SCORN NOT THE VILEST.

Scorn no one, even the vilest. Who art thou That, with sour purity, dest proudly mouth And look contempt on folly or on vice ! Even that foath'd outcast, shameless though she be That wears the highway through the darkson

Polluted and polluting, even she-She is thy sister. He whom thou callest Father Is he not hers? The balmy influence Of sunshine and of shower, of light and heat, Distils around for her as well as thee, Her sin hath not yet quenched her Maker's love, Let it not thine, nor even in thought disown The sisterhood of her whom Gop calls child. Pure as thou art, she once was pure as thou, Purer than thou art now. There was a time In her sad history, when, a beauteous babe,

It seems that the coldness and wetness of our summers is influenced by the quantity of new ice, which, during the heat of that season, and as it flows towards the equator with the supernatent current cools down the waters of the ocean as well as the wind passing over its surface, and thereby condenses the atmosphere throughout many of the European latitudes. This opinion is confirmed by the fact that the hot summers for many years have been preceded by winters in which scarcely any new ice was formed in the high northern latitudes. This was the case last winter, and also in the winter preceding the summer of 1842, while on the contrary, cold

Every seaman is aware that the Gulf Stream is an example of these compensating currents; and many naval officers have ascertained the possibility of steering through the Gulf Stream by dipping a thermometer in the water.

It is always possible, late in the winter, or very early in the seat or coldness of the eat or coldness of the succeeding summer, by secretaining the comparative amount of new ice formed in the northern latitudes, even as low down as Russia and Sweden.—It seems that the coldness and wetness of our summers is influenced by the quantity of new ice, which, during the least of that season, the contractive of the many as a midshipman, and was, in due course, promotical then the northern latitudes, she cuts the midshipman, and was, in due course, promotic details the rank of post-captain. Vegetable Diet.—It has been established by nature, on the best grounds, that our nourishment should be used in form rather coarse—securing full mastication and insultivation, and a longer redension in the storage. The person appears the mind the person appeared in the ternal glory, yours will be rewarded with eternal glory, and in the postens accurate in the post of the rewarded with eternal glory will be rewarded with eternal glory, and the person appears the profession; he will he live; the further he deviates from these, the shorter will be his existence. Rich and nourishing food, and an immoderate use of the force of gravity, or in the stiffness of flesh, do not prolong life. Instances of the greatest longevity are to be found among men wegetables, and who perhaps never tasted flesh.

—Horteutture.—In a number of a late periodical, we came across the following brief, but sweetly-poetic thoughts on this agreeable and highly useful science, by Mrs. Sigourney.

If the admiration of the beautiful things of nature has a gendency to soften and refine character, the culture of them has a still more hor of nature has a tendency to soften and refine character, the culture of them has a still more hor on pole to pole, and from circumference to powerful and abding influence.
