In regard to oilseeds, the government must take a realistic view of the position as it exists today. Our major contact with the international oilseed position on the export side is through flaxseed. In 1948 flaxseed production in Canada amounted to 17·4 million bushels as compared with an average of 1·5 million bushels during the 1935-1939 period. Nineteen hundred and forty-eight production of flaxseed in the United States, traditionally an importer of flaxseed, is estimated at 50 million bushels as compared with an average production of 11 million bushels during the five years prior to the war. This expansion in acreage and production of flaxseed in Canada and United States has more than offset decreased production in the Argentine. It is now evident that all three countries will have surplus stocks of flaxseed or linseed oil available for export at the end of the present crop year, and of course additional supplies will be available through 1949 production.

I should say a word in regard to rapeseed and sunflower seed. There is practically no demand for rapeseed or rapeseed oil in Canada, and, as a result, this crop is almost entirely an export commodity and is therefore affected by the broader oilseed position which I have described. Sunflower seed is in a different position, being an edible vegetable oil which can be utilized in Canada. In my opinion sunflower seed oil will continue to have a good market in this country, and for that reason will not require continuing government support.

Under the circumstances the government is not prepared to encourage the production of oilseeds by establishing support prices for 1949-50. The position will be examined again at the beginning of the next crop year.

The government does not propose to provide specific floor prices for oats and barley produced outside of western Canada. In the opinion of the government, the interests of eastern producers marketing these grains as grain will be protected through support prices established for western oats and barley, which constitute the main stream of commercial supplies in this country.

It must be emphasized that the great bulk of oats and barley produced in eastern Canada and British Columbia is consumed on farms where grown, and does not enter into commercial channels except through livestock and livestock products. Not more than 100,000 bushels of oats and barley in eastern Canada are inspected and graded under the provisions of the Canada Grain Act, which indicates that the purely commercial movement of these grains is relatively unimportant as compared with farm consumption, and of course as compared with the commercial movement of western grains.

To the extent that eastern oats and barley are sold commercially, the producers concerned have a geographical advantage in that their prices are based broadly on the laid-down price of western grains at various points in eastern Canada. This statement is true even after allowing for the free freight policy which has been in effect for some years. There is nothing to indicate that producers in other parts of Canada who have oats and barley to sell commercially will not continue to have a price advantage, owing to the cost of shipping western oats and barley into local markets in eastern Canada.

With eastern production of oats and barley tied in closely with farm feeding, a very serious problem would arise if for some unexpected reason prices fell below a support level made effective in eastern Canada. The only practical way in which the Canadian wheat board or any other agency could implement floor policies in eastern Canada or in British Columbia would be to take delivery of these grains in carload lots in terminal positions. In this case feed grains would have to be shipped to areas where required for purchase under a price support program. The results would be to draw off feed grain supplies from areas in which they were required to maintain the existing livestock population. The subsequent redistribution of these supplies of oats and barley purchased by the organization responsible for maintaining support prices would be a difficult and costly undertaking. Should it be found that the floor price policy that I have outlined does not in fact protect the price of oats and barley grown in eastern Canada, means will be sought to remedy the situation.

Mr. Bracken: May I ask the minister if any change is proposed in the free freight policy with respect to coarse grains?

Mr. Howe: Government policy in that regard will be announced in due course.

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRESENTATION ON TUESDAY, MARCH 22

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I wish to inform the house that, barring unforeseen contingencies, I expect to bring down the budget a week from tonight at half past seven.

Mr. Knowles: A half hour earlier in the day than last year.

CANADA PRIZE ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZE MONEY

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to provide for the payment and distribution of prize money out of prize money presently and prospectively in the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY PACT

QUESTION AS TO SIGNING AND TABLING IN THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he expects the north Atlantic security pact to be signed and ready for tabling in the House of Commons?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It had been hoped that a draft of the north Atlantic security pact could be tabled this afternoon, and arrangements to that end were being made by the governments concerned. One government, however, has asked for a short delay. It is hoped now that the draft—of course it will not be signed—will be tabled and made public on Friday.

Mr. Graydon: The Secretary of State for External Affairs speaks of a draft pact. It will be the pact that has been agreed upon by the signatory nations?

Mr. Pearson: It will be a pact that has been agreed upon in principle by the governments concerned, subject to any changes they may wish to put forward at the conference which will be called for the signing of the pact. It is hoped that that conference will take place some time in April.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—PROVISION FOR INCREASE TO CERTAIN BENEFICIARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, notice of which I have sent him. Is the minister in a position to inform the house what steps are planned to meet the increased needs of recipients of war veterans allowance?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I should like to make the following answer.

It has become desirable to augment the benefits payable in certain cases to beneficiaries under the War Veterans Allowance Act, and steps are being taken to do so. In most cases the beneficiaries will be the now ageing veterans of world war I.

War veterans allowance recognizes in legislation the presumption that battle service does or may result in pre-ageing, even when no pensionable disability is incurred. In May, 1930, the act provided $20 per month single and $40 per month married. In 1940 these sums were raised to $30 and $60 respectively. In 1948 they were raised to $40 and $70 respectively.

Evidence before the veterans committee of the House of Commons in 1948 was to the effect that these rates were probably too low to meet the needs of some of the beneficiaries who had no other source of income. It was pointed out that this was a condition which was particularly likely to apply in the cities. During the interval between sessions my department made a survey of the situation. This survey established the fact that a percentage of urban dwelling war veterans allowance recipients with no other income were suffering real hardship. To meet this problem a substantial sum is included in the main estimates now tabled to be used to alleviate these conditions of hardship. Only those who are in receipt of the maximum war veterans allowance, and without other means of support, and who are unable to manage, will share in this fund.

Regional offices of the Department of Veterans Affairs are familiar with, or will discover, these cases of special need. Reasonable flexibility will be provided by regulation to make the fund operate quickly and effectively. Each case will be dealt with on its merits. Advantage will be taken of the close co-operation already existing between the Department of Veterans Affairs welfare officers and local welfare agencies. Every case investigated will be sympathetically considered in terms of the local situation. Help given may be temporary to meet an emergent condition, or it may be on a monthly basis while the special need continues.

In no instance will the supplementary grant exceed $120 per annum single and $180 per annum married. This meets in these cases the most generous increase suggested by any national veterans organization, that is, $10 per month single and $15 per month married. Regulations governing the administration of the fund are now being prepared. When completed they will be submitted to the governor in council and tabled when approved. It is planned to begin payment at an early date after the item in the estimates provided for this program shall have been approved by parliament.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of the statement he has just made. Will imperials be included who have lived twenty years in Canada? Will those who served in England during the first war also be included in this increase? They are not getting a pension now.

Mr. Gregg: Under this plan only those who are now in receipt of, or who may become in receipt of, war veterans allowance, will be eligible.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister if the act will be amended.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bentley: May I ask the minister whether these payments, when they are passed by the house, will be retroactive?

Mr. Gregg: No.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Knowles: Will the increase be available to widows who qualify under the War Veterans Allowance Act?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Wright: Will all cases of veterans who are now receiving the maximum pension be automatically reviewed by the department? Or will those receiving the maximum pension have to make special application to have their cases reviewed?

Mr. Gregg: If the hon. member will read the statement, I think he will see that I made that clear. If not, I shall be glad to answer his question at another time.

Mr. MacNicol: Does this provision for increases include the so-called nonpensioned widows, and the South African veterans?

Mr. Gregg: I think I partly covered that in my answer to a previous question. The proposed assistance will apply only, when approved, to those who are now in receipt of war veterans allowance and without any other means of support.

Mr. Brooks: If I might ask the minister a further question, will he introduce a bill to amend the act, or will this be done by order in council?

Mr. Abbott: An item in the estimates.

Mr. Gregg: In reality neither course mentioned by the hon. member will be followed. The assistance will be provided for by an item in the main estimates.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is this not a recommendation that was put forward by the veterans affairs committee last year, when so many members were absent for other reasons?

Mr. McKay: In view of the statement just made by the minister with respect to increased allowances, may I ask whether he is now prepared to make a statement with regard to the claim of the student veterans for increases?

Mr. Gregg: I shall be glad to answer that question at an early day.

PACIFIC DEFENCE PACT

PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN DISCUSSIONS AMONG COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Press dispatches yesterday afternoon and today have indicated that John Dedman, Australian defence minister, made a statement in Canberra to the effect that discussions are under way there among representatives of Great Britain, New Zealand and Australia for a Pacific defence pact similar to the north Atlantic security pact, and embracing the British commonwealth and other countries. Can the minister tell us whether or not Canada will be taking part in this Pacific pact?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have seen the press dispatch referred to. We have received no information concerning any discussions in Australia with regard to the formation of a Pacific defence pact. Certainly this government has not been invited to participate in any such discussions, if they are taking place.

Mr. Green: Would Canada be willing to join a Pacific pact?

Mr. Pearson: I think that is a hypothetical question.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO ROUTE THROUGH BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, notice of which I sent to his office yesterday. Can the minister say what is the present position with respect to the route of the trans-Canada highway in British Columbia? Can he say whether he will establish a highway commission—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not see any urgency in the question of the hon. member. I suggest to him that he put it on the order paper.

Mr. Fulton: It is an urgent question. May I say why it is urgent? I point out respectfully that the route of the trans-Canada highway—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

QUESTION AS TO INCREASE IN BASIC RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the basic rate for old age pensions is lower than that for war veterans allowances is the minister in a position to say whether or not the Old Age Pensions Act will be amended to provide for an increase such as was suggested?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As my hon. friend will appreciate, all I can say at this moment is that government policy will be announced in due course.

Mr. Knowles: Will it be announced before the election?

IMMIGRATION

QUESTION AS TO MEDICAL EXAMINATION—PERMITS FOR ENTRY INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): On March 11 I asked the Prime Minister a question in regard to the medical examination of immigrants. Further in regard to that matter I should like to ask whether those who have entered Canada illegally and who have been permitted to remain under order in council were given a medical examination or X-rayed before the order in council was passed, or were they X-rayed or medically examined at all?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Fraser: It is not a question for the order paper.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I differ with the hon. member; I think it is a question that could very well be put on the order paper. It is one about which two or three departments would have to confer to prepare an answer, and this is an additional reason for its being placed on the order paper.

Mr. Fraser: Only one department would have to give the answer.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is not the business of the Prime Minister to examine immigrants, and in order to give the hon. member an answer I should have to get the information from others.

Mr. Fraser: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fraser: The Prime Minister brought this up last Friday.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member directed a question to the Prime Minister and he has had his answer. I would ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Fraser: I am not at all satisfied with the answer.

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

COST OF LIVING BONUS OR OTHER SUPPLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Fraser: He may not have time to answer you.

Mr. Knowles: Did the Prime Minister meet a representative or representatives of the superannuated civil servants in Quebec city and give an assurance that the request of these people for a cost of living bonus or other supplement would be considered? If so, can he say whether such consideration has been given, and what decision has been reached?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): So far as I can remember, I did not meet any representatives of the superannuated civil servants in Quebec city prior to the session or since the session began. I received a letter in October asking me to meet such a delegation, and my secretary replied stating that I should be glad to consider whatever representations they wished to put in writing. They did make representations to me in writing, and I answered along the lines of the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), as a government statement, in January, 1948, which was repeated in this house on January 28, 1949. For the further information of my hon. friend I may say that if he wishes to see a copy of the letter, I have it available here, and should be glad to send it over to him.

Mr. Knowles: I was hoping the Prime Minister would be more helpful than the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fraser: He answers a bedfellow but he won't answer me.

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Monday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

And the motion of Mr. Casselman: "That the question be now put."

Mr. C. C. I. Merritt (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening I had pointed out that the government had given hon. members no assurance that they were following policies which would enable them within a year, by bringing about adequate production of the articles under control, to be able to abandon these wartime controls they are maintaining on our free peacetime economy. Further I had suggested that this debate gave us an opportunity to require from the government statements as to their production policies in connection with steel, housing and the certain articles of food still under control. As a third point I had asserted that the Canadian people do not want controls over various articles they need, but that rather they want adequate supplies of those commodities now in short supply, and that particularly they want and urgently need adequate housing. These five wartime controls which the government seeks power to continue are not a coherent policy. Rather, Mr. Speaker, these five controls stick out just like five sore thumbs, showing the Canadian people where the government has fallen down in stimulating the production of those things we require. For instance, steel control indicates that the government, which has had absolute control over the steel industry for many years, has failed to ensure sufficient manufacturing capacity to meet our demands and, in the alternative, has failed to obtain from foreign sources the amount of steel required to make up the shortage in the domestic supply.

The remaining price controls are very interesting. They number thirteen; and if you examine the commodities still under control you find that none of them is necessarily in short physical supply. You find that each of these remaining price controls can be traced directly to another government policy and, in particular, to another government control. There is a perfect illustration of how certain controls breed other controls. Of these thirteen price controls, eight are on fruits and vegetables and are the direct result of the government's import restriction program. If there were no import restriction program, there would be no need for any of these controls. As a matter of fact, each of these commodities had been decontrolled and controls were restored when the austerity program became effective.

Of the remaining five, two of the controls are on sugar and molasses. The reason for the maintenance of these two controls is that this government still persists in state trading. We had a debate upon this subject in the house last year in connection with sugar control. We were promised by the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), who was then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, that it was likely that state trading in sugar would stop with the end of 1948. We find that control still being continued, however, and presumably state trading is still being continued. The people who provided us with sugar for so many years before the war are not permitted to carry out their usual function.

The remaining three controls, namely on bread, butter and flour, are designed to offset shortages which I suggest are not caused by the war, but are shortages directly resulting from the personal control exercised by the Minister of Agriculture over the agricultural policies of Canada.

The two controls on rent and priorities are simply an admission of the failure of the government in the housing field. To a great extent, they are designed to insulate the Canadian people from the administrative failures of this government. I want to confine the remainder of my remarks to the question of rent control and housing production because, as I was stressing last night, the manner in which the government is failing to stimulate the production of houses is going to lengthen the time during which rent control will be necessary.

First of all, let me assert my belief that proper legislation in respect of rent control is still necessary. So long as we have the acute shortage of housing that exists in the country today, and so long as the government's policies are such that people are not encouraged to build rental housing, it would seem to me that the need for control may continue for a considerable time. This does not mean that rent control is good. It does not mean that it is the sort of thing we want to see perpetuated in our economy. It is a necessary evil. Any government which has to request an extension of that kind of control five years after the war has not conducted its housing policies in the way the Canadian people expect. Because such a control may be necessary, Mr. Speaker, that does not preclude criticism of the measure, nor does it make it a holy thing which one must not touch.

Last night the member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) attempted to frighten me, I think, with the bogey that if I was against rent control I would not be re-elected. A threat of that kind, Mr. Speaker, is nonsense. It is not that I am against rent control now. I do not fear rent control at this moment under these circumstances. What I do fear is a government which will sit down on its most important responsibility. This government has put us in real danger of perpetual rent control, and that is the thing I do not want to see. I do not think the member for Vancouver North wants to see it. I am sure there is no one in Canada, either landlord or tenant, and certainly not one of the homeless veterans, who wants to see rent control go on for ever.

I am not raising bogeys when I suggest perpetual rent control. I imagine all the members of this house have received within the last few days a pamphlet which discloses that France has had rent control since some date during the first war, and has been unable to get rid of it during the many years since the first war. I say the time has arrived in this country when this rent control, which is still necessary to protect tenants, is working great hardships and great inequities upon many landlords in Canada. I think this control is deterring the construction of rental housing, so that the minister of reconstruction will be called upon for redoubled efforts in the rental housing field. I suggest it is distorting the natural distribution of housing in this country, and is putting a price premium on recently vacated or new housing accommodation. The new accommodation is not under control and the result is that the supply is limited and its cost is out of reach of most of the Canadian people who want homes.

Furthermore, this control is creating difficulties between controlled landlords and post-control landlords. I suggest to the members of the house, and particularly to the members of the government, that rent control cannot go on for ever in its present state. Each year the housing shortage continues and the need to protect people in the lower income group remains; each year the injustices against landlords grow. The time is coming, and it will not be too long delayed, when these injustices will be so great there will have to be a revision of this control. Landlords as a class, Mr. Speaker, are not the sinister type of top-hatted individual that many members of the party to my left and some members of the government would like us to believe. A large number of the landlords in this country are entirely dependent upon the earnings of their houses and apartments for their livelihood. A large number of them have sunk their savings in housing accommodation so that they might have an income for themselves in their old age. Many of the people in this class known as landlords, whom one might envisage as rich men, as a matter of fact occupy a suite in their own apartment building and do the janitor work themselves.

From that class of people we have a continued stream of correspondence complaining not simply against low rents but against the fact that the whole burden of this control is being placed on their shoulders, and that they are finding it difficult to make ends meet under it. All these people have been squeezed between fixed rents and doubled costs of fuel, repairs and living expenses and they have found it necessary to defer repairs and to do a minimum of decoration and renovation of their places. Now they are beginning to see new, modern apartments springing up probably in the same districts in which their own are located, and they are naturally fretting against a control which they see is designed against themselves alone.

It is under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, that the government come in, without a word of explanation of their resolution and without any attempt to recognize and remedy these injustices of which I speak, and ask simply for continuation of this control. I think hon. members of the house should examine the case a little bit more closely than that. The government have offered us no housing production policy, nor, by way of amendment to the rent control measure, any scheme which will preserve rent control to do the necessary work that it must do and yet will ameliorate these injustices of which I speak. The government's policy apparently is simply one of frank admission of failure and a request for the continuation of controls.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Merritt: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is the hon. member not in favour of a floor price, for instance, on butter?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: The Tory members do not want that off farm butter, or are afraid to say so.

Mr. Merritt: If the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) will allow me to continue with my remarks, I should like to do so. That question is on a different subject.

Mr. Cruickshank: The Conservative party do not want to answer, apparently; they are afraid to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: There is a big farm vote.

Mr. Merritt: Here is the situation, Mr. Speaker. The government asks for the continuation of this control for one year. Yet the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), speaking on January 29, is reported to have said that, if he achieves his target of houses for this coming year, it will not begin to solve the housing problem. Without further explanation that seems to me to be just a warning that this measure is really not for one year, that the government are not on top of the housing problem, and that if we do not require something more from the minister than we have already had we shall be faced next year with the same debate, the same problem and the same injustices.

I want to say to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that there is only one answer to this vexing problem of rent control, namely, the production of many more units of rental housing than he at present contemplates. I suggest to him that the government must not be content just to count as a discharge of their responsibilities an annual increase in an inadequate program of housing. Rather they must set their sights much higher than that. If the minister thinks that on present supplies of material and labour he can see one hundred thousand houses completed in the year 1949, and if that number of houses—even though it is more than last year's supply—will still do little to bring about an adequate supply of housing for the Canadian people, he must set his sights much higher. He must double his target; he must say, if you like, two hundred thousand houses. Then if he fails in reaching an adequate target, he will have measured his failure and he will not have that anchor to windward upon which to fall back, namely, that he has achieved the target that he set for himself.

I do not think that two hundred thousand houses is a target that the minister would be foolish to shoot at. I think that a target like that is one which the Canadian economy might come close to reaching if it were given the proper incentives by this government. I suggest to the minister that he reconsider the target of one hundred thousand houses, that he calls upon industry not to be satisfied with a small increase over last year in their production of building materials, and not to be satisfied with their present plant, but to create new capital plant so that a much larger supply of building materials can be produced.

I suggest to the minister that a larger program would require a much greater supply of skilled labour in the building trades. If he has not in Canada a supply of skilled labour able to meet a much larger program, there is a good way in which he can find those new people. He can find them with their skills already developed and can bring them here; and he can train more under vocational training schemes. If he really wants to do so, he can vastly expand the production of building materials and of houses much over any target he has at present. But if he is to do that, if he is to step up his target to something which would really satisfy the Canadian people, there is one further thing that will be required of him; it is that he give to the construction industry, and to those private firms whom he will be asking to increase their investment in their capital equipment, a feeling of long-term assurance of a sustained demand for housing. If he can do that, and if he can get the Canadian business firms which are engaged in this type of production to believe that this demand for housing will not be over this year or next but rather that it will go on through the years, I think he will get an adequate response from Canadian business and that he will surprise himself as to the target which he can really achieve.

In order that he may give Canadian business that assurance, all that his government need to do is to stop this policy of a controlled and restricted economy, reverse it completely, and give to private business in this country the assurance that, through all the lifetimes of those who now manage those affairs, there is to be an ever-expanding economy in Canada, with more people, more business and a greater production all through the years. If the government will give to the building trades that assurance of a long-term sustained demand, they will get all the housing they need, and they will get it quickly.

Before taking my seat I should like to make two further suggestions to the government. The first is that rental control and housing should be placed at once under one minister, and I suggest it should be the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). In my view we should bring the two sides of this housing problem together—the production side and the control side. If the minister who is responsible for the production of housing will accept responsibility for rent control as well, then I suggest we will have one member of the government who really feels his responsibility in respect of housing, with all its difficulties.

At the present time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) administers the dead hand of rent control, and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is responsible for housing. There is very little opportunity of bringing home to the Minister of Finance the difficulties in connection with housing, or of bringing home to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply the problems being created under rent control through the failure of the government to attack the housing problem promptly and successfully.

I believe it would be a good thing if the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply had to answer landlords and tenants as well as homeless people, particularly veterans. I believe his headaches over rent control would spur him on to a much greater effort in the field of housing.

The second suggestion I would make is that, even though controls should remain, landlords must be given some immediate relief. If rent control is to be of prolonged duration, if it is to be continued throughout this year and probably next year, then let us bring it out in the open, regularize it and face up to its problems. The chief of those problems now is that landlords are being required to foot the bill.

I suggest the house has a responsibility toward that class of Canadians as well as toward any other, and must see that landlords are no longer singled out to carry the full burden of subsidizing rentals for the government—because that is what they are doing. Even though I do not like subsidies any more than anyone else, if we are to have them they should be government subsidies, and no single class in the country should be saddled with the whole financial burden of a general public policy. That is the condition now.

Then I suggest that actual subsidy may not be necessary. It might be possible in this year's budget to exempt all landlords who come under controls from income tax on their earnings, and in this way restore them to a position of parity with other landlords. That suggestion I throw out in all seriousness.

Now that we are discussing the continuation of rent controls, a subject which members of the house cannot pass over without giving it careful consideration—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Cruickshank: Tell us about butter; tell us about your party's policy on butter.

Mr. Merritt: I should like to say one last sentence.

Some hon. Members: Time.

An hon. Member: Go on.

Mr. Cruickshank: We are not like Rosedale; go ahead.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the resolution which the house is now debating provides that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war. I draw attention to the words, "certain orders and regulations of the governor in council."

The only explanation the house has received as to the nature of the measure the government seeks leave to introduce is in the brief statement drawn out of two ministers, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on February 7. In support of a measure as important as this one, we have had very brief statements which were literally wrung out of these two ministers. One of them said in effect, "this is to continue five types of controls", and the other minister spoke briefly about his plans with respect to the controls coming within the jurisdiction of his department.

It is clear from their remarks, particularly those of the Minister of Finance, that the bill is to be one to which certain orders in council will be annexed, and that the house will be asked in blanket fashion to give statutory effect to orders in council. In other words, the method pursued in previous years by the government with respect to this type of legislation—an altogether wrong method—is to be continued again, if the house will submit to it. And I urge that the house ought not to submit to a wrong method of legislating.

There are three obvious features to this resolution. The first is that it contemplates the present existence of a national emergency, and that the orders and regulations should be continued as long as the national emergency continues, within the time limit proposed in the bill to follow.

I do not wish to labour this point, because it was dealt with in such a masterly and comprehensive fashion by my esteemed leader yesterday, and I think it is crystal clear and needs no further elaboration. I simply mention that where one finds controls as varied as those referred to by the two ministers in their brief statements, it is not enough from the constitutional and legal point of view simply to make a general recital to the effect that a national emergency exists. Particularly in view of the latest judicial pronouncement on the subject by the Manitoba court of appeal with respect to establishing the existence of a national emergency in connection with a particular problem with which the legislation seeks to deal, the course the government is taking is not adequate. This judgment holds that with respect to each of the problems referred to it is necessary that the existence of a state of national emergency be established in order that validity may be acquired for the legislation the house is asked to adopt.

The second obvious feature is that the house is simply being asked to continue existing orders in council. It is not being given the opportunity of proceeding in the proper and normal legislative fashion, and of following parliamentary methods through the submission of a bill containing detailed provisions which the House of Commons, in obedience to its duty, would review before giving the bill three readings. The house is not to be given that opportunity.

This inherently wrong method is again being pursued. We will simply have orders in council handed to us and we will be told to approve them, lock, stock and barrel. That simply is not good enough. If it cannot make up its own mind as to what to do in connection with detailed provisions of orders in council, the minimum the government ought to have done was to follow the procedure the house insisted upon when in the 1946 session the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) introduced a bill to give legislative approval in general terms to an order in council having to do with reinstatement in civil employment.

What the house insisted on at that time was that the bill should not be given second reading but that the subject matter be referred to the special committee on veterans affairs. That committee, instead of reporting the order in council to the house, wrote a proper bill. Surely if this government is capable of learning a lesson it should have learned that lesson, and learned it long ago. I shall have something to say about the orders at a later point.

The government is now asking us to continue the vice of delegating power. First, this house is being asked to delegate in a sense legislative approval to orders in council, and then the orders in council themselves will delegate great and sweeping powers to certain boards and officials, particularly one board. That is an inherently wrong method. In 1949, nearly four years after V-E day, I submit that there can no longer be any justification for asking this house to legislate in that holus-bolus fashion.

If the house does permit the bill to be introduced in the form contemplated, and I hope it will not, I trust the government is not going to attempt to do what it did in 1947 with the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act. When that measure was first introduced the government did not even set out the text of the orders as an appendix to the bill. Reference was made to them only by number and this house had no opportunity of confirming the text of the orders to which it was being asked to give legislative effect.

The third obvious feature of this resolution is the multiplicity of subjects which is embraced within its scope. We were told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), as reported at page 316 of Hansard, that it is to continue five types of control. First, price control over certain commodities; second, rent control; third, steel control and price control over steel; fourth, timber control; and, fifth, priorities control.

May I recall to the house what happened two years ago when the government introduced a similar omnibus bill which was characterized by the same looseness which characterizes the method being followed by the government in connection with the present resolution. At that time the government sought permission to introduce a measure to give omnibus approval to no fewer than fifty-seven orders in council. Thank goodness we are not being asked by this inherently wrong method to give legislative approval to so many orders in council, but nevertheless the same principle applies here. The house must assert its adherence to principle unless it is content to lie down and let this government steamroller things through as it has in the past.

Hon. members will remember the significant words that were spoken in 1947 in the debate on that measure. I hope the house has not forgotten the memorable speech delivered on that occasion by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). He drew attention to the inherently dangerous method of legislating in that omnibus fashion. He drew attention to the duty of the house to scrutinize a resolution of this kind before giving approval to the introduction of a measure to be based thereon. Significantly he recalled the storm of protest which the Liberal party, under the former Prime Minister who was then leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), raised in 1932 to a relatively simple resolution introduced by the then Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett, in which two subjects had been linked together. Those subjects, unemployment and farm relief, were clearly related, but the rafters rang with the indignant protests of the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) at what was said to be an invasion of the rights of parliament.

That same party now seeks to repeat the monstrous imposition upon parliament which was perpetrated by it in 1947. May I recall to you the closing words of the memorable speech delivered on March 20, 1947, by the hon. member for Quebec South, who had this to say, as reported on page 1595 of Hansard of that date:

> My last objection is that, by passing this resolution and bringing in the bill, in the shape in which it will be brought in, we are creating an extremely dangerous precedent. We are preparing the way for the time when any government or a government which will not have the same respect for ancient constitutional usages and practices will be in power in this country, and when they come in they will have ready-made at their hand such legislation as will enable them at once to put into effect their theories and the practice in which they believe.
> I have said before and said many a time that I have no objection to a great many of their theories. I would like to see many of them put into practice if they could do away with the regimentation that goes with them. But I certainly do not want to be a member of a party which will prepare the way and make it easier for them when they do come into power to carry out what I believe to be false principles in a democracy. In other words, I do not want to be a St. John the Baptist for a socialist messiah.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Hon. members of the C.C.F. can laugh, but I say to this house that there is exposed in that memorable speech of the hon. member for Quebec South one of the inherent vices of the method now being pursued by this government, a practice and policy which seems so acceptable to their allies, the socialist C.C.F. It is small wonder that on occasions like this the socialist C.C.F. group are ready to rally to the support of the government and applaud the efforts of the government to continue in force, by methods that are worthy only of condemnation by this house, legislation and orders in council which ought not to be dealt with in the way in which this house is being asked to deal with them.

Mr. Probe: Perhaps the hon. member will explain why the Liberals are supported by the Tories in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

Mr. Fleming: There seems to be a loud outburst from the hon. gentleman to my left. If he wishes to indicate his sincere devotion to a principle which is inherently wrong he will have an opportunity in due course.

I drew attention at the outset of my remarks to the fact that the government has not attempted to offer any alternative policies. The government has not attempted to put into force any policies which would eliminate the necessity of dealing with questions of this kind, policies that would get to the root of the matter and deal with the problems. Instead we see an impotent and useless government slithering around the problems in the slipshod fashion that has characterized its continuing adherence to power. The government has always been ready to use existing problems as an excuse for requesting the continuation of sweeping arbitrary powers rather than trying to cure the problems.

That is the fundamental accusation I make. That is the fundamental difference between the Progressive Conservative party and this government in connection with measures of this kind. The government have not attempted to grapple with the problems; they have ignored the problems. They come now to the house and ask to be clothed with arbitrary powers, using these problems as a pretext. The problems themselves should be grappled with and solved by proper legislative practices and administrative policy on the part of the government.

We are told that certain orders and regulations are to be continued. What are these orders and regulations? We have some idea because of the imposing residue, I may say, that remains of the orders to which statutory effect was given in 1947 by the passing of the Transitional Measures Act, chapter 16 of that year. I wish to draw attention to certain provisions in some of these orders and regulations because I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that, while problems exist related to these questions, the fact of the matter is that the house cannot, if it really seriously addresses itself to its task of reviewing the proposals to which it is asked to give legislative effect, continue powers as sweeping as those that are asked for. Just briefly I draw your attention to order in council P.C. 8528, which is the general order establishing the wartime prices and trade board, and conferring powers upon it. Section 4 of that order confers the most sweeping powers upon the wartime prices and trade board, powers that the government sought to justify when we were in the midst of a war crisis, but conditions today do not bear sufficient resemblance to the conditions that existed then to justify this house in continuing powers as sweeping as those.

Let me remind the house that this order in council to which I have referred does not simply give the wartime prices and trade board power to impose price control; it also gives the board power to impose wage and salary controls. Every member who supports this measure is supporting a continuation of power in the hands of the wartime prices and trade board to reimpose salary and wage controls. For my part I am not prepared to support any measure that would permit the reimposition of salary controls or wage controls.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Isn't that sad?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, we have heard the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson) make his annual one-sentence contribution to the debates of the house. He says, "isn't that sad?" I will tell him that, if he goes into his riding, gives his electors a frank statement, and says that he advocates asking the house to pass legislation that will give power to the wartime prices and trade board to reimpose wage controls and salary controls, he will not come back to this house.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Don't you worry about him; he will be back all right.

Mr. Fleming: He will not be back. I will be saying goodbye to him on the dissolution of the house.

Mr. Garson: Goodbye to you.

Mr. Fleming: He is not the only one to whom we will be sending flowers.

The socialist members to the left, Mr. Speaker, will also have to justify their support of a measure that will give the wartime prices and trade board power to reimpose wage controls and salary controls.

Let me pass on to section 8, which puts upon the person charged with a breach of the order the onus of proving that he has not committed a breach of the order in respect of the price at which he sells his goods. That is entirely undemocratic. It is just as antithetical as anything can be to the things we are supposed to stand for in this Canadian parliament. I submit to the house that if it has retained its sense of duty and sense of self-respect it cannot possibly approve measures of that kind. One may go through the other orders that will be continued by the bill to follow, if the house permits it.

Order No. P.C 9029 again gives sweeping powers to the wartime prices and trade board to enter any premises, and examine any books of people whom they suspect of having committed any breach of the leasehold regulations. No warrant is needed; they can just walk into premises and take over the books. That is the kind of legislation that the government is asking us to continue under the guise of giving them power to deal with a particular problem. The problem is there, of course it is; but it ought not to be made the excuse for arbitrary and high-handed methods of that kind.

There is a similar criticism of the order on steel control, P.C. 245. With respect to steel that order contains some of the most sweeping provisions that the mind of man could devise. Under section 3 of that order the steel controller can take possession of steel wherever he finds it. He can enter on any land, and into any mine, plant, factory, mill and other buildings for the purpose of inspecting operations. He can enter on, take possession of and utilize any mine, land, plant, factory, mill, refinery, smelter, foundry, warehouse, building, or place that is used or capable of being used for the purpose of producing or dealing in or with steel, and other things in relation to steel. In the year 1949 is this house going to justify the continuation of powers as sweeping as those? The situation that exists cannot, by any stretch of a reasonable mind, be treated as an excuse for the continuation of powers like these.

There is a similar situation with the order establishing timber control, P.C. 1997. The timber controller has power, among many other things, to enter on, take possession of and utilize any land or premises or any plant, building, place, equipment or facilities used or capable of being used for producing and/or dealing in timber. He can produce or deal in timber; he can do many other things. There is nothing in the situation today that justifies a continuation of vast powers such as these.

A similar provision exists in the order dealing with priorities, P.C. 1609. Do the members of the house realize that section 2 of this order gives the priorities officer power to prohibit the making of, or dealing in, construction materials? It does not stop with giving the priorities officer power to control and regulate the making of or dealing in construction material; he has the power to prohibit. Any good citizen who is interested and engaged in the production of these materials should know that it will lie within the power of the priorities officer to step in and to prohibit him from continuing his operation if these orders are continued in force in their present form.

Running through all these orders there is that vice, to which I drew attention earlier in my remarks, of the power to delegate power, to delegate to officials power to do many things under these orders. They are powers that no self-respecting House of Commons can contemplate being conferred by it upon officials.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that these orders mark again the determination of the government to retain power that is centralized at Ottawa, the kind of power that the C.C.F. want to see centralized here. Again, in a measure of this kind, the C.C.F. see eye to eye with the Liberal party. The C.C.F., in the program it laid down at its convention last summer, advocated again the appointment of a national planning board. They want to see the constitution changed in order that power can be concentrated in a national planning board and thus control the economy of the country. They want to see the constitution changed in order that there may be vested in the government power to regulate all trade and commerce. It is all of a piece with the proposals of the league for social reconstruction in the book they put out in 1935, "Social Planning in Canada", when they advocated the establishment of a national planning board of three or not more than five persons to plan the economy, a vision of a super-centralized Canada. To the extent that the C.C.F. can see in this measure the fulfilment of their hopes—and they can see a good deal in it—they will of course applaud it and support it to the limit.

Again, Mr. Speaker, measures of this kind, seeking to continue powers that cannot be justified in the face of present conditions, powers that go far beyond the needs of the government to deal with existing problems, are definitely socialistic. Those are the controls the C.C.F. want to see made permanent, and of course the government is very obliging.

I have spoken about the continuation of wage control made possible by this measure. This is also akin to the measures which are being foisted on the British people today by the socialist government over there, in the form of direction of labour and direction of agriculture. Mr. Speaker, if any workingman in this country wants to be ordered around, wants to have direction of labour in peacetime, then certainly he ought to vote for the C.C.F. at the coming general election, or for the semi-socialist Liberal party, to your right. If any farmer in this country believes in directed agriculture, believes the government should be given power to tell him what to grow and power to take his land from him if he does not do what the government representative tells him, then certainly he should vote for the socialist C.C.F. or the semi-socialist Liberal party.

Then we must not forget the contribution the C.C.F. would make to the solution of our problems. I well recall, as I hope you do, Mr. Speaker, the contribution made to the debates of this house on October 5, 1945, by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), probably the most frankly spoken member of the C.C.F. party in this house. I always give the hon. member credit for speaking frankly, and I wish some of his colleagues would follow his example. Here is what he said, speaking on a very significant subject, at page 821 of Hansard for 1945:

> . . . when the war is over, the debt should be cancelled. There is no reason why when they come back and go into overalls, into plants and factories, they should start to pay tribute by way of interest to people who sat back comfortably and secure and invested their money. The national debt, apart from the interest, we owe to ourselves. It is not a liability but an asset.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: There you have in very plain terms a demand for repudiation of our national debt. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) was one of those who just now said "Hear, hear" to that proposal; so there is at least one other member of that group on record on this subject.

And they talk to high heaven about the virtues of planning. It is a very euphonious term to disguise the raw realities of socialism, and the regimentation which is inherent in socialistic planning. They can dress it up all they like, but it is still the same ugly regimentation.

To be quite clear on this, Mr. Speaker, the system of free competitive enterprise in which this Progressive Conservative party believes is not a system that can be compromised or confused with the kind of socialistic planning these hon. members seek to support. I quote to you a statement from a responsible Canadian businessman, the chairman of the executive of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, who recently made this intelligent observation in stressing the differences between this system of so-called socialistic planning on the one hand and the system of free competitive enterprise on the other:

> One of the most important factors that distinguishes our system—

That is, the free competitive system.

> —from planned economy is not the absence of planning, but that the planning of industry comes from the consumer rather than from the planning board of an all-powerful state.

That is a significant observation.

We want to see an end to the kind of procedure that prevails when more and more powers are vested in the government and they proceed to exercise those powers in secret. There was a significant occurrence in this house last week when a request was made for the tabling in the house of certain papers and documents pertaining to a crown company. A minister of the crown, supported by the C.C.F., rose in his place and said, "No, we do not want to set up a precedent by bringing into this house papers in relation to a crown corporation". That is an example of what would happen under a socialist economy; they do not want to bring into the House of Commons things that this house ought to know about. That is why they like to have things done behind the closed doors of the privy council chamber.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question?

Mr. Fleming: We of the Progressive Conservative party believe that the place to pass legislation is out in the open, not in secret sessions or in the privy council.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: Oh, I suppose so.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you. Does the hon. member know what has been the attitude of the government of Ontario, of which the hon. member's leader was formerly head, with regard to the tabling of documents in the Ontario legislature concerning the Ontario hydro? That is a case absolutely on all fours with the matter that came up last week.

Mr. Fleming: I do not know the particular reference my hon. friend has in mind, and until I do know it I am not prepared to make any statement from memory. What does the hon. member expect? I suppose in the legislature of Ontario at this session there have been fifty speeches on the subject of hydro.

Mr. Knowles: The fact is that your leader refused to table documents which were on all fours with the documents that were the subject of the vote the other day.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: It is so interesting to see the hon. member coming to the rescue of the government. How he does love to find himself in bed side by side with the government opposite. All I have to say to him is that he is welcome to it; we want none of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the time that remains to me I wish to comment briefly on one or two other matters. The subject of housing has been dealt with already by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) in his constructive contribution to the debate. It was made quite clear by my leader in his remarks yesterday that an adverse vote on this omnibus resolution by any member of this party is not to be considered as opposition to rent control, a proper statutory measure of rent control. That has been made abundantly clear by the observations of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) at pages 1446 and 1448 of Hansard yesterday, so let there be no misunderstanding of the attitude of the members of this official opposition, of which I think we had a veiled suggestion last evening in the question asked by a member to your right, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of rent control. It has to be a proper measure; it has to be a measure in proper statutory form, not something hidden in an omnibus resolution of this kind.

The government has made a sorry botch and failure of housing, which was the subject of some of those juicy promises on which they got themselves elected in 1945. May I here express publicly to my esteemed and hon. friend the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) my profound sympathy, in that his admission to the charmed government circle should have been on the basis of his acceptance of such a lemon as was fobbed off on him by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). That minister, having made one of the most lamentable failures in Canadian government history in dealing with this housing problem, now passes it off on the unsuspecting Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I wish to say to the minister in all sincerity that in anything I have to say on the subject of housing, either in this house or elsewhere, I shall have due sympathy for the unhappy position in which he now vicariously finds himself.

Not a word has fallen from the lips of a member of the government this session as to how they are going to cope with the housing crisis. When I spoke in this house on February 3 during the debate on the speech from the throne, I quoted figures indicating that according to statements made by leading government officials the housing crisis in Canada is just as serious today as it was three years ago. Our net progress in three years under this administration has been absolutely nil. Put that fact, Mr. Speaker, against those juicy promises which the government held out to the people in 1945.

What are they doing to encourage the people who have accommodation in the form of one room or two rooms that they would be prepared to rent if it were not for the freezing controls which apply to shared accommodation? What are they doing about that? We argued this question at great length two years ago. We asked the government to eliminate the freezing controls from shared accommodation as applied to tenancies thereafter created. The government, of course, turned a deaf ear to anything in the form of a constructive suggestion. Apparently, they are content that the problem should continue.

We will never see a solution of this housing problem, of such critical proportions in this country, so long as there is manifested on the part of this government such a smug and self-complacent attitude as was exhibited in this chamber last night when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) crowed about eighty-one thousand houses. I should like to say to him, and to any other member of the government who shares his smugness in the face of the critical housing situation, that the people of Canada know the government has made absolutely no progress in three years, with all its boasting and blustering, and has failed lamentably in the discharge of its duty to the people of Canada.

In the short space of time that remains I cannot say all I had intended to say. I shall close with this observation. There are many things the government could do to meet the problem of inflation, because we have inflation in Canada. One of the things that is so obvious, and to which the government closes its eyes, is the matter of money supply. Taking the last issue of the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Speaker, one can see that within the last four months the money supply in Canada, which is controlled by the Bank of Canada, is higher than it has ever been in the country's history, $4,500 million. All through 1948 the money supply has increased out of all proportion to the rate of increase in industrial and commercial activity. Is it any wonder that all through 1948 the dollar has gone down in value and the price level has risen? There is something to which the government could address itself, if it had the courage and energy to do so.

There is one place where the government could make a most effective and constructive contribution towards meeting the problem of the Canadian consumer, the high cost of living and the higher scale of taxation; but will the government do anything? They have turned a deaf ear to the pleas that have been made for tax relief, pleas that have been made on behalf of the suffering Canadian people. The government has chosen for itself the role of oppressor of the Canadian people by continuing its extortionate taxes which cannot be justified in times like these.

We know it is part and parcel of the communist strategy to foment a depression in the free western countries wherever it is possible. It is part of their scheme to bring about chaos by the advent of the depression. They have been working for that, Mr. Speaker. Did it not shock you then to see a statement recently made by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), which is quoted in the Montreal Gazette dated December 31, 1948? This dispatch reads as follows:

> Ottawa, December 30: C.C.F. leader M. J. Coldwell admitted here tonight that there was little possibility that Canada would have a "democratic socialist" government in the immediate future unless the dominion entered a period of economic distress.

You know now, Mr. Speaker, who wants to see economic distress in this country because of the political advantages it would give them. It is the duty of the members of this house to assert that they will be true to their responsibility to the Canadian people and work in this house for such proper and constitutional measures as will contribute to the lasting prosperity, happiness and freedom of the Canadian people.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I know that this is not the place to have a discussion on the measure now before the house. It is really a resolution asking for the right to introduce a bill. I have sat here now for the better part of two days and listened to seven Conservatives stand in their places and sing the same swan song. I think it is time the tune was changed. In my opinion, the tactics being employed are designed to stop the introduction of the bill. Every argument they advanced, from the leader to the last gentleman who spoke, this little merchant of the spoken word, it was the same story. It has been a straight argument on behalf of big business and the protection of capital. The basis of their argument is that capital has a prior right over the rights of the human being. The government has no right to enter the picture to protect the rights of the little people.

The hon. member who just spoke went out of his way to antagonize people. I think it is unbecoming, you know, because I like him. At one time, I told him that if I were ever being tried for murder, he would be my lawyer. He asked me why, and I said, "For the simple reason that I would die of old age before the case reached the jury." I do not like to see him disillusioned. The way he carried on this afternoon, I would not be sure when he went in the courtroom on whose side he would be. I was rather surprised at his arguments because none of them were valid.

First, he says we are giving the government these wide powers. I wish we were, but we are not. The fact of the matter is that all the government is requesting in the bill that will be introduced, because it is similar to the bill we passed last year, is this: They want to give statutory protection to the little fellow who is renting a home today but who will be on the street a week from Monday if this measure is not passed. There are hundreds of people in this city who are renting apartments and who are in fear and trembling lest rent control is abolished. I talked to some people last night and if this measure is not passed they will be on the street with nowhere to go. When this bill becomes effective, in so far as rent control is concerned, all it means is that those who are renting accommodation, who have not a home of their own, will not be evicted for one year. There are thousands of people across this country in the larger cities who will be on the street on the 1st of May if rent control is not continued.

My hon. friends have argued that should be done.

Mr. Fraser: No, they have not.

Mr. Gillis: Yes, you have.

Mr. Fraser: Not on rent controls.

Mr. Gillis: Yes, you have; you cannot backtrack on that.

What are the other measures that are going to be retained in this legislation? A few price controls, not half enough, are being retained. There is the control on flour, citrus fruits, and odds and ends of that sort. The thing to which I object strenuously is that there is not enough control. Too many controls have been removed. The arguments we hear from this side of the house are ridiculous. My hon. friend quoted something I said in 1945, and I am glad he did. I am glad he took the position he did on that matter. I said in 1945, and I reiterate it now, that we had no right to send the young men into the air, on the sea and on the land with a rifle in their hands to fight a war and then, when they came back, put them in plants and factories to assist in production and tax them in order to pay interest on the bonds that were sold during the war—to fight the war—to people who stayed at home and made money. I say that should not be done. Those young men had already made their maximum contribution. My hon. friend takes the position now —and I hope that is the position of his party—that they are quite satisfied that the boys who fought the war, who won the war and made it possible to maintain the institutions we have on this continent, should now be taxed in order to pay tribute to the bondholders, the bankers and the coupon clippers. I say that should not be the situation. Those boys made their maximum contribution.

Another error made by the hon. member was this. He spoke about the wartime prices and trade board. He waved his arms; he would have made a good evangelist.

Mr. Fleming: It is not too late yet.

Mr. Gillis: He said that the wartime prices and trade board, with their sweeping powers, had the right to fix wages and salaries. But they did not. The hon. member is in error there. That was done under order in council P.C. 9384, and was administered by the labour department.

Mr. Fleming: It is in black and white.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member did not have his glasses on. Going that far with what my hon. friend had to say, I really do not like to quarrel with him. I realize where he stands. His party believes in the right of capital.

Mr. Fraser: That is the Liberal party.

Mr. Gillis: He believes in the right to protect big business.

Mr. Fraser: That is the Liberal party.

Mr. Gillis: He believes that ninety per cent of the people of this country should be exploited by the other ten per cent.

Mr. Fraser: That is the Liberal party again.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gillis: I did not interrupt my hon. friend while he was speaking. If he wants to ask a question, let him wait until I have finished.

Mr. Fleming: I am not asking a question. I am asking that the hon. member's last remark be withdrawn. I refer to the remark to the effect that I believe that ninety per cent of the people should be exploited by the other ten per cent. That remark is clearly a breach of the privileges of this house.

An hon. Member: Ninety-five per cent.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member said that either I myself or those with whom I sit believe that ninety per cent of the Canadian people should be exploited by the other ten per cent. That remark is a breach of the privileges of the house and it is utterly untrue.

Mr. Gillis: I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming: I ask that the remark be withdrawn.

Mr. Gillis: I never say anything without carefully considering it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member meant the Liberal party.

Mr. Gillis: I listened to several Conservative speeches in a row.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remark be withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand that the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is saying what he believes to be the stand of a certain party. I do not see that there is any reason why his remarks should be withdrawn.

Mr. Knowles: And Your Honour agrees with them.

Mr. Gillis: As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I never say anything without carefully considering it; and I listened for a long time before I came to that conclusion. I think it was a conservative estimate. I think perhaps I could have gone higher than that. But that is my interpretation of the speeches I heard here on this particular measure. I came to the conclusion that my hon. friends are concerned for the protection of capital, and that they are not particularly interested in anything else. I am not taking anything back on that score.

What is the position in this matter of controls? Practically all the controls are off. All of the controls that mean anything are gone. I am quite prepared to continue what we have for the sake of the small amount of protection there is in them, particularly in the matter of rent control. The wartime prices and trade board is gone. I could name a whole list of controls that are gone, but I shall not waste the time of the house in doing so. For a few moments I wish to direct the thoughts of hon. members to this matter of controls. Have we now controls outside of this house?

An hon. Member: Surely.

Mr. Gillis: The answer is, definitely yes. Who are these controllers, what are they controlling for, and whom are they controlling for?

An hon. Member: Whom are they responsible to?

Mr. Gillis: That is a question we must answer for ourselves. What effect have these controllers on the legislation that goes through this House of Commons?

The economic set-up in this country is this. If hon. members will examine the records they will find it to be true that about eighty-eight directors of the chartered banks—

Mr. Skey: Here we go.

Mr. Gillis: I hear the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey), I think it is. He says "oh". Every time someone tramps on their feet and it hurts them, they groan.

Mr. Skey: It is the same old story. We hear it over and over again.

Mr. Probe: It is still the same old story.

Mr. Gillis: If you follow through the directors of the chartered banks, in their ramifications, you will find they are connected with practically every industry in this country.

Mr. Jackman: That is why they are chosen.

Mr. Gillis: He who controls finance, fairly well controls the country. When that control goes back into your industrial set-up, the tie-up is complete.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Save it for the folks back home.

Mr. Gillis: This is good for my hon. friend too.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gillis: The control within is such that all of the economic processes of the country, by means of which the people live, are in the hands of one small group. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), who is a farmer—and I have seen him stand up and wave his arms—knows that the price of practically everything produced on a farm today, from milk right down, is fixed by the packing companies of this country from coast to coast. That is price fixing. They make the money. They milk the farmers. That is price control; that is irresponsible control from the outside, responsible to no one. Who fixes the price of fuel?

An hon. Member: Who set the price of wheat?

Mr. Gillis: Is it fixed by the government?

An hon. Member: John L. Lewis.

Mr. Gillis: Certainly it is not fixed by the government. It is fixed by Dominion Steel and Coal in the east and by Canadian Collieries in the west. They will charge you, and you pay through the nose. You have no say in what you pay. That is price fixing. That is control from the outside. That situation ramifies through the whole economic set-up. Pressure from these groups can force your government into doing the things they want done. In both the provincial and federal fields, I am reasonably sure that from time to time cabinets are in the position of wrangling with these pressure groups against certain proposals that are not in the best interests of the Canadian people. That is control; that is the kind of control that my friend the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) wants. I am not surprised, because he does not come from the stratum of society where he has been up against that kind of stuff. But if he ever becomes a cabinet minister he will know what it means. Or if he ever works for one of these corporations, comes to a conference table, and attempts to negotiate wages, he will know what is meant when it is said that there is no humanity in industry. I have been told that. I have been told that figures on the right side of the ledger are what count, that this is a business proposition. The corporation will use you as long as they can wring profits out of you. That is the kind of industry that I have been hearing about in the last seven speeches. I have been hearing a plea for these poor fellows who today actually have in their hands all of the power in this country.

When I hear hon. members in this house talk about democracy, and saving our democratic set-up I am afraid that, if they do not smarten up and try to re-establish democracy in this country, they may do what has been done in Europe—that is, pull the house of cards down over their ears. That is the kind of thing that has happened in Europe. What we have in this country today is not the democracy that was established by confederation. What we have is a managerial form of society. The government is managed from the outside, and that would be much more the case than it is today if my hon. friends to my right were over on the opposite side. I believe however, that those on the opposite side today are really trying to struggle against that sort of thing. At least they are going this far; they are saying: "We are going to maintain rent control so thousands of people in this country will not be evicted". My hon. friends sitting to my right say "Take them off, and let them be evicted".

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is not so.

Mr. Fraser: You are dead wrong.

Mr. Gillis: An attempt is being made to maintain some price control on flour, citrus fruits and other things of that kind. But my hon. friends to my right say, "Take them off; let flour go up. We stand for the milling companies, so that they will make more money."

Then, in the matter of housing, the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) gets up about every second day and wants to know where he is going to get nails.

Mr. Fraser: And I am still wondering where I am going to get them. If that is a priority of the government, under controls—

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Gillis: But when we had controls the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply could get up every once in a while and tell him where to get them.

Mr. Fraser: No, no. I have the priorities as to where they went.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gillis: But today, under private enterprise—no nails.

Mr. Fraser: That is government misdirection.

Mr. Gillis: Then, has not housing been in the hands of free enterprise since the end of the war?

Mr. Jackman: No; it is under national housing.

Mr. Gillis: The government set up some machinery. They took more responsibility than they should have taken when they were not handling it themselves. The fact is that the government guaranteed the money to the lending companies, established the National Housing Act, and placed it in the hands of the insurance companies in the matter of administration—and we get no housing. Then hon. members to my right scream at the government because they are not getting houses. Why? Because free enterprise cannot produce. They are not building the houses. Let me repeat what we have said on a good many occasions, that we will never have houses in this country for the low-income groups until subsidized housing is established; and they will never be built until they are built through the municipalities and towns, where they can do the planning for themselves in their own communities, and where they have the administrative machinery to do it. And unless it is taken out of the hands of the insurance companies which want to make money out of it, we will not have any houses.

Then what is the position of free enterprise in connection with steel production? Someone will say there is steel control. That is true, to some extent. If there were not, I do not imagine we would have much steel in this country. The government provided for the extension of plants, and pleaded with free enterprise to do something about it. But free enterprise did not do much. Then the government came along with a fifty-fifty proposition, whereby it would provide half the capital. Still not much was done about it.

There is an example of the failure of free enterprise, where it had failed to supply the necessary quantities of steel in this country—something basic to our whole economy. I say that, when controls were taken off the whole structure they should have been retained for at least some years, until we got back to a peacetime economy. That was a wrong procedure, and is responsible for the condition we face today.

I do not think the people for whom hon. members to my right have been pleading are suffering much. I happened to pick up the Ottawa Journal this morning and I find that International Nickel reports a net profit of $5,604,938 higher than last year. The article states:

> International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited, had net profit in 1948 of $39,108,404, up $5,604,938 from 1947.
> This is after setting aside $3,000,000 for contingencies and is equal to $2.55 a common share, compared with $2.16 in 1947.
> Of the profits, $29,156,338, or $2 a share, was paid in common dividends and $1,933,899 in preferred. Balance of $8,018,167 was retained for future requirements of the company.

One could look at the records of any corporation in this country and get the same kind of figures. But if one stands in the House of Commons and says, as in the case of International Nickel, that the man who went down into the mine at Sudbury, threw his body against nature and sweat that wealth out of the ground, is entitled to an equal share of what he produced, and that capital has no prior right over him, one is branded as a socialist or a communist—or dangerous, as one of my colleagues has suggested.

Mr. Knowles: Or it is regimentation.

Mr. Gillis: I was listening to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who, I notice, has now left the chamber—and I do not blame him.

Mr. Knowles: He can't take it.

Mr. Gillis: After reading about these International Nickel profits, having some idea of what the men who go down in the mine are up against, and after listening to this accusation of socialism and communism, and what have you, I happened to pick from my files this document which, it seems to me, is an answer to this nonsense one hears spoken about socialism. This is humanitarianism.

Mr. Martin: It is Liberalism.

Mr. Gillis: With a small l. I just happened to pick this up while the hon. member was speaking. It states:

> Labour is prior to, and independent of, capital. Capital is only the fruits of labour, and could never have existed if labour had not existed first. Labour is the superior of capital, and deserves much the higher consideration.

Where do you think that came from? If I were to ask that of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) he would likely say it came from "Who Owns Canada", or some other C.C.F. publication. Abraham Lincoln said that in December, 1861. We see just how far back my hon. friends are. The language we talk today Abraham Lincoln was talking away back in 1861. That is the right of the human being to share in the wealth he has produced; the right to a home and all it stands for.

An hon. Member: Jesse James.

Mr. Gillis: He was a gentleman; at least he took a chance.

I had not intended taking part in the debate, until the hon. member for Eglinton provoked me. I should like now to conclude, in the hope that we may get around to the bill and make a study of it. I hope it contains much more than it did last year, and that the government is reimposing many of the controls which were taken off. I suggest they ought not to take too seriously much of what they hear from the official opposition, my Progressive Conservative friends, because the official opposition is not talking the language of the people of this country. There is one thing the people understand today, and it is that the government took them through the war by a process of planning the economy of the country. They protected the income of the people by means of price controls and subsidies. Through excess profits taxes a fair share of profits was taken from industry. If the government were to reimpose these controls tomorrow it would be backed by 75 per cent of the people of this country. I suggest that serious consideration be given to that before the next election takes place.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, now that my good friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has disposed, at least to his own satisfaction—

Mr. Knowles: Of the Tory party.

Mr. Green: —of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and other members of the Progressive Conservative party, I would ask the patience of the house for a few moments while I deal with what seems to me to be the fundamental question raised by this debate. I suggest the question is this: Is Canada in 1949 to have parliamentary government or emergency controls? The resolution under discussion reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

This measure is the great-grandchild of the War Measures Act. As hon. members know, that act permitted the government to take almost any step by order in council during the war. There was no serious quarrel with such a measure under war conditions. Then in 1945, when the fighting had ended, the government brought in what was called the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. That act gave to the government much the same powers that had been exercisable under the War Measures Act. I think the act of 1945 was continued in 1946 and then in 1947 we had introduced what was called the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act. I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to correct me if I am wrong in this outline.

The preamble of the act of 1947 referred to the fact that it was to be temporary. It was mentioned in the headnote also that the powers were to be for a limited period only. Instead of giving the government over-all powers in certain fields, the act had fifty-seven orders in council as a schedule. Your Honour will recall that it was called the Heinz bill, because there were fifty-seven varieties of order in council. In 1948 this act was extended for a period of one year so that it has remained in effect until the present time. Today we are considering its successor, the Transitional Measures Act of 1949.

This great-grandchild was ushered into the world the other evening rather apologetically. The Minister of Justice, who is sponsoring it, had nothing to say at all; he just threw the resolution on the table and sat down. Later in the debate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) got up and explained that he was to be responsible for some of the orders in council which were to be continued under this new measure, and his statement will be found at page 316 of Hansard.

He referred, first of all, to rental control. He explained that he had been trying to palm off rental control on the provinces but had been unsuccessful. He said he was now sponsoring it in this bill. He mentioned also the wartime prices and trade board and said that the price control powers granted to that board would apply only to twelve commodities. Those commodities were flour, bread, butter, citrus fruits, imported canned citrus fruit juices, certain fresh vegetables, imported onions, certain fresh fruits including imported apples and imported grapes, domestic canned vegetables, imported canned fruits, molasses and sugar. It will be noticed that over half of those commodities are imported.

Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) took over and explained that he was responsible for the other three orders in council which were to be retained by this bill. First was steel control, for which he put up quite an argument. The second was timber control, about which he was very halfhearted. He said that that control might be needed for a few months, but he was very lukewarm about it. I understand from British Columbia that the timber control is now of little effect and it would make practically no difference if it were dropped. The third was the priorities control and, like the timber control, the minister said that it would probably be required only for a matter of a few months.

I think members of the government realize that they are not on very firm ground in asking for a continuation of these emergency powers. That may be one reason why so few members of the government are speaking in this debate. Another explanation may be a statement which was made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Jean) last November. I have here a press dispatch reporting an interview given by the minister in Quebec on November 24. It was carried by the Canadian Press and reads:

> Order in council rule era ending.
> Solicitor General "hopes" no need now for cabinet's wartime power.
> Quebec, November 24—(CP)—Solicitor General Jean said here Tuesday at a press conference that possibly the last use of procedure by order in council under Canada's emergency transitional powers act has been made by the federal cabinet.
> Mr. Jean said he is due to present in Ottawa today his final report as head of a committee on application of the emergency powers.
> He said he hoped there will be no further necessity for cabinet orders under the legislation designed to ease the country from a war to a peacetime administration footing.
> Mr. Jean made the statement during a meeting with newspapermen.
> His discussion of administration by order in council was in reply to a question whether the Liberal party was concerned about criticism that the authority of parliament had been supplanted by the cabinet.
> Mr. Jean said he happened to be in charge of a committee appointed to take charge of the question of returning to parliament administrative power which during the war had been assumed by the cabinet.

It is quite obvious that even last fall the Solicitor General realized the weakness of trying to maintain these emergency powers, but apparently he has been overruled. This resolution is clear evidence of the failure of the cabinet to shake off their wartime mentality; it shows quite clearly that they still have an order-in-council hangover.

The problems to be dealt with by this measure are important and they are difficult. I admit that they are very serious. I think those problems might be summed up as the rental problem, the prices problem and the steel problem. They are much too important to be trifled with, to be left to order in council and regulation under a minister and controllers, deputy controllers, assistants and so on. They are much too important to be dealt with on an emergency basis. They are really much too deep-seated to be solved by temporary measures. After all, this bill must be considered as a temporary measure whereas permanent remedies are required. The fundamental error in the government's planning has been that it is basing the legislation on war emergency.

Let us take the rental problem first. That problem arises out of a great shortage of housing. There are many reasons for a shortage of housing. In the first place there was a failure to build homes during the 1930's. Then, of course, there was a failure during the war, and we have had a great increase in population since the war. Many thousands of people have come to Canada from abroad. Another reason is that there has been a movement from the farms and rural areas to the towns and cities. I am quite sure that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will not contradict me when I make that statement. I believe that the shortage of housing is growing worse each year; in other words, that buildings are not being put up as fast as the demand arises for new homes. Obviously, therefore, the problem will be with us for many years, and it is one of the most serious facing Canada today.

I must say that I think it is also obvious that rental controls cannot be lifted at this time. Such action would result in great suffering, particularly in the cities. Certainly in the very large cities of Canada that would be the case. There should be a clear-cut, definite policy on rental control set out in statute form. If that were done responsibility for the measure would be placed directly on the members of the house rather than on controllers and wartime prices and trade board employees across the country. If rental control were set out in statute form it would give certainty where there is none today for either the tenant or the landlord.

As hon. members know, control today is by order in council and regulation, subject to chopping and changing. Every so often a change comes out. One change benefits the tenant, the next change benefits the landlord, and neither the tenant nor the landlord is sure of his rights. I think the present situation is unfair to both of them. They both have to run to the rental control officers. Lawyers very often do not know what the regulations are, and there is great uncertainty.

I think the greatest uncertainty of all is caused by the fact that no one knows, either in this house or across the country, whether the government intends to stay in the rental field or to get out of it. Apparently the government tried to get out last fall. Now is the time for the government to decide. If it intends to vacate the rental control field a year from now, in 1950, the decision should be announced in order to give the provincial governments an opportunity to pass legislation establishing provincial rental control should they feel that is wise, and also to set up the administration to look after those provincial controls.

Mr. Sinclair: They have had that chance already and did not care to take it.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker, the member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) is not quite right in that statement. The government said in effect, "if you want to take over rental controls we will get out of the field", but what provincial premier would walk into that trouble if he did not have to? I am sure if the member for Vancouver North were premier of British Columbia he would not be in a hurry.

Mr. Sinclair: I would think that the premier of Quebec and the former premier of Ontario, who are so exercised over provincial rights, would have gladly moved into that field.

Mr. Green: That is really not a question; it is a speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: They want all the privileges and none of the responsibilities.

Mr. Green: The point I am making is this. If the government intends to get out of the rental control field in April, 1950, for goodness' sake make that announcement now, or very shortly, so that proper steps can be taken by the provincial authorities. There is another reason why the position should be made clear. Old age pensioners, in British Columbia at least, have been very hard hit by rentals. One of their main problems is to get a house for which they can afford to pay the rent. There are now different service clubs helping to build homes for the senior citizens, which homes rent for a very small fee. They should know well in advance if the control is to be taken off so that plans to help in the construction of these homes can be speeded up.

On the other hand, if the government is not going to vacate the rental control field, then permanent legislation should be passed bringing rental control in line with the dominion housing legislation, tying it in with the present legislation designed to increase the number of homes.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about butter control?

Mr. Green: In any event, no matter what stand the government takes on rental control, certainly leadership should be given by the dominion in setting up a low-rental housing scheme for Canada. The initiative for such schemes must come from the dominion.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about butter control?

Mr. Green: Just about a month ago the premier of British Columbia was reported in the Vancouver Sun as follows:

> The provincial government will take part in a joint dominion-provincial-municipal conference to be held this year on a plan for low rental housing projects, Premier Johnson announced in the legislature.

I was very pleased to read that announcement, but a few days later a question was asked in the house by the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and the reply he got from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) was to the effect that there would be no such dominion-provincial-municipal conference, but that the dominion would be willing to talk the question over with individual provinces, and I think he also said with municipalities. That is not good enough; that is not going to bring about any low rental housing schemes.

I am afraid that the difficulty is the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) towards the question. He was quoted on October 28, 1947, as having said in Montreal:

> "Subsidized housing threat to democracy"—St. Laurent.

The dispatch reads:

> External Affairs Minister St. Laurent said Monday night "no government of which I am a part would ever pass legislation for subsidized housing." He was replying to a question during a speech to the McGill university Liberal club. Affable, pleasant and apparently happy as he discussed the rise and flowering of Liberalism in Canada, Mr. St. Laurent leaped to his feet during the question period with his answer to the problem of how soon subsidized housing would make its appearance in Canada.
> "Not while I am there," snapped the minister as he cut off the hardly-heard questioner. He declared he believed it unconstitutional and a threat to democracy.

Much the same attitude was taken by the Prime Minister a few days ago in his speech in "The Nation's Business" series on the radio. He is reported on March 4 this year as having said with regard to subsidized housing:

> I am very definite, however, in my belief that the initiative in providing low-rental housing for civilians should be taken either by the provinces or by municipalities empowered to do so by the provinces.

That does not show much of a tendency to take the initiative in bringing about a low-rental housing scheme. Actually since 1935, when the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett placed the Dominion Housing Act on the statute books of Canada, the housing legislation has been taken to include low-rental housing schemes, and I repeat that the initiative should come from the dominion.

So much for the rental problem. Now I should like to say a word about the second matter to which I referred; that is, the prices problem. The wartime prices and trade board is now practically gone. It is to be given power only over twelve commodities. So whether we believe or do not believe in that board, the fact is that to all intents and purposes its effectiveness has ended, and certainly it will be quite unable to keep down the cost of living during the year that lies ahead. I think the wartime prices and trade board is to be used largely as a bluff in an attempt to keep prices down; in fact I think that has been the main function of the board in the mind of the government during the last year. Many of these commodities which are to remain under the jurisdiction of the board are imported, as I said a few moments ago, and control over those articles can be maintained by virtue of the export and import permit legislation, which is permanent.

Here, too, on the question of price control, there is need for a long-term policy; and I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) should study the possibility of setting up adequate control over such things as illegal combines. The government seems very slow in carrying on prosecutions under that act. The machinery provided by that legislation does not seem very effective. Another direction in which thought should be given to permanent legislation is that of keeping the flow of goods at all times free in Canada. We have such things as the withholding of new patents. Improvements are being made; yet under our patent laws it is possible to keep those improvements off the market. That is a field in which the Department of Justice could do a great deal of good, and I think it could do much to keep down prices. In Canada various other unfair practices are indulged in by a minority, not by a majority of the people. The vast majority of Canadians are honest and trying to play the game with their fellow citizens, but I think we do need a tightening up in such legislation.

Mr. Herridge: Such as monopolies.

Mr. Green: Yes; where there are unfair monopolies they have to be dealt with, too. There is a field for permanent legislation, and I suggest the Minister of Justice should be giving attention to matters of that kind.

The third matter I mentioned was the steel problem. That is not a war emergency. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) explained on January 28 of this year how the steel problem arises. At page 67 of Hansard he used these words:

> The defence of Canada is a matter of federal jurisdiction at all times; the defence of Canada requires watchfulness and preparation at all times. Steel is an indispensable material for the proper organization and maintenance of those forces which it is the responsibility of the central government to keep in existence.

He based the proposed actions of the government in connection with steel on national defence. Really it was worry over a third world war rather than an emergency arising out of the second world war. And there is to be legislation on steel. I point out to the Minister of Justice that the speech from the throne promises:

> —legislative provision for governmental assistance by loan to the producers of basic steel for the purpose of increasing production.

Why cannot the minister include in that steel legislation the provisions required for steel control, instead of leaving them in order in council form? If that were done parliament would be given direct control over steel. The order in council which this measure will keep in force gives to the steel controller and all his henchmen absolutely dictatorial power over the steel industry, including such things as the mining of iron ore. I would refer hon. members to the interpretation clause of that order in council, which defines "steel" to include all steel products, iron ore, iron metal, alloys of iron and carbon, with or without other metals, any raw materials and minerals excepting coal and coke which go into the making of steel and also any scrap metal. It provides further that the minister may declare in writing that any article, commodity, substance or thing may be included or excluded from "steel" for the purpose of these regulations. The order in council also gives the controller this power:

> To enter on, take possession of, and utilize any mine, land, plant, factory, mill, refinery, smelter, foundry, warehouse, building, or place or any equipment used or capable of being used for the purpose of producing or dealing in or with steel and to deal in or with or take possession of any vehicles, cars, ships, locomotives, or other equipment deemed by the steel controller to be required or useful for the operation of any such mine, plant, factory, mill, refinery, smelter, foundry, warehouse, building or place and/or for producing or dealing in steel or equipment—

And "equipment" is very widely defined.

> —provided that any order of the steel controller made under the powers vested in him by this paragraph shall be subject to any conflicting valid order of the transport controller appointed by the government on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport.

The widest possible power that can be expressed in the English language is given in that steel control order; and I suggest to the Minister of Justice it is now time that we had these provisions in statute form, and further that it is time for a permanent steel policy.

Finally, our main objection to this measure is the fact that emergency powers are continuing. Emergency powers are dangerous. Surely the ministers must realize that. Such powers give the persons who exercise them delusions of grandeur. They forget they are the servants of the Canadian people, not their masters. I need only quote from the article by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) in Maclean's magazine of February 1, 1947, entitled "What's Wrong with the Liberals?" No one knows better than the hon. member for Quebec South what is wrong with the Liberals. Here is what he said:

> During the war years we all drifted away from democratic ideas and principles. The condition was not peculiar to the one party. It cut across every element in the nation. I believe most Canadians were in accord with the process invoked to fight the war—the extraordinary steps taken, the controls, the censorship, the security powers, the bypassing of parliament, what was tantamount to government-by-decree.

And he went on:

> Undoubtedly speed, efficiency, expediency and secrecy were essential in wartime. But there is no need for any continuing sacrifice of cherished liberties or democratic principles today.

Then he went on to say:

> Extraordinary power does something to the people who wield it.

That sets forth our views on these emergency powers. There is a further reference contained in the book "From Smoke to Smother", by Douglas Reed. He is the author of "Insanity Fair", the book which was written before the war and which showed us so clearly what was going to happen. At page 174, he is dealing with the United Kingdom government's emergency powers, and he says this:

> Under "emergency powers" power becomes irresponsible, like a high-tension cable cut loose. When individual ministers may do this or that by signing a paper, without submitting it to parliament, the doctrine of collective governmental responsibility collapses and the limits of departmental authority become blurred.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, since the opening of this session a very clear example of the dangers of emergency powers has come to my attention. Some members will recall that I raised a question in this chamber concerning what is known as the Fraserview project in greater Vancouver. That is a veterans' housing scheme under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The objective of the scheme is worth while. It is to establish homes for eleven or twelve hundred veterans. The corporation expropriated a certain area in the southeastern corner of the city of Vancouver for this scheme. In that area there were between two and three hundred home owners. Instead of dealing with those home owners individually and attempting to see that they were not upset, the corporation simply expropriated the whole property, including the homes.

The expropriation plan contained a complete change of streets and lot boundaries. The corporation told these people they could have no more than about a forty-foot lot. If one had more than that, even though it was in garden or being used for chickens, it was taken away. If a person had a vacant lot in that area, that was taken too. There was in my office yesterday a man who bought two lots back in 1910. He is a Saskatchewan railroader who went out to Vancouver and selected these lots. He paid taxes on them from that time until today, and yet he was told the lots were being taken from him but he would receive compensation.

I have a letter from one man, the first letter I received about the project. I am going to read it to the house because it sets out the picture very clearly. It is dated the 4th February, 1949, and reads as follows:

> Enclosed you will find a copy of a letter which I received on Friday of this week.

The letter to which he refers is from an officer of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

This letter from my correspondent continues as follows:

> It was quite a shock to me when about two weeks ago I returned home from work and my wife said that somebody had been into my place with a tractor, doing damage to the rear of my garden. I found out that the men were working for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.
> I went in to see Mr. Walker, and asked him why they were working on my property, and he said, "They had taken it over as of December 20, and it was not mine any longer, as they had expropriated it," and that they would compensate me for damage done, if any.
> As I have a clear title to my property, which consists of a house, and lot 80 feet by 275 feet, which is in garden and orchard, all improved, I objected strongly to their attitude in trespassing on private property. Mr. Walker said I would get a notice later on, to say what they were doing about my place, and the enclosed letter is apparently a vague notice from them that they are taking part, and they don't say how much, of my garden.
> Is this country that I have given nearly nine years of my life in two wars to fight for, and is now submitting to such things, a free country any more? Is my home safe, or will I get notice tomorrow that they want my house as well? Who gave the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation power to expropriate homes, land, etc., just to build more homes as a money-making scheme?

My correspondent is not correct, of course, about the money-making scheme.

> I am only one of hundreds who have to submit to this unheard of robbery. The war was over three years ago, and these emergency measures should have been scrapped as soon as the war stopped, so that one's home should be safe.
> We don't mind the company building new homes on vacant land, but we do object to them cutting up improved lots and gardens.
> Mr. Walker says my lot 80 feet by 275 feet is too big for one person, even though it is all in garden and fruit and helps to make a living for the home. Who is he to judge the size of a person's lot and garden?
> I came out to this country in 1911, to the Okanagan, where I lived until, being discharged from this war, and, being physically unable to work a farm any more, I bought a place here. Now I am told I have to give up half of it. I object very strongly to being confined to just a house with no garden, and I intend to fight this thing through as long as I am able to.
> I hope you will be able to do something to bring this injustice to light in parliament, and stop the company from turning people out of their homes, just to build new homes for other people, so that they can make money out of it.

The latter statement, of course, is hardly correct.

> Make them leave the improved property alone. There is no such emergency to steal a person's garden, when there are millions of vacant acres all over the province.

The following is the relevant paragraph from the attached letter from an employee of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation:

> On December 20, 1948, an expropriation plan was filed which covered a considerable area in South Vancouver including the property above referred to. In accordance with the new plan which is proposed for the area, your buildings will remain as they are presently located, but the size and shape of the lot will be somewhat altered and that part of the lot which will not be appurtenant to the buildings on the new plan will be retained by the crown and used by it for its Fraserview project.

This clearly indicates he was going to decide how much land anyone could have. Since the question was raised here Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been trying to clear up this situation. It shows the dangers of these emergency powers, Mr. Speaker. There is no place in the Canadian system of government for powers of this type.

Mr. Howe: May I ask the hon. member a question? What have the emergency powers to do with the expropriation of land for housing in Vancouver?

Mr. Green: I cite that as an example of the dangers inherent in these emergency powers, and the attitude the emergency powers must, of necessity, breed in the minds of the people who have to administer them.

Mr. Howe: The power of expropriation for federal purposes is as old as Canada.

Mr. Green: The minister missed the point about which I am complaining. I am complaining about Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation simply walking in and taking away the homes and gardens of these people. Some of these men were earning part of their living by using the land.

Mr. Howe: That has no place in the discussion of emergency legislation. Emergency legislation is not involved in that.

Mr. Green: It is that sort of power about which we are complaining.

Mr. Howe: We would have to repeal the Expropriation Act.

Mr. Green: I say the emergency powers are of that type. I would repeat that the main question to be decided on this measure is whether we are to have in Canada parliamentary government or emergency controls. This party and I, personally, stand for parliamentary government.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask the member a question? Are you in favour of floor and ceiling prices for butter?

Mr. Green: I do not know what that has to do with this subject.

Mr. Cruickshank: He is afraid to answer because of the farm vote.

Mr. Green: I am not afraid of any question the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) can ask or the heckling remarks he makes. Most of his remarks in the house are heckling, unfortunately. I believe that measure has been passed by legislation in this house.

Mr. Cruickshank: Are you in favour of the floor price?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I do not intend to say very much, but I should like to inform the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that the reason we are not saying much in this debate is due to the fact that we know we are right. We can afford to keep quiet. I remember when rent controls came into effect some people were not wise enough to raise their rents when the rent was too low. Some of these hardships were rectified, perhaps most of them. I do not want to see rent controls lifted until there are enough houses to satisfy the needs of all our workers. But the effect of the lack of housing has not been all bad. We know that the building business has connected with it more allied industries than perhaps any other. As long as there is a need for housing and building there will be a need for cement, for lumber and for nails, as I am sure somebody will agree. As long as we have need for building and construction, we shall have good times. I am strongly in favour of keeping the controls until there is enough of the commodity to satisfy the need or until there is more of the commodity than there is money to pay for it.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I wish to speak briefly, Mr. Speaker, on the resolution before the house, which is to continue certain so-called emergency controls under the guise of the national emergency.

When the order in council was passed in November, 1941, P.C. 8528 which set up the wartime prices and trade board, its preamble contained the following words:

> . . . the wartime prices and trade board regulations were made and established to provide safeguards under war conditions . . .

Under that order in council we in Canada for the first time had an octopus which controlled the economy of this country. This original order in council conferred most sweeping powers on the officials of the wartime prices and trade board. I imagine that few people in Canada, apart from lawyers, have during the war years and to date fully read the many orders in council, regulations and orders passed by the board and by the administrators and officials under the board who had delegated authority. A mere glance at many of these orders and regulations would show that the most sweeping powers are conferred upon the board.

During the time that this board has been in existence it has been a law unto itself because, under these original regulations which are still in effect, the powers granted to the board could be delegated. Certain officers of the board were given authority to issue orders and regulations, which orders and regulations would have the force of law. These officers to whom these powers were delegated have, through the years, issued hundreds and hundreds of various orders and regulations which all have the force of statute law. In many cases these same officials have interpreted their own orders and regulations.

In the resolution before the house there is a slight change in the wording from that contained in the original order in council which set up the wartime prices and trade board. The original order was "to provide safeguards under war conditions." The resolution before the house refers to "the national emergency arising out of the war." Yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), when speaking on this resolution, pointed out clearly that the government to date has not offered the house any explanation or any evidence as to why any of these controls should be extended, with the exception of rent control, which must be continued because of the sorry mess and muddle into which this government has got all housing. I think the government and the responsible minister should explain clearly to the members of this house why it is necessary to extend these controls in an omnibus bill which is about to be presented to the house.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, just before the dinner recess I was dealing with the remarks made yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) when he read certain extracts from a judgment of the Manitoba court of appeal. Some of the extracts he read showed that the court had analysed the matter and had set forth its opinion as to what constitutes a national emergency. They came to the conclusion that there was no national emergency in the case at bar.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the responsible minister to indicate to the house full information as to why these so-called emergency controls—with the exception of rent controls—are still necessary. A mere glance at the original orders in council clearly indicates the very wide powers given to the wartime prices and trade board. I should like to indicate briefly some of the extraordinary and in my opinion somewhat arbitrary provisions of some of these orders in council, as set out in the office consolidation of these rental regulations for February, 1949.

At page 6 I find the following extract:

> The board shall have power from time to time to enter any premises, to inspect and examine the same and any or all books, records and documents in the possession or control of any landlord or of his agent, and to require any such person to produce such books, records and documents at any place before it or before any person appointed by it to investigate, and to take possession of any or all of such books, records and documents.

And at pages 7 and 8:

> The board may exercise its powers by order and may from time to time delegate to any person and authorize him to exercise from time to time such of the powers of the board on such terms as the board deems proper; and the signature or countersignature by the chairman of any order purporting to have been made by such person under authority of the board shall be conclusive evidence of such authority but nothing in these regulations shall be construed as requiring such signature or countersignature.

Then, in the same book, a severe penalty is set out whereby, upon conviction, an accused is liable to a fine of $5,000 and subject to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two years. At page 10, under the general provisions, there is this very interesting regulation:

> Every provision of the Interpretation Act shall extend and apply to every order published or printed in the Canada Gazette or Canadian war orders and regulations or statutory orders and regulations or in any extra thereof or extract therefrom purporting to have been printed by the King's Printer for Canada, but nothing herein contained shall be construed as requiring such publication or printing.

I would point out the significance of the last few words, "but nothing herein contained shall be construed as requiring such publication or printing." It seems to me that under that provision an order of the board could be passed and some regulation made by the administrator which would be binding; and it would not be necessary to have it published in the Canada Gazette or under these other provisions.

While those regulations are severe enough, I should like to refer to some of the regulations under P.C. 8528, in the office consolidation of that order in council, which deals with the immunity of all persons employed by the board. Section 15 states:

> No member of the board and no administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting on behalf of or under authority of the board shall be or become liable to any person for or in respect of any act or omission of himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations or any regulations for which these regulations are substituted or otherwise conferred or imposed by the governor in council.

> No proceedings by way of injunction, mandatory order, mandamus prohibition certiorari or otherwise shall be instituted against any member of the board, administrator or other person for or in respect of any act or omission of himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations or any regulations for which these regulations are substituted or otherwise conferred or imposed by the governor in council.

It seems to me that nowhere under any dominion statute or under any provincial statute in Canada will one find such wide and sweeping powers given to any board—a board which has authority to make orders and regulations which have the force of law, a board which has authority to delegate powers to make orders and regulations—and then, as the crowning indignity of it all, in section 15 (2) to provide that no person shall have any right of any action against any official of the board, no matter what he or she may do.

It seems to me it will be most difficult for any members in the house to vote for the continuance of such autocratic powers. I would point out that at least in Ontario there has been a wide difference of opinion as to the meaning and legality of many of the orders and regulations passed by the board. Not only is there the judgment of the Manitoba court of appeal referred to yesterday by the leader of the opposition, where it was decided that there was no emergency, but also in Ontario we have the recent decision of the Ontario court of appeal in the McGinn case, in which it found certain provisions of the wartime prices and trade board regulations were invalid. And any Ontario lawyer who follows the law reports must have been impressed by the wide difference of opinion between judges of the county courts and justices of the supreme court as to the meaning of these various orders and regulations.

I would refer to the Ontario Weekly Notes of February 18, 1949, page 95, where a justice of the Ontario court of appeal, giving the judgment of the court in a rental appeal case, made this very significant statement:

> I confess to having had much difficulty in trying to understand that section, particularly subsection 2 thereof.

In the judgment of the court of appeal the judgment of the court below was upset. In my opinion that shows, as I said, that there is a great difference of opinion among members of the judiciary as to the exact meaning of these orders and regulations.

In another Ontario case reported in the Ontario Weekly Notes of January 14, 1949, a justice of the supreme court of Ontario, giving judgment in a rental appeal case, made this significant statement, as it appears at page 4:

> Looking at the matter apart from authority, one must realize even now, and despite the changes which have come about as to the extent of government intervention in private affairs, that order No. 294 is a somewhat extraordinary and arbitrary invasion of what was formerly regarded as the private business of the ordinary citizen.

I ask you to note the words of the justice where he states that the order is an extraordinary and arbitrary invasion of what was formerly regarded as the private business of the ordinary citizen. I agree entirely with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said yesterday when he asked the minister to bring in separate bills for each of the controls he is now asking to have continued. I think it is only reasonable that we members of this parliament should put into statute form those controls which it is found necessary to continue so that the Canadian citizen will know exactly what are his rights.

When consideration is given to the far-reaching and arbitrary orders and regulations that have been issued by this board; when consideration is given to the wide and sweeping powers conferred on the board with the additional authority to delegate those powers to other persons; when consideration is given to the complete immunity of the board no matter what its actions may be, I wonder how any hon. member can vote for this resolution and persuade his own conscience that such powers are in accordance with well known, well defined and well established Canadian legal procedure.

On many other occasions I have referred in this house to the manner in which the wartime prices and trade board have carried out their duties. This board has sent snoopers around the country to harass and embarrass merchants. Where one merchant will be prosecuted, the next goes free although he is guilty of the same offence. In the face of such tactics I wonder how the board can expect the Canadian citizen to respect the methods under which these regulations and orders are administered.

We have heard a lot about tenants. As a country lawyer I have had much to do with both tenants and landlords. I should like to point out that landlords as well as tenants have certain legal rights. From my own personal knowledge of many cases in my own county I have come to the conclusion that the landlord might just as well have stayed at home rather than attend the hearing for all the benefit he received.

One is perhaps inclined to forget that in the average small municipality the total revenue is derived from taxation on real estate. Taxes, replacements, repairs and everything else in connection with rental property have increased greatly. So far as labour and materials are concerned, the increase is anywhere from 50 to 100 per cent. Taxes have also increased greatly, but the landlord has been allowed an increase of only 10 per cent.

I can readily understand why the socialist C.C.F. will be ready to vote for the resolution. The socialists are all for controls and if they saw their way clear they would regiment the entire economic life of this nation. In my opinion no government can make a nation great by planned economy through controls. The sooner these socialist controls are removed, the sooner we get away from a paternal state which feels that it has to spoon-feed the Canadian people, the better it will be for the general public.

In his short but effective speech yesterday the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) summed up the whole matter in the concluding paragraph, which is to be found on page 1466 of Hansard and which reads:

> I am going to suggest that the government reverse its policy. It has tried about everything so far—everything but letting the people manage their own affairs. I suggest that we go back for a short time to those good days when honest and competent people were permitted to look after their own business and that this paternal government seek other pastimes, and other fields of amusement than attempting to manage the private affairs of the discontented people of Canada.

Mr. L. W. Skey (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I did not think I should let this debate go any further without putting on the record some extracts from a document which to me appears to be one of the most significant that has come into the hands of members of parliament. It reports on the experience of France where property was placed under rent control in 1914; and from that time up to the present French property has been subject to rent control. Recently there has come into my hands a document written by a Frenchman by the name of Bertrand de Jouvenel, entitled "No vacancies."

Before I put this on the record I should like to refer briefly to what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said yesterday when referring to this matter, as reported on page 1454 of Hansard. I quote:

The emergency in regard to rental housing is entirely an emergency created by this government. If they want to deal with that, let them do so by a proper bill that will recognize the rights of those who occupy homes and of those who own them, and will permit proper housing plans under the various controls they already have and are seeking to perpetuate.

There cannot be an urban member in this house who is unaware of the problems that face his constituents arising from the government's rental control policy. Property owners are being disfranchised to some extent and tenants are being made uncomfortable. In most cases tenants are unable to look forward to finding alternative accommodation. There cannot be an hon. member of this house who does not want to see the right solution found that will permit the landlord to have reasonable control over his own property and permit the tenant an opportunity to seek alternative accommodation at reasonable rental.

Mr. Bertrand de Jouvenel, as I said before, has written this significant pamphlet. I think I should begin by quoting his final conclusions which are to be found in a short paragraph entitled "Road to ruin," which reads:

Possibly the French example may prove of some interest and use to our friends across the sea. It goes to show that rent control is self-perpetuating and culminates in both the physical ruin of housing and the legal dispossession of the owners. It is enough to visit the houses in Paris to reach conclusions. The havoc wrought here is not the work of the enemy but of our own measures.

That is his concluding paragraph. In the foregoing pages he sets out the whole bleak history of what has happened in his country under rental control. It would be very unfair for me, Mr. Speaker, to take a stand for my party that would not be in line with what my leader has said. I would be the last one to want to do that, knowing of the position that tenants in my city find themselves in today, but I do feel that it is my duty to call the attention of the house to this history which is written so clearly, because I know there is not a member here who wants to find the same thing happening in our country that has happened in France.

In short, rents are very low but there are no lodgings available. Nor are any being built. And practically none have been built for the last twelve years.

Here is another quotation entitled "Parisian plight", which reads:

To go into sordid details, eighty-two per cent of the Parisian population have no bath or shower, more than half of the population must go out of their lodgings to find a lavatory, and a fifth do not even have running water in their lodgings.

Here is another example:

To take an example of a very common situation, here is a lady who owns three buildings containing thirty-four apartments, all inhabited by middle class families. Her net loss from the thirty-four apartments, taxes and repairs taken care of, is $80 per year. Not only must her son put her up and take care of her, but he must also pay out the $80. She cannot sell; there are no buyers.

This is a man who has no axe to grind in our country, and in this document we can read the record of what has happened in France. That is why I should like to place myself on record as being in full agreement with the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) when he said this afternoon that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) should have under his jurisdiction both sides of the problem, not only the housing problem, positive action to obtain homes for Canadians, but also the negative side which is the controlling of rents. Only by having them both under his administration can the whole problem be seen in its proper perspective by one minister of the government.

I should like to change the course of my remarks for a moment and refer to the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). It was an amusing and interesting speech, but I do not believe that the theories which he advocated would be of any use in this country. He was talking straight socialism. As far as socialism is concerned a documentary record is being written for us today in another land across the Atlantic, Great Britain. I should like to refer the house to a few of the things that have been said in Great Britain so that those who read Hansard will have on record the other side of the question.

Mr. Archibald: Especially the by-elections.

Mr. Skey: Perhaps we had better wait for the general election to know more about that. Back in 1947 Mr. Churchill described the socialist administration—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I called the attention of members of the house very often last night to the fact that their remarks should be relevant to the subject under discussion. I again ask members to see that their remarks are relevant to the motion which is before the house. I point out to the hon. member that there is nothing whatever in the motion that has any reference to socialism.

Mr. Skey: I shall bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I would—

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Skey: I would say—

Mr. Knowles: A little louder.

Mr. Skey: Speaking of controls, we are discussing the socialist doctrine. Perhaps I should say the doctrine of "controlism" rather than socialism, but really they are one and the same thing. They deal with restrictions. Mr. Churchill is speaking of the type of controls which we are debating under this motion. Mr. Churchill refers to them thus:

> By their restrictions they make scarcity; and when scarcity comes they call for more restrictions to cure it.

I contend that is what controls are doing in Canada, and that is what they will continue to do. In August, 1947, he describes these controls in England as crazy theories.

Mr. Archibald: What about 1933 in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: It may be very clever for the hon. member for Trinity to phrase his remarks in the way he has put them just now, but he should not discuss controls which are imposed in Great Britain. I would ask him to keep his remarks relevant to the motion.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order, in view of what you have said, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in any sort of forensic effort in any arena anywhere comparisons are always relevant to the subject. All the member for Trinity is doing at the moment in his discussion of controls is making a comparison with the exercise of controls in another country. With the greatest respect and deference to you, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the comparison is entirely relevant. No one can discuss a motion in this house and be confined merely to the wording of something that is given us by the government. We must go outside by way of comparison to bring truth, whether it be in favour of or against, to bear on the measure before the house at this or any other time. With the greatest respect and deference, sir, I submit that these remarks are entirely relevant to this subject.

Mr. Skey: I need not go through a long story, but perhaps I can make indirect reference to the effect of these controls in Great Britain. No one was happier than I to learn by today's newspapers that Britain has balanced her exports and imports. I do hope that is the result of a little sanity creeping into their control and socialist theories. However, they have been described as leading the country into bankruptcy and disaster. The man who has control of food in Great Britain, Mr. Strachey, was met by a mass of women pickets outside the House of Commons and subjected to their very evident wrath.

Mr. Thatcher: They keep voting for them.

Mr. Skey: Well, wait until the end of this year, or 1950; perhaps there will be another story to tell then.

Mr. Probe: You still believe in democracy, don't you?

Mr. Skey: I certainly do.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): He does, but you do not know what it is.

Mr. Skey: I can tell you something in which I do not believe. A little earlier I was referring to the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). On June 24 of last year, at page 5822 of Hansard, 1948, he was dealing with wage controls, and was interrupted by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) who asked this question:

> Do I understand the hon. member correctly, that he believes there will have to be a restoration of direction of labour?
> Mr. Gillis: Absolutely.

That is something I do not believe in, and I do not think the trade unionists of this country believe in it either.

Mr. Archibald: What did R. B. Bennett do?

Mr. Skey: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the trade unionists of this country believe in that doctrine. Certainly I do not believe in it, and never will. I should like to tell the house what the Northern Miner of September 16 had to say about it:

> Trades unionism is essentially an outgrowth of the system of free enterprise. It is part of the machinery of checks and balances which hold our economy level. It has no place in the socialist state where the interests of any particular group must be subordinated to what the governing body considers to be the interest of the state itself.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Now the hon. member is discussing trade unionism. Again I would ask him to confine his remarks to the resolution under discussion.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Again, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, when you permit interruptions and questions of the kind we have heard tonight, are you going to rule that the hon. member who has the floor has not the right to answer them?

Mr. Speaker: Order. At different times I have suggested to the hon. member that I thought his remarks were not relevant. I am sure his last words were not, so I am asking him again to abide by the rules. That is all I am doing.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): With the greatest respect and deference I would point out that the last remarks of the hon. member were in reply to interjections and questions coming from the socialist party immediately to my left. If you are going to rule that he cannot answer them, then you must rule that they should stop this nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not ruling against anyone; I am simply asking the hon. member to abide by the rules.

Mr. Skey: I am sorry I appear to be infringing upon certain rules of this house. I do not mean to. I am endeavouring to discuss objectively the doctrine of controls. This is a control bill; controls are an essential part of socialism; and I have referred to the treatment of labour and the control of labour and its effect on trade unionism because I believe this is very important. As you know, the Northern Miner is one of our finest newspapers. It provides a great service for northern Quebec and Ontario and is intimately connected with the mining communities and their trade unions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call the attention of the hon. member to standing order 40, which will be applied if I have to rise again because of his remarks:

> Mr. Speaker, . . . after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition, may direct him to discontinue his speech . . .

If the hon. member does not wish to abide by the rules of the house I shall have to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Skey: I have done my best to abide by the rules of the house, Mr. Speaker, and I find it difficult to see where I have infringed upon them. Therefore I must conclude my remarks.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will this conclude the debate?

Mr. Garson: I understand not.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I hope it will not be said that I made a speech. I merely asked a question.

Mr. Garson: Am I correct in my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that this will not close the debate?

Mr. Speaker: I stated yesterday that the motion that the previous question be now put is not a substantive motion, and that being so there is no reply.

Mr. Garson: That answers the question of the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Jackman: How does it answer it? Do you close the debate?

Mr. Garson: No.

I rise to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, because several of the allusions that have been made by members of the Conservative party to the subject matter have seemed to me so erroneous as to reflect a misconception of some of the facts and legal principles involved in this matter. However, I should like to congratulate all of those, with the possible exception of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, who have taken part in this debate today, on the excellent relevancy which has been preserved and in some cases even upon the force of their arguments. They were all arguments made by adults for adults, and in this respect quite different from those offered by the members of the same party in the debate yesterday. I can think of nothing which would have been more useful to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) than to be in the house this afternoon and hear the speech delivered by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). He would have learned much about how a case should be presented to this house in a matter of this kind.

From this I would not wish it to be inferred by any means that I agree that the arguments presented by the hon. member for Eglinton were sound. Before resuming my seat I hope to deal with most of the main arguments made by him and his colleagues. In the meantime I think the time would not be wasted if we gave some attention to the legal aspects of the question now before us.

The resolution we are considering is intended to lead to the introduction of a bill to amend the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act of 1947. The first two recitals of the preamble of that act are quite relevant to this discussion, and I should like to read them:

> Whereas parliament, in view of the continuation of the national emergency arising out of the war, by the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, conferred upon the governor in council certain transitional powers, pursuant to which the governor in council has continued in force certain orders and regulations made under the War Measures Act and has made other orders and regulations; And whereas the national emergency arising out of the war, in certain aspects, has continued since the unconditional surrender of Germany and Japan and is still continuing . . .

When we amend an act introduced by a preamble of that sort, by substituting another section 7 providing for its termination approximately a year hence, we in effect import that preamble into what we are doing in this piece of legislation. In other words, as the leader of the opposition quite correctly stated yesterday, this house takes it upon itself to declare that in certain aspects the war-induced emergency which gave rise to the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947, then continued and is still continuing today.

That act of 1947 was quite short, containing only seven sections. The first set out the short title. The second provided that the orders and regulations set out in its schedule would continue in force. The third section provided for the employment of the necessary persons to administer it; the fourth, that the governor in council may revoke in whole or in part any of the regulations named in the schedule to the act; the fifth, provided for the publication of these orders; the sixth, the coming into force of the act; and the seventh, which we are now amending by the bill before us, the duration of the act. From the beginning, it has been on a temporary basis, renewal from year to year. It does not, therefore, present any of the dire consequences such as those envisaged by the last speaker in the case of France or Britain because the nature of this legislation from its commencement has been of an emergent or temporary character. The language is designed to carry out that idea.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Are you quoting from the new bill or the old one?

Mr. Garson: The bill we are now seeking to introduce is a bill which substitutes a new section for the old section 7 in the Transitional Measures Act of 1947. When we put in that new section 7—

Mr. Fraser: We have not got that bill.

Mr. Garson: Which bill?

Mr. Fraser: The bill about which you are talking.

Mr. Garson: The resolution we are discussing is preliminary to the introduction of the bill—

Mr. Fraser: The minister is not in order.

Mr. Garson: In any event, I have no more to offer on that aspect of the matter. I think hon. members who were very much concerned today, one of whom was the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), as to what orders in council are still in effect under this bill we have before us—

Mr. Pearkes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have no bill before me. It has not been issued.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, to this resolution which is before my hon. friend, the orders in council under the Transitional Measures Act of 1947, are exceedingly relevant. The member for Eglinton, if I am not mistaken, had the consolidated office copy before him and read from it from time to time. He based his argument on it and no person on this side of the house thought it proper to question the relevancy or propriety of any of the remarks he made.

Mr. Fraser: That was all right.

Mr. Garson: The member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) is now taking a position that is the very antithesis of the position he took about five minutes ago when he was raising points of order, that it is not possible to refer to any of these orders in council. It would then be quite impossible to answer any of the arguments of the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) because it would be impossible to refer to the orders in council to which he was referring.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order, my question was, are you reading from the new bill or the old one. That is the only question I asked.

Mr. Garson: I have passed that part of my argument in which I was referring to them.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then do not say that my present position is the antithesis of something else because I have not said anything since I asked that question.

Mr. Garson: Very well, Mr. Speaker, if it will make my friend any happier I am quite prepared to withdraw my remark that his present position is the antithesis of his former one.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am very happy and I thank the hon. member.

Mr. Garson: There has been some attempt, or if there was no attempt it was an accident, to convey the impression to the members of this house that the orders in council and controls were increasing rather than diminishing and that, as in France, they threatened to destroy real estate values as well as the liberty of the subject. Actually, a great deal of progress has been made towards diminishing the number of orders in council.

The member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) referred to the fact that there were fifty-seven orders in council. He said it was the Heinz bill because there were fifty-seven orders covered in the schedule. He is quite correct in saying that there were fifty-seven orders in the bill as it was presented to the House of Commons, but before the bill reached the final stages the number had been reduced to fifty. Out of those fifty, we are now concerned with carrying on in force only twelve. I should like very briefly to go over the orders in council contained in the schedule to the act of 1947 and indicate, by subject matter, those which have already been revoked, as indicating the very great extent of decontrol which has already been effected by this government. I should also like the privilege, Mr. Speaker, if hon. members will accord it to me, of putting on Hansard, for their convenience, the whole text of this list of the orders in council contained in the schedule to the Transitional Measures Act including both those which have been revoked, and those which are still in force.

The first of these was P.C. 5424, the agricultural food board regulations, respecting the recovery of subsidies. The next is P.C. 6759, respecting the repayment of subsidies and regulations on agricultural products. Then there were five regulations dealing with the civil service commission and relating, for example, to the appointment of ex-service men to the civil service, to veterans preference, and like matters. Then, under the Department of Finance, there was P.C. 394 dealing with the importation of anthracite coal and exempting it from customs duty. P.C. 8042 dealt with coke made from coal and exempting it from war exchange tax when used as fuel for cooking or baking foods or for heating buildings. Then there was P.C. 9058 dealing with bagging material, the importation of which is exempt from customs duty. Next there was P.C. 9781 which dealt with well-drilling machinery and the tariff treatment accorded to it.

Then, under the wartime prices and trade board, P.C. 9870, authorizing the incorporation of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, has been revoked, as well as P.C. 5518, the repayment of subsidy order. The next one was P.C. 6497 which created ration coupon banking.

Under the Department of Fisheries, there was P.C. 6289, regulations for control of salt fish and appointments thereunder.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Was that the regulation of salt fish and appointments thereunder?

Mr. Garson: Regulations for the control of salt fish and appointments thereunder.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Under the fish or what?

Mr. Garson: Then, under the Department of Labour, the wartime labour regulations which, as we know, control wages and salaries—

Mr. Knowles: No, labour relations, not wages and salaries; that was P.C. 9384.

Mr. Garson: I am giving the number of the main order in council in each case. Amendments made by other orders in council I am not going to refer to because there is such a large number of them.

During the debate this afternoon the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) argued that this bill which we are now seeking to introduce into the house would permit wage control. He did not explain how he arrived at this extraordinary conclusion and, personally, I am at a loss to understand how he could arrive at it because my information, obtained from reliable sources, is that all the orders in council dealing with wage and salary control have been revoked, the board disbanded and the machinery dismantled. Moreover, section 2 of the bill which it is now sought to bring before the house, limits the authority—

Mr. Fraser: The minister is not allowed to say it.

Mr. Garson: All right. I will not say it. I will leave it to my hon. friends to make their erroneous allusions to these matters out of the wisdom of ignorance upon which they draw so heavily from time to time.

Then under the Department of Labour—and I am still dealing with decontrol; these are controls that have been taken off, as some people in Canada would argue perhaps too rapidly—P.C. 7355 dealt with financial assistance to voluntary repatriates to Japan and for liquidation and transfer of their assets to Japan. Then under the Department of Mines and Resources, P.C. 7167 reserved to the crown radioactive substances in the Yukon territory and P.C. 7167 reserved to the crown radioactive substances in the Northwest Territories. In the Department of National Defence, P.C. 6638 provided post-discharge benefits to members of the armed forces serving in an interim force; P.C. 3617, naval, military and air force estates regulations; P.C. 349, regulations respecting claims by or against the crown involving members of naval, military or air forces (overseas); P.C. 363, consolidated regulations respecting salvage services of His Majesty's Canadian ships. Then under the Department of National Health and Welfare, there were four separate orders in council dealing with old age pensions. Under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, P.C. 9439 dealt with emergency shelter regulations; by P.C. 7502, emergency shelter regulations were transferred to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Under the Department of the Secretary of State, P.C. 1665 dealt with administration by custodian of property of persons of the Japanese race; and P.C. 469 transferred to the custodian the property of Japanese evacuees. Then under the Department of Transport, P.C. 133/510, compensation to seamen (war damage to effects) regulations, 1939; P.C. 2245, to authorize the chairman of the board of steamship inspection to relieve any ship from the obligation to comply with any of the provisions of part VII of the Canada Shipping Act, excepting those provisions of the said part relating to radiotelegraph installations on ships and two other provisions as well.

All of these orders in council have been revoked and will not be continued in this legislation which is now sought. In addition to this, there are two other orders revoked by an order in council passed in 1948 which will take effect as from April 1 next. One is in the Department of Fisheries dealing with the prohibition of fishing licences to persons of Japanese racial origin and one in the Department of Labour with regard to the evacuation and relocation of persons of the Japanese race in Canada.

Out of fifty orders in council that were covered by and appear in the schedule to the bill of which we are now seeking an amendment, that leaves only twelve.

An hon. Member: What bill?

Mr. Garson: I am not talking about the provisions of the bill. I am talking about the act of 1947 which we are now seeking to amend. I think it is perfectly proper to refer to it in those terms because that is the basis of the resolution which we are asking the house to pass. That means that we have now retained, as being continued effective by the legislation which we now seek, only twelve out of the fifty-seven Heinz orders in council that were referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

An hon. Member: That is why the cost of living has gone up.

Mr. Garson: Those are P.C. 8528, the wartime prices and trade regulations; P.C. 9029, wartime leasehold regulations; P.C. 7475, regulations of Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, which now exercises only a residual function; it is gradually completing its work. P.C. 34/4433, Government Employees Compensation Act extended to employees of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation; P.C. 3122, consolidation of supplementary regulations; P.C. 328 dealing with the Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation Limited.

Then there are two orders in council in the Department of Justice that have no substantive significance—one, P.C. 4600, authorizing, in cases involving breaches of wartime regulations, appeals through the provincial courts of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada rather than to a county court judge where constitutional issues are involved; and another P.C. 6223, calling for notice to attorneys general of Canada and of the provinces in certain cases under these regulations which involve constitutional questions.

Then under the heading of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, there is P.C. 1609, establishing construction materials regulations. There is P.C. 3, covering wartime industries control regulations; P.C. 245 the steel regulations, and P.C. 1997, the timber regulations.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Did I understand the minister to say that there was an order in council by which there was to be revoked the prohibition against Japanese getting fishing licences on the Pacific coast, which would become effective by April 1? Does that mean that by order in council, after April 1, the Japanese will be able to get fishing licences on the Pacific coast?

Mr. Garson: In the forty minutes at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, I am dealing with an extremely complicated question—

Mr. MacInnis: These are the people who are opposed to controls.

Mr. Graydon: You are the people who want it.

Mr. Garson: —and I would refer the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) to the order in council for the reply to his question.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and, I believe, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) this afternoon, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) yesterday, put forth this argument which, on its face, seems to have some merit. They say this. If it is desirable that these controls should be continued, why not bring before this house a statute setting forth, in terms that the members of the house can check, the provisions for that control? My reply is this. We are proposing to the house that it should continue the existing orders in council because it is hoped that the control thereby provided is temporary and therefore it is not desirable to put the law into the form of a permanent statute. More than that, we are here dealing, and through the years have been dealing, with a situation which is not only temporary in its duration but which changes in its character quite substantially from time to time in a quite unpredictable way; and it is impossible, under a statute, to get the degree of flexibility and adaptability of administrative regulations and the like which are appropriate to deal with a problem of that kind.

During this period of economic stress or emergency resulting from war and from the shortages occasioned by war, the regulations passed under the authority of the statute of which we are now seeking the amendment required constant and frequent revision and adjustment. To have this subject to statute, which would require amendments to be brought in and passed by this house from time to time, would involve a rigidity which would be wholly inappropriate in dealing with matters of that sort. For example, since March, 1948, on this very subject of rental regulation, commercial accommodation, as we know, has been decontrolled; landlords who need their homes for their personal residence have been permitted to give to their tenants six months' notice to vacate. Any landlord, no matter when he purchases a house, may apply for exemption, based upon grievous hardship to him because of his inability to occupy the residence himself. A public institution may apply for exemption if it needs the accommodation for the extension of its public endeavours. And maximum rentals were increased from 10 to 15 per cent. This is an example in just one field alone which can be matched by similar changes in the regulations in others. To say to the people who are to be affected by regulations of this sort that no change could be made until the House of Commons was called together and passed an amendment to the statute would, I suggest, be very unacceptable to public opinion in this country.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said this afternoon he had read in the speech from the throne that the government was introducing at this session a bill dealing with steel, and he suggested that the proper way to deal with at least steel regulations would be to incorporate them in this bill.

Now, sir, as I read the allusion in the speech from the throne—and I confine myself to that, for fear I might infringe upon the sensibilities of hon. members across the way, on a point of order, that I do not reveal any of my inside knowledge about bills which may be coming down later—

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Don't worry about us. It is Mr. Speaker you have to worry about.

Mr. Garson: At the instigation of my hon. friend. Now, this allusion in the speech from the throne was to legislation to provide for a loan to a steel concern in Canada. I suggest that the making of a loan to a corporation in the steel business, and the matter of the general control of steel, are subject matters so incongruous to each other that it would be highly improper to combine them in a single statute. And if it were desirable to bring down for steel regulation a statute to this House of Commons it would be much better to have the lending statute on the one hand and another statute governing steel regulation on the other hand, separate from each other. But for reasons which I have already given in the case of rental control, regulations of the sort I have indicated, which deal with a situation which is changing and fluid from time to time, are not in an appropriate form in a statute.

In view of the discussion which has taken place thus far, I do not think it is necessary to review the statements which have already been made by my colleagues the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that these twelve orders in council still in force cover, first of all, commodities subject to price ceilings, second, rental controls, third, steel control, and fourth, timber control.

One of the arguments made by our friends of the Progressive Conservative opposition is that they oppose the continuance of these controls upon the ground, among others they put forward, that it is unconscionable for members of the House of Commons to declare that the state of emergency which formed the basis for the act as it was originally passed still continues.

As hon. members will recall, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said that we must understand the terrible burden we take upon our conscience of declaring that there was an emergency in the country, as we must declare if we are going to pass this bill. Well, I agree entirely with my hon. friend. We do declare that the emergency still continues, because we are putting a new section 7 in a statute which has that declaration in its preamble. And when we put the new section 7 in, we do in effect make that declaration.

But surely, sir, such a declaration as that should not offend the conscience of any intelligent, reasonable and well-informed member of any legislature. I should have thought it was apparent to everyone that one of the results of every great war in history has always been inflation; and after the greatest war in history, one in which there has been by far the greatest destruction of property, and by far the greatest outpouring of money in the war effort, inevitably in every country after a war of this magnitude under even the best of fiscal management there is a great increase in the amount of money in circulation, on the one hand, and a tremendous destruction of goods and services upon which that money could be a claim, on the other. And that in any language spells inflation, basic inflation. To say as did the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) this afternoon, that he had noticed from one of the government publications that there was more money in circulation now after a great war than there had been before, and that therefore he immediately jumped to the conclusion that the Bank of Canada was in some way at fault, is to give an indication that my hon. friend simply does not understand the fiscal consequences of waging a great war.

If we have that condition of inflation then, sir, we have the type of economic emergency with which we are concerned in the resolution now before the house, and in the bill to be introduced. And, sir, that war-induced emergency has persisted after every war in history, and it certainly persists at the present time, and can be seen in various forms in every country of the world, civilized and uncivilized.

In the face of that emergency with all its maladjustments and dislocations, a necessity arises to introduce matters such as steel control and rent control, not as a matter of improvidence, stupidity and injustice but as a matter of prudence and good sense and in fairness to all the people of the country and particularly those who are not so well able to look after themselves.

From that I suggest that, far from its being a difficult thing for any man of conscience to affirm that we have in Canada today a war-induced emergency still continuing, I believe that the majority of members in the House of Commons will agree with me that the continuance of this exceptional condition of emergency, certainly at least so far as the matters which we seek to control in the measure now before us are concerned, is so self-evident that it is not subject to dispute at all.

In that respect I am most happy to have a very substantial measure of agreement even from members of the Progressive Conservative party. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) rose in his place in this debate and gave a most excellent description of an emergency—a most excellent description indeed. It was well described, well worded and graphically portrayed, and his whole argument supports the position of the government. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has taken part in the debate and he dealt with three matters in particular, one being steel. This is what he said about steel, as reported on page 320 of Hansard:

> In so far as steel is concerned, steel is in great demand. Steel undoubtedly requires some measure of regulation.

The hon. member admits that it requires some measure of regulation.

> For what reason? The reason is that projects of great magnitude—

Listen to this for a fine description of the type of emergency for which controls should be devised:

> The reason is that projects of great magnitude, so far as this little country of Canada is concerned, have been held up for a great variety of reasons. To my mind, some of these reasons are patriotic. We had a war. We were told not to use steel while the war was on. We were told to forget, until the war was over, about our building projects requiring steel. The war consumed a tremendous amount of steel. Those charged with the responsibility for new construction requiring steel, realizing that a war requires a great quantity of this product, delayed their projects five years—yes, six, seven and eight years. The blueprints, however, were on the table. Those blueprints were worrying those who were directing the affairs of different organizations such as, for example, banks and office buildings.

Could you have a better description of the kind of situation arising out of a war in which it is advisable to declare an emergency and bring into effect the same steel control?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does the minister say that we need more big banks? Is that his argument?

Mr. Garson: No, not necessarily to have more big banks, but perhaps to see that the limited amount of steel that was in supply would go to the building of hospitals rather than big banks.

Mr. Jackman: Why did you not do it? You have not done it for five years.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Rosedale.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend is going to do what he did before and get up and call my time, may I say that I wish he would let me have my time for myself while I am speaking.

Mr. Jackman: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Which point?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): What point of order?

Mr. Jackman: I have not had a chance to state my point of order. I want the house to know that when I called the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to order the other day—

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The time the hon. member is taking now should not be counted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no point of order.

Mr. Jackman: The point of order is the allusion to which the Minister of Justice—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Garson: I hope this time will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. Howe: Rosedale will call it on you.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister's time is taken up by the yapping of ministers to his right.

Mr. Garson: In addition to the very excellent description of that emergency by the hon. member for Danforth, I should like to refer to the statement made by the minister with regard to accomplishments under the steel control. Perhaps in so doing I may satisfy the curiosity of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) who is asking me to show what has been done. The minister stated, as reported on page 317 of Hansard:

> At the present time we are moving surplus primary steel, or semi-finished steel, from the Algoma Steel Company to the finishing plants at Hamilton, to the amount of about 18,000 tons per month. We are also moving semi-finished steel from the Dominion Steel and Coal Company at Sydney to Hamilton, to the extent of about 10,000 tons per month. That 28,000 tons of steel, which cannot be finished at Algoma or at Sydney, would ordinarily go for export and be finished in other countries.

I presume, to be used in other countries.

> That was the pre-war history of the surpluses of those two plants. By moving that steel to Hamilton 28,000 tons per month of additional basic steel are turned into finished products.

In reply to the hon. member for Rosedale, who asks what we are doing, I say that that is what we are doing. The minister continued:

> To end steel control abruptly at this time would, I am sure, reduce the production of finished steel from Canadian plants and Canadian foundries by as much as 20 per cent.

In the face of these facts, what sort of mentality is it that will result in an hon. member of this house getting up and saying that it disturbs his conscience and his intellectual honesty to be asked to declare that there is an emergency which warrants these controls?

During the course of the discussion the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) introduced among other and irrelevant matters a recent decision of the court of appeal in my own province of Manitoba in the case of Nolan and Hallet and Carey versus the Attorney General of Canada. In replying to a question yesterday, the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the Department of Justice had instructed counsel to appeal this judgment. That is entirely correct. Therefore I do not think that it is proper for me, any more than it was proper yesterday for the leader of the opposition and for the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), to comment upon a case which to all practical intents and purposes is sub judice. Certainly for me as Minister of Justice to attempt to analyse a judgment from which we are taking an appeal would be, in my opinion, improper in the highest degree and I have no intention of doing any such thing.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why would it?

Mr. Garson: However, I do not think it would be improper for me to point out that I agree entirely with the leader of the opposition when he says that the decision of the Manitoba court of appeal did not hold that the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act was ultra vires of the dominion parliament. Unless it so held it is difficult to see what relevancy this citation has to the discussion that is now being carried on. If it did not affect this matter we are dealing with, if it did affect something else—I hate to use the vernacular but . . . so what?

Moreover, it should be pointed out that the order in council involved in the Nolan case does not appear anywhere in the schedule of the act in its original form in 1947. It was not one of the fifty-seven varieties. That being so, it is difficult to see what bearing this judgment has upon the matter before us.

Mr. Harkness: The order was relevant to the matter.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Stand up.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that certain assertions and contributions by various members of the Conservative opposition, and I include the interjection just made by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), may be quite misleading to hon. members of this house when they either hear or read them subsequently in the absence of a statement of one or two cardinal legal principles that have a bearing on this matter.

The first of these principles is that there can be no doubt that the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, the first of the series, was intra vires or within the power of this parliament to enact at the time it was enacted. The privy council has so held in the Japanese case, 1947 Appeal Cases, 87, which followed and applied the Fort Frances case, 1923 Appeal Cases, 695. In the Fort Frances case the privy council considered the constitutional validity of the War Measures Act, 1914, and certain orders in council made under the War Measures Act during the war for the control throughout Canada of the supply of newsprint paper by manufacturers and the price of newsprint. They also considered the constitutional validity of further dominion statutes, 1919, chapter 63, which were passed after the cessation of hostilities for continuing war control into the post-war period after the first world war.

Upon the point as to the continuance of the authority of parliament to pass laws dealing with matters arising under the war emergency after the cessation of hostilities, Lord Haldane in the Fort Frances case said, at page 706:

> It may be that it has become clear that the crisis which arose is wholly at an end, and that there is no justification for the continued exercise of an exceptional interference which becomes ultra vires when it is no longer called for. In such a case the law as laid down for distribution of powers in the ruling instrument would have to be invoked, but a very clear evidence that the crisis had wholly passed away would be required to justify the judiciary, even when the question was one of ultra vires which it had to decide, in overruling the decision of the government that exceptional measures were still requisite.

Very clear evidence would have to be given to overrule the decision of the government that exceptional measures were still requisite. In the Japanese case—that is the one after the last war—the privy council considered the validity of three orders in council made under the War Measures Act relating to the deportation of persons of the Japanese race and the revocation of their Canadian nationality. The orders in council in question had been continued in force by P.C. 7414 made under section 4 of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. The privy council held that the orders in council were intra vires and that the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act was intra vires and also, by implication, that P.C. 7414 was intra vires.

With respect to the power of parliament to legislate as to an emergency arising out of the war, Lord Wright said at page 101:

> On certain general matters of principle there is not, since the decision in Fort Frances Pulp and Power Company versus the Manitoba Free Press, any room for dispute. Under the British North America Act property and civil rights in the several provinces are committed to the provincial legislatures, but the parliament of the dominion in a sufficiently great emergency, such as that arising out of war, has power to deal adequately with that emergency for the safety of the dominion as a whole. The interests of the dominion are to be protected, and it rests with the parliament of the dominion to protect them. What those interests are the parliament of the dominion must be left with considerable freedom to judge.

Mr. Hodgson: What are you reading from?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend had been listening he would have heard me state that this is the judgment of Lord Wright.

> Again if it be clear that an emergency has not arisen or no longer exists there can be no justification for the exercise or continued exercise of the exceptional powers. The rule of law as to the distribution of powers between the parliament of the dominion and the parliaments of the provinces comes into play, but very clear evidence that an emergency has not arisen, or that the emergency no longer exists, is required to justify the judiciary, even though the question is one of ultra vires, in overruling the decision of the parliament of the dominion that exceptional measures were required or were still required.

These clear statements of judicial opinion, as applied to the facts of the case now before us, require that we, in the exercise of our judgment with regard to the passage of the resolution now before us, need to satisfy ourselves merely that, with regard to the need for rental regulations, steel control, timber control, and the control of commodities which are under price ceilings, the state of war-induced emergency still continues. That is all we have to find.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Garson: I have only one more sentence to finish. In the face of a large number of facts—

Mr. Jackman: By permission.

Mr. Garson: —that are so clear and plain—well, I will sit down.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in the event that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) did not finish his speech, may I ask that he be permitted to do so?

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: His own party says no.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): He spoke for over an hour, but I promise you I will not occupy that much of the time of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I do not know what an hour is since we changed our dinner hour. He spoke for over fifty minutes. That is what I had intended to say.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend is going to say that I talked for over an hour then I think I may as well get up and get my money's worth. If I am going to be accused of speaking overtime I may as well do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Reid: He started at 8.07.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): With great respect, one's money's worth is a peculiar thing. To the man who is selling something it is very often an entirely different thing than it is to the man who is buying.

Mr. Grant: You have nothing to sell.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I say with respect to the gentleman who just interrupted me that his remark neither adds to nor lowers the gauge of his natural stupidity. It remains just the same. This has been going on for four years, Mr. Speaker, so you will pardon the roughness of my remarks. As to this whole question, it seems to me of interest that the resolution was introduced by the Minister of Justice and explained by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). So it has gone on its way. I listened very carefully to the very good speech made by my friend, the Minister of Justice, and from the beginning I endeavoured to find out just where he was heading. Some lines occurred to me. I think they were probably written by a great man, but when the Minister of Justice was dealing with these controls, which they want to hang on to and cling to so tightly, these lines came to my mind with respect to government controls.

There is no death. What seems so is transition.

That is the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act which they have before us at the present time. In saying that, I then follow the argument last made by the minister which was with respect to the Free Press case—I am glad he is familiar with it—which went to the privy council almost before he was born. To put it simply, the law is as he said it was. The Nolan case he is talking about at least went so far as to hold that the question whether or not there was an emergency was a matter of proof before a court.

On this matter of decontrol, I am very happy to say that I think the members on the government side, the members of our party, and the members of the Social Credit party all are anxious to get rid of these controls as soon as they can be got rid of and as soon as the economy of the nation will permit. I believe that is a fair statement. It does seem to me that our socialist friends over here do not want to get rid of these controls, because that is contrary to their doctrine. Their whole scheme of things is that everything and everybody should be under their control. That is the basis of their philosophy. I give them credit. They have said so in this house and, as I have said previously, the position is arguable and I do not want to change what I had to say on another occasion with respect to that. Discussing controls, however, I was very interested in the C.C.F. convention held in the city of Winnipeg, which was broadcast over the radio. One of the debates to which I listened, away out where I live, when my friend the whip of the party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), was chairman, concerned the private chartered banks of Canada. The subject of that very interesting debate was whether the country should own the banks or merely control them. The people who urged control, which was the idea advanced by the central council at that convention, finally succeeded; and I listened with great attention as my hon. friend said, "I want everybody to know that we are now practically unanimous; there are only two votes against it", though I heard a good many more than two speeches against it.

Mr. Knowles: I am enjoying the hon. member's reference, but just to keep the record straight the occasion when it was unanimous but for two votes had to do with another matter, namely ERP.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then I apologize; I thought it had to do with the matter of the banks. You will find me ready to quite frankly admit it when I am wrong. However, I did hear many of the speeches made at that time. I do not want anyone to be offended when I say that debate dealt with two excellent examples of this sort of thing. The Russian system is one of ownership; the German system under Hitler was that of control. That is the difference between the two philosophies which operated at that time in Germany and Russia.

Mr. Coldwell: Do you really believe that?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I certainly do believe it and can prove it. That was the difference between what was advocated in that debate. May I add that I am not for a moment suggesting that anyone who took part in that debate is a Hitler or a Stalin or a follower of either. I do not indulge in that sort of thing; but that was the subject matter.

Now turning again to the Minister of Justice and his references to this question of emergency, he read from the judgments of Lord Haldane, I think it was, or Lord Wright of the privy council. I was interested in hearing again some of those judgments on which I cut my teeth twenty or twenty-five years ago; I think the Free Press case was about 1923, or something like that. But I want to ask the minister this very simple question. Can one, by any statute or order in council, find the same emergency calling for a price ceiling on butter that calls for control on steel? To mention the thing, sir, is to show the complete absurdity of the whole business. Nor can one equally justify a dealing in coarse grains, we will say, and a dealing in lumber, saying that the same reason exists which one would use to prove an emergency.

I must make this exception. In time of war we had the War Measures Act, when it was just and right that the people of the nation should give up their individual freedom in order that as a whole they might maintain freedom. But those arguments have no application whatever at the present time.

Now I put this question. We had the War Measures Act, which gave complete power to the central authority. Then we struggled along with what we called the transitional powers acts, I think from 1945 on. I have often wondered why the government did not simply continue the War Measures Act. Let it be admitted that I am one of those who would have argued against that; but the same arguments are open to me today in saying that the orders we are continuing go altogether too far, some of them even further than the War Measures Act itself went. I do say that in time of peace there can be no justification for carrying things that length. With the greatest respect and some considerable admiration for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), I should think he would be better pleased without such wide powers as he, or some other members of this government, or members of the staffs of this government, have under those orders.

I make this suggestion in that regard. The government have said so often that they do not like continuing under order in council government. We learned from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that only twelve of these orders are left, and if I heard him correctly he said some of them are quite unimportant. It does seem to me that we as a parliament should pass a statute declaring an emergency, if there is an emergency, and then state what is to be controlled. The Minister of Justice complained that a statute did not have the elasticity of an order in council. It has. All you have to do is say so in your statute. All you have to do is put in the statute the subject matter, leaving the regulatory matters to such authorities as those presenting the statute see fit. It has been done time and time again. To repeat the illustration I used a moment ago, it does not seem to me you can find the same emergency to justify ceiling prices on butter that you may to justify control over the output of steel mills.

Now then, what does all this mean? It means this, that it may be there are some things that require control. I am a little bothered about the legal aspect of the matter. With respect to rental control, and this will please my friends on the opposite side, I am not quite sure that, if we do pass this proposed statute and continue the order in council, it will be worth a nickel in a court of law. These matters belong to the provinces and it will be open to anyone, if he cares to take the trouble, to find out whether or not there is in fact an emergency in that connection. I do not think it would be very difficult of proof. It seems to me it would necessarily be proven.

With respect to some of these other matters, I am going to say that the question of the emergency is one upon which I have very great doubt. Some day, as in the Nolan case, it will be submitted to our courts for a final decision.

I promised, sir, I would not be long, so I am going to close with a suggestion that these matters be embodied in a statute, so that he who sows may reap. Surely with the experience the officials have had from 1945 to 1949, it should not be difficult to write into a statute these regulations which are needed now. It is not a large undertaking for any draftsman who is worth his salt, considering the experience the various departments have had in the operations of these orders under this nebulous transitional powers act. I think it could be done with respect to some commodities—let us take butter, if you will, as one product, or the cabbages we are now getting from Florida and which we could not get until a few days ago. The point I am making is this. If we do put our imprint of approval upon these various orders, then at some time someone should do more than quote the speech of the member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) with respect to steel. All he said was that there is a lag because our steel was used for war purposes; that is all he said, and that is the only authority quoted by the minister to prove his emergency in connection with steel.

I do not think it is too late yet, Mr. Speaker, to put these things in the form of a statute. Then, everyone who has been sent here by the people may vote one way or the other on that statute. He could go home, then, and be responsible for a definite act for or against the government. It would not permit anyone to say we approved or disapproved of this nebulous thing which may be interpreted in a hundred ways by five thousand people or two thousand people, because at least that many people will be interpreting these orders to the people who sent us here.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to hold back the passage of this measure before us. I refrained from speaking until some members of the official opposition this evening made statements about the C.C.F., Great Britain and socialism generally which, if not answered, might go out to the public as bearing some modicum of truth.

The last speaker, in his humorous way, referred to the C.C.F. convention held last summer at Winnipeg and told us about a certain debate he heard at that time. I was present at the convention from the beginning to the end—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Some hon. members have been requesting the member who has the floor to speak louder. If there were not so much talk in the house, the hon. member who has the floor could be heard.

Mr. Zaplitny: In discussing the philosophy of the C.C.F., the last speaker attempted to draw a parallel by saying that Hitler, and by that I assume he meant nazism, believed in control. I think we agree on one thing, that Hitler did stand for stringent control. Furthermore, I think we agree on the point that Hitler and his party did not believe in public ownership.

Taking that as our text, the hon. member may be surprised to find that a leading member of his own party, who narrowly missed being leader of the party, expressed himself on that question as far back as 1942 in these words when he was speaking to the Conservative businessmen's club in Toronto:

> The Conservative party must meet this challenge that comes to it and show the people that our economic system shall continue to be one of free enterprise under stringent control—

I am not going to accuse the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) of being a follower of nazism or an admirer of Hitler, because I know he is not.

Mr. Hodgson: That was during the war in 1942.

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes, but the hon. member did say that the Conservative party must persuade the people to believe that they are the party that believes in stringent control, which is the very thing the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said Hitler stood for.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If you will read further, you will find he was dealing with monopolies.

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Certainly. Why don't you give it to us straight?

Mr. Zaplitny: I will be very glad to do so, and if my hon. friend had listened further to the radio broadcast to which he referred, he would not have made the mistakes he made in trying to interpret what happened at that convention. He was a long way from the point. If the hon. member means to imply that because the C.C.F. has favoured controls in the house during the past four years, and we have no apology to make for that, that because we were trying to serve the best interests of the people of Canada, we were in some way undemocratic or did not believe in the democratic system of government, I want to tell him right now that the C.C.F. is far more democratic than the Conservative party ever was.

Mr. Graydon: Of course, that is an unprejudiced judgment.

Mr. Zaplitny: Entirely, and I want to be perfectly fair with the hon. member. I suppose he wants an unprejudiced authority for that, and I have it in my hand. I expected he would make that remark so I have it here. I am going to quote from the constitution of the Progressive Conservative party dated March 29, 1946, in which one finds this amazing phrase while discussing who can be a member and what power a member of that party has:

> Aside from the executive membership provided for in this section, there shall be a general membership of the association which shall consist of all those who pay the annual membership fee which shall be fixed by the executive officers of the association. They may attend meetings, take part in deliberations and receive information, but may not vote.

The basic thing in any democratic organization is that those who pay membership fees should have a vote in that organization to decide the policy of that organization. Surely a party that has a constitution of that nature—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): From what were you reading?

Mr. Zaplitny: I was reading from the constitution.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You are lifting parts of it from the context.

Mr. Zaplitny: I did not interrupt the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) or any other member when he was putting his views on the record.

Mr. Graydon: Do not try to misrepresent the situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: That is a misrepresentation, and I do not mind telling you that right here on the floor of the house.

Mr. Knowles: The rest of it would make it worse.

Mr. Graydon: I know what is in it.

Mr. MacInnis: That is why you do not want to hear it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must insist that hon. members address their remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Graydon: He is misrepresenting the situation.

Mr. Zaplitny: I want to be as kind as possible to my hon. friends, Mr. Speaker, because I have nothing in a personal way about which to criticize them. As members of this house they are delightful people, but they say some queer things in this house; and they direct their criticism to the C.C.F. when they are discussing a government measure. That in itself is a strange procedure. One would have thought that we had introduced this measure into the house. They directed their criticism against the socialists, against the C.C.F. and against the British government. Now when I have the opportunity—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, what has this to do with the question that is before the house?

Mr. Coldwell: As much as what was said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) last night.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has pointed out to me that he does not see what relation the remarks of the hon. member have to the resolution before the house. I would ask the hon. member to direct his remarks to the resolution.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Why did not the hon. member for Danforth interrupt his own members?

Mr. Zaplitny: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall be glad to do as you ask. At the moment, I was directing my remarks to the remarks made by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). If his remarks were unrelated to the subject under discussion, I stumbled into disorder by following his example. I wish merely to finish the sentence by saying that I have been accused by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) of trying to misrepresent the position of his party.

Mr. Graydon: As you have.

Mr. Zaplitny: I have in my hand the constitution of the party. I read a whole paragraph from beginning to end, not taken out of its context. It comes under the heading "general membership." The next paragraph has to do with something entirely different.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Which I submit, Mr. Speaker, has nothing to do with the question before the house.

Mr. Zaplitny: The hon. members may be ashamed of their constitution, but that is not my fault.

Mr. Graydon: It is a democratic constitution, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Knowles: Have you ever read it?

Mr. Graydon: I had something to do with drafting it.

Mr. Zaplitny: According to the hon. member's standards of democracy, it may be a democratic constitution.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Danforth has risen to a point of order. There are so many interruptions, with hon. members speaking to one another and to the hon. member who has the floor, that it is absolutely impossible for me to follow the debate. I will make a ruling that speeches at this time must be relevant to the resolution which is before the house.

Mr. Coldwell: That ruling is rather late in the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Zaplitny: The subject under discussion, Mr. Speaker, has been controls, and I presume it still is.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You found out something.

Mr. Zaplitny: Although the resolution in itself refers to the bill, which is to come before the house, to give permission to the government to continue certain regulations that they have exercised for a number of years, to me the basic thing appears to be price control and controls generally. In discussing this matter I believe we should try to separate, for our own benefit, the two matters that have been more or less confused in this debate. First of all, there is the question of controls as such, and then there is the question of the abuse of powers. The critics of this resolution and of the government have been confusing those two issues by pointing out all the abuses—and there have been some; there have been enough for the government to have earned plenty of criticism—and using that issue as a measuring stick for deciding whether controls as such are desirable in this country at this time.

I do not think there is any member in this house who would condone any abuse of the power given to any government; and if the government or those to whom they have delegated powers under the wartime prices and trade board have in any way abused their powers or gone beyond the authority given to them by this parliament, I have no objection to anyone's exposing them and criticizing them in the strongest possible terms. We in this party believe that the powers delegated by parliament to the government, or by the government to any board, should be used for the purpose of serving the best interests of the people of this country. As long as that power is used in that way, we have no criticism of it. If it is used in any other way, or if it is abused in its application, we are just as critical as any member of this house.

The question has arisen whether price control or any other control is now necessary, in view of the question whether there is now an emergency or not. I do not intend to take up the time of this house to discuss at great length what an emergency is or whether we are now in a state of emergency. We could discuss that subject for a long time without coming to any conclusion, for this simple reason. When we speak of an emergency, we do not always speak of the same people. Let us remember that in this country today there are people, and there have been for many years, for whom the state of emergency has never passed. They have always been in a state of emergency. During the 1930's when we had mass unemployment in this country—

An hon. Member: What do you know about it?

Mr. Zaplitny: I wish you knew half as much about it as I do. During the 1930's when we had mass unemployment there were thousands—yes, hundreds of thousands of people—who for ten years were living in a state of emergency and the government did not do anything about it. There were many people then who would have thanked a government that took the trouble to pass some legislation to help them to find jobs and to give them a decent standard of living. They were not worrying about the government having too much power or doing too much. They were critical because the government was not doing enough. I think most hon. members in the house realize that now.

On the other hand there are today in Canada, and there have been for many years, people who have never felt the state of emergency so far as their economic lives are concerned. Now that the war is over those who find themselves in comfortable economic circumstances feel that there is no emergency. Naturally it depends on whom you are speaking for. If you are speaking for the class of people who thrive at a time when prices are skyrocketing or who are in a position to profiteer from the state of affairs in this country, as they have been for the past few years, then of course for them there is no emergency. For them there is a harvest to reap. But if you are speaking for the people who are obliged to pay the profits and who are the victims of exploitation, then for them there certainly is an emergency.

I wish now to refer to the charge that has been made and repeated so blithely this afternoon and evening by hon. members to our right to the effect that the C.C.F. is the party of control; that we should like to see the people controlled at all times, and that we should like to control everything. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Those who believe in the philosophy of public ownership or co-operative ownership are the very ones who can save this country from permanent price control. Under the present economic system this country will never get away from controls because the very way in which the present system operates invites controls. As long as you have an economic system which is based on profit, on the philosophy that the strongest should win and that the weakest should be trampled underfoot, then if there is to be even rough justice of any kind you must have a system of price control and other controls to keep the economic affairs of this country under some semblance of order. But if we change the economic base of this country to one of co-operation from one of competition, we shall slowly start to emerge from the position where controls are necessary. We shall emerge into a time when production shall be for use and when service shall be at cost. Then it will not be necessary to control prices because the customer and the producer will be the same person, as will be the distributor.

When, in any economy, you get to the stage where the people produce for their own use, distribute among themselves the goods of their own production, and enjoy the fruits of their labour without having to hand tribute to any profiteer, you will not need control. That is the reason the C.C.F. has advocated and advocates today, not a permanent system of price controls as a solution of our problem, but the extension of public ownership into legitimate fields, and the encouragement of co-operative ownership in all the fields in which it can be properly worked, thus letting the people of Canada work out their own economic solution.

Let us take our co-operatives as an example. There is no finer example of institutions which lay out their own destiny, so to speak, than the co-operative organizations. They are the producers, the distributors and the consumers, all at the same time. There is no reason for them to raise prices against each other, because it would be senseless to try to profiteer from yourself.

Therefore for hon. members to say that the C.C.F. is the party which wants permanent controls is simply to show that they do not understand the philosophy of this party. If we reach the point in this country where we are willing to admit that human rights have priority over property rights, and that human welfare in this country should have first priority at all times, then it will be possible for us to build our economic system to suit human welfare, and not try to twist the human element in our society to fit our economic system, as we are trying to do it today. That is the reason we must have price controls now.

The suggestion has been made by several members that, instead of administering these controls by order in council, they should be put into statute form. We have also heard from the same people that these controls appear to be self-perpetuating. Well, if I judge aright the temper of the government of Canada, and its actions in the past few years, it would be useless at this time to attempt to put into statute form what is left of their price-control program, as they themselves have announced it.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) took great pains this evening to try to prove to the official opposition that this is a decontrol measure he is placing before the house, rather than a measure of control. In other words, he suggests that the government have no intention of bringing about any comprehensive system of price controls, and have said so on several occasions, and that they are following out their philosophy in the present instance.

There is no basic difference on this question between the approach made by the government and that made by the official opposition. Let us not be fooled by the shadow-boxing which has been going on in the house for the last few days. Both those parties believe in private enterprise and in letting people go ahead and make all the profits they can. That is what happens in practice, regardless of what they say. And I have no more faith in what the government pretends to do today, than I would have in the official opposition if it were sitting on the government benches.

What we are told is that they have left twelve orders in council controlling a number of things. We are given the list of the things still under control, so far as prices are concerned. An examination of the list would show that it all consists practically of either agricultural products or primary products, with the exception of steel and timber.

That is not a policy of price control. It is only a pitiful attempt at trying to appear as if they are controlling something. The government has gone down the road of decontrol. The Progressive Conservative opposition should be applauding what the government is doing, because it is the same thing they believe in. The government has destroyed the price stabilization system of this country by the process of decontrolling prices at a time when prices were still going up. Today they find themselves in the position where they are the ones to blame for the high cost of living. And they will soon be the ones to blame for the primary producers in this country being unable to obtain even the cost of production of their primary products.

In the face of that, however, the government is decontrolling instead of attempting to build a system of prices which would have some sort of relationship with each other, and which would have some sort of relationship between the prices received by the producers of primary products and those received by the ones who manufacture goods for sale to the primary producers.

Until some effort is made in this direction, it will be useless for the government to talk about controlling prices. It is not doing that; and it would be equally useless for the official opposition to attack the government or the C.C.F. in the matter of controls. Thus far the Progressive Conservative opposition has been attempting to show that the Liberal government is following certain socialist proposals. They might as well forget that approach, because it is becoming more evident than their speeches can make it from day to day that the affinity between the Liberal and the Progressive Conservative philosophies for the private enterprise system is far stronger, and in practice shows itself in the coalition which we have out west.

The C.C.F. party in the House of Commons, in attempting to bring about a modicum of justice for the primary producers and consumers, has stood out, over the years, pleading for the government to maintain the price stabilization program they started during the war. If we have not been able to persuade them to do it, at least we will be able to stand on our record showing that we have fought for the benefit of the people, and that the combined parties have beaten us down.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that the C.C.F. was also a member of the Manitoba coalition?

Mr. Zaplitny: I have heard that old chestnut once before.

Mr. Garson: Is it not true?

Mr. Zaplitny: No, it is not true.

Mr. Graydon: It is true.

Mr. Zaplitny: I have heard that old chestnut shot out in the house several times, and I might as well deal with it now.

At the time the C.C.F. participated in the government of Manitoba it was specifically stated at that time by the premier of that province, who now sits in this House of Commons, that it was a non-partisan government, and that he objected to the word coalition being used.

He stated also, publicly, through the press and radio, that it was a temporary set-up in order to help the war effort. It was on that elevated basis that the C.C.F. entered temporarily the non-partisan government of Manitoba. But it was not long before the C.C.F. found its good faith was being violated and found that it was not a non-partisan government, and that the motive behind it was to bring about coalition in order to maintain itself in power. There was only one thing to do; the C.C.F. did the honourable thing and withdrew from the coalition. But the other two parties found the necessity for clinging together in the interest of self-preservation even greater than the necessity of preserving the public interest.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in the debate. However the official opposition has been carrying on for the last two days, and their arguments are getting so thin —they were not very good to begin with— that I felt something that really mattered should be said. During the past day and a half they have spent most of their time in criticizing the attitude of this party toward controls.

I am not much concerned as to whether the present control bill passes or not, because there is so very little of useful control left, that is, control for the benefit of the common people of Canada, that perhaps a little heavier load would not be much harder to bear. As a matter of fact, if controls are removed altogether it will likely bring home to them all the sooner who are their friends and who are their enemies.

There are and there have been two schools of thought with regard to controls. There is one school, those who live by exploitation and who do not favour controls. Then there is the other school, the little fellow who is exploited and who favours controls because they are his protection. The little fellow was never protected to the extent he was when controls were in effect during the war period. Never in his life was his standard of living so high, and never was he so secure. For that reason he believes in controls. And who can blame him?

But neither the official opposition nor the government believe in controls. The government found that they operated well during the war and I think they were prepared to carry on with controls until supply was sufficient to meet demand, but they were continually being pushed by the official opposition to remove controls.

Mr. Graydon: And the farmers.

Mr. MacInnis: The farmers today want controls. If the hon. member will read the report of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture he will find there the strongest demand for controls ever made in Canada. The C.C.F. is not in favour of controls just for the sake of controls. We are in favour of government controls because we are convinced that if we do not have government controls we will have some other form of control. Let me demonstrate to the house what happens when government controls are removed.

As soon as a government control is removed another control takes its place. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is not at the moment in his seat, last August wrote to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in regard to the allocation of newsprint. In the letter that the hon. member received from the minister appeared these words:

> As you may know, the authority for the control of allocation of newsprint, formerly vested in the wartime prices and trade board, was rescinded as of December 15, 1945 . . . The Newsprint Association of Canada, Sun Life Building, Montreal, now has complete control of the allocation of newsprint.

Are my friends opposed to that kind of control?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. MacInnis: That is the kind of control they want. They want big business to control the lives of the people of Canada. I am being generous and am willing to assume that the government do not want that situation, but they have willingly or unwillingly allowed themselves to be pushed into the position of having to do that.

Only a few months ago there was an investigation by the combines investigation commissioner into the price and distribution of bread. It was found that the very staff of life of the people was controlled and is being controlled today. It was found that prices were set and that the bakeries had their own police to see that those prices set were adhered to. Are hon. members going to tell me that there is no control? Of course there is control. We believe that it is much better to have control by a government or an agency responsible to the people than by an agency not responsible to anyone but itself.

What has happened during the past few years through the removal of controls? The removal of each control has resulted on each occasion in an increase in the cost of living. Every increase in the cost of living has made it that much more difficult for the low-income people of this country to live. I have pointed out already that the standard of living of the low-income people of Canada, the old age pensioners, persons in receipt of war veterans allowances, those on superannuation and the like, is much lower today, despite the fact that in 1948 we had the highest level of production we have ever had in Canada, than it was during the war years.

What is the reason? The reason is that when the government removed controls those who were controlling prices allowed those prices to soar, or they put up prices and took away some more of what the little people had left. At one of the sittings of the royal commission on prices last autumn Mr. H. R. MacMillan of the MacMillan lumber interests was on the witness stand. When he was asked the reason for rising prices he said:

> "We found that selling to the retailer at lower prices than other mills was having the effect of increasing the retailer's profit without doing anyone any good.
> "My experience is that in the open market when the price is going up you can't stop it."

Just because you cannot stop it without controls, the little fellow is being squeezed to death while the big fellow is prospering as he never prospered before. There can be only one end to a society where squalor, misery, want, poverty and privation increase at the bottom while wealth and luxury increase at the top. That is what is happening in Canada today.

My hon. friends of the official opposition say that four years after the war there is no need for controls. If there is no emergency now, why all this talk about military pacts? If there is no emergency now, if we are living in such a safe world, why have the defence estimates for this year been increased considerably over what they were last year, or the year before that, and the year before that? Let us talk sense. The world is on the edge of a precipice today. With that situation confronting us, hon. members to my right day after day have obstructed the work of this parliament.

Today the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) referred to certain things that had been done by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the development of a housing project. I agree that they did not use that discretion in regard to property rights that they should have. There were, however, only some twenty or thirty properties involved. My information, obtained from letters received from some of the people concerned, is that the situation has been settled fairly well since the matter was taken up with the minister of reconstruction and the chairman of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. But I remember that when 23,000 people in British Columbia were despoiled of their property, the efforts of a lifetime, the hon. member for Vancouver South never raised his voice in protest.

Mr. Green: When was that?

Mr. MacInnis: When the Japanese Canadians were uprooted from their homes and scattered right across this country from one end of its 4,000 miles to the other.

Mr. Green: Your own C.C.F. leader advocated moving them.

Mr. MacInnis: My own C.C.F. provincial leader did not do anything of the kind, and even if he did not have any democracy in his make-up my friend the member for Vancouver South cannot take that as an excuse for not having any himself.

Mr. Green: Do you think they should not have been moved?

Mr. MacInnis: They should not have been moved, but if they had to be moved then their properties should have been protected. The government of the country should have acted as their guardian and not as their despoiler. That is what should have been done. There is no democracy in a country unless there is democracy for everybody, democracy for those you do not like as well as for those you do like. That is the only democracy that is worth while. That is the only democracy that I stand for or will have anything to do with.

Mr. Graydon: My goodness, you are worked up.

Mr. MacInnis: Why shouldn't I be worked up when I see people around me who just talk for the mere sake of talking, who talk for the mere sake of making an impression on the country?

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, I realize the hon. member has worked himself up into a fine state.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order—

Mr. Fulton: I would suggest—

Mr. MacInnis: Will my friend please sit down? I have the floor.

Mr. Fulton: I would suggest that this has nothing to do with the resolution. I ask for your ruling on the point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has raised a point of order that the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East do not refer to the resolution. I ask him to direct his remarks to the resolution.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the matter I was just referring to involves one of the orders in council referred to this evening by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and it is in the resolutions that are going to be dealt with. My friends on the right, the official opposition, are very fond of criticism, but they cannot take it when it is directed at them. As I said, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the matter before us is of very great moment to the people of Canada outside of rent control, and I am bound to say that rent control is not an unmixed blessing. It works to the disadvantage of some poor people although it benefits others. The question that is before us now is whether my friends in the official opposition want to see this legislation pass in order to protect the very few that it can protect now, or whether they want to see this legislation expire and these people have no protection whatever. They should say exactly what they want to see happen, and then the house can govern itself accordingly.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): This resolution has caused a great deal of heat and a great deal of discussion on matters that were hardly germane to the question of the continuation of the controls that are left from the old wartime control order. Housing is such a problem in the riding of York West that if I thought the proposed measure of the government would assist in the alleviation of the situation, believe me, Mr. Speaker, I would support it. On the subject of rent control there are a number of questions which we must ask ourselves, and on the answers to those questions judge its effectiveness. The questions are:

1. Is rent control producing an equitable distribution of available housing?

2. Does rent control result in the construction of an adequate number of houses for rent?

3. Does rent control ameliorate substandard living conditions?

4. Does rent control assist veterans to obtain houses, or other suitable living places?

5. Does rent control channel building materials and building labour into residential housing rather than into commerce, entertainment or business premises?

On an entirely impartial survey of the housing situation in Canada today, Mr. Speaker, I think that the answer to all five questions must be no. It is for that reason that I believe that a statute with regard to housing should be enacted by parliament after consultation with the two other levels of government which are so intimately concerned with the whole matter. The control provided is not satisfactory, and that is why a statute is needed as to housing, and for these basic reasons.

In most Canadian towns the proper planning of a residential area is made impossible by the fact that approximately eighty per cent of all new houses do not pay sufficient taxes to cover the cost of municipal services supplied to them. This causes an urgency to compete for the location of industry at whatever social or locational cost; the gross overzoning for industrial land use, resulting in the enforced location of housing in industrial areas; the need for suburban municipalities of township size in order to spread taxation; the consequent inhibiting of the socially desirable small, compact communities; the imposition of excessive restrictions in "well planned" communities in order to exclude houses of low assessment; the refusal of municipalities to accept current federal offers of subsidized rental housing owing to the tax burdens which their acceptance would cause; the inequality of school standards as between school sections; and generally to make physical planning appear futile. No such complete study exists, although it is basic to planning and housing practice.

Those are the problems we face today in the housing or re-housing of our population. They are problems which cannot be solved or cured by a mere control act such as that envisaged in this measure. These are problems which have to be worked out with the provinces and municipalities; and if there were no other reason why a dominion-provincial conference should be called, it is to solve this vital and pressing problem.

I want to give an example of what I mean. In the riding I represent there is a desperate shortage of houses, houses for veterans or low-rental houses of any description, and there is gross overcrowding and substandard conditions of living. The problem is acute. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation offered to build some two thousand houses in the metropolitan area of Toronto, of which a large number would be in the riding of West York. They wanted to build houses in groups of two or three hundred, the most economical way to construct a planned housing project, because in that way the contractor can move onto the land, set up his machinery, his sawmills and other manufacturing processes, and by this means a house can be built for much less than an individual house here and there, which is not mass-produced. The estimated cost of these houses was in the neighbourhood of $6,800. They would rent for $37.50 a month, a reasonable and justifiable price and a rental within the capacity of the average industrial worker in West York.

But let us look at what happened. Let us look at the problems involved in establishing one of these 300-house communities, and let us look at the impact of such a community upon the municipality. In an ideal community each of these three hundred houses would have an average of one and a half children of school age. For such a community this would mean 450 additional children in the school section. Assume there would be an average of fifty children per room, though I say this number is far too great. The present cost of constructing a school in the Toronto metropolitan area is around $33,000 to $35,000 per room. This would mean that if these three hundred desperately needed houses for veterans were constructed, the community would immediately have to face a capital outlay of over $300,000 just for schools, exclusive of such things as sewers, water, street lighting and all the other essential services. No municipality in Canada can withstand the impact of a shock as great as this. No municipality can exist without going bankrupt, if this sort of thing is to be allowed. A recent conference of mayors, reeves and municipal officers of the municipalities surrounding Toronto pointed this out to the officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and said they could not permit the erection of these houses unless some solution could be found to the school problem. That is a basic economic problem, and until it is solved you will get no low-rental housing where it is most needed.

I say this control measure does nothing to solve that problem. This control measure merely continues a pious hope that was effective before the shift of population caused by war industry, and the subsequent movement of industry into large metropolitan areas. The control measure has completely failed to give us an equitable distribution of the housing and the living space now available, and it has failed also to assist in the building of low-rental houses.

Now I want briefly to deal with this question of planning, but before that I want to say something about the corruption of the English language. "Planning" is one of the words that have been so basely corrupted. Because of the socialist insistence on over-all planning for the state, such things as town planning or planning for communities have a tinge of socialism they do not deserve. A modern community must be zoned and it must be planned. Other words have been corrupted as well. The word "home" has been corrupted. Instead of meaning, as it did in the early days, one's hearth, the place where one lived, the word "home" has been corrupted to mean a sort of jerry-built house, constructed for speculative sale. I think it is a pity that such excellent old English words should be corrupted by advertising in this way.

I want to mention the problem of the low-rental house. It may amaze this house, and I think it will interest the country, to know that, despite the protestations of the Prime Minister, this government is actually subsidizing housing to the extent of approximately $2 million a week. About one hundred million dollars a year is going into subsidized houses. If that were producing a solution for the veteran who cannot get a house, if that were producing a solution for the industrial worker who is moved from pillar to post and is living in cramped and very frequently in unsanitary conditions, if that money were really being effectively put to work, I for one would not complain. This is not the case and the situation has not improved. The men on the waiting list, the veterans with two and three children who are living in deplorable conditions and who are on the books of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, are just as numerous today as they were a year ago. Unless a tri-government agreement can be made, there is very little hope that the situation can be improved.

With rental control we have developed a hatred between the landlord and tenant. I thought a letter which appeared in the press the other day was rather interesting in that it expressed this feeling which has grown up because of rent control. This is the letter:

> The majority of landlords are not wealthy people —but today a landlord is apparently a despised citizen, classed with gangsters and criminals, all because he happens to have a house for which he has worked and saved and which somebody else now wants to occupy, all at his expense—namely, the tenant. The law gives it to him because there are more tenants than landlords and that means more votes.

I have had literally dozens of letters from the owners of small houses in my constituency. The owners of these houses have been unable, until quite recently, to live in their own houses and frequently the tenant is leasing a room or two for the amount of rent paid for the whole house. That is a grave injustice, Mr. Speaker, and it is one of the faults of an over-simplified control measure. It is for reasons such as these that I believe the whole problem of housing should come before a dominion-provincial conference, and the municipalities should have representation at that conference.

Whatever the constitution may be, conditions have made it necessary for the question of municipal taxation to be brought into the arena of dominion affairs. Following the first great war an intolerable condition developed, similar to the one which exists today. The sudden development of small houses mushroomed into the suburban municipalities surrounding the major cities. Eventually this resulted in demands for the necessary municipal services which, in turn, resulted in the bankruptcy of a large number of Ontario municipalities. This is an intolerable situation, Mr. Speaker, and a situation which we cannot permit to develop again. It is a situation, however, which we are doing everything possible to bring about by this very control order that is on our statute books. That is the problem, Mr. Speaker. I believe it is a problem that requires, not a blanket order but the attention of the best brains in all three levels of government.

We are not producing houses. Certainly we are not producing houses for rental purposes, and therefore we are not improving the conditions under which our people have to live. If this government, if any government, produced a workable plan, I would certainly support it. Having seen the operation of this present measure, having seen the conditions forced upon the people in my constituency, I do not and cannot support the measure as it is. It does not do the things it is supposed to do. It does not control rent. It does not provide low-rental housing and it does not allow the veteran to obtain the shelter which he deserves.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I do not wish to prevent a vote being taken tonight, Mr. Speaker, and for that reason I will confine my remarks to four or five minutes. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to one clause in the resolution as amended. As I said on February 7, there are 180,000 of these orders in council. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there are some people who are taking advantage of that because the Supreme Court of Canada has been the court of last resort. Only four of these orders in council have gone before the supreme court, with the result that only one of them has been held intra vires, by a vote of 4 to 3. There are some people who are taking advantage of that fact. The courts do not know what the law is.

I agree with what has been said. There is in the city of Toronto no land available for housing. If we only had a steam suburban service around the city, the housing problem could be solved satisfactorily. In the olden days we had the advantage of having in the city land at $6 and $8 a foot. Today out in the township of York, in the counties of York, Ontario and Peel, the city is giving a service by buses and electric cars, but we have no steam suburban service in that area. If we had the advantage of that service I think we should be able to solve the housing problem. Other large cities like Montreal have a steam suburban service.

In conclusion I want to say this about these orders in council. Nobody can know the law until it is finally determined. There are some people who have been put in jail illegally. I know of one case in which the man owns his own house. He is a soldier. I have seen some of the tenants who put electric stoves in cupboards away up in attics, and who do a great many things that a desirable tenant would not do. I believe there should be some control over them. I have seen some of the houses of soldiers and others and they cannot get into them. I believe there should be some change in the system. Some magistrates and county court judges in our city, and all over Ontario, are sentencing people illegally. I have been calling the attention of the house to this matter on several occasions. I do not wish to obstruct the passage of the resolution, because I should like to see it adopted. As I say, if we had the steam service that I have described furnishing transportation out to the townships, we would then have a method which would solve the housing problem in the way it was solved in the first great war.

Mr. Harry R. Jackman (Rosedale): It may be said generally that we who belong to the Progressive Conservative party are against controls unless those controls seek the betterment of our people. Unless the case can be proven that the control will, of necessity, make for better living conditions, then the control should not be put into operation. I should like to bring to the attention of the house again the point which was made by my colleague the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who said: How can the government show any reason for emergency powers, on which this legislation is supposed to be based, when the government combines under the resolution such diverse things as butter and steel? How can there be any relation whatsoever between the control of butter and the war? It is now nearly four years since the armistice, although we have not yet had a declaration of peace with regard to some of the enemy countries. But for all practical purposes the war has been over for nearly four years.

In place of there being a butter shortage and in place of there being some danger of butter going to untoward heights where a ceiling of seventy-two cents a pound or some other level is necessary, I am sure that the government must be far more concerned with the floor under butter rather than with a ceiling. Surely a floor is not an aftermath of the war. On the other hand, a ceiling might have been. So where does the government stand on that matter?

Then, again, I should like to refer to the question of oils and fats. At the moment there is in the world a great surplus of vegetable oils. If that is an aftermath of the war, then surely it is an aftermath which we gladly welcome; and certainly it does not call for any controls of the nature of those proposed by the government at the present time. On the other hand, steel may indeed be something which requires control, because in the long years of the war steel was in such demand for war purposes that little or none was available except for the most urgent civilian uses. There may be a case to be made for the allocation of steel under government supervision. But how can any administration say that butter on the one hand, and steel on the other, provide an argument for the reasonableness of the legislation proposed under this resolution? It would seem to me that if the government wish to carry the people of this country with them they should set out the reasons for the proposed legislation and not put it in an omnibus resolution as they are now trying to do.

On motion of Mr. Jackman the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Drew: May I ask whether it is intended to proceed in committee when the motion is disposed of?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes. The moment the motion is carried we shall go into committee on the resolution, have first reading of the bill and second reading the next day. Then we shall take up resolutions Nos. 5, 8, 4 and 15 on today's order paper.

At ten-thirty the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on March 14, 1949.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 16, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

SUGGESTED ADJOURNMENT AT SIX O'CLOCK ON MARCH 17

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There appears in this morning's Ottawa Citizen a Canadian Press dispatch from Quebec city which states that the Irish employees of that city will have a holiday with pay tomorrow, St. Patrick's day. I am sure that all members who are imported Irish, as well as those who are of Irish descent, and their friends, would enjoy a holiday tomorrow evening. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he will move the adjournment of the house at six o'clock on Thursday the 17th so that we can enjoy the holiday.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sure it would give much pleasure to all members of the house if something were done to enable them to celebrate St. Patrick's day. But the fact is that I shall have to move tomorrow, as appears from the notice in Votes and Proceedings, that the house begin its sittings at eleven o'clock in the morning and continue under that arrangement until such time as we shall have disposed of the four resolutions mentioned in that notice. I am afraid it would look a little out of the ordinary to ask the house to begin its sittings at eleven o'clock on Friday morning and at the same time arrange to have the house rise at six o'clock on Thursday evening. However, we will see what progress has been made in the meantime, and if it is such as to convince everybody that we have earned an evening off, perhaps it can be agreed that we take it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—DAY SCHOOLS, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Campbell:

What steps have been taken by the Department of Mines and Resources (Indian affairs branch), to build day schools, this year, on the reserves in Saskatchewan at Sweet Grass, Poundmaker, Red Pheasant, Stony and Thunderchild?

Mr. MacKinnon:

Sweet Grass reserve: Plans have been prepared and an item included in the estimates for 1949-50 for the construction of a one-room Indian day school with attached teacher's residence. It was hoped that a start on the construction of this school would have been made in the current fiscal year, but difficulty was encountered in securing a satisfactory site with adequate water supply.

Poundmaker reserve: Plans have been prepared and an item included in the estimates for 1949-50 for the construction of a one-room Indian day school with attached teacher's residence.

Red Pheasant reserve: There is at the present time a one-room school in operation on this reserve. A considerable sum was spent recently to repair the foundation and to insulate the building. Consideration is being given to providing an additional classroom.

Stony reserve (Mosquito reserve): A survey is being carried out to determine the educational needs for this reserve. At present some fifteen of the children are transported daily to the school on the Red Pheasant reserve.

Thunderchild reserve: The contract has already been let for the erection of a modern two-room school on this reserve. It had been planned to erect the building last fall, but the contractor was unable to proceed on account of the cold weather.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS CO-OPERATIVE MARKETING ACT

Mr. Wright:

1. What co-operatives have operated under the provisions of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, 1939, and chapter 19 of the amended act in 1940?
2. What products have they handled?
3. What have been the total advances to each by years?
4. What have been the repayments by each?
5. What were the terms and stipulations under which these advances were made to each?

Mr. McCubbin:

1 and 2:

The following listed co-operative organizations or agencies have operated under a co-operative plan under the provisions of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, 1939, since its inception May 19, 1939:

Saskatchewan Honey Producers Co-operative Association, Honey 1939/40/41.

L'Association des Producteurs de Fourrures de Nicolet, Fox Pelts 1948/49.

Northern Pelt Market Co-operative, Fox Pelts 1949.

3, 4 and 5:

Under the act, which is designed to promote orderly marketing, no advances are made and thus no repayments are necessary. Orderly marketing is promoted by the government guaranteeing initial payments which are paid by the organizations to their primary producers, thus permitting primary producers to receive part payment for their products whilst awaiting market returns from the sale of their products under a co-operative plan. In addition to the guarantee of the initial payment, operating expenses of the organizations, such as actual processing, carrying and selling costs are also guaranteed. Accordingly the government only becomes liable to the organizations when the average wholesale market price of the products falls below the value of the initial payment plus the operating expenses. Under the act the government has successfully guaranteed initial payments and operating expenses to the organizations since its inception in 1939. No payment has been made, under the act, to date with the exception of agreements pertaining to the marketing of fox pelts of the 1946-47 season. Due to the softening of the fox pelt market, some liability on the part of the government has been realized. Claims covering the marketing of these 1946-47 fox pelts are now in the process of being settled but until such time as all claims are received and audited the total government liability cannot be accurately determined.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GREAT LAKES SHORE EROSION

Mr. Lennard:

1. Did the government receive a resolution from the lake shore erosion conference held in Toronto in March, 1948?

2. If so, has the government made a survey of the erosion on the great lakes and has a report been prepared with any recommendations for a remedy?

CANADIAN NAVY—OFFICERS RECALLED FOR SERVICE

Mr. Cockeram:

1. How many officers were recalled for service from January 1, 1947, to date, in the Royal Canadian Navy?

2. On what dates were they recalled?

3. What were their (a) names; (b) rank; (c) and age?

Mr. Baker: With reference to this question and the two which follow, I should say that no officers have been recalled for service since January 1, 1947 to date in the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army or the Royal Canadian Air Force; consequently these three questions in their present form would have to be answered "None." In conversation with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram), who asks the question, I find that he would like to have the names, rank, ages and date of appointment of former officers, of the rank of major or equivalent and above, who were appointed to the active forces for full-time employment after January 1, 1947. With this explanation the questions will be answered and I would ask that they be made orders for returns.

CANADIAN ARMY—OFFICERS RECALLED FOR SERVICE

Mr. Cockeram:

1. How many officers were recalled for service from January 1, 1947, to date, in the Canadian Army?

2. On what dates were they recalled?

3. What were their (a) names; (b) rank; (c) and age?

R.C.A.F.—OFFICERS RECALLED FOR SERVICE

Mr. Cockeram:

1. How many officers were recalled for service from January 1, 1947, to date, in the Royal Canadian Air Force?

2. On what dates were they recalled?

3. What were their (a) names; (b) rank; (c) and age?

VETERANS PENSIONS—APPLICATIONS REFUSED

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many applicants for service pension, by provinces, have been denied pension in each of the years 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949 to date on the ground that disabilities complained of are or were of pre-enlistment origin?

2. Of such applicants, by provinces, how many were enlisted in the armed forces as being in "A" category?

Mr. Gregg: The records of the department are not maintained to show statistically the category in which applicants for pension were enlisted in the armed forces. The answer to part 2 cannot be secured until after the cases referred to in part 1 have been identified, when each file would require to be drawn and examined individually, thus involving a great amount of time, labour and cost. The hon. member who asks the question has agreed that, if the cost should be found to be substantial, part 2 of the question may be answered by stating that statistical records do not reflect the information. Subject to this reservation, the question may pass as an order for return.

C.B.C. NETWORKS—AFFILIATED STATIONS

Mr. Benidickson:

1. During each of the last ten years what privately owned radio stations were added to C.B.C. networks?

2. Where is each station located?

3. With which network did each station become affiliated and was the affiliation (a) as a "basic station"; (b) on a "sustained basis"; (c) on another basis?

4. Which privately owned radio stations are charged by C.B.C. an annual "line charge" for network affiliation and what is the annual charge in each case?

Mr. McCann: Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED VESSELS—MERCHANT SEAMEN

Mr. Young:

1. How many ships were owned by the Canadian government on August 31, 1945?

2. How many such ships have since been sold by the Canadian government to non-commonwealth owners?

3. How many such ships have since been sold to commonwealth owners?

4. How many such ships have since been sold to Canadian owners?

5. How many vessels purchased from the Canadian government by Canadian companies since August 31, 1945, have since been resold to non-Canadian owners?

6. How many Canadian-owned vessels formerly owned by the Canadian government are now registered under foreign flags?

7. How many Canadian merchant seamen were employed during 1945?

8. How many Canadian merchant seamen were employed during 1948?

9. Are there any statistics available on the number of Canadian crews which have been paid off from Canadian vessels sold to foreign flags in the year 1949?

W. E. MACKIE, LIMITED

Mr. Nowlan:

1. During the calendar year 1948, what services, if any, were rendered to the dominion government, or any department or agency thereof, by W. E. Mackie, Limited?

2. Were tenders called for in connection therewith?

3. How much has been paid to W. E. Mackie, Limited for each of such services?

4. How much is still owing to W. E. Mackie, Limited, for each of such services?

VETERANS AFFAIRS—PSYCHOLOGISTS

Mr. Blair:

1. How many clinical psychologists are employed on a full-time basis by the Department of Veterans Affairs; where are they located; what are their academic qualifications and from what universities did they receive degrees in psychology?

2. What arrangements are made by D.V.A. to ensure that the best available techniques are employed, and what steps have been taken to ensure adequate training of these psychologists while in the government service? Does such training go beyond sending some of these psychologists on short courses to the United States?

3. Is an adequately trained clinical psychologist employed on a full-time basis by D.V.A. to co-ordinate techniques, and to ensure co-operation with psychiatrists and other specialists of the medical profession?

4. How much time do part-time consultants in psychology to D.V.A. spend on such work?

5. Who are these consultants; with what institutions are they connected; how much money have they been paid in fees and expenses in the past two years; on what basis have these fees and expenses been paid, and what is the basis for their selection?

6. Have any of these same consultants been employed during the past two years by federal departments other than D.V.A.?

EXPROPRIATION OF PROPERTY IN HURDMAN'S BRIDGE AREA, OTTAWA

Mr. Fulton:

1. Under what authority is property, presently occupied for residential purposes, being expropriated in the Hurdman's bridge area?

2. Have specific recommendations for such expropriation been made by the federal district commission?

3. If so, what are the details of such recommendation?

4. Have the projects so recommended been approved by the governor in council?

5. If so, has any appropriation been authorized by parliament?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE, 1936—VERBATIM REPORT

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The question is, how long does it take to give the touch of history to any public paper? I shall make myself clear. This motion refers to a paper that dates back nearly thirteen years. Is this a sufficient lapse of time to enable it to be called an historical document? What period of time must elapse before a public paper may be given to the public?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but there is no motion before the house. If the hon. member wishes to speak on a question of privilege, of course that is a different matter.

Mr. Pouliot: Would Your Honour be kind enough to put the motion to the house?

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Pouliot moves that an order of the house do issue—

For a copy of the transcript of the shorthand notes of the report of the dominion-provincial conference, 1936.

Mr. Abbott: I find that a similar motion was made five or six years ago; it asked for the production of the transcript of the shorthand notes of the proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference of 1936. My predecessor pointed out at that time that the shorthand notes of the proceedings were to be taken for the purposes of a confidential record of what took place. A press statement was issued each day following the meetings of the conference. In view of the arrangement between the dominion and provincial representatives at the conference, I feel it would not be appropriate to produce the transcript of the proceedings.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise again on a question of privilege. Apparently no one can understand why this report should be secret when the reports of all other dominion-provincial conferences have been published. Many years have elapsed since the predecessor of my genial friend the Minister of Finance refused to table this document. The other day I voted reluctantly against the request of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) for the production and tabling of certain orders in council. They were not historical documents then, but a few days afterwards they became historical documents and were tabled in the house. If it only took a matter of days to table the papers asked for by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I do not see why many years are not enough to make other papers of historical value.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but motions for the production of papers are not debatable. If the hon. member wishes to rise on a question of privilege, I would ask him to state his question of privilege. Otherwise I shall have to put the motion to the house, because such motions are not debatable.

Mr. Pouliot: I agree, and I do not intend to discuss the motion at all. I rise on a question of privilege, and it is one which would affect all requests of a similar nature. I am lured by mystery, and mystery surrounds us here. We are told a thing is mysterious, and we cannot know about it. We cannot even learn about the tenders for post office contracts at Riviere du Loup. They are secret; there is a mystery attached to them, and there is mystery attached to this matter too. I will now tell you why I will not insist that the motion be proceeded with. I will tell the house why it has been made mysterious. It was precisely at the time of that conference that Mr. Dunning went to see Mr. Duplessis of Quebec and said to him, referring to certain words in the transcript: "Would you like to delete this?" He said, "No; I will leave it as it is." What Mr. Dunning referred to was an offer of co-operation from the premier of Quebec to the dominion government as to the settlement of all difficulties, and it is because the premier of Quebec refused to delete those words that the whole thing has been kept secret. Now everybody knows it.

Motion dropped.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

GRANTS TO POLICE AND FIRE DEPARTMENTS—PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence or, in his absence, to one of his assistants. Is the new system of grants to police and fire departments, announced by the attorney general of Ontario, which he said was part of an overall plan of improving national defence, being undertaken in co-operation with the federal Department of National Defence? If so, will the minister make a statement in the matter and say whether the same co-operation is expected of or being arranged with the other provinces?

Mr. L. E. Baker (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I shall take note of the question. I noticed the newspaper article to which the leader of the C.C.F. party has referred.

JAPANESE GOODS

QUESTION AS TO MOST-FAVOURED-NATION TARIFF TREATMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether proposals have been made to the government by the United States or any other source that Canada should extend most-favoured-nation tariff treatment to Japanese textiles or other Japanese manufactured goods. Further, is the Canadian government contemplating any such action?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): We have had intimations that such a request may be made, but none has been received officially. As to what would be the attitude of the government, of course I am not in a position to say until some such proposal is put forward.

Mr. Green: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? Will the subject of extending most-favoured-nation treatment to Japanese goods be under discussion at the international trade organization conference to be held in France next month?

Mr. Abbott: I am not sure, but I should think not.

EDUCATION

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—ESKIMOS—SERVICE PERSONNEL AT CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon City): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State, arising from the fact that sessional paper 176, which I received yesterday, is not complete. In the original question there were eight parts; in the return I received yesterday, only four were answered. The others are marked to be answered by another department, but they have not been answered at all. I would ask the Secretary of State to be kind enough to look into the matter.

Hon. Colin Gibson (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to bring the matter to the attention of those who were concerned with the preparation of the return.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Will the Prime Minister oblige hon. members by saying when it is expected that the house will rise for the Easter recess, and how long the recess is to be?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I still hope it may be possible for the house to rise on the evening of April 8 for the week preceding and the week following Easter. There are some matters of urgent importance that might make it inadvisable to take so long a recess, but I hope that will not be so.

Mr. Knowles: Shall we be coming back?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, we shall be coming back.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN VANCOUVER—ARRANGEMENTS FOR SHIP CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James Sinclair (Vancouver North): Is the Minister of Transport yet in a position to announce what departmental work can be allotted to the shipyards of North Vancouver?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): In order to assist in relieving the unemployment situation in Vancouver I have arranged for the construction of a lighthouse tender and buoy vessel for the Department of Transport at Burrard dry dock at North Vancouver. The contract for this vessel was originally let to Yarrows Limited of Victoria. This change will not involve any loss of employment in the Victoria area, as I believe another order suitable to the Yarrow yard will be announced shortly. There will be no delay in putting the work in hand in both yards, and the change has been made with the consent of both companies in the interests of economy and efficiency and for the purpose of maintaining a maximum amount of employment in the shipyards on both coasts. These arrangements have been made on the recommendation of the Canadian maritime commission.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—PROVISION FOR INCREASE TO CERTAIN BENEFICIARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, based on the statement he made yesterday with respect to the increase in war veterans allowances. I asked whether the board would automatically review the cases of veterans now receiving the maximum allowance, or whether they would have to make special application to have their cases reviewed. The minister replied that if I read his statement the answer would be evident, but this is the only sentence I can find which refers to this matter:

> Regional offices of the Department of Veterans Affairs are familiar with, or will discover, these cases of special need.

The only way they can discover them is by investigation. Does the department intend to make the investigation itself, or are the veterans to make application?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): After reading Hansard I realized that I did not complete the answer to my hon. friend's question of yesterday. The answer is that many of the cases referred to, coming under the plan proposed yesterday, are already known. The review with respect to others will continue to be carried out; but any veteran who feels that he should come under the plan when it comes into operation may make application.

Mr. Pearkes: In view of the statement made yesterday, may I ask whether a veteran who is in receipt of war veterans allowance and who also draws a disability pension will be eligible for the increase?

Mr. Gregg: The circumstances under which a veteran may become eligible under the plan announced yesterday are exactly the same as those which now prevail with respect to a veteran who may be getting a small pension supplemented by the war veterans allowance.

Mr. Pearkes: But the words are, "without other means of support". That would not include a disability pension, then? The words "without other means of support" leaves some doubt in the minds of many veterans.

Mr. Gregg: May I answer in this way? If a man were receiving full war veterans allowance and, say a $5 pension, but was not in receipt of other income, he would be eligible to apply.

SEED POTATOES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—EXPORT PERMIT REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Just prior to coming into the house I received a telephone call about the new permit regulations covering the shipping of Prince Edward Island seed potatoes to the United States. I did not have time to acquaint the Minister of Trade and Commerce with the subject matter of my question, but it is this: Will the minister make a statement with respect to the new permit regulations, for the benefit of shippers and producers? If he is unable to answer today, will he please take this as notice and answer on Thursday?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to look into the matter.

PUBLIC WORKS

INQUIRY AS TO EXPENDITURES IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Will the Minister of Public Works indicate where in his estimates he has hidden the proposed public expenditures for Saskatchewan this year? I cannot find them. I wonder if he knows that Saskatchewan is still in the Canadian confederation.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): If the hon. member will look in the book he will find everything we intend to do in Saskatchewan this year.

Mr. Thatcher: Less than one per cent of the total.

CHILD WELFARE

ALLEGED TRAFFIC IN BABIES FOR ADOPTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): May I be permitted to answer now a question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) on March 10 last, concerning the alleged traffic in babies for adoption?

The first consideration in regard to this problem is that jurisdiction in child welfare matters within the provinces, and particularly in adoption matters, rests with the provinces themselves. Consequently the Department of External Affairs is concerned with this question only in connection with the issuance of passports for young children who are leaving the country under guardianship arrangements. In such cases it is the responsibility of the department to try to ensure that all the requirements of the provincial laws have been met before passports are issued. I can assure the house that officials of the department have continued to co-operate with provincial authorities in the issuance of passports in this category. Whenever there appears reason to question the propriety of issuing a passport on behalf of a child who is leaving the country under guardianship arrangements, the passport is not issued until the matter has been clarified in consultation with the provincial authorities concerned.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

PAYMENTS TO PERSONS WITH OTHER OCCUPATIONS, ETC.—REFERENCE TO RETURN TABLED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of a return made yesterday, being sessional paper No. 6B. It has reference to the administration of the prairie farm assistance allowance. The questions which I asked were as follows:

Was payment made of the prairie farm assistance allowance to any persons in 1948 who (a) for a major portion of the year did not live on the land farmed by them; (b) had an occupation or carried on business additional to farm operations?

If so, how many cases are there in each of said categories?

The answers given to those questions are not answers at all, in my submission. The answers read as follows:

1. In dealing with prairie farm assistance claims, no record is kept of the number of farmers who do not live upon the land farmed by them nor of the number of farmers having an occupation or business in addition to farming. The act and regulations do not require that a farmer, to be eligible, must live on his land, nor does having another occupation disqualify him, provided that farming is his primary occupation.

2. See answer to No. 1.

These are not answers to the questions I asked. It is suggested there is no record kept of the number of farmers who do not live upon the land. Whether or not there is a record kept, that fact is stated on every application that is made. In view of the fact that in the administration of this act in Saskatchewan one farmer is receiving payment and another under similar circumstances is being denied it, I think parliament has a right to an answer so that it may be determined whether certain farmers are being discriminated against.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The only thing wrong with that answer is that it gives more information than was requested. It is not debatable, either.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture says the matter is not debatable. After all, the administration is required to answer questions, not evade them.

Mr. Gardiner: I am required to answer questions on my estimates, and I am prepared to do so. This question, however, has been answered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, sir—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must realize that I cannot permit a debate on the subject. On a question of privilege the hon. member should state his question. I gave him all the time he could possibly need to enable him to do so, and he received a reply. I believe he should be satisfied.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would draw the attention of all hon. members to the fact that it is for the Speaker to decide whether or not a member is in order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sir, you are the custodian—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I doubt whether you will be able to get order from the group opposite, Mr. Speaker. I am rising on a question of privilege. You, sir, are the custodian of the rights of members. I ask you to examine that answer and report to the house whether in your opinion the right of members to information has been satisfied by it.

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

And the motion of Mr. Casselman: "That this question be now put".

Mr. Harry R. Jackman (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, last night when the debate was adjourned, this side was endeavouring to find out from the government just what the reasons were which, in their mind, dictated the fact that a national emergency arising out of the war was now obtaining in this country. We did not receive a satisfactory answer, nor have we received a satisfactory answer from the few ministers of the crown who so far have taken part in the debate on the resolution. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) did say that we did not need to fear that permanent shackling might take place if the executive were given discretionary powers because, first of all, we had the War Measures Act. When that act expired, the government changed the name to make it more palatable to the people and it was called the Transitional Powers Act. Today we have before us another softening of the language, and the title of the resolution upon which the bill will be based is, the continuation of the Transitional Measures Act.

No longer do we call it "powers"; we call it "measures". In other words, the people of Canada are supposed to be getting used to this control of their powers in the hands of the executive in Ottawa and the "powers" now simply become "measures". In any event, the Minister of Justice, who is piloting this resolution, gave no clear indication, beyond a bare, declaratory statement, that an emergency did exist. We on this side, and certainly the people we represent, wish to know just how it is that all the various measures which are embraced in the resolution find their origin in the fact that a national emergency arising out of the war still exists.

On this side, Mr. Speaker, we are not necessarily against controls where those controls are in the interests of the people of Canada. Unless those controls can be clearly shown to advance the interests, welfare and happiness of our people, then we are not of that experimental nature that we should wish to fasten controls on the people and perhaps end up in a situation such as we saw in many European countries before the war. Today we see a similar situation in countries such as Russia and her satellites. Where it can be shown that controls will work towards the welfare of the people, the Progressive Conservative party is favourable towards controls. One objective we have, and I will not say that it is not the objective of other parties, is the welfare of our people.

If we have economic controls throughout our whole system—and I am not suggesting that the present batch of controls under the resolution before us gives us economic slavery, nevertheless the tendency is there—we must be assured that there is ample justification for them. For where economic controls get into the hands of an executive or a small clique, then you can be sure that freedom of conscience and freedom of the individual will be taken from us. I do not think that any members of this house believe in control of salaries and wages. We had that control to some extent during wartime, and we were glad to get out of it. We do not want controls of that nature in peacetime. Nor do we want such controls as are in existence in the United Kingdom today under the title of the control of engagement order where a young man entering a business or a field of livelihood is told where he shall go or where he shall work. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, freedom and liberty of the individual was once the keystone around which the whole doctrine of Liberalism was built; that fact, however, has long been forgotten by the party which forms the government of this country today but which still calls itself Liberal.

It is not my intention today to go into the merits of the various controls. Ample opportunity will be afforded when the bill itself comes down. We shall then have an opportunity of examining the particular measures affecting each of the fields of activity. But we still seek from the government benches some justification for the resolution which is before us, by means of which we are to legislate on all these controls, or perhaps to legislate on some and not on others. I shall endeavour to point out the lack of justification.

The only source of jurisdiction which the government claims is the fact that a national emergency arising out of the war still exists. It would be much simpler for us if, in place of having an omnibus resolution, upon which I assume an omnibus bill is to be based, the government would break down the various controls into their separate entities so that we could examine each one and not be called upon to vote holus-bolus for a resolution which may contain some good, such as rental controls, and some bad, such as some of the other controls which I shall mention later. We and the people of this country should like to see the various controls in statute form, so that we shall know exactly what the people must conform to and not be under some general omnibus law where the terms exist chiefly in the mind of some minister or of some controller.

What is happening in this case is what we in this house have seen happen so frequently; and this applies particularly to the Department of National Revenue and to the Department of Finance. We find that the laws are made to suit the administrators, not to suit the people. As long as ease of administration is obtained, then the rights of the people and the consequences to them are given little consideration. So it is in this resolution before us now. We shall find that the bills will give the controllers all kinds of power to cover not only any possible emergency but any peacetime contingency, which would not in itself give the government jurisdiction; and the rights of the people will be forgotten. For example, in the steel control measure, as it exists today, there is the right not only to go into the premises of any steel manufacturer but, if necessary, to take over the plant and to direct its activities as the controller sees fit. That measure goes quite as far in the way of control as does the steel nationalization bill in the United Kingdom which is rocking the industry of that country from stem to gudgeon. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we should like to see these matters in clear statute form so that we shall know exactly where we stand on them, and shall know that powers without limit will not be given to the various administrators and controllers.

Under this resolution a great variety of matters is dealt with. The wartime prices and trade board comes under it. Butter, fruit, vegetables and other matters will be dealt with. Then we have rentals, sugar, steel and timber. In considering these various matters, what I have been looking for is some common thread which runs through them all. I have been trying to find the least common denominator which these matters have, but I cannot find much relationship between them. Yet the government seems to find jurisdiction to legislate on all of them in the national emergency arising out of the war.

Last night I endeavoured to compare the problems with regard to butter and the problems with regard to steel control. With regard to butter, there is today no necessity for a ceiling of seventy-two cents which exists; but if butter slides much further we shall be under the necessity of putting some kind of floor under the butter producers. That is the problem there. The nature of these problems changes quickly. But for the life of me I fail to see how the butter problem has anything to do with the national emergency arising out of the war. Surely the government must concede me that point. Butter today can have no relation to any problem arising out of the war. Yet we are asked here to admit that the government should have jurisdiction on this particular product when they cannot prove their case at all in the matter of jurisdiction. It is not a matter whatsoever for the dominion government.

For the benefit of my friends in the C.C.F. party I might point out here that not so long ago we heard about rather large and fancy inventory profits being made on butter. I for one would not deny that those profits must have been made by somebody; because between the season when butter is easily made—that is, the summer season—and the next season when the cows are freshened, there is no butter production in Canada, and someone must store butter. If we must have butter in storage, and the price fluctuates, someone must get the profit; or, as in the present case, someone must get the loss. So I should be pleased to hear from some of my friends in the C.C.F. what they intend to do now with those who are suffering the loss on the butter which is being carried over from one season to another, just as we heard from them when there was a profit. As to that profit, may I say here that it was not all gain to the co-operative creameries or to the dealers in butter; because if there was any profit on it there was a thirty-five per cent corporation tax which went to the dominion government. Now when there are staggering losses there is no dominion government to come to the rescue of those who must suffer the inventory loss. In other words, Mr. Speaker, what I want to point out is that these controls sometimes work hardships on the people. The fact that we had on butter a control of seventy-two cents may have been all right for the producer of butter at that time, but when he is faced with the losses, either in the production or in the handling of it, whether it be by a co-operative or by a privately-owned company, he is not left with much fat on his bones with which to carry him over the lean period. In other words, every time we interfere with the natural working of our economic laws we find that there are repercussions which we hardly expected.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he tell us what the natural working of economic laws is?

Mr. Jackman: In the limited period of forty minutes at my disposal I am afraid I would not be able to do that.

Last night the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) referred to the fact that my colleague, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), spoke about steel, and he endeavoured to extract from my colleague's remarks the fact that steel should be controlled. I am not going to say yes or no, whether steel should be controlled. I think perhaps the allocation of steel is necessary in many cases, but I do think that the argument made by the Minister of Justice was anything but sound. We are now discussing problems which arise out of a national emergency because of the war. As I recall it, the Minister of Justice said something about lessening the production of steel, and that we are still in an emergency arising out of the war. Well, we use our own steel in Canada. We have always been an importer and never a heavy exporter of steel. Let me point out that in 1939 the steel production of Canada was 129,000 tons. That, apparently, sufficed for our ordinary peacetime economy at that time. In 1948 it amounted to not 129,000 tons but 280,000 tons, an increase of 117 per cent. We had a relatively small gain in our population, but notwithstanding all this our increase in production because of the war leads us to the fact that today we must have controls. I fail to see it.

The Minister of Justice pointed out that it would be highly improper to embody in the same statute, if we had used the statutory form, a loan to a corporation in the steel business, and the general control of the steel industry. It might indeed be highly improper to embrace all these matters even though they deal with the common element of steel. But how much more highly improper is it to embrace not only these two things but a multitude of other things in the same bill and in the same statute.

Still talking about steel, the Minister of Justice went on to say that he wanted to see that the limited amount of steel that was in supply would go to the building of hospitals rather than to big banks. That was interesting, Mr. Speaker, because for some years now, as a member of the Progressive Conservative party, I have been endeavouring to get the government to put into force some form of building permit controls. Everyone realizes that if you want to put your finger on something that does arise out of the war in the way of a shortage, it is the housing shortage. The reason that we have this housing shortage, in this peculiarly acute form, is that hundreds of thousands of our young men were overseas at a time when they might have been acquiring some sort of a house in this country. When they came back no houses were available. They had all been taken by people who had moved into the cities, or by the natural growth of the population. There were no houses for them, and we have not yet begun to fill up that gap; therefore we have a national emergency arising out of the war, and it is housing. We have had it for four or five years, and yet the Minister of Justice has the effrontery to say that we should have controls now in order that steel shall go into hospitals rather than into banks. I have pleaded all along for years that we should have this very thing, and yet the party which he represents, and whose sins he must bear equally with his colleagues, have refused to put in any form of control in relation to building during all these years, and we have on our hands today this very sorry mess in regard to housing. The reason we must still have some controls over housing is the failure of the Liberal government over the last five years.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he arguing for more controls?

Mr. Jackman: If the minister had listened to me today, or listened to me the other day when I had some remarks to make, he would understand that I believe the proper way to overcome this housing difficulty is to have some controls from Ottawa, not through the municipalities, because one municipality competes with another. Until we break this log jam in the housing field we shall not have houses. If the minister lived in a riding such as mine, which is part of a great city, he would have some understanding of the conditions under which many of our people live. Many of these people have the effective means of paying for a house if they could only get one. Certainly I am for controls when it is for the betterment of the people. The minister's government has been sadly derelict in its duty in the last five years.

Let me point out to the Minister of Justice that I am for controls when controls better the condition of our people. If the Minister of Justice had the privilege of living in some of the hovels in which some of my constituents have to live, because of this government's inaction, he would not feel quite so happy about it. In 1947, 7 per cent of the construction which went on in the city of Toronto proper was for housing units; 93 per cent was for everything else, commercial and industrial building. In 1948, the amount of construction that went into housing units was only 11 per cent, but still it was an increase. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when he had control of housing said: "You cannot show me a large plot in Toronto where you can have an extensive housing development." I readily admit that you cannot put 500 houses on any one spot in Toronto, but you can put up apartment houses and multiple-dwelling houses. He might just as well have said to me that no more money will be spent in the political confines of Toronto in the future on housing because there are no large lots available. Yet we find that in 1948 the proportion of housing construction going on in that city was 11 per cent as against 7 per cent the year before.

I can tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce that hundreds of millions of dollars will be spent in the city of Toronto in the years to come on apartment buildings and on multiple units. It is inevitable. Because of the failure of this Liberal government to have any control over housing construction, we find that all the materials and many of the available workmen are being used in the building of commercial and industrial buildings in the city of Toronto. In fact we have so many moving picture theatres in the city, costing anywhere from $500,000 to $2,500,000, that one wonders whether they will ever be able to justify themselves on a dollar and cents basis.

Mr. Knowles: Private enterprise.

Mr. Jackman: That may be so, but a lack of control has been the compelling reason. Do not think for a moment that when you have a war on you must not have controls of a very severe nature. You must have them because the whole economy is thrown into a different gear.

Mr. Knowles: You are in a different gear.

Mr. Jackman: You cannot function unless you offset the claims of industrial and commercial building and thus remedy the housing deficiency. A director of one of the large motion picture companies in the United States visited Toronto, where they have interests, and remarked that in no comparable city in the United States had so many motion picture theatres been constructed as in the city of Toronto.

Mr. Mitchell: May I ask my hon. friend who issued the permits for the construction of those theatres in Toronto?

Mr. Jackman: If the Minister of Labour had been listening he would have heard me say that it was no use for the federal government to pass over the control of permits to the cities because if one city would not grant a permit another one would. It was necessary to have a central control here if it was going to be made effective.

Mr. Mitchell: I cannot understand my hon. friend, who seems to be going around in circles. In one breath he is for centralization and in the next breath he is against it. In one breath he is for controls and in the next breath he is against them.

An hon. Member: It is just taking up time.

Mr. Jackman: I think my statement is very clear. Where there has been a continuing need for housing, such as there has been for the last five years, there should have been some control here in Ottawa. I shall not go on to describe some of the conditions that have been brought about and the hardships that have been created because of the failure of the government to act. They are not going to be able to get away from rental controls for some time, because they have not done anything yet to break the jam. They have failed to produce houses for our people. According to the minister who is looking after housing, last year 83,000 houses were erected but 80,000 new family units were created, which meant a net gain of only 3,000 houses. Everybody knows that there is a need at the present time for 200,000 or 300,000 houses, and yet this government does nothing. Let us get ahead with housing so that we can get rid of rental controls. The people want to get rid of them as soon as they can.

I suggested the other day that the way to solve the housing problem was to produce more builders' supplies and other materials going into housing. The immediate shortage is not labour, it is materials of one sort or another. At that time I suggested certain methods which might be adopted. I had a few remarks to make about steel but time will not permit me to go on in that particular field except to say that the powers which exist today in the hands of the bureaucrats are too loose and undefined. If we are to protect the liberty of the subject, not necessarily under this present government—you can trust some people with your fortune, but there are other people you do not want to trust, whom you cannot trust—laws should be made that are workable, no matter who is working them.

I have a few things to say about sugar, which is one of the items covered by this particular bill. I wonder what the reasons are for including sugar and molasses in this control measure? What is the national emergency which arises out of the war? I fail to see any emergency in that connection. I ask hon. members whether the government has demonstrated that any sugar emergency has arisen out of the war.

Let me mention just a few facts in connection with sugar. The price is down to a reasonable figure. I have not heard of any complaints in that regard. The large sugar producers in the tropical countries got about five cents per pound last year but in the present crop year they will be lucky to get four cents per pound. I believe the last price mentioned was $4.15 per one hundred pounds. It certainly is not an expensive commodity. All the sugar companies are having a difficult time just now. Let me read just one item in reference to molasses, which is still under control. This appeared in the Wall Street Journal and has reference to the South Porto Rico Sugar Company. It reads:

> The market for blackstrap molasses, a sugar by-product which contributed substantially to profits last year, has collapsed, and revenues from this source may prove nominal. South Porto Rico reported it realized an average of 21 cents a gallon on its blackstrap sales last season. The indicated market price today is about four to five cents a gallon.

What is the reason for continuing the control on sugar and its by-products? Is it that we are being dictated to by the United Kingdom from whom we are buying our sugar? Is it that they are insisting on state trading? Most of us in this country are against state trading. When I present facts such as these I think the government, and particularly the minister in charge of the resolution, is called upon to answer them, if not to refute them.

The wartime prices and trade board is another item which comes under this omnibus resolution, and fruits and vegetables are included, certainly the imported ones. I should like to know how those commodities are linked up to a national emergency arising out of the war. It seems to me to be difficult to find any connection between them. Certainly one cannot find a connection through the foreign exchange control board, because we are now in a reasonably satisfactory situation in regard to our holdings of gold and United States dollars.

We had a committee on prices which had to justify its existence. That committee found that once the embargo was put on fresh imported fruits and vegetables some wholesale dealers and others in the trade made what might be considered exorbitant profits. No doubt they felt that they should get what the market would bear for the stocks they had on hand, because soon they would be able to get no more imported goods and would perhaps be out of pocket. Rightly or wrongly, they took advantage of what they could. But the government felt that they had to find some little wheat in the investigation; and, as far as I can see, the only reason for keeping on fruits and vegetables controls is to create some justification for the great expense to this country of the prices committee and the royal commission which followed it.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had a few remarks to make about inflation as a result of the war and the need to control prices and other things until all the inflation had been squeezed out of the sponge. Let me point out to him that we are all perfectly aware that there has been inflation since the war. I suggest to him that we should be very unhappy if much of the inflation does not remain with us as a permanent condition. Whatever situation we may be in now, if we go too far the other way, if our commodities such as wheat, butter, livestock and other things go down in price, we shall find ourselves in a sorry mess indeed.

How does the minister expect that we shall ever be able to support our present national debt unless we have fairly high price levels? We cannot go back to the 1939-equals-one-hundred days because since 1939 our national debt has increased from $3,000 million to $13,000 million. We must have some increase in our 1939 price level, for we only have twelve million people to shoulder the debt, and it is a very substantial amount. By the same token, how does the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) expect to pay for all the social services and all the other extraordinary costs of government that we have today? If he looks at the revenue for 1939 he will see that it was a paltry $500 million. How far would that go? Family allowances are $300 million. If we return to price levels anywhere near to what they were in 1939 we are going to have in this country problems which neither the Minister of Justice nor I would care to face. As against revenue of $500 million for the government in 1939, today we have $2,500 million, five times as much. You cannot support that with the same population unless you have vastly higher price levels.

I should now like to say a word or two about the foreign exchange control board. That was a measure of control which was enacted to control exchanges, and yet we find how easy it is for bureaucrats to deviate widely from the original purpose. When the foreign exchange control measure was put through, the Minister of Finance said that it would never be used for anything but exchange control. We found in very short order that it was being used for price control, and it was like using a fine chisel to do the job of a woodsman's axe. We also find that the foreign exchange control measure is used to control trade, and not just to control our exchanges.

May I point out another matter of some interest to the taxpayers of Canada who must bear the burden of all these costs? The Foreign Exchange Control Act is a measure to control exchanges, and if you want to let it go further it can control these other things I have mentioned, control prices and control the direction of trade, et cetera; but it was never meant to be a taxation measure. Once you put this great power in the hands of bureaucrats, what becomes of it? They do exactly as they please; the more revenue they produce the bigger they can expand their departments, and the more important they can become. Just think of a Minister of Finance who has a foreign exchange control act on the books which is to do a simple job of controlling, and yet when the controller comes to him at the end of each year he reports profits like these, in 1941, $8,900,000, and then $9,200,000, $11,200,000, and last year $10,832,697 by way of profits from the operation of the foreign exchange control board. It is not as if these profits were just pulled out of the air.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, is it proper to discuss the operations of the foreign exchange control board under this resolution in view of the fact that there is on the order paper another resolution on that matter?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not understand that the hon. member for Rosedale was discussing the foreign exchange control board. He was using it as a reference.

Mr. Jackman: As to what happens when you give power to these various boards, they distort the purpose for which they were originally intended and place additional burdens upon the backs of the taxpayers of Canada. In 1939 the total personal income tax was only $50 million.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. N. J. M. Lockhart (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to elaborate at any great length—

An hon. Member: Collaborate?

Mr. Lockhart: If you will take the wool out of your ears you will hear some of the things that are being said. I want to make a few remarks arising particularly out of a return that I received in the house a few days ago dealing with the matter of housing. As housing is one of the controls which are being included in this omnibus resolution, I want to make specific reference to the return that I received. I want to refer to the specific questions in this return before I make my general observations. The questions I asked were:

1. How many persons are employed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?
2. Are there any persons employed outside of the city of Ottawa by this corporation?
3. If so, at what points?
4. What was the total amount paid out in salaries and traveling expenses to employees of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation during the year 1948?
5. What are the names of the principal officials of the corporation?
6. What salary does each receive?
7. What were the travelling expenses of each such official during the year 1948?
8. Have any increases in salary been granted to the employees of the corporation since it was set up?
9. If so, to whom, and what increase to each of them?

The answers can be found in the return to which I have referred. The answer to question No. 1 shows that there are around 1,800 people employed. The answer to question No. 2, under which I wanted to know whether any were employed outside of the city of Ottawa, was yes. Then a detailed list is given of where these persons are employed. The answer to question No. 4 shows that the total amount paid out in salaries was $3,698,218.49, and total traveling expenses are given as $247,460.32. In question No. 7 I asked about the traveling expenses of the officials during the year 1948. That is where I take exception to what bureaucrats can do. The answer to question No. 7 is that this information is not available from government records. After being given the total traveling expenses of the officials as $247,460.32, I cannot get the information that I desire about these traveling expenses because it is said to be not available from government records. In other words, I am not given a breakdown of the traveling expenses.

Question No. 8 deals with increases in salary. Then in question No. 9 I asked to whom increases were given and what they were in each case. Again the answer I received was that the information was not available from government records. I doubt whether you can find in the annals of the house an instance where more bureaucratic answers have been given to a simple return. It is a matter about which I am being asked time and time again. I have received further letters today asking me about the situation. I am glad that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) is in the house because I could not get this information.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lockhart: I rose in the house last Monday—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should point out to the hon. member that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not come within the present resolution. I understand rentals do come within it; but a general discussion of the corporation to which the hon. gentleman is referring would not be in order at the present time.

Mr. Lockhart: They put up rental housing.

Mr. Fraser: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, Central Mortgage does come under the matter of controls, because Central Mortgage has absolute authority over priorities for building projects. If a municipality issues a permit for the construction of a theatre or any other building it must get its priority certificate from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That is the only way they can build, and that is why there is a shortage of cement, nails and everything else required for veterans' houses. That should be and is under this control act; therefore it can be discussed under this item.

Mr. Fleming: May I add that one of the orders sought to be continued by the measure the Minister of Justice is asking leave to introduce is the order under which priorities are issued by the priorities officer.

Mr. Garson: Speaking to the point of order, while the observations of the last two hon. members are quite correct, as I understood them, the hon. member who has the floor was not discussing the application of any of these priorities by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. He was discussing the internal administration of the corporation—

Mr. Lockhart: I was leading up to priorities.

Mr. Garson: —which comes under a statute of its own. That discussion would be quite irrelevant to the matter now before the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe what has been said by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is correct; but as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has pointed out, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) was not discussing these priorities. He was discussing the whole question of the internal management of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which does not come within the scope of the resolution. As a matter of fact it is a corporation which is responsible to another minister entirely. I think I have made my point clear; and the hon. member for Lincoln has stated that he is going to lead up to the question of priorities.

Mr. Lockhart: I do not want to transgress against any ruling you may make, nor do I want to transgress against the rules of the house, but I am following along the line of what my leader said so definitely in this house in regard to bureaucratic controls, and I want to point out that this is one of the things which are causing considerable concern under those controls.

I have attempted to show the nature of the thing about which I am complaining. I am not blaming the minister for this, because probably he is only repeating what someone else has told him, since he has just come into the department. However, yesterday I asked if it would not be possible to get answers to these questions, to find out what were the traveling expenses—

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend persists in following a line of argument which I think is quite inadmissible on this resolution.

Mr. Lockhart: We are being asked to continue these controls, and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is building rental houses in my city at the present time. I am showing the procedure that is followed under the bureaucratic controls that are in effect today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understood the hon. member was discussing the management of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the cost of operating the corporation, the salaries paid and so on. I do not think that could be considered by any stretch of the imagination to come under this resolution. I would not object if the hon. member made passing reference to what is being done by the corporation, but I do not think it would be in order to have a detailed discussion on that point at the present time. That may well come up on a subsequent occasion.

Mr. Lockhart: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to pursue this matter, but will conclude with my own observations in regard to what has happened. Rental houses are urgently needed but, as the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) has said, materials are being diverted to the construction of hospitals, bank buildings and so on. I say in all fairness to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that in the cities of Welland and Niagara Falls, where houses are so urgently needed, it will not appear very well to see an item in the estimates of a quarter of a million dollars for a public building in one city.

Mr. Mitchell: I can only say to my hon. friend that I hope we get the public building.

Mr. Lockhart: Go ahead and get the public building for the quarter of a million dollars, if you wish; there is still a terrific need for houses. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is one of the crown companies responsible for the production of houses, but they have not advanced at all in the last year or two.

I have spoken of bureaucratic controls. I have asked the minister for the information I required, but he tells me I cannot have it. I merely recite this to show the type of bureaucracy that seems to be developing more and more in this country. Here we have an omnibus resolution covering things which have nothing to do with a war emergency; yet we have to submit to this sort of thing. I am just asking the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) why I cannot get information the people of my constituency are requesting. This resolution will continue control over such things as fruits and vegetables. With all these matters brought under an omnibus resolution I do not know where this will ever end. So I say there is only one thing to do and that is abandon the sort of control we have at present, except in extremely emergent cases.

Mr. Thatcher: Oh, they have done that now.

Mr. Lockhart: A little more wool-gathering. I will not pursue this point further, but I should like the minister to be good enough to explain why this information cannot be made available. The minister has suggested that the report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is responsible for a great deal of housing construction, may be referred to some committee, and that when this is done I may be able to get the information I have requested. However, I would ask the minister to give me that information now.

Motion (Mr. Casselman): "That this question be now put", agreed to.

(Text):

The house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. Drew: Will the minister now explain the extent to which any of the twelve orders are to be varied or changed in any way?

Mr. Garson: During the course of my remarks in the debate yesterday it was pointed out to me by the hon. member for Peterborough West and the hon. member for Nanaimo that at this stage it was improper to refer to any of the provisions of the bill, and that that could be done only when the bill was brought down. It would be difficult for hon. members to follow any argument until the bill is brought down. Subject to that difficulty, may I say that the intention is not to effect any modification in any of the existing orders in council. I think that is what the leader of the opposition means. When the bill is brought down it will be seen that it goes somewhat further than that. If I may be permitted a slightly improper allusion to the bill not yet before the members, may I say that it will provide that not only will the orders stand as they are but also that, notwithstanding anything in the act, the wartime prices and trade board shall not exercise any powers with regard to the fixing of prices or with regard to the launching of prosecutions with respect to any goods and services other than those which are already referred to in existing orders in council. Therefore, not only will these orders in council not be changed but it will not be permissible, under the terms of the bill, to pass any more orders in council or board orders dealing with goods or services other than those under control when this bill becomes law. Perhaps that answers my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Drew: Yes, except to the extent that if there are any other changes—

Mr. Blackmore: Speak louder, please.

Mr. Drew: Information could quite properly be placed before the committee to indicate the extent to which any of these orders, as distinct from the bill, are to be changed or amended in themselves. I am not now referring to the extent to which the act may limit the exercise of powers in relation to these matters. I want to know whether we may take it that the twelve orders referred to in the explanation of the Minister of Justice last week are to be put forward in the same form as they were last year, subject of course to any interpretative provisions which might be in the amended bill itself.

Mr. Garson: I would say the bill being introduced applies to the orders in council in question in the form in which they were last year. But what I would suggest in that connection is that the bill be printed and distributed, and that we then lay before the house, if it so desires, a text of the orders in council to which the bill will apply. When these are laid before the house hon. members will see, if they wish to make a comparison, that there has been no change of any substance in the orders in council along the lines indicated by the leader of the opposition's question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the minister spoke the day before yesterday he mentioned the prerogative powers that permit of the issue of orders in council. I was quite interested in the statement he made, and I should like to ask him how far the crown now possesses the power to pass extraordinary and prerogative orders in council outside and above those particularly covered in this resolution.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would make clear before I answer his question whether he refers to prerogative powers with respect to the subject matters covered by the bill before the committee. If he refers merely to these subject matters I apprehend just offhand that there is no intention to pass any prerogative orders in council, seeing that our powers have been determined by parliament to be covered by the statute, of which the present bill is an amendment. If his question is not confined to the subject matters before us, then I would object to the hon. member's question as irrelevant to the present discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to bring in anything irrelevant. Perhaps I can put it this way. I was wondering whether or not the matter of emergency might apply in this case to which I would direct the minister's attention. There is a motion on the order paper to permit the sittings of the house to start in the forenoon. This is to be referred to tomorrow. Naturally any motion such as that gives rise to speculation. Then again the budget is to be brought down on March 22. I was wondering whether or not under these emergency powers it is considered by the Minister of Justice that once the budget has been introduced, without its being passed by parliament, the emergency powers of an order in council could make effective its recommendations. Would that come within the emergency powers or within the prerogative powers exercisable under the emergency legislation?

Mr. Garson: I have been in the legal profession now for some twenty-five years odd, and I have never yet acquired the habit of answering like a slot machine questions of the type just asked by my hon. friend. If my hon. friend wishes an opinion on that I shall be glad to confer with the law officers of the crown and produce it for him, but I regret that I cannot feel responsible to produce it at a moment's notice at the present time.

However, I might say this, if it does not offend my hon. friend's professional sense. As a lawyer I think he knows that, when parliament has provided in the Transitional Measures Act the power for the executive to pass orders in council, certainly, following the usual process, the executive would confine itself to the powers so granted when dealing with any of the subject matters which are within the limits of the legislation. That being the case, and the hon. member being a lawyer, I think he should be as able to read the statute and draw his own conclusions as I, also being a lawyer, am to draw them.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the allusion to a slot machine is about the best thing I have heard in reference to orders in council. When I think of the thousands that have been turned out, the slot machine allusion is most applicable and pertinent. But still that does not answer my question. The experience in the past has shown that this government has not been too careful about exceeding its powers when passing orders in council, even when those powers are granted under a statute passed by this parliament. It was because of that fact that I asked the question, and the uncertainty of the reply gives me the answer that I was endeavouring to get.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think there are certain points that should be put forward at this time in regard to the matter now before the committee and which have been emphasized by the reply made by the Minister of Justice to the hon. member for Lake Centre. It is very noticeable that on the part of many hon. members, particularly some of those in the government ranks, there is an attitude of impatience, not to say annoyance, that the wisdom of the government should be challenged in any way as to the necessity for the continuance of these extraordinary powers.

When the Minister of Justice indicates his reluctance to act like a slot machine, he is obviously announcing on behalf of the government a new policy which it is hoped will actually bear some fruit in the future. It is obvious that this is a new declaration of policy as of today, but not as of last night, because in some of the comments the minister made last night on this subject he was certainly following the slot machine process and not paying very much attention to what he had learned during his twenty-five years in the practice of law.

There are a great many points that come up in this house that are not matters calling for special legal consideration, but there are also many matters which call for the practical attention of those who because of special knowledge can express the most expert opinion. But when it comes to matters that relate to the constitution and to the division of authority between the governments of this country, that relate to the powers and responsibilities of this house and of parliament as a whole, then it is wise for every hon. member to have some regard for the legal effect of the measure before the house. The decision made by hon. members is going to have a profound effect upon the opportunity of our courts to protect the rights of the people of Canada in relation to many of their ordinary occupations and their ordinary rights which are disturbed by arbitrary powers of this kind.

Last night the Minister of Justice stated that he did not think it was proper to refer to the judgment given last Thursday in Manitoba. I do not know by what process he came to the conclusion that the mere fact that there may be some further action precluded the possibility of comment upon the latest decision of the courts in interpreting the judicial attitude toward any matter of this kind. That was the latest judgment dealing with the emergency transitional powers act which the government seeks to continue by the bill which is to follow this resolution. Therefore, it was most proper to examine what that court found and what was the opinion expressed by the five judges of that court in regard to an order in council passed under the broad provisions of this act. The judgment was one of great importance, not merely because of its effect upon the broad issue with which it was dealing but because of the fact that it made an important observation in regard to the type of emergency which should be present before it is possible for anyone to say that there was such an emergency as called for a decision to that effect.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) said that in this case the emergency is one which is apparent to everyone. It was not apparent to the judges of the supreme court of Manitoba, and in a very powerful statement one of the judges pointed out that, far from being a general economic emergency, the situation was precisely the contrary. After all, that was only stating what reason and common sense would assert in any case without the necessity of going to that judgment for an interpretation of the proper attitude towards emergency controls of this kind.

The Minister of Justice is asserting here that every member of the house can see for himself, without any argument or anything to substantiate it, that there is such an emergency as makes it possible for the members to declare that this omnibus bill should be passed which covers twelve different orders that are carried forward from the period of war emergency. There can be a general emergency or there can be a specific emergency relating to a particular condition or a particular subject. I submit that the distinction between those two types of emergency should be in the mind of every hon. member of the house before making the very important decision to declare by his vote that there is an emergency of the kind which the government argues in this case.

There have been a number of cases in the past where a specific emergency was declared and legislation presented to the house and dealt with by the house in relation to that specific emergency. The circumstance which has undoubtedly caused the most extensive legal consideration of this point was the passing by the Canadian parliament many years ago of the Canada Temperance Act. That was an act dealing with a specific emergency. I do not know that there is in the house anyone who, from his own recollection, can recall the condition which was regarded as a national emergency of that nature at that time. In fact, it is apparent that there is no one who remembers the conditions which led to the passage of that bill under something approaching recognition of a national emergency. It was only in the light of the recognition of something of that nature that it would have been possible to have dealt with the situation. There is, of course, the fact that the provinces at that time had not provided their own liquor control acts, and this device was apparently necessary if there was to be a general supervision of the use of spirits.

I only mention the Canada Temperance Act to point out that there can be a specific emergency which becomes the justification for the passing of a bill to deal with that subject. It may well be, and in fact I assert, that there is an emergency in regard to certain matters under consideration in the broad purpose of this bill. It is very noticeable that some of those to the left who believe in controls for the sake of controls—

Mr. Williams: That is nonsense.

Mr. Drew: —are extremely caustic in regard to the very positive statement that—

Mr. Williams: On a question of privilege, the privilege of refuting the statement of the leader of the opposition, who is merely making—

The Chairman: Order. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member will have an opportunity to reply later on.

Mr. Graydon: Let the government speak for themselves. They have spokesmen everywhere.

Mr. Drew: I was just saying that there are those who are very caustic when the statement is made that there should be controls over certain matters during a continuing period of emergency in respect to certain subjects. It is strange how people will accept the general extension of powers, and the continuance of those powers to the point where ultimately they seem to forget how wide those powers are, and how dangerous the principles are that are involved in them. When a perfectly sound and logical proposition is put forward that these matters should be dealt with in the proper, parliamentary way of having separate bills to deal with the specific emergencies that are alleged, there are those who try to convey the impression that a submission in regard to a constitutional position of that kind means that those who assert it properly, and with due recognition of the rights of parliament, are opposed to any measure of control over any of these subjects. I hope it will not be necessary outside of this house to call any hon. gentlemen by a short and descriptive name afterwards, but I for one will certainly reserve the right to do so if any hon. member suggests that I—

Mr. Howe: Threats.

Mr. Drew: —, or any other member of the party with which I am associated, have expressed opposition to rent control, or to any other specific question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: It seems that I shall be given the opportunity and duty of using a very short but expressive word.

An hon. Member: What a farce.

Mr. Drew: Here you have the mechanism of dictatorship right in front of you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Here you have men drunk with power, and of course I am not referring now to the Canada Temperance Act.

An hon. Member: Cocktail bars.

Mr. Drew: Here you have men so convinced of their own rightness that they simply say that the war was over four years ago, but you must not suggest for a moment that anybody should be told what the emergency is as to any of these particular subjects.

Mr. Williams: You have had a chance to do that for two days.

Mr. Drew: Then when you have placed before the house an argument which is in keeping with what every real Liberal would have asserted, and asserted most vigorously, in the past, you have nothing but empty laughter from the government benches. Last evening the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) quoted from a judgment of Lord Wright in one of the more recent and leading cases on this subject, and referred to what has been also accepted generally in other cases. He quoted these words:

> The rule of law as to the distribution of powers between the parliament of the dominion and the parliaments of the provinces comes into play, but very clear evidence that an emergency has not arisen, or that the emergency no longer exists, is required to justify the judiciary, even though the question is one of ultra vires, in overruling the decision of the parliament of the dominion that exceptional measures were required or were still required.

The important words in that quotation from Lord Wright were "in overruling the decision of the parliament of the dominion". This matter is now before the House of Commons, as the first stage in obtaining a decision of parliament as to whether in fact there is an emergency now; and the very wording of that quotation from the judgment of Lord Wright emphasizes the fact that everyone here is being called upon to make that important decision of fact. No hon. member has a right to make that important decision unless he knows there is a general emergency which will justify an omnibus bill of this kind as distinguished from a specific bill dealing with an important subject.

Those who are not in this house—of course I am not referring to those who are here, because they have heard this before—may be unaware that the government was urged to introduce specific bills dealing with the particular subjects they wish this house to consider, and in those bills to define the rights of the people, to make it possible for the people to properly assert their position before the courts and to bring an end to this sort of arbitrary power in the hands of controllers, priority officers and others who are utterly irresponsible under these orders which are still being brought forward. The powers conferred by these orders were granted at a time when this country was in the midst of war; when the energies of the people were directed to the war, and when the activities of the government were concentrated upon that consideration. Even though sound arguments were advanced then against the extent of some of the orders that were adopted; even though very proper considerations were put forward as to why there should be some restraint on many of these controllers and officials who in turn are given power to delegate their authority to anyone without protection for those affected in the conduct of their affairs; nevertheless it was indicative of the spirit of this country at that time that the people were prepared to grant even the widest powers during the period of the war so that the actual conduct of the war effort might not be limited or impaired in any way.

In every country one of the greatest problems arising since the war has been to remove those measures and powers which, even if they can be justified in war, can only be justified under such extreme emergency. Once again I urge every hon. member to read those orders that have been in effect under the omnibus bill which has been law and which by this resolution the government seeks to continue in an amended form. They will find powers conferred on individuals which are absolutely contrary to our ideas of a parliamentary system under which the elected representatives of the people determine the rights of the people by laws which the people themselves can understand.

Rent controls have not been effective in helping the tenants, any more than they have been effective in dealing with the housing situation. One reason that is so is that these orders relating to rentals are loose and undefined, and it is extremely difficult for anyone to know exactly what his rights really are under these orders. I said before and I repeat that the government still has the opportunity to deal with this in the parliamentary way. Bring before this house a rent control bill that will really deal with the rights of tenants and the rights of landlords, and really establish the rights of our people generally; and the government will find support from every part of this house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What about provincial rights? How could we pass that? You said we did not have the authority.

Mr. Drew: Apparently the hon. gentleman is quite ignorant of what has been said. Doubtless he was out while some of the statements were made. I have just said, and for his benefit I repeat, that there has been no question at any time but that there is power in this parliament to deal with a specific emergency if it can be established that there is a specific emergency. That was settled in law long ago. I have already referred to the Canada Temperance Act, which has been interpreted over and over again. If the hon. member will read the decisions under that act he will find that the law was established many years ago and has been confirmed through the years since.

I see the Minister of Finance is leaving.

Mr. Abbott: Your repetitive argument is too good; I cannot take it again.

Mr. Drew: My hon. friend could not understand it, anyway, so perhaps it is just as well that he goes out.

This bill seeks to carry forward the wide emergency powers relating to a whole field of subjects in respect of which no pretence of emergency has been asserted by the government; and any hon. member who tries to convey the impression that, because anyone in this chamber opposes these wide omnibus powers, he is opposing any specific power, is dishonest and untruthful in that assertion.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? Does the leader of the opposition agree that there is now an emergency arising out of the war?

Mr. Drew: I most certainly do not agree that there is a general emergency arising out of the last war, and that is exactly the point every hon. member should understand. There is a great difference between a general emergency and a specific emergency, and that is precisely what was under consideration in the case decided in Manitoba last Thursday. If hon. members will examine that judgment, no matter whether or not the dominion government intends to appeal the case, they will find some very illuminating explanations of the difference between specific emergencies and general emergencies.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask another question, and it will be the last one. I am asking the permission of the hon. member, and if he does not wish to give it to me, I will sit down, but I believe he does. If there is no emergency arising out of the last war, how can the leader of the opposition have any constitutional ground for asserting that this parliament should pass a law for rent control?

Mr. Drew: Obviously, the member was not in the house when I was speaking earlier.

Mr. Bertrand (Prescott): The hon. member was here.

Mr. Drew: I regret that the hon. member—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: I regret that the hon. member failed to appreciate the distinction between a specific emergency and a general emergency. The distinction has been drawn very clearly.

Mr. Lesage: Not by the courts, but by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: The distinction has been clearly drawn by the courts. There is no person capable of reading the judgments of the courts who is not capable of clearly interpreting the distinction between a general emergency and a specific emergency.

Mr. Lesage: I have practised law, and you have not.

Mr. Drew: The situation in this case is that the government must assert a general emergency to justify omnibus powers of this nature. If there is such a general emergency as would justify the adoption of an omnibus bill of this nature, then there is an emergency which would permit the dominion government to invade any field of provincial rights at this time. A decision to that effect would have precisely that result.

If it is a fact that there is a general emergency, and apparently the hon. member who has just spoken must believe there is, then there is no aspect of provincial jurisdiction which this government could not invade under the general powers available to it. The member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) has, in fact, raised a point which should be in the mind of every member. In asserting that proposition he is asserting a proposition which this government could carry forward in other emergency measures dealing with a number of subjects that affect the constitutional position in this country. At a time when this government has refused to carry out its solemn undertaking given during the war to return the taxing powers to the provinces, every member in this house should be extremely careful about accepting the proposition that the parliament of Canada has the right to invade the field of provincial authority under a declaration of a general emergency.

Let there be no mistake about it. The view just expressed by the hon. member is an indication that he believes there is a general emergency, so do not let the government suggest they are not asserting there is a general emergency. Obviously, they would not be able to carry the conviction of the hon. member with them if they did. A general emergency, such as is asserted now, would be a general emergency which would go far beyond this omnibus bill. It would go far beyond the agricultural bill, the foreign exchange control bill, or any other bill that has been brought forward in this house. The government seems very unwilling to admit that it believes in wide bureaucratic powers. Yet this house should recognize the extent to which this government has gone in introducing new bureaucratic powers under new devices. A discussion of this is directly relevant to the way in which wide powers of this kind could be used if the parliament of Canada asserts that there is a general emergency of the type that would be necessary to cover the field included in this omnibus bill.

Let me illustrate the kind of power taken by this government which goes beyond the necessity of asking parliament to declare an emergency. This government introduced a device giving it the power to enter the field of industrial development by placing in the estimates substantial sums which are not covered by statutory authority. It is done under the broad assertion of the right of the government to appropriate moneys for any purpose. They appropriate large sums of money for the purpose of giving to a minister of the crown undefined and uncontrolled rights to take part in the expansion of particular industries at his discretion. The adoption of the estimates by the house has the effect of statutory authority. Consequently, in that loose and slipshod manner, many millions of dollars are made available for expenditure under a procedure which is not covered by any statute of this house.

Then what happens? The government, having entered the field of industrial activity, asserts the right to hide the details of the use of that money. A perfect example of the way this government creates bureaucratic authority by new and utterly irresponsible methods is provided. A few days ago we were given an example of the manner in which this government felt it should be permitted to continue that type of business behind closed doors. A question was asked about the Polymer Corporation, which is one of the corporations in which the government has been taking an active interest under these loose powers. The question concerned the contracts that had been made by Polymer Corporation for the supplying of energy to various bodies in the area it serves. The position taken was that this was something upon which the government was not prepared—

The Chairman: Order. That question was put to the house and was voted upon. There is a rule that hon. members must not reflect on the proceedings of the house, except for the purpose of rescinding them.

Mr. Drew: I would draw a distinction between reflecting on the proceedings of the house and explaining the result of the decision of the house in relation to the present conduct of the government.

The Chairman: I should remind the hon. member that he cannot refer in the present session to a debate on a matter not now under discussion, which has been decided during the present session. It is against the rules to have a debate twice on the same subject.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am not debating that resolution. I am stating, as a matter of fact, that the government has refused to give information in regard to the operation of a corporation into which it has put public funds. This house, by a majority vote, supported the government in its declaration that the house is not entitled to that information. It is to that decision I am referring. I am not in any way questioning the decision; I am simply saying that the decision has shown the extent to which the use of these moneys is put beyond the inspection of the members of this house. The principle asserted by this government applies to several other companies, and I am now asserting that their broad declaration is that this money, appropriated in this manner and advanced to these corporations, can then be spent at the discretion of the minister without the ordinary supervision of the elected representatives of the people.

If that is not bureaucracy carried far beyond even the wartime measures, then I do not know where one could find an example. The hon. members of this house have a duty to recognize that many of the powers asserted under these general provisions have been challenged and have been dealt with in the courts. There was another case that has been referred to on a number of occasions here; that was a decision in Toronto only a short time ago, again referring to this act and again holding that those charged with the responsibility for carrying out the details of the provisions carried forward under this act were exceeding their authority. In case after case there has been clear demonstration in the courts of this country that the loose powers conferred in these regulations are being abused by the bureaucracy operated by the senior bureaucrats of this government.

Let us examine, for instance, the powers conferred in regard to some of these things that have no relation at all to the question of the emergency which is alleged, and which undoubtedly exists in regard to some of the specific subjects. Take, for instance, timber and timber control. Under that wide power the government have the power now to deal with the control of the standing trees and the processed wood, as well as all the other things—subject, of course, to what they may withdraw from that at the present time; and they have given wide powers in regard to that matter. There are powers in regard to steel, supplies and priorities which will undoubtedly be defined and discussed in various ways. But unless the government introduce specific acts of parliament to deal with subjects of this nature we shall be going on, during a period when the emergency cannot possibly have been declared to exist, with the bureaucrats ranging loose in every field that is covered by the whole of these twelve orders.

In the United States, over some period of time, a committee under the chairmanship of former President Hoover made a most useful and illuminating examination of autocratic authority and of mounting government extension of powers. The findings of that committee are illuminating to the extent that they disclose how power builds on power, and how the building of that power creates new groups of minor officials who constantly add to their own authority, to their number and to the cost of operation of all these controls. As recently as March 3 Mr. Hoover made a most interesting speech on this subject in New York, based on his experience arising out of the work of that extremely important committee, which has its lessons for us in Canada as well as for the people in the United States. I quote from the report dealing with this speech.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Which paper?

Mr. Drew: I quote from the report dealing with his speech in the New York Herald Tribune of Friday, March 4:

> The former president, chairman of the commission on organization of the executive branch, told the New York state chamber of commerce, during its monthly meeting at 65 Liberty street, that the increasing "bureaucracy" in Washington has been caused by three factors.
> 1. Because of the natural instinct of federal bureaux to "exfoliate in their desire to improve the lot of man."
> 2. Because "our people, under the illusion that money from Washington is pure manna, are selling right and left their birthright as free men and their responsibilities in a free man's government in order to get it."
> 3. Because "there are those who are impatient with the slow process of local reform and who conceive that all may be good if the federal government would only pass a law, set up a bureau, and make an appropriation."
> Mr. Hoover, recalling that "the original idea" of the American republic was that the federal government was to have limited powers, said "the founding fathers seemed to have a notion that a bureaucrat might be more responsive to the will of the people if his head office were down the street instead of 3,000 miles away in some pentagon building."

Those words, Mr. Chairman, apply to the situation here with just as much force as they do to the situation in Washington.

An hon. Member: Tut, tut.

Mr. Drew: In fact, they apply with a great deal more force, because in the United States there is a constitution which cannot be challenged by this loose appeal to the emergency which is available here under such an act as is now before this House of Commons for consideration. The members of this house are called upon to decide whether they believe these things can best be dealt with by an all-powerful bureaucracy or whether they can best be dealt with under ordinary statutory provisions which will be interpreted in the usual way in our courts. That is the basic distinction which should be in the minds of the members who are called upon to vote on this resolution or on the bill at any of its stages. If this government can establish that there is a specific emergency in regard to any one of the twelve subjects mentioned here, then it can pass an act which makes it possible for the man or woman, in any part of Canada, who is affected by this act, to go to his or her own court in his or her own vicinity and have his or her rights determined by those who live in the place where he or she is affected by the operation of such acts, and where his or her affairs are not being decided by some distant bureaucrat three thousand miles away who does not understand the local problem but who nevertheless is called upon to determine it by loose orders that are not subject to revision or consideration by the court unless there is a case that can actually be made of complete failure to comply even with the loose provisions of this act.

When Mr. Hoover pointed out that the founding fathers in the United States had an idea that the federal system was of value in that country, he was only saying what the people in this country should say a good deal more than they do. When I hear some hon. members talking in derision about the constitutional rights in this country, I say it is time that they examined what has happened in every country where the constitution has been disregarded and the democratic processes have been abandoned.

The founding fathers of Canada, the fathers of our confederation, decided that this country should have a federal system, in which there was a division of authority between the federal and the provincial governments. They decided also that it would be only in the case of an extreme emergency, such as war itself, or a condition approximating war, that the terms of that constitution should be abandoned. If we disregard that basic consideration today in an effort to make shortcuts such as have produced the great bureaucratic expansion in the United States, as well as here, then we are paving the way to a complete loss of that democratic freedom which has been at issue at all times since we received our constitution in 1867.

The statement that it is not possible to do these things within our constitution, and that it is not possible to obtain the desired results, is not borne out by any evidence which is before this house, or before anyone who will read what is written down in plain and understandable language in the record of the meetings of the governments which took place here in Ottawa in 1945 and 1946.

Mr. Knowles: This is where I came in.

Mr. Drew: Some hon. members seem to think that this is an old subject. It is an old subject which started in 1867, but which needs to be re-emphasized for the benefit of hon. members who seem to think that it is an old subject which should be forgotten.

In answer to a question in this house a few days ago the Prime Minister said that it had not been possible to proceed with the health and social security measures because it had not been possible to obtain agreement at the conference. That statement left the impression that there had been resistance to the advancement of health and social security measures. There is no person who understands the language of the record who can honestly say—and, I repeat, honestly say—that there was not a declared desire by every government attending that conference to advance health and social security measures. When the Prime Minister says that there was no indication of a willingness to take whatever steps would be necessary to carry forward those health and social security measures, I challenge him or any hon. member in this house to point—

Mr. Martin: I rise to a point of order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin: On the right occasion, and when this matter is properly in order, I shall certainly challenge that statement; but I rise to suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that this trend of argument is wholly out of order.

Mr. Drew: We are called upon to extend wide and arbitrary powers, and no hon. member has a right to cast his vote in regard to the extension of those powers unless he examines how arbitrary powers have been used by this government. When the appropriate time comes to deal with another subject I shall deal with some of the absurd statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in regard to what he has done for health in this country. As I said on another occasion, one would think that Canadian health had been discovered only when he came to office.

Mr. Martin: I am perfectly willing to meet the hon. gentleman—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Graydon: Don't take it too hard.

Mr. Martin: I am perfectly willing to meet the hon. gentleman at a time when our discussions will be in order; but I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that what the hon. gentleman has said in the last fifteen or twenty minutes is wholly out of order.

The Chairman: Order. I am sure that the leader of the opposition will relate the remarks he is making at the present time to the resolution.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to relate them to the point at issue. The point at issue is very clear to any hon. member who understands our constitution.

Mr. Cleaver: That is one man in the house.

Mr. Drew: There are of course many hon. members who obviously do not, and it will be helpful if some of those will try to learn something about it by listening to a discussion of the subject.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: I wish to announce that the first order of business tomorrow will be the resolution which is No. 4 on the order paper of today, dealing with the bill to extend foreign exchange control powers. If there is anything that can be done after that has been under discussion, we shall come back to the resolution which has been considered in the committee of the whole this afternoon.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIVILEGE

ROUYN DISASTER

Mr. Réal Caouette (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, we were shocked to learn this morning of the dreadful fire which broke out last night at Rouyn, a city in the constituency I have the honour to represent in this house.

Fortunately, the anxiety of the citizens was not heightened by any loss of life.

Many families have not only sustained severe losses but are now homeless. At noon, I was informed that losses will total well over a million dollars.

May I, Mr. Speaker, tender my deepest sympathy to all the victims of this disaster, be they landlords or tenants, and may I also congratulate the dauntless firemen and citizens of Rouyn who now have the fire entirely under control.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

GRANTS TO POLICE AND FIRE DEPARTMENTS—PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATION

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked a question about civil defence, having regard to proposals put forward in the Ontario legislature by the attorney general. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has given notice of an inquiry of the ministry as to the same matter. I am glad to make a brief statement in reply to both questions.

Some time ago Major General F. F. Worthington was appointed civil defence adviser. As such he has been working with the various federal departments and agencies that might be concerned, and has visited the United States, Great Britain, and other countries, to bring our information up to date as to what is being done or proposed in those countries.

The vast extent of Canada and the nature of the problems involved in civil defence make it clear that suitable safeguards require close working arrangements among the various agencies of government, federal, provincial and municipal, as well as transportation and communication services, and national and local organizations. Moreover, many of the matters relating to civil defence fall within the ordinary jurisdiction of the provinces and municipalities of Canada, which are responsible for municipal services such as fire fighting.

On my instruction Major General Worthington visited all the provinces, and at each place saw either the premier or a member of the cabinet, at which time arrangements were discussed in a general way. I should like to say that all provinces showed a most co-operative attitude. These preliminary discussions are being followed up.

In considering civil defence, it is apparent that one of the actions which would be desirable would be that the couplings and attachments of fire equipment be standardized as far as possible. While some progress has been made, I am informed that there are no less than two hundred types of 2½-inch fire hose coupling having either different threads or outside diameter which would make it impossible, or at least more difficult, for the fire equipment of one locality to be used in another. This is an objective which could be attained only over a period of time by the provinces agreeing on certain standards and working towards them. Clearly it is in the general interest of the people in the various parts of Canada that fire equipment be capable of being used in neighbouring municipalities.

Beyond these general discussions, no arrangements have yet been made with any of the provinces. Until today I had not seen the legislation proposed by the Ontario legislature. Of course I have not made and do not make any comment on that measure.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Questions

QUESTIONS

*CANADIAN ARMY—PARACHUTISTS

Mr. Harkness:

As of February 15, 1949, how many Canadian army personnel have been qualified as parachutists (a) of the P.P.C.L.I.; (b) of other units?

Mr. Claxton: As is well known, it is not the practice here or in the United Kingdom to give the strength and other detailed information about individual units of the armed forces. If the information were to be given about one unit, there would be no reason for withholding it about others, and thus the entire battle order and fighting strength, which are matters any prospective enemy would take a great deal of trouble to find out, would be disclosed. Even though individual figures may not have any immediate significance, the fact that some were given and others withheld would give information or create ground for speculation.

Changes in the strength or locations of individual units might have the utmost significance. It may be interesting to observe that in the soviet union the giving of such information as is sought here is a crime punishable by ten to twenty years in prison. Few figures could be given which would be of greater interest to the only possible aggressor than the information sought in answer to these two questions.

Accordingly it is not in the public interest to give this or similar information in reply to this and the next question. However, I shall be glad to give the hon. member the information for his own private use, if he wants it.

Mr. Harkness: I must protest against the refusal of the minister to answer these questions. I doubt very much the validity of the arguments that he has advanced.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has had an answer to his question.

Mr. Graydon: The minister made a speech.

CANADIAN ARMY BRIGADE GROUP

Mr. Harkness:

What was the strength of the active force Canadian army brigade group as of February 15, 1949, or nearest date to that for which returns have been made?

Some hon. Members: Answered.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Answered by the answer to the previous question.

[Mr. Howe.]

HOUSING—AJAX, ONT.—COOKSTOVES

Mr. Williams:

1. Were any cookstoves purchased with federal treasury funds for tenant use in the wartime houses built in Ajax by Wartime Housing? If so, how many?

2. How much did these cookstoves cost?

3. What is the total amount of money collected from the tenants as (a) rent; (b) purchase of these stoves?

Mr. Winters:

1. Yes; 573 cookstoves were purchased for tenant use in wartime houses built in Ajax by Wartime Housing.

2. The cost of the cookstoves laid down in Ajax and installed was aproximately $21,201. It is estimated that maintenance cost a total of $13,000, or an average of about $4 per stove per annum. Interest at 3 per cent on the capital involved over the period amounts to $2,544.05.

3. Total amount of money collected from tenants as (a) rent, $28,915.75; (b) purchase, $7,018.50.

*HONG KONG VETERANS—PACIFIC PAY

Mr. Brooks:

1. What action has been taken by the Department of National Defence with reference to the representations of the Hong Kong veterans for Pacific pay, as contained in their brief presented to the Veterans Affairs committee June 17, 1948, and forwarded by the committee to the Minister of National Defence for consideration?

2. If no action has been taken as yet, will favourable consideration be given to the representations of these veterans?

Mr. Claxton: The question of giving Pacific pay to the members of the Hong Kong forces has been under consideration for some time. Under P.C. 3593 of May 17, 1945, authority was granted for the payment of "Japanese campaign pay" to members of the Canadian army Pacific forces, effective June 1, 1945, and to begin from the date of departure from Canada. The main reason for this provision was that our forces would be acting in close association with the forces of the United States, which had a different pay structure from ours, and which, unlike the Canadian pay structure, made express provision for foreign service pay. The order did not cover Canadians who had fought in the Pacific, including the Hong Kong force, the Kiska force and members of the R.C.A.F. and others who had taken part in the active operations in the Pacific.

However, representations were received from members of parliament and others that members of the Hong Kong force who had suffered so much should receive the same entitlement as members of the Canadian army Pacific forces. This has led the government to consider the matter on different occasions and in the light of difficulties which favourable action might create. Generally speaking it is a good rule that no pay provision should be made retroactive so as to include a class that had not been covered. The circumstances here, however, were so different that it was felt that others could not properly regard this as opening the way for other retroactive adjustments.

In principle the matter was decided by the government some time ago, and I am glad to be able to announce now that the terms of the original order will be extended so as to make members of the Hong Kong forces eligible for Pacific pay until two months after return of such members to Canada.

Mr. Graydon: Another victory for George Drew.

HOUSING—TORONTO—VETERANS AND CIVILIANS

Mr. Church:

Under the Housing Act, 1944, how many applications for housing space has the Central Mortgage Corporation received in the city of Toronto from (a) war veterans; (b) civilians?

Mr. Winters: This question does not indicate the dates for which the information is required, but in conversation I had with the hon. member he stated that he wished it from January 1, 1947. On that basis the answer to the question is as follows:

Under the housing act, 1944, number of applications received for rental housing in Toronto from January 1, 1947, to March 31, 1948: (a) 1,784; (b) nil; April 1, 1948, to February 28, 1949: (a) 1,094, (b) 4.

CIVIL SERVICE—UNIT SURVEYS, POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East):

1. What is the cause of the delay on the part of the civil service commission in completing the unit survey of the inside service of the Post Office Department promised at the end of the war?
2. When was it started?
3. How many investigators are employed on this survey?
4. How many employees are affected?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West):

1. The progress of the work has been hampered by changes in the investigating staff of the civil service commission.

2. Unit surveys were first permitted after the end of the war in 1947. The first official request received for a unit survey was in 1948, and in that year unit surveys were commenced.

3. One, at present, but in the past three years there have been several investigators on this work at different times.

4. 1,068 employees have been or will be interviewed in the course of these surveys.

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Have unit surveys leading to reclassification of civil service positions been undertaken in the Post Office Department since 1946?
2. If so, how many surveys have been completed, and how many are yet to be completed?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West):

1. Yes.

2. Three unit surveys in the postal service at Ottawa have been completed and five are still to be carried out.

Outside of Ottawa one unit survey review has been completed and 171 unit survey reviews are to be undertaken.

It may be noted that 582 reclassifications in the postal service at Ottawa and 1,019 reclassifications in the postal service outside of Ottawa have been granted since 1946.

2. What is the total quantity of aluminum in all forms which it is anticipated will be exported from Canada in 1949?
3. Of such quantities, what portion was produced or will be produced by facilities in Canada and/or in British Guiana on which the government allowed 100 per cent depreciation during world war II?
4. To what extent is the Aluminum Company of Canada now making use of aluminum producing facilities in Canada and British Guiana on which the company was allowed 100 per cent depreciation during world war II?
5. To what extent is use now being made of the Aluminum Company of Canada's power facilities at Shipshaw on which the company was allowed 60 per cent depreciation during world war II?
6. What are the current prices of aluminum, domestic and export?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Canadian exports of aluminum during the calendar years 1944 to 1948:

Questions

INCOME TAX—NIAGARA FRONTIER COMMUTERS

Mr. Church:

1. What action is being taken to collect arrears of income tax in the Niagara river border from commuters who work in the United States?

2. What demands for immediate payment have been made for income tax arrears?

3. What is being done regarding arrears of income tax owing by the members of the Niagara frontier commuters association in these matters?

Mr. McCann:

1. Taxpayers who are residents of Canada but receive income as a result of services rendered in the United States are taxable under the Canadian law but are allowed to offset against Canadian tax payable any taxes paid to the United States on income derived from sources therein. The collection action involved is to forward an assessment notice and two collection letters within a specified period unless payment or arrangements for payment are made in the interval. If payment is not received or arrangements made, further collection action as provided by the Income Tax Act is considered and, if deemed advisable, applied.

2. Demands for immediate payment have been made only in those cases where the taxpayer had omitted to communicate with the district income tax office and to arrange for settlement of his outstanding taxes. Even at this stage, should the taxpayer make a suggestion regarding payment, it would be given consideration by the department and the demand lifted if the proposal is considered reasonable.

3. Members of Niagara frontier commuters association are taxable if residents of Canada, and they are treated in a similar manner to other Canadian taxpayers who may have fallen in arrears in respect of their obligations.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—CONTRACTS UNDER SECTION 15

Mr. Wright:

1. Have any contracts been entered into by the government with firms or manufacturers under section 15 of the National Housing Act, 1944?

2. If so, what are the names of such firms and the amounts paid to each?

3. If not, what are the reasons for not implementing this section of the act?

Mr. Winters:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The continued scarcity of certain building materials, particularly plumbing and heating equipment and other materials of which steel is a component part, has made it inadvisable to encourage the use of the facilities of section 15 of the act. This section authorizes guarantees to manufacturers of plumbing and heating equipment or other component parts of houses provided that such equipment is sold by the manufacturer concerned for installation in rural or farm homes. It is expected that when the materials situation does warrant it, this section will help to stimulate an active farm home modernization program. While no projects have yet materialized under section 15, discussions did take place during 1948 with one large manufacturer with a view to the mass production of a prefabricated plumbing unit especially planned for installation in farm houses already constructed but without modern water and plumbing systems. The unit is designed to be set in a common wall between the kitchen and bathroom. The company has been advised of the information required in submitting an application.

Wells Construction Company, Limited, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, on a cost-plus-fixed-fee basis. Altogether 28·75 miles (including the 11·6 miles), were cleared, 17·30 miles were stumped and grubbed, and debris was burned along 13·90 miles. The cost of clearing, stumping, grubbing and burning was $45,720, exclusive of the management fee. The management fee paid for the clearing, stumping, grubbing

Mr. Chevrier: The second part of this question is almost impossible to answer. However, I have the answer to paragraph (a) of part 1, and to the part having to do with annual maintenance including dredging. To that extent I should like to make this an order for return, now tabled.

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

TELEPHONES—QUESTION AS TO USE OF RECORDING DEVICES BY MINISTERS AND PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

Hon. Colin Gibson (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on February 21 the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) asked a question and at that time the Prime Minister promised that a reply would be brought down in the form of a return. The question is reported in Hansard at page 722. I would request that it be passed as an order for return, now tabled.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROVISION FOR MORNING SITTINGS UNTIL CERTAIN MEASURES DISPOSED OF—SATURDAY SITTING MARCH 26

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Friday, March 18, 1949, until the following resolutions and the legislation based thereon be disposed of by this house, viz.: (a) the resolution for a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war; (b) the resolution for a measure to amend the Agricultural Products Act to extend the operation of the act for a period of one year; (c) the resolution to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act to provide authority for advances to the corporation by way of loan out of the consolidated revenue fund and to extend the time of operation of the act; (d) the resolution for a measure to provide for the continuance in force of the Foreign Exchange Control Act until sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year 1951; the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock there shall also be an intermission every day from 1 to 3 o'clock p.m.; and further that on Saturday, March 26, 1949, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m. and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Friday, March 25, 1949.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the reasons for this motion are the same as I gave for the motion I put before the house on March 11, to give priority to these resolutions and the legislation based thereon. The present legislation with respect to the matters described in paragraphs (a), (c) and (d) would expire on the 27th of March if not extended by parliament before that date. The legislation described in paragraph (b), the Agricultural Products Act, would expire on March 31 if not extended before that date.

Hon. members will realize that all the steps required for these resolutions and the legislation based thereon provide many opportunities for debate. On each one there is opportunity for debate on the motion that you, sir, leave the chair. There is opportunity for debate in committee after you leave the chair. There is opportunity for debate on the second reading of the bill, in committee of the whole when the bill is being considered clause by clause, and on the third reading of the bill. There are four of these measures, and I indicated it might be desirable to consider a fifth, namely, the consolidation of the bonuses or supplementary payments being made to mail carriers on a contract basis. As one can see, there would be some twenty or more opportunities for debate.

The debate on one subject was begun on Monday and has been continued ever since, but as yet, we have gone through only one of the five stages provided for by each of these resolutions. On Friday last when making the motion I stated that the government believed it to be its duty to make every possible effort to have these measures considered by parliament and disposed of so that they would not expire by mere lapse of time, and that each member would have an opportunity of taking his responsibility in respect thereto and expressing his views in this house.

The motion now before the house would add some twenty-two hours to the time available after today for further consideration of these matters. The time available otherwise would amount to thirty-nine hours; by this motion we are adding something more than fifty per cent to the time available for the consideration of these measures. I recommend to the house this further effort to deal with matters which are evidently of great interest, whatever one's view about them may be. I believe the provision of this additional time will be a demonstration that the members of this house do intend to discharge their responsibilities in regard to these matters.

Hon. members will see that this motion is drafted in such a way that it will no longer be operative if these resolutions and the legislation based thereon are disposed of before present legislation expires; the effect of the motion will disappear and we shall return to the standing orders. Under these conditions I trust that it will be the feeling of all members of the house that this order should be made.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to oppose the resolution. In indicating support of this proposal to increase the time available for discussion of the subject matters referred to, I think it should be clearly understood that there is a way in which any possibility of delay could have been avoided from the outset, and can be avoided now.

The Prime Minister has said that whether or not one favours these measures, they are regarded by the members as matters of some importance. The main point at issue is not the measure that is contemplated, but the way it is done. The main point at issue is whether we are to act as a parliament and deal with legislation by bills properly presented, or whether we are to carry forward these dictatorial orders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would request that the leader of the opposition make his remarks relevant to the motion.

Mr. Drew: I cannot imagine anything more relevant to the motion than the question how the government can easily save time, which is the main consideration in this motion. The government can save time by dealing with this matter in the proper parliamentary way instead of pretending that there is still a war on in Canada, or a war emergency. The members of this party have indicated clearly an expeditious procedure for dealing with this matter, and the arguments that have been put forward are directed to dealing with these matters in an orderly way. I take the opportunity on this motion to emphasize once again the fact that if this government really believe in each of these measures being dealt with in the proper way, they should introduce bills indicating the ground upon which they ask for extension in each case; they should not attempt to make a blanket provision, based entirely on the existence of a general emergency, which, if it is supported by this house, practically means the suspension of our constitution.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): We intend to support this resolution, Mr. Speaker, because we believe, whether the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is right or wrong, these matters are of such great importance that they must be dealt with before the date of expiry of the acts referred to.

An hon. Member: Right or wrong.

Mr. Coldwell: Not right or wrong—this parliament can safeguard the interests of the Canadian people. After all, it is not my friends in the official opposition who are to determine whether something is right or wrong; it is the majority in this house.

My criticism of what the government has done is on an entirely different basis. Parliament should have been called earlier. We should have had more time in which to deal with the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, and the measures here referred to—and they are important. The measure with respect to control that we have been discussing for the past few days is of paramount importance to many people in Canada, particularly those who are affected by the control of rent. The prolonged opposition to a suggestion of this kind does not, in my opinion, reflect much credit upon the House of Commons.

I wish therefore to say that we are supporting this motion, but we are criticizing the government on the ground that parliament should have been called earlier in order that we might have had more time in which to deal with these important measures.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a short reply to this further lesson on propriety of procedure in this house which the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party has been dinning into our ears ever since the beginning of the session.

I would remind the followers of the new leader of their attitude only two years ago when they were pounding their desks just as vigorously in applause of the remarks of one who was suggesting that in dealing with this kind of legislation we should follow the procedure which was followed in the British House of Commons. That we did last year by bringing in a bill with a schedule of orders attached to it. Then hon. members opposite complained because there were fifty-seven orders and there were not to be fifty-seven times five opportunities for obstructive filibustering debate.

This year, as last year, though it was not necessarily the best one, we followed the procedure that was recommended by hon. members on the other side because we hoped that by that means the merits of matters would be considered and we would have done with this waste of time in futile discussions about procedure. I have attended meetings of other deliberative bodies and have seen just the same tactics adopted and the same waste of time by those who were obstructing consideration of the real merits of issues. I do not need to tell this house from what quarter those tactics came. Here in this house we took ten days on the proposal for the union of Newfoundland with Canada. Hon. gentlemen on the other side asserted in the most formal terms that there was nothing they desired more than the union of Newfoundland with Canada, but they said that the procedure was wrong. This parliament, about the respect of whose privileges and authority they have been clamouring ever since we came back here on January 26, was not competent to deal with the problem. It could not be dealt with, according to my hon. friends opposite, until this parliament had obtained Mr. Duplessis' permission. For three days now these hon. gentlemen have been asserting that they are not opposed to the continuation of rent control, and that they are not opposed to the continuation of steel control. But, they say, the procedure is not the one that should have been adopted; instead of twenty opportunities for filibustering debates, they argued, we should have given them four times twelve more opportunities for it. Their leader says now: If you want this legislation to pass, just put it in the way that I, in my omniscience, tell you is the proper way.

Mr. Fraser: A Gilbert and Sullivan opera.

Mr. St. Laurent: This parliament had known how to deal with legislation in a proper way for a long time—

Mr. Drew: Before you were Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent: —before the hon. member for Carleton came here, and I think it will know how to deal with legislation in a proper way for a long time after he ceases to come here.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Order. Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that the debate is closed.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No.

Mr. Speaker: The debate is closed.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Well, I was merely going to say—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Graydon: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker; it is well established in the rules—

Some hon. Members: A waste of time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: I understand the temperature on the other side is very high, and I shall make allowances for it.

An hon. Member: What about lowering it?

Mr. Speaker: I hope that hon. members on both sides of the house will co-operate with the Speaker. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Graydon: On a question of privilege.

Mr. Coté (Verdun): State it.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker will no doubt ask me in due course to do that. It has been a well-established practice in this house that when the Prime Minister, or anyone else who moves a motion, rises to reply and close the debate, the Speaker cautions the house that if he speaks the debate will be closed. For that reason I suggest that the hon. member for Calgary West, or any other hon. member, is in order in discussing the motion after the Prime Minister concludes.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Casselman: The noise is coming from the other side of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the hon. member for Peel that after the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party had spoken, no other member rose and I put the motion to the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes, he did.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I rose and put the question to the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Then the Prime Minister rose to answer. The hon. member knows perfectly well that when the Prime Minister rose to speak on the motion in reply to the leader of the opposition he was closing the debate. The debate is closed. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DAIRY INDUSTRY

FLOOR PRICE ON BUTTER 58 CENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government made any decision on a floor price for butter? If so, when will he be in a position to make a statement?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): During the last three or four days I have had telegrams from most of the dairy organizations across Canada suggesting that the floor price on butter be made fifty-eight cents for the next year, as had been done for this year. That matter was considered by the government today, and a decision arrived at to maintain the floor at fifty-eight cents for the coming year.

QUESTION AS TO BUTTER OFFERED TO DAIRY PRODUCTS BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Drope (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, having to do with butter. Has any butter been tendered to the dairy products board, now that it has reached the floor price? Further, what information is necessary to satisfy the board that the butter cannot be sold to the trade?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I do not know that I can answer the first part of the question by a direct yes or no. Inquiries have been made of the dairy products board as to whether they would be prepared to take delivery of carloads of butter from different points. But so far as I know none has been actually offered. Inquiries have been made as to the terms under which butter would be taken.

In reply to the second part of the question, as to what information is necessary: In view of the fact that the price has not been established at fifty-eight cents on the market—there may have been some No. 1 butter sold at fifty-eight cents, although I am not certain about it—there is so far no set-up, for the system under which it would be taken. But generally speaking the system will be that if no one else will pay fifty-eight cents for butter on the Canadian market, the government will take delivery of it.

REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY ON BUTTER FAT AND MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McKay (Weyburn): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, a copy of which I have sent him. In view of the serious drop in butter prices, and the chaotic state of the market, will the government give immediate consideration to the paying of a subsidy of five cents a pound for butter fat and two cents a quart for milk production, so as to assure the country of an adequate supply of both these commodities?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): As was indicated by my answer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley, the government did consider the question which has been raised by the proposal of the hon. member for Weyburn, and decided it on the grounds that were submitted to us by the dairy organizations across Canada, namely, that the proper way to deal with the matter was to have a floor price for the product.

CHEESE—REQUISITIONING TO FULFIL UNITED KINGDOM CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. Tustin (Prince Edward-Lennox): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. For several months the dairy products branch of the Department of Agriculture has been reporting a considerable decrease in the production of cheese over the corresponding period last year. Has any consideration been given to the requisitioning of cheese during the coming year in order to fulfil our contract with the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The production of cheese is on the increase at the present time as compared with last year. The position some weeks ago may have been different, but at the present time production is on the increase. I did announce earlier in the session that the government has no intention of requisitioning cheese this year.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SETTING UP OF CLAIMS COMMISSION—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE OF BOTH HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Has any decision yet been made with regard to the setting up of the claims commission, or the re-establishment of the joint committee on Indian affairs as recommended for this session of parliament?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): The answer to the first question is that no decision has yet been arrived at. I have nothing to add to the answer I gave two or three days ago to a question similar to the hon. member's second question. At the present time the bill is before the Department of Justice. When it comes back I purpose recommending to my colleagues that the committee be re-established and the bill referred to it.

VEGETABLE OILS

QUANTITY IN CANADA OR LIKELY TO BE IMPORTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Desmond (Kent, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say what is the quantity of foreign vegetable oil in Canada at the moment, or the amount about to be imported?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am afraid I cannot do that; I have no knowledge of the minds of the importers. I do not know what they intend to do.

EMIGRATION

CANADIAN CITIZENS MOVING TO THE UNITED STATES SINCE JANUARY 1, 1947

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources, of which I have given him notice. It arises out of a question I asked on February 24 last as to the number of Canadians by birth or naturalization who had left Canada to make their homes in the United States, month by month, since January 1, 1947. According to the answer, that information was not available and could be secured only from the United States authorities. I now ask the minister whether he is in a position to give an answer to the question, since he has secured the information from the United States.

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. member gave me notice of his question. During the year 1947 some 23,467 persons went to the United States, and in 1948, 24,788.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS OF NATIONAL COUNCIL OF STUDENT VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. Kidd (Kingston City): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It has reference to the veterans who are at present attending university and the request submitted by the national council of student veterans. When can the veterans who are at present attending university expect an announcement regarding their application for assistance?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): With several of my colleagues I had the pleasure last Saturday of meeting the delegation of the national council of student veterans. At that time I undertook to write to them at an early day with regard to the representations made. When consideration of the matter has been completed, I shall be glad to comment on this question.

CORPS OF CANADIAN FIRE FIGHTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Williams (Ontario): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The other day he promised to make a statement about student veterans. When he makes that statement will he at the same time make one with regard to the corps of Canadian fire fighters, who hope that they will get some benefit as well?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall look into the question, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PACIFIC PAY—HONG KONG—QUESTION OF EXTENSION TO OTHER CANADIAN UNITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Will the provisions respecting the extension of Pacific pay now be made available to the other Canadian units who served in the Pacific?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): No. That has been given consideration, and a definite decision has been made against it. There is no entitlement whatever.

UNITED KINGDOM

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR LOAN OR EXTENSION OF CREDIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frederic Dorion (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it true that Sir Norman Brook is here in Ottawa for the purpose of requesting from the government the granting of another loan to Great Britain, or an extension to the credit already granted to that country?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The answer is no.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

QUESTION AS TO ADJOURNMENT AT SIX O'CLOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Will the house meet this evening? This is St. Patrick's day.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Present indications are that the house will meet tonight. The statement I made yesterday was that if we made sufficient progress to entitle us to feel that it was not necessary to work this evening, consideration could be given to adjournment. But I do not think that progress has been made.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, rising to a question of privilege, I am sure we are grateful to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew)—

An hon. Member: For what?

Mr. McIvor: —for allowing the house to see the superiority of the Irish blood in the Prime Minister, especially on St. Patrick's day.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC SERVICE—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES, SALARIES, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Douglas G. Ross (St. Paul's): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. When may I expect the return for which an order was passed on February 9, over a month ago?

Hon. Colin Gibson (Secretary of State): I shall look into the matter. I did make inquiries before, and I understand that answers have been received from some departments but not from all.

VETERANS LAND ACT—ALBERTA—BOWNESS PROJECT NEAR CALGARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Some time ago I asked a question and it was made an order for return. He was good enough to assure me that he would endeavour to get the return. The inclement weather and the sanitary conditions are difficult, and I am being pressed for an answer. Will the minister do the best he can?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall bring down that return as soon as possible. Some of the material for it had to be secured from the west. However, as soon as it is obtained the return will be tabled.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—APPRAISAL OF PROPERTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. How many properties in the area appropriated for the site of the new dominion building at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, have been appraised and paid for?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to place his question on the order paper.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTION OF USE OF PUBLIC ADDRESS SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask a question of the appropriate minister. Has any attention been paid to the question of having in this chamber some system of amplification of the voice by means of loud speakers? If it can be done in British Columbia, surely it can be done in this capital city.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REQUEST FOR CALLING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. When may we expect the public accounts committee to be called?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The public accounts committee, Mr. Speaker, has been set up. Any member can require this committee to be called for the purpose of organization. I think the date of its first meeting should be a matter arranged among the whips.

Mr. Drew: The chairman has not yet been named, and until that is done the members cannot call the committee. We want it called as soon as possible.

Mr. St. Laurent: The standing orders in that regard are the same as they have been for a great many years. Heretofore it has been found possible to have the committees organized without there being any intervention from the Prime Minister. The whips get together and arrange for the meeting.

Mr. Casselman: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas says no. I do not know how it was arranged in past years, because I never took any part in bringing them together. But my understanding was that the whips arranged the membership of the committees and then they arranged to have a notice published calling the meeting. The leader of the opposition says there is no chairman; but there cannot be a chairman until there is a meeting. There have been meetings in the past for the purpose of appointing chairmen.

Mr. Casselman: I say to the Prime Minister it is the duty of the government to call the meeting for organization of the committees.

Mr. St. Laurent: In my view as to the duties of the government I differ from my hon. friend. These are committees of the house, not committees of the government.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): As one of the members of the public accounts committee and one who wishes to see it called together, may I say to the Prime Minister that it has been the practice in the past for the leader of the house to arrange for the organization meetings of all standing committees.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have no doubt the hon. member may have that impression, but that has not been the practice.

Mr. Fleming: May I say to the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must not engage in debate. If he wishes to ask a question, he must put it briefly.

Mr. Fleming: Then if I must put a question, I shall put it in this way: Is not the Prime Minister aware that at every previous session of this parliament the organization meetings of all committees of the house were called by the Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows very well that the purpose of a question is not to give information to the house but to obtain information from the ministry.

Mr. Fleming: I am not giving the house information. I am giving information to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Graydon: The government should quit stalling.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT

CONTINUANCE IN FORCE UNTIL SIXTY DAYS AFTER OPENING OF FIRST SESSION OF PARLIAMENT IN 1951

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the continuance in force of the Foreign Exchange Control Act until sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year 1951.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which this resolution seeks leave to introduce is a bill which provides merely for the extension of the Foreign Exchange Control Act, adopted by this house in 1946, for a further two-year period. No doubt the house will recall that, when the original measure was introduced in and passed by this house, it contained no limitation as to time. In another place, however, an amendment was offered, and was accepted by the government, providing that the act would lapse sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament in the year 1949. That amendment was agreed to by the house, and the termination provision is incorporated in section 73 of the present act.

The effect of this new bill, when it is enacted, will be to postpone the termination date for a period expiring sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament in the year 1951; in other words, an effective extension of some two years. Otherwise the provisions of the present Foreign Exchange Control Act are to be left unchanged. The normal British constitutional procedure, under which acts of parliament remain in force until they are repealed by parliament, has a good deal to recommend it; but in view of the legislative history which I have outlined, the government felt the same practice should be followed here, and that a measure should be introduced extending the provisions of the act for a further period. The idea behind the time limit was, of course, to ensure that the measure would come up for review after a specified interval, and parliament would have the opportunity of determining at that time whether the legislation should be continued as being necessary and desirable.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has indicated, we have nearly reached the end of the time when the existing measure will expire, and parliament must now review the situation and determine whether or not the provisions of the present act should be extended, whether or not it is desirable and necessary to continue this act. Speaking for the government, I may say that I have no hesitation in stating that, in view of prevailing conditions in the field of trade and commerce, and currency conditions throughout the world, we would not feel justified in suggesting to parliament that it is no longer necessary to exercise control over Canada's foreign exchange transactions.

When this measure was originally introduced it was recognized, of course, that the world outlook was very uncertain, and that Canada was in a very exposed position. It was recognized that we were particularly vulnerable to the impact of conditions originating abroad both because of the great importance of our foreign trade, and on account of our normal dependence on exports to the United Kingdom and certain other European countries, whose economies had been pretty seriously weakened by the war, to pay for a very large proportion of our imports from the United States. The second factor exposing us to influences abroad was, and continues to be, our very large international indebtedness, particularly to the United States. Those were the main conditions which led the government to seek power to continue under legislative authority the operation of the exchange control which had originally been enforced at the very outbreak of the war.

The experience of the past two years has, I think, served to confirm and reinforce the views which were then held, and adopted by this house, regarding the necessity of a measure of this kind. If anything, I think it is fair to say that we under-estimated the international economic difficulties of the post-war period, and the length of time and the degree of effort that would be required to overcome the distortions of war, and get the world back on its feet. The international flow of goods between the western hemisphere and Europe has been maintained, as the house is only too well aware, largely by extraordinary measures, such as credits extended by the United States and ourselves, and is now dependent to a very important extent on grants and loans from the United States government under ECA. The impact on Canada of these payment difficulties experienced by our customers was, as I have indicated, recognized in the debate which took place on this measure about two and a half years ago, but I think it has been realized much more clearly in the time which has since elapsed.

I do not suppose that the members of the house need to be reminded of the sharp decline which took place in our exchange reserves in 1947, or of the measures which the government found it necessary to take at that time to restore the situation. In the course of 1947 our official reserves of gold and United States dollars diminished from $1,250 million to approximately $500 million in the middle of November, and to a low of $461 million by the middle of December, 1947. A combination of two factors was mainly responsible for that fall in our reserves. The first, of course, was the unexpectedly slow rate of European recovery which led to a very much more rapid utilization of the Canadian loan to the United Kingdom than had originally been anticipated, and secondly, the very high level of prosperity and capital development in Canada which led to an unprecedented flow of imports from the United States, and the virtual elimination of the surplus in our current account balance of payments.

I am sure that members on all sides of the house will have noted with satisfaction the great improvement which has taken place in our exchange position in the year which has just passed, 1948. As the facts regarding the record of our exchange transactions during the year have recently been made public in the annual report of the foreign exchange control board, which was tabled a few days ago, I think that in my remarks today I only need to refer to a few of the highlights.

Our official gold and United States dollar reserves rose from $502 million at the beginning of the year to $998 million at the end of the year. In this improvement of $496 million the sum of $150 million was not earned, but represents the proceeds of a loan on a bond issue which we sold to three American insurance companies last summer.

I am not going to suggest for a moment, of course, that all the credit for this improvement in our exchange position is due to government policies, but I do assert that those policies, both negative and positive, which were adopted to deal with our exchange difficulties, have been highly successful, and that the major part of the improvement which has taken place has been due to the adoption of those policies.

I referred a moment ago to negative and positive policies. The negative policies, of course, as the house appreciates, have been the import controls and the travel restrictions, which have resulted in a substantial curtailment of purchases in the United States, and of travel in that country. I think even more emphasis should be placed on the positive measures, including encouragement of exports to the United States under the direction of my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the development of Canadian tourist income with the valuable assistance of the Canadian co-operation project of the American moving picture industry, and the assistance to the gold mining industry. On the trade side, members of the house will be aware that we managed to reduce our merchandise trade deficit with the United States from $918 million in 1947 to only $284 million in 1948.

That, I think, was a truly remarkable achievement; and it is particularly gratifying to note that of this improvement of some $634 million as much as $465 million was due to increased exports to the United States and only $169 million to reduction of imports from that country. Percentagewise the increase in our exports to the United States was no less than 44 per cent; and notwithstanding the increasingly severe restrictions imposed against certain of our exports by a good many other foreign countries, the total value of our exports to all countries was higher in 1948 than in 1947, to be exact $3,110 million in 1948 as compared with $2,812 million in 1947, or an over-all increase of nearly 11 per cent. In this respect I may say our experience differed from that of the United States. The exports of that country to the world as a whole fell from over $15·3 billion in 1947 to about $12·6 billion in 1948, a decrease of nearly 18 per cent.

As I have said, our reserves of gold and United States dollars at the end of 1948 amounted to approximately $1 billion. That sounds like a pretty large figure, but in relation to our needs it is less than we had before the outbreak of war. At that time, that is to say in 1939, Canada had gold and United States dollar reserves amounting to approximately $400 million. In comparing the present figure of approximately $1 billion one must also bear in mind the very great increase that has taken place since that time in commodity prices, and also the very considerable increase which has occurred in the physical volume of our international trade and all other transactions against which reserves of this kind are held. One method of conveying these factors would be this. In 1939 our reserves were $400 million and our total imports $750 million; in other words we held reserves sufficient to pay for over six months' imports. We now hold reserves of approximately $1 billion and are importing at the rate of about $2,600 million, so as a consequence our reserves are sufficient to pay for somewhat less than five months' imports.

But perhaps the chief characteristic of the present situation as it affects our exchange arrangements is the uncertainty which surrounds the international trade outlook. Hon. members are well aware, of course, of our continued dependence upon United Kingdom and other western European markets to take some of our main export products and to provide us with exchange with which we can satisfy and pay for our imports from the United States. Notwithstanding the shift in imports to the United States I indicated a moment ago, which took place last year, the group of countries consisting of the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area and other countries participating in the European recovery program took 42 per cent of our exports in 1948.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister would permit a question, how much of that was made up of money derived directly or indirectly from the United States?

Mr. Abbott: I could not give that offhand, but speaking from memory I think during 1948 payments made from ERP funds for exports to western European countries were probably somewhere between three and four hundred million dollars. I want to reserve the right to check that figure, but I think it is approximately correct. We have no indication, of course, as to the exact amount which may be used by any particular European country out of ERP funds, because we have no control over the application of the funds they may receive from ECA.

Mr. Jackman: Would the minister have the figures for 1947?

Mr. Abbott: In 1947 there was no assistance from ECA funds, of course. The assistance was largely out of our own credits, the exact figure as to which I cannot give the hon. member. But speaking from memory again I think it was somewhere between four and five hundred million dollars in that year.

Mr. Cockeram: Will the minister be able to get those figures for us?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I will be able to get them; and I might suggest to my hon. friend that when we are in committee on the resolution I will be in a position to answer questions on details of that kind. At the moment I am endeavouring to give as briefly as possible a survey of our foreign exchange position and the factors which enter into the consideration of whether a measure of this kind is necessary.

As I indicated a few moments ago, special and temporary sources of finance are necessary in order to enable the United Kingdom and other ERP countries to pay for their imports from the western hemisphere; and even with these special sources of finance the countries concerned are in fact cutting their purchases from Canada in an effort to make ends meet. While some of our chief trading partners are as far from complete recovery and balance as they are, the continued exercise of supervision and control over foreign exchange expenditure remains in my judgment and in the judgment of the government an imperative necessity. Under those circumstances, having regard to our international position and our international commitments, the government believes that it would be failing in its responsibility to the Canadian public if it did not recommend a prolongation of the Foreign Exchange Control Act for another two-year period.

If there were any satisfactory alternative, Mr. Speaker, that would be another matter. I gather from newspaper reports that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and a number of his supporters believe that manipulation of the exchange rate, that is to say depreciation of the Canadian dollar, might provide what would be for them a satisfactory solution; and I have no doubt that he and those who advocate that course will develop their views on that matter as this debate continues. For that reason amongst others I want now to deal with this very important question of exchange rate policy.

As the house will probably recall, section 18 (1) of the Foreign Exchange Control Act empowers the governor in council to prescribe the rates of exchange between the Canadian dollar and any foreign currency. The Bretton Woods Agreements Act of 1945, which was adopted by this house, also authorizes the governor in council to take all such measures as may be deemed necessary to establish the par value of the Canadian dollar for the purpose and in accordance with the terms of the agreement for the international monetary fund. Shortly before that fund began active exchange operations, members of the fund were called upon to communicate the par value of their currencies to the fund. Under the authority I have mentioned, an order in council was passed on March 11, 1947, fixing the par value of the Canadian dollar as equal to one United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on July 1, 1944, that is to say 15 5/21 grains of gold 9/10ths fine; and this par value was communicated to the fund.

During the war years, before the Foreign Exchange Control Act was enacted in 1946, decisions in regard to matters of this kind were based on the foreign exchange control order which was passed under the authority of the War Measures Act. Consequently on September 15, 1939, the then Minister of Finance, acting on the responsibility of the government, directed that the rates of exchange which the board should maintain were to be $1 U.S. equal to $1.10 Canadian; £1 sterling equal to $4.45 Canadian. On July 5, 1946, the government decided these rates should be changed, and as a result of that decision the then Minister of Finance informed the board that the new rates were to be $1 U.S. equal to $1 Canadian and £1 sterling equal to $4.02 Canadian, which is the present rate.

I mention these details, Mr. Speaker, because I want to make it clear that the power to fix and alter exchange rates has been exercised by the government rather than by the foreign exchange control board or the Bank of Canada or any agency other than the government itself. I say that because sometimes one hears or reads statements to the effect that the foreign exchange control board, a purely administrative body acting as agent for the Minister of Finance, arbitrarily changed the exchange rate in 1946. Now, that is not true. The government is solely responsible for the decisions to change and maintain the rates of exchange, and we claim sole credit for the beneficial results which the Canadian people have experienced from the change in the exchange rates made in July, 1946.

Mr. Speaker, that change in exchange rates is now being criticized by a good many of my hon. friends on the opposite side of the chamber. It is held up by some as a prime example of what is described as economic lunacy. The air is thick with all kinds of dire forebodings of the grim consequences which will befall as a result of it, if they have not already happened, by the obstinate decision of the government to stick to this decision which was made in July, 1946. I have not a doubt in the world but what some of my hon. friends opposite will have something to say along these lines. I hope they will take advantage of this debate to inform the house and the country of their views on this very important question.

In that connection, I want first to remind the house that when the exchange rate was changed in July, 1946, that move was hailed with satisfaction by virtually every section of the country without regard to party affiliation. Even the newspapers which have since been most critical of the government's action in that regard joined in the chorus of approval. The house might be interested if I were to read an extract from an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of July 8, 1946. It was headed, "A one hundred cent dollar," and this is what the editorial writer of that journal said on that date, two days after the action to which I have referred:

> It is our opinion that had there been a free play of exchange, our dollar would have returned to parity with the United States dollar long ago. It was designedly kept at ninety cents for several reasons, not least among them the protection of our future competitive trading position. It is, therefore, somewhat silly for some quarters to attempt to make political capital of the government's action as a "masterstroke" of economic strategy.

Mr. Jackman: Ha, ha.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend from Rosedale laughs.

> The return to parity must be read as an accurate indication of the impact of United States conditions on our economic structure. The change was forced on us by the inflationary trend within the United States.

Mr. Speaker, that is fairly characteristic of the editorial comment which appeared in the press of Canada at that time.

I have some diffidence in quoting anything that may have been said by the leader of the opposition, who, I understand, is now very critical of the action the government took at that time, because I am quite sure one could quote something in the opposite sense. I should like to point out that on this point, too, his consistent record of inconsistency remains unbroken. I am sure my hon. friend will not mind if I refer at this time to a subject which I know is very close to his heart, namely, the dominion-provincial conference of 1945. If hon. members will take the trouble to look up page 33 of the printed booklet entitled, Dominion-Provincial Conference (1945), Submissions by the Government of the Province of Ontario, which was issued in January, 1946, they will find the following:

An hon. Member: What are you trying to do, spike his guns?

Mr. Abbott: No, I would not try to do that. The following is the quotation to which I referred in this booklet issued by the province of Ontario:

> The foreign exchange control board of Canada was created by an order of the Minister of Finance on September 15, 1939, authorized under the provisions of the War Measures Act. The board has power to fix the rates at which foreign exchange, in such currencies as the board may designate, can be purchased or sold. The buying rate of eleven per cent and the selling rate of ten per cent established on United States currency on September 16, 1939, have remained constant during the war.
> In these circumstances, it is urged that the dominion government make available to provincial and municipal governments the foreign exchange required to meet their external obligations at parity of exchange. To obtain this agreement, the provinces and municipalities should accept a ruling whereby future provincial and municipal borrowing would be restricted to Canadian currency.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that that in no way suggests the course that was followed, but merely points out the situation that obtained so far as the municipalities were concerned.

Mr. Abbott: I have no doubt that my hon. friend will avail himself of every opportunity of making a speech—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order. I must request that when the hon. leader of the opposition rises to address a question to anyone who has the floor, he address the Chair.

Mr. Drew: I opened my remarks with the term, "Mr. Speaker."

Mr. Abbott: As I was saying, I do not think my friend was asking a question; he was making another speech.

Mr. Drew: I was correcting you.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend will listen, he will hear a little more about his position back in 1946. The then premier of Ontario, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), as I have indicated, urged the dominion government to make available to provincial and municipal bodies at parity the necessary foreign exchange to meet their borrowings. This proposal was repeated at the plenary session of the conference on April 29, 1946, only seven weeks before the restoration to parity. This proposal will be found in the proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference of that date. I have not searched the record exhaustively, but I think I am right in saying that the premier of Ontario was alone in putting forward that proposal.

The leader of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, has at great length made it clear that all his actions at the dominion-provincial conference were based upon considerations of high principle and not merely upon a desire to get more money for his own province. The claim which he put forward for parity of exchange to which I have just referred must, of course, be based on some principle. I wonder what that principle might be? Could it possibly be that the principle which the premier of Ontario had in mind on the 29th of April, 1946, was that parity with the United States dollar was the proper exchange rate for the Canadian dollar? Offhand, I cannot think of any other logical principle, unless he was trying to secure a special privilege for his own province. I therefore find it difficult to understand, and I shall be interested in his explanation, why at the same time he would believe that the decision of the government of Canada which was made on July 5, 1946, was based on what he euphemistically described as economic lunacy.

Mr. Jackman: Not even interested.

Mr. Abbott: I gather from the press accounts of some of the recent statements made by the leader of the opposition that it is his policy and the policy of his party to restore the quotation of the Canadian dollar to what he describes as a realistic level. In fact, there is a plank in the platform of his party to that effect. It seems that is what my hon. friend had in mind when he told the press on February 24 that was what he proposed to do, if and when he got the chance.

"Realistic" is one of those nice words which have a pleasant sound and a very favourable emotional appeal. It can be used very conveniently to conceal a lack of concrete thought or any definite views as to just what should be done. I am sure my hon. friend had no intention of doing that. The leader of the opposition and those who sit around him will, I hope, during the course of this debate give a full exposition of the reasons which led them to the conclusion that the present exchange rate is not realistic. I shall listen to those reasons with a great deal of interest. I am sure they will not confine their exposition to a mere assertion, but will let the house have an explanation of the criteria which they believe should be applied in order to achieve the realistic rate.

Sometimes it looks and sounds as though the only thing some of them have in mind when they talk about a "realistic" exchange rate is one which will result in a substantially higher price for gold in Canada. Let me say this at once. We all appreciate that the government's decision to raise the exchange value of the Canadian dollar by ten per cent in July, 1946, had the effect of reducing the price of gold in Canada from $38.50 to $35 an ounce; and it is true that that reduction in price came at a very difficult time for the gold-mining industry, which was faced with rising costs and reduced profit margins. But I want to say this. So far as this government is concerned, the main economic policies of the country—those policies like the exchange rate policy which affect the well-being and the standard of living of the people of Canada—are not going to be determined to suit the convenience of any single economic interest, whether that interest is the gold-mining industry, the stock promoters, the wheat farmers, the manufacturers or any other single group. The main economic policies of this government are going to be determined in the light of the interests of the community as a whole, and not those of any single group.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, let me say this. The gold mining industry has, naturally, just as much claim to consideration as has any other group in this country; and the government and this house have recognized that claim in tangible form. The gold-mining industry, as everybody knows, tends to have a normal cycle of prosperity which is exactly opposite to that of most industries. When business conditions are active and there is an upward pressure on prices, costs go up while the price of their product, gold, does not do so. On the other hand, it frequently happens that, when other businesses are depressed, the costs of gold production go down, and since the price remains the same the margin of profit is of necessity increased. All of that is of course the logic of a monetary system which is based on gold. However, it is cold comfort to the gold-mining industry, at a time when other industries are very profitable and it is not, to think back to the days when the situation was reversed. Consequently last year the government recommended and this parliament approved a measure under which each gold mine is compensated for part of the increase in its costs of production above a certain level. Thanks to these bonus payments and to some improvement in the labour supply, I am glad to be able to report a very considerable improvement in the industry last year and an increase in total production of something like fifteen per cent.

I feel sure that hon. members generally will share our gratification over this improvement in an industry which has been going through an extremely difficult period, which means so much to the prosperity and to the development of the great northern areas of this country, which has made such an important contribution to our national strength in the past, and which will, in my judgment, continue to do so in the future.

I have had estimates made, and I am informed that these special assistance payments to the gold-mining industry will amount to about $10,250,000 in respect of production during 1948, the first year of operations under the program. It is perhaps interesting to note that this works out at approximately $3.26 per ounce on each ounce of gold produced from the straight gold mines; that is to say, excluding any produced as a by-product of base metal mines, which is not eligible for assistance under the plan. In other words, our gold-mining industry proper, taken as a whole, is now receiving, from gold production, revenues which work out at about $38.26 per ounce, or very close indeed to the same price they received before the change in the exchange rate. Of course the marginal mines, the higher-cost mines, are receiving a substantially higher price.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister any figures on that?

Mr. Abbott: I have not a breakdown here, but in due course they will be available for the different sections of the industry.

Mr. Knowles: That would mean that the average would be higher than $38.26.

Mr. Abbott: No, that is not right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. Abbott: The point I have been making is that the marginal mines and the new producers are getting what the measure was intended to give them, namely, a greater measure of assistance; and that the older, well-established, low-cost mines did not get as high a proportion. I believe it is fair to say that more marginal mines have been kept going, more northern communities have been sustained, and the gold-mining industry as a whole is better off under the present arrangements than they would be with the Canadian exchange rate at a level which would have resulted in a price of $38.50 per ounce for everybody, which might have been the case, without these bonus payments. I think that these truths are being recognized by an increasing number of persons in the industry and in the communities which are dependent upon it.

I think perhaps I have said enough, for the present at any rate, to deal with this particular approach to a "realistic" exchange rate. But maybe that is not what my hon. friends have in mind. If not, I have no doubt that they will tell us what, if anything, they do have in mind, so that the house and the country are not obliged to guess. I wonder if they have in mind that the exchange rate should be one which would enable us to compete in foreign markets and avoid running a deficit in our current account balance of payments? That would be a perfectly legitimate and logical basis on which to found a realistic exchange rate. May I say this. The last thing the government wants to do is to take a rigid attitude towards exchange rate questions, and considerations of the type I have just mentioned are worthy of the closest attention. But that cannot be what my hon. friends mean—not, at any rate, if they really consider the present rate of exchange unrealistic. For what is the present position? The present position is of course that at the prevailing rate of exchange the competitive capacity of this country makes the Canadian dollar one of the strongest currencies in the world, and no amount of calamity howling can possibly change that position.

In 1948, as I have indicated, we sold abroad $3,110 million worth of goods, 10·6 per cent more than in 1947 and 33 per cent more than in 1946. In that year we increased our exports to the most competitive market in the world, the United States, by over 44 per cent and to a total of over a billion and a half dollars. Does anyone really believe that we could have achieved these remarkable results with an exchange rate which was over-valued and unrealistic?

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Abbott: Gladly.

Mr. Blackmore: Was the minister referring to the year 1946-47?

Mr. Abbott: I am referring to 1948. I have no doubt that some of my hon. friends will want to remind us that Canada got into exchange difficulties in 1947, and that it was necessary for the government and parliament to take certain action, including import and travel restrictions to which I have referred, in order to improve our position. This is true, of course. But let me remind the house that even in 1947 we did not have a deficit in our over-all balance of payments on current account. On the contrary, we had a surplus—excluding exports of goods financed by official relief contributions—amounting to $50 million. Our exchange difficulties arose, as I have indicated on other occasions, because some of our principal customers were not able to pay us in cash for all our exports, and in what I contend was a self-interested effort to aid their recovery we extended large amounts of credit to them. In 1948 we achieved an over-all balance of payments—excluding relief shipments—in excess of $450 million, an improvement of over $400 million, a record figure for a peacetime year. That compares with $50 million in 1947 and $350 million in 1946. It is true that some of this surplus was achieved as a result of import and travel restrictions to which I have referred and which the government is pledged to remove as soon as possible. But even without these restrictions we would undoubtedly have had a very substantial over-all current account surplus. Some relaxations have been made in these restrictions, but the restrictions have been maintained to the extent that they have for the same reason that the drawings on the foreign credits, which were extended, have been limited because it has been necessary to build up our exchange reserves to levels which will give us greater independence of action in the uncertain days which lie ahead of us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the light of our export position and our over-all balance of payments position, are my hon. friends really prepared to maintain that the present official quotation of the Canadian dollar is not realistic? These factors would seem to me to lead to the conclusion, if anything, that the present exchange rate of our currency is too low, and that the Canadian dollar should be appreciated. I know that some of my hon. friends opposite will say that the favourable results we achieved in our trading position in 1948 were partly due to the special grants and loans given to some of our European customers by the United States government under the European recovery plan, and that had it not been for these grants to Europe the picture might have been quite different so far as our exports are concerned. Let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion the action taken by the United States government in initiating the European recovery program last April represents one of the most statesmanlike and farsighted actions of national policy that the world has ever seen. I think it is fair to say that the future history of the civilized world, which includes Canadian history, might well have been quite different if our great and strong neighbour had not decided to lend this further and magnificent assistance to the recovery of the western world.

The exact impact of that assistance on Canada in 1948 is not directly ascertainable, as one can only guess what would have happened to our exports in the absence of this special financing of Europe by the ECA. However, for purposes of the question which I am discussing, let us take it for granted that the availability of ECA funds was an important factor in enabling western European countries to maintain their purchases in Canada in 1948. I accept it. Well, what inferences can and should one draw from that assumption? Should the house draw the inference that the Canadian dollar is not quoted at a realistic level? Well, such an inference, it seems to me, would surely be unwarranted. After all, there is nothing in the ECA legislation which forces recipients of this financial assistance to spend their money in Canada. They spend money in Canada because they get good value for their money here, which means that at the prevailing rate of exchange for the Canadian dollar they get at least as much for their money in Canada as they do anywhere else. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we are able to compete in world markets. And if there is any better definition than that of a realistic rate of exchange I hope that before this debate is over one of my hon. friends opposite will give me that definition.

Perhaps the inference some of my hon. friends want the house to draw from the fact that our European customers are financing part of their purchases in Canada with ECA funds is that world trade rests on unstable and uncertain foundations. If that is their inference I heartily agree with them, but I cannot agree with them if they draw from that the conclusion that we should devalue the Canadian dollar. I ask them in what way they think that it is going to restore balance to the dollar account of the United Kingdom and other war-damaged countries, and help them to maintain their purchases in Canada by taking such action. These countries are in need of special dollar assistance for the obvious reason that they are not able to obtain enough dollars through exports of goods and services to meet their dollar requirements. Notwithstanding the special financial assistance given to them through ECA, they have cut down on their imports from dollar countries in an attempt to balance their account. Canadian exports have of course been affected by these restrictions, and the government is greatly concerned with the problem and is seeking, in conjunction with other countries, for an alleviation of the situation; but the Canadian exporters who are affected by this situation will, I know, agree with me when I say that their difficulties do not arise because their prices are too high —a situation which might be corrected of course by a change in the exchange rate— but because the foreign countries simply will not make dollars available for certain goods; and the lowering of the Canadian exchange rate could do nothing to correct that situation. On the contrary it would aggravate it.

The trouble of course lies, as I have said, in the inability in present circumstances of the United Kingdom and certain other overseas countries to earn enough dollars to pay for the goods we would like to ship to them and they would like to have from us. A depreciation of the Canadian dollar would make it more difficult for them to earn dollars here to spend on our exports, and a moment's reflection will show the accuracy of that statement. One would think that it would be pretty obvious, but it does not seem as clear as it should be to some people.

I was struck by the statement made by the leader of the opposition at a press conference a week or so ago when he was quoted as saying that the Canadian dollar should be devalued to a realistic level. Then he went on to say this, according to the newspaper quotation:

> . . . primarily today on the necessity of increasing British imports to this country as a means of maintaining our overseas trade.

That is a most desirable thing to do, but the action which my hon. friend appeared to be advocating would have exactly the opposite effect, and I hope that when he speaks he will explain to the house and to the country just how the depreciation of the Canadian dollar by say 10 per cent would help the export of British goods to Canada. It would have this effect: a British manufactured article which costs now $100 would then cost $110. Does he suggest that that increase in terms of Canadian dollars would help the United Kingdom to sell more in this market? One of the main reasons why they are unable to sell as much as they wish to is that their costs are now too high, and they find it difficult to compete with domestic prices. Of course it is true that devaluation or depreciation, which has been suggested, would result in the price of United States imports increasing. But who, under present conditions, does the house think is in a better competitive position to cope with the increased Canadian dollar cost of imports that would result from the depreciation of our dollar—the British exporter who is already finding difficulty in competing here at the prevailing exchange rate, or the United States exporter?

I hope I have said enough to make it clear that depreciation of the Canadian dollar is, in the opinion of the Canadian government, no answer at all to the difficult world trade situation which is developing. It is no answer because it does not strike at the root of the trouble which is, I repeat, the difficulty experienced by the United Kingdom and other overseas countries in exporting enough goods to pay for their purchases in this country; and far from helping the situation the action some hon. members opposite appear to have in their mind would, as I have said before, aggravate it and worsen the lot of these exporters.

I think I have demonstrated conclusively that if you apply the normal tests of competitive capacity, that is ability to compete on the world market and ability to produce an equilibrium in our international payments, the present exchange rate is, to say the least, realistic. Some people may say: "Very well, but you are not saying anything about capital movements." I am going to deal with the question now. I will deal with it not because I really believe that our exchange rate on the dollar should be determined by considerations relating to capital movement, but because I want to analyse all that there may be in the case put forward by some of my hon. friends, and particularly the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram). The case they try to make, as I understand it, is that up to the time the government took the decision to appreciate the Canadian dollar in July, 1946, there was a considerable inflow of capital from the United States and that this inflow came abruptly to an end when parity of exchange with the United States dollar was established in July of that year. In other words, it is said that the American investors were willing to put their money in Canada only if they were able to buy the necessary dollars at a 10 per cent discount, but not if they had to pay par, presumably because they regarded par as an unrealistic rate. And that argument is further developed, that the cessation of capital inflow deprived Canadian industry of a much-needed source of venture capital which would help develop the economic resources of the country. No American capitalist, the argument runs, would be sufficiently misguided to put money into a country foolish enough to try to maintain an artificial exchange rate by means of a system of exchange control. I hope my hon. friends will agree that that is a fair statement of the argument that is made. If they do not, then I should be only too glad to quote from statements of those who are like-minded, made along similar lines, but in much less temperate language.

Now, let us look at the facts. One fact is that there has, in recent years, been a decline in net American purchases of outstanding Canadian securities. I emphasize the word "outstanding." This is the only fact that my hon. friends opposite appear to see. A second fact is that in 1944, 1945 and the first half of 1946—that is, before the change in exchange rate—the great bulk of Canadian securities purchased by American investors consisted of dominion, provincial and municipal government bonds. In the period mentioned, net sales to American investors of securities in these classifications amounted to $275 million or 72 per cent of the total. A third fact is that the decline which occurred in net American purchases of outstanding securities in recent years has been much more important in the case of government securities than in the case of industrial securities.

What is the significance of these three facts? Even if one assumes that the decline in American buying of outstanding securities was largely influenced by the change in the exchange rate rather than by the reduction which occurred in the public offerings of government of Canada securities, or by other causes, the main significance of the decline is that this indirect form of government borrowing in the United States came to an end.

Well, to take the words which my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) used yesterday—"So what?" Does anyone opposite actually think the government should offer its securities to American investors at cut rates, for 90-cent dollars? Is it not more advantageous if the government wishes to borrow in the United States, for it to borrow directly as we did when we put out the $150 million in the New York market, the fifteen-year issue of last summer at 3 per cent—and the terms, incidentally, which are much better for the government and for the people of Canada than those involved in the other indirect type of borrowing to which I have referred, terms which could not be bettered by any other country in the world.

It is quite likely that the restoration of the Canadian dollar to parity did cause certain American investors, who had bought Canadian-dollar security in the belief that the Canadian dollar was bound to go back to par, to reduce their purchases and in some cases liquidate their holdings and take profits. They had indeed made the speculative profit which they had anticipated.

What conclusions should one draw from this regarding the proper exchange rate policy for Canada? I put this question: Should we maintain a continuously undervalued exchange rate so that American investors who wish to take a position here will at all times expect that the value of the Canadian dollar is going to be increased? If you keep this up long enough the Canadian dollar will not have any value at all. It will disappear altogether.

I hardly think my hon. friends can be recommending that course. But it is precisely these anticipations regarding future changes in the exchange rate which seem to play an important part in determining the attitudes of some non-resident investors toward outstanding Canadian securities.

In this connection it should be noted that, during a large part of the time which has elapsed between January 1946 and the present time, American investors who wished to purchase Canadian domestic securities have been able to get the Canadian dollars through the unofficial market at about the same 10 per cent discount as prevailed before the exchange rate was changed.

I have stressed the fact that the bulk of the net American purchases of outstanding Canadian securities, when this type of capital inflow was at its height, consisted in the purchase of government securities, and that the great bulk of the decline in net American purchases which has occurred in recent years has been concentrated in that particular class of security.

From this fact we are invited to draw the conclusion that there has been no real increase in American investment in Canada in recent years. And that is simply not true. The real investment of American capital in Canadian industry has gone on increasing year by year. I am not referring now to the purchase of outstanding securities but to the bricks and mortar type of investment in which the non-resident investor brings skill and know-how and makes a direct contribution to the development of the economic resources of the country.

Hon. members will find some interesting figures in this connection in the report of the foreign exchange control board tabled only a few days ago, showing the fresh inflow of funds into Canada from the United States for direct investment by years since 1945. These figures are as follows:

1945	$17 million
1946	41 million
1948	68 million

The year of the change was 1946. It is clear from those figures that fresh risk capital has been flowing into Canada on a massive scale from the United States, not for purposes of speculation but to participate in the economic and industrial development of this country. And that is the kind of foreign investment we want.

Mr. Cockeram: Has the minister the figures showing where that risk capital is? Can he tell us that later on?

Foreign Exchange Control

Mr. Abbott: When we are discussing the report of the foreign exchange control board a breakdown could be given. I was about to say that the change in the exchange rate and the existence of exchange control have not prevented this inflow from increasing year by year. As I have said, we welcome this type of inflow, and we know that our American friends feel assured, from their experience of the past, that they will get fair treatment in Canada, or they would not be prepared to risk their capital in those amounts.

I hope that those who have had, and have conveyed to others, the impression that American capital was now shunning this country will find some comfort in the facts I have given, and will not repeat this type of statement.

Mr. Hackett: Has the minister available the total inflow of American capital in the period, let us say, from five years preceding the war?

Mr. Abbott: I have not those figures here, but I have no doubt they are available. I shall take note of the hon. member's point and see that they are made available to him. The great bulk of it, as I said a moment ago, was in the purchase of outstanding Canadian government securities, whether dominion, provincial or municipal. The great bulk of investment immediately prior to the war was in that type of security, and not so much in the industrial type of security.

Perhaps I have said enough now about the capital movements aspect of our international transactions to refute the notion that this reflects the maintenance of an unrealistic exchange rate. We do not need to offer the Canadian dollar at bargain-basement prices to attract desirable capital investment to this country. It is quite possible that we might be able to attract some speculative in-and-out investments by doing so, but I can assure you that this government is not going to base its exchange policy upon that type of Canadian investment.

There is one other reason, as invalid as the rest, which is sometimes given for considering the present exchange rate as unrealistic. That is the existence of this so-called unofficial market for Canadian dollars in New York in which the Canadian dollar is currently quoted at a discount of 6½ to 7 per cent. In the press conference to which I have already referred, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) apparently indicated that the unofficial market rate was the yardstick which in his judgment could be taken in determining where exchange should be pegged. From that, I gather he thinks that represents a realistic quotation of the Canadian dollar.

[Mr. Cockeram.]

I should like to look at that proposal for a moment. First, no resident of Canada ever has occasion to acquire foreign exchange through the unofficial market at the discount prevailing there. All the foreign exchange bought by Canadians is bought at official rates. Foreigners receiving payment in Canadian dollars from Canadians in payment of imports, in payment of current services of all types, in payment of interest and dividends, in payment of freights and the like, can convert these Canadian dollars into foreign exchange at the official rates of exchange. There are, however, a few types of payments to non-residents, representing capital items, which we are not prepared to convert into foreign exchange at the official rates. For example, an American holding a security maturing in Canada can, and does, receive the face value of that security payable in Canadian dollars, and he will come into Canadian dollars as a result of the maturity of that security which we are not prepared to provide exchange for out of our official reserves. The various types of payment of this kind and their magnitude are described in detail in the report of the foreign exchange control board. I shall not weary the house by reviewing them here, but non-residents who come into possession of Canadian dollars which they are not able to convert into United States dollars at the official rate may have some use for them in Canada; for instance, they may purchase another security here. If they have not, they are free to sell them to some other non-resident, to some other American, who may have some use for the dollars, at a price which is determined between them. It is transactions of that type which take place in the unofficial market.

Since the Canadian dollars acquired there are limited in the uses to which they can be put in Canada, being restricted, broadly speaking, to investment and tourist expenditures, the quotation need not be the same as the official rate. But to say that this narrow, restricted market, this market for a dollar which is only good for a few relatively unimportant purposes, gives a more realistic appraisal of the value of the Canadian dollar is, in my judgment, pure fantasy. I am prepared to leave it to the house and to the country to form their own judgment as to what constitutes the more representative and realistic rate, the rate at which Canadians were able in 1948 to obtain foreign exchange to pay for $2,600 million worth of imports, $275 million worth of freight and shipping charges, over $400 million worth of other current expenditures abroad, and at which non-resident investors were able to obtain foreign exchange in the amount of $325 million for income earned in Canada, a total of some $3,600 million, or the rate at which a few non-residents transferred to other non-residents some scores of millions of Canadian dollars. I am prepared to leave it to the judgment of the house and the country as to which is the more realistic rate.

I have come to the end of what I have to say about exchange rates. I have tried to examine, as carefully as I could, all the grounds which I have seen put forward for dissatisfaction with the present rates, and in the present circumstances I can find no basis for believing that the present rate is unrealistic or that it should be altered. The Canadian dollar was appreciated in 1946 very largely because we saw a marked increase in prices originating in the United States. It was realized that Canada would inevitably be affected by this, but we did not want to add to the cost of our imports, with pervasive effects throughout the whole cost of living and the cost of doing business, a further ten per cent which could be avoided through changing the exchange rate. The price developments which have taken place since 1946 have shown how well founded our expectations were, and have provided the most complete justification for the action which we took. If any hon. member believes that the cost of living in this country is too low, I hope he will get up and say so. The government, at any rate, is not prepared to add to that cost of living and the cost of doing business by depreciating the Canadian dollar.

Perhaps I can bring that issue home to every hon. member of the house, and to every household in this country, if I put it in these terms. The government sees no justification for and is not prepared to recommend an action at this time which would have the effect of imposing an additional 10 per cent tariff, or even a 7 per cent tariff, against the importation of any and all goods from any and all countries. That is what would be the effect of restoring the Canadian dollar to the wartime 90 cent basis or, alternatively, fixing it at the rate which has recently prevailed in the unofficial market. Let those who argue for the devaluation or depreciation of the Canadian dollar be frank in explaining to the Canadian people just what it will mean to their cost of living and their cost of doing business.

The moral, Mr. Speaker, of all that I have said is that there is no real alternative to the action which is now recommended to the house. I look on this as, in a sense, a measure of national defence. In the face of all the uncertainties now surrounding international trade, this country cannot afford to give up the economic defences which foreign exchange control provides because, as I have said on other occasions, a nation which loses its exchange reserves loses its independence. More than ever we need to ensure, in the words of the preamble to the Foreign Exchange Control Act, that Canada's foreign exchange resources are made available to meet the needs of Canada as a whole, that they are used to promote trade and other normal current transactions with other countries, and not dissipated through disadvantageous exports of capital from Canada, or for other purposes disadvantageous to Canada as a whole.

Two years from now, Mr. Speaker, parliament will again have an opportunity of reviewing the situation and determining whether, in its wisdom and in the light of the then existing circumstances, it is still necessary to continue exchange control to protect the public interest.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise with hesitation, and almost with apology, because it seems to me that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has not only made his own speech but he has tried to make in advance all the speeches that we might make on this side of the house. I do not know whether or not we should be very grateful to him for that. Perhaps time will tell.

I was interested in one thing. I listened carefully to the minister, and as far as I could discover he did not say a single word to suggest that he regretted the need for these controls, that they were things we should be trying to get away from. It seemed to me he fully bore out the suggestion which my leader has made from time to time that the hon. gentlemen opposite have become control minded, or emergency minded, and it is a permanent state of mind.

Mr. Abbott: I have said it so often on other occasions that I did not think I needed to say it again.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I listened to him carefully, and it was all along that line. I do not propose to follow the minister into many of the details that he has given us, first of all because he has given us so many. Some of them will need careful study, but I wish to mention one or two things in passing. As one listened to the minister's picture of our position in Canada, really I pinched myself and I said, "Have we actually any difficulties of any kind?" The minister made one or two references at the beginning to the fact that there were difficulties in the background, but from then on it seemed to me that he became so intoxicated with the wonderful figures which were the result of the wonderful policy which the government has pursued that a stranger listening to him could easily have said, "These people have no troubles of any kind". Of course the minister will agree that we have great trouble, and that our export trade is in great danger. If he does not agree I shall have something to quote later on from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who seems to have doubts about the matter.

I shall refer to one or two of the figures that the minister gave. I am not going back to dwell at any length on the cataract of United States exchange which we lost between July, 1946, and November, 1947. I just want to correct the minister on one small point. They were not quite as farseeing, not quite as all-wise as he suggested, because in reading the report of the Bank of Canada for the year following, which I suppose would be the beginning of 1947, we find that the actual reason which very largely stimulated the action taken by the government was their belief that the course of prices in the United States would be very different from what it was. They thought it was going up for a while and then coming down, and that by the course they took we would be able to take the low road and meet United States prices on their way down. Unfortunately that did not happen.

One other point I wish to refer to in the minister's speech is rather important. When we in this party spoke about this more than a year ago and were troubled about the course that had been taken, we said "Of course if the Marshall plan comes in with hundreds of millions of dollars in 1948, that may save you from the consequences of your own acts." The Marshall plan has come in; but I was rather surprised at the figures the minister gave. He pointed out an improvement of $496 million, less a loan of $150 million of which he advised us, which would leave an improvement of $346 million. Then the minister said he thought the amount of United States dollars that had found its way to us through European purchases was some three or four hundred million. My own idea of the figure was that it was very much larger, though I suppose we can get the exact amount later on. My idea was that it was greater by some hundreds of millions.

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Howe: You are confusing authorizations with shipments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The other evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told us he did not know where the money came from at all, so we will not take him as an authority at the moment. But I could not help thinking that when he was building elevators—I understand the minister built very good elevators—he knew perfectly well where the man for whom he was building was going to get the money, and I suggest that he show the same assiduity in serving the people of Canada.

Mr. Howe: That is not a very bright remark.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Well, it is a fact. Often facts are dull and unpalatable.

Now I should like to make some comments on this resolution. We are now asked to continue the measure passed three years ago. I recall the debates at that time and the tremendous efforts we made to have some flexibility introduced into this legislation. I remember the utter refusal on the part of the government. It was whole hog or none. They had to be "thorough"; there must be no flexibility of any kind. And when I see the government coming along three years later and asking us to approve this thing exactly as is, I must confess to my surprise. It seems to me there is an intellectual bankruptcy over there. Surely they should be able to suggest something except that for another two years we are going to follow the same unfortunate course which has brought us to the point where, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) says, we have the sterling area with an iron curtain or a curtain of some kind having the dollar mark on one side and the pound mark on the other, and we are drifting more and more into the position that we can have no satisfactory trade with it. I am sure the hon. gentlemen to my left who come in the main from the western plains know what that means, unless some solution is found. It really seems to me—and I try to use moderate language, as you are perhaps aware, Mr. Speaker—that in a sense it is almost an act of effrontery for the government to come now and just ask us to continue for two more years this measure, with all its imperfections, which was imposed upon us three years ago.

It was said of the Bourbon kings that they learned nothing and forgot nothing. Well, as far as this measure is concerned I think we might say the government has learned nothing. I do hope they can forget something, however, because I am sure they have a lot of things they would like to forget. To put it differently, in medical language we are being offered the mixture as before; no change, just the mixture as before. It was a bad dose three years ago, and it is an even worse dose today. Of course it would not have been so bad if the legislation had been used only for the purposes for which it was intended; but we remember that in 1947 it was found that various things could be done by it and through it that were never dreamed of at the time it was passed. On June 17, 1946, Mr. Ilsley, in introducing the measure, said:

> We have no intention of using this exchange control legislation to restrict anything but certain types of capital movement.

But we all remember that in 1947 it was used indirectly to limit the movement of goods. At that time the minister with great mental agility propounded an interesting theory. He said the statement I just read was not an undertaking. I think the minister said it was just a statement, or a statement of intention. That was very interesting to me, because as I read it and as I think anyone else would read it, it was a clear undertaking by the then Minister of Finance, which was departed from in the year following.

First of all I wish to refer to one or two of the details of this act we are asked to continue. In speaking of it on August 7, 1946, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) referred to two of the sections. I shall be very brief, but I should like to refer to those two sections also, because it is just as well to remind ourselves of the powers given in this act.

> It provides by section 31 that no person in Canada shall assign or deliver to a non-resident any property situated in Canada or elsewhere, and no person residing in Canada can give any property to a non-resident without a permit from the board.
> It provides by section 49 that the board can prohibit any person from exercising any control over his own property, whenever it sees fit.

Of course the minister will say that these powers are just put there in order to meet a remote contingency. The minister might even say, as he told the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), that the resolution which was enacted by radio by the minister in November of 1947—

Mr. Abbott: It was not enacted by radio.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): That is my statement; enacted by radio.

Mr. Abbott: I am contradicting it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister said it was not really a law at all, that nobody needed to obey it. But unfortunately, as the hon. member for Calgary West pointed out to him, even though it was not a law it was something on which the government authorities were acting, because they had impounded certain goods belonging to a client of the hon. member for Calgary West. So we will leave the minister to decide the question, when a law is not a law.

Now I want to come to what I consider to be the main point for consideration; that is the basis underlying this act. I quote very briefly from the preamble to the act itself:

> . . . whereas it is desirable to provide means for achieving orderly exchange arrangements and in general discharging the obligations of Canada as a member of the international monetary fund . . .

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government has taken that agreement entered into at that time and approved by us, and has just sat down and accepted that and allowed a kind of paralysing rigidity to settle down upon them for these three years. Now, when the results are beginning to appear, when our trade with western Europe is in danger of being strangled, the government is coming along and asking for a continuation of this legislation. Let me point out that in the Bretton Woods agreement itself there was no such contemplation. Article 1, subsection (iv), says the purpose, among other things, is—

> To assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper the growth of world trade.

I ask where there is any indication that the government have taken that part of the agreement seriously, where there is any suggestion of any kind that they are proceeding to the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions. All we have had is the minister telling us of the great things they have done in the past, making no suggestion that there should be any alteration of any kind. Yet, as I said a moment ago, there is in western Europe a situation which I would call alarming, and in using that word I think I am making an understatement.

Of course the international monetary fund got off to a bad start. It allowed the nations to write their own ticket in regard to the value of their exchanges, and I think they have been to blame for allowing the thing to go on without alteration. We know France and Italy have more or less kicked over the traces, but in the main the situation has been allowed to continue. The officials of the international monetary fund are aware of the danger and difficulty. In a report by the international monetary fund, dated April 30, 1948, this appears at page 21:

> The fund agreement makes it clear that the provisions for the regulation of exchange rates are not intended to impose upon the fund the duty of perpetuating in the name of stability exchange rates which have lost touch with economic realities.

I propose to say something more about that because here you have the officials of the international monetary fund stating very emphatically the need for realism; yet there is not a sign that the governments back home who give these representatives their instructions are interesting themselves in this matter at all.

Foreign Exchange Control

For a long time, Mr. Speaker, the evils of this situation were obscured. I know quite well, and probably the minister would say it if I did not say it, that for some time business in this country had the feeling that it was good to have exchange rates pegged. It meant the risk was taken out of business. It meant the government took the risk. This was true of the banks as well as of business people who should have known better. They should have realized that this was a dream world in which they were living because its rigidity, which seemed to be working pleasantly for the moment, was going to produce exactly the sort of evils that it has. The minister said not a single word about remedying any of these evils. I ask the minister whether the government is satisfied with the situation in western Europe? Are they prepared to sit by and let this paralysing rigidity continue?

Mr. Abbott: It cannot be remedied by changing the Canadian exchange rate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Never mind, let me make my speech. As I was saying, the minister made no mention of this in his speech.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes, certainly.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the hon. member mind telling the house, in the course of his remarks, whether he regards this rigidity as a cause or an effect?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): It is like a lot of other things, both a cause and an effect. I will come to that later. The idea that a fixed exchange rate was going to be a pleasant thing is beginning to change. The situation in western Europe has awakened our people. They know now that the danger is a very serious one. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows it is serious. Last December he said so to the people in London, and I should like to quote two or three sentences from what he said. This appeared in the Montreal Star on December 17, 1948.

Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Canada's agriculture minister, said today that Canada's hopes of long-term, large-scale food agreements with the United Kingdom were "dashed to the ground" by currency difficulties.

I am convinced that the world is not in any state of mind where it can be expected to agree that the manipulation of any system or systems of currency is going to be allowed to interfere with the will of those who have empty stomachs when it is preventing their purchasing surpluses of food and distributing them.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

Later, he said:

There is no plan for exchange of British cars or steel products for Canadian food although Britain gives Russia tinplate for fish.

Although Canadian production was increased largely during the war when Britain was in urgent need, British negotiators now propose imports from Canada similar to those of pre-war days.

It might be a good thing for everybody if they would close down united nations meetings long enough to permit some of the United Kingdom and the United States experts to get together and settle some basis on which dollars and sterling can be converted to allow nations like Canada to produce food to feed the starving millions and distribute it.

The Minister of Agriculture is a practical man; he knows that these difficulties exist.

What is the situation in western Europe? We all know what it is. Our trade is shrinking to the point where it is dubious whether we are going to be able to sell any of our agricultural products. Do not let anyone imagine that even the most miraculous discoveries of oil in Alberta or equally miraculous discoveries of ore in Labrador are going to solve our problem, even if they were so miraculous that they solved the payment problem in the United States. Nevertheless, unless this problem of exporting our food products to Europe is solved, you will have an economic revolution on your hands because you would have the western provinces with three or four times too many people growing food. So far as I know, the Minister of Finance made no reference to that. The Minister of Agriculture knows about it. Why would he not? He is a farmer.

What is the story in Britain? We know the story. In Britain and in western Europe you have this ironical situation. North America is sending them aid in a manner that has never before been equalled by any nation in peacetime in the economic field. What are they doing? How are they using these materials? I am not exactly blaming them, I am blaming the situation; but they are using them in order to make themselves better able to cease trading with us. They are using them so as to be better able to develop trade in the sterling area. I am glad to be able to tell the minister who smiles somewhat cynically—

Mr. Abbott: No, I was not smiling cynically.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): —that the realization is beginning to take hold that when you have unreal exchanges you begin to suffer. In the sterling area they are beginning to find that out. The thing is rolling back on them. This is one of the things that give me some hope.

In the meantime, what does Cripps say?—whose mind is brooding over our affairs, as Churchill said. Cripps has said that if we want to sell more to Britain we shall have to buy more from Britain, and that is all right. In the meantime, however, so far as we can make out Britain is busy selling in eastern Europe goods which could be sold here. Electrical machinery, which could be used in this country, is going to eastern Europe. The unreality is being perpetuated there in a real way.

Let me read briefly two extracts from the New York Times. The first article is dated February 6 and it indicates the fantastic—no other word will describe it—situation which has arisen in Europe by perpetuating the principle in this act which we are asked to renew. The government are not taking cognizance of it. They are not taking steps to meet it. They are just permitting things to roll along, and they are not rolling very well. This article is headed, "Exchange Deals hit U.S. Industry." The text reads as follows:

"Bargain currency deals" and indirect transshipment of merchandise are creating major inflationary problems for American industries which depend upon several important raw material imports, according to authoritative trade quarters here.

Then, later, it says this:

Traders and importers cited the unrealistic "official" exchange rates for certain foreign currencies, including the British pound sterling, as being chiefly to blame for the conditions which have arisen.

At this point, let me say that when we think about exchange rates we should not think only in terms of the United States dollar and the Canadian dollar. There are many other exchanges that affect this country. It seems to me the minister had very little to say about them.

Mr. Abbott: If the hon. member wants to be fair, let him say what responsibility I have for the exchange rates in other countries.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am going to tell him. We intend to put the responsibility squarely where it belongs. I continue with the quotation:

While Britain has taken steps to prevent exchange abuses, it was held no secret that sizable amounts of pounds sterling are available in nearly all major world markets at substantial discounts from the pegged rate. It was asserted that traders willing and able to buy with such "bargain" pounds are consistently able to outbid United States importers competing for supplies with pounds at $4.03.

That is a nice state of affairs when you consider that these very same people of the United States are the ones who are making the mare go at the present time. I read further from this quotation—the further we go the more fantastic and involved it becomes:

Another aspect of the situation was said to be the willingness of foreign traders and speculators to pay more for goods than trade conditions justify in order to convert currency into commodities.

The same conditions were held to apply to other currencies and to be aggravated by multiple rates of exchange, black market discounts and other evidences of over-valued currency which have induced hoarding of stable non-perishable merchandise in many parts of the world.

I have one further quotation from the same newspaper on March 6. This is entitled "Variety of sterling valuations recalls Schacht's trade moneys". Let us remember that that estimable gentleman is the man to whom we owe these delightful controls, because he was the man who started them. I quote briefly from this article as follows:

Since the pound sterling ceased nearly two years ago to be freely convertible into the world's other moneys, the value of the pound in international trade keeps taking on greater resemblance to the intricately devised multiples of German international money spawned during the thirties under the economic inspiration of Dr. Hjalmar Schacht in Germany's frantic pre-war "export-or-die" campaign.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Would the hon. member mind telling me the source of that quotation?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): It is the New York Times of March 6.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): An editorial?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): No. It is an article written by a man called Paul Heffernan.

Mr. Jackman: A very good writer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): One of the results of this is that Britain is beginning to price itself out of our markets. That is coming more rapidly than we like to think. You have also another fantastic situation which is in great danger of arising, where the sterling area will deal with other countries in the sterling area on a level of prices above the rest of the world. That is something which is, as I say, making the thing fantastic. I should like to read a short extract from the last report of the chairman of the foreign exchange control board, in which he refers to this sterling situation. I read from page 5:

The prices at which commodities are exchanged in such bilateral deals are frequently considerably higher than those prevailing for similar goods outside the protected trading area. Moreover, the discriminatory restrictions imposed on dollar expenditures keep out competition from the western hemisphere while the special financial arrangements referred to encourage trade within the area. In these circumstances trade within the area takes place in many cases on the basis of higher prices than those prevailing outside the area. It is easier for countries within the protected area to buy from each other than from dollar countries because they are better supplied with each other's currencies than with dollars, and it is more profitable for the individual producer in any country within the area to export to another country within the area than to dollar countries because better prices are frequently available.

I again ask this question. Facing the situation that the governor of the bank describes there, have we anything to offer? Has the government nothing to say to us except to ask us again to continue the paralysing influence of this act that was passed two years ago? Surely it is fair to say that we have now a new situation. I mean, it is a new situation by reason of the fact that we are faced with this grave dislocation of our trade with western Europe. Some people will say —with a certain amount of truth—and I come now to the question that was asked a few minutes ago—that this dislocation exists because trade has got all snarled up, because we have not been able to reach multilateral trade as we had hoped, and that we have other difficulties. In a measure that is true. On the other hand, I think it is equally true to say that one of the things holding back trade is this matter of unreal exchanges. One of the things that give me hope is that inside the sterling area they are beginning to find that out. I think it is a case of action and reaction. I would suggest that our action is hurting us in two ways. First of all it is hurting us with regard to European trade.

Next I want to take up a point that the Minister of Finance made. He pooh-poohed the idea that we are suffering anything by reason of the loss of American investment. I am aware of what he says, namely, that money is coming up here for bricks and mortar. As I understand it, they do a kind of complicated deal with the foreign exchange control board. If you are an American wanting to come up here to invest, apparently you go in a humble manner to the board and say, I want to spend $5 million, let us say. Then you make a deal, and the board says: If you will buy $2,500,000 at our rate, then we will allow you to buy $2,500,000 at the so-called free rate or whatever you wish to call it. In other words, the board recognizes that rate in an extremely real manner. Although the minister laughed at it and pooh-poohed it, nevertheless his creature, his own board, recognizes that rate, and a great many of the transactions take place under it.

Now I want to deal with what the minister said. He rather sneered at people who merely want to invest money. He prefers bricks and mortar to money. In a way I do also. But let us remember this fact. Ever since the year 1608 this country has been in need of outside investment. We have always needed outside investment. Anyone who does not face that situation is just not looking at the facts.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

The second thing I wish to point out is that as long as we have this situation where people put their money in and have it impounded, then we shall have a brake on investment. Although the minister did not say it—he may believe it but he certainly abstained from saying it—what we should aim at as our objective is to get back to the situation we had in the past where people could bring money here and take it out. It was a most useful cushion in the 1920's. It has been a useful cushion again and again to have Americans ready to come in here and invest their money. That we are not suffering now is possible merely because for the moment we have continuing huge government expenditure, high employment and so on. The time will likely come—and it may be nearer than anyone wants to think—when we shall want all the American investment we can get, and it will be available if we are strong enough to get to the situation where we can do away with these rigid exchanges. I am not going to suggest that it be done tonight, but I have a suggestion nevertheless.

There is another thing we should bear in mind. I am sure the minister has not enjoyed the comments that have been made from time to time with regard to him as the author of austerity. Having been brought up as a Presbyterian I am a great believer in austerity, but I think it should take more convenient forms.

Mr. Abbott: Oatmeal or something like that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I was going to say that there is only one way in which we shall ever escape from periodical spasms of austerity and that is to get back to the point where our dollar is free, where Americans can invest here and take their money out, and where we get away from this miserable business of having a kind of Star Chamber. I say that with respect; I do not want to criticize the men who do it. Nevertheless we have a Star Chamber where any American who wants to bring money in here must go and make a deal.

Mr. Abbott: No. I know my hon. friend wants to be fair. He has not to go to the board and make a deal. An American is free to come into Canada at any time he wants to invest American dollars in Canada. If he wishes to avail himself of the facilities of this unofficial market, then the extent to which he uses Canadian dollars acquired in the unofficial market is subject to approval by the foreign exchange control board. I imagine my hon. friend would want to make that clear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I go back to what I said before. I do not think the minister has corrected me. I said that if an American wants to come here and wants to invest a substantial amount of money, and does not want to buy it all at the fixed rate, he must go and make a deal.

Mr. Abbott: They can take their own money into the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Nevertheless what I said stands. The minister did not correct me before and does not correct me now. I repeat that in spite of this, and because they know it is good business, the board has been compelled in effect to recognize this free rate in the United States. They have not done that for fun. They have had to do it.

Mr. Abbott: Nobody has ever disputed the fact that they recognized it existed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): You take part in it. You participate in its operation through the deals that take place. Of course you do. Why, it is only a figure of speech to say that you do not. What I am suggesting is that for three years we have had a kind of paralysing inflexibility, paralysing rigidity, and that there is no suggestion of any change. I shall make a suggestion as to a change which certain sensible people have thought was not so bad. At the present time the only right we have, if we want to change the value of the dollar, is to say that we will make it ninety-five cents or ninety-three cents or whatever you like. Why should not there be a range within which it might swing? Why should we not call on Bretton Woods or the international monetary fund and say, they can change the agreement; the agreement can be changed. Why should we not have an arrangement of flexibility whereby the government might say, we are going to support the dollar at ninety cents? We shall let it swing from where it is to ninety cents. That I suggest would be the way of getting a realistic value of our dollar. If, with that provision, it stayed at 100 cents, that is all right; that is the value. But at the present time nobody knows whether that is the value or not. The only evidence we have is that that is not the value in the only free market—in the United States.

Incidentally, if the fund took that forward step, it seems to me that it might encourage other countries to come forward and try to make at least a beginning, instead of this barren resolution which just says, let us go on for two years more as we are, and have everything getting worse and worse.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): We would be honest, anyway.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes; but my point is that things are bad and in all probability they are going to get worse unless we can get people to come around the council table and try to deal with this thing in a sensible way.

I think we who are helping to stake Britain should talk very plainly to her. I hope no one will question my feeling of admiration for that great country when I say that, but nevertheless we have to be realistic about these things. At the present time we have a situation which is absolutely fantastic, whereby we and the United States are busy staking Britain and they are busy trying to organize themselves so that they can do as little business with us as possible. In the face of that, what does the government do? They offer us the mixture which is before us, but it is a very noxious drug.

Mr. Abbott: I wish my hon. friend would demonstrate how a change in our exchange rate would help the situation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am suggesting that at the present time, with a lot of other people, we are enmeshed in unrealistic exchange rates. I gave some illustration of the pound this afternoon. I am suggesting that one of the useful features of Bretton Woods was that people could be brought around the council table. We should try very hard not only to get our own exchange rate realistic, but what is just as important, other people's as well, because exchange rates work two ways. This thing need not be as hopeless as the minister suggests by shaking his head, by which he means that we cannot do anything about it. I believe we can do something about it. The thing is not as hopeless as all that. The Americans are being utterly realistic about this in the economic co-operation act under which they are making the advances we know of which are without precedent in the history of the world, as the London Economist pointed out, without precedent in peacetime in the history of the world. Nevertheless they are realistic, and they have the right—and I should think it is a right which they will avail themselves of—to ask people who are participating in the benefits of their fund to come and discuss their exchange rates with the international monetary fund. What does that mean? I think that the Americans who, as I say, are keeping western Europe going, are going to be realistic about this. They are not going to let this thing go on to the point where after three or four years, all that they succeed in doing is to set up a situation which makes it impossible for them to trade with the sterling area. I say that the Americans have the right to do that. The international monetary fund is the medium which they have chosen for this. They reserve to themselves the right to call in the beneficiary nations to discuss it in that way.

I have tried to outline what I think should be done. We in this party are not going to accept this resolution as is. We are not going to vote for this foreign exchange act as is, which has the effect of continuing the present rigidity. We believe that the time has come when our government and other governments as well—we can only speak for ourselves—should take steps to move toward realism, and therefore I move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman):

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the chair but that it be resolved that:

1. The Canadian dollar should be allowed to seek its true economic level within the limits imposed by the Bretton Woods agreement; and

2. It is expedient to present a measure to provide for the continuance in force of foreign exchange control with necessary modifications for not more than one year to permit representations to be made to the international monetary fund with a view to obtaining such modifications in its regulations as will permit an orderly revaluation of currencies to bring them to realistic levels and thus make the further continuation of foreign exchange control unnecessary.

Mr. Abbott: I cannot lay the same claim to an expert knowledge of the rules of procedure as my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, but this is a resolution which precedes a money bill. I suggest to Your Honour that it is a resolution which can only be introduced or amended by a member of the privy council upon the usual message from His Excellency the Governor General. I do not wish to interrupt the debate at this point, but I make that objection to the introduction of an amendment. Your Honour will no doubt consider it and give a ruling in due course.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I was going to say very much the same thing in that respect as the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Graydon: The more we are together.

Mr. Coldwell: —because I have a vivid recollection of what happened two years ago when we attempted to move an almost identical resolution on the same stage of the control measure, and it was ruled out of order. Consequently I think I have a right to say so, without being held up to ridicule by Progressive Conservatives who are making parliament a farce.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: May I tell my hon. friends that there are more ways of destroying democracies and democratic institutions than by burning a reichstag.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

Mr. Drew: That is right, and you have found it.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what some hon. members are trying to do, destroy it by destroying confidence in the institution which our forefathers have built up. I have been in this house for thirteen years and I have never seen an exhibition like some we have witnessed lately since I have been here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor. If any hon. member believes that the hon. member is out of order he should rise and address himself to the Speaker.

Mr. Coldwell: I was just going to add that I agree with the member of the Canadian press who described the scenes in this house this session the other day as comparable with behaviour in a beer garden. I feel it is about time someone said something about it in this house.

I should like to say something about the measure now before us. This is a very important one, from the point of view of Canada's economy. As has been said by both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), Canada's economic situation is vulnerable when viewed in the light of world conditions at the present time; and any government or parliament which fails to protect our country in the present circumstances is in my opinion derelict in its duty.

Consequently I believe the attention of the house should be directed to the resolution, and the proposals lying behind it. May I say to my hon. friends of the government and of the official opposition that there is one thing which people everywhere are coming more and more to realize, and that is that unrestricted private or free enterprise is no longer a policy any government can follow. More and more, by the circumstances and the evolution of history and society, governments are forced more and more to protect their people and to direct the economy of their various countries. That is particularly true I believe in the international field at the present time.

I have noticed that again and again hon. gentlemen who have objected to control measures before the house in the past few days have risen in their places when the orders of the day have been called and asked the government to do this or that to protect various parts of our economy, and various interests in that economy. More and more we are going to be driven to the point where governments have to give attention to the economic relationships in the domestic field as well as our economic relationships with other nations of the world.

To say that the emergency following the war has passed is, I suggest, particularly unrealistic. We have only to look around the world today to realize that in almost every field of human endeavour, in almost every one of our relationships, emergencies exist. And in this House of Commons, ever since we met on January 26, day by day some phase of one or other of these emergencies has been brought to the attention of the house by individual private members and by the government itself—and by the official opposition as well, incidentally.

Consequently a measure of this description which has a tremendous bearing upon our economic relationships with other countries must receive the consideration of parliament at this time. And whether we agree with all the implications of this policy, whether we agree or not with the manner in which it has been operated, the fundamental principle behind the proposal must be endorsed and accepted by the House of Commons, if we are to protect our economy in the situation in which we find ourselves at the present time.

I should like to go on from there after supper, if I may ask to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Before leaving the chair I should like to answer the point of order put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I declare this amendment out of order, because it purports to make a declaration—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, before you state your ruling—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: Before you state your ruling—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Before you state your ruling would you hear further argument on the point of order?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Would you hear further argument?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking me before I proceed with my ruling to hear further argument. I must tell him that I have already started to give my ruling.

Mr. Casselman: And you should give an opportunity for argument.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I declare the amendment out of order, because it purports to make a declaration which can only be moved as an amendment to the second reading of a bill. Hon. members will recall that I did the same thing last session, when I declared a similar amendment out of order moved for the same purpose.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Would Your Honour indicate whether there is any special part of the resolution which you consider out of order,—whether your judgment is based upon some special part.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that the ruling of Mr. Speaker is not debatable. I have given my ruling, that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I was not going to debate it. I would ask Your Honour if you would indicate whether there was some special feature of it which you found to be out of order.

Mr. Abbott: The whole resolution.

Mr. Speaker: What I have said to the house gives my reason for declaring it out of order. I would call the hon. member's attention to citation 755 in the second edition of Beauchesne, which states:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

As I said a moment ago, I made the same ruling during the last session of parliament, and it has been made at different times by my predecessors. There are therefore many precedents.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): If I understand correctly, Your Honour is not now saying that this resolution will be out of order if introduced subsequently on second reading.

Mr. Croll: He did not say that at all.

PRIVILEGE

THE BUDGET—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN "EVENING CITIZEN"

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the house rises for dinner recess I rise to a point of very great privilege, so far as the members of this house are concerned. In the afternoon edition of the Evening Citizen there is a statement in regard to income tax exemptions. It makes the bold statement that certain things will be given, and states—

> Single men are to be exempted up to $1,000 in income, married men up to $2,000. A man with two children gets $100 for each child and therefore will be exempted for $2,200.
> The figure of $2,200 is chosen because the bureau of statistics reports on January 1, 1949, that the average weekly income of the Canadian worker in all manufacturing industry is $42.16 a week. This works out to $2,192.32 per year, in other words just about $2,200. Thousands of civil servants are at just about that level or below it.

I place this before the house, as it is exactly the sort of thing which called for action by the House of Commons in Great Britain some time last year, and should certainly be dealt with by the House of Commons here.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has not been here very long. If he had he would probably realize that this is a popular pastime which goes on for about a week or ten days before the budget, where people speculate—sometimes shrewdly and sometimes not too shrewdly—as to what the budget will contain.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT

CONTINUANCE IN FORCE UNTIL SIXTY DAYS AFTER OPENING OF FIRST SESSION OF PARLIAMENT IN 1951

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the continuance in force of the Foreign Exchange Control Act until sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year 1951.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was saying before the supper hour that I thought that any government must take steps to protect the economy of this country in the face of the difficulties which now confront the world, and bearing in mind particularly that the Canadian situation has been made more difficult because of the historic pattern of our trade in the past. For years we were in the very happy position in normal times of being able to sell almost everything that we wished to sell to the United Kingdom and western Europe, and with the dollars we earned we were able to buy in the United States almost everything that we wished to buy. The result was that this triangular trade benefited Canada considerably in the past, but today it makes our situation peculiarly difficult.

Great Britain and the western European countries, the Netherlands, Belgium, and other nations, have lost much of the income they once received from overseas. That, of course, is more particularly true of Great Britain, who liquidated so many of her overseas investments in order to meet the obligations of our common war. It is quite true that over the past year and a half the exchange situation has greatly improved as far as Canada is concerned. I think, however, that to some extent that is an improvement at the expense of our own Canadian people, and that we should be wary lest our people suffer further. What I have in mind is that because of the restrictions that the government imposed in regard to imports from the United States, and because the government insisted we were under obligation, because of the Geneva agreement although some of us did not agree with that point of view, to exercise non-discrimination, we had to put the same impediments against the inflow of goods from the United Kingdom and other countries as we did upon those from the United States.

Then, too, as soon as the war ended there was a great deal of pressure for protection by certain Canadian manufacturers. At any rate, the government removed some of the advantages that Great Britain had enjoyed during the war by reimposing certain tariffs that were in the interests of the textile industry, the glass industry, and other industries in our country that had arisen behind policies in the nature of protective tariffs. To my mind, the continuance of such policies will be serious for the farmers of Canada, because after all we can produce vast quantities of food in Canada, and unless we can find permanent markets for the great surpluses we produce, surpluses which would be surpluses even if our own people were fed adequately, then agriculture in this country faces a very difficult future indeed.

Therefore I say to the government that, while we believe that the exercise of control over foreign exchange is essential at this time, nevertheless we believe that there are other factors which the government should take into consideration in dealing with these problems. We have increased our exports to the United States, but I think that most people will agree that the United States market for Canadian goods has always been a very uncertain one. There have been times when they were prepared to take quantities of certain classes of goods from us, and then from time to time, when they found that they could themselves produce the goods that they were taking from us, we lost those markets. We have seen these fluctuations ever since I have been in the country, now some forty years.

Then there is also the peculiar situation in the United States that no one seems to know what is going to happen internally to their economy. Like our own economy, it is buoyed up at the moment by these tremendous expenditures, we will call them, though in reality they are exports of tremendous quantities of goods abroad, thus maintaining a very high level of employment in that country. Lately, however, we have seen a somewhat sharp drop in certain prices in the United States. There is considerable unemployment and we have seen certain classes of farm commodities drop in price. In our own country we have had similar and quite spectacular drops. I mentioned the other day that on the speculative market a year or so ago rye was selling for around $4, but when I looked at the paper the other night I saw that it was down to below $1.20. It is the same thing with barley; it has fluctuated widely. Where you have the kind of economy that is subject to great fluctuations there is grave danger. That will be particularly the case if we are tied up completely to the United States. Therefore I think that, while the increase in our exports to the United States, and the lowering of our imports from the United States, have improved our dollar position, nevertheless there are dangers in connection with what has occurred during the past year or so. I say therefore that we have to look to the principal customers whom we have had in the past.

I noted this afternoon the criticism that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) made of the British trading so largely in the sterling area, entering into bilateral agreements, and so on. We have to bear in mind that what they are actually doing is what we should be doing. They are more or less digging into the markets which were their natural, reliable and normal markets before the war. They are endeavouring to protect themselves in that regard as well as to prevent the loss of those dollars which they need badly in the dollar area, and of which they are short at the present time. Indeed, while we may take steps of the description of those that are now being considered under this foreign exchange control measure, it seems to me that the final solution of our problems, as well as of the problems of the world, lies more and more in co-operation on the widest possible basis, and with the largest possible group of nations across the world.

At the moment I confess that I cannot see any immediate hope for a return to wider trade relationships than we know now. We see all of the European countries endeavouring to rebuild their own economies, to produce more and more goods for export, and unless we in our country can receive more and more of the goods that they can export, then we cannot export goods to them. I want to emphasize again that the old pattern of trade, which benefited Canada so greatly, has disappeared. Our overseas customers, and particularly the United Kingdom with her vast overseas investments, had a steady flow of goods under that pattern of trade, which brought in the dollars with which she could make payment to us from time to time; and those dollars have disappeared because the investments which gave rise to them have disappeared as far as the British are concerned.

It strikes me that what the British are actually doing at the present time is endeavouring to protect themselves in the future against a further loss of trade, and to build up in their island, with their great population, an export trade that will enable them to obtain the raw materials and the foodstuffs that are vital to the existence of their country.

While we may be critical of some of the things they have done because they may react against our own country at the moment, I think it is understandable why they are doing them. The point I am making is that we should endeavour to be realistic, too, where tariff barriers or trade barriers of any description prevent goods coming into our country from overseas that could be used to buy goods here which we could export and must export if we are to remain prosperous, because we produce them in quantities too great to be used within our own country. So I say we have to consider more than both the exchange and other factors in the situation.

This afternoon I heard the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) suggest that we should let the dollar find its own level. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) answered that previously when he asked what is that level. If we take the market referred to as the free market, that level is not very much below the rate at which the foreign exchange control board exchanges our currency for that of the United States. But it seems to me that with a fluctuating Canadian dollar, a dollar that might be depreciated—I think it was suggested last session that we should allow the Canadian dollar to depreciate as much as thirty per cent—if the Canadian dollar depreciated ten per cent the cost of living for the mass of the people of this country would probably increase by more than ten per cent. We are so dependent upon the United States for many of our raw materials and many foodstuffs; and anything which tends to depreciate our dollar means that we must find more Canadian funds with which to purchase United States currency in order to buy American goods, and the cost of living here would increase proportionately. Consequently I believe that suggestion would benefit relatively few people in this country.

I am free to admit that it might benefit certain speculative interests. It might benefit some of the gold-mining interests in the country, though I would point out that already the government has made considerable concessions to that industry in order to assist it. So, since the depreciation of our dollar would be done only at the expense of sacrificing our agriculture and the standard of living of our people, I think the suggestion is thoroughly unsound and I would oppose it on those grounds. We remember very well that back in the twenties there were considerable investments in our country coming from the United States, but when things got a bit tough not only did the banks in our own country withdraw loans but there was some flight of United States capital as well. I would not be inclined to suggest to the minister or to the government that they should follow the example of what was done in the twenties. We must bear in mind that the twenties were followed by the thirties, and we all remember what happened at that time, when we allowed our own dollar to remain tied to the gold standard and how that affected primary producers all over this country.

I do not propose to prolong this discussion, Mr. Speaker, because I think the principal debate should be on second reading of the bill, when we know exactly what is before us. I did want to say, however, that I believe no government in any country, in the circumstances now existing all over the world, can do other than exercise a considerable amount of economic control in order to protect its own nationals, its own domestic economy and indeed its international trade. That, I take it, is the purpose of the resolution before us at the present time; and because we believe that to be the purpose we are going to support it when the vote is taken.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): At the outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I find myself pretty well in agreement with the stand taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the question of exchange and the valuation of the dollar. I think the price level in Canada compares very favourably with the price levels in other countries. I would say to the minister, however, that if a situation develops such as we had in the thirties, when the prices of agricultural products fell to a low level and we had great difficulty competing with other countries whose currency was depreciated considerably below the dollar, then the primary producers of this country would be justified in demanding that the dollar be depreciated also. That situation has not arisen, however, and we hope it does not recur. On the other hand, if the government were prepared to stabilize the prices of agricultural products, then of course agriculture would no longer be concerned with the level at which the dollar might be maintained on the international market.

The international situation today I think demonstrates the need for continuation of the foreign exchange control board. On the one hand there is the ever-present danger of an adverse balance of payments with the United States. On the other hand there is the danger of losing essential markets in Europe owing to the shortage of dollars. I am going to confine my remarks mainly to the second of these points. I notice the measure is intended to continue the board for only two years. I am satisfied that it will be necessary to continue the operations of the foreign exchange control board for a far longer period than that. Both the problems I mentioned are being aggravated at the present time, I think, by the operation of the Bretton Woods agreement and the non-discrimination clauses in the Geneva trade agreement. That trade agreement has not passed this house, but I understand the government has signed it and that we are actually operating under it. On several occasions I have explained why we are opposed to certain policies under the Bretton Woods agreement, so I am not going to take any time to deal with that matter this evening except to mention it later on in regard to one or two other matters. However, today we are operating under those agreements whether we like them or not, and certainly as long as we continue to do so there will be a very real need for continuation of the operation of the foreign exchange control board. Even if those agreements were replaced by others which would operate for the benefit and advantage of all trading nations, I am convinced there would still be a need for a foreign exchange control board, though no doubt in that case controls would be exercised mainly for the purpose of trading to the greatest extent possible with those nations which would balance their trade with us.

This does not mean for one moment that we in this group endorse everything that has been done by the foreign exchange control board. Many things have been brought to my attention that have seemed indefensible, though I quite realize that if those matters were investigated it might be found that while they appeared inadvisable there were grounds that really justified the action taken by the board. I have had several matters referred to me which I have taken up with the board.

On each occasion I was given every consideration, as was the question I raised.

Both the problems I have mentioned, that is the adverse balance of trade with the United States and the shrinking of our markets in Europe, are the logical outcome of certain policies carried out under the Bretton Woods agreement. I say that because so long as the exporting nations have the right to demand payment in their own currency instead of accepting the goods of other nations in return, I think there is bound to be trouble. In fact, I would say that as long as that situation exists we will have trouble in maintaining a balance of trade with European countries. That is what is happening today. True, our trade surplus with Europe is today apparently being reduced, but not so much by an increase in imports from those countries as by a reduction in exports from Canada to them.

The 1948 report of the foreign exchange control board makes this quite clear. At the bottom of page 14 of that report it is stated:

> However, if allowance is made for the rise in both export and import prices in 1948 it is apparent that though there was an appreciable rise in the volume of imports into Canada from these countries the contraction in the volume of our exports was the more important factor in reducing our trade surplus.

In the middle of the next page it is stated:

> Nearly every appreciable decrease in our exports to sterling area and other ERP countries can be traced to a change in import policy on the part of the foreign government concerned.

I point out that if nations were unable to obtain dollars with which to buy our goods, in order to avoid a greater deficit they were forced to reduce imports from this country. They had no other alternative. It is also interesting to note that that action was advised by the international monetary fund. In the report of the fund for 1948, on page 12, I find that European nations were advised that they should reduce their imports from the western area and try to increase their imports from Asia and Africa. Referring to Asia and Africa, the report says this:

> These areas might also be further developed as alternative sources for certain European imports and this would diminish European demands for imports from the western hemisphere.

I have heard some people become quite critical regarding Britain's action in buying from other nations instead of buying from Canada. In fact, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) seemed to be rather critical. Britain, however, has no alternative if we demand payment in dollars. Britain has not got the dollars and we will not supply her with the dollars because we have curtailed our imports from that country. As long as we continue a policy of that kind we are forcing Britain to trade elsewhere because she has not the dollars to trade with us.

Mr. Blackmore: We are forcing them into it.

Mr. Quelch: The report of the foreign exchange control board expresses regret that a greater balance was not restored by increased exports from Europe to Canada. At the bottom of page 15 the report states:

> There is, therefore, reason for some concern that these countries did not export more to us, particularly in view of the fact that the net effect of the government of Canada's import restrictions enforced during 1948 was to encourage imports from overseas countries. Notwithstanding the improvement noted, only eighteen per cent of our imports came from the United Kingdom and other sterling area countries in 1948, compared to twenty-nine per cent before the war.

It is all very well to express regret that Europe did not export more goods to us, but two countries are involved. Europe cannot export more goods to us unless we are prepared to buy them.

I noticed that Mr. W. G. Coventry, the British trade commissioner, speaking before the Canadian Federation of Agriculture at Saskatoon, stated that there would be a permanent market for a large volume of surplus Canadian farm products in the United Kingdom when British exports to Canada reach $500 million annually. It was for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that we opposed the Bretton Woods agreement. At that time, we prophesied that a policy of that kind with regard to our exports of Europe would be bound to fail because those countries would not be in a position to pay for them with dollars.

I should like to refer to a statement in the report of the foreign exchange control board which I think puts this whole problem in a nutshell. First, of all, I should like to quote this statement, then briefly analyse it. It is to be found on pages 6 and 7 and I will read first from page 6:

> If efforts on the part of the sterling area and ERP countries in the direction of greater exports to dollar countries are inadequate or fail to solve their dollar problem, then it may be expected that these countries will continue to place special restrictions on imports from dollar countries. The countries whose exports are affected by these restrictions will be confronted with the choice of finding some alternative use, at home or in other foreign markets, for the goods previously exported to the dollar-short countries or making special arrangements in an effort to retain these markets. These arrangements could involve the provision of the exports without payment in foreign exchange, through the extension of grants or credits, or special deals in which the exporting country agreed to use the proceeds of its exports to take more goods from its dollar-short customers even though these goods were higher in price than had to be paid elsewhere. To make room for these relatively high-priced imports it would be necessary to impose discriminatory import restrictions.

I wish to deal with two or three of the alternatives given in that statement. The statement is made that:

The countries whose exports are affected by these restrictions will be confronted with the choice of finding some alternative use, at home—

Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very important point. On most questions of trade, it is a matter of getting two countries to agree, but here is a suggestion that if we are not able to export goods we should try to find ways and means of utilizing some of these goods in the home market. It is solely within the power of this government to deal with that matter. I would suggest that many of the goods we are trying to export today could very well be utilized in Canada. After all, we have a tremendous potential market in this country if we would only develop it. Therefore, as the first step in dealing with this problem, I would suggest that the government take action to increase the purchasing power of the people in the lower income brackets to at least the point where they can have a decent standard of living; at least, to the point where they could purchase the agricultural products we have in abundance.

I would point out that that is not only the answer to finding a market for goods we cannot export, but it would be just as important if we were able to export goods and bring back goods in return, because if we bring back goods in return for our exports the same difficulty will apply. It will be difficult for us to find markets for our imports. The international monetary fund stressed that problem on page 13 of the report:

A high level of demand in the western hemisphere will be a necessary condition for increasing exports to this region. A further relaxation of tariffs and import quotas in the western hemisphere countries applicable to primary commodities as well as to manufactured goods would be helpful in encouraging the necessary increase and redirection of world trade. But recognition of these considerations should not obscure the fact that Europe's need to increase its exports to the western hemisphere arises not only from the exceptional circumstances of the transitional period but also from more enduring changes in the world economic structure.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, we are making a grave mistake if we look upon this as a merely temporary condition. We can trace the origination of this condition back to the year 1913. It was aggravated by two wars, but even if there had been no wars we would have had to face this question in the very near future. I think the government, therefore, ought to take heed of the recommendation that was made by the federation of agriculture regarding the allocation of food. I think the suggestion was put forward by Professor Hope, who is the economic adviser to the federation of agriculture. I understand the proposal is an extension of the old food-stamp plan. I remember when the food-stamp plan was first introduced in the United States, whereby surplus food could be sold to people in low-income groups at a fraction of its cost. The Christian Science Monitor pointed out that it was an adaptation of Mr. Douglas' social credit idea.

I do not care what you call it. I think it would be a good way to dispose of large quantities of agricultural products that are surplus. Perhaps I might just quote Professor Hope with regard to the way this plan might operate. I quote from the Alberta wheat pool budget of February 11, 1949 as follows:

Reducing farm production during a depression simply causes scarcity of food and increases the misery of unemployed and the low income groups of consumers. Therefore the only correct and sound solution under such circumstances is to maintain or restore to a decent level consumer purchasing power for food.

This statement was made by Dr. E. C. Hope, economist with the Canadian federation of agriculture in an address to the annual convention held at Saskatoon last week.

Dr. Hope said that, should we run into a major depression, no price support program for agriculture could last if it depended merely upon withdrawing supplies from the market by a government agency. Creating artificial scarcity, he said, is just aping industry. He suggested first a large scale useful public works program to maintain employment at reasonable levels, and second, a food allotment plan similar to the one established in the United States.

Under the United States food allotment plan a family can purchase for forty per cent of its monthly income a food coupon book which will buy sufficient food each month for an adequate diet. Each month or so the government calculates how much it costs to provide an adequate diet for different sized families. If the cost is $60 for a family of four, and the declared monthly income of that family is $100, a coupon book with a food value of $60 can be purchased by that family for $40. If the family income is only $80 the book can be bought for $32. If the family income is $150 a month or over it will not pay to purchase the coupon book. The difference between the $60 value of the coupon book and the cash paid by the family for the same is provided by the federal treasury.

A program of this sort, said Dr. Hope, would mean that every family would be guaranteed an adequate diet regardless of income. In times of depression and unemployment this would increase the demand for food because the people with low incomes would be able to bid for food against the people with higher incomes.

American economists have estimated that had such a plan been in operation in the United States during the 1930's, prices for farm products would have been maintained close to ninety per cent of their calculated parity level without any other price support program.

So I suggest to the government that it might be worth while thoroughly to investigate that plan as a means to helping maintain a demand for our own production and the imports we bring into this country, because that problem is going to grow steadily as time goes on. Once these nations that are getting on their feet are in the position not only to pay for their imports by their exports but in addition to start to pay back their loans in goods, how are we to maintain in this country markets for those goods? There is only one way, and that is by taking steps to increase purchasing power to the point where it can pay for those goods.

Mr. Blackmore: We might just as well do it first as last.

Mr. Irvine: Is the scheme in the nature of a subsidy?

Mr. Quelch: It is paid out of the federal treasury. Professor Hope does not say how it is to be financed. So long as this government is in power, it is its responsibility. I do not intend to suggest how to finance it. We have our own views as to how it should be done. Certainly it should not be done by increased taxation. If there is a lack of effective demand in the country and you are going to try to eliminate that lack of demand by increasing taxation to expand purchasing power you are going to get nowhere. The government would no doubt do it by borrowing from the chartered banks. We would suggest that it be done through the Bank of Canada. This paragraph goes on to say:

> These arrangements could involve the provision of the exports without payment in foreign exchange, through the extension of grants or credits, or special deals in which the exporting country agreed to use the proceeds of its exports to take more goods . . .

Well, Mr. Speaker, it might be done as the board suggests, by making gifts to countries, but I am not advocating that, unless the country is in a state where it cannot possibly carry on without that help. It might be done by loans, but I am not suggesting that it be done in that way if that country is in a position to pay by exports of goods. I am suggesting that the logical way in which to deal with that program is this. Instead of insisting on payment in dollars, we should be willing to accept sterling from the country, that is a blocked credit. Then with that blocked credit we could buy from Britain the goods we require. That is of course a straight bilateral deal; but that could very easily be put on a multilateral basis by establishing an international exchange so that blocked credits held in one country could be traded for the blocked credits held in another. It would be multilateral trade on a goods basis instead of on a dollar basis. It is interesting to note that the London chamber of commerce of England, the members of which are not the type of crack-pots the Minister of Agriculture was talking about when he was in England, but who are a bunch of hard-headed businessmen, men who probably have a greater understanding of international trade than has any other body of men in the world, are suggesting a system of that kind. I should like to quote briefly from "A Twentieth Century Economic System", a system endorsed by the London chamber of commerce. Referring to the matter with which I have just dealt, it states:

> The above is a simple example of bilateral trade, but multilateral trade could be provided for by the exchange controls of the participating nations having representatives at an international exchange where blocked credits in one country could be exchanged for those in another at the conventionally fixed exchange rates: the primary responsibility for establishing a contra account, by importing from the country to which a sale had been made, would remain with the exporting country. If it did not wish to do so that would be its affair and not that of the importing country, which would have done its part by establishing the necessary credit. The importing country would be entitled to cancel the credit, under a statute of limitations, if it were not used within seven years. The principle is that with which we are all familiar in internal trading: if you have a credit with a shop, you cannot take it out in cash but you clear it when you take goods.

It is interesting to recall that when Professor Keynes brought forward his white paper he suggested it might be wise to institute a statute of limitations; that is to say, where nations pile up credits in other countries, and refuse to accept goods in return, that over a period of time those credits might be cancelled. I would say that would probably be the greatest stimulus to getting countries exporting goods to take payment in goods; because if they do not take payment in goods, after that period of time they would get nothing and they would no longer have the power to demand that payment be made in dollars.

Under a system of that kind I think we would be able to greatly expand both our exports to Europe and our imports from that continent. To complete this paragraph:

> To make room for these relatively high-priced imports it would be necessary to impose discriminatory import restrictions.

I have never been able to understand why the price of goods coming in from Britain should be so high. It has always amused me because our friends to our right, the C.C.F., are always extremely critical about price levels in this country and emphatic about the need for controls. Yet here you have a socialist country in which prices are far higher than prices in this country. Why? I have heard it said—and I do not know whether it is correct; I would not like to say that it is correct—that the social services in that country are being maintained by countries paying Britain these high prices, and that the countries that are buying goods from Britain are in reality paying for those services. There may be something in that; because the countries who buy these goods pay high prices. The food in England is subsidized and therefore the people there get food at a lower rate. But when we get goods from England we must pay exorbitant prices. For many years I have bought goods that were made in England. Goods that I used to be able to buy quite reasonably—for instance, shirts like the one I have on—could be bought for $3. Now one must pay anywhere from $6.50 to $10 for the same shirt.

I have a nephew who was in the navy. He was in Ottawa last year and he bought a suit of clothes and an overcoat which cost him around $75. He said that if he had bought that suit and coat in England they would have cost him $120. He was going right back to England, yet he bought that suit and overcoat in Ottawa. Why? I think that is something which needs explaining and investigation, because if Britain is keeping her price levels so high that she cannot compete with other countries, then of course she has to accept a certain amount of responsibility for that situation. But even if for some reason or other Britain cannot keep her prices down we are faced with these alternatives. Suppose we make a gift. If we make a gift, we lose the goods of which we make the gift. If we make a loan, we stand a good chance of never being repaid, because the history of international loans has never been a happy one. If we make a loan, we are likely to lose that loan. If, on the other hand, we export goods to Britain and bring goods back, even at a high price, we could very well subsidize those goods which we bring back into this country to bring them down to the price level of Canada. We did that during wartime and again in order to maintain the price ceiling in this country. We imported goods, subsidized them, and sold them at the price level in this country. Surely, if we could carry out a policy of that kind in war, it could be done in peacetime.

The minister might say, well if the British price is 10 per cent higher, then it will cost us 10 per cent. In other words, we would be getting back at least 90 per cent of the value of our export. If we make a gift we get nothing. If we make a loan we are in danger of losing it all. At least we would get paid for 90 per cent of the exports we sent to that country. I am suggesting that it would be good business to import goods, even if we have to pay 10 per cent more than we should, subsidize them, and sell them at the current price in this country. It would be good business because it would help to maintain our production at a high level, and in the long run I do not think there is any doubt that we would benefit by business of that kind. I am hoping that eventually Britain will find it possible to bring her price levels down.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister would call that discrimination in favour of Britain.

Mr. Quelch: I notice that the report does mention this question of discrimination. It says:

> To make room for these relatively high-priced imports it would be necessary to impose discriminatory import restrictions.

Well, if we have signed an agreement that outlaws action of that kind, an action that is necessary to keep our economy in a state of flux, the quicker we get out of it the better.

I would say it is evident that the shortage of dollars in Europe is not going to be solved in the near future. I know that many people were hopeful that ERP would solve the shortage of dollars, and by 1952 Europe would be on its feet and in a position to pay for imports from the west with dollars. Well, anybody who has read the interim report of the organization for European economic recovery will realize that there is very little chance of that, or that by 1952 Europe will be in that happy position. I read the report through. I hold in my hand a summary of the report made by the London Economist, dated January 1949, and it puts it far better than I can put it; therefore I shall read what the Economist has to say regarding this report. It is as follows:

> It is in discussing the nineteen nations' estimate of their future trade that the officials of the OEEC have most firmly dispelled the idea that a complete solution can be found by 1952. In the first place, the governments themselves have produced estimates which leave a deficit of a billion dollars, largely with the western hemisphere, in western Europe's trading account for 1952. But the interim report questions whether the nations can achieve the scale of exports they have proposed. For instance, to reach the target for exports of $12 billion in 1952, the nations would need among other things to increase their exports to South America by $1 billion above the present level, a step which would seem to entail capturing half the United States' South American markets. Similarly, the increased exports to the United States itself would need to rise to $2·1 billion compared with $1·5 billion sent there in 1938. It is true that the United States is buying more abroad—50 per cent more in 1948 than in 1938—but western Europe's share in American imports has fallen from 23 per cent to 13 per cent. All in all the report concludes that it is impossible to put the level of visible and invisible exports in 1952 above $10 billion, and the deficit is likely to be nearer $3 billion than $1 billion. And even this revised figure demands prodigious efforts—an increase of 40 per cent above the present level of visible exports and the turning of an invisible deficit of $750 million in 1947 into a favourable balance of $1,300 million in 1952.

In concluding the summary the Economist had this to say:

> It has often been insisted in these columns that there were two elements in the dollar shortage—a European problem and an American problem. This is now clear for all the world to see. If Europe, after doing what it can, will still have a deficit of $3 billion, somebody will have a surplus of $3 billion. The one cannot be removed without the other. Certainly the debtors cannot, by taking thought and drawing up plans, remove their deficit unless the creditors will also take thought—and perhaps even draw up plans—about their surplus. The next stage should be a Marshall plan for the creditors.

Perhaps that may sound rather humorous, but I believe there is a lot of sound thought behind the suggestion. That is the point we emphasized time and again during the discussion of the Bretton Woods agreement in this house. We emphasized the point time and again that balancing international trade was the responsibility of two nations. It was the responsibility of the creditor nation just as much as it was the responsibility of the debtor nation, because unless the creditor nation was willing to accept goods in payment the debt could not be paid.

In view of the fact that we are told it is probable that these European nations will still face a deficit of around $3 billion by 1952, it is high time that greater consideration was given to dealing with this problem. As I say, the London Economist emphasizes the need for a Marshall plan for the creditor nations. By the time that the present one has run out in 1952, the production of all European nations will probably have reached approximately their maximum output, and then we must organize our own internal economy to such a degree that we shall be willing to accept the goods that these countries are anxious to send to us. That being so, it is quite evident that the real problem is still ahead. We think we have quite a large problem on our hands at the present time, a problem that unfortunately we have looked upon as a temporary one; but now we realize that it will be a problem that will be with us for many years, and therefore we should look to the future and take steps to deal with it.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder whether the government realizes that.

Mr. Quelch: Because, if I remember rightly, by 1952 Britain is supposed to start paying off the loan to Canada, and many of these other loans to European countries will then become due. Then those nations will not only have to pay for our exports to them with their exports, but they will have to start paying either the interest or the capital on the loans which had been made to them. It is quite obvious that they are not going to be able to pay it in dollars because, according to the report, they will not be able to pay for their imports with dollars. How are they possibly going to be able to pay dollars on our loans? If we are really sincere in suggesting that the debt should be paid, then the quicker we realize it can only be paid in goods the better; otherwise it will be merely a repetition of what happened after the first war, when every nation except Finland had to default on its war debts. That is not because they were not willing to pay those war debts in goods, but because creditor nations were not willing to accept payment in goods. Hence those debtor nations were forced to default.

I have tried to stress the fact that when anyone analyzes the situation he finds he really has a national problem to solve. It is the problem of maintaining the purchasing power of the people internally at a level high enough to buy imports which will be brought back in exchange for exports. Some people seem to think you can solve a small problem more quickly by making it larger. In other words, they think that because you cannot solve a problem on a national basis you will be able to solve it if you put it on the international basis. I would say that any effort to deal with that type of problem on an international basis would simply aggravate it greatly.

Mr. Alan Cockeram (York South): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made a speech which I thought was possibly as frank as any speech he has made on the question of the activities of the foreign exchange control board. I well remember that when in 1947 he brought down his budget he gave us a glowing account of the United States exchange situation as he thought it was at that time. I recall pointing out to him that he had on hand, at the then rate of expenditure, only enough United States funds to last until about November of that year, or a period of about five months.

I noticed that when speaking this afternoon he said that at the present time, at the present rate of expenditure, the foreign exchange control board has about five months' supply of United States funds on hand. The minister made some reference to the newspaper articles which appeared at the time our money was placed at parity with that of the United States, especially one which appeared in the Globe and Mail praising the government's attitude for having brought our money up to parity. In my opinion there can be no question that at that time the minister stated that one of the reasons for parity action was to stop inflation in Canada, and there can be no question about it that since our money was put back to par with the United States we in Canada have seen inflation run wild.

I also remember in that debate asking the minister about the flow of capital into Canada, and talking about risk capital and other kinds of capital which would come in to develop industries in this country. If I remember correctly, he did not want to see any money for bricks and mortar coming into this country.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is quite wrong.

Mr. Cockeram: I do not think I am.

Mr. Abbott: I know you are.

Mr. Cockeram: Certainly the minister gave me the brush-off at that time.

Mr. Abbott: No; I wanted no quick speculative capital in here.

Mr. Cockeram: And I am pretty sure you did not want the kind I had mentioned.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. Cockeram: However, that is immaterial. Times have changed. Now we see the minister trying to build up the thought in this country that there is a considerable amount of American money coming in.

However there is in Canada, I believe, considerable concern as to the effect the maintenance of the artificial value of our Canadian dollar is having not only upon the inflow of capital into this country, which will be used for purposes of development, but also in respect of the loss of our export trade.

I was going to repeat something the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) said, when he referred to page 6 of the report of the foreign exchange control board. However, I shall leave that out for the moment. I would, however, like to read from page 10 of the report of that foreign exchange control board for 1948, where it states:

> The most important change in Canada's commodity trade in 1948 was in the geographical distribution of our exports. The destination in Canadian commodity exports in pre-war and in recent years has been as follows:

I shall exclude the United States figures, although they show that the average from 1935 to 1939, as compared with the 1948 figure, is in the nature of an increase of 13 per cent. However, in those areas in which our great export market is to be found, the market which we as Canadians must maintain if we are going to be a prosperous country—and I am referring to the British isles and the sterling area as a whole—there is shown a very marked decrease. This is more particularly emphasized when one considers that in the 1935-39 period commodity and farm prices were lower than as indicated in the 1948 export figures.

We find that in the 1935-39 period we exported to the United Kingdom 37 per cent of our exports, whereas in 1948, in spite of the increased costs of all supplies sold to the British isles, we were down to 23 per cent. In the total sterling area and ERP countries we decreased our exports from 63 per cent in the 1935-39 period to 50 per cent in 1948, or a reduction of practically one-third. And this notwithstanding the fact that in the earlier period prices were much lower.

To me, as one who thinks of the future prosperity of Canada, those figures are most significant. They should give reason for thought to everyone who wants to see our farmers have a market for their goods and our factories a market for their manufactured articles. These figures prove that we have lost a certain amount of trade in the last few years. In spite of the glowing remarks this afternoon by the minister concerning the tremendous dollar volume of trade, it does seem to me that in the last year or so this government, seeing our market slipping away from us, might certainly have given consideration to a barter deal, if you like—some kind of deal. And in this I believe I am following up what was said by the hon. member for Acadia whereby under such an arrangement we in this country would have bought steel, electrical equipment, coal and many other commodities from the British isles, commodities which they have exported to countries behind the iron curtain, with which they have made trade agreements running up to ten-year periods, and supplies of which there has been a shortage in Canada.

We now find ourselves in the position where, with the exception of the wheat agreement, we have only three short-term agreements left with the British isles. I say this situation can be traced to the policy of the government in having placed a fictitious value on the Canadian dollar. It is true that this afternoon the minister said that, by placing our dollar at a 10 per cent discount, purchases from the United Kingdom would have been 10 per cent higher in cost. At the same time, in view of the circumstances, it would have been of much greater advantage to Canada if the British had had 10 per cent greater purchasing power with their pound, and such a condition would have been more beneficial to us.

I consider the recent report of the foreign exchange control board, that for the year 1948, is evidence of the fact that this supposedly non-political board, which parliament is asked to continue in office for a further two years, is aware of the adverse effect of the artificial value of our dollar.

What they are trying to do in this report is to allay the growing concern of the Canadian people by presenting only a part of the facts so far as the inflow of capital from the United States is concerned. In its report for the year 1948 the foreign exchange control board, in its reference to the inflow of capital from the United States, has confined its report to capital for investment in Canadian properties or business and the increase in book value of United States direct investments in Canada. This method of conveying a false impression to this parliament and to the country is not in accordance with the known facts as to the inflow and outflow of capital, and is a departure which can be justified only on the ground of political expediency.

In the reports to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) of the foreign exchange control board in the past, this parliament and the Canadian people were given a true picture which included not only capital coming to the country for direct investment in plants, but as well the net result of sales and purchases of securities between Canada and other countries. In the report of the foreign exchange control board under date of March 1, 1946, the facts in connection with the movement of capital were dealt with in this way, and I refer to pages 27 and 28 of the report dealing with capital inflows:

> In the later years of the war, the inflow of capital to Canada from the United States became an important source of exchange. The inflow took the form mainly of the purchase of securities by United States investors.

That is what the minister stated this afternoon.

> The movement first become marked in 1943 when gross sales of outstanding securities for United States dollars amounted to nearly $200 million, or almost twice the total in 1942. While there was some falling off in 1944, the total for the year still exceeded $100 million, and in 1945 rose again to more than $200 million.

That report, with all of the facts in connection with the inflow of capital, was put out in 1946 four months before the parity action of the government when Canada established an artificial value of our dollar. In this connection I might say that the report of the Bank of Canada this year is in an unprecedented form completely different from what it has been in previous years. It does seem to me that the powers that be in the Bank of Canada have tried to make this report more difficult to understand than it was before. There was a true report in 1946 of all facts in connection with the inflow of capital, four months before the parity action of the government. The foreign exchange control board report for 1948, dealing with the inflow of capital, does not follow the practice followed in the past of giving all the facts, but rather confines itself to capital inflow for direct investment purposes in Canadian properties or business, and then reaches an all-time high for political reports when it states as follows on page 22:

> It is apparent from the above table that the factors which operated to reduce the purchase of publicly issued Canadian securities by United States investors in recent years have not acted as a deterrent to the provision of very large amounts of risk capital for direct investment in Canadian business.

You will notice that in the Bank of Canada's report they do not tell us how much of this money was brought into Canada for, as they say, direct investment in Canadian business. In other words, they do not break it down to tell us what kind of business this money was invested in in Canada. In this connection the Minister of Finance stated this afternoon that there was no difficulty in bringing in a great deal of money from the United States, but I recall very well that last spring a man from Texas wanted to bring in $10 million for oil development in Alberta. I went to see Mr. Graham Towers and Mr. Donald Gordon of the Bank of Canada, and as far as I know I explained the circumstances and the situation as to this man bringing in this large sum of United States funds. I arranged for an interview for him with these officials whereby any difficulties that appeared on the surface might be overcome, and this large sum of money brought in for development in the west.

As a result of the interviews that were had at a later date with the officials of the Bank of Canada, this man from Texas decided that Canada was not a safe place to bring his money because the restrictions that were placed on him were so great that he could not take the chance. We lost that opportunity to get a very large sum of money for development purposes.

The paragraph which I have just read from the 1948 report of the foreign exchange control board states that risk capital from the United States has not been retarded in coming into Canada by reason of the dollar parity. It certainly is retarded by reason of the dollar parity, and it is retarded to a greater degree by the restrictions that are placed on money brought into Canada by the bureaucrats of the Bank of Canada and the foreign exchange control board. The figures given in the report are misleading, and they do not take into account the great forward movement of the development which can be expected in Canada with the influx of risk capital directed to this country where there is a chance of reward for those people who send their money into the country. Everyone familiar with this type of capital knows that it has dried up through recent years in comparison with what it would have been without government interference. The summary under the report of capital influx is, in my opinion, very misleading.

I stated that two years ago the minister did not wish risk capital, or that kind of money to be brought into Canada.

Mr. Abbott: May I tell my hon. friend that he is quite wrong on that. If he will look up the record he will see that what I am saying is true.

Mr. Cockeram: The minister says I am quite wrong. I certainly do not think I am wrong. Just now I was talking about bricks and mortar, and now I am talking about risk capital. I remember that at that time the minister certainly did not desire risk capital—

Mr. Abbott: All I did not desire was this quick speculative in-and-out money. Look up the record.

Mr. Cockeram: The minister can gloss things over as he likes, but I think if he goes through the record he will see that he did not wish this type of money, which today we call risk money, to come into Canada to develop the country. I advise the minister to read history; I want to tell him to read the history of the development of the United States, the South American states, South Africa, the Dutch East Indies, Australia and Canada. He will find out where the money came from for the original opening up and development of those countries. It was risk capital which came from continental Europe to a very great extent, and in later years money from the United States. Therefore when the minister states that he does not want to see risk capital come into the country—

Mr. Abbott: He has never said any such thing.

Mr. Cockeram: You have your idea of what you said and I have mine.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is making an assertion, and I want him to quote what I said. I challenge him to quote what I said.

Some hon. Members: Address the Chair.

Mr. Cockeram: You can make your reply later on. You know quite well—

Mr. Abbott: My challenge is there. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that I never said any such thing.

Mr. Cockeram: I have no doubt in my own mind as to what the minister said two years ago. He may be able to turn it around; he is a smart lawyer and he can do as he likes with language, as he did with me a short time ago when he spoke about personal interest in matters brought before this house. But that sort of thing does not worry me at all. I say the minister did state at that time that he did not wish that kind of money in Canada.

Mr. Abbott: I rise to a question of privilege. I challenge my hon. friend to point to any place in Hansard where I made any such statement; and unless he is prepared to quote Hansard I ask him to withdraw.

Mr. Cockeram: That is not a point of privilege at all; the minister is making a speech.

Mr. Abbott: Of course it is a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Cockeram: Why should I withdraw? I certainly do not intend to withdraw. You can take a jump in the lake. Perhaps the minister will let me get on and not interrupt me any more. I say I am correct in that statement; but I shall come back to the minister later on. In 1946, when existing conditions were recorded in a straight, factual manner—I am now talking about this political report of the foreign exchange control board—we had a net capital inflow on the sale and purchase of securities of $134·6 million for all countries, and a favourable balance with the United States of $170·2 million. In 1947 we had an outflow of capital from Canada amounting to about $18 million, in spite of the figures that appear in the report of the foreign exchange control board. That report does not show this result, but it is shown by the figures of the bureau of statistics. In the first eleven months of 1948 the outflow of capital amounted to $17·6 million. Yet the minister talks, as he did very glibly this afternoon, of all the risk money coming into Canada. When we get into committee I think he should produce figures to show just how he arrives at that conclusion, and just how much of that money was put into bricks and mortar.

Here is the case of a board acting under power and authority delegated by this parliament, and this resolution asks that we delegate that power for a further period of two years. The minister gave no reasonable statement as to why a period of two years was selected, but it does seem to me this board has just dug itself in and proposes to stay dug in. Instead of the one-year period they have had up to the present, they now ask for two years and sixty days so they can be sure of their jobs for an extended period of time. The foreign exchange control board submit to this parliament, through the Minister of Finance, a report prepared from a political angle by a supposedly non-political board in order to justify its actions in the past; and I say that without reservation. As one who has been interested in the question of exchange for some years, who as a young man came back from the first war and served in New York in the foreign exchange branch of one of the Canadian banks, I think I know a little about exchange. At a later date I shall have something to say about the size of the staff required to carry out the work of this board. I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that the the political complexion of the 1948 report of the foreign exchange control board is something that goes far beyond any powers ever conferred upon that board or ever intended to be exercised by the board at the time parliament established it in the first place.

There is one other aspect of this report which transcends even the injection of politics, and which in effect strikes at the very root of our parliamentary system of government. I refer to what is apparently becoming a practice in this country of boards and commissions, acting under powers delegated by parliament, actually laying down government policy. This is one of those boards. Very often you see Donald Gordon or Graham Towers or somebody else making speeches that should be made by the minister in this house, just as we find officials of the Department of Finance going around making speeches about things which later become government policy. It would not surprise one if the article in this evening's Citizen about a budget leak is not a true statement.

The objections I have raised already to this report indicate in no uncertain terms the bureaucratic domination of the government by the foreign exchange control board. The report of the Bank of Canada for 1948 is another glaring example. It is in a form entirely different from the reports of other years. I remember saying two years ago that the report of the foreign exchange control board was made up in such a way that, while it may not have been intended to actually deceive members of parliament, it did get them all muddled up so they could not find anything at all in it. This inroad of bureaucratic domination, which is becoming more evident all the time, calls for this parliament to exercise its responsibility to the Canadian people and call a halt to the powers given this department and this government.

This afternoon the minister said something in reference to the gold bonus. I had not intended to touch on that subject at all. I think the minister well knows that the gold mining industry has no desire to be a bonused industry in Canada. In the past they have fought their own battles, and the troubles with which they have been beset during the last few years have been brought upon them by the actions of this government. I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) knows as well as I do that when this government needed gold during the war, before the United States came in, he was one of the ministers who approached the gold mining people and asked them to produce to the very maximum. The industry responded to the request he made and saved Canada's finances at that time, but at great expense to itself mining companies mined their higher grade ores and as a result paid taxes on fictitious profits as they did not carry on the development work they are now called upon to undertake.

While we are on the subject of gold—and it all comes under this exchange regulation—the minister has stated many times in the past that there is no free market for gold the world over. I would like to show him a couple of letters that I have, one from Denmark and the other from another country, asking for quotations on gold, to be paid for in United States dollars on the presentation of documentary evidence to a Canadian bank. So there is a market for this gold at higher prices than the gold mines are receiving today, and I think the minister might at least take cognizance of that fact. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that this foreign exchange control bill is now on the books and that it has a few days to run. I think the minister should explain to us why he needs that additional year—two years all told. He should explain why Mr. Towers, Mr. Rasminsky and these other high officials in the foreign exchange control board believe they should have two years instead of the one year. After all, this is an election year.

Mr. Mitchell: How do you know?

Mr. Cockeram: The appearances are all there. A bonus has been declared to the poor fellows from Hong Kong who should have had that money a long time ago. However, Mr. Speaker, when this measure comes up for second reading I shall have more to say.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the hon. member who has just sat down that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did a superb job in presenting the case for the government. As a matter of fact, he went a little bit too far and presented an even better case for the opposition than any of them have been able to present. Then he took the occasion to kick it full of holes, so much so that I thought the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) would throw his notes out of the window.

It will delight the house to know there is a member from Toronto who does not agree with the other members from Toronto as to what should be done about gold mines. It is crystal clear that devaluation of the Canadian dollar, or whatever you wish to call it, has become a plank in the platform of the party opposite. The party would adopt that favourite if somewhat clumsy description used by hon. members up until today, "to let the dollar find its own level", as if they were not talking at all about a standard of values but rather about a septic tank. Today, the term used was, "the true economic level". I see from a report of an interview with the leader of the opposition, dated last Friday, the term he uses is "an honest level". This much we can say, that from the suggestions made by the opposition this afternoon one would gather that the remedy is an automatic, self-adjusting, Drew's patent dollar. My own opinion is that, if he were fortunate enough to secure office, after he had been in office about three or four years these dollars would have about as much value as Bennett's buggies.

He asserts that the Progressive Conservative party says that is the way they want it. If they ever succeed, it will mean a good deal to a number of chosen people in Toronto. It will mean joy in the brokerage rooms, but it will mean hardship in the kitchens.

An hon. Member: And work in the mines.

Mr. Croll: Since the kitchens outnumber the board rooms about a thousand to one, I suggest that in a democracy they are far more important.

There are two possible explanations for our friend's espousal of the present policy. I assume it is honestly advanced as a solution of a difficult problem, the existence of which no one denies; that is one thing. If, on the other hand, it is cynically advanced to satisfy those who give to their party its greatest political support, then that is another matter entirely. If it is honestly advanced, the kindest thing I can say for it at the present time is that they are not thinking this problem through. If it is cynically advanced, there are in the dictionary no words I could possibly use to apply to that particular policy.

I think we can sum up the effect of the policy by saying it will increase the price of both gold and oranges. As everyone in this house knows or should know, a few very powerful people in this country, particularly in my own province, are in the gold-selling business and, as a useful sideline, they run political parties. As everyone also knows, a great many people in this country, undoubtedly the majority of the people in this country, are in the orange-buying line, particularly if they have young children to feed. If you balance the effect of this policy, you will see it means greater wealth for those citizens who happen to be in the gold-producing business and heavier budgets for those citizens who happen to be buying oranges and imports from the United States.

I do not suggest for a moment that these two groups of citizens do not overlap. Gold miners and their supporters, their political spokesmen, also have children and they do buy oranges. I think a word of commendation may be due to them for their willingness to pay an additional ten per cent or whatever it may be for the oranges that come from the United States, provided that they get an additional ten per cent or whatever it might be for the fine ounce of their gold. In the political language of some of my friends opposite, this is known as equality of sacrifice.

Our friends might say that may be a very narrow view of the matter; it may even be a distorted view. A dollar that was officially worth perhaps ninety cents in United States funds, would help not only the gold mining boys on Bay Street and St. James Street—

An hon. Member: You are on Bay Street yourself.

Mr. Croll: —they say it would help a lot of other people in the export business. It would enable Canadians to compete with their United States rivals because Canadians could offer their products at ten per cent, or whatever percentage it turned out to be, cheaper. They could undersell the United States competitor and they would pay their operating costs in the depreciated Canadian dollars, including of course what has already been pointed out to this house, the big item of labour costs. There would be no suggestion of a compensatory rise in wages so that the worker's family could meet the increased price of oranges, coal and other imported goods they need. That would ruin everything; after all, a company executive would also be confronted with higher coal costs and higher prices for oranges. So it would be a matter of equality of sacrifice and share and share alike.

It would seem that this is the proper place to mention the small point of percentage of income required for living costs. I think that what we have failed to grasp up till now—and, Mr. Speaker, it cannot be denied —is that when you impoverish the Canadian dollar you impoverish the Canadian worker and the Canadian farmer.

Let us examine for a moment this idea of Canadian competition. At first it sounds highly attractive. With a ninety-cent dollar we could step into the markets of the world and undersell the Americans who would have to quote in one-hundred-cent dollars. At least, we could do that in cases where the Canadian firm was independent, or where the Canadian producer was not forbidden by his head office to export, or where the American head office had figured it would be good business to shift its export operations to the Canadian subsidiary. There we are with Canadian-produced goods entering world markets with a ten per cent price advantage over American goods.

I am sure that by now members of this house are beginning to murmur to themselves that the competition is not entirely American. There is British, Scandinavian and Swiss competition; and what is more, on top of all that we are beginning to get a little bit of Japanese and German competition. That is all quite true; I shall deal with it in just a moment, and explain why the result of other competition makes still more questionable the proposition put forward by the opposition.

For the moment, let us adhere to the American competition which is, after all, the big competition in the free markets of the world.

We would have, let us say, something like a ten per cent advantage over our American competitors; but for almost everything we export, for the raw materials that form the bulk of our sales abroad, there is a world price set daily on the commodity markets in New York, or established by private negotiations between the big producers and the big consumers. These world prices are established in American dollars which are, after all, the world currency. Let me ask my friend for an honest answer to this question: Would that price in American dollars for, say, copper or lead or newsprint, be affected one whit by the process of devaluing our dollar? Or would it simply mean that the Canadian producers of these commodities would get a higher profit in terms of Canadian dollars, provided their wage rates stayed down, despite the higher living costs which devaluation would impose upon the wage earners?

Then, to meet the objections that have been raised by the champions of the debased dollar, let us turn to the exporters of Canadian manufactured goods for whom the hon. member for York South (Mr. Cockeram) attempted to say a few words. They are having a hard time of it today. Let us consider their case as sympathetically as we can. They are pioneering for Canada as a world trader in new and distant fields. Will the ninety-cent dollar help them to market their finished goods against their competitors not only from the United States but from every other industrialized country in the world?

I ask the house this question: Will it help them to sell Coleman lamps in South Africa, or Moffat stoves in Bolivia, or O'Keefe's beer in Pakistan, to mention only three of our major exporters and to keep it as close to home as possible for gentlemen opposite? Of course the answer is no. The trouble with ninety per cent of the markets which would normally be open to Canadian producers of finished goods is not a shortage of cash but a shortage of the right kind of cash. It would not matter particularly to importers in most countries if they could get a bargain in terms of Canadian dollars as against American dollars. They have not either kind of dollars and they simply could not buy on dollar terms. One after another Great Britain, Sweden, South Africa and Mexico have run out of dollars, any kind of dollars, and so they have closed their doors to imports of goods for which the sellers required payment in dollars. This, as my friends well know or should know but refuse to admit, is our dilemma today as a trading nation, as a nation which must trade abroad to maintain prosperity. If any problem surmounts party lines, I think this one does. But what have my friends to offer? Have they any sort of solution? So far, they have not suggested a solution.

Mr. Manross: Have you?

Mr. Croll: We have.

Mr. Lennard: What is it?

Mr. Croll: Keep the government in office. If my friends opposite have a solution to offer, it certainly would not be the cheap-dollar solution so glibly advanced by the gentlemen in the opposition today and so glaringly designed merely to increase the wealth of those who have a surfeit of wealth at the expense of those who face a weekly problem with the food budgets of their families.

Mr. Lennard: The same old stuff.

Mr. Croll: It is worth while perhaps to note—

Mr. Jackman: You will get elected.

Mr. Croll: While you are around, I will not get licked, and you know that too well.

Mr. Jackman: I said you will get elected if you keep on talking like that.

Mr. Croll: I wish the hon. member would stop mumbling.

Mr. Lennard: There was no mumbling about it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Croll: Did the hon. member say that I would be elected?

Mr. Jackman: Yes.

Mr. Croll: I start to shake in my boots. I do not trust his judgment. But I thank him just the same.

It is worth while to note that those whom hon. members opposite claim to champion—the exporters themselves—have not to my knowledge leaped forward with a demand that our dollar, as my friends so inaptly put it, "be allowed to find its own level." When I say exporters, you will realize that I mean not those dealers in essential raw products to whom a devalued dollar would mean an automatic increase in price; I mean those others who send their finished or processed goods abroad to compete in the open market against similar goods from other countries, on the bases of price, quality and Canadian standards of fair dealing.

These estimable firms have an active organization called the Canadian exporters association. They have a first-class trade paper known as the Canadian Exporter. I have yet to learn, Mr. Speaker, that either this organization or its trade paper has endorsed the devaluation which our friends across the way are advancing as the salvation of these very exporters. They have not done so, in spite of the fact that in a handful of dollar markets, and just a handful, and I can name them, Venezuela, Panama, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Cuba, devaluation might help. Their trade paper, which takes a realistic approach, has not argued for devaluation, as have the Bay Street gold miners, which, to put it as kindly as I know how, will never advocate a policy, or force a policy upon its spokesmen, if that policy runs counter to the interest of those who own the mines.

This is one of those occasions, Mr. Speaker, when I wish that parliamentary practice permitted an hon. member on this side of the house to borrow a weapon with which our democratic processes equip our opponents. I wish it were possible somehow to move a vote of non-confidence in the sincerity of His Majesty's loyal opposition, and to apply it specifically to the single issue of devaluation, which up to the present time is the solitary plank which has miraculously been suspended in mid-air over the site where we should have expected a finished platform to arise long before this time.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): It is rather amusing, Mr. Speaker, to hear the statements of the recent speaker, and it was particularly amusing to hear him quote the opinions of certain industries in Canada. His whole speech can be judged by an example of what he has just said. He mentioned specifically the Coleman lamp company, the Moffat stove company, and one other company, and said that they were happy about the policy of the foreign exchange control board and of the government. As it happens, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a letter from the export manager of the Coleman lamp company, and I shall quote just one paragraph from it:

> We believe that the export trade of the whole world, but particularly also of Canada, is greatly hampered by the many regulations to which our monetary system is subjected. Personally, I can only hope that in the not too distant future the policy of the Canadian government will change in this respect.

Again this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) played the game of the clever fox leading the hounds astray. This afternoon the Minister of Finance discussed the problem of dollar depreciation. The problem is not depreciation; it is convertibility. That is the main problem which is being accentuated by the action of the present administration. We have not got a convertible currency. Let me emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that it is a convertible currency that we need. Until we get a convertible currency we are going to be hamstrung by the actions of others and the actions of our own administration.

I want to go back briefly because I supported the Bretton Woods agreement. I supported it on December 6, 1945, at page 3075 of Hansard, in these terms:

> There is, however, the method by which the parity of exchanges shall be fixed, and that appears in article 20, section 4. It merely states that each country shall settle its own parity of its own exchange. That is to me, Mr. Speaker, the crux of the whole question—the method of arriving at parity or of arriving at the currency exchange value in gold of the various members of the agreement. At the present time the huge majority of currencies have a fictitiously high value in terms of the United States dollar, in terms of gold and in terms of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Irvine: Who is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. Adamson: I am quoting what I said in 1945 on the Bretton Woods agreement.

An hon. Member: A real authority.

Mr. Adamson: I continued:

> We in Canada are dependent upon a stable exchange. Probably we are more dependent upon stable rates of exchange than any other country in the world at the present time. We are in the focal point, situated between the sterling bloc and the gold exchange currency of the United States . . . If we as a small country cannot come to some arrangement by which our currency and our trade is not at the behest of the great trading nations which can control managed currencies, and which, because of their great wealth, can jockey with international currencies to our disadvantage; if we as a long-term exporting country cannot be sure that we trade with a currency which is convertible, exchangeable and stable, our future is extremely dark.

We are now in that serious position which I foresaw in 1945. There was no question of devaluation. There was the question that our currency should be exchangeable and it was my hope at that time that the Canadian dollar, through the operation of the Bretton Woods agreement, would be an exchangeable currency. Unfortunately, because of the fictitiously high value placed on currencies by the various members of the agreement, the Bretton Woods agreement has failed to work and the international monetary fund is more abused than honoured. Until the condition obtains where we can exchange our currency freely into the currencies of all nations we are going to be faced by an ever-constricting world market. I say that, Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that our exports last year were the greatest in Canadian history.

I want to mention one thing which I think shows what the policy of the British government is likely to be. I shall quote Sir Hubert Henderson, who is the president of the Royal Economic Society. In the current issue of the Economic Journal he has this to say about the British position with regard to currency and discrimination:

> I submit, then, that for correcting a huge maladjustment in the balance of payments, such as still confronts Great Britain, counter inflationary financial measures, though helpful, cannot suffice, and that exchange-rate variations might be harmful. It is essential to keep down the volume of our import purchases as effectively as we now do by means of import restrictions. And not only to keep down their total volume but, more particularly, that part of them that comes from what we call hard-currency sources. The principle of non-discrimination does not fit a world in which the whole international balance of payments has been upset.

What does that mean? It means simply this, that the policy of the United Kingdom, the policy of the London School of Economics, which is the socialist school of Sir Stafford Cripps, is going to follow a discriminatory policy against the hard-currency countries. In other words, we are going to be discriminated against in Canada because we are a hard-currency country. There it is, in black and white, from the highest authority in England.

This government—and any government of Canada—is going to have to face that problem. We are, I think, going to say "Our United Kingdom exports are stopped", or else we are going to have to arrange some methods by which our currency is exchangeable into United Kingdom currency. That is the problem facing the government at the present time. I say in all respect it is the problem which they have brought on themselves by their action of tying our dollar rigidly to the American dollar.

The report of the foreign exchange control board is most illuminating. The paragraph quoted this afternoon by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) is pure Schachtism, in the very essence; it is the same policy as followed by Germany prior to the last war; it is the same policy of having a number of currencies and offering them at fictitious prices for various purposes, and it will have exactly the same result.

There is in this report a section at page 25 which I consider extremely illuminating. It sets out the problem in these words:

> Until recently there was little occasion for Canadian exporters to seek to export on terms other than those specified above.

And that is a reference to the original terms of the foreign exchange control board. It continues:

> With the growing severity of import restrictions imposed by many countries, however, an increasing number of cases have arisen where Canadian exporters find it impossible to sell goods on the prescribed terms of payment. In these cases alternative proposals for payment are sometimes made by foreign buyers; and where they are acceptable to the Canadian exporters the board has indicated its readiness to consider applications for the necessary permits. The following appear to be the main types of case which warrant consideration.

The first case is merely a case where extended time credit is asked. But the second case—and this I suggest is the real admission of failure of the foreign exchange control board—is this:

> Exports to previously established markets for payment in blocked foreign currency, i.e., foreign currencies which are not freely convertible into United States dollars or sterling. In these cases, the exporter must of course be prepared to assume the risks involved of being unable to convert the foreign currency into Canadian dollars for an indeterminate period.

If that means anything, it means a free exchange. It is an advocacy of free exchange, allowing the exporter to sell in a foreign country and in a foreign currency, that foreign currency, under our present system, not being convertible into Canadian dollars. My first quarrel with the foreign exchange control board under its present set-up is that some machinery should be made available for the conversion of that foreign currency into Canadian dollars, and that machinery should be left in the hands of the exporters and the chartered banks. The next, and again a very significant admission, is found in section 4:

> Exports to be paid for by the acceptance of goods of equivalent value.

If that means anything, it is straight and absolute barter. Receiving goods of an equivalent value is a definition for barter. Here, in the report of the foreign exchange control board, we have an advocacy of, first of all, free exchange, and secondly of barter. I assure you that those are important and serious considerations.

I believe there is a way out which we can take to overcome the blocked currencies of the various countries with which we find it so difficult to trade; and I shall come to that in a moment. However, this afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) emphasized, and rightly, the difficulty of trading with countries which exercise this same vicious foreign exchange control. He was quite right.

Last June when speaking in the house I mentioned that the total number of permutations and combinations, if every country had a barter deal with every other country, including all the countries of Europe and South America, was about 326 barter deals. Last June there were actually 156 barter deals already consummated between those countries. That is economic chaos. That is the condition in which we are forced to trade, and no one emphasizes more than I do the seriousness of that condition.

But under the present system of making our dollar almost the hardest currency in the world to get, we are excluding ourselves from every hope of becoming a factor in the external trade of those countries.

What are the methods by which we can overcome the trade barriers erected against us? What can we do in order to increase foreign trade? What can we do to prevent ourselves suffering from the most gigantic squeeze play in international history? Our prices are right and our products are good. Our exporting firms have great ability. Our financial institutions have been world traders for generations. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we should allow a great deal more latitude to these institutions to work out their own deals. We should give a great deal more authority to the foreign exchange departments of the chartered banks to deal with individual firms in Canada and individual firms elsewhere in order to work out their own deals. I realize that the foreign exchange control board is moving in that direction, but under this control measure to have to go through a government agency is always a stultifying control, and a restriction on the freeness of trade. No matter what the control is, it is always a restrictive control.

Coming to the position of our gold and dollar reserves, I spoke about this before, but today the latest figures available show that the total Canadian authorization for Marshall-plan purposes is $671 million. Deduct that from our holdings of foreign exchange and gold, and you will see that our situation today is an extremely perilous one. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has no reasons at all for complacency or satisfaction over the situation. As a matter of fact, had it not been for the Marshall plan offshore purchases in Canada, our gold and hard currency situation would be desperate. That it is not due to a very far-seeing and extremely generous act by the former secretary of state of the United States, General Marshall, and by the present administration of that country.

Of these purchases of $671 million some $246 million are wheat and $58 million are wheat flour. If, as is extremely likely, wheat is declared surplus in the United States, on that basis half of our Marshall plan purchases will be immediately cut off, and I submit that with a cut of $300 million in Marshall-plan purchases our exchange and dollar situation will be extremely critical even if the purchases of base metals and other Marshall-plan offshore purchases continue. Entirely apart from our trading position, entirely apart from our situation with regard to the United States Marshall-plan purchases, we have two alternatives. We can either take steps now to rectify the situation or we can continue, and no matter what happens we shall be subject to an economic squeeze which we shall find it impossible to overcome.

Two things are happening today. Our historic European market is being closed off, partly by force and, I submit, partly by design. We are becoming ever more dependent for our exports on the United States market. I assure this house that, with the enormous productivity of the United States, immediately there is a surplus of goods and a surplus of materials in the United States our exports to the United States will fall off just as Niagara Falls drops over the brink. That may happen a great deal more quickly than anyone in the house thinks. Therefore we are faced with a barter economy being closed against us, and a market in the United States subject to the tremendous possibilities of production creating surpluses in that country and shutting us off from that market, in all manufactured goods.

What are the alternatives which we might follow? We might, and I believe we should, endeavour to make the Canadian dollar a convertible currency. What do I mean by "convertible currency"? Every currency must have some common denominator to which it is related. The historic common denominator to which all currency is related is, of course, gold. Today the operation of the gold standard is impossible. There is no currency in the world, with the possible exception of the Swiss franc, which could stand fixed convertibility into gold. When I say no currency I mean the United States dollar as well. If the United States offered to sell United States gold for $35 an ounce and let their own nationals buy it, the hoard at Fort Knox would not last very long. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we must arrange some tie, some convertibility between the Canadian dollar and gold; and the obvious, classical machinery, which was used by Great Britain all through the last century and until the gold standard was established, was the free bullion or free gold market, call it what you will. On this market you could buy or sell bullion at a price agreed upon between the buyer and the seller; and that is the only way you can get the true value of any currency in terms of gold, what people are prepared to pay for it, not what any government may say it is worth. It is a question of what it will sell for in the open market under the law of supply and demand; that is the true value of any currency.

I suggest that the first thing we should do is to go to the international monetary fund and tell them very definitely that we are suffering through the operation of the present economic system, and ask for the establishment of a free gold market in Canada. I have in my hand a letter from a United States economist who today has given me permission to use it. He is Mr. Henry Hazlitt, who writes an article for Newsweek, and who is one of the foremost advisers to American business. I quote one paragraph:

> I heartily approve of your proposal that Canada should re-establish a free gold market.
> It could not do so, of course, without meeting the strongest possible opposition from the international monetary fund, the British government, and from our own. But if the Canadian government maintained sufficient courage and clearsightedness to go ahead, nevertheless, the American government would soon have to follow suit and the fund, the British government and every other government that is now trying to combine inflation with exchange control would have to readjust its thinking, and the first step, at least, would have been taken toward the return to a real international gold standard.

Now I want to say a word as to one of the other advantages of convertibility into gold. Your purchaser of Canadian goods would have an opportunity to exchange his own currency in terms of gold in order to buy Canadian dollars, because the market would be open. Admittedly many countries would find their currencies extremely low when they came to purchase gold; nevertheless they would be able to purchase it and effect a trading transaction, which they are unable to do at the present time. What about the Canadian exporter? Exactly the same principle would apply; he would be able to offer his goods in terms of a foreign currency, and would be able to exchange that foreign currency into Canadian dollars in terms of gold at will. The classic trading pattern, call it old-fashioned if you like, is not going to return easily; but the present restricted, controlled and impossible trading position can cause us nothing but the most severe headaches in the very near future.

As to the policy of devaluation, I have always said that vis-à-vis the United States we are in a strong position. Our economy is strong. The reason it is strong has nothing to do with this government, however. Our economy is strong in comparison with the United States simply because the United States is becoming a have-not country. It is running out of many basic raw materials and becoming more and more dependent upon Canada for those materials. They find themselves dependent upon us particularly for many of the base metals, for newsprint and many other things. On that account I would have no fear at all that if we took this action our dollar would sell at a great discount. Our dollar would be freely convertible, and free convertibility is an essential to any currency. We hear that if our dollar went to a discount of ten per cent, coal would cost more. Well, Mr. Speaker, in 1936 I paid $8 a ton for coal. Today I am paying $18 for the same coal, or 125 per cent more than I paid at the time these agreements were made. That is a very serious matter; but for anyone to say that a discount of ten per cent would cripple this country is sheer nonsense. We have withstood shocking advances in the prices of many commodities such as coal and oil. These are the chances we have to take. There is no safe, easy way of walking through the valley without running any danger. That is not the way the world is constituted. There is the way of this government, which is leading us directly into a chaotic impasse. On the other hand we can take courageous action now and see that the essential quality of free convertibility into gold is restored to our dollar.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take a great deal of the time of the house, but I would like an opportunity of saying a few words on a matter which to me and to certain sections of my constituency is important. In prefacing my remarks, I might say that I have always had the best relationship with the various ministers of the crown. I must say that when I have presented cases to them from time to time they have served me well. I hope that I have as happy relations with their successors after the next election.

Mr. Irvine: We will treat you well.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know who will take their places, but I will be here to face whoever do. While I commend the present ministers of the crown, I must say that there are two departments that I regard as particularly tough. One is the Department of Finance, the minister of which is sponsoring this bill, and the other is the Department of National Revenue, which rudely lays its hands upon the taxpayer.

In dealing with most ministers of the crown, I find they look over my case and say, "Now, Mr. Hansell, I believe we might be able to handle that through section so and so, subsection so and so, clause so and so." Somehow or other the legislation written for the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue has no section so and so, subsection so and so, clause so and so through which they can creep to accommodate us. Their legislation is sewn up so tightly that when you present them with a case the reply you receive is a rather cold one. It reads something like this: We beg to advise you that section so and so, subsection so and so, and clause so and so states this. We wish we could do more for you. Yours sincerely.

I should like to say a word about the austerity program under which the country appears to be still labouring. It came upon us so suddenly that the Minister of Finance must take some responsibility for failing to keep his finger on the pulse of the nation's financial welfare. If I were about to drive my car down a hill having a gravelled road, what would I say? I would say, "Now, Hansell, just a moment; this is a gravel road and it is a rather steep hill. You had better put on your brakes a little and take your foot off the gas." I would anticipate what might happen. I would know something about the road that I was going to take. Evidently the government either did not know the route they were taking or did not know the dangers of the road they were traveling. Something must have happened because suddenly, out of a blue sky, the austerity program was thrown upon us under the controls which the government have, and which we have permitted them to have.

I do say, Mr. Speaker, that the government should have known before the nation got into such serious difficulties with other countries, particularly the United States, and should have put the brakes on a little sooner instead of plunging them on suddenly and giving the nation such a jolt. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance should warn the country, if it is possible, that he expects something to happen. I have in mind the small business concerns and a few large business concerns that are capitalized with millions of dollars. These concerns receive a jolt at such times, but perhaps they can stand it. They have capital reserves and they have certain business administration, directorates and so forth that have steered these concerns over the rocks in days gone by.

The small businessman who has invested five thousand, ten thousand, or up to $50,000 in some business in a small community cannot stand it. These announcements that have been made in the past have well-nigh wrecked this type of business concern. I suppose some of them have had to go into bankruptcy. I recall having to take up on one occasion a case concerning a very small woollen mill. A few people had invested money in the mill and then quota restrictions were placed on woollen goods. It made it difficult for this small concern, but there was nothing that could be done about it. It was a matter coming under the Department of Finance and there were no holes to crawl through. The legislation was sewn up tightly.

I go along a road and I see a beautiful new building with a large sign "Hudson Cars". I stop to buy a little gasoline, perhaps, but I see no Hudson cars. The owner has a tale of woe about being a small businessman who took the agency for these Hudson cars. He put his money into the building, expecting that when the war was over he would be able to do a good business selling these cars. Suddenly, he finds he cannot get any cars. He might have had the agency for another car, but he chose Hudson and suddenly finds he cannot get any cars. Surely, there should have been some warning to protect these small business concerns.

I know that next Tuesday night the budget will be presented. It is anyone's guess as to what may be in the budget. The minister is going to adjust the hangman's noose around the poor taxpayer. I do not know whether he will make it a little tighter, but it is expected he will let it out a notch or two. I do trust that the minister will be able that night to make some announcement that will alleviate the distress in which small business concerns find themselves because of the austerity program. Surely the government must play fair with small business. It is only reasonable. I know that the minister cannot answer at the present time in this debate, but I think he should be able to give the country some lead so that small industries may know what is in store for them in the future.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, my contribution will also be brief. I was much interested in the speech made by the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) because I approach this matter, as I am sure he did, as a very amateurish amateur. I promise you I will not speak about gold. The member for Spadina read a speech about gold. There again we have something in common, because neither of us knows anything about the gold problem. I admit that. He demonstrated it. That is the only difference between us.

He accomplished something more. If he had set out to give a speech which would be a prize example of demagogic, forensic effort, he succeeded exceedingly well. I almost cried when I thought of the poor child in his home in Toronto who, when he got his orange, found that it had a piece bitten out of it by these nabobs on that street in Toronto on which the hon. member practises; I just forget the name of it, but I am told that it is Bay street. Then I see the rich men, these nabobs, putting away their ounces of gold, bringing them out and tallying them up every week. Then he went so far as to say, or clearly to imply in this demagogic talk of his, that an effort was being made by certain persons in authority in matters of business and finance to do a certain thing; that the object of those persons was—to use an expression that I hear quite often in this house from the socialists to my left—to keep poor people in a state of enslavement. Frankly, one needs great patience to listen to that kind of argument, because surely the answer must be obvious. If the rich are to get richer they must do so by selling to somebody; and if we enslave and impoverish our buyers, then the rich man cannot get richer. He also will get depressed.

Mr. Young: Then you will have your depression.

Mr. Manross: That is what you are hoping for.

Mr. Young: That is what you are asking for.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I do not intend to reply to that; because to suggest that I am working for a depression is so utterly silly as to be completely unworthy of an answer from me at this time.

I intend to make a reference to the speech made by the minister, and I am asking him to correct me if I misunderstood the effect of his remarks. He said that the devaluation of the dollar meant a higher cost of living to everyone in Canada. I think I am correct so far. Then he went on; and I think he will admit that, if that be true, an increase in the value of our dollar therefore must have the opposite effect.

Mr. Abbott: It might have.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You cannot have it both ways, can you? Then he went on to say that from a realistic view our dollar, on account of the business we carried on, was in fact probably worth more than par. I think I am correct in saying that. If from a realistic standpoint our dollar is worth more than par, and if that fact in turn will decrease the cost of living, why in the world do we not let it go to its proper level, its real value more than par, and therefore cheapen the cost of living for the people who live in this country?

In my amateurish way I intend to relate this problem of dollars to an economic effort about which I know at least a little bit. I refer to the oil business in Alberta. I undertake, Mr. Speaker, to show that relationship quite clearly; and having met your displeasure last evening I warned myself that I must not stray from the subject we have before us. Those fields—because instead of one there are now at least nine of them—are today producing approximately fifty-three thousand barrels of oil per day. At $3 a barrel, which is a minimum price that I am using, that means $150,000 per day to this country in terms of American dollars, because these fields are supplying a necessity which formerly was supplied by the United States, the South American and other countries. In that way we are saving for ourselves at least that much per day through the fields we now have as they are developed at the present time.

I speak of these oil fields for two reasons. The first is the effect of their development—and I hope it will be rapid—in connection with our economic situation. But I refer to them for another reason, and events may prove that this is the greater one. We all know that during the last war, aside from the directly killing instruments, oil was something upon which the war was fought. In fact the situation in this continent became so critical that the United States government built a pipe line right across the Rocky mountains from Norman Wells as it is now called—it used to be called Fort Norman—on the Mackenzie river, right across to Whitehorse. Tremendous sums of money were expended and the refineries were built. It is not there any more. As a matter of fact, it has been moved down to Edmonton. This move was, in my opinion, one of the finest pieces of engineering that we have known in this country for a long time. The increase in this output was dealt with by, I believe, the first vice-president of the Chase National Bank in New York, when he was speaking either here or in Toronto. He gave us some idea of what that development might be, and he used this figure. To develop that area to the point where it will be producing not forty thousand barrels per day, as it was when he spoke, but four hundred thousand barrels per day, as it seems it is easily capable of doing, the cost would be one billion dollars.

One billion dollars is a tremendous amount of money. One billion is a tremendous amount of anything. Certainly I cannot visualize it. I think the most of anything that I have ever seen was at practically the last roundup which was held in western Canada, in which I had a part; and by a part, I mean astride a horse. I had a part in that way. I saw about eleven thousand cattle at one time, which is the most of anything I have ever seen at one time. I cannot therefore visualize this billion dollars. But I do know that we cannot get that money in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Howe: Why?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Because it is not here. The other day we read about the Imperial Oil selling its interests in the International Company for $80 billion.

An hon. Member: No, $80 million.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I can confuse these amounts in the way the Minister of Agriculture did the other night when he was tossing them about.

Mr. Gardiner: I usually have them right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is $80 million, of which $30 million is being spent at the present time to build the 485-mile pipe line from the fields to Regina.

In answer to the point made a moment ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I want to give the net figures as to the inflow and outflow of capital in Canada. Let me tell him that in 1947, in the capital formation of eleven oil companies, they got 48 per cent from external operations; 37 per cent was borrowed; 13 per cent was preferred stock; and 2 per cent was by sale of common stock.

What have we been doing with respect to capital in Canada from 1945 on? These figures are in millions. At least I shall get them right this time. In 1945, the United Kingdom, minus 33·5; the United States, plus 222·1; and other countries, plus 2·4. The plus means the influx of capital into this country. In 1946, the United Kingdom, minus 35·4; the United States, plus 170·2; other countries, minus ·2. In 1947, the United Kingdom, minus 9·1; the United States, minus 10·5; and other countries, plus 1·6. In eleven months of 1948, the United Kingdom, minus 1·3; the United States, minus 16·6; and other countries, plus ·7. The over-all picture is this: for 1945, plus 191; 1946, plus 134·6; 1947, minus 18; and for the eleven months of 1948, minus 17·2. I am unable to make the fine distinction between the brick and mortar money, and the investment money in top securities, which was made by the minister; but, sir, I have given you the over-all picture.

If you will look at page 22, table 9, of the foreign exchange control board report you will find the situation set out in the first column, which shows only the inflow of funds. I have taken the outflow and have given you the net position after that has been done. The point I am making is that never at any time has it been more important that we should have an inflow of capital, certainly in connection with the one industry which I have just named, than now. I confess that somebody may very well say that in the province in which I live we are having an inflow of capital in connection with this same industry. That is quite true; but having regard to the general picture, it is only in driblets so to speak, as compared with the total amount which will be necessary to make that complete development there.

The house might be interested in just a few facts which have emerged in the last two or three weeks since the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) spoke with respect to it. There is a field out there which was discovered a couple of weeks ago. By that I mean that the bit penetrated the oil-bearing formation. In drilling an oil well, if you have a decent porosity, which means these interstices in the rock or in the sand, which will hold the oil, in conjunction with the gas, you are all right. We used to think that if we could find a yard, three feet, or better still two yards or so of that stratum, then we really had found something. And you have that situation, not exactly that, but quite a great deal more than that, in the oil-bearing zones in the Turner valley; but in the last Calgary paper which I saw, which was three or four days old, in this new field at Schoepp, which is the field that is now called the golden spike field, they found oil in one oil-bearing stratum which is 232 feet thick. It was that thickness when they discovered it, and there was no water underneath. I mention that to show the immensity of the possibilities which are there. I also mention the Redwater field, which was discovered within the past year, and which is today producing more oil than the Turner valley field at the present time. I mention these things to show what is there and what the development may mean both economically and, as I said a moment ago, in connection with the hemispheric or continental defence.

We must have an influx of capital, and that must flow in as easily as it possibly can. I am not in a position to follow, nor do I intend to try to follow, the ramifications of just what deflation of so many cents would mean. I have not sufficient understanding—perhaps I am not clever enough to follow the gyrations of the experts who deal with matters of that kind. But I remember what happened to the pound and to the dollar after the first war. Let me admit at once that I know the destruction in Europe today is infinitely greater than it was at that time, and that there was no destruction on this continent after either war. But nevertheless there was very considerable destruction in Europe at that time. I do not remember the exact figures, but in New York the British pound went down to $3.70 or $3.50. I am told I am wrong; it is $2.75. The point I am making is that it was a substantial depreciation. For a time I think our dollar went down as low as seventy-five cents. At that time there were no restrictions. Governments were not placing fictitious values on their money. Within six months after selling at these lows, both the pound and the Canadian dollar sold at a premium in New York.

I am not arguing that the two cases are entirely parallel. Conditions change and they are different after the last war from what they were after the first one.

Then, again, in my amateurish way let me say that the sooner we can let our dollar find its level, the better. According to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), there would be an increase rather than a decrease in its value. Why do we not let it go there and, in the trade and markets of the world, find its own value? I do not know whether that means a devaluation or an evaluation—and frankly, as a simple person trying to get along, I don't care very much. But I do know this, that no country yet has successfully, either by law or by edict, or anything of that kind, fixed a currency at a given value without ultimately ending up in chaos. The story of all the European countries after the last war proves that completely. Not in one case did any of them emerge from the difficulties they were in by this effort to blow up their balloon with respect to the value of their own currency.

Some experts may find fault with what I have said, but I give it to you as the judgment of one whose sight is not clouded by the intricacies of these experts, a simple person who knows that a dollar is worth only what it will buy, whether it be in oranges, about which the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) cried, or an ounce of gold from someone's gold mine.

It is now twenty-five minutes past ten, Mr. Speaker, and I close with this appeal on behalf of the oil industry—a selfish appeal, if you like. But in the oil industry you cannot be selfish about as big a thing as that. If allowed to grow, that industry will some day supply the dominion. And that is not all. We all know that in the search for oil it has been shown that Alberta is practically underlaid with gas. That is not only the history in other fields; it has been completely proven in Alberta. Gas is there in tremendous quantities. Only recently a commission has been endeavouring to find the extent of the reserves. The amount runs up into so many trillions of feet that I just cannot follow it. However, I do know that it is something immense, something that has never been heard of in Canada before, and shows signs of outstripping those tremendous fields in the state of Texas.

And so the oil developed with the gas. The value is not only in the fuel made available. Chemists tell us that many things can be made from it, including plastics—although they may not meet the competition of plastics made in other ways and in conformity with the great advances made in chemistry.

But let me tell the house one little thing. Up on the Willingdon line, which is east and then north of Edmonton, a couple of small local oil companies joined together to do one thing. They met Mr. Richie Donald, whom the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) knows very well, and who I know is one of the great chemists in Canada. He wanted two things. First he wanted to find salt. He wanted a hole which, if bored, would show a salt and produce natural gas. He had another condition, that it must be beside a railway track. That was done.

He was asked how much salt he wanted, and he said it should be at least six feet thick. A friend of mine, who was in charge, of putting down that hole, got his gas—of course he knew it was there. But he did not find six feet of salt; he found a thousand feet of pure salt. And salt, with natural gas, I am told by the chemists, forms the basis of many different products. That is an outgrowth of the business of finding oil.

I should have said that the usual price for heat anywhere in Canada to produce a ton of refined salt is somewhere between $6 and $8. In their refining process the price of producing that salt is exactly 75 cents per ton. That, of course, will overcome a great deal of difficulty in connection with freight rates.

On motion of Mr. Smith (Calgary West) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue with this resolution, and take up resolution No. 7, national emergency powers; and then resolution No. 5, agricultural products; and resolution No. 8.

At ten-thirty the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on March 14, 1949.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 18, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

TEXT OF PROPOSAL TO BE CONSIDERED FOR SIGNATURE IN WASHINGTON

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to lay on the table of the house the text, in French and English, of a document which I trust will become of historic importance. It is the proposal for a North Atlantic treaty which is to be considered and, if found acceptable, signed in Washington during the first week of April. Copies are available for hon. members, but for greater convenience I would ask that it be printed also as an appendix to Hansard of today so that it may be available to all those who receive Hansard and get their documentary information from its pages.

At the same time I would call attention to notice of a resolution appearing on page iii of the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday. Hon. members will see from the recitals of that resolution that a conference is to be held in Washington early in April for the purpose of completing such a treaty among the states named; and it is hoped that the situation in parliament will permit a brief discussion of this resolution before the date fixed for this meeting in Washington, so that the sense of the house may be obtained. I should hope it would be the sense of the house that Canada should be represented at this conference in Washington and continue to put forth its best endeavours to bring about the signature of the pact along the lines of this proposal.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNUAL REPORT FOR YEAR ENDED DECEMBER 31, 1948

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I desire to lay on the table the following reports in English and in French:

Annual report of the Canadian National Railway System for the year ended December 31, 1948.

Annual report of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the year ended December 31, 1948.

Auditor's report to parliament for the year ended December 31, 1948, in respect to the Canadian National Railway System and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited.

All these reports are being distributed today.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 84, respecting the pension fund society of the Bank of Montreal.—Mr. Rinfret.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "FINANCIAL TIMES"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. I have before me the issue of the Financial Times of March 18, in which appears a column under the name "Tempus." That column seals the fate of sixteen of the seventeen members of parliament from Alberta. I alone am left to suffer suspense, uncertainty and agitation. This, I contend, warrants a bill of rights to prohibit discrimination against politicians.

REFERENCE TO STANDING ORDER 43

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I rise on a question of privilege which I think affects hon. members of this house, including myself, though I am not putting it on personal grounds. I want to call attention, with a view to guidance in future debates, to standing order 43, which reads:

(1) No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but then he is not to introduce any new matter, and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

(2) A reply shall be allowed to a member who has moved a substantive motion, but not to the mover of an amendment, the previous question, or an instruction to a committee.

The next paragraph is important:

(3) In all cases Mr. Speaker shall inform the house that the reply of the mover of the original motion closes the debate.

Yesterday's incident is completely closed, but I am calling to your attention, Mr. Speaker, for the future guidance of the house in debate, that this latter rule must be complied with before a member may be refused the privilege of speaking.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REMOVAL OF EMPLOYEES FROM WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the Prime Minister received a telegram from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce asking that notices of removal to certain Trans-Canada Air Lines employees in Winnipeg be suspended pending consideration of the matter by a committee of this house? If so, can the Prime Minister say what action he has taken in response to that telegram?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall look into it. I do not remember that any such telegram has been brought to my personal attention. However, I shall inquire and be in a position to answer the hon. member's question at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Possibly later today?

EXECUTIVE CLEMENCY

STANLEY D. MCLAREN—QUESTION AS TO COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has the government received any request from counsel or other responsible persons for remission of sentence or executive clemency in the case of Stanley D. McLaren, of Calgary, who has been sentenced to hang on March 30? If so, has any decision been reached?

Hon. Joseph Jean (Solicitor General of Canada): The hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of his question. A few applications for commutation of the death sentence in this case have been received, but no decision has been reached. May I say that in such cases a decision is seldom announced before the last few days preceding the date set for execution, which in this instance is March 30.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HONG KONG VETERANS—PACIFIC PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): I intended to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, but perhaps his parliamentary assistant can answer it. It is not clear, from the statement the minister made yesterday about Pacific pay for the Hong Kong veterans, whether the payment will begin as of the 1st of June, 1945, or whether it will apply for the whole period of service in the Pacific. Could the parliamentary assistant say which of these courses is to be followed?

Mr. L. E. Baker (Parliamentary Assistant to Minister of National Defence): Payments will begin as of June 1, 1945. They cannot begin prior to the date of the order in council.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT

CONTINUANCE IN FORCE UNTIL SIXTY DAYS AFTER OPENING OF FIRST SESSION OF PARLIAMENT IN 1951

The house resumed from Thursday, March 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott that the house go into committee on the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the continuance in force of the Foreign Exchange Control Act until sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year 1951.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it will be possible to deal with the various sections of this bill at a later stage in the procedure, but in the meantime it is important to consider some of the principles involved and some of the points that have been made in connection with this proposal.

The bill before the committee is to replace a bill introduced some time ago to meet special circumstances. It is interesting to note the extent to which a bill of this kind, once it is on the statute books, is accepted by people who forget the considerations that were in their minds at the time the bill first came to their attention.

Since this law was originally placed on the statute book, many circumstances have changed and many things have served to emphasize the need for careful consideration of what has taken place. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) discussed this bill yesterday but made little reference to some of the most important considerations which have arisen since the first bill became law. The theory of foreign exchange control was one which the Minister of Finance himself indicated he accepted reluctantly at the time that step was taken. At that time, however, he contended that in view of the Bretton Woods agreement and our position in relation to the international arrangements then assumed, it was essential that we have this measure of control. Time passed and it was necessary to review the circumstances in the light of what had happened.

In the foreign exchange control bill as it was originally introduced in this house there was an extremely important provision, under which pounds sterling were to be convertible with the dollar. For Canada that was a vital consideration at that time. Our difficulties in international trading are not with the United States, from the point of view of our monetary unit; our problem is to be able to sell in the sterling areas where in the past we have found our main export markets.

When the Minister of Finance speaks of exchange as being something which it is difficult to determine in realistic figures, he well knows that in the past the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the monetary units of other countries was determined by the trade which Canada carried on in both dollar and sterling areas. The day by day value of our dollar was related to the possibility of converting our pound position into a dollar position in the ordinary exchange markets of the world. It is doubtful whether Canada would have entered into the Bretton Woods agreement and would have carried forward her undertakings without a further arrangement of some kind, had there not been reliance on the provision for convertibility between the pound sterling and the dollar of the United States.

When circumstances arose which led to the abandonment of the convertibility factor in the Bretton Woods agreement, immediately there was a reason for a review of the whole situation. As the Minister of Agriculture said in London not so long ago, and in forceful and vigorous terms, it is the duty of government to find some way in which the products of this country can be sold into markets which cannot buy unless there is some arrangement in regard to the sterling exchange. The whole situation has changed. Today we see a loss, and a threatened still greater loss in the future, in those sterling areas unless some mechanism can be devised for selling our products to countries to which we have sold them for so many years and which have been our largest export consumers. It is therefore essential that when the bill based on this resolution comes before us we understand that we are going forward without any indication by the government of any new steps which would assist the situation in which we find ourselves.

After all, the parliament of Canada must accept the responsibility of deciding whether we shall simply submit to a situation which exists or whether we shall take the initiative in seeking a solution to the problem posed by the Minister of Agriculture, who has felt the direct effects of this situation in dealing with the basic agricultural commodities of this country. When we are asked to carry forward the Foreign Exchange Control Act by the bill now before the committee, it is important to realize how necessary it is that the members of this house know perfectly clearly what the government intends to do, how these problems are to be solved, and how this country is to find an opportunity to extend its business in those markets which are now made difficult for us by the steps which have been taken under this act and through the failure of the convertibility factor in the Bretton Woods agreement. There is a special reason why this house should insist upon knowing what hope the government offer of some solution of that problem, and how they propose to deal with it.

We know what occurred after this act was originally passed. In the first place it was not intended that it should operate as a control over the exchange of goods between Canada and other countries. It was intended that this act should deal only with foreign exchange. When it was pointed out that this act went a great deal further than to deal only with foreign exchange, a reassurance was given that there was no intention of dealing with anything else. That is evident not only from the answers given by the minister, but also from answers given before the standing committee on banking and commerce by one of the representatives of the foreign exchange control board, who was put before that committee to explain the effects of this act.

In the reports of the standing committee on banking and commerce on Bill No. 195, foreign exchange control, as reported at page 40 of the proceedings of July 11, 1946, Mr. Rasminsky was answering certain questions in regard to the effect of this act and what the foreign exchange control board would do. These are Mr. Rasminsky's words as they are found in that report:

> The foreign exchange control board has nothing whatever to do with the types or quantities of goods which are imported into Canada or exported from Canada.

On July 15, at page 53 of the report, Mr. Rasminsky was again being asked certain questions in regard to the effect of this act and the powers of the foreign exchange control board. These were his words:

> The answer is that if circumstances arose in which for one reason or another it seems desirable to place restrictions on the import of goods into Canada then it is evidently the opinion of the government in this measure that the power to place those restrictions should not be conferred upon an administrative body such as the foreign exchange control board.

That is a clear and definite statement which, put forward in the way in which it was, the members of this house have a right to accept as a guide in their understanding of the effect of this act and the operation of the foreign exchange control board.

On July 15 also, at page 57 of the report, we find that Mr. Rasminsky was asked this question:

> Q. In other words, the suggestion there is no regulatory power vested in the board with reference to imports at the expense of any power parliament now has in that regard, Mr. Rasminsky, was referring to the export and import of goods rather than securities and currency? A. That is right.

On the basis of this statement it is quite clear that the impression was left that this was strictly a foreign exchange control bill and in no way dealt with the import or export of goods; yet we find that very situation has arisen.

Of course there were also the explanations given at the time that this matter was under discussion in the house. The then Minister of Finance is reported, at page 2547 of Hansard of Monday, June 17, 1946, to have made the following statements:

> We have no intention of using this exchange control legislation to restrict anything but certain types of capital movement.

And later the same day, as reported on the same page, he said:

> It is for this reason that it is necessary to maintain our over-all machinery of control, even though our intention is to place no restrictions on current account transactions.

The house had a right to rely on that assurance. I repeat the words:

> We have no intention of using this exchange control legislation to restrict anything but certain types of capital movement.

Again we find that the present Minister of Finance said, as recorded on page 4530 of Hansard of August 9, 1946:

> I repeat that the whole purpose of the measure is to provide for the efficient handling and conservation of our essential foreign exchange resources.

The word "whole" is not subject to any misunderstanding. It meant that the whole purpose, the only purpose, of this act was to provide for the efficient handling and conservation of our foreign exchange resources. It was at a later date that the announcement of a budget by radio, as described by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), changed the whole situation. At that time the present Minister of Finance made the naive statement that until they had been informed by the officials of the department they had no idea that the act contained the powers to do the things he was then announcing they were going to do. For a minister of the crown to say to the people of Canada: We had no idea that this act contained the powers we now exercise, but our officials have informed us that we have these powers and therefore we shall use them, is simply a declaration by that minister that if any act is passed by this house containing powers that will enable them to do anything which in their use of arbitrary powers they want to do, they will do it, even though they had told the house they did not intend to do it. That, Mr. Chairman, goes much deeper than merely the accuracy of the statement of a minister of the crown; it goes to the question of good faith on the part of the government. It is inherent in our theory of responsible government that, when a minister of the crown gives an assurance with respect to government policy affecting the way in which the government will use an act that it asks the house and parliament to pass, the government will respect the undertaking which was given at that time.

Just think of what the effect of a disregard of that principle would be in relation to the other control measures which are now before the house, but which are not put forward by statute. If the assurance of the members of the government means nothing, as it meant nothing in this case, then assurances given that the government has no thought of using those powers in any particular way will also mean nothing. There is no other interpretation of the statement which was made by the Minister of Finance at that time.

But the minister went even further. He not only used the act to carry out the control over the import and export of goods, which he had said they did not intend to do, but he announced certain measures which could come into effect only when legislation was passed, and he gave instructions to the appropriate officials that they were to act on orders which had never received the authority or the power of parliament. That is simply government by dictatorship and not government by the parliamentary system. In the first place he repudiated the undertaking which had been given, and in the second place, having then used powers which they stated they were not going to use, he gave orders to departmental officials to carry out certain operations which were not even yet made possible by any act of this house.

When the Minister of Finance now treats in such a cavalier manner any criticism of the purpose or the operation of this act, it simply indicates how much he has forgotten the nature of the criticism which emanated from supporters of this government when this was done. Certain illuminating comments in regard to the effect of this act were made in the Senate, by men who had always been very close to this government. For instance, there was the comment of Senator McGeer on August 13, 1946, as reported on page 680 of Hansard of that day. Amongst other things, he said—

The Chairman: Order. Is the hon. member referring to debates in the Senate? I think it would be in order to refer to proceedings in committees of the Senate, but it is not usual in the House of Commons to refer to the debates of the Senate.

Mr. Drew: Having regard to the practice in the house, Mr. Chairman, and having Hansard in front of me, probably I should have referred to "the other place". I would remind you, sir, that I am not referring to a debate in the current session, but to a debate which took place some years ago. I understood that these records of debates could be discussed from the point of view of interpreting the effect of a document.

The Chairman: I do not think that the House of Commons has ever referred to debates in the Senate, whether they are debates of the current session or of previous sessions. The house has referred to other records of the Senate, but I do not recall the debates in the Senate having been referred to in this house.

Mr. Black (Yukon): What rule is the chairman quoting? What is to prevent it?

Mr. Drew: For my enlightenment, Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what rule prevents a reference in this house to a statement made in the Senate in relation to a bill which has become the law of Canada by the completed action of both the house and the Senate?

Mr. Irvine: The only reason why the Senate was not quoted in this house before is that nobody over there had said anything.

The Chairman: I have not the rule at hand, but my recollection is that if the house desires to know what the Senate has done, it passes an order to search the records of the Senate. I do not think any hon. member recalls a reference to the debates of the Senate, either of the current session or of a previous session, having been made in the House of Commons. The rule I had in mind was standing order 32:

> This house doth consent that its journals may be searched by the Senate, in like manner as this house may, according to parliamentary usage, search the journals of the Senate.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I do not think the standing order just read has anything to do with the question at issue. Surely what the leader of the opposition was reading from is now an historical fact, and these debates are open to quotation or otherwise in the house if members see fit. There is nothing sacred about what happens in the Senate. It would not be proper for an hon. member to cast reflection upon what the present Senate is doing—although it may be a proper subject to reflect upon. I am sure, however, that in my time in the house a reference such as that which the leader of the opposition now seeks to make has not been forbidden by the rules of the house.

Mr. Hackett: I have been in and about the house a long time—about it more than in it, I admit—but never until the last few days have I heard a chairman or a Speaker interrupt the leader of the government or the leader of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hackett: I am stating a fact. It is open to any hon. member to rise to a point of order. But until these last few days it has never come within my knowledge or observation that a Speaker or a chairman, of his own volition, has called a prime minister or a leader of the opposition to order. I should be interested to know whether this is a departure from the tradition that has been observed in the house.

Mr. Abbott: It is not my custom to interrupt when questions of procedure are under discussion, but I do see in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, at page 95, citation 293 which reads as follows:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order,—

That is, standing order 41.

> —it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (a) refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion; nor
> (b) refer to any debate in the Senate, but he may refer to the official printed records of the upper house though they have not been formally communicated to the lower house.

The official printed record of the upper house is the minutes of the proceedings of the Senate, not Senate Hansard. I should be delighted, however, to hear what my late friend Gerry McGeer said at that time. I am not taking issue on that point at all.

The Chairman: Order. I must agree that I was impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead. It is only with the greatest of hesitancy that I would interrupt the leader of the opposition or any minister of the crown, and it has not been my custom to do so—although I think it has been done from time to time. The interruption I did make was in connection with referring to the debates of the Senate. As I had never heard it done in the house during the time I have been here, I thought it only proper that I should bring the matter to the attention of the committee. If it is to be the custom to refer to the debates of the Senate, then we should know. It would be an innovation, I am sure, so far as the House of Commons is concerned.

Standing order 41, to which the Minister of Finance referred, was the one to which I was about to refer. Citation 293 (b), in connection with standing order 41, states, as the minister has pointed out, that—

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not . . .
> (b) refer to any debate—

And I draw attention to the word "any".

—in the Senate.

It does not say, any debate of the present session or some other session; it is simply any debate. I take it to mean any debate of any session.

The rule to which I referred a moment ago was standing order 32. That is the one under which the House of Commons may ascertain what has been done in the Senate. I shall read it again:

> This house doth consent that its journals may be searched by the Senate, in like manner as this house may, according to parliamentary usage, search the journals of the Senate.

That is the method the House of Commons has adopted of ascertaining what has been done in the Senate.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to press the matter, particularly from the point of view of considering what was said. A question, however, has been raised which I believe should be settled with some clarity, now that it is before the committee of the whole house.

When you referred, sir, to citation 293, you read only as far as the words, "refer to any debate in the Senate". But the words which follow immediately after those words are these:

> . . . but he may refer to the official printed records of the upper house though they have not been formally communicated to the lower house.

Mr. Sinclair: That is not Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: That refers to the minutes of proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. Drew: I know of the dispute which has taken place for some time in connection with the word "official" in that respect. The word "official" appears, of course, on Hansard, both of the House of Commons and of the other place. That is a matter which I suggest should be understood. I have another way of dealing with it, Mr. Chairman; I could avoid asking for a ruling at the present time, if you would prefer to give it later.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, may I call the attention of the committee to citation 252 in the second edition of Beauchesne, which states:

> The journals are the official records of the house.

It is a lengthy paragraph, but that is the gist of it. I confess when the point of order was first raised I was inclined to feel that it was being pressed too hard against the leader of the opposition. As I have been reading the citation, however, it has seemed to me that the chairman is right.

Mr. Sinclair: To what citation is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Knowles: Citation 252 in the second edition, at page 76, which defines what are official records, and it states that "the journals are the official records of the house". Hansard is not an official record.

While I am on my feet may I draw your attention, sir, to another citation in connection with the point raised by the hon. member for Stanstead. The hon. member objected to the chairman of committees and the Speaker of the house raising points of order in the midst of speeches by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. May I quote in this connection citation 108 at page 33 of Beauchesne, second edition:

> The Speaker decides the questions of order only when they actually arise and not in anticipation. He is bound to call attention immediately to any irregularity in debate or procedure and not to wait for the interposition of a member.

Surely the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister are members of the House of Commons, with the rest of us, and subject to the same rules. I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, not to have any reluctance to intervene in the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition when, in your opinion, they are out of order.

One other point, lest the hon. member for Stanstead suggest that citation 108 refers only to the Speaker and not to the chairman. May I call his attention to citation 534 in Beauchesne's third edition, which says, in effect, that committees of the whole house are, in actual fact, the house, and that therefore the same rules apply.

The Chairman: May I say in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that I was not pressing any ruling against the leader of the opposition. I was simply drawing attention to the fact that the quoting of the debates of the Senate was a departure from the usual custom of this house. The question has come up whether Hansard is the official record of the house. I happen to have before me a copy of the Hansard of the British house, dated February 16, 1949, where Mr. Speaker in making a ruling stated:

I think the right hon. and gallant gentleman said that it was a mistake in the official report. Hansard is not an official report.

Mr. Hackett: I rose merely to point out that interrupting of the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition by the Speaker or the chairman of the committee of the whole is a departure from tradition.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Case: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to debate the point that Hansard is not the official record, but I would point out that I have a copy of the official Senate Hansard, and it says "official report."

An hon. Member: Record.

Mr. Knowles: I have seen the hon. member's official letters in the Owen Sound Sun-Times, but that would not make them official.

Mr. Case: Don't worry too much about that.

The Chairman: I shall read the whole statement by Mr. Speaker as appearing in the British Hansard:

I think the right hon. and gallant gentleman said that it was a mistake in the official report. Hansard is not an official report. It is, I hope, as accurate an account of our proceedings as possible. The official report is one which it is my duty, the house remembers, by resolution passed at the beginning of every session, to peruse daily. I did peruse the official report, which is the accurate one, and it says "another amendment made", which is the correct wording. Therefore, officially the amendment is correct and in order, and I hope that what I have said, and what the right hon. and gallant gentleman has said, will ensure that the matter is put right in Hansard.

Mr. Hackett: May I draw to your attention the fact that Hansard bears on its first page the words "official report." It is published under the control of the house.

An hon. Member: Report, not record.

The Chairman: Official report of the speeches.

Mr. Hansell: I am happy, sir, at your ruling, because the way is now open for you to inform the page boys not to clutter up my desk with Senate documents. It is most untidy, and besides they hurt my knees.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps we can discuss this subject at some other time before the rules committee, because there is no way in which I can raise the point I wish to raise.

In view of the fact that yesterday the Minister of Finance quoted with such approval an editorial from the Toronto Globe and Mail at the time these proceedings were under consideration, I shall quote another editorial published during that same period; it deals with this particular point, and I am sure the Chairman will not find it to be contrary to the rules of the house. This editorial, which appeared on August 15, 1946, is headed: "Liberalism revolts", and reads:

The government's bill to put in statute form the extraordinary powers of the foreign exchange control board received the reception it deserved when presented in the Senate. The senators' approach to what is beyond all doubt the most offensive and dangerous legislation sent over to them this session offers hope they will insist on retaining for parliament authority which a Liberal majority in the commons would have so meekly abdicated in favour of a bureaucracy of civil servants.

In preliminary examination the senators pounced on the objectionable features against which the opposition fought in the commons and unearthed further details of the bureaucrats' grasp for power. They, too, found alarming the government proposal granting the board authority to remake the laws of parliament to suit its own purposes; to discriminate in favour of groups or individuals at the expense of others; declare a resident of Canada, as defined by statute, a non-resident, or vice versa; "make a man a woman", as a member of the house put it. Senator McGeer discovered that disregard for the rights of the individual does not end there. The board could strip its new "creature" naked.

This had to do with the provision requiring that "no person shall, except in accordance with a permit, export any property from Canada." Senator McGeer commented:

This is what I was going to quote:

"You cannot move your own valise out of this country without a permit. They have the power to prevent anyone leaving . . . unless they walk out naked." Coupled with this is the power given the board's agents to search persons suspected of violating the Foreign Exchange Control Act. The Customs Act contains restrictive safeguards so that the traveler, whether he be entering or leaving the country, is left with some dignity. Such consideration of the human being is totally disregarded in the bill before the Senate.

Likewise, as Senator McGeer pointed out, the tourist who wants to come into the country "with his clothes on" must first write to the board for permission. Importation of any property without a permit is banned. Nor is there any recourse to the courts for the individual who might suffer from this abuse of arbitrary authority. No matter what the indignity inflicted, the board's agent has only to plead that he was acting on its instructions, either written or verbal.

Most significant about the Senate's attack was its leadership. It was led by men who were brought up in the same school of political philosophy as those government benchers who bowed their servile heads to the will of the cabinet. Even Senator Hayden, who was assigned the task of piloting the bill through the upper chamber, proved to be an unenthusiastic sponsor. He confessed that, to his way of thinking, the bill was "unusual" and in some respects "extraordinary."

Senator Lambert doubted whether it would aid in the development of Canada or improve relations with the United States. Senator Bench didn't like it and proposed that life of the legislation be at least limited, the minimum for which the commons opposition fought. Senator Campbell thought that the board should continue to operate for the time being under order in council, where it would be at least subjected to some control by parliament. Senator McGeer, most forthright of all, would have killed it outright.

With this display of acute sensibilities, it is obvious that the bill has few friends in the Senate. It is not what might be regarded as liberal legislation in the proper sense of the word. This being the case, the senators have no choice but drastically to restrict the authority of the board or tell it to carry on under order in council. The Senate cannot possibly sanction the handing over to a group of individuals not responsible to the people "the control over the whole trade and commerce of the nation." As Senator Hayden reminded his colleagues, if the senators approve the bill without putting a limitation on it, they will have parted with their right to deal with it again.

I quoted that editorial because yesterday the Minister of Finance quoted an editorial from the Globe and Mail with such evidence of confidence in the wisdom of their judgment in discussing this matter.

Mr. Bradette: What did the Senate do in that instance?

Mr. Drew: It limited the life of the bill.

Mr. Jackman: Which the Commons would not do.

Mr. Bradette: But it passed the bill.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly what happened; it limited the life of the bill, which the Commons would not do. That is why this bill is now before the house, and why this house should remember what was before parliament at that time.

Now, because I find that the Minister of Finance does believe that editorial comment is useful in interpreting his bill, and also because of certain restrictions on the use of the Senate Hansard, I shall quote another editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on August 21, 1946. The heading is, "A disturbed Liberal." I read this editorial because it also dealt with this subject and because the Senate recognized that certain features of this bill were entirely contrary to every principle of Liberalism. The editorial reads:

Senator T. A. Crerar is receiving no end of praise for a speech which he delivered in the Senate last week. Oddly enough, it was a speech in defence of liberalism—against Liberals. Senator Crerar was dealing with a completely totalitarian measure which a Liberal majority in the Commons had sent over to the Senate.

The bill which disturbed Senator Crerar, which made him long for the old liberalism, was one conferring wide powers upon the foreign exchange control board. Said he:

I am still quoting from the editorial.

"This is one of the most extraordinary bills ever to come before the house of parliament. In principle it proposes to confer upon a board of civil servants absolute power over the import and export trade of the country and over the movement of funds across our borders, a power unlimited as to time, and unrestricted as to scope and sweep of operations."

Senator Crerar went on to show, as we in these columns tried to show recently, the extraordinary changes that have come in the political philosophy of this country, with their whittling away all our old ideas of a free economy. Thus:—

I quote again from Senator Crerar:

"I first became a member of parliament thirty years ago and the functions of the government of that day as contrasted with those of the administration of today represent a complete transformation. The government of Canada today is in the wheat business up past its ears. The government is in the housing business to a most extensive degree. It is in the transportation business, by land, sea and air. It is operating a transcontinental air service, ships on the sea and the national railways. The government is in the broadcasting business. The government is in the motion picture business. It is also operating crown companies. It is in the business of dispensing public information. All these activities have completely or at any rate largely changed the functions of government."

That is the end of that quotation from Senator Crerar. It does not say whether or not it was from Hansard.

The picture is not distorted; to an amazing degree Canada has passed from a country of free capitalist effort into one where totalitarianism is steadily on the march. The strange thing, and the pity, is that this transformation has come and continues to come without public discussion, largely without public awareness. The stranger thing, and the greater pity, is that it has been brought about by people who profess to be against totalitarianism, who talk sometimes as if they held the title deeds of liberalism, and also that many who profess to be the enemies of totalitarianism daily cry out for more of it. We have people, at this moment, calling upon the government to settle strikes by "making the unions work". It does not occur to them that if any government in this country ever uses force to make the unions work it will not be to make them work for private industry but for the government—the state; that work compelled by force will put us precisely where Russia is and where Germany was.

That is the trouble with too many of us; we have no clear understanding of where all this government intervention, and all this government planning, and all this totalitarian legislation, are carrying us. Well might more of us, whether we belong to labour or to capital, heed the wise words of Senator Crerar.

Again I quote his words, and not from Hansard.

The Chairman: Order. I think it is just as much out of order to quote from a newspaper what has been said in debate in the other place as it is to quote from Senate Hansard direct. An hon. member may not do indirectly that which he may not do directly.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I wanted to let the hon. gentleman finish his quotations, but I would refer the committee to citation 307 of Beauchesne:

Allusion to debates in the other house are out of order, and there are few orders more important than this for the conduct of debate and for observing courtesy between the houses.

That rule has always been observed; the chairman is quite right. We have never debated a debate in the other place. I did not interfere; I thought it would be a short quotation, but apparently most of the hon. gentleman's speech is to be taken up with these quotations. That is a rule of the house which has been continuously applied.

Some hon. Members: During the current session.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No; there is no mention of any particular session.

Mr. Fulton: On this point I would refer the committee to the ruling in May, twelfth edition, which I submit clearly establishes that the restriction is confined to debates of the current session. The rule is referred to at page 291. The text then follows along for several lines, and there are a number of citations and quotations at the bottom of the page in support of it. Citation No. 5 at the bottom of page 291 reads:

> See also the Speaker's rulings concerning the power of quotation from a speech in the House of Lords . . . and his declaration that it was a very wholesome rule of the house not to allude to statements or debates of the current session in the other house, as to do so might bring the two houses into collision.

That is a citation in support of the rule as found in May, and I suggest that it clearly establishes that the rule is confined to debates of the current session.

Mr. MacNaught: On the point of order I would like to draw attention to citation 264 in Beauchesne, third edition:

> It is out of order to read extracts in a debate if they (e) allude to debates in the other house of parliament.

Mr. Drew: The context clearly indicates no reference to the records of the other place, and a completely new principle is asserted in the suggestion that what has been reported in a newspaper is in itself not subject to comment here, though there is no suggestion that what is quoted is taken from Hansard instead of being merely the ordinary record made by the newspaper reporters who were present at the time.

The Chairman: I understood the hon. member was reading a direct quotation from Hansard which had been inserted in the editorial.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman; that is why I said "not from Hansard".

The Chairman: My point is that the hon. member cannot do indirectly what he cannot do directly. I thought I should put myself on record in regard to this matter.

Mr. Drew: Then is the ruling that a newspaper reference to something which has taken place in the other house in an earlier session is not admissible in the debates of this house?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct, and that is as it should be.

Mr. Drew: I am referring to a quotation from the press.

The Chairman: If it quotes the direct words, the exact words, and is a quotation from Hansard, in my opinion it would not be in order.

Mr. Drew: Then, Mr. Chairman, I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Black (Yukon): I should like to ask the chairman to direct his attention to the House of Commons Debates, on the title page of which appear the words "Official Report". The same thing is true of the Senate debates. The chairman has ruled that these are not official reports, and therefore if a person is quoting from them he is not violating the rules of the house because there is no official report from which to quote. Either these are official reports or they are not. The chairman suggests they are not; therefore, the leader of the opposition in quoting from these documents is not quoting from official reports.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, I understand there has been a ruling and an appeal from that ruling. No further discussion is allowed.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to take into consideration the ridiculous position in which we would be placed if we said we could not discuss anything that was ever said in the Senate. We would be in exactly that position if what was said last year or the year before could not be repeated in this house. If nothing that had ever been said in the Senate since confederation could be repeated, how ridiculous it would be! Surely what these rules have in mind is that we should not create a controversy between the house and the Senate concerning matters currently under discussion; that is the only logical conclusion to which one can come.

The Chairman: I must say I was impressed by the reference from May which was read by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and which I have not been able to obtain. I did not give a ruling on this matter. I stated it was my opinion that it was irregular to refer to the debates of the Senate, either by having a copy of Hansard in the hands of the member who was speaking or by having the quotation from Hansard which appeared in the press. I expressed that as an opinion.

I said in the first place that I rose because this was a departure from the custom in this house. I think hon. members will recall that I stated that. I was not calling the leader of the opposition to order. With respect to whether or not the standing order applies only to the debates of any one session, standing order 41, citation 293 (b), reads as follows:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not . . .
> (b) refer to any debate in the Senate—

It does not say, "of the current session". One cannot refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion, and the rule in this regard definitely says, "debate of the same session".

With respect to the question raised by the member for Yukon (Mr. Black), I have read citation 293 (b), in which the words are "refer to any debate in the Senate". Then it continues:

> But he may refer to the official printed records of the upper house—

Which are different from the debates.

> —though they have not been formally communicated to the lower house.

Mr. Fulton: I believe you will find, Mr. Chairman, that the citation in Beauchesne's second edition is based on the authority of May, and May sets forth the rule in greater detail in the quotation to which I have referred. The citation at the bottom of page 16 seems to me to limit the rule set forth in May to debates of the present session, and that, in turn, would limit the citation in Beauchesne's second edition, which is based on May, also to debates in the present session.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is difficult to come to a definite conclusion by reading the rules. I note that the leader of the opposition was in order in reading extracts from newspapers to support his argument; that is stated in citation 262. According to citation 264 a speaker may not "allude to debates in the other house of parliament". I think some restraint should be placed on the practice of reading clippings. I have no objection to the leader of the opposition reading some clippings, but he should not make a whole speech by reading newspaper clippings.

Mr. Drew: The point is not one that can be dropped at this juncture, because, as the discussion has indicated, the practice in the past is not perfectly clear. Even though the rules have not stated the situation as positively as they might, their purpose is to prevent the very thing the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has referred to as an embarrassing misunderstanding between this house and the other place while some matter is under active discussion. I think hon. members might well consider what the effect of such a decision would be.

Many members have been urging that the other place initiate more legislation than it has in earlier years. Certain legislation is initiated in the other place, after which it comes to this house. This practice is in accordance with established practice in Westminster, and, although the procedure in Canada and the United States are not the same, it is an extremely common practice in Washington. The upper house takes the responsibility of piloting through some measures in connection with which an extensive examination of the details is called for. If at some future time, in order to explain his reason for coming to certain conclusions, it should be impossible for a member of the house to quote in this chamber what had been said in the other place, the house would be deprived of extremely valuable information. No reasonable justification could be put forward for establishing such a rule.

What has happened in this case is that certain discussions did take place three years ago in the other place. Those discussions were referred to by the press of this country over an extremely wide area. In order that all hon. members may better understand what was actually under consideration, I am placing the editorial comment before the house. In doing so I am following the same practice as the Minister of Finance followed yesterday in explaining the effect of a bill which had been introduced, although the contents were different. In this case the newspaper editorials actually quote from statements made by members in the other place. Whether or not those statements appeared in Hansard is in no way indicated by the editorial. In fact in the ordinary course of events one might expect that the editorial would be based upon a report of the particular newspaper in which the editorial appeared. I have not finished the editorial in question. There is a quotation from another member in the other place, and I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on whether I may proceed to read it.

Mr. Adamson: Just before you give your ruling, Mr. Chairman, may I say that some years ago I found myself in exactly the same situation. At that time Mr. Ilsley was the minister of finance. I was quoting an hon. senator and the deputy minister of finance both in a debate in the other place and in a committee of the other place. The then minister of finance requested a ruling on the matter, and the ruling given at that time was that I could proceed, since it aided the argument I was putting forward. I submit there is a precedent, sir, for allowing the quotation to be given.

Mr. Golding: I think the point which has been raised is an important one, and a snap judgment on it should not be given. I suggest that the debate be allowed to go on, that the hon. member be allowed to quote from the editorial to which he was referring, and that consideration be given to a ruling in the matter. It is important that we should have a proper ruling in a case of this kind. I should not want to see the debate restricted to any greater extent than may be necessary; yet I should like to see the rules observed. My suggestion is that the leader of the opposition continue his discussion, and that the matter be taken into consideration and a ruling given later.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When I stood up, Mr. Chairman, I thought the leader of the opposition had concluded his reading of the extract. I waited for that moment in order to cite the rule. If he has not completed the reading of it, I see no objection to his continuing.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to say just one thing. It seems to me that the general sense of this committee was that what the hon. member for Vancouver East said was sensible. I suggest that the body of the rules of this house is the result of two things. One of these is the precedents. But it is not altogether a matter of precedents. After all, new decisions have been made on hundreds of occasions. When this matter is being considered I suggest that we have regard to what the hon. member for Vancouver East said, and to what a former leader of my party called "the immortal ground of common sense."

Mr. Drew: I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Huron-Perth is a sound one. Obviously the point is one upon which members on both sides of this house have some doubts. I am simply asking that it be clarified one way or another; and if the suggestion he has made is acceptable to the committee, I shall proceed.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Drew: I will start at the last paragraph, Mr. Chairman, because I am not just sure at what word I stopped:

> That is the trouble with too many of us; we have no clear understanding of where all this government intervention, and all this government planning, and all this totalitarian legislation, are carrying us. Well might more of us, whether we belong to labour or to capital, heed the wise words of Senator Crerar:
> "Liberalism down the ages has been the great liberating force in every worthwhile achievement of our civilization. When I speak of liberalism it is not in the sense of something that distinguishes the Liberal party from the Conservative party; for today those party labels have little, if any, significance when you probe deep down into the very fundamentals upon which our civilization is based and has developed. It is because I am opposed to anything that undermines the spirit of liberalism, the love of freedom and liberty which is the divine heritage of the individual citizen, that I am opposed to this measure."

The editorial goes on:

> Canada would be a better country, had we more of the heart and mood here so finely spoken.

That was the sentiment expressed at the time this bill was under consideration, and that was the sentiment expressed in a great many publications, with different points of view, in different parts of the country.

The operation of the foreign exchange legislation was limited as to time, not in this house but in the other house. As a result, the measure we are now considering comes before this house for decision on the part of hon. members whether it shall again impose no restraint upon those things which have been done in the past, and which the Minister of Finance said would not be done.

There will be an opportunity to discuss this matter still further; but, in dealing with a motion of the kind now before us, hon. members must consider whether they should not receive some assurance from the government, first as to the things that have arisen in connection with the foreign exchange measure; second, as to the real necessity for the legislation, and third, as to what this government is doing to meet the situation which was so vigorously and so ably put forward by the Minister of Agriculture in London a short time ago.

As has been pointed out, one of the difficulties involved in this bill is that it places in the hands of civil servants wide and sweeping powers over the whole economy of this country. Let no members of the government get up and suggest that this is a reflection on the civil servants, as they are prone to do whenever any statement is made to the effect that the future of this country should not be entrusted to civil servants. Civil servants are the servants of the public; it is their duty to carry on their daily work under statutes approved by legislative bodies and under the administrative direction of ministers of the crown answerable to parliament and to the people of Canada. When you sidetrack the responsibility of the executive, and of parliament which is in control over the executive, you set up something that approximates a totalitarian state, as was pointed out by those prominent Liberals whose words were referred to in the editorials I have quoted.

This legislation can have a profound and decisive effect upon the whole future of this country. Under it our economy could be undermined and destroyed if a dangerous and unwise course were pursued too far. Canada could find its trading relationship with other countries interfered with by the limiting provisions of the act relating to export and import, and its whole trading position in the world could be seriously impaired and seriously threatened if steps were taken which excluded us from markets which are the natural ones for the products of this country, and which have been the natural markets for many years.

It is not expedient to carry forward a measure which by men who believe in the Liberal tradition has been properly described as a totalitarian measure. This house has the opportunity to say that if there is to be an operation of this kind in relation to exchange, it shall be an operation that is under the responsibility of a minister answerable to the house, and that the acts by civil servants be brought to an end. After all, civil servants can do only what they are told to do by the ministers to whom they are responsible under the acts which have been passed. A great many things are being done about which neither parliament nor the people of this country have any information. When the Minister of Finance yesterday talked at some length about a realistic value for the dollar, implying that it was impossible to arrive at some realistic value of the dollar—

Mr. Abbott: I did not imply that.

Mr. Drew: —on the basis of open transactions, he of course implied that when the foreign exchange control board is approving some of these transactions, it is not the standard by which to test the propriety of the figure at which that exchange operation is fixed. Unless these exchange operations, which are reported in the financial press, do bear some relation to reality, then it is indeed a strange thing for the foreign exchange control board to be approving large transactions, involving in single cases many millions of dollars, at the very figures which are being quoted in the press from day to day. Apparently it is realistic enough for the foreign exchange control board to conduct business in this way.

So many things are done in such a casual and secretive manner that they are left to be discovered by the public by indirect methods. Tourist trade between Canada and the United States is a matter of considerable importance, as was pointed out by the Minister of Finance in his own remarks. It is a two-way operation. If we encourage tourist trade here, we must also recognize that there are certain reciprocal obligations—and every sensible person recognizes that. When certain exemptions are extended to United States citizens coming into Canada, under which they may take certain goods back to the United States, naturally Canadians are interested in any arrangements we make to encourage Canadians to travel and to see that we are reciprocating as far as we can. Possibly it is not important in the total figure, but it does indicate the way in which people are left to find out for themselves what has been done. In the Foreign Commerce Weekly of February 4, 1949, a publication of the Department of Commerce of the United States, an interesting item appears on page 13. It reads as follows: "Canadian tourist credit purchases liberalized." I do not recall any announcement in the Canadian press that Canadian tourist purchases in the United States had been liberalized at about that time, and I should be glad if the Minister of Finance would indicate that any such statement was then given to the press.

Mr. Abbott: A press statement was issued at that time.

Mr. Drew: In regard to the method that was employed?

Mr. Abbott: In regard to the $100.

Mr. Drew: But not in regard to these credit arrangements?

Mr. Abbott: No; I do not know anything about the credit.

Mr. Drew: The minister does not know anything about the credit arrangement?

Mr. Abbott: The credit arrangement is one which has always existed ever since foreign exchange control was established. There is nothing new about it. There was no change.

Mr. Drew: The announcement on February 14 of a change may be wrong?

Mr. Abbott: There was no change. It had always existed.

Mr. Drew: The provision by which people could buy on credit and then come back here?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Drew: Then apparently the Foreign Commerce Weekly is incorrect in its information.

Mr. Abbott: That may be so; yes.

An hon. Member: What publication is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. Drew: If the hon. member had been listening—not the Minister of Finance—he would have heard me say that I am referring to an official publication of the government of the United States.

This particular provision is one of the many that can be made in regard to credit arrangements between two countries. Evidently an official publication of the United States government was in error when it said that there had been a change. We are now informed that such a change did not take place. Naturally I accept the statement of the minister to that effect.

Mr. Abbott: I want to keep the record clear. The tourist imports were completely cut off, whether for cash or for credit, and naturally at that time the credit arrangement was suspended with the cash arrangement; but once the cash provision of $100 was restored, the credit arrangement was restored as well.

Mr. Drew: Of course this was hailed, and not unnaturally, in the United States as a broad liberalization of Canadian policy, which would permit an increase of the amount of money; and it was obvious that the thing was not generally understood, because apparently they regarded it as a considerable extension of the facilities available to them, and that is what they point out.

In connection with the control of exchange between the two countries, as distinct from the control over the actual movement of goods one way and the other, to hear the Minister of Finance argue one would think that the ordinary operation of exchange is something that is very undesirable, when as a matter of fact he himself indicated at the time this bill originally came forward that the present course was not one which appealed to him very much at that time, but that he felt it had become necessary under the circumstances.

So far as one could discern a clear argument yesterday by the Minister of Finance in the speech which he read to the house, it was to the effect that far from our dollar having a normal level below par, it has a level which justifies the fixing of it at 100 cents on the dollar. If it really is so, then these crutches which are now being given the dollar are unnecessary; but the fact is, and the Minister of Finance is well aware of it, that because of perfectly normal and traditional results from the kind of trade that is carried on at the present time between Canada and the United States, our dollar is not at parity with that of the United States.

Mr. Abbott: Why is that?

Mr. Drew: Because for the whole period covered by the history of international exchange, the value of the money unit of one country in relation to the money unit of another country moves up and down in relation to the balance of trade and other credit considerations between the two countries. And because the convertibility factor was removed from the Bretton Woods agreement we are in the position of dealing alone with the United States, and our excessive purchases in the United States as compared with our exports, naturally, as the Minister of Finance well knows, produce a result that does for the time being place our dollar below 100 cents in United States funds.

Probably the unfortunate fact is that our dollar is called a dollar. If it were not called a dollar, then we would not be so sensitive about the normal movement of our unit of exchange. The movement of the unit of exchange is the thing that has controlled and actually brought to a balance the trade between countries, and that is a sound way for our dollar to get back to some measure of parity.

This country need not be so much concerned about the value of its money unit so long as appropriate efforts are made by this government to bring about normal international trading. It is not enough for the Minister of Finance or for any member of this government to say that this is the Bretton Woods agreement; the pound is no longer convertible, and we have just got to go along as we have done in the past. This is a sovereign state. This is a nation which boasts of its great growth and strength in the international sphere. It is the duty of the government of Canada to take steps which will be in keeping with the ultimate needs of this country as one of the greatest trading nations in the world—and it is not only that, but it is one of the greatest per capita trading nations in the world, if not the greatest. Consequently if there is one country which should initiate steps to change this situation and to break the log-jam which has stopped trading in many directions, it is this country, the future of which is so seriously threatened by its inability to sell in markets which would normally be ours.

The Minister of Finance yesterday in the speech which he read—and which obviously he had read over before he presented it here —referred to a statement which I had made on behalf of the province of Ontario in regard to a provision under which the external obligations of provincial governments would be met in such a way as to make it possible for those provinces to pay their obligations at parity in the United States. Not one word of what I put forward, or in what was put forward by anyone else, had to do with this subject of the level of foreign exchange. either then or at any other time. The quotation of the minister yesterday is one of those typical introductions of something which in some way indirectly relates to the subject, and the putting of a coloration upon it to suit his own purpose. He did put a coloration upon it which was improper and which was entirely contrary to the facts, as he well knows.

Mr. Abbott: In what way? Will the hon. member allow a question? What coloration did I put upon it, and in what way was it improper?

Mr. Drew: I was coming to that. What he said was that this had been put forward in the special interests of Ontario.

Mr. Abbott: No, I did not. I said in my statement of yesterday I was sure it was put forward on grounds of high principle, not to give additional revenue to Ontario. I was very careful to emphasize that.

Mr. Drew: The proposition that was made by him was a proposition put forward as a basis of over-all agreement among all the governments of Canada, and it could have been accepted only if it was acceptable and could have become a part of the general agreement among all the governments of Canada.

Mr. Abbott: Nobody else suggested it.

Mr. Drew: The minister of course was not present at the discussions at that time.

Mr. Abbott: According to the record, nobody else suggested it.

Mr. Drew: The minister is well aware of the fact that he was seeking to leave an impression which was quite clear. The fact is that when he made that proposition to which I referred, and to which he referred, he was putting forward something before the provinces, the provincial governments, which had voluntarily given up their taxing powers during the war and had been denied the return of taxing powers which the dominion government had promised them, and suggesting that they should be in some way provided with the necessary arrangements to meet their external obligations and thus compensate them to some extent for what they had done during the war.

I mention this only to dispose of an attempt that was made in some way to create confusion as to what had actually been discussed at that time.

Now, Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I am extremely interested in these comments, which show an impatience on the part of hon. members in regard to a measure which has to do with the economic future of this country, and which will determine the course this country will follow for years to come. I only wish there were, somewhere within the ranks of those opposite, men who recalled the liberal principles put forward by those Liberals whose statements I have quoted here this morning.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he agree with the monetary principles of the late Mr. McGeer?

Mr. Drew: That is exactly the kind of question I would expect from the present Minister of Justice.

An hon. Member: Answer.

Mr. Garson: Whether it is the kind of question which my hon. friend would expect from the Minister of Justice or not, I should be very glad if he would answer it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The old slot machine.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Justice is perfectly well aware that I can quote from newspaper editorials which deal with statements that were made at that time in regard to foreign exchange control, and that they were not in any way limited to the late Senator McGeer. They included Senator Campbell, who is still, I believe, in the favour of his party; and Senator Bench, who unhappily no longer is there, and Senator Crerar, who at that time and in the past has been respected as an exponent of Liberal policies.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member has not answered the question. If he does not wish to answer it, all right.

Mr. Drew: I am not going to answer silly questions. I will answer every sensible question that is put to me during this discussion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: Read the speech.

Mr. Drew: No; I do not find it necessary to read my speeches. I am quite capable of making my own speech—unlike some ministers of the crown. I am not going to read, except from the words of another Liberal who has stated sound Liberal policies, and who has happily expressed some of them here —because they do relate to the matters we are now considering.

I notice that the Minister of Finance was very sensitive in regard to the suggestion that he gave this country a budget by radio.

Mr. Abbott: I am not sensitive to anything.

Mr. Drew: I have quoted these words before, and I do not hesitate to quote them again, because they have application to what the minister has put forward:

> Without the existence of an almost all-powerful bureaucracy, it is unlikely that we would have had budget by radio, restraint of trade by embargoes and prohibitions, bungling of freight rates, and a snarling of interprovincial relations.

Those are the positive words of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). He said in the same speech—and I might add that this of course was not yet made in the Senate:

> Ministers of the crown must abandon the practice of abdicating their functions, their duties, and shouldering their responsibilities on irresponsible boards, committees or commissions.

Mr. Chairman, that is as cogent an argument as could be put forward against the adoption of a resolution stating that it is expedient that we proceed to deal with this measure. Because that is exactly what has happened in these cases.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Abbott: He does not know it.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: We are now dealing with the extension of the foreign exchange control measure, and I come to statements made yesterday by the Prime Minister which had to do with the very type of thing that is now under consideration here. The Prime Minister yesterday waxed indignant about the time that had been taken in the discussion of certain matters in the house. The Prime Minister put on a well-staged show, which had been carefully planned in advance. Of course we had the advantage of knowing from the press that it had been planned and was going to take place.

An hon. Member: How did you like it?

Mr. Drew: I liked it very well as a perfect demonstration of the mind of a dictator.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I will repeat that until Hansard gets my answer: I liked it very well—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: I liked it very well as a clear demonstration to this committee—

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order—

Mr. Drew: I liked it very well—

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order; is the leader of the opposition not now referring to subjects that have been discussed and things that have happened in another debate?

Mr. Drew: I liked it very well as a demonstration—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —of the action of a man who believes in dictatorial authority. It was a clear indication of a servile government group following a man in trying to suppress the ordinary rights of this House of Commons in the way he has.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, I was wondering if my hon. friend could tell me whether it was the right of free speech that was being dealt with.

Mr. Drew: If the minister has a question of privilege or a point of order to raise, he has a right to the floor; but I have no intention of paying any attention to his silly questions.

Mr. Abbott: The only questions the leader of the opposition answers are his own.

Mr. Drew: It was not without reason that the minister was nicknamed "garçon" at the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Abbott: What brilliant wit!

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Grant: Back to the scene of the crime.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Grant: Back to the scene of the crime.

Mr. Drew: This is a fine demonstration—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: This is a fine demonstration of the recognition by members on the other side of this house of the importance of the measure that is now before us and its effect on the future of Canada.

Mr. Howe: Filibuster.

Mr. Drew: When the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: The leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: —and the leader of the house, who also has some responsibilities in that respect, makes the statement that a filibuster is taking place he is merely indicating how little he likes legitimate debate in the house on the arbitrary measures which he puts forward. His whole conduct demonstrates how unsafe it is to place arbitrary powers of this kind in his hands.

Mr. Knowles: I ask for a ruling on my point of order. The rule is clear that it is not in order to revive a debate that has already been concluded. The debate to which reference is now made was concluded yesterday when the motion of the Prime Minister was agreed to unanimously, and I submit it should not be revived now.

The Chairman: I think the point taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is well taken, on the ground that he has indicated—hon. members may not refer to a debate on another subject in the same session. Standing order 58, subsection 2, reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Foreign Exchange Control

When a resolution is before the house, considerable scope is given to the debate, but when it is referred to the committee of the whole the discussion must be strictly relevant to the resolution under consideration. May I emphasize the words "strictly relevant"—not only in connection with the present resolution but in connection with all other matters which will come before the committee. I am sure all hon. members are anxious to abide by the rules, and I think it is only necessary for me to call their attention to the words "strictly relevant".

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I conclude—

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

The Chairman: The chairman will declare when it is one o'clock.

Mr. Drew: I was dealing with the observations made in regard to the extension of this debate. I have heard that observation. I am certainly not, in the circumstances, limiting the extent of my remarks when I believe the freedom of this country is at stake in an issue such as this. I shall conclude in a moment by reading these words—

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Drew: I quote:

> I may be leading a forlorn hope, but I am leading it up to the very battlements of autocracy, complacency and inertia.

Mr. Garson: I rise to a point of order. When a hon. member of this house announces that he does not intend to abide by its rules, he should be named.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe: One o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, that was another silly statement by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: I rise on a question of privilege. I demand that my hon. friend retract the word "silly". It is unparliamentary.

Mr. Drew: I will not retract the word "silly", except under your ruling, sir; because that word is quite proper. It has been used several times by hon. members opposite.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

The Chairman: I understood the leader of the opposition to state that the question was silly, not that the minister was silly.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Garson: No question was asked at all. A point of order was raised, and I should like to have your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order.

The Chairman: I think the word "silly"—

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Garson: I am not asking—

The Chairman: What was the point?

Mr. Garson: The point of order was this: when an hon. member rises in his place and informs the chairman and the members of the committee that he will not abide by its rules—

An hon. Member: He did no such thing.

The Chairman: With respect to the word "silly", it has been used a great many times during the present session—

Mr. MacInnis: It ought to be.

The Chairman: —but I do not think the word should be used, and I would ask hon. members not to use it. With regard to the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice, I did not understand the leader of the opposition to say that he would not abide by the rules.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: The chairman must be allowed to give his ruling without interruption. I did not understand the leader of the opposition to say he would not abide by the rules of the house. I do not remember his exact words, but they were to the effect that if freedom of speech was being interfered with, he would not hesitate to speak in this house. He did not say he would not hesitate to speak irrespective of the rules, and I was about to rise and say, "as long as the hon. member is speaking in accordance with the rules."

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROCEDURE FOR ORGANIZATION OF STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): With the permission of hon. members I might put on record the information I received from the clerk of the house as to the procedure followed in the organization of the standing committees. It is as follows:

> As soon as standing committees have been set up it is the duty of the chief of the committee branch of the house to call a meeting of each of them for the purpose of electing its chairman. In doing so he endeavours to suit the conveniences of the members of the house and he consults the chief government whip as to the day on which they will be free to attend.
> As some members belong to two or three committees, it is the usual practice to have all of the committees choose their chairmen on the same day. A few days elapse before this first meeting because some consultation has to take place prior to the choice of the chairmen.

After committees have been fully organized by the appointment of their chairmen, they enjoy complete autonomy within the orders of reference sent to them by the house. They are free to settle the dates of their meetings and to regulate their own proceedings. Interference of members or even ministers of the crown with their proceedings would be considered a breach of privilege.

They are responsible to the house alone, and in no way subservient to the government.

Arthur Beauchesne,
Clerk of the House of Commons

Mr. W. G. Weir (Macdonald): In fairness to the chief of the committee branch perhaps I should add a word to what the Prime Minister has said. Hon. members will recall that the committees were announced last Monday. The following day I received this note from the acting chief of the branch, as I presume the opposition whip did also:

When you have decided on the date on which the standing committees are to be organized by the appointment of their respective chairmen, it would be appreciated if I could have a few days advance notice in order to have notices to members printed.

I conferred with the chief of the branch during the week as to a date suitable to most hon. members, and yesterday advised him to call these committees together on Tuesday morning next.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT

CONTINUANCE IN FORCE UNTIL SIXTY DAYS AFTER OPENING OF FIRST SESSION OF PARLIAMENT IN 1951

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the continuance in force of the Foreign Exchange Control Act until sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year 1951.

Mr. Green: In the province of British Columbia we are faced with the problem of having to sell a great deal of our lumber, our canned salmon, our apples, our base metals and other commodities to Great Britain and other commonwealth countries. As everyone knows there is great difficulty at present in connection with that trade. The apple trade, and I think also the trade in canned salmon, have been cut off completely, though there is still some lumber going to Britain.

From time to time the suggestion has been advanced that an arrangement could be made under which we would bring in steel from Great Britain in exchange for our lumber, for example. I realize that there are obstacles to the setting up of this kind of trade, but in reading the report of the foreign exchange control board I gathered the idea that the board is not very keen about arrangements of the kind. At page 7, for example, we find reference to two types of arrangements which could be made to promote trade between dollar and non-dollar countries. The first suggestion is that the exporting country, which in my case would be Canada, should advance credits to the importing country, in my case Great Britain. The other suggestion is that arrangements be made for special deals in which the exporting country, which would be Canada, agreed to use the proceeds of its exports to take more goods from its dollar-short customer even though those goods were higher in price than if bought elsewhere. That would mean bringing steel from Great Britain for use in British Columbia.

I would like the Minister of Finance to explain the attitude of the board and of the government toward transactions of that kind, because it does seem to me we are in a corner as far as this trade is concerned. We are like the dog that had to climb a tree; we have to do something. I should like to know why it is not possible for Canada to work out some special arrangement under which we could exchange British Columbia timber, for example, for steel from Great Britain.

Mr. Abbott: Well, Mr. Chairman, of course that involves a very large question of trade policy. Arrangements of that kind, if carried on to any great extent, essentially would involve what are commonly known as barter deals; that is to say, one country arranges to swap a certain quantity of wheat, let us say, or bacon, for a certain quantity of steel or manufactured goods. That sort of thing involves a substantial degree of import control on the part of both countries. It involves, if it is to be carried through to any substantial extent, a considerable degree of state trading, that is purchases by the state. But perhaps the most difficult feature of an arrangement of that kind is that the price of the steel, as my hon. friend has indicated, may be higher than the price at which that steel could be obtained from our domestic producers, let us say, or from producers in the United States. Someone would have to pay that higher cost, either the purchaser or the taxpayers as a whole.

Many other difficulties are involved in arrangements of that kind. Incidentally I understand that the board of trade in Great Britain has arranged for a substantial increase in exports of steel to this country, through representations made by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not know the price, but I assume the steel is coming in at reasonably competitive prices.

Mr. Howe: Higher prices.

Mr. Abbott: The demand for steel is such that Canadian consumers are prepared to pay those higher prices. But let me say to my hon. friend that we in Canada are not only ready but anxious to take any sort of commodity, capital or consumer goods, that the United Kingdom is able to export to us at competitive prices. We are not only ready; we are extremely anxious to do that, and we have gone to quite considerable lengths, as I shall attempt to indicate in the course of my budget speech in dealing with trade questions, to encourage that type of export, and we hope and believe the steps we have taken and that are being taken by western European countries will result in an increased flow of trade to this country.

In direct answer to my hon. friend's question, I do not believe that a system of barter deals is in the interests of Canada if it can possibly be avoided, if for no other reason than that such a tremendous volume of both our imports and our exports come from and go to the United States. We cannot make barter deals with the United States; they do not operate on that basis. We have to operate on a price basis there, and naturally that introduces very serious complications in the matter of barter deals with other countries, which in my judgment are most undesirable in the interests of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Green: Surely the minister does not mean these deals necessarily would have to be made between governments. Suppose a lumber-producing firm in British Columbia exchanged lumber for steel, and then disposed of that steel in British Columbia.

Mr. Abbott: There is nothing to prevent that. It would be splendid.

Mr. Green: That is a private transaction.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Green: But as I read the report of the foreign exchange control board, that board is not favourable to deals of that kind. I am not an expert on this question, but it does seem to me there is a method there of getting our trade with Great Britain back to something approaching normal. It does seem the foreign exchange control board is not working very hard to bring about deals such as the one I have mentioned.

Mr. Abbott: On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any objection, let us say, to a British Columbia producer of lumber entering into an arrangement with a British steel manufacturer to swap lumber for steel. The British Columbia producer would then be faced with the problem of selling steel in Canada at competitive prices. He may be unwilling to take that risk and, as to that, I do not know.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Generally speaking, the foreign exchange control board would put no obstacle in the way of an arrangement of that type. Far from doing anything to discourage imports from sterling area countries, the foreign exchange control board and every other agency of government is doing everything in its power to encourage such imports. It is tremendously in the interests of the Canadian people as a whole to do that because of the volume of our export trade. We should try to get our customers in a position where they can pay for our goods. It was for that reason we extended these large credits, so these countries would be able to restore their productive machinery and export goods and services to us. This is the only real way in which our exports can be paid for. They cannot be paid for in pieces of paper; they have to be paid for in something tangible. When these importing countries are able to restore their economies to the position which enables them to export goods and services to us and to other countries at prices which our people are willing to pay, then our trading accounts can be balanced.

Mr. Green: Is there any agency or department of government which is actively promoting such transactions, such as helping the exchange of steel from Great Britain for lumber from Canada?

Mr. Abbott: I shall ask my hon. friend to answer that question.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, if I may answer that question, the Department of Trade and Commerce encourages barter deals where they are helpful. The barter deal which my friend proposes would not be helpful. He proposes that a producer of lumber in British Columbia exchange that lumber for steel from Great Britain. May I point out that we are taking now all the steel Britain can send us and we are exporting all the lumber Britain will take from us.

The trade is just as badly unbalanced if you take $50 million worth of lumber on one side and $50 million worth of steel on the other side out of our reciprocal trade accounts; your unbalance continues unchanged. True, one individual transaction is balanced, but since you have a large movement of each of the two commodities, the unbalance is continued just as if your barter deal never took place.

Last year our department helped to work out a barter deal with Brazil in which apples were exchanged for oranges. This was a helpful transaction because the oranges would not have moved to Canada otherwise and we would not have had that market for our apples. It is the latter type of barter deal that we encourage because it develops new trade. The department has attempted to develop other barter deals, but some have not worked out. Such a transaction usually has to be developed at somewhat higher prices than competitive prices in one of the countries concerned. We do everything possible to encourage the type of deal I have mentioned whenever it develops new trade between countries and I may say the foreign exchange control board has put no obstacles in the way of such transactions.

Mr. Green: Is that the type of barter deal that is taking place between Great Britain and the other countries in the sterling area?

Mr. Howe: I do not know; it is difficult to say. I believe those transactions are not true barter deals. It is really an agreement to buy so much wheat from Russia, we will say, as against so much machinery from England. To the best of my information the settlements have been made partly in pounds sterling or in dollars. In other words, the transactions are not barter deals as I understand that term. These transactions seem to be mutual trade deals in that the settlement is not strictly goods for goods.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): This word "barter" is being used a great deal now and I do not understand exactly what is meant by it. Will the minister explain what he meant by calling this deal with Brazil a barter deal?

Mr. Howe: It is a direct exchange of commodities for commodities, without any exchange of dollars or currency.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Arranged by whom?

Mr. Howe: This particular deal was arranged by the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association with the help of the trade commissioner in Brazil.

Mr. Hackett: It was not between the two governments?

Mr. Howe: No, we do not make such arrangements between governments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): If it was an exchange of goods for goods, there would have to be some means of arriving at the value. In what sense do you mean it was barter; is it not an exchange of currencies but a straight barter deal? I am asking that from the point of view of barter as understood some centuries ago. I would go into a shop and ask a man for a shirt in exchange for which I would sweep out his shop. I may have to try quite a few shops before I find someone who wants his shop swept out. In what sense are we returning to real barter?

Mr. Howe: In the barter deal to which I referred, the people in British Columbia said they would exchange so many boxes of apples for so many boxes of oranges. It was simply an exchange of goods for goods.

Mr. Quelch: The Minister of Finance, I think, will agree that one of the reasons Britain has to charge high prices for some exports is that under the special agreements which she has with European nations she is able to get those high prices. If we want these goods to come to Canada we will have to compete and pay those prices. I should like to refer the minister to a statement I quoted last night appearing in the foreign exchange control board report near the bottom of page 6:

> If efforts on the part of the sterling area and ERP countries in the direction of greater exports to dollar countries are inadequate or fail to solve their dollar problem, then it may be expected that these countries will continue to place special restrictions on imports from dollar countries. The countries whose exports are affected by these restrictions will be confronted with the choice of finding some alternative use, at home or in other foreign markets, for the goods previously exported to the dollar-short countries or making special arrangements in an effort to retain these markets. These arrangements could involve the provision of the exports without payment in foreign exchange, through the extension of grants or credits,—

This is the point I wish to emphasize.

> —or special deals in which the exporting country agreed to use the proceeds of its exports to take more goods from its dollar-short customers even though these goods were higher in price than had to be paid elsewhere. To make room for these relatively high-priced imports it would be necessary to impose discriminatory import restrictions.

I wonder if the minister could explain just what kind of deals the board had in mind when they said:

> —or special deals in which the exporting country agreed to use the proceeds of its exports to take more goods from its dollar-short customers even though these goods were higher in price than had to be paid elsewhere.

This would mean we would be importing goods into this country at higher prices than prevailed within Canada. No doubt that would mean we would have to subsidize those imports. We did not hesitate to subsidize imports into this country during the war in order to maintain the price ceiling. Surely, if it is a question of maintaining our markets in Europe, we would be justified in going to the length of subsidizing imports. If we are not prepared to compete with other nations for British goods because the prices are higher, we must lose that market and we may have a great deal of difficulty in getting it back.

Surely, as a short-time expedient, it might be well worth our while to subsidize imports into this country, thus making it possible for the importer to sell them at existing price levels. This foreign exchange control board report says:

> To make room for these relatively high-priced imports it would be necessary to impose discriminatory import restrictions.

Would that not come into conflict with the Geneva trade agreements?

Mr. Abbott: Unquestionably.

Mr. Quelch: In principle, yes. On the other hand there are escape clauses in the Geneva trade agreement which would appear to permit action of that type. I know the minister spoke last year about these escape clauses and the advantage taken of them in trading. They were going to live up to the principle. What is the use of having an escape clause in an agreement if you are not going to utilize it? Surely when we are faced with a situation that is as serious as the situation today, where our markets to Britain are in danger of shrinking, we would be justified in utilizing a clause that was put in there for the very purpose for which we may need it in this case.

In view of the serious situation in regard to our exports to Britain, I should like to ask the minister whether he would not consider the advisability of accepting sterling in payment for our exports; then using the sterling in the purchase of British goods, even if the prices of those British goods were higher than the price level in this country; and then placing a subsidy on the prices of those goods so that importers could sell them at the existing price level in this country. The minister himself will admit that that procedure would not be a violation of the Geneva trade agreements, if it were done under the escape clauses.

Mr. Abbott: First, the hon. member for Acadia has raised a difficult and serious question, namely, the extent to which this country is going into the business of subsidizing high-cost imports into Canada which are in competition in this market, subsidizing wage levels of this country or that country which are lower or higher than ours.

I cannot agree with the dark picture that he has painted as to the trade prospects in the sterling area market. It is true those countries are going through a difficult period at this time. We knew they would be going through a difficult period. That is why we extended substantial credits. That is why the United States government is extending these substantial credits under ERP. It may well be that, when the period of the European recovery plan expires, the western European countries will not have achieved the degree of self-sufficiency or restoration of their economy they now anticipate.

Mr. Quelch: That is evident.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. Abbott: Although we must recognize—and I have said so on a number of occasions—that we must look forward to some diminution of our exports to those particular countries, I do not take the dark view that others appear to take when they say they will be drastically curtailed. So far as our main primary products are concerned, I believe they will be maintained. But I think we must face the fact that in a number of fields, and particularly in the field of manufactured goods, we must look to greater access to other markets, particularly the United States market. But let me say this. Until the situation becomes much worse than it is now, or much worse than I expect it will be, I would be strongly opposed to any system of subsidizing high-cost imports.

Mr. Quelch: I would point out that the cost of that procedure might be much less than the cost to this country of losing markets for our primary products.

Mr. Abbott: Let us settle that question, but let us not settle it on a hypothetical basis. A moment ago I made the statement that we have not lost these markets. We have not lost them by any means. Our exports to the markets to which my hon. friend was referring were much higher last year, I think, than they were in any year preceding the war.

Mr. Quelch: What about food contracts?

Mr. Abbott: As we all know, future prospects are that there will be, and must be, some curtailment of these markets; but in my judgment the time has not arrived to attempt to pull ourselves up by our bootstraps by subsidizing imports.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to ask the minister two questions. In the first place, I did not understand that this parliament had yet ratified the Geneva trade agreements. I should therefore like to know to what extent we are bound by them. In the second place, I wonder what our position would be in the coming year. We want to increase British imports. If we found it advisable, would it be possible under this act to switch to the British markets imports which we are now getting in the United States? Would that be possible under this Foreign Exchange Control Act?

Mr. Abbott: It would not be possible under the Foreign Exchange Control Act. To deal with my hon. friend's first question, the Geneva agreements have been given provisional application in accordance with the terms of those agreements, and I think they will be coming before the house at a later stage this session for formal consideration and ratification.

Mr. Thatcher: Are we bound by them before parliament ratifies them?

Mr. Abbott: We are provisionally bound, yes; and they are operative at the present time. If parliament refuses to approve and ratify them, they will cease to be operative from the time that parliament takes that action. That has been done by I do not know how many countries.

An hon. Member: Twenty-three.

Mr. Abbott: Twenty-three countries which signed the agreement. What was the second question?

Mr. Thatcher: If, because of that particular situation in the coming year, Canada should find it advisable to decrease its imports from the United States and switch its imports to the British market, I wanted to know whether that would be possible under this act.

Mr. Abbott: As a result largely of the import restrictions which we imposed a year ago last November, we have sharply reduced our imports from the United States and we have substantially expanded our imports from the United Kingdom. We are taking every pound's worth of goods we can get from the United Kingdom that will come here at prices that our people are prepared to pay.

Mr. Hackett: Imports from the United Kingdom were subsidized, were they not?

Mr. Abbott: No. We are not subsidizing imports from the United Kingdom. We suspended the duties on certain types of goods.

Mr. Hackett: Suspended the duty and furnished a certain amount of currency or funds with which to make the purchases.

Mr. Abbott: We have extended credits, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I tried to make clear yesterday that I attached great importance as well, notwithstanding its comparative ineffectiveness up until now, to the international monetary fund and to its operation. I tried to emphasize the fact that I regretted certain aspects of its administration and operation up until now. I want to ask the Minister of Finance certain questions with regard to our relationship to that fund. I want to know just how we keep in touch with it. I understand we have a representative there. I want to ask just what our method of contact is, or how closely we keep in touch. Then I should like to ask the minister to indicate to us whether we are consulted with regard to the various things that arise, and how we deal with the questions that arise. In particular I should like to ask him to indicate whether there is any indication that the various governments which are members of the agreement are prepared for forward action. Rumours come out from time to time—and I stress the fact that they are rumours—that the officials themselves at the headquarters of the fund are anxious for more flexibility and are anxious to move forward but that as yet they have not been supported by the people back home. As I say, it is rumour; I do not put it forward as anything more than that.

I want to read one sentence from the report of the international monetary fund. It is found on page 1 of the report of 1948 and is as follows:

> The restoration of international balance, however, still requires important and difficult adjustments in many national economies and for most of these adjustments the national authorities now have the main responsibility.

I take it that in a broad way that means that the officials of the fund are indicating in this statement that I have read, that they are only instruments, or agents, and that the principals are the various countries. I have indicated a rather broad range of questions, but I wish the minister would tell us, in what detail he can, just what our means of contact is, just what relationship we have to the fund, and just what reason there is, if any, to suggest that the fund is trying to think its way forward, or whether it is going to remain static. In the latter case it seems to me that the prospects of its doing the tremendous task which it was set up to do are not at all bright.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know just how much territory my hon. friend expects me to cover.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like the minister to cover a wide area.

Mr. Abbott: I will do the best I can. As the hon. member is probably aware, the international monetary fund is set up under the terms of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, which was adopted by this house in 1945. The organization of the fund consists of governors who are the finance ministers for the time being of the respective countries which are members of the fund. For the time being I am the governor of the fund representing Canada, and as such I have attended the annual meetings of the fund, which take place once a year. In 1947 the annual meeting took place in London. In 1948, in September, it took place in Washington. The executive of the fund consists of a body known as the executive directors, and these executive directors are selected by vote of members of the fund. The system of votes is rather complicated. I have not got it in my head, and I shall not attempt to explain it here, but broadly speaking the bigger countries, the United Kingdom, France, the United States, China—I am not sure whether it includes anybody else—have enough votes of their own to elect an executive director of the fund. Other countries must combine to select an executive director. At the present time Canada has an executive director on the fund in the person of Mr. Rasminsky of the Bank of Canada who, as my hon. friend knows, is the alternative chairman of the foreign exchange control board. Mr. Rasminsky attends the meetings of the executive directors of the fund in Washington at pretty regular intervals. It partly depends upon the business which is before the fund. He does not go there for all the meetings, but the constitution of the fund provides for alternate directors.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Do we have a representative there permanently?

Mr. Abbott: I am coming to that. Each of the executive directors has what is known as an alternate, and Canada's alternate is Mr. J. F. Parkinson, who is the financial attaché at our embassy in Washington. At meetings at which it is not possible for Mr. Rasminsky to be present, Mr. Parkinson attends. He has constant contact with the executive of the fund itself. As my hon. friend is aware, the chairman is Mr. Camille Gutt, a former minister of finance of Belgium. He is the executive head of the fund. In addition to the executive directors, the fund has quite a large, and in my judgment quite a competent, executive staff; that is to say, a staff of experts on currency matters and monetary matters, research people and the like. I understand that they are constantly studying these international currency and exchange problems. When specific questions come up, which the fund agreement requires to be dealt with by the fund, they are submitted by the countries concerned. An instance is the action which Canada took a little over a year ago last November to introduce our system of assistance to the gold mining industry. The original plan which we had was considered by the fund as a possible infringement of the fund agreement. I do not know that we were in complete accord with that view, but at any rate the proposals were modified, submitted to the fund, and approved.

The fund will sometimes take action on its own initiative. My hon. friend will recall that it did so recently in the case of the sale by South Africa of 100,000 ounces of gold, ostensibly for commercial purposes, at a price some $6.50 above the $35 United States, which is the price established by the United States treasury.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): What was the action?

Mr. Abbott: I have not the data here. It first made an inquiry of the government of South Africa, expressing grave doubts as to the desirability, and perhaps even the propriety, of the arrangement under the fund agreement, and after receiving certain explanations from the government of South Africa, issued a further statement in which it again indicated that it felt there were serious grounds for believing that this gold would not go into the regular commercial or industrial channels, but would be going into channels which were prohibited under the fund.

Mr. Hackett: Who was the purchaser of the gold?

Mr. Abbott: I have forgotten the name; I believe it was some firm of gold brokers in London.

Mr. Hackett: Johannesburg?

Mr. Abbott: They may have had an office in Johannesburg, but they have connections elsewhere. Generally, I think this is the way in which the fund operates. I cannot pretend to be an expert on these international monetary fund matters. When questions come before the fund which involve matters of policy, Canada's executive director on the fund consults me, and if it is a matter which requires cabinet consideration I report to my colleagues; but generally speaking that is the way in which the fund operates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Can the minister say whether in fact there has been any consideration by the executive officers of the fund with their governmental principals as to the modifications in the original arrangement with a view to what I, at any rate, would regard as desirable elasticity, or were they just content to ride along as is?

Mr. Abbott: So far as I am aware, the executive directors of the fund do not consider that the provisions of the fund agreement, with the latitude which these provisions allow for change of exchange rates, are as yet inadequate, and with that view I am in agreement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Just one final question. Am I correct in assuming that, so far as the minister is aware, the present situation which has led us into something near an impasse with regard to our relation with the sterling area is apparently contemplated with equanimity by the directors of the fund and the various governments, and that there is no move on foot to try to meet the situation which the Minister of Agriculture so eloquently described in accurate terms. I want to know whether that is true. In other words, if this fund, which was set up with such high hope three years ago, has really stalled and, if I understand the minister correctly, no consideration is being given to the introduction of any further element of elasticity in a situation with the dangers and difficulties which not only the Minister of Agriculture but the Minister of Finance himself will admit, then the situation is indeed a serious one.

Mr. Abbott: The difficulties which the United Kingdom or other western European countries may be involved in, in connection with their trade, are not due to any exchange difficulties created by the international monetary fund. The international monetary fund has no power to impose upon any of its members a particular exchange rate. It has the right to approve changes; it has the right to make recommendations; but it has no power to impose upon any one of its members any particular exchange rate.

As I say, the difficulties of the United Kingdom and others in exporting their goods are not due to exchange difficulties as such. They are due to the fact that these areas are not as yet producing enough goods and services to pay for what they have to buy from this particular area of the world. That is the fundamental underlying cause. It may be—I am not suggesting that it is—that some of these European currencies are overvalued. It is not for me to say whether they are or not. If they are overvalued, then it is perfectly clear that that is a bar to their export trade; but that is not something which Canada can solve for itself, and it is certainly not something that the international monetary fund can solve.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): First of all the minister said that currency had nothing to do with these trade difficulties. Later on he said much more correctly that if in fact currencies were overvalued they did have something to do with it. In the last statement he was right. But when he says that Canada cannot do anything about it, may I say this. We have talked pretty big about ourselves. The government have talked pretty big about the wonderful things they have done, which I prefer to say that we have done, and we have done pretty well. We are not going to take the position that we are a nonentity and that it is not possible for us to have thoughts of our own, and that if we have those thoughts they would not be listened to if they were presented to the fund. Whether I am right or not is not the point. I should like to know whether the minister is taking the position that there is nothing that Canada can do; in other words, that if Canada had views that she wished to have carried out there is nothing we can do to have them accepted by the fund. If that is right, then I think we should seriously consider withdrawing from the fund. But I do not think it is right.

Mr. Abbott: I know that my hon. friend wants to be constructive. I am going to ask him a question after I make a statement. As a nation, Canada has no right to change the exchange rate of any other nation; and believe me, we would resent it pretty strongly if any other nation attempted to tell us what we should do in that regard. As Minister of Finance I would consider such advice from any other country as purely gratuitous and impertinent. I would not presume to offer any advice to any other country as to what exchange rate it should place on its currency. My question to my hon. friend is this—

Mr. Hackett: Isn't the result that we cannot buy from them?

Mr. Abbott: Now, this is a technical subject, and I should be pleased if the hon. member would allow me to complete my thoughts. I said to my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario that the international monetary fund has no right to impose an exchange rate on any other country. It has the right to endeavour to persuade, but it has not the right to impose its will—and rightly so—because I do not think that any body of that kind should supersede the sovereignty of any particular nation. Now, my question to the hon. member is this, and I know he wants to be constructive. I would ask him what positive measure he suggests Canada should take in the situation he has outlined?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): One of the greatest advantages held out—and correctly so—in the international monetary fund was that it provided a forum where people could sit around a table and discuss their difficulties. That was one of the great points made—and rightly so—when we had evidence before the committee on banking and commerce three years ago. What I am suggesting is that at the very least we can get that body together. Secondly—and I am not going into details nor am I going to repeat what I said yesterday—I suggest for what it is worth that what we are considering now is whether we are condemned to what I still call a kind of paralysing inaction. Because how we can sit here contemplating the shrinkage of our markets is beyond me.

I am not so optimistic as the minister permits himself to be with regard to the situation in western Europe, if this situation continues. The minister made a statement about not wanting advice from other countries as to how we should value our dollar. Now, if the minister will not take advice from us I am sure he will not take it from anybody.

Mr. Abbott: There are others I would sooner take advice from.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): But I am coming back to this—and this is my point. The Minister of Finance keeps on saying that we are not going to do anything about this, that there is no suggestion we are going to make. I suggest to him that monetary things are not going well; they are going badly. And I say again, page the Minister of Agriculture. Because while the Minister of Agriculture was not able, and while no one is able, in an offhand way, to suggest how it is going to be done, in the meantime the minister sits here, stares in the face of something which is of immense importance to the western plains, and says there is nothing he can do about it.

Mr. Abbott: No, I am not saying there is nothing I can do about it. But I am saying that we cannot cure it by currency manipulation, either of the Canadian currency or of some other.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not suggesting currency manipulation.

Mr. Abbott: What are you suggesting?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): In one of his more accurate moments, the minister said a moment ago that, if there was any overvaluation of the exchange, that was what would injure trade. There is a widespread feeling—and I pointed this out yesterday in my remarks—that some of the European exchanges are overvalued. Read the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada. It says that you now have the sterling area up in a kind of ivory tower. What will the effect be? The effect of it will be that trade with the sterling area will become more and more difficult and you are not doing anything about it.

Mr. Abbott: On the question of the overvaluation of currency, my hon. friend says with confidence that some European currencies are overvalued. I confess to him with respect that it is something I cannot consider myself competent to say.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not asking the minister to say it. All I say is that we are deeply interested in it.

Mr. Abbott: So am I.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): And one of the points of the monetary fund was to get the various parties interested to come together to consider if anything that may be done has not been done.

Mr. Abbott: They are doing it continuously. The executive directors meet two or three times a week.

Mr. MacInnis: It would appear, to an unobservant person, that we were not making any progress. But when we find the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and the Minister of Finance both agreeing that they do not know what to do about this situation, I think that is an indication that we are moving. The reason they do not know what to do about it is that they are not operating in old familiar grooves or old patterns. Trade patterns are not what they were twenty-five or thirty years ago, or perhaps even less than that. A new situation has developed. Two world wars have perhaps permanently affected our economy.

What we have to do is to try and reconstruct trade and business on a basis that fits in with the present-day conditions. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario looks with longing eyes on what was, and the Minister of Finance, who is orthodox in the extreme, is also looking back to things as they once were, and as he would like them again to be.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): No, we are Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. MacInnis: But things are not as they once were, and it is unlikely they will ever be again. I believe that in this discussion one of the best suggestions has come from the hon. member for Acadia and also from the hon. member for Vancouver South, who finds himself in the very difficult position of the dog who had to climb a tree.

Mr. Green: I did not say I was in that position.

Mr. MacInnis: We are all in that position. So I say the government, which is the administrative factor in this instance, must try other means outside the old methods which no longer work. It is because those old methods do not work that the British government have had to apply new methods with which to meet the conditions with which they were confronted.

Mr. Hackett: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a very few questions. I have not found in the report of the foreign exchange control board any statement of the sum of United States investments in Canada. In case I have overlooked those figures, would the minister be good enough to tell me roughly what they are?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot recall having seen that figure myself, although of course I have gone through the report, but it may be there. But the figure is roughly some $5 billion, I am informed.

Mr. Hackett: Will the minister say what proportion of that $5 billion is affected in its mobility by the legislation governing the foreign exchange control board?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I shall have to get that information and give it to the hon. member when we are in committee on the bill.

Mr. Hackett: I am not going to be exacting. The minister knows roughly what it is, and I would accept his approximation.

Mr. Abbott: I would not care to hazard a guess. I try to keep a good many figures in my head these days, but there are a good many of them; and that is not one which I remember or which I have on tap.

Mr. Hackett: Would the minister admit it is half of the $5 billion?

Mr. Abbott: No, I cannot admit anything, but I shall try to get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. Hackett: I will accept the minister's word. But I am disappointed as I have always considered him so well informed about the details of his department.

Mr. Abbott: It is the exception that proves the rule.

Mr. Hackett: For the purposes of my question I assume that half of this investment—I have reason to believe that it is probably more than half—is immobilized in Canada by foreign exchange control legislation. I ask the minister what effect in his opinion that immobilization of United States investment has upon the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I would care to express any opinion on that. Of course, the current earnings on that investment can be taken freely to the United States at the official rate. That has always been the case, and it was the case even during the war. We never attempted to restrict the current earnings of foreign investment. The opinion of my hon. friend is probably as good as mine as to what the effect is.

Mr. Hackett: On that point the minister and I are in perfect agreement. I suggest to him that the fact of a large proportion of the United States investment in Canada having escaped from the control of the owner must result in the depreciation of the Canadian dollar in the markets of the world, particularly the United States. Will the minister agree with that?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think I would agree with that.

Mr. Hackett: Does not the hon. gentleman think that a dollar invested in Canada which is subject to the complete control of and recall by the owner is more desirable from the point of view of the United States owner than a dollar which cannot be withdrawn from Canada?

Mr. Abbott: I suppose it depends upon the return that is obtained on the investment, and a lot of other things.

Mr. Hackett: Is that the best answer the hon. gentleman can give?

Mr. Abbott: It is an answer.

Mr. Hackett: Yes, possibly a good answer, as somebody once said, for an anser.

Mr. Abbott: A question for a question.

Mr. Hackett: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if it is not a fact that the Canadian dollar has depreciated in the United States market because, owing to this legislation, it has escaped from the control of its American owners?

Mr. Abbott: I would not put it in just that way. It is true that in the limited financial market in the United States in which Canadian dollars are traded to other non-residents it is under a price discount of some six to seven per cent, but I do not think that that truly reflects the value of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Hackett: Does not the hon. gentleman think that, were these restrictions to disappear and the owners of a United States dollar invested here were to become free to take it home at any time, the change would have an immediate effect upon the Canadian dollar, and that it might soon go to par?

Mr. Abbott: There again is involved a question of opinion based on hypothetical conditions which have not yet arisen. What the effect would be on the Canadian dollar of taking off all exchange controls I do not propose to guess, but I do say that in view of the fact that Canada is such a large debtor nation the removal of all exchange restrictions at this time would result in a temporary situation which would be most injurious to the Canadian people. It was principally for that reason that this measure, which I have described as a measure of national defence, was introduced two years ago, and we are asking to have it continued for a further period.

Mr. Hackett: I thank the minister for the answer he has given me. I should like to ask a few questions with regard to trade with Great Britain, and about the volume of that trade concerning which the minister does not like to speculate. Will he not admit that trade would have been severely diminished had it not been for the credits established by Canada for Britain and for the use of the credits established by the United States in Britain for Canada's benefit.

Mr. Abbott: I would agree with that.

Mr. Hodgson: A few minutes ago we were discussing the export of hardwood lumber to the United States. Up until three weeks ago there was practically an embargo on this lumber, but now we have a five per cent quota. Why is that, when United States dollars are needed here? There is a market in the United States for our hardwood lumber, especially flooring.

An hon. Member: What about housing?

Mr. Howe: Perhaps I can answer that as it comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce. The reason we have not allowed the free export of hardwood flooring is that we need hardwood flooring with which to build houses in Canada.

Mr. Hodgson: That is quite all right; I knew that that would be the answer. At the same time, every flooring company in Ontario is backed up with hardwood flooring that they cannot sell in Canada. More than that, there is a backlog of two and three common lumber in the yards that they want to sell to the flooring people. The flooring people can easily take care of the local market and have a lot for export. I know this as a fact because I am in the business. I sold some hardwood lumber last week at an average of $44 per M for three common and better because of the embargo on flooring going to the United States. Will the minister consider giving us more than five per cent? Will he give us 50 per cent?

Mr. Howe: The timber controller keeps the export situation under review from time to time and so far as I know we have been successful in keeping lumber moving. I know of no great accumulation. It is something new for Ontario to have a surplus of hardwood flooring. I may say that we have been shipping flooring into this province ever since the war ended, in fact long before.

Mr. Hackett: My right hon. friend has not a very good opinion of my knowledge of wheat and he may not think that I know very much about lumber.

Mr. Howe: Do you?

Mr. Hackett: Keeping lumber moving is one thing and keeping it moving at a loss is another. I cannot imagine that there is much profit in selling the type of lumber mentioned by my hon. friend at the price he mentioned, and if that price is the result of the policy of the government the policy should be changed.

Mr. Howe: He has sold hardwood lumber at a lot lower price than that.

Mr. Hodgson: Not in the last ten years. That was not just three common, it was three common and better.

Mr. Howe: Think back to the last time the Conservative government was in power.

Mr. Hackett: That is not an answer. That is not a fair answer either.

Mr. Archibald: We have had considerable discussion about the barter method of trading and I think we must recognize that method. Personally I support it. Has the department any idea as to how much of the world trade is now being carried on by barter as compared with multilateral methods? Is it one-third or what?

Mr. Abbott: I have no idea. Perhaps when the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are before us something in that connection might be brought out. Of course, what should be remembered is that in certain countries, particularly communist countries, price does not enter into it at all. It is all state trading. They ship out their lumber or wheat or whatever it is at any price they like to charge. They take it over from the people in those countries and ship it to the United Kingdom or anywhere else. There is no competitive factor in those countries, and they can jockey it any way they please. So when you get into a system of state trading, which is almost inevitable in any widespread barter system, it becomes pretty difficult to know what you are really paying for the goods you are getting.

Mr. Hodgson: I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he will take up the matter of hardwood lumber with his timber controller, who is a very nice chap but who has not had very much experience as far as logging is concerned. When we have to sell hardwood lumber stock at less than it costs to produce it, there is something wrong with our export trade. Would not the minister consider taking the Canadian Lumbermen's Association into his confidence, to see if he cannot work out something which would allow us to export more hardwood flooring to the United States?

Mr. Howe: The timber controller is constantly in consultation with all the lumber associations, and as I say the supply situation is watched very carefully, not only the supply situation at the moment but the situation three or four months hence. I can assure my hon. friend it is the purpose of the department to release for export anything that promises to be surplus.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the need for United States exchange I want to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce why there is a quota on cedar poles, telephone and light poles, exported to the United States, since the greater market for these poles has always been in that country. Would the minister consider having the question of the export of cedar poles from the interior of British Columbia to the United States looked into?

Mr. Howe: Yes, I shall do so.

Mr. McIvor: This resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the continuance in force of the Foreign Exchange Control Act . . .

Is this not the same act that was passed last year?

Mr. Abbott: No; it was passed three years ago, in 1946.

Mr. McIvor: I looked up the Hansard record of that debate, and I find that none of the calamities which were forecast at that time ever hit the country.

Mr. Sinclair: Except George Drew.

Mr. McIvor: And I am sure the majority of the members of this house do not believe any calamity will hit this country if this bill is passed again this year. I believe we should pass it and get on with our business. The majority of the members of this house are not quite foolish. We think this is wise legislation, and the sooner we bring it into force the better.

Mr. Case: It seems that the more discussion we have the less we are informed. It was my understanding that when the international monetary fund, the international bank, foreign exchange control and all these other agencies were set up, the purpose was to assist in promoting multilateral trade. Now we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce referring to a barter deal which took place between British Columbia and Brazil, apples for oranges; and he said there was no value to it. They exchanged so many boxes of apples for so many crates of oranges, and it seems to me eventually some value must be placed on those goods for the purposes of the record. You could not just put in so many boxes of apples and so many crates of oranges.

Mr. Howe: Why not?

Mr. Case: It is an interesting fact that when the charter for Bretton Woods was prepared it specifically mentioned that those joining would be admitted with their currency at the rate of exchange it enjoyed at the time of their admission. When that discussion was going on in this house our dollar was at 90 cents as compared with the United States dollar. They made the further proviso that the currency of a country could not be depreciated more than 10 per cent without the consent of the fund.

My point is that they recognized the trading advantage of a depreciated currency; otherwise they never would have put in that proviso and placed a limit on the extent to which your currency could be depressed. Having regard to the fact that the traders of the world and men versed in finance paid great attention to that provision, it did seem to me most unusual that Canada should move out of the preferred position she enjoyed at that time, by placing our dollar at par when we were in a position to join Bretton Woods with a 90-cent dollar which could have fluctuated from that pivot point either backward or forward, within the regulations laid down by the fund.

Having recited these facts, since these various trading agencies were brought into being to promote multilateral trade though practically all we have today is bilateral trade, I want to ask the minister whether it was not intended that you could trade in a circle, and that this international monetary fund would adjust your trading balance so we would avoid the very thing we have been hearing about, that is barter trade. In other words, we completed our deal with Brazil, and Brazil completed a deal with somebody else. Eventually through this bank, in which we made a substantial deposit in gold or in kind which was recognized as acceptable, our balance should be adjusted there, and we should have been able to use our trading organizations, the industry of our people, and business and commerce generally in order to go out and seek markets throughout the world. As long as the United States dollar remained the standard of value, it would take a great deal to convince me that we did not enjoy a trading advantage over the United States in connection with the goods we were capable of producing in great quantities, because our productive capacity was so large in relation to the demand of the home market. We could have had these advantages in the world market if we had taken full advantage of the trading organizations that have been set up.

So I ask what progress if any has been made along the line of making it possible to engage in multilateral trade or even trading within a circle, in which we could expect to have our currency exchanged for the currency we use at the international bank.

Mr. Abbott: Well, as I indicated in my remarks yesterday, the change in value of the Canadian dollar in July, 1946, was made because of inflationary forces at work in the United States at that time, and to prevent a further price rise in Canada. In my judgment, as I said yesterday, Canada could have derived no trading advantage by continuing its dollar at a ten per cent discount in relation to the United States dollar. During the last three years we have sold every bit of the produce of this country we had to sell, in quantities greater than we ever sold before, and at competitive prices. So, as I demonstrated yesterday, I do not think anyone can accurately assert that the Canadian dollar is overvalued and that we need to depreciate it in terms of United States currency. Our problem has been that our customers have not been able to get the wherewithal to pay us.

On my hon. friend's second question, as to what progress has been made with respect to restoring multilateral trade, I can only answer him by saying that I am afraid there has been lamentably little progress. It was recognized, of course, when the international monetary fund was first considered and when it was brought into existence, that during the period immediately following the war, which was referred to as the transition period, for which special provision was made, it could play only a perhaps relatively minor role in helping to even out these currency distortions. It was never contemplated that it could correct an unbalance arising out of substantial capital expenditures, for instance. That is what has been taking place in western European countries in recent years. A great deal of the imports which those countries have had to make from Canada and the United States have been to restore their factories, their houses, their machinery and other things which were destroyed as a result of the war. It was never contemplated that an organization such as the international monetary fund could possibly do more than help to even out the temporary unbalances in current account transactions. It can never, consequently, fulfil its full role until western Europe and these other countries have been restored to their full productive capacity.

Mr. Case: The minister has answered the question in part, and he has expressed an opinion that I am sure is not shared by everyone. However, we are all entitled to our opinion.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member speak more loudly?

Mr. Case: I want to make this observation. The minister said we have sold everything we have for export. Let us consider how this was accomplished.

First of all, we lent a great deal of the money with which to purchase these goods and we relied largely upon ERP to take up the balance. It was quite evident from the minister's remarks on the radio in November of last year that we did lack United States currency. There is no question about that. It was also very evident that we were storing up a large volume of United States currency when we had the ninety-cent dollar. Many United States tourists came to this country, and for my part, their trade is very valuable. Up in Georgian bay we spend a great deal of money to attract these people to that part of the country. If those people could come here and get a dollar and ten cents' worth of goods for their dollar, it was worth encouraging them because the goods were produced here.

Conversely, we have restrictions upon our own people traveling to the United States. With the ninety-cent dollar, if our people wanted to sacrifice a dollar and ten cents to go to the United States and wanted to pay a dollar and ten cents for goods worth a dollar, that was up to them. This ninety-cent dollar, however, tended to restrict those imports which have played havoc with our internal economy. In the final analysis the funds upon which we depend to provide us with the means whereby we can trade multilaterally have failed. The government has been lax in its efforts in promoting the better interests of the trade of Canada. The government has leaned upon ERP and when ERP is finished—well, probably this government will be finished before then and there will be an opportunity for us to do something on our own behalf. The government has become a leaner on the United States and has tied our dollar to the United States dollar, failing to see that our great advantages are in the sterling area.

Mr. Thatcher: I am going to support this resolution, but there are one or two points upon which I am not clear. The minister said the Geneva agreement, in effect, is with us now. Would these resolutions, if they were passed, be contrary to the spirit of the Geneva agreement?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think so.

Mr. Thatcher: Are we using an escape clause to get around it or has the United States agreed to let us go ahead?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot quote my hon. friend the exact clause, but my understanding is that the Geneva agreement recognizes that every trading country in the world, with the exception of the United States, is exercising a form of exchange control. It recognizes that we are entitled to do so for a continuing period. I did not contemplate discussing the Geneva agreement and I have not the data here, but I know that to be the case.

Mr. Thatcher: If we can bring in these resolutions, possibly we can bring in something in the form suggested by the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I wonder what the United States had to say about the extension of these restrictions for another two years. Has the United States made any official protest to the minister?

Mr. Abbott: No objection has been made by the United States and they would have no right to do so.

Mr. Timmins: There are some figures appearing in a return from the Department of Trade and Commerce which I should like to quote to the Minister of Finance in respect to the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom's imports from Canada in 1948 amounted to $688 million, whereas Canada's imports from the United Kingdom amounted to only $274 million. When we come to South Africa we find they exported to Canada $3,522,000 worth of goods, whereas Canada sold to South Africa $83 million worth of goods. Turning to another sterling area country, Jamaica, they purchased from Canada, in 1948, $12,371,000 worth of goods, whereas we purchased from that country only $9 million worth of goods. Trinidad and Tobago purchased from Canada $17 million worth of goods, whereas we purchased from them only $8,990,000 worth of goods. Australia imported from Canada $38 million worth of goods, whereas in 1948 we purchased from Australia only $22 million. New Zealand purchased from Canada $18 million in goods whereas we purchased from that country only $11 million in goods.

My suggestion to the minister is this. Is it not a fact that the Canadian dollar is depreciated to such an extent in the eyes of the sterling area countries that they are not willing to sell to us?

Mr. Abbott: We are extremely anxious to import from these various countries as much as we can. We have done all kinds of things to encourage those imports, and I shall have occasion to say a good deal about that later on a more appropriate occasion. World trading accounts between two different countries have never exactly balanced, and that goes back, I was going to say, to the prehistoric days mentioned by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) when he spoke of barter. The whole system of world trading presupposes that you use your surplus from one area to offset your balance in another area. That has been the traditional pattern of Canadian trade. We have always purchased twice as much from the United States as we sold to that country. We have been using our surplus accumulated from other areas to restore the balance. We have been going to great lengths to encourage imports from those countries to which my hon. friend has referred. It is very much in our interest to do so.

May I say that the imports must be things which our people are willing to use, and they must be at a price which is somewhere near what our people are prepared to pay. That is the fundamental reason why we are not importing more. I suppose we could buy a lot of New Zealand butter.

I do not know how the population would react to that, but we might do it. We used to sell a great many motor cars to New Zealand, but I do not know whether or not we do today. Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would know. In any event, the failure of those countries to export to Canada, let me assert again, is not the fault of Canada.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Finance has just emphasized the government's determination to encourage imports from the sterling countries. I would suggest to him one very good way he could encourage at least some imports from the sterling countries would be to take the sterling area out of the provisions of schedule I of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act.

Under that act, which was passed last year, a total prohibition was placed on the importation of certain goods from all countries, including the sterling area. We all knew, and the government knew, that the real problem to be met then was that our purchases in the United States were too high. It was United States imports that should have been prohibited; but the government prohibited imports from all countries, including the sterling area. Surely the time has now come when the sterling area can be lifted out of schedule I of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. I notice in the annual report of the operations under that act, for the calendar year 1948, that there were a good many million dollars involved in these goods which were prohibited from the non-schedule countries, which in effect means from the sterling area. I would ask the minister why he cannot remove the sterling area now from the provisions of that schedule I.

Mr. Abbott: The short answer, Mr. Chairman is, of course—as has been pointed out several times before when we were discussing these import restrictions—that it would be a breach of our obligations under the Geneva agreements. However, as I have had cause to state in this house on numerous occasions before, the import restrictions, both in the prohibitions in schedule I and in the quotas in schedule II, were carefully tailored to give a real advantage to the sterling area countries; in fact, to highly discriminate against hard-currency countries. That is the fact. I asserted that fact in this house when those measures were under consideration, and the event has proved that I was right; because the imports from the sterling area countries, in spite of higher prices—particularly in textiles—have substantially increased and imports of course from hard-currency countries have substantially decreased.

Mr. Hackett: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, now that I am finished with my sentence. I hate to be interrupted in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. Hackett: I apologize. But I find that if I do not ask my question promptly, the opportunity disappears. Is it not a fact that these purchases in sterling-area countries have been considerably enhanced and to a considerable extent made possible by the establishment of credits by Canada and by the attribution of American credits to Canada?

Mr. Abbott: At the moment I am talking about purchases from sterling-area countries, not sales to those countries.

Mr. Hackett: It goes to the matter of trade.

Mr. Abbott: The more they sell to us, the less they have to use ERP credits or any other kind.

Mr. Hackett: A few moments ago the minister said that we cannot have trade unless services or commodities are interchanged.

Mr. Green: The minister amuses me when he tries to argue that these sterling-area countries have benefited by the prohibition against the importing of certain things.

Mr. Abbott: You ask them. They will agree with me.

Mr. Green: I have the figures here under the act. Schedules I and II of the act are under the minister's own department. The figures show that for the non-schedule countries, for the first eleven months of 1948 the value of those prohibited goods that were allowed into Canada was cut almost in half from the value in the year 1947.

Mr. Abbott: They are relatively small figures, though.

Mr. Green: The figures are relatively small. There is only $6 million worth of those goods.

Mr. Abbott: Six million as against about $150 million in the other schedule.

Mr. Green: When you are dealing with the sterling area—

Mr. Abbott: I am talking about the sterling area.

Mr. Green: —there was only $6 million and it was only allowed in under permit. I suggest that the time has come when this prohibition should be lifted so far as the sterling area is concerned. The minister has said that the reason it has not been lifted is the existence of the Geneva treaties. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the reason it is not lifted is that the government is afraid of annoying the United States; in other words, it is kowtowing to the United States on this question. I suggest that it is now perfectly obvious that, in the interests of Canada, the importation of goods from the sterling area should be encouraged in every possible way; and one of the main practical ways to encourage that importation is to lift this prohibition against goods from the sterling area.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is making exactly the same argument that he made one and a half years ago—

Mr. Green: And it is as good now as it was then.

Mr. Abbott: —and the same assertion that we are kowtowing to the United States. We are not kowtowing to the United States. The United States is our best customer and we are their best customer. In these restrictions we have imposed prohibitions and quotas against the United States which for that reason have been strongly resented by traditional exporters to this country. But they have accepted them very well. I said a moment ago that the arrangement of this quota was rather highly discriminatory against the United States. They accepted that fact. They recognized that it was necessary for us to so frame our restrictions that although in form non-discriminatory they would be in fact discriminating in favour of sterling-area countries; and that is what was done.

This has been an extremely interesting discussion, Mr. Chairman, but may I say that the quotas under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act have little or nothing to do with the extension of the Foreign Exchange Control Act. If my hon. friends are suggesting that a change in the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar by devaluation to ninety cents or less will help exports to Canada from the sterling area, then I say, as I did yesterday, that that remedy will have exactly the opposite result. They may have some other remedy to suggest, but I have not heard it yet.

Mr. MacNicol: I shall try to make a suggestion that will be helpful to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): That is what we have all been doing.

Mr. MacNicol: I am not saying that anyone has been doing otherwise. But I am going to make a suggestion along a different line from that taken by anyone else.

Mr. Hackett: He is beginning to be nervous.

Mr. MacNicol: No, I am not nervous.

Mr. Hackett: No; I meant the minister.

Mr. MacNicol: The minister need not be nervous. He has sitting beside him another capable minister in the person of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who will listen to the remarks I intend to make. Between the two of them perhaps they may work out some plan whereby what I say may make the lot of both ministers easier and in addition may make things much better for Canada. Last year, in 1948, I believe we imported from the United States approximately five million tons of hard coal. It was a little bit more than that, but I will use round figures. For that coal we paid $54 million. That sum had to be paid in good United States currency. If there was any premium on their dollar, we of course had to pay that extra. To bring that coal from the United States mines to our border cost us approximately $13 million. I know that we must deal with the United States; I shall not try to put up an argument as to whether we should not buy coal from them. But I argue that a great deal of that coal should be purchased here in Canada. Recently in the Albertan, published in Calgary—it is an excellent paper; it is always right up to date—there was an editorial, in which was quoted an exchange between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself a short time ago when I asked a question as to whether it would be possible for the minister to assure hard coal users in Ontario that a spur line could be built in from Okotoks, Alberta, to the hard-coal mine on the Sheep river fifty miles west of Okotoks. The editorial makes a significant statement. It is all significant but I shall quote only one statement, which is as follows:

> Still very much in question, however, is the economic problem of getting a railway constructed to the mine, and the political question of what effect the large-scale operation of this coal property would have on existing coal operations.

Previously I had given no thought to the political effect. I am not interested in what the political effect is on any party in Canada, not even this party. I am interested in creating trade in Canada. I spent much of my life trying to create trade in Canada, internal trade as well as foreign trade. I should like to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce help the Minister of Finance to ease his problem of foreign exchange by taking some action whereby people in Ontario, who use so much hard coal, five million tons a year, could buy at least half of it in Canada.

On my desk I have a lump of Alberta hard coal which came down from the mine I went to see last fall. It is as fine a piece of hard coal as I have ever seen in my lifetime from any mine anywhere, and compares with anything that can be produced in Pennsylvania. I know something about coal. You cannot beat this coal anywhere. I am trying to be constructive.

Mr. Williams: May I see it?

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): How does it compare with Welsh anthracite?

Mr. Williams: That is why I asked to see it.

Mr. MacNicol: Welsh anthracite is another grade altogether. There is Pennsylvania anthracite and then there is Welsh anthracite. They are both called anthracite, but they are not of the same texture. This is Alberta anthracite, which is a different texture again. It is a high grade hard coal. I am not personally interested in coal in any shape, manner or form. As a Canadian I am interested only in doing two or three things: firstly, providing employment for Canadians to mine the coal; secondly, providing freight for our railways; and thirdly, cutting down exchange.

The minister has a difficult problem on his hands, and it is up to us to ease the burden if we can. In using Alberta hard coal we could save millions of dollars in exchange which the minister has to find to bring in United States hard coal. I am not an authority on coal, but I have discussed this with the very best engineers who are themselves authorities on the properties of this coal. I have read the report of the coal board, but I have not much faith in it, I am sorry to say. I am not going to condemn it, but it does not seem to me to be a report designed to encourage the development of coal in Canada. That is what I want to do. I want to encourage the development of coal in Canada. The report is tinged with arguments against this hard coal, and I do not know whether any of the people who wrote the report were ever there. I was there. I did not go at government expense. I went to the mine that this lump of coal came from. If I remember rightly, this lump of coal came from 1,400 feet in the tunnel. It was just knocked off the wall and came down to me here.

I want to make my argument as short as I can. If we can mine hard coal in Canada—I know of nowhere else in Canada where we can mine hard coal—it would look to me that every effort should be made by Canadians to do it and thus ease the burden of the Minister of Finance.

Last year we purchased five million tons of hard coal in the United States. We should try within five or ten years' time to produce two and a half million tons of hard coal in Canada. That would be a target to aim at. At the rate we paid for the coal last year, that would mean a saving of $27 million in United States money. Added to that would be approximately $13 million in United States freight. I am aware that we have a problem, Mr. Chairman. The cars which would come down here full of coal would have to go back to Alberta empty; but we have to do that with our wheat cars, our cattle cars and everything else. In any event it would be our own money; it would not be outside money that we would have to pay to send the cars back empty. I believe we can put our teeth into this problem. If we expanded the soft coal market, too, we would save much more. We buy twenty-five million tons of soft coal a year from outside of Canada. For both hard coal and soft coal we sent out of Canada last year $181 million. That was United States dollars that the minister had to buy, and to bring the coal into Canada the minister had to find approximately $70 million of United States exchange for freight. Therefore for every ton of coal, either hard or soft, that we produce in Canada, we would be saving exchange money. I am speaking particularly of hard coal because in Toronto we want to use Alberta hard coal.

I am not interested in this company in any shape, manner or form; I cannot give the right name of it. The mine I am thinking of is called the Burns mine in Alberta. I wish the hon. member for Calgary West were here. If he were he could handle this much better than I can. He made a magnificent speech last night and I had hoped that he would deal with this question too. I had intended to get him up on his feet today to speak on it; but since he is not in at the moment I shall try to do the best I can. Since I am an Ontario man my heart is in the effort to try to use Alberta hard coal. I think the company is called the Alberta Hard Coal Company. They brought down about fifteen cars of coal during the last few months. It has been thoroughly tested in a hundred homes in Toronto. I went to see it in operation. The users of it are loud in their praise of its quality. It is good hard coal. It burns to an ash and throws off much heat. I asked the users how it compared with Pennsylvania hard coal, and they gave the edge to the Alberta hard coal. I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to use his best endeavours to try to have a spur line put in to that coal mine. What does it mean? At the moment they are selling this coal in Toronto, good hard coal, at $17 a ton. That means that the users in Toronto have $3.75 left in their pocket for every ton of coal used. The producers of the coal have to pay $4 a ton to have it trucked from the mine to Okotoks or wherever they load it on to the railways. I do not think it is Okotoks; it is another station ten miles nearer Calgary, at a place called Midnapore. The trucking to Midnapore costs them $4 a ton. If we had a spur line in there it would mean $4 less a ton to the Toronto coal users, which would mean that the price would be approximately $14 or less a ton.

I have participated in this debate to try to throw out some suggestions whereby the burdens of the Minister of Finance could be eased. There are two billion tons of hard coal we can have from Alberta, which would make the minister's burden much lighter. I would have to persuade the Minister of Transport to use his best endeavours with the railway company to put that spur in. It would be paid for in one year's time through the savings in amounts paid for coal by Canadian coal users, and it would take off the shoulders of the Minister of Finance a portion of the heavy burden he now carries in providing United States dollars for United States coal.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and hon. members for the patience you have shown in listening to me. I have made my suggestions honestly and earnestly, after much travel and endeavour; and I am going to keep it up until Canadians are enabled to use Canadian hard coal, thus saving themselves $4 or $5 on every ton they use.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of an answer he made a moment ago. The minister made the statement that he was very anxious to do anything which would increase imports. I then asked him: Are you anxious enough to lower tariffs? He said, "I will have an opportunity to say about that on a later occasion." Does he mean the budget? If he does, I want to tell him that everybody in the west would welcome lower tariffs. Today we have talked a good deal about trade. Surely one of the first things we should do, if we wish to keep up this multilateral trade everyone is talking about, is to bring down the tariffs on British goods and thus increase British imports.

Mr. Sinclair: What is the question?

Mr. Abbott: It did seem to me that this was not really the proper occasion upon which to discuss tariffs or to make any tariff prognostications.

Mr. Thatcher: The minister did not mean the budget?

Mr. Case: I wish to ask another question. How much has it cost the Canadian taxpayer to maintain the Canadian dollar at par with the United States dollar?

Mr. Abbott: I would think that not only did it not cost the Canadian taxpayer anything, but that the Canadian taxpayer had got great advantage from it.

Mr. Case: But was there not taken from the reserves about $372 million for the foreign exchange control board? What was that for?

Mr. Abbott: That was the bookkeeping entry, of course.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): It was not a bookkeeping entry for the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Abbott: The Canadian taxpayer suffered no loss.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister has said that $372 million is just a bookkeeping entry.

Mr. Abbott: I said that was the bookkeeping entry.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The taxpayer did not think of it in that way. I would like to ask a further question about barter. I am interested in the question of barter, because it seems to me we are falling into the use of that word; and my feeling is that it is a dangerous one. I take it that barter is now being used in a rough way as the equivalent of bilateral trade. My question is this: Going back to that Brazilian deal, does the minister seriously suggest that certain quantities of Brazilian goods were handed over in exchange for certain quantities of British Columbia goods, using no yardstick of any kind? Did they just take a quantity of one thing, and hand it over in exchange for a quantity of another? Was there no regard for value?

I cannot believe the minister intended to say that. Then, in the same connection, may I ask this: If that happened, did it happen entirely without the cognizance of the foreign exchange control board? Did they have nothing to do with it? If they did not, can you defeat the board by making barter deals on the side, and outside the purview of the board? It is a question which the minister can answer, I am sure.

Mr. Howe: I understand no money passed at all in the apples-for-oranges deal.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I did not ask whether money passed. I asked how they made up their quantities involved—whether it was with relation to money value.

Mr. Howe: I did not say the quantity of each was not without regard to money value. I would suppose that the Brazil co-operative, or whatever the agency was, wanted perhaps five or ten thousand boxes of apples. The value of those apples laid down in Brazil, at a reasonable selling price, would be so much. That value could then be converted into oranges—the value of oranges laid down in Canada at a price that would permit the sale of the oranges in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Then why do you call it barter?

Mr. Howe: Because no money was involved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): No money is involved in any case when you have a sale where the amounts are equal.

Mr. Howe: But the point is to get the amounts equal. If no money passes, and no money is involved, call it barter.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): No, no.

Mr. Howe: Where you have reasonably balanced trade, and when payments are made on receipt of goods, you may call it bilateral trade. My hon. friend may call it what he likes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): What about the foreign exchange control board? Do they not come into the picture?

Mr. Howe: Any dealings of that kind must be reported to the foreign exchange control board, and approval must be obtained, because the foreign exchange control board does not permit goods to be shipped out of this country unless value is returned to this country. For that reason transactions are cleared through the foreign exchange control board. I have never known the board to object to an exchange of goods representing value for value.

Mr. Pearkes: Earlier in the afternoon the minister intimated that he was not concerned with the loss of British markets. I rather gathered from him that the British markets were not being lost. I was not able to catch the eye of the chairman, but if that was correct I may say that that sort of talk is not understood in British Columbia.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I made no such statement—that we were not concerned about the loss of sterling-area markets. Of course we are concerned about it. What I said was that, as realists, we had to recognize the fact that, because of conditions, those markets were being restricted. I did not say that we were not concerned about it; it is just the reverse.

Mr. Pearkes: It is the fact that the markets are being lost.

Mr. Abbott: The markets are being curtailed, because the British are not able to produce the goods and services to pay for our goods and services. That is the reason. That is the essential reason. There is no other reason. It is not done with mirrors; it is not done with pieces of paper; it is done by the exchange of goods and services.

We are doing our best to encourage the exportation of goods from that area, and we have gone to the length of giving credit to the extent of a billion and a quarter dollars to get that area on its feet—because we thought it was in our interests to do so. If that is not some evidence of concern at the loss of a market in Great Britain, then I do not know what it is.

Mr. Pearkes: The British are exporting to other countries certain things which are urgently required in this country.

Mr. Abbott: That is not our fault.

Mr. Pearkes: And they are taking from those countries things which we produce here. Surely there is some concern about that. For instance, in 1947-48 Britain exported something over $596,000 worth of iron and steel manufactures to Hungary. At the same time she imported hundreds of thousands of hundredweight of poultry from Hungary. We have poultry to sell to Great Britain, and we want steel products from Great Britain.

Is that not a case where one cannot help thinking that something more might have been done to have found a market for our poultry in Great Britain, and to have obtained manufactured articles from there, some of which would go right into the poultry business itself?

Mr. Abbott: As I have said so many times, we do not control the trade policy of Great Britain or any other country. We do not control it. And if Great Britain sees fit to buy poultry from Hungary, or bacon from Denmark, or crabmeat from Russia, while we may not like it very much we are not in a position to say, "You must not do it."

Mr. Quelch: The minister has stressed the fact that exports from the sterling area to Canada have increased, and he has also stressed the fact that our exports to that area are at a high level. I think the minister will have to agree that the reduction in our trading surplus in that area is due more to a contraction of our exports to that area than to an expansion of exports from that country to this.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. The contraction is due to a reduction in manufactured goods, not in our more primary products such as base metals, lumber and other things. Unfortunately the reduction is largely in manufactured products, such as automobiles and other articles of that nature. That is where they are curtailing their imports and up to the present time that is what has had the most effect on our exports.

Mr. Quelch: On the other hand, it is making it difficult for us to get certain food contracts signed at the former level.

Mr. Abbott: I think the Minister of Agriculture will have to speak about that.

Mr. Gardiner: I have been listening on a number of occasions, not only during this debate but during one or two others, to the references that have been made to Great Britain. I want to agree with what the Minister of Finance has said, namely, that so far as the main agricultural products for which we expect to have a market in Great Britain are concerned, we have made arrangements which are satisfactory. To suggest from that that we are always going to have a satisfactory arrangement with Great Britain is a question that seems to be in the minds of hon. members.

I say that the arrangements are satisfactory. What we did was to sit down with the British and estimate the amount of our farm products, other than wheat, which they would be required to take in order to leave us without surpluses. Fortunately the position at the moment is that we have been able to sell our beef cattle; up until very recently we could have sold our pork products, if necessary; we could have sold most of our dairy products up until very recently in another market, particularly the United States market, at prices which were a little better than we could obtain from the British. But we estimated that on balance throughout the year we would probably be able to sell for about the same price to Britain under the agreements which we made.

Having figured the quantities which we had, and having determined that we could sell certain quantities in other countries, we made agreements with Britain which are taking all the surplus products that we have for sale to Britain. In the case of bacon, we have not been able up to now to fill the contract with Britain. They are taking all the cheese that we can supply, but we have not been able to fill the contract up to the present time. They have been taking all our dried and frozen eggs and we have been selling our fresh eggs in the United States market.

In other words, the negotiations with regard to these products have resulted in the sale of our surpluses. As has been said so often, I do not think that we could improve our position in the British market by going there and saying, "Unless you buy all our surpluses, unless you take them off our hands, in spite of the fact that we can sell some of it elsewhere, we are not going to play with you". That is not the way to establish yourself in a good market.

The British have their difficulties in balancing trade at the present time, as we have ours. What we said to them in effect on our last meeting was: "We are prepared to co-operate with you; we would like to see you putting forth an effort, and we would like to see our friends in the United States putting forth some effort; we would like to see some others who have not had the same difficulties we have had in reaching a balance put forth some effort to assist. We have not ourselves been able to see our way through". I know the suggestion is made that nobody has done anything about it, but the fact is that the products which the British have bought are products that they would have preferred not to have bought at all in order to make their trade balances complete at as early a date as possible.

In spite of the fact that they would have preferred to do that, they have bought our products. I may say to hon. members that they are still negotiating with us to buy our farm products over a long period on a basis similar to that on which they are buying from other countries. At no time has Great Britain bought from any other country in the world, so far as I know, on a basis similar to that on which she has bought products in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: The less my hon. friends over in the Conservative corner say about it, the less I will say about their responsibility for the position. The British have been buying our products on a different basis from that on which they are buying other countries' products. They have been agreeing with us year by year down until the last two years to put into the contract a figure which would induce our people to produce more. They have agreed with us to pay a set price for the product and to make the determination of that price official in the agreement from the beginning. Their agreements with other countries have been quite different. They have had a maximum amount that they were prepared to take from those countries, and they have had a minimum amount that those countries were required to deliver. Then in addition they had a provision in the contract whereby they could renegotiate the price from time to time. When there was a possibility of their being able to buy a product in some other country at some other price they were permitted to renegotiate the price downward with the country with which they had the contract.

The difficulties that we have had with the British have not been difficulties of the type that have been in the minds of hon. members who have been talking here. There have been discussions as to whether we should follow the same practice that has been followed with other countries. I have been wondering all through this debate why my hon. friends in the opposition have been making so many inquiries about barter trade. I recall when the chief exponent of barter trade in the Dominion of Canada in 1939 was the last leader of the Progressive Conservative party while he was premier of the province of Manitoba. I am quite satisfied that he could tell them about the negotiations between that province and a certain European country with regard to barter trade.

Mr. Bryce: Which country?

Mr. Gardiner: I will leave it to the hon. gentleman to say.

Mr. Bryce: You tell us.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend knows the country; he can tell us what country it was. In any case we have had fairly satisfactory dealings, I would say very satisfactory dealings, with the British. Although we had signed a contract with them to take our surplus beef, when we could get a higher price for it in the United States they agreed to our closing out the contract in the middle of the season and selling our beef in the United States. We have had other negotiations from time to time and we have met them in their attempts to balance their own trading with this and other countries by cutting down on the amounts that we expected them to take at any time when we could sell the remainder of the surplus to someone else or at any time our own people were able to consume all or the greater part of what we had. Someone said, what about apples?

Mr. Knight: Honey.

Mr. Gardiner: I dealt with apples on two previous occasions, and I cannot improve upon the reason I gave for the position in Great Britain. My hon. friend, who comes from a country where we used to grow a lot of apples, shakes his head; but if he will look at the records that were quoted the other day he will find that in spite of the fact that an increase in purchases from Australia can be shown, or an increase in the purchases from somewhere else, the British are importing very much less in the way of apples than they were in the early periods that were mentioned. That is due to the fact that they are producing more apples in their own country.

My hon. friends opposite speak of the necessity of getting back to the law of supply and demand. That has been one of their main arguments today, that we should get back to the point where we would be governed by the law of supply and demand, and they say that then the value of our money would take care of itself. Well, the first people in this country to depart from the law of supply and demand were the official opposition when they formed a government under the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. That was back in 1932. The only free trade country in the world, the best market we had for food products, was compelled by them to abandon that policy. Now when these gentlemen come along and say we ought to get back to the law of supply and demand I say to them that the only way we will ever get back to it is to get a Liberal government in Great Britain, as they have in the United States and we have in Canada. Then we will all get back to it.

Mr. Jackman: The minister answered that part of the queries raised on this side of the house having to do with Britain taking goods from Canada, which I presume was his particular assignment. Many of us here are concerned about why Britain is not sending more goods of a kind we can use here, instead of sending them to other countries, so that in turn Britain would have more Canadian dollars with which to buy more of the particular products with which the minister was concerned. Does he have any information to convey to the committee in that regard?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the hon. member does not listen to my speeches; and I am afraid that even if I break the rules of the house and repeat my speech, he still will not listen to it.

Mr. Harkness: One of your political speeches.

Mr. Gardiner: My speeches are all political; that is why they are all good. I have never made any excuses for being in politics. I think it is the best job the country offers.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): We all know you are in politics.

Mr. Gardiner: The question is why the British find it necessary or advisable to take certain commodities from Poland, Denmark and perhaps some other European countries, with which we could supply them if we were to either ask our own people to eat less or ship them products for which we already have a market elsewhere. Why do they prefer to take those products from some other country and send to that country some things we might like to have? Well, the minister has given the fundamental reason for the present position; the costs in different places. The real basis of the reason, in fact, is that which I gave the house previously, namely that Britain over a period extending back to 1932 has been under contract to take these products from other countries. She was forced into that contract when she was forced off the system of free trade which had been in effect up to that time. She was forced off that policy in 1932 as the result of two elections in Britain in which the people who were in favour of continuing that policy were defeated. Though she was not able to carry out the policy under quotas during the war years, immediately the war was over she resumed it. While Denmark has not been able up to the present to supply the quantity of bacon or the eggs that Britain agreed to take, and while Poland has not been able to supply the amount of bacon Britain agreed to take, I have no doubt that Britain will continue to follow the policy she has always followed, that once she enters into an agreement with anyone that agreement is carried out until a new agreement is made.

The great difficulty in making new agreements at present is the idea which was expressed here today by one hon. member, and which was also expressed back at that time; that is, that for thirty years there have not been any markets of the kind we used to talk about. That statement always sounds rather silly to me, though I was told not to use that word in the house. It does sound silly, nevertheless, in view of the fact that we have three times the trade now that we had when that statement was made. Our trade has gone up every year since then, so that today it is at least three times what it was when it was said there were no markets to be had in the world.

An hon. Member: They were low to start with.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, because there had been a Conservative government for five years, and from that time on it has increased. If I went back to that time it would be five times as great now. These people who try to indicate that there is no possibility of trading our products are wrong. I am inclined to agree with some of the statements that have been made from the other side of the house to the effect that something ought to be done about the convertibility of exchange between all countries who are trying to co-operate in doing the same thing in the world. I am inclined to agree with that; but in spite of the fact that some people have credited me with stating the position very forcefully over in London, I still say that the best way to get a final result is to listen to what the other people have to say, to put forward our own views from time to time with regard to the matter and, since we are all friends, to co-operate with them in trying to get the results as quickly as possible not only in our own country but in all countries.

As far as I am concerned, I think Britain has had the greatest battle of any country in the world, and I think she has made the best job of handling it of any country in the world.

An hon. Member: Under a socialist government.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says it was under a socialist government. If the socialist government had not had the plans all laid down previously by a good government, before they came into power, I doubt very much whether within their own ranks they had sufficient strength to evolve the policies which are being put into effect. The British people entered into the war at the peak of their influence among the nations of the world, financially and otherwise. They did not ask help from anybody. They said, "We think we are right, and we are proceeding to demonstrate that we think we are right."

This is not the first time Britain has done that. Britain has done that five times in the last three centuries. The only reason that Britain has been supported by ourselves and other countries is the fact that we, too, were convinced she was right. She carried on on that basis for at least one-third of this war and for the greater period of the first war without very much assistance from any country outside the empire. Some people were willing to give aid but were denied the right to do so because their countries were overrun.

Britain went through both of these wars and we went through with her. It is not more than eighteen months ago when everyone I met who came back from Great Britain was saying, "Britain is through." I used to turn on the radio night after night and hear messages broadcast from the other side of the line to the effect that Britain was on the way out. I want to say, to those who are talking so much about communism now, that those were communistic messages. Britain was not on the way out. I took in my hands my own position as a possible prophet and declared that within five years Britain would be restored to her financial position among the nations of the world; that she would be trading with the other countries in much the same way as she traded before.

So far as I am concerned, I am prepared to do everything and to assist the government in doing everything possible in order to put Britain back into that position. I do not care what country you are talking about, there is no country in the world—I do not exempt any country from that statement—that has done more to establish world peace than Great Britain. She has done so by creating in the world the commonwealth of nations to which we belong. I think our first duty in Canada is to see to it that when we are all through with this scrap about money—I am not going to try to lay the blame for it—the one nation that has done more to maintain peace than any other nation, no matter what political party she has been under, ought to be supported.

If by selling her less food for a year or two, and selling the rest of our surplus somewhere else, or even persuading our own people to eat it, we are going to help her resume her position, then, Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to do it. Someone mentioned honey. The honey producers were in to see me yesterday. We have been advertising honey in Canada to get the people to eat it, and they are eating it. If the Canadian people continue to eat it in the quantities they naturally should, we will not have any problem in getting rid of our honey. It may do us a lot of good to eat it.

Some of our other problems are in a similar position. In the house there has been an overemphasis on the problem of getting rid of our food products. Our food products are going out at fairly good returns and we are hopeful we may be able to maintain that position.

Mr. Skey: The Minister of Agriculture just mentioned the possibility of being through with this scrap about money at some time. I should like to ask him if he will resume his role of prophet and tell us when we may be through with it.

Mr. Gardiner: I probably should have said that I agree with my friend the member for Muskoka-Ontario that the scrap has been continuing for a long time. Some of the opinions that have been expressed by members opposite are exactly the same in principle as that which the Spartans had in mind when they made their money out of iron so that nobody could carry it out of the country. Undoubtedly there are some people who think we ought to have money that makes it impossible for it to be used. The government is not composed of people who think that way; the government wants a currency that will enable us to trade.

Mr. Merritt: The Minister of Agriculture has made two speeches and one remark. The last remark I did not like. The first speech I did not like, but I thought the second speech was excellent and if he continued in that vein he could come over and sit with us. He expressed a regard for Great Britain, a regard for the convertibility of currencies; and those are two very wholesome things.

I rose to say that at the opening of his first speech, in which he once more criticized the Ottawa agreements of 1932, thereby showing a complete ignorance of the trading position of British Columbia—

Mr. Abbott: I had to ask my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, to answer questions which were raised about these agricultural contracts, Mr. Chairman, but I think we are going rather far afield from this resolution concerning the extension of the foreign exchange control board for a year. The statements concerning those agricultural contracts could not be allowed to go unchallenged and the Minister of Agriculture was the one to deal with them. Could we not now return to the subject matter of the resolution?

Mr. Merritt: Mr. Chairman, I do not remember straying from the subject matter of the resolution very often and I do not think I have now. The economy of British Columbia has been based upon trade with the sterling area. This trade was put on a firm foundation by the Ottawa agreements. The Minister of Agriculture said that our agricultural products have been satisfactorily sold.

Just before the Minister of Agriculture made that speech, the Minister of Finance said that the drop in our exports to the sterling area was in manufactured goods.

Mr. Abbott: Primarily, I said.

Mr. Merritt: Primarily in manufactured goods. I just want to inform both ministers, who seem to be completely ignorant of the economy of British Columbia, of the kind of things we have for sale to the sterling areas. I wish to tell them something about the facts. I should like to refer to the report of the foreign exchange control board for 1948, page 15, and I am reading from the top of the page:

> Most of the decline in our exports was concentrated in a relatively few items. Shipments of wheat were lower because of the comparatively small crop in 1947.

Now the next is one of the sentences to which I want to make particular reference.

> Exports of other food items were, on the whole, maintained although there was a substantial drop in shipments of apples, poultry, and some kinds of fish.

Apples, poultry, and some kinds of fish, three of the principal exports of British Columbia to the sterling area. I shall skip one sentence concerning the shipment of beef and continue reading from the report.

> With the important exception of lumber, which dropped sharply, exports of non-food raw materials were substantially maintained.

Mr. Chairman, lumber is British Columbia's greatest source of wealth.

Mr. Abbott: Previous to that, it had been at an abnormally high level.

Mr. Merritt: The minister asserts that but he knows very little about the economy of British Columbia, judging from what he has said in the house.

Mr. Abbott: I know a great deal, if my hon. friend will forgive me.

Mr. Merritt: I should like to give some figures concerning the export of lumber from British Columbia which will show the minister what I have in mind. The water-borne exports of lumber from British Columbia fell off twenty-four per cent during the last year. To the sterling area, they fell off forty-four per cent. The difference between twenty-four and forty-four per cent was the export of lumber by water to the United States.

Mr. Abbott: As compared with what year?

Mr. Merritt: As compared with the year before.

Mr. Abbott: That is my point; compare it with 1939.

Mr. Merritt: I cannot, because you have inflated the currency too much.

Mr. Gardiner: The year 1947 was the first year there was no control of consumption here.

Mr. Merritt: A forty-four per cent decline in the export of lumber to the sterling area is a very serious thing for British Columbia. The absolute cessation of apple shipments to Great Britain and a drop in eggs and canned fish are also something that the ministers might take into consideration when they are giving these nice views with regard to our trade position.

I now want to come to another point.

Mr. Abbott: Does it relate to the resolution, Mr. Chairman? Really we should not be discussing anything that we have been discussing. Perhaps it is unfair to raise the matter at this point, but we should not be discussing general trade problems under each of these resolutions. This is not the place to do so.

Mr. Merritt: I am not talking about general trade problems but rather of particular trade problems.

Mr. Abbott: That makes the situation all the worse.

Mr. Merritt: Trade problems are inseparably connected with exchange problems. That is the point the Minister of Finance does not seem to understand. That is the only reason anyone ever talks about money: money reflects trade. If there were not trade, we would not talk about money at all. We would not have it.

I shall continue, Mr. Chairman, and I assure you that I will relate my trade remarks particularly to this resolution. I outlined the general situation of the reduction in the particular exports of British Columbia products to the sterling area. I should now like to call to the attention of the Minister of Finance this further fact. In the year 1948 we had with South Africa a favourable balance of trade of $80 million. The products which South Africa buys from Canada have largely been lumber, fish and, I think, fruits such as apples.

Mr. Abbott: Automobiles, manufactured goods.

Mr. Merritt: But lumber, fish and fruit have been extremely important items in that trade. In the month of December South Africa was forced to put on import restrictions because of her exchange position. If $80 million of our trade with the sterling area was with one country with a smaller population than ours, which had not exchange restrictions in the year 1948—

Mr. Abbott: It sure has them now.

Mr. Merritt: —then in the year 1949, under restrictions, that favourable balance in our trade and that outlet for a substantial part of British Columbia's trade will be seriously endangered.

I have listened to this debate in committee all afternoon. I have found the minister to be always talking about the position up to date. The reason that members on this side of the house are raising this subject at all is that we fear for the future unless we get to the Minister of Agriculture's principle, namely, convertibility of exchange.

Mr. Abbott: We all want that.

Mr. Merritt: Since we in British Columbia know that the British would buy our lumber if they could get Canadian dollars and that the South Africans, the Australians and the New Zealanders would buy our produce if they could get Canadian dollars, we want to hear from the minister how that trade can be maintained unless he does something to bring about more realistic exchange rates. The minister must not talk about over-all balances of trade with the whole world. We are concerned with these very exports that are mentioned in the report. The government's rigid exchange policy has hurt British Columbia and British Columbia's chief exports more than it has hurt any other part of Canada. If the government goes on like this, then we face, not the danger of going down hill without our brakes on, as was said the other night, I think, by the hon. member for Macleod, rather we face going over a precipice without our brakes on. I think it is about time that the minister stopped trying to criticize the policies we in this party put forward, and himself started to tell us how he proposes to handle these extremely serious matters that are facing us.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know how many times I must say this, Mr. Chairman. I have stated what the remedy is. It is, of course, greater production in these countries at competitive prices. But I do not know how many times I must reiterate that devaluation of the Canadian dollar, which is what my hon. friends opposite or some of them are suggesting—

Mr. Merritt: No. It is not.

Mr. Abbott: Or change in the exchange rate.

Mr. Merritt: Move towards convertibility.

Mr. Abbott: One cannot create convertibility of currencies alone. That requires the participation of others.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): That is what we want.

Mr. Abbott: All I want to say is this. The remedy suggested by the leader of the opposition and some of his supporters, namely, the devaluation of the Canadian dollar to what he suggested might be a realistic level, a ten per cent discount, would hurt and hinder the exportation of goods from the sterling area to this country. If this is the only remedy my hon. friends have to suggest, then I say it is no remedy at all. It is just the reverse. If I have said that once, I have said it a dozen times; and I am not going to repeat it.

Mr. Merritt: Having no defence himself, the minister is simply trying to attack our position.

Mr. Abbott: He does not need to have a defence. He has nothing to defend.

Mr. Merritt: I think the minister has said that the only way in which we can approach convertibility is by the European countries increasing their production and their exportation. He also stated that the European countries are pricing themselves out of our markets. There is no one in this house who does not know that the way in which a country which is pricing itself out of a market gets back into that market at a competitive price is by a change in its exchange rate. Nor is there anyone in this house who expects that the European countries will be able to balance their trade with Canada for an extremely long time. I do not suppose that Great Britain ever in this century had a favourable balance of trade with Canada.

Mr. Abbott: She never has had.

Mr. Merritt: No, she never has had. How the minister expects that Great Britain, with her foreign investments gone, is to be able to balance her trade with Canada or to find other sources of income to balance her payments, is something I cannot understand. I think he knows as well as we over here do that the only way to get back to convertibility is to place the exchange rates—not of Canada alone but of all countries—in a satisfactory relation to the trade between those countries. We over here are not talking devaluation of the Canadian currency. The minister should listen more carefully to what is being said.

Mr. Abbott: Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite are talking that. I am not saying that my hon. friend is.

Mr. Merritt: The hon. member for York West stated the matter quite succinctly, as the minister would know if he had listened.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, but the leader of the opposition stated another principle.

Mr. Merritt: He stated that the problem was not devaluation but rather convertibility. I do not know why the minister does not take the house into his confidence frankly on the real point at issue. It is his responsibility, as Canada's Minister of Finance, to seek to make the Canadian dollar exchangeable with the currency of other countries in the world so that we can get trade flowing without an iron curtain.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Does he really think that any single country such as Canada, or any single Minister of Finance, can achieve this most desirable result of free convertibility of currencies? He cannot honestly be suggesting that. If he is, then—I do not want to be offensive—I suggest that he confine his criticism to military matters and not to this question of international exchange.

Mr. Merritt: The minister seems to think that I know very little about this matter.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say that.

Mr. Merritt: I have not claimed a great knowledge of money matters. I do not pose as an expert on exchange. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the minister is a lawyer and not an economist. I believe that the minister knows not a great deal more about currencies himself than do most hon. members. Perhaps he has had a little more intensive education in the last two or three years but that is about all. On this side of the house some of us think that the minister is too much in the hands of people who know more about economic and money matters than he does, and that some of us who are not subject to that influence may be able to bring points of view to him which will clarify his own mind on the subject. I did not come into this House of Commons representing myself as having any special knowledge. I do not claim particularly good military knowledge. There are a hundred members in this house who served in one of Canada's wars. None of us claims any special knowledge of that subject. We are here as members of parliament. The minister suggests that I should not rise and express a view because I am not an expert.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say that. I asked my hon. friend a question. It was a simple question. I asked how he thought any single country, whether Canada or any other, could create conditions of free convertibility of currencies, which depend upon the trading nations of the world being in a position to pay their bills in goods or services. I asked him the question how he thought Canada could do that. We have been doing our best. We have been supporting the principle of multilateral trade which, in my judgment, is one of the greatest factors to facilitate free convertibility of currencies. We have been sticking strongly to that. We have been trying to hold off from what I consider to be this dangerous and vicious system of barter agreements. That is the thing we have been trying to do in order to ensure convertibility. I asked my hon. friend how he thought that a single country could do that, and I inferred that he thought we could.

Mr. Merritt: Then you made personal remarks.

Mr. Abbott: I said I did not want to be offensive. If I was, I gladly withdraw. It was somewhat humorous, because I said that, if he was really suggesting that, which I do not think he was for a moment, then he should confine himself to criticism of some other topics. That is all I said. I cannot believe that he meant what he appeared to mean. That is what struck me.

Mr. Merritt: I think that is just the reason why this bill should not pass the house and why the government should be defeated. I say that because I do seriously mean that the Minister of Finance has a duty upon him to take the lead in bringing the countries of the world, which are signatories to the Bretton Woods agreement, to a basis of exchange which more truly represents the terms of trade in the world. I believe that unless some country takes that step, unless some country gives a lead to a body which is, I do not say it invidiously, almost a bureaucratic body, an administrative body instead of an organization designed to make policy, it will never be done.

Only this morning I read in the paper that they are again thinking that wheat may be declared surplus in the United States. I referred to our situation in British Columbia. If ERP fails us under fixed exchanges, then there will not be any other possible course open to the minister than the one we are recommending to him from this side of the house.

Mr. Abbott: What is it?

Mr. Merritt: If he does it too late it will be worse. The course I am suggesting to him is to take a lead in bringing about a revaluation, not a devaluation, of all the currencies of the signatories to the Bretton Woods agreement. Somebody has to take that lead, and it might as well be Canada, because Canada has such a very big stake in this problem.

We have heard the minister try to ridicule and try to draw red herrings across policies of ours on this side of the house. We have not heard a thing from him which is going to stop us from sliding over this precipice which many of us see in front of us. The fact is that the course we are suggesting to him, and which he thinks himself incapable of achieving—that is apparently why he will not do it—is the only possible way out of this impasse which faces our export trade. In my view it is high time that the government stopped trying to stay in power by ridiculing other people's policies and developed a policy itself.

Mr. Archibald: I have listened to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard bat the minister around and tell him that he does not know anything about the problem in British Columbia, and I have to admire the minister's patience. I might disagree with the minister in all his economic policies, but when I hear an hon. member tell him that he should become a second Moses in the wilderness and lead the whole world into multilateral trade, to me it begins to sound rather ridiculous when I think of the brains which Europe can produce and has produced, and yet the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard can only dream up a solution to the Canadian problem by asking the minister to go over to Europe and tell them how to do their business. That is Tory politics—meddle in the other guy's business but do not attend to our own business.

If the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is interested in jobs and meal tickets on the Pacific coast and wants to see the workers out there working on export goods, then let us adapt ourselves to the policies which are becoming prevalent in the international field, namely, barter agreements. Whether we believe in it or not, let us eat regularly. That is the problem.

Mr. Merritt: I am with you on that.

Mr. Archibald: I should like to see something more constructive come out of British Columbia than this mugging about with something which the hon. member does not know anything about. He did not advance one idea in his whole speech.

Mr. Jackman: Some time ago I tried to get some information from the Minister of Agriculture, but I am afraid I did not get quite what I wanted. I did get a note from one of my colleagues which said that the qualification of a cabinet minister is to be able to reply to a question without answering it. The minister did not answer my question. I am not going to ask it again because the minister is much smarter in debate than I am or ever hope to be. I am just an average, ordinary member, like my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. Therefore I shall address my question to the Minister of Finance. Some time ago some figures were given in this house—I think from this side—which showed that the total imports of Great Britain from Canada were $688 million and the total exports from Great Britain to Canada were $374 million, or 40 per cent of the amount they took from us. What I should like to know from the Minister of Finance is this, and it is purely factual; there is nothing else behind it. What efforts have been made to have Britain send more goods such as iron and perhaps textiles? I know that we altered tariffs on one particular point. But a good salesman not only tries to sell his own goods when he goes over to Great Britain; he shows them the way by which they can purchase goods from us. I should like to know if the Minister of Finance can throw any light upon these matters. What has been done to try to get more of Britain's goods into Canada, to offset the goods we are sending to Britain? Because only this month we have read in the press that Great Britain's over-all balance is now about equal. The only shortage is in hard currencies—Canadian dollars and American dollars.

I think it is true to say generally that there have been many things produced in Great Britain and exported to soft currency countries which could have been sent to Canada. Can the Minister of Finance throw any light upon that—before I ask further questions?

Mr. Abbott: I had intended at another time, and still intend, to deal in somewhat greater detail with the question the hon. member has raised. Generally speaking, however, I can say this—

Mr. Jackman: Would the minister prefer to answer it at another time?

Mr. Abbott: I would, because I do not have figures with me. However, perhaps I could give a general answer at this time—and I am sure this will be concurred in by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

When the chancellor was here last September we urged upon him strongly the desirability of endeavouring to persuade British exporters to direct as much of their production as possible to the Canadian market. As members of the committee are aware, we have been particularly interested in textiles because, prior to the war, British textiles were exported in substantial quantities to this country. As a result of the war that market was largely taken over by American exports—Canadian imports from the United States.

As a result of the severe import restrictions against the United States there was a great opportunity for British textile manufacturers to export to this country, and they have been doing so in fairly substantial volume. When Sir Raymond Streit, chairman of the textile group, was out here—he has been here on several occasions—great stress was laid upon the desirability of directing as many exports as possible to Canada. Substantial success has been achieved along those lines, although not as great as we would have wished.

I am not familiar with all the details; but I do know that my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as a result of discussions with board of trade people in the United Kingdom, was able to arrange for a substantial divergence of steel to Canada. The joint committee which was set up following the chancellor's visit met in London a month or so ago; and again at those meetings we impressed upon the British government—at official levels, it is true—our anxiety that everything should be done to encourage exports of this type from the United Kingdom. I propose to deal with some aspects of the matter at greater length, perhaps in my budget speech. I have no doubt that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be doing so, too.

Mr. Jackman: The annual report of the foreign exchange control board points out that official holdings of gold and United States dollars increased by $496 million. May I ask the minister if the amount of United States currency which Canada would have received through the purchase of a minority interest in the International Petroleum Company by Standard Oil of New Jersey would be reflected in the 1948 account, or would it be reflected in the 1949 account; and approximately how much in millions of dollars would it be?

Mr. Abbott: I would have to check on that. I should think it would likely be reflected in the 1948 accounts. I am afraid, however, that I could not give an accurate answer, but I shall get the information and give it to the hon. member at the next stage.

Mr. Jackman: May I ask how this $496 million of very valuable assets now held by the Bank of Canada is paid for? I presume it is with Canadian dollars. It would make a difference in the budget surplus as shown in cash surplus, when the minister gives us the nation's accounts next Tuesday night. However, I do not wish to anticipate his statement to be made at that time. What will be the government's policy in regard to allowing Canadians to reinstate to some extent their capital position with regard to American securities? The minister will recall how valuable it was for Canada to be able to put our hands on American securities in the possession of Canadian individuals and companies. Some of those securities were not at that time taken over by the government; but in many cases individuals and companies sold part or all of their American securities, and the money went to provide very necessary funds to purchase munitions in the United States before that country came into the war.

Would it be against the policy of the government to allow Canadian individuals to repurchase American securities? Those securities of course would be under the jurisdiction of the foreign exchange control board. This would allow Canadians a certain amount of freedom which they would not have otherwise.

Mr. Abbott: So far no consideration has been given to changing the existing policy which, generally speaking, does not allow Canadians to obtain United States dollars for the purpose of investing in American securities.

Mr. Jackman: May I ask if there is any reason for continuing that policy, or is it just like so many things which have found their way to the statute books? They are never removed because the bureaucrats have not found it necessary to remove them, and the public do not make a big enough fuss.

Mr. Abbott: The reason is that the government does not consider our reserve position is as yet sufficient to permit us to allow our store of United States dollars to be used to purchase American securities, which would naturally be subject to market fluctuations—to which currency and gold are not subject.

Mr. Adamson: With regard to what was so clearly and ably said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the minister should keep in mind that at the time of the Bretton Woods agreement, after the impasse between the British proposals and those made by Mr. White on behalf of the United States, it was Canada that took the lead, and it was the Canadian compromise proposal which was finally accepted.

Canada took the lead at that time, and I submit she could now take the lead again in asking that the international monetary fund go into the matter we are now discussing, to see if the regulations could not be altered so that the greatly desirable quality of convertibility might be returned to the currencies of the world.

No one realizes more than I what a stupendous task it would be. But I wish to tell the committee and the minister that Canada did take the lead in overcoming the impasse between the United States and Great Britain at the time of the Bretton Woods agreement; it was our proposal which was finally accepted. I believe we could again take the lead.

I suggested last night, as I have done repeatedly, that an initial step would be the establishment of a free gold market so that we could have some common denominator to which we could relate our currencies. I shall not labour the point now. I did mention however that there is a considerable body of support for that contention in both the United States and Canada. I believe it should be explored a good deal further. The minister said—and in error I suggest—that the United States dollar was the only currency not subject to exchange control.

Mr. Abbott: I should have included the Swiss.

Mr. Adamson: The Swiss is the only currency that is really not subject to exchange control. The United States dollar is subject to the most rigid exchange control in that the holders are not allowed to convert into gold. The gold exchange act of the United States specifically prohibits the purchase of gold with United States dollars. Unless that quality is returned to a currency you cannot say that that currency is free of exchange control.

I should like to quote one thing in connection with this matter of purchases in Great Britain. What the Minister of Agriculture said about this was most interesting. He, like myself, believes that convertibility is essential, that we must do everything we can to strive for that. We owe to the United Kingdom, in fact all civilization owes, a debt that probably can never be repaid. Without the United Kingdom we would probably still be engaged in hostilities or be a vassal state. This is what Mr. Elliott M. Little had to say, as reported in a Reuters dispatch from London in today's Ottawa Journal:

> "We are not satisfied that everything possible is being done by you or by ourselves to overcome this dollar problem", Little declared in a speech at the annual dinner of the Paper Makers Association of Great Britain and Ireland.
> "It is not only Canada's pulp and paper trade with Britain which has been affected by the exchange problem", Little asserted.
> "In the past year one traditional market after another has been reduced or has disappeared and old customers for Canadian pulp and paper products have turned to other countries at much higher prices or have gone without supplies they wished to have."

Granted that the bulk of our newsprint goes to the United States, the fact is that the United Kingdom has been a traditional market for a major part of our production of wood pulp and newsprint. But we find United Kingdom buyers of wood pulp and newsprint paying higher prices for an inferior newsprint in other soft currency countries. Everything should be done to overcome that problem. For the Minister of Finance to stand up and say that it is an impossible problem is not taking a realistic view of the situation.

Mr. Abbott: I have not said that it is impossible.

Mr. Adamson: Pretty nearly. We have to be prepared to take a chance; we have to be prepared to take courageous action. If we do not, there will be more and more articles such as this appearing in the press.

Despite the fact that our export trade last year was at a record level, the situation is so ominous that I believe the government has no time to lose in taking steps. I have suggested that the thing to do is to go to the international monetary fund and see if some new arrangement cannot be made to allow—perhaps only in small quantities to start with, perhaps only in a minor scale—these currencies to be given the essential quality of free convertibility.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in, on division. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 85, to amend the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At seven-thirty we will proceed in committee with the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice dealing with emergency powers.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 16, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Garson—Mr. Golding in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee requires a good deal of information before this resolution can be reported back to the house. It is also information the house should have before it undertakes to debate the principle of the bill that may follow, when second reading is moved. It is with a view to eliciting that essential information that I should like to put a number of questions to the Minister of Justice. I think I have made it clear that I regard this as essential information, and that the purpose of these questions is to ascertain facts which are highly important both in regard to the validity of the measure that will follow and also as to particular aspects of it. The minister did furnish certain information when he spoke in the house on March 15, but there is still quite an area in which I do not think the information before the house is adequate.

We have been told that certain orders, twelve in all, will be continued by this bill. Enough has been said by the minister, I think, to indicate that the bill will contemplate continuation of the orders in their present form. In the first place I wish the minister would be good enough to tell us something further about the orders. When he spoke last Wednesday he enumerated the twelve orders, of which I find six were amended by the statute itself in 1947. The legislation of 1947 actually contained amendments to those six orders, and section 4 of that statute does not permit the governor in council to do anything but revoke orders in whole or in part; there is no power of amendment. However, intimations have been given by members of the government at one time or another that certain amendments are being made, and I wonder if the minister would indicate just how that is being done.

Let me illustrate. When the Minister of Finance spoke on this subject on February 7, I am afraid altogether too briefly, he indicated that the bill would confine the effect of price control to some dozen or so commodities which he listed. That list is on pages 316 and 317 of Hansard. That would involve some provision in the statute, I should think, and I wonder if the minister would indicate just how that would be brought about. Another change was also intimated by the Minister of Finance on another occasion, when he said it would be the purpose to amend the general order in relation to the powers of the wartime prices and trade board so that, without indicating just how it would be done, the effect would be to amend section 8 of that general order by eliminating the "reasonable and just" provision in relation to price control.

That is one subject of inquiry, namely how these changes have been brought about. Perhaps I might stop here and give the minister an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Garson: Section 4 of the 1947 act enables the governor in council only to revoke but not to amend the orders in council, and my hon. friend's first question is how those orders may be amended in view of that provision. I apprehend that they will be amended as part of the schedule of the bill we are now seeking to amend by the legislation which will be found on the resolution now before us. I regret that I did not have the opportunity of being in the house or in charge of this measure at the time the 1947 act was passed, but I think I am right in saying that the amendments on that occasion were part of the bill itself. In view of the fact that the governor in council has no power to amend, the only way an amendment could be made would be by means of the present bill in its passage through the house.

Mr. Fleming: Does the bill now make that provision?

Mr. Garson: No; it does not. We went on the assumption that these orders in council having been considered item by item and order by order in 1947, when the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act was passed and, as I am informed, having been considered order by order in 1948, when that amendment was passed—

Mr. Fleming: Not in 1948.

Mr. Garson: That is my information from the gentleman who attended the committee. It may be that my hon. friend's recollection is different; however, nothing turns on that. But having been considered in 1947 and, as I contend, again in 1948, our thought was that the orders in council would be regarded as acceptable in their present form by a majority of the members. If they are not so regarded, then I imagine it would be open to the house to further amend them in much the same way that this was done in the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947. Speaking from recollection, I do not think there is any provision in this bill for the amendment of the orders in council in the schedule. I believe they are indicated there as having been amended by the 1947 act. However, I do not think any difficulty would arise in that regard if it were the desire of a majority of hon. members to have an amendment; I think the only problem would be one of draftsmanship.

With regard to my hon. friend's second question, I am rather in a predicament in trying to answer it without referring to one of the sections of the bill. Exception was taken in the house the other day when I did this, but perhaps hon. members will not object if I read section 2 of the bill we will be introducing if this resolution carries:

> Notwithstanding anything in the said act or in any order or regulation set out in the schedule thereto, the wartime prices and trade board shall not,
> (b) —

This is the point my hon. friend was inquiring about.

> —grant leave to prosecute any person for violation of subsection one of section eight of the wartime prices and trade board regulations with respect to any goods or services other than the goods and services with respect to which an order of the board was made under that paragraph and is in force at the commencement of this act.

By the way, my hon. friend, I think, will recognize subsection one of section eight of the regulations—

The Deputy Chairman: I do not believe it would be in order to deal with those sections of the bill at the present time.

Mr. Fleming: The minister could state the effect of the section without actually giving a verbatim rendering.

Mr. Garson: I have already offended the rule and given a verbatim report of the section which will answer my hon. friend's question. I am now referring not to the bill which is being introduced, but to subsection 1 of section 8 of the actual regulations which are in force under the old statute. This is the subsection which provides that:

> No person shall sell or offer for sale or supply goods or services at a price that is higher than reasonable and just—

Mr. Fleming: My next question has to do with the emergency which must exist if this legislation is to have any validity. I think the house will wish to be assured it is not passing legislation that is likely to be challenged and upset in the courts. Having regard to the fact, as was pointed out in the house on Tuesday, that there is a great deal of breadth to these orders, more than is required now in relation to the field in which the orders are to operate as compared with the original field, I think the minister will appreciate that if we legislate more broadly than is required to cover the field within which a national emergency is said to exist we are simply laying the legislation open to attack as being ultra vires. We will have to keep our legislation within the ambit of a national emergency. I should like the minister, if he will, to indicate in what respect the emergency may today be said to exist with regard to some matters that are covered by the general order which one might well call the mother order, P.C. 8528. This is the order that clothes the wartime prices and trade board with its broadest powers.

For instance, this order not only gives power to the wartime prices and trade board to fix prices, but it also gives the board power to fix the return on services. If you look at the definition of services you will see that, if this order is continued, the wartime prices and trade board will have the power to determine the remuneration—

Mr. Garson: To what page is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. Fleming: I am referring to P.C. 8528, page 20 of the consolidation that was used in 1947. You will see that services include the following specific services and any activities or undertakings associated therewith or ancillary thereto, and also any activities or undertakings that may hereafter be designated by the board as services for the purposes of these regulations. The first service mentioned is the transportation of goods.

Now, I think the minister must tell the house wherein a national emergency exists in Canada today with respect to the transportation of goods, warehousing and storage. I think he must tell us the same thing with regard to laundering and cleaning; tailoring and dressmaking; hairdressing and beauty parlour services; the supplying of meals; refreshments and beverages; the renting and and exhibiting of moving pictures; manufacturing processes performed on a custom or commission basis; the dyeing of furs; the dressing of furs; the slaughtering or dressing of animals or poultry on a custom or commission basis; the breaking and separating of eggs on a custom or commission basis; the pasteurizing of honey on a custom or commission basis; the drying of any goods on a custom or commission basis; the packing or packaging of any goods on a custom or commission basis.

Then further powers are given to the board with respect to putting a price on services, quite apart from goods. Now that is not the only feature in which the proposed extent of the order or, for that matter, the full extent of the order today has not been exercised; that power is not being exercised today by the board. The board's orders do not extend to the fixing of a price for services of that kind any more than they extend to the fixing of the price of goods other than those dozen commodities which appear at page 316 of Hansard.

Mr. Howe: This discussion is entirely concerned with the contents of the bill and has nothing to do with the resolution. Surely we cannot discuss the bill when the bill is not before us.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister will wait, he will see the point to which this question is directed.

Mr. Howe: I have waited quite a while.

Mr. Fleming: I do not care whether or not the minister is getting itchy. At the moment, I am trying to get some information which the house ought to have before it gives second reading to the bill. The house will not have that information unless it gets it here, at this stage. This is the purpose of the resolution stage in committee, in order that members may secure information which would enable them to use their intelligence in deciding how they should vote when the bill is presented.

I pointed out that there is a particular provision in the order in council to which I have referred, and there are others to which I could refer as well which are outside the scope of the regulations now being enforced by the board. I am not asking the minister to disclose the contents of the bill, but I wish he would state clearly how it is proposed to deal with this question so that the house may be sure that what is to follow is not going to have the effect of keeping alive a power with respect to matters on which the board has power today by these orders, but concerning which there surely cannot be said to be a national emergency today.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I must disagree with my hon. friend in his proposition that, in order to found a jurisdiction of this parliament to pass a law such as the bill we are seeking in this resolution, it must be founded upon an emergency in respect of, we will say, the transportation of goods, or warehouse and storage. I apprehend that, once a national emergency has been established, then, on the basis of that national emergency, parliament can legislate with regard to any of those matters if it so chooses. My hon. friend's objection is not, therefore, well taken in so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned.

It is perhaps well taken, although I did not understand him to address himself to that point, to the matter that under the present conditions, he might argue there is no longer the necessity to regulate these particular matters. Now, I do not think he can anticipate the bill by making that assumption, even though I have disclosed to him part of the contents of section 2 of the bill. I would suggest that by far the most practical way of dealing with the difficulty which is bothering my hon. friend is to proceed with this present stage; then when the bill is in the committee stage, we can have those who are charged with its administration before the committee of the house. Then we can explain to my hon. friend, I hope to his satisfaction, just wherein arises the necessity for these particular provisions that he has been reading.

As to the jurisdiction aspect of the matter, in drafting the bill our law officers have satisfied themselves upon that score; and with all deference I think that the problem to which my hon. friend alludes does not arise.

Mr. Hackett: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that this bill is going to a private committee and is not to be dealt with in the house?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: No. We shall bring it into the committee of the whole.

Mr. Hackett: But we are not going to hear witnesses in the committee of the whole, are we? It is not the practice to hear witnesses before this committee of the whole.

Mr. Garson: No, I understand not. I am somewhat at a disadvantage, in this respect, I must admit, because this is the first session in which I have been in this chamber. But I understand that the practice is that the various ministers may have officials of their departments attend with them in this house, and that, when a question is asked of the minister, he informs himself from his officials and relays the information to the house.

Mr. Hackett: The minister is quite right as regards matters of detail, I was going to say. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, for instance, has a number of gentlemen come at different times to give him figures about trade and such matters. But we are now dealing with a question of principle. I was going to ask the minister if he could inform the house what are the elements that constitute the national emergency upon which he relies.

Mr. Garson: I certainly have never held myself out to be an expert upon national emergencies, and I would question if even an expert could give a comprehensive and completely satisfactory definition. But I do not think that is necessary in the case before us because, as I said the other day in my remarks when I was speaking on the motion to go into committee, the economic emergency with which this country has been continuously faced since the cessation of hostilities is one which I think the members of this house were quite right in affirming as existing, by a vote of some 141 to 53. For the purpose we have here, that of making a foundation for our jurisdiction to pass this bill, I think that all we have to do is to satisfy a majority of the members of this parliament. Then you have an emergency which is sufficient for the purposes of founding jurisdiction to pass the bill. I am not raising this as any point of order at all. That is a matter that has already been determined.

Mr. Hackett: With great deference, may I say that the question of emergency is one of fact.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Hackett: It is not a question of what I or somebody else might think about it. At this juncture I think this question becomes a matter of grave importance, because the mere declaration of an emergency does not create one. If there be enacted legislation founded upon an assumption which the facts contradict, the minister will agree with me that great hardship may ensue; because we are a law-abiding people and we shall observe the law even while resisting it.

Without being too specific, the minister coming from Manitoba will know what I mean when I say that a high authority, confirmed by still higher authority, after hearing witnesses who testified on a broad range of topics, has said that not only is there no national emergency but that there never has been a time when we were more remote from an emergency than we are today. In fact, should I by chance, good or ill, find myself on the other side of the house, I might be inclined to welcome that document as a testimonial to the efficiency of the government in power. But the fact remains that, by a body before whom we as law-abiding people incline, it has been held that there is no national emergency. As prudent and careful men who seek to protect the interests of the country at large, I think there should be some reluctance on the part of parliament to enact legislation which in all probability—and I say "in all probability" because of the elements that point that way—will be ill founded in fact. I ask the hon. gentleman this question. What has happened since last Thursday or a week ago yesterday which prompts him to say that today a national emergency exists, when a week ago it was declared by a high authority that there was no such emergency?

Mr. Garson: I think that my friend's argument is founded upon a fallacy, if I may say so; and the fallacy is this. Merely because the Manitoba court of appeal, as some of a group of five men in Canada, finds as a matter of fact that there is no national emergency does not extinguish the fact, if the fact exists. So far as I am personally concerned, notwithstanding the testimonial aspect of their findings, I am myself in the most profound disagreement with this finding of facts. My hon. friend says, and rightly so, that this is a question of fact. But facts, for the purpose of founding jurisdiction in a case of this sort, are something that groups of people must find. They must find them to be facts. Human error being what it is, it is inevitable that some groups will find a thing to be a fact and another group will find that it is not a fact. I might say with just as much force as has my hon. friend that—I think it was yesterday or the day before—this parliament by a vote of 141 to 53, found that there was an emergency in Canada. I claim for the finding of this highest court in the land at least as much validity as my hon. friend can claim for certain members of the Manitoba court of appeal. Without attempting to discuss a matter which is, I think, for all practical purposes sub judice, I may tell him that we do not agree at all with the judgment of the Manitoba court of appeal either with regard to some of its findings of fact or with regard to some of the legal principles that it has invoked. We intend to appeal that case. The case is by no means ended. There as yet has not been in that case a final and ultimate finding which will carry the force of law, because we can appeal it, and we intend to appeal it. Not until after that appeal has been disposed of will my hon. friend be in a position to invoke it in support of his contention that there is no emergency existing in Canada today.

I do not want to repeat the argument which I made in the house, when I moved that the Speaker do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider this resolution, as to the reason which I stated for there being an emergency in Canada at the present time, because I do not think it is fair to bore hon. members by quoting from one's own speeches. I am sure that what I said is fresh in the minds of those who paid any attention to it in the first place. But even if my hon. friend objects to my remarks as not being correct statements of fact—and I think he would have great difficulty in doing so, because they were all so self-evident as to be platitudinous—I would ask him to look about him if he wishes to see proof of there being an emergency in Canada and listen to the remarks of his colleagues, the hon. member for Danforth, the hon. member for Davenport, the hon. member for Rosedale, the hon. member for York West and the hon. member for York South, who, during the last two days, have given the most excellent statements in great detail of various aspects of this emergency.

The leader of the opposition himself says that, although his party voted against the resolution which would lead to the introduction of rent control, neither he nor his party have declared themselves to be not in favour of rent control. They are in favour of rent control—for what reason? Because there is an emergency. If there is no emergency there is no need for rent control.

Mr. Merritt: Will the minister permit a question? Is it not a fact that the leader of the opposition pointed to specific rather than general emergencies? Is the minister not suggesting that there is a general emergency?

Mr. Garson: Indeed I am, sir. I do not know how the idea got about that specific emergencies are necessary as the foundation of the jurisdiction of this parliament.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Hackett: I doubt very much whether anybody alleges that.

Mr. Garson: I agree with my hon. friend that no person alleges it, but many people alluded to it. The hon. member for Nanaimo himself seems to be under that illusion.

Mr. Hackett: I do not think so.

Mr. Pearkes: No.

Mr. Garson: Let us be perfectly fair. Are my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party and I in agreement that all that is necessary is a general emergency for the foundation of our jurisdiction to pass the proposed bill?

Mr. Pearkes: On a question of privilege, I have never referred to anything which would lead the minister to make such a statement.

Mr. Garson: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He is quite right in the point he has raised. I meant to refer to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who has just made that statement. My hon. friend from Nanaimo is quite right.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister permit a question from this corner of the house? If he says that there is a general emergency, as he is arguing, why are we dropping so many controls as he proposes to do?

Mr. Garson: That is a very easy question to answer, Mr. Chairman. While the general emergency is the foundation for the jurisdiction that we propose to exercise here, it is a matter of judgment in dealing with the general emergency as to how we should carry on controls or dispense with them.

Mr. Thatcher: The judgment has not been very good in the past.

Mr. Garson: While my hon. friend may not agree with the judgment we have exercised, yet we happen to be in charge of the affairs of the government and that is what we thought to be the proper course to follow. Probably I have dealt with the points raised.

Mr. Hackett: I was going to pursue the inquiry a little further. I understand quite readily what the hon. gentleman has said, that the judgment of a court is not final until the right of appeal has been exhausted. Nevertheless I think it well that we recall a few facts, and I think it is well that parliament should recall them. Our parliament is not an omnipotent parliament. In Britain parliament is omnipotent; it is—I think somebody said here today—capable of doing anything except making a man into a woman or a woman into a man. The power of the British parliament is in almost all cases beyond question. Not so here!

Some 175 years ago the colonies in North America became dissatisfied with the omnipotence of the British parliament and rebelled against it.

Mr. Garson: It was not their parliament.

Mr. Hackett: It was a parliament which enacted legislation which was binding upon them, and it was against those enactments that they rebelled.

Mr. Garson: Because they had no representation.

Mr. Hackett: I am not going to deal with side issues. I say that the American colonies rebelled against an omnipotent parliament; and there grew up on this continent a new form of government, a form of government which, instead of being an omnipotent government, depended for its efficacy and its operation upon a system of checks and balances. In the United States there was the legislative power.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend if he is now dealing with the United States constitution?

Mr. Hackett: I am dealing with ours. For the moment I am referring to the United States constitution but I am coming to ours. I was going to say that in the United States the powers were divided into three: the legislative, the executive and the judicial. The supreme court of the United States was given the power to determine whether or not the laws enacted by Congress were constitutional, were binding; that is, whether or not legislation passed by the legislative body was effective, and could be applied to an individual. Some ninety years later another group of North American colonies set up another union which again refuted the doctrine of an omnipotent parliament; Canada, in a way all her own, devised a method of checks and balances. It was different from the United States system because Canada still retained the king. But our system followed the United States system to the extent that we had a constitution, although it happened to be a statute enacted by the British parliament. Any law enacted by the Canadian parliament or by a legislature of a Canadian province is valid only in so far as the lawmaker can point to the chapter and verse in the constitution which gives him authority to enact that law. And the arbiter upon whom was placed the duty of determining whether or not a law is constitutional and binding is the judiciary, the courts of the land—the trial courts, the courts of appeal and, in the early days, the privy council, because there was no supreme court until 1875, and after that date the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council.

I think my hon. friend will admit that there is a presumption that a judgment is right. There are courts of appeal for the purpose of correcting error. But my hon. friend will admit also, I am sure, that in ordinary cases a judgment of a court, especially a court presided over by an able and experienced judge, which has been unanimously confirmed by the highest court of a province—and when, be it remarked, the confirmation deals with a fact—permits of no successful appeal. I am not saying that in this instance an appeal may not succeed. But in the ordinary instance, in the ordinary case, I am sure my hon. friend will admit there is but scant hope for the success of an appeal from a case on which there have been two concurrent findings of fact.

In the case about which we are talking, the question was this: Is there an emergency? Because it is only if and when there is an emergency that the powers which give vigour and force and life to the order in council, and to the statute under which it is passed, exist. It has been held by a trial court, it has been held by a court of appeal in respect of this simple question of fact, that there is no national emergency, and that in consequence—

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hackett: Certainly.

Mr. Lesage: Do I understand that the hon. member for Stanstead contends it was the unanimous finding of the court of appeal of Manitoba, in the judgment to which he referred, that there was no national emergency? If he answers yes to that question, then I would ask him if he has read the judgment. I have it here. He should be careful.

Mr. Hackett: I was saying that there has been a finding of fact.

Mr. Lesage: By one judge out of five.

Mr. Hackett: I was saying there had been a finding of fact in the trial court, and that the court of appeal has confirmed that judgment and has confirmed it on the facts. I submit to the minister that while I believe most of us would be loath in an ordinary case—and this is not an ordinary case—to advise an appeal to a higher tribunal where there has been a concurrent finding of fact, there may be reason to appeal here. In fact, I would expect there would be an appeal in a matter of this importance.

But, all that being so, does it not impose upon the government at this juncture, before enacting more legislation which is subject to challenge and which, if successfully challenged, may cause great damage and hardship to a number of people, the duty of giving most careful study to the basis of the alleged emergency.

As the minister knows, there have been several other judgments in which it has been held that no national emergency exists, and the law has in consequence not been susceptible of enforcement. I suggest to the ministry that it is only prudent to state carefully what, in the view of the administration, constitutes a national emergency, and endeavour to ascertain if the facts, which are probably known to most of us, are such that it can be safely declared that a national emergency exists.

I do not wish to be facetious; and in matters of this kind which create great perplexities, I do not wish to be unduly partisan. I feel there is too much at stake to attempt to secure any political advantage or party advantage in a matter of this kind. But where are we going to find evidence of an emergency? I will admit—and I hope my hon. friend will not take it amiss—that there is a political crisis. I will admit that a government which, in its everyday activities, is relatively strong but which, in fact, compared to the entire opposition, is not so, finds itself in a difficult position. And I believe in a matter of this kind and of this importance parliament should go slowly. We should inquire with care and with the utmost scrutiny into the elements upon which the government relies to constitute this a national emergency.

To most of us a national emergency means national peril. It means the type of thing which arises when the enemy is at the gate. But anything in the way of an inconvenience, anything in the way of a local disturbance or turbulence, does not, I submit, according to the authorities and according to popular understanding, constitute a national emergency.

Then I say to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet that I too have the judgment of the court of appeal of Manitoba. And while I do not take the same view of it that he does, let me assure him that I too have read it carefully, and I hope my powers of comprehension have not abandoned me.

Mr. Lesage: I should like to quote from the judgment of Mr. Justice Dysart, and ask the hon. member for Stanstead if he can find anything that even resembles a declaration in those reasons for judgment that there is no national emergency. The judgment states:

> The act—

And he was speaking about the transitional powers act—

> —clearly invades the field of "property and civil rights" which, by the British North America Act, section 92(13) are committed to the provincial legislatures. But the parliament of the dominion in a sufficiently great emergency, such as that arising out of war, has power to deal adequately with that emergency for the safety of the dominion as a whole.
> The interests of the dominion are to be protected, and it rests with the parliament of the dominion to protect them. What those interests are the parliament of the dominion must be left with considerable freedom to judge; per Lord Wright, in Co-operative Committee on Japanese Canadians v. Attorney General for Canada, 1947 A.C. 87 at 101.

Mr. Hackett: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lesage: I am reading the judgment.

Mr. Hackett: The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Justice Dysart did not dissent from the judgment which confirmed the judgment of the chief justice.

Mr. Lesage: I am about to read his reasons.

Mr. Hackett: His conclusion was that the appeal should be dismissed.

Mr. Lesage: Of course, and I am about to read the reason he gave for concluding that. A little later on in his notes he says:

> Parliament has declared that the emergency is still continuing. That declaration is peculiarly within the rights of parliament to make. And although the judiciary has the right, in a proper case, to review parliament's decision, and has a duty, upon sufficient evidence, to reverse that decision, still the courts ought not to venture upon such a review or reversal unless the need of doing so is clear. The courts have always exercised that right "with reluctance"; per Lord Haldane in In re the Board of Commerce Act, 1919, and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, 1919, reported in 1922, 1 A.C. 191 at 200.

That is the very question we have before us, whether there is an emergency or not. The judgment goes on:

> In my view, P.C. 1292 goes beyond the act, and to the extent of that excess is invalid. That view renders it unnecessary—and I think inadvisable—for me to deal with the validity or invalidity of the transitional act.

Was there concurrence in the expressed opinion of one judge who said that there was no emergency? There is an emergency in Canada at the present time arising out of the last war that is still continuing.

Mr. Jackman: The first war or the second?

Mr. Lesage: Of course the emergency following the first war was of a special kind due to the policies of the Tory government that we had from 1914 to 1918. The policies of the government during the last war—

An hon. Member: This time?

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask hon. members to refrain from interrupting the speaker, no matter on what side of the house he may sit.

Mr. Lesage: I like it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Every hon. member should have the opportunity to present his views without interruption. I appeal to hon. members to support the rules by trying to keep proper order and decorum.

Mr. Lesage: What is an emergency? According to the Oxford dictionary an emergency is a sudden juncture demanding immediate action. Will any hon. member on the other side of the house say that the situation in regard to rents is such that we should do away with it?

An hon. Member: Who wants to?

Mr. Lesage: Is there a disturbance or peculiar situation amounting to an emergency in connection with housing? Is that emergency continuing owing to the fact that we were not able to build houses during the war? Is there not an emergency that we should deal with? The leader of the opposition has said that there is. If there is such an emergency why do hon. members on the other side rise in their places from time to time and ask that they be given an example of the emergency? Who will say that the situation with regard to housing is not a national emergency? Will any hon. member rise in his place and say that because of the shortage of certain commodities it is not necessary to keep certain prices down by price control, at least for some time?

If the Tories want to take the responsibility of disrupting the Canadian economy by doing away with all controls at this time let them do so. They must accept that responsibility before the people at the next election and I am mighty glad that they are doing it.

Mr. Ferguson: The hon. member has been emphasizing rent control but I ask him to name quickly three other emergencies. Will he stop harping on rent control and name three others? Go ahead. He cannot do it.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member has only to read—

Mr. Ferguson: Answer the question.

Mr. Lesage: —the list of twelve orders in council which will be mentioned in the bill and he will have his answer. There are not only three; there are twelve.

Mr. Ferguson: Mention them

Mr. Lesage: For example, steel and distribution of building materials which are in short supply. As I say, if the members of the opposition want to disturb the Canadian economy at this time, let them do so; but they will be responsible to the Canadian people. I am glad they are taking this stand because it is going to help us and there will be fewer members on the other side after the next election.

Mr. Knowles: I have listened for hours on end to the legal aspects of this argument and I resolved long ago that I would not get into it. After all, it is the sort of situation into which only lawyers would jump. I received through the mail today a copy of the judgment which has been referred to so often during the course of this debate. I also received many other letters in today's mail, to one of which I wish to make reference in a few minutes. This made me decide to say a few words on this legal point. I must admit that the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet has said much of what I intended to say, but perhaps not being a lawyer I can express myself in a layman's terms.

I have read to the best of my non-legal ability the judgments of Mr. Justice McPherson, Mr. Justice Coyne, Mr. Justice Dysart and Mr. Justice Adamson of the Manitoba court of appeal. As I read those judgments it seemed to me that there was one thing on which the four justices were agreed, namely, that they were ruling on the validity of order in council P.C. 1292 under the terms of the Transitional Measures Act. They did not rule that the Transitional Measures Act was ultra vires of this parliament, but they did rule that P.C. 1292 was ultra vires of the Transitional Measures Act. I may say by way of digression that I cannot follow their views on that matter. They speak about this 28¼ cents per bushel that was taken from this man Nolan who held this barley as though he had created that value. As a matter of fact that 28¼ cents was a fortuitous profit created by the action of the government in removing the ceilings, so to me their argument is very dubious on that point. But that is not the issue now. The issue is clear, and all the legal gentlemen of the official opposition should not keep dragging out these four judgments together with the previous judgment of Mr. Justice Williams as a proof, somehow, that we are doing something here that we have no right to do. The judgments either do not discuss it at all or they admit the validity of the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act itself. The only thing they say is that the act did not give the government power to pass P.C. 1292, because there was no emergency with respect to barley.

Mr. Hackett: No general emergency.

Mr. Knowles: That may be their view, but most farmers in western Canada, who lost heavily and saw others making fortuitous profits because of what happened, do think there was an emergency as far as they were concerned.

I want to leave it at that because, as I said, I have tried to put it in layman's language, and if I went on I would make it as confusing as most of the lawyers have made it. I said there was another letter I had received. As a matter of fact it was brought to my desk only half an hour ago, and this is what made me decide to take part in the debate. The judges say there is no emergency with respect to barley. The hon. member for Stanstead enlarges on that and insists that there is no general emergency. Other hon. members do not like a reference to one subject; but here it is, and this comes to me from a correspondent in Winnipeg:

Dear Mr. Knowles,

Please do your best to keep controls on the rents. There will be a lot of us widows on the street if the control is taken off.

Then there is a compliment to me about something else, which I need not read.

Some hon. Members: Read it.

Mr. Knowles: Well, since my friends in all parties are asking for it, all right:

You did wonderful work for our pensions. Please help us now. Wishing you luck in the coming election . . .

Since you wanted the whole letter I have given it to you.

Some hon. Members: Whom is it from?

Mr. Knowles: It is not necessary to give the name.

Some hon. Members: Yes, it is.

Mr. Knowles: It is not necessary to give the name of the writer of the letter. I am not going to make public the name of a widow who is receiving a small allowance, and who is afraid now that her rent may be raised. I received this letter in the mail today, and I received as well this document of many pages, in which their lordships say something which makes it possible for the hon. member for Stanstead and others to argue that there is no emergency. I keep receiving letters like this from people telling of the emergency they will face a week from Monday if rent controls go off; so I say we should pass this legislation.

Mr. Pouliot: I do not intend to speak for very long, and I have not read any of the judgments referred to; I have only listened to my hon. and learned friend from Stanstead, who spoke of the judgments that had been given in respect to the emergency powers. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet mentioned the definition of an emergency. It includes an immediate element not imputable only to war, as the hon. member for Stanstead has said, but arising from unforeseen circumstances. The hon. gentleman spoke at great length about the various acts. He is against controls; he considers them a poison, and the action of the courts as the antidote. Well, the more he insists upon it the less dangerous become the controls, because as long as there is an antidote—I mean the courts—to correct the so-called wrong effect of the controls, how can he complain so much about it? That is all I want to ask him.

Mr. Fleming: I think one or two aspects of this subject need to be clarified. There has been a good deal of discussion, but it seems the further it goes the greater is the attempt on the other side to becloud the issue as we on this side have stated it. That issue was stated in crystal-clear terms by my leader on Wednesday last with regard to this subject of emergency. He pointed out the dangers of the course the government is pursuing, dangers which are revived by the reasons assigned by the Minister of Justice in what he has said tonight.

What my leader said, and what others speaking from this part of the house have said, is that with respect to the housing situation in Canada emergent conditions do exist, and that is the source of the relationship of rent control to this question. We have emergent conditions with respect to housing; we have a crisis in housing. But, Mr. Chairman, to justify a measure which will deal with rent and several other subjects that have been mentioned, the government proposes that this parliament go on record as asserting the existence of a national emergency.

See where that leads us. The minister has said that parliament—I think he means this house—by its vote on Wednesday last asserted the existence of a national emergency. I entirely take issue with that statement. All the house did last Wednesday was to pass a motion that on this particular resolution the house should resolve itself into committee of the whole. It still remains for parliament, and even for this house, to say in binding terms that a national emergency exists. I point out to the Minister of Justice that the measure of 1947 did not put parliament on record in specific terms as asserting the existence of a national emergency. That was in 1947, when we were asked to say that a national emergency required the statutory enactment of fifty-seven orders in council.

All that was done in the act of 1947, which is chapter 16, was to make a reference to it in the preamble. Parliament has not yet asserted in categorical terms, and did not assert in 1947, that there was a national emergency.

For the sake of argument, however, let us say that the recital in the preamble is equivalent to such an assertion.

Mr. Garson: How much more categorically could parliament make a statement of the emergency in the act of 1947 than to recite that as the fact upon which the exercise of their jurisdiction was based?

Mr. Fleming: The answer is obvious. Parliament can set out a declaration that the emergency does exist. All parliament did in the preamble to the 1947 act was to say that in view of the continuation of the national emergency, and whereas the national emergency in certain respects is continuing, and so on.

Mr. Garson: And is still continuing.

Mr. Fleming: All right; that is a preamble. Even if we were to accept the contention of the minister that a reference of that kind in the preamble is equivalent to the assertion of the existence of a national emergency, I point out that this was in 1947, and parliament has not yet said anything in 1949 by way of a final declaration on this subject.

That leads me to make a comment on the grounds on which the minister proposes to invite parliament, at some stage or other, to assert the existence of a national emergency. He was invited to indicate the evidence by which he says a national emergency exists of a general character. At the moment we are not arguing whether an emergent condition on a national scale exists with respect to housing. Let us not spend any more time threshing old straw there. The minister is asserting the existence of a national emergency. Mr. Chairman, in his remarks on Tuesday last he put it on the basis, and I read his speech very carefully, first of all of inflation. He says there is inflation arising out of the war just as there is out of every war. Then, his second piece of evidence was the quotation of certain remarks made by members on this side of the house with respect to housing conditions.

What has been said, Mr. Chairman, with respect to housing conditions, shows it is a fact that emergent conditions on a national scale do exist in regard to this matter. That is no ground, however, for the assertion that there is a general national emergency. Look where that leads us. The minister himself, in reply to a question by the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), has said that the existence of this national emergency does create this result, that it does transfer to parliament the power, not simply to do what we are being asked to do in the present resolution, but to do much more. Parliament can then do anything by way of invading the normal jurisdiction of the provinces over property and civil rights.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, that is what it amounts to, because if a national emergency exists then parliament has a right to do anything that is required to meet that national emergency.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? If a national emergency does not exist, in my hon. friend's judgment has this house the right to deal with rental control?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I have already made it clear, following the plain statement of my leader in this house on Wednesday, that an emergency does exist with respect to housing. A measure with respect to rent control is, therefore, one of the steps arising out of that national emergency with respect to housing. It would not, however, be competent for parliament or the minister to say that, since there is a national emergency with respect to housing, that gives parliament the right further to invade the normal jurisdiction of the provinces over property and civil rights.

May I remind the house that the provinces pass most of their statutes in the exercise of their jurisdiction over property and civil rights. It is the main source of jurisdiction in all provincial legislatures. The proposition the Minister of Justice has put before the house tonight is tantamount to this: By reason of the existence of a national emergency there exists in parliament today the right to trespass upon the provincial field of property and civil rights when parliament, by a majority of one if you please, deems necessary. Now, proclaim that broad principle throughout this country. The member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), instead of proclaiming his idle threats and threshing straw that was threshed out in this house three days ago, should go down to his constituency and proclaim the stand of the Minister of Justice in support of the proposition that there exists in this country such a national emergency as vests in the parliament of Canada the right to trespass completely on the provincial field of property and civil rights.

Mr. Lesage: I have just received a challenge, and I will answer it. I will answer the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) by quoting the words of Viscount Haldane. In so doing, I shall be in much better legal company than my friend the member for Eglinton with his imagination.

> Their lordships, therefore, entertain no doubt that however the wording of sections 91 and 92 may have laid down a framework under which, as a general principle, the dominion parliament is to be excluded from trenching on property and civil rights in the provinces of Canada, yet in a sufficiently great emergency such as that arising out of war, there is implied the power to deal adequately with that emergency for the safety of the dominion as a whole.

That is quite different from what the member for Eglinton said.

Mr. Hackett: Is that the Fort Frances case?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, it is the Fort Frances Pulp and Power Company Limited case. Parliament has the power to deal with the emergency. It has to be a national emergency in order that the dominion may invade the field of property and civil rights. The extent of that emergency determines the extent to which the dominion can invade the field of property and civil rights. When the bill comes before the house, the extent to which we may, under the present emergency, invade the field of property and civil rights will be decided by this house. I understand that is the procedure. It seems to me we are wasting a lot of time discussing things that do not matter at this stage.

An hon. Member: We do not know yet what the bill will be.

Mr. Hackett: Will the hon. member permit a question? I think the hon. gentleman will admit that the validity of the legislation must depend upon the emergency being a national emergency.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, definitely, and I contended a few moments ago that there was a national emergency. The lack of housing is felt from Halifax to Vancouver, and that is a national emergency.

Mr. Coté (Matapedia-Matane): I was involved in a debate such as this when this matter was brought before the house on an earlier occasion.

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Coté (Matapedia-Matane): I expressed my views at the time the omnibus bill came before this house. I should like to put myself on record in this session concerning the manner in which this proposal has been brought before the house. I have not changed my mind on the principle involved, but I have changed my mind concerning the procedure. I am glad to see a new Minister of Justice, who is a real Canadian, dealing with these matters. He is not asking us to do this for Britain as the former Minister of Justice did. I would say that, after the 27th of this month—

An hon. Member: Ha, ha.

Mr. Coté (Matapedia-Matane): Do not laugh, my friends, because I would say this to you. If you continue your filibuster, you will have to take the responsibility if these emergency powers lapse. I know what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), "gorgeous George", said in Ontario last June, "Make Ontario Strong," and what Duplessis said in July, "Make a country of our province." If hon. members opposite go back to their ridings and say they would like to Balkanize this country instead of doing what we propose to do, namely, to make this country just as big and strong as the United States, I would say that some of them will never show up again.

When we come to this matter of emergency powers, I would say that, if the Tory party wishes to take the responsibility of filibustering this emergency power legislation out of existence, thus bringing about the possibility of tenants—who constitute seventy-seven per cent of the people in Canada in the large cities—being thrown into the streets or with the prospect maybe of having an increase of two hundred or three hundred per cent in their rent, that is their responsibility. But I do not think it is a proper thing for the government to swing an election on this item. It would be the responsibility of the Tory party if all the tenants in this country were put on the sidewalks unless they accepted an increase of two hundred or three hundred per cent in their rents.

Then there is the question of margarine in certain places. We have these emergency powers to do certain things about agriculture. If the Tory party wishes to take the responsibility for increasing the price of butter and doing away with subsidies I would say, all right. I think it is about time that the Tory party showed its colours.

The new leader of the opposition conducted a sort of campaign against which I participated with the leader of the Liberal party in Ontario.

An hon. Member: The Grit campaign.

Mr. Coté (Matapedia-Matane): Yes, the Grit campaign; and I am not ashamed of it because it is the greatest thing a Canadian can do now.

Since the leader of the opposition has been here, he has been asking for provincial rights. I should like to know why this man, with all his ostentation, has admitted that he would step down from being premier of a province to become leader of the opposition at Ottawa; because if the provinces are on the top, why should he come down here?

Mr. Ferguson: You will find out in a month or two.

Mr. Coté (Matapedia-Matane): If these emergency powers do not go through by March 27 by reason of the filibuster of the opposition, they will have to take the responsibility; the Tory party will have to take the responsibility. The Tory party will have put on the sidewalks all the beds of the tenants, who will have no more consideration because Ottawa will no longer protect them. Neither will Mr. Duplessis nor Mr. Kennedy any longer protect the small people. I say to hon. members opposite, if they want that, let them go to the people of Canada and say: What do you think? If we cannot go through with these emergency powers on account of the filibustering of the Tory organization, it is about time that this House of Commons was dissolved. We are in a position to say, "gentlemen, we are not afraid".

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have been up on my feet several times trying to catch the eye of the Chairman. I am glad I have it because it gives me a chance to say briefly that this debate seems to me to be a tremendous waste of time. All that we see happening is the same old shadow-boxing. Any member who cares to go back to the 1935 debates, when the Tories were in power, will find that they were putting up the same arguments then as the Liberals are putting up now and that the Liberals are putting up now the same arguments which the Tories were putting up then. There is very little reality in this entire debate.

As far as the Tories are concerned, their motto should be autre temps, autre moeurs, because I have here on page 4186 of Hansard of 1935 a statement by my friend the hon. member for Stanstead. A little while ago I think he said that the only emergency which really could arise was when the enemy was at the gate. He has changed his mind radically since 1935, for then he was of opinion that when the world was in a state of dislocation it might conceivably cause a national emergency. I do not like to be unfair to him but I shall quote him here when he was answering Mr. Rinfret, who was then the member for St. James. The member for St. James objected to the artificial methods which were being used by the Tory government, and the now hon. member for Stanstead said in part—and I am trying to be completely fair in this quotation—as follows:

> . . . but I believe the hon. member will admit that the whole world is in a state of dislocation.

The hon. member for Stanstead was then defending the Natural Products Marketing Act which the Liberals were attacking, of course, most savagely. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

> There come times in the health of the individual as in that of a nation, when it is necessary that he have recourse to extraordinary means. Stimulants in times of crises are admitted by all to be not only wise but necessary.

Perhaps the hon. gentleman will admit that this is a time of crisis. Perhaps he will admit there is some international dislocation today and that therefore these measures we have in front of us, poor and attenuated as they may be, may within limits be wise and are certainly necessary. Then he went on later to say:

> It has been necessary to resort during a period of disequilibrium to extraordinary methods.

That to some extent is precisely what is happening today, and I hope he will ask his colleagues to refer to those words which he spoke in 1935 and let us get on with the business of the house.

Mr. Ferguson: We have been listening to a battery of legal experts on this question. They have been exceedingly interesting. The hon. member for Stanstead made one of the greatest addresses on this subject that we have heard in this house for some time. He pointed out very strongly that this parliament should pass many of its final decisions by guidance of the judiciary of this country. When I was a little boy my father used to say to me: "We have an appointed judiciary which is far superior to the courts of the United States, where many of them are elected." From time to time we hear people remarking that our courts are for the rich and not for the poor. It little behooves this government to set any example by not seriously considering the decisions of the Canadian courts, particularly the courts of appeal, when a court of appeal holds that there is no state of emergency.

Mr. Garson: They all did not hold that.

Mr. Ferguson: Not as a member of parliament, but as a member of this house, and a representative of the people as well as the members of the legal profession, the labouring man, the grocer, the merchant or people of any other walk of life, I say that before we put a steam roller through the laws of this country, or a rubber stamp on those laws, simply because we belong to a party, we should reflect on what we do. As members of parliament and representatives of the people, we should reflect on the fact that an appeal court of Canada, comprised of men of substance and men whom we all hold in the highest regard, have stated that in their opinion there is no state of emergency. Let us not for one moment say that because we are the parliament of Canada we have a right over all the people, including appeal courts.

So far as getting on with the business of this country is concerned, let me say to the members of the C.C.F. party, who say that we have been holding a filibuster, that as long as I am in this House of Commons and I have an opinion I will voice it on behalf of the people whom I represent. Irrespective of flippant laughter I shall argue whether or not legislation going through the House of Commons is beneficial to all. At no time shall I try to stir up one class of people against another, as they do. I shall fight for the workingman, but I shall also fight for the other classes in this country. It is pretty near time they did a little of that instead of trying to antagonize and advocate class legislation as they do on almost every occasion when they rise to their feet in this House of Commons. They say that the poor workingman is going to be on the street because he cannot pay more rent. What about the landlord who owns a $10,000 house and is not getting more than $12 a month for it? Let us be a little fair about this question. There is no national emergency. The C.C.F. know that, but they want this parliament to rule as they rule in Russia. That is the true story. I hope I never bring my mentality to the low ebb that they do.

Mr. Jaenicke: I do not propose to follow the speaker who has just taken his seat. There seems to be an accepted opinion in this house that a national emergency is the only reason why this parliament can legislate in such a way as to encroach upon section 92 of the British North America Act. I do not agree with that. A national emergency may be one reason; but according to the decision of the privy council in the Canada Temperance Act case, this parliament has also power to legislate upon any matter which, as the court says, by its inherent nature is of national importance, even though the matter legislated upon may touch upon the subjects contained in section 92 of the British North America Act. I think that is the situation here at least with some of these controls that we have under consideration.

There is the matter of price controls. I maintain that this parliament has power to legislate upon price control, whether there is an emergency or not. I think we agreed with that, and I think the hon. member for Stanstead a few moments ago agreed that we in Canada have power to legislate upon anything we want to. However, our legislative powers are divided between the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. Hackett: Within the constitution.

Mr. Jaenicke: Yes, that is right. Either we in this parliament, or the provincial legislatures, have power to legislate on price control. I do not think there is any doubt about that. Then evidence would be brought forward as to whether or not price control is a matter of provincial concern or national concern. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that price control would be a matter of national concern because price control is unthinkable within the provinces themselves. Price control can only be enforced in an economic entity, and the whole of Canada, all the nine provinces, and ten after a week or so, are the economic entity. It is only within that economic entity that price control can be enforced. Therefore this parliament would have power to legislate upon it. Let me give an example. Recently, the supreme court held that the dairy act was ultra vires. With great respect to the majority of that court, I think the decision is wrong in law, and I think the chief justice was right in his decision, because later developments have proved it. If the decision were made now perhaps it would be made the other way.

The dairy act was enacted in order to give protection to the dairy farmers. It was a matter of price control, was it not? It was held to be ultra vires. The province of Quebec has now passed a similar law, and a very strict law I understand, in order to protect the dairy farmers of Quebec, in order to protect the price of butter in Quebec. Did it have that effect? No. The price of butter has gone down in Montreal, just as it has in Toronto and in Ottawa. Therefore, there is plain proof that the matter of price control of dairy products, the matter of price control of any other products, must rest within this dominion because the dominion as a whole is an economic entity. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that as far as the law is concerned the Minister of Justice does not need to worry. I agree with him that this bill is clearly within the jurisdiction of this parliament.

Mr. Fleming: There is another question on which the house will wish to have some further information. The legislation of itself does not and cannot validly create a national emergency. The committee must be concerned as well about what steps are being taken to deal with the conditions which the government asserts constitute the condition of national emergency. I do not think enough time has been spent in this debate considering that aspect of the matter.

As things now stand the government is quite prepared to ask parliament for the vesting of these special and extraordinary powers, which normally repose in the provinces, so long as any case can be made out, to satisfy the majority across the way who support the government, that a national emergency exists.

It has been very hard to get out of the government any clear definition of what these national conditions are which constitute a national emergency. I mentioned earlier that we got from the Minister of Justice just two indications; one was inflation and the other was a shortage of houses. It is quite clear that we have inflation; it is equally clear that we have a grave shortage of housing. We apparently differ as to the powers that arise in that event. But I should like to know now, Mr. Chairman, just what the government is going to do to try to cure these conditions.

Let us concern ourselves for the moment with the conditions. Tonight we have had a legal argument. I should like the government now to make quite clear what it is going to do to bring to an end the national emergency which they say exists with respect to inflation and housing. It may be opportune to give the Minister of Justice a little rest for a while this evening, and to invite the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to give the house some enlightenment with regard to this problem. It is obvious that housing conditions have entered largely into the thinking of the government—certainly they have entered largely into the reasons they have put forward tonight in arguing for the existence of a national emergency.

Will the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply give an indication to the house as to how far the government considers the emergency in housing extends today? We know that the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation said not long ago that there was an emergent shortage today to the extent of 150,000 houses. That was the purely emergent shortage. I want to know what the government is going to do with regard to that emergent shortage, whether when the 150,000 houses are built the emergency will be ended, and—

Mr. Garson: I rise to a point of order. We are considering a resolution preceding a bill to continue certain controls which for some years now have been on the statute books. What is concerned now is the administration of these controls and not, I suggest, any of the matters to which the hon. member has been referring.

Mr. Fleming: I cannot imagine anything more far-fetched than the minister's argument. Surely the only valid argument that can be put forward in support of maintaining rent control is that there is a shortage of housing, one which has reached critical, emergent and national proportions.

I want to know, and I think every member in the house wants to know, how long the emergency will be permitted to extend. Surely we are not going to be content simply to let the emergent condition continue, and to say that because of the existence of an emergent condition we will vest special powers in the government, or government boards. Surely it is the duty of every intelligent member of the House of Commons to seek to eliminate those conditions of shortage, and the condition of inflation. Surely that is our principal responsibility.

Before I am called upon on second reading of the bill to subscribe to giving the government special powers, I want to know what the government are going to do to cure and to eliminate the condition which they say has given rise to the existence of a condition of national emergency with respect to housing.

The Chairman: On the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice, I am of the opinion that the hon. member could ask the government how long they think the emergency is likely to last. But at this time to raise the question as to what the government is going to do about these emergencies is, I think, beyond the powers of this committee. If that were done the government would have to give its plan with respect to housing, and whatever else may come up. The question of housing comes within another department entirely.

Mr. Fleming: Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of departments, simply because the Minister of Justice has introduced this bill. Surely to goodness the whole basis of the continuance of rental control is the shortage of housing. You say it is proper to discuss the question as to how long the national emergency will continue? Very well; I am very much interested in the question as to how long the national emergency will continue. I think it is perfectly fair to ask what we are doing and what we are going to do to try to speed up the elimination of the emergency. What are we going to do? What is the government going to do? What is it going to ask parliament to do with a view to shortening the time during which the emergent condition will be permitted to continue to prevail in Canada? That is a matter of prime importance, when we are in committee of the whole on a measure of this kind.

Mr. Garson: Speaking to the point of order —which I presume my hon. friend has been speaking to; otherwise he would be out of order—may I say it is one thing to allege a national emergency as the foundation for jurisdiction to pass this bill, as we are doing here, and it is another thing to take steps to cure it. When the bill comes down and the terms of it are seen, the period of time during which we are seeking these controls will be apparent. But surely, sir, we should not, certainly not at this stage, discuss the matter of housing, steel, poultry, butter, lettuce or citrus fruits—because, if we do, we will be here until Christmas.

What this measure is concerned with is the continuance, for a further period as yet undetermined but which will be disclosed when the bill is brought down, of the controls which we have had for the past several years. All of these matters to which the hon. member has referred might properly be the topic of discussion when departmental estimates are being considered. But certainly they are not properly discussed on the present occasion.

Mr. Hackett: I think the minister will admit—

Mr. Williams: Can anyone else, except a Tory, have a go in this House of Commons?

Mr. Hackett: I think the hon. member will admit—

Mr. Williams: Who has the floor?

The Chairman: I understand the hon. member for Stanstead is about to speak to the point of order.

Mr. Hackett: No, I was not.

The Chairman: Then I would rule that the matter of going into the question of the general policy of housing, and all the details with respect to housing, and the Central Mortgage Corporation, would not be in order at this time.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, there has been a complete misapprehension of what I was trying to do. I was not going into details with respect to the administration of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I did mention a statement by the chairman of that corporation in which he indicated the extent of the emergency which exists in housing in Canada today.

Now the minister says that when the bill comes down we will know exactly the period during which the government is asking for continuance of control. We have been told that already, with respect to rent control. They want to continue it for a year. But that is not an answer to my question. If it is said that there is a national emergency today, then I want to know what the government is doing to cure it. What is the government doing with respect to this question of emergent conditions, and critical conditions with respect to housing?

Mr. Howe: Order.

Mr. Fleming: I want to know if it is going to go on for a year. I want to know what is going to happen after that. It is perfectly proper to ask how long the emergency will last, and I am asking that question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: "Order" —what do you mean?

Mr. Howe: The Chairman has given his ruling.

Mr. Fleming: You said earlier, Mr. Chairman, it was perfectly proper to ask how long the emergency was going to last.

Mr. Gardiner: You will find it in the bill.

Mr. Fleming: I want the government to say how long the emergency will last. I am asking them, further, to tell the committee what they are doing to shorten that period of time.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member has asked the government to say how long the emergency will last. We are legislators; we are not prophets. There is an emergency, and this is one of the means of dealing with it. I submit, as I did before, that all my hon. friend's remarks at the present time are out of order; and I would ask for a ruling to that effect.

The Chairman: I would rule that the hon. member was in order when he asked the government how long the emergency would last. Whether or not the government can answer it, or desire to answer it, is another question. I would also rule that the question as to the details of what the government is doing in respect of the emergency is not in order at this time.

Mr. Fleming: I am content to leave it, Mr. Chairman, as the Minister of Justice has put it—if that is his answer—because he has said he is not prepared to hazard any conjecture whatsoever, or to give any statement to the house as to how long this emergency will last. As to my second question, which was what the government was doing about it, the minister's answer is nil. I am quite prepared to agree with that answer, that the government is doing nothing about it.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend knows quite well when he makes that statement that it is not a correct one because I have never said that we were doing nothing. What I did say was that my hon. friend's question was out of order.

Mr. Fleming: If the government have anything to say as to just what they are doing or propose to do to eliminate or shorten this period of emergency, let them say so now. If they have nothing to say, I say to them that they are doing nothing about these emergency conditions.

Mr. Williams: I have sat here all this week and listened to a torrent of words about nothing. I am about sick of all this stalling and fooling around.

An hon. Member: By whom?

Mr. Williams: Somebody across the way asks "by whom"? I do not think there is any doubt as to who is doing the fooling and the stalling. During this week some forty hon. members have spoken on these particular questions, and thirty of them have been Tories. I do not think there is any doubt as to who is doing the stalling.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: We are the only ones who are doing any work in the house.

Mr. Williams: I can understand why the members of the opposition applaud, because they are doing a most successful job of holding up the business of the house. That is just what they want to do. There has been a lot of talk about a national emergency and then somebody else would come along and split hairs about a specific emergency. If hon. members would listen even to what their own members are saying they would not stand up and make such—is it parliamentary to say "fools of themselves", Mr. Chairman?

An hon. Member: Yes.

The Chairman: Of course that is not parliamentary.

Mr. Williams: I was not quite sure, so I gladly withdraw the remark.

An hon. Member: Let it stay.

Mr. Williams: If it is not parliamentary, I am willing to withdraw it, but even here the members of the opposition want to rule differently. I am ready to obey you and withdraw it if necessary, but members of the opposition do not want that. They want it left on the record. They cannot please two groups even though they talk in that way. They like to make out that they are representing the ordinary people of this country, but you cannot serve God and mammon. Is there an emergency?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Let us have your contribution.

Mr. Williams: I am going to quote from the contributions by their own speakers in the debate.

Mr. Lennard: Now who is filibustering?

Mr. Williams: Is not that senseless, to say that I am filibustering? This is the first time I have spoken this week and I have been on my feet only about four minutes.

Mr. Lennard: Say something then.

Mr. MacInnis: Why should he? The hon. member did not.

Mr. Williams: It is difficult to say anything after having listened so long to so little, in fact to nothing. There is a tendency to follow the same habits.

Mr. Murphy: If you cannot read it, spell it.

Mr. Williams: Is there an emergency? Let us listen to the words of the hon. member for Davenport uttered on March 14 and reported on page 1463 of Hansard. I quote:

> Now I want to say a word about our own mayor of Toronto, who has done a good job and wants to help all he can. I am sure if the minister made contact with him he would find that Mayor Hiram McCallum would be happy to help in any way possible. He is in despair today because he is right up against it. I used to go home every week end, but now I can only stand to go home every three weeks. When I get home there is too much pressure of all sorts, especially in connection with housing.

The Chairman: Do I understand that the hon. member is reading from another debate?

Mr. Knowles: This debate.

Mr. Coldwell: When the Speaker was in the chair.

The Chairman: If it was during the present debate, it is in order.

An hon. Member: Go on.

Mr. Knowles: Does it not sound relevant?

The Chairman: The hon. member should continue.

Mr. Timmins: These remarks were made yesterday when we were dealing with another matter.

An hon. Member: Go on.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member quoting from the debate of yesterday?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Williams: They know that I am not.

An hon. Member: Proceed.

An hon. Member: Do not listen to them.

Mr. Williams: The hon. member for Davenport went on to say:

> I am too soft-hearted; I cannot stand the tears of the women when they ask me to help them out.

The hon. member then went on to quote the Toronto Evening Telegram. Here is an hon. member who is so disturbed about housing that, in his own words, he does not like to go home as frequently as perhaps he should because of the pressure that is put on him. And the hon. member for Eglinton asks if there is a national emergency. If that is not sufficient, perhaps I should read from the statement of the hon. member for Rosedale, as reported on page 1535 of Hansard. I quote:

> The reason that we have this housing shortage, in this peculiarly acute form, is that hundreds of thousands of our young men were overseas at a time when they might have been acquiring some sort of a house in this country. When they came back no houses were available. They had all been taken by people who had moved into the cities, or by the natural growth of the population. There were no houses for them, and we have not yet begun to fill up that gap; therefore we have a national emergency—

Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hazen: Finish the sentence.

Mr. Williams: The concluding words are:

> —arising out of the war, and it is housing.

That is the complete sentence. The hon. member for Rosedale says we have a national emergency arising out of the war, and it is in connection with housing. Then the hon. member for Eglinton gets up and asks, is there a national emergency? Why don't they get together and decide what they are going to say in the house? Actually they are not in the house just now to promote the well-being of any particular section except one which they particularly like to represent, namely big interests; and they are determined to put every obstacle in the way of all other hon. members trying to do business. Even after all their filibustering—

Mr. Jackman: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, of which I think you are as well aware as I am. I believe the hon. gentleman made some reference to the fact that the hon. member for Eglinton and myself were interested in protecting certain specific interests, which was a reflection upon us. Would you kindly ask him to withdraw the remark?

The Chairman: I understood the hon. member for Ontario to refer to hon. members generally in that part of the house. I do not think he referred to anyone specifically.

Mr. Jackman: Yes, he did.

Mr. Williams: I quoted from Hansard what was said in this house by the hon. member for Eglinton and his colleague the hon. member for Rosedale. My concluding remark was to the effect that these Tories in the house—not any particular two or one—should get together and decide what they want to say.

Mr. Jackman: There is no question at all about what the hon. gentleman said. He stated that my colleague and myself represented only big interests, I think the term was, or something like that. He was very specific in regard to the two members and also in regard to the interests they represent. I would ask you to request him to withdraw the remark.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Ontario has stated definitely that he did not say what has been alleged by the hon. member for Rosedale. His last remark was that his statement applied to a certain party in the house; and I am not asking him to withdraw.

Mr. Jackman: In that case we will have to let it go until tomorrow, when Hansard will be available; but my recollection is very clear.

Mr. Hackett: Mr. Chairman, we have had some question—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: I understood the hon. member for Ontario had concluded his remarks.

Mr. Williams: No, not quite.

Mr. Fleming: Carry on the filibuster a while longer.

Mr. Williams: The only other observation I want to make in this debate is that I am as interested as any hon. member of this house in finding out what the bill contains. I am not prepared to indulge in a lot of shadow-boxing at this stage. All that is asked in the resolution now before us is that we permit the introduction of that bill. When we come to second reading, if things are not in it that we think should be in it or things are in it that we think should not be there, I believe that is the appropriate time to really criticize. But until we have the bill before us we are simply flogging a dead horse in carrying on this debate, which is precisely what my hon. friends to my right have been doing all week. Though we have only another hour to sit this week I do hope we may conduct ourselves as the people of the country expect this parliament to be conducted, and permit the bill to be introduced.

Mr. Hackett: I do not think the Minister of Justice questions the fact that we are dealing with a matter which affects the constitution. He has stated in clear terms that the validity of the legislation to be founded upon this resolution depends upon the existence of an emergency. Here may I say that I was not speaking about an emergency in the interesting passage read to the committee a short time ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. He read from a speech I made in this house some years ago, when possibly my hair was more abundant and possibly not quite as white as it is today. As the record shows, I was talking about the Natural Products Marketing Act, which was based not upon an emergency but, as the minister well knows, upon concurrent legislation in all the provinces, and upon the theory that this legislation of the nine provinces empowered this parliament to enact legislation it might not otherwise enact. On that issue, which was as remote from the question of an emergency as a camp meeting is from a beer garden, I expressed certain views, not one word of which I desire to retract at this time. What I said had no bearing upon the question of an emergency. As a distinguished member of the legal profession, Mr. Chairman, you will recollect that this matter of the constitutionality of the Natural Products Marketing Act went first to the Supreme Court of Canada and then to the privy council. There the legislation was held to be unfounded, not because there was no emergency—because emergency was not invoked as its basis—but because the provinces had not the power to enact legislation giving jurisdiction to this parliament.

I think it well to bring these matters to the attention of the committee, and even to the attention of the hon. member for Ontario. May I remind him that we have a constitution. We pride ourselves upon respecting it. We know that our liberties and the very essence of our well-being depend upon respect for the constitution. If there be no emergency, as the Minister of Justice admits, this parliament has no competency to pass the anticipated legislation.

Now I want to say just one word about the attitude of hon. gentlemen to my left and across the way who are sometimes pleased to call us Tories. What people are called does not matter very much. If the name be disrespectful, it may reflect upon the upbringing and good taste of them who use the language; but I have no complaint on that score. This is a serious question which goes to the very wellsprings of our national existence. If it be competent to this parliament to enact legislation of this kind in the absence of a national emergency, then Canada ceases to be a confederation and becomes a unitary state. I think we will all concede that the provinces would not have come into confederation, we would not have come into existence as a nation, otherwise than on the basis of confederation, with distinct rights, privileges and powers reserved to the separate entities, the provinces, that went to make it up. I hope I can discuss this matter quite dispassionately. I am willing to assume that every hon. gentleman in this house is interested in arriving at a conclusion which will respect the constitution.

There are a number of gentlemen on this side of the house, some of whom have spent a life that is beginning to be long, in the pursuit of the law. They are not infallible; but some people think they know something about their profession. They are putting forward a point of view that the Minister of Justice, although opposed to it, does not consider either futile or time-wasting. I think we shall make better progress and arrive at a saner and safer conclusion if gentlemen are permitted to express their views amid that attention which is characteristic of a deliberative legislative body.

The question is one of major importance. To style this discussion a waste of time is an expression of petulance or possibly, if one wished to be extremely kind, is a failure to understand all that is at issue. There has been criticism of those who have but put forward a point of view which has found repeated expression in the courts. Some people talk very lightly of the courts. Under the Canadian system of government, which is the system of the rule of law, Canadians depend upon the courts as the final arbiter, as the great check upon the legislative and administrative branches of government. The case in which the legislation was enacted, on which I was speaking when I uttered the passage quoted by the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), referred in no way to a national emergency. Consequently, the passage that he read has no bearing upon this present issue. I have asked the hon. minister to point to those conditions which create the national emergency which will justify the legislation.

The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) has discussed the question in a very interesting way. Nevertheless, all of the judges of the court of appeal of Manitoba arrived at a unanimous decision that the law based upon an emergency was defective for lack of power. It is quite true that at least one of them did not find it necessary to pass upon the question of an emergency because the law was found invalid for other reasons. Nevertheless, it was not said that there was no emergency. At least two of the judges found in terms most categorical that there was no national emergency. We have the finding of the trial judge and we have the unanimous finding of the court of appeal confirming that judgment, with at least two, if not three, of the members of that bench finding that there was no emergency. That being the case, it seems to me—

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question?

Mr. Hackett: Certainly.

Mr. Gardiner: Would my hon. friend agree that there was no feed grain emergency in the area of the province of Quebec from which he comes or in the province of Ontario in 1946?

Mr. Hackett: I am stating that there was no national emergency. We find, Mr. Chairman, that there crop up every now and then difficulties in the life of a nation, as there are difficulties in the life of an individual; but we are asked—

Mr. Mitchell: Could I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Hackett: Just a moment. We are now asked to suspend the constitution. The constitution is the agreement under which the provinces came together and under which we undertook to work out our difficulties and destiny; under which we undertook to colonize, civilize and redeem from the wilderness the vast areas of the northern sectors of this continent. I submit that a local difficulty is not sufficient to suspend that agreement—not sufficient to suspend the operation of the constitution.

Now, my friend may ask his question, and I thank him for waiting.

Mr. Mitchell: My friend has given a very learned dissertation on the constitution. I want to ask him this simple question—one of the questioners requested a prophecy and I believe the Minister of Justice said he was not a prophet—

Mr. Fleming: It was the Minister of Agriculture who said that.

Mr. Mitchell: Just you keep quiet. I want to say this to my hon. friend. If wind could solve problems, there would not be any problems at all. I should like to ask this very simple question: Does the hon. member not think there would be an emergency if rent control fell by the wayside at the end of this month?

Mr. Hackett: If my hon. friend asks for a personal opinion, I am willing to give it, but I say that at the present time that is not the question before us.

Some hon. Members: What is the question?

Mr. Hackett: If we are asked to declare that there is a national emergency which warrants the suspension of the constitution, my opinion for what it is worth, based upon such examination as I have been able to make of the facts and of the case law, is that there is not such an emergency.

Mr. Mitchell: I should like to tell the hon. member that this government is charged with the safety of the state. No doubt my learned friend is in the very fortunate position of owning a home and all the things necessary to make that home possible. I think he will agree with me that he would shudder to think what would happen in his home city of Montreal if rent control fell by the wayside. This is a practical problem and, in my judgment in simple English, it is a grave emergency facing this country.

Mr. Hackett: The hon. gentleman has put his question fairly. My answer is this. If he feels there is something of such a nature so definite and dire that it requires the suspension of the constitution, then let him introduce an act setting forth the situation and we will weigh it carefully and deal with it in consequence. It could then be debated here. Instead of that the government is offering an omnibus bill empowering it to carry on under arbitrary powers with a suspended constitution. It is attempting to perpetuate a type of administration which is a denial of the constitution and a denial of all the rights that are reserved both to individuals and to provinces.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if the hon. gentleman will permit a question?

Mr. Hackett: Certainly.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. member agree with his own leader that the judgment in the Manitoba case to which he has been referring does not go so far as to declare that the transitional powers act is ultra vires?

Mr. Hackett: I do not think that judgment had to go as far as that. I am suggesting here that the judgment said, among other things, that there was no power under the emergency transitional powers act to pass a certain order in council which permitted the government to take over Nolan's grain. That is the holding of the court. The court furthermore held that, there being no emergency, there was no power in the government to do what it had done. I am not at the moment going to argue, and I am not obliged to argue, that the act itself is invalid. But the order in council was invalid. I reiterate this suggestion. If hon. gentlemen feel that there is a certain condition which requires remedial legislation, let us deal with that situation. But do not ask us to pass an act which empowers the federal cabinet to occupy the whole field of legislation without regard to provincial and civil rights.

Mr. Hansell: I too am one of those members who have sat in the house for some considerable time listening to this debate.

Mr. Knowles: How are your knees?

Mr. Hansell: With these Senate documents under my desk, my knees get sore. Before I say what I intend to say, I want to set the minds of hon. members at rest with respect to the way in which I shall vote. I intend to vote for the measure, because I do not oppose the measure itself at this particular time of the country's history. I rise, however, in protest against those who are expressing themselves as desirous of getting on with the business of this house. That statement may sound rather paradoxical. I listened to one gentleman on the government side of the house tonight while he spent ten or fifteen minutes talking about a filibuster. I heard another gentleman on this side of the house quote from Hansard; and he was obliged to brush the dust from its pages when he turned away back so many years to pit the Tories against the Liberals and the Liberals against the Tories. I heard another gentleman who followed him give quite a dissertation, the theme of which was: let us get on with the business of the house. I suggest that the person who makes the remark "let us get on with the business of the house" is always in favour of the motion.

What is the business of the house? It is just as much the business of this house to prevent legislation from going through as it is to put it through. If a member or a party is vigorously and conscientiously opposed to a measure, and likewise if the government is as vigorous and conscientious in its desire for a measure to be passed, will you please tell me what conceivable method there is at the disposal of those who oppose the measure to prevent it from being passed? What conceivable method is there? I am not surprised at filibusters. Perhaps we should have more of them. I say that it is perfectly within the right of members of parliament to talk to their hearts' content on any measure that comes before us. I say that members of parliament are elected to this House of Commons to talk. There are only two things you can do when you sit in the chamber. You can either talk or keep silent. That is all there is to do. If you were not sent here to talk, what on earth were you sent here to do?

An hon. Member: Listen.

Mr. Hansell: I would say this to hon. members. Just go back to your constituencies, bid for the votes of your people, tell them, "If you vote for me I will go into the House of Commons; I will sit in my chair and I will never say a word." Tell them that, and see how far you will get.

With that in mind I simply say this. Every member in this house has a right to unburden his soul with respect to any measure that places a burden on it. Having said that, I am prepared to vote right now. But if anybody wants to talk, I am not prepared to say that he should not do so.

Mr. MacInnis: For the last little while the debate, in my opinion, has not had much to do with the subject matter which is before us; and I hope that you will pardon me, Mr. Chairman, if I just continue in that strain for a moment. I do not agree with the hon. member for Macleod that members are sent to this house just to talk. Members are sent to this house to express their views on certain questions—as a matter of fact, on any question that may arise. But after they have presented their views, in my opinion they should not undertake to present the same views half a dozen times. The house has heard them once. We are sent here to enact legislation which may be beneficial to the people who sent us here. We may differ as to what the legislation is. When I rose to speak I was going to say that there is no man in this house to whom I like to listen more than I do to the hon. member for Stanstead. He was out of the chamber when I rose to speak, but I see that he is back now. I like to listen to his reasoned statements, whether I can agree with them or not.

I do not agree with what he said tonight that this is merely a matter of law. The law is important, but there can be no law until this parliament acts first. This parliament must pass the law. Then if some person is not satisfied with it, he can take it to the courts, and the courts will deal with it. But if this parliament is prevented from doing anything—and it very well may be prevented —there will be no use going to the courts after March 27 to find out if rent control is legal or illegal, because there will be no rent control. That is the question with which we are confronted at the moment.

Let me put it this way. The House of Commons is composed of a government and an opposition. The government, because it has the majority, is charged with the administration of the affairs of this country. That being the case, we have no right as an opposition, after we have stated our case, to prevent the government from doing what it considers right to do. We have a right to present our case as vigorously as we can. Then we should leave the matter to a vote of the house. But we have no moral right, in my opinion, to stand up here day after day and hold up the work that we were sent here to do for the people of Canada. We often in this house refer to the mother of parliaments. If this bill came before the house at Westminster, so many days would be allotted to debating it. After that was over, a vote would be taken.

I maintain that in a certain traditional and legal sense the opposition has the right to hold up the business of the house as long as we are foolish enough to hold it up. But in the rules of the house there is a provision to shut off debate. In the nineteen years I have been here I have never seen it invoked except on one occasion. The reason for that is that governments do not want to be put in the position where they have to choke off debate. However, a time will come when one of two things must be done. Either the government will have to apply closure or it will have to allow its legislation to lapse because it cannot get it through the house. If that is what my hon. friends want, it is their business of course, and they can settle it with the country.

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. Hackett: On division.

The Chairman: At this time I should like to make a statement with respect to the discussion that took place earlier today. I have looked into the question of quoting Senate debates on the floor of the House of Commons and I am now prepared to make a statement.

It is forbidden in the United Kingdom parliament to refer to debates in the House of Lords, which in turn does not allow reference to the debates of the House of Commons. We have no standing order on this rule of debate but the decisions of our Speakers and Deputy Speakers are unanimous in accepting the practice followed in the United Kingdom. The main object of this practice seems to be to prevent members of one house from answering members of the other house, thus bringing about a joint debate between the Senate and the House of Commons.

Is the rule so rigid that it prevents members from quoting under any circumstances extracts from debates which took place in the distant past or does it apply only to speeches recently delivered in the Senate? A reasonable view has to be taken in this matter. Our authorities make no distinction between the dates on which the speeches were delivered, but in the United Kingdom the rule applies only to recent speeches. On December 16, 1902, when Sir William Harcourt attempted to quote a speech delivered by a minister in the House of Lords, he was stopped by Mr. Speaker Court-Gully, who said:

> Order, order! The right honourable gentleman began by saying he would read a speech made in the House of Lords. I must remind him that it is not in order to quote from recent debates in the house. I have no doubt that the right honourable gentleman will be able to state what he understands to be the views of the government as expressed in the House of Lords without quoting the speeches.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

I suggest that we ought to follow the same practice as at Westminster.

The great difficulty is to decide what may be called a recent debate in the Senate. As to the current session there can be no doubt; but how far back must a speech have been delivered for it to be considered old enough to be allowed to be quoted in the House of Commons? This ought to be decided according to circumstances.

If the House of Commons is considering a measure passed in the Senate a few years ago and likely to come up again during the current session, it seems to me that, in such a case, if members of this house quoted the debates of the Senate, they might start an unpleasant controversy between the two houses. But I see no reason to debar members from quoting parts of speeches delivered in the Senate many years ago on questions which do not then call for an immediate decision of the house. What we want to avoid is a discussion between the two houses of parliament. There is nothing better calculated to bring a conflict between the Senate and the Commons than having members of the one attacking the members of the other on the floors of their respective chambers.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 86, to amend the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS ACT

EXTENSION OF OPERATION FOR A PERIOD OF ONE YEAR

The house resumed from Friday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Agricultural Products Act to extend the operation of the act for a period of one year.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I believe that when the house adjourned on February 11 I moved the adjournment of the debate. May I express sympathy to the long-suffering members who throughout the hours of today have been enriched by learned legal arguments and who now will have to adjust their mentality to the language of the representative of a rural constituency. I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will join me when I say that in our language we shall avoid all legal discussion.

When the house adjourned on February 11, I was questioning the advantages and the desirability of continuing this particular form of legislation, because it had brought such difficulties to the poultry farmers of British Columbia. The preamble of the act which we are asked to consent to continue refers to the grave distress which exists in certain countries of the world, foreign countries and commonwealth countries, because of the inadequate supplies of food. I suggest now that if there is any grave distress it exists not so much in foreign countries as amongst the poultry farmers of British Columbia, and if there are any inadequate supplies of food, those inadequate supplies are felt by the flocks owing to the high cost of feed grain which has to be brought into British Columbia.

In concluding my remarks on February 11 I pointed out that the profit accruing from a year's operations with one hen was somewhere in the neighbourhood of seventy cents after all costs of food had been paid, and that that seventy cents had to cover such items as labour, interest and the upkeep of the equipment.

One man can look after somewhere between 1,600 and 1,800 fowls. Therefore it will be seen that there is only a comparatively small profit which can be made during a year by the activities of one man. He has to invest considerable sums of money in order to receive that amount.

As I had previously pointed out, great increases had been made in response to the requests of the government to increase production. It is no use for people to say that we should now reduce egg and poultry production. That does not seem to be fair, after the farmers made such a great effort to meet the wishes of the government during the war years.

I hold in my hand a letter from a co-operative on Vancouver island from which I should like to read one sentence which in my view is pertinent to the remarks I have just made. It states:

> Some have said that we are now producing too many eggs in Canada. That is surely a poor answer to give the poultryman who responded so well to the oft-repeated exhortations of the Department of Agriculture to produce more eggs for shipment to Britain.

To give an indication of how the production of eggs was increased to meet these exhortations of the Department of Agriculture in respect of various poultry products, I should like to place on record some figures. In 1946 Canada shipped 10,296 hundredweight of dressed poultry to Great Britain. In answer to the request from the department in 1947 that was increased to 107,452 hundredweight, an enormous increase.

What happened in 1948? The total amount shipped equalled exactly nine hundredweight. Then one sees much the same curve although perhaps not quite so marked in respect of the production of eggs. In 1946 Canada exported to Great Britain 450,938 hundredweight of eggs, and in 1947 exported 649,793 hundredweight—an increased figure. Then in 1948 there was a drop to 536,738 hundredweight.

But other countries did not follow that same curve; there we see a steady increase. The imports from all other countries in 1946 amounted to 299,093 hundredweight; but in 1948 they had gone up to 520,000 hundredweight. Eggs had gone from 502,148 hundredweight in 1946 to 1,810,000 hundredweight. There we see an enormous increase in the eggs shipped to the United Kingdom from other countries.

Do not let it be said that price made any great difference, and that Britain was not able to pay the price which Canada demanded, or that Canada was getting any particular advantage. In 1947 the price for poultry was $35.74 per hundredweight, while the price for other countries in that year was $48.05, or some $12 higher received in other countries than was received in Canada for the poultry we sent.

In 1948 we had no appreciable exports to the United Kingdom. I believe I said before that they amounted to some nine hundredweight. Other countries however had not kept their price down. Oh no, the price had gone up. It had risen from $48.05 in 1947 to $61.75 per hundredweight. I think that is an indication of how the price had increased.

Where were those imports into the United Kingdom coming from? I said that in 1947 Canada sold the United Kingdom 107,452 hundredweight of poultry at the price of $12.40 less than the United Kingdom was paying other countries. Yet in 1948 we had lost that market completely. We find the imports into the United Kingdom from other countries had increased to the extent of about 300,000 hundredweight.

Reports respecting the United Kingdom exports show the principal countries shipping poultry and eggs to the United Kingdom. I shall name only one of them, Hungary. Hungary shipped in 1948 the amount of 102,577 hundred weight at a value of £2,031,673. Canada had nine hundredweight from which she realized only £93. So that we see there is a very considerable difference.

Changing that into dollars, as accurately as I can, it appears that Canada received $374.79 whereas Hungary received $8,187,642. We have lost the British market for Canadian eggs, and have lost it to Hungary. Hungary has imported certain commodities in exchange for the poultry products she has received. Some of those products are manufactured. The United Kingdom sent to Hungary, in exchange for the poultry products she was receiving, iron and steel manufactures to a value of $596,242. We must remember that Canada has been importing steel manufactured articles from the United States.

Hungary is behind the iron curtain. We do not know the ultimate destination of the goods shipped to that country. We must remember however that Hungary is a member of the Russian economic council of mutual assistance, which is the Russian counterpart of the North Atlantic security pact.

I do not think we can pass this off lightly. I feel we must try to ensure the poultrymen of British Columbia a market for their future production of eggs and poultry products. The fact is that the United Kingdom market was lost because of the policies followed under the legislation we are now being asked to continue for another year. That is why the poultrymen of British Columbia wonder whether this will ensure them a continued market in the future. They remember a few years ago when the officials of the Department of Agriculture came to them and asked them to increase production. They responded loyally.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member because it is getting near to closing time, but a few moments ago he said that we had lost our egg market to Hungary. I think he intended to say our market for poultry products because our egg market in Britain is still forty-six times as high as it was in the year before the war.

Mr. Pearkes: I meant our poultry market; I may have made a slip there. I was pointing out that the poultrymen of British Columbia are questioning whether a continuation of this legislation will give them the security that they need. They feel that this type of legislation leaves everything in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture. They have repeatedly asked that a marketing board be set up upon which those closely in touch with the producer side of things would be largely represented, instead of leaving it all in the hands of some official who is acting as selling agent but who perhaps would not give the same consideration to the maintenance of markets as would be given by those actively engaged in the production of poultry products.

We have heard that the loss of markets is due to the shortage of dollars, but I have heard many farmers on Vancouver island ask whether it is a shortage of dollars or a shortage of foresight. They feel that no one man could possibly take such a broad view of things as would a group of men who were active producers.

Mr. Gardiner: We have a committee of sixteen that advises on these matters, nine members of which are recommended by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. Pearkes: I am simply saying that the feeling is prevalent among the farmers on Vancouver island, even though half of the members of that committee are producers, that they have not authority to control their own marketing. This brings me to a close. I simply wanted to place before the minister the feeling of uncertainty which I know does exist among the poultrymen of Vancouver island. They are perturbed about the loss of markets and the threat which they feel exists to the continuity of their business.

On motion of Mr. Bentley the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Will the Prime Minister indicate the business for Monday?

Mr. St. Laurent: We will proceed with the second reading of the bill to amend the Foreign Exchange Control Act and the bill to extend the emergency powers. We will then return to a discussion of the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture. If we dispose of those three items, the next will be the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Knowles: The foreign exchange control bill will be the first?

Mr. St. Laurent: The present intention is to proceed first with that bill because it was the first one to receive first reading.

At ten-thirty the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on March 14, 1949.

APPENDIX

North Atlantic Treaty Proposed for Signature During the First Week in April, 1949

Preamble

The parties to this treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the charter of the United Nations and their desire to live in peace with all peoples and all governments.

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

They seek to promote stability and well-being in the north Atlantic area.

They are resolved to unite their efforts for collective defence and for the preservation of peace and security.

They therefore agree to this North Atlantic treaty:

Article 1

The parties undertake, as set forth in the charter of the United Nations, to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

Article 2

The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

Article 3

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

Article 4

The parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened.

Article 5

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by article 51 of the charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the north Atlantic area.

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the security council. Such measures shall be terminated when the security council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

Article 6

For the purpose of article 5 an armed attack on one or more of the parties is deemed to include an armed attack on the territory of any of the parties in Europe or North America, on the Algerian departments of France, on the occupation forces of any party in Europe, on the islands under the jurisdiction of any party in the north Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer or on the vessels or aircraft in this area of any of the parties.

Article 7

This treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting, in any way the rights and obligations under the charter of the parties which are members of the United Nations, or the primary responsibility of the security council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 8

Each party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the parties or any third state is in conflict with the provisions of this treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement in conflict with this treaty.

Article 9

The parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented, to consider matters concerning the implementation of this treaty. The council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defence committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of articles 3 and 5.

Article 10

The parties may, by unanimous agreement, invite any other European state in a position to further the principles of this treaty and to contribute to the security of the north Atlantic area to accede to this treaty. Any state so invited may become a party to the treaty by depositing its instrument of accession with the government of the United States of America. The government of the United States of America will inform each of the parties of the deposit of each such instrument of accession.

Article 11

This treaty shall be ratified and its provisions carried out by the parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes. The instruments of ratification shall be deposited as soon as possible with the government of the United States of America, which will notify all the other signatories of each deposit. The treaty shall enter into force between the states which have ratified it as soon as the ratifications of the majority of the signatories, including the ratifications of Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, have been deposited and shall come into effect with respect to other states on the date of the deposit of their ratifications.

Article 12

After the treaty has been in force for ten years, or at any time thereafter, the parties shall, if any of them so requests, consult together for the purpose of reviewing the treaty, having regard for the factors then affecting peace and security in the north Atlantic area, including the development of universal as well as regional arrangements under the charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 13

After the treaty has been in force for twenty years, any party may cease to be a party one year after its notice of denunciation has been given to the government of the United States of America, which will inform the governments of the other parties of the deposit of each notice of denunciation.

Article 14

This treaty, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the government of the United States of America. Duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that government to the governments of the other signatories.

In witness whereof, the undersigned plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty. Done at Washington, the day of April, 1949.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 21, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the name of Mr. Isnor be substituted for that of Mr. Winters on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSFER OF DUTIES

INDUSTRIAL DEFENCE BOARD—EXERCISE OF EXECUTIVE CLEMENCY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table copies of two orders in council passed under the Transfer of Duties Act. The first is P.C. 1166, dated March 15, 1949, transferring the industrial defence board from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Trade and Commerce; the other is P.C. 1303, dated March 18, 1949, transferring to the Solicitor General the powers and duties pertaining to the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SPECIAL OR ACCELERATED DEPRECIATION

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What is the normal rate of depreciation which was allowed industry during each of the years 1937 to 1949?
2. What is the maximum rate of special or accelerated depreciation which was allowed to any corporation for taxation purposes during each of these years?
3. What is the minimum rate of special or accelerated depreciation which was allowed to any corporation for taxation purposes during each of these years?
4. What is the policy of the government on the granting of special and accelerated depreciation?
5. Has the government policy on special and accelerated depreciation changed since 1937?
6. If so, what changes have been made?

Mr. McCann:

1. There is a variety of normal rates allowed industry, ranging from 2 per cent on reinforced concrete buildings to 50 per cent on replacements of linen, china, glassware, cutlery, etc. Broadly speaking, however, the following might be considered as the normal rates of depreciation applicable to the general type of asset allowed industry: Buildings: concrete, 2 per cent; stone or brick, 2½ per cent; wooden, 5 per cent; Machinery and equipment: 10 per cent. These rates applied in all years from 1937 to 1948. The regulations governing allowances in respect of capital costs for 1949 as provided in section 11 (a) of the Income Tax Act have not yet been published.

2. Under amendments to the legislation passed in 1940, the war contracts depreciation board authorized special or accelerated depreciation in respect of plant and equipment created for war purposes. Such allowances provided for the write-off of the whole cost in one or more years up to the estimated post-war value.

Also, in the year 1940, the War Exchange Conservation Act was enacted which provided for special depreciation allowances to companies who expanded production facilities primarily for increasing exports to the United States, or would increase the output of domestic resources the product of which would otherwise have been imported from the United States.

In 1944 the Income War Tax Act was amended by adding subparagraph (ii) to section 6 (n) which provided that depreciation at not more than double the rates normally allowed may be allowed.

Regulations under this clause are set out in orders in council P.C. 8640, dated the 10th of November, 1944, P.C. 2487, dated the 24th of June, 1947, and P.C. 3882, dated the 9th of September, 1948.

3. See No. 2 above.
4. See No. 2 above.
5. Yes.
6. The provisions governing special and accelerated depreciation were introduced in 1940 and in 1944, as stated in No. 2 above. See also the booklet "Encouragement to Industrial Expansion in Canada" issued by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—M. J. CUMMINGS

Mr. Blackmore:

1. Is there such a veteran of world war I as veteran M. J. Cummings, Reg. No. 142082?
2. If so, where is said veteran?

Questions

Mr. Mutch:

1. Yes.

2. Recent information on file indicates that the address of the veteran would be "in care of the Public Trustee, province of Ontario."

SPECIAL OR ACCELERATED DEPRECIATION

Mr. Coldwell:

NIAGARA, ST. CATHARINES AND TORONTO RAILWAY—TORONTO-PORT DALHOUSIE STEAMSHIP SERVICE

Mr. Church:

1. What ships are to be in commission this summer between Toronto and Port Dalhousie of the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway, a subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways?

2. Have they been pronounced as seaworthy?

3. What is being done to give a better service with new ships since the service provided in 1948?

4. Are any improvements being made in the road bed and bridges of the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto railway?

5: If so, what betterments?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Dalhousie City and Northumberland.

2. Both ships will be dry-docked for biennial inspection by steamboat inspector of the Department of Transport and must be passed as seaworthy before being placed in operation.

3. No new ships will be in this service in 1949.

4. The roadbed and bridges of the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway are being maintained in accordance with recognized standards to meet traffic needs and safety in operation.

5. See answer to question No. 4.

TIMBER CONTROL—SALARIES AND OTHER EXPENSES

Mr. Hodgson:

What were the salaries, traveling and other expenses for the timber controller and all persons connected with the office of the timber controller or proceeding under his direction or in pursuance of timber control in each of the years beginning 1940 to date?

Mr. McIlraith: Not available. The records of the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, and the treasury office have not been maintained in such a way as to make it possible to segregate the cost of timber control.

OATS AND BARLEY—ADJUSTMENT PAYMENTS, AUGUST-OCTOBER, 1947

Mr. Bentley:

From what source were funds taken to make the adjustment payments on oats and barley which were marketed by growers during the days from August 1 to October 21, 1947?

Mr. Sinclair: In so far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned:

Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, Ltd., was authorized and directed to pay a subsidy to producers who sold and delivered oats or barley during the period August 1, 1947 to October 21, 1947. Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, Ltd., appointed the Canadian wheat board to act as its agent in this connection.

Payments are made out of funds provided by parliament and are chargeable against vote 88 (1948-49) "Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, Ltd.", in the usual way.

R.C.A.F.—PRESENT STRENGTH—DUTIES OF PERSONNEL

Mr. McKay:

1. What is the present strength of the R.C.A.F. with regard to (a) officers; (b) N.C.O.'s; (c) airmen?

2. How many of these men are on (a) actual flying duties; (b) maintenance work; (c) administrative duty?

Mr. Baker:

1. (a) 2698; (b) 4041; (c) 7568 (aircraftsmen).

2. (a) 1303, but to these should be added 6148 aero engine, airframe and radio mechanics, photographers, etc., included under (b) below, who are required to fly as crewmen, and 434 officers, included under (c) below who are employed on administrative duties and who are qualified to fly.

(b) 8470.

(c) 4534.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—DISPOSAL OF MATERIALS IN ST. CATHARINES AREA

Mr. Fraser:

1. Have investigations been made, or are investigations being made, into irregularities in connection with the improper sale and disposal of materials belonging to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, or its contractors, in the St. Catharines area projects, numbered 14 and 15?

2. If so, what action has been taken, or will be taken?

Mr. Winters:

1. Yes, by officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

2. Complaints were received from a former employee of a subcontractor engaged on construction projects in St. Catharines that employees of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the prime contractor had improperly sold or disposed of scrap lumber, flooring, aluminum siding, new lumber, and beveled siding belonging to the corporation. Examination by officials of the corporation disclosed that all scrap and surplus materials sold at the St. Catharines projects had been properly reported and paid for and the proceeds of the sale recorded in the corporation's books of account. On an earlier occasion the same complainant had made allegations that materials had been improperly removed from the St. Catharines projects. At that time corporation records were reviewed with the complainant and he was shown the complete and proper recording of each transaction he questioned. The complainant has ben informed that examination by corporation officials has disclosed no shortage of materials nor any indication that surplus materials were disposed of without payment being made to the corporation. As corporation records give no indication of the irregular transactions, it is not felt that the corporation has grounds to request an investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. However, as the complainant considers that there has been irregularities, it has been suggested to him that he should visit the Niagara Falls detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and lay what charges he considers appropriate.

LAKE LOUISE-FIELD, B.C., HIGHWAY—SNOW PLOWING

Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East):

1. Was the road between Lake Louise and Field, British Columbia, plowed out in either January, February or March of this year to facilitate the removal of a park official's goods?

2. If so, what was the cost of this operation?

3. Was the road again closed to traffic and is it closed now. If so, for what reason?

Mr. MacKinnon:

1. The section of the road from Field to the Monarch mine in Yoho park is kept plowed all winter. The section between the Monarch mine and Lake Louise is not kept open for travel during the winter months. It is a regular feature of maintenance of park highways to do a certain amount of snow plowing to facilitate the early drying of the roadbed which enables the spring maintenance to be carried out at an earlier date. Advantage was taken of this practice and the section between Monarch mine and Lake Louise was plowed early in March. This facilitated the removal of the household effects of the park superintendent, who had been promoted to a more senior position at Jasper park. The removal of the goods by truck actually saved considerable money, because the costs of packing and crating were avoided.

2. The cost of plowing the section from the Monarch mine to Lake Louise was $204.20.

3. As no other plowing was done on this section it was again closed and will not be open for travel until the spring maintenance work has been completed, which will probably be some time early in April.

NEEPAWA, MAN., AIRPORT

Mr. Bracken:

Have any plans been made by the Department of Transport or any other department of the government for utilizing the Neepawa airport, and if so, what are they?

Mr. Chevrier: The department proposes to continue the operation of the airport as a public airport.

Questions

INGLEWOOD, ALTA., BIRD SANCTUARY

Mr. Harkness:

1. Is the Inglewood bird sanctuary at Calgary, Alberta, recognized as a dominion bird sanctuary?
2. What financial assistance does the dominion government provide for other bird sanctuaries?
3. Will the government provide any financial assistance for the Inglewood bird sanctuary?

Mr. MacKinnon:

1. Inglewood bird sanctuary was established by the dominion government on June 6, 1929, under the provisions of the Migratory Birds Convention Act. It is not owned or operated by the dominion government, but is subject to the migratory bird sanctuary regulations promulgated by order in council P.C. 1536 of April 13, 1948.

2. The dominion government provides no financial assistance for the upkeep of any privately-owned bird sanctuary established under the Migratory Birds Convention Act. Periodical inspections are made by dominion wildlife officers, and posters and advice on management are supplied by the dominion wildlife service when requested, free of charge.

The dominion government has, in special circumstances, paid for grain used in emergency winter feeding of waterfowl. During each of the winters 1947-48 and 1948-49, the dominion government paid $50 for grain fed to waterfowl in Inglewood bird sanctuary.

The dominion government makes an annual grant to the Jack Miner Migratory Bird Foundation Incorporated. At present, the amount of this grant is $5,000 per annum. The property of the Jack Miner bird foundation is not a bird sanctuary under the provisions of the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

3. This is a matter of government policy.

MUSKRAT RAISING PROJECT—ATHABASKA RIVER, ALTA.

Mr. Dechene:

1. What progress has been made in the development of the muskrat raising project in the 200,000 acres in the delta of the Athabaska river, near Fort Chipewyan, Alberta?
2. Is the provincial government of Alberta contributing any funds to the development of that enterprise?
3. To what extent is the government proceeding with further development of the project during the current year?

Mr. MacKinnon:

1. Preliminary investigation of the provincial lands portion of the Delta was undertaken by the dominion and province jointly and preliminary investigation of the Wood Buffalo park area was carried out by the dominion. Results were disappointing due to abnormal water conditions during the investigation period, the data received in the preliminary report indicating the necessity of very careful investigation before any construction was undertaken.

2. The provincial government has co-operated in the investigation of the area but as the project has not reached the development stage it has not contributed any funds for that purpose.

3. The dominion and province are continuing the investigation jointly of the provincially-owned section of the delta, while the dominion is continuing its investigation of the Wood Buffalo park area.

MARSHLANDS—NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK—EXPENDITURES MADE AND PROJECTS APPROVED

Mr. Stanfield:

1. What have been the total expenditures (a) in Nova Scotia; (b) in New Brunswick in each of the years 1946, 1947 and 1948 in connection with protection and reclamation of maritime marshlands?
2. What was expended for (a) salaries; (b) wages; (c) purchase machinery; (d) rental machinery; (e) motor cars; (f) supplies and incidentals?
3. What projects have cost $10,000 or more, stating amount in each instance?
4. What projects have been approved and what is the estimated cost to complete?

Mr. McCubbin:

	1946-47	1947-48	1948-49
1. (a)	$17,611 15	$25,250 25
(b)	7,250 89	20,729 40	$ 4,738 07 (Feb. 28/49)

Note: This represents dominion share of expenditures only. The works program is the responsibility of the provincial governments and is carried on by the maritime dikelands rehabilitation committee. The original payments are made by the provinces where all detailed records are kept. On presentation of certified accounts the dominion reimburses one-third of total cost. All accounts for the current fiscal year not yet rendered by provinces.

2. See answer to No. 1.
3. See answer to No. 1.
4. See answer to No. 1.

Mr. Fair:

1. What are the names and addresses of veterans of world war I who purchased land through the soldier settlement board with which mineral rights were included?
2. In how many cases have those rights been transferred to the settlers?

Mr. Mutch:

1. The information is not available from the present records of the director of soldier settlement, nor from the titles held or previously held by the director.

2. None. In 39 cases, rights are in process of being transferred.

DEFENCE ARRANGEMENTS WITH GOVERNMENT OF ONTARIO

Mr. Church:

1. What arrangements, if any, have been made with the Ontario government as to defences in case of war?
2. Who made such a request, how and when?
3. What was such a request?
4. At whose expense was it to be (a) federal authority; (b) provincial authority; (c) municipal authority?
5. Is any grant to be made the municipal authorities of Ontario or mayors' association for their enforcement of all federal law, orders in council and other federal regulations by municipal police forces of Ontario accordingly?

GROSS AND NET FARM INCOME

Mr. Wright:

What is the gross and net farm income, by provinces, from 1928 to 1948, inclusive?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the information requested in this question concerns the gross and net farm income, by provinces, from 1928 to 1948 inclusive. The information for that period of time is not available, but it is available from 1938 to 1947 inclusive. Subject to these considerations, I am prepared to have the question passed as an order for return, and to table the return.

Motions for Papers

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REMOVAL OF EMPLOYEES FROM WINNIPEG

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): May I be allowed to answer a question put to me by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on Friday, concerning the possible removal of T.C.A. personnel from Winnipeg to Montreal? On Friday I received the night letters to which the hon. member referred, and I answered them as follows:

Your telegram re T.C.A. plans to move certain personnel to Montreal: may I call attention to following statement made in parliament on March 3 by Mr. Howe. "I remember distinctly reading a published statement by Mr. McGregor in which he said the move would not take place until October, 1949. That being so I hope we shall have a committee before that time." Notice for the setting up of a committee of the house to deal with accounts, estimates and bills relating to operations of T.C.A. has now been given. Committee expected to get under way almost at once and will have power to send for persons, papers and records and report from time to time. Plans of management and reasons therefor can be gone into and reported upon, and interested parties can appear or be represented to make proper investigation. In the meantime government would not feel justified in issuing directives to management. I trust that this public hearing will make clear what policy in regard to this matter will best serve the general interest of all concerned in the good administration of T.C.A.

Mr. Knowles: May I just ask this question, so that the record may be complete? That is the telegram which the Prime Minister sent to the mayor of Winnipeg and also to the secretary of the chamber of commerce?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is so.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SHIPS OPERATING FROM PACIFIC PORTS—RADIO EQUIPMENT AND WATCH KEEPING

Mr. MacInnis:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents received by the minister or any official of the Department of Transport, since January 1, 1946, complaining of the failure of owners and operators of ships operated from ports on the Pacific coast (a) to keep radio equipment in proper working condition; (b) to maintain radio watch keeping.

Mr. MacInnis:

For a copy of all reports received by the Department of Transport, the Minister of Transport or any official of the department, since January 1, 1946, relating to the efficiency of radio equipment and the adequacy of radio watch keeping on ships operated from Pacific coast ports.

Mr. Chevrier: This motion has to do with any reports received by the Department of Transport, the minister or any official of the department since January 1, 1946, relating to the efficiency of radio equipment and the adequacy of radio watch keeping on ships operated from Pacific coast ports. I understand it has been the practice and the custom that all interdepartmental reports are privileged; but there may be—I have not had, as I would wish to have, the opportunity of consulting fully the file—a number of reports that were made by outside sources. There can be no objection to producing these, but as to interdepartmental reports, perhaps, in view of the practice in that regard, the hon. member will consent to their not being produced.

Mr. MacInnis: At the request of the minister I allowed this motion to stand for several days. Will the minister now be good enough to allow it to stand so that I may have a talk with him about what I want?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Motion stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—SEASONAL WORKERS, ETC.

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all regulations and directives dealing with seasonal workers, seasonal industries, etc., under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—"SUITABLE EMPLOYMENT"

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all circular letters, directives, etc., having to do with the interpretation of "suitable employment," sent out by the unemployment insurance commission to its various offices across the country, dated since January 1, 1946.

LEASE OF CADOMIN BUILDING, WINNIPEG, MAN.

Mr. Miller:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memorandum, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Department of Public Works, Department of National Revenue or any branches or divisions thereof, and United Realty Company Limited, Aronovitch and Leipsic, Cadomin Building Limited, and other persons or firms, from July 1, 1947 to October 1, 1948, relating to the leasing of the Cadomin Building, Main street, Winnipeg, Manitoba. Also a copy of the said lease.

IMMIGRATION—ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 4233

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents received by the Department of Mines and Resources leading up to or connected with the issue of order in council P.C. 4233, dated September 13, 1948.

Mr. MacKinnon: I should like to point out that order in council P.C. 4233 refers to twenty-four individual immigrants. There are included in this number three persons about whom the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) has asked for the production of papers. The order for return was passed on February 9, 1949, as appears by Votes and Proceedings No. 11.

The names of the three persons are G. B. Montel, J. G. Labedan and A. C. E. Boussat.

As there has not been any question raised about the twenty-one other persons, I assume it is the three persons I have mentioned in whom the member is interested. I suggest that the hon. member withdraw his motion; there is no need to copy the papers again. I can arrange to have the extra copy of the other return filed, if the hon. member so wishes.

My purpose in making this request is simple. All members of the house are aware of the large amount of work being done by the staff of the immigration branch and the pressure and strain under which they are working. I therefore wish to avoid, whenever possible, asking them to do unnecessary tasks.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): In view of the circumstances, perhaps the minister would allow his motion to stand. It is in the name of my colleague who is not in the house at the moment.

Mr. MacKinnon: That is quite satisfactory.

Motion stands.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR AND CANADIAN SEAMEN'S UNION, ETC.

Mr. Young:

For a copy of all correspondence and telegrams since the year 1946 exchanged between the Department of Labour and the Canadian seamen's union; between the Canada Steamship Lines and/or their solicitors and the Department of Labour; between the Minister of Labour and the above mentioned companies or the Canadian Seamen's Union, and between the minister or his department and the Colonial and Sarnia Steamships Company Limited.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member asks for a copy of all correspondence and telegrams since the year 1946 exchanged between the Department of Labour and the Canadian Seamen's Union, which of course may cover a wide field. He goes on to include correspondence and telegrams between the Canada Steamship Lines, which is one concern, their solicitors and the Department of Labour; and then in line five of the motion he refers to "the above mentioned companies". I think I know what the hon. member wants, but I suggest that he be a little more specific. If he will be good enough to have the motion redrafted, subject to there being nothing confidential on the files I see no objection to the motion being passed.

Mr. Young: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Dropped.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Knowles: Which is it?

Mr. Mitchell: The motion is to be redrafted. The hon. member has agreed to that.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—APPOINTMENT OF MANAGER, EMPLOYMENT AND CLAIMS OFFICE, RED DEER, ALTA.

Mr. Shaw:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Labour, officials of the labour department, the civil service commission or any official thereof and any person, persons or groups of persons, since July 1, 1948, with respect to the appointment of a manager, employment and claims office, Red Deer, Alberta.

Mr. Mitchell: Subject to the usual reservations as to confidential correspondence, I have no objection to this motion being passed.

CAROLINE, ALTA., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. Shaw:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents exchanged since January 1, 1948, between the Postmaster General, the Post Office Department and any official thereof, and any person, persons or groups of persons with respect to the appointment of a postmaster at Caroline, Alberta.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WORLD METEOROLOGICAL ORGANIZATION—QUESTION OF REFERENCE TO EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

On the order for government notices of motions:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs—Resolved, that it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the convention of the world meteorological organization signed at Washington on October 11, 1947, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Pearson: Stand.

Mr. Graydon: Is it the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to refer this convention, when it finally reaches the stage of introduction, to the standing committee on external affairs?

Mr. Pearson: That might be a proper way of dealing with the matter, and if the house so desires, it could be done in that way. I had not had that intention, because I thought that it was a fairly simple matter, and that possibly no such reference was necessary. We are not dealing with it now because more urgent matters are before the house.

[Later:]

CONSULTATION TO EXPEDITE CONSIDERATION OF CONTROL MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the importance of the several control measures now before parliament, and the shortage of time for this and the other chamber to consider and approve the legislation, might it not be advisable for the government to consult with the party leaders, and perhaps the party whips, with a view to apportioning the remaining time in order to protect the people, particularly in regard to rent control and against possible speculation in foreign exchange?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): We did make rather satisfactory progress on Friday with the resolutions, and I hope we shall make satisfactory progress today. However, I shall be glad to consult with the leaders and have the whips confer and endeavour to arrange matters so that there will be time for the other place also to give consideration to these matters before the deadline is reached.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time, and that notwithstanding standing order 65, in relation to the limitation of the number of members, the said committee to consist of Messrs. Bourget, Chevrier, Clark, Emmerson, Fulton, Gibson (Comox-Alberni), Hatfield, Hazen, Hlynka, Jackman, LaCroix, Lafontaine, Lockhart, Maybank, McCulloch (Pictou), McLure, Moore, Mutch, Nicholson, Picard, Pouliot, Reid, Warren.

He said: This is the annual motion seeking the establishment of the committee on railways and shipping, to which are referred the various reports of the Canadian National Railways, certain items in the estimates which are withdrawn from the committee of supply, and other matters. It is in the same form as in previous sessions.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): What is the object of appointing this committee? Last year the committee did not function in relation to this very important work. Moreover, I fail to see many public ownership men on this committee. I fail to see how there is to be any control over this committee, and discussion in the house itself will be prevented. As I see it, before the motion is adopted there should be some discussion in the house about this railway, its ocean and hotel services, etc. I call the attention of the minister to the fact that we have no maritime commission on the great lakes; we have no life-saving stations. We had a disaster at Port Burwell, and we cannot get any information about it. The house should first spend a day on the affairs of the national railways and their ocean and lake services, hotel services and everything else, because we may have some trouble soon. We have no submarines whatever. What is the object of bringing this motion up this morning? Notice was given only on Friday. Before this motion is passed the house should consider these questions.

Mr. Chevrier: The purpose of the motion is, as I have already stated, to consider the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. As in the past, the hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss the business of the Canadian National Railways on many occasions. If he is not a member of this committee, I presume there would be no difficulty in having him appointed to it so that he could bring forward any questions he has in mind. Furthermore, if he is not a member of the committee, he could appear before it and ask the questions which he has in mind and obtain information. As I said a moment ago, there will be ample opportunity to discuss the affairs of the Canadian National Railways during the session.

Mr. D. King Hazen (Saint John-Albert): Has the minister given consideration to having the report of the maritime commission submitted to this committee? The maritime commission comes under his department, and there does not appear to be any way in which we can find out anything about it—at least no way that I know of, except by putting questions on the order paper. We could have the chairman and some of the members of that commission appear before some committee for the purpose of finding out more about it.

Mr. Speaker: May I call the attention of the house to the fact that according to the rules an hon. member is not entitled to speak more than once, or a minister of the crown more than twice. If there are any other questions I suggest that they be put now so that the minister can reply.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to reply to the last question.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I draw attention to the fact that there is no provision for a quorum? Perhaps the minister will say a word about that.

Mr. Chevrier: In select committees the quorum is provided by the meeting which calls the members together. When this is not done, a majority of members constitute a quorum.

Mr. Fulton: On the second page—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have called the attention of hon. members to the fact that they are not entitled to speak more than once, or the minister more than twice. I said that if the minister spoke again he would close the debate. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN MARITIME COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Would there be any objection to having the report of the Canadian maritime commission referred to a committee—if not to the committee on railways and shipping, then to another committee? I believe the minister was about to answer the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) a moment ago.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yes; I was going to say that the report of the maritime commission has first of all to be tabled in the house on or before a certain date. The report has not yet been tabled, but it will be in due course, in accordance with the act establishing the commission. There will be ample opportunity to discuss that report on at least three occasions I can think of. It has not been the practice in the past to refer the report to the committee on railways and shipping. I would think the committee would have its hands full with the business of the Canadian National Railways.

WHEAT

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I regret that through an error the notice was sent first to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister make a statement on the international wheat agreement which has just been announced, particularly with regard to what effect, if any, it may have on the British-Canadian wheat agreement and future policy; and also what effect, if any, the nonparticipation of Russia and Argentina will, in his opinion, have on the wheat price situation generally? He may not be able to answer it today, but we should like the information as soon as possible.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think I can answer it now. As my hon. friend knows, 450 million bushels of wheat are covered by the agreement. In other words, the supplying countries undertake to supply 450 million bushels of wheat, and the deficit countries undertake to purchase 450 million bushels of wheat. The maximum price is $1.80 per bushel for the four-year period. The minimum price drops from $1.50 per bushel by ten cents each year, down to $1.20 for the fourth year.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minimum price established at seaboard or at Fort William?

Mr. Howe: At Fort William.

Mr. Bentley: And the maximum price at Fort William?

Mr. Howe: Yes. The United Kingdom wheat agreement will not be affected by the terms of the proposed international agreement. In other words, the crop of 1949-50 will be sold to the United Kingdom at $2 a bushel to the extent of 140 million bushels. Another 60 million bushels will be sold within the terms of the international agreement to account for the total of 200 million bushels allocated to Canada. Any wheat over and above that will be sold outside the agreement. There are consuming countries outside the agreement that will continue to buy wheat.

As far as the effect of Russia not participating is concerned, that country was offered 50 million bushels, if she wished to come into the agreement, in which event the consuming countries would have undertaken to purchase 500 million bushels of wheat. In other words, the amount that would have been assigned to Russia is not now assigned under the agreement. Argentina attended as an observer, but has never stated its export intentions. Russia and the Argentine will be able to sell their wheat outside the agreement when they can find markets for it after the consuming countries have purchased their obligations under the agreement. What the effect will be, of course, is difficult to say. I am told Russia has never exported in any year 50 million bushels of wheat; therefore I think the effect will not be great.

Mr. Wright: What machinery is set up for determining the price as between minimum and maximum for the first year of the contract?

Mr. Howe: The range of prices between the maximum and minimum is the trading area. The law of supply and demand will operate within that area, namely, between $1.80 per bushel and $1.50 per bushel.

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister say what method of payment is to be permitted? I am asking the question because the press referred to the fact that payment will be made in capital goods.

Mr. Howe: Under the wheat agreement, payment is in cash. Wheat is always traded on basis cash on delivery.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is there any allowance made in the agreement as to the quality of Canadian wheat?

Mr. Howe: Yes; the price is based on No. 1 northern Fort William.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): But as between other countries?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Perhaps I might ask a supplementary question. I do not think I made my question clear and the minister did not understand me. What I am getting at is this. I would assume this agreement at $1.80 covers the price paid to all exporting or shipping countries. In that price is there any distinction made as between qualities? That is, is there any distinction between Canadian hard wheat and the price, we will say, of Kansas soft wheat, or Australian wheat? Or, so long as it is wheat of the first class from the country of origin is it at $1.80 right through?

Mr. Howe: There will be a board charged with the duty of determining the details of the agreement. Obviously it will be the duty of the board to see that comparable wheat is shipped for comparable payments. There is a comparable grade of wheat in the United States—I believe it is known as No. 1 red winter, comparable with our No. 1 northern.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In the northern states there is some, but not much.

Mr. Howe: I dare say when the subject of wheat is considered, the comparative value of soft wheat as compared with Canadian hard wheat will be taken into consideration in setting the price.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is nothing in the agreement covering it.

Mr. Howe: I think not. The agreement provides for an administrative board, which would obviously be charged with that duty.

HORSES

ALLEGED CRUELTY TO ANIMALS EXPORTED FOR SLAUGHTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence I shall ask his parliamentary assistant. Have representations been made to the Department of Agriculture alleging extreme cruelty to horses exported for slaughter from this country to Europe? Has the government given consideration to prohibiting the export of horses for slaughter?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I will take the question into consideration, and an answer will be given later.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUESTION AS TO INCREASED PAY FOR WOMEN CLEANERS IN FEDERAL BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. In view of the welcome announcement that the wages of women cleaners working for the government in Ottawa are to be increased to sixty-nine cents per hour, retroactive to January 1, can the minister say how soon an announcement will be made as to pay increases for women cleaners in federal government buildings in other cities, such as Winnipeg, where the rate is still only fifty cents per hour?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Every year in the month of April there is a general review of salary rates. They are investigated by the Department of Labour. Any change which would take place will be announced in due course.

Mr. Knowles: Will it be retroactive to January 1?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I cannot say.

Mr. MacNicol: May I follow up the inquiry made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? I was told this morning by some of the women cleaners in this building that they are not included in the minister's announcement of last Friday. Can he enlighten us in that respect?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I understand the situation correctly, the women working here come under the jurisdiction of the House of Commons authorities, and not under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. McIlraith: They did get a pay increase.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member for Ottawa West says they did get a pay increase; therefore I shall not discuss it.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ESQUIMALT DOCKYARDS—REPLACEMENT BY OTHER PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Have any instructions been issued to the R.C.M.P. guards at the dockyards at Esquimalt to be relieved of their duties as from March 31? If so, what other personnel will replace the R.C.M.P. there?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The hon. member did not give notice of his question. I shall take what he has said as notice and bring down the answer tomorrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DUTIES ON FIRE-FIGHTING EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon City): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the minister's recent statement as to fire prevention being an essential part of national defence, is he prepared to advise his colleague the Minister of Finance to admit fire engines to this country either free of duty or at reduced rates? Is he aware that life and property are often lost in some municipalities because of the high cost of such fire-fighting equipment?

Mr. Howe: Order paper.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have had no notice of the question. However, I shall draw it to the attention of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT ENCLOSED WITH CHEQUES AS TO PAYMENT BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is he aware of the fact that blue slips have been enclosed with current family allowance cheques reminding the recipients that family allowances are paid by the federal government? Can the minister say whether there is any reason for those slips other than political propaganda?

Mr. MacNicol: None whatever.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I know the hon. member would be the last in the house to accuse me of carrying on political propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Knowles: I can assure the minister he is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue if in all the correspondence he is sending out he is saying that the taxes are being collected by the federal government?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Graydon: I should like to have an answer, because we ought to have uniformity in this regard.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. gentleman knows the answer.

SEED POTATOES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—EXPORT PERMIT REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with seed potatoes. He stated some time ago that he would look into the matter, and would make a statement. Is he now prepared to do so?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting for an opportunity to make a statement. A few days ago the hon. member for Queens asked for a statement regarding new permit regulations covering the shipping of Prince Edward Island seed potatoes to the United States.

My department has not issued new regulations in this connection since those which I announced on November 26, 1948. It has recently been found necessary, however, to clarify two of these regulations.

1. Expiry dates of permits. It has been agreed to issue permits for shipments of seed potatoes to the United States only if the shipments were made within the limits of a schedule which was released at the same time as my statement of November 26. Canadian shippers, however, have been clearing customs at an interior point towards the end of the periods, but the actual shipments in many cases, have not crossed the international border until several days after the termination of the period. We have now clarified this position and have advised exporters that their shipments must cross the border before midnight of the expiry date of the permit.

2. Assurance from importers that potatoes will not be diverted or reconsigned for table stock purposes. Despite the controls being administered, several United States importers have allegedly diverted Canadian seed into table stock markets. In order to stop this practice, which, if continued, might well jeopardize the whole agreement, it has been found necessary to require a formal statement of each importer in which he undertakes that he will only use or sell Canadian seed potatoes for seed purposes.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

QUESTION AS TO INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct another question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I do so in view of the fact that he states he is not a political propagandist. Is the minister yet in position to make the expected announcement with regard to an increase in old age pensions?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend asked me that question so recently that any reply I would make now would not be very helpful to him.

Mr. Knowles: The minister's replies never are.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HONG KONG VETERANS—PACIFIC PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question in connection with the pay or bonus to be granted to the Hong Kong veterans. To whom do they make application for that pay?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): From my discussions with the officers of the department my recollection is that there will be no need to make application. The files will be examined and calculations made and cheques issued just as soon as possible. We have up-to-date addresses of a great majority of the Hong Kong veterans because they are in touch with the Department of Veterans Affairs through the receipt of pension and other assistance. However, if any have moved recently they should let the Department of National Defence know of their change of address so that we can send cheques to them as soon as the calculations are made.

Mr. Hodgson: Will the minister say whether these cheques will be issued before the next general election?

Mr. Claxton: The cheques will be issued just as soon as they can be prepared.

[Mr. Howe.]

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT

CONTINUANCE IN FORCE UNTIL SIXTY DAYS AFTER OPENING OF FIRST SESSION OF PARLIAMENT IN 1951

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 85, to amend the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that the Minister of Finance and others would be glad to have this bill passed without any further discussion, and, having spoken last week, I do in a sense hesitate to detain the house. Nevertheless I do so for two reasons. First of all, I think that in some way this may be considered the most important measure that will pass this house this year. It is not a measure that is of tremendous interest to a large section of the public; nevertheless I believe it is of great importance. Furthermore, having had the opportunity of reading the minister's speech since it was delivered the other day I should like to make some comments thereon.

I do this for another reason. I understand that there are some faithful and much-enduring citizens who actually read Hansard, and there are some things I should like to put on the record this morning in connection with this all-important question. I have some material here, quite apart from what I shall say myself, which I believe is of interest and importance to those who are trying to reach a conclusion on this question.

The first thing I should like to say is that the real principle of this bill, really the only one we are discussing, is whether we want to go on in the grip of controls or whether we actually wish to make a move toward freedom. I know the minister will pooh-pooh that; I know he will say that the government have already abandoned a great many controls and that they want to abandon the whole lot and in due course the time will come when they will abandon them. In my opinion that is not good enough, because, as I said the other day, we are being asked in this foreign exchange matter for two years more to stay exactly where we are. There is to be no progress of any kind so far as legislation is concerned. I deprecate that very much.

I think it is wise to remind ourselves of what we sometimes forget: that in a large measure this act which is now on the statute book has in it the aspects of a police state. We all know that foreign exchange control was the invention of Dr. Schacht. It was a German idea and when we adopted it we adopted it holus-bolus. We tend after months to get rather numbed to this kind of thing. I think it is a great pity that these police-state provisions, of which there are a great many, should be allowed to continue. I will say no more about that, because we shall have an opportunity of referring to it in committee.

I just wish to emphasize what I said a moment ago about the importance of foreign exchange control, because it goes to the very root of our foreign trade. As the minister himself pointed out the other day, our prospects with regard to foreign trade are most unsatisfactory. In this whole question of foreign trade the matter of exchange control is to some extent the key log in the jam. That is why I am sorry that we are to have two years more of what I call paralysing inactivity, because we are in a kind of twilight zone and we either have to emerge into the light or draw back still further into the darkness.

I wish to say one or two words about the minister's speech on Friday. The minister spent a good deal of his time making speeches for us on this side of the house. To put it differently, he set up a number of straw men and then proceeded to his own satisfaction to knock them down—a very pleasant form of entertainment. I am going to suggest to him later that many of the straw men at which he aimed his darts really represent his own experts. I refer to the governor of the Bank of Canada and the associate governor of the foreign exchange control board. I suggest to the minister that he had better hold a caucus of the Department of Finance so that they can all speak with the one voice.

Mr. Abbott: Neither of those gentlemen is in the Department of Finance.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister may say that they are not in the Department of Finance, but I imagine that there is no iron curtain between the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Abbott: None whatever.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Indeed I would point out that no less a person than the governor of the Bank of Canada described himself to me as a civil servant. I do not know whether he was strictly accurate, but he did that. I was interested in the point. As a matter of fact, I was asking him for some information, which he was kind enough to give me, but he said that as a civil servant of course he would have to ask the minister. I take it, therefore, the minister will agree with me that there is at least a friendly relationship between the department and the Bank of Canada.

The minister spent a great deal of his time on Friday defending the rate which had been fixed. He seemed to think that we were going to come out in favour of another fixed rate. I wish to make it clear that I am not championing any fixed rate. Indeed my great complaint is that the minister—although I am sure he will say that convertibility is in his mind's eye—seems to have what I can only call a fixation on fixing. His whole speech the other day was designed to prove that they were right in what they had done. My feeling is that we should have as an aim that we should pursue constantly and energetically the convertibility without which—I am sure the minister will agree with this—the prospects for our continuing foreign trade are very dark. What I complain about is that the minister, in paying lip service to convertibility, is like the man who talks about the weather but does nothing about it.

The minister again and again justified the rate which had been fixed. My point is that we want to get it to a much higher court of appeal than the minister or anyone else. As fast as we can we want to get to the court of appeal of real economic conditions, where the rate of our dollar will be decided, not by the judgment of this person or that person, but by the only final judgment—the state of trade throughout the world. Unless this happens we shall just sink deeper and deeper into a mass of controls. Indeed we are in a kind of morass now, and my disappointment is that I see nothing in this measure except two years more of the same thing.

As a matter of fact, to digress for a moment, it seemed to me that the minister overplayed his hand when he was explaining the excellence of this rate which they had fixed; because, if I understood him correctly, he finally said he thought that they had put it too low, or, at any rate that there was a good deal of reason for feeling that it was too low. I am not expressing an opinion on that; I am merely saying that if the minister thinks that, it seems to me it is a great argument against going on with this fixed rate.

It is obvious, of course, that all my arguments are made against the background of the present precarious and uneasy situation. If everything was all right I suppose there would be a disposition to say that we would travel along. It is perhaps difficult for us to deal in principles unless we are brought to it by our own necessities. I suggest that here there is quite enough to indicate that things are serious, and that there is an indication of certain things that need to be done.

I wish to read from what I think is the best statement I have read as to the exact trading position at the moment, particularly having regard to ourselves, Europe and the United Kingdom. It is lengthy, but I believe it is of interest. I want to get it on the record for the sake of those who actually read what we say in this house, and apparently pay some attention to it. This is an article written by Norman Crump, who is described as a well-known London financial writer. I am reading from the Montreal Daily Star of March 9 last:

A delegation from the Canadian chamber of commerce has been in London recently for conversations with the federation of British industries, the association of British chambers of commerce, and the national union of manufacturers. The object of the visit was to establish Anglo-Canadian relations on the "business" as distinguished from the governmental level. In doing so, the delegates had the support of every business interest in Canada, agricultural and mining, as well as industrial.

It is clear that all is not well with Anglo-Canadian trade. Canada is a dollar country, and as Sir Stafford Cripps explained in a statement to the Canadian press last week, our power—

Bear in mind this is an Englishman writing.

—to buy Canadian goods is limited by the amount of dollars which we can earn. There are, however, certain facts which the British public should not forget. One is that Canada, with a population of fewer than fourteen million people, has already extended to us extremely generous aid, both by gift and by loan. Another is that Canadian farmers in particular depend upon Great Britain as their chief external market.

The Canadian delegates remind us that Canada has a foot in both the sterling and the dollar world. She is loath to abandon either interest. Yet at a time when political and defence arrangements between Great Britain and the United States are drawing closer, the economic trend appears to be in the opposite direction. They add that, if Canada is ever forced to choose between the sterling and the dollar area, she will have to throw in her lot with the United States.

These are grave words. It is clear that Canadian business opinion has come to feel that partly through a lack of dollars, and partly through a proper desire to foster commercial relations with both Europe and the sterling area, the British government has allowed trade relations with Canada to drift into the background. The long term cure is clear. It is the restoration of convertibility between sterling on the one hand and the Canadian and American dollars on the other; in other words, "a sterling-dollar union."

This cannot come yet. In 1948, the sterling area imported from Canada £120 million more than it exported to Canada. Yet in 1938 the United Kingdom supplied Canada with 17½ per cent of her total imports. In 1947 the proportion was only 7½ per cent, and in the first half of 1948 it was no better than 10 per cent. This is not good enough. Canada wants British textiles, steel and machinery. In 1948 a United Kingdom engineering mission travelled right across Canada, and on its return published a most valuable report.

I shall skip a certain portion here, and then continue:

Meanwhile Canadian farmers are nervous. Should wheat be proclaimed a "surplus commodity" in the United States, then strictly speaking Marshall aid dollars will cease to be available to finance European purchase of Canadian wheat.

I skip again, and continue:

The delegates say that there is very genuine concern in Canada over Great Britain's bilateral trade agreements with other countries. They point out that a British trading area has grown up, which includes the sterling area, most of western Europe, and even a certain number of countries behind the iron curtain. As a result of trade bargains, in which the price of goods is only one of many factors, the price level in this area is becoming divorced from the dollar area by an artificially inflated cost and price structure.

I skip again and continue:

It is doubts of this kind that have led to this Canadian approach to the British business world.

Further down there is the following:

This is a most welcome move, but by itself it is not enough. It is the duty of the British public and the British government to reflect where this postwar system of bilateral trade and payments agreements is leading them. Neither Europe nor Great Britain can achieve a permanent recovery if they try to make the basis of that recovery the division of the world into watertight compartments.

It is because we are heading straight in that direction, and because the continuation for two years of the present situation offers no remedy, that I am complaining about the bill.

I should like to point out that this bilateralism is right down the socialist alley, that bilateralism almost inevitably means the expansion of government trading, and every time you have a bilateral deal, particularly where governments are concerned, it makes the situation just that much more difficult for the continuation of private enterprise.

Mr. Irvine: May I ask a question? I am interested in what the hon. gentleman is saying.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I hope you are agreeing.

Mr. Irvine: Do I understand that the hon. member is advocating, as an alternative to the present bill, the devaluation of the dollar?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I have tried to make it clear that what I am advocating is that we try to move forward to a situation of reality. On Thursday I tried to show that what I wanted to see was some measure of flexibility introduced. This objective cannot be reached today or tomorrow; but I suggest to the gentlemen who represent western constituencies that they are more interested than anyone else in achieving this objective. If we do not reach it, our trade with western Europe will disappear, just as surely as the sun rises. I am suggesting that at the present time we are living in what a friend of mine calls a kind of dream world so far as exchanges are concerned. If we do not return to reality, we will suffer more injury. This situation cannot continue. I am trying to suggest an appeal to a power higher than myself or the Minister of Finance, an appeal to reality. I do this because I think the international monetary fund is not moving us forward, and I suggest we should hurry them along.

Mr. Knowles: What you are asking for is a fluctuating rate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): It will have to fluctuate until it reaches an equilibrium. We did not have a fluctuating rate in the old world, but one cannot suddenly attain the true rate everywhere.

I am maintaining that we are now crystallizing, not making permanent but continuing indefinitely rates which, as I shall try to show later, a great many people believe are unsound. We are doing nothing about it. It is for that reason I object to this bill which carries forward that rigidity for two years more.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Certainly.

Mr. Blackmore: I am sympathetic to what the hon. member has been talking about, and I agree with him that something should be done. Is the hon. gentleman able to suggest anything that could be done, for example, to avoid bilateral deals—

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the hon. member permit me to say that I did make one suggestion, and there will be others? I shall refer to that again. Perhaps if the hon. gentleman will permit me to continue, I shall cover in the course of my remarks, the things he has in mind.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member will not mind if I ask him a few questions from time to time?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): No.

I should like to deal with the minister's speech and quote something he said. I should like to quote many of the things he said, but I shall confine myself to this particular remark. I shall quote a good many authorities that I think the minister will respect, including the governor of the Bank of Canada, who think the price situation in the sterling areas and in western Europe has already grown to the point where those countries are pricing themselves out of our market.

Mr. Abbott: I said that myself.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to read what the minister said at page 1569 of Hansard:

—but the Canadian exporters who are affected by this situation will, I know, agree with me when I say that their difficulties do not arise because their prices are too high—a situation which might be corrected of course by a change in the exchange rate—but because the foreign countries simply will not make dollars available for certain goods; and the lowering of the Canadian exchange rate could do nothing to correct that situation. On the contrary it would aggravate it.

The minister pressed that point further; but I want to make the point that I am not attempting to fix the Canadian exchange rate. I am suggesting we should try to move towards a more realistic rate.

Referring to the minister's other point, I wish now to read an extract—I apologize for the reading of these extracts, but I do not think one can avoid them—from the London Economist. This extract covers two or three points to which I shall refer later. The reference is right on the target we are discussing:

In an interview with the Canadian Press Association, Sir Stafford Cripps this week reviewed the prospects for Anglo-Canadian trade and gave a very frank summary of the position as seen from the British angle.

Mr. Hazen: What is the date of that article?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): February 26, 1949.

He went over the familiar ground of the historic and persistent lack of balance in the two-way flow of Anglo-Canadian trade, and stressed that Britain had made plans to bring its purchases from Canada more into line with its ability to pay for them. The reductions hitherto made have fallen mainly on food and timber. What had been done so far to reduce imports was, however, insufficient, and the United Kingdom might be obliged gradually to limit its imports of bacon, cheese and eggs from Canada, though Sir Stafford added the somewhat comfortless reassurance that this would be done only "after the fullest consultations with the Canadian government". Sir Stafford went on to explain how large a proportion of British imports of certain foods still came from Canada. He also stressed the difficulties that are being met in expanding British exports to Canada, saying that Britain could not sell all the steel Canada needed because it had to reserve certain quantities of scarce materials for use in bilateral negotiations with other countries.

I stress that particularly.

This somewhat gloomy review of Anglo-Canadian trading prospects was perhaps more remarkable for what it left untouched than for what it said. For example, the chancellor seems to have made no reference to the extent to which the problem of payments with Canada might be eased by bringing into play the whole of the trade between Canada and the sterling area.

I would remind the minister at that point that in considering these exchange rates the other day I said we had to consider the broad situation and not merely our exchange rate with this country or that country. I continue the quotation:

If the export drive to Canada could involve all sterling area produce and not only UK manufactures, the problem might be found much more amenable than it appears if seen purely in Anglo-Canadian terms. Nor did the chancellor refer to the delicate subject of prices. There can be no doubt that the main obstacle to the British export drive to Canada is to be found in the fact that British prices are, by and large, too high for the Canadian market.

Now, that is the opinion of the Economist, for what it is worth. I continue the quotation:

> That fact is likely to be increasingly impressed upon all concerned if the trend of prices in the United States continues to be downward.

You will observe that in this quotation there are three points of particular interest to this problem. First of all we have here what I pointed out, the effect of bilateralism. You have the British government which says that because of bilateral negotiations with other countries—this is apart from the question of prices—Britain cannot let us have certain goods. You have a government with ideological views which is making bilateral deals for that purpose. You have the reference to British costs—that is, that they are pricing themselves out of our market. I commend that to the minister.

There is another quotation from page 384 of the Economist which I should like to give to the house:

> At the same time, it cannot be said that Canada has chosen the happiest moment, from its or Britain's point of view, to announce the reimposition of the import duties on British textiles which were suspended in 1947.

I take it the minister is going to tell us something about that tomorrow night; so we will leave that point until he has dealt with it. In this connection, I should like to quote from a public address—I checked on it to make sure it was published—delivered by the executive assistant to the governors of the Bank of Canada and alternate chairman of the foreign exchange control board. It contains some interesting comments on this very point. He says:

> At the present time many of the ERP countries are discriminating against imports from the western hemisphere in order to economize in their use of dollars.

I skip a portion of the material and continue the quotation—I should have told you earlier that these quotations are from a lecture delivered by Mr. Rasminsky to the National Defence college on December 1, 1948:

> But the danger in these policies, which we might as well recognize, is that the countries concerned, as part of a program of economizing dollar outlays, may impair their own capacity to earn dollars. They will do this if they establish special techniques for trading with each other at high prices without having to face the competition of efficient producers in Canada and the United States. Exports by the countries forming this system to each other will be easier than exports to the western hemisphere. In the long run, I think such a system would break down. There are no continuing rewards for high cost production.

There is a remark which might well be borne in mind by people who seem to think that this question of exchanges is one that can be dealt with in an arbitrary manner by the wisdom of this or that person. "There are no continuing rewards for high cost production."

Also in this connection I should like to quote one sentence from a report by Mr. Towers. Mr. Rasminsky is a wise man and puts all his statements in a rather conditional form. He says it could have this effect or it could have that effect, but Mr. Towers goes a little further and says it did. I am quoting from page 5 of the report of the foreign exchange control board, at which point Mr. Towers says:

> Moreover, the discriminatory restrictions imposed on dollar expenditures keep out competition from the western hemisphere while the special financial arrangements referred to encourage trade within the area. In these circumstances trade within the area takes place in many cases on the basis of higher prices than those prevailing outside the area.

I suggest to the minister that he read, mark, learn and inwardly digest what those two able assistants of his have said.

I now wish to refer to one point which the minister made in his speech and which I really do not think he should have made. He referred to the possibility of the dollar going to some discount; and he said that might mean an addition of say seven per cent, or even ten per cent, to the cost of some things we have in Canada. It seems to me I remember that, in the decree which the minister made on November 17, 1947, some taxes were put on there that were not just seven per cent or ten per cent but were twenty-five per cent; and I suppose that they added to the cost of living.

Mr. Abbott: They were not on necessities, though.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not know about that. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) would tell you that they were on some necessities.

Mr. Jackman: Yes, sir.

Mr. Abbott: They were not on coal, oil, steel and bread.

Mr. Jackman: Ask your own colleagues; they will tell you.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I think that was not one of the minister's better answers.

Mr. Abbott: You find a better one yourself.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): In this connection I want to say a few words about the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), because he also took up the point. I am going to suggest to him that there is a danger in letting your whole economic thinking be governed by one particular consideration. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar seemed to be concentrating so much on the fact that there might be a little addition to the cost of living that, so far as I can see, he was prepared to contemplate a situation which might result in our losing hundreds of millions of dollars from the proceeds of selling our Canadian wheat. I should like to ask a simple question of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—I am sorry he is not here at the moment. Is it better to have some money in your pocket to buy things at a little higher price, or is it better to have prices low and to have no money in your pocket?

Do not let anyone suggest that I think that, if we again run into difficult prices for wheat, the western farmer is to be left to bear the whole burden. I do not suggest that policy at all, because we have learned a great deal since those days. Nevertheless I suggest that if Canada as a whole loses some hundreds of millions of dollars because our European market for food products is destroyed, that loss will hurt us all, including the western farmer—and it will hurt him most of all, because in many cases he will have to choose a different way of life. Such a situation would have far more than an economic effect, because if anything happens which lessens the agricultural population in this country, it is a great loss, not merely economically, but intellectually and spiritually as well.

Mr. Castleden: We tried the private enterprise system before.

Mr. Irvine: Does my hon. friend think that if we left exchange to its own way of doing things, the result would be a drop in the exchange, or a rise?

Mr. Jackman: Both.

Mr. Irvine: And if there should be a drop, would that help Europe and Britain to sell more goods to Canada?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I will not commit myself. I am not a prophet, or the son of a prophet, but I think I understand a principle when I see one. All I am saying is that you cannot indefinitely fight against the truth. You cannot indefinitely fight against reality. I shall have something more to say on that subject because I think we are coming to the stage when there must be a showdown with regard to these exchange rates. In turn, I should like to ask the hon. member a question; but I will not ask him to answer it now, because I do not want him to make a speech.

Mr. Irvine: I intend to do so after you finish.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to ask the hon. member this question. Is he ready to contemplate the situation which is developing now and which, if things are allowed to stand, may be crystallized and stereotyped so that, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) said the other day, you will have an iron curtain with the dollar on the one side and the pound on the other? What I read from the Economist a few moments ago indicates that we are on the way to that condition now. I suggest that there are no people in this house so greatly interested in preventing that situation as are those who represent western farming constituencies.

Mr. Irvine: The hon. gentleman did not ask me the question he was going to ask.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes, I did. I asked whether the hon. member was prepared to have the present situation between the sterling and dollar areas become crystallized. He need not answer it now. He can answer it later.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It has occurred to me that a large number of questions are being asked, and the house is not in committee.

Mr. Irvine: Nobody has answered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suggest that questions should not be asked so frequently.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to go on now and refer to the question of what can be done. The minister, with a slight sign of petulance which is most unusual in him—

Mr. Abbott: Surely not.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): —kept saying on Thursday, "But what can be done?" First of all, I say that nothing will ever be done unless you have an objective. My point is, as I said earlier, that our objective should be the restoration of reality—the restoration of convertibility. After all, we hoped for that in 1947. If the convertibility of the British pound had come about in 1947, we would have had a different world since. Hon. members will recall that when the United States made their first big loan after the war, that condition was stipulated; it was hoped that it could be done, but it was not done. In the meantime what I am complaining about is that the minister just asks us to continue the present situation. So far as one can see, he has not, for the moment, given us any hope of convertibility. So far as I can see, he is just ready to continue as we are and to ask us to hope for nothing for the next two years.

Happily, not everybody is taking that same attitude. There are other people—and people in prominent positions today—who seem to think that something can and should be done. I should like to read from the Economist of February 12, at page 272, at which is given an indication as to the views of that great man—as I think he is—Mr. Hoffman, who is in charge of the Marshall plan. After speaking encouragingly of the progress which they are making, he said this:

> The real proving period lies ahead—immediately ahead. This is the time to hit hard for European recovery; time for the Europeans to take the drastic and sometimes painful steps necessary for real recovery; time for the United States to back their efforts to the full.

Then the Economist goes on and says:

> Mr. Hoffman went on to outline to his listeners the "drastic steps" he has in mind. They follow closely the conclusions reached in the interim report produced by the OEEC—

The organization for European economic co-operation.

> —after Christmas—a document which incidentally earned Mr. Harriman's praise for its "rigorous honesty." The first—

One of Mr. Hoffman's points.

> —is the demand for an end to inflation and the stabilization of currencies in 1949.

You have Mr. Hoffman taking that attitude. After all, he is in a position of great influence.

You have another man, Mr. Snyder, at that time secretary of the treasury in the United States, taking a similar position. I read now from page 384:

> . . . Mr. Snyder remarked that the question of currency devaluation should be "explored with the European countries in receipt of Marshall aid." Mr. Snyder suggested that the overvaluation of European currencies provided a serious obstacle to the restoration of equilibrium in their balances of payments, and added that "it becomes a matter of grave direct concern to us when a European country tends (by overvaluing its currency) to retard its exports or misdirect its trade and increase its western hemisphere deficit, and thus indirectly increase its calls upon the United States for assistance."

That is the end of Mr. Snyder's statement. I should add that the Economist points out that on a former occasion Mr. Snyder excluded sterling from the countries to which he was giving this advice. Then the Economist goes on:

> But the conditions in which a deliberate overvaluation of European currencies was justified are rapidly departing, and the prevailing overvaluation is having a retarding effect on the efforts of the countries concerned to restore equilibrium.

I commend that also to the minister's consideration, because what I am advocating is not that anything can be done today or tomorrow, but we should make a beginning, and that beginning should be the making of the international monetary fund more flexible. The other day I ventured to make one suggestion. It is put forward as a suggestion of what might be a beginning: instead of being forced to fix the exchange rate, instead of a country having to come to the international monetary fund and say: We fix our rate at ninety-four cents or ninety-five cents or ninety-eight cents, there should be an area within which they would allow it to fluctuate. That is to say, we might make the floor at ninety cents and allow the dollar to find its own level. I will not pursue that further. We have expert men on the international monetary fund. My own feeling is that provided that we begin to get away from this rigidity, once we make a beginning, further progress may follow—and another thing is that it might be contagious. If we started we might find a lot of other people willing to come in too. I am perfectly sure of one thing: the situation cannot stand where it is. It is going to get better or worse. At the present time there are a good many things to make one feel that it is getting worse. Publicly, these men, Hoffman and Snyder—

Mr. Abbott: J. W. Snyder.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Former secretary of the treasury in the United States.

Mr. Abbott: He still is.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): These two men, who are in positions of key importance, have strongly taken the view that something should be done; that the present situation should not be left as it is forever. I venture to suggest that what I have read from these valued civil servants would indicate that their minds are moving in that direction. Perhaps what we need is action on the political level. We need an act of courage on this thing politically; it should not be left mired as it is now.

I should like to call another witness to support me. I am sure that this is a witness whom the minister will treat with some respect, because it is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The Minister of Agriculture of course has the great advantage of having lived in the west where they know more than others do about foreign trade. He is not a city slicker like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), or like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Mr. Abbott: Or the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I will have you know that I am from a rural riding.

Mr. Abbott: An absentee member.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): No, I am not an absentee member. I live there during a large part of the year.

This is a quotation from the Minister of Agriculture which is right down my alley. He says, as reported at page 1641 of Hansard:

I am inclined to agree with some of the statements that have been made from the other side of the house to the effect that something ought to be done about the convertibility of exchange—

That is all I am saying. Let us do something and not just talk about it. I continue:

—something ought to be done about the convertibility of exchange between all countries who are trying to co-operate in doing the same thing in the world.

Mr. Knowles: That is something.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes. I have tossed in my half pint; let other people do the same. The minister will not commit himself at all. He just says: As you were! and everything stays as is. I continue with the quotation of the Minister of Agriculture:

I am inclined to agree with that; but in spite of the fact that some people have credited me with stating the position very forcefully over in London, I still say that the best way to get a final result is to listen to what the other people have to say, to put forward our own views from time to time with regard to the matter and, since we are all friends, to co-operate with them in trying to get the results as quickly as possible not only in our own country but in all countries.

When I was speaking on Thursday one of the points I made was that one of the great arguments for this international monetary fund was that it would provide a forum. The minister said that they have a meeting once a year.

Mr. Abbott: Once a week.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Wait a minute—once a year, to which the minister goes. I want to get the minister in on this. I do not think things will happen until he gets in. He will not do much by going there once a year. He has got to give his mind to it.

I want to read just a sentence from the last report of the international monetary fund. I am ganging up on the minister with a lot of witnesses. Here is another one. What they say is this:

The fund agreement makes it clear that the provisions for the regulation of exchange rates are not intended to impose upon the fund the duty of perpetuating in the name of stability exchange rates which have lost touch with economic realities.

Further on they say:

There are indications, however, that in some countries the exchange rate is becoming a restraining factor on exports and that it is adding to the difficulty of earning convertible currencies.

I am suggesting that here, you might almost say, is a straight appeal to the political people back home who have the authority to give these people a chance to get on with it. At least that is the way I construe it.

I should like to read just a sentence from a document which is of great importance, put out by the top-ranking United States economic advisory committee at Washington, called the national advisory council on international monetary and financial problems. I wish to read the following from page 25:

Among the objectives of the fund has been the progressive removal of exchange controls.

We have had this present bill for three years; there has been no progressive removal, so far as I can see, and we are asked to have two more years of the same. I do not think it is good enough. I come back to what the minister said: "What can we do?" Well, Mr. Speaker, we practically invented this international monetary fund, as I understand it. We have a tremendous responsibility for it. As I understand it, we had the Keynes plan and the White plan, and it was Mr. Rasminsky who came along and reconciled them. The minister shakes his head. He had better learn more about it.

Mr. Abbott: He was at Bretton Woods.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps the minister has been doing good by stealth. Probably some of his officials have been doing more than he knows. At any rate the minister will not disagree when I say that we had quite a lot to do with the invention of it, and no one has a better right to make suggestions.

We have been talking pretty big. I have heard the minister speak in a grandiloquent manner about what the government has done. I do not object to that at times.

Mr. Abbott: And always strictly accurate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): That is all right; we must expect that, especially when an election is coming along; but speaking seriously, we are not a negligible factor. I should like to go back and ask the minister what would have happened in 1940 if we had said, What can we do? Anything we could do in 1940 because of our geography, and by our own efforts, enabled us to play a very important part in what was going on then, and there is no saying what might happen if a lead were given now. I am saying all this against a background not of favourable but unfavourable prospects. The Minister of Agriculture told us the other night that the agreement had been made for this year; let us not forget that it is because of United States money. Let us not be fooled because of what the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us about our wonderful position. Do not let us overlook the fact that we are standing on slippery places and that the thing could change so quickly that you could hardly recognize it. That is the basis on which I am putting this forward.

It might be asked: Well, why should we do it? Why does not the United States take the lead? I have quoted these important United States officials, and I think when the time comes they may take the lead; nevertheless it is likely that they might want to avoid doing anything like shaking the big stick. I think it is quite on the cards that they would be extremely pleased if we came forward. Because of our efforts and exertions during the war and since, we have a rather remarkable place for a small nation. No one doubts that. I think you might almost say that we are a natural for this job, because we would be much less open to jealousy than almost any other nation that I can think of. Why do we have to sit around paralysed for two years?

As a matter of fact I am giving the Minister of Finance a wonderful opportunity. I am giving him the chance to step out and provide the Abbott solution and have his name ring around the world as has Mr. Marshall's rung around the world. If he is going to do it I think it would be fair to have the election before it is done, because we do not want the minister to become world famous before the election.

Mr. MacNicol: He will not be here after the election.

Mr. Abbott: Don't be too sure. That was prophesied once before from that same seat.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Let me just sum up and poll my witnesses again—the governor of the bank; the associate chairman of the foreign exchange control board; Mr. Hoffman; Mr. Snyder; the international monetary fund; the London Economist. Remember, I do not for one moment hold myself out as an expert as against the Minister of Finance, but I hope he will pay attention to this noble array which I have paraded before him.

In these circumstances I move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green):

That the said bill be not now read the second time but that it be resolved that:

1. The Canadian dollar should be allowed to seek its true economic level within the limits imposed by the Bretton Woods agreement; and

2. It is expedient to present a measure to provide for the continuance in force of foreign exchange control with necessary modifications for not more than one year to permit representations to be made to the international monetary fund with a view to obtaining such modifications in its regulations as will permit an orderly revaluation of currencies to bring them to realistic levels and thus make the further continuation of foreign exchange control unnecessary.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

I wish to say only a few words about the amendment. In the first place, it was my understanding that when the amendment was ruled out before in the committee stage it was mainly on the ground that that was not the proper time to introduce it; that the amendment should have been made on second reading. While I do not wish to put words in the Speaker's mouth, at any rate that was the impression I got.

I sincerely hope that this amendment will be allowed to come to a vote, because it seems to me everyone should be in favour of the substance of it. How can anyone be against it? If it does not produce the results expected, it will be too bad, but how it could do any harm is beyond my understanding.

It will be observed that we have been very reasonable in indicating that if the government accepts this we shall be prepared to go along with some form of foreign exchange control. We do not say it in exactly this form, but we will be very co-operative—as we always are. I cannot see how any reasonable man could object to this proposal.

I close by saying that if Canada, which enjoys a unique reputation in Europe and in the United States, were to step forward and take vigorous action here, the psychological effect might be more than we could realize; it might supply the motive power to take us off the present dead centre which, if left long enough, will be fatal to free institutions.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word at this time, only as to the procedural question raised by the amendment. I am not an expert on procedure, as the house knows, but I do suggest that this amendment is out of order. It is an amendment relating to a money bill. While subsection 1 might conceivably be in order, I do not think a private member is free to introduce an amendment stating that it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the continuance in force of foreign exchange control with necessary modifications for not more than one year to permit representations to be made to the international monetary fund, and so on.

I believe that this part of the amendment should be ruled out of order on second reading, as it was at the resolution stage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do any other hon. members wish to make representations with respect to the amendment? I shall give it due consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, there are certain sections of Beauchesne's second edition which I believe are relevant to the point raised by the minister. While it will be agreed that no private member is free to amend a money bill, it is important to know exactly what is meant by the expression "money bill". I submit that the foreign exchange control measure now before the house is in no sense a money bill as intended by the rules. In citation 579 of Beauchesne's second edition he quotes from an authority of the British House of Commons in 1911, where "money bill" is defined. It states:

> A money bill means a public bill which in the opinion of the Speaker of the House of Commons contains only provisions dealing with all or any of the following subjects, namely, the imposition, repeal, remission, alteration, or regulation of taxation; the imposition for the payment of debt or other financial purposes of charges on the consolidated fund, or on money provided by parliament—

And so on. Then he quotes a lengthy definition of "money bill", and continues by saying:

> The word "only" is very important in the above statutory definition. May, 13th edition, page 436, note, says: "It may therefore be well to notice here that a bill for granting aids or supplies to the crown may fail to secure the Speaker's certificate as a money bill as its provisions are not confined to the objects contained in the statutory definition."

I believe it is clear, and I am sure even the minister will agree, that the objects of this particular bill are by no means confined to the statutory definition to which I have referred, namely, a bill dealing only with matters of taxation or charges upon the revenue. That is the accepted definition of a money bill.

One might call this bill merely a procedural one to continue in force for a further period of time a statute already on the statute book. I submit without hesitation that the bill now before us does not come within the definition of "money bill", and that therefore the amendment is in order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in the discussion on the point of order, chiefly because of the citation just read by the hon. member for Kamloops. I believe the Minister of Finance has really put his finger on the nub of the question. Frankly, I believe it is possible to word an amendment to the motion for second reading which would be in keeping with citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition, which would declare a principle such as that in the proposed amendment, and still be in order. Unfortunately the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, instead of declaring some principle, has taken the prerogative of a minister to suggest that it is expedient to introduce a measure involving the expenditure of money.

The hon. member for Kamloops has endeavoured to base his case as to the propriety of the amendment on citation 579 of Beauchesne's second edition, on the basis of which he argues that this is not a money bill. I must say the hon. member drew my attention privately a few days ago to the citation he has just read, and when I first looked at it I found it perplexing. However it was not very difficult to discover what it was all about. All one has to do, as I would expect the hon. member for Kamloops to do, is to look at citation 579 in its context. It will be noted that citation 579 in Beauchesne's second edition is one of the notes listed following standing order 61. Standing order 61 is the standing order which says in effect that all bills voting money are the sole gift of the House of Commons.

Let me repeat that the purpose of standing order 61 is to say that money bills must originate in the House of Commons only; in other words, they cannot originate in the other place. I believe what has happened is that we have fallen into the practice of calling any bill involving the expenditure of money a money bill. Technically speaking, money bills are those bills which vote money, in other words, the supply bills.

Standing order 61 and citation 579 deal solely with that question. The effect of citation 579 is that a money bill, that is to say a bill voting money, cannot be denied introduction in the Senate if it has something else attached to it. Let me repeat that what this whole section in Beauchesne's second edition deals with is the question of defining a money bill. A money bill is a government bill which does nothing but vote money; and that kind of bill can originate only in the House of Commons. Citation 579 protects the rights of the Senate to this extent: if a money bill asking that money be voted has something in it besides the voting of aid or supply, then it could originate in the Senate. Section 53 of the British North America Act reads:

> Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Entirely apart from what are correctly defined as money bills, namely, bills that vote aid or supply and nothing else, are public bills which involve the expenditure of money. Such a bill can be introduced in either house, but when it is presented it must be introduced by a minister who is able to say that His Excellency has seen it and has approved of it. I submit that the citation referred to by the hon. member for Kamloops does not apply to this bill at all. That citation merely defines clearly what is a money bill. He is correct in saying that this is not a money bill; in other words, it is not a bill for voting aid or supply and nothing else. This is a public bill involving the expenditure of money and therefore it has to be introduced by a minister of the crown, and so would an amendment of the kind now before us, which I feel is therefore out of order.

Mr. Jackman: May I point out that, instead of this bill involving the expenditure of money, if the foreign exchange control board continues to go on in the same manner as it has during the last few years it will show considerable revenue for the crown. Last year the profit under the regulations under this bill amounted to $10 million.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank hon. members for the assistance they have given me in coming to a conclusion. I must say that it seems to me that this is a public bill involving the expenditure of money, and I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Harry R. Jackman (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, when the minister introduced the resolution on March 17 he said that no doubt the house would hear something about the criticism which was leveled at the government in regard to the change which was made in the rate of Canada's currency in July, 1946. That was the time when it was restored to parity with the United States dollar. May I quote one or two of the remarks of the minister, as reported on page 1566 of Hansard:

—that move was hailed with satisfaction by virtually every section of the country—

The minister went on to quote from an editorial which had appeared in the Globe and Mail, as follows:

It was designedly kept at 90 cents for several reasons, not least among them the protection of our future competitive trading position. It is, therefore, somewhat silly for some quarters to attempt to make political capital of the government's action as a "masterstroke" of economic strategy.

I do not know to what political quarters they were referring.

Mr. Abbott: That is the Globe and Mail; it is not my statement.

Mr. Jackman: I realize that, but they were referring to the attempt to make political capital of this masterstroke. The minister went on to quote the editorial as follows:

The return to parity must be read as an accurate indication of the impact of United States conditions on our economic structure. The change was forced on us by the inflationary trend within the United States.

There was an inflationary trend in the United States where the price level was higher than in Canada. Certainly the foreign exchange control board was never designed to control the cost of living in Canada. The purpose sought to be achieved in July, 1946, was to keep down the price level in Canada, something which had nothing to do with the control of exchange. We found the government at that time using the board for a purpose for which they should never have used it, using it for a purpose which was not proper.

If the minister thinks that any kudos is due to his own party for the restoring of the Canadian dollar to so-called parity with the United States dollar on July 5, 1946, may I read to him what I said during the debate on foreign exchange control on July 2, 1946. I think I am usually fair to the government, and here is what I said at that time, as reported on page 3048 of Hansard:

However, I will say this on behalf of the board. It is convenient for traders on international account to know that they can buy foreign exchange at a fixed rate and sell it at a fixed rather than a fluctuating rate.

In other words, there are a number of businessmen in this country who like to make their money without having to work for it. If they can buy exchange at one fixed rate and sell it at another fixed rate, so that they cannot possibly lose, it is a very simple way of making a considerable amount of money in view of the transactions involved. As I pointed out, the rather small percentage which the board takes is sufficient to pay all its operating expenses and the high salaries of the officials of the board and still show a profit of no less than $10 million, but which is still an exaction from the business community of Canada. I went on to say:

But the danger is that if these rates are artificial and are sometimes subjected to severe readjustment —the Canadian dollar is now selling too low in world markets—the readjustment to a proper value if it comes suddenly may cause real hardship, which would be avoided if the readjustment came gradually and the higher level of the dollar was foreshadowed by gradual increases in its value.

There was no reason why the government should expect any particular praise because of the change in the value of the dollar at that time, because that change was foreshadowed by economic events. Had the control board not been in existence we would have found the Canadian dollar to be quite close to parity with the United States dollar. The minister now suggests that we are criticizing the action taken at that time. The armistice had just come about a short time before—

Mr. Abbott: A year before.

Mr. Jackman: A year before, if you like, and the boys were still coming home from overseas. We were still in a chaotic state and no one knew precisely what was going to happen. It was still a period of hush-hush; we were not being told a great deal, there were secrets as to the troops coming home, and so on. At that time we felt that perhaps it might be just as well, the office of price administration in the United States having expired on July 1, 1946, that some action be taken. We were not in possession of sufficient information at the time to criticize, even if we had desired to criticize.

I should like to point out that one projects these difficult and technical questions with a certain amount of humility, which indeed is becoming I think when one questions policies on foreign exchange or matters having to do with international finance. They are not easy even for those who are privileged to devote all their time to them. In fact, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), we find great differences of opinion among the so-called experts. Our economic and financial system is like Topsy—it just grew. It has grown sufficiently to give the United States and Canada the highest standard of living of any two countries in the world. All countries in which there are great financial centres have a higher standard of living than other countries. These natural economic laws functioned, and it was under them that we achieved a high standard of living. To get away from this natural working and to put ourselves in the hands of helmsmen who are economic experts but who cannot possibly foresee all the reactions to their policies, and all the repercussions which may arise from any particular line of action, is something which we on this side of the house do not favour. It has often happened in the past that a policy, which was a part of a plan that was designed to do good, has had in it the seeds of a much worse condition than existed before. In other words, the cure was worse than the disease. That is the general philosophic reason, if you like, founded on facts in great number, why we do not favour controls unless it can be shown that the controls are getting us somewhere.

In my opinion the minister made not a bad defence of the operations of the foreign exchange control board during the last few years, but it was entirely one-sided. That is something which I regret should come into a discussion of this highly technical subject. I believe that the house is entitled to all the information on both sides. The minister has the advantage of his economic advisers, who, as I say, spend all their time on these matters. They have a great many relevant facts on both sides of the question which might well be put before the house. I cannot help but say, when I recall the cries about filibustering in the house, that if we on this side, and in the Progressive Conservative party in particular, were not eager to see these measures carried through and debated as well as possible and as quickly as possible, we certainly would have asked that this bill go before the banking and commerce committee as it did a few years ago. There we could have called expert witnesses and businessmen; we could have found out exactly what the pros and cons are, and what would be the best solution to this very pressing problem. As it is we are doing the best we can, within the confines of the formalities of the house and the committee of the house which will follow; but it does not take the place of the banking and commerce committee. The only reason we have not asked for that is that time is fast slipping by, and the end of the month will soon be here when the regulation will expire if not given a further lease of life. Therefore I hope that the house will appreciate that we have done everything we could to expedite the matter, and that if we had wished to filibuster we certainly might have filibustered, to use the word in a very proper sense, and have obtained the information we rightly require.

The minister, with all the eloquence he could command, pointed out what he thought would happen if the value of the Canadian dollar were lowered in relation to other world currencies—which, by the way, is not necessarily a policy that we would advocate. What we want to see is a dollar which is influenced by natural and normal economic trends as they exist today, and not one which is subject to the ukase of the government itself. If the Canadian dollar were cheapened in relation to other world currencies, it is true, as the minister said, that it would be more difficult for the United Kingdom, which no doubt would like to get more Canadian dollars, to sell in this market; but then we must always look at the other side of the shield. By having a cheaper dollar, if that resulted from natural laws, it would be that much easier for the United Kingdom to buy our products, to buy our wheat, our bacon, and whatever else was required.

As I have pointed out, one must always consider both sides of the question, and it is by no means a simple one, to find what the right answer is. As every businessman, farmer, and storekeeper in the house knows, in our economic system there are certain natural laws that operate when one thing gets out of adjustment with another. Certain influences are set in motion which tend to right that condition. Now that we have fixed controls and regulations those natural laws are offset. We go along in definite, arbitrary channels and often end up in the situations where we are much worse off than we were at the beginning. We have cultivated the sore spots rather than allowing them to be cured rapidly through the natural working of economic laws.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

Foreign Exchange Control

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Jackman: Mr. Speaker, before the noon recess it had been pointed out that variations in exchange rates followed natural economic causes and brought about the rectification of any lack of balance there might be between the currencies of various countries. I referred to the fact that the Bretton Woods agreement brought about certain rigidities which did not allow exchanges to fluctuate so that these discrepancies between international currencies could be ironed out in the ordinary self-righting process. It was also pointed out that while the move on July 5, 1946, might have been one in which the great majority of the people could have concurred, especially in the direction it took, because there was no doubt at that time that our dollar was worth a great deal more than ninety cents in relation to the United States dollar, it would be foolhardy for anyone to say that the value of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar since 1946 has, at all times, been as one hundred is to one hundred.

It has not been so because the currency of any country will vary according to conditions and according to the prospects which exist in men's minds from time to time. These variations bring about self-righting devices which are good for any country, and which are even necessary, because if the correction does not take place at the appropriate and natural time, then the correction will very likely have to take place at a subsequent and perhaps much more painful time.

In his remarks the other day the minister built up as strong a case as he could for the policy that the government has pursued through its agency, the foreign exchange control board. If the Canadian dollar were, I will not say devalued, because that is not necessarily the policy of the Progressive Conservative party—our policy is simply aimed at freedom of exchange and an approach to reality as soon as that is possible —but if the Canadian dollar were to go to ninety or ninety-five cents, it would be not only harder for England to sell, as the minister pointed out, but as I pointed out it would be easier for England to buy. It is a question of where the greater benefit to Canada lies.

I might point out further that, if our dollar did find a naturally lower level and England were able to buy more from us but we were not able to buy so much from England because of our cheaper dollar, we would nevertheless, because England bought more from us, have far more sterling and it might be that having more sterling we might be able to buy more goods in the United Kingdom even though the prices were fractionally higher. There are so many repercussions in the matter of foreign exchange that it is quite beyond the power of any of these so-called experts to say exactly what the reactions and repercussions are going to be.

For generations we have had an entirely free economy whereby exchange found its own level. Under that system we prospered and our country built up one of the highest standards of living the world has ever seen. May I point out to you, sir, that as the minister mentioned the Canadian dollar is fairly strong at the present time. But it might be that in place of the Canadian dollar selling at a discount in relation to the United States dollar, it might sell at a premium. Such a thing is not beyond the bounds of imagination. If the Canadian dollar were to sell at a premium, as it has in the past, in relation to the United States dollar, the contention of the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), that his people would have to pay more for oranges if our policy were carried out, would be reversed. If by following its natural course the Canadian dollar were to sell at a premium, we could import citrus fruits for the people of this country at cheaper prices than it is possible to have under control.

I should like to mention the recent move of Belgium which was made known last week. This article is taken from the Globe and Mail and is attributed to the New York Times. It is headed "Belgian Monetary Move is Seeking Free Economy." I would think this article was very much to the point at which hon. members on this side of the house are driving. We are attempting to have a free economy and get away from the restrictions which lead to complications one cannot expect, against which one does not know how to guard oneself, and which alter the course of international trade and international liberty. The article reads as follows:

> Almost unnoticed, Belgium has just taken two daring steps toward making the Belgian franc a fully convertible currency.
> The first former belligerent country receiving Marshall plan aid to tackle the realities of post-war commercial competition, Belgium has become the first country to make good on promises made by all Marshall plan countries to re-establish internal-external monetary stability.

Then farther down the article reads as follows:

> The National Bank took a calculated risk. It bet, in effect, that the Belgian economy could stand the shock of being called upon to pay off in goods many millions of dollars in claims represented by Belgian franc notes that had been selling at a discount on free markets against the dollar and the Swiss franc. This is a risk no other European ex-belligerent has taken.
>
> The second significant move toward throwing away the monetary crutches was Thursday's decision to permit United States and Swiss individuals and companies, whose accounts in Belgian banks have been frozen since the war, to use their money freely for purchases in Belgium.

Both moves are part of a consistently followed economic policy unique in Europe, because it places the establishment of a free economy above economic security. Both steps are risky because they might lead to a serious outflow of capital which Belgium cannot afford. Belgians believe that if every European country retains shackles on commerce until there is no risk in removing them, Europe will be bogged down forever in economic controls.

Authorities plan to unblock other foreign accounts the same as the American and Swiss.

In other words, the great Belgian economists, financiers and statesmen realize that if these controls continue indefinitely Europe will become bogged down in economic controls and there will not be the same freedom in exchange of goods or the same general level of prosperity that there might be if these controls were abandoned. Belgium has taken the bull by the horns and eliminated some of the rigidity which formerly held sway over exchange movements.

Canada has subscribed to the Bretton Woods agreement and, with the exception of a small group in this house, every party enthusiastically endorsed it at the time it was passed in 1945. In the last annual report of Bretton Woods, however, we find that the chairman of the fund states that the board is quite willing to have the various countries come before them, put their problems before the members and re-examine whether or not the rate of their national currencies is sound in view of present conditions. So that it would seem that the international monetary fund governors do not for a moment say that the fixed rates of exchange which the various countries established when they became members of the fund are necessarily the right ones; it would seem that these rates should be examined from time to time, and that perhaps now is one of the times when such an examination should take place.

When Bretton Woods was formed it was hoped first that the various clauses under that agreement would shorten the time during which international currencies could once again find a free convertible level; and, second, that the formation of Bretton Woods would ease the period of readjustment until exchanges became once more freely convertible. We have seen that this purpose has not been possible of fulfilment partly because of the unusual situation in which Europe, Great Britain and some of the other countries found themselves after the war. In place of looking forward with happy expectation to the near future when these various currencies will be convertible, we find that in many of the European countries there are growing up some of the evils which Bretton Woods was formed to prevent. Indeed we find some of these evils are growing up in more exaggerated form than we would have expected to find them if there had not been Bretton Woods itself.

Under the international monetary fund it was hoped that any correction of exchanges that had to take place would be done through an expansion, rather than through a restriction, of trade. Yet my colleague, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), gave to the house this morning various extracts from the report of the foreign exchange control board indicating that there was a tightening of commerce rather than an expansion of it, due to some of the currency restrictions which are today imposed. I point out therefore that there is no use of anyone endeavouring to play the legendary part of King Canute and the sea. You just cannot stop an economic trend. If we endeavour to defeat economic laws through too great rigidities in the operation of a measure like the Foreign Exchange Control Act, we are only storing up trouble for ourselves, and indeed multiplying that trouble.

One has only to refer to page 5 of the report of the foreign exchange control board to realize some of the things that are going on. On that page one finds the following:

The prices at which commodities are exchanged in such bilateral deals are frequently considerably higher than those prevailing for similar goods outside the protected trading area.

That is the type of thing that Bretton Woods was supposed to prevent. To continue:

Moreover, the discriminatory restrictions imposed on dollar expenditures keep out competition from the western hemisphere.

That is, we in the western hemisphere cannot compete there because they have not the necessary dollars and they make it impossible to exchange in their own sterling or whatever currency they are using.

In these circumstances trade within the area takes place in many cases on the basis of higher prices than those prevailing outside the area.

That again is the very type of thing which Bretton Woods sought to obviate.

It is easier for countries within the protected area to buy from each other than from dollar countries because they are better supplied with each other's currencies than with dollars, and it is more profitable for the individual producer in any country within the area to export to another country within the area than to dollar countries because better prices are frequently available.

That is one of the reasons why we have not been getting as much European goods as we might have been getting, and as much as we would have been willing to take. Those exporting countries are getting a higher price in the European circle than they would get if they exported to the dollar area. Indeed I hope that all hon. members will read the report of the board because I think it is factual and is objective in many cases. I should like to read this further excerpt:

It is, however, also important to recognize that there is a risk that the special measures taken to maintain and develop trade within this group of countries—

That is, in the ERP countries.

—may have the effect of reducing their productivity as well as their capacity to earn dollars and so to balance their accounts in this desirable way.

This risk is present because--as will be apparent from what has been said—trade within the group of countries concerned does not move entirely on the basis of competitive price and quality.

In other words, world trade is anything but free under the Bretton Woods agreement. What we are asking for is that there be less rigidity and that, as soon as possible, we get back to the normal state of affairs; because we are breeding certain things which will make conditions more difficult than ever. As I said this morning, the cure may indeed be worse than the disease itself. To quote further from the report:

The tendency for trade within the protected area to take place at a higher level of prices than that prevailing for similar commodities in outside countries cannot fail, as has been noted, to make it more profitable for the individual producer in the countries concerned to sell within the area than in dollar countries.

In other words, keep your goods away from dollar countries and let the dollar countries make donations to you as much as possible.

And a general consequence of the developments outlined is to raise the price and cost structure of the countries inside the area and so reduce their capacity to export to dollar markets.

In other words, what is going on there has the effect of increasing the cost in these European countries so that their level of cost is so high that they cannot sell to Canada. If they had devaluation of their currencies, they would find they could sell to Canada because devaluation of their currencies would mean that, in relation to the Canadian dollar or at least to the American dollar, we could buy their exports notwithstanding the fact that their internal costs were too high for the export market. To continue:

Canadian trade has already been adversely affected by the creation of this protective currency and trading area and it is not possible at this moment to foresee how serious these developments will be from our point of view during the next few years.

Here the board cautions us that the tendencies which are developing in Europe at the present time may become aggravated; and it is impossible even for those great foreseers of our destiny, those in the board, to foresee how serious these developments will be from our point of view during the next few years. Like myself, they admit that they cannot tell what is going to happen, but they want to play the artificial way instead of allowing natural economic forces to come into operation. A few lines farther down we find this statement:

In this connection encouragement is to be drawn from the recent successful efforts of the United Kingdom to increase their exports to Canada. The performance of other parts of the sterling area and most other ERP countries is less encouraging, and there seems little doubt that competitive offerings would find Canada able to absorb larger quantities of goods from these countries than we are now obtaining.

In other words, in this country we are doing all we can to put Europe on its feet, and yet because of certain exchange fixations, I shall call them, the producers of these countries have been able to make a greater profit in their own currency by sending their goods to some country other than the United States or Canada. We find that while we take all we can, we are not getting from them what we should get because, as the report so well states:

. . . there seems little doubt that competitive offerings would find Canada able to absorb larger quantities of goods from these countries than we are now obtaining.

As I said this morning, if it were not for the fact that we in the Progressive Conservative party are eager to have this measure passed on and put in statute form as soon as possible, we should certainly ask for a hearing before the banking and commerce committee, so that we could find out from the writers of this report exactly what they mean by individual cases which gave rise to putting these words in this published report of the foreign exchange control board.

At the bottom of page 6 the report continues:

The countries whose exports are affected by these restrictions will be confronted with the choice of finding some alternative use, at home or in other foreign markets, for the goods previously exported to the dollar-short countries or making special arrangements in an effort to retain these markets.

The reason I read this paragraph is that the gentlemen who are advising the government on foreign exchange also foresee in the future further difficulties, and nothing is being done under Bretton Woods at the present time to keep down these difficulties and to approximate what would be the natural working of normal economic laws. The report goes on to say that these are the difficulties that we may expect to find under the present arrangements:

These arrangements could involve the provision of the exports without payment in foreign exchange, through the extension of grants or credits, or special deals in which the exporting country agreed to use the proceeds of its exports to take more goods from its dollar-short customers even though these goods were higher in price than had to be paid elsewhere. To make room for these relatively high-priced imports it would be necessary to impose discriminatory import restrictions.

Thus we have to go against our undertakings under Geneva; so that we find that even the foreign exchange control board does not offer us very much hope under the present system of controls. If there is no hope under that system, then surely the least we can do is to go back to the natural working of things where, when one currency gets out of line with another, certain self-righting devices are put into force automatically, and we again come to a normal and natural balance of currency between countries.

If our dollar in Canada were to go to some slight discount—and I do not expect it would be many points in discount in relation to the United States dollar today—we might find that the situation was beneficial to us, because we are primarily a primary-producing country. Let us look at our geography from east to west. In the maritimes we find fish, apples and potatoes, all export commodities. If our dollar were slightly less than a hundred it would give us an advantage in exporting to the United States market or to other markets.

If we go to Quebec and Ontario we find our great storehouse of forest products and minerals, most of which again are exported to the United States. Passing further west to the prairie provinces we find wheat, cattle and bacon, all of which would be easier to export if we had a slight discount on our dollar. When we come to our pacific province we find there forest products and fish, which are export commodities and which would find a readier market in the world today if our dollar were slightly less than one hundred cents. Therefore we have nothing much to fear if our dollar is at a slight discount from the United States dollar.

Another reason why we should go into this matter with the so-called experts to find out exactly how the problem hits them is that when this matter of exchange was before the house earlier we were not only in a period of full employment but there were more jobs than there were applicants available. Today we are beginning to have some spotty unemployment, and in some instances that unemployment is in the export industries, for example, lumber. The policy that a country pursues in relation to its exchange when it has full employment as against a time when there is a shortage of employment is entirely different. We found after the war that when every country was short of goods it wanted to establish its currency at as high a rate as possible because it was a buyer. The more they could get for their pound or their franc, or whatever it might be, the better off they were. Now we are beginning to see at least the possibility of running into a situation such as we saw in the thirties, when the whole attempt was to depreciate currency in order to export unemployment, as it was called. In other words, make your goods cheap enough so that other countries will buy them, and keep your population active and busy and give them at least a fair standard of living.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I did not intend to take part in this debate, but recently I received a telegram from a good Progressive Conservative friend of mine in St. Andrews. If it is in order I shall put it on the record. It reads as follows:

> How about telling the house how the foreign exchange control act affects your constituency in Charlotte county? Best regards.
> Doug Everett

At the outset I wish to say that in the county of Charlotte the foreign exchange control board has been a source of worry to the people because, when the premium they were getting on their United States money was taken from them, they resented the fact that they had lost 10 per cent of their earnings. Another matter which caused great concern to these people was the restrictions which were put on the international border after the foreign exchange control board began to function and after the austerity program was put into effect. As we all know, the people on the international border resented these restrictions to a great extent.

In listening to the debate thus far I have noted that the Progressive Conservatives are basing their arguments on the fact that the Canadian dollar should be permitted to seek its own level. During my lifetime there have been two occasions when the Canadian dollar was permitted to seek its own level. On both these occasions a Progressive Conservative government sat on this side of the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? I know he wants to be fair. If he is referring to me I should like to ask him this question. Is he aware that I did not make that suggestion? My suggestion was that there should be a floor of ninety cents so that if there was any tendency to wild fluctuation it could be controlled.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I do not believe I suggested that the hon. gentleman said that. I said that the Progressive Conservatives have based their argument on the fact that the dollar should be permitted to seek its own level. If the hon. member looks at Hansard

I believe he will find those words appearing there one hundred times in the last ten days. As I was saying, during my lifetime I have known two occasions when the Canadian dollar was allowed to seek its own level. Those two periods which I shall mention briefly were both at a time when the Conservative party was sitting on this side of the house.

The first period to which I shall refer was the one between 1915 and 1920. At that time I was a very young man in the fishing industry down along the international border. I do feel that people living on the international border have a much better idea of the effect of discounts and premiums on money than people living farther away. For that reason I feel I am in a position to explain conditions exactly as they existed at that time.

I remember very well on many occasions going to Eastport, Maine, and getting an American cheque for sardines I had sold in the United States. I would bring it home and go to the bank with it. But I would have to take along with me to the bank someone who was well acquainted with the bank manager before I could get the premium I was supposed to get, or before I could get the premium that businessmen, doing a much larger business than I was, were receiving.

There are men sitting on the other side of the house now who may have had experiences at that time, but they were not on the international border. I can assure the house that, from 1915 to 1920, at no time in Charlotte county or in the state of Maine on the international border could you find rates of exchange posted; if you happened to go in with a few fish scales in your hair or a few hayseeds you were given 10 per cent. But if I were making a transaction and if I got a businessman in the town who was well acquainted with the banker and who knew local conditions better than I did, I would get 15 or 18 per cent.

Now the Progressive Conservative party are arguing that we should go back to that type of thing. I can assure you that the people down where I live do not want any part of that at all. There is a story I have told in the house on one other occasion when this matter was up for discussion. I well remember a man and his wife going to the bank in the town where I live—and that banker still lives here in the province of Ontario. He was the manager of the bank at that time. Apparently the larger the amount of money you had in those days, the greater percentage you got. If you had a thousand dollars you got a better premium than if you had $500.

They both had interests in sardine herring weirs. The woman went to the bank with $1,200, and they gave her 12 per cent. When they were ready to go home her husband said to her, "You made a good day's pay today on your American exchange." She said, "Yes, I got 12 per cent." He said, "No, there is some mistake; I had only $800 but I got 15 per cent." They went back to the bank, and after an embarrassing scene the bank manager apparently decided that he should pay her 3 per cent more on the $1,200.

There were many many instances exactly as I have described which took place at that time. I remember another occasion when a good friend of mine, who is still living down there today, had a like experience. He was living on the other side of St. George, a little town in my county. He was going to St. Stephen to buy a car and had an American cheque. He went to the bank manager in St. George and asked what premium they would give, and they said 12 per cent. He came to St. Andrews and they offered 15 per cent. Then he came to St. Stephen and after going to two or three banks he kept trying until he got 18 per cent. That was the condition which prevailed down there. And I could give a hundred examples of conditions which prevailed between 1915 and 1920.

That was a time when the Conservative party sat here in office—the Tories. That was the condition we had down there then, and we had to put up with it.

Mr. Graydon: What year was that?

Mr. Brooks: Union government.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That was between 1915 and 1920. And I can remember very well the year 1918 when I went into the sardine industry. I can assure you that is the condition which existed in 1918.

Mr. Graydon: You had Liberals in that government then.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No; they were Conservatives.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): You are not discussing the exchange rate; you are discussing dishonesty.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I did not interrupt you when you spoke. I am addressing my remarks to the Chair, and everything I say is correct. I can substantiate every statement I have made.

Another statement made here today contained the suggestion that, if there were a premium on American money, much more American funds would come into this country for investment in industry. Well, when I hear members speak in that way I just look back to the period between 1930 and 1935, when the premium went as high as 25 per cent. I would ask some hon. members on the opposite side of the house to tell me where is this enormous amount of money that the Americans poured into Canada during that time for the development of industry in this country. Because, if it did come in, none of it came to the section of the country in which I live; I can assure you of that.

I come to the period between 1930 and 1935. Again I was engaged in the fishing industry. At that time I think a dollar looked about as big as it ever did at any time in the history of Canada. Again the premium on American funds went as high as 24 per cent. That is the highest point I can remember. That premium of 24 per cent was a big help when we were selling our produce for practically nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): All right, you may thump your desks; but I want to tell you what happened then. Our American friends who were buying sardines said, "This is too good a thing to lose." They came over into my county and deposited their American dollars in the banks. Those funds were deposited in the banks of Charlotte county. They took the 25 per cent premium themselves, and paid me in Canadian funds.

The member who sat on this side of the house from my county at that time is a very fine man; he is living today. He was well aware that that condition existed, because it was brought to his attention on many occasions. But we were still paid in Canadian funds. Our American friends took the 25 per cent premium, when they brought the cash into Canada. Some of you people who live near the international border would perhaps remember those circumstances; I remember them well. And I tell you today that many people who are arguing that this Canadian dollar should be allowed to seek its own level are showing selfish motives. I believe that at some time or other they themselves have been benefited by that condition. I do not believe that the primary producers who are carrying on in industry, as I was during the two periods I have mentioned, would want to see the Canadian dollar seek its own level and be handled under the same conditions as it was in those times.

I now come to my explanation as to why I have supported and still support the foreign exchange control board. When war broke out in 1939 a Liberal government was sitting on this side of the house. They decided there must be no manipulation of funds, so far as they were concerned, and they pegged the American dollar at a 10 per cent premium. From 1940 until 1946, I believe it was, when the premium was taken off, I could walk into the same bank I spoke about earlier, pass in my American cheques and get back exactly the same premium as the Prime Minister of this country or anyone else.

To me that is democracy. That is why I have supported the foreign exchange control board, and that is why I maintain that the board has done a good job. There was no exporter or importer who could take any advantage from the situation, because each and every person was given exactly the same premium.

Mr. Hatfield: Was not that 10 per cent a help to your fishermen?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I have not argued that it was not, and I have said they resent the fact that they are not getting it today. And I believe the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) will admit he has made plenty from foreign exchange, as others have. I think that is one reason why many of them today are speaking as they do—because they were benefited by it. But, as I said before, they are taking a selfish attitude. You have to look at the general picture, and we should all be working for the benefit of the greatest number.

Another feature I might mention is this. Ninety per cent of the fuel oil and gasoline used in this country is being imported from the United States. If our Canadian dollar went down to 60 or 65 cents—and we do not know where it might go—where would those people be who are obliged to use this necessary commodity which we must import from the United States? There are two sides to the question.

Then, as to coal. We import great quantities of coal into Canada. I believe today that if we were obliged to pay a 20 or 30 per cent discount on the Canadian dollar we would find it difficult to bring in that coal with which to do our manufacturing. I believe that the man who should have been given some consideration is the primary producer, particularly the primary producer who is marketing his own products. That is the man I am fighting for. I have no worry about the man who is buying from him and selling again, but the primary producer who is selling his own product should be given some consideration.

Mr. Brooks: Would not the fisherman who is selling fish get the ten per cent under these circumstances? If you wish to support him would you not have to vote for that?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No, I cannot see it. As I have explained, the United States importers can come over and deposit United States money in Canada. We would have no assurance that we would get the premium.

We did not get it under the Conservative government from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. Brooks: I understood the hon. member to say that the foreign exchange control board was controlling that at the present time. If it is, the fishermen would get the benefit of the ten per cent.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is what the hon. member believes. The hon. member is ready to discard the foreign exchange control board which would bring about the same conditions as those existing between 1930 and 1935. What guarantee would we have that we would get the premium on United States money? I can tell hon. members that I was paid hundreds of dollars for sardines which were sold in the United States, but that it was all paid in Canadian money. There was nothing we could do about it. I can assure hon. members that that statement is correct. As I have said, I support the foreign exchange control board for the reason that since it has come into existence each and every citizen of this country has been treated exactly the same. I for one would not want to see the day come again when one man will get 18 per cent premium for his United States dollar and another only 12 per cent. For that reason I will support this measure and I feel that I have the support of a good many people in Canada in making that statement.

Mr. William Irvine (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us for second reading merely provides that the Foreign Exchange Control Act shall remain in force and have effect until sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year one thousand nine hundred and fifty-one. I had hoped that the bill would pass its second reading before the noon hour, but after listening to the speech of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) I am moved to inflict another speech on this assembly.

That hon. gentleman is one whom we all respect most highly and who usually has something worth while to say. If I should strike fairly strongly at what he said today, I hope he will not regard it as being a personal matter. I assure him that I hold him in the very highest regard indeed—

An hon. Member: But.

Mr. Irvine: —but I listened—I know these "buts" are bound to come, but this is something human that I am trying to say. I shall try to be human about this. During the hon. member's speech I was reminded of the story that is told about Browning. Some friend quoted a verse of Browning to Browning and then asked Browning if Browning knew what it meant. He thought for a little while and then he said, "I have no doubt that when I wrote those lines I had something in mind, but what that was now God only knows". No doubt the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario had something in mind, but what that was I know that most of us do not know; I do not know whether he knows and I shall not speculate as to what other powers may know.

The hon. member seemed rather ill at ease. He appeared to me as having been called upon to spearhead an attack in which he had no heart, which he felt he could not properly defend. He seemed to be performing a task perhaps for reasons of friendship or honour. He did not attempt to give whatever reason there was for objecting to the bill, if indeed there ever was a reason. If there was a reason for his opposition I still do not know what it was. It may have been that what he saw wrong in the bill was really something which he was unable to state. It may have been that he fully intended to say what was wrong, if anything was wrong, but that he failed to say what it was, or what he would do about the thing that was wrong.

Mr. MacInnis: If it was wrong.

Mrs. Strum: Or what it was.

Mr. Irvine: If it was wrong. He said that he was living in a dream world and I think it was hardly necessary for him to assure the house about that because I think he proved that to the hilt. He went on to say that it was so difficult to settle exchange problems that even the wisest man or the wisest group of men might blunder in doing it. Since it was so difficult to solve problems of exchange we were to leave it alone, not to touch it at all, as though there was some inherent, infallible intelligence in exchange itself which would guide it properly in its operations in the nation's business. Therefore, he said, leave it to settle itself.

But there seemed to be a great many differences even about what "settle" means to the official opposition. Some say it means to find its own level—it never had a level. Others say it is to find a realistic position in which it can rest—its position was always realistic. Others say it is to devalue the dollar. It is really not clear what it is that foreign exchange should be left alone to settle, but whatever it is I do not believe it can do it if it is left alone.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario wants to have it crystallized. I have no objection to crystallizing it. He wants a restoration of reality. I will tell him that reality needs no restoration. Reality will always be able to restore itself. He can be absolutely sure about that, and need not worry further about it. Finally, at the close of his speech, in apparent desperation he said, "Mr. Speaker, let's do something." It seems to me that when he said, "let's do something" what he really meant was, "let's do nothing", just as when his associates moved that the question be now put they moved that in order that the question should not be now put. Here is a case where he cries out to do something, meaning that they do not want to do anything; and to do something means that you kill the only bill that proposes to do anything.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Irvine: As I saw him in this dream world in which he was living, I had to come to the conclusion that he was unwittingly making a speech in defence of the return of gambling with the exchange problems of the country. As I saw him in that dreamland I saw him with one leg over the bull and another leg over the bear. They were racing together towards the grand horizon of restored reality to do something, but neither the bull nor the bear nor the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) knew what it was they were going to do.

An hon. Member: That is a bad dream.

Mr. Irvine: So much for the argument of my hon. friend. I want to come now to the question itself. I ask, why was exchange control instituted in the first place? Those who have been interested in the question know very well that it was brought into being by order in council on September 15, 1939, under the provisions of the War Measures Act. It was brought into force for sufficient reasons, which were stated by the then Minister of Finance. Roughly those reasons were that in the first place there was danger of a shortage of United States dollars which, if such shortage developed during the war, would inevitably interfere with Canada's war effort. One of the things which the Minister of Finance feared at that time was the unloading of securities held by foreign owners in Canada. The United States then as now was a foreign country, and she was not at war at that time. Those individuals who owned securities in Canada might easily have panicked, sold their securities on the Canadian market, and taken out the proceeds in the form of United States dollars, which action would have impaired very greatly the war economy of the country.

The second reason was to prevent fluctuation in exchange, and my hon. friends to the right, the official opposition—speaking for Hansard "my hon. friends to the right" will mean nothing there, and as my hon. friend, the member for Muskoka-Ontario spoke to Hansard I am, of course, speaking to Hansard too—I therefore say the official opposition are now arguing that foreign exchange should be permitted to fluctuate. The Minister of Finance of that day, however, thought that two things would happen if that were permitted. One would be that the cost of living of the Canadian people would be affected by fluctuations in foreign exchange rates, and secondly that ordinary business in a general way would be disrupted by the fluctuations. There can be no doubt as to both of those views. These things happen all the time, and have happened in Canada constantly throughout its history, because we never had control before the birth of this measure. If we kill it now we will go back to lack of control again, and money and exchange should not be left to be gambling instruments for anybody. I think the best thing that can be done with any kind of currency is to maintain it as stable as possible so that the people may be able to depend upon it in doing business, so that it will always buy what it buys now, and so that people can deal with confidence.

The third reason for bringing this measure into effect was that panicky sales of securities, which might easily have happened in wartime, would have greatly hindered the financing of the war.

The second thing I ask, Mr. Speaker, is whether any of these reasons remain today. It has been argued that all the emergencies which were associated with the war have passed. It is true that the war is ended, but there were things begun in the war that will never end. The effects of the war on almost every institution of the country, on the economy of the world, and on the interrelations of nations, may never be ended. These effects go on perhaps forever, and some of the emergent conditions to which the war gave birth are just as strong today as they were then.

Let me deal with one, and this is one of the realities which I want to reconstruct. The fact is that we are now selling more to Great Britain than they can sell to us. That applies equally to Europe. We are buying more from the United States than we are able to sell to them. Those are realities. I need not go into what happened to Great Britain which brought about those conditions. They were caused directly by the war, and the inability of Great Britain now to meet her accounts with us is a post-war emergency of the greatest gravity, not only to Great Britain but to us, and to the United States as well. Everyone knows that before the war Great Britain was able to pay for her extra imports of Canadian goods by her income from her foreign investments. We were paid in United States dollars which made up our deficit with the United States of America. Things ran along fairly smoothly then, but now things have changed. Great Britain lost all her foreign investments which, if they existed as they were before the war, at present prices would purchase one and a half billion dollars' worth of goods. Surely the wiping out of that fund is an emergency and one which is not, as I say, confined to Britain. It is one which affects all nations, particularly and directly Canada.

The next question I want to ask is, would the abandonment of exchange controls help Britain or Europe to sell more goods to Canada? Primarily, that is the question. As everyone knows, this is not essentially a financial question; it is the question of exchange of goods. It is true that stupidity in matters of finance can hinder the exchange of goods, but even perfect financial arrangements alone will not solve the problem. I am asking those who wish to kill this bill if they are sure—I do not want any guessing about it—that if we leave the dollar to find its level, if we reduce it by ten per cent, if we allow our exchange to crystallize, if we turn it into a restored reality, or whichever of these proposals they want to adopt, it will help to sell more British goods in this market. I believe that is the issue. We need to be certain that any or all of their proposals will do that. We cannot guess about it.

The next question is, would the devaluation of the Canadian dollar help? Again I say we should be certain about it. I think the real certainty is that it would not. The real certainty is that it would mean ultimately that Britain would sell less to Canada than she is selling today. This question was dealt with by the Minister of Finance and I do not wish to deal with the technicalities involved, but I shall if anyone questions what I am saying. I say that the devaluation of the Canadian dollar at the present time would inevitably mean greater difficulty for the British to find a market for their goods in Canada.

I am supporting this bill, therefore, Mr. Speaker. I notice that those who are opposing it are opposed to all kinds of controls. I am quite sure that, as the days and years go by, more and more controls will be necessary. The member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) said something about following the natural economic laws. Sometimes, sir, that means following unnatural economic blunders. In this case, that is exactly what it would be. I conclude, sir, by hoping that these few enlightening remarks of mine will convince the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) and that we shall be unanimous on this bill.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I did not intend to speak on this measure again, but after listening to some of the speeches that have been made today I feel like making a few comments. I listened with great interest to the remarks of the last speaker, and I agree wholeheartedly with the latter part of his speech. I tried to follow the first part of his speech through the maze of reasoning of the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) which seemed to lead to a policy of despair. I was myself beginning to despair, because I also listened with a great deal of interest to the member from Muskoka-Ontario and other members in that party. It does seem to me they are very good at criticizing the government, but they are not prepared to put forward any constructive proposals. They finish by saying, we must do something. If the government is going to do something, we should tell the government what to do; otherwise the thing it does may be the opposite of what we want. I am not prepared, therefore, to follow that type of reasoning.

As I said during the debate on the resolution stage, we in this group are supporting the measure because we believe it is in the interest of the country to have a foreign exchange control board continue in operation. I am satisfied that with the world in the state it is in at the present time, and the state in which it is likely to be for many years, we shall need a foreign exchange control board for more than two years. I quite realize that the import restrictions that were placed in operation last year were not popular. On the other hand, I think any fairminded person, realizing the situation that existed, will agree that some of those restrictions on imports from the United States were essential unless we were to go heavily into debt to that country. Therefore, I do not think any member should try to make political capital out of that situation.

I noticed several members of this house have spoken outside the house from time to time in an attempt to link the Social Credit group with the Conservative party. I would say that the gap between this group and the Conservative party on the question of financial policy is so wide that the greatest engineer in this country could not possibly bridge it.

I have listened to a lot of this talk about letting the dollar find its own value. Put quite frankly, what does it mean? It means that we should make the value of the dollar the subject of speculation. I recall that in 1938 I went over to England. I was only there for two weeks, and yet, in that short time, the value of the pound dropped twenty cents. Why? Because people became frightened of the situation and started to buy United States securities. Consequently, when I went to the bank to change my balance of sterling back into Canadian dollars, I found that the value of it had dropped twenty cents on the pound owing to speculation.

I have noticed that the Conservative party is very keen about multilateral trade based upon the convertibility of currencies. I would say it is not possible to have multilateral trade based upon the convertibility of currencies so long as you have a situation in which there is a large unbalance of trade in the world. That situation exists today and, according to the report of the organization for European economic co-operation, there will still be a large unbalance even by 1952. It had been hoped that through Marshall-plan aid a balance would be arrived at before that date. Today, even the most optimistic believe there will be an unbalance of at least one billion and probably three billion by 1952.

The nations have therefore been turning to the system of bilateral trade agreements and the imposition of restrictions on imports for the purpose of attempting to establish a greater degree of balance. Under that policy perhaps we shall be able to bring about a greater degree of balance. If international trade were successfully balanced throughout the world, then it would be possible to have multilateral trade based upon the convertibility of currencies. How long would it be possible to remain on that basis? I would say that as soon as we adopted that system, unless the great exporting nations were willing to balance their trade, we would very soon find ourselves in a position of unbalance once more.

Then, once again, the nations would have to return to bilateral trade agreements. For example, if we exported goods to Britain and demanded payment in dollars instead of accepting goods in payment, then naturally Great Britain would have an unbalance with this country unless we accepted the responsibility of finding some alternative dollar market for Britain. There would be an unbalance of trade that would grow from year to year.

It is true that the international monetary fund was supposed to take care of that situation. This fund could only take care of that situation so long as it was a temporary condition of small degree. When the international monetary fund was set up, it was never stated that it could rectify a chronic situation. So far as Europe is concerned, this unbalance of payments is a chronic one, a condition that has been growing ever since 1913. The quicker we realize that it is a chronic condition and not merely one resulting from the war, the quicker we will be in finding some solution to this problem.

We never believe in criticizing unless we are prepared to make certain constructive proposals. That is why we have insisted time and again that what the world needs today is multilateral trade on a goods basis instead of a convertibility of currencies basis. In other words, let us accept blocked credits in Europe for our goods, and then trade any surplus blocked credits with other European nations through an international exchange. In that way you could maintain a balance of trade and you would not have to have convertibility of currencies.

When I spoke at the resolution stage, I stressed the fact that the shortage of dollars in Europe was making it almost impossible for Canada to maintain food contracts at the present level. Instead of dealing with that question himself, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said that he would let the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) deal with it. I just want to quote what the Minister of Agriculture said, because I want to prove that the statement I made was absolutely correct, and that the statement the Minister of Agriculture made in this house was not in line with the statement he made when he was in England. The Minister of Agriculture, as reported at page 1638 of Hansard, said this:

> I want to agree with what the Minister of Finance has said, namely, that so far as the main agricultural products for which we expect to have a market in Great Britain are concerned, we have made arrangements which are satisfactory . . .
> Having figured the quantities which we had, and having determined that we could sell certain quantities in other countries, we made agreements with Britain which are taking all the surplus products that we have for sale to Britain.

He suggests there that the agreements are satisfactory. But what did he say when he was speaking to the Canadian chamber of commerce in England after the agreement had been made? I quote—

Mr. Hlynka: From what?

Mr. Quelch: From the speech that he made to the Canadian chamber of commerce on December 17, 1948. I would ask hon. members to bear in mind that in the house here he has just told us that the agreements are satisfactory. This is what he said then:

> It is difficult for us to understand why anyone should expect us to be other than disappointed with the 1949 contracts. They provide for 160 million pounds of bacon, for 50 million pounds of cheese, and no cattle or beef.

Then later he goes on:

> There are no dollars available in the United Kingdom with which to purchase Canadian apples. Partly because of this we have financed the pulling-out of 240,000 apple trees in Nova Scotia. There are no dollars available with which to purchase Canadian fish.

And then later:

All of our discussions on food bulk contracts were proceeding satisfactorily until difficulties arose in adjusting the relationship between dollars and sterling. We were aiming at being able to provide the United Kingdom with 350 million pounds of bacon, 125 million pounds of cheese, 75 million dozens of eggs and having 400,000 head of cattle which we could dispose of either to the United States or the United Kingdom.

Then again:

Our hopes were dashed to the ground when the United Kingdom traders came over one year ago and said they were grieved to find themselves without the dollars to be certain they could buy any of our food excepting wheat.

Then again:

In the light of these circumstances we entered into agreements to deliver to the United Kingdom 87,000 tons, or 195 million pounds, of bacon—

Again remember that he said that we were all set to sell Britain 350 million pounds of bacon. Finally they had to agree to selling them just 195 million pounds of bacon.

—120 million pounds of beef, 80 million dozens of eggs, and 50 million pounds of cheese.

Whereas he stated that they were all ready to make an agreement for selling 125 million pounds of cheese.

Mr. Knight: We did not fulfil our previous contract.

Mr. Quelch: An hon. member interjects that we could not fill the last agreement. But apparently the Minister of Agriculture hoped that under Liberal policies we could expand our production and fill a larger quota. The point I want to make is that, when I made this statement that our contracts had been reduced owing to the fact that Britain lacked dollars with which to take a larger quantity of food from us, I was basing that statement upon the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture himself. He was so concerned about the situation that he suggested drastic action. Further on he stated:

. . . I am convinced that the world is not in any state of mind where it can be expected to agree that the manipulation of any system or systems of currency is going to be allowed to interfere with getting surplus food to those who have empty stomachs. It might be a good thing for everybody if the United Nations meetings were closed down long enough to permit of the United Kingdom, United States and Canadian experts getting together and settling some basis upon which dollars and sterling can be converted to allow nations like Canada to produce and distribute food to feed the starving millions.

I think that statement fully justifies the remark I made to the effect that we were having difficulties in establishing contracts with Britain at the former level owing to the fact that Britain had a shortage of dollars. Again I suggest that the most logical way in which to deal with that situation would be for us to accept blocked sterling in Britain and then trade any surplus of blocked sterling we might have in Britain with any other European country that was willing to supply us with goods and take goods from Britain in payment.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): We should remember, Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this bill now before the house, that it completes the trio of so-called emergency measures which are being submitted at this session and completes the network of controls over the Canadian economy. The other two measures are the emergency powers act and the Agricultural Products Act. With the addition of the control over foreign exchange, the system of potential control over the whole economy is complete. Under those circumstances it is not surprising to find my hon. friends of the socialist party in this house entirely in agreement with what the government is doing in seeking to continue this measure of foreign exchange control for another two years.

We have heard it said frequently in this debate, particularly this afternoon, that the official opposition does not know what it would do about foreign exchange or about the Canadian exchange. That statement, of course, is not correct. I do not think it is so necessary to justify our position as it is to expose the weaknesses of the government. But since the two are the concomitant stages of the same picture, I would again refer to what we said we would do and what was the core of our amendment which, unfortunately, has been ruled out of order. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not agree with your ruling; but as it has been given, I will not question its merits. Our intention is perfectly clear if one takes the trouble—which I take it my hon. friends criticizing it have not done—to study the amendment offered by this party. What we wanted to do was, first, to insist that the rate of exchange on the Canadian dollar be allowed to seek its own level, whatever that might be, within the terms of the present Bretton Woods agreement. Since, under the Bretton Woods agreement, exchange rates can only be varied by ten per cent, it becomes obvious that it would be necessary to put a floor of ninety cents or a ceiling of $1.10 on the dollar for the time being. That was the first step, to allow the dollar to find its natural level within those limits. Secondly, we felt that exchange control would be necessary for a limited period, which the government would need in order to consult with the international monetary fund with a view to finding some method by which all exchanges could be readjusted to a more realistic level. I do not see that there is any mystery or secret or anything incomprehensible about that. My hon. friends opposite, and of the socialist party, who profess to be such great experts in exchange matters, should surely not find that a policy difficult to analyse or understand. No, Mr. Speaker; their opposition to our suggestions is not because they do not understand them. Their opposition to our suggestions is because we are seeking to restore a measure of freedom to the Canadian economy, and that is not consonant with their policy of seeking complete control over every aspect of the national life.

That being said, it still remains a fact that, nevertheless, the government has refused to accept our suggestion of prolonging the life of this measure for only one year. They insist upon prolonging it in its present form for two years, and they give no indication that they will make any real effort during that time to adjust the facts of the situation which at present make foreign exchange control necessary. Therefore, it would be inconsistent if we did not oppose continuation of this measure on these terms. We want to see those steps taken which will make control of exchange unnecessary. We see no signs that the government propose to take these steps, and we are therefore opposed to allowing them carte blanche to continue exchange control for a further period of two years without any assurance that they will take the steps within that time to make further continuation unnecessary.

I should like to give some reasons why we are opposed to the present system of control of our exchange. In the first place, the controls are arbitrary and absolute, and give opportunity for the irresponsible exercise of power to the detriment of the whole of the Canadian economy and to every one of the Canadian people. They absolutely prevent convertibility of exchange. So long as this act and regulations remain in force in their present form, convertibility of exchange is an impossibility.

I shall just refer to one or two examples of that absolutism and one or two of the sections which prevent convertibility of exchange. Section 15 of the present act, which is sought to be extended into force for two years, turns every customs officer and every postmaster in Canada into agents of the foreign exchange control board, requires them to snoop, and to inquire and to investigate into the activities of ordinary Canadian citizens; and every customs officer and postmaster in Canada is thus drafted into the army of snoopers from which this country already suffers. I suggest it is an improper use to make of these civil servants.

Section 18 gives the governor in council unlimited powers to set exchange rates, and even to vary exchange rates from one specific transaction to another. It places in the hands of the governor in council the most arbitrary, irresponsible power to exercise control and to discriminate between one Canadian citizen and another, even from one transaction to another.

Finally, in sections 21, 22, 23 and particularly 25, we find the absolute denial of any right of ownership of money to the individual in the first place; and secondly, an absolute barrier to free convertibility. These are not powers which we are willing to see continued in the hands of any government. This act contains the denial of the principle, and the power to give effect to that denial of the principle, of an individual's ownership of his own money.

Furthermore, as I have said, we believe that the problem confronting the world today with respect to trade is the problem of convertibility of currency, and the Foreign Exchange Control Act makes impossible the convertibility of currency. We are therefore opposed to the continuation of the act in force for another two years.

The second general reason why we are opposed to this measure is because it gives sweeping powers to this government and I have no hesitation in saying that we do not regard this government as a fit custodian of those powers. I shall give one or two concrete examples of why I feel that way, and a reference to an indication of the frame of mind of this government in respect to powers which reinforce that belief. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when the foreign exchange bill was before the house in 1946 the Minister of Finance, who sponsored it, stated in clear and categorical terms that it was not intended to use the bill except with respect to exchange and with respect to certain capital transactions. He indicated clearly and unmistakably that it was not intended to use the bill to control the movement of goods, to impose embargoes or any other form of tariff structure. That clear and unmistakable statement was made in 1946, on the strength of which the bill became law. In 1947, about fifteen or sixteen months later, we found, however, that the act was put to the very use which we were assured it would never be put to, in that under the authority of the Foreign Exchange Control Act embargoes and quotas were imposed against the importation of goods into Canada. That was defined then, Mr. Speaker, and it still stands, as a breach of faith by this government. To take an act which they had said would never be used for a specific purpose, and sixteen months later to use it for that purpose, can only be described as a breach of faith.

With respect to this type of control, this type of unusual invasion of the sphere of private rights, we find that when we criticize these methods, when we criticize, for instance, what are in effect breaches of the constitution, when we point out that what is being done is a denial to the individual of what had previously been accepted as his fundamental liberties, and when, because of the importance of the issue, we take a stand on these matters in the house and criticize the government as it should be criticized, we are told that we are indulging in a futile discussion on procedure. We are told that by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Yet I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that only seven years ago that right hon. gentleman was one of the leading lawyers in this country. It was his duty to his clients to insist upon proper procedure. The Prime Minister knew then very well the importance of proper procedure. As a constitutional lawyer and as one who appeared before the privy council in matters involving the constitution, no one knew better than he, or represented better than he, the importance of constitutional and procedural propriety, and the importance of following and observing the constitution of the country, or of a corporation which might happen to be his client.

Seven years ago that was the attitude of the Prime Minister. Now, only seven years later, and within only a few short months of his becoming Prime Minister, he characterizes discussions of constitutional procedure as "futile", and works himself up into a high state of indignation. He describes this whole question as "a futile discussion of procedure." Thus we saw another example of how power corrupts, and how absolute power corrupts absolutely.

I give those two examples as only two of the many which could be advanced as to why we should not trust the government with sweeping powers over our economy such as they have had under the Foreign Exchange Control Act, and as a second reason why we should refuse to allow the extension of that act for a further two years.

The third general reason is that the Foreign Exchange Control Act has not worked. It has not given us any freedom of trade. It has, in fact, prevented and continues to prevent the convertibility of currency. Not only does it not in fact gain for Canada new fields of trade, new sources of currency and new sources of American dollars, but this act, along with the foreign exchange control regulations and the import restrictions with which it is coupled, in many instances prevents our earning American dollars.

Let me give the house one example of the ridiculous, far-fetched and almost impossible results which flow from the application of these exchange and trade restrictions. We have in my constituency a company incorporated for the purpose of operating a number of tourist camps. As the house knows, and as you know, Mr. Speaker, the tourist business is one of the most fruitful sources of American dollars. It will be recalled that under the Foreign Exchange Control Act, and kindred legislation, last year certain restrictions were placed upon imports of goods from the United States, because it was said that we lacked the reserves of American dollars to buy those goods.

It so happens that one of the officials of this company has access to American sources of materials, without the expenditure of a single Canadian dollar, and without in any way depleting our reserves of American dollars.

Mr. Howe: Do you mean without creating a debt?

Mr. Fulton: I mean without creating a debt. What he wants to do, and what he could do, is to bring into Canada equipment from the United States which would enable him the better to operate and the better to enlarge the facilities of his camp. That, in turn, would enable him to offer greater facilities and thus bring in more American tourists, increasing the supply of United States dollars in Canada.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is now in Canada a regulation which says that no one can import this type of equipment or supply from the United States. We know the purpose for which this regulation is said to have been imposed; but it applies to this individual in the same way that it applies to everyone else.

So we have the ridiculous situation of regulations which, in their inception, were said to be designed to save us United States dollars, operating, in fact, not so as to save us United States dollars but to deny us the possibility of procuring more of them. It is that type of impossible and ridiculous situation which could not be foreseen when these measures were first put into effect, but which we find more and more resulting from them, which gives us concern.

This is only one small example. I mention it because only recently I placed the matter before officials of the department. I did so last year, and they would not change their ruling. I have had it reviewed this year, and in their letter to me of March 17, only four days ago, they again refused to change their ruling, despite the fact that they agree with me that the proposal of this gentleman would not deplete our reserves of American dollars, but in fact would add considerably to our potential supply of those funds.

Because of conditions of that kind, and because we find Canadian trade throughout the world reaching a more difficult state, I say we should not continue this restrictive measure for a further period of two years. There are other examples which make it abundantly clear that, far from helping Canada's trade, the exchange restrictions are in fact hindering it.

One of the clearest examples is found in the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) himself. Speaking in the house when the resolution was under discussion, the minister first sought to give the impression that the restrictions imposed in the fall of 1947 under the Foreign Exchange Control Act, and applied since, have in fact been largely responsible for the great improvement in our American reserve position.

The minister went on to paint a picture of tremendous improvement. While he stated modestly at one point in his speech that he did not claim that all credit for this condition was due to the government's action, he made it clear that he claimed a large part of the credit as being due to the restrictions imposed and to the policy administered under the Foreign Exchange Control Act. Very shortly after that, however, he concluded his remarks by showing that the position with respect to the reserve of United States dollars is not nearly as satisfactory as at first he would have led us to assume. He told us that in 1939, the first year of the war, when foreign exchange control first came into operation, we had in reserve more than enough American dollars to pay for over half a year's imports from the United States. On the other hand, after ten years of foreign exchange control, and after a year and a half of embargoes, restrictions, and the most stringent measures of exchange conservation, we had hardly enough American reserves on hand to pay for four months' normal imports at the current rate.

Not only has the exchange control policy not enlarged our trade, and not sufficiently increased our reserves of American dollars, but it is the exchange control policy itself, coupled with the government's action in July of 1946 of restoring the dollar to parity, which resulted in the depletion of our official reserves of American dollars. Because if one brings about a situation where no Canadian can obtain an American dollar except through the foreign exchange control board, through its being made available from our official reserves, it means that the government and the board have to stand back of every Canadian who wishes to buy and who receives consent to buy an American dollar. Thus the government entered into the foreign exchange business in a large way. Then when you have coupled with that the fact that they restored our dollar to parity, thus making it easier and more attractive for Canadians to buy United States dollars, one can see that a greatly increased demand for United States dollars would be created. That is exactly what the government did. They got into the foreign exchange control business and then made it easier and more desirable—more tempting, if I may use those words—for Canadians to get United States dollars. Naturally they found a tremendously increased demand and they found their reserves of United States exchange rushing down the drain at an alarming rate. As a result they had to put into effect the restrictive policies of November, 1947.

While no one perhaps can go so far as to say that the government's action was entirely to blame, nevertheless the minister cannot laugh it off and say that his policies did not have any effect on that matter. His policies had more effect in creating the difficult exchange reserve position than they had in curing it. His policies will not cure the situation from which Canada suffers. They are restrictive and the situation in which Canadian trade finds itself today will not be cured until we restore the convertibility of exchange. That will not be done so long as this act is maintained on the statute books and is in effect in this country.

Then the minister dealt with the situation with regard to gold. I must say that it is difficult to speak with any degree of reasonableness when one bears in mind the things which have been said, and more than that the things which have been suggested by hon. members opposite and hon. members of the socialist party with respect to the motives of hon. members of the official opposition in saying that the gold mining industry of Canada is entitled to some consideration. When one sees the dangerous situation that is developing for the whole Canadian economy, when one sees one example of that situation in the gold mining industry, and then puts forward the position of that industry as an example of what government policies are doing to the economy of the country, one finds it strange that there should be members irresponsible enough to suggest that we are speaking solely for the gold mining interests.

I find it particularly interesting that the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) should weep such tears, such readily summoned tears, about the workmen in his riding, who he says benefit from the present policies, and should be completely indifferent to the situation of the workmen in the gold mines of Canada—who far outnumber the workmen in the riding of Spadina. I find it extremely interesting to note that the socialist party are so ready to make political capital out of their old policy of saying that the Conservatives represent special interests that they completely disregard the welfare of the workers in the gold mines.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friends laugh, but I am not glad to find that my thought is borne out by their cynical and callous laughter. Apparently many of the hon. members of the socialist party come from the cities and do not know anything about the gold mines. For instance, apparently they do not know that the gold mining industry is virtually the only industry which, since before the war, has not had an increase in the price of what it sells. In fact, it is the only industry which has had a decrease in the price of its product. One result of that situation is that the men in the gold mining industry have not been able to obtain those increases in wages to which they are entitled and which the management of the mines agree they are entitled to.

My hon. friends, as I said, come from the cities and they do not know much about these problems. Their remarks and laughter show that they do not know that in British Columbia two of the gold mines which give employment to a substantial number of men have had to cease operations as a result of the present price of gold and the revaluation of the Canadian dollar which had the effect of reducing the price of gold by $3.50 per ounce. I know my hon. friends would like to laugh that off. I know my hon. friends like to pose as the friends of all workingmen, but when one points out that workingmen are suffering, that men are out of work as a result of government policy, one finds that the socialists laugh.

Not only were two mines in British Columbia closed down and men thrown out of work as a result of this situation; I have a list here of fifty-two other gold mines which had reached the development stage to the extent of sinking shafts, which were ready to extend their operations by continuing mining at new levels, thus giving further employment, but which have suspended underground operations since mid-1946 when the Canadian dollar was revalued and placed on a par with the United States dollar.

I do not suggest, any more than the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) suggests, that the whole Canadian economy be drafted to suit the interests of this particular industry even though the welfare of a large number of workers is affected, but I do suggest, and I am glad to find that the minister agreed apparently for the first time last Thursday, that the gold mining industry and the men whom it employs are entitled to consideration. Their problem, which was created by the restoration of parity in 1946, is a problem which properly concerns the Canadian House of Commons and the Canadian people.

This is not a problem about which hon. members are entitled to take the attitude of saying that other hon. members represent special interests, that they are trying to obtain special advantage or profit to themselves and their friends—

Mr. Williams: The hon. member's innocence is most touching.

Mr. Fulton: It may be that my innocence is touching but I am sure that the hon. member who makes that remark—

Mr. Williams: I am crying my heart out for you.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure that the hon. member who makes that remark has occasion to differentiate between innocence and guilt. It is also significant that the attitude of the hon. member, and of those who sit around him and of the rest of his party, is one of such complete cynicism that they see nothing but the worst of every situation. They see nothing but sinister motives wherever they look. They see nothing but dark capitalists hiding under the bed. That is all the meaning they are capable of taking out of the speeches of other hon. members. I know that my hon. friends opposite have had occasion to remark in the past how the members of the socialist party take unto themselves the right of being the only ones who are concerned with the welfare of the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: One hears the words of approval. Such conceit, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Williams: Listen to who is talking.

Mr. Fulton: Such conceit and such shallow hypocrisy provide their own answer.

I have given three reasons why we cannot support the continuation of this act without some assurance of steps being taken to free exchange. As I have said, the problem is convertibility and not control, but the continuation of controls under the Foreign Exchange Control Act makes it so easy to avoid grappling with the problem of convertibility. Yet until we have grappled with that problem we shall not be able to remove controls from exchange.

As an example of what is happening as a result of lack of convertibility, one should examine the picture in so far as trade with the sterling area is concerned. In discussing this matter the other day, the minister went at some length into figures which he said showed that our trade had expanded under the control policy of the government. As a matter of fact, however, the report of the foreign exchange control board shows that our over-all balance of trade with the sterling area in fact declined in 1948 as against 1947. I should like to read from pages 2 and 3 of the report of the foreign exchange control board, as follows:

> Canada's current account surplus with countries other than the United States was $873 million in 1948. Although still very large, this surplus was $347 million smaller than in 1947.

Further down the page there is the following:

> This general summary of the main factors affecting Canada's foreign exchange position in 1948 would be incomplete without specific reference to the important and helpful part played by the European recovery program . . .

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of the tremendous volume of dollars and assistance made available under the European recovery program, Canada's balance with the United Kingdom, with the sterling countries, shrank by $347 million in the year 1948. That is a tremendously significant development. It has been referred to in some detail by speakers who have preceded me, and therefore I will not dwell on it. It does mean, however, that we cannot take that rosy assurance from the minister's speech as to the beneficial results of his policies which he would like us to take, because, while we increased our exports to the United States, our flow of trade with the sterling countries has declined by $347 million.

I have here a clipping which indicates to me that we are not the only ones who are concerned with the shrinking of trade in the sterling area. This report appeared in the Montreal Gazette of the 18th of March and concerns a statement made by a Canadian, Mr. Elliott M. Little, member of the executive board of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association in London, England, on March 17. Mr. Little was discussing the question of the shrinkage of trade, and he said to his British audience:

> We are not satisfied that everything possible is being done by you or by ourselves to overcome this dollar problem. It is not only Canada's pulp and paper trade with Britain which has been affected by the exchange problem. In the past year one traditional market after another has been reduced or has disappeared, and old customers for Canadian pulp and paper products have turned to other countries at much higher prices, or have gone without supplies they wished to have.
> It is difficult to reconcile oneself to the fact that a country like Australia, with a long tradition of trade with North America, particularly in pulp and paper products, must now buy at inflated prices from Italy, Germany, Finland, and even a little from Japan—all of them recent enemies—and from Sweden, which was neutral, and cannot buy from Canada, a sister dominion and old commercial friend, or from the United States.

That is a statement of the facts of the situation under which Canadian trade is now being carried on. On account of the lack of convertibility, countries which previously had been free to trade with one another, and which desire to trade with one another because of their economic and political affinity, can no longer trade. They are forced to buy at higher prices from countries with whom they have nothing in common simply because the currency of those countries is available whereas Canadian dollars are not available to sterling countries, and sterling is increasingly less available to dollar countries. Sterling will be less available to dollar countries if trade between the two shrinks much more; because, if we do not sell to the United Kingdom and to sterling countries and get supplies of sterling, not only will they be unable to buy from us but in the long run we shall be less able to buy from them.

The fourth reason why we cannot support the continuation of this act is its great cost to the Canadian people, not only its cost in terms of trade and what it is doing to lose trade, but the cost of administering it. In answer to a question recently as to the cost to Canada of carrying on her foreign exchange transactions, I received figures showing that the excess of expenditure for gold, United States and other currencies over receipts from those currencies has been $981 million since 1939. That is over $100 million a year for the nine-year period up to 1948. There is only one place which that money can come from and that is out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers. Nearly $100 million a year has had to be raised in taxes from the Canadian people in order to keep the government in the business of foreign exchange where it should not be, certainly not so long as its policies are restrictive rather than making for expansion.

For that fourth reason, because of the tremendous cost to the Canadian people, a cost which we can ill afford to bear with the present rates of taxation, we can not allow this measure to be continued. It would be different if the government showed any signs of really trying to get out of the business of control, but it does not. It restricts our trade, it taxes us to carry on control measures, and it asks for a continuation of this measure for two years without at any time showing any sign of realism, or any willingness to enter into negotiations which would result in the final elimination of these controls which are so expensive, and which so hamper and thwart the Canadian economy.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking again on this bill because, although the debate on this measure has been a good one, we are placed in this position, that the government and the house realize the impasse into which we are getting through the inconvertibility of currencies. We are approaching a trade climacteric. We are moving from a sellers' to a buyers' market. Everything has gone well because a market could be found for everything that has been produced. Further, we have been doing well because of the tremendous volume of Marshall-plan offshore purchases made in Canada. We cannot look for a continuation of this sellers' market, nor can we look for a continuation of the great volume of Marshall-plan offshore purchases.

There is a specific danger with regard to wheat. At any moment, wheat may be declared a surplus commodity in the United States. Such a move would cut off approximately $300 million of the annual offshore purchases made in Canada. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this problem of exchange control and convertibility is vitally important. I realize that no one appreciates that more than the minister, and no one appreciates it more than the members of this house. It is because we in this house see the lack of any specific action contemplated by the government that I wish to put forward certain suggestions.

An exchange rate cannot be fixed by edict; it can only be fixed by convertibility into gold at a fixed rate of redemption into gold. A fixed rate without redemption into gold is meaningless. A flexible but convertible rate can only be arrived at through the use of a common denominator and that common denominator has always been gold. There is no evidence to indicate that is not now the case.

We have suggested the freeing of the Canadian dollar. There are certain risks in that course, and they are risks which must be considered. The first risk is: would the Canadian dollar, if exchange control were abandoned, sink to a great discount in the United States? I think, Mr. Speaker, we have evidence that it would not in the operation of what is known as the unofficial market for Canadian dollars in New York. While that unofficial market represents only about five or six per cent of our entire trade, nevertheless it does account for, according to the best figures I could get from New York, between $135 million and $300 million. Mr. Speaker, that is no hole-in-the-wall market. It does give an indication of what would happen to our dollar if controls were removed.

When the parity move was made, the unofficial market was around ten per cent. At one time it went down to a little over twelve, but today I believe it is around six and a half per cent and seven per cent. This illustrates what has happened to our dollar on this free market on which our currency is sold in terms of United States dollars. It has improved from twelve per cent to about six per cent in approximately a year's time. This shows that the position of the Canadian dollar, vis-à-vis the United States dollar, is strong. I submit that if we had no foreign exchange control, the dollar would not sell at a great discount, and my evidence is the operation of the unofficial market in Canadian dollars.

The second point which we must consider is: would there be a drain of capital from Canada? Here again our fears are groundless because the history of capital shows that capital has always flowed into a country with a free economy. Capital has always been attracted to a country in which it is given the greatest freedom. The removal of exchange control would be giving capital that freedom. I submit that, far from being a drain on capital, there would be a tremendous increase of capital in Canada.

Furthermore, I submit that this capital, by and large, would be what the minister termed desirable capital. He called it the bricks and mortar capital. I believe it would flow into the development of oil, the development of base metals, the development of our potential iron deposits, and for a dozen and one other purposes for which capital is needed. The situation that obtained in 1929 does not apply today, and I will give you the reason for that at a later stage.

The third question is: would our economy be subject to gambling under pressure of what is known as "hot money"? I submit that is not likely because, first of all, there is very little so-called hot money in Canadian currency outstanding. Our savings accounts, the position of our financial institutions, have never been as strong nor as resilient as they are at the present time. The credit situation is very good. There are no extended loans for security purchases. The exchanges have tightened up the margin requirements and have accomplished a lot of other worth-while things which have made practically impossible speculation and gambling of the type that occurred in 1929. Therefore, I think that the existence of "hot money", the existence of gambling in Canadian funds, is not a risk which we have to run.

Would there be an increase in United States investments in Canada? I think the answer to that question is obvious. We have shown—and I think it is a matter of some national pride—that despite the restrictions of the FECB we have had an inflow of capital into Canada. There was a time immediately after the parity action of 1946 when the movement was very much the other way. But today there are literally billions available for investment in the United States and these billions are looking for adequate employment in the development of natural resources. With the possible exception of Brazil, Canada is the only country left in the world that has a stable government and tremendous untapped natural resources. I think we would have a great increase in United States funds coming into Canada for investment purposes, and those purposes would not be for investment in the stock market. If they want to, the Americans can buy or sell Canadian stocks at the present time, particularly interlisted stocks. As I have said, the restrictive operations of the major stock markets make this sort of speculation much more difficult. The volume and the impact of hot money is now tremendously cushioned. This investment money would not be frightened money. It would be money coming in for long-term purposes.

I want to mention briefly two authorities, both of them British, and what they say with regard to what our present situation is doing to our international trade. The first authority is Sir Stafford Cripps, in an interview which is quoted by The Economist of London of February 26:

> He also stressed the difficulties that are being met in expanding British exports to Canada, saying that Britain could not sell all the steel Canada needed because it had to reserve certain quantities of scarce materials for use in bilateral negotiations with other countries.

I skip about eight lines, but I am not taking the statement out of its context at all:

> There can be no doubt that the main obstacle to the British export drive to Canada is to be found in the fact that British prices are, by and large, too high for the Canadian market. That fact is likely to be increasingly impressed upon all concerned if the trend of prices in the United States continues to be downward. This disparity in dollar and sterling prices is beginning to call into question the basic effect which the Marshall plan may be having on the relative price and cost structures of Europe and the dollar area. The way in which aid is being applied, and the extent to which the countries of Europe are being encouraged to divert their imports from dollar to non-dollar sources even if the latter are more expensive, is creating a disequilibrium which may call for the most drastic remedial measures, involving exchange adjustments, if the dollar solvency of Marshall Europe is to be restored by 1952.
> At the same time, it cannot be said that Canada has chosen the happiest moment from its or Britain's point of view to announce the reimposition of the import duties on British textiles which were suspended in 1947. Overtopping all other issues affecting Anglo-Canadian trade is the possibility of wheat being declared a surplus commodity in the United States, a move which would prohibit the economic co-operation administration from allocating Marshall dollars for offshore purchases of wheat in Canada. If any such misfortune were to happen it would face both Canada and Great Britain with a problem the urgency of which would relegate the longer term issues to relative insignificance.

That is from The Economist of last month. I do not think the seriousness of the problem can possibly be overestimated. I want to quote also from The Banker of London, England, an article by C. Gordon Tether, who has been an adviser to some of the big five banks in Great Britain, and what he has to say on what he calls the Canadian dilemma:

> There is general concern at the apparent paradox that in the past year or so the Canadian price level has shown a bigger rise than occurred during the preceding eight years of war finance and post-war adjustment . . . the dominion is beginning to suffer from a money-goods gap of the type familiar in European countries during the past few years . . . To begin with, there is no certainty, even in the short run, that the indirect "Marshall" relief for the dominion's United States dollar position will continue on the present scale beyond the middle of 1949.

Then I skip a paragraph and continue:

> Mr. Gardiner, dominion Minister of Agriculture, pointed out in a recent speech that the ban on the use of E.C.A. dollars for "offshore" purchases has already made it impossible for Canadian farmers to sell their linseed, beans and other products, although consumers elsewhere are paying prices fifty per cent above those ruling in Canada.
>
> It would seem, therefore, that Canada must resign herself, even during the currency of the Marshall plan, to the need to resume unrequited exports and, in all probability, to a decline in the amount of convertible exchange she can derive from her favourable trade balance with Europe. The post-Marshall prospect is even more disturbing . . . Imports from Canada may be small in relation to total United States production, but resistance to them tends to become intense in times of surplus and falling prices. Canada is therefore liable to find this outlet for her produce blocked just when she most needs it.
> It is, in short, unfortunately all too clear that the dominion's external economic prospect is, on a short view no less than on the long, as obscure and as fraught with peril as ever. This being so, the present dilemma of the Canadian government is readily apparent. . . Whatever success attends the drive to obtain permanent markets in the United States, however great the expansion in import-saving production within Canada, markets for the bulk of the dominion's primary produce, readily accessible in bad times as well as in good, will remain in Europe. If those markets are lost, Canada's prosperity will inevitably suffer.

There we have two British authorities who, I think, may be considered to have a sympathetic desire for the mutual well-being of the United Kingdom and of Canada; yet they state in definite and specific terms that under the present situation nothing but a chaotic impasse will happen if convertibility cannot in some way be arranged. That is a pretty serious situation. Because we had record exports in 1948, because we had record purchases by the Marshall plan, because our situation last year was so good, let us not fool ourselves into thinking that we are going to live in this paradise with happy exports for everything we produce, either to the United States or to Europe—certainly not Europe. Let us not fool ourselves that we are going to be able to export either our raw materials or our manufactured articles when we see that in terms of barter these countries on a barter economy are willing to pay for the goods that we produce 50 per cent more than they can get them for from us. We cannot sit idly by and say that there is nothing we can do; we cannot sit idly by and say, here is a situation which stumps us. There must be something we can do. There has to be something that we can do. It reminds me of a young officer who was training recruits for the first time on the square. He became frightened and the squad started marching off. The sergeant major said to him: "For God's sake say something, even though it is only good-bye". Our export markets are in that position. I suggest to the government that for God's sake they do something, even though it is only to say good-bye. I am sure that they can do something. I am sure that there are measures which they can take which will at least explore the impossible situation into which we have got ourselves.

The problem is one of convertibility. These European countries have imposed the same sort of restrictions as we have. They have imposed them, as they think, in order to safeguard their own economy. They are neither safeguarding their own economy nor assisting world trade. In fact, they are doing absolutely the reverse.

Of course we cannot go to any other sovereign state and say to it, your laws and your exchange control are bad. We want you to change them. The minister was perfectly right when he said that it would be considered as a gratuitous insult for Canada to suggest to the United Kingdom, or to any other country, that their currency was overvalued or undervalued in terms of the United States dollar. But I do suggest that there is a way in which we can start. The problem is that we have two unknowns, two currencies, and the only way to indicate the relationship of a currency is to relate it to something that is known. It is a sample of what we were taught in school. It is the simple simultaneous equation.

The only known thing to which currencies are eventually related is gold; and I suggest again that in order to obtain this denominator, this relationship, we should allow the operation of a free gold market so that we should get a true relationship of one currency to gold and another currency to gold. By so doing we would be able to obtain a relationship between these currencies, and if they could be converted, one or another, into gold through the operation of the free market, surely we would be taking the first step toward convertibility of one currency into another. It is going to be difficult. A great deal of opinion in the United States is against it, but I suggest in all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, that they are against it for selfish reasons. Let us see who are opposing it. A most vehement opponent of the operation or the establishment of a free gold market is—and I think he is one authority whom we must consider—a man called Leffingwell. He is the chairman of the board of J. P. Morgan and Company, international bankers. What are the reasons which he gave for opposing the operation of a free market? They were simply these. He said that today the United States dollar is a world currency, and that the United States gold reserves are world gold reserves. If I were the chairman of J. P. Morgan I would take precisely those views, and I would do it for precisely the same reason. If I were a great United States banker I would like to have my dollar and my gold reserves known as the world gold reserve. It would be a tremendous advantage to me. It was the happy position that the pound had at one time, only never in so great a degree. But here the Americans, quite frankly, want to make the United States dollar the only international currency, and the United States gold reserves the world gold reserve. He admitted it.

Let us go a little further. Mr. Walter E. Spahr opposes a free gold market, but he wants the United States dollar to be returned to the gold standard at $35 an ounce. He wishes convertibility of the United States dollar, the one freedom which the United States dollar does not possess at the present time. He wishes it to be restored. In other words, he wishes that you should go to the mint or to Fort Knox with $35 and buy an ounce of gold. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if that were done, even with the tremendous reserves of gold today, Gresham's law would become effective immediately, and there would be a run on the gold reserves of the United States.

We like to think that the United States currency, in regard to gold, is in a happy position. So it is; but let us remember that there are $141 billion worth of United States government obligations outstanding, and these obligations are a prime responsibility of the United States government. There are two other authorities, the economists national committee and the New York board of trade. They have opposed the operation of a free gold market, and have opposed it for these reasons. Therefore unquestionably we would meet great opposition. Not only that, but we would meet opposition from the United States treasury and the international monetary fund.

I suppose, however, there is a great and growing body of opinion that this is the only method by which we can obtain a norm by which currency can be judged. And unless some norm is found, some agent of convertibility, bilateralism and restraint of trade through monetary restrictions are going to be increased and intensified. We Canadians, because of our erstwhile happy position between the United States and Great Britain, are going to find that we are the supreme sufferers in this impossible situation; and instead of being, as I believe, the greatest per capita exporter, we shall find ourselves in a position in which we cannot export.

Immediately a surplus is built up in the United States, immediately they have a surplus of manufactured goods and of wheat, where are we going to sell our wheat? Where are we going to sell our surplus goods? Immediately that happens we are going to be in an impossible position.

I suggest that certain action should be taken. I am sure the permanent officers of the international monetary fund are as perturbed as any of us about this situation. I have no doubt they are as anxious as we are to find some method of convertibility. The whole reason for the international monetary fund, the whole hopeful theory behind Bretton Woods, was to prevent the international banditry of jockeying with currencies, and doing all the things which shocked Europe and the world in the late twenties and all through the thirties. Had it worked, possibly no one in the world would have condemned it. It has developed however an entirely new sort of international banditry, the international banditry of bilateralism. That is, two countries get together and one says, "We will sell you this commodity at an entirely fictitious price, in terms of a paper currency. We will sell it to you, not in terms of currency but in terms of something else which you sell us at a far higher price than it would bring in terms of international currency." They price themselves out of the world market.

That is the international banditry that is going on today, and it is a type of trade banditry and unrest which we cannot stand. Until some method is found to overcome this impossible position, we are going to suffer—and to suffer most acutely.

I suggest we should go immediately to the international monetary fund and ask for a plenary session. We would make our claim as one of the great suppliers of food, one of the great creditor nations in terms of foodstuffs, metals and materials required in world recovery. On a per capita basis we are probably the greatest supplier of those materials, whether they be food, metals or anything else.

I suggest we should go to the international monetary fund, ask for that plenary session, and put our case on the table before all the countries, saying, "We do not want to take unilateral action in this matter. But unless, through the agency of this fund, we can obtain convertibility of exchange, not at the behest and requests of the national treasuries of the various countries at the pegged rates, but at free rates and rates in terms of gold, our exports are liable to be cut off, and our import position becomes impossible because the countries have priced themselves out of our markets. Therefore our export trade upon which, more than any other country in the world, we depend, is being destroyed. If our export trade is destroyed, our national sovereignty is threatened, because our economy is so desperately bound up with that export trade."

I say that unless we can get some agreement with the other nations of the fund we must be prepared to protect ourselves by unilateral action and enter into what I believe to be the unfortunate business of barter. Even though it was mentioned by the foreign exchange control board, I consider it a retrograde step. But we should strain our efforts first toward obtaining convertibility of currencies through the operation of the free gold market.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I cannot well understand why some hon. members who supported the Bretton Woods agreement now take the stand which some on this side of the house have taken. I am one who believes that we must look into the cause and effect of all the trouble we have got into. I am not one of those who criticize the ministers of the crown because I think they are doing their best under a very heavy burden. I have always tried to show ordinary Christian charity toward my political opponents of all kinds. I have always tried to get on with people. Mind you, some of them are hard to get on with, but I get on with them anyway. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has been carrying a heavy burden, both as assistant to the former respected Minister of Finance and in connection with his other duties. He has worked very hard.

I was one of those on this side of the house who opposed the principles of Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks because I realized the trouble into which the government would be led. I know I was right at that time. So far as Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks are concerned, they got us into this trouble. A great mistake was made by hon. members on this side of the house in agreeing to that, although I was the exception. The government have been driven into making mistakes along that line.

I am going to speak for only a few minutes; I was down to follow the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). When I opposed Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods I did it for many reasons. I did not like the international monetary fund and international bank features of the agreements; which have had a great effect upon the bill now before the house. They led us into our present imbroglio. I was against the international bank and the international fund which are the basis for the present exchange control bill. I did not believe in the international monetary fund at that time. I said that some pay in and some do not, that some take out and some do not. I referred to the man who broke the bank at Monte Carlo. Tennyson said about this particular matter:

> Our little systems have their day;
> They have their day and cease to be;
> They are but broken lights of thee,
> And thou, O Lord, art more than they.

That is what he said in "In Memoriam". Public finance is different from private finance, and when I have completed the few remarks I want to make in this connection I shall have said what I want to say on the motion. I have had some experience with public finance in connection with city government and I know some of the mistakes that can be made. I was a member of the treasury board from 1909 to 1914. In 1915, the second year of the war, we called for quotations, like the present Minister of Finance, from some of the chartered banks, for a loan of $8 million or $9 million on treasury notes signed by the mayor and treasurer of the city. We received quotations of four and a half, four and three-quarters, four and seven-eighths and five for those treasury notes.

I decided to telephone Chicago and New York and I was able to obtain a loan of $9 million from the Chase and National City banks at one and a half, one and a quarter and one and three-quarters. On January 5, 1915, we had $28 million of a sinking fund with which to pay that debt. I suggested to the legislature that there should be an amendment in the city act to permit the city to use that sinking fund for the payment of treasury notes at the current rates.

After that it was decided that instead of the various civic boards handling their own sales of bonds, boards such as the Toronto harbour board and the transportation board and so on, the city would handle everything. At that time there was not a public utility paying its own way. I brought in the late Thomas Bradshaw to act as finance commissioner and from then on we had public discussions of the estimates at open board meetings. A pay-as-you-go system was adopted and there was no inflation of revenues but there was a reduction in the tax rate. In 1915, 1916 and 1917 the expenditures totaled $8 million.

In 1916 I advised the city to apply for legislation to substitute serial bonds for sinking fund bonds and the result was that we were able to refund all our securities and pay something off each year. This was a blessing to civic finances in that we were able to secure loans for debentures at the highest possible rates of any other municipality in the province.

In conclusion I want to say that I was one of those who opposed Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods. We on this side of the house are just as much to blame as the government for the mistakes that have been made. I am willing to admit that. There are also the Geneva and Havana agreements. I was the only one on this side of the house who objected. We should have told our friends in Washington that preferential trade is a family matter and beyond discussion outside the empire.

I am glad I took the stand I did with regard to Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks because they proved to be wrong. They have destroyed preferential trade and they have made us dependent on Washington for many things. They have placed us beyond hope. I am glad I was the only Conservative on these benches who opposed those notorious agreements which have ruined Canada and brought us to disaster. We cannot blame the government entirely for we on this side of the house are just as much to blame. My hon. friends to the left, except those to my far left in the corner, were in exactly the same boat.

Mr. H. H. Hatfield (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words against the extension of this act and will have to disagree with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). The premium on United States currency was a great help to all farmers, lumbermen, fishermen and exporters of goods in the maritime provinces. The member for Charlotte went back to 1918 and 1919 and said that the banks paid a different rate on United States currency at that time. They paid a different rate, but it never varied over one per cent in all that time. He said that the Americans came over, put their currency in the bank and received the premium, and that the fishermen received no advantage. That is not correct because when the American buyers put their currency in the bank and received the premium they had to pay out the premium to the fishermen, lumbermen, pulpwood sellers and farmers.

During the years 1918 and 1919 I shipped hundreds of cars of potatoes to the United States and Cuba, and for every one of those carloads I paid the farmer from $100 to $300 per car more than I received for them in United States funds. But everyone made a good profit that year. That shows that the premium was a blessing to our farmers, fishermen and lumbermen of the maritime provinces, and of all Canada, the gold miner and everyone else. It was a great mistake when the Canadian dollar was raised to parity.

The member for Charlotte said that he sold fish and received Canadian currency for it in accordance with the foreign exchange control order of 1939. That order reads:

> No person shall, without a licence from the board, accept payment in Canadian dollars for any property exported, or to be exported, to the United States.

Therefore if he sold fish for export to the United States it was contrary to the act.

As I said before, the 10 per cent premium was a great blessing to the farmers, fishermen and lumbermen of the maritime provinces, and of all Canada. It brought more United States dollars into Canada than the austerity program has. We would have plenty of United States dollars today if we had only retained the premium.

The Liberal policy has always been free trade. On November 17 over the radio they put embargoes against United States goods. They did not increase the duty; they placed an embargo against United States goods. That was a great detriment to our export trade. The premium increased our export trade; the premium brought millions of dollars into Canada by way of investment. Now the foreigner is scared to bring his money into Canada because he is afraid that he will never get it back again. The government is today allowing the manufacturers of Canada hundreds of thousands of dollars of United States currency to send over to the United States and other countries to buy potato starch and cornstarch to bring into Canada. At the same time the government is buying in the maritime provinces potatoes which they will dump. Those potatoes should be put into starch to take the place of the starch they are importing, and for which they are using United States currency. The imported starch is in competition with our own starch and is driving the price of our own starch down to the extent of hundreds of dollars per carload. This spring we will be dumping potatoes in the maritime provinces because of the bringing in of corn and potato starch.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Abbott: This evening I have to devote some time to a matter of some importance.

Mr. Knowles: What would it be?

Mr. Graydon: Are you still open to suggestions?

Mr. Abbott: I thought we might carry on this discussion for half an hour or so after the dinner recess, but if it is not possible to complete proceedings by that time I shall have to ask that the debate be adjourned, and that we go on with something else for the rest of the evening.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause one carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is just one matter I should like to take up with the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, and that is the enforcement of these regulations. During the past year and a half a number of complaints have been made to me about the enforcement of these regulations and the failure of the officials to respect the spirit rather than the letter of the law. I want to make it immediately clear that what I am about to say is not a criticism of the customs officers connected with the enforcement of this legislation. They have the regulations and they have to go by them. I would be the last person to make uncalled for allegations of injustice against customs officers in the administration of these regulations, for personal reasons.

I suppose I have to explain that statement. It is simply this, that for years my father was in the customs service and I know something of the work in connection with enforcement. What I wish to bring to the attention of the committee, and the minister particularly, is this. In the application of this legislation care should be taken to see that it is administered with discretion and with the avowed purpose of preventing anything of an unjust or tyrannical nature.

I realize that some found contravening these regulations will raise the defence that they were unacquainted with the regulations. That defence, of itself, should not be sufficient to guarantee the return to them of the moneys forfeited to the crown. Recently I was in one of the maritime provinces and was informed that on a number of occasions refunds of such moneys were made.

I am going to bring to the attention of the committee two cases that I brought before the foreign exchange control board, as examples of cases where refunds were improperly denied. In the one case, a resident of the province of Saskatchewan was crossing the line at Windsor. When he came to the line he was asked if he had any United States money in his possession. He said "Yes, I have $86 in my possession". He was then asked if he had the necessary travel permit and he said, in effect, "No, I have not. I endeavoured to deposit this money before coming here, but this is a holiday and I have not been able to do so. I am not concealing it in any way". The order was made that the money be forfeited, the wording of the order being as follows:

that the currency so seized shall remain forfeited in view of and on your failure to declare and offer same for sale to an authorized dealer of the board as required by section 22 of the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

There was no concealment. There was an immediate answer to the questions asked. That this man was in no way deceptive in his answers was admitted by the control board when application was made for the return of the money. I personally communicated with the control board, and I shall read in part from the answer I received.

When leaving Canada at Windsor in July, Mr. Boruff, when questioned by a customs officer, declared having $86 in U.S. currency in his possession but was not in possession of the necessary travel permit and $76 was accordingly seized under the provisions of the Foreign Exchange Control Act. The reason for the seizure was not because of any attempt to conceal from the customs officer that he was carrying the currency but because of his illegal possession of it.

I think that is going too far, sir. There was no concealment, not even an endeavour to conceal. As soon as he was approached by the customs officer, he gave him the facts. In my opinion, that is a tyrannical exercise of discretion on the part of the board in refusing to permit this man to have his money. He established his bona fides and his honesty, which was admitted by the board, and it was tyrannical for them to continue to uphold the order of forfeiture.

Mr. Jackman: The money was never returned?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was not returned.

Mr. Abbott: Does my hon. friend know how long this man had had the $86 in his possession?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot give the minister that information. No question of that kind was raised by the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. Abbott: I trust my friend appreciates the reason for my question. Anyone who has more than $10 in United States currency is supposed to turn it in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize that. It was a matter of a few days prior to the date in question, when he crossed the line, that he obtained this money.

The next case I should like to mention, and I mention these cases because they illustrate a lack of the exercise of proper discretion on the part of the board, is a case from my constituency. A man received word that a relative had died in Minnesota. The word was received on a Saturday in a small town in Saskatchewan. He obtained a few United States dollars so that he could cross the line to attend the funeral on the Monday. He crossed the line on Sunday and admitted that he possessed $22 in United States funds. Forfeiture of the money was ordered and that order was upheld by the foreign exchange control board.

It is that type of thing, sir, that arouses people to a realization of the injustice that follows bureaucratic interpretation of the law by the board. Parliament does not want to place honest Canadians in a position of having their money forfeited under circumstances such as those. If there were an appeal to the courts, sir, and the appeal were not from the hired man to the hired man's employer, persons such as those I have mentioned would be assured of justice. There being no appeal to the courts, I make an appeal to the minister.

I ask him whether, in his opinion, it was ever intended that this emergency legislation should be used in a manner that can only have the effect of diminishing the respect for law in the minds of the people and increasing their contempt for bureaucratic power thus exercised and above the law. Parliament is asked to place emergency powers in the hands of this board, and above the courts. Certainly, sir, my opinion is, and I think I am expressing the viewpoint of members in all parts of this house, that the board should endeavour at all times to exercise its discretion for the benefit of the citizen when that citizen has clearly shown the absence of any intent to defraud, defeat or in any way hinder the administration of this legislation.

The minister who is in charge of the administration of these regulations should be in a position to assure parliament that harsh, rigorous, unbending and tyrannical interpretation of these regulations will be reduced to the minimum.

I know that there have been occasions when members of the house have felt that my stand on behalf of the need of preserving appeals to the courts has been advanced to too great an extent. I make no apologies for taking that stand. Following criticism that those who administer this legislation were being placed above the law, finally a year ago provision was made to enable a person who was illegally dealt with or tyrannically treated to take proceedings in the courts. But action is made subject to one condition. No matter what his damage, no matter what his loss, no matter how unjust the conduct of the official might be, the person who is wronged is restricted to nominal damages, which means one dollar, but with no costs of action. The only satisfaction that a law-abiding Canadian citizen has, if he takes proceedings, is that if he is the first he may find his name in the law reports. In return for being perpetuated in that way, he is obliged to submit himself to payment of the costs of action and is denied damages.

Now when this legislation is being reconsidered, provision should be made to assure to the individual who is wronged the right that Canadians should have as against officers of the state who act beyond the powers of the legislation under which they purport to act: a right of action without the necessity of leave for a petition of right being granted by the crown.

In Great Britain there are many such bureaucratic regulations and orders. I think there are ten thousand different cases in which an individual may be searched without a search warrant, under legislation now in effect. But the individual has certain rights which are denied under this legislation. Where he is wronged, he may take proceedings in the court without being required to secure the permission or the consent of the crown. I think that we in this parliament, now that we have accepted the principle of this legislation, should make it a point to do three things. First, we should assure that the law be administered with equality to all. Second, we should assure that no one shall be penalized who, through innocence or ignorance, has committed a contravention of the legislation. Finally, we should insist on the preservation for the individual of right of action against the crown; providing that the crown, in the event of its officials acting illegally, in administering this act, shall be liable for damages to the extent of the damage sustained by the citizen.

Mr. Langlois: Many hon. members of the official opposition have endeavoured since the opening of this debate to prove that the measure under study, if again put into effect, will destroy Canadian trade with other countries of the world—specifically our trade with countries of the sterling area.

They seem to have been completely blind to the fact that, though this measure has been in force for some time, our numerous efforts to maintain and increase this special trade have met with a large degree of success. The Minister of Finance the other day gave many examples of this fact, and outlined our various and worthy endeavours in this particular sphere of our international trade relations. I wish to go on record and give this house another striking example of the numerous achievements of our present trade policy in this respect.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. What the hon. member is doing now is making a second-reading speech.

Mr. Knowles: It is too late for that.

The Deputy Chairman: It is too late to do that now. We are now dealing with clause 1 of the bill. Any speech in committee must be directly relevant to the clause before the committee. The clause has reference simply to the continuance of these regulations.

Mr. Langlois: We are still on the general item, Mr. Chairman. Having made these few introductory remarks, I was just coming to the specific points. The hon. member for Lake Centre just gave certain specific examples of a situation which, to his mind, should be corrected. I think it is my privilege, as it is the privilege of any other hon. member, to point out whatever good came about when this measure was in force. Maybe my remarks were too general in the beginning, but I am just coming to the specific point. May I be allowed to continue my remarks?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Langlois: I wish to draw your attention briefly to what this government, especially the Department of Trade and Commerce under the clever direction of its present minister, has done to relieve the situation created last year in eastern Quebec and the maritimes owing to the lack of European markets for our lumber production.

Last fall advice received from the lumber industry in the maritimes and eastern Quebec indicated that lack of orders from the United Kingdom would seriously affect lumber production in this area.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Langlois: A reduction of twenty-five per cent below the 1948 cut was predicted. The industry, however, continued its efforts to develop trade with the United Kingdom, and has now met with considerable success.

It is now expected that a large summer cut in the maritimes and Quebec will make up for the reduced production of the past four months.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Order, order.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Why do you not let him go on? He is in order.

Mr. Knowles: Listen to the Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is not in order now to deal with the principle of this legislation. The principle was adopted on second reading. We must now deal specifically with the clause that is before the committee. If I permit the hon. gentleman to make a second-reading speech at the present time, there is no reason why other members should not do the same. We do not make much progress if we do that.

Mr. Langlois: If the committee will give me two minutes I shall conclude my remarks.

Mr. Knowles: Second reading was given to the bill at six o'clock.

Mr. Langlois: Although officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, in both Ottawa and London, have assisted in the complicated negotiations, it is true that the maritimes and eastern Quebec lumber industry deserve much credit for having successfully developed this business.

We have just been informed of contracts with the United Kingdom and Ireland which will considerably aid our lumber industry of eastern Canada. The details of some of these contracts are as follows: Of Eastern Canadian spruce: the original requirement by the British timber control was 90 million feet, 30 million feet more than purchased in 1948.

It is my information that 80 million feet has been placed, and that additional contracts are being negotiated which, if successfully concluded, will bring the total volume for shipment in 1949 up to approximately 125 million feet instead of the 90 million originally indicated. The value of these contracts would be approximately $8 million.

Pit props: the United Kingdom has contracted for approximately 225,000 cords of pit props for her mines.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Once more I ask the hon. member to deal specifically with the clause under discussion.

Mr. Langlois: I shall conclude my remarks—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langlois: I have not abused the time of the house to such an extent that I should not be allowed a few minutes.

[Mr. Langlois.]

Mr. Knowles: That is not the point.

Mr. Langlois: These pit props are produced mostly from spruce and jack pine, and shipments are made from the maritime provinces and Quebec. The value of these contracts amounts to approximately five and a half million dollars.

Hardwood: I have also been informed that the United Kingdom is expected to purchase approximately 10 million feet of hardwood lumber from eastern Canada. This contract is, however, yet to be confirmed.

The authorities in Ireland had placed orders for approximately 20 million feet of Canadian spruce with eastern companies, subject to confirmation and release of funds by ECA authorities. Approximately 6 million feet of the total was confirmed, but difficulty was encountered in obtaining release of the remaining quantity.

Representations were made by Ottawa and Washington officials of our Department of Trade and Commerce on behalf of the Canadian companies holding these contracts. Confirmation has now been received from Washington which indicates that release has been approved for a further quantity of 7,400,000 feet for shipment during the second quarter of 1949. These Irish contracts will amount to approximately $1 million.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Langlois: In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce for having so effectively given his best attention to my representations and to the representations made by members of our sister provinces to the east. Our lumber producers, and all those who make a living in our lumber industry, will receive the news of these new contracts with great relief and satisfaction.

The Progressive Conservatives may shout their opposition to their heart's content; they will not prevent the public from appreciating the good effects of our policy, which has proven to be in the best interest of the Canadian people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that my hon. friend has raced through his remarks I wonder whether I can get an answer from the minister. I should also like to ask this question. How many seizures of money took place in 1947 and 1948 by provinces, and in how many cases were the seizures released and the money returned to the applicants?

Mr. Abbott: I completely agree with the point made by my hon. friend in his initial remarks that officials of the board, or the customs officers who act for them, should in no case be harsh and tyrannical, as he put it. I suppose that all of us who are members of parliament have had some of these cases brought to our attention. I know that I have had them and I have taken them up with the board. I do not think that the actions that have been brought to my attention have been harsh or tyrannical. I am free to confess that in some cases it seemed to me that the customs officers might have used a little more discretion and given the person the benefit of the doubt as to his bona fides. However, no one will realize better than my hon. friend the difficulty of giving wide discretionary powers in cases of this kind because it is so easy to play favourites. If there is a breach of the law, in the absence of very special extenuating circumstances, certain conclusions must flow. However, I do not differ with him, or with other hon. members with whom I have discussed this question, that judgment should be exercised by people who are in charge of enforcing these regulations, but favouritism should not be shown.

As to the number of seizures, I have not the breakdown by provinces, but I have them for the country as a whole. I shall give the seizures in total, and perhaps I can obtain the breakdown later. In 1947, 347 seizures were maintained and 321 released. The seizures maintained involved a total of 10,991 United States dollars. The seizures released involved 17,807 United States dollars. These are seizures of $100 and under. In 1948, the number of seizures maintained amounted to 1,501, involving 30,768 United States dollars, and 13,668 Canadian dollars. The seizures released in 1948 amounted to 975, totalling 27,003 United States dollars and 1,770 Canadian dollars. At the end of 1948 there were 228 seizures still pending, involving 5,961 United States dollars and 1,768 Canadian dollars.

Only one case was referred to a court for final decision in 1947. In 1948 there were five cases referred to the courts. Seizure was maintained in three and the board's decision was reversed in the other two. I shall try to get the breakdown by provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says that he agrees the action of the officials should not be tyrannical. Does he not also agree that, in circumstances such as those that I referred to him, the facts were such that the exchange board, in the exercise of its discretion, and having regard to the rights of the individual, might have released the moneys held, since in both cases there was no intent nor was any subterfuge perpetrated with a view to undermining the law? I feel, sir, that these two cases were proper ones for consideration.

The minister has not answered the question that I asked him as to whether or not he thinks the time has come, in the granting of these extraordinary powers, that any individual wronged by the illegal exercise of powers by any of the officials, or by the usurpation of powers by them in the discharge of their duties, should have a right of action against such officials and not be limited to the sum of one dollar as nominal damages, irrespective of the enormity of the offence and the interference with his rights and the damage suffered by him.

Mr. Abbott: On the first point my hon. friend has made quite an appealing case, as he has presented it. My own experience has been—and similar cases have been brought to my attention by my own constituents and others—that there is nearly always some difference of opinion, or some conflict between the statement of facts put forward by the person who is complaining and the report we get from the customs officers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was quoting from the report.

Mr. Abbott: It is sometimes difficult to judge as between the two conflicting stories.

The hon. member raises the point that there should be some recourse against the public officers in the performance of their duties. I do not think I can agree with that. My understanding is that in the Customs Act and the Excise Act for years there have been provisions analogous to that contained in the Foreign Exchange Control Act, protecting officers in the performance of their duties from being exposed to actions for damages. I was informed at the time the act was brought in that the provisions put in the Foreign Exchange Control Act were, with of course the appropriate changes, identical in their terms with those in the Customs Act and the Excise Act and other revenue acts for years.

I should not think there would be any special reason for removing that protection from customs officers exercising their functions in this instance, or that it should be any different from the protection they are afforded in exercising their duties as customs officers proper.

Mr. Kidd: I have another point I should like to bring up—this is not the first time I have mentioned foreign exchange to the minister. We are really dealing with an act known as the Foreign Exchange Control Act. And I might say to you, sir, that I think a lot of this difficulty rests with the minister —and I am sincere about that.

There was an error in judgment on the minister's part, and I am going to point it out. I will point it out now, because I think there should not be any recurrence of it.

I know that we have complaints where constituents are dealt with unjustly, and they do not receive the compensation due to them. I think it is the duty of a member to bring this to the minister's attention, because the fault lies with him.

He carried out the same, perhaps I should not use the word tactics, when he was minister of militia. It was most difficult to get the present minister to bring down legislation in the house. I remember that one time when he was minister of militia he made a speech which should have been made here in the House of Commons. We asked him about that speech the same afternoon and in a jocular way he said that it was a political speech, and that we would not wish to hear a political speech. Having said that, he was not very serious about it.

That happened on Friday, May 23, 1947. I hold in my hand an amendment to the Foreign Exchange Control Act, as it is set out in P.C. 2045, and it is that issue I wish to take up this evening. What happened on that afternoon? The house was in session at that time. I might say that the amending order in council was here. I say the minister should have come to the house, as has been done many times by ministers of the crown, and should have informed the house of the amendment. He should have given us the same information as to the amendment. But instead of that he went on the air at night.

We have a press gallery up here, and they could have given the country the information, but the minister thought better to give it out as a broadcast. What happened? The public did not know anything about it. And that was the condition in May, 1947.

The months of May, June and July passed. Then what happened? Enforcement officers were appointed. I say that the administration is wrong and that the minister was wrong. First we have the Minister of Finance dealing with the Foreign Exchange Control Act, and then the administration comes through the Minister of National Revenue.

Two citizens in my constituency were picked up by officers at the international bridge at Lansdowne in 1947. Naturally I wrote to the minister responsible, in that instance the Minister of National Revenue. He washed his hands of it, and said that this was a matter for the foreign exchange control board.

I immediately brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance. Well, I did not get very much information there, except to find out who was carrying out the enforcement. What did I find? In the course of a short time in the following session the minister placed hundreds of these enforcement officers all across Canada. These were not trained. And I should like to place myself on record as saying that if this had been left in the hands of the inland revenue branch I believe all of these people would have been justly dealt with. I say that because the enforcement officers with the inland revenue branch are well established officials who have chosen that branch of the service for their life's work. Many of them are returned soldiers, and veterans of the first world war. They know how to deal with these infractions.

However, as soon as the apprehension is made these people are passed on to Ottawa, with the result that the work of the enforcement officers here overlaps. First there is the Minister of Finance, then the foreign exchange control board, and then the Minister of National Revenue.

I am now going to ask my question. What happened? A form was sent out by an enforcement officer over here in the foreign exchange control board. I would like to know who Mr. C. A. Rowe is. This officer was appointed on June 2, 1947. Then, who is J. E. Rowe, appointed on September 22, 1947?

In order to obtain the information I wanted I had to ask these questions:

1. How many enforcement officers are employed by the foreign exchange control board?
2. Who are they?
3. What date were they appointed?
4. Where are they located?
5. What salary does each receive?

Naturally one would think that an official who is acting as part of a government organization would be recorded. I wanted to know if this was an honorary appointment. So what did I find? The answer was:

As the officers provided to the board are employees of the Bank of Canada, their salaries are not a matter of government record.

Here we have this document signed by C. A. Rowe. At that time the present Secretary of State for External Affairs was his chief. I did not know that; perhaps I should have directed my question to him.

This is where the administration is wrong. This letter was sent out, and let me point out where it is not quite fair. It is dated September 5, 1947, and, refers to the minister's statement:

In his statement of May 6, 1947, which was given wide publicity in the daily newspapers and over the radio the Minister of Finance announced that customs officials would be instructed to enforce the new permit regulations strictly and that prosecutions would be instituted in cases where Canadians have unlawfully accumulated United States funds or have attempted to export them without permit.

That letter was sent out on September 5, 1947. It was more or less protecting the minister, and intimated that he had done the proper thing. I can only say again that the Minister of Finance did not do the proper thing.

I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here tonight, but even in his absence there is a recommendation I should like to make. It took me all last year to get this return of 168 pages. No one can tell me that an injustice has not been done. According to the figures given to the hon. member for Lake Centre a moment ago, in 1947 there were 347 cases, the collections were $10,991. This was retained. But they returned $17,000 in 321 cases. I have every one of those names on the list, and not many of them exceeded $50. That money should be returned on the ground that the minister erred in his judgment.

I say that because in December 1947, when Bill No. 3 was before the house, he saw his mistake. Why did he see it? Because he knew then what had happened. In January of 1948 he saw fit to advertise in newspapers across Canada. This is what he should have done the morning after he went on the air on May 26, 1947. The minister will find the details of the Renaud case on file. I do not know why he did not return the money. That woman was just as innocent as she could be. Can the minister tell me why the money was not returned? After he answers that, I should like to put another question. Can you answer my question first?

Mr. Abbott: Why does not my hon. friend address the Chair?

Mr. Kidd: It is all right, I will address the Chair.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member was a Speaker in a legislature for years.

Mr. Kidd: I want to ask the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, why he has not returned this money. There is another case that I read of only yesterday in the Financial Times. This case was not correctly stated by the foreign exchange control board. This man is a French Canadian, Mr. Peter Brunet, and when he was crossing the bridge en route to Ormstown, Quebec, the English-speaking officer asked him—he works in my constituency—what money he had. He told them he had $5. He thought they were asking him about United States money. They asked for his purse, and when he gave it to them they found $68 Canadian funds in it. They took $43 from him. That man was innocent.

That is why I find fault with the administration of the act. If we had the old trusted inland revenue men they would have told the man to leave the money there because they would know he was coming back on Monday morning. But what was done? These other officers put it in an envelope and sent it behind the iron curtain to the foreign exchange control board. The man was penalized and the money has not been returned. The minister knows both these cases and I am glad of this opportunity to bring them before him again. Will the minister state why these moneys have not been returned to Miss Renaud and Mr. Brunet.

Mr. Abbott: The details of these particular cases have gone out of my head at the moment. Many of these cases are brought to my attention, but I do recall my hon. friend took up with me these two particular cases. From the reports which I got from the officials of the board I came to the conclusion that there was no greater justification in these two cases for returning the money than there would be in several hundred others, and consequently the money was not returned.

Mr. Kidd: Who is Mr. Rowe and how long has he been appointed?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid that I cannot give an answer offhand, although I can get the information. I cannot keep track of hundreds of employees in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I have only been in the chamber a few minutes because I do not believe in sitting at seven-thirty. I think it is a lot of nonsense because no one is here. I heard what the hon. member for Lake Centre had to say and I agree with everything he said because he talks common sense. But I cannot go as far with the last speaker. If we are going to talk about each individual case involving $10 here and $10 there the bill will never get through. There are one or two ways in which I do not approve of the foreign exchange control. I do not know much about foreign or any other kind of exchange because I have never had any money except what I could borrow.

The other day the Minister of Agriculture said that he always spoke as a politician. I do not, because I do not know anything about politics. My riding borders on the United States and many of my people have to cross the line. There are one or two instances that I want to bring to the attention of the minister. Some of us in British Columbia are honest; we do not all come from the maritimes.

An hon. Member: Those are the ones from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Cruickshank: We are allowed $150 United States to cross the line. We may cross the line and being conservative, in the economic rather than the political sense, we save our money and bring back $75. Being honest people in British Columbia, particularly in the Fraser valley, we turn in $75. Then when we want to go across the line later in the year we cannot get any money. The minister knows that that is the fact. We are not complaining about being allowed only $150 a year, but when we bring back $75—I never do because I happen to be married—we should be given credit. Unlike the Minister of Agriculture, I am not a politician but my riding borders on the United States and these regulations affect my constituents most unfairly.

Mr. Hatfield: An act was passed in 1946 permitting a person to have $100 United States currency in his possession; is that still in effect?

Mr. Abbott: It is $10.

Mr. Hatfield: When was the act amended?

Mr. Abbott: I do not remember the exact date, but I think it was the date referred to by the hon. member for Kingston City. I do not want to interrupt, but I indicated before dinner that unfortunately I can be here only for a short time this evening. I gather that the committee wants to discuss this measure for some considerable time. If we could finish in ten or fifteen minutes I could stay, but if not I should like to adjourn the debate and have the house go on to something else.

Mr. Fleming: I shall not be long as I am not going to go into details of cases, but there are one or two things I should like to say with regard to the administration of the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

I think there is on the part of the foreign exchange control board far too much of an attitude of distrust toward people in business. I am perfectly satisfied from what I have seen that there is too great a readiness to prosecute. There are many transactions where the regulations have been technically broken but where there has not been the slightest intent on the part of the individual involved to commit an infraction. I feel that there is far too great readiness to distrust the people involved instead of a willingness to sit down with them to discuss the problem.

In connection with the second aspect of the matter that I should like to discuss, I offer this illustration. This particular case involved a substantial amount and it actually resulted in the saving of considerable United States exchange. But the officers of the board considered there had been an infraction. I am satisfied that if there had been one it was purely a technical one. The officers and accountants and auditors of the board went into this place of business in Toronto and asked to see their books and vouchers. The head of the business readily agreed. He said: "You may make yourselves comfortable here. We will produce anything you want to see." The officers were not satisfied. They said: "We would like to take your books away. Have you any objection?" He said: "Certainly I have objection. You can take copies of anything you want. You can photostat anything that is here, but I am not going to have my books taken out of my place of business." They were not satisfied with that. Nothing was heard of them for several months, and then like a bolt from the blue in walked the R.C.M.P. with a warrant, seized the books, and a prosecution was launched. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that reveals a very high-handed attitude. If foreign exchange control must continue then I put the responsibility on the Minister of Finance to see that this high-handed attitude ceases on the part of the officials concerned.

In saying that, I am not going to underestimate the size of the task they have to perform. If we are going to have foreign exchange control, then of course there must be administration, and there must be enforcement, but I think just as important as the letter of the law is the spirit that is instilled into the officials responsible for the administration and enforcement. In that respect it seems to me, with deference, that the Minister of Finance and the chairman of the board could have a beneficial influence.

There is one other matter. I am still concerned about the possibility of the use of this measure for the purpose of regulating or prohibiting in some way or other the movement of goods. I do not wish to thresh old straw. We recall the assurance given to the house on this subject by the Minister of Finance on June 17, 1946, when he said, at page 2547 of Hansard:

> We have no intention of using this exchange control legislation to restrict anything but certain types of capital movement.

On that assurance the bill went to the banking and commerce committee of the house. A good deal has been said about what occurred before the banking and commerce committee of the other place, but some things of importance transpired in the banking and commerce committee of this house. I wish to mention briefly two passages in the evidence given by Mr. Rasminsky to the banking and commerce committee of this house on July 15, 1946. At page 55 of the record this question was put to him:

> There is one remark of Mr. Rasminsky's that I should like to ask a question about.

Then reference is made to it, and reference is made to sections 25, 26 and 27 of the act. Then this statement is made in the question:

> Surely it is not a complete answer to say that protection is provided in what are apparently intended to be the saving or reassuring clauses, section 25, subsection 2, section 26, subsection 2, and section 27, subsection 3. They do not go so far as to remove from the foreign exchange control board all regulatory power with reference to the movement of goods, currency and securities.

Then follows Mr. Rasminsky's answer:

I do think that the subsections to which you have just referred very definitely have this effect, that they make it impossible for the board to withhold permits for the import or export of goods except on two grounds, one, that the payment is not in a currency which has been specified as the appropriate currency for that transaction; and two, on the ground that there is an improper valuation placed on the transaction.

Mr. Rasminsky, the alternate chairman of the foreign exchange control board, said there were only two grounds on which freedom for the movement of goods could be refused under the provisions of the act. Again at page 57 there is this question:

In other words, the suggestion there is no regulatory power vested in the board with reference to imports at the expense of any power parliament now has in that regard, Mr. Rasminsky, was referring to the export and import of goods rather than securities and currency?

Mr. Rasminsky answered:

That is right.

We know what happened in November, 1947. This house is entitled to the assurance that the act is not going to be used again—or, more accurately, abused again—for a purpose that was specifically disclaimed by the Minister of Finance in introducing the measure, and by the alternate chairman of the board in giving his evidence in the passages to which I have referred. Before the bill is reported to the house I think the minister should be prepared to give assurance that, except in the two cases referred to by Mr. Rasminsky which are clearly within the terms of the act, the act will not be used again to restrict the movement of goods across the border.

It is unfortunate that there is not an opportunity provided now for a review of the whole administration of the act, and a review of the provisions of the act, as there was three years ago when the bill was before us. It is a great pity, because the provisions of this act ought to be very carefully scrutinized by the banking and commerce committee of the house in the light of nearly three years' experience under the terms of this statute. I think the banking and commerce committee would insist on a goodly number of amendments being made if the committee had the opportunity to make that review.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the minister should give the house some statement as to his objective. It is not good enough to go on saying, "We believe that a need exists for the continuation of the measure; we are not prepared to say when the act should come to an end, and we are asking in the meantime for a two-year extension." We had statements of a similar nature when the bill was previously before the house, and I think the house ought to have a clear statement from the minister as to specifically what he is aiming at in that regard. His predecessor as Minister of Finance had this to say on June 17, 1946, in introducing the measure, at page 2547 of Hansard:

We hope—

He is speaking now of the character of the financial relations between nations.

—that it will be one which does not call for restrictive controls and we shall do everything in our power to bring this about.

Again on page 2547 of Hansard he said, following the passage I read earlier disclaiming any intention to restrict anything but certain types of capital movement:

We expect to be able to avoid any interference with current account transactions.

Will the minister give the house some statement as to what his objectives are? Surely the minister must be prepared to subscribe to freedom in this matter as the objective to which the house should be bending its efforts, to which the administration ought to be bending its efforts, and to which the whole purpose of the administration of this measure ought now to be directed.

Mr. Abbott: I think the latter part of my hon. friend's speech was directed rather more to the principles of the bill than to the details of the sections. I do not know that I can add very much to what I said in my rather lengthy speech last Thursday. As to what the government has in mind in asking for the continuation of this measure, in the disturbed condition in which we find ourselves today in the world I look on it as a sort of measure of national defence. I am firmly convinced that we need exchange control, and that we shall continue to need it for some little time yet; but as I have had occasion to say numerous other times when this legislation has been before the house, it is open to the government of the day or to parliament at any time to repeal this measure. It does not have to wait until it lapses by mere passage of time. There is not much, if anything, that I can add to what I said in my speech last Thursday as to the reasons why the government feels that it must ask for the continuation of this measure.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister give assurance against the use of the act to limit the movement of goods across international boundaries?

Mr. Abbott: I am not going to give formal assurance as to anything. As the committee will recall, the foreign exchange control order was used in November of 1947 to control the importation of goods into the country. As I stated frankly at that time, it had never been contemplated that power was contained in the act. In those circumstances I think it was very fortunate that it was there. Concurrently with the use of those powers we introduced into the house a specific bill which is now the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, in which we put in statutory form the prohibitions and quotas on the importation of goods. I can certainly say, however, that the government has no intention at this moment of using the Foreign Exchange Control Act in that way. The committee will recall that in the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act there is a specific provision that its prohibitions and quotas cannot be increased except by a statute of this house. We can relax, but we cannot increase the prohibitions; I think the law will have to speak for itself.

Mr. Herridge: I intend to support this measure, but I should also like to express my support for the suggestion put forward by the member for Fraser Valley. I think it was a practical and reasonable suggestion. I also represent a border constituency in which there are a number of people who go back and forth to the United States. Under the present regulations the United States currency they have when they return to Canada is turned into the bank but is not credited to the $150 total United States funds they are allowed per year. If a person returns the unspent balance of this United States money to the bank, in my opinion it should be credited to the total of $150 a person is allowed. I ask the minister if it would be possible to change the regulations in this respect to give effect to that suggestion.

Mr. Abbott: I would be very glad to discuss it with the board. I do not see why it should not be done, but there may be good reasons for not doing it. I will certainly explore the matter. I am sorry, but I cannot stay any longer this evening. If the committee is not ready to report the bill, I shall have to adjourn the debate.

Mr. Kidd: Will the minister inform the house who this Mr. C. A. Rowe is, who was appointed—

Mr. Abbott: I will have to get some information as to that. All I can say at the moment is that he is an employee of the board. I do not know what his particular duties are or from where he comes.

Mr. Kidd: As long as the minister says he will inform the house—

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: I will obtain the information and inform the house.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I think the minister should be allowed to leave, since he has an important engagement, and we can go on with something else.

Progress reported.

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 86, to amend the Continuation or Transitional Measures Act, 1947.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this bill, an act to amend the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947, I should like to review and, if I can, to clarify some of the issues which have emerged in relation to it. Whatever he may think as to the continuance of the emergency up to the present time, no member will deny that during world war II a national emergency arose.

To deal with the problems created by this national emergency, the government introduced a number of economic and financial controls in respect to matters which it was admitted under normal peacetime conditions would fall within section 92 of the British North America Act and within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The government's authority to deal with these matters was not established by this parliament. It was established by the War Measures Act which was passed in 1914 to deal with a similar emergency created by world war I.

Section 2 of the War Measures Act, 1914, provides that the issue of a proclamation by His Majesty or under the authority of the governor in council shall be conclusive evidence that the war exists and of its continuance, until by the issue of a further proclamation it is declared that the war no longer exists. At the end of world war I the War Measures Act was not repealed and therefore, when world war II began, the government had only to proclaim on September 1, 1939, the War Measures Act of 1914 in order to eliminate all conflicts of jurisdiction between the provinces and dominion. This granted supremacy to the federal parliament to the extent that it was necessary to deal with the emergency of world war II.

Many harsh things have been said by our Progressive Conservative friends in this house concerning the orders in council now under discussion and the alleged bureaucrats who administered them, including the alleged No. 1 and No. 2 bureaucrats, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). The leader of the opposition alleges that the present Liberal administration in connection with these orders in council has been guilty of centralization, dictatorial bureaucracy, and invasion of provincial rights, and I believe also of incipient totalitarianism.

Characteristically, he has not at any time taken the trouble to prove these serious charges. We of course emphatically deny them. Most of the orders in council complained about, which authorize all of this alleged bureaucracy, were passed under this War Measures Act of 1914, introduced by a Conservative government under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden and left on the statute books at the end of world war I by the Union government presided over by a Conservative. Order in council P.C. 8528, which is the key order, was drafted as a copy of an order passed during world war I under the War Measures Act, and the words, "unreasonable and unjust", stood the test of time from 1914 until they were somewhat disturbed by the decision in the McGinn case just a few weeks ago.

In saying this, sir, I am implying no criticism whatever of Sir Robert Borden or of the Conservative government in 1914. On the contrary, I say he was right in passing the War Measures Act and we have been right in invoking that act. It is the leader of the opposition and his colleagues in this house now who are wrong in criticizing us for invoking the act passed at that time.

At the end of world war II, the present government did not continue to act under the War Measures Act. As soon as the war ended, this government, which is now charged by the leader of the opposition with flouting the authority of parliament, came back to this parliament for authority for the transitional powers it required to carry on in the post-war years. This authority took the form of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, the preamble to which recites, among other things, the following:

> And whereas the national emergency arising out of the war has continued since the unconditional surrender of Germany and Japan and is still continuing;
> And whereas it is essential in the national interest that certain transitional powers continue to be exercisable by the governor in council during the continuation of the exceptional conditions brought about by war—
>
> —and it is preferable that such transitional powers be exercised hereafter under special authority in that behalf conferred by parliament instead of being exercised under the War Measures Act.

This is a very pregnant statement—

In other words, sir, the moment the war was over, instead of this government in any way disregarding the rights and powers of parliament, it ceased to invoke the War Measures Act and came back to parliament for authority to carry on during the post-war period. Thus when our Conservative friends rant in this house about restoring to parliament the powers of parliament, they completely ignore the fact that as soon as the war was over this Liberal government, true to its traditions of acknowledging at all times the supremacy of parliament, came back to this house for the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, just as we now seek the passage of the bill which is now before the house. But what our friends of the Conservative party must not forget, I suggest with all deference, is that it is the majority of parliament which determines these matters and not the minority, no matter how noisy and truculent it may be.

After 1945, having secured the authority to carry on in the post-war period, this government came back in 1946 to call for an amendment to the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act of 1945. Then, in the further development of this policy of consulting parliament at all times for authority for each new phase of decontrol, in 1947 this government came back to parliament seeking the passage of the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947. To this act at that time was attached a schedule which, as it was originally presented—as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said the other day—contained fifty-seven orders in council; but those had been whittled down to fifty before the bill got through the house. These orders in council —that is, the exact text of the orders in council themselves—were laid before the house in their entirety. Then, order by order and section by section, they were gone over by this parliament; and they will appear in the schedule to that act, with the amendments which were made by parliament to those orders in council indicated as part of the schedule. In other words, parliament approved these orders in precisely the same way that it would approve the sections of a statute. Any suggestion that the procedure followed was a secret procedure or a flouting of parliament is not in any way supported by the facts. More than that, by section 4 of this 1947 act, it was provided that in addition to these orders in council set out in the schedule to this act of 1947—the terms of which orders in council had been approved of by parliament—the governor in council might revoke in whole or in part any order or regulation, but he could not amend any order or regulation. That means that far from parliament having delegated—as it has done on a number of occasions and as it is quite proper for parliament to do—legislative power to the governor in council, parliament in that bill did no such thing. It undertook itself to go over the exact terms of the orders in council; and by the terms of the act which this government introduced the governor in council was limited to the revocation of the orders but had no authority to amend them in any way.

Was this procedure a flouting of parliamentary authority? Did the consultation of parliament, year by year, take away from parliament's powers? Did the prohibition under section 4, which prevented the governor in council from amending the orders in council which parliament had approved and placed in the schedule to this act, give unto the governor in council any dictatorial, bureaucratic powers, as those words are used by the leader of the opposition? Did the duration of the act until not later than March 31, 1948, as provided in section 7 of that act—thus necessitating the government's coming back to parliament within approximately one year—indicate upon the part of this government a desire to destroy or prejudice parliamentary authority? Surely, Mr. Speaker, the answer to each of these questions is a resounding no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jackman: You will lose the C.C.F. support.

Mr. Garson: The leader of the opposition, this great John Hampden of Bay Street—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is one for the book.

Mr. Garson: —in language reminiscent of—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Young Lochinvar came out of the west.

Mr. Garson: —the battlements—as a matter of fact he used the word "battlements". He was speeding to the battlements to protect parliament.

Mr. Green: That was the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

Mr. Garson: No, no. In language reminiscent of the French revolution, tumbrils, barricades and battlements, he talked about restoring the powers of parliament. What powers, Mr. Speaker? What powers does he want to restore?

Mr. Graydon: Chubby Power.

[Mr. Garson.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Garson: It is a great thing, Mr. Speaker, to have a sense of humour.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Garson: However, my hon. friend may not have noticed that I was speaking in the plural. My hon. friend's interjection was in the singular.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is that the best you can do with that one?

Mr. Garson: In reference to these matters, what powers during the last five years has parliament failed to exercise that it should have exercised?

Mr. MacNicol: Chubby Power again.

Mr. Garson: "Chubby Power" would be about as good an answer as my hon. friend could give to that question. Chubby Power is the answer. That is the only power that was not exercised. Certainly parliament did not fail to exercise legislative powers. In 1947, as I am informed, and as the leader of the opposition seems not to have been informed, this parliament went over not only the sections of the act but the provisions of the orders in council with more care than it takes with the average statute. As I have pointed out, having done so it prohibited the governor in council from amending these orders in council in any way. Although it is a commonplace thing for parliament to delegate to the governor in council legislative powers, the government on this occasion did not ask for that delegation and it was not granted. The orders in council were passed by parliament and they stayed as parliament had passed them, and were so administered and enforced.

Parliament delegated to the executive nothing but executive powers. Is it, perchance, the executive power that our hon. friends of the Conservative opposition want restored to parliament? If so, surely they have enough experience in public life to know that it is nonsense to suggest that parliament hires the administrators, accountants, and clerks to administer this law. Far from having ignored parliament, this government has gone back to parliament every year and not only has submitted to it, but the government itself has suggested, these limitations upon its own authority.

This, sir, is by no means all that this government has done to respect parliamentary authority and to accomplish orderly control.

From 1947 onward the government in its requests to parliament voluntarily has limited itself to the continuation of orders in council which parliament has seen and approved. From 1947 on, the government has been deprived of any rights there might have been under the War Measures Act to pass any orders in council to deal with any other subject matters. Under the provisions of this War Measures Act, put on the statute books by the Borden administration, all that the government had to do was to carry on and invoke its powers in almost any direction. As soon as the war was over it came to this parliament and limited itself voluntarily to powers actually delegated by this parliament.

From 1947 until the present time this government has revoked thirty-eight of the fifty orders in council that appear in the schedule to the 1947 act. More than that, the ministers of this government have stated time and time again that the remaining controls will be lifted at the earliest time that it is safe to do so. In connection with at least one of these controls, namely, rent controls, a sincere effort was made in good faith to get the provincial governments, some of whom had been very jealous of their provincial rights, to exercise their provincial rights in relation to the subject of rent control. But strangely enough, when it came to doing something rather than merely talking about provincial rights, there was not the same amount of zeal about the exercise of them.

Mr. Zaplitny: What can you expect from a coalition?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister was running Manitoba at that time.

Mr. Garson: No, I was just ceasing to run it.

Mr. Knowles: You left it and several other things for Campbell.

Mr. Garson: To listen to my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The socialists were talking to you just now. Do not mix us up with them.

Mr. Garson: There is not much danger of my doing so. Judging by the remarks of the hon. members of the official opposition one would think that the passage of this bill—indeed, this charge has been made—is for the purpose of continuing unlimited bureaucratic dictatorship which we have been exercising during the past several years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Garson: They still think so—in order that we may centralize all the power in Canada in this government, in order that we may destroy provincial rights. Well, sir, under this bill we cannot invoke this continuing emergency to deal with any matter whatsoever, except those relating to the very narrow list now of goods and services, in respect of which an order of the wartime prices and trade board is in force at the time the bill becomes law. In other words, if we wish to exercise these wide, bureaucratic, dictatorial powers with which we are charged, the only way in which we can legally do so is to come back to this parliament, not by any of the bills which are before us, but by an entirely new bill, asking parliament specifically to grant us that power. Having regard to the fact that we have already brought down this bill, invoking for that purpose the continuing emergency, we would be in a very parlous condition to do so, and I should think it would be at least politically embarrassing, if not legally impossible, to invoke the same emergency the second time for other powers. Therefore, our powers are very narrowly limited, and any suggestion about widespread totalitarian dictatorial powers which flout parliament is just so much nonsense.

Mr. Jackman: Put it in statute form, then.

Mr. Garson: These are the facts upon which the leader of the official opposition relies, because they are the only facts upon which he can rely, to launch his hysterical charges of dictatorship against the Prime Minister and against this government, and his charges of servility upon all those hon. members who support the government's control measures. He says that the members of this government are "drunk with power". Drunk with power on the basis of what I have stated, of a very narrow limit of authority which is deliberately asked for and has been granted by this parliament from year to year.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is the second best way to get drunk that I know of.

Mr. Adamson: They get drunk easily.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): But not often.

Mr. Garson: I say this quite seriously to my hon. friends, who have a sense of humour which functions at times. I say seriously that charges, language and arguments of this kind are not such as to advance the prudent progress of public business or to develop good public policy or properly to care for and discharge the public affairs of this country.

In his remarks the other day the leader of the opposition said—and I quote his exact words so as not to misrepresent what he said—that he:

> . . . would be under the necessity of applying a short and harsh word to any of those who said that because his party had voted against this resolution that it was not in favour of rental control.

Well, sir, he and his colleagues in the official opposition have been at very great pains in this house to establish upon the one hand that they are in favour of rental control, yet, sir, they vote against a resolution to introduce a measure to continue that rent control.

Mr. Cockeram: We want it by statute.

Mr. Garson: They have a perfect right to do that. But within half an hour of the taking of that vote, before a single hon. member could have emerged from this house to talk to any person as to what that party had done or what it had not done, the leader of the opposition was on his feet uttering threats that he was going to brand, presumably as a liar—I imagine that is the short and descriptive word—any person who had sense enough to draw from the vote the only possible deduction that could be drawn from it, namely, that the Conservative party was opposed to the continuance of rent control; for surely, sir, it must be obvious to the meanest intelligence that if all of the hon. members had followed the example of the Conservative party in the vote on this resolution we would not have had any continuance of rent control. That is the answer.

Mr. Graydon: You would have had to bring in a statute.

Mr. Garson: I suggest, sir, that such a worry, such a perturbation upon the part of the leader of the opposition within minutes after the vote had been cast, betokens a rather troubled conscience. Methinks, Mr. Speaker, the lady doth protest too much.

Mr. Knowles: He is no lady.

Mr. Garson: And, sir, my hon. friend's protests impress, and I suggest that his threats frighten, no one. He has used this short and descriptive word with regard to so many honourable, decent and often distinguished citizens, that it is almost a mark of distinction for him to admit others to their company. It is getting to be that no man in public life today can really claim to have arrived unless he has been called names by the hon. gentleman. It is like a picture by Karsh in reverse. The Karsh picture flatters, and the harsh names of my hon. friend offend, but they are both, with apologies to Mr. Karsh, the hallmarks of arrival.

Mr. Graydon: What section of the bill is the minister speaking on now?

Mr. Garson: I shall be very glad to answer my hon. friend. I am speaking on the statement of his leader that he would apply a short and descriptive word to any person who commented upon the vote that was cast by my hon. friend's party on this bill.

Mr. Graydon: What has Karsh got to do with that?

An hon. Member: The minister had his picture taken by Karsh.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend the other day issued an invitation to the members of this house. He invited us to listen so that we might learn something about constitutional matters in Canada by no more complicated a device than listening to him.

Well, sir, I must say that for a man who professes to be such an expert in this field he portrays, in my opinion, on every occasion on which he speaks concerning it, a most superficial grasp of the principles involved. And as compared with those of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), for example, or the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), or the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), his legal arguments upon it neither merit nor warrant a reply. His statements do not make sense even as to the facts. He says, for example, that if there be such an emergency as we allege, then that emergency could be invoked for the purpose of a wholesale invasion of provincial rights.

Mr. Jackman: Hear, hear.

Mr. Garson: And the hon. member says "hear, hear." What are the facts? With these powers which he says we have taken unto ourselves, what have we done? Over a period of years, since the Transitional Measures Act was passed in 1947, and even before that, we have followed a policy of continuous and orderly decontrol practised by this government, which is the very antithesis of any invasion of provincial rights. So that any suggestion such as the one that has been made, that this general emergency which we invoke as the basis for our law, is going to be seized upon for a wholesale invasion of provincial rights, is quite without foundation.

Even the very control which he says he is in favour of, namely rental control, has not been continued by this government until sincere attempts had been made to have the provinces take over this field, if they were prepared to do so. Does this look like an invasion of provincial rights? Does it support any of the extravagant language and the extravagant charges and accusations which my hon. friend has been making so freely at every stage of the debate on this bill? Certainly not.

He drags in, as he has dragged in on every possible occasion, whether it was relevant or not, the old chestnut which is just as incorrect this time as on every other occasion on which he has repeated it, to the effect that after the war the dominion government did not return to the provinces their taxing powers. This, sir, I suggest is a statement and argument which is intended for consumption by the uninformed; because no one else would pay any attention to it. The constitution, of which my hon. friends are the stout defenders, gave to the dominion government from the very beginning, in 1867, completely unlimited taxing powers. The dominion government does not have to ask any provincial consent to impose any form of taxation.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What section is that?

Mr. Garson: May I tell my hon. friend that I am replying to the argument which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) considered so relevant to this matter, which he introduced in the house, and which hon. members and Mr. Speaker permitted him to speak upon, and to which they listened.

Mr. Knowles: You are both out of order.

Mr. Garson: If that could be done, then surely we are at liberty to correct a record which has been left in the state in which he left it.

The facts are that during the war the dominion purchased from the provinces exclusive powers in the fields of income and corporation taxes by paying to the provinces good and valuable consideration fixed in freely negotiated agreements between the provinces and the dominion. During the period of the agreement the Drew government in Ontario accumulated an aggregate surplus on current account of over $46,800,000.

At the expiration of this agreement the provinces were offered a generous substitute for it, which substitute recognized and affirmed the provinces' constitutional rights to impose all these taxes if they chose to do so. Again, the provinces were free to accept or not to accept. Two of them, Ontario and Quebec, in point of fact did not accept. The wartime tax suspension agreements had been complied with to the letter, and any statement that the dominion failed to return to the provinces their taxing powers, Mr. Speaker, is just not true.

My hon. friend and members of his party are quite within their rights in a free country and in a free parliament to get up in their places and say that it was his——declared desire that the dominion-provincial conference of 1945-46 should succeed.

And in this he is precisely correct. It was his "declared" desire. The record is larded with pious statements to this effect. And he is also quite within his rights in the closing hours of the conference to demand as the price of its success $50 million more than all the provincial revenues, including dominion subsidies, before the war.

My hon. friend is quite entitled in a free country to say that he is entirely in favour of Newfoundland entering Canada; and his party, as he claims, in order to save the Canadian constitution, is entirely at liberty to vote against Newfoundland entering Canada.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Order, order.

Mr. Garson: He is entirely free in this issue—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I rise to a point of order. Surely this is not only irrelevant but it is miles and miles from anything connected with the bill we are talking about at the present time—as is 90 per cent of what the minister has said.

Mr. Garson: In some respects I quite agree with the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). But I am replying to the arguments made by his leader in this debate, and the hon. member for Calgary West should have been more assiduous when the subjects were first introduced in calling the house to order.

As I was saying when I was interrupted by my hon. friend—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I want a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am listening to the minister. If I thought he was out of order it would be my duty to intervene, and I would intervene.

Mr. Garson: I say that it is—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You are in order. Mr. Speaker said so. Everything is all right.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition is entirely free in this issue now before us to say that he and his party favour rent control, and he is entirely free to vote against the resolution which would continue it.

But, sir, I think he will find as time goes on, before he gets finished with these manoeuvres, that the Canadian citizens are too intelligent to be taken in by these conflicts between his words and his deeds.

An hon. Member: Give them a chance.

Mr. Garson: And, this being a free country, they will not be deterred from saying what they think about it by any threats about the use of a short and descriptive word. They will be more disposed to consider his opposition in the light of the fact that the authority which this government has exercised under the War Measures Act of the Borden government has been exercised at all times with a scrupulous regard for the rights and privileges of parliament.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says that is not true. Thank goodness in a free parliament he will have the opportunity shortly to get up and prove that it is not true, if he can.

Immediately after the fall of Japan this country went to parliament and secured the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, which has been subject ever since to annual review by parliament.

As I have pointed out, not only has parliament determined the text of the orders in council under which the governor in council has acted since 1947, but the government in acting under those orders in council has carried on an orderly, and latterly an accelerated, decontrol which is still continuing. This government is committed to decontrol, even in respect of the residual controls that are being maintained, as soon as it is safe to do so.

Finally, the fact that two of the opposition parties in this house have supported this bill in its different stages is eloquent tribute to the rightness of the government's action in asking parliament to pass it.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate and I would not have done so except for the splendid schoolboy essay just read by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: His master's voice.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I would like to hear you all, so I would ask you to speak one at a time. That would be much better. I do want to compliment the minister upon the splendid reading he has just given us. I intend to deal with just two or three things, and I shall deal with the major one first.

The minister has told us that this government has been so generous and kind to us in the opposition and so careful of the interests of the people of the country that they brought this thing back year after year in order to get parliament's support. Of course the answer to that is that the legislation within itself contains the provision that it is only for one year. Therefore they had to come back under the legislation and not through the great kindness that lies in the hearts of members of the cabinet. In fact, in times gone by, it was urged that it should be passed as it was only for a year, that at the end of that time it would probably die a natural death. That takes care of that part.

[Mr. Garson.]

Then the minister says that they have eliminated these various things. I ask this simple question even of my impatient brethren across the road, and I assure them that I will not be very long: After the government control over steel, lumber and farm products, what is there left? That takes in the total economy of this country. It may be that there are other industries, other efforts and other energies expended in dealing with other things, but without those three your economy stops dead. A year or so ago we learned that you do not need a general strike in Canada to stop our economy, that all that was needed was a strike in a basic industry.

Dealing now with this matter of rent control, short words and that sort of thing, I suppose the minister was referring to what we usually term as being short, ugly four-letter words or something of that kind. What does it amount to? On the occasion when there were fifty-seven varieties it was put up to this parliament, as it is put up now with the twelve varieties, that we must accept the whole package or go without. We on this side do not and will not accept that sort of judgment. We will not compromise with ourselves or with our people and say that because A, B and C are good, D, E, F, G and so on are bad; that we are going to compromise and vote for all things because there are two or three good ones wrapped up in the package. That is exactly the position that we are taking at the present time and in so far as I know will continue to take as long as we are here.

Mr. Garson: Could the hon. member inform the house what the bad things are?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I shall answer the minister's question and deal immediately with two of the things which are bad. I shall read from the orders in council dealing with steel and lumber and then I shall ask the minister if in his judgment and wide experience he thinks that the government needs the powers given in those orders in order to carry out the things the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has in his mind. I think that is a fair suggestion. I brought down these books thinking that we might be in committee, when I intended to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce about this. But since we have this volunteer across the road perhaps I might mention them to him.

I am reading from the statutory orders and regulations, volume 1, 1946, beginning at page 131. I do not want to read all the order in council, but later on I shall read from page 133. Paragraph (c) reads:

To enter on, take possession of, and utilize any mine, land, plant, factory, mill, refinery, smelter, foundry, warehouse, building, or place or any equipment used or capable of being used for the purpose of producing or dealing in or with steel and to deal in or with or take possession of any vehicles, cars, ships, locomotives, or other equipment deemed by the steel controller to be required or useful for the operation of any such mine, plant, factory, mill, refinery, smelter, foundry, warehouse, building, or place and/or for producing or dealing in or with steel or equipment; provided that any order of the steel controller made under the powers vested in him by this paragraph (c) shall be subject to any conflicting valid order of the transport controller appointed by the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport.

That is only one paragraph of about twenty. Then the definition of "dealing in or with" is given in paragraph (d), which reads:

"dealing in or with" shall include buying, selling, leasing, hiring, exchanging, acquiring, importing, exporting, storing, supplying, delivering, operating, transporting, distributing, shipping, conveying, installing, allocating, consuming or using and "deal in or with" and "dealt in or with" shall have corresponding and similarly extended meanings.

I will not read the definition of steel, but it covers everything that has any ferrous metal in it. My recollection is that ferrous means "pertaining to or derived from iron", so it would mean anything with a component part containing some iron. Under this the government could go and take a farmer's tractor away from him if it was thought it were needed in some little business engaged in dealing in or with steel. There are many more paragraphs. I am going to stop and ask the minister now whether he thinks that, with regard to the present emergency as to steel, the government needs the powers I have read in that one paragraph. Does he think so?

Mr. Garson: I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I think none of my hon. friend's remarks are substantially relevant to the matter under discussion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Garson: They are not substantially relevant to the matter under discussion, and when I close the debate I will take the occasion to deal with them.

Mr. Graydon: You are running out on him.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I thank the minister for his great generosity in telling me that he will put his boys to work and probably find an answer to what I have said, and that he will let me know what the answer is when that time arrives. May I say that under that order there is a steel controller, an associate steel controller, a deputy steel controller, all of whom may depute other persons who may do all of these things. Discretion is completely given to these individuals to do all the things that the controller himself is entitled to do, and the only appeal is to the controller himself. Then again all these individuals have the most complete protection from actions, and so on; no matter how wrongful their acts may be they have complete protection under this statute. When the minister is boning up on his reply I wonder if he would include that part of it in the answer he is going to make.

Mr. Garson: I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then I will say a word or two about lumber. I think the difference between lumber and steel is that there is no associate controller. There is only a timber controller and a deputy controller. I said that I was not going to be long, and I mean that. Therefore, without going into all the various regulations, and under one paragraph they run from "a" to "s", I think it fair to say as to the lumber situation—and I hope you will correct me if I am wrong—that the powers are practically the same as those with respect to steel.

Why have I put that forward, Mr. Speaker? Because it seems to me that we have argued, and I think validly argued, that if there be an emergency requiring certain things these matters should be dealt with differently. As I understood it, the explanation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had to do largely with priorities, and had to do largely with saying that we need this type of manufactured steel rather than that. I think I am correctly stating what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said. Therefore I come back to what the Minister of Justice said, which was that they brought this emergency business, these controls by order in council, before parliament each year, and I say to him, Why has he not studied these various controls to eliminate from the orders in council to which I have just referred the powers that they do not need to take care of present needs, even accepting their word for what those needs are?

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that in this same bill we have controls on certain products of agriculture. I mean prices of agricultural products. Let me repeat for the last time tonight, and if I have the strength I will continue to do so, that we are prepared to consider, to receive, and to support certain controls, rent control if you like, if it is brought to us as a bill, as a statute or as an order in council where the rights of landlord and tenant are clearly set out, and which is not subject to change every few weeks as rent control has been. Then we will support it with a good heart. But we will not under any circumstances, and I hope we never shall, take a great large package of twelve things running from butter through timber to steel, and support that or get nothing. As far as I am concerned, I intend to oppose the measure, and I have no hesitation in doing so.

Is it laziness? Is it inattention? What is it? The minister said a moment ago that this decontrol was progressive. Let it progress to the place where we may deal with those essential items in our economy one at a time. Let us find out the necessity in the particular case and vote on it accordingly, rather than have this grab box handed to us with a game of bingo to support it, because that is about the only reason that has been given by the minister up to this time.

Mr. Howe: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh yes, indeed, but do not make it too long.

Mr. Howe: During the eight years in which these two orders in council have been in force has he ever heard anyone complain about the injustice of their operation?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh yes, many, many times.

Mr. Howe: Can he give me one instance?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I can give you many. May I congratulate the minister and say to him that he does not overstep the mark and does not intend to. But many of his officials who are enforcing these regulations do so.

Mr. Howe: You are quite mistaken about the latter.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I listened tonight with a great deal of interest to the minister and to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I think first of all, if I may say so, that the member for Calgary West, with his usual eloquence, was flogging a very dead horse. The bill before us today is a vital one, because it brings parliament face to face once again with what is probably Canada's thorniest domestic problem. As we begin this debate I think there are two significant facts which have developed. I think this may be remembered as a historical night. It will be remembered as such a night because, when the bill is passed, it means that Canada has virtually come to the end of the road as far as controls are concerned. We have been led down the last lap of the route leading to complete decontrol. This night will go down in the history of Canada secondly because George Drew, the hon. member for Carleton, has won his first major political victory, in making the government prematurely throw out all these controls.

The insidious—I do not know whether that word is parliamentary—pressure of the Conservative party has culminated tonight in forcing the government to sacrifice the interests of the average Canadian to the interests of a few privileged citizens. Those are the two significant points in this debate so far.

I hope that hon. members, even on the government side, will yet consider the matter very carefully before they pass the bill because I think they should keep in mind that in the last three and a half years the cost of living index has gone up forty points.

An hon. Member: What about wages?

Mr. Thatcher: I am talking about the cost of living index. I will come to wages in a moment. On August 1, 1945, the cost of living index stood at 119·6, and today, with pretty well all controls removed, it stands at 159·4. I am not going to go again over all that has been said on the resolution. All I want to say with increased emphasis is that the average Canadian has been hurt by decontrol, particularly those in the low-wage income groups, and more particularly pensioners. I think that the inflation I have mentioned indicates, beyond any reasonable doubt, to any reasonable man that parliament so far has failed to deal effectively with the cost of living problem. For a number of years the government has been content to drift along, to hope that something will turn up, to hope that prices will go down of their own volition. I think ultimately prices will come down, but in the meantime a great many people will have been hurt, and hurt unnecessarily. This very stubborn government attitude has benefited primarily only one segment of Canadian society and that is the business and commercial interests.

The other night the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) pointed out that, in the period between 1945 and 1947, profits after taxes of 655 of Canada's largest corporations went up 64 per cent, while in the same period the cash income from farm produce went up only 17 per cent. The member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) asked me about wages a moment ago, and I should like to tell him about wages. For instance, in the iron and steel industry—I am sorry I cannot tell him about the lumber industry—weekly wages rose in the period I have mentioned about 9 per cent while profits for that industry rose 66 per cent; in the pulp and paper industry wages went up 23 per cent but profits only 247 per cent. One could give other examples. In almost every case, profits rose much more rapidly than wages.

By means of Bill 86, which is before us tonight, the government is asking parliament for authority to continue certain controls and regulations for a limited period. I suppose we must take it that this is the government's 1949 answer to the cost of living problem. I remember that a year ago this house was discussing the same problem and had before it a bill of a somewhat similar nature. I remember that even at that time the cost of living was causing concern throughout the country. Every hon. member will recall having received thousands of petitions from protesting citizens, labour unions and the like. All members will also recollect that, about a year ago, the Institute of Public Opinion conducted a poll, which revealed that the majority of Canadians desired the reimposition of some controls.

When Bill 136 was introduced a year ago, those were the circumstances. That bill was quite different from this bill, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) pointed out. The bill of a year ago gave parliament the power to reimpose controls over the whole broad field if it deemed it necessary. I think it would be fair to say that most hon. members expected, when they gave the government those very wide and comprehensive powers a year ago, that the government would use them to fight inflation. I recall the member for Bonaventure, I think it was, a government supporter, speaking in the debate. He said that drastic measures should be taken immediately in order to bring the cost of living index back to where it was in 1946. He said we could not rely upon time and laissez faire to solve this problem, and price ceilings should be reimposed immediately on timber and basic commodities. A Liberal member said that. I believe there was an indication a year ago that parliament and the country expected the government to use the powers it was given in Bill 136. The country expected some action from the government. But in the past twelve months the government has stubbornly refused to do anything about reimposing controls where it was necessary.

On the contrary, while still piously professing to follow a policy of orderly decontrol, the government has been removing subsidies and controls just as rapidly as they dared in the face of public opinion. Hundreds of controls have been eliminated in the past year and there are almost no subsidies left. In other words, instead of using the powers given in Bill 136 a year ago, the government has practically scuttled the whole system of controls and subsidies. The result, of course, has been a very substantial increase in the cost of living.

Rather than take any tangible action as they were empowered to do, to reimpose controls, in February, 1948, the government set up a parliamentary prices committee. The C.C.F. attitude towards that committee was very clearly expressed by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) at page 761 of Hansard, when he said:

> . . . we are of the opinion that, in the present crisis in Canada, the people demand not the establishment of a parliamentary committee, but rather some effective step to meet the situation.

When the government refused to take specific action, we did participate in the committee. We did our best to make that committee a reasonable success. Some of our members spent a good many hours on that committee. We knew in advance that the committee could not possibly succeed in lowering prices because its powers were so limited. The only power that the prices committee had was the power to talk. Even if it found acts which were anti-social, there was nothing it could do about them. Thus while the committee sat, prices continued to rise. The members of the committee sat back impotent and helpless; we were restrained from any concrete action by our limited terms of reference.

However, I am not going to say much more about the prices committee except that after sitting for months, and after having heard mountains of evidence, a report was finally brought down in this house. I think it would be fair to say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and his government supporters brought down those recommendations. We who were in opposition could agree or disagree with them as we saw fit, but they were brought down by the minister. I suppose those recommendations were made in the belief that, if the government implemented them, perhaps something could be done to bring down the cost of living. I think that was about nine months ago. If the government was sincere about wanting to do something to get prices down, surely ample time has elapsed.

I am not going to be very long, but I suggest we look at some of the recommendations of the prices committee for a moment. Recommendation one urged the setting up of a special commission to continue the work of the parliamentary committee. Before I pass along, I might say that that commission is still sitting. I understood it had finished its work before parliament opened this session, but it is still meeting, and I suppose the members are together drawing $100 or $200 per day of the taxpayers' money. I do not know why it is taking so long to bring in this report, and I think it is shameful that this debate should have to be carried on without benefit of the findings of that commission.

However, recommendation one called for the setting up of a royal commission. In setting up the commission, the government rendered that recommendation useless in advance because the only thing the royal commission could do was talk. If the report of the commission is brought down, I hope something will be done about it; certainly the commission has not brought down prices.

Recommendations four and nine were really window dressing. Recommendation four concerned the relaxation of the ban on fruits and vegetables. Recommendation nine concerned the removal of the twenty-five per cent excise tax. Those measures would have been carried out whether or not the prices committee recommended them, and they were simply introduced to get the government out of a jackpot. They had imposed a ridiculous tax which the people resented and something had to be done about getting rid of it.

So far as I can ascertain, the remaining recommendations have been more or less ignored. Nothing has been done about them. For instance, recommendation number two is that the work of the combines investigation commissioner should be accelerated and extended and that he should be given more funds with which to work. In my opinion that is an excellent recommendation. Time and again we are finding that when the commissioner does bring in a report on a combine, whether it is a bread combine or a dental combine, the legislation is too weak to support the report and the court throws it out. The commissioner cannot do anything about it. If the government is sincere about reducing the cost of living, why does it not bring in effective legislation to make the combines act work, and accomplish something for the people of Canada? Recommendation three was also a good one, that existing legislation be amended—so that immediate specific action can be taken where the evidence discloses flagrant cases of profiteering at the consumers' expense.

Nothing has been done to implement this recommendation, as far as I know.

I think recommendation five is a significant one, that the government should consider—restricting price rises by special taxation of unreasonable profits.

Again, nothing has been done. I wonder why nothing has been done about that recommendation? I think of the Nicolet-Yamaska by-election and I think of the February 12 issue of Time magazine. I quote from that particular issue as follows:

The Liberals went all-out in support of lawyer Paul Trahan, 40, with $135,000.

That was campaign funds. I have always believed that it was my hon. friends to my right that were financed by the industrial interests of this country; but I am beginning to wonder whether the Liberal party also does not do too badly in that respect. If the statement of Time magazine is correct—and I have not heard it denied in this house—that $135,000 was spent in one constituency for campaign expenses, surely the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) should start some kind of investigation. I do not know how the Liberals could spend that kind of money unless they were handing gifts around in some manner. Mr. Power perhaps has a good idea how the sum was spent.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend must believe in fairies and Christmas trees when he makes a statement like that.

An hon. Member: Santa Claus talking.

Mr. Thatcher: I am quoting from Time magazine. I may be wrong, but that is what it says. Maybe that is why recommendation five has not been implemented.

What about recommendation six, that the government should amend the Companies Act to institute a "uniform system of business accounting" so that excessive profits cannot be so easily concealed? That was a good recommendation, but again nothing has been done about it. And so one could go on down the list, but I will not take up the time of the house to do so. Hon. members can read for themselves the report of the prices committee.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, after this committee was set up; after hundreds of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money was spent, at least $200,000 between the two of them; after our leading businessmen were called down here from all over Canada and cross-examined; and after a great deal of the time of the members of parliament was wasted: the government pays absolutely no attention to the recommendations which were brought down by that committee. I say that fact must indicate to the people of Canada that the government cannot be particularly interested in taking concrete action which will bring prices down.

Early in the proceedings of the committee I remember the minister of health (Mr. Martin) making this statement. I know he will remember it.

Mr. Martin: I remember everything that the hon. member said.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sure the minister will remember this. He was speaking about the committee members and he said:

I am sure that they will not permit it to be used as a smoke screen. They will not permit it to be used as a means of delaying action.

I think it is fairly obvious to the people of Canada today that the committee was used as a smoke screen, and that it was used as a means of delaying action. Perhaps my time is much less valuable than that of many other members of this house. I will not attempt to deny that. Nevertheless, I am not anxious to have that time completely wasted, as it apparently was on the prices committee.

I remember when I first came down here about two years ago the government set up a flag committee. I wasted about seventy or eighty hours on that committee. We finally chose a Canadian flag and we brought a report onto the floor of the house. That is the last I have heard of that Canadian flag.

My friend the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) and certain other members have been sitting on the Indian committee for about three years. That Indian committee in my opinion should be now ready to do something for the Indians. But we find that little has been done. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the government, that the government is far too prone to use committees and royal commissions or something of that kind to divert public attention from the fact that it has not done anything about a particular problem, or that it does not want to do anything. I suggest that is what has been done with the parliamentary prices committee.

The bill which is before us, namely Bill No. 86, has been called a "control bill" by some of my hon. friends. I suggest that actually it is nothing of the sort but is a "decontrol bill". As I said a moment ago, it is a bill which is leading the Canadian people prematurely down the last lap of the road leading to complete decontrol. I say that this bill is one which virtually abandons any degree of economic planning in Canada.

I have been much surprised to hear the Minister of Justice speak as he has in the last few days. He has been arguing with my Tory friends that a great emergency exists. He says we must have these controls because the war emergency is still on. If the war emergency is still on, I ask this question: Why on earth is he taking off all the controls?

Neither can I understand the attitude of my hon. friends to my right. Tonight they have won a victory. Tonight I say that 99·9 per cent of the controls have gone down the drain; still they are complaining to the government that not enough controls have been taken off. The once great Liberal party used to be known as the party of reform. It used to be known as a party which, generally speaking, would try to legislate for the benefit of the greatest number of individuals in Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, it looks to me as though that is no longer true. More and more often we are finding the Liberal party legislating for a small group or for certain interests in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Taking a cue from the Tories.

Mr. Thatcher: I want to give my hon. friends a warning. I am sure the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) will take this warning in the vein in which it is given. I do not think that the people of Canada want the Liberal party to out-Tory the Tory party. If they try to continue to out-Tory the Tory party, as apparently they are trying to do in this bill, I think that in five years the Liberal party in Canada will have gone the same way as the Liberal party in England has gone; that is, into oblivion. In the opinion of this group, Bill No. 86 is wholly inadequate to cope with the high cost of living. Moreover, from our past experience, we doubt that the government is anxious to even continue the controls they have in this bill. Probably they will drop them in a few months. In our opinion this bill is a relatively empty gesture made to appease public opinion. I am sure the Minister of Justice tonight must feel somewhat like that Canadian murderer who, in one of our penitentiaries, was stepping up to the gallows. The murderer turned to the executioner just before the trap was to be sprung, and as the noose was being put over his neck said: "This is going to be a great lesson to me." I think the minister should bear that story in mind, because we have an election coming up, and I do not want to see him in the position of the man who was being hanged—having to tell the Canadian people that it is going to be a great lesson to him. This group does not want price controls or price ceilings for one minute longer than they are necessary. As soon as prices start to go down fairly well, we should like to throw out controls. But until that time arrives we think that price ceilings and controls should be reimposed where necessary, at least on basic commodities.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to go back, Mr. Speaker, to the speech made this evening by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Only he could have made it. That speech could not have been made by anyone who had sat in this house during the four previous sessions in the life of this parliament, because the review of the history of legislation with which the minister introduced his speech, and which occupied much of the time of his speech, was very inaccurate history indeed. I wish to set the record right to begin with tonight, because it would be a great mistake if the record which was given to the house by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) ever by any stretch of the imagination came to be regarded by anybody as an accurate account of what happened.

The minister began with the War Measures Act, and then he said the moment the war was over the government ceased to operate under the War Measures Act. Mr. Speaker, that is not a statement of fact. That is a statement which is at variance with the fact. Then he went on to talk about the bill which was introduced in 1945. I want to go back to the fall session of 1945. The bill which eventually became law in 1945 was not the bill which was originally introduced by the government. The bill which was originally introduced by the government was Bill No. 15, which was to be known as the National Emergency Powers Act, 1945. The minister completely glossed over this. Whoever wrote that speech for him had not told him about this essential feature of the history of the legislation because, Mr. Speaker, this legislation was so shocking in the powers that the government sought thereby to usurp at the expense of parliament that an outcry arose from one end of this country to the other. The powers that the government sought in this measure exceeded those which the government possessed under the War Measures Act. It is high time that the Minister of Justice made himself acquainted with the terms of Bill 15, a shocking bill, because by that bill the government sought at the hands of parliament powers as broad as these:

3. (1) The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may, by reason of the existence of the national emergency . . . deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada.

Then it goes on:

And for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:...

Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, they are given power to do everything that was considered necessary or advisable arising out of the national emergency. What follows is not exhaustive; it is exemplary:

(a) production, manufacture, trading, exportation and importation;

(b) foreign exchange;

(c) transportation by air, road, rail or water;

(d) supply and distribution of goods and services, including the fixing of prices;

(e) employment, including salaries and wages;

(f) appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property and of the use thereof, including the control of rentals and occupation;

(g) entry into Canada, exclusion and deportation, and revocation of nationality;

(h) imposition and recovery, in connection with any scheme of control contained in or authorized by orders and regulations, of charges payable to the Receiver General of Canada or into such fund or account as may be ordered.

That bill did not pass, Mr. Speaker, but it was a measure of the mind of the government.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Garson: What bill is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. Fleming: Bill No. 15.

Mr. Garson: What book is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. Fleming: The bills of the second session of 1945. That bill, Mr. Speaker, contained the mentality of the government with reference to the powers that it sought to take from parliament in 1945. The hue and cry was such in this house and elsewhere that it found its place into the deliberations of the dominion-provincial conference then in session. It may have escaped the recollection of the hon. gentleman, but the premiers of the provinces then assembled made it quite clear to the Prime Minister of that time that they would not consent, that they would not continue to deliberate with the federal government, if the federal government, by a measure of that kind, was going to trample underfoot the constitution of this country and usurp powers, not only powers which belonged to parliament, but powers which are reposed by the constitution of this country in the legislatures of the provinces. It was under a stream of protest, Mr. Speaker, that the government had to yield and withdraw that iniquitous Bill 15.

Such was the mind of this government, Mr. Speaker, that they were determined to usurp everything that they could, and with a submissive majority in this house they were able to take from parliament in a bill which did become law, and is chapter 25 of the statutes of the second session of 1945, the following powers as enumerated in section 2, which reads as follows:

2. (1) The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may, by reason of the continued existence of the national emergency arising out of the war against Germany and Japan, deem necessary or advisable for the purpose of . . .

Then there is a series, and (c) reads thus:

(c) maintaining, controlling and regulating supplies and services, prices, transportation, use and occupation of property, rentals, employment, salaries and wages to ensure economic stability and an orderly transition to conditions of peace.

This government wanted absolute power, Mr. Speaker. It wanted all the powers that are reposed in parliament, and it wanted all the powers that are reposed by the constitution in the legislatures of the provinces. That is what this government wanted, and that is the shameful record that the Minister of Justice has the effrontery to stand up in this house tonight and defend, when he says to this house that the moment the war was over this government ceased to act under the War Measures Act, and that it came forward and did things in a statutory way. What did it do, Mr. Speaker? It took from parliament powers that no government that has any sense of responsibility to the constitution or to the people has any right to demand in time of peace.

That was 1945, Mr. Speaker, and the minister has said that the government came back to parliament in connection with each phase of decontrol. It is too bad that whoever wrote the minister's speech did not take the trouble to give the minister the facts, because the next time that the government came back to parliament was in 1947. And what a proposition it put up to parliament on that occasion! It said: Here are fifty-seven orders in council. It is too much trouble for us to bring in proper bills. We like these orders in council. We have been operating under them, and we have our boards and commissions set up to operate under them. We do not like to make any change. Therefore, parliament, will you be good enough to give statutory effect to these fifty-seven orders in council?

I am going to suggest to the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker, that he go back and read that bill, because he told the house tonight that these orders in council were set out in the schedule to the bill. That is not the fact. All that the Minister of Justice, or anybody else, can find in the schedule to the bill is a series of numbers and dates. This house has not yet put its imprimatur upon any official version of the orders in council to which it was called upon to give statutory approval in 1945. All that the house was given, all that you will find in the bill, Mr. Speaker, is the numbers of the orders in council and the dates, and then there are—

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: I have not much time.

Mr. Garson: I shall make it as brief as possible. If what the hon. member says is correct, how does he explain the fact that in the schedule to this bill of which he is speaking, as it was passed, there are indications that the wartime prices and trade board orders in council were amended in many particulars, with the regulations of the corporation and so on?

Mr. Fleming: Surely to goodness the Minister of Justice could not have been paying very close attention to what I was saying. I have just said that the text of these orders in council is not set forth in the schedule to the bill, and all that the Minister of Justice, or anyone else, can find by way of text in the schedule of that bill is the text of half a dozen amendments. This house was not given—

Mr. Lesage: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: —an opportunity to put the text of the orders in council in the bill. I asked the Minister of Justice at that time to put the orders in council in the bill as a schedule. He said: Oh, no; we will do nothing but put the numbers in. And, Mr. Speaker, no one who wants to know the law today, whether about the fifty orders in council that became law under that bill, or about the twelve orders in council that exist today, will find it in the statute books. He will not find in this enactment of the parliament of Canada the text of the law that parliament was then enacting. He must go to the privy council office and try to find there what are the orders in council which are referred to by number and date in this legislation, and that act of 1947 is to be continued today. It is too much trouble, Mr. Speaker, for this government to act in the sensible, proper legislative way. It is too much trouble for a government that has become accustomed to ruling by order in council to bring forward measures and to show parliament the courtesy, or at any rate to do parliament the justice, of putting before it the text of what it is being asked to legislate.

And that same situation prevails today. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has referred to my leader, shamefully, as the John Hampden of Bay Street. Who is his leader? Surely, Mr. Speaker, in the record I have given you tonight you have the mentality of those who occupy the treasury benches and wielded this omnipotence during the war. And it is to that company that the hon. gentleman has now succeeded.

Let me tell him, if he is talking about people on Bay street, that he had better make sure he has first cleared up or cleaned out the nest of the government. He had better start with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). When he is talking about big interests he need not look at my leader, because my leader was never part and parcel of big interests. He never was.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: He never was a bank director, he never was a director of a trust company, or of companies, like the right hon. gentleman who leads the government today. And if you are looking for representatives of big business or those in this House of Commons who represented big business before they came here, then let the Minister of Justice page the Prime Minister. There is where he will find his man.

And bear this in mind, that the fact that the Prime Minister had had that kind of experience was put forward by those who brought him to this chamber in the first place, and those who brought about his election as Liberal leader last August, as one of the reasons he should be leader—because he had had all that experience.

Mr. Speaker, I should think that by this time, if the Minister of Justice knows the record a little better by now, he and his ilk in the government ought to be the last to talk about representatives of big interests.

I am surprised to know that the Minister of Justice, who himself was present at that Liberal convention, that cut-and-dried affair, and heard—at least I hope he heard—all the speeches of the candidates for leadership, did not recognize the words quoted in the house by my leader, reference to which was made by the minister in his speech tonight. So there can be no mistake about the source of those historic words I shall now read, for the benefit of the Minister of Justice, the words which were uttered by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) on that occasion on August 7, 1948, when he made a speech as a candidate before the Liberal national convention. And at that time he was speaking of those who sat on the platform. He was speaking of those at whom he was looking when he spoke. This is what he said:

> I may be leading a forlorn hope, but I am leading it up to the very battlements of autocracy, complacency and inertia.

He looked straight at the Prime Minister of the day as he spoke. And, Mr. Speaker, that is the mantle which the new Minister of Justice has come forward with great alacrity to wear.

I wish to put him right on one other thing. He says that if the resolution preceding this bill had not passed on Friday night we would not have rent control. That is utterly nonsensical, as every member in this House of Commons must know. It would mean that the government would have an opportunity and that the government would have a duty to introduce a proper measure to bring about a continuation of rent control, and to do it in proper legislative form, and in a form which would recognize the responsibility of the government to parliament.

There has been so much misrepresentation on the subject of the position of this party with respect to the emergency and rent control that I should like briefly to say one or two things on the subject. One finds in the bill today no reference whatever to a national emergency. If the government is so convinced that there is today what the Minister of Justice contended in his speech on Friday last, namely, a general emergency, a general national emergency—and note the word "general"—then one would have thought that the government would have invited the house to make a clear declaration on the point, or that at the very least there would be in the bill a recital of the continuance of the national emergency. But, no; the Minister of Justice does not like to bring that subject too directly before the House of Commons. So he simply relies upon a continuance of the recital in the preamble to the 1947 bill. That is as close as he wants to bring this subject before the house, and into the discussion on the bill.

My leader made it perfectly clear, and the house can see it at pages 1446 and 1448 of Hansard, that this Progressive Conservative party did not oppose rent control. The Progressive Conservative leader and those associated with him say that we are quite prepared and ready to support a proper measure of rent control. But we do not wish to see it done in this form. We wish to see it done in proper legislative form. And that is the position every member in the House of Commons ought to take, if he has any respect for his responsibility as a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Howe: So you are for controls, eh? Running back and forth.

Mr. Fleming: We are for controls, but in proper form—not the kind of form to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has been so long accustomed—a man who, however sound his mind may have been when he entered parliament, has wielded such extraordinary powers for so long that one can see in him the truth of the famous statement of Lord Acton that all power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

Mr. Speaker, the house must make up its mind whether it proposes to proceed by a proper legislative and responsible method, such as we have advocated, or by this omnibus holus-bolus method the government is asking parliament to accept.

Bear this in mind, that we of the Progressive Conservative party have shown how the matter of rent control can be handled. We have shown how it ought to be handled in this House of Commons by proper methods, by a proper legislative enactment which would be clear and which would give to members of the house an opportunity to do their duty, a duty they owe to their constituents, the duty of carefully reviewing legislation before it becomes law. This is impossible to do in connection with these orders in council.

There are some members in the house who have not very much patience with a discussion about the constitution. That is the kind of mentality that is found in hon. members as a result of the doubtful example set by the government opposite. I wish to give ample warning to those who are prepared to heed warnings that the course that is being followed, in regard to this measure in its present form, is one which may well lead to a defeat of the whole scheme of rent control and of other controls, if this bill should be challenged in the courts.

We have given the House of Commons a clear statement as to how this matter could be handled without jeopardizing the whole system of controls, including rent controls, if the House of Commons would follow the legislative methods we propose.

The Minister of Justice has made it perfectly clear that in his judgment—and in this respect he is correct; that is the one place in his speech where he was right—there is no power in the subjects enumerated in section 91 of the British North America Act to legislate with reference to the matters dealt with in the twelve orders in council which are to be continued.

The minister justified the legislation on the strength of the existence of a general national emergency—not a specific emergency, but a general one. Let me say to the house, and to those who are not interested in the verities of the constitution, and who are not interested in warnings about what may be the fate of democracy if this house does not rise to its responsibilities, that they are jeopardizing everything in these orders in council today by their acceptance of the course the government is pursuing. They are jeopardizing everything.

If the government will bring in individual measures, as it ought to do, it may save the controls believed by the House of Commons to be necessary. But if this measure goes to the courts—this omnibus measure dealing with twelve orders in council on a wide variety of subjects—and if the courts are not satisfied that a national emergency exists with respect to each of these subjects, let us bear in mind the fact that the courts will not sit down and say, "Well, we will recognize the validity of the measure with respect to this control, but not with respect to that control or the other control". The courts are not going to sit down and separate the wheat from the chaff, separate what is ultra vires from what is intra vires.

May I remind the house of what the privy council did in 1937 when they had before them a reference with respect to the validity of the Employment and Social Insurance Act, 1935. The government asked the courts on that occasion to say whether that act or any part of it was within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada. They expressly asked the courts in case they found the whole measure was not intra vires of parliament to say what parts of it were. The reasons of the privy council will be found in 1937 Appeal Cases, page 355. In effect they said that they were not going to sit down to try to sift out the wheat from the chaff. Here is the concluding paragraph of the privy council's decision:

> The other parts of the act are so inextricably mixed up with the insurance provisions of part III that it is impossible to sever them. It seems obvious, also, that in its truncated form, apart from part III, the act would never have come into existence. It follows that the whole act must be pronounced ultra vires.

The privy council were there dealing with only one statute and they were not prepared to say that part III might be intra vires while the rest of the act might be ultra vires. They said that they would not sit down and try to separate the parts that were intra vires from those that were ultra vires. Today we have a measure which cannot be compared as to clarity and specific directness with the statute under review in 1937; here we have an omnibus measure that simply scoops up the twelve remaining orders in council and says that they shall be law for another year. If this measure should go before the courts and it should be found that any part of it is ultra vires by reason of the general national emergency referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) not extending to that particular aspect of it, you may be sure that the whole bill will be ruled ultra vires. Think what a calamity there would be if the whole measure should be thrown out at a time when perhaps parliament was not in session. Would it not be the part of wisdom and common sense to divide up these various subjects and treat them individually, as they ought to be treated, and pass the proper legislative enactments with respect to each? That humble warning may fall on deaf ears, but if this measure is ruled ultra vires those words are on the record.

I wish to comment upon the proposition propounded in this house by the Minister of Justice in support of what he has had to say about the existence of no specific national emergency, if you please, but a general national emergency. He has put the validity of this measure on the basis of the existence of a general national emergency. The word "general" is his. If that general national emergency exists, as contended by the spokesman for the government, it is crystal clear that whether parliament occupies any field of legislative jurisdiction throughout the whole ambit of self-government in this country is simply a question of expediency or choice on the part of the government. So far as the constitutional argument is concerned, it goes this far: there is no field of legislative jurisdiction in Canada today into which this parliament may not enter by reason of the alleged existence of a general national emergency.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Any Quebec member may well say, "Oh, oh", but the fact is that the Minister of Justice has propounded that very proposition. He was asked the other evening by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) what he had to say on this subject. The question asked by the hon. member was not an unreasonable one. First of all I shall refer to what the Minister of Justice said, before he was asked the question, as reported on page 1650 of Hansard. He said:

> I apprehend that, once a national emergency has been established, then, on the basis of that national emergency, parliament can legislate with regard to any of those matters if it so chooses.

That closing phrase referred to a long enumeration taken out of the general wartime prices and trade board order. The Minister of Justice was saying that today parliament can legislate with regard to all those subjects because a national emergency exists. Then to make the matter crystal clear, the hon. member for Moose Jaw asked this question, as reported on page 1652 of Hansard:

> Will the minister permit a question from this corner of the house? If he says that there is a general emergency, as he is arguing, why are we dropping so many controls as he proposes to do?

That was quite a reasonable question from the point of view of the hon. member asking it. The spokesman for the government on everything pertaining to the law and constitution of this country replied:

> That is a very easy question to answer, Mr. Chairman. While the general emergency is the foundation for the jurisdiction that we propose to exercise here, it is a matter of judgment in dealing with the general emergency as to how we should carry on controls or dispense with them.

The position of the government is that they say there is a national emergency and everything that belongs to the field of legislative jurisdiction in Canada lies within the power of this parliament, that this parliament can exercise all its rights in view of the existence of that national emergency. There is no limit. That is the argument of the government. It becomes simply a matter of choice on the part of the government whether it invades the whole provincial field or only part of it. This government has assassinated the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. St. Laurent: Even members of the hon. member's party laugh at that.

Mr. Fleming: Whoever is ready to support the government in this monstrous argument may accept for himself whatever glory he can find in being the assassin of the Canadian constitution. The proper and sensible method that a parliament at all responsible to the Canadian people should follow nearly four years after V-E day is the course that has been proposed in this house by my hon. leader.

I have asked this question: where will the reader of the statutes find the law we are continuing today? He will not find it in the statute books of Canada. He will have to go to the privy council office to learn the law which parliament has enacted.

We are told in this bill that they are going to confine their power to the orders and regulations in existence today, but where do we find those? We will have to go to the privy council office, we will have to go to the office of the wartime prices and trade board, we will have to go to all the other factories where orders and regulations are turned out.

Mr. Cockeram: A slot machine.

Mr. Fleming: Slot machine is right. There is a great multitude of slot machines turning out the law, and this parliament is being asked to become a mere rubber stamp to give parliamentary authority to all kinds of order in council and regulation procedure.

We are told of amendments, but how on earth are we going to amend the orders in council when they do not appear before us in the text of this bill or in any statute of this parliament?

I am not going to go into the subject of surplus powers at any great length, but the twelve orders we are being asked to continue are just filled with powers that cannot by any possible stretch of the imagination be said to be necessary. Let any member of the government stand up and try to defend the necessity for the continuance of some of these orders in council. I will not go over the ground covered by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), but I just ask in passing if any hon. member of this house will stand up in his place and say, having regard to what may be suggested by hon. members opposite to be a national emergency, that it is essential in order to meet that national emergency that the priorities officer shall have power to prohibit the making of or dealing in construction materials, because that is what order in council P.C. 1609 says. It provides that the priorities officer shall have power to prohibit as well as to control and regulate the making of or dealing in construction materials. That is not an isolated case; that is an example, and examples of the same kind can be multiplied by the score in these orders, containing as they do surplus and unnecessary powers that cannot be justified by the existence of anything that has been said at any time in this debate in relation to the alleged national emergency.

By continuing these powers in their present form this bill projects forward for another year the vice of delegation of power, the continuation of irresponsibility. Surely this House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, is not going to turn its back upon its clear responsibility in the matter.

It would be interesting to hear from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) what he, as premier of one of the provinces, had to say in 1945 when Bill 15 first came to the attention of the provincial premiers. Did he say, "Oh, you can trust this government with all power. Let us go right ahead. The war is over, but we will trust this government." Did he say that? If that was the position he took as a provincial premier in the fall of 1945 when the premiers of the provinces were meeting in conference in Ottawa, I would invite the Minister of Justice to stand up and say that he approved that bill. If, on the other hand, like the premiers of the other provinces, in obedience to their responsibility to the constitution, and to the people of their provinces, he stood up and protested, as did the premiers of the other provinces, against this high-handed, arbitrary usurpation of the powers of parliament and of the provinces, and joined them in protest, I think the house would like to know, because the house would like to have the opportunity of testing the glowing words that fell from the lips of the hon. gentleman tonight in relation to the stand he took with reference to that iniquitous Bill 15.

Would it not be comforting at least if the house and the people of the country had some assurance that the government was taking energetic measures to eliminate and to cure the conditions which constitute the national emergency that has been referred to? Would it not be comforting to know that they have some objective for meeting the critical national emergency that exists as to housing, and which justifies and makes necessary a proper measure of rent control today? Would that not have been of some comfort to the house in continuing these broad powers? Would it not have been of some comfort to the house on the other branch of the argument of the Minister of Justice? You will remember he said he supported his argument as to the national emergency on two grounds, first the housing emergency, which everybody on this side of the house knows more about than the government, and secondly, inflation? Would it not have been comforting if the minister had been able to tell us that the government was doing something to cure inflation, that this inflationary spiral, with which apparently they have been powerless to cope in recent years, was going to be cured by sensible government measures, and that the people of the country were going to be given an opportunity to meet the rising spiral of inflation, the rising cost of living, by reductions in income tax, by reductions in the burden of indirect taxes, all those consumer taxes that have weighed so oppressively upon the backs of the Canadian people?

My time is almost up, but before I conclude my remarks I wish to put forward an amendment which will give the house the opportunity that the government has not seen fit to give it, namely, to proceed with regard to this subject of rent control, and the other subject matters referred to in these twelve orders, by a proper legislative method. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

> That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce with instructions that they have power to recommend a specific measure relating to rent control, and other specific measures relating respectively to other matters provided for in the said bill.

This amendment will give the house an opportunity to break down the measure. It will go to a committee; it will not now be read a second time. It will go to the banking and commerce committee, and the committee will have the opportunity of breaking down the subject matters that are dealt with today in the twelve orders in council. The committee will be able to bring in a proper specific measure with respect to rent control, a proper specific measure with regard to each of the other several matters dealt with in the twelve orders in council that are now under debate. That, Mr. Speaker, is a healthy and sensible procedure. It is the procedure that was followed in the house in 1946 when the government brought in a measure of a similar nature. It is true there was only one order in council involved, but it was a measure—

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Fleming: My time is not up. It was a measure to extend the life of an order in council, and the house decided it would not proceed by that method, that it would insist that a bill in proper legislative form be brought in, and therefore the house referred the government measure before second reading to the special committee on veterans affairs. That is the procedure that I offer the house in this amendment—a sensible, legislative and responsible method of dealing with the question.

Let it not be said that there is not time to deal with it. The banking and commerce committee can be called together to meet at once. If it be said that there is not now time to deal with the matter adequately, if the government has left the banking and commerce committee too little time to deal with it properly, then we are quite prepared to have a short interim extension to give the banking and commerce committee time to do what this government has not given parliament time to do, to deal with this matter in a responsible way.

On motion of Mr. Graydon the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Graydon: May I respectfully suggest that the amendment should be read?

Some hon. Members: The house is adjourning.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Golding): The amendment can be dealt with tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: Do hon. members wish to know what the business is for tomorrow? I was waiting for an inquiry to be made. Tomorrow we shall make an attempt at eleven o'clock to dispose in committee of the Foreign Exchange Control Act. If and when that is disposed of we will endeavour to give comfort to those hon. members who have been asking for it by disposing of the amendment made to the motion for second reading of this bill. As already announced, at seven-thirty the Minister of Finance intends to introduce his budget resolutions.

Mr. Knowles: And then we will return to whatever business was being considered prior to that time?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

At ten-thirty the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on March 14, 1949.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Vote 489—Maritime Freight Rates Act, railways other than Canadian National;

Vote 556—Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, deficit 1949;

And that the resolution passed by the house on March 14, 1949, referring certain estimates to the committee of supply, be rescinded in so far as the said resolution relates to votes Nos. 488, 489 and 556.

Mr. Case: I notice, Mr. Speaker, that in each case the ministers moved resolutions that certain reports be referred to the sessional committee "owned, operated and controlled by the government." I do not know whether that is the way they want it to read.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the name of the committee.

Mr. Case: Owned, operated and controlled by the government?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO NOTICE OF MOTION OF MR. LACROIX

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On March 21 the following resolution appeared on the order paper, in the name of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix):

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces with the view of the adoption by parliament of a new constitution for Canada and Canadians which would be a statute of Canada repealing the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, resulting in the making of Canada a truly sovereign and independent nation, a separate republic outside of the British commonwealth of nations, free of economic or other commitments, whether in peace or in war.

If that resolution had been called and debated it would have placed hon. members in the position of debating something which is contrary to the oath of allegiance which each member took before he entered the house. The resolution is changed on today's order paper. Where in the original resolution the word "co-operation" appears, the word "consent" is substituted, and where the words "a separate republic outside of the British commonwealth of nations" appear in the original resolution, the words "a separate republic, free of economic or other commitments toward the British commonwealth of nations" are substituted.

My point of privilege is this, sir. Did you, in your position as Speaker, consent to the alteration of this resolution? Was it placed before the house, or was the alteration made at the request of the government?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Answering the last part of my hon. friend's question, I may say that the government had nothing whatsoever to do with it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was just wondering, because the hon. member is a supporter of the government.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the remarks of the hon. member into consideration and give him an answer.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO APPEALS TO SUPREME COURT, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 87 (from the Senate) to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—QUESTION OF REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On March 14, as recorded in Hansard on page 1420, I asked the Prime Minister whether arrangements could be made to refer to the public accounts committee the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1948, and the Auditor General's report attached thereto. The Prime Minister answered as follows:

> The matter will receive consideration, and an announcement will be made by the Minister of Finance.

My question is: now that the public accounts committee has been set up and organized under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), will the Minister of Finance move to refer the public accounts and the Auditor General's report to that committee?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I shall be glad to propose such a motion tomorrow.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

AGREEMENT AS TO CHOICE OF ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. In his absence, perhaps I can put my question as notice and he can reply to it later. Can the minister inform the house whether an over-all agreement has yet been reached as to the route of the trans-Canada highway? If so, is he in a position to advise us when construction will begin?

BUTTER

FLOOR PRICE OF FIFTY-EIGHT CENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Drope (Northumberland, Ont.): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since he is not in his seat, perhaps his parliamentary assistant will answer it. It has to do with the announcement of the minister on Thursday last about a floor price on butter. There seems to be some confusion as to just what the announcement means—whether it is hoped that the floor price of fifty-eight cents will be held and all butter bought at that price, or whether a subsidy will be paid and the price of butter allowed to go below the floor. May we have a statement clarifying the position?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): It is my feeling that the government will be willing to buy all No. 1 butter when it drops to fifty-eight cents a pound. No subsidy will be paid.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUESTION WITH RESPECT TO M. J. CUMMINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I should like to put three questions to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I did not send him a copy of these questions, therefore he may take them as notice and answer later.

My questions are: Is veteran M. J. Cummings, regimental number 142082, at the present time in care of the public trustee of Ontario,—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: —actually in bed suffering from haemorrhage from T.B.?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows—

Mr. Blackmore: Will Your Honour speak so that I can hear at this end of the chamber?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows the rules. A question which is put before the orders of the day are called should be urgent and brief.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I find it extremely difficult to think of anything more urgent than the means of getting assistance to a man who is in bed suffering from bleeding T.B. That is why I have asked the question.

My second question is: If so, what is the department doing to ensure that veteran Cummings is receiving appropriate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Blackmore: I was unable to hear what Your Honour said.

Mr. Speaker: I said—

Mr. Blackmore: I still cannot hear you because of the noise.

Mr. Speaker: I asked the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Blackmore: Then I shall do it on your responsibility, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

IMMIGRATION—REGULATIONS AND ORDERS IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Douglas G. Ross (St. Paul's): May I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources when I may expect the return which was passed on March 9?

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): I believe that the information asked for was tabled by the Prime Minister some days ago.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT

CONTINUANCE IN FORCE UNTIL SIXTY DAYS AFTER OPENING OF FIRST SESSION OF PARLIAMENT IN 1951

The house resumed from Monday, March 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. 85, to amend the Foreign Exchange Control Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Golding in the chair.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Kidd) asked for some information about one C. A. Rowe, an employee of the foreign exchange control board. I have that information now and I should like to give it to him.

Mr. Rowe was born in Durham, Ontario in 1913. He attended the university of Western Ontario from 1931 to 1935 and Osgoode Hall from 1935 to 1938. He was called to the bar and practised law in Ontario until joining the army in 1944. Upon his discharge he joined the staff of the wartime prices and trade board in Ottawa, on October 31, 1946. On June 1, 1947, he was taken on the staff of the Bank of Canada and assigned to the enforcement section of the foreign exchange control board, where he dealt with seizures made under the provisions of the Foreign Exchange Control Act and general enforcement matters under the supervision and direction of senior officers of the board. On September 1, 1948, Mr. Rowe was transferred to the office of the board at Windsor, Ontario, where he has remained since that time.

Speaking generally, I believe that Mr. Rowe is a relatively junior employee of the board.

Mr. Fulton: Am I correct in my understanding that the difference between the cost of purchasing, let us say United States currency, and sales from time to time of United States currency, is a charge on the consolidated revenue fund; or is it taken from some special fund that is at the minister's disposal?

Mr. Abbott: I understand the foreign exchange control board charges a commission when it sells United States funds, and receives a similar commission when it buys them. That is the margin of profit, if I may so describe it, which is intended to cover the operating expenses of the board. Of course if there were an exchange loss it might wipe out that profit. Is that the hon. member's question?

Mr. Fulton: No; I did not have operating expenses in mind. I mean actual money used to purchase foreign exchange. The minister has referred from time to time to the building up of our foreign exchange reserves. That could only come out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. The foreign exchange control board acts as the agent of the Minister of Finance, and the foreign exchange account is provided with money furnished by the Minister of Finance as Receiver General for Canada out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Fulton: The minister answered a question on February 28 in which I asked for the amount expended for the purchase of gold, United States currency and other foreign currencies since the enactment of the Foreign Exchange Control Act. The answer was given in the form of figures showing net purchases and net sales for each year, the net purchases indicated by a plus sign and the net sales by a minus sign. On setting the figures up and taking a rough total, one finds that the excess of plus over minus under the three headings, namely purchase of gold, purchase of United States dollars, and purchase of other foreign currencies, is $981 million over a nine-year period. I should like to know if I am correct in assuming that the payments for the operation of foreign exchange control resulted in a charge upon the taxpayers of Canada of $981 million for the past nine years.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I would put it just that way. The result of course is that while the government of Canada has advanced to the foreign exchange control board or the foreign exchange account an amount such as the hon. member suggests, there is an asset there for the corresponding liability. It is included in our account as an active asset of the government.

Mr. Fulton: Presumably if control were to end tomorrow it would be represented by an amount in the consolidated revenue fund, so that perhaps we could operate without taxation for a year. But since the government has only two sources of obtaining funds, namely, taxation and borrowing, to finance the operations so far $981 million has been raised by taxes from the Canadian people.

Mr. Abbott: Or by borrowing.

Mr. Fulton: It is an asset standing to their credit. Nevertheless that asset can be raised only by taxation; is that not correct?

Mr. Abbott: No; it could be raised by borrowing.

Mr. Fulton: By taxation or borrowing?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Jackman: If the hon. member is correct in saying that there is an apparent cost of $981 million incurred by the foreign exchange control board, how much is the active asset carried against that cost? When we revalued the currency we lost the premium of ten per cent which we had paid out to acquire some of those assets. What was the profit when the foreign exchange control board took over all the gold holdings of the banks of Canada, and perhaps any private holdings as well? I think the take-over price was at the old rate of $20 an ounce, and then it was revalued upward. The board would have a fortuitous profit there at the expense of the banks and the holders of gold in Canada. Will the minister tell us what the active asset is against this $981 million exchange, and how much profit was made by the board when gold was taken over?

Mr. Abbott: As to the last part of the hon. member's question, I believe that figure has been brought out in previous reports of the foreign exchange control board. The so-called profit to which my hon. friend refers was of course realized some years ago. The assets the foreign exchange control board holds against the liabilities to which the hon. member for Kamloops referred are those holdings of gold and foreign currencies, principally United State currency; and they are shown in the annual report of the foreign exchange control board which I tabled a few days ago.

Mr. Hazen: I should like to ask a question with respect to section 35 (1) (e) of the Foreign Exchange Control Act, which reads:

> 35 (1) The governor in council may make regulations . . .
> (e) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained elsewhere in this act, exempting any person or any class of persons or any transaction or class of transactions from any provision of this act.

As I read it, this provision gives the governor in council the right in certain cases to overrule this act passed by parliament. Have any regulations been made under paragraph (e) exempting any person or any class of persons or any transaction or class of transactions from any provision of the act?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, there have been; and I should be glad to give my hon. friend an enumeration of those exemptions. Most of them relate to exemptions from various permit requirements of transactions between Canada and Newfoundland. Exemption from permit regulations has been provided under section 35 (1) of the act concerning the change of address of the owner of a bank account from Canada elsewhere.

Mr. Hazen: The minister is dealing with section 35?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, section 35 (1) (e), which provides for regulations exempting persons or transactions from the provisions of the act. The cases in which this power is exercised under the regulations are, first, exemptions from various permit requirements of transactions between Canada and Newfoundland—I have a long list of them here. They are technical, and perhaps the hon. member would be satisfied if I were to place them on Hansard. They are set out in detail, and would give him all the information he wants.

Mr. Hazen: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: There are six exemptions relating to Newfoundland. Then there is a second group which relates to exemption from declaration or permit forms for certain transactions, mainly those involving small amounts. There are twelve specific cases in this instance. Then there is a third category exempting from immediate declaration and sale of foreign exchange to authorized dealers. There are two other miscellaneous exemptions. Perhaps it would save time if I were to put them on the record:

> Subsection (1) (e) provides for regulations exempting persons or transactions from provisions of the act. Cases where this power is exercised in the regulations are as follows:

1. Exemptions from various permit requirements of transactions between Canada and Newfoundland.

Permit requirement under act

Change of address of owner of bank account from Canada elsewhere—section 26 (3). Section of regulations exempting: Section 33 (1).

Export of goods—section 25 (1). Section of regulations exempting: Sections 40 (2) (a) and 41 (1).

Import of goods—section 26 (1). Section of regulations exempting: Section 46 (2) (a).

Export of currency—section 25 (1) (a). Section of regulations exempting: Sections 49 (2) (a) and 51 (2) (a) (i).

Export of securities—section 25 (1) (a). Section of regulations exempting: Section 52 (2) (a).

Transfers and changes of address of securities—section 28 (1). Section of regulations exempting: Sections 55 (2) (c) and 57 (1).

2. Exemptions from declaration or permit forms for certain transactions, mainly those involving small amounts.

Permit or declaration requirement under act

Declaration and sale of foreign exchange—section 22. Exemption under regulations: No form needed up to $1,000 United States or £250 except from export proceeds where $100 United States or £25—section 14 (2).

Purchase of foreign exchange—sections 19 and 21. Exemption under regulations: No form needed up to $25 United States or £25 in case of payments for imports and $10 United States or £25 in other cases—section 17 (2).

Payment of Canadian dollars to non-resident—section 23 (1). Exemption under regulations: No form needed to sterling area up to $100 in payment for imports and $100 per month in other cases; to non-sterling area up to $25 in payment for imports and $10 per month in other cases; payments of interest on publicly issued Canadian securities, cheques issued by comptroller of treasury, and trust and loan and life insurance companies appointed agents of the board by sections 7, 8 and 9 of regulations; etc.—section 28 (2) and (3).

Exports of goods—section 25 (1) (a). Exemption under regulations: No permit needed for gifts up to value of $25, other exports up to value of $5, travelers' baggage, tourist purchases, baggage and effects—section 40 (2).

Delivery of goods for export unless payment received—section 25 (1) (b) and (c). Exemption under regulations: Exports for no payment may be made for goods of no commercial value, travelers' samples, gifts up to a value of $100, etc.—section 41 (2).

Imports of goods—section 26 (1). Exemption under regulations: No permit needed for personal baggage of tourists and goods for which customs entry made otherwise than on forms B.1, B.5 or B.11—section 46 (2).

Other exports of currency, etc.—section 25 (1) (a). Exemption under regulations: No form needed by authorized dealers, trust and loan and insurance companies in cases prescribed in instructions from board—section 51 (2).

Exports of securities—section 25 (1) (a). Exemption under regulations: Same as above—section 52 (2).

Sale, assignment, etc., of securities to non-residents—section 27 (1). Exemption under regulations: Same as above—section 53 (3).

Sale of securities in Canada by or for non-resident—section 27 (2). Exemption under regulations: No form needed by appointed security dealers in cases prescribed in instructions from board—section 54 (3).

Registration of transfer of securities to non-resident by registrar, transfer agent, etc.—section 28 (1). Exemption under regulations: No permit need be produced for securities received from outside Canada or presented by appointed security dealer—section 55 (2).

3. Exemption from immediate declaration and sale of foreign exchange to authorized dealer.

Section 21 of the regulations authorizes merchants, hotelkeepers, etc., to make change in United States currency for American tourists tendering that currency for purchases and for that purpose to retain reasonable amounts of United States currency in their tills.

See also notes under section 22 (1) (b) for provisions for the operation of foreign currency bank accounts by residents.

4. Other exemptions.

(a) By an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States on June 18, 1940, it was agreed that certain exemptions from foreign exchange control regulations would be available to United States citiens resident in Canada. Section 78 of the regulations provides for applications for, and granting of such exemptions which, in general, are from the obligation to sell to an authorized dealer United States funds derived from non-Canadian sources.

(b) Section 41 (1) of the act provides that every person carrying on business who engages in transactions to which the act applies shall keep records and books thereof at his place of business in Canada. In the bill as it was originally introduced into parliament, this provision was drafted to give the board discretion to authorize the keeping of books elsewhere but this discretion was deleted in the Senate. Some Canadian companies, notably International Nickel, keep all of their books and records in the United States and it is obviously impractical and undesirable to require them to comply with section 41 (1) of the act. In order to meet these cases, section 79 of the regulations exempts from the requirement under the act a company which satisfies the board that it is reasonable and proper to keep books and records outside Canada and undertakes to make them available for inspection if requested to do so.

Mr. Hazen: I should like to ask a question respecting section 36 of the act. The pertinent part reads:

36 (1) Subject to the provisions of this act and the regulations and under the control and direction of the minister, the board may . . .

(b) In particular cases or classes of cases, from time to time prescribed terms and conditions for permits additional to those prescribed by regulation or prescribed special forms of permits in cases where none is prescribed by regulation.

As I read that section it gives the board the power to make regulations that would override regulations made by the governor in council. It gives the board the right in particular cases to amend or add to regulations, and apparently the regulations that the board makes do not have to be published in the Canada Gazette as do those made by the governor in council under section 35. In what particular cases or classes of cases has this section been acted upon?

Mr. Abbott: Here again this is a provision inserted to give a reasonable degree of practical flexibility to the act, and the variations from the formal regulations are somewhat minor in character. Section 36, subsection 1(b), as my hon. friend has pointed out, authorizes the board to prescribe special forms of permits and terms and conditions of permits additional to those contained in the regulations. Under this provision, for example, special forms of permits have been introduced for the export of currency by travelers; these are issued in lieu of the normal permit on form H.

First, there is the special border permit issued to commuters and others having occasion to cross the border frequently, authorizing them to carry a specified amount on any one trip. The permit is exhibited to a customs officer on each trip but need not be surrendered. Then there is the special business travel permit which is issued to business firms whose employees frequently require to travel to the United States on short notice when banks may be closed.

Special terms and conditions are attached to permits in various circumstances, examples of which are as follows: First, foreign exchange is made available for any reasonable amount for genuine business travel. Businessmen obviously cannot, in many cases, estimate in advance what expenditures they will have to make, and where large amounts are asked for, they are normally made available on condition that on his return the traveler will furnish a statement of his expenditures so that the board can satisfy itself that they were in fact for business purposes.

Second, in certain cases of capital transfers from residents to nonresidents, payment is approved on condition that the nonresident reinvest the amount in certain classes of Canadian domestic securities. The effect is that the nonresident, while retaining his investment in Canada, is able to change its character if he wishes to do so. This procedure is applied principally in the case of capital payments between related parties.

Third, where a resident is authorized to make a new capital investment abroad to establish a business, it is normally made a condition of providing exchange for that purpose that earnings from the investment will be brought back to Canada.

I think these are fairly typical examples of the latitude given under that section to the administrative body to vary the formal conditions of the general applications which are set out in the regulations.

Mr. Hazen: Section 48 gives the board power to prevent a person from dealing with his own property. Has this power been exercised to any considerable extent?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that this power has been authorized in a number of cases, in most of which the prohibition related to withdrawals from bank accounts or access to safety deposit boxes by owners who, the board had reason to believe, were exporting capital from Canada. In one case a railway company was prohibited from delivering a shipment of Christmas trees for a nonresident who had bought the trees for unofficial Canadian dollars, pending adjustment of the transactions so that United States dollars were provided.

Mr. Hazen: Have there been a number of cases?

Mr. Abbott: My information is that there have been a number of cases in which it was suspected that capital export was being attempted.

Mr. Hazen: May I ask two questions about another matter under the regulations? Suppose a farmer who is growing old has sold his farm, has liquidated his assets and proposes to go to the United States to live with a son or some other relative; how much will he be permitted to take with him from this country?

Mr. Abbott: I shall have to get that information and give it to my hon. friend in a few minutes. I have an idea, but I do not want to say positively.

Mr. Hazen: There is another question along the same line I should like to ask.

Mr. Abbott: It is an annual amount. If he cannot take the whole amount, we allow a certain amount annually.

Mr. Hazen: Take the case of a businessman whose health is bad and whose doctor tells him that if he wishes to live he must leave this country and go to a more favourable climate. If such a man liquidates his assets with the idea of moving to another country in order to go into business there, how much will he be permitted to take under the regulations?

Mr. Abbott: There again I shall have to get the information. I know that he would be allowed to take a reasonable amount, but he would not be allowed to take all his capital, particularly if it were a substantial amount. I hope to have that information in a few minutes.

Mr. Cockeram: I notice that there is an increase of fifty-two in the staff of the board, whereas the cost of operating the board has increased from $810,668 to $1,334,930 in 1948, an increase of over sixty-two per cent. It would not seem that that increase in administrative cost is justified. Will the minister explain it?

Mr. Abbott: I may have to inform myself a little more accurately on it. Certainly part of the increase in cost would be due to the general increase in salaries and expenses which occurred during the past year. Whether that would account for the entire amount to which my hon. friend refers, I would not want to say now. I shall try to give him a more specific answer later.

Mr. Cockeram: The increase is $524,262, while the increase in staff is only fifty-two.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Following the answers given by the minister last evening I should like to preface what I have to say in regard to refunds by asking the minister what recourse a person has who believes he has been unjustly deprived of his money under the provisions of the act and where forfeiture has been ordered?

Mr. Abbott: I am glad my hon. friend raised that question, because last evening I was not thoroughly familiar with the procedural steps which could be taken under the act. I have had it looked into, and here is the position. The only case in which the board can make a decision as to forfeiture is the case involving $100 or less. The procedure is provided in sections 61 and 62 of the act. Briefly it is that when the seizure is made the board notifies the owner of the reasons therefor, and calls on him to furnish within thirty days evidence relating to the seizure if he wishes to do so. If evidence is furnished it is considered by the board, and the owner is notified whether or not the seizure is to be maintained. The owner may, within thirty days thereafter, object to a decision to forfeit the funds, in which case the board is required, upon request of the owner, to refer the matter to a court. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The provisions of sections 61 and 62 are applicable only when there is a large amount in dispute. A person who has $20, $40 or $60 taken from him, irrespective of how unjust the circumstances may be, is in effect denied any recourse. I mentioned two cases last evening. I have at least another half dozen cases in which individuals, and properly so, resent the orders that were made. In effect they have no recourse. If they decide to go to court under the provisions of sections 61 or 62, the costs are out of proportion to the benefits that will come to them. At the end of a lawsuit, even if they are successful, they will have nothing to speak of as a result of the litigation, because the legislation does not provide for their costs to the extent that it should. I am going to make a suggestion to the minister. According to the records, those who get in touch with me, and through me communicate with the foreign exchange control board, are not nearly as successful as some others must be. During the last two or three years I have followed the course of not submitting cases that in my opinion are unjustifiable. With a number of them I have done nothing, because I felt that while the applicant resented having his money taken from him, in effect he had no proper cause for complaint. In the several cases I have brought to the attention of the board I have met nothing but a blank wall.

Mr. Kidd: Hear, hear; that is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When I read the records for 1947, which indicate that 347 seizures were maintained and 321 released, the failure of my advocacy on behalf of these people as their member becomes obvious. Apparently I have not the modus operandi, or the proper method of approach.

Mr. Abbott: Or bad cases.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I am speaking about these cases. I mentioned two last night, and the minister was kind enough to say that, if the facts were as I had stated them, these were proper cases for review. When I put the cases before the house I quoted from the findings of the board in regard thereto. Then I find that in 1948, out of 1,501 seizures, the number of releases is again correspondingly large, namely, 975. I make an appeal to the minister that as to these cases, inasmuch as individuals are in effect denied their right of complaint because of the expense and the trouble, there should be a review.

I do not want to press individual cases. I do so merely by way of illustration. A man who lives in a small town in Saskatchewan gets word on Sunday of the funeral in the United States of a close relative. He picks up a few United States dollars that happen to be in the town, gets to the boundary, announces that he has them, and has no other means of getting to the United States. The money is taken from him. He appeals, but all he receives from the board is the answer that the forfeiture is upheld. That is not good enough. I have never made it a point to bring particular cases before the committee, but orders such as those are arbitrary, unjustifiable, and exactly in keeping with the manner in which certain persons in a position of bureaucratic power exercise that power irrespective of the will of the people.

Last evening the minister said with regard to one case that I brought to his attention—not the one to which I have just been referring—that if the facts were as I had stated them it was a case to which consideration should be given. There are more than those two cases; there are many. After all, one of the reasons that we are in parliament is to bring before the executive any injustices that may be perpetrated by officialdom on Canadian citizens. These are not isolated cases. Again I urge upon the minister that, as to cases in which less than $100 has been taken from individuals, there should be some method of review that will not place upon the applicant for review the costs incidental to the taking of action.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend knows that there is that method of review now by the board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes; I have the statute here, but in effect you are appealing from the employee to the employer. In Great Britain this type of thing is bitterly criticized in a report made in 1932 when the Lord Chancellor's committee was set up on the question of the exercise of extraordinary powers by officials. One of the recommendations was that where the rights of the individual are interfered with, that individual should have his right freed from unnecessary expense in challenging or having reviewed any order that has been made.

Those who have had less than $100 taken from them are not criminals endeavouring to evade the law. I gave an instance last evening, that of a man who, on a Sunday, arrived at the boundary and did not have a form H with him. He was asked if he had any money, and he said that he had. He was then told that he must deposit it somewhere. I have the name of the official who told him that. The man who wanted to cross the border said, "Well, the banks are closed today, and I must go over the line." The officials said they would take his money and he would have his right to apply against forfeiture. These are not isolated cases; these are cases of Canadians who are law-abiding, and who are being treated unjustly. Even at this stage I ask the minister if he will not have a review made of these cases to the end that justice be done.

The figures given last night were for the little fellows. In how many cases were seizures made of over $100, and in how many of those cases were the moneys returned as a result of representations made?

There is a third question that I should like to ask the minister. Canadians are law-abiding. Some of them want to go to the United States as tourists, and they are restricted to $150. When one sees in his own locality people who are able to spend three or four or five months in Florida or California, I do not think they get very far on $150. I should like to know in how many cases persons desiring to spend the winter in another country have had special regulations made to the end that they may be provided with the necessary funds. Matters such as these arouse resentment and ill-feeling, and when coupled with obvious injustice in cases such as those to which I have referred, there is not only resentment against the government; there is resentment against parliament for permitting individuals to enjoy power almost unchallengeable by Canadians as a whole.

Mr. Abbott: Well, Mr. Chairman, as to the various points raised by my hon. friend, of course I shall look into the two cases he has cited, as I am continually looking into similar cases. Members on all sides of the house get in touch with me in connection with these seizures of United States dollars, and I look into each case to see if it is one in which the action of the customs officer, or whoever it may be, should be reversed.

As to the seizures in these larger cases, these have to be made under section 60 by proceedings in the exchequer court, and the figures show that in 1947 there were 91 prosecutions, with fines totaling $34,805. In 1948 there were 216 prosecutions, with fines totaling $75,032. In 1947 and 1948 there were five cases in which charges were laid where the accused were acquitted, and in seventeen other cases the charges laid were withdrawn before trial.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What were the largest penalties in each of those cases?

Mr. Abbott: The largest group penalties were nonresidents importing unofficial Canadian funds, mainly in the form of drafts, and acquiring United States dollars illegally in Canada. There the total fines were $26,720. Then in 1948, 53 prosecutions were still pending, and the breakdown shows attempts by resident travelers to export currency, 21; residents exceeding annual travel allotment, 7; residents failing to sell United States dollars to authorized dealers, 13; and under the category of "others", 12, making the total of 53.

As to the people who spend the winter in California or Florida, like my hon. friend I occasionally read the social and personal columns of the newspapers, and I do see that this is done. Perhaps I should say that in spite of the necessity for imposing fresh travel restrictions a little over a year ago, the board has been following as liberal a policy as possible with respect to health applications. So far as health travel is concerned, I am told anyone over sixty-five years of age can get permission almost as a matter of course to reside in a warmer climate during the winter.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister when that policy became effective? It must have been just recently.

Mr. Abbott: It has been effective certainly for a year or more. Those of us who are somewhat younger must have a medical certificate to show that for health reasons it is necessary for us to reside in a climate other than that of Canada. As I say, speaking generally the board has endeavoured to follow a liberal policy with respect to health applications. I notice the hon. member for Eglinton shakes his head, and I have had some experiences myself in which it seemed to me they should have accepted the medical certificates. However, generally speaking that is the case.

While I am on my feet I think I should answer the hon. member for Saint John-Albert as to the export of capital by those who may wish to sell their property and move to the United States. Section 36, subsections 1 and 2, authorize the board to determine residential status for the purposes of the act, and that power is exercised principally in dealing with applications for change of status from resident to nonresident, made by persons who wish to move from Canada and take up permanent residence elsewhere. Where the move is to a United States dollar area country the emigrant is authorized to transfer a maximum of $12,500 during the first year, in Canadian dollars, through the unofficial market. Regulations have been issued with respect to that; and at the end of one year from the departure from Canada, and at annual intervals thereafter, depending of course upon how long the restrictions may continue, the owner may apply to the board for authority to make additional transfers from Canada from these resident assets. One addition I might make to that is that a United States citizen who has been resident in Canada and who desires to return to the United States to live is normally authorized to transfer his assets to the United States at the time of departure, provided that the excess over the amount authorized for transfer in Canadian dollars is invested in Canadian domestic securities having a term of maturity or authorized call date of not less than three years.

Mr. Hazen: What about the second year? What additional amounts can be transferred?

Mr. Abbott: I understand nothing is fixed as to the second year, but the same maximum of $12,500 would apply.

Mr. Hazen: Would the answer the minister has given apply to a man who for reasons of health had to give up his business here and go to the United States to live? Would it apply to a farmer who has sold out in Canada and is going to live with a relative in the United States?

Mr. Abbott: I think the same maximum would apply. Of course a man who moves down to the United States is entitled to take all his revenues there. If he is given a change of status for exchange control purposes he can take all his Canadian revenues down in United States dollars which he can acquire from the board at the official rate; but with respect to capital transfers he is limited to $12,500 the first year.

Mr. Hazen: I think that works a hardship on a man who is obliged to give up his business here for health reasons, who has a family to support and who wants to go to the United States and start up some kind of business or industry there. If he is allowed to take only $12,500 with him—

Mr. Abbott: The first year.

Mr. Hazen: —of course that will amount to less than $12,500 when exchanged into United States currency. He has to get a house to live in, and he needs capital to put into a plant or a farm, if he is going to run a farm. I am referring more particularly, however, to an industrialist who wants to go into business of one kind or another in the United States. It leaves him in a very difficult position. He cannot live here for reasons of health; he has to go to a drier climate, and when he gets there he is practically stranded because he is allowed to take only $12,500 with him, or its equivalent in United States funds, and is allowed an equivalent amount from year to year.

Mr. Abbott: No doubt my hon. friend is right, and a hardship may be involved in a case of that kind. The limitation prior to November, 1947, when we had to take further steps to conserve our exchange resources, was $25,000 the first year. That was cut in half. Perhaps as our position improves it may be possible to increase that again, but I must point out to the committee that our exchange difficulties have necessitated the imposition of the present prohibitions on the transfer of capital from this country. That is the main purpose of the restrictions, and of course there is inevitably some hardship incidental to that prohibition.

To answer the question of the hon. member for York West, the concluding paragraph of the report of the chairman of the foreign exchange control board states, in reference to the increase in costs:

> The increase was due to a continued rise in the volume of foreign exchange and other transactions coming under the board's review and added duties arising out of the exchange conservation measures introduced by the government in the latter part of 1947. These were reflected in an increase in the over-all cost of administration from $810,668 in 1947 to $1,334,930 in 1948.

That increase consisted entirely of increased expenditures for staff, premises, office supplies, equipment and traveling expenses. There were some minor expenses paid out of the parliamentary appropriations, such as telegrams, stationery, printing, enforcement and cost of coin shipments. But the main increase is in the items to which I have referred.

Mr. Cockeram: Can the minister get a breakdown of that figure, and also comparative figures for 1947? Can he also get a breakdown of the public information program, $99,957? There is an increase of fifty-two in the staff of the foreign exchange control board, which seems a good deal. The staff is increased by one-eighth. I think that increase is out of line. I should like to get a breakdown, and also the comparative figures for the previous year.

Mr. Abbott: I will see if I can get the information.

Mr. McMaster: I should like to ask a question arising out of an answer given to the hon. member for Kamloops. The minister said that the foreign exchange control board is in the market. Does the foreign exchange control board acquire any considerable sum of money except such funds as the people are bound to hand over to them of the United States dollars they receive?

Mr. Abbott: No. What I meant was that it acquires all the United States dollars that Canadian exporters receive from their customers.

Mr. McMaster: Do they go into the market?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I was inaccurate in using the word "market". It has a monopoly on foreign exchange.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask the minister what the policy of his department is with regard to goods coming into this country for charitable purposes. I have one case, which is no doubt one of quite a number, and three different government departments seem to be involved. I am at a loss to understand the extent of the co-ordination among these three departments. The position is this. Some goods were ordered to be brought into Canada to be used by a Lions Club for charitable purposes. The goods were not bought. The goods were coming in. No funds were exchanged between this country and the United States. Furthermore, the goods were to be used for charitable purposes. No money was to be made from the sale of the goods. There was no transfer of title of the goods. Yet now, because those who were bringing the goods into Canada were not aware that they had to get the proper permits, the goods are held up at the border. They have been held up for some time while correspondence has been going on between the Department of Finance and the Department of Trade and Commerce; now the Department of National Revenue comes on the scene and wants its cut from the duties that would be imposed upon the goods, in spite of the fact that there is no transfer of funds, and the goods are not bought.

I am not now making any criticism. I am taking the case up with the department, but I cannot quite unravel it. Two or three departments are all mixed up in it. If I could get a picture of the government policy with respect to such a matter, I think I could perhaps unravel it in my own mind.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend will give me the name and the particulars, I shall be glad to have the matter looked into. It sounds to me as though it were a case in which the emergency import restrictions were involved, and not foreign exchange control. The only interest I have as Minister of Finance, or which my agent the foreign exchange control board has, in imports, is to see that they do not constitute a concealed export of capital from this country. But the case that my hon. friend appears to have in mind would likely be in relation to a commodity which is on either the prohibited list or the quota list under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. In those cases the Department of National Revenue acts as agent for the emergency import control division of the Department of Finance. But without knowing the exact circumstances and the parties involved, it is difficult to give a specific answer. I shall be glad to look into the case.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister to give us some further clarification of the policy of the foreign exchange control board with regard to the export of goods from Canada. He will find at page 24 of the annual report for the year 1948 an interesting outline of that situation. It begins:

> Under the Foreign Exchange Control Act a permit from the board is required for the sale of goods for export from Canada otherwise than on terms providing for payment of the fair value within six months in a currency designated as acceptable therefor. In general the currencies designated by the regulations are as follows:

Then it sets out the ordinary method in which these deals are financed.

> 1. Exports to any destination—United States dollars or foreign currencies which are freely convertible into United States dollars;
>
> 2. Exports to sterling area countries—sterling, other sterling area currencies which are freely convertible into sterling, or Canadian dollars paid from sterling area accounts;
> 3. Exports to special arrangement countries (e.g. France, Belgium, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Norway, Czechoslovakia, Egypt and Palestine)—Canadian dollars paid from special arrangement country accounts.

We all agree, of course, that that is the way in which we should like to see Canadian export business financed. But the board is obviously concerned whether it will be possible to carry on in any one of those three ways, because the report goes on as follows:

Until recently there was little occasion for Canadian exporters to seek to export on terms other than those specified above. With the growing severity of import restrictions imposed by many countries, however, an increasing number of cases have arisen where Canadian exporters find it impossible to sell goods on the prescribed terms of payment. In these cases alternative proposals for payment are sometimes made by foreign buyers and where they are acceptable to the Canadian exporters, the board has indicated its readiness to consider applications for the necessary permits. The following appear to be the main types of case which warrant consideration:

I would emphasize there that the board itself says that these particular types warrant consideration. That is becoming increasingly true as the days go by. Of course it is particularly important to British Columbia, because we have the greatest difficulty in keeping up our exports to the sterling area countries.

These are the types of cases warranting consideration:

1. Exports for payment in the appropriate currencies but where payment is to be deferred beyond the normal six-month period.

We have had an example of that in the canned salmon trade. I hold in my hand a press dispatch of January 21 of this year, which reads as follows: "Salmon get last chance."

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I question whether the hon. member is in order in reviewing the whole act. What is now before the committee is an extension of the time of operation of the act. Section 1 of the bill extends the time of operation of the act. I hope the hon. member will try to confine his remarks to the simple amendment which is now before the committee. The principle of the measure was agreed to on second reading. These matters could have been discussed at that time. Hon. members should confine their remarks to the clause before the committee.

Mr. Green: The question I am raising involves a good many millions of dollars to the people of British Columbia. The whole thing is tied up with the policy of the foreign exchange control board.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: I have not finished my statement.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I agree with the hon. member that it is all involved in this act, but that is not now before the committee. What is before the committee is an extension of the time.

Mr. Green: This question is becoming of great importance. It is in the coming year, during which this act is to be extended, that the question will be of far more importance than it was last year. Surely I am entitled to ask what the policy of the board is on these particular points.

Mr. Abbott: I think my hon. friend wants to ask me what the policy of the board or of the government is with respect to payments on exports in sterling, let us say. I imagine that is what he was leading up to, was it not? If so, it is a relevant question, certainly as relevant as any other questions which have been asked me this morning. I do not think we should go into a discussion of the plight of industries. I do not suppose the hon. member intended to do that.

Mr. Green: I am asking the minister first of all about the first type of cases which the board thinks warrants further consideration. My submission is that some much more definite policy should be adopted with regard to this type, which is:

Exports for payment in the appropriate currencies but where payment is to be deferred beyond the normal six-month period.

Before the war British Columbia sold to Great Britain over a million cases of canned salmon a year. Hon. members will recall that during the war there was no canned salmon available in Canada because it was all being sent overseas. Sales have now been cut off completely. The press dispatch to which I referred reads:

Fisheries Minister R. W. Mayhew has begun last-chance negotiations toward agreement for sale of B.C. canned salmon to the United Kingdom, and upon his success or failure will depend to great extent the prosperity of this province's fishermen in 1949.

This was announced today as British food minister Strachey declared in London his ministry had turned down a Canadian offer of tinned salmon on a deferred payment basis.

I presume that is the basis mentioned by the board as type one. The dispatch goes on:

Reason: "It is not known when Britain will have enough dollars to pay.

"If they would agree to payment in sterling we could do business. We must keep our dollars for more essential food, like wheat."

Is there not some way in which deferred payments can be arranged for canned salmon?

My second question has to do with the fourth type of case to which the foreign exchange control board refers. It reads:

Exports to be paid for by the acceptance of goods of equivalent value.

The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce explained that there had been one such arrangement of which he knew, and that was an exchange of apples for oranges between Brazil and Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Under this amendment it is not in order for the hon. member to review the whole act. It is entirely out of order. If the hon. member wishes to put a question, he can do so without going into the whole act.

Mr. Green: In order to put my question I have to make certain explanations. I have asked one question. I wish to ask the minister another question with respect to the fourth type of case in which lumber is involved. Obviously the British have made a deal—

Mr. Williams: Can you not ask a question without making a speech?

Mr. Green: If you will just keep quiet.

Mr. Williams: Bless your little soul. You have been fifteen minutes trying to ask three questions.

Mr. Green: The British have made deals for timber with Yugoslavia and Sweden, and apparently they are now dealing with Finland and Russia. Is there not some way in which a similar deal for timber can be made between Great Britain and Canada? Just last week in Vancouver Mr. Graham Towers said—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he must deal with the amendment and not review the whole act. I think hon. members will agree with me that it is not in order to review the whole act.

Mr. Green: The bill before the committee is a provision to continue the whole act for a year.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The amendment before the committee extends the time. The principle of the act, and all that was involved in it, could have been discussed on second reading. Second reading has been given to the bill, and we are now dealing with the amendment.

Mr. Green: I am not discussing the principle of the bill.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member is going back over discussions which lasted for an hour and which were finished.

Mr. Green: It is exactly the type of discussion that has been going on here all morning.

Mr. Howe: How many times do you have to discuss the whole matter?

Mr. Green: I am discussing how the board functions.

[Mr. Green.]

The Deputy Chairman: I ask the hon. member to put his questions as briefly as he can. I do not think he is in order in carrying on the discussion as he has. The amendment asks for an extension of the time of operation of the act. It does not ask for a review of all the ramifications of the act. That is not what we are dealing with in committee.

Mr. Green: I am not dealing with all the ramifications of the act, Mr. Chairman; I am asking a question concerning one paragraph of the board's report.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman that if we permitted him to continue his discussion as he has been doing, other hon. members who wish to deal with any other feature of the act would have the same right to do so. In committee speeches must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration.

Mr. Green: The minister made a statement which is to be found at page 1644 of Hansard, and it was made during a discussion in the committee stage of the bill. He said:

> We have been trying to hold off from what I consider to be this dangerous and vicious system of barter agreements.

With regard to the fourth type of case—that is, where the board says that exports shall be paid for by the acceptance of goods of equivalent value—I ask the minister whether the time has not come to take more definite steps to permit transactions of that kind, in order that we may not lose our trade with the sterling area, as we have already done with regard to some commodities?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think this is the place to discuss the merits or demerits of so-called barter transactions. There is no foreign exchange control aspect involved in any case. It is true that the Foreign Exchange Control Act requires that any goods exported from this country must be payable in currency approved by the board. To that extent you cannot enter into barter transactions without permission of the board. The primary question whether a transaction of that kind should be entered into I shall not discuss at this time. My views are well known. I voiced them the other night. I believe that kind of transaction we should enter into only as a last resort.

As to the first question, with reference to acceptance of sterling as payment for exports, as indicated in the report of the board, there is no objection to that now, provided that the exporter is willing to accept that sterling and to wait until the Bank of England or the United States treasury is prepared to convert it into dollars. But if the foreign exchange control board were to take sterling from the Canadian exporter, actually we would be simply extending further credits to the sterling area, and in addition to the credit risk we would also be incurring an exchange risk.

As I say, there is no objection; I think the board will now permit such transactions. If for instance any exporter of salmon, lumber or some other commodity is prepared to sell it and to take sterling for it, that is permitted —provided that his workmen get the necessary Canadian dollars. But the dominion government does not feel it can extend its foreign credit program by accumulating sterling.

Mr. Adamson: I believe the minister was under some misapprehension in respect to what he regarded as a discourtesy on the part of the hon. member for York South and myself. What we said was "softer", not "louder". We realize that the minister has a heavy commitment this evening in the presentation of his budget, and we are conscious of the fact that his voice requires all the care it can receive.

My first question is this: Has the foreign exchange control board made purchases in the unofficial market for Canadian dollars in New York? Then I have a question with regard to the redemption of United States securities, or at least securities which call in United States funds—and in this I am thinking of two companies which have made heavy redemptions of bonds in the last two years; one is the Abitibi Company, and there are several others. They redeemed certain bonds in compliance with the first mortgage clause and also had payments in United States funds as one of the conditions of the purchase of the bonds. Can the minister say how much was redeemed in this way in United States funds? Is there a condition under which bonds of this kind are redeemed in United States funds?

Mr. Abbott: The foreign exchange control board has not purchased in the so-called unofficial market any Canadian dollars. As to the second point, I do not believe I have with me figures showing maturities of Canadian securities payable in United States funds made prior to the imposition of restrictions in November 1947. They were fairly heavy in that year. I was going to give a figure, but perhaps I should not. It is readily available; I believe it appears in the report of the board for 1947. Perhaps I could get it in a few minutes.

Mr. Adamson: I do not wish to hold up passage of the bill, but the policy is for redemption in United States funds to be made from funds of the foreign exchange control board?

Mr. Abbott: Since November 1947 we have not been allowing that type of capital to come in.

Mr. Adamson: I understand that, but outstanding securities can be redeemed in that way?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, to meet maturities as they fall due. But we cannot allow an anticipation of maturities. The hon. member was referring to maturities of securities to become due. Funds of course will be provided to pay them off. That has always been our policy. There has never been any deviation from that, even during the war.

Mr. Adamson: The reason for my first question was that I wanted to know whether the unofficial market was completely unsupported by the government.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Stephenson: Knowing that in any case we have to have funds to purchase goods in the United States, if United States funds have been purchased, has Canada had to pay a premium on them?

Mr. Abbott: No, there is no premium paid on those funds.

Mr. Fleming: Earlier this morning the minister answered some questions as to the relationship between the foreign exchange control board and the consolidated revenue fund. I wonder if he would supplement the information he gave respecting assets and liabilities of the exchange fund account as it appears at page 28 of the 1948 report of the foreign exchange control board. This indicates that at December 31, 1947, advances from the consolidated revenue fund stood at $505 million, whereas at December 31, 1948, they stood at $1,025 million. These of course are calendar year figures. If we subtract the 1947 from the 1948 figure we have not a figure which would tally with the fiscal year for which the minister keeps his books. In other words the increase of $520 million in advances from the consolidated revenue fund as between December 31, 1947, and December 31, 1948, represents the twelve months of the calendar year 1948, and does not bear any relationship to the fiscal year ended March 31.

What is the position with regard to the effect in 1947 and 1948 of increases in the consolidated revenue fund on the books of the Department of Finance with regard to such things as surplus? I am aware of the figure appearing at page 1 of the report indicating holdings in United States dollars and gold. But what I want to get at is this: in 1947 we had a substantial reduction—

I believe it was about $700 million—in the board's holdings of United States dollars in gold. So far as I am aware, this was not reflected in the figures the minister gave the house. It was not reflected in a reduction of the national debt.

In 1948 we see a substantial increase in advances from the consolidated revenue fund. From a statement issued earlier in the year, which appeared in the Canada Gazette, it appears that these increases in advances from the consolidated revenue fund to the foreign exchange control board are going to have the effect of reducing the surplus available in the hands of the Minister of Finance for the reduction of debt. If it does not work in 1947, how does it work in 1948?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid my hon. friend has not read carefully the prepared statements I have issued in the last two or three months in connection with the comptroller of the treasury's monthly statements, where I have been endeavouring to demonstrate the difference in public accounts between what is referred to as budgetary surplus and cash surplus. In public finance there are many items which are not budgetary items but which have to be paid for in cash. On the other side there are a great many budgetary expenditures which do not have to be made in cash. If my hon. friend will look back at my budget speech of 1947 he will find that I referred in specific terms to the fact that during the then fiscal year we had received several hundred million dollars as a result of payments made to me in my official capacity from the exchange fund account. The trend has been reversed this year; in fact we have had to provide out of the cash resources of the government between $400 million and $450 million for the exchange fund account in order to provide dollars, mainly for exporters who have turned over their United States dollars to the exchange fund account.

That fact has nothing to do with the amount of the budgetary surplus which the government has at the end of its fiscal year. It has a significant bearing on the cash requirements of the government, which is something completely different. I am not revealing any budget secrets when I say that in the course of my economic survey this evening I shall have something to say on this particular subject. Perhaps my hon. friend will accept this short explanation this morning, and this evening I hope to be able to deal with the question he has raised, which is an important one, in considerably more detail.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. McKay: I should like to ask a question arising out of a news report in the Toronto Star of March 18, which reads:

> Vancouver, March 18—"Restoration of Europe might well be the task of a generation or more, and to that degree Canada will be without its traditional customers capable of buying from this country," declared Graham Ford Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, in an address to the northwest credit conference yesterday.
> Mr. Towers said European recipients of aid had been forced by dollar shortages to form trading arrangements among themselves and with countries outside the dollar area. "Some of these international trade policies are enough to make classical economists turn in their graves," he declared.

I assume that when Mr. Towers refers to international trade policies which are causing classical economists to turn in their graves he is referring to barter trade. On several occasions the minister has indicated to the house that he is at least in principle opposed to barter trade arrangements. If he is opposed in principle to barter arrangements, will he tell the committee what the government has to offer in place of those barter arrangements, other than granting Europe increased loans and credits so that they can purchase goods from Canada?

Mr. Abbott: As I have said before, I am not going to enter into an extended debate on trade policy when we are in committee on this bill. I think it would be completely irrelevant. We had a long discussion on it the other day, and on a more appropriate occasion I shall have a good deal more to say on this question of barter deals. I do not think it is in order to go into the matter this morning, and I shall give, as I have done before, excellent reasons why I do not think it is in the interests of this country to go into them.

Mr. Campbell: What percentage of the profits made in Canada by United States firms has been converted into United States dollars during the past year?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot give my hon. friend the percentage, but every dollar of profit made in this country by a United States firm during the past year could, if the firm wished to do so, have been taken to the United States at the official rate of exchange. A good many of them, in accordance with past practice, have allowed current earnings to remain here and have reinvested them in the business. But Canadian policy is, and always has been, even in the worst days of the war, to allow nonresident investors to take their current earnings out of the country at the official rate of exchange.

Mr. Jackman: Following the questions asked by the hon. member for Saint John-

Albert, will the minister say whether a farmer or businessman who retired to the United States would be permitted to have all his income in Canada sent to him in the United States at the official rate?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Jackman: Irrespective of what the amount may be?

Mr. Abbott: If he has been granted a change of status. That is my information.

Mr. Jackman: Is there any particular trick about being granted a change of status? Would that apply to a person who has been there, say, for a year, and has taken up domicile?

Mr. Abbott: I think there must be some justification, as was indicated by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, such as health or other reasons. If a Canadian feels that he must leave Canada, he is always free to do so, but it is discretionary with us to say whether he is given a change of status for exchange purposes—in other words, whether we will allow him to take his capital out of the country.

Mr. Jackman: Supposing a businessman or farmer wanted to go to the United States in order to carry on business, in order to get away from restrictions; would this government allow him to have the income from his Canadian investments at the official rate of exchange?

Mr. Abbott: Not necessarily.

Mr. Jackman: In other words he must pass through the hands of the bureaucrats before it is decided whether he can go to the United States. Last night we heard the Minister of Justice say that this government is eager to get out of controls with the utmost possible speed, but we must not forget that when the Foreign Exchange Control Act was before us, the government would not consent to any limitation as to time. It was only because of the work of the other house that any limitation was placed on the act.

May I ask the minister why he has put a two-year limit on at this time? I say that partly because of what I see in the report that the staff has been increased from 420 to 472. Naturally I am concerned about the future of the young men and women who make up the staff there, to say nothing of the large additional expense which has been incurred and which amounts to no less than $10,000 per head for the fifty-two additional people.

I should like to ask the minister a question which is relevant to the time factor in the bill before us. If in the eyes of the government our currency becomes sufficiently strong to stand on its own feet, is it the intention of the government to do away with the foreign exchange control board, or does the minister feel that under his obligations, as they now exist and as he contemplates they will exist under Bretton Woods, it will be necessary to maintain the foreign exchange control board with a fairly substantial staff? If it should come about that there was freedom and convertibility of currency, what staff would be required in addition to the staff now employed?

Mr. Abbott: As I have said on other occasions, I am never too keen about answering hypothetical questions, and I certainly have no intention of stating what government policy might be under contingencies as yet undeveloped. I did point out either yesterday or the day before, or previously when we were discussing this measure, that it is perfectly open to parliament to repeal the measure at any time. The fact that there is a time limit does not prevent that.

As I have said on numerous other occasions, I think it would have been better to follow the ordinary British constitutional practice and not put in a time limit—leave it to parliament to repeal the statute when it was no longer necessary. However, that principle was accepted in the other place when the act was before that body for consideration in 1946. The approximately two-year time limit is put in because that period will terminate early in the life of the next parliament. But there is nothing to prevent parliament from repealing it this year or next year.

Mr. Williams: In one of the answers given by the minister this morning he referred to prosecution of people who had been evading the rules and regulations of the foreign exchange control board. Is it possible to have an itemized statement, not giving the names of the people involved but in the form of case A, case B, case C, and so on? May we have such a statement so that we may see just what the situation is?

Mr. Abbott: I gave a fairly well itemized statement, but I will see if I can give a little more. Let us take 1948, the most recent figures. There were 105 attempts by resident travelers to export currency without the necessary permit. There were twenty cases of residents obtaining United States funds in excess of the annual travel allotment by making false declarations to authorized dealers. Thirty-nine residents failed to sell United States dollars to authorized dealers, or illegally disposed of United States dollars.

There were twenty cases of non-residents importing unofficial Canadian funds, mainly in the form of drafts, acquiring United States funds in Canada, or illegally attempting to export Canadian currency. There, as I pointed out to the hon. member for Lake Centre, the fines were the highest in the whole group.

As to other illegal dealings in foreign exchange, there were ten cases, and there is a classification of miscellaneous, whatever that may mean, with twenty-two cases, making a total of 216. These were formal prosecutions before the exchequer court. I have not the breakdown here of the seizures of currency in amounts of $100 and over, but of course in the great majority of these cases people were attempting to cross the border with amounts of currency in excess of the legal limits provided under the regulations.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the comments that have been made as to the section that is now before the house indicate the necessity of recognizing exactly what the effect of the section is. On second reading the principle involved was simply whether or not foreign exchange control should be extended. That has been discussed; and naturally it is a subject which would embrace a very wide field.

The device that is being used to extend the life of this act is to carry forward an act of seventy-three sections by the adoption of a single section. It would be utterly impossible to discuss effectively at any point in the proceedings the consequences of this act, unless it were done in committee, because this section carries forward in detail the whole seventy-three sections of the act.

There is one feature of this amending section which is of basic importance and which should be given consideration in the light of remarks that have already been made both in and out of the house. The amendment to section 73 of the act proposed by the bill now before the house extends the life of the act for two years. I submit that under no circumstances should this measure be carried forward beyond one year under the present bill amendment, because when parliament meets in 1950 it can then deal with the question whether the act should be extended for another year.

Mr. Nicholson: It might take us that long to get this through.

Mr. Drew: Under the system of government that we have adopted in Canada the basic principle that has been accepted for hundreds of years is that, in relation to financial matters, there shall be an annual review by parliament, and that the authorization shall only proceed for a period of a year subject to that review. It is questionable if there is sufficient recognition of the fundamental importance of the act which will be carried forward in toto by the amendment if it is adopted in its present form. No single act could possibly have a wider impact upon the future economic life of the country than one which can so definitely and powerfully influence the future trading relationships of Canada with all nations with which Canada deals.

To a greater extent than any other nation, with the possible exception of Switzerland, we in Canada are dependent upon the maintenance of a very large export business for continuing the standards of living which have been established in this country at a very high level. The Foreign Exchange Control Act, through its effect on exchange, which has such a bearing on trade in itself, and through its direct effect on trade under the import and export sections, can determine the whole level of trade carried on by this country in the years ahead. Therefore the act is one of immense importance to the future of Canada, and should be so regarded by those who are making a decision both as to its contents and its duration.

As the records show, an effort was made to limit the life of the act when it first came before the house. The efforts to impose such a limitation were defeated by the government and its supporters, but in the other place a limitation of three years was placed upon the life of the act. That at least was a limitation which has brought it back to the house for further consideration. In the ordinary course of events this act will not again be subject to review until after two years, no matter what disastrous consequences may ensue.

As the Minister of Finance has very properly pointed out, there is available information as to the details of the operation of the act, and the minister, under very heavy pressure in relation to other impending events, has unquestionably done everything possible to answer the detailed questions which have been put forward. But only information will be received; and while it is true that it is open to parliament at any session to repeal the act, the fact remains that under ordinary circumstances the act as it now stands would carry forward for two years, thus placing ordinary discussion of the operation of the act beyond the control of parliament for the whole of that period. That is undoubtedly something which should be regarded in the light not only of the general principle involved, but also of statements made by those who should be in a better position than anyone else in the house to know what the circumstances actually are or to advise hon. members.

As it stands at the moment, in view of the enormous and, may I add, humanitarian considerations which have guided the course of the United States in dealing with Marshall aid and the financial assistance of European and other countries, undoubtedly those charged with the responsibility of administration of those funds have more expert knowledge available to them than anyone else who could discuss the subject. For that reason it is of importance in considering this matter to recognize what has been said by Mr. Hoffman, administrator of the ECA, and the man charged with the major responsibility of allocating Marshall plan payments. Mr. Hoffman has said unqualifiedly that there must be stabilization of currency in 1949. If that is the view of Mr. Hoffman, the man more responsible than anyone else, outside the government of the United States, for what will be done either through the international monetary fund or through any other agency of the United States government or of the United Nations, it seems to me the parliament of Canada should not be prepared to extend the life of this foreign exchange control bill, which is also a control over export and import, beyond the period of one year. It is within the power of the government to deal with that matter by indicating its willingness to limit the life of this measure to one year, but that must be done while we are in committee if it is to be done at all, unless the bill is referred back from third reading for further consideration by this committee. I would strongly urge the Minister of Finance to recognize the basic principle involved in the continuation of this bill of seventy-three sections, and also to observe the explicit statement by Mr. Hoffman that there must be currency stabilization in 1949.

When it comes to the question of dealing with our own exchange rate, a great deal has been said about the use of the word "realistic" in relation to the actual value of Canadian money. So far as that is concerned, the word "realistic" has been widely used by the official advisers to this government; and one statement that has been made, which it seems to me should commend itself to hon. members of this house, is that fixed exchange rates have lost touch with economic realities. We are not the inventors of the word "realistic" or the words "economic realities." Obviously the officials who are dealing with the approval of any particular application for a large transaction at a definite level of exchange other than one hundred cents Canadian funds for one hundred cents United States funds, in their minds must be dealing with the word "realistic" and, if there is in fact responsibility on the part of those officials, they must be dealing with realities in deciding whether or not they will approve an application that has been made at a level other than parity.

Mr. Blackmore: In the course of his remarks will the hon. member tell us what he gathers to be the meaning of the word "realistic" as these experts are using it?

Mr. Drew: I must confess that I am unable to improve upon either the Oxford or the Webster dictionary, and I am prepared to accept their definition of the meaning of the words "realistic" and "realities." I am saying in all seriousness that I do not know anywhere else to go for a definition of those terms. In any comments I make, the meaning of "realistic" or "realities" is the accepted dictionary meaning of those words.

Mr. Blackmore: After all, you have not only the dictionary or theoretical meaning; there must be a definition of realism in terms of goods and services as an actual fact.

Mr. Drew: I attribute complete sincerity to the thoughts behind the actions of the hon. member, but I know that in his consideration of economic realities he has a different view than that which some of us hold; and I confess that my view of the word "realities" in relation to finance does not entirely conform to his. For that reason I do not propose to answer questions which could only have as their purpose the eliciting of an answer which would indicate a difference in our points of view in regard to the broad principles of economy which can be described by "realistic."

I have mentioned the expression used by Mr. Hoffman in the consideration of this subject. I should like also to point out that Mr. Snyder, United States secretary of the treasury, has said emphatically that currency devaluation must be considered as a means of meeting the problems with which we are all now confronted. After all, at a time when we are admittedly relating our own money value so directly to that of the United States, we can hardly ignore the views expressed on the one hand by the United States secretary of the treasury and on the other hand by the man charged with the responsibility of considering the effect of exchange on the moneys advanced in enormous amounts by the government of the United States, either under the Marshall plan or by other devices which would come within the purview of ECA.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member desire to proceed further, or could we have this section approved?

Mr. Abbott: Unless we can conclude within a few minutes I shall have to ask that the committee rise, since I am unable to be here this afternoon.

Mr. Drew: I shall be glad to meet the wish of hon. members. I would certainly conclude these remarks in not more than ten minutes.

Mr. Abbott: It would be a great accommodation to me personally if within ten or fifteen minutes we could complete the committee stage of this measure, though I do not want to press that.

Mr. Knowles: Are there any other speakers in addition to the leader of the opposition?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Then it is agreed that the committee continue to sit for ten minutes.

Mr. Drew: I want to quote also what has been said by one of the leading advisers of the government in regard to this whole subject. I refer to Mr. Louis Rasminsky, who on December 1 last, in a fairly long review of the general effect of foreign exchange control, had this to say:

> And in the meantime, the restrictions and discriminations involved could impose severe burdens on Canada which continues to rely to a considerable extent on having a surplus of exports to the United Kingdom and western Europe and using the proceeds of that surplus to pay for a surplus of imports from the United States.

Mr. Howe: That has all been read to us by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Not that part.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario also indicated to this house some of the things that had been said by Mr. Rasminsky, but I believe a check of the record will indicate that this is not one of the subjects mentioned, and this statement happens to have a direct bearing on what I am now saying.

I suggest further that the Minister of Finance should have regard to the warnings that have come from other hon. members about what is going to happen unless a realistic approach is made to the solution of this whole exchange question, which really got into its present difficulty by the ending of the interchangeability clause as between sterling and dollars in the Bretton Woods agreement. Sir Stafford Cripps in an interview with the Canadian Press in February, said that what had been done so far to reduce imports into the United Kingdom from Canada was insufficient, and that the government of the United Kingdom might be obliged gradually to limit its imports of bacon, cheese and eggs. Since he made that statement to the Canadian Press, he has even more emphatically pointed out that unless Canada is able to buy much larger quantities of goods from Britain than are now being bought, it will be impossible for Britain to continue to buy those things upon which the continuing stability of a substantial part of our domestic economy must depend in the years ahead.

The Minister of Agriculture—and in this case I agree that this has already been referred to—has dealt with this subject; he said as reported in Hansard of March 18 at page 1641:

> I am inclined to agree with some of the statements that have been made from the other side of the house to the effect that something ought to be done about the convertibility of exchange between all countries who are trying to co-operate in doing the same thing in the world. I am inclined to agree with that; but in spite of the fact that some people have credited me with stating the position very forcefully over in London, I still say that the best way to get a final result is to listen to what the other people have to say, to put forward our own views from time to time with regard to the matter and, since we are all friends, to co-operate with them in trying to get the results as quickly as possible not only in our own country but in all countries.

What the Minister of Agriculture has said is exactly what has been put forward by the members of the Progressive Conservative party. In the amendment which was ruled out of order—I am not discussing the amendment beyond referring to it—it was clearly indicated that in our view it is necessary to carry forward, for a period of not more than a year, the operation of some measure of exchange control, so that this can be related to an orderly readjustment of the situation. But the position taken, either directly or by implication, is that this government must sit back and wait for others to do that job. Since Canada has very properly asserted its increasing importance in the world, there is no reason why Canada should wait for any other country, and there is a special reason why Canada should be the first nation to insist upon a realistic review of the whole situation and attempt, with the assistance of the best brains available in the western world, to find some way of restoring the convertibility factor between the pound and the dollar.

The situation as between Great Britain and Canada is no different today from what it was in the past. In fact, the unbalance between exports and imports is not as great as it has been on many occasions in the past. At a time when the pound and the dollar were convertible at a realistic rate of exchange, Britain was anxious to sell to Canada, and was not unduly concerned about the unbalance between exports and imports, because in the broad movement of exchange it built up credits elsewhere with which it was able to balance its adjustments.

Mr. Abbott: Britain then had not lost her investments.

Mr. Drew: That was the traditional, the historic and the sound method of international exchange which made Britain one of the great trading countries of the world, and which has made Canada one of the great trading countries of the world as well. We are simply accepting a defeatist point of view if Canada does not say officially to those who administer the international monetary fund and to the governments which are members of that fund: We want an immediate review of the whole situation. It certainly is open to Canada to invite the other nations to meet and discuss this subject at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Williams: Time.

Mr. Drew: Canada is the nation most affected by the ability to continue its exports to the sterling area.

Mr. Williams: It is ten minutes past one. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drew: Canada is infinitely more affected than is the government of the United States in relation to its total export situation.

Mr. Williams: Time.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Williams: It is ten minutes past one. The leader of the opposition promised to finish in ten minutes, and he is still going.

Mr. Drew: I have no intention, Mr. Chairman, of extending this discussion beyond what the committee desires. It was exactly three minutes after one when I said I would be finished in ten minutes, and I believe that I shall be.

Mr. Abbott: Go ahead.

Mr. Williams: Go on. Give him another ten.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: Since the Minister of Finance has questioned the use of the term "realistic" and "economic realities" in relation to question of exchange rates, I should like to refer to the report of the international monetary fund published on April 30, 1948, in which, at page 21, those who prepared this report on behalf of the international monetary fund made the bald statement to which I have already referred:

> . . . stability exchange rates which have lost touch with economic realities.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that relatively Canada is more concerned in this matter than any other country now operating under the international monetary fund. Unless a solution of this problem of interchangeability is found, this country may well be heading for disaster.

The Minister of Agriculture has indicated quite clearly the dangers to the export of our commodities under the rigidity which now exists. Sir Stafford Cripps has given us an ominous warning of what may happen if we do not find some way of restoring interchangeability. Mr. Hoffman has made it clear that the solution must be found this year. Therefore I urge the government without delay to press for an immediate meeting of the governments and their experts to explore the possibility of restoring interchangeability of these funds and of laying the foundation for the kind of trade that this country through a realistic exchange really can have for its people to meet the demands of a hungry world.

In accordance with our general practice, this act should be limited to one year. Mr. Hoffman has said that the solution must be found this year. For these reasons, among others, we shall vote against the bill. No matter how determined the government may be to carry this measure forward in its present form, I urge that this extension be limited to a period of one year, so that there may be some compulsion and within the year a solution may be found which will open the channels of trade for Canada to the whole world.

Bill reported.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: Next sitting.

At one-fifteen o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Monday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 86, to amend the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with the bill I should like to give a ruling on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling may I point out that the amendment has not been read, and no objection has been taken to it. If you are proposing to give a ruling with regard to the amendment I would ask that an opportunity be given to hon. members to argue the point.

For my part I wish to submit to you that the amendment is clearly in order. May I suggest that before you give a ruling the amendment be read?

Mr. Speaker: It is my intention to read the amendment before giving my ruling upon it. It is moved by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

> That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce with instructions that they have power to recommend a specific measure relating to rent control, and other specific measures relating respectively to other matters provided for in the said bill.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, it is my submission that the amendment is clearly in order. It complies with the requirements of citation 657 in Beauchesne's third edition, which is the same as citation 755 in Beauchesne's second edition at page 217, which reads as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

The effect of the amendment is that the bill should not now be read the second time, but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to one of the standing committees of the house, with instructions that the committee shall have power to bring in a specific measure with reference to rent control and specific measures with regard to each of the other subject matters touched upon by the bill in question. I submit that—

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: This clearly—

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lesage: I submit that the hon. member for Eglinton is out of order. He is speaking for a second time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member raises a point of order.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Well, the hon. member for Eglinton is already speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Lesage: Who raised the point of order?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker did.

Mr. Lesage: No; no point of order was raised.

Mr. Speaker: I thought the hon. member was speaking to a point of order. As no point of order was raised by the hon. member—

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps the house may have misunderstood you, but you intimated you were about to make a ruling on my amendment.

Mr. Lesage: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: And I asked that before any ruling was given the house be given an opportunity of discussing whether the amendment is or is not in order—which, I take it, is to be the subject matter of your ruling. Therefore I was proceeding, as one member of the house, to make some submissions to Mr. Speaker on the question whether the amendment is or is not in order. I have given you the reference.

Mr. Lesage: Speaking to my point of order, the hon. member for Eglinton is now speaking a second time on second reading. No point of order has been raised by anyone, and on the motion for second reading he cannot speak twice. No one has raised a point of order.

An hon. Member: He raised it himself.

Mr. Lesage: No, he cannot raise a point of order against his own amendment.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize there is no point of order before the house, so that no member could discuss a point of order. I have given the hon. member who moved the amendment an opportunity to call my attention to the citation in Beauchesne's third edition, and I would ask him not to make a speech.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then I shall rise to a point of order; and my point of order is that this is not in order. Now he can speak.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mutch: Speaking to the point of order raised by the hon. member—

Mr. Fleming: I thought I was discussing it.

An hon. Member: Make up your minds.

Mr. Fleming: I have made my submission that the amendment is within the terms of citation 657, which I have read, because it proposes to refer the bill to a committee. I would also point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is the precise procedure followed on at least one previous occasion in the lifetime of this parliament under circumstances identical with those now before the house.

I would refer you to a ruling which you made on May 14, 1946—or at least to the procedure which you accepted at that time as being entirely in order. On that date second reading was moved by the Minister of Labour to a bill entitled an act to amend the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act. The reference is to be found in the Journals of the house for 1946, page 214.

An amendment was moved by Mr. Mackenzie that the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the select committee on veterans affairs, with instructions that they consider same and report thereon to the house. That question was put and carried. That is the procedure followed. The present amendment follows precisely the terms of that amendment, and the case is on all fours with that of May 14, 1946, to which I have referred.

Mr. Speaker: The amendment of the hon. member for Eglinton is:

That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce with instructions that they have power to recommend a specific measure relating to rent control, and other specific measures relating respectively—

And I insist on these last words—

—relating respectively to other matters provided for in the said bill.

The amendment is totally different from the one just mentioned by the hon. member. There can be no question that, on the second reading of a bill, an amendment may be made to the end that the second reading do not take place but that the subject matter thereof be referred to one of the standing committees which may be given certain instructions. But the house cannot, under the guise of referring the subject matter, refer also certain provisions of the bill itself. The amendment asks that the committee recommend other specific measures relating respectively to other matters provided for in the said bill.

It seems to me that that is going beyond a reference of the subject matter. It is an instruction to consider certain provisions of the bill which could be done more easily if the bill were simply read the second time and referred to a committee in due course. The house cannot both refuse to give second reading and refer some provisions of the bill to a committee. It will have to make its choice. The amendment is therefore out of order.

I may add that the adoption of the amendment would cause the bill to disappear from the order paper. It would be killed without any hope of revival during the present session.

Mr. Drew: I challenge your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and call for a vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the Speaker's ruling be sustained? Those in favour will please say "Yea."

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say "Nay."

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the "yeas" have it.

And some members having risen:

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from the ruling given by the Speaker on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). The amendment contains these words:

That they—

The committee.

—recommend other specific measures relating respectively to other matters provided for in the said bill.

It seems to me this is going beyond a reference of the subject matter. It is an instruction to consider certain provisions of the bill, which could be done more easily if the bill were simply read the second time and referred to a committee in due course. The house cannot both refuse to give second reading and refer some provisions of the bill to a committee. It will have to make its choice. The amendment is therefore out of order.

I may add that the adoption of the amendment would cause the bill to disappear from the order paper. It would be killed without any hope of revival during the present session.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Some hon. Members: A waste of time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. Drew: In dealing with the effect of the adoption of this bill at this time, I do not believe it would be possible to put the situation which results from a decision to adopt an omnibus measure of this nature into more accurate terms than can be found in the words of the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he spoke in this house on April 1, 1932, when the government of that day sought certain powers under the general reference to peace, order and good government, the reference under which the present steps must be taken if they are to be taken at all. The words I now read are taken from his speech on that occasion, with certain omissions from the total of the speech:

> Peace, order and good government include virtually everything. . . . That no doubt is the kind of thing the Prime Minister would like to bring about; to establish himself as a dictator, as a second Cromwell in his day, but I say that, before we return to the days of the revolution, we shall do our utmost to prevent a reversion to any condition such as that.

Let me ask my hon. friend . . . how would he feel if a socialist government were in office at the present time and, under the rights claimed by the ministry of which he is a member, attempted to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government, and to deal with the very subjects with which he and his colleagues have dealt? How would he feel if they passed an order in council to amend the Bank Act without any reference to parliament? How would he feel if they said that, by virtue of a situation which had arisen, the banks of the country should no longer be permitted to carry on their business under the provisions of the act which parliament had enacted; that it was necessary to amend that act, and then proceeded, by order in council, to amend the Bank Act? . . .

Let us consider the question of the insurance companies. How would my hon. friend view the action of a socialist ministry which said: We do not care what the law is with respect to insurance companies, we are going to pass by order in council the legislation which we think is necessary in this time of crisis to make these insurance companies do whatever we believe to be in the interests of the country. . . .

That is the position in which we are at the present time. May I go a step further? . . . How would my Conservative friends feel if a socialist government in office, using the precedent of the action taken by the present ministry under authority to legislate on peace, order and good government, started forthwith to have the printing presses of this country manufacture whatever money they wished and to distribute that money broadcast, giving as a reason that this was necessary in order to meet a situation which existed? . . .

I hear an hon. member opposite say that there will be no socialist government. May I say to him that this is the kind of thing that breeds socialist governments of the most extreme type. This is the sort of thing that would provide any government with the weapons it might need in order, if it so desired, to deal in a subversive manner with the constitution and other rights of the people. . . .

I am endeavouring to place before hon. gentlemen the position as it would present itself to them if a socialist government attempted to do what they themselves are doing. I do not believe that any government, socialist or otherwise, except this one would attempt to go the autocratic lengths that hon. gentlemen opposite have gone, but I do say that any government would find ample justification in the form of precedent for any extreme act, in the action of hon. gentlemen opposite in this particular measure which gives to the government of the day the authority which it does. That is the point I wish to make.

We all know very well that extreme action of the kind for which hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible does not come about in a day. Arbitrary authority helps to breed arbitrary authority. The enjoyment of a certain amount of absolute power creates an appetite for more in the way of absolute power, and finally absolutism knows no bounds. That is the point we have now reached so far as the Prime Minister and his colleagues are concerned.

Those words of the right hon. member for Glengarry are in every respect applicable to the measure now before this house, except for the fact that it confers infinitely wider powers than were ever dreamed of in the bill under discussion at the time these statements were made.

Mr. Irvine: What was the bill under discussion at that time?

Mr. Drew: We are now asked—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Irvine: What was the measure under discussion when the former Prime Minister made the speech just referred to?

Mr. Drew: It was the unemployment insurance act.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Wrong again.

Mr. McCann: The marketing act.

Mr. Drew: I was right, as might have been expected. It was the unemployment continuance act.

Mr. Martin: The unemployment relief act, was it not?

Mr. Drew: The formal title is the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932.

Those words of the right hon. member for Glengarry were directed to a very limited field of the exercise of the emergency powers. They were limited to a specific measure. Before us now we have an omnibus measure which is the continuance of the application of extended powers; and the fact that these have been reduced to twelve in number in no way changes the principle which is inherent in the contention that this house should pass this omnibus measure covering all these wartime orders in council.

We are not asked as a House of Commons to consider a rent control bill. We are not asked to consider a price control bill. The only bill that the members of this house are asked to consider is a bill which gives to this government all the loose and undefined powers of a dictatorship over the whole timber industry, the whole steel industry, over all industrial and other building priorities, and several other extremely important activities of our people, as well as unsatisfactory and undefined authority over rent and prices. Whether they are tenants or not, Canadians generally know that the present rent control by government dictate, and not by law, has proved unsatisfactory in many important respects, quite apart from the dangerous principle involved in these arbitrary powers, which include the whole field under the declaration of a general emergency.

In many ways this rent control measure by government dictate is adding to the difficulties and preventing the building of satisfactory rental housing. We have urged over and over again that a rent control bill be introduced which will give tenants defined and assured legal rights and at the same time encourage the building of housing and apartments for rental purposes. That is the parliamentary way to deal with this subject. It is the parliamentary way to deal with price control. It is the parliamentary way to deal with any other matter covered by this omnibus bill perpetuating wartime emergency orders in council which give to bureaucrats who are not answerable to parliament, and some who are, dictatorial powers over a large segment of our domestic economy.

When it is suggested that it is necessary to follow this arbitrary procedure in order to continue these other measures, that contention is simply unadulterated nonsense. There is no reason why a bill cannot be brought in separately to deal with any of these subjects. The same justification which would give the power to deal with the broad field would more than give power to deal with the specific field where an emergency is shown in that respect. This measure simply puts before us the continuance of powers that were put into effect in wartime, when everybody was under the pressure of war itself. Today there is no excuse for continuing measures of that kind. At the time that these arbitrary measures were first adopted, many unselfish citizens of this country were, at considerable sacrifice of their personal time, acting in the role of controllers or supervisors of some of these arbitrary measures. Those men are no longer available. Now the people who are directing these affairs are mostly civil servants—excellent civil servants—who should have the protection of dealing with the problems placed before them under clearly defined laws, not dictates of this government.

I did not of course hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) last night. I must say that that was a saving of time. But nevertheless I do know something of what he said. When the Minister of Justice demonstrates the profound depths of his historic knowledge by referring to me as the Bay street Hampden, thus emulating his leader in the house, I do hope that he will not get into difficulties with his sponsors, the Siftons. I hope he will remember that those legatees of the great political beneficence of an earlier Liberal government have established the head office of the corporation which handles their great inherited wealth on the same Bay street in Toronto to which the Minister of Justice refers with such scorn. The Siftons might not like his attitude toward the street from which they have chosen to direct their great interests in western Canada.

When the Minister of Justice seeks to defend in this manner the conduct of a government so rapidly approaching parliamentary and physical dissolution, the description which fits him most perfectly is to be found in the familiar words, slightly modified:

> The boy stood on the burning deck,
> Whence all with sense had fled.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member is reading too quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): What is the leader of the opposition quoting from?

An hon. Member: He would not know if he told you.

Mr. Drew: The principle at issue on second reading is whether or not there is a general emergency in this country which would justify the extension of wartime emergency powers covering a considerable part of the daily lives of our people under the provision in our constitution which permits parliament to invade the field of provincial jurisdiction only in the event of a great national emergency.

Mr. Brunelle: Find something new.

Mr. Drew: Let no hon. member of this house be under any illusions as to what a vote in favour of this omnibus measure means. A vote in favour of this omnibus measure is a declaration by each member voting in support of it that he believes that now, four years after the war is over, there is a general emergency under which this government can step into any field of provincial jurisdiction given to the provinces by the constitution. When hon. members vote to declare that they hold such an opinion, they are not only voting for broad dictatorial powers—

An hon. Member: We are not voting.

Mr. Drew: No, they are just following the direction of the government. When they are called upon by the government to vote in support of a dictatorial measure of this kind, they are not merely asked to place on record a vote which declares the existence of a general emergency, but they are making a declaration which would empower a government, which already is centralizing in every way it can, to centralize full authority—if in fact that declaration by the members of this house could hold water. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on second reading of this bill, the issue is whether war emergency powers continue, and whether a general emergency exists, which gives to our constitution at the present time no continuing sanctity except the whims of this dictatorial government.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Graydon: Call the yeas and nays.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And some members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Garson) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Cardiff: I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Transitional Measures Act

On section 1—Duration of act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there are certain matters that can be better discussed in committee than on second reading. I should like to deal with a number of these matters which were referred to last evening by the Minister of Justice. However, at the beginning I wish to reiterate the stand taken by this party, a stand which was made most clear in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton, which had just been ruled out of order. While respecting the ruling of the chair, in order to keep the record clear I should like to refer to the wording of that amendment. It reads:

> That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I never saw so many Speakers in the house before. Hon. members apparently do not believe that the person occupying the chair can make rulings without their assistance. The amendment continued:

> —with instructions that they have power to recommend a specific measure relating to rent control, and other specific measures relating respectively to other matters provided for in the said bill.

The amendment sets forth the stand taken by the opposition. We believe in the necessity for certain controls while at the same time accepting the necessity for decontrol as referred to by the Minister of Justice. We on this side of the house asked that the bill be referred to a committee so that evidence could be heard. It would be interesting to hear the evidence of some of these individuals occupying bureaucratic positions were they required to come before a committee and outline their ideas, which apparently have actuated the government all through the piece. We say that we require evidence on this matter.

That there was doubt in the minds of the cabinet on this legislation is perfectly clear from what the chairman of the transitional powers committee of the cabinet said on November 24 last. He, the Solicitor General, at a press conference, said among other things:

> Possibly the last use of procedure by order in council under Canada's emergency transitional powers act has been made by the federal cabinet.

Apparently that was before the Minister of Justice achieved his portfolio. At that time the Solicitor General was speaking for the Department of Justice. The report continued:

> Mr. Jean said he is due to present in Ottawa tomorrow his final report as head of a committee on application of the emergency powers.

[Mr. Cardiff.]

The report having been referred to at a press conference, I think parliament should be let in on it. The Minister of Justice should present to parliament the report to which the Solicitor General made reference. The Solicitor General went on to say that he hoped there would be no further necessity for cabinet orders under the legislation designed to ease the country from war to a peacetime administrative footing. The minister should explain when the transition —not under the transitional powers act— took place in the minds of the cabinet. At what time since November 24 did the cabinet decide not to follow the recommendations of the chairman of the committee set up by the cabinet to consider this matter? That is an interesting document that should be before parliament when it is arriving at a conclusion respecting the existence of a general emergency.

The minister said last evening, as reported on page 1729 of Hansard:

> Our powers are very narrowly limited and any suggestion about widespread totalitarian dictatorial powers which flout parliament is just so much nonsense.

He asked whether anyone could produce proof to the contrary. A case that I produce is one decided in 1948 in the exchequer court, Belleau versus Minister of National Health and Welfare. I shall not go into the details, but here is what was said by one of the protectors of the rights of the people in this country, namely, a member of the judiciary. The minister, speaking partly I believe as a politician and not exclusively as the custodian of justice in this country, said that there were no serious encroachments on personal rights, but this is what the judge said:

> The court has no power under the law to prevent a minister from transgressing his administrative function and entering into the judicial field.

Mark these words.

> There are, in my judgment, far too many encroachments by ministers, deputy ministers and functionaries in the judicial as well as in the legislative field;

Last night the minister said that there was no such danger as the leader of the opposition feared from this legislation, namely, the incipient beginning of a dictatorship, but a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, referring to ministers, deputy ministers and such functionaries, said this in his judgment:

> —if they are not curtailed the country may in a not too remote future be ruled by a dictatorial government.

I ask the Minister of Justice whether the opinion of a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada has not a meaning which the words of a minister would not have. The judge decided that the minister had done wrong and was unjustified in what he had done, in that he had entrusted his administration with wide and exorbitant powers, and concluded his judgment:

I have no other alternative but to accept reluctantly I must say the doctrine expounded on behalf of respondents.

In other words, however dictatorial and unjust an order made by a minister under legislation alike and akin to this legislation, or by a deputy minister or a functionary, the decision would be above the courts and could not be interfered with in any way.

Mr. Garson: What is the citation of that case?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is 1948, Canada Law Reports, page 288, and I read from page 321.

Mr. Rinfret: Who was the judge?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Justice Angers. The government say that there is no danger in such legislation. I now quote from the Fortnightly Law Journal an article which appeared in November, 1945, when this legislation was first introduced. I shall read from the issue of November 1, 1945, in which the following appears:

It seems to us that the dominion in its anxiety to prolong the bureaucracy that has got completely out of hand under the War Measures Act, falls between the two stools of the War Measures Act and bill 15. But really bill 15 lets the cat out of the bag.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Lesage: Any member has a right to rise on a point of order, even against the member for Lake Centre. I am not going to be afraid of him. He can scare children, but he will not scare the members on this side of the house.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member for Lake Centre is in order. May I read from Beauchesne a part of standing order 58:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I submit that the hon. member for Lake Centre has been out of order since the beginning of his remarks, and especially in his last quotation when he referred to Bill 15 which was under consideration about three years ago, but which was never adopted.

Mr. Graydon: He is too relevant for you; that is the trouble.

An hon. Member: You are not enough for him.

The Chairman: The clause under consideration at the present time is clause 1 of Bill 86, and it refers to the duration of the act. I understood the hon. member for Lake Centre was giving reasons why the act should not be extended. Just how far I should allow him, or any other hon. member, to proceed in their remarks is difficult for me to say. The last words of the hon. member for Lake Centre as to a certain bill may not have been in order. I was not following him very closely. I think all I can do at this time is to ask all hon. members to respect standing order 58, to which the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet referred, and to make their remarks strictly relevant to the clause under consideration, which at this point is the duration of the act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I can understand the hon. member rising on a point of order because after all sometimes the truth hurts, and naturally arouses those who must, because they are members of the legal profession, feel some pricking of conscience in participating in bringing into effect certain of these powers which are above the courts, and which they as officers of the courts cannot uphold except in a political way.

An hon. Member: That will hold them for a while.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If we have more order and less disorder from over there, things will be much better.

The Chairman: I hope that the hon. member for Lake Centre will now discuss clause 1.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was coming to the abuse of powers under this measure, a matter which I think is particularly relevant at the moment. Referring again to what my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, said last evening, he went on to point out that there was no danger in this legislation, that after all it was apparently being administered with proper safeguards. I do not know where to begin in the quoting of editorials referring to powers such as are asked for under this legislation for the period of one more year. I am sure if I quoted the Globe and Mail it would meet with immediate support from the other side, but I am not going to do that. I am going to quote from the Winnipeg Free Press, which the minister must accept as an authority, and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, which has never been noted for its support of the opposition. As far as the Winnipeg Free Press is concerned, it has this to say:

It is easy to say that Canadian liberty is perfectly safe in the hands of the present government. The record shows it is not safe in the hands of the present government.

Yet we are asked to place these powers, and I refer to those with the exception of the matter of rent control and any other controls that may be necessary, in the hands of a government that has shown a psychopathic contempt for parliament, and has placed itself above the law in orders in council passed under the powers conferred by this act. I want to quote also what the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix had to say only a few days ago about the responsibilities of the present Liberal administration. The date is February 22. It reads:

> It is unhappily true that the present Liberal administration, while it has devised and executed broad fiscal, trading and security policies . . . has failed miserably these past few years in keeping clean and free those points where policies impinge on the individual citizen, and on his rights and responsibilities as a citizen. So as Liberals meet to choose their candidates let them make their voices heard.

I point out that this quotation is not from a Progressive Conservative paper, but from a paper which at all times has given real support to the government of my hon. friend in the province of Manitoba, while he was premier and before.

> Let them—

That is the Liberals.

> —not deny that they resent and denounce government by order in council;

I repeat that those are not my words.

> that they condemn the delegation—

The Chairman: Order. Is the hon. member now discussing clause 1?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Chairman. These are some of the results that will flow from the continuation of these twelve powers for a period of one more year under section 7 of the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act.

The Chairman: I think probably there is relevancy, but I would remind the hon. member that under standing order 58 the wording is, "strictly relevant." I know that it is a difficult question to decide. I can only ask hon. members to do their best to abide by the rules.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I am trying just that very thing.

Mr. Martin: Let us try a little better.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have been most restrained in my language. Instead of making statements myself I am adopting the words of organs that in the past have given the strongest support to the government, and I have been pointing out what will follow from legislation such as this. Last evening my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, in the absence of the leader of the opposition made a very strong attack on him. The essence of that attack was that freedom was safe in the hands of the government under this legislation by delegation whereas the experience of the last three years has shown that whenever the opportunity has arisen for this government to evade the responsibility of parliament it has done so under this legislation. I ask the right to read what is said in this newspaper editorial in regard to the exercise of these powers, because it represents exactly the criticism of the leader of the opposition as well as the criticism offered by the right hon. member for Glengarry on April 1, 1932, which was just quoted by the leader of the opposition. This editorial points out:

> Let them not deny that they resent and denounce government by order in council; that they condemn the delegation of cabinet power and responsibility to boards, commissions and crown corporations elevated to a world where parliamentary interference is resented and beyond the control of our tested political system.

Can anything be stronger than that—that this government, under legislation such as this, has elevated bureaucrats in this country to a position where they have power to push individual Canadians about, without permitting those Canadians recourse to the courts? And they are asking for this power for one more year, though in November last the Solicitor General said in effect: "We are at the end of the road, as far as I can see, in connection with this legislation." Then the editorial goes on:

> Let them as Liberals make it clear that they will no longer passively accept the interpretation of our laws by non-responsible officials and the progressive weakening of our judicial system to which alone we can safely entrust this function of government...
> Let them reject and outlaw the political considerations which have led to state appointments which will scarcely enrich our public institutions. Let them refuse to accept or countenance interference in their deliberations by those of their leaders who are infected with the disease of machinism.

I shall let hon. gentlemen on the front benches determine which of the leaders are infected with the disease of machinism. We of the opposition have consistently followed the course—and I have the quotations over the years—that where there is necessity for individual controls because of scarcity or by reason of economic conditions, we accept them. But we demand that the government, while holding out as bait the bringing into effect of necessary controls, shall not at the same time bring in controls that are not necessary, in order to perpetuate and preserve the bureaucracy that has been rampant in this country during the last two or three years. That is the stand taken by the opposition. I could give quotation after quotation from Liberal newspapers in this country calling upon parliament to cease its passivity, and calling upon members supporting the government to forget that one of the major offences they can commit is to stand against a decision of the government front benches; asking them to stand up in this house, as members representative of the people, against an oppression that is arising by reason of bureaucratic control above and beyond the reach of the courts.

You asked me, Mr. Chairman, not to refer to the 1945 act. I shall not do so, except to say that this is a continuation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: I understand the 1947 act is under consideration at the present time. May I suggest that before we went into committee the house accepted the principle of an extension of this act, and I do not think any reconsideration of that principle is now in order. The only discussion that is in order at the present time is as to whether or not the act should be extended to 1950. Any representations either in favour of extending it to 1950 or against extending it for the full year are in order, or any question about changing the date; but a general discussion of the principle of extension which was approved on second reading would not be in order at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to know what it would be possible to discuss on an occasion like this, if it were not the degree to which the powers that are being granted will be utilized in the period between now and March 31, 1950. I realize your fairness at all times, Mr. Chairman, and I do not want to do anything that would constitute even the slightest departure from your ruling, so I shall not press the point further. I realize that this is one subject my hon. friends opposite do not want discussed.

Mr. Howe: Don't take yourself too seriously.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As far as my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is concerned the abuse of power is one subject which always arouses him. He is a Chesterfield of parliamentary manners until there is any reference to the way in which he and those associated with him have flouted parliament. Then he immediately becomes aroused and resorts to his usual attitude, which he is now displaying. I expect a higher degree of intelligence from my right hon. friend than he displayed in the interjection he just made. I can understand his attitude, however, for he is the man who was responsible for the order in council which denied to parliament—

Mr. Garson: I raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Surely this is not in order.

Mr. Howe: I suggest that the hon. gentleman be allowed to proceed, for I should like to reply to him with the same latitude.

The Chairman: The right hon. minister made his point, and I have allowed the hon. member for Lake Centre to reply, so I believe he should return to the bill.

An hon. Member: Another waste of time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend has some remark to make?

An hon. Member: Get back to the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let me tell my hon. friend that ignorance, even though energetic, is still ignorance.

An hon. Member: A waste of time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is difficult to continue against all this noise, Mr. Chairman. The area in the back is now engaged in general disorder. However, I want to ascertain from the minister the degree to which, when these powers are granted, the individual who is affected will have the right of recourse to the courts against injustice and unfairness. I think it only fair that there be an assurance in that direction. The principle has been decided by the house already, that there is to be an extension of powers for a further year; and as custodian of the rights of the people in this country I think the Minister of Justice should give the assurance now and place the necessary amendment in this legislation so that no longer will orders in council be passed by the Star Chamber method and kept in secret for several months, to be produced ultimately only when some hon. member discovers their existence. Will he make provision in the act whereby any person wrongly interfered with or unjustly treated or in any way discriminated against in his own class to his own detriment will have the right of recourse to the courts? We have a right to ask that if extraordinary powers are to be granted they shall be so circumscribed that no man in this country will be denied his right of appeal to the courts against injustice caused to him as the result of a misapplication, if you will, of the powers granted under this act.

Mr. Church: I want to point out to the attorney general one feature of this particular bill. Since confederation it has always been the rule, by maxim and tradition, that the hon. gentleman who is Attorney General of Canada must not give to the house legal opinions. The hon. gentleman has been violating that rule every day of the week. I happened to have a pair in the first vote today. I was unfortunately not here at the time Bill 86 was called, but I was called in. Legal opinions have been given across this chamber every five minutes, and it is a breach of the statute law. The hon. gentleman may be brought into litigation between the attorney general of the dominion and the attorneys general of the provinces with regard to what is a general emergency under Bill 86 and what is not. A general emergency takes precedence over everything from coast to coast in Canada, provided that it is of general application and within the terms of section 91, which makes the dominion, in case of war and general emergency, supreme over section 92 and over everything we have in this country.

I wish to point out only four or five things in conclusion. I hope we shall not have any more violations of that kind by the present attorney general. I happened to point out this rule to his predecessor, who is now the Prime Minister of Canada, during the first three or four days he was in the house. At that time a bill was under consideration as a result of which litigation might arise between the Attorney General of Canada and the attorneys general of three or four of the provinces. It was pointed out that, by a decision of the privy council, this was a rule of law in England. While the names of their ministers over there are a little bit different, the principle is the same; the attorney general must not give legal opinions in the house, even if he is asked to do so.

The other question to which I wish to refer is one that I probably should have raised on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton. I shall not go far with it today. In three or four minutes I shall conclude my remarks. At the Canadian National Exhibition grounds in Toronto on May 20 there is to be an exhibition by the Home Builders Association with regard to prefabricated housing, and I hope all hon. members will find it possible to see it. I remember mentioning this matter of housing three or four years ago when Mr. Churchill, then Prime Minister of Great Britain, was getting lumber and many other things for that type of housing. I have here in my hand a pamphlet announcing the exhibition which is to be in the horticulture building. Houses that can be built for $1,200 are to be shown.

As I said before in connection with the building of civic car lines in our city, I remember when we had a similar situation in Toronto. The old street railway went only up to Bloor street, under the old street railway agreement. Between 1915 and 1921 a system of civic car lines was built—six tickets for ten cents—one on St. Clair running right out to the junction, one in North Toronto, in Eglinton riding, by the taking over of the metropolitan railway out there, one of these civic car lines on Gerrard street from Broadview to east end, and one on Danforth from Broadview to Main street. With these municipal civic car services, with six tickets for ten cents, the whole territory was opened up and the people built their own houses.

The last thing I wish to say is this. We have no steam suburban service, as they have in Montreal and every large American city. We must have one if we are ever going to solve the housing problem. Land could be bought by the acre in the country but as long as we have no steam suburban service we are not able to obtain it. Other large cities have such a service. I believe western Ontario is suffering badly, as is the Niagara district and the Toronto district especially, from choked railway facilities without a steam suburban service. In York, Peel and Ontario counties land is cheap but without municipal services, and in the city no lands are available for that type of housing at a cost that the workingman can pay.

As I said here the other night on, I believe, another section of this particular bill, it is time that we had some provision along those lines. Speaking as a private member of the house I went so far as to say that I believe the time has come when there should be some subsidy in connection with workingmen's houses. For the low-wage people there is a fund under the Workmen's Compensation Act to which the Minister of Labour makes considerable reference. This matter could be worked out under the Workmen's Compensation Act, plus a food subsidy along the same lines, through the Workmen's Compensation Act, to meet the needs of the low paid wage earners. I remember when Mr. Churchill, the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, made an address in which he was urging the building of 500,000 prefabricated houses. We need almost that many in Canada right now. With the cheap land which can be had out in the townships, and with a steam suburban service, a solution might be found. Take, for instance, Lorne Park. There is only one train a day out there. In East York there are no trains at all. The city gives services and we paid large sums of money to build roads, the York highways which I instituted in 1907, fifteen miles out.

There are various classes of housing that might be referred to today. I am afraid I come pretty close to the rule that it is not in order to discuss these matters under this bill. I might mention that there is housing for the Indians and the Eskimos. We had committees on these matters. In my constituency three or four hundred people are being housed in the old jail, which has accommodation for only 130. We managed that by building two jail farms, one for men and one for women, when I was in office, and the old Toronto jail was used only for remands. It is a question of the sick. No doubt the Ontario government needed those two farms for the mental hospitals. They are doing excellent work in that connection and have made a great deal of improvement. But the old Toronto jail should be used only for remands and the excess given new quarters.

There is the question of housing for the aged and infirm, and there are a great many other features of the housing problem which I shall be obliged to mention at another time. I call to your attention, however, the fact that what we need in the Toronto district is a steam suburban service. Every large city has such a service. Without it there can be no solution to the housing problem, because that problem is almost ninety per cent a transportation problem plus municipal services problem. If these cannot be given at a small cost—and I hope the Minister of Labour can work it out in some way—plus some allowance for food for the workingman's family and part for cheap housing, then I do not know where we are going to be in the Toronto district, where we need such a large number of houses for the working classes.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I do not suppose there is much possibility that all members of this house will agree on this bill anyway. That would be too much to expect. The Progressive Conservative party naturally takes the attitude that we have too many controls embodied in this bill. Of course our friends of the C.C.F. party suggest that there are not nearly enough controls.

Last night I was particularly interested to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw say that his party would not suggest that controls be continued for one moment beyond the time when prices were no longer rising. It seems to me that the attitude which they have taken recently shows their interest in retaining floor prices for most of the products which the farmers sell in Saskatchewan.

I would suggest to the minister that he might adopt the philosophy of the Chinese. It might be helpful if he allowed all of us to save face in a matter of this kind. I suggest that one control that he could well remove is that on timber. I am not sure that he is convinced himself that he really needs the power to control timber.

In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) the minister said that he was interested in retaining sufficient clears in Canada to take care of the situation. I know the minister will concede immediately that there are all kinds of lumber available in Canada for building houses. If it is merely a question of controlling clears to take care of our flooring needs, I wonder whether it would not be wiser to let the individual buyer decide for himself what price should be paid for clear flooring. He may decide that he would like to put down shiplap flooring or something of that quality, and then cover it with wall carpet. It seems to me that each of us should be able to make the decision for himself. The price could very well be determined between the buyer and the seller, and there would be no hardship because there is always an alternative.

The same thing applies to the use of clear lumber for doors and for window stock. After all, there is always an alternative available in the form of plywood, or it could even be metal. I ask the minister whether he would consider getting rid of timber control, because I am satisfied he has sufficient administrative duties without taking on this extra one.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to follow the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. As a matter of fact, he and I have talked about this on two or three different occasions. I have also had letters from quite a few lumber companies in Ontario, and I have talked to members here who are interested in lumbering or in the lumber industries in their ridings. I have also talked to men from the maritimes, Quebec and British Columbia. Since this bill controls the lumber industry from the tree to the root under the ground, and from the log to the finished product, there is no doubt in my mind that the government can do whatever they wish about it. They have the power.

At the present time I have a carryover of lumber in my own yard, and I know that every lumberman has lumber in his yard. Pine, according to grade, is down from $5 to $20 a thousand. Spruce is down on the average $10 a thousand. Hemlock is down on the average about $5 a thousand, and you cannot sell hardwood flooring stock at all. There is no market for it. I should like to prevail upon the minister to throw timber controls out the window, because there is no doubt that lumber for houses can be obtained, flooring, or anything else. I should be glad to have the business at twenty-five cents a thousand.

An hon. Member: Twenty-five cents a thousand.

Mr. Hodgson: Yes, commission for supplying the government with lumber, or anybody else who wants to use it. The orders would be so big that I would make a lot more money. There is a market for hardwood in the United States, but because of the quotas we cannot fill them. The government should talk with some of the lumber concerns, and the Canadian lumbermen's association, and do something immediately. Now is the opportune time to do it because there are large cuts this year and some carryover from last year. Unless something is done along that line within the next few weeks the lumber industry will be left in a precarious position.

In my own riding this year there happens to be a hydro line being built which is occupying the time of 237 men from my own township. I made it my business to find out about that. If these 237 men had not been working on that hydro line, which has been cut out and is now practically finished, I do not know what we would have done with the men in Haliburton because there just would not have been any work for them to do. We had a cut of lumber taken out this year at a high cost.

I think the minister will agree that when he took certain controls off lumber in the past, when he took price control off, the lumbermen's association held the price down so that there was no increase. At any rate, there was very little, if any, increase in the price of lumber. I think he will agree also that the lumbermen are fairly reasonable fellows to deal with. He would be on safe ground in taking off these quotas and letting us ship some of this hardwood flooring to the United States.

An hon. Member: The price has gone up.

Mr. Hodgson: The hon. member has not looked up the statistics. If he does that he will find that lumber has not increased in the last twelve months since controls were taken off. At the present time we do not need timber controls at all. I have stacks of letters and telegrams which I would like to show the minister if he wishes to see them. I should like him to consider this immediately.

Mr. Fair: There must be something radically wrong with the lumber and timber business, particularly when the hon. member who has just taken his seat has told us that he could not sell flooring any more. There is a good reason for that. The reason is that the price is entirely against better sales of flooring. In my home town last fall it cost only $315 a thousand for edge-grain flooring, and for oak flooring, mill run, only $350 a thousand, and half of it was not fit to put in a floor. Perhaps some of these things are responsible for the lumbermen not being able to sell their flooring. Other materials are in the same category.

Mr. Howe: I say at once that no one would like to get rid of timber control any more than I would. My difficulty is that when the trade as a whole are consulted their opinions are different from the individual opinions expressed in this house. I sent the co-ordinator of controls out to the Pacific coast a short time ago to discuss with the trade there whether we could not now drop timber controls. The reply was, "please, no". They gave as the reason that they were facing negotiation of new contracts with the United Kingdom and they wanted the government in there to work out with the trade any contracts that could be arranged with the United Kingdom.

Another case in point is the situation in the maritime provinces. Last year the maritime provinces had a timber contract from the United Kingdom for 60 million feet of lumber. Recently, the United Kingdom has come in with a demand, government to government, for more than twice that amount of timber. How would we be placed if there were no control of the industry? How would we know that the larger quantity could be supplied without upsetting the local market? By working out the larger exports on a quota basis we know that the quantity can be supplied.

In addition, the United Kingdom is coming in for 10 million feet of hardwood, which is the material my hon. friend spoke about. Suppose everybody were free to ship their hardwood wherever they liked. You could not touch that business. It is all very well for hon. members to rise in their places and say that this control bothers some individual, and that he could make more money if there were no control, and therefore there must be no control. We try to look at the industry as a whole, and Canada's interest in the industry, which is very real indeed. We are trying to cut the control down to the absolute minimum. My hon. friend knows that there is no price control. The control today is solely an export control. There is no other control. We think export control is needed. We would like the industry as a whole to tell us it is not needed, and we would then get rid of it. But when we ask the industry to do so, it backs away and says, "We think we should have it". I think we should have it, too, because otherwise I think the upset in our domestic economy would be considerable, and that the effect on exports, particularly on exports to the United Kingdom, would not be beneficial.

The timber trade of the United Kingdom is under government control. That buyer comes in for very large orders which no one firm could begin to handle. Whether the industry by itself is sufficiently organized to see that those orders are taken and fairly distributed among all the producers of lumber, I am not sure. I wish they would tell me that they are so organized.

As I say, there are always two sides to this question. The hon. member has suggested that there was no increase in price when price control went off. I would remind him that the wholesale price on lumber on the Pacific coast for the domestic market was $29 a thousand when price control was removed, and inside of a month the price level soared to about double that level.

Mr. Hodgson: You can buy clears on the market right now for $45.

Mr. Howe: I was talking about $29, when we had price control.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): How will the timber control allocate bulk purchases from the old country? If they want half a billion feet of lumber, how will the small producers in British Columbia obtain the same pro rata share of that business as the large producers? It is well known that there are several large exporting companies in British Columbia, and that they have had a number of smaller mills working for them under contract. How will those smaller mills receive their share of the business? Is it part of the business of the timber controller to direct that?

Mr. Howe: Yes, and I think timber control has worked to that end. If the market gets slack, or if the chief outlet is a United States market, it is much more difficult to bring that about. But for United Kingdom market orders I believe timber control has always been able to see that the order was distributed among the large and small operators.

Mr. Thatcher: I do not wish to appear persistent, but at some time in this debate I hope the Minister of Justice will tell us what the government has done about the report of the prices committee, or what it intends to do. I do not know if this is the place to do it, but some time before this debate is over I wish the minister would tell us that. What has he done about those fourteen recommendations, or what is he going to do about them —if anything?

Mr. Timmins: The remarks of the minister are of considerable consequence. I took down some of them concerning control. One of his observations on timber control was that no one would be more pleased than he would to get rid of it. While these are not his exact words, he did say he had found the industry was anxious to continue controls.

That is not the basis upon which these control bills were first introduced. They were brought in on the basis of an emergency. I shall not attempt to go into that argument again, but that was the basis for their introduction. Now we reach the point where this business of timber control becomes a matter of marketing, to use the minister's words. He says that, looking at the industry as a whole and having regard to Canada's interests in it, the government feels that these controls should be continued for another year.

It seems to me that in respect of timber control we are now being told it is to be continued as a marketing project. We are now in the business of marketing timber. That may be a proper procedure in the ordinary course of events, but certainly it arrives at the wrong end of this matter of controls. So much for that.

Mr. Howe: May I answer the point the hon. member makes? I would remind him that I said timber control today was reduced solely to export control. I would remind him further that export control is a statute of the government which does not depend upon an emergency. It depends upon permanent legislation passed by this house. The hon. member ought not to get his blood pressure too high when he discusses timber control as it is today. There is no infringement of any other jurisdiction; export control is a matter within the federal government jurisdiction.

Mr. Timmins: I am not suggesting there is any infringement. I am simply taking the minister's reasons for having this control. If it could be done under the other measure, well and good. But why tell us that this control measure is necessary in respect of timber? Then, coming to the matter of steel—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The clause before the committee deals with the extension of time.

Mr. Timmins: My point is directed to that. With respect to the control on steel, I believe the data handed out by the steel industry in Canada and in the United States all goes to point out that by the third quarter of this year steel will be in good supply in this country. The minister can correct me if I am wrong, but that is the statement made by the steel industry itself.

I know that in Toronto the transportation commission, which has been waiting for many years to begin work on a big project, has now made arrangements for its steel, and is getting it from month to month. I do not know whether the steel is being produced at the present time, but the contract has been made. As I see it, the minister has no problem in steel control for the year 1949. I see no reason why it should be continued for another year. It is tied up with the export-import control regulation. Under that measure we know that all the steel coming into this country is welcome. We want all we can get. The controller exercises no control over it, except that it is regulated from one plant to another in order that the best interests of industry may be served. But that is a matter of internal economy. I see no reason why that cannot be taken care of under the export-import control measure.

The minister has said that this bill, in respect of the export of timber, does exercise control of the timber of the country, but only to that extent. I think this control bill is being used now more or less for the purpose of regulating trade, rather than for its original purpose of dealing with an emergency in Canada. The minister is bound at this stage to state specifically why steel control should be continued for another year.

Mr. Howe: I think it would be well to let the committee know just what steel control has accomplished. I would point out to the hon. member that steel control directs the rolling schedules of the producing mills in Canada. It is all very well for the hon. member to say that we do not need steel control because in the third quarter we shall have an ample supply. I would remind him that we are still in the first quarter, and that we have to live through the second quarter.

Mr. Timmins: Will the minister tell the committee that he believes there will be plenty of steel in the third quarter?

Mr. Howe: Certainly not; and I suggest if my hon. friend is putting that out as his expert opinion he is misleading a great many people in Canada who should be better advised. Last year we produced about 3 million tons of steel and we imported about one million tons. Of the 3 million tons that were produced in this country, 330,000 tons were produced due only to the fact that the steel controller stepped into the distribution of basic steel. Under the authority of the emergency act the steel controller took basic steel from Algoma and Dosco and shipped it to the finishing mills at Hamilton which had an additional finishing capacity. The result was the production of about 300,000 tons of steel plate that would not otherwise have been produced.

Similarly, in the matter of pig iron we said to some of the big producers: We are sorry; we shall have to have part of your pig iron; it is true you need it for your own production, but you will have to do with less. Otherwise foundries will be closed unless we get additional supplies to them that are not available from usual market sources.

In the matter of scrap steel, the controller has arranged for the importation of about 300,000 tons of scrap from Cuba, Australia and other countries. A good deal is coming in now from Germany and other foreign countries that would not otherwise have been available to private industry; it was made available by the government agencies directed by the steel controller. In some cases it has been necessary to subsidize the movement of scrap so that it could be used by our steel industry without upsetting the prices of the products.

A good deal was said last year about nail production. We stepped into the distribution of wire and rod suitable for being made into nails. There can be only so much nail wire and nail rod produced in this country, because our capacity is limited. We stepped in and said: We are sorry, but you cannot use as much of that nail wire and rod for wire fencing as has been your custom; we have to have a certain additional proportion of it for nails. Recently we completed a most complicated transaction in which we have had the assistance of the United States government. Certain nail wire and rod from United States mills has been allocated to Canadian mills so that this year we shall be able to produce an additional 24,000 kegs of nails per month. It will not now be necessary to interfere with our wire fencing program.

Mr. Fraser: Will any of those nails be exported, like those referred to a few weeks ago which were produced from wire that had been brought in?

Mr. Howe: No; that was simply a conversion process. In this case the mills have bought the wire and the product will be wholly distributed in Canada.

The steel controller is supporting certain national programs. In other words, he gives an undertaking to a manufacturer that if he takes on a program in this class which is approved by the steel controller, the steel controller will see that the necessary steel is produced. These programs include shipbuilding; freight car construction; hydro-electric expansion; railway maintenance and repair; locomotive construction; the expansion of the petroleum industry, both construction and refining; and housing construction.

Through the efforts of the steel controller and the government, the import of steel from England has been stepped up greatly. This steel has not gone into just one program; it has gone into a number of programs. The net result has been that we have been able to relieve the capacity of one of our own steel mills so that it can continue rolling plate for the pipe line required as a matter of urgency to distribute the production of the Alberta Leduc oil wells.

That is the function of the steel controller. I do not know of anyone who has been subject to the control who would have it otherwise.

There is no doubt that if individual programs were able to shop around among the different producers, and there were no government co-ordinator, certain programs would be well supplied while other programs would be badly upset. I do not know of any producer of steel or pig iron or steel products who would like to see steel control abandoned. I certainly do not know of any user of steel in an important program who would gladly see steel control abandoned.

It has interested me very much to hear our friends say that they are for or against these controls. Apparently the attitude is: "Me too, but the method must be different." I remember it was said that the Dewey campaign was conducted with the motto, "Me too, but not so much." I think, "Me too; but the method is wrong" accurately describes the Tory position on these matters. In taking that view I think they are overlooking the well-being of the steel industry and of those industries that depend upon steel for their existence.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister agree, as to the feeling of satisfaction which he describes, and which I am very much afraid exists in many quarters—there is satisfaction on the part of those who are well established in business, who are content to have business remain as is, who want no one else allowed to come—it is those people who are as content as the minister indicates? If so, I should like to point out that that situation is most injurious to anyone who really believes in the free system.

I am very much afraid that the minister is right in saying that there are a lot of people who like to come down to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sure that they talk his language and think he is very sensible, but I wish to point out that the result of it is that those people who are pretty well enamoured of steel control are in the position I have described. However, it is extremely difficult for new people to get in. If they do not get in, then as to the system in which the minister says he believes—I think he does believe in it, but I always think the minister's belief in private enterprise is tempered somewhat by the personal attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—if the small man is kept out it is likely to result in a very dangerous position.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend is asking me whether I believe in keeping out the small man, may I say that I certainly do not. I know of no small man who has been kept out. In fact I know of many small men who have been kept in business by the support they have received from the steel controller. You will find that in all parts of the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I hope the minister is right.

Mr. Howe: Even my hon. friends in the C.C.F. know of little firms on the prairies that have been taken care of. They include new people, they include small people. The duty of the steel controller is to see that they all are looked after. The producers say that they want to distribute steel fairly and equitably, and they think that steel control has enabled them to do just that. The consumer says that he thinks the government has correlated all the demands of steel, that it has scheduled steel properly to fit requirements in the steel plants, and therefore he favours steel control.

Mr. Rowe: In view of the minister's statement with reference to lumber and steel, do I understand that the present controls are merely for the export of lumber?

Mr. Howe: I did not say that. I wish my hon. friend would come to the chamber occasionally and listen to what I say. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. Rowe: The minister said that the foreign exchange control board controls exports, and if that is so it is not necessary to have this control.

Mr. Howe: I said nothing of the kind. I will tell my hon. friend what I did say.

Mr. Rowe: All right; say it again.

Mr. Howe: I hope that you do not mind listening this time, because I do not know anyone who can twist my statements any faster or farther than my hon. friend.

Mr. Rowe: You are a good subject to misquote.

Mr. Howe: I said that timber control as of today is reduced to export control. Export control is not administered by the foreign exchange control board. It is administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Rowe: Export and import?

Mr. Howe: Yes, under the Export and Import Permits Act it is administered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Just keep that in mind for a moment. As for steel control, I spent at least ten minutes explaining all the various functions of steel control, which include the scheduling of rollings in mills, distribution of scrap, distribution of the finished product, and I said nothing about exports, for the reason that the export of basic steel is prohibited.

Mr. Rowe: That is the very point. Probably the clarity of your expression is somewhat similar to my intelligence and understanding.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

Mr. Rowe: In view of the fact that the minister can make his statements so clear, I should like to ask him now to say what condition would exist if there were export of steel. Would he believe in continuing controls on steel just as he has continued them on lumber?

Mr. Howe: I will tell my hon. friend what would happen if there were export of steel. On the present price scale, all steel in this country would move out to some other country. What would happen to people who need steel in this country would be that they would have to bid up the price or go without.

Mr. Rowe: Keep the controls either way?

Mr. Howe: I do not know.

Mr. Green: One question occurs to me as to steel control. In the speech from the throne it was announced that assistance was to be given to the producers of basic steel. Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell us whether that is to be done by new legislation, or whether it is to be done under the powers that are now possessed by the steel controller? I notice that he has very wide powers. Paragraph (p) of subsection 1 of section 3 of the order reads:

> Subject to the approval of the governor in council, to advance moneys to any person engaged in the business of producing steel, for the purpose of assisting such person in the carrying on of such business.

Is the assistance to the steel industry to be given by the steel controller under this order in council, or is there to be separate legislation?

Mr. Howe: I shall be very glad to bring down the bill as soon as we get through discussing these matters. Then my hon. friend will know all about it. Obviously it is a separate bill, but to discuss it now—

Mr. Green: I do not want to discuss it now. I merely asked the question. I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Justice. This bill is an amendment of the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947. In the act of 1947 there is a schedule which lists fifty orders in council. The Minister of Justice has told us that there are now to be only twelve orders in council under the act. I suggest to him that it would make it much easier for the legal profession, and for other people across the country, to understand the legislation if he would bring in a section of the present bill substituting an amended schedule including only the twelve orders in council. If he does not do that, when a person looks up the act he will go back to 1947 and will find fifty orders in council. It would be almost impossible for anyone, who has not been in the house and followed the discussion, to find out which of those orders in council are still in effect. I know it would be extremely difficult. I think it would simplify the legislation a great deal if the minister would simply add one section to the present bill which would set out that the schedule was to be amended. Then we would have a new schedule with only twelve orders in council listed. Of course that will have to be done while the bill is in the committee stage, if it is to be done at all.

Mr. Garson: I do not think that the difficulty is nearly as great as my hon. friend believes. The schedule to the 1947 act lists these orders in council, and also lists certain amendments to them. Then there is an office consolidation of the orders in council which are specified in the schedule to the bill. That contains all of the orders in council specified in the schedule, and the governor in council is prohibited from making any amendments to those orders in council. Therefore the only question that remains is as to which are revoked and which are still in force.

Mr. Green: That is what is hard to find out.

Mr. Garson: As regards the board orders made under the powers of the orders in council, in the matter of rental control, for instance, there is an office consolidation which I have in my hand, and which is dated February, 1949. It contains the wartime prices and trade board orders respecting maximum rentals, termination of leases for housing accommodation and shared accommodation. This is prepared as of February of this year so that it is right up to date. I do not think that the difficulty of getting at these regulations and ascertaining what they are, as indicated by some of the remarks that have been made, exists, because with no more trouble than simply getting these documents one can ascertain what orders are still in effect. The terms of these orders are accessible in these two pamphlets.

I suppose that we could bring in a new schedule with just the twelve orders in it, but they have been mentioned time and again during the course of the debate. I do not think that any person would be very badly discommoded or inconvenienced by not having them. Then there is the further matter that, inasmuch as the policy of the government is one of decontrol, one would expect that it would not be very long before the new schedule would be a bit out of date because of the decontrolling of some of the subject matters set out in the suggested new schedule. Upon balance I scarcely think that it would be worth the effort to bring in an amended schedule with a smaller number of orders in council in it.

Mr. Green: I take it from what the minister says that there is no serious objection to putting a schedule in the present bill. I would earnestly suggest to him that he give consideration to bringing in such a schedule because it will make the legislation very much clearer than it is at the present time.

Mr. Merritt: I think the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said that he had made arrangements whereby three or four thousand tons of rod would be brought in from the United States to make nails this year. The increase in the rod allocated to nails last year from wire fencing did not, I believe, result in any additional supply of nails reaching British Columbia through that means. Will the minister assure the committee that a part of this new allocation will be available to British Columbia?

Mr. Howe: Yes. I can assure my friend that the first order placed for this material, I was happy to note, was from the Morrison Steel and Wire Company.

Mr. Merritt: Having said that timber control involves export only, and is administered in the minister's department by the export permits branch, why is it that the timber control order is needed any more? Why is it that the Export and Import Permits Act does not give the minister ample power to assist in these state trading deals?

Mr. Howe: Perhaps so, but at the moment we are keeping the powers of the timber controller. In any case, even if timber control were administered under the export act, it would still be necessary to have a timber controller. The timber control legislation probably will be cancelled before many months go by.

Mr. Fleming: I want to return to the answer which was given by the Minister of Justice to the question of the hon. member for Vancouver South. I think the Minister of Justice can well afford to be more reasonable in the position that he has taken. He says it would not be worth the effort to put the twelve orders in council as a schedule to the present bill. I want to point out to him that the office consolidation of the orders in council to which he refers has no statutory validity. It was merely circulated among members of the house for their convenience in discussing the bill. Quite apart from that legal aspect, however, think of the difficulty in which you are placing people who want to learn the law of this country. They come to look at the statutes to see what control measures are still in effect. When they come to read the present bill they find a measure with only two sections, and they do not find the text of the orders which are given continued statutory life by this legislation.

Then, sir, think of the position in which this house is placed. I trust hon. members will want to see introduced certain amendments to some of the orders. As the Minister of Justice has pointed out, the governor in council has no power under the 1947 act to amend, except as to the revocation of the orders in whole or in part. The governor in council may revoke any portion of the orders but cannot otherwise amend them. As the minister well said in the debate on March 18, the only way the orders themselves can be amended is in committee, the stage we are in at present.

For my part, difficult as the matter may be, I think it essential that the house should consider necessary amendments with respect to some of these orders, because the powers conferred by them are far broader than there is any possible excuse for continuing today. There has been certain discussion here this afternoon. We talk in general terms about steel control or about timber control or about priorities control, but this is the stage at which the house should have full opportunity to consider these subjects in their particularity, in detail. When we talk about steel control, for instance, let us not confine ourselves to a general discussion. I think the house in committee should get down to an examination of some of the powers conferred upon the steel controller by article 3 of P.C. 245; and I defy the Minister of Trade and Commerce or any other member of the house to say that all these powers are necessary today in connection with the type of steel control for which the minister is arguing. Is he going to say, for instance, that it is necessary for the steel controller to have this power:

> (a) To take possession of steel wherever found and to produce and/or deal in or with steel or equipment . . .

Is it necessary that he should have power to produce steel? Is the minister going to say it is necessary that the steel controller should have these powers:

> (c) To enter on, take possession of, and utilize any mine, land, plant, factory, mill, refinery, smelter, foundry, warehouse, building, or place or any equipment used or capable of being used for the purpose of producing or dealing in or with steel and to deal in or with or take possession of any vehicles, cars, ships, locomotives, or other equipment deemed by the steel controller to be required or useful for the operation of any such mine, plant, factory, mill . . .

and so on. Is he going to say that power is necessary for the steel controller today? Here are powers which, if exercised, could make the steel controller a virtual dictator not only over the distribution of steel but over its manufacture and over every aspect of mining which may have to do with the production of steel in its finished form, over transportation and a thousand and one other things that may enter into the various processes which finally bring about the production of steel. There are many other provisions of the same nature that I say are totally unnecessary today.

I have referred to steel control, but look at some of the powers conferred on the timber controller. I say we should not be talking about timber control just in general terms. I ask if it is necessary that today the timber controller should have the power, as he has, under section 2 (d) of P.C. 1997, to enter on and take possession of and utilize, by himself or by any person duly authorized by him thereunto—

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid my hon. friend is trying to raise the principle involved in these controls, which is the principle involved in the bill. That principle was dealt with on second reading, and it is a definite rule that speeches in committee should be strictly relevant to the clause under discussion. What is the clause under discussion? It is to extend this act for another year. I think the hon. member is completely out of order in dealing with the principle of these controls, the powers conferred and all the rest of it, because those matters should be dealt with on second reading. I hope hon. members will try to keep within the rules.

Mr. Fleming: With all respect, Mr. Chairman, you say I am trying to discuss the principle of the bill. I assure you I am not. That principle, which has been approved by the house, is that there shall be an extension. In what I am arguing I am assuming there is to be the extension which was approved in principle on second reading. Within that principle I am saying the powers are unnecessarily broad, and that this section which is designed to extend every term, every letter and every syllable of these twelve orders is unnecessarily broad. I am pointing out the respects in which that unnecessary breadth continues. That is not to question the principle of the extension. It is to ask whether, the house having decided there shall be an extension, it shall be a completely unfettered extension, as is contemplated in section 1? What I am saying is completely within the scope of that section. I am pointing out to the committee the powers it is proposed to continue, which I say are quite unnecessary, assuming the house has decided there shall be an extension of the control system. I am saying many of these powers cannot be justified, that they are totally unnecessary even to the extension of steel control or timber control or priorities control, for which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been arguing and which I am discussing now just as he discussed it.

Mr. Garson: No one likes to be raising points of order on his fellow members of the house, on any side, because the less we do so the more harmonious can be our discussions and perhaps the more progress we can make. But surely in the present instance we are dealing with a section which changes only two words. It changes the words "forty-nine" in the third line of section 7 of the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947, to "fifty", and does the same thing in the following line. That is all it does. I would say about ninety-five per cent of the discussion since we went into committee has been irrelevant. What would be relevant is whether the date should be 1950 or 1951 or 1952—

Mr. Drew: Or 1945.

Mr. Garson: That is quite right; but it relates only to the question of the length of the extension. No amount of sophistry can disguise the fact that this is all this section deals with. If we are going to be strictly relevant, that is all we can talk about on this section. My hon. friend would be quite right in making these remarks on second reading, or he could make them on third reading, but not in committee on this section.

Mr. Green: May I point out that last evening the Minister of Justice laid great emphasis on the fact that, in each of the years these bills have been brought up, the house has had the opportunity to approve each order in council and has actually done so, and that therefore a decision has been made each year on each order in council. The very next day, when the hon. member for Eglinton tries to deal with an objectionable term in an order in council, we have the Minister of Justice, of all people, getting to his feet and saying that it is out of order to say anything about these particular orders in council. His stand today proves absolutely beyond a doubt that the point he was making last night was just ridiculous.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think I should remind the hon. member for Vancouver South that when the minister was speaking he was speaking on second reading. At the present time we are in committee on the bill. I should like to say this to the hon. member, in all kindness. There is no proposal in this clause now before the committee to change any of the powers that were in the bill. The proposal is simply to extend the act for another year. I believe it would be perfectly in order when we are discussing it on second reading to draw to the attention of the house all these objectionable features of the bill. But in my opinion it is not in order to go into all the phases of the bill when we are dealing simply with an extension for one year.

Mr. Green: On the point of order, may I point out that when you are on second reading of the bill you cannot discuss sections. You can discuss only the principle. How could we possibly have discussed the terms of any of these orders in council on the second reading of the bill?

The Deputy Chairman: My hon. friend will agree with me that, on second reading of any bill, you can point out all the objections to it that you may wish to point out, and you can move amendments to the bill if you wish to do so. You can raise all the objections you like. But when we come into committee the rule is strict that speeches must be relevant to the clause before the committee, that each clause must be dealt with, and that we pass on to the next. I do not want to interfere with the members, but I think we should try to keep to the rules and, as much as possible, try to have the speeches relevant to the clauses under discussion.

Mr. Green: Is the chairman ruling that when we were on second reading we could have taken all the different orders in council paragraph by paragraph?

The Deputy Chairman: Oh, no.

Mr. Green: And could have dealt with them there?

The Deputy Chairman: Oh, no.

Mr. Green: If not, when can we do it?

The Deputy Chairman: On second reading every member has the right to point out all the objectionable features in a bill and to use all the arguments he possibly can to defeat the bill, if he is not in sympathy with it. He may move amendments to defeat the bill. But once the house has decided on the principle of the bill and it comes before the committee, we should then confine our remarks to each clause that is before the committee.

Mr. Merritt: Speaking to the point of order, I have in my hand Hansard of last year when this measure was discussed. I find that on March 16, 1948, at page 2256 under the heading "On section 1—Duration of act", each of these orders in council was discussed specifically. At the start of the evening sitting on that day the Chairman himself said:

> The committee was considering P.C. 9029, wartime leasehold regulations as amended.

Right through the discussion of last year, on the section dealing with the duration of the act, the practice was followed of discussing the detail of the specific orders in council.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That does not mean it was in order.

Mr. Drew: I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the whole problem that has arisen here in the discussion that is now taking place on the one hand is the direct result of the course that is being followed, and on the other hand indicates the highly unsatisfactory nature of that course. What comes before the committee is a short bill of two sections. The first section of the bill contains a provision that would extend the period of application of these twelve orders in council for another year. The second section refers to the powers of the wartime prices and trade board in connection with these regulations. But obviously the second section dealing with the restriction of the powers of the wartime prices and trade board is something of such a specific nature that it certainly would not be the place where the general or detailed effect of these twelve orders in council could be considered. Therefore unless they can be considered in detail in relation to section 1, there is no place in the whole course of the discussion where they can be considered in detail.

All that is before the house on first reading where there is no debate, on second reading where there is debate on the principle, and ultimately on third reading, is this bill of two sections, the first section carrying forward for another year these twelve orders in council in their entirety. The principle involved in the discussion on second reading was whether or not, in the opinion of this house, the circumstances were such that these twelve orders in council should be continued. If there is any point at which some reasonable limitation might have been placed upon the amount of detail, I think it would be at the time that clear principle was in issue.

Now when we come into committee, in the ordinary course of events there would be before us a bill including in express detail in succeeding sections those things that the government will have power to deal with by an act ultimately adopted by the parliament of Canada. But through the fact that these are not statutory provisions in the ordinary acceptance of that term, but are in fact wartime orders in council carried forward by an all-embracing act of this nature, then unless at this point in committee there is an opportunity to discuss in detail the effect of the provisions of these orders in council carried forward, there is no point during the whole course of the proceedings, from first reading to third reading, where there would be any opportunity to point out in detail exactly what the result is or to obtain from the ministers concerned an appropriate explanation of what their reasons are for continuing these particular powers or what the effect of the continuance of these particular powers would be.

I close my remarks—only in respect to this discussion that is taking place—by suggesting that the ordinary rules do not apply; because the ordinary rules relate to the introduction of bills which confer powers upon parliament and upon the administrative body of parliament, the government; whereas in this case you have the utterly abnormal situation, from the ordinary point of view of parliamentary procedure, of orders in council adopted under the War Measures Act which, in turn, was an act passed under these emergency powers. May I emphasize that point, Mr. Chairman. These were not orders in council adopted under any general powers available to the government and to parliament in the war. These were orders in council passed under the War Measures Act, which act was within the jurisdiction of this parliament only because of an emergency. That act has disappeared, but the orders in council passed under it are carried forward. Therefore the whole proceeding we have is completely abnormal and completely outside of the ordinary concept of the rules. I submit that, unless there is an opportunity to discuss these orders in council in detail at this point, there could be no opportunity at any time.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the leader of the opposition put his finger on the point when he said that the principle on the second reading was whether the house would agree to carry on or to extend these emergency measures. That was the principle. That having been agreed to, no change is proposed. No change was proposed in the amendment to change any control that anyone operating under the bill had. I am expressing my opinion that now the debate must be strictly relevant to the clause before the committee, whether we should carry this on for another year or not. I do not want to press the point any further but I think I am right in that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, let me just illustrate the difficulty, and I shall refer to this section only so that I may illustrate the point that I have in mind. As you have pointed out—and I can see the difficulty with which you are confronted in interpreting rules which relate to ordinary procedure dealing with bills in this house—it does confer the powers under which the government will act from the administrative point of view, and under which the rights of people will be determined. For instance, there has been some discussion with regard to the need for the continuance of steel control. When hon. members are making up their minds as to whether there should be a continuance of steel control, it is certainly something for them to have in their minds, in arriving at a decision, that they should know exactly why these controls are necessary at this particular time. I do not know how else they can decide whether this act should be extended for one year or not.

Take the situation in regard to the control of steel and equipment. Section (a), which has already been read to the committee, provides that the steel controller shall have power available from time to time:

to take possession of steel wherever found and to produce—

In order to realize the extent of that word and what it means, and what the powers are, you have to go to the definitive provisions before that and find out what produce means. It means something that every hon. member should bear in mind when we consider what the powers now are. This is what it means:

Producing shall include prospecting, developing, digging, mining, drilling for, melting, extracting, milling, concentrating, refining, smelting, processing, fabricating, machining, rolling, finishing, making, manufacturing and repairing—

Mr. Young: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, can you inform me whether the leader of the opposition at the moment is speaking to a point of order, or whether his remarks are being extended into a speech?

The Deputy Chairman: The leader of the opposition is speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Drew: I explained, Mr. Chairman, that I was illustrating the effect of this word in relation to the explanation given in this order in council itself, which is carried forward. I continue:

—and "produce," "produced" and "production" shall have corresponding and similarly extended meanings.

Take the width and scope of this definition and relate it to the fact that the controller is given powers to produce. Then it seems that it is of the utmost importance that every hon. member have some explanation from the minister putting forward this measure, or the minister who will have the administrative responsibilities, as to why powers as wide as those, which in fact would mean a complete nationalization of the steel industry, if they were exercised, should be extended for another year.

The Deputy Chairman: It was all put on the record last night by the hon. member for Calgary West when the bill was given second reading.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think any opportunity was given for explanation.

The Deputy Chairman: It was done on second reading. As I say, I am not going to press the point any further. I have tried to point out the rules and I think I am right.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I hesitate to intervene because in my little experience in this house I have found out that more time is lost on points of order than on serious discussions of a bill or resolution; but in this instance I cannot remain in my seat without saying one word. Last week we spent three days discussing the resolution, which was the basis of this bill. We spent two days on the principle and one day in committee. Every order in council which is covered by this bill was mentioned and discussed while we were discussing the resolution, the principle of the bill and in committee. We have been more than a day now on the principle of the bill on second reading. Even what the leader of the opposition has just read was read last night by the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Green: Not that section.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He read the whole thing.

Mr. Green: He read another one which is just as bad.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But it means one thing, that all these orders in council have been discussed by each and every hon. member who spoke on both sides of the house.

This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce read the whole thing concerning steel.

Mr. Knowles: He was also out of order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There is no doubt about that. I understand the point of order brought up in this instance. If we follow the rule we cannot get away from being strictly relevant to what is set out in the amendment. The Minister of Justice has mentioned it. It is a change of date, changing 1949 to 1950. The principle having been adopted on second reading, all that we can discuss on this section is the reason why it should not be extended for that one year; but it will be extended. The house has decided that point. Really, after two days discussing this—we can keep it up for a week; any hon. member could keep this up—I do not think we can get any more explanation than we have been given up to now. I would ask the Chairman to try, if possible, to follow the rules and have the discussion relevant to this section of the bill.

Mr. Drew: The explanation which has just been given merely illustrates what this house is being asked to do here. This bill has only two sections.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Drew: No.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Drew: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, may we be informed if it is the intention to proceed with the budget immediately after the recess?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At seven-thirty the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will make his budget speech, and after that I understand that some hon. member from the opposition side will speak. At the conclusion of his remarks we shall revert to this bill in committee.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at seven-thirty o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, once again it is my pleasant duty to bring down the annual budget amid conditions of sustained—one might almost say unexcelled—prosperity. Despite the grave uncertainties and the persistent difficulties that beset us in the field of international affairs, we Canadians as a whole have continued throughout the past year to enjoy higher standards of living than ever before. The volume of industrial output for civilian account, in the form of both consumer goods and capital goods, has never been higher. Cash income derived from farm crops, and the value of commercial fish landings in 1948 have also reached figures never before equalled. The output of our mines has increased by nearly one-third during the past three years, and is now running at a rate within two per cent of the wartime peak.

In other words, during the past year the Canadian economy—and by that phrase I mean this community of a million and a half farmers and fishermen, of three million industrial workers, and of hundreds of thousands of business, salaried and professional men and women, great and small—during the past year this community of free people has produced a record quantity of consumer goods, and at the same time has produced and installed a huge amount of new and improved capital equipment which promises still greater output in the years immediately ahead.

But what is even more satisfactory is that the energy, industry, skill and equipment which have been put into industry during the past three or four years is now bearing fruit in the form of a greatly increased flow of goods. Most of the serious shortages of goods have been overcome. The post-war world price inflation appears to have run its course. Since the late summer the price indexes have leveled out both here and in the United States —the two countries in which a free price market most nearly exists. In some sectors of the price structure, where the increases had been particularly great, prices have begun to recede to more healthy levels.

Prediction in a world so full of uncertainties must always be hazardous, but there is a wide measure of agreement, both here and abroad, that, barring the three major catastrophes of war, crop failure and widespread industrial work stoppages, the post-war price inflation has come to an end. That is not to say that there are not some acute shortages, as in steel or in housing, nor that there may not be considerable ups and downs in the prices of individual commodities from week to week and month to month. But the general assumption which I feel justified in making at this point is that when we come to the end of this year and look back we shall find that the price level as a whole will be no higher than it is now and that the prices of some groups of commodities at least will be somewhat lower.

The conditions and prospects which I have thus briefly sketched enable me to recommend to this house a series of proposals which combine a prudent provision against future uncertainties with a considerable measure of immediate tax reduction.

It seems to me that the time has now come when our objective should be to sustain our present high levels of output, avoiding the evils of unemployment on the one hand and further inflation on the other. The aim of both public and private economic policy should be to hold steady on the course. It cannot be the steadiness of inaction. To hold a steady course we must continue to devote much of our effort to further development and betterment. We should not seek just a balance, but a balance in motion.

Of course, we have our pessimists here and elsewhere. There are those whose eyes, fixed firmly on the past, see only the depressions that have followed the booms. But the best opinion I have been able to form leads me to believe that we can hold the current levels if we, and others in like position, act sensibly. I do not expect in the near future any serious decline in the high level of expenditures in North America, upon which our present prosperity is based. Businessmen, public authorities and consumers still have large demands to be filled, and the wherewithal to pay for what they want. Overseas countries still have many requirements to be met from north American production. Their own ability to pay is increasing and in the meantime is being supplemented by assistance from this side of the Atlantic. As I have said, no one can look far into the future with complete assurance in this uncertain age, but we can see far enough to make it possible to lay our plans now in the expectation that something like the present level of production and income for the country as a whole will persist throughout this coming year.

[Mr. Abbott.]

At the time of the last budget our most urgent and difficult economic problem was our shortage of foreign exchange. The progress made in this matter has been evident in our improved trade figures and in the recovery of our exchange reserve.

The present size of our exchange reserves shows the great improvement that has taken place since the end of 1947, when the emergency measures designed first to stop and then to reverse the serious drain on our reserves went into effect. From the dangerously low level of $502 million on December 31, 1947, our reserves rose to $998 million on December 31, 1948, and are now about $1,065 million, a level which, though not yet satisfactory, is much more nearly adequate to safeguard our position against the deficits which could develop without much warning in a trade as large and vulnerable as ours. In appraising this higher figure, one must bear in mind that it includes government borrowing of $150 million in the United States. On the other hand it also reflects the net foreign lending by the government amounting to about $100 million in this 15-month period.

All things considered, the change in our reserve position has been quite remarkable. During most of 1947 we were losing reserves at an average rate of $70 million a month. Since the beginning of 1948, excluding the long-term loan, we have been rebuilding our reserves at an average rate of about $30 million a month. In other words there has been a reversal of trend of the order of about $100 million a month. Improved tourist revenues as well as other invisible items on both current and capital account have contributed to this result, but it is clear that the principal increase in our reserves has come through the improvement in our merchandise balance of trade, and in particular our balance with the United States.

The trade figures for the year 1948 as a whole, when compared with 1947, show in a striking way this principal reason for the improvement in our exchange position. Our total exports increased from about $2·8 billion to about $3·1 billion. Most of this increase was due to the higher prices at which our goods were sold, but in some groups of commodities there were satisfactory increases in volume. The total value of our imports remained almost unchanged at about $2·6 billion, despite an average increase in their prices of over 10 per cent. There was therefore an appreciable decrease in the actual volume of goods imported. Taking tourist business, freights, interest and dividends and other similar transactions into account, our net balance on current account transactions with all countries increased from a surplus of only $47 million in 1947 to one of about $450 million in 1948. Hon. members will realize, of course, that in 1948 we were not selling so much on credit and that this larger current balance was not offset to the same extent as in 1947 by large-scale foreign lending.

This improvement in our trade balance took place almost entirely in our trade with the United States. Our exports to Britain and its sterling area were reduced in total value by $130 million, or about 12 per cent, due mainly, of course, to their need to save dollars. Our exports to other countries—mainly European—were reduced by $30 million, or about 5 per cent, for similar reasons. Our imports from both these areas were increased substantially—by $230 million, or nearly 40 per cent. This improvement in the capacity of these areas to resume their pre-war share in supplying our needs has been most welcome. It reflects a fundamental improvement in their productivity and output, as well as their efforts to sell, and our efforts to encourage the resumption of something approaching the pre-war pattern of trade.

On the other hand, our 1948 imports from the United States were $170 million less than in 1947, or a reduction of about 10 per cent, and this despite some sharp increases in the cost of American goods. The reduction of $170 million is the net result of two contrasting trends. In the case of goods enumerated in the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, the value of imports from the United States was reduced by $300 million; but the volume of all other imports rose by $130 million. Increases in oil, coal and farm machinery alone amounted to more than $120 million.

But the feature of our trade which I find most encouraging has been the increase in our exports to the United States. Here, the total value increased from just over one billion dollars in 1947 to more than one and a half billions in 1948. Some of this increase is due, of course, to higher prices—especially for pulp and paper and metals. Some of it is due to very large exports of cattle. But much of it, I am glad to say, is the result of improved Canadian ability to produce for, and sell to, the United States market, and of the reductions in tariffs obtained in the Geneva agreements. This big improvement in our exports to the United States was the type of constructive solution to our exchange difficulties that we were hoping to achieve, and I am gratified—as I hope you, sir, and all other hon. members are as well—at the extent of our success in this direction.

To summarize these trade figures briefly, our debit balance with the United States has been reduced by $635 million, and our credit balance with all other countries has gone down by $400 million, leaving a net increase in our over-all credit balance of $235 million.

Our exchange problem is now approaching manageable proportions. As this house is aware from the discussions of the past few days, it is necessary to continue controls over imports as well as capital exchange transactions, in order to improve and safeguard our exchange situation, but these need not be so general or severe as to interfere seriously with the free working of our economy. I shall be announcing later in this statement some further welcome relaxations in these import restrictions, effective April 1.

I cannot leave this discussion of our exchange situation without expressing appreciation of the farsighted actions of the United States in promoting the economic recovery of western Europe. This sensible and practical program has already overcome some of the difficulties which eighteen months ago seemed almost insuperable. It is slowly but surely putting back on its feet one of the great productive areas of the world. This economic restoration is clearly a prerequisite for a stable and progressive political life in this key area, and as such it is a matter vital not only to our future economic well-being but to our very national safety. To us in Canada the general and longer-run benefits of European recovery and progress are of prime importance.

The grants and loans being financed through ECA are of great immediate value, but in another and more fundamental way the European recovery program is contributing to a betterment of our trading and income prospects. As a result of ERP, and more generally of the broad basic policy which underlies both ERP and the North Atlantic treaty, Europe is rapidly recovering confidence in its own future. The immediate crisis of confidence which was so alarming two years ago has passed. Without this restoration of confidence the large programs of financial aid would have proved merely palliative. As it is, the level of industrial production in western Europe, and for this purpose I include the German bizone, during the last quarter of 1948 was 20 to 25 per cent above the average of 1947, and most of the individual countries in this group have now reached or passed their pre-war levels of industrial output. Of course, much of this output is still going into the repair of the physical ravages of war, and is therefore not yet available for an improvement of standards of living or to pay for the additional imports which the restoration of a normal and rising standard of living demands. The future holds many uncertainties, but we can express gratification for the progress that the first year of ERP has witnessed.

There is one aspect, both of this exchange situation and our own general economic situation, which is clearly going to require continued attention from the government and parliament, as well as from Canadian businessmen. That is the problem of maintaining and extending Canada's overseas exports. In many traditional areas these have been declining during the past year under pressure of their dollar shortage, the adoption or tightening of import restrictions, and the increased supplies becoming available from other countries. In the light of all these adverse conditions, our export trade has stood up relatively well, but we cannot be satisfied with its present situation or immediate prospects. We must seek improvement. We must search for those adjustments from day to day and month to month that will maintain as far as possible our traditional markets. It was for the purpose of re-establishing and maintaining these traditional markets that we undertook a large export credits program. To the extent that those markets are closed to us, we must develop alternative outlets. While attempting to overcome the immediate difficulties, we must persevere in working out the constructive solution through trade agreements on a wide, non-discriminatory basis, and by other measures of a basic character that will assist those countries that buy from us to find dollar markets for their own exports, in order that they may pay for what they would really like to get from us. Over the long run, the establishment of prosperous trading conditions must come largely through the reconstruction of those countries overseas with whom we trade, through the expansion of their output and through the recovery of their productive efficiency, so that once again they will be able to earn enough to pay for the imports which they need.

It is only natural in the face of this problem that some should urge us to reverse our basic trade policy and embark upon barter deals, discrimination, and the balancing of trade accounts with individual countries. These are courses that many others are following. Discriminatory deals between others are interfering with our trade. It is tempting in the short run to consider doing similar deals, particularly to sell this or that, where our exports have been supplanted by others. However, it is too easy to look at only one side of the picture. If you look at the country as a whole, if you examine all aspects of the problem, I believe you will find that such a course would not serve Canada's best interests.

We believe that the inevitable effect of these bilateral, discriminatory deals is to diminish the total volume of world trade. However, even apart from this basic objection on grounds of principle, there are also, from Canada's standpoint, serious practical objections. In the first place, most of our trade takes place with the United States—both export and import—and we cannot deal that way there. There is a real danger that we may prejudice this greater part by trying discrimination and barter in the lesser. Secondly, we are not in a good bargaining position to make successful bilateral deals, deals which by their very nature would force us into bilateral balancing with each individual country. The normal and healthy pattern of our trade is triangular or multilateral. We might succeed in selling some surplus products by special deals—but we would have to take some other surpluses in return which we do not want and cannot really use; and for things we want we would be pressed into paying prices which our consumers would be unwilling to pay. In general, the advantage lies with the larger countries in these deals, particularly as sellers' markets give way to buyers' markets. If anyone feels tempted to start this kind of trading in a few problem cases, let him consider how we are likely to get along in the bargaining as we get drawn further and further into it.

The third practical objection to this line of approach is one in which most, but not all, members of this house will agree. It is that the application of a policy of barter, bilateral deals, and discrimination requires widespread governmental control of private trade, and even the extension of trade by agencies of the government itself. Deals of this sort would require a multiplication of import controls, export controls, licences and permits. It is apt to lead to more government buying and selling, frequently involving subsidies and trading losses. This may fit into the philosophy of government prevailing in some other countries, but most Canadian don't like controls and don't want their government getting deeper and deeper into import and export business.

It is unnecessary, I believe, for me to go into any more detailed review of the economic situation, save such as may be relevant to the appreciation of our fiscal position and policy. As usual I am tabling a white paper that contains, in addition to the detailed estimates of revenue and expenditures for the year now closing, a review of the more important economic statistics for the past few years and recent months. There are also some paragraphs of exposition and comment prepared at my direction and which I commend to those who wish to consider the budget proposals against an economic background. Members of the house and others will recall as well the two recent reports by the governor of the Bank of Canada and the chairman of the foreign exchange control board in which he deals in his usual lucid and objective fashion with the current developments of importance in this field. Finally I should mention the informative facts and forecasts provided some weeks ago to the house by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, relating particularly to the prospects for capital expenditure and the supplies available for construction.

Several conclusions emerge from an examination of these facts and forecasts. The first is that the prospective amount of capital expenditure on construction and on machinery and equipment, taken together with the level of exports, appears likely to be sufficient to sustain incomes and employment this year at around their current levels. Although the supply of construction materials will be better this year, construction costs are still abnormally high and there is still evidence of some strain upon the industry. I continue to believe that all construction work under the control of the government which it is practicable to postpone should be postponed, except in those few areas where there may be some local unemployment. That has been the approach of the government in the formulation of its expenditure program for the year. I must say that it gets progressively more difficult to apply this policy from year to year, as really important requirements for construction of all kinds keep accumulating —some of them repeatedly deferred since long before the war. Other needs, too, are constantly arising—some of them from the necessary expansion in the defence program, others from more constructive developments, such as the need to provide improved airport runways and related equipment to accommodate the bigger and better planes now available. We have also given a fairly high priority to construction necessary to permit expansion in our government activities in the field of scientific research and the improvement of techniques and markets for primary production—government operations which we feel are as fruitful as much private work with which they must compete for materials and labour. I hope this view will commend itself to the house and the public.

A second conclusion that emerges from a review of the economic situation is that the pressure of consumer expenditures upon supplies available to consumers is slackening. This may be observed in respect of various particular commodities where consumers can get what they want more easily and promptly than before, even motor cars. In some cases we can observe the occasional emergence of surpluses and of bargain sales by retailers, something which we had almost forgotten to be a normal part of business at certain seasons of the year.

This improvement in the supply situation for consumer goods results mainly from an increase in their supply and, to a lesser extent, I believe, from the filling up of the more urgent needs of consumers deferred during the war and the post-war shortages. Larger supplies of food have resulted from good crops here and elsewhere last year, both in the United States and abroad. The post-war world food shortage is passing over from its acute stage to a less severe phase in which prices and the ability to pay them are governing considerations once more. In other types of goods we are beginning now to receive the increased output in Canada made possible by our extended and improved equipment installed in recent years, as well as the increased imports from overseas as a result of the recovery of production in Europe and elsewhere, and the efforts of various countries to export to our markets.

This improvement in consumer supplies has brought a welcome halt to the increase in the cost of living. The index of living costs has remained almost constant since last September at a level about 60 per cent above pre-war, and about 30 per cent above 1929. Decreases in food costs have offset slight increases in other items. Some further increases may occur in a few items; but I think we are unlikely to see any significant increase in the cost of living this year—unless, of course, there are serious crop failures—and it is quite possible that there may be some decline. Consumers should have more money to spend this year than last, partly because of the upward sweep in wages that took place last year, partly because of the distribution of wartime refundable taxes that has been going on this month, partly because of additional payments being made to farmers by the wheat board, and partly as a result of the tax reductions which I shall be inviting this house to approve. The time has now come, I believe, when these increased expenditures by consumers can be met by increased supplies of goods without endangering either our price structure or our exchange situation.

In the light of these conditions and in line with the policy to which we have steadily adhered of removing controls at the earliest appropriate time, the government has authorized the wartime prices and trade board to withdraw its price ceiling orders on flour, bread, butter, sugar and molasses, and on those fruits and vegetables which are not limited in supply by the operation of the present import restrictions. Concurrently the government is withdrawing the subsidy of 46½ cents a bushel which has been paid since August 1 last on wheat going into domestic consumption in Canada.

Before turning to a review of the government accounts for the year, I wish to say a few words in regard to provincial matters.

We are now about to enter the third of the five fiscal years covered by our tax rental agreements with seven of the provinces. Those agreements have enabled the provinces concerned to obtain a more equitable share of revenue from the three great sources of direct taxation. They have done so without subjecting the taxpayers of these provinces to dual assessments, dual reporting and the other inconveniences and vexations which double taxation involves. They have enabled all these provinces to have the revenue from these major sources reflect the growth of population and the expansion of national income, and at the same time to have the assurance of an underwriting against the risks of economic adversity. This assurance that, come what may, cash receipts from these important tax sources could not fall below a guaranteed minimum has been, I believe, of great importance in enabling provincial governments to plan in advance their developmental programs and to undertake them with confidence. It has certainly also improved the credit standing of the provinces concerned. From the national point of view, it has removed or vastly lessened the risk that in times of economic difficulty the financial strains to which some provincial governments would be subject might lead to a competitive scramble to impose new and higher taxes and to adopt other policies which would hamper and impede national policies designed to promote economic recovery. They have provided a partial, though not yet a complete, basis for the development of that comprehensive program of co-operation between the federal and the provincial governments which we envisaged as essential to promote the maximum development of our resources and to assure full employment and a wide measure of social security for the Canadian people as a whole.

In all these ways the agreements have contributed to the strength and independence of provincial governments and to the health and vitality of the Canadian confederation. They have added a large measure of economic autonomy to the political autonomy enjoyed by the provinces which have entered into them. It is a travesty to suggest, as has been done so many times in this house in recent weeks, that they have weakened provincial autonomy or created an undue degree of centralization in this country. Two attempts have been made to build a case to support this charge.

The first attempt was based on the argument that the tax rental agreements involved an excessive use of subsidies which threatened the freedom of action of the provincial governments. In reply to that it should first be pointed out that the payments being made to the provinces under the tax rental agreements, apart from the statutory subsidies, are not subsidies at all; they are rentals negotiated by provincial governments for the temporary use of certain rights possessed by them. They are business-like arrangements, subject to re-negotiation at least a year before their termination date, and they do not involve the element of charity nor the surrender of one jot or tittle of constitutional rights. In most of these respects they are in marked contrast with the alternative which some of the critics suggest, namely, fiscal need subsidies which would require the provincial governments to come hat in hand to the federal government and plead for assistance on the basis of need rather than of right.

That should be a sufficient answer to the argument. However, even if we take both the tax rentals and statutory subsidies, we find that the total payments being made by the federal government to the provinces constitute a lower percentage of provincial ordinary revenues than the percentage of statutory subsidies to total ordinary revenues in the case of the four original provinces during the first fifteen years after they joined together to form our confederation. Let me give the figures. In the fifteen fiscal years 1868-1882, Nova Scotia derived 74·1 per cent of its ordinary revenue from federal subsidies; in the current fiscal year it is estimated that only 36·1 per cent of its ordinary revenue will come from subsidies and tax rental agreement payments. The corresponding figures in the case of New Brunswick are 77·9 per cent for the earlier period and an estimated 36·9 per cent for the current year. In the first fifteen years after confederation, Ontario derived 39·9 per cent of its total ordinary revenue from federal subsidies and Quebec 45·1 per cent; if these provinces were participating under the agreement, the percentage of their ordinary revenue derived from tax rentals and subsidies would, it is estimated, be moderately lower than the percentages I have just quoted. In the years following confederation up to 1882, all provinces, on the average, obtained 49·8 per cent of their total ordinary revenues from federal subsidies. For all seven provinces which enjoy the benefits of the tax rental agreement, the percentage of total ordinary revenues derived from tax rentals and subsidies in the current fiscal year is now estimated at only 32 per cent. If such percentages be the test, it is amply clear that we have far less centralization and make much less use of subsidies than the fathers of confederation thought to be necessary and provided for in the making of Canada.

The second attempt was based on the argument that between 1939 and 1947 the increase in dominion tax revenues had been much greater than in the case of the provincial and municipal governments. The simple answer to that argument, of course, is that during the period in question Canada has fought a major war involving the federal government in a perfectly colossal cost and leaving behind it an enormous burden in debt charges, pensions, treatment service costs, rehabilitation and other expenditures for which this government will be responsible for many years to come—and so will it also be for the vastly increased national defence expenditures which the state of the world left by that war is making it necessary for us to carry.

Neither of these arguments stands up nor do any of a similar kind. The simple fact is that the tax rental agreements promote and encourage provincial autonomy by making the provincial governments better able to carry out the heavy responsibilities assigned to them by our constitution. This government yields to no one in its desire to protect their rights and see them financially strong and independent. It yields to no one in its desire to co-operate with them in that kind of constructive partnership which will best enable all governments to tackle and solve the complicated problems of today and give to the Canadian people the measure of peace, prosperity and happiness they have a right to expect.

In this search for co-operation, it will not let pettiness of spirit nor false pride nor undue emphasis on purely financial considerations stand in the way of mutual understanding and constructive results. It will constantly seek out ways of tackling mutual problems and developing practical solutions. —not merely talking about them as some other people do.

THE GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS: REVIEW OF 1948-49 AND FORECAST FOR 1949-50

Before appraising the budgetary outlook for the coming fiscal year, it is my duty to report to the house the financial results of the year that is now drawing to its close. The white paper which I am tabling includes the usual detailed statements of revenues and expenditures, and of assets and liabilities. The figures for the year 1948-49 are necessarily preliminary and subject to revision. Our fiscal year ends next week, on March 31, but our books must remain open for several weeks thereafter to record various year-end adjustments and to include all payments made up to April 30 on account of expenditures originating in, and properly chargeable to, the current fiscal year. Final figures for this current year cannot be available for some time.

A year ago I forecast revenue and expenditure figures that would yield a surplus of $489 million. The present figures indicate that our revenues will be $2,768 million, our expenditures $2,193 million, and our surplus $575 million. This surplus of $575 million is $100 million less than we had in the preceding year, but it is $86 million greater than I had forecast for this current year.

A year ago I based my estimates on what I then called a "conservatively optimistic forecast." In fact the expansion of the national income has been somewhat greater than that which I had predicted, and as a result our tax revenues are turning out a little better than the forecast, but the excess is not very great—less than 2½ per cent. We will obtain more from non-tax revenues and special receipts and credits than I had forecast, but expenditures, on the other hand, are within 1 per cent of my forecast.

Considering the magnitude of the total sums involved and the length of time ahead that these forecasts have to be made, I take a good deal of satisfaction in the close relationship of these forecasts and the actual results.

Mr. Case: Almost a perfect score.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I think the hon. member is right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): At least a hole in one.

Mr. Graydon: The last inning you mean.

Mr. Abbott: I am looking forward to hearing from my hon. friends later in the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Abbott: I do not propose to comment at length on the details of revenue and expenditure, but shall content myself, and I hope the house, with a few general remarks.

Direct taxes, which include personal and corporate income taxes, the excess profits tax and succession duties have yielded $1,369 million, or $51 million greater than a year ago. They accounted for more than 56 per cent of our total tax revenue.

Indirect taxes, which include all customs and excise taxes and duties, have produced $1,072 million, or $62 million less than a year ago.

The greater yield in direct taxes is a reflection of higher incomes and profits; the decrease in indirect taxes is the result of the lower rates of duty under the Geneva agreements, the restriction of imports under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act and the removal a year ago of the amusement tax, the sales taxes on prepared and packaged foods, and certain other indirect taxes.

Non-tax revenues, that is, post-office receipts and revenues from investments, were $210 million, or $32 million greater than last year. Special receipts and credits, chiefly sales of surplus war assets and sundry refunds, amounted to $117 million. This is $125 million less than a year ago.

On the expenditure side the principal decrease is $229 million in demobilization, reconversion and special expenditures. This decrease was almost exactly balanced by increases of $203 million in ordinary expenditures and $21 million in the deficits of government owned enterprises.

To a considerable extent this increase in ordinary expenditures is due to transfers of activities from the demobilization accounts to the ordinary accounts, and for the rest it stems from higher old age pensions, increased numbers of persons entitled to family allowances, the expansion of health services, more exploration, survey and mapping work, increased research expenditures, improved roads and tourist facilities in our national parks, improvements in airports and aids to air navigation, the betterment of maritime ports and harbours works, and generally from the effects of the higher price levels of all government operations, including the costs of construction and the costs of materials and supplies purchased, and including necessary adjustments in civil service salaries. I am very keenly aware of these increases in expenditures, and I can assure the house that we are constantly striving to maintain and improve both efficiency and economy in all government activities.

In summary then, our revenues for the year now ending are $103 million less than the preceding year, expenditures as a whole are down $2 million, and the surplus of $575 million is $101 million less than last year. There, in brief, is the result of our current financial operations for the year, and that is the amount by which the net debt of Canada has been reduced.

But, as has to be pointed out each year, the cash position and the cash requirements of the government, as distinct from its revenues and expenditures, are of almost equal importance in their bearing upon the incomes and expenditures of the individuals who make up this nation. Apart entirely from the sale of new securities or the redemption of old debt, the government receives and pays out each year large sums of cash that do not really belong to what an accountant might call its "income account",—they are neither revenue nor expenditure in the accounting or budgetary sense. Moreover some items of revenue and expenditure do not involve any cash receipts or cash outlays.

To arrive at our cash surplus, the $575 million budget surplus must be adjusted upward by $75 million on account of these non-cash items. Then we must add $128 million of cash receipts in the form of additions to various pension and trust accounts. This gives us a total of $778 million available for cash outlays that do not belong in the income account. Of this total $450 million were advanced to the foreign exchange control board to finance its increase in gold and United States dollar reserves, and $57 million were loaned to the United Kingdom and other countries to finance purchases of Canadian products. That is, $507 million were used in connection with the financing of our export surplus. Then we made loans and investments in Canada to the amount of $89 million, $71 million of which were advanced to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing construction and housing loans. The total of all these loans, investments and advances is $596 million, and when you deduct that from the $778 million of cash available you get a cash surplus of $182 million. To this cash surplus were added $224 million resulting from sales of securities rom our securities investment account. Of he resulting $406 million we used $372 nillion to make a net reduction in our funded lebt, and the remaining $34 million served o increase our cash balances.

Our securities investment account is the ne in which the government temporarily olds some of its own securities rather than olding larger cash balances, and it is neces- ary to make allowances for changes in this ccount in order to get a proper figure for he change in funded debt in the hands of thers. Consequently the reduction of $372 nillion in our total funded debt should be ffset by the $224 million reduction in the unded debt held in our investment account. Ve then see the reduction in funded debt utstanding outside this account was $148 nillion. This may be considered as the mount of our cash surplus used to reduce ebt, the remainder of it being used to ncrease our cash on hand.

To summarize this explanation I should ke, with the permission of the house, to put n Hansard at this point a short table recon- iling our budget surplus and our cash osition:

Budget Surplus and Cash Position

		(millions)
et cash balance arising from the current year's budgetary surplus (i.e. budgetary surplus of $575 million adjusted for non-cash items)		$650
dd other receipts:
Increases in annuity, pension, insurance and guaranty accounts	$93
Increases in floating debt, deposit and trust accounts, and sundry suspense accounts	35
		128
		$778
educt other disbursements:
Advances to the foreign exchange control board	$450
Loans to the United Kingdom and other governments (net)	57
Advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation	71
Increases in other loans, advances and investments (net)	18
		596
ash surplus—i.e. balance available for debt reduction and/or increase in cash balances		$182
dd:
Net sales of securities from securities investment account		224
		$406
educt:
Reduction in Canadian funded debt	$472
Less increase in United States funded debt	100
Net reduction in funded debt		372
et increase in cash balances during the year		$ 34

The greater part of the reduction in the funded debt has taken the form of repaying approximately $286 million on account of the compulsory savings portion of the personal income taxes of 1943 and 1944, and the refundable portion of the excess profits taxes of 1943. This completes the repayment of the refundable portion of personal income taxes.

I must not leave this part of my report to the house without referring to the very gratifying response to our offerings of Canada savings bonds to the general public. As hon. members know, the purchase of these bonds is restricted to individuals and is limited to not more than $1,000 of any one series to any one person. Sales of the second series of these bonds reached $288 million. A third series was opened for subscription last October, and sales to date are $248 million. The public response to these issues, and particularly the volume of subscriptions made through the payroll savings plan, shows that Canada savings bonds fill very acceptably a real investment need for the rank and file of the Canadian people.

These results for the year should be a source of gratification to all Canadians. We have reduced our net debt by $575 million at the time when we could best afford to do so. It is still a very large debt—a net debt of $11·8 billion, and a total funded debt of $15·6 billion. There will undoubtedly be years when we will need to increase it in order to finance expenditures in excess of revenue, when economic conditions make that wise or necessary. An indefinite growth in the debt, and in the cost of servicing it, must eventually undermine confidence in our currency and our national finances.

I think most Canadians will regard the policy we have followed as one of simple common sense. Yet some hon. members opposite have insisted that we should have been less prudent, that we should not have attempted to reduce our debt this year, that we should have borrowed to pay off refundable savings or to finance the recovery in our exchange reserves. While arguing that taxes should have been drastically lower, they have also been urging higher and higher expenditures on a bewildering variety of projects. I ask myself how anyone can take as serious and responsible criticisms of this kind. They ask us to believe that the people of Canada would have been better off this past year had taxes been substantially lower, and our debt substantially higher.

That is not the case. Large tax reductions last year would have come too early to be of real value to the public as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: Even in June it will be pretty late.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friends may not laugh quite so loudly in a moment, Mr. Speaker. I repeat, large tax reductions last year would have come too early to be of real value to the public as a whole, because the public's expenditure, even without tax reductions, was large enough to buy everything available—indeed it was a bit too large, and buying pressure forced up the cost of living. Lower income taxes in 1948 would have meant a higher cost of living. Some might have gained, it is true—those whose incomes are high and whose concern with the cost of living is relatively small. But the general run of citizens and taxpayers would not have been farther ahead—they would have paid less to the public treasury but more to those private treasuries where the gains from a higher cost of living would have come to rest.

Mr. Rowe: What a change a few months have made.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Now we have heard everything.

Mr. Abbott: The laughter has abated somewhat, Mr. Speaker.

It was plain for all to see that the nation as a whole was fully employed last year. More spending would not have led to any significant increase in production. To have reduced taxes then in order to let people spend more would have been a delusion. It made far more sense to use the surplus income—surplus from the viewpoint of the nation as a whole—to pay off our debt and restore our essential reserves of gold and United States dollars. It is hard for the individual taxpayer to see it that way, naturally, because it is true that if he alone had more to spend and less to pay in taxes he would be better off. He does not realize that there would be two or three million others doing the same, and the competition between them is what causes trouble—is what feeds the inflationary spiral. We in parliament have to see the picture as a whole, and it is when we look at it as a whole that we see the common sense in the decisions we took here last year.

Let me turn now to the coming year. The total of the main estimates for next year, including statutory items and those to be voted, amounts to $2,217 million—a substantial increase over last year's estimates, reflecting mainly a considerable increase in the national defence program and also higher prices and rates of pay. We have also this year included in the main estimates a number of items of types which last year were more common in the supplementaries—notably construction projects on which it is hoped to get started well before the fall and winter weather make this type of work more costly. To the main estimates will have to be added special estimates for Newfoundland which will probably exceed $50 million. We shall also have the usual supplementary estimates, although I do not expect they will be nearly as large as in this past year. I fear that we face again a deficit in the C.N.R. that will require a subsequent vote from parliament. It will also prove wise, I believe, to add further to our general reserve against the active assets on our balance sheet. All in all, I think I must budget in the expectation that total expenditures in 1949-50 may amount to about $2,390 million.

On the side of revenue, forecasting is as usual more difficult and uncertain, because our tax yields are now very sensitive to changes in economic conditions and the national income. On the basis of our present tax laws, and in the expectation that prices and production will hold to about their present levels with only normal seasonal changes, and that we have average crop yields this year, I now estimate that in the absence of any tax changes our revenues for the next fiscal year would amount in all to about $2,800 million.

The make-up of this total is given in the table, showing each of the major items in the forecast, together with the estimate for the year now closing. For the convenience of hon. members, I should like the consent of the house to have this incorporated in Hansard in the usual way without my taking time to read it.

Forecast of Revenue
(Before tax changes)

	Fiscal year 1949-50 (Forecast)	Actual Fiscal year 1948-49 (Preliminary)
	(in millions of dollars)
Customs duties	235	225
Excise duties	210	206
Sales taxes (net)	385	378
Other excise taxes	260	259
Income taxes
Individuals	835	771
Corporations	550	490
Interest, dividends, etc.	45	43
Excess profits taxes	...	40
Succession duties	26	26
Miscellaneous taxes	4	4
Total tax revenue	2,550	2,442
Non-tax revenue	200	210
Total ordinary revenue	2,750	2,652
Special receipts and credits	50	116
	2,800	2,768

From the figures I have given it is evident that in the absence of tax changes I would expect next year that our accounts would show a surplus of $410 million.

It is important, as in the case of the past year, to consider not only this budget surplus but also our prospective cash position, in order to appraise properly the outlook for next year. Eliminating non-cash revenues and expenditures, this budget surplus of $410 million might yield a surplus of available cash of about $500 million. To this we must add various receipts in pension and trust accounts and similar deferred liability accounts, which are likely to amount to nearly $150 million. This sum would probably exceed various loans and advances other than those to the foreign exchange control board and to governments abroad by as much as $25 million. Consequently in the absence of tax changes we might expect a cash surplus of about $525 million, reduced by whatever amounts may be required for financing our export surplus either by accumulating reserves or by foreign loans. It is still too early, with all the uncertainties of this present year to say, even roughly, what funds the government will have to find for financing our export surplus in one way or another.

TAX POLICY

What I have already said in commenting upon the economic situation, the results of last year, and the prospects for the new year, will already have indicated to you, Mr. Speaker, that I feel the time has now arrived when this parliament should enact some further substantial reductions in taxes. The increasing flow of goods available for sale to consumers without higher prices makes tax reductions economically feasible. The prospective surplus of revenue over expenditure, in the absence of tax changes, and even of a substantial cash surplus over our requirements for loans and investments, makes tax reduction financially feasible. The reduction of more than $1,600 million in our net debt made in the last three years has put us in a position now where we may prudently give consideration to further tax reduction. Finally, sir, I should say that I have been led to believe in recent months, as no doubt other hon. members have, that most of the Canadian people would support and even welcome an enlarged measure of tax reduction this year.

If this parliament should approve the program I am now going to propose, in addition to the tax reductions enacted following the Ilsley budgets of October, 1945, and May, 1946, and following my budgets of June, 1947, and May, 1948, it will have carried through a program of tax reduction such as no parliament has ever made before, here or anywhere else, I believe, and far more than most of us thought possible when we were elected following the victory in Europe in 1945. In approaching our task this year we should bear in mind that this is the continuation and rounding out of a program—not the beginning of a new policy. We have brought our high wartime taxes down by careful stages over a period of four years, and now we should aim at establishing a peacetime revenue system that may be varied up or down as the needs of the changing times require. We cannot complete this year all those improvements in the form and nature of our taxes that have been started in recent years, but we can carry them a long stage farther.

In selecting the fields for tax reduction we should bear in mind several general considerations. In the first place, we must recognize that most Canadians, like other peoples in recent years, have shown that they prefer to pay taxes in forms other than high income taxes. I think most of us believe the income tax on individuals is the fairest and best tax we have. The trouble is that we just don't like it, or at least we don't like too much of it. The public in peacetime will apparently only tolerate a level of income taxes that is far short of enough to yield the revenues that Canada requires now, and is going to require in years to come. Consequently we must plan on retaining as normal sources of revenue substantial taxes on goods and services, and taxes on corporate profits. In neither of these fields can we expect now to get back to the pre-war level of tax rates—at least not until the threats to peace disappear and the people cease to demand that the government carry out many of the types of services and transfer payments now being provided.

Consequently we face now, in addition to the problem of establishing a fair and proper schedule of income taxes, the need to adapt the form and nature of our taxes on goods and services and corporate profits to make them efficient, fair, and flexible sources of revenue, causing as little harm and irritation as possible for each dollar of revenue we must derive from them.

The second consideration relates more to the immediate future. The present economic situation is such that it is more appropriate this year to encourage increased expenditures by consumers, rather than capital expenditures by business. Business profits are already high, on the whole, and a large part of them is being devoted to capital expenditures. Markets for the goods and services required for additional capital expenditures by business are still relatively tight, and prices of machinery and equipment, and construction costs, are still very high. It would not be wise, I believe, to stimulate increased expenditures of this nature this year by general reductions in corporate taxation. On the other hand, there is, as I have already said, more opportunity now to satisfy increased expenditures by consumers. Consequently the principal tax reductions I am going to propose are those affecting individuals, both personal income taxes and taxes on things the consumer buys. I have, however, some important changes to propose in the distribution and nature of corporate taxes.

I propose now, Mr. Speaker, to state and explain our program of tax changes and tax reductions.

1. PERSONAL INCOME TAX

The house will recall that there have been three substantial reductions in income taxes since hostilities ceased. Late in 1945 there was a general reduction of 16 per cent. Effective January 1, 1947, there was a second reduction in rates and an increase in exemptions; and in mid-1947 there was a third general reduction in rates. Tonight I propose still further substantial reductions in this tax in the form of both reduced rates and increased exemptions.

The present basic exemptions are $750 for single persons and $1,500 for married persons. I propose that these be increased to $1,000 and $2,000 respectively.

The exemption in respect of children eligible for family allowance is now $100. I propose that this be increased to $150.

The exemption for other dependents which is now $300, will be raised to $400.

By these moves we shall return to pre-war levels of exemptions, and in so doing will relieve about three-quarters of a million present taxpayers of all income tax liability.

I also propose a downward adjustment in the rates of tax. The complete details of the new rates are contained in the budget resolutions, and with the consent of the house I should like to insert in Hansard at this point the usual tables showing comparisons of the old and new taxes for single and for married persons at various income levels.

Note: (1) The above figures show the actual income tax liability of a taxpayer with family allowance children, but in order to arrive at his true net position the amount of family allowance received for his children must be offset against his tax liability. For example, assuming he receives the average family allowance payment of $72.00 a child, a taxpayer with an income of $3,000 and two children would find that under present rates his income tax exceeded his family allowance by $86.00, while under the proposed rates his family allowance payments will exceed his income tax liability by $39.00.

(2) In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total. No account has been taken of the new 10 per cent tax credit for dividends.

In revising the rates of tax applicable to various income levels I have sought to achieve not only a reduction in rates, but also greater simplicity and greater equity. The two chief features of the new table of rates are first a large increase in the size of the first tax bracket to which the lowest rate of tax applies. Formerly this was a bracket of $100, now it is to be a bracket of $1,000. The second change in principle is to raise the point in the income curve at which the 50 per cent tax rate begins to operate.

Under the new table of rates three out of four persons who will still be paying tax will pay at a rate not exceeding 15 per cent on their income above the exemption level. No one will pay more than 15 per cent on any part of his income unless and until his income exceeds: $2,000 in the case of a single person; $3,000 in the case of a married person without dependents; and $3,300 for a married person with two children of family allowance age.

Let me give a few typical comparisons of the old and new rates.

A single person now paying $29 a year on an income of $1,000 will henceforth pay no tax whatever. A married person without dependents now paying $70 a year on an income of $2,000 will no longer have to pay any income tax. A married man with two children under 16 now pays $90 tax on $2,300 of income; henceforth he will pay no tax at all.

A single person at $1,500 will get a reduction of $45 or about 38 per cent; at $2,000 the reduction will be about $70 or 32 per cent; at $3,000 a reduction of $100 or 24 per cent; at $5,000 a reduction of $135 or 16 per cent; and at $10,000 a reduction of $293 or about 13 per cent.

In the case of married couples without children the reduction at $2,500 will be $95 or about 56 per cent; at $3,000 a reduction of $120 or 44 per cent; at $5,000 it will be $160 or about 24 per cent; at $10,000 it will be $330 or 17 per cent.

Comparison of the position of married couples with children of family allowance age is complicated by the necessity of taking the family allowance payments into account. All married taxpayers with two family allowance children having incomes of $2,300 or less henceforth will have no tax to pay and will, of course, receive the full amount of the family allowance payments. At $2,500 the amount of tax payable will be reduced from $130 to $30. If we offset family allowance payments against income tax such a family now receives on balance $14 a year from the treasury. In future they will, on balance, receive $114 from the treasury. At $3,000 this class of taxpayer, on balance, now pays $86 to the treasury; in future he will, on balance, receive $39 from the treasury. At $5,000 this same taxpayer will get a tax reduction of $177 or 28 per cent and at $10,000 a reduction of $348 or 18 per cent.

We propose, further, Mr. Speaker, that all these changes be effective as from January 1, 1949.

My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, is expediting the preparation of new tax deduction tables for employers. These will be distributed as soon as available and employers are authorized to put them into effect immediately on receipt. It is expected that it will be possible to have the lower deductions in operation throughout the country within a few weeks. Furthermore, employers will be authorized to cease deductions immediately from those taxpayers no longer taxable under the new exemptions and a table is being made public tonight showing the weekly or other pay period amounts below which employers need no longer make tax deductions. My colleague will immediately make arrangements in co-operation with employers to expedite the making of refunds to persons no longer taxable but who have had tax deducted at the source since the first of the year. This will be done as quickly as possible, but in view of the great number of refunds that will have to be made it will require some months to complete the job.

While most of the reductions resulting from the new exemptions and reduced rates accrue to the benefit of the lower and middle income groups, I have not been unmindful of those business and professional people earning somewhat higher incomes. I have had particularly in mind the point at which the taxpayer is required to surrender to the treasury 50 per cent or more of any additional earnings, and have raised it to a more reasonable level.

These are the major changes we are proposing in the personal income tax field. But there are a number of other proposed changes to which I should refer.

At present all investment income in excess of $1,800 bears an extra tax of 4 per cent. In keeping with the general increase in exemptions, this $1,800 exemption will be increased to $2,400 or to the total of the taxpayer's personal exemptions, whichever is the greater.

The present law requires that in determining the income of a dependent for eligibility purposes it is necessary to include income, such as war disability pensions, that is exempt from tax under the law. I propose that this requirement be removed. The effect of this change is that only income that would be taxable income will be taken into account.

With reference to permissible items under the medical expenses allowance, and in response to many individual representations, I propose to allow the cost of a wheelchair as a medical expense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: I see the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) is applauding vigorously. His was one of the representations that I have had.

Under this same heading I also propose that the optional deduction of a flat amount of $500 now granted to a blind person be extended to persons confined throughout the taxation year to a bed or wheelchair.

Amendments will also be introduced confirming the exemption now granted to clergymen in respect of the rental value of a free residence provided by a congregation and in addition extending the exemption to rent paid by a clergyman renting his own quarters where a free residence is not provided by the congregation.

In the case of interest penalties accruing on unpaid amounts of tax where the taxpayer has received no assessment notice it is now possible, in view of the greatly expedited assessment tempo in the income tax division, to reduce the period beyond which interest will cease to accrue from the present twenty months to twelve months.

I estimate that the net effect of all these reductions and amendments affecting personal income taxes will be a tax reduction in a full year amounting to $270 million or about 32 per cent of our total estimated revenue from this source. In the coming fiscal year, however, the loss of revenue to the treasury will be about $235 million, because part of the effects of the tax reductions in 1949 incomes will not be reflected in revenues until after March 31, 1950.

2. SUCCESSION DUTIES

In view of the very considerable relief granted in respect of succession duties last year, Mr. Speaker, I am proposing no change in the Succession Duties Act this year. It will be recalled that my last budget provided for the complete exemption of estates up to $50,000 from liability for federal succession duties, and removed the ceiling on the amount of gifts that may be made for charitable or educational purposes free of succession duty.

3. CORPORATION TAXES

I have several important proposals to announce relating to the corporate tax field. In last year's budget we undertook a successful general overhaul and consolidation of the Income Tax Act. Within this new framework I am now bringing forward a program of policy changes as part of the progressive improvement of our tax system.

At present we have a flat rate of 30 per cent on all corporate profits. I am recommending that this 30 per cent be reduced to 10 per cent on profits up to $10,000 and increased to 33 per cent on profits in excess of $10,000. The house will at once recognize this as tax relief for small businesses and will, I trust, be heartily in accord with the policy. Our country as a whole owes a great deal to the small family type of business. They have to struggle along, grow and develop in competition with large and well financed corporations whose activities may be nation-wide. My own belief is that small businesses should be encouraged and it seems to me that a useful way to do this is to lower the tax and take less out of the funds they need for growth and expansion.

All corporations, regardless of size, will, of course, receive this relief on the first $10,000 of profits but, as I have said, the rate of tax on profits in excess of this figure will be increased by 3 per cent. The net result of these changes is a decrease in tax burden for corporations whose profit is less than about $77,000; that is, the large reduction on the first $10,000 of profit more than offsets the slight increase in the rate on profits between $10,000 and $77,000. Where profits are in excess of $77,000 there is a greater tax under the new rate structure payable by the corporation itself, but in the light of my next proposal it will be seen that this additional tax may be more than offset by benefits to the shareholders if the corporation distributes a reasonable proportion of its profits.

My second proposal introduces a measure of reform which has long been a declared objective of this government. I refer to the removal of double taxation of corporate profits, which was one of the aims of the program we placed before the dominion-provincial conference in 1945-46. Today we find governments in this country, as well as in most other countries, taxing away at least a third of corporate profits. In addition, the personal income tax rates apply in full to what is distributed out of the remaining two-thirds. The tax may be as high as 80 per cent upon distributions to shareholders. It seems to me that under a system of private enterprise which depends for its existence on a steady flow of venture capital we cannot afford to neglect the implication of this defect in our tax system, which has been accentuated by the increase in both corporate and personal income tax rates. We had hopes that the working out of satisfactory arrangements with all the provinces would have enabled us to deal with this problem before now, but the government feels that it cannot longer defer a beginning in this field. It is not a question of the immediate profit position of Canadian business because I think it is clear that today we in Canada are prosperous as never before. Rather it is a matter of concern for the future under a system where we depend, and must depend, for full employment and the creation of new wealth on the willingness of our people to risk their money in constructive enterprises.

As a first step in dealing with this problem I am proposing that parliament should allow individuals a credit against their personal income tax equal to 10 per cent of the dividends they receive from common shares of Canadian taxpaying corporations. While I have used the expression "common" shares, the law will actually confine the credit to the most junior class of shareholders of a company, and it will not be granted in respect of shares that enjoy any special preference. Generally speaking, the incidence of the corporate tax is upon the common shareholders, and I believe that they rather than preferred shareholders should be granted such relief as can be given at this time.

In discussing the increase in the general corporate rate by 3 per cent I said that this meant an increase in tax burden for the corporation itself where profits were above the $77,000 mark. The fact is, however, that if the corporation distributes more than about one-half of its profits after tax in dividends in respect of which the shareholders get a 10 per cent tax credit, there will have been a net decrease in the tax burden over-all from the point of view of the corporation and the shareholders considered together, that is, the corporate rate increase is more than offset by the decrease in tax for the shareholder in all cases where there is a reasonable distribution of profits. I should like to call particular attention now to the fact that as a result of the low corporate rate of 10 per cent coupled with the 10 per cent tax credit this budget removes completely double taxation on small businesses where profits are less than $10,000.

A further proposal affecting the taxation of profits is that the loss carry-forward period be lengthened to five years instead of the present three-year limit.

During the past year a great deal of study has been given to our system of allowances for depreciation. The problems in this field are highly technical, and I cannot in this speech enter into much detail regarding changes which are to be made. I shall, however, state briefly what they are, and a full explanation of them will be given when we are in committee on the budget resolutions.

In the past allowances have been granted on the basis of wear and tear of assets used in earning the income subject to tax. Under the new regulations which my colleague the Minister of National Revenue is proposing, the governing principle will be the amortization of costs of depreciable assets. Incidentally, an effect of this will be to allow for obsolescence hitherto unrecognized under our act. In the second place the rates of write-off will apply to the written-down value of the asset account rather than to the total asset account. In the technical language of the accountant this means changing from the straight-line method of depreciation to the diminishing balance principle. Of course the rates of depreciation will be appropriately increased having regard to the diminishing base to which they apply. Thirdly, it is proposed to introduce what might loosely be described as a recapture provision. This provision will operate to ensure in effect that the deductions for amortizing the cost of an asset shall not exceed the final proven cost of the asset to the taxpayer. It will call for an adjustment against future write-offs where assets are disposed of after some use. I might add here that the so-called add-back or adjustment will be limited to the written-down value at the end of 1948 regardless of the price realized on disposal of assets in order that there can be no possible claim that under this provision capital gains are being taxed, or that this recapture provision has any retroactive effect.

I believe that these principles which I have outlined will mean a great improvement over the old system and will be a further step towards greater simplicity in our system of taxing business profits. There should be a real reduction in the accounting work both for business concerns and the tax department as well. The system will likewise be more equitable to the taxpayer and to the treasury. I shall welcome a full discussion of these recommendations.

Another problem that has been given a great deal of study in my department and the Department of National Revenue during the past year is the difficult position that many family businesses may find themselves in when their growth has been financed by the plowing back of profits over a long series of years. At present, on winding up, the distribution of assets to the extent of undistributed income on hand becomes taxable in the hands of the recipient at personal income tax rates in the year in which the assets are distributed. So severe is the application of our present law in such cases that many such businesses have been driven into a great variety of extremely complicated and cumbersome devices to secure legal avoidance of the excessive tax burden to which they are now potentially liable. As a result we are losing revenue to which we think the public treasury has a justifiable claim.

The problem is an extremely difficult one and I think it fair to say that there has not been much unanimity of view among those who have studied it as to the most equitable and practicable solution. We have been considering a plan under which a straight percentage tax paid by such a corporation at the time of winding up or at the time of capitalization of earned surplus will relieve the earned surplus of tax liability in the hands of the eventual recipient. Whether this would be equitable and, if so, what the flat tax should be, are questions which require the most careful consideration. I am not prepared to make specific proposals for enactment at this session of parliament. I hope that there may be an opportunity of having a plan of the type mentioned discussed when we are in committee.

In addition to the major adjustments in the corporation tax structure outlined a few minutes ago I am proposing some comparatively minor amendments affecting corporations.

I propose that the allowances now granted for expenditures on oil, mineral and gas exploration be extended for a further period of three years, that is, for 1950, 1951 and 1952. The present law now provides for deductions only in respect of expenses incurred to the end of 1949. The extra tax credit granted in the case of expenditures on deep test wells will be extended for one year, that is, to the end of 1950. Also the three-year tax exemption for new metalliferous and certain industrial mineral mines will be extended to cover such mines that come into production in 1950, 1951 and 1952.

There will be several amendments introduced affecting companies having business operations abroad. The more important of these will remove a complicated procedure by which corporations having controlled subsidiaries abroad are now allowed to claim a tax credit against their Canadian tax for taxes paid by these subsidiaries abroad and in some cases by companies which are in turn subsidiaries of the foreign subsidiary. In view of the fact that most countries in which Canadian companies are now doing business abroad impose corporation taxes as heavy or heavier than the Canadian tax, the effect of the present tax credit provisions is that no Canadian tax is imposed on this income. The procedure for attaining this result, however, is extremely complicated and it is proposed that the same result be achieved by an amendment which would allow dividends from such controlled foreign subsidiaries to be taken into Canadian income free of tax. This will greatly simplify one small but very complicated provision of the law at no appreciable cost in revenue.

A group of other miscellaneous amendments, mostly technical in nature, will be contained in the bill. They are not of general interest to the public so I shall not burden the house with the details at this time.

In concluding this discussion of corporation taxes, I estimate that all the proposals I have made, including the tax credit for dividends, will on balance result in no loss to the treasury. The three per cent increase in the general corporate tax rate will, in effect, enable the other changes to be made without any net loss of revenue.

4. TARIFFS AND TRADE

Before taking up excise taxes and duties, I want to say something about tariffs and trade.

I have already discussed the major changes which took place in Canada's foreign trade position during the past year. The record reflects both the difficulties which some of our exports have encountered, and the large degree of success with which Canadian exporters and the Canadian government, working together, have sought out and developed alternative markets when traditional markets were closed to us. It must be regarded as a major achievement that Canadian exports reached a new peacetime record in 1948. This result is all the more remarkable when we consider that United States exports in the same period fell by nearly 18 per cent.

Chief credit for this achievement belongs to Canadian producers whose energy and resourcefulness made the right goods available for export at the right prices. But the government's achievements in reducing trade barriers and developing new trade opportunities contributed greatly to the maintenance and expansion of our trade.

The increase which took place in our total exports, and particularly the 44 per cent growth which took place in our exports to the United States, would not have been possible without the tariff concessions which we obtained under the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade.

As I mentioned in my budget speech last year, most of the tariff reductions agreed upon at Geneva became provisionally effective on January 1, 1948. The first year's results are apparent from the trade figures which I have mentioned. These results, in my opinion, provide a strong endorsement of the policies which this government has followed in the field of international trade.

As hon. members know, trade negotiations with 13 additional countries are to commence at Annecy next month. As a result of these negotiations, the mutually beneficial concessions negotiated at Geneva will, it is confidentially expected, become applicable both to a wider circle of countries and to a broader range of commodities. As hon. members know, the legislation for the extension of the United States Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is now before the Congress. When this legislation is passed, we will have the opportunity to seek a further trade agreement with that country. We would hope that it may be possible to conclude a further agreement similar to the three entered into in the past under that legislation, but one which would also open up wider possibilities for our exports of manufactured goods.

In view of the pending tariff negotiations at Annecy and other trade discussions which are envisaged, and in view also of the intention to introduce legislation at a later date to implement the general agreement on tariffs and trade, I am not proposing any tariff changes at the present time. For the same reasons the government does not intend to invite parliament to extend the special temporary provisions regarding the duties on cotton and rayon piece goods. These will expire July 1, 1949 in accordance with the legislation passed by parliament last year.

During the past 16 months we have had in effect certain emergency restrictions on imports into Canada. These restrictions have been an important factor in achieving the notable improvement which has taken place in our foreign exchange reserve position. When these emergency restrictions were introduced I stated that they would be relaxed or removed as rapidly as possible. Some relaxations have already been made, but the time has not yet come when these exchange conservation measures can be dropped entirely. Canada's foreign exchange reserves are still not as large as we would like them to be under present circumstances. A further increase is necessary if we are to face future uncertainties with confidence. However, the improvement which has taken place in our balance of payments justifies some further relaxations at this time.

After a careful appraisal of the situation, the government has decided to increase the present quotas on consumer goods listed in schedule II of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act by approximately 25 per cent. In addition some items will be transferred from the prohibited list to the quota list as of April first, and on a few other items the restrictions will be suspended completely. As I announced last December, it is the government's intention to remove all the remaining import restrictions on fresh fruits and vegetables by next July. Complete details of these new relaxations are the subject of a statement, a copy of which I am now tabling.

At this time I wish to emphasize that it is still an important aspect of the emergency exchange conservation policy to facilitate the efforts of United Kingdom exporters to regain as much as possible of their historic share of the Canadian import market which they inevitably lost during the war years. This is particularly so in the case of cotton piece goods, which is the field where the greatest change between pre-war and post-war sources of supply occurred.

While United Kingdom cotton textile exports to Canada in 1948 did not reach the levels that we had hoped to see achieved, there was an encouraging improvement. The yardage of United Kingdom cotton goods exported to Canada in 1948 was more than four times that of 1947. We believe that Canada offers a sound long-term market for still larger quantities of United Kingdom cotton piece goods than are coming here now.

The quota applicable to textiles from scheduled countries is to be increased somewhat in the interests of Canadian users, but the continued operation of this quota will still give a strong incentive for further expansion in Canadian purchases of British textiles. It is to be earnestly hoped that both Canadian importers and United Kingdom exporters in their mutual long-run interests will continue to make every effort to consolidate and expand this trade on a sound business basis.

The Canadian government has taken and will continue to take all feasible steps to encourage the expansion of British trade with Canada. We are keenly aware that we must buy from our customers if we are to continue to sell to them. However, we cannot solve this problem alone. We have provided opportunities and created incentives for the purchase of British goods. It is up to British exporters and the British authorities to take advantage of these opportunities and to see that their goods are made available for export to Canada at prices which our consumers can afford to pay.

The most important lines of British exports to Canada have been greatly assisted, and are continuing to be assisted, by the operation of quotas under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. These quotas restrict competitive imports from the United States, and give British producers preferred access to their pre-war share of the Canadian market. This is one of many steps which have been taken in applying the Canadian government's policy of using every practicable measure to encourage imports from the United Kingdom.

Early in the war Canada granted a 50 per cent discount from the normal preferential duties to a wide range of British goods. The duties on British cottons and rayons were entirely removed. Moreover, these wartime tariff reductions were maintained in effect until January 1, 1948, when they were replaced by the reduced tariff rates negotiated at Geneva.

In order to remove any possible obstacle to British trade arising out of our anti-dumping legislation I introduced last year an amendment to the dumping provisions of the customs tariff. Under authority of this amendment several important classes of goods, which might otherwise have been subject to dumping duty when imported from Britain, have been declared exempt. Measures such as these, together with the special efforts of the Department of Trade and Commerce and its commercial representatives in the United Kingdom to stimulate the interest of British exporters in the Canadian market, are playing a constructive part in expanding British sales in this country.

The government of Canada has made repeated requests at the very highest level that authorities in the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries do all that they can to take advantage of the favourable opportunities which Canada has offered for their exports. The Canadian government has also made it clear that it does not look with favour on purchasing arrangements or bilateral trade deals which tend to divert away from Canada either British or colonial products which otherwise could be sent here, particularly in cases where we have established and are maintaining substantial tariff preferences in favour of such goods.

Canadian import statistics which I quoted earlier make it clear that the efforts made both here and in Britain to enlarge Canada's purchases from the United Kingdom are bearing fruit. British export figures offer confirmation, if any is required. They show that the United Kingdom's exports to all countries increased substantially in 1948, and that its exports to Canada increased even more. The value of United Kingdom exports to all countries was 39 per cent higher in 1948 than in 1947. In the same period its exports to Canada increased 60 per cent. It will be agreed that this is a large and encouraging increase. I sincerely hope that this trend will be continued and thus provide a sound basis for the maintenance of our important export markets in the United Kingdom.

5. EXCISE TAXES AND EXCISE DUTIES

Under the exigencies of wartime finance we were compelled in our search for revenue to get into a rather complicated structure of commodity taxes. In addition to the traditional taxes on beer, wine, spirits and tobacco and the general sales tax, we developed a great variety of taxes. These were necessary indeed indispensable, taxes at the time; but they varied considerably as to rates, as to point of imposition, and as to method of collection.

We cannot afford to forgo most of the revenue these taxes provide, but in my judgment the time has come for a major job of simplification in this superstructure combined with substantial reductions in the number and the rates of these newer taxes.

I shall begin by listing those taxes which we propose shall be entirely repealed.

First, there is the tax of 15 per cent on all travel tickets by air, land or sea, and special taxes on sleeping car berths and parlour car chairs. This tax has been a considerable burden in a country like Canada where distances are so great, and it bears somewhat more heavily on people living at greater distances from the main centres of business and industry. We propose that these taxes be repealed effective midnight tonight. The revenue from these taxes has been $22 million a year.

Closely related to the transportation taxes are those on telegrams, cables, long distance telephone calls and extension telephones. These also bear disproportionately on those living at greater distances from the main centres of business, and in addition they mean added expense to individuals at times of family emergency. It is proposed to repeal all these taxes effective tonight. The revenue reduction will be $7,500,000.

In the third place, the special taxes on soft drinks, carbonic acid gas, candy and chewing gum have never been popular, and administratively they have not been easy to collect. They have, however, been highly productive of revenue at a time when revenue was badly needed. In the year now closing they have yielded more than $49 million. They seem to have been among the least popular of all the so-called "nuisance taxes", and we have come to the conclusion that they can go. It is proposed, therefore, to repeal these also, effective midnight tonight.

Finally, there is one other excise tax that is proposed for outright repeal and that is the special 5 per cent tax on the manufacturer's selling price of buses. This is not a large revenue producer—last year it gave us only $150,000. No other form of public transit equipment bears such a tax, and its disappearance will be a modest benefit to municipalities who operate bus transportation systems.

These are the taxes which we propose for outright and immediate repeal. The total tax reduction involved is approximately $79 million in a full year, and about $69 million in the coming fiscal year.

I turn now to another group of special taxes in respect of which I propose simplification of procedure and reduction in rates effective midnight tonight.

I shall mention first the 25 per cent retail purchase tax on jewelry and related articles. This is the only tax in our whole system that is levied and applied at the retail level. At the time it was imposed, and having regard to the revenue then desired, there were sound reasons for putting it at the retail level; but in line with the simplification of our tax structure, the pattern of which will appear as I continue my speech, we propose that the tax be moved back from the retail level to the manufacturer's level, and that the rate be reduced to 10 per cent effective immediately. The existing exemptions to this tax will continue. The net tax reduction in this case is estimated to be $8 million a year.

In much the same class I put the present 35 per cent tax on the manufacturer's selling price of luggage, bags, purses, fountain pens and pencils and desk sets, and smokers' accessories; and the 25 per cent tax on cigarette lighters. We propose that all these taxes be reduced to 10 per cent at the manufacturer's level. This will involve a tax reduction of $5,800,000 a year.

Similarly it is proposed to reduce from 25 per cent to 10 per cent the tax on cosmetics, toilet articles and preparations, with a consequent tax reduction of $4 million a year.

The present tax structure on matches is a rather complicated schedule based on the number of matches in the box or package. We propose to repeal this whole schedule, and to substitute a straight 10 per cent ad valorem tax. This will mean a tax reduction of $2 million a year.

Rubber tires and inner tubes (but not including original equipment tires) are now subject to a tax of 5 cents a pound. It seems to me that this is both cumbersome and complicated. We propose, therefore, to repeal this poundage tax, and put these tires and tubes into the 10 per cent ad valorem group. No change in revenue yield is expected.

Finally, there is a tax, of minor revenue significance, of 25 per cent on coin-operated games and vending machines. This, too, will be reduced to 10 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Have you any taxes left?

Mr. Abbott: The reductions in tax revenues as a result of all these shifts to this new 10 per cent rate will be about $20 million in a full year and about $17 mililon in the next fiscal year. Added to the reductions in the repealed items, this makes a total reduction in excise taxes of $99 million in a full year, and $86 million in the coming fiscal year.

I am not proposing any changes in the taxes or duties on liquor and tobacco or in the general sales tax rate.

As usual I must give public notice that no claims for refund arising out of these tax repeals and tax reductions in respect of goods on which tax has been paid or is payable will be entertained by my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

With these changes in effect our excise tax structure will be very much simpler and will be available to serve the people of this country as an efficient, equitable and flexible instrument of raising the revenues which are necessary to pay for the services which are now demanded of the federal government.

Let me recapitulate the substance of this commodity tax structure as it will now be.

First, the taxes at special and very high rates on beer, wine, spirits and tobacco.

Second, the general sales tax.

And third, a new group, or more accurately an enlarged group, where a 10 per cent tax in addition to the sales tax is imposed. The list will include such things as radios, phonographs, motorcars, jewelry, furs, cosmetics, luggage, purses, handbags, smokers' accessories, and so on.

This will provide a commodity tax system in which adjustments to varying fiscal requirements can be made by adding or subtracting from the list of goods covered, or by raising or lowering the general rates applicable.

Quite apart from the details of items and rates I commend it to all members of the house as constituting a very long step toward the desirable objective of a coherent and simple, yet efficient and flexible tax system.

CONCLUSION

I can now summarize the net effects of all the tax changes I have proposed by saying that they will produce an estimated total reduction in taxation of $369 million in a full year and about $323 million in the next fiscal year. With the permission of the house I should like to insert in Hansard a recapitulation in tabular form:

After making allowance for tax reduction amounting to about $323 million on the basis of the fiscal year, my revised estimate of revenue for the year will be $2,477 million. With the permission of the house I will place on Hansard a table showing the revised revenue forecast in detail after taking account of the tax changes.

I said earlier that before making any tax reduction it was estimated that we would have a budget surplus of $410 million in the coming year. I have now proposed that $323 million of this be translated into tax reductions, which means that I am budgeting for a surplus of $87 million. This $87 million is a modest, I could almost say a nominal, budget surplus for it represents less than 3½ per cent of our expenditures.

I repeat, and I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that all these estimates of revenue and surplus are based on the assumption that current rates of employment, production and incomes will, on the average, be maintained during the coming year. Should this expectation not be realized, our budget surplus of $87 million could rapidly melt away.

A budget surplus of $87 million will mean a reduction in our net debt by that amount. This reduction may take place either as a result of an increase in our active assets by a reduction in our outstanding debt or by both. It is more difficult than usual to forecast what our cash surplus will be in this coming year, because of the rapid changes that have been taking place in our foreign trade situation and the difficulty of foretelling now what cash the government will need to use in financing Canada's export surplus. Earlier I stated that in the absence of tax changes we could expect to have a cash surplus of $525 million next year, apart from the amounts required to finance our export surplus either by accumulating exchange reserves or making credits. The tax changes will reduce this figure to $202 million. I would hope that we shall succeed in selling enough abroad that our export surplus will be larger than this figure, and that we shall be able to bring our reserves up to a more satisfactory level. Should things develop this way and if, therefore, we need more than $202 million for this purpose, I think it would be the sort of situation that would justify us under present circumstances in borrowing our residual cash requirements.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the third budget that I have had the responsibility of presenting to this house, and the seventh in the preparation of which I have had some part. I take a good deal of personal pride in having been associated with the framing of Canada's economic and financial policy throughout these seven years. Wherever you go outside Canada, and almost everywhere you go within Canada, you find in the minds of those who know the record, a clear appreciation of the fact that the Canadian achievements in matters of economic and financial policy during and since the war rank second only to Canada's fighting record on land, on sea and in the air. We have been fortunate, it is true, but we have also, I think, been skilful, intelligent and prudent in the management of our affairs.

Before I take my seat may I summarize in a few short sentences the financial record of this Liberal government during the life of this present parliament.

In October 1945 we provided tax reductions of $300 million a year.

In June 1946 we provided tax reductions of $266 million a year.

In April 1947 we provided tax reductions of $265 million a year.

In the 1947-48 session we provided tax reductions of $92 million a year.

And now in March, 1949, we are providing tax reductions of $369 million a year.

In these five successive budgets we have made tax reductions which now mount up to nearly $1,300 million a year.

During the past three years we have reduced our net debt by $1,625 million.

During the life of this parliament we have extended social security, improved our health services, and have provided training, re-establishment credits and other benefits to our ex-servicemen on a scale more generous than that of any other country. We have greatly expanded our activities in research, exploration and surveys. And throughout the last four years the increase in employment, in wages, in farm incomes, and in general prosperity has never faltered. I know of no country in the world which can show a better record, or in which I would rather live.

I want to table now the budget resolutions.

$8,660 upon the income of $25,000; and 50 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $25,000 and does not exceed $40,000; or

$16,160 upon the income of $40,000; and 55 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $60,000; or

$269,160 upon the income of $400,000; and 80 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $400,000.

3. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, there may be deducted from tax payable by an individual resident in Canada 10 per cent of the amount of his income that is from dividends on shares, having no preference of any kind, in a corporation resident in Canada that was liable to corporation tax in the taxation year: Provided that in the case of dividends deemed to have been received from a personal corporation the deduction shall only be 10 per cent of that part of the income deemed to have been received by the shareholder as a dividend that the income of the corporation derived from dividends is of the whole income of the corporation.

4. That, with respect to income of corporations earned on and after January 1, 1949; the present rate of tax of 30 per cent shall be reduced to 10 per cent on the first $10,000 of income and increased to 33 per cent on income in excess of $10,000 with corresponding changes in the rates in the case of consolidations.

That, for the purpose of computing income of the 1948 and subsequent taxation years of a member of the clergy or of a religious order or a regular minister of a religious denomination there may be deducted the value of the residence or other living accommodation enjoyed by him as such member or minister to the extent that it would otherwise be included in his income or the rent paid by him for or the fair rental value of such a residence or living accommodation.

8. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the exemption from income of an individual in respect of a spouse supported by him shall not be reduced because of exempt income of the spouse.

9. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, all amounts whether in the form of lump sums or otherwise, received by employees from their employers, whether before, during or after their employment, shall be included in computing income of the employee unless it is established that they cannot reasonably be regarded as consideration for entry into the employment, remuneration for services or consideration for restrictions on the activities of the employee.

10. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, payments made for a wheel chair may be included in the medical expenses for which a deduction from income may be made for the purpose of computing taxable income.

11. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, $500 may be deducted from income for the purpose of computing taxable income of a taxpayer who, throughout the whole of the taxation year, was necessarily confined by reason of illness, injury or affliction to a bed or wheel chair.

12. That special deductions from income to taxpayers engaged in exploring or drilling for natural gas, oil or minerals be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1950, 1951, and 1952 operations on the same basis as for expenses in 1949 operations.

13. That special deduction from taxes to taxpayers engaged in exploring or drilling for oil for expenses incurred on deep-test oil wells be allowed for such expenses in 1950 operations on the same basis as for such expenses in 1949 operations.

14. That the provision for the exemption of income derived from a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine that came into production during the calendar years 1946 to 1949 inclusive during the period of thirty-six months after the mine came into production be extended to exempt income from such mines that come into production during the calendar years 1950, 1951, and 1952.

15. That tax concessions under Statutes of Newfoundland shall not apply in respect of taxes imposed by any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I gather that in a general way the Minister of Finance is fairly well pleased with himself tonight. We are generous people over here, and I do not think we will grudge the minister his moment of triumph. Indeed, I think, without prejudice to what I shall have to say later, we will not for the moment cavil at the words which he applied to himself and his colleagues—skilful, intelligent and prudent.

Of course the bearer of good news, even though it is long deferred and perhaps unnecessarily deferred, is always a popular figure. But, as I say, I do not think we should grudge the minister his moment of triumph. Indeed I think we should express to him our admiration of the way he has carried through his difficult task in spite of a heavy cold.

Now, I believe there is one part of his speech which it would be very proper, having regard to the presence here of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the right hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Mackenzie King), to make reference to particularly. That is the paragraph on page 1791, where the minister, after making certain references to dominion-provincial relations, went on with this:

In this search for co-operation—

That is a touching phrase.

—it will not let—

That is, the government—

—pettiness of spirit nor false pride nor undue emphasis on purely financial considerations stand in the way of mutual understanding and constructive results. It will constantly seek out ways of tackling mutual problems and developing practical solutions.

I have one practical suggestion to make in that connection, and it is that the practical way to deal with this, the way to further a practical solution, is for the government to do what it has refused to do in the last three years, to call the provinces together so that these things may be discussed in the way in which the minister has suggested.

I think one might say—and in this I believe the minister will agree with me—that whatever effect he expected to get from the budget tonight he did not expect to get the effect of surprise—because this situation, of course, has been clear for the last year. I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I ventured to say in this house a year ago, referring to the fact that everyone was saying last year was not an election year—

The one universal comment made when the minister was through was: Well, no election this year.

That was last year.

The reason is obvious. The reason was that the minister did not, like Little Jack Horner, put in his thumb and pull out a plum.

Of course at that time the minister had a large surplus. He had a surplus of some $489 million which, as he has told us, has grown to $575 million. The minister at that time lectured to us about the beauties and the necessity of what he called cyclical budget. So far as I understand a cyclical budget, it was sponsored by Mr. Ilsley and carried us back to the Old Testament days, and the dream of Pharaoh who dreamed of the seven lean years and the seven good years. And the idea is that as a result of crystal-gazing it is decided that we are going to have so many good years and so many bad years, and we have to make hay in the good years in order to have it in the bad years.

The question which arose in our minds at that time, of course, was: Who is going to interpret the minister's dream? Who is his soothsayer? We may all guess who it is, but we will not go into that. The thing which has been clear in the last year, however, is that this was not an economic cycle at all, but that it was a political cycle. The minister was prepared to produce a lemon in 1948 in order to cut a melon in 1949.

I shall try to substantiate this statement. Just let us look back for the last few weeks or months, and we shall see what has been happening. It began at Digby-Annapolis-Kings. I shall quote what the minister said at that time, as reported in the Halifax Herald —and I mean the Minister of Finance; I am leaving out the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). This is dated at Kentville, January 5:

Finance Minister Douglas C. Abbott has replied to a resolution passed at the eighty-fifth annual convention, Nova Scotia fruit growers' association, here last month, in which an appreciation to the federal government for its financial assistance to the Annapolis valley apple industry was voiced in a letter read by the secretary at the first meeting of the new directorate.

Mr. Abbott, in acknowledging receipt of the resolution, said he was very glad to know of the expression of appreciation, but regretted this appreciation had not "taken the form of a larger vote for the government in the recent by-election."

Mr. Abbott: It just shows you that one should not try to be humorous when one tries to write letters.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): At the present time, of course, signs are arriving thick and fast, like the birds in the spring. It may be uncertain whether the government has a shelf of projects for unemployment, if it should arise; but nobody has any doubts that the government has a shelf of projects for election purposes.

We come first of all to the Canso bridge, about which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) the other day tried to conceal his glee, looking all the while, in spite of himself, like the cat who had swallowed the canary when he told us about the building of the Canso bridge.

Was that a new idea? No; it is not a new idea. They have been pursuing it for many years. And in particular there was a report of a special committee which had studied it for years, and which was produced in January of 1944. But of course they could not get it then. They could not get it until now. It was not the needs of the citizens of Cape Breton which were of interest to the genial minister, I am sure—and I am sure his heart bled that it was so—but he could not consider the needs of the citizens of Cape Breton because what had to be considered were the election needs of the government. So they had to wait for the cycle.

The next contribution came from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). We have the Hong Kong veterans being given a measure of justice; it is not a full measure, but a measure of justice.

Did their needs just arise this year?

Mr. Cruickshank: That is pretty small coming from the hon. member.

Mr. Rowe: It is pretty late coming from you.

Mr. Cruickshank: Where was the hon. member in either war?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): To do the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) justice, I would have thought that he would have some feeling for the Hong Kong veterans.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have some feeling.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Regardless of the feelings of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, the fact is that this was held back year after year and it is only now that it comes because the political cycle is here. These men had to wait. It was not their needs that caused the government to move; it was the needs of the government, the political cycle. A rather deft touch is the fact that they have made it retroactive in the hope that the government will actually profit by their own negligence and delay. I suggest to the minister that he should not forget to add interest to the arrears.

I have just one other observation to make with regard to this collection of birds in the spring. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) is showing, I think, a much more generous and co-operative attitude than he has for a long time.

Mr. MacKinnon: Oh, no; that is not right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): If it hurts, do not squawk too much.

I am not suggesting that this is the first government that ever regulated its tax policy with some reference to an election, but I must say that by mulcting the public of huge surpluses for the last two years they have done a job which is beyond anything I have ever heard of. I hope you will let me know, Mr. Speaker, whether the word I intend to use is parliamentary, and if it is I would think that we are not wrong in calling this a bribery budget.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I am very fond of the hon. member for Fraser Valley but I wish he would let me make my speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I suggest that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario be permitted to continue without so many interruptions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I think we should congratulate the minister upon the thoroughness with which he has set out to do his task. He has wanted to be beneficent and he has done a very thorough job. Indeed, as I listened to him I began to wonder if after all the largesse which he was distributing there would be any taxes left. Certainly the minister has not seemed to forget anyone. What a change from last year.

Mr. Cruickshank: You have a new leader now.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Last year there was a tidy surplus of $670 million and the minister pointed out that by taking in certain special receipts that could be raised as high as $1,180 million. However, I do not think we should regard the $1,180 million as being a true surplus because only $670 million was produced from taxation, only $670 million came out of the pockets of the taxpayers. When the minister was telling of the wonderful things they had done, when he was talking about these huge sums which the government was giving back to the taxpayers, I felt like reminding the house that the taxpayers were getting back just a little bit of their own money.

In spite of the high surplus last year there was only a beggarly reduction of some $60 million.

Mr. Abbott: Ninety million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I will raise it to $90 million if the minister wishes, but I still consider it was a beggarly reduction. I think the minister is wrong, I think it was $60 million. We could not have a decent reduction because there was no election last year. As I say, we had this surplus of $575 million, added to the surplus of the year before, which means that during the two years the government had $1,200 million of the hard-earned money of the people to play about with in various ways. I interject to point out to the minister that Philip Snowden, a great chancellor of the exchequer of Great Britain, once said that any government that took even half a crown more from the taxpayers than was needed to run the government was getting money under false pretences. Obviously there is the great danger that when you have such large sums of money economy flies out the window.

I recall that a year ago the minister said that the budget gladdened his heart. But during the year, when he found out that the people were expressing considerable annoyance that they had not more of their own money to spend—indeed some people wondered why the government did not take it all and just give them a little back—when people found out that they had so little of their own money to spend they began to criticize the minister, and I doubt if his heart was as glad as it had been earlier. Indeed, he began to explain the matter away. One explanation he gave was that the taxpayers' money had to be used for various purposes, including the making of large advances to the foreign exchange control board. He made that statement some time in January when the advances to the foreign exchange board amounted to $275 million, and for the whole year it is something in the neighbourhood of $500 million. There is no more need for the citizens of Canada to take money out of their pockets to pay for the operations of the foreign exchange control board than there is for them to pay for the upkeep of the pyramids. It is an absolute misuse of the taxpayers' money.

The minister seems to take the matter very lightly. Perhaps that is the reason why he went on to give back these large sums this year when the cycle has come around. He is now giving back the taxpayers some of their own money. When the minister was taxed last week by the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) as to why all this money had gone into the foreign exchange control board, he replied that it was just a bookkeeping entry. I said to the minister at the time that I did not believe the taxpayers regarded it as a bookkeeping entry.

Mr. Abbott: I know my hon. friend wants to be correct. I made no such statement. I said that the writing down of the assets as a result—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Abbott: I know the hon. member does not want to misrepresent me.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Oh, no.

Mr. Abbott: In replying to the hon. member for Grey North I said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Abbott: It does not matter anyway.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It has just occurred to me that the hon. member is referring to another debate during this session on another subject.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, will you please make clear to me whether I am permitted to refer to what the minister said?

Mr. MacInnis: Not in another debate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): It was in another debate. The minister has questioned the accuracy of what I said. I brought Hansard here in order to be perfectly clear as to what was said. Is it your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot indicate exactly what the minister said?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not technically correct, but I will not rule against it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I shall read it because I think it is extremely desirable—

Mr. Abbott: Read the hon. member's question as well.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I shall read the whole thing. Do not fear. It is to be found at page 1637 of Hansard:

Mr. Case: But was there not taken from the reserves about $372 million for the foreign exchange control board? What was that for?

Mr. Abbott: That was the bookkeeping entry, of course.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): It was not a bookkeeping entry for the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Abbott: The Canadian taxpayer suffered no loss.

That is true. I did not suggest that he suffered a loss. All I suggest is that it should not be his money which is being used for entirely unnecessary and irrelevant purposes.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend allow me to say something? I am sure my friend, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case), will confirm that he was referring to the write-down in the assets of the foreign exchange control board as the result of the revaluation of the Canadian dollar. If he was not, that was certainly what I thought he was referring to. I do not care, but I certainly understood him to be referring to that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Then a little further down on the same page of Hansard there is the following:

Mr. Abbott: I said that was the bookkeeping entry.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The taxpayer did not think of it in that way.

However that may be, I will go back now —and we will have no fooling about this— to what the minister said in a press statement on the 15th of January. He was speaking about the cash funds provided for various purposes. He said:

> In the first place these funds constitute the principal source of cash for financing certain large demands upon our cash resources. Among the largest of these are the advances which the government is currently making to the foreign exchange control board to finance increases in Canada's exchange reserves. During the nine-month period April 1-December 31, 1948, the government's advances to the board on this account totalled no less than $275 million.

That is the point I am making, and I am saying there is no earthly need for that coming out of the taxpayers' money. I want to point out furthermore—

Mr. Abbott: Use social credit money.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): —that the amount of roughly $500 million which went into the foreign exchange control board last year, and which should have been provided in another way, was equal roughly to three-quarters of the total personal income taxes collected, and it was equal to the income taxes, if my arithmetic is correct, paid by all people with incomes up to $8,000 in the taxation year 1947. I am not suggesting there should have been any tax relief like that. I am pointing out where the money went to, and I am asking why in those circumstances no relief was given last year.

Now I come to the relief which the minister has given this year. I shall not deal with it in detail. I applaud unreservedly the relief given to small companies, and I remind the minister with all modesty that that has been suggested not once but several times by the opposition. If he will look at some very excellent resolutions which were passed last October by the party to which I belong he will find that it is in there too.

In the second place I think that, when the taxpayer looks at the surplus which the minister has, he will feel disappointed and think that the minister might have increased the exemptions to the amounts suggested by our party last October, that is, to $2,500 for married persons and $1,250 for single persons. As far as I can estimate it from the figures I have, that would not have cost very much. Then, I think, the taxpayer will feel that the increase of $50 for dependent children is utterly inadequate, and that it should have been $200 as we suggested.

Mr. Abbott: Did I hear a reference to bribery a short time ago?

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): The taxpayers will compare the relief given, which undoubtedly is substantial and which they will welcome, with the surpluses of the last two years, particularly of last year, and they will think that with a surplus of over $700 million, if I remember correctly, it is not out of the way. Broadly speaking, I think what they will feel is that what has been given to them is a kind of partial restitution of the money which has been taken from them in the past. When the minister boasts that it is a greater tax reduction than has ever been given, I would point out to him that if you get your taxes high enough and keep them up long enough, unnecessarily long, you can get yourself into the position where it is rather easy to reduce. Further, I think the taxpayer will feel uneasy that there is no suggestion that I am able to discover from the budget that the government is going to discontinue the utterly unnecessary practice of mulcting the taxpayer in order to provide capital amounts for such government enterprises as the foreign exchange control board. Finally, I think the taxpayer will say, "Thank you very much for giving us back some of our own money, but you are late, very late, and while we are glad to get the money back do not imagine we are so stupid as not to realize the trick which you have tried to play on us." Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES ACT, 1947

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 86, to amend the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947.

On section 1—Duration of act.

Mr. Fleming: I would have been finished speaking this afternoon in another couple of minutes if discussion on points of order had not intervened to consume something like twenty minutes before the six o'clock adjournment. There are one or two observations I wish to make to complete what I set out to say. In doing so, I assure you that I recognize the principle that was adopted when the house gave the bill second reading, namely, that the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947, should be continued for a further period.

The point I am dealing with now is whether the twelve orders to which the statute applies should be continued in their entirety for the full period referred to in section 1 of the bill. I am urging that these orders are so broad and sweeping in their terms, and so vast in the powers that they confer upon the wartime prices and trade board, upon the government and government agencies, that they ought not to enjoy continuance in the present form for the full period during which the act is to continue to run in view of the decision on principle made on second reading. I had made some reference to steel control, to the sweeping powers there that are unnecessary for the continuation of steel control for the period of a year. That was the kind of control referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I say also that the powers conferred upon the timber controller by P.C. 1997 are far wider and more extensive than are required to maintain the kind of timber control which the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon contended was necessary for this period. I would point out that under section 2(d) the controller will continue to have powers as broad as these:

> to enter on, take possession of and utilize, by himself or by any person duly authorized by him thereunto, any land or premises or any plant, building, place, equipment or facilities used or capable of being used for producing and/or dealing in timber.

Does this committee appreciate the breadth of these words, the scope of the powers conferred upon the timber controller. Read with the powers I referred to this afternoon which are conferred upon the steel controller, these two men could be the twin dictators of the whole Canadian economy. It would be hard to conceive of powers more sweeping than those.

Then briefly I mentioned the unnecessarily broad powers conferred upon the priorities officer under P.C. 1619. I pointed out that he is given power to prohibit the making of or dealing in construction materials. His powers are not confined to control or regulation. He is given the power of life and death over every business concerned in the making of or dealing in construction materials, which under the order are given this broad meaning:

> . . . any materials which are intended or are suitable for use in the construction, repair, alteration or improvement of any structure or are intended or are suitable for the heating, lighting or ventilating of any structure or the supply of water or power thereto or the disposition of sewage therefrom.

The priorities officer is given power to prohibit any kind of business coming within the scope of that definition of construction materials. I defy the Minister of Trade and Commerce or any other member of this house to stand up and stake his self-respect by asserting that these powers are required today in order to maintain priorities control of the kind we have heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce argue for in this debate. There can be no justification for this sort of thing in view of present conditions in Canada, particularly now that we have heard the Minister of Finance elaborate upon the condition of the country for which he is claiming so much credit. How can it be said now that in view of present economic conditions in Canada there is any justification for the continuation of totalitarian powers such as those I have referred to? And, Mr. Chairman, I have referred to only three of the twelve orders in council.

We have been informed also that the list of commodities to which price control is to continue to apply is to be reduced by the elimination of bread, flour, and one or two other commodities. That is a change; and it would be interesting to learn from the Minister of Justice whether this reduction in the list is to come into effect before this bill is intended to become operative.

Mr. Garson: Tomorrow morning.

Mr. Fleming: Then, Mr. Chairman, the list of articles to which the powers of the wartime prices and trade board will extend under P.C. 8528 will be narrowed to that extent. It is true the minister was proceeding quite rapidly, but I did not hear any reference to butter. Was butter included?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: It is included in those commodities mentioned?

Mr. Garson: Flour, bread, butter, sugar, edible molasses and certain fruits and vegetables.

Mr. Fleming: So from tomorrow morning forward those commodities will not be under price control.

I ask the Minister of Justice, as I did at the outset of my remarks, to take a reasonable and parliamentary view and insert, by suitable amendment in the annex to the bill, the orders in council which are to be continued. As a matter of fact the course the government ought to take is that of inserting in the annex to the bill not only the orders in council, but such orders as are made under the powers given in the orders in council to which legislative effect is to be given by this bill, so that those who are bound by the law will be able to find the law in the statute books and will not be compelled to scurry around all the offices in Ottawa to find the law to which parliament is now being asked to give this blanket assent.

I should touch on one other aspect of this matter of priorities control. A sensible kind of control that would have contributed much to meeting the housing needs of this country was abandoned by the government on April 1, 1946. I refer to permit control. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, then Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, defended his action on that occasion by saying it had become too difficult to administer from Ottawa. Therefore he was handing this difficulty over to the municipal governments, which were not by any stretch of the imagination in a position to deal with it. It simply meant that this form of control completely broke down. After that time, instead of building materials—which were in very short supply—being channeled into the construction of the houses which were so badly needed by the people of this country, those materials were diverted into much non-essential building such as theatres, hot dog stands and all sorts of establishments of that kind.

Later on we found that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was quite prepared to reverse his position. In November of 1947 he was quite ready to assert the very contrary of the proposition he had set up on April 1, 1946. He was then quite prepared to undertake the administration from Ottawa of a new, greater and more far-reaching form of control which is now embodied in the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. If in the contention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce it is possible to administer that sort of control from Ottawa, then I say he has completely exposed the fallacies and inadequacies of the argument he offered this house on April 1, 1946, when he deliberately threw away the opportunity the government then had to channel building materials into the construction of needed homes for the people of Canada.

Mr. Stephenson: I was interested in the statement by the minister this afternoon that there was a possibility of a greater supply of nails. This has been a problem in my riding, as I presume it has been a problem all over the country. I was wondering if the minister could tell us what control there is over these nails from the manufacturer down, how they are distributed to the wholesaler and from the wholesaler to the retailer, and if there is any possibility of getting more nails into the hardware stores, which are the usual means of distributing nails to the community. I was wondering if the minister could tell us also how many nails the government has held out of this production for government use or how many they now hold, or what possibility there is of getting some nails to the hardware stores of the country in order that they may supply the needs of the local municipalities.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Stephenson: No. This is an important question.

Mr. Howe: I do not know that I have anything to add. I have made statements previously. The pattern of distribution has been approved by the wartime prices and trade board. It is fairly efficient. Last year the additional precaution was taken of having a reserve of nails that could be supplied to priority projects, and all priority projects are home building. So far as I know, no home building was handicapped by lack of nails last year. With the purchases of wire that we have been able to make recently through government channels, I believe that by July nails will cease to be a source of discussion in this parliament.

Mr. Timmins: May I follow up that last question. I think the minister will admit that last year one reason why there were a great number of complaints about nails, particularly in the central provinces, was that down in the maritimes the system of distribution of nails to some extent fell down. In other words, the manufacturers there distributed the nails to the wholesale houses, and the demand on the wholesale houses in the maritimes was not sufficient to take up all the nails there for the purpose of use in the maritimes. Outsiders therefore came in and bought up those nails. The result was that they got into districts where they were used as bootleg nails. I think the minister who is responsible for setting up the machinery under which nails are distributed ought to tell us just what regulations have been put into effect this year in order to see that that situation does not develop again. After all, it is of little use to talk about the production of nails if they get into the hands of certain people who can profit from those nails to the disadvantage of the builders who are crying for them.

Mr. Howe: In answer to my hon. friend, I may say that any wholesaler or any retailer in the maritimes who sold his nails into bootleg channels immediately had his quota cut by the amount of those sales.

Mr. Merritt: I want to ask the minister a question about priorities control. As I understand, priorities are now being exercised only in respect of Central Mortgage and Housing, veterans housing and integrated housing. Last year the minister said that total amounted to only 15 per cent of the housing being built. I want to ask him two questions. First of all, is the minister to administer this priorities control from now on, or is it to be handed over to the minister of reconstruction? Second, what are the government going to do in respect of the priorities order this year? In what way are they going to exercise their right to give priorities for building materials?

Mr. Howe: The priorities order will continue to be administered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It applies not to 15 per cent of the housing; it applies to all the small housing. Anyone building a house can take advantage of the priorities system, and it is confined entirely to house building. It is a simple answer. I do not think it needs elaboration.

Mr. Merritt: Since that statement represents a change from what the minister said last year, I should like to have the matter clarified. Last year the minister said that it applied to low-cost housing and to veterans' projects generally. To what type of housing does the priorities order not apply?

Mr. Howe: It does not apply to houses that cost over $10,000.

Mr. Merritt: Anyone who is building a house at a cost of less than $10,000 can today get a priority for his building material. Is that correct?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister this question. How did the dealers get the United States nails that they were selling for twenty cents or twenty-five cents a pound? How did those nails get across here?

Mr. Howe: Anybody can import nails. There is no prohibition on their import. If they are foreign nails, and if the dealer can find anybody foolish enough to pay those prices, he can sell them to him.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Powers of wartime prices and trade board restricted.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain what commodities will remain subject to price control?

Mr. Garson: Yes. After the budget takes effect, it would apply to citrus fruits, canned citrus fruit juices, cabbage, carrots, imported new potatoes, imported grapes and the primary forms of iron and steel.

Mr. Fleming: Much has been made by the Minister of Justice in his remarks in the course of this debate about the government's alleged policy of decontrol; and in the debate a good deal has been made of the limitations that were being applied to the control structure by this particular section. At this point I simply draw attention to the fact that this limitation, for what it is worth, affects only one order out of the twelve. It applies simply to the general order, P.C. 8528. We have reference here to the wartime prices and trade board. There is in section 2 (a) reference to "paragraph (f) of subsection one of section four of the wartime prices and trade regulations"; that refers to P.C. 8528. Then we have a reference in section 2 (b) to "subsection one of section eight of the wartime prices and trade regulations", which is also P.C. 8528.

The minister is suggesting that it applies to some other order. There is certainly nothing in the language of section 2, as it now appears, that has any application to any other one of the eleven orders. If the principle is sound that limitation should now be put on the exercise of the powers conferred under this one order in council, why should not the principle be applied with equal soundness to the other orders? If the government is sincere in this policy of decontrol, why does it go on reserving under the eleven orders these vast and sweeping powers? It will be no comfort to be told: Oh, the wartime prices and trade board, or the priorities officer, or the steel controller, or the timber controller has made certain orders today. If this section passes in its present form, those controllers are at perfect liberty to exercise all the powers that are conferred upon them by those eleven orders as they stand today. This section imposes no restraint whatsoever upon the exercise of those sweeping and totalitarian powers that are conferred, by those other eleven orders, on the various officials and controllers. I say this to the Minister of Justice. If the government is sincere in its professions of a policy of decontrol, and if it is meaningful in setting up the principle of section 2 as applied to this one order in council, P.C. 8528, why is it not prepared to go further and apply the same principle to all other eleven orders in council which are the subject matter of the bill today, and to provide that no further power shall be exercised which is not in effect today by reason of some order or regulation made under the terms of those eleven orders in council?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: Has the Minister of Justice something to say?

Mr. Garson: I would draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that of these twelve orders there will remain in effect P.C. 8528, which is a general order authorizing the wartime prices and trade board regulations; P.C. 9029, which is the rental control order; P.C. 7475, which covers the regulations of the Commodities Prices Stabilization Corporation, which is just getting wound up and has no price fixing or control significance; P.C. 34/4433, which extends the provisions of the Government Employees Compensation Act to the employees of the Commodities Prices Stabilization Corporation, and therefore has no price control significance; P.C. 3122, which effects the consolidation of supplementary and ancillary regulations, and therefore has no price control significance; P.C. 4600, which authorizes appeals upon leave to the court of appeal of a province and from there to the Supreme Court of Canada in cases involving breaches of wartime regulations, and has no price control significance; P.C. 6223, which provides for notice to the Attorney General for Canada, and therefore has no price control significance. Therefore, clause 2 of the bill in question applies to all of the goods and services except rentals. It limits the wartime prices and trade board's powers with regard to section 4, paragraph (f), of the wartime prices and trade board regulations, which gives wide powers to fix specific or maximum or minimum prices, or specific or maximum or minimum markups at which goods and services can be sold or offered for sale by or to any person; which prescribes the manner in which any price or markup shall be ascertained; which prescribes what shall constitute or be included in any price or markup; it prohibits the purchase or sale at prices which are at variance with the prices or markups so fixed or prescribed, and so on. This is a very long subsection. Then it also applies to section 8, subsection (1), which authorizes the prosecutions for selling for unjust and unreasonable prices.

Clause 2 of the bill as applied to all these provisions means that the board's power is further limited to enact price-fixing orders only with regard to those goods and services which are now affected by an order of the board. This embraces citrus fruits, canned citrus fruit juices, cabbages, carrots, imported new potatoes, imported grapes, and the primary forms of iron and steel. The same limitation applies also to granting leave to prosecute for violation of section 8 (1) of the wartime prices and trade regulations. Therefore under clause 2 of the bill, in fact we only have four orders in council which affect price control, one of which, P.C. 1997, is irrelevant because it applies to timber, in respect of which there is no existing board order. Another one is P.C. 245 dealing with the primary forms of iron and steel. Then the rentals control order, P.C. 9029, and then P.C. 8528, the wartime prices and trade regulations. The net effect of it all is that any person who wants to find out what his position is with regard to the law, which concerns my hon. friend, has only to look at these four orders in council and this bill. The powers of the board either to fix any prices or to authorize prosecutions are confined to these articles which I have named.

Mr. Fleming: In his reply to my remarks the Minister of Justice has dealt simply with the matter of price control. He has completely ignored what I had to say, and the effect in relation to all these sweeping totalitarian powers which are conferred by these other orders. The five principal orders are 8528, which is the one referred to in section 1. Then there is 9029, which has to do with these leasehold regulations; then 245 in relation to steel control; 1997 in relation to timber control and 1609 in relation to priorities control. The net result of it is that every power that could have been exercised under any one of these orders two years ago remains open to the officers such as the timber controller, the steel controller, and the priorities officer, to be exercised just as they could have been exercised two years ago. It does not matter whether he has exercised these powers in the meantime. These powers are there for him to exercise afresh or anew today, if this bill passes in its present form.

Talk about restraint in relation to price control. Yes, section 2 does confine the operation of price control. But no restraint whatever is placed upon the exercise of any of these sweeping and totalitarian powers conferred by these other four major orders in council: 9029, 245, 1997 and 1609; and there still remains in the hands of these officers, created by the government, the power to strangle and throttle the free economy of this country, if they choose to exercise them. And this government is responsible for asking this parliament to confer today, four years after V-E day, totalitarian powers as sweeping as those open to these officials. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that if that government are sincere in their profession of the policy of decontrol they should recognize the principle that they themselves have set up under section 2, and apply it to all the powers and all the orders issued under these other four major orders in council.

Mr. Knowles: May I just say one word. We support the bill but we are opposed to the passing of this second section, because of what it now does. The fact is that in effect we are now committing to the ground, earth to earth, ashes to ashes and dust to dust, the soul of the wartime prices and trade board; and at this moment of its death I think a tribute should be paid to the good work it did through a number of years. But it is too bad that by this clause we are completely robbing it of its power.

Mr. Timmins: What the minister has said with reference to P.C. 8528 in relation to section 8 (1) is in effect, having regard to the decision in the McGinn case of about a month ago, throwing overboard all the effect of that section prior to the decision in the McGinn case.

Mr. Garson: It has nothing to do with the McGinn case at all.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Hackett: I wish to ask the Minister of Justice if it is not a fact that the provisions of 2 (a) and 2 (b) of the bill were not included in the War Measures Act; and is this act an extension of the War Measures Act to meet the holding in the Nolan case?

Mr. Garson: No, I think not. It is not an extension; it is a limitation upon the powers of the board.

Mr. Hackett: Why does there have to be a statute passed to bring about a limitation? In the Nolan case all of the judges held that under the War Measures Act there was no authority to do that about which Nolan was complaining.

Mr. Knowles: P.C. 1292.

Mr. Hackett: Therefore I am asking the question whether the provisions of 2 are not outside and beyond the provisions of the War Measures Act and whether this legislation, if enacted, would not confer powers upon the governor in council to do things which it could not have done under the War Measures Act.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will read the section carefully he will see that it says:

Notwithstanding anything in the said act or in any order or regulation set out in the schedule thereto.

That is, notwithstanding the powers they have under this Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, the wartime prices and trade board shall not—and it limits the powers they shall receive under the act—

—(a) exercise any of its powers under paragraph (f) of subsection 1 of section 4 of the wartime prices and trade regulations—

Which deal with price-fixing—

—or (b) grant leave to prosecute any person for violation of subsection 1 of section 8 of the wartime prices and trade regulations—

Which deal with functions such as the charging of undue prices—

—with respect to any goods or services other than the goods and services with respect to which an order of the board was made under that paragraph and is in force at the commencement of this act.

That is, the amending act. So that it is not an extension in any sense at all. It is a quite extensive limitation upon the powers of the board which it receives under the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947.

Mr. Hackett: Is not the effect to extend its powers in matters not mentioned beyond those set forth in the War Measures Act? It refers to orders in force good or bad at the time this bill becomes law.

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Hackett: Is it not an attempt to give effect to the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947, which it would not otherwise have?

Mr. Garson: No. Under the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947, the wartime prices and trade board would have power to authorize prosecutions and to fix prices. The effect of this section 2 is to say that, notwithstanding those powers which it received under that act, it cannot do so except in relation to those things as to which an order has been made and is in effect at the time of the coming into force of this amendment.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Garson moves, seconded by Mr. Fournier (Hull), that this bill be now read the third time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Drew: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: The first order of business tomorrow will be the third reading of Bill No. 85, to amend the Foreign Exchange Control Act. Then the next order will be the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for a bill to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. Then, if that is disposed of, the other item would be the resolution in the name of the Postmaster General to amend the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act.

Mr. Knowles: Can you tell us now what the date of the election will be?

At ten-thirty the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on March 14, 1949.

information of Parliament on the occasion of the Budget of 1949-50

FOREWORD

The purpose of this Appendix is twofold:

(1) to make available in one place and in convenient form, as a supplement to the Budget, some of the more comprehensive economic statistics prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other Government agencies;

(2) to present a preliminary review of the Government accounts for the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1949.

NATIONAL INCOME, EXPENDITURE AND EMPLOYMENT

National income measures the annual earnings of Canadian residents from productive operations. As such it includes salaries, wages and other forms of earnings by employees, in cash or otherwise, plus military pay and allowances. It includes corporation profits and other returns on invested capital. It includes the net income of farmers and of others who are in business on their own account.

Gross National Product is the value at market prices of all the goods and services produced in a year by the labour, capital and enterprise of Canadian residents. It is obtained by adding to National Income indirect taxes and such costs as depreciation allowances which may be regarded as entering into the cost of the goods and services produced, but do not form part of the incomes of Canadians. On the other hand, government subsidies, which reduce the price to the consumer or add to the income of producers, have to be deducted since they form part of the income of Canadians but do not enter into costs of production.

The goods and services produced in a year must be disposed of in some way. They are either sold at home or abroad or added to inventories. Gross National Expenditure indicates how the Gross National Product was disposed of. Thus it measures the same total as Gross National Product but in a different way. Since foreign expenditures on Canadian goods and services, i.e., exports, form part of the earnings of Canadians in the Gross National Product, they are likewise included in Gross National Expenditure. While Canadian expenditure on imported goods and services is included in the totals of consumer expenditure, government expenditure and gross home investment, it is not part of the disposition of Canadian production and is therefore deducted.

The value of goods and services produced by Canadians attained new levels in 1948, surpassing the previous year by 14%. Physical output showed a modest gain but most of the increase is accounted for by higher prices. The resulting additions to incomes were widely distributed. Total income of wage and salary earners went up by $895 million or 14%, investment income by $271 million or 15% and the income of those engaged in agriculture and other unincorporated businesses by $643 million or 27%. In dollar terms the National Income in 1948 was about three times as high as in 1939. It is difficult to say exactly how much the gain has been in real output, but tentative calculations suggest that, when adjustment is made for price changes between the two years, the physical output of the Canadian people as a whole in 1948 was probably two-thirds higher than in 1939.

[1] Minor adjustments have been made to the figures of current receipts and payments shown on page 21 of "The Canadian Balance of International Payments", 1948, Dominion Bureau of Statistics, to achieve consistency with the other component series. (See also Table 14).

Looking at the expenditure side of the national accounts, several developments are to be noted. Personal expenditure on consumer goods and services, which had risen by about a billion dollars in 1947 rose by the same amount in 1948. This increase of about 12% in dollar expenditure is less than the increase in the cost-of-living index of about 14% between 1947 and 1948, which would seem to indicate that there was some decrease in the physical volume of supplies purchased during the year. Post-war investment expenditure continued at an unprecedented level, absorbing 20% by value of total available supplies in 1948. The claims of federal, provincial and municipal governments on available supplies, which had fallen steadily from 1944 (when the war effort was at its peak) to 1947, rose somewhat in 1948. However, all governments taken together consumed a smaller share of total output in 1948 than in 1939.

During 1948 employment continued at very high levels. The total number of the unemployed was very small in proportion to the labour force as a whole although there are a few local areas where the situation is less favourable.

Note:—The estimates do not in all cases agree with the estimates shown in the labour force bulletins of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. To take into account the fact that the labour force surveys do not cover approximately 100,000 persons living in institutions, the number of persons not in the labour force has been increased correspondingly. Similarly, to take account of the omission of Indians living on reservations and persons in inaccessible areas, the nonagricultural employed and persons not in the labour force have both been increased by 83,000.

PERSONAL INCOME AND ITS DISPOSITION

How much income was received by individual Canadians in a year and how that income was disposed of is portrayed in tables 5, 6, 7 and 8.

The total of personal income differs from the National Income in several respects. For example, it includes only that part of corporation income which is actually distributed. Deductions from employees' total earnings must also be made for unemployment insurance contributions and similar contributions which, although forming part of the compensation for services performed, are not actually received by the employee within the year. On the other hand, transfer payments such as family allowances, old age pensions, veterans benefits and charitable contributions by corporations are included in arriving at the total of personal income.

Personal income rose by $1,570 million or 15% from 1947 to 1948. As already pointed out, the additional income was widely distributed, the rise in farm incomes being particularly noteworthy. Transfer payments continued to decline, reflecting another drop in post-war payments to veterans which more than offset the growing total of family allowance payments and old age pensions.

4. Personal Income (1+2+3).....	4,291	9,670	10,390	11,960

Personal expenditure on goods and services increased by less than personal income during 1948. While direct taxes accounted for a smaller proportion of personal income than in any year since 1942, direct tax collections actually rose by $23 million from 1947 to 1948. There was also a noteworthy reversal in the trend of personal saving which, after declining steadily from the high levels of war years, rose from $750 million in 1947 to $1,155 million in 1948.

(1) Personal income less personal direct taxes (See Table 6).

The relation between personal spending and saving is set out more specifically in the above table 7. It shows that Canadians saved approximately 10% of the personal incomes at their disposal after payment of taxes in 1948, as against nearly 7% in 1947.

TABLE 8

PERSONAL DISPOSABLE INCOME PER CAPITA

On a per capita basis, personal income was $928 in 1948, the highest on record, exceeding 1947 by over $100. In spite of this very much higher income figure, personal direct taxes per capita remained the same, therefore leaving individual Canadians, on the average, with the full additional income for saving or spending.

SAVING AND INVESTMENT

Tables 9, 10, 11 and 12 are designed to illustrate how investment expenditures were financed out of savings. For the purpose of these accounts, a government deficit is regarded as a claim on public savings and a government surplus as an addition to public savings.

TABLE 9

(1) The adjustment has been made only to grain held in commercial channels.
(2) See Tables 1 and 2.

There was a very substantial increase in both personal and corporate saving during 1948, the total of these two items rising from $1,240 million in 1947 to $2,036 million in 1948. The only significant offset was a reduction in saving by the Canadian Wheat Board which made substantial payments out of its accumulated profits during the year.

(1) See Table 15.
(2) See Table 13.
(3) See Tables 1 and 2.

The claims upon savings represented by investment expenditures in plant, equipment, housing and inventories increased by very little in 1948. Foreign investment, however, rose from virtually nothing in 1947 to $419 million, represented for the most part by additions to foreign exchange reserves. The revenues of all governments taken together exceeded expenditures by $845 million in the calendar year 1948, a somewhat larger surplus than in 1947. This surplus on government account formed 23% of total savings by the Canadian people in 1948.

(2) Taxes paid or payable in respect of the calendar year's income, excluding the refundable portion of the excess profit tax. (See Table 13).
(3) Includes charitable contributions made by corporations. (See Table 5, Item 5(b)).
(4) (See Table 9).

Corporation profits before taxes increased by $353 million from 1947 to 1948. Almost the whole of the increase is reflected in the increase in corporation profits after taxes of $333 million because of the decrease in corporate taxes. Dividends paid out, however, increased by only $33 million so that retained profits showed another substantial increase, reaching a total of nearly $900 million in 1948.

(3) Value of physical change.
(4) Change in value. Includes privately financed industrial and trade inventories.
(5) See Table 2, Item 3.

In dollar terms, private investment expenditures on plant, equipment and housing, including those of publicly owned utilities, rose by approximately 23% in 1948. In terms of physical units, there was a much smaller change. Analysis of the figures indicates a shift in the content of investment expenditures. The value of construction and equipment used by utilities was up sharply and increases are indicated for housing. Investment in manufacturing industries declined. The net addition to inventories was only $550 million in 1948 compared with $866 million in 1947.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE OF ALL GOVERNMENTS

Table 13, "Government Transactions Related to the National Accounts", attempts to bring together in one statement and under uniform headings the activities of all governments in Canada on a calendar year basis.

The table is designed to include only those transactions which have relevance for the national accounts, and consequently the surpluses or deficits shown here do not agree with those shown in the various public accounts. It has been necessary to adjust the conventional accounting statements of fiscal year revenue and expenditure to exclude purely bookkeeping transactions as well as the purchase and sale of existing capital assets. Extra-budgetary funds such as unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation and pension funds have been added, and surpluses or deficits of Government enterprises are likewise included. In the federal accounts some of the more substantial adjustments are as follows: addition of national defence recoverable expenditure, allocation of war refunds to prior years, adjustment of corporate taxes to an accrual basis, elimination of sales of war assets to business, and elimination of British Commonwealth Air Training Plan write-off from expenditure. In addition the federal figures have been adjusted to a calendar year basis by using the monthly figures published by the Comptroller of the Treasury. Government loans to foreign countries or accumulation of gold or foreign exchange are not included with government expenditure.

For purpose of analysis, expenditures by governments may be divided into two main categories: expenditures for the purchase of goods and services, and so-called transfer payments, i.e., family allowances, old age pensions, veterans benefits, the greater part of the interest on the public debt, etc., which do not arise from current production of goods and services. The first category represents the demands which governments place on the annual output of the nation. Transfer payments, on the other hand, simply add to the sums available for spending or saving by the recipient.

Using the definitions appropriate to the calculation of the National Income and Expenditure (which, as already explained, differ somewhat from the accounting procedures used by governments), it is estimated that during the calendar year 1948, federal, provincial and municipal governments took in as revenue $4,106 million and spent $3,261 million, leaving an over-all surplus of $845 million of which $824 million was attributable to the federal government and $21 million to the provincial and municipal governments. Both the revenues and expenditures of the federal government declined, but expenditures fell more sharply, so that the federal surplus actually increased from 1947 to 1948. On the other hand, provincial and municipal governments, taken together, spent more than in 1947 and took in more by way of revenue, but the net result was a smaller surplus of revenue over expenditure.

INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS AND EXCHANGE RESERVES

Tables 14 and 15 are designed to display the principal features of Canada's international balance of payments on current account and the related changes in capital items.

When goods are exported (unless they are given away) they give rise to payments or debts in favor of Canada. Similarly, when goods are imported they give rise to payments or debts in favor of the rest of the world. Other transactions, such as interest and dividend payments, the tourist trade, freight and shipping charges, also give rise to similar payments or debts in either direction. The difference between the debits and credits arising from these current transactions is referred to as the net balance of international payments on current account, as shown in Table 14. When total credits exceed total debits within a year, the rest of the world has gone into debt to Canada or Canada has paid off some of her debt to the rest of the world. When total debits exceed total credits, the net position is, of course, reversed.

It is also important to consider the related changes on capital account, i.e., the international transactions which do not arise from the movement of goods or the performance of services, such as borrowing and lending operations between Canada and the rest of the world. These are shown in Table 15. The changes in official exchange reserves, i.e., in Canadian holdings of gold and United States dollars, over a series of years are also shown in Table 16.

The over-all surplus in Canada's balance of international payments rose from $47 million in 1947 to $453 million in 1948. The 1948 figure was substantially higher than the $363 million current account surplus achieved in 1946 and constituted the largest favourable balance ever achieved by Canada in a peacetime year. About three-fifths of the increase of $406 million in our current balance over 1947 is due to a larger surplus on commodity account and about two-fifths to the improvement in our balance on so-called "invisible" items.

The most important change in Canada's commodity trade in 1948 was in the geographical distribution of our exports. The destination of Canada's commodity exports in prewar and in recent years has been as follows:

—	United States	United Kingdom	Other Sterling Area	Other ERP Countries	Other Countries
	%	%	%	%	%
1935-1939	37	37	10	7	9
1947	39	28	13	12	8
1948	50	23	10	10	7

The change in the destination of exports in 1948 was accompanied by an opposite change in the source of imports, as shown below:

(2) Includes multilateral settlements (in 1939), and errors and omissions in all years.

Deducting repayments, the Canadian Government made loans or advances to foreign countries to a net amount of $126 million during 1948, as against $563 million in 1947. During the same period the United Kingdom repaid $64 million on the $700 million interest-free loan of 1942, compared with $104 million in 1947, Official contributions for relief purposes fell by half from $38 million in 1947 to $19 million in 1948.

Included in the other capital movements vis-a-vis the United States and other non-Empire countries was an inflow of capital from the U.S. dollar area for investment in Canadian properties or business of $68 million. This figure does not include the ploughing-in of earnings by Canadian companies instead of their transfer to the non-resident parent company. The comparable figure of direct investments for 1947 was $48 million, for 1946, $41 million and for 1945, $17 million.

Milk production, however, was somewhat lower than in 1947 and, although final statistics are not available at this time, meat production also declined.

(1) New Interim Index, based on June 17, 1947=100.

The chief development in Canadian prices in 1948 was the stability in the cost-of-living index during the closing months of the year. There was practically no change from September to the end of the year. In the United States the cost-of-living index at the turn of the new year was 4 points below the high point attained in August.

From the end of 1946 to the end of 1947, the total money supply, as estimated by the Bank of Canada, showed virtually no change. During 1948, however, there was an increase of about $400 million. The reasons for the change are discussed in detail in the Bank of Canada annual report for the year 1948.

PART II

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1948-49

1. Introduction

The figures appearing in this Part must be regarded as necessarily preliminary and subject to revision. Although the Government's fiscal year ends on March 31st the books must remain open for several weeks after that date in order to record various adjusting entries, as well as all payments up to April 30th made on account of expenditures originating in, and properly chargeable to, the current fiscal year. For these reasons final figures for the current year will not be available for some considerable time.

2. SUMMARY OF GOVERNMENTAL FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING THE YEAR

Total revenues of the Government for the year ending March 31, 1949, are now estimated at $2,768 millions. Expenditures, on the other hand, are estimated at $2,193 millions. On the basis of these figures it would appear that the Government's accounting or budgetary surplus for the current year will probably total something in the neighbourhood of $575 millions. This compares with the all-time record surplus of $676 millions accumulated during the year ended March 31, 1948. As a result of the current year's estimated surplus of $575 millions, the Government's net debt (i.e. the excess of total liabilities over total active assets) will reflect a reduction of an equivalent amount.

In addition to collecting revenues and making expenditures in the narrow accounting or budgetary sense of those terms, the Government also receives and disburses substantial amounts of cash in other ways. These other receipts and disbursements relate to transactions which give rise to increases or decreases in the Government's assets and liabilities, and they do not, therefore, appear in what might be called the Government's income account for the year, nor do they enter into the calculation of the Government's annual surplus or deficit. In 1948-49 the total of these other disbursements greatly exceeded the total of other receipts, and a large part of the cash provided by the 1948-49 surplus had to be used to finance the difference. The balance of cash available for the reduction of funded debt was, therefore, considerably reduced.

The following summary shows the nature and extent of these non-income account transactions and their effect upon the government's net cash position. The figures indicate that although a total cash sum of $650 millions became available to the government as a result of the current year's budgetary surplus, this was reduced to a "cash surplus" of only $182 millions after financing the large cash requirements on non-income account.

		(millions)

Cash surplus—i.e. balance available for debt reduction and/or increase in cash balances		$182

As shown above the total of other receipts during the year amounted to $128 millions, made up of $93 millions from increases in annuity, pension, insurance and guaranty accounts and $35 millions from increases in floating debt, deposit and trust accounts, and sundry suspense accounts. The total of other disbursements on the other hand amounted to no less than $596 millions, consisting of $450 millions by way of advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board to finance increases in Canada's exchange reserves, $57 millions by way of loans to the United Kingdom and other countries for use in purchasing Canadian exports, $71 millions by way of advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing construction and housing loans, and a further net amount of $18 millions by way of miscellaneous loans, advances, and investments (including loans to veterans, farmers, and the Canadian National Railways).

Although total receipts from all sources exceeded total disbursements by only $182 millions, the government nevertheless reduced its outstanding funded debt by a net amount of $372 millions. This extra reduction in funded debt was made possible through sales of bonds out of Securities Investment Account. This account is the one used to record temporary holdings by the government of its own securities. Such securities are held either as temporary investments of surplus cash balances, or until the securities themselves mature or are cancelled.

* To calculate the amount of cash made available to the government as a result of the current year's surplus two types of adjustment are necessary:

In the first place there must be added back to the accounting or budgetary surplus figure of $575 millions any items included in total expenditure which did not involve current outlays of cash. In this category, for example, come the provision for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets, $75 millions; the annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions, $8·6 millions; the 1948–49 subsidy payments and expenses of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation (which were financed out of moneys advanced to the Corporation in prior years), $15·0 millions; etc.

In the second place there must be deducted from the budgetary surplus figure any items included in total revenues which did not represent current receipts of cash. In this category, for example, come the interest accruals on interim advances made during the year to foreign governments, which were added to principal on consolidation of such advances into a specific loan, $16·0 millions; and the transfer to revenue of a balance previously held in a deposit account for War Supplies Limited, representing reimbursement for inspection costs in connection with certain procurements made through that company, $11·0 millions; etc.

A reconciliation between the "cash surplus" of $182 millions, the net reduction in funded debt of $372 millions, and the net change in the government's cash position during the year, is shown below:

	(millions)
Cash surplus—i.e. excess of total receipts from all sources over total disbursements	$182
Add:
Net sales of securities from Securities Investment Account	224
	$406
Deduct:
Reduction in funded debt payable in Canada $472
Less increase in funded debt payable in New York 100
Net reduction in funded debt	372
Net increase in cash balances during the year	$ 34

Ordinary revenues for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949, are expected to total approximately $2,652 millions, which represents an increase of approximately $22 millions over the total for the previous year. This increase was more than offset, however, by a decrease in special receipts and credits which are expected to total only $117 millions this year as compared with a total of $242 millions received during 1947-48. The reduction in these receipts, which consist largely of refunds of previous years' war, demobilization and reconversion expenditures, and sales of surplus war assets, reflects the normal decline which was to be expected in revenues from this source.

Of special interest on the expenditure side is the decrease in demobilization and reconversion expenditures from a total of $634 millions in 1947-48 to an estimated total of $434 millions for the current year. Special expenditures also reflect a decrease, declining from $63 millions in 1947-48 to $34 millions in 1948-49. These reductions were almost entirely offset, however, by an increase of $203 millions in ordinary expenditures ($1,583 millions in 1948-49 as compared with $1,380 millions in 1947-48), and an increase of $21 millions in expenditures connected with government-owned enterprises ($40 millions in 1948-49 as compared with $19 millions in 1947-48). To some extent the increase in ordinary expenditures and the decrease in demobilization and reconversion expenditures resulted from a change in method of classifying expenditure as between the two years. Owing to their continuing nature, for example, all costs relating to pensions and treatment of World War II veterans are now classed as ordinary expenditure, whereas in previous years they were included under the heading of Demobilization and Reconversion Expenditure.

4. ANALYSIS OF REVENUES

Estimated revenues for the year 1948-49, classified according to major categories, are presented in the following table along with corresponding figures for the previous fiscal year.

Total Revenues	2,768·2	100·0	2,871·7	100·0	−103·5

It will be noted that of grand total revenues for the year 49·5% was derived from direct taxes, 38·7% was obtained from indirect taxes, and the remaining 11·8% was attributable to non-tax revenues and special receipts and credits.

(a) Taxes on Personal Incomes

The personal income tax, which yielded an estimated total of $771 millions, retained its position as the largest single source of revenue. Although tax rates on personal incomes have remained unchanged since July 1, 1947, total collections from this tax showed an increase of some $111 millions over the 1947-48 total. This increase is a reflection of the high levels of income and employment which prevailed throughout the year.

(b) Corporation Income and Excess Profits Taxes

Corporation income taxes yielded a total of $490 millions, an increase of $126 millions over the previous year's total. This very large increase is attributable not only to the high level of business profits being earned during this period, but also to the fact that the effect of the increase in corporation income tax rates (from 18% to 30%) which took place on January 1, 1947, was more fully reflected in 1948-49 revenues than it was in the revenues of the preceding year.

The yield from excess profits taxes totalled only $40 millions during the current year as compared with a total of $227 millions in 1947-48. These taxes were repealed as of December 31, 1947, so that collections during the year 1948-49 were largely in the nature of clean-up payments.

(c) Taxes on Interest, Dividends, Rents and Royalties

Revenues under this heading represent withholding taxes on certain payments going to non-residents. The 1948-49 total of $42·7 millions represents an increase of approximately $7 millions over that for the previous year. This increase is due largely to a higher level of dividend payments during the current period.

(d) Succession Duties

Revenue from succession duties is estimated at $25·5 millions for the current year. The decline of $5·3 millions below the previous year's total is attributable largely to the raising of exemptions on estates subject to duty from $5,000 to $50,000. This change, which was announced in the 1948 Budget Speech, became effective as of January 1, 1948.

(e) Customs Duties

Net revenues from customs duties for the current year are estimated at $225 millions. This represents a reduction of $68 millions below the 1947-48 total, a decrease which is attributable almost entirely to the import restrictions put into effect in November 1947 as part of Canada's exchange conservation program.

(f) Excise Duties

Excise duties, which are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products, brought in an estimated total revenue of $206 millions during 1948-49, representing an increase of approximately $9 millions over the total for the previous year. Gross receipts in this category (before deducting refunds)are divided as follows: $105 millions from alcoholic beverages ($97·7 millions in 1947-48), and $104·3 millions from cigars, cigarettes and tobacco ($102·1 millions in 1947-48).

(g) Excise Taxes

Excise taxes constituted the second largest source of governmental revenues, with total collections for the year estimated at $637·4 millions ($640·7 millions in 1947-48). Included here are a wide variety of taxes on commodities and services levied under the provisions of the Excise Tax Act. The most important of these taxes from the point of view of revenue is the sales tax which yielded a gross revenue of $391·5 millions during 1948-49, or an increase of $8·5 millions over the total for the previous year. This increase, which reflects a somewhat higher price level during the current year, took place despite the fact that the majority of prepared food products not previously exempt from sales tax were placed on the exempt list in May, 1948.

The second largest revenue source among the excise taxes is the tax on tobacco products which yielded $76·6 millions. This represents an increase of 12% over the previous year's total, and indicates an upward trend in tobacco consumption.

The revenue from several other excise taxes also showed a substantial increase during the year. The revenue from soft drinks, for example, reached a new high of $27·8 millions, representing an increase of 17% over the total for the previous year. At the same time tax revenue from candy and chewing gum rose to $21·5 millions, representing an increase of 18% during the year. Excise tax revenues from automobiles, rubber tires and tubes totalled $37·4 millions for 1948-49, this increase of approximately 17% over 1947-48 revenues being attributable partly to the high rates of temporary taxes which were in effect until July 1948, and partly to the increased production and higher prices of automobiles.

Despite these increases, however, the over-all revenue from excise taxes was slightly lower in 1948-49 than in the preceding year because a number of previously important taxes no longer apply. The excise taxes on amusements, pari-mutuel bets, places of entertainment, and the special tax on importations, for example, were repealed in May, 1948 and yielded only small amounts of revenue during the current year. Moreover, excise taxes on gasoline and sugar, and the sales tax on gas and electricity, although they were repealed in 1947, yielded considerable amounts of revenue in 1947-48. Nothing, however, was received from these sources in 1948-49.

To some extent the revenue from excise taxes for the year reflects the temporary tax levies or temporary tax increases which were imposed in November 1947 in connection with the exchange conservation program. These temporary levies or increases were all removed over a period of nine months following that date, with the last and most important group being removed on July 31, 1948.

Some of the tax sources which showed an increase in revenue during the year (together with the amount of increase in each case) are as follows:

	Estimated Increase over 1947-48
Cigars, cigarettes and tobacco	$ 7,994,000
Automobiles, rubber tires and tubes	5,491,000
Beverages	4,033,000
Candy and chewing gum	3,261,000
Electric and gas appliances	1,066,000
Transportation and communications	1,049,000

Some of the sources which showed a decrease in revenue during the year (together with the amount of decrease in each case) are as follows:

	Estimated Decrease from 1947-48
Amusements	$ 12,789,000
Sugar	10,572,000
Pari-mutuel bets	2,519,000
Gasoline	2,208,000
Phonographs, radios and tubes	1,935,000
Special tax on importations	1,833,000
Stamps, including payment of taxes on jewellery, chinaware, cabaret attendance, etc.	1,750,000

(h) Other Indirect Taxes

Small amounts of tax revenue are derived from the tax on chartered bank note circulation; from the taxes on the net premium income of insurance companies; from a tax on the export of electric energy from Canada, and from a tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories. Total revenue from all these sources for 1948-49 is estimated at $4·0 millions, a slight increase over the total for the previous year.

*Direct taxes on income include individual income taxes, corporation income and excess profits taxes, and taxes on interest, dividends, rents and royalties.

(i) Non-Tax Revenues

Non-tax revenues for 1948-49 are estimated at $210·1 millions, an increase of some $32 millions over the 1947-48 total. The greater part of this increase took place in the revenue classification entitled "Return on Investments", the total of which is expected to reach $106 millions in 1948-49 as compared with a total of $75·8 millions in 1947-48. The larger items entering into total receipts under this classification are: interest on advances to the Canadian National Railways, $21·2 millions; Bank of Canada profits, $19·2 millions; interest on loans to, and operating profits of, the Foreign Exchange Control Board, $13·4 millions; interest on bonds held in Securities Investment Account, $17 millions; interest on loans to foreign governments under Part II of The Export Credits Insurance Act, $26·2 millions; and interest on advances under the Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act, $3·3 millions.

Also included in the general category of non-tax revenues are post office receipts, which are estimated at $79·8 millions for 1948-49 as compared with a total of $77·8 millions during 1947-48. It may be of interest to note that the total costs of operating the Post Office Department during the year are estimated at $78·0 millions, so that receipts on this account exceeded costs by approximately $1·8 millions. In making this comparison, however, it should be borne in mind that the total shown for Post Office receipts does not reflect the value of services rendered free of charge to other departments. Similarly the total shown for operating expenses does not reflect any charges for premises owned by the Government and occupied by the Post Office Department.

Other non-tax revenues of $24·3 millions represent receipts derived from the following sources: services and service fees, $8·6 millions; privileges, licences, and permits, $6·0 millions; bullion and coinage, $3·3 millions; proceeds from sales of publications, experimental farm produce, etc., $2·4 millions; refunds of expenditures, $1·9 millions; and miscellaneous non-tax receipts, $2·1 millions.

(j) Special Receipts and Credits

The total of special receipts and credits for the fiscal year 1948-49 is estimated at $116·5 millions, as compared with total receipts of $241·9 millions for the preceding year. Receipts on war, demobilization and reconversion account again constituted by far the largest source of special revenues. The total of such receipts during the fiscal year 1948-49 was $113·8 millions, consisting of $80·8 millions from refunds of previous years' war, demobilization and reconversion expenditures; $24·4 millions from the sale of surplus war assets, and $8·6 millions from miscellaneous war, demobilization and reconversion revenues.

The largest item in this total, namely the $80·8 millions received by way of refunds of previous years' war, demobilization and reconversion expenditures may be further analysed as follows:

Refunds in connection with cost audits and re-negotiation of contracts	$ 58·0	millions
Reimbursement for inspection costs in connection with certain procurements made through War Supplies Limited	11·0	"
Refund by the Government of the United States of advances made by Canada in excess of amounts required to cover the cost of supplies and services furnished under lend lease and related programs (including the Canpay program)	3·7	"
Amount received from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation representing proceeds from the sale of certain of the properties and assets transferred to that Corporation by Wartime Housing Limited	3·3	"
Miscellaneous refunds	4·8	"
	$ 80·8	millions

The amount of $24·4 millions realized from the disposal of surplus war assets does not include the residual cash balances or value of accounts receivable carried by War Assets Corporation as at March 31, 1949.

Miscellaneous war, demobilization and reconversion revenues totalling $8·6 millions include the sum of $5·0 millions derived from the operation of Park Steamships Limited, and the sum of $1·4 millions representing the Government's share of profits arising out of the wartime operations of Sorel Industries Limited.

Apart from war, demobilization and reconversion revenues, the only other important item included in special receipts and credits during the last fiscal year was a credit of $2·5 millions arising from the transfer to "Active Assets" of certain advances made in prior years in connection with the Snare River Power project, and previously classified as "Expenditure".

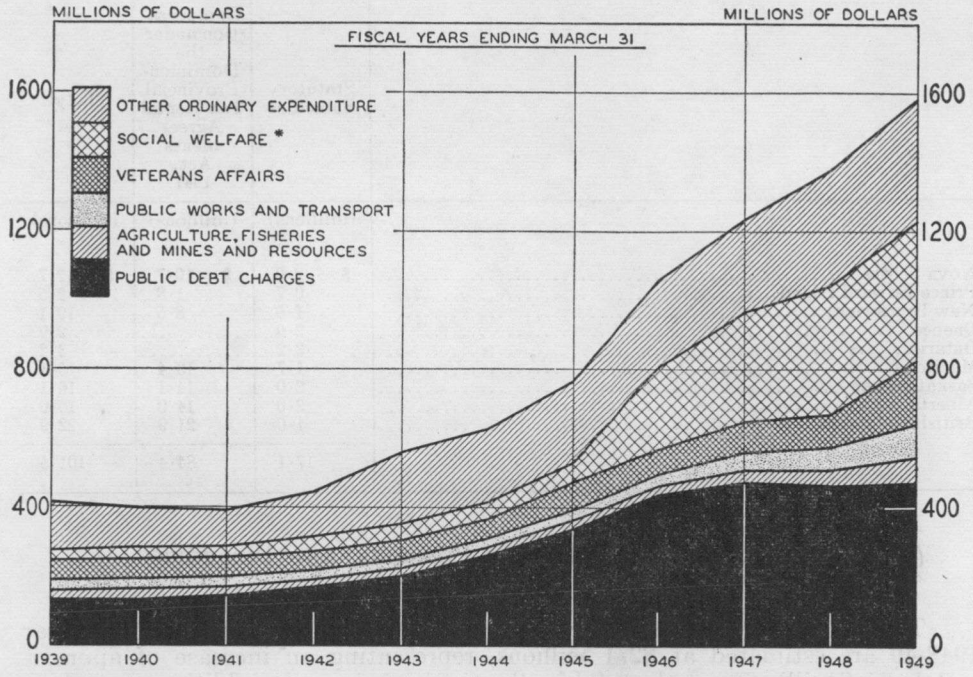
MAIN CLASSES OF BUDGETARY EXPENDITURE

*Other expenditure includes capital and special expenditures, deficits of government owned enterprises' and other charges.

(1) Ordinary Expenditures

(a) Debt Charges



Interest on public debt again constituted the largest single item of governmental expenditure, with the 1948-49 total estimated at $463·7 millions or 21·1% of total expenditure for the year. The increase of $8·2 millions in this item over the 1947-48 total is attributable to the payment during 1948-49 of several years' accumulated interest on the 1943 and 1944 refundable portion of personal income taxes. The refundable portion for both these years is being repaid in March, 1949 and the total interest accrued thereon amounts to no less than $19·1 millions. This compares with a total interest charge of only $5·3 millions in the 1947-48 year, when the 1942 refundable portion was repaid.

If interest payments on the refundable portion are separated from both years' totals it will be seen that the aggregate of all other interest charges for the year 1948-49 was reduced $5·6 millions below the corresponding total for the previous year.

Of total 1948-49 interest charges of $463·7 millions, the sum of $438·2 millions represents interest paid on the government's outstanding funded debt, while the balance of $25·5 millions represents interest paid or credited to various annuity, superannuation, pension and trust funds.

The addition of annual amortization charges in connection with loan discounts and commissions, plus the costs of new loan flotations (not amortized), and certain miscellaneous service charges, brings the total of all public debt charges for the year to $473·6 millions.

ANALYSIS OF ORDINARY EXPENDITURE

*Social welfare costs include family allowances, old age pensions and pensions to the blind, the Government's contribution to the Unemployment Insurance fund, and the ordinary expenditures of the Department of Labour and the Department of National Health and Welfare.

(b) Payments to Provinces

Total payments to provinces (including statutory subsidies and payments under tax agreements) amounted to $101·5 millions, a decrease of some $54·4 millions below the total for the previous year. This difference is attributable largely to the fact that the 1947-48 total included not only the current payments to the seven participating provinces under the 1947 Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements, but also the final holdback payments to six provinces under the old wartime tax agreements (which expired during 1947-48), and a special payment of $8 millions each to Alberta and Saskatchewan in final settlement of claims in respect of natural resources.

Details of payments, by provinces, for the current year are as follows:

—	Statutory Subsidies	Compensation under the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947	Total
	(millions)	(millions)	(millions)
Nova Scotia	$ 2·0	$ 10·7	$ 12·7

Ontario	3·2	.....	3·2

Alberta	2·0	14·0	16·0
British Columbia	1·0	21·9	22·9
	17·1	84·4	101·5

(c) Family Allowances, Old Age Pensions, and Pensions to Blind Persons

Total expenditures in connection with family allowances for the year 1948-49 are estimated at $271 millions, representing an increase of approximately $7·8 millions over the total for the previous year. In addition, payments for old age pensions and pensions to blind persons are expected to total $67 millions, an increase of approximately $8·9 millions over the 1947-48 total.

The estimated distribution of these payments, by provinces, is as follows:

—	Family Allowances	Old Age Pensions and Pensions to Blind Persons
	(millions)	(millions)
Nova Scotia	$ 14·6	$ 4·9
Prince Edward Island	2·3	0·6
New Brunswick	12·5	4·2
Quebec	89·3	17·3
Ontario	80·1	20·9
Manitoba	15·0	4·3
Saskatchewan	18·5	4·3
Alberta	18·7	4·0
British Columbia	19·4	6·5
Northwest and Yukon Territories	0·6
	271·0	67·0

(d) Department of National Revenue

The increase of $14·0 millions in the expenditures of this department is attributable largely to a general expansion of the Income Tax Division, as well as to increases in personnel costs in all sections of the department.

(e) Mines and Resources

The increase of approximately $25·7 millions in the expenditures of this department is due chiefly to subsidy payments to gold mines under the new Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, together with some fairly substantial increases in expenditure in connection with National Parks, Immigration Services, and the Indian Affairs Branch. It is estimated that the total of subsidy payments to gold mines during the government's current fiscal year will aggregate approximately $10 millions.

(f) Public Works

Expenditures on public works are approximately $16·1 millions higher than the total for the previous year, reflecting a general increase in the costs of operation, maintenance and repairs in the case of public works and buildings, and an increase in the costs of dredging, improvements, etc., in the case of harbours and rivers. The total of this department's expenditures would probably have been much greater had it not been for the policy of deliberately deferring, wherever possible, all expenditures on new construction and new equipment.

(g) Transport

The increase of $13·3 millions in the expenditures of this department reflects a general increase in the costs of various departmental services. Air Services showed the greatest increase, with expenditures aggregating $18·4 millions in 1948-49 as compared with a total of $10·4 millions in the previous year.

(h) Trade and Commerce

Although the total ordinary expenditures of this department show an increase from $10·8 millions in 1947-48 to $28·1 millions in 1948-49, the greater part of this increase is due to the transfer to this department during 1948-49 of many of the services or functions which previously came under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. Included in this transfer, for example, were the Chalk River Project and the National Research Council.

(i) Veterans Affairs

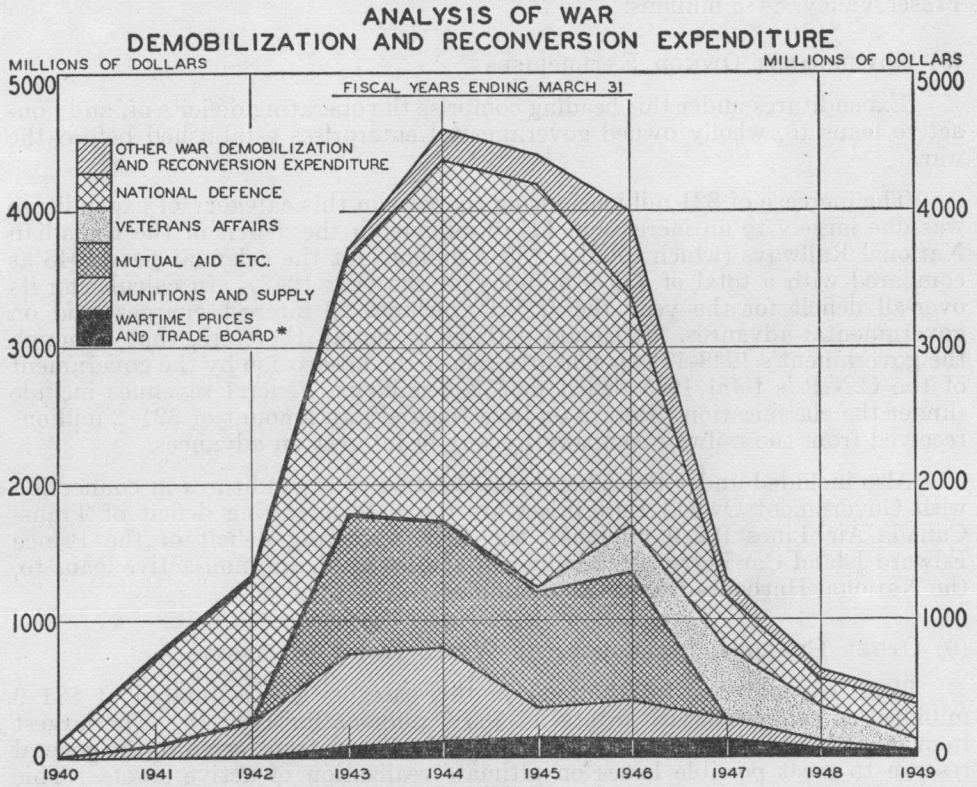
The ordinary expenditures of this department are estimated at $183·5 millions for the current year, an increase of $86·2 millions over the 1947-48 total of $97·3 millions. However, the greater part of this increase is due to a change in method of classifying expenditure. Owing to their continuing nature all costs relating to pensions and treatment of World War II veterans are now classed as "Ordinary Expenditure" whereas in previous years they were included under the heading of "Demobilization and Reconversion Expenditure".

To satisfactorily compare expenditures on veterans affairs as between the two years it is necessary to add together the Department's "Ordinary" expenditures and its "Demobilization and Reconversion" expenditures, and consider the combined total. As shown below the 1948-49 total of "Demobilization and Reconversion" expenditures for this department is estimated at $88·8 millions, as compared with a total of $237·4 millions for the preceding year. When these amounts are added to the totals of "Ordinary Expenditure" shown above it will be seen that the aggregate of all expenditures on veterans affairs declined from a total of $334·7 millions in 1947-48 to a total of $272·3 millions in 194 -49, i.e. an over-all decrease of $62·4 millions.

(2) Capital Expenditures

Expenditures charged to capital are estimated at $19·5 millions for the year as compared with a total of $15·7 millions in 1947-48. The principal items in this category are the costs of constructing and improving civil airways and airports, the costs of dredging the St. Lawrence ship channel, and capital expenditures in connection with the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals.

(3) Demobilization and Reconversion Expenditures



Despite a large increase in the expenditures of the Department of National Defence (which are estimated at $248·5 millions in 1948-49 as compared with a total of $195·4 millions for the previous year) the total of demobilization and reconversion expenditures decreased from $634·4 millions in 1947-48 to $434·4 millions in 1948-49.

The greater part of this decrease occurred in the Veterans Affairs Department, whose total demobilization and reconversion expenditure for 1948-49 is estimated at $88·8 millions as against a total of $237·4 millions for the preceding year. Part of this large decrease is due, of course, to the fact that costs of pensions, and treatment in connection with World War II veterans are, as already mentioned, included under "Ordinary Expenditure", whereas in previous years they were classified as "Demobilization and Reconversion Expenditure". In addition, however, some very substantial reductions did occur in such items as post-discharge rehabilitation benefits ($47·5 millions in 1948-49 as against $78·3 millions in 1947-48), and in war service gratuities and re-establishment credits ($36·2 millions in 1948-49 as against $84·2 millions in 1947-48.)

The total costs involved in administering the Wartime Prices and Trade Board (including costs of subsidies, and payments of drawback claims to millers) declined from $57·1 millions in 1947-48 to $35·8 millions for the current year.

A substantial reduction is also reflected in the expenditures of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply (which show a total of only $1·5 millions in 1948-49 as compared with $62·3 millions for the previous year). Part of this reduction is attributable to a change in the method of recording federal government outlays in connection with housing. Prior to June 30, 1948, construction work on federal housing projects was carried on through the medium of Wartime Housing Limited, and all outlays in this connection were treated as "Expenditure" in the government's accounts. As the various projects were brought to completion, the management and control of the houses was transferred to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. On June 30, 1948, in accordance with the 1948 amendments to the National Housing Act, the latter corporation became responsible for all future housing construction as well, and the activities of Wartime Housing Limited were thereupon brought to an end. The 1948 amendments to the National Housing Act also provided that all moneys turned over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing purposes were to be treated as advances on the government's books.

As a result of this change in procedure there is nothing in the 1948-49 expenditures of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply which corresponds with the total of $36·5 millions (for Wartime Housing Limited) included in the Department's 1947-48 expenditures. Although amounts totalling approximately $63 millions were turned over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation during 1948-49 for construction purposes, these are recorded as advances in the government's books and are not included with the year's expenditures.

*The amounts shown for the Wartime Prices and Trade Board include administrative costs, subsidies due to application of price ceilings, and payments of drawback claims to millers

Part of the reduction in the expenditures of this department is also attributable to the fact that certain functions or services previously performed by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply were transferred during the year to the Department of Trade and Commerce. Expenditures in connection with the administration, reconversion and operation of Crown companies and/or plants, together with production and transportation subsidies for Canadian steel producers, and costs of research and development of jet engines and aircraft, which were shown under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply in 1947-48, are included this year in the expenditures of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

(4) Special Expenditures

Special expenditures are estimated at $34·4 millions for the year, a decrease of approximately $28·7 millions below the 1947-48 total. The larger items making up the 1948-49 total are as follows: deficit of the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund, $8·9 millions; expenditures under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, $2·9 millions; expenditures relating to the St. Mary River Dam project $1·6 millions; deficit of the Canadian Wheat Board on flaxseed account for the crop year 1947-48, $4·5 millions; the grant to British Columbia for emergency relief and rehabilitation in connection with the Fraser Valley flood disaster, $5 millions; and Canada's share of the cost of repairing and reconstructing dykes in the Fraser Valley, $4·5 millions.

(5) Government Owned Enterprises

Expenditures under this heading comprise the operating deficits of, and non-active loans to, wholly owned governmental enterprises established before the war.

The increase of $21 millions during the year in this category of expenditure was due largely to an increase of $17·6 millions in the deficit of the Canadian National Railways (which totalled $33·5 millions for the calendar year 1948 as compared with a total of $15·9 millions for the year 1947). In calculating its over-all deficit for the year the C.N.R. includes all interest charges paid on governmental advances. It should perhaps be noted, therefore, that although the government's 1948-49 expenditures reflect the absorption by the government of the C.N.R.'s total 1948 deficit of $33·5 millions, Federal revenues include (under the classification "Return on Investments") an amount of $21·2 millions received from the railway company by way of interest on advances.

Also included under the general classification of expenditures in connection with Government Owned Enterprises are the 1948 operating deficit of Trans-Canada Air Lines ($2·9 millions), the 1948 operating deficit of the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry ($1·2 millions), and losses of, and non-active loans to, the National Harbours Board ($2·0 millions).

(6) Other Charges, Including the Write Down of Assets

Total expenditures for the year in this category are estimated at $81·9 millions, as compared with a total of $83·7 millions for 1947-48. The largest item in both years' totals is an amount of $75 millions transferred to the general reserve to meet possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets. This reserve was first established in 1940-41, and $25 millions was set aside annually from that time up to and including the fiscal year 1946-47. In 1947-48, and again this year, the annual provision was increased to $75 millions—a larger provision being deemed advisable in order to offset the charges that have been made to the reserve during recent years, and also in order to bring the reserve to a level more in keeping with the magnitude of the government's active assets and the proportion thereof represented by loans to overseas countries.

Also included under the classification "Other Charges", are the annual write-off of Veterans' Land Act Loans ($1·2 millions) and the reserve provisions for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act ($5·7 millions).

6. ESTIMATED BALANCE SHEET POSITION AT MARCH 31, 1949

The following table presents, in summary form, the Government's estimated balance sheet position as at March 31, 1949, together with comparable figures as at March 31, 1948.

Net Debt (Excess of Liabilities over Net Active Assets)	11,796·6	12,371·6	—575·0

It is estimated that the aggregate liabilities of the Government at March 31, 1949, will amount to approximately $16,947 millions, a reduction of $250 millions from the total at the end of the previous year. Outstanding funded debt (which includes bonds, treasury bills, deposit certificates, and the estimated refundable portion of excess profits taxes) accounts for $15,585 millions, or approximately 92 per cent of the over-all total. A complete statement of the Government's unmatured funded debt at March 31, 1949, giving details of interest rates, dates of maturity, annual interest charges, and principal amounts for each individual loan, may be found in tabular form at the back of this appendix.

The other principal items on the liability side of the balance sheet are as follows: floating debt, (which consists of outstanding cheques and interest, matured funded debt, and similar demand liabilities), $459 millions; deposit and trust funds (which comprise sundry funds deposited with the Receiver General or held in trust for various purposes), $110·6 millions; annuity, pension, insurance and guaranty accounts, $704·1 millions; deferred credits (balances whose ultimate accounting treatment is known, but which are held until certain conditions are met), $3 millions; sundry suspense accounts (where some uncertainty as to disposition exists), $60·2 millions; province debt accounts (settlements arising from agreements at the time of Confederation), $11·9 millions; and reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act, $13·3 millions.

Offsetting these liabilities (and in a measure explaining their existence, because a substantial portion of the total debt is attributable to the loans, advances, and investments which form a large part of the assets) are the Government's Active Assets. Essentially these consist of assets which yield interest, profits or dividends, together with very liquid assets such as cash and departmental working funds.

It is estimated (although some of the items are very difficult to forecast) that the totals of the principal asset classifications at March 31, 1949, will be approximately as follows: cash, $72·2 millions; departmental working capital advances, $11 millions; recoverable loans and advances, $4,273·7 millions; investments, $951·5 millions; province debt accounts, $2·3 millions; deferred charges (the cost of loan flotations in process of being amortized over the life of the loans), $65·7 millions; and sundry suspense accounts, $20 millions.

The reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets, which now stands on the books at $245·9 millions, is shown on the balance sheet as a deduction from total Active Assets.

7. INDIRECT OR CONTINGENT LIABILITIES

It should be noted that the balance sheet as summarized above does not reflect any of the government's indirect or contingent liabilities. Included under this heading, for example, are the government's guarantees of certain securities issued by various government owned enterprises such as the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, and various Harbours Commissions; the guarantee of deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada; guarantees of certain loans made by chartered banks to veterans or farmers for certain authorized purposes; guarantees under The Export Credits Insurance Act; and certain commitments under housing legislation.

The following table gives details of the bonds and debenture stocks guaranteed by the government, and also indicates the nature and approximate extent of the government's other guarantees and contingent liabilities:

It will be noted that the total of guaranteed bonds and debentures outstanding at March 31, 1949, is estimated at $554·6 millions, an increase of approximately $32·7 millions over the amount outstanding at March 31, 1948. This increase resulted from the issue by the Canadian National Railways of $35 millions in 3% bonds dated January 3, 1949, and maturing January 3, 1966, and the redemption on April 1, 1948, of New Westminster Harbour Commissioners' 4¾% bonds in the amount of $·7 millions, together with certain other smaller redemptions.

8. ANALYSIS OF CHANGES IN PRINCIPAL LIABILITY CLASSIFICATIONS DURING THE YEAR

The most significant change on the liability side of the balance sheet during the year was the substantial reduction which took place in the government's outstanding funded debt. Total funded debt decreased from $15,957·4 millions at March 31, 1948, to an estimated total of $15,585·0 millions at March 31, 1949—representing an over-all net reduction of $372·4 millions. Details of the various loan redemptions and new borrowings which resulted in this net decrease are set out more fully in section 10 of this Part.

The only other important changes on the liability side of the balance sheet were the following: annuity, pension, insurance and guaranty accounts showed an increase of $93·4 millions during the year, largely as a result of an increase of $66 millions in government annuities and an increase of $14·3 millions in the permanent services pension fund; sundry suspense accounts showed an increase of $28·8 millions during the year, attributable largely to collections of provincial taxes on corporation incomes.

9. ANALYSIS OF CHANGES IN PRINCIPAL ASSET CLASSIFICATIONS DURING THE YEAR

(a) Changes in Loans and Advances

The total of recoverable loans and advances increased from $3,676·7 millions at March 31, 1948, to an estimated total of $4,273·7 millions at March 31, 1949—representing an over-all net increase of $597 millions during the year. The following table summarizes the changes in outstanding loans and advances during the year by principal classifications:

DETAILS OF ACTIVE LOANS AND ADVANCES

(In millions of dollars)

—	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1949 (Estimated)	1948
	$	$	$
Loans to Canadian National Railways	764·8	760·7	4·1
Advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board	1,100·0	650·0	450·0
Loans and Advances to Sundry Government Agencies	380·9	304·7	76·2
Loans to Provincial and Municipal Governments	102·5	107·8	—5·3
Loans to the United Kingdom and Other Governments	1,918·8	1,846·0	72·8
Miscellaneous Loans and Advances	6·7	7·5	—0·8
	4,273·7	3,676·7	597·0

It can be seen that the substantial advances which the Government was making to the Foreign Exchange Control Board during this period constituted the principal reason for the large net increase in the "Loans and Advances" classification. These advances represent amounts transferred to the Board to enable it to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange. The addition of $450 millions during the year in the total of these advances is indicative of the satisfactory manner in which Canada's exchange reserves were increasing during this period.

The amounts shown as loans to the Canadian National Railways represent advances by the Government to the C.N.R. for capital expenditures (including purchase of railway equipment), for debt retirement, and for the temporary financing of current operations.

The balances shown as loans and advances to sundry government agencies represent amounts transferred to various government agencies of an independent or quasi-independent nature for working capital, construction, and other purposes. The following table gives details of the principal agencies included under this classification:

DETAILS OF LOANS AND ADVANCES TO SUNDRY GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Under the heading "Loans to Provincial and Municipal Governments" are grouped loans to provinces made originally under Relief Acts and other legislation, and loans to municipalities under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act.

The next category of loans, namely "Loans to the United Kingdom and Other Governments" consists of loans to the Government of the United Kingdom under the authority of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, and The United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, loans to other countries under Part II of The Export Credits Insurance Act, and miscellaneous foreign loans. Details of the changes in each of these individual classifications are as follows:

DETAILS OF LOANS TO THE UNITED KINGDOM AND OTHER GOVERNMENTS

(In millions of dollars)

—	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1949 (Estimated)	1948

Miscellaneous Advances	42·2	40·2	2·0
	1,918·8	1,846·0	72·8

It is estimated that during the year ending March 31, 1949 the United Kingdom will have repaid $34·4 millions of the loan previously granted under the provisions of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, leaving a balance of $297·1 millions still outstanding on this account at the end of the year. At the same time additional advances of $37 millions were made to the United Kingdom Government as part of the $1,250 million loan authorized by The United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act of 1946. The total of amounts advanced under this particular agreement now stands at $1,045 millions.

Advances under Part II of The Export Credits Insurance Act represent loans to certain foreign countries to assist them in purchasing goods and services in Canada. It is estimated that the total of outstanding advances under this Act will amount to $534.5 millions at March 31, 1949, representing a net increase of $68·2 millions over the balance outstanding at March 31, 1948. The following table summarizes the changes in these advances during the year according to recipient governments:

(b) Changes in Investments

The total of the government's investments decreased from $1,175·2 millions at March 31, 1948 to $951·5 millions at March 31, 1949, representing an over-all net reduction of $223·7 millions during the year. This decrease was due to the reduction of $224·4 millions during the year in Securities Investment Account. As previously mentioned, this account is the one used to record temporary holdings by the government of its own securities. Such securities may be held either as temporary investments of surplus cash balances, or until the securities themselves mature or are cancelled.

A summary of the principal items making up the investment total which appears on the balance sheet is shown in the following table:

(c) CHANGES IN RESERVE FOR POSSIBLE LOSSES ON ULTIMATE REALIZATION OF ACTIVE ASSETS

As mentioned earlier a transfer of $75 millions was made to this reserve during the year with a corresponding amount being charged to "Expenditure" in the government's accounts. The balance to the credit of the reserve now stands at $245·9 millions.

10. SUMMARY OF SECURITY ISSUES AND REDEMPTIONS DURING THE YEAR

During the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949, government obligations totalling $3,081·7 millions matured or were called for redemption. Of this amount a total of $2,941·6 millions represented redemptions in Canada, the financing of which was effected as follows:

	(millions)
By refunding or conversion into new issues	$ 2,233·3
From proceeds of new borrowing: Sale of Canada Savings Bonds Series III	236·0
From cash balances	472·3
	$ 2,941·6

The redemption of $472·3 millions out of cash balances represents the net reduction achieved during the year in the total of Canadian debt.

The remaining* $140 millions of the over-all redemption figure of $3,081·7 millions referred to above represents the repayment of certain U.S. dollar loans previously made to the government by the Export-Import Bank of Washington ($50 millions of which were advanced during the fiscal year 1947-48, and the remaining $90 millions of which were advanced during the early part of the present fiscal year). This repayment of $140 millions was financed out of the proceeds of a new issue of $150 million 3% fifteen year bonds which were sold to three United States insurance companies in August 1948 at par.

The $90 millions in U.S. dollars which were obtained as a result of this year's drawings on the Export-Import Bank loan, together with the $10 millions in U.S. dollars remaining out of the proceeds of the new $150 million loan, were transferred during the year to the Foreign Exchange Control Board and added to the nation's exchange reserves. The net effect, during 1948-49, of all these U.S. dollar transactions was to increase the total funded debt payable in New York by $100 millions, and at the same time to increase the country's exchange reserves by an equivalent amount.

It can be seen from the above analysis that the over-all net reduction in the government's outstanding funded debt during the year amounted to $372·4 millions—i.e. the net reduction of $472·3 millions in Canadian debt together with the reduction of $0·1 millions in sterling debt, and less the increase of $100 millions in funded debt payable in New York.

More complete details of redemptions and new issues of securities during the year are set out in tables on the following two pages.

*Apart from certain minor redemptions of sterling debt totalling $68,514.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 23, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THE BUDGET—DAILY EDITION OF DEBATES OF MARCH 22—TRIBUTE TO PRINTERS

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the debates committee of the House of Commons I rise to say a word about a noncontentious matter, namely, the publication of Hansard of yesterday, with the full speech of the Minister of Finance and a lengthy appendix. Every hon. member has before him this morning the English text of Hansard in book form, including the speech of the Minister of Finance, with seven tabulations, an appendix, fifty-two other tabulations and eleven full pages of supplementary detailed tables.

It is my great pleasure to pay a special tribute to the king's printer and to the whole staff. Sometimes we have to complain about certain things, but at this time the whole personnel of the printing bureau deserves special praise. The work could not have been done anywhere else except in the printing department of the New York Times—and my remark applies to the whole of North America. I know of no other place where such a piece of work could have been done so well and so expeditiously. I do not pay a tribute only to the higher-ups of the printing bureau—they deserve it; but I have in mind also the humble typesetter and proofreader. I know what it is to publish books, and this book, sir, is a credit to the members of the staff of the printing bureau. I hope that the minister will tell them it is the desire of the house to praise them and to encourage them to continue to do such fine work in the future.

Hon. Colin Gibson (Secretary of State): I thank the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) for bringing to the attention of the house the splendid work which is being done by the employees of the printing bureau. I shall be glad to inform them of his comments in that regard. I have often felt that hon. members do not realize that the members of the night staff of the printing bureau work month after month from ten o'clock until eight in the morning, at very high pressure and in difficult surroundings. The hon. member's word of tribute to these men will be appreciated.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): The Hansard staff should be included as well for the remarkable job they do.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I want to join in the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. We should add the translators, who are also the unsung heroes in a historical document of this kind.

PRIVILEGE, MR. DIEFENBAKER—REFERENCE TO NOTICE OF MOTION OF MR. LACROIX—STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: I should like to make a statement to the house following the remarks made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who raised a question of privilege which will be found in the official report of the debates of the House of Commons of Tuesday, March 22, 1949, at page 1745. I call the attention of hon. members to the following paragraph:

> My point of privilege is this, sir. Did you, in your position as Speaker, consent to the alteration of this resolution? Was it placed before the house, or was the alteration made at the request of the government?

The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) gave notice on Friday, March 18, that he would move the following resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces with the view of the adoption by parliament of a new constitution for Canada and Canadians which would be a statute of Canada repealing the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, resulting in the making of Canada a truly sovereign and independent nation, a separate republic outside of the British commonwealth of nations, free of economic or other commitments, whether in peace or in war.

This notice of motion appeared word for word on the order paper of Monday, March 21, but it was altered on the hon. member's instruction, and appears with material changes on the order paper of Tuesday, March 22. The hon. member for Lake Centre drew attention to the fact that the proposed resolution had been mutilated to read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should seek the consent of the provinces with the view of the adoption by parliament of a new constitution for Canada and Canadians which would be a statute of Canada repealing the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, resulting in the making of Canada a truly sovereign and independent nation, a separate republic, free of economic or other commitments toward the British commonwealth of nations, whether in peace or in war.

The question has arisen whether or not the alteration was so material that it could not be made before the motion was taken up by the house. Mr. Speaker Lemieux decided on March 26, 1928, that a motion which differs materially from the terms of the notice can only be proposed with the consent of the house, or upon the renewal of the notice. I agree with that ruling.

The change was made at the request of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, but outside my knowledge. My own opinion is that the notice of motion should not have been placed on the order paper at all. Its proposal that this parliament, constituted under the British North America Act, take upon itself to adopt a new constitution resulting in making Canada a separate republic outside of the British commonwealth of nations comes in direct conflict with the oath taken by members of this house, which oath is as follows:

I do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George VI.

May says, as quoted in citation 365 of Beauchesne's second edition, that:

When a notice, publicly given, is obviously irregular or unbecoming, the Speaker has interposed and the notice has not been received in that form. He has also directed that a notice of motion should not be printed as being obviously designed to give annoyance.

I have no doubt in saying the notice of motion should not appear on the order paper, and, using my authority as the custodian of our procedure, I have given the necessary instructions to strike it out of the order paper.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DEBATE ON NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Prime Minister in a position to indicate on what day the debate is to open on the North Atlantic treaty?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, not this morning. I had hoped it might be possible to reach it this week, although now that does not appear to be probable. There is the emergency legislation which has to be dealt with if it is not to be allowed to expire by lapse of time. Just as soon as that is disposed of, I think we should provide an opportunity for an initial debate on the North Atlantic treaty in accordance with the terms of the motion which is on the order paper. I should like to have that matter discussed as soon as we have disposed of these emergency measures.

Mr. Drew: The subject matter is of considerable importance, and hon. members will wish to arrange to be here. They all have their own arrangements which they are making from time to time. I think the time for the debate can best be arranged between the party whips by setting a definite date a few days in advance. I suggest therefore that the debate should not come on without due warning; hon. members should have an opportunity to make appropriate arrangements.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall bear in mind the observations of the hon. member, and try to arrange it so that there will be due notice to all members of the time at which the debate will begin.

Mr. MacInnis: Is it not a fact that members of the house are paid $6,000 a year to be here?

SITTING ON SATURDAY, MARCH 26

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention to have the house sit on Saturday if we finish the emergency legislation by Friday night.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No. The form of the motion indicated that it was only for the purpose of disposing of matters which had to be dealt with before the expiry date of the existing legislation that this departure from the standing orders was requested. If we are successful in disposing of that legislation by Friday night, there will be no reason for asking hon. members to sit on Saturday.

Mr. Knowles: The order would lapse.

Mr. St. Laurent: The order would lapse.

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—QUESTION OF USE OF PUBLIC ADDRESS SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to raise a question that was raised earlier in the session, and the importance of which I think was emphasized again only yesterday when one of the members—I feel sure quite sincerely—indicated that he could not hear your voice, Mr. Speaker. Your voice, sir, carries particularly well through this chamber. It is a matter of concern to everyone here that members who speak cannot be heard—perhaps not because of their voices, but because when one speaks from under the galleries there is a deadening effect which muffles the voice to such an extent that it cannot be heard, although it may be a perfectly strong and resonant voice.

I suggest that serious consideration be given to a suggestion made earlier, that amplifying devices be installed in this chamber, which unquestionably has acoustic dead spots. The legislature of Manitoba has had much success with small microphones which are put on each desk. They are relatively inexpensive, and they carry the voice of the speaker to every part of the chamber.

In raising this point again, may I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that, in addition to the microphones on the table in front of the Speaker of the House of Commons in London, there are microphones suspended by wires to carry voices throughout the house. The acoustic properties there are infinitely better than they are here. In fairness to the members, and in the interests of proper debate, I strongly urge that you consider the installation, even if only experimentally, of some system which will enable the voices of members to be heard in all parts of the house. I feel sure that one of the companies which handles equipment of this kind would be glad to do it on an experimental basis.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to say to the house that I have discussed the matter with the best firms in Canada who have to do with equipment of this kind. They agree with me that so far we have not reached a conclusion which would result in a method satisfactory to the house. It is with pleasure, however, that I say to hon. members that I hope that during the Easter recess certain experiments will be made in the house to see if we cannot succeed in providing a system which will give satisfaction.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

IMMIGRATION—DISPLACED PERSONS—EMPLOYMENT BY RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Fraser:

1. Have any displaced persons with university degrees been employed by the National Research Council?

2. If so, what are their (a) names; (b) date of arrival in Canada of each employee; (c) date that employment commenced in each case; (d) salary paid to each of these employees?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

*CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

Mr. Fulton:

What is the total of (a) all advances made to the Canadian Commercial Corporation since it was first set up; (b) all moneys advanced by the Canadian Commercial Corporation since it commenced operation?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, it has been difficult to understand clearly what is meant by the second part of this question. I have taken the liberty of discussing it with the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), and I understand that by the word "advances" in paragraph (a) of the question he is referring to the amount of money on deposit with the corporation from the Minister of Finance. That amount is $3,500,000.

Part (b) of the question which asks for the total of all moneys advanced by the Canadian Commercial Corporation since it commenced operation, is, I take it, concerned with the revenues of the corporation. The gross operating revenues received with respect to purchases made on behalf of the Department of National Defence amounted to $1,170,264 as of December 31, 1948. With respect to purchases made on behalf of others, as of the same date the amount is $1,303,798, making a total of $2,473,972.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Campbell:

What farmers received Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments in township 45, ranges 27 and 28, west of the 3rd meridian, in the years 1946, 1947 and 1948?

Questions

Mr. Gardiner: I would ask the hon. member, if he does not mind, to drop this question. We have taken great care to avoid publishing payments made to individuals under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the reason being that in the beginning strong pressure was brought to bear to permit of these payments being garnisheed. We have had requests from time to time to make public the names and amounts, and have always objected to doing so. We would have no objection to an hon. member getting the information, and I believe such information could be given as to individual cases, or even as to groups. We have always contended, however, that it would not be in the interests of individuals to have these lists of names published.

Mr. Campbell: I received a complaint from one farmer in my area to the effect that his name had been left off the list to receive payments. My reason for asking the question was to determine the accuracy of his statement that his name had been left off.

Mr. Gardiner: We will give the hon. member the information about that one individual.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

CROWN COMPANIES—NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION COMPANY

Mr. Merritt:

1. When did Northern Transportation Company become a crown company?
2. As at date of acquisition and at December 31, 1948, what was (a) the value of the fixed assets of the company; (b) the amount of its reserve for depreciation; (c) the rate of depreciation permitted to the company, and by what authority was such rate paid or approved?

5. Does the company carry on any business other than a transportation business, and if so, what other business?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. The shares of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited were appropriated by His Majesty the King in the right of Canada as of January 28, 1944. As of that date, all of the outstanding shares of Northern Transportation Company, with the exception of directors' qualifying shares, were owned by Eldorado Northern Transportation Company Limited, and as of that date therefore came under the control of the government.

2. The value of the fixed assets of the company and the amount of its reserve for depreciation as of January 1, 1944, and as of December 31, 1948, was as follows:

	Jan. 1, 1944	Dec. 31, 1948

3. $1,859,015.07.

4. Northern Transportation Company (1947) Limited is a carrier licensed by the board of transport commissioners, and operates under the jurisdiction of the board with respect to

2. What is the total amount in tons of starch made from corn imported into Canada from dollar areas, during each of the years 1946, 1947, 1948?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. (a) and (b) cannot be shown separately. Production of potato starch and flour in Canada: 1946, 2,326 tons; 1947, 6,387 tons; 1948, not yet available.

2. Information not available.

1. Has any request been made to the board of transport commissioners, to keep the C.P.R. station at Keeler, Saskatchewan, opened throughout the year?

2. Has this action been agreed upon?

3. If not, for what reasons?

Mr. Chevrier:

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. $302,925 (including water service, sewers, roads and electric hook-up).

Questions

5. It was apparent in the latter part of 1948 that every effort should be made to complete as many of these houses as possible before winter. Because of this and of the inaccessibility of the site it was considered expedient to negotiate for their construction with a firm in the general vicinity known to have had experience in construction in this territory and believed to be most capable of carrying out the work satisfactorily within a minimum of time.

6. Contract awarded on a cost plus, a fixed fee basis. Estimated cost of work to be $288,500, fixed fee based on 5 per cent of estimated cost=$14,425.

HOUSING—RURAL CONDITIONS IN THE MARITIMES

Mr. MacLean:

1. Is the federal government assisting in any program to study rural housing conditions in the maritime provinces, with a view to improving them?

2. If so, what is the nature of the assistance?

Mr. Winters:

1. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is assisting in a program for the study of rural housing conditions in the maritime provinces.

2. Under the terms of part V of the National Housing Act the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has made a grant of $2,915 towards the expenses of the program of the maritime rural housing committee for 1949. This sum is 55 per cent of the budget of the maritime rural housing committee, the remaining 45 per cent being contributed by the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

The program of the maritime rural housing committee is modeled on that of the prairie rural housing committee whose work has proved so useful. The committee is composed of representatives of the three maritime governments together with one representative from the federal Department of Agriculture, one representative of the farm women's institute in each of the three provinces and the maritime supervisor of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In addition to the grant made for the research being done by the committee the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation also makes available the services of its regional secretary to act as secretary-treasurer of the maritime rural housing committee.

SOLDIER SETTLERS—MINERAL RIGHTS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Are restrictions being imposed or payments being demanded in connection with the return of mineral rights on lands held by the soldier settlers?

2. If so, what terms are being imposed and what is the justification or authority therefor?

Mr. Mutch: No restrictions are imposed. The only lands affected are those where at the time of acquirement of surface rights by the soldier settlement board, the mines and mineral rights were also acquired. In cases where title to the land has already been transferred to a soldier settler or his heirs, the mineral rights are being transferred on payment of $25; where the settler has not yet obtained title to the land, transfer of the mineral rights is subject to payment of his outstanding indebtedness to the director plus a nominal fee of $1. Mines and minerals are conveyed to the soldier settler or his heirs under authority in each case of an order in council pursuant to the Public Lands Grants Act.

TRADE WITH GERMANY, JAPAN AND ITALY

Mr. Thatcher:

1. What was the dollar value of Canadian exports during 1948 to (a) Germany; (b) Japan; (c) Italy?
2. What steps, if any, have been taken by the government to re-establish trade with the above three countries?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. (a) Germany, $13,214,116; (b) Japan, $8,000,548; (c) Italy, $32,378,709.

2. See statements below.

Germany

The Department of Trade and Commerce has had a trade official resident in Germany since February 1946. The present officer is located in Frankfurt, with a staff of four. The department recently sent in several of its officers to advise what further steps should be taken to strengthen our commercial representation.

The government, in October 1948, extended to Germany most-favoured-nation treatment in customs duties.

The department has sponsored many Canadian businessmen wishing to visit Germany and continues to make every effort to develop close liaison with the military authorities and German business firms in the interest of two-way trade.

Italy

The Department of Trade and Commerce reopened its trade office in September 1946. The present staff, consisting of a commercial secretary, assistant commercial secretary, and six clerks, are doing their utmost to promote two-way trade between Italy and Canada. The government extended to Italy in April 1948 most-favoured-nation treatment in order to assist trade, and reciprocal treatment has been accorded to Canada.

Japan

A commercial representative from the Department of Trade and Commerce was attached to the Canadian mission in Tokyo in June 1946, and he has endeavoured to develop a close liaison with the occupying military authorities and Japanese firms. The Department of Trade and Commerce continues to assist Canadian businessmen to enter Japan in the interest of trade promotion.

The management has made a review of the various branch line extensions and has come to the conclusion that with present-day wages, scarcity of steel and high cost of materials, none of the projects can be entertained economically.

NATIONAL PARKS—BEACH ROAD FROM CAVENDISH, P.E.I.

Mr. McLure:

Who is responsible for repairs to the beach road from Cavendish leading down to national parks beach, Prince Edward Island?

FRED ROSE

Mr. Low:

1. Has Fred Rose, former communist member of this parliament, been given a position as "educator" in the library of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary near Montreal?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SHIPS OPERATING FROM PACIFIC PORTS—RADIO EQUIPMENT AND WATCH KEEPING

Mr. MacInnis:

For a copy of all reports received by the Department of Transport, the Minister of Transport or any official of the department, since January 1, 1946, relating to the efficiency of radio equipment and the adequacy of radio watch keeping on ships operated from Pacific coast ports.

Mr. MacInnis: I had a word with the Minister of Transport about this motion, and as I was not able to convince him that these documents should be produced, I would ask that the motion be dropped, without prejudice.

Mr. Speaker: Motion dropped.

IMMIGRATION—ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 4233

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents received by the Department of Mines and Resources leading up to or connected with the issue of order in council P.C. 4233 dated September 13, 1948.

WARTIME HOUSING—AJAX, ONT.—COOKSTOVES

Mr. Williams:

For a copy of vouchers and receipts in connection with the purchase, rental, maintenance and sale of cookstoves by Wartime Housing at Ajax, Ontario.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—POLICE AND FIRE PROTECTION

Mr. Church:

For a copy of the requests of Major General Worthington to the Ontario government and the mayor of the city of Toronto, as to the fire and police protection in case of war.

Mr. Claxton: I can answer this by saying that there is no such correspondence.

Mr. Church: I should like to have the motion stand until I confer with the minister. The question has not been answered.

Mr. Claxton: The motion may carry as an order for return, or be dropped. There is no correspondence.

Mr. Church: Toronto has always co-operated with this government in fire and police matters, on a standard plan. I raised this question last December of reviving the home guard—

Mr. Speaker: As the minister is ready to answer, the motion should be either adopted or not adopted.

Motion agreed to.

NANTON, ALTA., POST OFFICE

Mr. Hansell:

For a copy of all communications, letters, wires, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the government and any person or persons during the past seven years in respect to post office accommodation in the town of Nanton, Alberta.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

STATUS OF CIVILIAN MEMBERS OF R.A.F. TRANSPORT COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if veterans status has been accorded to the civilian members of the R.A.F. transport command, and, if not, is it expected that such status will be accorded this year?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is not expected that such status will be accorded this session.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRINTING BUREAU—WAGE RATES OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. In view of the well-deserved tribute which was paid this morning to the staff of the printing bureau, and in which I heartily join, can the Secretary of State say what progress is being made to bring the wages paid to employees at the printing bureau up to the levels prescribed in the act?

Hon. Colin Gibson (Secretary of State): The wages paid to printers are dependent upon the average wage paid in Toronto and Montreal. At intervals we ask the Department of Labour to secure this information and pass it on to the Secretary of State. The wages are then put in line with the wages being paid in those cities.

Mr. Knowles: Is the Secretary of State aware of the fact that there is usually a lag of a year or two in bringing up the bureau's wages to those levels?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That is not correct. I may say that negotiations take place with the various trades in both Montreal and Toronto, and when agreement has been reached with the printers in those two areas the Department of Labour is in a position to give us the average wage that should be paid here.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED DISTURBANCE ABOARD H.M.C.S. "CRESCENT"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John O. Probe (Regina City): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister please inform the house of the background of the reported disturbance aboard H.M.C.S. Crescent, indicating what seems to be dissatisfaction on the part of naval ratings? Will the minister indicate the extent to which disciplinary action has been invoked, and whether it is the intention of the government to investigate conditions in the naval service with a view to their improvement?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The reports I have received would indicate that this was a disturbance of a minor character and rather similar to that which occurred on board the H.M.C.S. Athabaskan. Disciplinary action was taken by the commanding officer on the spot, and since then the work of the vessel has proceeded without interruption. A full investigation will be held into the causes of these difficulties.

Mr. Probe: As a supplementary question, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence to indicate the type of disciplinary action that has been taken in relation to disturbances on Canadian destroyers that have been referred to occasionally.

Mr. Claxton: I shall have to make further inquiries to ascertain what it was, but there was no serious action taken. I think some men were charged with the offence of slackness—which I understand is a minor offence, suitable for these incidents—and that the cases were disposed of.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ESQUIMALT DOCKYARDS—REPLACEMENT BY OTHER PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Is the Minister of Justice able to give me a reply to the question I asked him on the 21st of March as to the R.C.M.P. guards at Esquimalt?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I will look into the matter.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS, 1946-48—EXPORT OF CANNED MEATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Patrick H. Ashby (Edmonton East): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Finance or the appropriate minister. On February 9 a number of questions asked by me were passed as orders for returns. I received an answer to the first two, but not to the others; I was informed that they would be answered elsewhere. I should like the minister to see that I am provided with correct answers to the questions that were not answered.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I will ask my colleague the Secretary of State to look into the matter and see what the situation is.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

FIFTEEN PER CENT INCREASE IN FARES—SUSPENSION OF TRAVEL TAX

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): To clarify something that took place last night, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question. Last evening in his budget speech the Minister of Finance announced the elimination of the fifteen per cent tax on air travel tickets. Almost at the same time an announcement came over the air that Trans-Canada Air Lines had increased the cost of its tickets to the extent of the reduction announced by the Minister of Finance. When did the directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines come to know that this reduction was to take place, or did they meet after the minister made his budget speech?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The decision to increase Trans-Canada Air Lines fares, by a scale which has been on file for some time with the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, was made at least six weeks ago—certainly before there was any knowledge of the proposed budget action. I myself learned only last Monday about the budget action.

Mr. Fraser: Who arranged the timing?

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS PROTECTING CANADIAN ORCHESTRAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. Lockhart (Lincoln): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources and ask him to take it as notice. Based on information I have received, may I ask him if there are any immigration regulations in effect which would protect the interests of Canadian orchestras against an invasion of their rights by United States orchestras? I have received a telegram or two objecting to that.

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources): From my knowledge of the regulations I think I can say these matters would be dealt with individually. If a person were coming in from another country for the purpose mentioned by the hon. member, that would be taken into account in dealing with the application.

Mr. Lockhart: There used to be immigration restrictions.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL ACT

CONTINUATION IN FORCE UNTIL SIXTY DAYS AFTER OPENING OF FIRST SESSION OF PARLIAMENT IN 1951

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 85, to amend the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there has been no recorded vote on this bill at any stage, and it is my purpose to seek a recorded vote. Before doing so I wish to refer to two considerations which I think should be in the minds of hon. members in regard to this matter.

It has been pointed out already, and I think it should be emphasized, that every leading expert actively associated with the international exchange problem at the highest level has stated that if there is to be a return to normal trading among nations a solution must be found which will give some measure of freedom of movement to the exchanges of the world. As I mentioned yesterday, Mr. Paul Hoffman, who administers ECA and is also mainly concerned with the allocation of Marshall funds, has stated that there must be a solution this year of the problem of convertibility. If that is so, there is every reason why parliament should not extend beyond one year legislation which gives extraordinary powers going far beyond the control of exchange itself.

That, Mr. Speaker, is something which has been overlooked or disregarded in any of the very limited explanations that have been given from the government side of the reasons for carrying forward this bill in its present form. This is not merely a bill to control exchange; it is a bill to control import and export as well. The argument originally presented was that the additional features were only for the purpose of supporting the effective operation of government action to control exchange, and were not intended as devices to deal with the export and import of goods, though that effect was clearly covered by the wording of the act. Later the Minister of Finance announced that he had been informed by his experts that under the provisions of the act he could control import and export, and since then this has been an important feature of the act itself.

If the optimistic viewpoint expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance in regard to trade is in fact borne out, then there is every reason why a bill of this kind, which carries forward arbitrary controls over trading which can have no meaning once our exchange operates as a normal instrument of balancing accounts between countries, should not be approved by this house. If in fact the statements of the secretary of the treasury of the United States and Mr. Hoffman are based upon sound information—and I think we should assume they are—they look for a decision in this matter during the present year. Therefore the government should be under the compulsion of immediate action; and if this legislation is extended for only one year there will be more reason for the government to act immediately and initiate the appropriate action to return to actual convertibility between the pound and the dollar. Until there is a return to that convertibility, this country faces possible disaster, no matter what optimistic statements may be made in this house or elsewhere.

We have it within our power to give leadership in something which relatively is of more concern to Canada than to any other nation in the world. Surely we have the trained brains; surely we have men of sufficient mental vigour and confidence in themselves to give leadership in breaking the log jam which is backing up international trade between western nations whose ability to defend their freedom will depend very largely in the years that lie ahead upon their ability to extend their trading strength and their economic interdependence and co-operation. Therefore it is not only something that is in the interests of Canada; it is a challenge to Canada's maturity and capacity to deal with international problems.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this bill should go forward in its present form, covering a two-year period. For that reason I believe it should not get third reading, and the government should take appropriate steps to reduce the life of the bill to one year.

In addition to the reasons I have given as to why that should be done in any event, reasons related to the statements made publicly by those best informed in the matter of international exchange, may I point out another reason why this house should refuse to extend the life of a bill of this kind, which in addition to controlling import and export has such a profound effect upon our whole economy. Our system of parliamentary control of expenditure is based upon an annual review of the action of the government. For hundreds of years that basic principle has been firmly imbedded in our parliamentary system. We should not disregard it when we have placed before us a bill which can affect the whole domestic and external economy of Canada in the years immediately ahead.

Out of the surplus collected in the form of taxes in 1948, more than $400 million had been lent for the purpose of dealing with the operations under this fund. That system again is contrary to our established methods of handling the public revenues. Other countries deal with similar exchange operations by setting up a fund for the purpose, to which money is voted in the ordinary way by parliament at the time the estimates are dealt with. That, I submit, is the way it should be done here. At the end of the year, in the usual way, there should be an opportunity to review the act itself as well as the results of the operation of the act. It is not enough to say, as has been said, that the accounting must come before this house every year. The bills that are dealt with by this house should be related to the accounting and should be amended from time to time to adjust them to the circumstances which that accounting discloses.

In this particular case we are told that our exchange is as strong as any other in the world, that our dollar is as sound a money unit as any other in the world. If that is so, why should we carry forward for two years, let alone for one year, emergency measures which in themselves suggest that that statement is not correct? The adoption of these additional measures covering the operation of exchange indicates a belief in another method than the historic device of the normal balancing of trade. If our exchange is as strong as it is claimed, and as strong as it certainly has a right to be, with our enormous resources and raw materials, we should not give to this or any other government that arbitrary day-by-day power by order in council over the import and export trade of this country.

There are so many inconsistencies, Mr. Speaker, in the statements made in support of the procedure which is being followed that it is difficult to understand exactly what argument the government has put forward in favour of the contention that these measures should be extended for two years. The Minister of Finance has said that if we returned to something in the nature of a free dollar we would then have an addition to our cost of living of some seven or eight per cent. At the same time he says that our dollar is worth as much as the United States dollar, so I do not know how he arrives at that conclusion. Moreover, although he says he is greatly concerned about the addition to the cost of living of the seven or eight per cent which might result from having a free dollar, he has at the same time been placing a twenty-five per cent excise tax on many of the daily requirements of the people. If a matter of seven or eight per cent is of so much concern in the one case, it is difficult to understand why a twenty-five per cent increase on other necessities can be regarded as unimportant simply because it happens to be something that is imposed by the government itself. Yet that is the only reason one can find for the difference between the two situations.

Let me sum up in this way. If we believe that exchange is really what the word implies, and that exchange, given a realistic relationship to the actual value at the moment, of the unit of currency, does act as a measure which will balance international trade; if we believe that it is not necessary for the government to have these powers which go far beyond exchange; if we believe that bills covering matters of this kind should not give by order in council the arbitrary authority conferred here for a period of more than one year, then I submit that the members of this house should vote against the third reading of the bill which carries all these objectionable features into effect.

Let there be no doubt about one point. We have made it clear that we believe there must be some measure of reference to the international monetary fund during a period when the adjustments are made. By an amendment which was proposed and which was ruled out of order, we advocated the taking of steps—within a year, or if possible within a shorter period, during which exchange control would still operate—to restore something in the nature of convertibility. Whether this bill is passed or not, but particularly if it passes, our position is that this government should without delay take the initiative in seeking a return to convertibility, which means so much to the future advancement of Canada.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Since we are going to vote for this measure, may I say a word? I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that there is some incompatibility between the minister's statement about exchange and the incidence of excise tax. I agree that the excise tax has the effect which devaluation of the currency or inflation of prices might have. But I submit that to take the initiative in bringing about convertibility, as suggested by the leader of the opposition, is not in the best interests of this country.

A few years ago the United States did something of this kind. The effect was to impede the efforts that were being made for recovery, particularly in the United Kingdom. I believe convertibility is desirable, but in view of the circumstances I do not think the time has arrived when that can be safely undertaken. The bill upon which we are about to vote grants powers to the government for the period that will be required in order to bring about a measure of economic stability among some of the nations of the world.

We know, for example, that the customer upon whom we must rely for a great deal of our trade and commerce believes it will be 1952 before she is able to approach the required balance in her economy. If it is suggested that the government does not need the powers granted by this bill for two years, I think it is likely that no government would endeavour to carry on a policy of this kind if it was unnecessary to do so.

An hon. Member: You do not know them.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not know, no; but I do know that in a democracy governments must pay some attention to public opinion. If public opinion did not support a measure such as this because it was believed to be unnecessary, I do not think any government would dare to fly in the face of public opinion. That is the safeguard that we as a parliament have in passing upon this measure, and indeed upon many others.

If I were criticizing the government for the general policy that has recently been placed before this house I would say that the dropping of controls brought about an inflationary condition that has worked to the detriment of the great masses of the Canadian people. I do not want to discuss the budget, but last night when it was proposed to remove the subsidy on flour and reduce the tax on chocolate bars, in which I concur, it seemed to me the effect of that might be to increase the price of bread, and, to paraphrase what Marie Antoinette said, if you cannot buy bread, you will be able to buy chocolate bars. I believe beneficial controls were dropped far too quickly, and the public regretted it.

To force Canada to take the initiative now in this regard would be a mistake. I agree with the leader of the opposition in the tribute he paid those who are advising the minister in these matters. If that tribute is sincere, then I have no doubt that the advice which the minister is getting, and upon which he bases the proposals he has made to this house, is advice which the whole House of Commons might well consider and approve. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, we should pass this bill, because it is in the interests of Canada, the Canadian economy and the customers upon whom we rely for our trade and commerce.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Abbott: I have no intention of making any extended remarks. I set out my position in the statement which I made on the resolution stage of this measure. I then gave the reasons why the government considers it necessary that the Foreign Exchange Control Act be extended for a period of two years.

The government is just as much interested in the restoration of convertibility of currency as anybody in this country, but it is something which cannot be done alone. No single nation can do it. The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) is perfectly right when he says that world and trading conditions today are such that it is useless to expect or to count on a return to full convertibility of currencies for some little time yet.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Why not make a beginning?

Mr. Abbott: We shall do our share. I also thank the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for the reference which he and the leader of the opposition have made to the advisers of the government on foreign exchange matters. My judgment is that the persons upon whom we rely for technical advice in these matters are among the most competent experts in that field to be found in the world today, and I have the most complete confidence in the advice which I receive from them in matters of this kind.

Foreign Exchange Control

I have just one other thing to say. In looking over Hansard of yesterday and the replies which I gave to some hon. members in connection with the change of residential status to the United States, I am afraid that, contrary to my usual practice, I was not quite as clear as I might have been. With the permission of the house I should like to place on Hansard, for the information of hon. members an official circular of the foreign exchange control board which outlines the full requirements with respect to change of residential status:

Foreign Exchange Control Board
Ottawa

January 10, 1949

Change of Residential Status

Definition of resident.

1. Under the Foreign Exchange Control Act any person who was or is ordinarily resident in Canada on or after September 15, 1939, is deemed to be a "resident" for the purposes of transactions to which the act applies, unless the foreign exchange control board determines that he is a "nonresident".

Application for change of residential status.

2. A resident individual desiring that the board determine him to be a nonresident is required to apply to the board through his bank on form 107—application for change of status from resident to nonresident for foreign exchange control purposes.

When application approved.

3. The present policy administered by the board is, upon application, to designate as a nonresident an individual who is making a bona fide change of permanent residence from Canada to another country and has obtained any necessary permission from the country concerned to take up permanent residence there. Authority to transfer his funds and other assets from Canada is then granted as outlined below.

Transfer of assets to United States dollar area countries.

4. (a) Where the total assets of an emigrant to a United States dollar area country do not exceed $5,000 he may transfer the total amount from Canada in the form of Canadian dollar bank drafts or cheques which he is free to negotiate in the United States at the rate of exchange prevailing there.

(b) Where such an emigrant's total assets exceed $5,000, the transfer is permitted in the manner described in (a) up to 50 per cent of the total, with a minimum limit of $5,000 and a maximum limit of $12,500, during the first year after leaving Canada. Assets which are not authorized for transfer during this period continue to be regarded as those of a Canadian resident and the board may require that they be placed under the control of a resident agent or trustee. At the end of one year from his departure from Canada and at annual intervals thereafter, the owner may apply to the board for authority to make additional transfers from Canada from these resident assets. Subject to changes in policy in the meantime, such applications are normally approved for the same amount and in the same manner as on the original change of status application.

(c) A United States citizen resident in Canada desiring to return to the United States to live is normally authorized to transfer all of his assets to the United States at the time of departure provided that the excess over the amount authorized for transfer in Canadian dollars under (b) above is invested in Canadian domestic securities having a term to maturity or earliest call date of not less than three years and the transfer of the excess if made in that form.

(d) Assets authorized for transfer on approval of a change of status application may be retained in Canada and income from them may be transferred at the official rate of exchange. Any subsequent disposal of the assets in Canada is subject to the prevailing rules governing nonresident-owned assets, e.g., a nonresident may ordinarily sell securities in Canada only where the proceeds are being immediately reinvested in other similar Canadian securities.

(e) In addition to assets which may be transferred in accordance with the preceding paragraphs, the export of normal household and personal effects is permitted.

To sterling area and special arrangement countries.

5. An emigrant to a sterling area or special arrangement country is ordinarily authorized to transfer all of his assets to such a country at the time of his departure in the form of a Canadian dollar bank draft or cheque or in Canadian securities. These countries include the United Kingdom, the British commonwealth and empire, France, Belgium, Netherlands and Norway.

In-transit traveling expenses.

6. At the time of departure an emigrant to whom change of status has been granted is authorized to obtain up to $150 (with a maximum of $400 per family) in foreign exchange at the official rate in Canada to meet in-transit expenses. In addition, he may buy his transportation in Canada with Canadian dollars.

Bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

ADVANCES BY WAY OF LOANS—EXTENSION OF LIFE OF THE CORPORATION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act to provide authority for advances to the corporation by way of loan out of the consolidated revenue fund and to extend the time of operation of the act.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be advisable for the minister to make his statement at this stage of the proceedings. The whole matter would be clarified and the debate could be proceeded with on that basis.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, the bill to be based on this resolution has a threefold purpose: first, to extend the life of the Canadian Commercial Corporation; second, to authorize borrowings by the corporation; third, to provide that when its services are used by a department or agency of the government, the corporation may recover its proper out-of-pocket expenses and proportionate overhead from the department or agency concerned.

The corporation was established in 1946 to take over the functions of the Canadian export board—an agency established under wartime powers to facilitate the procurement in Canada by other countries of civilian type supplies. These supplies were financed in large part, though not entirely, from the proceeds of post-war loans and grants then being arranged. It was recognized at that time that not only would other governments and relief agencies need assistance in procurement in Canada, but that international allocations and controls exercised by other countries would make necessary some Canadian government organization that could act as procurement agent for certain Canadian import requirements. At that time, much of such Canadian procurement was being handled by Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, another wartime agency whose life was of limited duration but whose main purpose was connected with subsidies then being paid on imported goods. The Canadian Commercial Corporation was not to be an agency for the payment of subsidies, but simply a piece of machinery that could be used to fill a need in carrying through foreign trade transactions that for one reason or another had to be handled through a government agency. Since it was established the corporation has made purchases in Canada for foreign governments and relief agencies to the total value of $272 million, a figure, incidentally, that is far in excess of the relative amount of credit or grants made by the people of Canada.

In the field of assisting in procurement of imports, the corporation's powers and organization have enabled it to be used with advantage on many occasions where the participation of a government buying or selling agency was essential. For example, in 1947, sisal being subject to world allocation, it was only through the auspices of the Canadian Commercial Corporation that Canadian cordage manufacturers were able to obtain their requirements of fibre from British East Africa. In another case the services of the corporation made it possible for the Department of Agriculture to obtain 5,000 tons of potash from the Russian zone of Germany. There is every reason to believe that the exigencies of foreign trade will continue to require the use of the corporation's facilities.

When the original act was passed and the corporation established in 1946, it was recognized that the need for the corporation's services in respect of foreign trade might well be required for some considerable time, but because the full useful life could not be forecast, the act was given a short term, it being understood that at the end of that term a review of the purposes and usefulness of the corporation would be made. Section 19 of the act provides that the act shall expire sixty days after the opening of the first session of parliament commencing in the year 1949. The legislation now before the house will permit the Canadian Commercial Corporation to continue to carry out its functions in the future.

In July 1947, the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act was amended in order to give the corporation the power to carry out for and on behalf and under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce certain duties in connection with the acquisition of munitions and supplies required by the Department of National Defence, which duties had been previously transferred to the Minister of Trade and Commerce from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. This amendment was effective February 1, 1947, and since that time all purchasing for the Department of National Defence has been conducted by the corporation, acting in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This work has entailed the placing of more than 113,000 contracts, to the value of about $200 million.

One of the primary purposes of this corporate agency of government is to meet the needs of international trade. It has been, and continues to be, the policy of the government to provide for the procurement of the needs of the defence services by a civilian department rather than direct procurement by the services themselves. This purchasing function could be performed by a department of government rather than a corporate body, although the corporate form provides certain positive advantages, not only to the government but also to those who supply the requirements. However, a corporate form is almost essential in connection with certain foreign trade transactions, and it has obvious advantages to have but one buying agency rather than two separate organizations, one a branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the other a crown company. By establishing a single agency with corporate powers, real savings in costs of administration and in general efficiency were possible and were made.

In its work in the interest of national defence, the corporation has proven itself to be an efficient and economical procurement agency. It has in its service an experienced staff, many of whom were drawn from the wartime purchasing staff of the departments of munitions and supply and national defence.

The legislation also provides authority to the Minister of Finance to advance up to $10 million to the corporation by way of loan on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine. Occasions will arise where unforeseen developments affecting the supply of commodities essential to our civilian requirements or to our national security may require us to take immediate procurement action. This may involve the use of funds in excess of those made available to the corporation under the act. A case in point was the action taken by the corporation between October, 1948, and January, 1949, to relieve the threatened shortage of butter in Canada. The Canadian Commercial Corporation undertook the importation, handling, and financing of purchases of 15,680,000 pounds of butter from Australia, Denmark, and New Zealand, at a total cost at Canadian port, including ocean freight, of $11,348,741.80. The butter was quickly sold to packers and creameries on the basis of allocations recommended by the wartime prices and trade board at official ceiling prices. In this particular case the corporation was able to finance the transaction because payments were promptly received from the Canadian purchasers. If there are transactions in the future of a similar nature for essential commodities, we cannot be sure that payments will be forthcoming with sufficient promptness to enable the corporation to finance them.

There is also always present the possibility that a sudden change in the international situation may confront us with the urgent necessity of procuring immediately supplies essential to our national security. We may, for example, be threatened with the loss of an important source of supply of a critical material. It seems prudent that the corporation be put in a position to deal with unforeseen emergencies of this kind should they arise.

Provision is also made in the proposed legislation under which it will be possible for the corporation to recover from departments and agencies of the government of Canada proportionate shares of the corporation's costs of operation. Such provision is calculated to place upon those departments and agencies proper financial responsibility with respect to services rendered to them by the corporation.

In this connection, the amounts up to $10 million provided for in section 8 were never regarded as a spending appropriation but were regarded as constituting a revolving fund, disbursements from which for the purposes of a particular department were to be recovered from that department out of its appropriation. Until May, 1948, the operating expenses were recovered on a prorated scale settled with the departments concerned and approved by the treasury office. In that way the corporation's funds were not depleted. On a question raised, however, the deputy minister of justice gave it as his opinion that, in the absence of special statutory provision, the corporation could not recover any of its operating expense from departments for which it acted as agent. Consequently the Department of Trade and Commerce had to get a supplementary appropriation to cover the corporation's operating expense incurred in transactions for the Department of National Defence. The view was expressed at that time by some hon. members that the costs of procurement should be borne by the appropriate departments rather than centralized in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

That, Mr. Speaker, outlines the purpose of the bill, and the provisions which will be contained in it.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to make a few observations on the resolution before it goes to the committee stage.

The minister has given us what I think is a clear picture of the scope of the work of the corporation. I should like to refer briefly to a few aspects of it. I shall read from the resolution introduced in 1946 by the then minister of trade and commerce, to be found at page 1930 of Hansard of that year:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to establish a corporation to be known as the Canadian Commercial Corporation empowered to assist in the development of trade between Canada and other nations and to assist persons in Canada to obtain goods and commodities from outside Canada and to dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada.

As the minister has pointed out, on the 5th of February, 1947, the authority was extended, and the extension was confirmed by chapter 51 of the statutes of that year. At that time, as the report of the corporation for 1947 shows, the function vested in the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Howe) as Minister of Reconstruction and Supply was transferred to the member for Port Arthur as Minister of Trade and Commerce. This was a measure to give the corporation power to act as purchasing agent for the Department of National Defence. I will read the pertinent section, which is to be found in chapter 51 of the statutes of 1947:

> The corporation may, as directed by the minister, exercise and perform on behalf of the minister, the power, duty and function vested in the minister to buy or otherwise acquire and manufacture or otherwise produce munitions of war or supplies for, and to construct or carry out projects required by the Department of National Defence.

I do not think we should overlook the fact that there is this very wide power because of the simple word "produce". I think we will want to ask certain questions in committee to assure ourselves as to where the corporation is taking us. The minister will not be surprised if I say that we are always a little shy of the extension of powers of crown corporations. I shall not say any more on that point.

It seems perfectly clear from reading the report of the corporation for the year 1948—and of course that only brings us down to March, 1948, so that we are almost a year behind—that the business of the corporation was changing very substantially even at that time, and that its duties as purchasing agent for the Department of National Defence were becoming more important. It was doing more along that line while its other duties were diminishing to a very considerable extent.

I can quite understand the force of what the minister said about the disturbed conditions immediately after the war, particularly on the continent of Europe, and that a government agency could probably do things which a private agency could not do. The minister gave us two instances, sisal in 1947, and potash, I am not sure in what year; and I can quite understand that situations do arise in which it would be important and useful to have a government agency operating. But we are now asked to provide more money for this corporation and in general to enable it to increase its operations.

It would seem to me that on the evidence of this second annual report for the year ended March 31, 1948, there is no reason to believe that the business of the corporation, other than that of acting as agent for the defence department, is on the increase. Rather the evidence is that it is on the decrease, and that seems to me to be quite proper; because I should have thought that as we got further away from the war, and as the abnormal situation became slightly more normal, people would be better able to look after their own business and would not have to rely so much on a government corporation. So we shall wish to ask a good many further questions on this point and others when we are in committee.

The report for 1948 states:

> There has, however, been a substantial change in the activities of the corporation, resulting from the tapering off of foreign government purchasing operations in Canada, which, however, has been offset by an increase in purchasing activities on behalf of the Department of National Defence.

Another thing one observes, at which perhaps one is not surprised but a little disappointed, is that the report of 1947 expressed the hope that as time went on the corporation would be able to do with a smaller staff; but if my memory serves me correctly, actually between 1947 and 1948 the staff of the corporation was increased by a very small number—I think only two.

I do believe this house is entitled to have the fullest evidence given it as to the work of this corporation: first of all, that it needs more money. As I say, its operations are contracting on that side of its business other than acting as purchasing agent for the Department of National Defence, and so far as I can see, in that capacity it does not need any capital moneys at all, because it is merely acting as an agent and, as I understand it, the accounts are sent directly to the Department of National Defence. The corporation therefore needs no funds for that, except for its ordinary operating expenses.

As to the service of the corporation to the Department of National Defence, it seems to me the minister makes a prima facie case there. One can understand that people who are in the defence department may not be businessmen, and that it may be a sensible arrangement to have this plan continue. But we want a great deal of information from the minister as to the nature of the import and export business which it carries on now. This brings us back to our old question of control.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

While I give the government credit for abandoning certain controls, nevertheless it seems to me that under a measure of this kind what goes out by one door comes in by another, and if the Canadian Commercial Corporation is going to play an important part in the import and export business, then it does in fact exercise in that way a considerable control over business.

As I have said, the report makes it clear that a great deal of the corporation's work for foreign countries, and for UNRRA, which it did immediately after the war, is coming to an end; and it is hoped that its activities in the import and export business will continue to decrease. In view of the fact that the latest information we have is almost a year old, I think the minister should give us figures which would bring us up to date and give us an indication of the course of business of the corporation in the last year. Otherwise we are rather in the dark.

It is getting close to one o'clock, and I suggest that when we come back at three the minister should be able to bring us up to date in that matter so we can get a better picture of the trend or tendency of the corporation's activities. My hope would be that in this past year, with a greater amount of normality returning to business, the tendency which is described in the 1948 report would be still further advanced; and I would certainly hope that the need for governments to enter into the import and export business would be lessened.

By the sheerest coincidence I met a man in this building last evening who told me he was in the export business, and by accident he mentioned the corporation. I am not able to give the details of this, and to that extent this portion of my remarks loses some effect; nevertheless this businessman—a bright, active fellow—did not seem to think the Canadian Commercial Corporation was helping him very much. In fact I think he would have been very much inclined to agree with the remark made by Winston Churchill in speaking about the socialists, that what the people wanted was to have the government get out of their way and let them carry on their own affairs. I do not wish to emphasize that or to be unduly critical of the corporation, because I think in certain ways it has performed a useful function; but just before resuming my seat I suggest to the minister that at three o'clock he should give us the fullest possible statement of last year's operations by the corporation. I should like him to indicate exactly the volume of the financial transactions it has carried out, as compared with the previous year. He should also indicate to what extent it has been acting for foreign governments, and in what particular ways it has been able to serve the individual Canadian importer and exporter; because speaking for myself, and I think generally for members of the Progressive Conservative party, we do not want to take lightly the continuation and extension of commercial corporations.

The minister made the point that the corporation rather than a government department was needed in respect of various transactions which are to be carried out. That may well be; nevertheless we feel—and this has often been expressed in the house—that when things get into a government department that is a fine way of having them done without scrutiny, and a way of exercising almost without limit, powers which cannot be exercised if they have to be submitted to the scrutiny of this house. Indeed we shall have certain questions to ask on that very point—whether one of the incidental by-products, if I may put it in that way—I will not say one of the aims—may not be to enable the minister to wield a power which I do not think he entirely dislikes, and to do it in a way in which he could not do it directly as Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I noticed one thing in the report that interested me. Evidently the writer has a great respect for the minister, for this is what he says:

> During the year the corporation, acting at the request and in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce . . .

And so on.

Mr. Howe: That was a different minister.

Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario): Well, I am not so sure. This is the report for 1948. The minister will know better than I do how long he has been in this department. He will agree that it is very difficult to keep track of just what he is and what he is not. At any rate it is the officer we are talking about; and if the minister is right in saying he was not minister of trade and commerce at this time —though I think he is wrong—I should think he would exercise just as much control as any other minister, and therefore I think the point still stands. There is an old saying that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. The minister, I am sure, enjoys power just as much when he exercises it through a crown corporation as he does when he exercises it direct. We like to see the minister exercise power directly rather than indirectly, because we feel we are better able to understand what he is doing and we can keep track of him better. There is then more chance for us to catch up with him some day, whereas when he is back of these commercial corporations no one knows what is happening.

I do not intend to prolong this debate, but I suggest to the minister that it will expedite this matter if, after the luncheon recess, he can bring us up to date on the operations of the corporation. As always, we have an open mind, but there are a good many questions we want to have answered before this measure is passed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that in general I support the principle of the bill that is on the statute book as well as the principle of the amending bill to be based on this resolution.

I noted with interest the reference that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) made to a remark of Winston Churchill, to the effect that people would like the government to get out of the way and let them carry on their own business. That remark applies in a good many cases, particularly in relation to small businesses. I would also point out, however, to the member for Muskoka-Ontario that there are a good many things that are the people's business that the people will never get an opportunity to do except through their government.

My reason for rising to say a few words about this resolution is to call attention, calmly but firmly, to certain abuses that have occurred in connection with the activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. This does not detract from my support of the principle. I feel that full publicity should be given to something that was done about a year ago in connection with the affairs of this corporation. One of the purposes in calling attention to this abuse is to provide a basis for preventing a recurrence of it.

In my hand I hold copies of the five orders in council referred to in paragraph 9 of the most recent auditor general's report. I find that those orders in council refer to transactions of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. The transactions to which I refer—and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is in order to deal with them at this point—are transactions mentioned in the orders in council of March, 1948, which authorized payments in advance for certain supplies for the Department of National Defence which were to be purchased by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. These supplies were not to be delivered until after the end of the fiscal year. As some hon. members are aware, the Auditor General has called attention to this as a serious irregularity. He points out:

> A constitutional reason for the lapsing and writing off of unused balances in appropriations at the year end is to ensure that the executive be ever in a state of dependency on parliament for funds.

Canadian Commercial Corporation

He goes on to say that there were certain appropriations voted during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948, which, according to the proper practice, should have lapsed if it was not possible to spend them in that fiscal year for the goods the department desired to purchase. The Auditor General notes that sums of money approximating $680,000 were spent on the authority of a series of orders in council passed in the month of March, 1948.

Mr. Howe: Who signed them?

Mr. Knowles: The orders in council were passed by the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Did the minister forget them?

Mr. Isnor: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Isnor: Were these not payments made as progress payments in connection with contracts?

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Isnor: The member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is capable of answering.

Mr. Knowles: In one case it was a contract for changing certain snowmobiles, in other cases they were contracts for the purchase of new equipment. In all cases the Auditor General makes it clear that the government realized it was an irregular practice, and it was because of that irregularity the orders in council were passed in an attempt to regularize payments in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948. These payments were for goods or services that would not be delivered until some time in the next fiscal year.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Just before the noon recess, Mr. Speaker, I had made reference to certain contracts entered into by the government at the instigation of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. I pointed out that in the case of a number of these contracts the Auditor General has given the government quite a severe reprimand. That reprimand is found in paragraph 9 of the auditor general's report appended to the Public Accounts for the year ended March 31, 1948.

As hon. members are aware, the Auditor General's criticism relates to the fact that certain money had been voted in that fiscal year, but the goods and services which the government sought to buy could not be delivered before the end of that fiscal year. Accordingly the government recognized that it was irregular to pay for these goods and services which could not be delivered before March 31, 1948, out of that year's vote. I submit that the government recognized that irregularity in the fact that it found it necessary to pass five orders in council to authorize these payments, which came to a total of over $600,000.

Mr. Howe: May I clear up that point at this time. An order in council is passed for every purchase of the Canadian Commercial Corporation of over $5,000 in value.

Mr. Knowles: The minister's quarrel is not with me. His quarrel is with the Auditor General, who points out that none of these five orders in council indicated any authority on which reliance was placed in order to give directions to pay the amounts. The Auditor General does not criticize the Canadian Commercial Corporation for the hundreds of orders in council which may be passed to authorize payments of over $5,000. That is not the reason for the Auditor General's criticism. The Auditor General criticizes these five orders in council because they authorized payment in March, 1948, before the end of the fiscal year, for goods or services not to be delivered until the next fiscal year. I have no doubt that when the Auditor General looked over these five orders in council—and I suggest to hon. members that they send for a copy of sessional paper 171D, brought down in response to a motion of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), so that they can look these interesting documents over for themselves—he noted that each of the five orders in council attempted to give some basis for passing the order. The basis which is stipulated in each of the five is in these words:

That the proposed contract is in the public interest.

Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been here for a few years remember the many occasions during the war when we were denied information because it was not in the public interest. Now we have a new doctrine of executive power, namely, that when, in the view of the government, something is in the public interest they have the authority to pass an order in council giving effect to that decision whether or not there is any legislative authority for it.

I do not get excited, as do my hon. friends to the right, when the government exercises powers given to it by this parliament. In fact, time and again I have criticized the government for not fully exercising some of the powers voted to it by parliament; but I do take strong objection when the government seeks to exercise power to pass an order in council for which there is no legislative authority.

The phrase which I have already mentioned runs through all five of these orders in council: P.C. 859 of March 2, 1948; P.C. 938 of March 6, 1948; P.C. 1051, of March 16, 1948; P.C. 1101 of March 16, 1948; and P.C. 1186 of March 23, 1948. I may say that all five of them were passed by the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, of course, is the present minister. I believe he assumed that position in the month of January, 1948.

It is possible that a case could be made for the desirability of changing our practice so that advance payments of this nature could be made; but that change has not been made, and the Auditor General has done a service to this parliament, and indeed a service to the government, in calling attention to this irregularity.

May I take just a moment to read a few quotations regarding the exercise of legislative power by the executive branch of the government? I have in my hand a well-known volume dealing with these matters, Law of the Constitution, by A. V. Dicey. On pages 50 and 51, and on a few additional pages, this matter is discussed. I find, for example, that in the year 1539, in the reign of Henry VIII, an act was passed giving the crown power to legislate by means of proclamation. Dicey says:

> This enactment marks the highest point of legal authority ever reached by the crown, and, probably because of its inconsistency with the whole tenor of English law, was repealed in the reign of Edward the Sixth.

Dicey admits that some difficulties have arisen in modern times, and that probably the executive branch should have a little more authority than we give to it; but whether such is desirable or not, it is not the case. Executive legislative authority simply does not exist. Dicey says, for example:

> For the repeal of 31 Henry VIII, rendered governmental legislation, with all its defects and merits, impossible, and left to proclamations only such weight as they might possess at common law.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the practice in our parliamentary way of doing things is very clear. The government can do by order in council such things as acts passed by this parliament give them power to do. When they exercise those powers they will get no criticism from me; but when they exercise, by order in council, powers not accorded to them in legislation I intend to raise my voice in protest.

May I read another sentence or two from this work by Dicey, which is found on pages 326 and 327:

> The minister or servant of the crown who thus takes part in giving expression to the royal will is legally responsible for the act in which he is concerned, and he cannot get rid of his liability by pleading that he acted in obedience to royal orders. Now supposing that the act done is illegal, the minister concerned in it becomes at once liable to criminal or civil proceedings in a court of law.

I myself will not endeavour to take the minister to court. Rather I am raising the case in this high court of parliament, and I suggest strongly to the government that they should not pass off too lightly the criticisms made by the Auditor General, but that they should be very careful as to the powers they exercise by order in council.

It is not so very long ago, Mr. Speaker, since we had another example of this, in which the same minister was involved. I refer to the Aeronautics Act, and to certain changes which were made in it in 1946. At that time this act had certain provisions in it. Some of us discovered that these provisions had been circumvented. When I asked the minister why, his reply was that it had been done by order in council. When we pressed the point that surely it was not possible to amend an act of this parliament by order in council, another answer was given; but in the end the whole intent of the act of parliament was circumvented by still another means. This was done by the same minister. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, from this group there is no objection to the government using the powers which are accorded to them by legislation, but I submit that they should stay within the legislation passed by this parliament. And while as I indicated at the beginning of my remarks I support the measure before the house and the idea behind the Canadian Commercial Corporation, I hope that those in charge of it will hew a little closer to the line.

Mr. Gordon B. Isnor (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise, not to support the thought expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in regard to bringing the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) into court in connection with what the hon. member has termed irregularities with respect to these amounts, but rather to express some of my views in the matter, and to answer from a common-sense point of view the observations made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. Knowles: Answer the Auditor General at the same time.

Mr. Isnor: And in doing so I feel I am making a proper approach to dealing with a matter of this kind. As I recall, the hon. member referred to four distinct transactions.

Mr. Knowles: Five.

Mr. Isnor: Yes, five distinct transactions, the hon. member says. Each of these is covered by the same principle, a principle which we in everyday business practice follow. It is a principle which I am sure the hon. member would follow if he contracted for the building of a house, in which event the contractor from time to time would approach him for progress payments. That would be along the same lines exactly, except in the present instance in some cases applications were made for payments because of the necessity of bringing from the United States into Canada certain parts for manufacturing purposes.

Mr. Nicholson: Why did the Auditor General comment upon it, then?

Mr. Isnor: I am not answering for the Auditor General. I am answering the criticism as it is advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I point out to him that from a business standpoint the procedure followed is that which would be followed by the average businessman; and the C.C.C. has acted no differently from the average businessman in that respect. It will be noted I did not say C.C.F.; I said C.C.C. I say therefore that I do not see any great difference in the manner in which the Canadian Commercial Corporation has carried on its business from that which would be followed by a reliable business concern.

Let us deal with these cases. The first dealt with a well-known firm, RCA Victor Corporation, and had reference to a progress payment. They had a contract totaling $226,597. Before the end of March they pointed out that because they had completed a certain part of the work they were asking for a progress payment. The amount of $93,852.50 was advanced to them at that time, leaving a balance of $132,744.50.

The next case to which the hon. member referred, having to do with Canadian Arsenals, was much similar in detail. In August, 1947, they received a contract for about $800,000. They had completed prior to March 31, 1948, work to a value of $435,000, and with that in mind asked for a progress payment of that amount. It was paid; receipts were accepted and vouchers shown. Proper records were made of the transaction. There can be no criticism in any way so far as that case is concerned.

The next one was similar in detail, where the Department of National Defence required certain equipment, certain portions of which were manufactured in the United States. In this instance an advance of $15,000 was made on a contract of $34,000. Other cases were similar in detail. Therefore I say there is no need for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to become greatly concerned or excited when these transactions are carried on in a businesslike way, and proper records are kept.

The only fault I would find is that the facts were not set out by the Auditor General as they appeared in the return made later to us. I would not set myself up as an authority in the matter of auditing, when compared with Mr. Watson Sellar; but I do say that one must take into consideration the facts and figures supporting the case. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his usual critical fashion at once pounced upon this, as did other hon. members inclined to study public accounts. I took notice of it, and received a return similar to that tabled for the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). This return covers almost all the cases in question. After having read it I recognized these as regular business transactions.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Isnor: I would be very pleased to do so.

Mr. Knowles: Would it not have been possible for the government to put an item in the estimates of the succeeding year, thus meet the terms of the contracts in that way, and at the same time stay within the law?

Mr. Isnor: Yes, and no. In the first place, the hon. member would be one of the first to criticize a government for placing in the estimates of 1949 an account which had already been paid in 1948—and would be justified in his criticism.

Mr. Knowles: We see revotes every year in the estimates.

Mr. Isnor: I beg the hon. member's pardon; revotes are for balances. This is for an unexpended amount.

Mr. Knowles: Is that the way you run private business?

Mr. Isnor: We set out every item of expenditure so that when the auditor comes along he will be able to go into our books, see the entries, and look at the vouchers and receipts; and he would see that we are not including in 1948 expenditures which rightly belong to 1949. This is the answer I would make to the hon. member.

I was about to make some comment with respect to the general functions and the principle behind this organization. Like the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), I recognize the generally good work this organization is doing. I am pleased that it is operating under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I would also agree with the financial critic of the opposition when he says that there should be not only a report but a tie-up with the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, so that we would be able to place these accounts before parliament, and in turn before the public accounts committee for careful scrutiny. In this way we would be able to make a careful study as to whether the expenditures have been made along proper lines.

Then there is one other feature of particular concern to the area from which I come. I would draw to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the fact that the operations of this organization seem to centre to a large extent around this industrial province of Ontario. Most of the purchases are made here because of the close contact the organization has with the buyers and sellers in these Ontario organizations. While the minister might say that these organizations have their local representatives in the various sections of the country, the fact is we believe that sections outside Ontario are not given the same opportunity. I would urge upon the minister, under whose jurisdiction this organization comes, that greater consideration be given to the different sections of the country, particularly the very fine province of Nova Scotia, and the maritime provinces in general. We believe that many of the contracts given to other sections of the country rightly belong to the maritime provinces. Not only could we supply the goods, but we could supply them in a more efficient manner. I have in mind particularly supplies to the armed forces—the army, navy and air force. For instance, who would think of buying butter in Ontario or Quebec to serve troops in Nova Scotia? But deliveries of butter are being made daily from areas outside the maritime provinces to serve the forces in Halifax. It is almost ridiculous. But that is what has happened recently. I pointed out at the time that I did not think it would work to the satisfaction of the department or of the organization which was doing the buying. Of course the results were what I expected they would be. They were unable to supply eggs and butter in sufficient quantities to meet the daily requirements. I think greater interest should be shown by this organization in the purchase of local requirements from local concerns, and I urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to consider this matter.

One other glaring example of lack of knowledge shown by certain officials was drawn to my attention only today. I do not suppose the average member of the house knows what a wharf fender is. A wharf fender is made up of some sixty to eighty small logs which are tied together and used to protect both the wharf and the ship coming into the wharf. Only recently a local concern which had been supplying these fenders for years were told that logs were going to be brought in from British Columbia for this purpose. We have every respect for the type of lumber and logs produced in British Columbia, but we feel there is no justification for bringing logs from British Columbia to Nova Scotia when we have quantities of that type of log available.

I am not saying this in harsh criticism because I am in accord with the work being carried out. However, I wanted to bring these matters to the attention of the minister and the organization because I believe this organization should be concerned, not with the economy of one or two particular provinces but with the economy of the country as a whole. I intend to support this resolution.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that we in this group will have to support this measure because it simply provides for the extension of these powers for a short time. We have no particular criticism to make of the operations of this corporation. However, I would like to put on the record my personal views with regard to crown companies generally. I am inclined to think that these companies simply take responsibility out of the government's hands, thus giving the government a way of escape. However, I do not think the government can altogether escape responsibility for the operations of crown companies generally.

Personally I am a private enterpriser, and I am proud of that. Crown companies are usually costly. They do not necessarily have to show a favourable balance because, generally speaking, they can take the position that it does not matter very much if they are in the red, the taxpayer will be there to foot the bill. I think the minister will admit that this bill is designed to help private industry and I think because of its very nature that it does help private industry.

The difference between crown corporations and private industry is that private industry must be efficient; it must provide service because it is competitive and it must show a profit or it will go broke. But if it does go broke that is its own business; it cannot call upon the taxpayers to foot the bill. Crown companies do not have to do these things. Even though they do not do them, they can still remain in business.

We have some glaring examples in Canada of crown companies that are sapping a good deal from the taxpayers in order to remain in business. They may be providing service, but they are providing that service at the expense of the taxpayer. Having stated these personal views, I am prepared to vote for the bill providing for a further extension of time for this corporation.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a very few comments on this resolution and in doing so I shall detain the house for only several minutes. My criticism of the resolution is the opposite to that of my hon. friends of the Conservative party. I contend that during the past two years sufficient use has not been made of this corporation. As was pointed out this morning, the Canadian Commercial Corporation was set up in 1946 for certain specific reasons. In a nutshell, the objects of the corporation as set out in section 4, chapter 40, of the 1946 statutes are to assist in the development of Canadian trade, first, by encouraging imports and, second, by encouraging exports. When introducing the resolution to the house the then Minister of Trade and Commerce said, as reported on page 472 of Hansard of April 2, 1946:

> For some time it has been clear that there are many transactions in international trade which cannot be handled entirely by private enterprise—

The minister then went on to state that the corporation would be used for three specific purposes: First, to make purchases in Canada for foreign governments and UNNRA; second, to assist Canadian companies to obtain essential supplies from former enemy territories; third, to provide the machinery for making bulk purchases of such short supply commodities as sugar, oils, fats, et cetera.

Even in 1946, the Minister of Trade and Commerce estimated that there was some need in Canada for an organization which could carry out trading at a state level. I suggest that if there was that need in 1946, with world conditions as they are today and with bilateral trade agreements so much more prevalent, there is an even greater need for the corporation today.

In 1946 the C.C.F. supported the bill in principle and our reasons for doing so were set out clearly in Hansard at page 4324, where the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is reported as follows:

> We support the bill, first, because in our opinion it is an attempt not only to expand our trade but also to bring about orderly marketing.

And again:

> —this may well be the first step toward setting up export and import boards.

The bill passed parliament and the corporation was set up. This morning the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told us some of the things which the corporation has done in the past several years, and he referred specifically to the handling of Australian butter. I think it has done some excellent work, but nevertheless the proportion of Canadian trade which the corporation has handled has been almost negligible. In view of recent trade developments our group is somewhat worried and disappointed over that fact.

Since the beginning of the session there has been a good deal of discussion about the deteriorating position of our trade with Great Britain. We are concerned especially with the way that markets in Great Britain for our primary products are evaporating. Our exports to Great Britain have been shrinking despite the fact that we have made very substantial loans to them, and despite the fact that the United States has made large ERP loans to Great Britain to finance purchases in Canada. We know that sooner or later ERP is going to end, and when it does we are concerned lest the whole bottom should fall out of our British market.

Recently, as has been pointed out several times in the house, Great Britain concluded a substantial barter deal with Poland, and the products which were obtained from Poland in that barter deal were livestock and farm products. Great Britain has concluded dozens of these barter deals in the last few months, and in almost every case the products which Great Britain is obtaining are products which she formerly obtained from Canada. In other words, our markets in Great Britain for primary products are apparently shrinking fairly rapidly. Sir Stafford Cripps warned us a few weeks ago as to what was happening. I should like to refer now, as I did about two weeks ago, to a Canadian Press dispatch from London concerning what Sir Stafford Cripps had to say about the question. The heading of the dispatch is:

> Canada to lose exports unless it "buys British"

The article reads:

> Britain will buy less food from Canada unless Canada buys more from Britain, Sir Stafford Cripps, Chancellor of the Exchequer, said Tuesday. He said the crux of the post-war Anglo-Canadian trading problem is expansion of British exports to Canada.

I know that the minister knows that. He knows that if we are to continue to have British markets we will have to find some way of increasing British imports into Canada. Time and again one minister after another has said that he does not believe in bilateral trade agreements. I myself think that bilateral trade agreements are a retrogressive step in most instances. If we had any choice in the matter I believe that most Canadians would prefer to remain on a multilateral basis. Today, however, it is beginning to appear that we have not that choice. In Europe there are between 100 and 150 recently concluded bilateral deals, and if we want to trade with Great Britain it appears that we may be forced to trade in the way the British desire. I think we will be shortsighted if we do not keep that fact in mind.

I suggest that today it is not a question whether or not we like bilateral trade agreements. It is a question whether or not, in order to retain the British market, indeed in order to survive economically, we are prepared to adopt that kind of trading if forced to do so by the British. Rightly or wrongly, we of this group believe that in the immediate future there is going to be a good deal more of bilateral trading. Rightly or wrongly, we also believe that this parliament, whether it wants to or not, is going to have to adopt that kind of trading to at least a limited degree.

If we use bilateral trading, a company such as the Canadian Commercial Corporation might prove invaluable. We cannot see, for instance, why the corporation could not take our surpluses of apples in British Columbia and Nova Scotia, and on a state level try to make a barter deal with Great Britain for some product they have. We cannot see why this corporation could not take other agricultural products which may be in surplus supply, and make barter deals with them. In other words, we think the Canadian Commercial Corporation should be expanded, that its staff possibly should be increased, and that its powers should be made more comprehensive. If Canada is going to be forced into bilateral trading, we think that the corporation should be prepared to play some role in it. We support the bill, but we would like to see it extended.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): In July, 1947, an amendment was moved to the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act so that provision might be made for purchases to be carried out on behalf of the Department of National Defence through the corporation. At that time I stated that I could appreciate the advantages of having a central purchasing agency for the Department of National Defence. Then I went on to say that I could not understand the reason why the corporation should take over the construction of buildings for the Department of National Defence. At that time the Minister of National Defence said that they were in the housing business in a very large way, and that the Canadian Commercial Corporation was handling the building and construction of a large number of married quarters for the personnel of the active army and the active navy. I want to stress that in doing so the corporation did not have the facilities to carry out a thorough inspection of the work which was being done, and that the effect was to set up a new department of public works when it would have been very much better if the construction of these houses had been carried out through the Department of Public Works, or by the service personnel themselves.

I have seen press reports that the corporation is to discontinue building houses for the active services. I do not know if that is true, but I hope that it is because for once the government will have taken my advice.

Mr. Howe: If I may interrupt, the Canadian Commercial Corporation has never built anything. It is a purchasing department. We took your advice before you gave it.

Mr. Pearkes: No, not according to the Minister of National Defence. I do not say that these houses were actually built by the corporation, but the contracts were let through it.

Mr. Howe: Yes, but the planning and the supervision were carried out by the armed forces.

Mr. Pearkes: I will quote what the Minister of National Defence said at that time. At page 4958 of Hansard of 1947 there is the following:

> The Canadian Commercial Corporation was created, not only for the purposes of purchasing for the Department of National Defence, but for the other purposes that parliament or the government might provide for it.

Later at page 4960 he says:

> This is a very large housing project involving the conversion or construction of some hundreds of dwelling units this year.

Then there is a reference by the minister on the same page to the fact that a great many men will be employed. He refers definitely to the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and then he says:

> There would be presumably about that number in the Department of National Defence if we were not getting the Canadian Commercial Corporation to do that job.

I questioned the policy at that time. I know that I have not made a mistake in saying that it seemed to be the intention then that the contracts for these buildings should be let through the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Howe: That is correct. The contracts were placed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation, but all supervision and planning are carried out by the services themselves. We simply act as purchasing agents for placing the contracts.

Mr. Pearkes: Has that policy been changed? Have they ceased to act as an agency for the letting of contracts?

Mr. Howe: No. The only change is that in the current year's program a good deal of the work in connection with housing has been turned over to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In the program of last year tenders were called by the Canadian Commercial Corporation and contracts were placed, but the planning and supervision were carried out entirely by the armed services.

Mr. Pearkes: There is to be a change in that policy now, and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, will take over the work from the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Mr. Howe: A certain amount of it.

Mr. Pearkes: I am very pleased to hear that; it seems to me a step in the right direction. Will the act be amended to eliminate the powers now given to the corporation? I have not the words before me, but I think in the amendment of 1947 it said "to construct". Will that be removed?

Mr. Howe: We place the contracts for these projects; and when I say "we" I am talking of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. When we place contracts with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation we have carried out our duty under the act. That may be our way of awarding the work. If we should decide to place such contracts with private contractors, that is also within the orbit of the corporation. The Canadian Commercial Corporation does not itself build; it has no building or supervisory staff. It simply places contracts for the services.

Perhaps I should clear up just one point, and in doing so close the debate. A good deal has been said about the five orders in council.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the minister is closing the debate.

Mr. Howe: These five contracts have nothing to do with parliamentary appropriations. The Canadian Commercial Corporation works on the authority of a financial encumbrance. In other words, when a requisition comes to the corporation it is accompanied by a financial encumbrance, which states that a certain vote has been encumbered for a certain amount of money required to make this purchase.

The first order in council I have in my hand is P.C. 1186. The requisition came with the usual financial encumbrance, for the purchase of two helicopters. They are built in the United States; and the only way I know to purchase anything from the United States aircraft industry is to follow the practice of that industry, which is to accompany the order with a down payment. That is done even by the United States government itself when buying from its own contractors, and it is done by the government of Canada if it is buying aircraft from Canadian contractors. It is a practice of the trade. If it is impossible to follow the practice it is impossible to purchase the aircraft.

What happened? The requirement in this case was that a twenty per cent down payment accompany the order for the two helicopters. That was made, in the amount of $33,979.80. It was a condition of the contract, the best contract that could be made. What is the government to do? I shall explain presently the technicality that has been advanced by the Auditor General. We have been buying aircraft for the last eight years, following this same practice exactly, but since purchasing has been under the authority of the War Measures Act the Auditor General has never called the matter to our attention. In this case the practice of the trade was followed; the order for these two helicopters was accompanied by the down payment required by the aircraft manufacturing plant. Then there was a further provision in the contract that when the planes were completed and ready for shipment to Canada a further amount was required, and that when the two helicopters were delivered to the forces the final payment was to be made.

Mr. MacNicol: Two or one?

Mr. Howe: Two. The technical point raised by the Auditor General is that when the down payment was made, nothing had been delivered. That is true. The transaction took place in the United States; but the same practice has been and must be followed in placing an aircraft contract in Canada. The order is always accompanied by a down payment. I do not think anyone can see anything very vicious in that. If anyone can show how the Canadian Commercial Corporation could have carried out its duty to purchase these two helicopters for the services without making a down payment, then they may show where the corporation did not carry out its obligations; but I suggest that it followed the practice of the trade. It is a pure technicality that the contract happened to be with a United States manufacturer and therefore no delivery was made. If it had been with a Canadian manufacturer the point never would have arisen, because then the payment would have been in order.

The next order in council I have is P.C. 1101, covering the supply and installation of 54 rhombic antennae. These have a large

United States content, as set out in the order in council. These were not a standard product; the antennae were made to order. The contract provided that the order be accompanied by a down payment sufficient to cover the cost of the United States imports. The Canadian Commercial Corporation made the best deal it could, and the contract was passed accordingly. The transaction went through in the ordinary way.

Mr. Knowles: These were purchased in Canada?

Mr. Howe: Yes, but with a large United States content. This order in council does not state that United States content, but I happen to know that the Canadian Marconi Company got this equipment from its American associate of the same name.

The next order in council is P.C. 1051 covering a quantity of teletype equipment consisting of fifteen items, as set out herein, with an expenditure of United States funds estimated at $22,750 as against a total price of $34,326. Here again the contract required an advance of $15,000. That was the best deal that could be made. The purchase was made in the ordinary way and the payment was made in accordance with the contract. As far as the Canadian Commercial Corporation was concerned, it could have refused to make the purchase; or it could have waited until next fiscal year to make the purchase or, alternatively, it must necessarily have carried out the terms required by the manufacturer.

The next one concerns a purchase from Canadian Arsenals Limited. Certain tooling up had to be completed and certain equipment purchased. It was getting towards the end of the year and the appropriation from the funds of Canadian Arsenals Limited, which is a government-owned company, was not sufficient to purchase the parts required for the tooling up. An advance payment was, therefore, requested from the Department of National Defence. There is nothing very serious about that, as I see it.

Then, there was the purchase of items of equipment from RCA Victor. The purchase price of this equipment was $226,597, of which $51,244 was an expenditure of United States dollars. In other words, the equipment was largely made in the United States. In this case, too, a down payment was required as one of the terms of the contract. This down payment was made.

The last one is the purchase of RCA Victor diversity communications equipment, a United States product. This purchase was made through the RCA Victor Company of Canada from its American affiliate. There was an expenditure in United States dollars of $51,224, and the usual down payment was required. The down payment was made. These are all ordinary purchases. The only significant fact is that part of the purchase price fell in one fiscal year and the remainder in another fiscal year. If the purchases had been made two or three months later no question of procedure could have been involved. I suggest that no special concern need be felt about these ordinary transactions that occurred in the usual course of business.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has been good enough to explain in some detail what was behind the transactions to which attention has been drawn by the Auditor General. However, as the one who obtained a copy of these orders in council to which reference has already been made by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I think it is quite fair to say that no one is suggesting there was anything underhanded or in any sense discreditable about what was done. Certainly the Auditor General did not say that. He did call attention, however, to the fact that this method of payment involved a departure from the normal method of financing government purchases. As I understand the normal method, it is that moneys can only be paid over to suppliers if, in fact, the goods or articles were supplied during the fiscal year in which the payment of money was authorized.

In this case, as a result of the orders in council, the money was paid over although the goods were not delivered in that fiscal year. In fact, an answer to a question of mine which appeared in Votes and Proceedings, No. 27, indicates that some of this equipment has not yet been delivered. This equipment was purchased under the authority of order in council P.C. 938, which was the contract with Canadian Arsenals Limited. Twenty-two snowmobiles remain to be delivered, fifteen of which are to be delivered on March 31 of this year and the others on April 30 of this year. It is over a year since the payment was made under this order in council.

As the Auditor General points out:

> A constitutional reason for the lapsing and writing off of unused balances in appropriations at the year end is to ensure that the executive be ever in a state of dependency on parliament for funds.

If that principle is not followed, then the executive need not come before parliament for authorization of expenditures. When that happens, the fundamental principle of responsible government has disappeared. I can see this as one objection to the proposal to increase the power of the Minister of Finance to make these advances from the consolidated revenue fund to the Canadian Commercial Corporation. If contracts can be financed and deliveries obtained merely by descending on the consolidated revenue fund without the specific authority of this house, then certainly such operations could be continued, as long as there was money in the fund, without coming to parliament. This is one more stage in the progressive loss by this house of its control over the expenditures made by the executive.

Instead of the minister having to place an item in the estimates, in this case, of the Department of National Defence, and obtain approval of the expenditure, he was simply given $10 million which he could obtain from the consolidated revenue. He is now asking for another $2,500,000 which would make $12,500,000 that he could spend without the specific authority of parliament. I suggest that is a serious step for us to take. It is going to require considerably more justification by the minister before I personally would be prepared to accept this amendment.

If one examines the balance sheet appearing in the annual report of the Canadian Commercial Corporation for 1948, one will see that there had been advances under section 8 of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act at that time of $2,500,000. In reply to a question, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce today gave an answer from which it appears that up to the present moment the net advances made under section 8 of the act have been $3,500,000, so it varies slightly from time to time. If I am correct in my interpretation of how this works, it means there is a balance on hand still to be advanced of $6,500,000. If any portion of that were repaid, suppose $3 million of that were repaid, then a further $3 million could be advanced so long as there was not more than $10 million outstanding at any one time. Mr. Chairman, $10 million is a great deal of money, particularly when it comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers. I cannot see why the minister needs another $2,500,000.

Operations have been conducted for three years, and there is a sum outstanding of $3,500,000. If that is not the case, I hope the minister will correct me. He may tell us if there has ever been the whole $10 million outstanding and, if so, how long it has taken to repay it so that the corporation would be in a position to get more. For instance, the fact that he was able to finance this purchase of butter and repay it with only $3,500,000 outstanding at the moment is quite a strong argument to indicate that they do not need this $2,500,000 extra. And when one sees what has been happening—as was pointed out in the auditor general's report, the money was paid to contractors over a year ago for goods which have not yet been delivered—I think it is going to take considerable justification for coming to us and asking for a further $2,500,000 of advances to be paid out for projects without the authority of parliament; that is to say, advances which may be made without the house knowing anything about it.

Mr. Howe: I think I can relieve my hon. friend's mind regarding two or three matters. The first is that no money under the control of the Canadian Commercial Corporation is involved in defence purchases. The moneys referred to in this order in council were not paid by the Canadian Commercial Corporation; they were not paid out of any fund of theirs. They were paid directly by the services. No money is involved in purchasing for the services other than the actual cost of purchasing, which I think ran last year about six-tenths of one per cent of the value of the purchases, the lowest cost of purchasing that I know of in all Canada. Therefore the question of capitalization is not wrapped up with defence purchasing. The capital was arranged for originally so that the Canadian Commercial Corporation would be able to purchase goods required for UNRRA or for governments abroad, pay for them, ship them and recover the funds later from UNRRA or from governments. It is still doing that business, and we have certain transactions—I mentioned sisal from India and potash from inside the iron curtain, and butter from Denmark. This financing required large sums of money. Money has to be paid when the purchase is made in the country of origin. Certain purchases can only be liquidated after the goods have been landed in Canada and resold to the Canadian trade. Around the end of the year we had drawn down from the Minister of Finance the full $10 million which we were authorized to draw, and it was only because of the fact that the shipments were fairly well spaced and goods were sold immediately on arrival that we were able to keep our funds sufficiently liquid to carry out the undertakings into which we had entered.

These undertakings are growing larger. We have had to finance a large purchase of tin. That transaction was entered into for reasons which were urgent. The reason that we are asking for more capital is that we have a full appreciation of the fact that in order to take care of situations which arise, temporary situations, we may require more than $10 million. We may require more than the $10 million capital that we have today. We drew the $10 million which we were entitled to draw from the treasury, and as we finished the transactions, we paid $6 million of it back a few weeks ago. Of course the entire use of the funds, both capital funds and any authorized loans, is subject to treasury control.

Mr. Fulton: Is it not a fact that most of the expenditures in the future will be on behalf of the Department of National Defence? I have particularly in mind stock piling. Between the time we last met and the time this session convened we have seen in the press numerous references to stock piling. My understanding is that these purchases of strategic metals are made on behalf of the Department of National Defence. If not, perhaps the minister will tell us on whose behalf they are made. One feature which strikes me as being significant is this. In the balance sheet of the corporation I cannot find any place where these purchases are carried as an asset. I do not recall any provision being made in last year's estimates, either in the minister's department or in the defence department, for funds to take care of these purchases. Surely the minister does not propose that the stock piling of strategic metals should be done out of the $10 million or $12,500,000 which he may have authority to obtain from the consolidated revenue fund. Will that not be done by items in the estimates and not in contracts of the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Where are these stock piles? How are these stock piles reflected in the financial figures of the dominion? Where are they carried as an asset? Are they in the corporation balance sheet or in the department concerned?

Mr. Howe: Stock piling is a civilian operation, and the funds will be voted by parliament. The only stock pile we are carrying at the moment is a considerable quantity of tin, purchased on the strong recommendation of the defence department. At the moment that is being financed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. When the further estimates for the year 1948-49 are placed before parliament, as they will be in a few days, there will be an item in these estimates to cover the cost of that stock pile, and the stock pile will then appear in the books of the government as an investment.

Mr. Fulton: In the Department of Finance?

Mr. Howe: Yes. The funds of the Canadian Commercial Corporation are not for permanent investment or semi-permanent investment. They are to finance current transactions. The transactions which they are used to finance are transactions which will liquidate themselves in a matter of months.

Mr. Fulton: In the estimates of what department will this provision for stock piling appear?

Mr. Howe: It will appear in the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Knowles: Just a brief word; I certainly do not intend to berate the government at length over the matter about which I spoke a moment ago; because I imagine that in view of the attention which has been called to this practice by the Auditor General, and by hon. members on the floor of parliament and in the press, it will not be repeated. I just want to say to the minister that we do not feel that his answers really explained away the abuse of power which the government has exercised in this case. The minister says that this is the practice of the trade. I remind the minister that he is a member of parliament and that it is important to follow parliamentary practices. The minister said that the government did this all through the war years under the authority of the War Measures Act. That was exactly the point that was offensive to some of us, namely, the powers which they properly exercised under the War Measures Act and which they still think they have the authority to exercise.

The minister said that it was only a technicality to which the Auditor General drew attention. That is right; it is only a technicality. I quite agree with him as to the common-sense approaches he sought to make to this whole matter, but I suggest that in parliamentary and governmental procedure technicalities are important, and I hope that the government will pay attention to the criticism which has been made in this respect.

Mr. Howe: I should like to say one word. I do not think my hon. friend understands yet what the technicality is. There was a vote for this equipment in the estimates of 1947-48 and also in the estimates of 1948-49. The goods were paid for partly out of the estimates of one year, and they were paid for partly out of the estimates of the next year. My hon. friend seems to think that somehow we evaded the provisions of the estimates; that we purchased without a proper provision being made in the estimates for the item. That is not so.

Mr. Knowles: The Auditor General thinks so.

Mr. Howe: No; he does not say that at all.

Mr. Knowles: He certainly does.

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Knowles: He says that amounts were charged to the votes of 1947-48 for goods and services not delivered until the next year.

Mr. Howe: That is true enough.

Mr. Knowles: I will wager that you won't do it again.

Mr. Howe: No! We do it every day. I did it just the other day. You cannot buy otherwise.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is very nonchalant about this thing. He is a great businessman, a great organizer, but he does find parliament an awful nuisance, doesn't he?

Mr. Howe: No, no.

Mr. Pearkes: Before the house moved into committee the minister did say this was a purchasing agency, not a construction agency.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: There is some justification for misunderstanding in that respect, because the amendment assented to on July 17, 1947, makes reference to constructing and carrying out projects as required by the Department of National Defence. I understand that no construction work has been done by the C.C.C., and that any projects which have been carried out for the Department of National Defence have been through the letting of contracts to some outside firms.

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that policy is now to be discontinued, and that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will carry out those duties. Would the minister consider amending that amendment, eliminating the words "construct and carry out projects"? That was the expression to which I objected in 1947. I think it is unsound, and that the present policy where you have a central department doing all construction work is the sound one. If I remember correctly, the explanation of that paragraph given a year ago when the bill was presented referred even to the possible construction of fortifications.

I believe that is wrong in principle, and if it could be removed from the text there would be no doubt in the minds of people as to the correct functions of this purchasing agency.

Mr. Thatcher: I have one suggestion which seems feasible to me. My understanding is that today this corporation does business only when some private company or foreign state approaches it. Why would it not be feasible to use the corporation when we have surplus primary products? For instance, I understand that today our apple-growers in British Columbia and Nova Scotia are facing disaster. Why could not this corporation try to arrange barter agreements with some other state, whereby it would take the produce received in return for the apples and sell it in Canada? There may be some reason why it cannot be done, but at the moment it is not clear to me. And if in the future other agricultural products are in surplus supply it could perform a useful function at that time.

Mr. Howe: I would not want the hon. member to see disaster on all sides; I can assure him the apple crop of British Columbia has been largely sold, and at a good price.

Mr. Thatcher: How about Nova Scotia?

Mr. Howe: There is in Nova Scotia a surplus of a certain quality of apple not marketable in this country. Britain has said it does not want them—would not even take them as a gift. We offered to give Britain certain apples. What can you get in barter for something which people will not take as a gift?

Mr. Thatcher: If the corporation, on its own initiative, would try to search the world for markets, I should think we would get results. That is why we have a dominion corporation of this kind. I do not see why it should not try.

Mr. Howe: It is exactly for that purpose that the Department of Trade and Commerce has trade commissioners in every country of the world searching for markets.

Mr. Fulton: With respect to stockpiling, if it is decided to obtain certain commodities for that purpose, do I understand that the $12,500,000 which will be available if this amendment passes would be used for that purpose, and that later provision would be made in the estimates to repay an equivalent amount? Or will a general item be inserted in the estimates to provide for an estimated amount to be spent for stockpiling in the coming year, and that amount drawn on from time to time as necessary?

Mr. Howe: We hope the latter procedure will be possible. As my hon. friend knows, conditions arise, such as threatened trouble in Malaya, which might easily have cut off our supply of tin, and which may make it necessary to take on commitments without the authority of parliament, in the belief that under the circumstances parliament would be sure to give approval when the time comes. But ordinarily we will anticipate the action and provide for it in advance, rather than ask Canadian Commercial Corporation to finance it.

Mr. Fulton: Do I understand the minister to say that the only material stock pile thus far is that of tin?

Mr. Howe: Yes; I believe, though, that there are orders out for one or two other materials which may be provided for later.

Mr. Fulton: The details will be included in the estimates?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: I had not intended saying anything in this debate, but I am not exactly satisfied with the answer just given by the minister to the hon. member for Moose Jaw in connection with the marketing of Nova Scotia apples. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said we are supporting the principle of the bill—and we are. But we are not supporting it merely as an agency to regulate, assist and help private enterprise when they get stuck. The basis of our support is that this is a government agency which steps in where private enterprise has fallen down, and that it will market the products of this country as a government agency, with any benefits or profits going to the government.

The apple industry of Nova Scotia is just another industry that has been siphoned off owing to the failure of private enterprise in the field of marketing. Only three or four months ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was in England. He stated in the house, and I believe accurately, that the people of Britain want Nova Scotia apples, but they cannot get them. I believe the chief reason for their not being able to get them is the difference in currency. We have depreciated the British pound to the point where they cannot afford to trade with us.

Unless some financial arrangement is made by the government for the marketing of Nova Scotia apples that industry will die out. Government policy is scrapping it. I have heard hon. members to my right make reference to the last by-election in the Annapolis valley. In my view the chief reason for the government's candidate having lost was the government's attitude toward scrapping the main industry of the valley. They are now paying for the uprooting of that industry by tearing up the trees and going into mixed farming.

If the government is to use the taxpayers' money for the maintenance of this commercial organization, I see no reason in the world why the government should not use it to support that industry. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said that our market is there, but that Britain cannot take our apples because of the difference in currency. That being so, I say it should be the responsibility of this agency to barter our apples for something from the old country which could be sold in Canada, thus getting around the currency difficulty.

I thought the minister spoke too quickly when he said our apples were not wanted in Britain. I am sure they are wanted. But until we get around the currency difficulty we will not market them; and the way to get around that difficulty is to barter Nova Scotia apples for something we can use in Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended taking part in this debate, but since the minister raised the question of Nova Scotia apples and some facetious remarks were made, I believe one or two points should be cleared up in this connection. In so far as the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South are concerned, I hope he is not suggesting that the failure of marketing in the Annapolis valley was due entirely to the failure of private enterprise. As a matter of fact, I think most hon. members know that the marketing was carried out by a board upon which were represented all branches of the industry. Although there have been difficulties in marketing, and very real difficulties, those were due to the exchange restrictions and not to the failure of private enterprise.

I notice the minister says that apples could not be given away, but I would ask his co-operation in clearing up any misunderstanding in this regard. I am surprised to know that the Canadian Commercial Corporation had any apples to give away. I think the minister will be ready to state that the corporation never at any time took over any apples. During the past year the marketing was carried on by the government agency. We did not ask the corporation to take it over, nor did the corporation take it over.

I would like to know when the corporation did offer apples to Great Britain and when the British refused them. I ask that in view of the fact that we were able to sell apples at a low price to Belgium, despite what the Minister of Agriculture said the other day, and at the same time Belgium was selling an inferior product to Great Britain at a higher price. I understand also that Great Britain imported apples of a poor quality from Italy, a former belligerent, a country with which I understand we have not yet arranged terms of peace. I rose simply to suggest that this misunderstanding should be cleared up.

Mr. Howe: The Canadian Commercial Corporation does not deal in apples. I was referring to the government who had conveyed an offer of apples which had been received from one of the co-operatives, not the Nova Scotia co-operative. That offer was conveyed to England but was turned down.

Mr. Nowlan: It was the British Columbia co-operative, I presume.

Mr. Howe: We sent to the United Kingdom a good supply of Nova Scotia applesauce and dried apples which was delivered free on board ship. I think these two transactions indicate that there is not a great market for apples in England.

Canadian Commercial Corporation

Mr. Thatcher: Is it government policy that the corporation shall not take part in such transactions? If it is, will the minister not consider changing that policy so that the corporation can dispose of some of our surplus produce if necessary?

Mr. Howe: The corporation is not the agency for that purpose unless arrangements are made to use it as a selling agency.

Mr. Jaenicke: The annual report of the Canadian Commercial Corporation states that the corporation acted as the agency for the government in placing contracts to a total value of $55,795,419 to the end of March, 1948. Would it be too much trouble for the minister to give us a breakdown up to date, including contracts that have been negotiated since that time? I would like to know the commodity involved in each contract.

Mr. Howe: I have not the list here but I suggest that it might be more convenient to discuss this when the bill is in committee.

Mr. Jaenicke: Could not the list be placed on Hansard so that we could peruse it?

Mr. Howe: This table that I have includes national defence purchases as well as purchases for other governments. I could have a table prepared and distributed tomorrow.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister not acquiesce in the request made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) that the balance sheet be carried out to December 31 between now and the time the bill is up for second reading? We could then make up our minds whether there is a real need for this extra $2,500,000.

Mr. Howe: The figures will all be available.

Mr. Thatcher: Does the corporation have representatives abroad or are the trade commissioners the only representatives of the government abroad?

Mr. Howe: The corporation does not have representatives abroad except in London and Washington.

Mr. Thatcher: Does the corporation do any advertising abroad?

Mr. Howe: No. The foreign trade service of the Department of Trade and Commerce is the agency that is used to obtain commercial intelligence in all parts of the world. Anything that the Canadian Commercial Corporation needs to know about foreign markets can be obtained from the foreign trade service.

Mr. Thatcher: What representatives or agents has the corporation across Canada? Are efforts made to sell some of these products domestically?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Howe: No, the corporation is not a selling agency in that sense. In other words, it is not in the retail business. It is not a Loblaws. The corporation has offices in Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, Victoria, Washington, D.C., and London, England.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): The minister said that one reason why timber control was being retained was that the British government were still making bulk purchases. Would it not be possible for the Canadian Commercial Corporation to undertake that work and act as purchasing agent for the British government? What policy would be followed if purchases were made in that way? Would there be an allocation as between the various producers, or would they be on a competitive basis?

Mr. Howe: As my hon. friend knows, throughout the war years, lumber was one commodity that was bought through the lumber controller. That was because the specifications were so important. Over-all arrangements were made and continue to be made through the timber controller's office.

Mr. Hatfield: Was it the Canadian Commercial Corporation that traded British Columbia apples for Brazilian oranges?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Thatcher: Is the corporation still trying to make deals with UNRRA or other relief organizations to dispose of some of the surplus horse meat in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Howe: The horse meat that Saskatchewan sold outside the country was sold by a government agency.

Mr. Case: Is that horse meat to be consumed in Saskatchewan or is it just for export?

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 122, to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

BANFF—EXCLUSION OF AREA REQUIRED FOR SPRAY LAKES POWER AND STORAGE PROJECT

Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 81, to amend the National Parks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, for the record, will the minister make a statement as to the purposes of the bill?

Mr. MacKinnon: Hon. members will recall that in 1929 the natural resources of the province of Alberta were transferred by the government of Canada to that province, and as appears in section 16 of the Alberta natural resources transfer agreement it was intended that that portion of Banff national park necessary for the proper development of the Spray lakes storage and power development project would be excluded from Banff national park. This is made clear by the debates in the house on the second reading of the bill approving the said agreement. Pursuant to the said agreement 630 square miles were excluded from the park in 1930.

The government of Alberta has now arrived at an agreement with the Calgary Power Company for a licence to develop the said project. It is proposed to dam the Spray river twenty-three miles above its mouth, and from the north end of the reservoir so created to divert the stored water through a system of canals, pipe lines and power houses down Goat creek valley and out through the pass opposite Canmore to the Bow river. The project will add 90,000 horsepower to the 110,000 horsepower now developed in the Bow river and its tributaries.

Strong representations have been made to me by the premier of Alberta as a result of which I am satisfied that the area excluded from Banff national park in 1930 is insufficient for the proper development of the project, and that it is necessary in the public interest that the further area of 21·2 square miles proposed to be withdrawn from Banff national park by section 2 of the present bill be excluded from the park in order that the proposed project may proceed. The said further area is all on the edge of Banff national park, and contains no features making essential its retention for park use. The natural flow into the Spray river from the watersheds emptying into it below the site of the proposed dam is usually adequate for scenic purposes.

In order to ensure an adequate flow of water for scenic and fire-fighting purposes, I have required the government of Alberta to enter into an agreement with me by exchange of letters between myself and the Hon. David A. Ure, the minister in charge of water resources and irrigation for the province. By this exchange of letters the province has agreed that it will not reduce, and that it will not permit any licensee from it, by works outside the boundaries of Banff national park, to reduce the flow of water in the Spray river at its junction with the Bow river in the said park to an amount less than 200 cubic feet per second during the months of June, July and August in each year hereafter; that it and any licensee from it will during the month of September in each year hereafter supply such amount of water as may reasonably be required by Banff Springs hotel for essential sewage and water supply, and that it and any licensee from it will provide additional water for fire fighting within the said park as required at the rate of 100 cubic feet per second. I consider that these provisions amply safeguard the scenic beauties of that portion of the Spray valley lying within Banff national park.

In order to protect fishing in the Spray river, the proposed licensee from the province of Alberta has agreed to provide 20,000 acre feet of storage more than was originally contemplated and to release the additional water into the Spray river below the dam at the rate of 100 cubic feet per second as and when required for the maintenance of a flow in the river sufficient to protect the fish therein.

Section 3 of the bill withdraws from Elk island national park, in the province of Alberta, a narrow strip of land on the north side of Alberta provincial highway No. 16 with a total area of 20·6 acres. The withdrawal of this area has been requested by the government of Alberta in order that the highway may be widened. I am satisfied that the withdrawal of this small area will in no way affect the park, and that such withdrawal is in the public interest.

Section 4 of the bill changes the name of New Brunswick national park. The new name, Fundy national park, has been suggested by the Hon. J. B. McNair, K.C., LL.D., premier of New Brunswick, and was selected as a result of an essay competition conducted throughout the New Brunswick schools.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Heading repealed.

Mr. Brooks: I wish to ask the minister a question with reference to section 4. I notice that the name is being changed from New Brunswick national park. Is that because another national park is to be established in the province of New Brunswick and they do not wish to have confusion of names? Is this park to be called Fundy owing to the fact that possibly another park will be established in that province along the Saint John river? I may say that the site which was first selected for the national park was up the Saint John river, and it was the one which was most highly recommended. It occurred to me that possibly the department intends to develop another national park on the Saint John river. Can the minister give me any information on that?

Mr. MacKinnon: There is no intention at the moment to establish immediately another national park in the province of New Brunswick. The name Fundy was selected, as I said, after a competition among the schools of the province, and was recommended by the government of New Brunswick.

Mr. Nowlan: As to the question which was raised by the member for Royal about the use of the name Fundy, will that include the national park which I understood was to be established in Nova Scotia? Certainly it is rather a surprise to me to know that the province of New Brunswick has a monopoly on the name Fundy. After all, there is as much of the bay of Fundy adjoining Nova Scotia as there is adjoining New Brunswick. I do not want to start an internecine feud between two of the three maritime provinces, but I want to register my protest now against the province of New Brunswick claiming any exclusive title, right or interest in the name Fundy.

Having made that preliminary statement, I now want to ask the minister a question. I noticed in a press report of something that had occurred in another place the fact that the federal government has taken steps to establish a national park near Blomidon. Certainly that is on the bay of Fundy. I had presumed that the amendment included that park, and I should like to know if it only applies to New Brunswick. I should like the minister to say what steps have been taken to set up a park in Nova Scotia at Blomidon, which should be included within the name Fundy and to which reference has been made by his department. I should like to know if the boundaries have been delimited.

Mr. MacKinnon: If I understand the hon. gentleman's question correctly, I would say in reply that this bill does not attempt to include the land in Nova Scotia referred to. There have been investigations by the parks branch officials of the department concerning the area of Blomidon, and at the moment I am not quite sure whether or not a decision has been reached.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Church: On division.

NEWFOUNDLAND

UNION WITH CANADA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ROYAL ASSENT IN UNITED KINGDOM—CEREMONIES ON APRIL 1

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Might I have the consent of the house to revert for a moment to motions, in order to inform hon. members that the royal assent has been given in the parliament at Westminster to the legislation providing for the union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: The applause with which this announcement has been greeted will not appear in Hansard, but I do wish to state that it is very satisfactory to find that, although there may have been diverging views as to the proper procedure, there is no divergence whatsoever as to the pleasure with which we receive the news that all the legal formalities have now been completed to make this union effective as from the expiration of March 31, 1949.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: May I add just a word to answer a question asked some time ago by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin). He asked whether the government was giving consideration to declaring March 31 a national holiday so that all Canada might join in celebrating the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. I replied that it would be premature to announce a celebration at that time, the bill then being still before the United Kingdom parliament.

Now I may say that owing to the very short time remaining before the end of March, and in view of weather conditions at this time of year, and other considerations, the government has decided that no holiday could conveniently be arranged for March 31 or April 1. However, it is planned to hold a simple ceremony here in Ottawa and in St. John's on April 1, and to broadcast these ceremonies over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation system and the Newfoundland stations. A more detailed announcement of the program will be made later on. Should the provincial government of Newfoundland wish to hold a celebration there later in the season, which might perhaps coincide with the opening of their legislature after their provincial election, the Canadian government will be happy to co-operate.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Does this mean there will not be a joint celebration in St. John's, Newfoundland, but rather separate celebrations in both the capital of Canada and the capital of Newfoundland.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is planned to have a part of the celebration take place in St. John's and a part take place here on parliament hill, and to have them so arranged that they will be consecutive and form part of the same broadcast over the radio systems of Canada, as it is now, and of the new province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Graydon: The Prime Minister is not going down?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, not at this time.

MAIL CONTRACTS

AMENDMENT TO MAKE SUPPLEMENTAL PAYMENTS APPLICABLE TO RENEWAL CONTRACTS

Hon. Ernest Bertrand (Postmaster General) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act to make supplemental payments authorized under the said act applicable to renewal contracts.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I hope I may not be prevented from taking some part in the debate on this resolution, if I consider that necessary, by reason of the fact that I suggest to the minister now that he should make a full statement and explanation of the purposes of the resolution before Mr. Speaker leaves the chair.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): For the last two years, Mr. Speaker, we have passed bills to authorize the Postmaster General to supplement the payments under rural mail delivery contracts to take care of increased costs. The provision was made effective for one year; then in June, 1948, there was an extension for another year. This year the officers of my department have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary to have further increases, but that it is better to get authority from parliament to merge the increases already given with the cost of the contracts when they came up for renewal. We do not intend to give further supplements, but when we renew contracts under which supplements have been paid we are asking permission from parliament to include those supplements in the prices of the contracts. When we have to ask for tenders the low tender, if the applicant has the facilities to fulfil the contract, will be the price of the contract; there will be no further supplements.

It was useful to have this legislation for the last two years, because costs were continually rising. When we asked for tenders the figures were so high that often we had to refuse to accept the lowest tender, and had to call for tenders all over again or ask those who had tendered to lower their prices. In other cases, concerning renewals, we gave supplements wherever we thought it was useful and just to do so.

Mr. Fraser: You only gave the supplement where it was asked for, did you not?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): When there was a request for a supplemental payment we studied the matter and quite often granted the request because, with the cost of living increasing, it was usually found that the price was too low.

Now I want to give the house the pro rata of the different contracts in which we gave supplements as compared with the contracts in which we had to ask for tenders. There are about twelve thousand rural mail contracts in operation in Canada today. As of March 28, 1947, the Postmaster General was given authorization to pay supplements and war allowances to contractors. On June 30, 1948, we extended to March 31, 1949, the period during which these supplements might be granted. The present bill is asking for the incorporation of these supplements into the contract, just as if they appeared in the original contract. If this permission is not granted by parliament, whenever a contract expires we could not grant a supplement and the contractor would have to take the contract at the price that obtained a year ago or we would have to ask for tenders.

As of 30th September, 1948, the mail contracts with supplements in force represented 54 per cent of the total 11,933 contracts in force on that date. This meant that 6,485 contractors received the supplement. The original contract rates on these 6,485 contracts called for a total payment of $4,993,735 per annum. The supplementary payments, as of 30th September, 1948, in respect of those contracts amounted to $1,537,108, making total payments on these 6,485 contracts of $6,530,843. The increase in cost due to supplements, therefore, amounts to 30·78 per cent.

Certain contracts under which we could not grant supplements, because the contractor had disappeared, died or resigned his contract, had to be sent out for tenders. There were 1,143 such contracts. As of September, 1948, the payments to be made under the old contract rates amounted to $765,651. After tenders were called, the new contract rates for those contracts amounted to $1,052,905 per annum. The per annum increase on these 1,143 contracts is, therefore, $287,254. The increased cost of the contracts which resulted from tendering amounts to 37·5 per cent as compared with 30·78 per cent for the contracts under which supplements were given.

During the coming year it is calculated there will be approximately 1,600 mail contracts that will expire. We have not the right to grant supplements to those contractors and we are not asking for it. We will have to call for tenders. If there is a supplement payable, the contract will include the supplement if this legislation is accepted by this house.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): These renewal contracts come under a public utility, the Post Office Department, and are no doubt very necessary. Rural mail deliveries are necessary. I wish to ask the minister a few questions, but I shall not take up more than two or three minutes. Would it not be well for the minister to follow a different method of financing these renewals? The Post Office Department has a surplus. In the city of Toronto, it is over $16 million and in the city of Montreal approximately $15 million. No doubt the mail order stores contribute to that to some extent.

This is a public utility with a large surplus. Would it not be better to return some of this money to the people? Would it not be well to follow the example of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who last night did something for the working class of the country in the announcement he made? There may be a difference in how it was done, but at least something was done. The minister has done fine work under the present contracts. There is a surplus and I think the minister should put it in the estimates. Whenever other public utilities such as the Bell Telephone Company, the City Gas Company or any of the others have a surplus the people are entitled to some reduction in rates. Since the Post Office Department has a surplus, I think the people are entitled to a reduction in postage rates. The benefit of the surplus has not been passed along.

There should be some other functions for the Post Office Department to perform. In England this department has many additional functions which are of benefit to the people. I appreciate what the minister has accomplished, but after all, the post office is a public utility. Service should be given to the people at cost and they are not getting it. If there is another way of financing it, it should be put in the tax rate so that the people would receive the benefit of improvement all along the line.

[Mr. Bertrand (Laurier).]

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, for many years the Post Office Department has had a large surplus. I am sorry to say that this year the surplus is evaporating. We were very happy to do it, but this year we have been obliged to increase salaries—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should point out that we are not in committee, and I do not think the minister wishes to close the debate at this moment. I would suggest that the minister either close the debate or answer questions when we are in committee.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In accordance with your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that the minister should not answer questions on second reading, since if he did he might close the debate, I want to take this opportunity of saying a word about the legislation now being considered. The question of the rural mail courier has been a vexing one during the years in which most of us have sat in this parliament. It has, of course, become an even more vexing one owing to the economic situation and the changes in Canada during the period of the war as well as to the increased cost of living.

I have no doubt that the Postmaster General has on his record hundreds of cases in which, had there not been some method of increasing the revenue to the rural mail courier for the carrying of mail to the rural residents of Canada, many of the bondsmen of those contractors would have found that they had a rural mail route on their hands. The minister, in his great wisdom or otherwise, decided that a supplementary sum should be paid to certain contractors when it was shown that those contractors could not proceed with the work under the present contract for which they had tendered and which had been accepted.

At this stage I want to refer to the conditions which made this legislation necessary. It was the failure of Postmasters General to face up to the problem of the rural mail courier. Since I came into the house in 1936 that problem has never been faced. I am wondering whether this bits-and-pieces legislation, which has been brought down from time to time, is not in a sense an attempt to cover up the mistakes of previous years. The mistakes to which I am referring are these. We have allowed to develop in the rural areas a condition which seems, strangely enough, to be overlooked by the government. It has been neglected all through these years, and we have allowed His Majesty's mail to be carried at a ridiculous price, particularly at a time when other people in the government service are well paid. That is the bedrock foundation of all the problems which make this legislation necessary.

Time after time we on this side of the house have asked the ministry, even if they did not want to change their policy, to go so far as to set up a committee to investigate the question how best to handle the rural mail-carrying situation in the country. But at no time, either in war or in peace, has this government seen fit to accept that proposal. What could possibly be in the minds of the government when they refuse to accept the suggestion? Are they afraid to have a committee set up? Are they afraid of the evidence which would be adduced by the rural mail couriers and by the people whom they are serving? Are they afraid of the evidence that would be brought out showing the disgraceful conditions under which the rural mail couriers have operated all during those years? I have never been quite able to see the government's point of view in dealing with rural mail couriers.

Last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) used such words as "intelligence" and "prudence", which he applied to himself and no doubt to the government, because I am sure that he would not want to monopolize these words himself.

Mr. Abbott: No, indeed.

Mr. Graydon: I am sure he would not. I am sure he had the Postmaster General in mind when he used those words.

Mr. Abbott: He certainly did.

Mr. Graydon: If he did not he should have had.

Mr. Abbott: Put him right at the top of the list.

Mr. Graydon: I do not think I would have done that. Nevertheless, he must be near the top because I am sure they are all in the same grab bag over there at the moment. In view of the fact that this government has chosen to interpret its actions as intelligent and prudent, the minister should not have taken such an adamant attitude to the setting up of a committee to deal with this question. Surely there can be no reason why the rural mail couriers problem should not have been investigated. If we take the government's word for it, in other lines of endeavour they are able to solve great problems in a masterly way.

Mr. Michaud: Hear, hear.

Mr. Graydon: Just a minute; I did not think you were following me very closely. The government say that they have been able to handle some problems in a masterly way, but they have not been able to solve the problem of the rural mail couriers in Canada, and I think that is a pretty good indication of how they do handle problems in general.

This arrangement for supplementary contracts is a necessary thing. It is a necessary thing not because we like the idea of the principle and method involved. It is necessary because of the failure of the government to face up to the whole problem and solve it on a proper basis. I want to leave one suggestion with the minister. I have always felt that there was an injustice in connection with these supplemental payments. I could never understand why the rural mail courier, or someone in his behalf, should have had to make a complaint or to make a suggestion to the government, in the first instance, that he should have more money for his contract. There never seemed to be any justification for that. I could never understand why the government should single out the rural mail courier again and say to him, unless you ask for the money we will not bother giving it to you. I ask the government if there is any other single employee of theirs who has to come to them and ask for the pay that he is to get. Why single out the rural mail courier for that kind of treatment? That is what he has had to do.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Because he had a contract.

Mr. Graydon: The minister can explain it in that way if he likes, after I am through. The point is that every one of the mail couriers should have been told that a supplemental grant is available for them under certain conditions, having regard to the contractual position in which they find themselves. The government never did that; the government never notified a single rural mail courier in Canada that he was entitled to a supplementary grant on his contract. I have no doubt that in Canada there are hundreds of mail couriers who have received less than they should have because they have not known that they could get a supplemental grant from the government. The minister dare not deny that.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Yes, I do.

Mr. Graydon: I am sure that that situation has existed. I am hopeful that the minister will see that those who are entitled to this extra grant will be told that they are entitled to it and that the department will calculate what they are getting for the mileage and the conditions of the route, so that they will receive that to which they are entitled.

I have nothing more to add except to appeal again to the minister. I do not like to be hard on the minister. He has a genial disposition. It must be the fault of somebody else on the government benches because I cannot imagine the minister and his department not trying to do the best they can for the rural mail couriers. I am going to ask the minister fairly and honestly this afternoon why we cannot set up a committee in this parliament to deal once and for all with this vexed problem of the rural mail courier. He is entitled to a square deal, and even though these supplementals do go a considerable distance to give him a better deal, he is entitled to the same kind of treatment as other servants of the government who are paid under the various contracts which they have entered into in the public service. It is not fair to single out the rural mail courier and treat him differently from other people in the service who are getting a much better deal.

I leave that suggestion with the minister in the hope that, in addition to the legislation which is now being brought down, he will consider the rural mail courier's position and bring in some legislation which will permanently solve the difficulty. When he does that he will be entitled to join that great throng to which the Minister of Finance referred last night as the intelligent and prudent part of the national community. Until the minister does that, I am afraid that we shall have to defer judgment on him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) speaks, may I refer to the interruption which I made a few moments ago when I stopped the Postmaster General replying to questions which are put to him? I think I was correct in suggesting that he should not answer questions at this time. However, I stated that he would have the right to reply. I was under the impression that we were on the second reading of the bill. Of course we are not on the second reading of the bill. The motion is that I do now leave the chair for the house to consider this resolution. There is no reply on that motion. I suggest that if there are questions to be asked the minister could answer them when we reach the committee stage.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately it was difficult if not quite impossible for us at this end of the chamber to hear what the minister said when he spoke briefly a moment ago. It is my understanding that the resolution now before us will enable his department to continue the payment of supplemental bonuses to those mail couriers who have been receiving them during the past few years, and where renewals are necessary a continuation of such bonuses will be provided.

However, one point troubles me. I believe the minister said that about 1,600 contracts would expire in the coming year. Many of those will be simple renewals, while in other cases it will be necessary to call for contracts. Is it the intention of his department to call for contracts, where such procedure is necessary, and then to pay the bonus on top of those contract rates?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): I would not be allowed to do that. The right expires on March 31. We had the right to pay a supplement only when the contract had been in force for at least one year.

Mr. Shaw: I just wished to be clear on the point. Were that not so we would be introducing a dangerous principle. I agree with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that concrete action should be taken soon to clear up once and for all the numerous conditions which do prevail and have prevailed for a long time with respect to rural mail couriers. It is one of the most unhappy activities in which one could engage. On the other hand, I do not know of any group of persons in the public service who have to contend with as many difficulties, unless one were to mention rural postmasters. However, I do not wish to go into that field at the present time.

We agree with the hon. member for Peel that a useful purpose could be served if a committee of the house were set up to enable hon. members to examine into the matter most carefully. I know last year there was considerable discussion of the suggestion made in some quarters that mail couriers should be appointed rather than placed in a position where they bid on contracts. However, before I would support that suggestion I would have to insist upon the clarification of certain conditions which at present surround the appointment of postmasters in many of our rural post offices. I am not at all happy about some of the conditions of which I am aware. Possibly before too long we will have an opportunity in the house to refer to some of those conditions.

Meantime may I repeat that, as in the past, we continue to support the payment of bonuses where they are necessary, and would also support the establishment of a committee so that we might consider this matter in greater detail.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. Bentley: As usual, when the minister was making his statement he did not take into his confidence those of us who are at this end of the chamber. It was difficult to hear what he said. There is a certain type of mail contractor in whom I am particularly interested, because I hear about his difficulties. I refer to those people in the urban centres who carry the mail from the post office to the railway trains, and back again.

From year to year these people have found their operating costs increasing at a tremendous rate. When they have bid on contracts expecting those costs to be a certain amount, they have found that before many months the costs have increased to a point much greater than had been expected. I am not clear whether these people are included in the bill, the resolution of which we are now considering. Would the minister assure the committee of that?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this legislation is to get authority, upon the renewal of a contract in which there has been payment of a supplement, to include such supplement. We do not intend to give more supplements. It is understood that they were given in the last two years because of the rapid increase in the cost of living. Contractors who believed that their contract rates were no longer commensurate with the cost of the work they were performing asked for this supplement. As a result of careful examination we gave the supplements wherever the officers of the department thought they might reasonably be given—and I might say that this applied to the vast majority of cases.

This law expires on March 31. Therefore in order to renew contracts now in existence we must renew with the added supplement; and in order to add the supplement we are asking for the passage of this legislation. The purpose of the legislation is to secure the privilege of including the supplement which was paid last year in the contract price for the coming year.

Mr. Bentley: It will exclude any new contracts?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Yes; contracts cannot be for more than four years. If we were to renew a contract today it would be on a basis without the supplement, because it was to apply only for 1947 and 1948. Therefore we are asking permission to add the supplement to the original contract rates when renewals are made. I should suppose that those who are going to tender today would tender at rates which would seem profitable under present circumstances.

Mr. Brooks: As there are many rural mail routes in my constituency, I am interested in this resolution.

One condition which has been causing much dissatisfaction in recent months in rural areas has been the curtailment of daily mail deliveries. I believe the department regulation requires four boxes to the mile. Many of the districts do not average this number, with the result that, instead of continuing the daily mail delivery which has been in operation for many years, the minister's department is cutting down the deliveries to three days a week.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Might I point out that that has nothing to do with this measure.

Mr. Brooks: I understand that. My question is this: When these supplementary payments have been made to rural mail couriers who we consider have not been paid enough, why would it not be possible to pay a supplementary sum in back areas so as to maintain in those districts daily mail deliveries where, in present circumstances, those deliveries are being reduced? I think it is most necessary that people in the country receive their mail each day. I should like to have the minister's reaction to that suggestion.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Any hon. member could get up and make an interesting speech about rural mail contracts, because each contract in the different sections of the country is different from the others. It is almost impossible to arrive at a unit price per mile. If we could do so, we would gladly adopt such a system. The matter has been studied for some time. These contracts have been in force ever since the Hon. Mr. Lemieux established rural mail deliveries back in 1908, I believe.

The officers of the department have done considerable thinking about this matter. I would have no objection to a committee studying this, but it has been studied before and I am sure that the members of such a committee would come to the conclusion that it is almost impossible to establish a unit price.

In certain places deliveries have been reduced from six a week to three a week, but this was done because of the small amount of mail that was being delivered. It is not efficient to spend money to deliver mail to points seven or eight miles from the railroad when there is only a little to deliver. The other day the hon. member for Mackenzie asked how many post offices had a yearly revenue of less than $25. It is hard to understand that a post office could have a revenue of less than $25 per year, but the fact is that there are thirty-four such post offices in one province. Surely when such a post office is located ten or fifteen miles from the railroad it is not wise to give deliveries six times a week, because there would be practically no mail to carry. The man would have to go to pick up the mail when there was practically no mail.

We are ready to give six deliveries a week wherever we can. For some time the Post Office Department has had considerable revenue owing to the increase in business and the tax that was put on during the war. It is impossible to take off that tax at this time and it might be noted that for the coming year our huge surplus will completely disappear.

Mr. Cardiff: I think the Postmaster General is one of the most genial ministers we have. I come from a county where the mail carriers have perhaps one of the hardest jobs to do in the country. We are in a snow belt and I can understand that it is impossible to set a mileage rate. On the other hand, I would not like to agree to these supplementary rates without knowing when they are going to stop. Suppose we give the minister another year or two, what will he do at the end of that time?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): I am not asking for an extension. Last year we asked for an extension of one year but this year we took the stand that we could not ask for an extension. All we are asking is that wherever a supplementary payment has been made we be permitted to merge it with the original contract price, should the contract be renewed. There are rural mail contractors whose contracts will expire this year. If a mail carrier has done his duty properly and asks for a renewal for another four years, without this legislation we would be unable to renew the contract at the contract price plus supplementary payment.

Mr. Cardiff: Why could you not let another contract? Why could you not call for tenders?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Perhaps we could do that, but the department has always felt that where a contractor has given good service, where he has purchased the necessary equipment such as an automobile and perhaps horses and sleigh for winter work, it is not fair at the end of his four years to call for tenders. Under the tender system we would have to accept the lowest tender and some other man might bid just a few dollars lower. It has been felt that it would be unjust to the man who has given good service if he were forced to tender every time his contract expired.

Mr. Cardiff: I am not opposing this, because I think these men deserve the supplementary payment; but I cannot figure where it is going to stop.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): We are stopping this year; we cannot go any further except by asking for tenders.

Mr. Drew: That is a frank admission of what the minister expects.

[Mr. Bertrand (Laurier).]

Mr. Bradshaw: Do I understand the minister to say that he will not pay any more supplementary payments?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Not after March 31.

Mr. Bradshaw: A new contract would not include supplementary payments?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): A contract would be renewed if a contractor asked for its renewal at the old price plus supplementary payment which had been made this year. If a contractor does not wish to renew we will have to call for tenders.

Mr. Case: I have tried to follow the minister and I understand that he now intimates that no one can apply for a supplementary payment.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): After March 31.

Mr. Case: Could anyone apply for a supplement between now and March 31?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): The law is here.

Mr. Case: That gives a little different picture. If these men know in advance they may be anxious to have supplements to their contracts.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): They have to be reasonable in their demands.

Mr. Case: I understand that if a contract is being renewed it will include the contract price plus the bonus.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): That is all we are asking for.

Mr. Case: There is no method by which you can make an adjustment later on if the costs of operation are lower?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): We are coming back to normal times. I have been told quite often by members of the opposition that we are approaching normal times.

Mr. Case: The rural mail carriers are not satisfied even yet. They feel that their equipment should be considered, that certain amounts should be set up for depreciation, and so on. Personally my sympathies are with the rural mail carriers, and therefore I am not likely to oppose anything that sounds reasonable. Like the policeman on the beat, they turn out in all kinds of weather, and they bring a great deal of comfort to rural people by delivering their mail to them. With that clarification, knowing that they have from now until March 31 to apply for an increase supplemental to their contract, I will not oppose the measure.

Mr. Reid: There is an angle to the giving of a bonus that is not generally recognized in the house. I rise to mention it, and then to make one suggestion. In so far as the rural mail carriers in my district are concerned, in the New Westminster constituency there are seven rural routes. There is nothing comparable in any other constituency because, of those seven routes, the smallest has not less than 480 boxes, and the largest route has 687 boxes. There is a reason why, in cases such as that in my constituency, it is advisable to grant a bonus, and I will explain it in a moment.

Bids are called on contracts to deliver mail over a mileage route, and at the time they bid on the contract there may be only 250 boxholders on the route. British Columbia is expanding rapidly in population, and especially the districts of Vancouver, New Westminster and the lower Fraser valley. These seven routes were put into operation two years ago, and they are now going to double the number and have fourteen routes. Where a man bids on 250 boxes, shall we say, and finds in two years' time that there are 600 in the same mileage, and that he has to stop almost every few feet to deliver mail, surely in that instance he is entitled to more money.

What I suggest to the minister is that the rules and regulations of his department should be examined and revised because some of the regulations in the postal department are inadequate. They go away back to the early days, and they have not been brought up to date. When we suggest to the officials that, instead of a man handling 687 persons on one route, the people on that route should be provided with door to door delivery, the officials say, "Oh, the regulations will not allow it because the main post office in the constituency is not one that has enough revenue to warrant door to door delivery going out from that post office." I suggest to the minister that he and his officials should take note of the conditions in certain parts of Canada where the rural mail system should be changed, and thus relieve the heavy work of the rural mail carriers. I suggest that in the congested areas door to door delivery should be established even though they have not the up-to-date and modern conditions of the cities. It is far too much to expect any man to pick up mail in the morning and serve 685 boxes in a day.

Mr. Shaw: The minister stated a moment ago that in some instances the frequency of service to rural areas had been reduced. He gave as the reason for that the fact that the volume of mail had fallen off in many cases. That is undoubtedly true, but here is the situation which confronts us, in my part of the country anyway. In some instances the frequency of the delivery service has been reduced from three days to two days a week, and there is an increase in the volume of mail delivered in every instance. That leads me to an intriguing question. What yardstick is used by the post office authorities in determining whether or not a tender is reasonable? I think that probably persons living in a district, knowing the conditions of the roads from season to season, are often in a better position to ascertain the problems and the costs involved than are persons who reside in the cities. As I say, I am very anxious to know just what yardstick is used in determining whether or not a tender is reasonable.

People become incensed when, after having had mail delivery to their boxes along the road three times a week for a period of many years, they find that the service has been reduced to once or twice a week, and are told that the reason for it is that all tenders were too high. I believe the minister owes us an explanation as to what standard is used when determining whether a bid is reasonable. I favour the principle of renewing contracts where the carriers are giving service. It takes quite a long time for these men to secure adequate equipment in order to give service in a highly efficient manner. It seems rather unfortunate, as the minister has stated, that in certain cases after a man has built up his equipment to a satisfactory state he has lost the contract simply because his tender happened to be $5 more than that of somebody else who probably was not familiar with the problems encountered. My first question, however, is the important one.

Mr. Ferguson: I have had a great deal to do with the Post Office Department. It is not very often that it is humanly possible for a person to contact a member of the present government, but I want to say that I have taken many problems to the Postmaster General personally, and he has looked into them and remedied mistakes that have been going on for years, particularly as to rural deliveries. In the town of Barrie there was an old practice that no mail could be delivered to a house that did not have a sidewalk in front of it. I brought that to the attention of the Postmaster General and he could hardly believe it was a fact, but when it was established as a fact he agreed that it was a ridiculous practice. Immediately 170-odd people in the town of Barrie received mail delivery who had not been receiving it before because they had been denied it by a postmaster who apparently was not using his head, or was too much inclined to follow an old practice which should have been obsolete years ago.

I have known of rural mail carriers who have contended that they were not receiving enough money, but when I investigated I found that these men simply believed that they would like to deliver mail, that it was an easy job, and they tendered so low that they took the business away from some other man who was doing a good job. I have also brought these situations to the attention of the Postmaster General and they have been remedied. In his department there are many old practices which through usage have become almost indispensable to the officials. I recommend to him that he inject a little of his fairness and farsightedness into the other members of his department. If he does that there will be very little to be desired from his particular department. I must say that.

Mr. Herridge: I want to add a few brief words. I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the Postmaster General because I was interested in the figures on awards supplemental to contracts, and the figures given with regard to the cost of contracts issued during the same period. If I heard him correctly, it appeared to me that the officials who were responsible for making the final decision on the awards supplemental to contracts in force must have used very sound judgment. If I heard him correctly, supplemental awards were some five to six per cent less in cost than contracts given during the same period.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Seven per cent.

Mr. Herridge: I think that indicates very sound judgment on the part of the officials concerned. I was interested in that aspect of it, because I remember when this legislation was up in the first instance hon. members to my right stressed very strongly that this was more or less a method of handing out political plums, and so on. The record as given by the minister indicates that this criticism has not proved to be correct.

At one time, Mr. Chairman, I thought this whole system of contracts was somewhat unsound, and had the idea that rural mail carriers should be under the civil service, or at least should be on a salary or wage basis. But the more I learn about the situation, the more I realize the difficulties with which the department has to deal, the more I appreciate the problems of climate, different road conditions, winter and summer conditions and all the rest of it, the more I believe that on the whole the rural mail system is handled very efficiently in this country.

Before resuming my seat I want to support the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Peel in regard to having this matter brought before a committee. It is not that such a committee would solve all the questions involved or that any great changes would be made, but if this question were referred to a committee I believe hon. members would be much better informed as to the difficulties that must be faced in connection with rural mail delivery throughout Canada, and out of the discussion might come some recommendations, perhaps on a regional basis, which would do something toward standardizing the cost of rural mail delivery in this country.

Just before concluding I want to refer to the fact that some previous speaker mentioned that mail was delivered every two days on some routes in the maritimes. As a matter of fact at the present time the Post Office Department is calling for bids on a rural mail delivery in my constituency that takes place once every two weeks, and when the minister's estimates are up I am going to have more to say on that matter.

Mr. Fulton: I want to bring a case to the attention of the committee and the minister because I cannot help feeling that it has not had adequate consideration. I have taken it up with the minister previously by correspondence, but it seems to me that it cannot have been brought to his attention by his officials, or he cannot have realized from the correspondence just what was happening. I shall be very brief, because I know it is not customary to bring forward individual cases at this stage; but this does involve some matters to which some other hon. members have referred.

This is the case of a route on which delivery was being increased from once a week to twice a week, as the result of extended negotiations with the department. The contractor who had the service on a once a week basis was a veteran who at considerable expense, and as a matter of fact only by means of loans, had built up his equipment to be able to carry out the once a week delivery. When it was increased to twice weekly, bids were called and his was not the lowest tender. There are certain features of the award of the new contract which I shall mention in a factual manner. When I asked who was the successful tenderer, I was given the name on February 9, in confidence. On February 10 the name of the successful tenderer was published in the local newspaper out at Williams Lake, British Columbia. It appears to me that someone somewhere in the department gave the information in such a way that it could be repeated in the press—and I have seen the article—while at the same time it was given to me only in confidence, as a member interested, because the contract had not then been executed.

Those facts, unfortunately, have aroused a great deal more feeling with respect to the awarding of this contract than otherwise would have been the case. The successful tenderer is not a veteran. The Williams Lake legion feels that the interests of veterans have been prejudiced. It is all very well to say that the contract must be awarded to the lowest tenderer, but in this respect I would point out two features to the Postmaster General. The first is that the previous holder of the contract was a veteran who had placed himself in a position to fulfil the contract by purchasing equipment by means of loans. He knew the conditions, knew what it would cost to perform a twice weekly service. The second point is that those in the area, members of the legion and other responsible citizens, tell me that the bid of the successful tenderer was for an amount considerably less than that for which he can actually perform the service. So not only does the veteran who formerly held the contract now find himself out of that work and with an unpaid loan on his hands, but it is very doubtful whether the present tenderer can perform the contract at the rate specified.

That raises the question whether he is to be allowed to apply for a bonus. I have no hesitation in saying that it would be quite improper to award a bonus in that case, when the contract has been given the present tenderer at a rate lower than the previous contract. I suggest that the Postmaster General should look into this case, because there are surrounding it features which to say the least are questionable. There is the leakage of information—

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): What is the name of the contract?

Mr. Fulton: It is the Williams Lake-Horsefly mail route. I conclude by saying that the case should be reviewed and the opinion of those on the spot should be sought as to whether in fact the present contractor, the lowest tenderer, can carry out the contract at the amount of his bid. I believe the whole matter should be reviewed and possibly a chance given to re-submit tenders; and that the award should be made having in mind all the facts of the case and the cost of carrying out that contract. I hope the Postmaster General will look into this before anything is done.

Mr. Wright: I want to bring just one other point to the attention of the minister. I believe the discussion has shown the great diversity of conditions throughout Canada as far as rural mail routes are concerned. In our area our position is the opposite to that of the hon. member for New Westminster. Ours are long routes with few people on them, and we find that from most post offices only one rural route is being operated, and that on the basis of two deliveries a week. The man who has the contract must keep a car for summer deliveries and a team of horses for the winter. He can only use his car and his team twice a week, which means that his costs are very high. If on the other hand there were two or three routes operating from each of these post offices he could bid on two or three contracts; he would be able to perform them at a lower cost, and still make a reasonable living. I wish the minister would take that point into consideration, because in the area from which I come some of the routes are being closed simply because the men who have the contracts are not getting enough to cover their expenses. If such a contractor had two routes, which would give him four days' work a week, the routes could be maintained, and in my opinion that is the only way we are going to be able to continue these routes in some parts of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Miller: A few moments ago the Postmaster General said that bonus applications would be received up to March 31 of this year. My recollection of these things from year to year is that there has been a deadline every year these matters have been before the house. What I want to know, Mr. Chairman, is this. How long, during the calendar year of 1948 and the calendar year of 1949, has it been open to contractors to apply for this bonus or payment supplementary to his contract?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): It was permissible for the contractor to apply each year in which it was permissible to give the supplement. Last year permission to grant the supplement was renewed on June 30. In the previous year, by paragraph 3 of subsection 4, no supplementary payment could be authorized under the act later than sixty days after the commencement of the next session of parliament following the coming into force of that act. That was in 1947. In 1948 the power to grant supplementary payments was renewed until the 31st of March of this year. While the law was in force any contractor had the right to submit his request for supplementary payment.

Mr. Miller: Might I call the attention of the Postmaster General to the contractors in my own constituency of Portage la Prairie. Last year I sat here and heard speaker after speaker commend to the Postmaster General the couriers in his constituency, as being entitled to increases by reason of the snow. In no part of the country are there couriers who have more difficulties in winter than the couriers in the prairie provinces. I have no recollection, Mr. Chairman, of any occasion on which any of them have applied from my area, with one exception, when bonuses or supplementary payments have been granted by the department.

I should like to know whether all these applications are considered in Ottawa or whether they are referred to the officers in the city of Winnipeg, for instance. If they are referred to Winnipeg, do you know whether the officials in Winnipeg make any inquiry outside the city of Winnipeg to ascertain whether a man is entitled to a bonus?

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): I wish to say a word or two in answer. There is no doubt that the argument advanced by the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller) is one which proves that we cannot apply the same rule in every part of the country. I understand that around Portage la Prairie the snow is very deep and the weather very cold. Distances are great. Rural mail carriers are working in every part of Canada, and the officer in charge of this branch of the service has many assistants. This officer usually compares what is being paid in that district in which the rural mail couriers are requesting a supplement. A contractor always makes a point of having to climb a hill when his fellow contractors have no hills to climb. The department receives reports from the officers in this district, and in the case of Portage la Prairie that would be Winnipeg.

I do not know the names of all the inspectors because there are so many. Great care is taken to see that there is justification for refusal if the request is refused. The granting of supplements for fifty-four per cent of the contracts is, I believe, a good indication of that.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 123, to amend the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, and then consider second reading of the bill to amend the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. Then we will consider the bill to amend the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
