MIRAMICHI ADVANCE, CHATHAM, NEW BRUNSWICK, DECEMBER 30, 1880.

What Happened Amid The Christmas Greetings A Year Ago.

By MARY E. MOFFAT.

It is again the joyous Christmas time. Bright eyes glow even more lustre on the thought, and red lips smile themselves into more joyous wreaths.

There is a certain excitement in the air. The Santa Claus brings treasures to all—the poor as well as rich. It is then that the members of Christ's flock on earth try to show their love for him who was once the Holy Babe of Bethlehem by calling little children in, and causing their hearts to overflow with joy as they fill their hands with gifts, and their "inner man" with goodness.

Of all the many Churches interested in this good work, none enter into the details with more heartiness than the Memorial Chapel of the Holy Innocents—so called from the reason of its erection being in memory of three sweet children who were taken from earth to heaven within one short week, leaving their parents so lonely and desolate that the torn tendrils of their bereaved hearts could not be satisfied until they had reached out and entwined themselves about the cross, and had thus found healing and peace.

It is with one of the young members of the Memorial Chapel that our story has to do. Cecile Grey is her name, and she sits in the mellowed light which comes stealing in through the stained glass of an arched window in the chapel, I will describe her. She is pretty with the sweet comeliness of early youth, and one's eyes unconsiously turn again and again to the round, fresh-colored face, and each time with a sensation of pleasure, although the lips are almost too full for a purely classical chiseling, and the nose is more inclined to a "tip-tilted" than to a Grecian outline. Then, too, when she smiles one does not mind any absence of regular beauty in the frank, pleasant features that are marked by a burst of extra petals to a rare and precious rose.

To-day she is robed in a soft dark velvet, deeper in color than the shade of a blue-bell yet still of an intense cerulean hue. A delicate fil of real lace at the throat and sleeves, and an apron which looks in its dainty finish as though fairy-fingers might have put together its transparent materials, and embroidered its finishing frills, complete the tout ensemble. She is busy at work-making for Christmas decorations, and a slight, pale child, who is one of her class in Sunday-school, stands by her, breaking sprays of green from some branches of cedars so as to help on with the good work to the utmost of her slender capacity.

Other groups are engaged in various ways tending toward the same ultimate; but upon none do those mellowed sun rays fall with such a tender light as upon Cecile and Lillian. A young gentleman, who is the tenor of the amateur quartette choir, and is also interested in the Sunday-school, has hastened up-town from the bank, which he is cashier, to try his need of assistance. As he enters, his eyes rest for a moment on Cecile and her tiny helper, and then he makes his way directly toward them. Cecile looks up, and a sudden brightness flashes into the eyes, which she turns again upon her work as soon as she turns. She fears to betray her joy at his presence, for he is a favorite friend—but I must not whisper a secret which Cecile will not even acknowledge to herself.

He will have to cry out for mercy, I assure you. To return for my devotion to you, or rather to some woman, please tell me who your pet is. I don't remember her face at all.

"Lily is almost a stranger to me. She has only been in my Sunday-school class three weeks, and it has been such a busy time with me, that I have not called at her home as I should have done had it been any other season of the year. I imagine they are not very well-to-do people, for though Lillian is always scrupulously neat, her clothes are of far too thin material for winter. I intend to remedy that, if I can do so without wounding their pride—for I imagine, from the child's manners, they have been better days. She is a perfect little lady."

"I don't know what you mean," said Cecile, leaning forward and her eyes fixed upon the speaker, who was not aware of the fact that she had been interrupted. "Please, Mr. Hilton, I need some one who can drive a tack straight. Will you come and help me?" said a laughing brunette.

"No, no, Mr. Hilton must draw me some more stars. Those you did last night were perfectly splendid!" "It was not long before a double wedding took place. At the grand party given by Cecile's mother, in honor of the event, it must be acknowledged that Ralph and his bride monopolized the lion's share of interest. For their romantic story had become bruted about on Rumor's thousand tongues, and had spread like wildfire, so that the bride and groom were not only the center of attention, but the place with them.

Poor Minnie, who had to act toward Lillian with a certain reserve, as her father had been widowed as well as alarmed, and she whispered, "For Ralph's joy is mine also, as was his sorrow at losing you."

All but Arthur Hilton stole softly away, feeling that they were but intruders upon the reunion, and, although full of curiosity to know the why and wherefore of anything so strange, knowing that in all probability time would enlighten them.
