FIFTH SESSION—NINETEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the twenty-sixth day of January, 1944, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker, the Honourable James Allison Glen, in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house having returned to the Commons chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The war is now in its fifth year. The coming months will witness decisive battles. They will demand a supreme effort on the part of all nations united in the cause of freedom.

It is true that the military situation is better than it was a year ago, and that cooperation among the united nations is closer than at any time in the past. At Washington, at Quebec, at Moscow, at Cairo and at Teheran, military plans for the coming campaigns were fully coordinated. Foundations were also laid for a united approach to the problems of transition from war to peace. The improved military situation does not, however, necessarily mean an early end of the war. Hostilities may continue for a long time in Europe, as well as in the far east. The German army is still very strong. There are no indications of any general deterioration of German resistance. Germany herself is protected by a vast outwork of conquered territory. She has been fortifying herself against invasion since the beginning of the war. Until the German army has been defeated, the allied nations cannot count upon an assured victory in Europe. Until the allied naval forces have grappled successfully with the main Japanese fleet there can be no assurance of an end to the war against Japan. Future operations will involve bitter fighting and heavy losses.

The winning of the war clearly remains the first of all objectives. My ministers believe it is their duty to see that Canada's war effort is firmly maintained until the enemy is defeated in Europe and in Asia. They believe the government's primary task, and the primary duty of the Canadian people, is to concentrate on the prosecution of the war. Our fighting men must be assured that there will be no diversion from this vital task and no relaxation of Canada's war effort. Till the war is won, the policies of my government will continue to be shaped to that end.

Our armed forces at sea, on land and in the air have added lustre to the name of Canada. The armed might of the united nations has been strengthened by Canadian mutual aid. In the combined allied assault upon the nazi fortress, all branches of the armed forces will have still heavier responsibilities.

While giving to the needs of the war precedence over all else, my ministers are resolved that, so far as the future can be foreseen, Canada will be in a position to meet the difficult situations which will have to be faced when victory is won.

As occupied countries are liberated from the enemy, it will be necessary to provide for the relief of destitute populations, and for the rehabilitation of devastated areas in those countries which have borne the brunt of the terror and destruction of war. A measure to extend the principle of mutual aid so as to provide for relief, as well as for materials of war, will be submitted for your approval.

Canada's prosperity and the well-being of her people are bound up with the restoration and expansion of world trade. Export markets are essential to the efficient employment of vast numbers of Canadians. Larger imports are needed to raise the standard of living. In accordance with the principles of the Atlantic charter, the arrangements required to clear the channels of trade and promote the flow of goods among all nations after the war are being explored with other countries. Discussions will be advanced as rapidly as the exigencies of war will permit.

The revival of world trade and prosperity after the war will depend upon the speedy recovery of the occupied countries. During the period of transition, the provision of international relief will help to maintain full employment of Canadian man-power and resources.

My ministers believe that the time has come when all the nations now united in the common purpose of winning the war should seek unitedly to ensure an enduring peace. The dangers of future aggression can be removed, and world security attained, only by a general international organization of peace-loving nations. You will accordingly be invited to approve of Canadian participation in the establishment of an international organization to further national security through international cooperation.

While the post-war objective of our external policy is world security and general prosperity, the post-war objective of our domestic policy is social security and human welfare.

In the opinion of my ministers plans for the establishment of a national minimum of social security and human welfare should be advanced as rapidly as possible. Such a national minimum contemplates useful employment for all who are willing to work; standards of nutrition and housing adequate to ensure the health of the whole population; and social insurance against privation resulting from unemployment, from accident, from the death of the bread-winner, from ill-health and from old age.

Post-war planning falls naturally into three broad fields: preparation for the demobilization, rehabilitation and reestablishment in civil life of the men and women in the armed forces; the reconversion of the economic life of the nation from a war-time to a peace-time basis, and its reconstruction in a manner which will provide opportunities for useful employment for all who are willing and able to work; and the provision of insurance against major economic and social hazards.

A broad programme has already been developed for the reestablishment of veterans of the present war, and for the care of disabled veterans and the dependents of our fighting men and merchant seamen. You will be asked to approve a measure to provide war service gratuities for all who have served in the armed forces, and also measures to supplement the existing rehabilitation programme.

The maintenance of full employment will require, in the period of transition from war to peace, a rapid and efficient conversion of war industries, the enlargement of markets at home and abroad, intensified research into new uses of our natural resources, programmes of national and regional development, including housing and community planning.

Suitable peace-time uses for war plants are being sought, and plans are being made for their speedy conversion. To assist in the conversion of war plants and in the development of small and medium-scale industrial enterprises, the provision of additional credit facilities, for both fixed and working capital, will be required. To meet this need, your approval will be sought for the establishment of an industrial development bank as a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. Expenditures on developmental work, in preparation for the transition of industry from war to peace, will be encouraged by suitable tax modifications.

To assist in developing post-war export markets for primary and secondary industries, a measure will be submitted to provide for the insurance or guarantee of export credits, and steps are being taken to expand the trade commissioner service abroad.

Provision will be made to expand research activities.

A measure to amend and supplement existing housing legislation will be introduced.

A considerable measure of social security is already provided under federal and provincial legislation, but the working out of a comprehensive national scheme, in which federal and provincial activities will be integrated and which will include nation-wide health insurance, will require further consultation and close cooperation with the provinces. My ministers will welcome opportunities for such consultation.

When suitable agreements are reached with the provinces, my ministers will be prepared to recommend measures to provide for federal assistance in a nation-wide system of health insurance, and for a national scheme of contributory old age pensions on a more generous basis than that at present in operation.

The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

My ministers believe that the time is rapidly approaching when a minister of the crown should be responsible for each of the three broad fields of post-war planning. You will accordingly be asked to approve the establishment of the following departments of government:

(1) A Department of Veterans' Affairs to have charge of the rehabilitation and reestablishment of members of the armed forces, and the administration of veterans' pensions and allowances;

(2) A Department of Reconstruction to promote and coordinate planning for national development and post-war employment; and

(3) A Department of Social Welfare to organize and to assist in administering activities of the federal government in the fields of health and social insurance.

Underlying efforts for the winning of the war and the solution of post-war problems is the necessity of preventing the inflationary effects of war. My ministers believe that to prevent inflation and to safeguard a basic standard of living it remains necessary to maintain the price ceiling and stabilization of wages and salaries.

To ensure economic stability for agriculture, you will be asked to make provision for a price floor for staple farm products.

Among other matters to which your attention will be directed will be the revision of the Bank Act, and the provision of adequate facilities for the exercise of the franchise by men and women serving in the armed forces.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make financial provision for the effective prosecution of the war and for other necessary services.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I express, I know, the thoughts of all Canada when I say with what pride and admiration we have followed the exploits of our armed forces. At sea, on land and in the air, the fighting men of Canada, wherever they have served, have displayed the highest courage, endurance and skill. I give them your assurance that their lives are more precious to their country than all else, and that it is our supreme aim to ensure their early and victorious return to their homeland.

As I invite your consideration of the very difficult problems which will engage your attention in this momentous year, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That, until the house otherwise orders, the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, government notices of motions and government orders, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Michaud, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), MacInnis, Taylor.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources, the Honourable J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. E. Michaud, Minister of Transport and the Honourable J. A. MacKinnon, Minister of Trade and Commerce, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled: An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Report of civil service commission respecting the appointment of Mr. John Laundy as deputy sergeant-at-arms.—Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.22 p.m.

Friday, January 28, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

PRISONERS OF WAR

TREATMENT BY JAPANESE—POSITION OF CANADIANS IN JAPAN AND JAPANESE NATIONALS IN CANADA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the house will have read in the morning papers the reports officially issued by the office of war information at Washington of the suffering of those brave members of the United States forces who fell into Japanese hands at the end of a heroic resistance at Bataan and Corregidor. The evidence of Japanese brutality and organized sadism is so horrible and overwhelming as to be almost incredible.

Reports of Japanese maltreatment of prisoners of war in Malaya, Siam and Burma are not so complete, but are sufficient to indicate that there were, in those areas, similar brutalities and cruelties. In the British House of Commons this morning the Foreign Secretary told of the sufferings in those areas of British, Australian, Indian and Chinese prisoners of war. He also told the shocking story of the Lisbon Maru, a Japanese transport carrying United Kingdom prisoners of war from Hong Kong, which was torpedoed by an allied submarine. The Japanese held the prisoners, some of them wounded, under battened hatches, until the ship sank some thirty-six hours later. When some of the prisoners made their escape from the ship, they were fired upon in the water by the Japanese escort vessels.

In their distress at these shocking revelations I extend to the people of the United States, Britain, Australia, the Netherlands, India and China the sympathy of this house, and the sympathy of the people of Canada. We share to the full their feelings of pain and indignation.

In existing circumstances, hon. members will be particularly concerned to know of conditions affecting Canadian prisoners of war in the far east.

The government has naturally been gravely concerned over reports of conditions among prisoners of war in Japanese hands. Every effort has been made to secure information, and every possible method of improving conditions has been explored. In collaboration with the other commonwealth governments, official protests have repeatedly been made through the protecting power. The Japanese have ignored these protests, or made hypocritical or cynical replies.

According to latest reports, about one thousand Canadian prisoners of war have been transferred from Hong Kong to Japan; between five and six hundred remain in Hong Kong. It would seem that the prisoners at Hong Kong are not suffering nearly so much from ill-treatment and abuse as from neglect. They are suffering from the failure of the Japanese government to provide adequate clothing, food and medical care.

As yet, no reports have been received about the camps in Japan to which the Canadians from Hong Kong have been transferred. It is believed that these men are better off than they were in Hong Kong.

The government had hoped that the Japanese would be influenced by the protests made through the protecting power and the appeals made by the International Red Cross. Pending the results of these representations, it was thought that a public indictment of Japanese behaviour would not help our men in their hands.

The government and the Canadian Red Cross have been doing their utmost to make good the failure of the Japanese, by sending to our men the needed supplies, but the Japanese have largely frustrated our efforts. Some supplies went forward to the far east on the SS. Gripsholm in the first exchange of diplomatic officers and civilians in 1942. After loss and pilferage and months of delay, part at least of these supplies reached Hong Kong. But the supplies sent on the Gripsholm in 1943—at the time of the second exchange—were carried to Japan. Although weeks have passed, no word has been received that they have yet reached their destination.

A joint effort by the governments and Red Cross societies of Canada and the United States to send a shipload of supplies also failed because of the refusal of the Japanese to grant a safe conduct to the vessel which had already been loaded with supplies.

Negotiations with the Japanese government through the protecting power and the International Red Cross resulted in arrangements for the shipment of supplies to Vladivostok, thence to be transhipped to Japanese territory. The first shipment sent by the Red Cross societies of Canada and the United States reached Vladivostok months ago. Despite the previous negotiations, and despite the need of the prisoners of war for whom these supplies were destined, they remain in Vladivostok.

The Japanese also have done little to assist and much to obstruct the forwarding of mail to and from prisoners of war. The few letters which have been delivered have taken long months to reach the prisoners. Recently the Japanese placed a limit of twenty-five words on letters to and from prisoners of war.

The Japanese have been equally neglectful of their obligation to transmit reports through the protecting power and the International Red Cross. Reports of deaths of prisoners of war have been transmitted only after long delay. Reports of transfers of Canadian prisoners of war from Hong Kong to Japan are still incomplete.

All of this is in marked contrast with the treatment which Japanese nationals have received in Canada.

It is the duty of a belligerent to permit representatives of the protecting power and the International Red Cross regularly to visit prisoner of war camps. The Japanese have permitted some such visits to certain camps in Japan, but so far only one visit by a representative of the protecting power has been permitted at Hong Kong. After long delay, the International Red Cross was permitted to name a representative there, but so far we have not seen evidence that he is being allowed to carry out fully the usual functions of a delegate of the International Red Cross.

Although not a signatory to the convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war signed at Geneva July 27, 1929, nor to the earlier conventions, the Japanese government at the commencement of hostilities, gave an undertaking to abide by their provisions. Japan has failed to live up to this undertaking.

Whether the Japanese government in Tokyo is unable, or unwilling to induce the military authorities outside Japan to act like human beings, the responsibility for inhuman treatment of prisoners rests none the less at Tokyo. This guilt will not be forgotten.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Prime Minister complete the record which he has read by naming the protecting power and indicating what steps that protecting power is taking with respect to the matters he has mentioned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The protecting power is Switzerland. It would be a little difficult for me to indicate offhand the steps they are taking. There is a regular procedure adopted in these matters. The Swiss, being neutral, seek through negotiations with the government of Japan to have their authorized agents or representatives given free access to camps in which Canadian prisoners of war are detained. The degree of success their representatives may have depends upon how far the government concerned is willing to comply with the terms of conventions on the treatment of prisoners of war and do what is right in the matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose the diplomatic agents and the International Red Cross work in cooperation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, very closely.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ROOMS AND SEATING ACCOMMODATION FOR NEW MEMBERS

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I did not want to interrupt the proceedings when the Prime Minister was about to make a statement, but I rise on a point of privilege to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to that of the house, the situation which exists with regard to new members. In our party we have two new members, and neither of them has been allotted a room or a seat. That has been the experience we have had in previous sessions. There are in this house now, surely, a number of vacant rooms which were previously occupied by supporters of the government, and seats in the chamber which were occupied by supporters of the government. It seems to me the time has come when a reallotment of seats and rooms should be made, in order that new members may be properly and adequately accommodated, as I think is their just due. I bring this to your attention, sir, because I have taken the matter up with responsible officials and others ever since last October in the hope that this would be done before new members arrived for the present session.

Mr. SPEAKER: The difficulty to which the hon. member refers is not wholly attributable to anyone's fault, but rather arises out of the fact that we have a number of groups in the house and it is difficult so to redistribute rooms as to meet the convenience of all hon. members. The matter is a subject for discussion and consideration by the whips of the house. I can assure the hon. gentleman that if the whips consult with me I shall endeavour to cooperate with them, but I must also ask that there be cooperation from all sides of the house in the allotment of rooms.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest that if there are to be applications for new rooms, we of this party might put in an application for a hundred and fifty or so after the next election.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

REPORTS OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE AND SUBCOMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to table the report of the advisory committee on reconstruction, and reports of five subcommittees: first, agricultural policy; second, conservation and development of natural resources; third, publicly financed construction projects; fourth, post-war employment opportunities; and fifth, post-war problems of women.

CENSORSHIP

PRESS AND RADIO—REQUEST FOR MAKING DIRECTIVES PUBLIC

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members will recall that at the last session a request was made for making public the directives regarding censorship of the press and the radio. I stated at the time that the government would have no objection to making public such of these directives as might not be prejudicial to the public interest. I now table these particular documents.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the government found it in the public interest to make public many of them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is, I believe, in the public interest to have these directives made public.

CRIMINAL CODE

EXECUTION OF DEATH SENTENCES—DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I beg to lay on the table the order of His Excellency the Governor General in Council under section 1075 of the criminal code, dealing with the execution of death sentences, and also the report in pursuance of the provisions of paragraph 3 of the defence of Canada regulations. No person has been detained under these regulations during the period from July 1, 1943, to January 25, 1944, and there has been no case in which the Secretary of State has refused to accept the report of the advisory committee.

ELDORADO MINING

ACQUISITION OF PROPERTIES AND ASSETS BY EXPROPRIATION OF CAPITAL SHARES

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I wish to table order in council P.C. 535 of January 27, 1944, and before doing so I will make the following statement.

As a necessary means for the more effective prosecution of the war, the government of Canada has acquired all properties and assets of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, by expropriating all the capital shares of the company. Expropriation of the shares became effective as of three o'clock this afternoon.

Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited will in future be operated as a crown company, and will continue to carry on its present operations. The president, the directors and officers of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited have been invited to continue to act in their present capacities, and have agreed to do so. There will be no change in existing arrangements affecting the employees of the company.

The directors of the company have agreed with the government that a fair value for the properties and assets of the company is represented by a price of $1.35 per share, and the directors and a number of other large shareholders have delivered their shares to the government at that price. The same share value is being offered to all shareholders of the company, and will be paid on delivery of the shares, properly endorsed, to the registrar and transfer agent, the Trusts and Guarantee Company Limited, Toronto.

I regret that for reasons of secrecy I am unable to give the house any further information on this subject. In the interests of military secrecy I hope that no questions about this matter will be asked until the necessity for withholding information no longer applies. I now table order in council P.C. 535 which effects the expropriation of all the capital shares of the company.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PLANS FOR PROJECTED MEETING IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to make an inquiry of the Prime Minister, of which I have given him notice. Have plans for the projected meeting of the dominion prime ministers now been completed, and if so, can he indicate to the house the approximate date of the meeting?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In addition to the dominion prime ministers I hope the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom will attend.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was taking my phraseology, as a matter of fact, from the statement which as I recollect it, appeared in the Regina Leader-Post, and which was given by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid my hon. friend is seeking to excuse himself.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was trying to excuse the right hon. gentleman at the same time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend I have no more information which I am in a position to make public as to the time than what has appeared thus far in the press. The announcement made in the British House of Commons was, as I recall it, to the effect that the conference would be held some time before very long, but that there were reasons why it was not advisable to name the precise date. As a matter of fact the actual date has not yet been definitely decided.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister intends to attend?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope so; yes. I have every intention of attending, unless prevented.

RADIO BROADCASTING

VACANCIES ON BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a question of the Minister of National War Services? I understand that for almost three months there have been two vacancies on the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I should like to inquire of the minister why these vacancies have not been filled before this time, and also when we may expect an announcement with respect to the new appointees.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): May I first express my appreciation to the leader of the opposition for his having sent me notice of his question.

The question of filling the vacancies referred to has been before us for some time. It has been under very careful review. I had hoped to be in a position to make an announcement at the beginning of this session of parliament. May I say I hope to be able to do so within a very short time.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the minister will not forget the farmers, who have a claim in that respect—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely I may be allowed to interject—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is a speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not trying to make a speech, but I should like to complete what I had to say, just in a sentence; that is, with a reference to the farmers and also the newspapermen, who were mentioned the other day by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR OPPORTUNITY TO DISCUSS ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 9384

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the widespread and active protests by organized labour against the new war-time wages control order, P.C. 9384, will the Prime Minister consider setting aside a time for discussion of this order by this house, at an early day?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It seemed to me that the first part of my hon. friend's question was an assertion of something which he alleged to be the case, but I am not sure that he is right in his allegation. As to the second part, the business of the session will have to be carried on in accordance with the regular procedure. All I can say at the moment is that each question will be brought forward for consideration at a time which seems the most appropriate to bring it forward.

CHILDREN'S UNDERWEAR

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO INCREASE AVAILABLE SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I wrote the Minister of Finance in regard to this matter prior to the press release of November 11, 1943. What is being done at the present time in regard to speeding up the production of children's underwear? I ask this question because the hospitals are unable to get sizes one and two in children's underclothing and as a result have to cut down on the larger sizes available.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): If the hon. gentleman wrote me about the matter, as he says, and as I have no doubt he did, I am sure I must have given him a full reply, and I shall write him again and bring the story down to date. Most careful efforts have been made, and very effectively, to increase the production of children's underwear. My recollection is that this production is considerably greater this year than it was in previous years, but I will confirm that fact.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We must also remember that there have been more births during the past year, which has helped to aggravate the shortage.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. L. D. TREMBLAY AND SECONDED BY MR. W. A. TUCKER

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Major-General the Right Honourable the Earl of Athlone, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, a member of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Grand Master of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, one of His Majesty's Personal Aides-de-Camp, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

He said: (Translation): Mr. Speaker, if I have accepted with much pleasure the signal honour of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne—a motion which the brilliant and genial member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) has been called upon to second—it is because I knew that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with his characteristic tact, wished, in honouring the constituency of Dorchester, to include in that tribute the worthy farming community of Canada whose members are so nobly doing their duty in this war. Our farmers—and I am rightly proud to single out those from Dorchester—have been quick to see where their duty lay, and in spite of the man-power shortage, in a conspicuous spirit of Canadian fellowship, they have achieved a general effort, by which our armies, our people and our allies have greatly benefited.

The right hon. the Prime Minister also wished to pay a sincere tribute to the Canadian army. Our young men and women, the sons and daughters of my former comrades who, true to noble traditions, are serving in this country or have gone to other lands in order to raise the bulwark of their gallantry against the onslaughts of barbarians who wanted to enslave the sons of freedom, are now adding a glorious page to our matchless history. To them Canada offers the tribute of her deepest admiration and her unfailing gratitude.

For more than three years, that is since I returned to the active army—for the second time in a quarter of a century—I have not been able to follow as steadily as I should have liked the debates of this house, nor the legislation which it has passed, but it is none the less true that I have constantly kept in touch with the worthy people whom I have the honour to represent here, and that my presence in the army has moreover enabled me to appreciate the spirit of the gallant youths who wear the uniform and so patriotically do their duty in the Canadian army.

In the present tragic times, an insight into the Canadian nation's sentiments makes us very proud of being Canadians. Indeed, among all the nations of the world, is there a single one which could, without feeling very proud of the fact, accomplish all that our young and valiant country, because of its perfect unity of purpose, has been able to contribute in the struggle of Christian civilization against nazi paganism? The incessant appeals to national unity made by our government leader have made it possible for our dear country to play a glorious part in the present world conflict and have assured universal admiration for us and the gratefulness of civilized nations to Canada, and I am firmly convinced that they will also have the effect of placing our country forever in the rank it deserves as a proud, young, valiant, gallant and freedom-loving country, among the free nations of the world.

The speech from the throne contains nothing that would be of a nature to repress such feelings on our part. Indeed, the legislative measures forecast inspire us with a brand of optimism that brings us real comfort in these times fraught with severe disturbances when apprehension reigns over too many sections of the country.

The realization of the fact that post-war problems engage and hold the attention of the government is really comforting.

Putting their sorry past experiences to account, and without forgetting that the primary objective must remain the indefatigable prosecution of the war to a victorious conclusion, the governments of the united nations have combined their efforts with a view to finding an immediate solution to the grave problems that offered such a tremendous challenge in the years that followed the first great war. The speech from the throne reveals, on the part of the Canadian government, a clear intention of facing these problems as well as a strong determination of finding an adequate solution.

It is not my intention to delve into all the points raised in the speech from the throne, but I propose to give special attention to some of the extremely important measures suggested in order to avoid such difficulties as have jeopardized social peace in the years subsequent to the first world conflict.

To win a war at the price of the supreme sacrifice and then lose the benefits of a just peace that should logically follow victory, would be, in my estimation, a catastrophe of the same magnitude as war itself. Our young men and women, the flower of our youth, who have sacrificed everything in order that their country be spared the horrors of war and may continue to enjoy happiness and freedom in order that we all be free to think, to speak, to pray, to worship God who has created us to His image and likeness; these young people, I repeat, these heroes, have a right to expect that on the glorious day of their return, they will not be condemned to destitution. Indeed, our government—and the Canadian people will be thankful to them for it—announces in the speech from the throne, measures that will be adequate to prevent such a condition.

(Text): On returning to this country in 1918, the veterans of the last war had to face conditions altogether different. Everything had not been foreseen as it has been to-day; and it is fitting at the present time to pay tribute to those gallant heroes of 1914-18 who so nobly exalted Canada and paraded the standards of their victorious regiments in foreign countries. By using persuasion, and at times even coercion, the veterans won or wrested from successive governments one concession after another, securing, one point at a time, recognition of the reestablishment programme they had mapped out for themselves. True, perhaps this programme was never completely put into effect, but they did succeed in securing legislation at least as favourable as that adopted in any other country, or as that recorded in the statutes of any country totally unprepared to solve the problems raised by the return of such a large number of military men to civilian life.

If some old grumblers have at times felt an aching bitterness in their proud, great souls, they none the less at the outbreak of the present struggle spontaneously offered to serve once again their native land. And to-day we see them in the ranks of the veterans' guard, and on active service in England and in several other posts outside Canada, just as we find those who, declared unfit for overseas service, much against their will have been stationed at vulnerable points in Canada, or, armed with tommy guns or machine guns, keep watch over prisoners of war.

At this point may I be permitted to quote a few verses by Alan Horwood, published recently in the Legionary. They are these:

Their faces now are etched with lines of care;
The hoar-frost of the years is in their hair;
But sagging shoulders stiffen in salute
As youth swings by; but in their eyes the mute
And hopeless longing for the days when they Marched to the bugles of another day.
They say that the old soldier never dies;
And that is true; till under sod he lies,
His martial spirit flames on undiminished
Till death blots out the light, and all is finished.
They did not shrink from duty when once more
Dark war clouds loomed, more deadly than before;
They vied with youth, eager to do their share
Of service, here, abroad, or anywhere.
And those the years had touched with gentleness,
Are serving with the troops in battle dress;
Holding the line, until to son and sire
Victorious bugles sound the call "cease fire."

To all my dear old comrades of the Veterans Guard of Canada, and particularly to that distinguished gentleman, Colonel H. R. Alley, worthy commander of the guard, may I at this moment pay the heart-felt tribute of my deepest admiration.

(Translation): Reverting to the speech from the throne, which is the subject matter of this motion, I desire, Mr. Speaker, to offer my heartfelt congratulations to the government for the outstanding place they have given to social legislation. They seem to have left no field unexplored. I wish to quote part of the speech from the throne:

Post-war planning falls naturally into three broad fields: preparation for the demobilization, rehabilitation and reestablishment in civil life of the men and women in the armed forces; the reconversion of the economic life of the nation from a war-time to a peace-time basis, and its reconstruction in a manner which will provide opportunities for useful employment for all who are willing and able to work; and the provision of insurance against major economic and social hazards.

A broad programme has already been developed for the reestablishment of veterans of the present war, and for the care of disabled veterans and the dependents of our fighting men and merchant seamen. You will be asked to approve a measure to provide war service gratuities for all who have served in the armed forces, and also measures to supplement the existing rehabilitation programme.

It is also foreseen by the government that if the country is to be spared another period of unemployment, those industries which now produce solely for war purposes will, immediately after the cessation of hostilities, have to be rapidly converted into peace-time industries. In order that this task may be made easier for the smaller industries, and so that the latter may not become an easy prey for greedy financiers and monopolistic interests, the government has the wisdom to provide for the establishment of an organization that will be a kind of subsidiary to the Bank of Canada, and through which the smaller industries will obtain financial assistance for converting their plants to peace-time production, which will enable them to keep on their payroll the workers they needed during the war.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to voice a personal belief? Although a staunch supporter of individual freedom and private enterprise, I loathe the economic liberalism which, under the fallacious pretext of giving free rein to private enterprise, opens the door to every kind of abuse. Economic liberalism is essentially based on a laisser faire policy, not on private enterprise. This economic liberalism enables monopolistic interests to build up their economic empire through the elimination of their legitimate competitors by corrupt practices, blackmail and brute force. The devotees of that liberalism, which is not to be confused with political liberalism, are precisely from that school of thought which proclaims that "might is right"; they belong to that section which, twice in less than a quarter of a century, has plunged the entire world into the dreadful abyss of war with all its disastrous consequences. Economic liberalism is, in the last analysis, the worst negation of individual freedom and private enterprise. It is the very opposite of Canadian political liberalism. Did not Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in a lecture on political liberalism which he delivered in Quebec city in 1871, state that:

The rights of every man, in our society, end precisely when they infringe on the rights of others.

That is one of the undying principles of Canadian liberalism, and the most outstanding disciple of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the right honourable the present Prime Minister, was not unmindful of it, in announcing measures that will safeguard the freedom of the weak against the usurpations of the powerful and the strong.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that if the public powers are to check the greed of monopolistic interests, they must not themselves take over legitimate concerns.

As a matter of fact while rejecting economic liberalism, I am just as much opposed to those socialistic theoreticians who would establish a new order by a process of general levelling. Adopting the erroneous views of one theory would not cure the evils of the other. There is a group here advocating socialistic utopias. They affirm, in their conferences and conventions "that agricultural lands are and should remain national property" (Annual Conference of the British Labour Party, May, 1942). They proclaim that the Canadian farmer who, in his earliest youth, has courageously hewn his farm out of the virgin forest, is not entitled to leave it to his sons when, aged by prolonged and strenuous labour and feeling the weight of years, he has not enough strength left to pursue his appointed task (Excerpt from a statement of policy of the C.C.F., at Saskatoon, July 26, 1934).

They still further state, to hide their true designs, "that they do not intend to proceed to a general expropriation of farm lands already settled" adding that "not a single parcel of land will be granted to a private owner when they are in power." God grant that this may never come to pass! (Excerpt from the text book of the C.C.F. "Social Planning for Canada," page 259.)

Let them compete to their hearts' content in exaggerating the failure of economic liberalism and endeavour to drag our citizens on the still more slippery and more dangerous slopes of socialism, which inevitably lead to communism and bolshevism; it is all in vain, and I may state to the house and to the whole of Canada that the noisy and impassioned appeals of the Canadian socialist group will never influence the beautiful and sound type of Canadian, the farmer of Dorchester, the habitant of Quebec.

If the right honourable the present Prime Minister has always enjoyed and still enjoys the support of old Quebec, it is because such qualities as fairness, broadmindedness, moderation, tolerance and Canadianism of the purest vintage, which are among his characteristics, are equally possessed by the people of the province of Quebec. All Canadians, after four years of war under the King government, have every reason to know that their affairs are well looked after. The many beneficial measures alluded to in the speech from the throne will receive, from the various sections of the country, the enthusiastic approval they deserve, for their adequateness is understood by all and they fulfill the wishes of our people.

It is my privilege, in this house, to represent a typically Canadian constituency. Indeed, Dorchester in inhabited by the four nationalities that have, more than any, contributed to the formation of the Canadian people. In our hearts, Canadians of English, Scottish, Irish and French descent live as neighbours, esteem one another, fraternize together and, who would believe it, go so far as to love one another and set up happy homes. They are all true Canadians. Even though they retain, as they should, the strong ties that bind them to their country of origin, none the less, they are bound by all the fibres of their soul to Canada, which occupies, indubitably and irrevocably, the first place in their affections.

I am proud to proclaim that racial prejudice is not to be found in Dorchester, where every one entertains for his neighbours the consideration and esteem due to his fellow-citizens. The great majority of my constituents are farmers, the most peace-loving of citizens, who cherish their land, families, church and country. They work hard from morning till night and, since Canada has called her sons to the defence of their homes and families, they have increased their efforts to fill the growing demands for their crops. Many of their sons and daughters have answered the call to arms, and, unfortunately, a number of them will never see their homes again; those who remain labour and pray, hoping for the day of victory. We may well call them "Our own good people."

These excellent folk, Mr. Speaker, ask no privileges and hope for no favours. All they require and expect from their government is fair consideration and the share that legitimately belongs to them. They are glad to notice that once again, the present government has shown its interest in the farmers by introducing legislation to guarantee that they will enjoy fair prices for their products after the war.

During the present war, the government has very wisely established a price control organization to fix on certain products, a ceiling which could not be exceeded under severe penalties. Such a control was evidently necessary to avoid inflation. The farmer has not complained but has willingly submitted to these restrictions adopted in the general interest. When he has protested—I have strongly criticized myself, in certain cases—it was because some over-zealous or stupid official had not made any allowances for special circumstances.

However, it is comforting to know that to-day, the government guarantees that prices now paid for agricultural products will be maintained for a certain period even after the end of the war.

Another fact which the Canadian people will not fail to appreciate fully is connected with family allowances. The speech from the throne states as follows:

The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

It is said in the speech that the family is the foundation of national life. That is a truism which unfortunately has not always been reflected in legislation, but it is a principle which, if applied to our national life, will give the very best results, provided the needs of the whole nation are taken into account.

The value of a nation lies, indeed, in the sum of individual values of which it is composed; accordingly, it is of prime importance for the whole nation that in each family every child should enjoy a minimum of comfort, medical care and educational facilities so that he may develop fully and become an asset for the nation. During the present war, army physicians have ascertained beyond any doubt that the number of young men physically unfit for military service is much greater among the poorer working classes than among well to do families.

Family allowances and social insurance will remedy a social inequality which has especially affected the children from destitute families, and they will afford to those children, toward whom fate has not been generous, the means necessary for their physical and moral development. Such a legislation derives from the very best Christian principles and it is worthy of the man who can rightly be called the main initiator of social legislation in Canada.

On October 9, 1942, the man to whom I have just referred, that is to say the right hon. the Prime Minister himself, made the following statement in a speech delivered at the congress of the American Federation of Labor:

(Text): Before the war, we talked about the conservation of natural resources. Unhappily, we heard much less about the conservation of human resources—the lives and health and happiness of men and women and children. To-day, our aim is total mobilization of resources and of man-power for the waging of total war. When the war is over, we must seek, above all else, to use our natural and material resources to conserve human resources—to promote the health and happiness of all the people. Our resources of land, of sea, of forest, and of mine, were given to man by the Creator for the preservation, and not for the destruction of life. The people of no country can be made happy, contented, and prosperous except by safeguarding the lives and welfare of the many, and by protecting from injustice and misfortune the homes of the humble in the land.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, humanity ranks foremost among all the qualities of the right hon. Prime Minister, and in thanking him for his social legislation, I have no hesitation in saying: In this respect Canada will forever be grateful to you!

In the fine reports presented by the committee on reconstruction, it is suggested that the benefits granted the farmers of the western provinces by the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be extended to the farming classes throughout Canada. Such legislation would materially benefit our farming population and I dare hope that the government will see fit to implement this recommendation of the committee. I have in mind particularly those farmers whose swamp lands would require drainage and those whose farms are eroded or flooded by the rising waters in the spring or during the rainy seasons. I have in mind all those farmers who wish to improve their farms but who, unfortunately, are not in a financial condition to bear personally the cost of such improvements.

In the province of Quebec, the Gobout government is bravely and efficiently fighting the electricity trust, and we hope that as soon as the war is ended the rural areas will be electrified. I would ask the federal government to give this question of major importance to our farmers their immediate consideration and to co-operate fully with the provinces, for electricity in all rural regions would above all else benefit our rural classes and bring them comfort and happiness.

Among the suggestions not mentioned in the speech from the throne but which many figures in the business world have taken upon themselves to present to the Canadian public in speaking on the post-war period, there is one to which I should particularly like to call attention: I refer to the matter of mass immigration which is already advocated in some circles. Fortunately, our present government does not seem to consider at all seriously the exaggerated claims made by those wholesale removers; I should like to congratulate the hon. Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) who wasted no time in denying the rumour which a clamorous politician, well-known in the province of Quebec, circulated a few months ago with a great deal of publicity, in the constituency of Dorchester, if you please! The attitude adopted by the immigration branch in its last annual report which was tabled in the house to-day still seems to me the only one that is reasonable and logical:

> It is recognized everywhere that Canada must first of all look after the reestablishment of the members of her armed forces and their families, and at the same time direct Canadian war industries towards peace-time enterprises. Only after the war shall we be able to understand the full import of this task.

Further on, I find the following:

> Canada should not make the mistake of giving preference to transportation over settlement, mistake which has occurred in the past. Some people think that at the very moment, it is possible to draw up plans which would even include figures; others believe that only time and the economic development of the country will solve this problem.

Without the shadow of a doubt, I belong to the latter class, and I say that until the time when we have reinstated our fighting men in civilian life and found for each one of them some remunerative and useful employment, it ill becomes these transportation magnates to speak to us of immigration.

Mr. Speaker, another figure, and a very eminent one in all respects, has recently made some untimely declarations which caused a great deal of press comment and gossip in general. Indeed! I am no great statesman, and still less of a diplomat, but like all my fellow-citizens, I love my country, I am proud of its history and I dream of a wonderful future for it. I want Canada to be great, I want her beautiful, I want her strong and vigorous, I want her prosperous, and I want her always to be united. She has developed scores of remarkable men, heroes and saints. Divine Providence has always willed that at the very heart of our nation there should be statesmen, leaders, able to guide the country towards its most glorious destiny, and long may it be so!

Why, then, must distinguished personages, hailing from across the Atlantic, come to us from time to time and with look inspired and an air of mystery, shower upon us instructions which we shall term indiscreet to say the least? The latest edition of these mysterious travellers is attempting, it seems, to refloat the foundered ship of the Imperial Federation.

If such is the case—but I will have you note, Mr. Speaker, that I am no prophet, that my eye is not veiled in mystery and that I am not actuated by mystical inspiration—but if such is the case, may I, speaking simply as a Canadian, tell this distinguished but indiscreet gentleman that in the year of grace 1944, just as in 1897 and in 1902, that to-day as in the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, "this sugar-coated pill portends nothing good." And I trust that, just as the Canadianism of Laurier triumphed over the Imperialism of Chamberlain, so to-day that of King will outwit the intrigues of Halifax.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the motion which has just been moved so ably and eloquently by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay). To be asked to move this motion I have always considered a great honour and privilege. It is doubly so on this occasion, moved as it was, by a very dear old friend and comrade in arms.

I should like at the outset to express to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) my thanks for the honour he has done to the constituency of Rosthern in asking me to second this motion. The federal riding of Rosthern is a new constituency, set up in 1933 from four former constituencies, and has been represented in this house by many distinguished men. However, the part in which I live enjoys what is probably a unique distinction, in that it has been privileged to elect to this house two prime ministers. It started out in 1896, as part of the old constituency of Saskatchewan, by electing the great leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and in 1926 it elected to this house the present Prime Minister. If I could leave out of account, Mr. Speaker, the present member, I would say that my friends and neighbours of Rosthern certainly know how to pick their representatives.

(Translation): From my earliest youth, I have learned to admire the beloved figure of one of our greatest statesmen, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. When I became a member of this house, I soon realized and felt that among my good friends were to be found many of my French speaking colleagues, and in particular the honourable and distinguished member who has just moved the motion of which I am the seconder. For many years I sat in this house with the late Right Honourable Mr. Lapointe, and I acquired the conviction that he was a very distinguished leader and a great Canadian. I have also learned about the large share which the French speaking Canadians have had in the development of our Canada. I mean the valiant pioneers who came and built their homes in the loneliness of the forests, the brave missionaries who risked death and torture so as to teach Christianity to the Indians, the courageous French-Canadians who repulsed the invaders during the American revolution and during the war of 1812, thus proving on two different occasions their loyalty to Canada and to their king. I refer also to my gallant French speaking comrades of the Great War, and of the present war, and to the loyal cooperation of French Canada since the outset of the hostilities. With all these things in mind, as an English speaking Canadian, I wish to pay a humble tribute of respect and admiration to my French speaking compatriots for the part they have taken in building the great and powerful nation that Canada is today.

(Text): I am very proud to have the honour to represent in this house the constituency of Rosthern. Like the hon. member for Dorchester, I can say mine is a truly Canadian seat. Within it there are many people of non-English speaking origin. In the dark days of 1940 I said this about those constituents of mine of non-English origin, as reported in Hansard of June 13, page 762:

I should not be doing my duty to my fellow-citizens of non-English-speaking origin, many of whom to-day are in the armed forces of our sovereign—in the first division, for example, there are probably more boys of Ukrainian origin than their proportion of the population of Canada—if I did not tell my fellow members that from an intimate knowledge of thousands of people of non-English-speaking origin I know they are just as loyal to Canada and our empire as the members of this house of commons. It is our duty to let them know that we trust them, and together we will then go forward as a united people regardless of racial origin and place the name of Canada high on the roll of the nations of the world where tolerance is preached and practised.

The truth of this statement has been well borne out by the record of service of the people from my constituency. I would just call to mind the casualty lists which have appeared from time to time and the record of those decorated for bravery. The first two boys decorated from the little town of Rosthern, where I live, were respectively of French-Irish origin and of Mennonite origin. In regard to the people at large, in the last victory loan the quota set for the district surrounding the little town of Rosthern was $62,000; the amount subscribed was $81,650, or 131 per cent of the objective.

I realize that above all else the request that I second this motion to-day is intended as a tribute to the armed forces, of which I am again privileged to be a member in this war as in the last. Speaking of their efforts in this war, as a member of the Canadian corps I feel I cannot pay them a higher tribute than to say that they are worthy successors of that grand fighting body which distinguished itself so highly in the first great war.

With regard to the boys serving in the Royal Canadian Air Force, I do not think I can pay them a higher tribute than to say that they too have shown themselves to be worthy successors of those who wrote the name of Canada high in the list of nations by their contribution in the last war.

As regards the Royal Canadian Navy, I think they would feel that I could pay them no higher tribute than to say that by their contribution, by their sacrifices in this war, they also have proved themselves worthy upholders of the great traditions which have been built up by the British navy under such leaders as Drake and Nelson.

I believe that the story told by Ralph Allan, war correspondent, in last Saturday's Winnipeg Tribune, about a young soldier from western Canada, is worth telling as indicative of the kind of young fellow we have right in our armed forces to-day. Here is what the correspondent said:

I am thinking now of a little battle in which fifteen kids from this part of the country attacked a company of Germans. They got into trouble but they kept going. Eight of them got back, seven didn't. The story of one of them I remember particularly well. He was covering his section with a Bren gun and a German bullet smashed his foot. Badly hurt, weak, dazed with pain, he left his gun and crawled painfully over the battlefield to a ridge that gave him cover. He was safe now. He would live; a minute before he had been going to die.

And then the youngster lifted his head a little and listened to the dreadful sounds of battle a hundred yards ahead. He didn't have to see to know that on the fire-swept slope from which he had found sanctuary his pals were fighting against terrible odds. The kid looked back over the valley that beckoned to life.

Then, painfully he crawled the other way, to where he had come from before. He found his Bren again and sprawled out behind it with his broken foot and started shooting. He stayed with the gun, shooting, until he was killed.

Reading of such an exploit, we long to find words to express our admiration, our unfathomable gratitude, our boundless affection and our sympathy for the loved ones that are bereaved. Words seem to me to be totally inadequate, and in this connection I thought of Lincoln's Gettysburg address, in which he said:

We cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men living and dead who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. It is for us the living rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us that from these honoured dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain.

In order to carry forward the work which our own boys are making possible, I think we should try to know the cause for which our Canadian fighting men are giving their last full measure of devotion and which we who send them there must never allow to fail. First and foremost, I think, is the safety of their homes, their loved ones and their country. If this war is not won, so that that safety shall be secured, their sacrifice will have been indeed in vain.

As pointed out in the speech from the throne, this war is not yet won. Tremendous exertions and sacrifices may yet have to be made before it is. If our enemies discern the slightest weakening in support of the war, or in determination or unity on our part, they will undoubtedly be encouraged to hold out, and more precious lives will be lost. Nothing should go forth from this country, either from this house or out of it, either in word or in deed, which might in any way encourage our enemies and endanger a single Canadian life. I most earnestly commend the government for bearing this in mind in putting the first emphasis on the winning of the war, and for the measures brought forward in the speech from the throne for utilizing all our energies to that end.

The greater our superiority in material equipment, in planes, in tanks, in guns, the less will be the loss of life. To those who are concerning themselves solely with after-the-war plans, I say this. Such plans are worth nothing unless enough fighting men in the united nations are willing to risk and, if necessary, to give their lives in order to defeat the nazis and the Japs.

How much would the nazis and the Japs care for, or how long would they tolerate, plans to make our people better off, if they got us under their control? The statements of their own leaders, and their actions, regarding which we have just heard something more in this house to-day, show us what we might expect in that regard. Unless we win this war, Mr. Speaker, such plans are no more than a barren intellectual exercise.

What next are our men in the armed services concerned about? I think it is that a lasting peace may be achieved whereby their children may not have again to undergo the horrors of war in order to preserve their very existence. This means that steps must be taken to ensure that an enemy who threatened our existence twenty-nine years ago, and again threatened it three years ago, shall not be permitted to make a third attempt, thereby plunging the world intc the measureless misery of war. Certainly those who lost loved ones in the last war, and those who have lost loved ones in this war, will agree with me—and I should hope that everyone else who has been more fortunate will also agree—that certain steps should be taken. First I would suggest this that Germany and Japan must be so treated in this war that it will be utterly impossible for future leaders of such countries again to persuade their peoples that war is a desirable thing.

Secondly, to ensure that those countries do not attempt to take revenge for what has been done in this war to beat them, I suggest that they should be disarmed for all time to come. Arming for the alleged purpose of self-defence ultimately again may mean arming for aggression.

Thirdly, and more important than all, I suggest that some form of world organization should be established that will have not only the will but the power to maintain world peace and prevent further aggression by any other nation in the future.

In this connection I feel that I should say something about the speech that was delivered recently in this country by Lord Halifax. So far as I am personally concerned I feel that we should continue on our course of moving toward complete sovereignty within the British commonwealth of nations; that we endorse wholly the plans of the government to support to the greatest possible extent the establishment of an international organization to maintain world peace. We are, of course, willing and anxious to confer with the other members of the British commonwealth as a sovereign nation in regard to advancing our cause in this war and in regard to protecting world peace thereafter; but if it is to be suggested that we reverse our course and retrace the steps which we began to take seventy-five years ago on our way to complete sovereignty and autonomy within the commonwealth under great leaders like Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden and our present Prime Minister, then I say that I do not think such a course is either feasible or desirable. I do not think it is in the best interest of either Canada or the British commonwealth and empire itself.

Recent conferences between great world leaders, and statements emanating therefrom are most encouraging. But the problem of organizing world peace is not going to be an easy one. That has been shown by the experience of the last war. To try in some way to restore the nations which have tried to defend themselves against aggression to something like their former strength and at the same time not to put absolutely impossible burdens upon the conquered nations will be indeed a very difficult task. I for one suggest that all the nations who will be represented at that conference should send to it their most able, most experienced statesmen and those who have learned to work together in the past.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that our present Prime Minister may be spared in health and strength in his present position to give the benefit of his long experience in the service of mankind as leader of Canada's delegation at the peace conference following the war. There is another reason why I should like to see him there. It has at last come to be recognized that high barriers to world trade are inimical to the best interests of the nations of the world. The Prime Minister has always fought for that principle. He achieved the lowering of tariff barriers when there was not the universal agreement that there is to-day. But to use the fluid period after the war, a period which must be seized on if there is to be any general reduction of world tariffs, will require a man who believes heart and soul in it, and who has had experience in negotiating along those lines if the opportunity is not again to be missed.

I recall that one of President Wilson's fourteen points had to do with the lowering of tariffs, and we know what happened after the peace conference following the last war. Unless every country in the world sends to this peace conference men who believe in the principle of razing tariff barriers, and know how to carry it out, once again the hopes of the world will be frustrated in this regard.

This leads me to a question which is in the minds of many members of the armed forces. What will be their economic condition on their return to civil life? There is common agreement in regard to those who are injured and to their dependents. Everybody agrees that they should be looked after to the extent that they should not suffer on account of having served their country. But what of the man or woman who returns in health and hopes to be reestablished? Everyone knows there is great misgiving on the part of the members of our armed services as to what will happen to them after peace arrives. They are concerned with getting reestablished on a self-supporting basis. I find that there is a lamentable lack of knowledge on the part of members of our armed services of what has already been provided by parliament in regard to looking after them after the war.

Provision is made for those problems being discussed with the men by officers and padres. I happen to be connected with headquarters staff of one training brigade, and the padres tell me that they have not the information as to what the government actually has done in regard to plans already carried into effect. I am told that overseas in England there have been discussions on what Great Britain is doing, but there is very little knowledge of what Canada is doing, and for that reason there is a feeling that nothing is being done.

As a matter of fact a well-known United States publication had this to say about what we have already accomplished:

> There is already in operation, however, one system which is probably the most generous, definite and enlightened yet adopted by any member of the united nations. It is that of our neighbour, Canada. It assumes that every man or woman who returns from the battle front, whether disabled or not, is entitled to careful assistance and guidance back to stability and self-sufficiency.

I urge that full knowledge of what this parliament has done and does should be made available to all members of the armed forces in order that they may have no fear that they can not be reestablished on a self-supporting basis when they return to civil life. I know that the task of reestablishing a million ex-service men and women, and those who have left their jobs to work in war factories, is a tremendous one. There is a feeling that no government can possibly deal with such a task. In regard to that I would say to them that a government which organized the titanic war effort which we have organized can certainly look after that problem when it is not harassed with the problem of carrying on the war. Its willingness to do so is shown first of all by what has already been done, as indicated by the quotation I read from the United States publication, and secondly it is reinforced by what is foreshadowed in the speech from the throne.

Paramount in these plans, I believe, are the provisions for the three new departments, particularly the department in regard to veterans' affairs. I most heartily commend the government for deciding to set up that department. Looking after the veterans who come back wounded or injured is only one part of the problem of rehabilitating the veterans. Setting them up in civil life in order that they may become self-supporting is, after all, most important. War veterans' gratuities are very good. Unemployment relief benefits are very good and are necessary, but, after all, the thing that the service man or woman is worried about is a chance to earn his or her own living. A separate department should be able to look after that problem much better than if it were spread over several departments. The Veterans' Land Act should be administered in such way that the difficulties that followed the administration of the Soldier Settlement Act will be avoided. The provision to assist veterans in establishing themselves in business, in regard to building their homes or improving their homes, is something that I think will be greeted with a great deal of satisfaction.

The reconverting of our factories from war-time to peace-time uses after the war will be a stupendous task. It is important from two points of view that it be done quickly, in order to reabsorb into industry as many people as possible, and so that their productive capacity may be made available as early as possible in order to step up the standard of living of our people. The Department of Reconstruction which will devote its entire energies to this work should be able to make a real contribution toward the well-being of Canada.

I am sure hon. members will realize how much I personally commend and appreciate the proposal to establish an industrial development bank, as a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada, to assist in providing funds for the reconversion of war plants, both in regard to capital expenditure and working capital. This is veritably a step in the right direction.

Above everything else, however, the principle in the speech from the throne which I believe the people of Canada, both service personnel and civilians, will rejoice to see accepted is the recognition by our government of an obligation to guarantee to our citizens a national minimum of social security and human welfare. In his book, "Industry and Humanity", written twenty-five years ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) set out certain ideals which we should seek to attain in regard to better social security. It is not often that a young man who dreams of a programme for the betterment of his country is given a chance twenty-five years later, as prime minister of his country, to begin to carry out in such large measure as is proposed in the speech from the throne that programme. Already we have had some indication of the devotion of the right hon. gentleman to humanitarian principles in connection with the enactment under his government of old age pensions, pensions for the blind, unemployment insurance and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which is in the same category. I do not need to dwell upon the extent to which the first three measures I mentioned are appreciated by those whose lives they have made much easier and happier. In regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, not a farmer in the west with whom I have come in contact has failed to express his appreciation for what has been done in giving him some measure of security against crop failure through drought which, it has been shown through experience, must be expected from time to time throughout that area. I should like to say just how much we in the prairie provinces appreciate that measure of security, and we do thank the government for having given it to our part of the country.

In the programme outlined in the speech from the throne there are certain definite proposals to provide social security which I welcome. A guaranteed minimum price for staple farm products is something for which representatives of all parties have struggled, both in this house and out of it; and speaking on behalf of a farming constituency I should like to say how much that step will be appreciated by the farmers of this country. There is a feeling that the farmer is just as much entitled to minimum prices for his products as the labouring man is entitled to minimum wages, and I rejoice that this measure of security is being given to our farmers. They will feel that they need not fear after this war a collapse in prices such as we saw following the last war; and just here I should like to add a word of commendation in regard to the policy of the government which made it possible to attain something approaching parity in the prices of farm products. This house knows that I for one have felt that the anti-inflation programme should not be permitted to freeze the primary producer in a position of permanent economic inferiority, and I wish to thank the government most earnestly and sincerely for having found a way to maintain the anti-inflation programme and at the same time to see to it that the farmer obtained some measure of justice through an increase in the prices of the things he has to sell.

The provision for family allowances is something about which we should all be very happy. This principle has been recognized in our law ever since we provided for income tax exemptions on account of the children of those in the higher income brackets; but it only helped those with incomes sufficiently high to require them to pay income tax, and did not help those who needed such assistance even more, the people who did not have incomes sufficient to be subject to income tax. If it is good enough for the richer man, Mr. Speaker; if it is good enough for the more highly paid labouring man, who get enough to pay an income tax and receive the exemption, then I say it should be good enough for the poor man who does not come in either of those categories. Furthermore, anyone who has a large family will appreciate that as a result of our system of heavy indirect taxation, our sales tax and so on, the bigger your family the more you pay in taxes every time you have to buy anything for your family. Certainly if you have to buy eight pairs of shoes you are going to pay far more in taxes than if you have to buy only one pair. Then if war comes we expect the young lad belonging to a large family to go out and risk his life equally with the boy from a small family, though perhaps the one lad may not have had nearly the same chances in the way of education and so on. If the state claims the right to ask a boy to give his life, then it should guarantee to him a minimum standard of well-being in childhood.

I commend the government most heartily for the other proposals to provide more social security contained in the speech from the throne, but I cannot now take time to mention them, because for a moment I should like to deal with the war effort of this country. We now have in our army some 470,000 men, in our navy some 70,000 men and in our air force some 185,000 men, a total of 725,000. In the women's branches of these services we have enlisted more than 37,000, a total of both men and women in the services of more than 762,000. Unfortunately, we have had casualties (not including the wounded) of over 19,000. More than 1,000,000 persons are working in war plants and associated industries, while another 2,100,000 are engaged in agriculture and essential civilian employment. About seventy per cent of all males in Canada fourteen years of age and over are in the armed forces, in war industry or in essential civilian employment.

I have not time to give the figures I should like to give in regard to the great contribution agriculture has made, but production has been stepped up to a marvellous degree notwithstanding the depleted numbers of those engaged in this occupation, depleted by enlistments in our armed forces and entry into war industries. For example, our milk production has been stepped up from some 15,000,000,000 pounds to 17,400,000,000 pounds; the production of creamery butter has increased from 254,773,000 pounds to 312,310,000 pounds; our beef production has increased from 618,000,000 pounds to 886,000,000 pounds; our feed grain from 456,000,000 bushels to 734,000,000 bushels, and our flaxseed from 1,508,000 bushels to 17,911,000 bushels. In each instance the first figure represents the average for the period from 1935 to 1939, and the last figure the production for 1943. Our shipments of bacon to the old country amounted to 330,000,000 pounds in 1940 and by 1943 that had risen to 675,000,000 pounds.

In regard to our production of munitions, I feel that it represents almost a miracle of organization and accomplishment. Canada should be proud of the whole organization, from the minister to the youngest lad in a munitions factory. We have already produced, since the beginning of the war, 80,000 artillery units, a million machine guns and rifles, 600,000 military vehicles, 55,000,000 rounds of heavy ammunition, three billion rounds of small arms ammunition, radio equipment to the value of $308,000,000, five hundred naval vessels, over 200 merchant ships, with a total tonnage far exceeding 2,000,000, and over 9,000 aircraft.

I should like now to say a few words with respect to the accomplishments in connection with the commonwealth air training plan. Under that scheme we have now turned out over 50,000 aircrew. In recent months we have been turning out each month more than twice the number of pilots who fought and won the battle of Britain. May I also pay tribute to the minister of that department, who, particularly in those difficult days in 1940, kept the plan going, even under circumstances where it seemed almost impossible to do so.

I should like to say a word about finance. The total cost of the last war was $1,670,000,000, and that figure covered the cost of demobilization. The cost of this war, estimated to March 31, 1944, will be $10,824,000,000. The successful fight against inflation is not only helpful now, but will make much easier our reestablishment after the war is over. I am particularly happy that this great programme has been financed without having to resort to borrowing from abroad, because the interest we shall have to pay on the debt will remain in Canada, and will be subject to future taxation. Further, we have drained off large profits due to the war, to help pay for the war, another procedure for which I must commend the Department of Finance.

There are a great many other aspects of our war effort upon which I should like to comment, had I time to do so. I have in mind particularly the industries of fishing, lumbering, transportation and mining, each of which has made a magnificent contribution to our war effort.

I believe no one will deny that Canada's contribution to the war has been titanic; but, more important is the fact that our effort came at a time when it made all the difference between victory and defeat. In 1940, when the issue was swaying in the balance, when it was not certain whether or not Great Britain would go down, the fact that our young airmen were in the air, that our army was on the shores of Great Britain, and that Britain knew we were at her side, may have made all the difference between victory and defeat.

But, sir, of very great importance is that that has all been accomplished without destroying the unity of this country. Many people argued that we should not take any great part in the war, because it would inevitably mean the destruction of unity in Canada. Well, under the leadership of our present Prime Minister that titanic effort has been accomplished without destroying our unity. The end of this war will find Canada more united, more conscious of her great national strength, and respected the world over, with an agricultural, industrial and financial system and the trained citizenry to assure us of a standard of living as high as that of any nation on the face of the earth.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we face a bright future; but we should never forget that that future has been made possible by the bravery of our brave sons, and that of brave people the world over. Let us therefore, in so far as it lies within us, make up our minds that that future will be worthy of the sacrifice which made it possible. Let us approach our problems in the spirit of that gallant British airmen who, writing to his mother just before going into combat in which he was killed, said: "I shall have done my duty to the utmost of my ability. No man can do more, and no man calling himself a man can do less."

On motion of Mr. Graydon the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.10 p.m.

DIVORCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1930—JURISDICTION OF COURTS IN PROVINCE OF MARRIED WOMEN'S DOMICILE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 2, to amend the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LIVE STOCK

PRESS REPORT WITH REGARD TO SLAUGHTER AND SALE OF ANIMALS BY QUEBEC FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, under whose administration the wartime prices and trade board comes, a question with respect to an item that appeared in the Montreal Standard of Saturday. It says that a new plan by which Quebec farmers will be allowed to slaughter and sell their animals themselves in future has been adopted by arrangement with the wartime prices and trade board.

Does this arrangement apply also to Ontario and the other provinces?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall have to look into the newspaper report and see whether there is any truth in it. I do not know whether there is or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): True enough. I confirmed it this morning.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I shall have to ask the indulgence of Your Honour and of the house if I follow my notes more closely than I have been in the habit of doing. I am anxious to condense my remarks and deliver them in the minimum amount of time, in order to set an example that perhaps may be followed by the house in time to come.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. GRAYDON: I was looking at the other side of the house when I said that.

When I rose, sir, to take part in a similar debate a year ago I raised my voice in protest against the time lost in the house in the traditional and extended congratulations which are usually showered upon the mover and the seconder of the address. In parliament, as in many other phases of our national life, we have to make up our minds to leave some of the habits of yesterday behind. These are days of change and reform and having this in mind I hope that the mover (Mr. Tremblay) and the seconder (Mr. Tucker) will fully understand and appreciate the motive which lies behind my comparative silence with respect to their very excellent efforts. Were they not both members of His Majesty's armed forces, I would have refrained from creating another precedent in this debate. Both of them are comparatively young men; both of them have served with distinction in two wars. That in itself constitutes a word of tribute more eloquent than my words could convey.

It is appropriate that the first point I cover in this address should be the war. It is not yet won. True, we have reached the stage where the fear of losing it has been to a large extent removed, but with the most serious fighting and the heaviest casualty lists yet to come, it is in my opinion utter nonsense to talk as though the war were practically over. Would to God it were!

Mere words will fail to appraise appropriately the contribution of Canada's armed forces at sea, on the land and in the air. Their magnificent part in the pulverization of vital German industries; their heroic fight in Sicily and Italy; their daring exploits on the oceans of the world, have added a new lustre to Canada's already great reputation among the nations of the globe. It can be safely said —I should say, proudly said—that the Canadian armed forces rate second to none among the war's very best participants.

Labour, agriculture, industry and business generally have made on the civilian front a giant contribution towards the winning of the war, but the brunt of our effort is being carried by those in our armed forces. Our contribution as civilians, however great, suffers in contrast to theirs. When this war is over, this Canada of ours which has been ready to give and to pay heavily to win the war must equally be prepared to do the same thing for the establishment and the maintenance of peace and for the rehabilitation of our armed forces.

It is difficult to say what the general terms of the speech from the throne mean for the veterans of this war. Only close scrutiny of the legislation proposed will give any indication of how far the government is prepared to go. When our men and women come back they will be thrown into competition for a livelihood in our nation with those who have been receiving a very much larger share of the national income than our fighting forces. Let me therefore impress upon the government the necessity of giving to our discharged men and women sufficient aid and support to put them on better than an even basis so far as cash is concerned so that they will have a fair chance in the competitive struggle for a fuller and more abundant life. Our forces have not been niggardly in their sacrifices for us. Let us not be niggardly with them when it comes our turn to pay.

The government has never been too frank with the people of Canada with respect to the conduct of the war. It is high time it was. Our people are demanding satisfactory and straightforward answers to these questions:

(1) What does the abandoning of the seventh and eighth divisions in Canada mean?

(2) What does it involve?

(3) Why were these two additional divisions constituted in the first place?

(4) What were the underlying reasons for the change?

(5) What is being done with our big home defence army?

(6) Is it going overseas?

(7) Is it going to remain in Canada and if so, is its personnel to be directed back to civilian activities?

Recently the three chiefs of the navy, army and air force were transferred overseas. Does this mean that the government believes that all danger to Canada has been largely removed? If so, why the necessity for the maintenance of this big home defence army? Even at this late date it is essential that the whole story of the home defence army's constitution and its present and future role should be explained fully and frankly by the government to this house and to the people of Canada.

Canadians, too, are confused as to what is going on overseas. Why was the Canadian Army constituted as it was in the first place? Whose idea was it? If the plan was good, why was it abandoned? If it was bad, why was it approved in the first place?

Many rumours are in circulation regarding the resignation of General McNaughton. Public interest demands that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should at once give a full and frank explanation of the facts in this regard, letting the chips fall where they may.

The Prime Minister has stated that he is going to attend, at an early date, a conference of British commonwealth prime ministers. There are strong, but we hope not irreconcilable, views abroad in Canada with respect to our position in the commonwealth and with respect to our relations with the world at large. It is unfortunate that the speech from the throne mentions only the latter.

It is well that the views of all sides should be carefully weighed and considered. The views of the government would be particularly welcome, but it is not our intention to embarrass our own Prime Minister, or the representatives of other parts of the commonwealth, by tossing controversial issues into this debate when common sense indicates that every effort must be made to secure a united front in a united Canada in a greater and more powerful British commonwealth.

A very noticeable omission from the speech from the throne which justified curiosity is the failure to mention the burning question of post-war civil aviation. There is no single economic subject fraught with such important effects and ramifications of a world-wide character which is so vital to Canada as commercial aviation. People are asking if we are to be pawns in the great international game. Are we to stand by inactive in this field while the United States, Great Britain, Russia, China, Holland, Sweden, Free France, and many other countries, determine what our part is to be in the international scheme?

Canada is playing a dangerous game. Canada cutting in at the last minute will be of little use. Already official reports from United States sources are saying that the northwest route through Canada is credited with considerable glamour, but little commercial importance. In other words, they are already seeking to discount our geographical advantages.

Canada has earned a place in aviation far greater in importance than her proportion of operated air routes. The commonwealth air training plan, the vast distribution of arctic and sub-arctic landing fields, the weather-reporting facilities and other advanced operational achievements warrant her claiming an important role in all international post-war aviation deliberations. Yet, for some strange reason, the speech from the throne remains silent on this tremendously important subject.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has recently attended a commonwealth air conference in London; and he should be in a position to inform this house and this country where Canada stands in any agreements or proposed agreements that have been entered into or discussed. To what extent are we collaborating with the United Kingdom on this important matter? How far have negotiations proceeded with the United States?

There is grave and general concern throughout Canada that delay and inertia on the part of the government may lead to our position becoming, in the critical period ahead, nothing more than a point of geographical convenience when final arrangements have been concluded. Our people want to know and to be assured that full and beneficial use will be made of the vast and strategic ground facilities now available in Canada. How is the superior knowledge and experience of our trained people to be utilized to the greatest advantage; and what benefits are we to reap from our favoured position as the most economical trade route between industrial centres in the United States and the markets of Europe and Asia? Parliament is entitled to have, at a very early date, a full report on this vital matter.

In agriculture, opportunism and a series of short-run moves are still being substituted for a definite, comprehensive, long-term policy. John Bracken's Lethbridge bill of rights for Canadian farmers has had some effect upon the government's indecisive agriculture position—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Don't laugh.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is rather a hollow laugh, but I cannot blame the hon. members for that. I am going to repeat this, because I know it is of tremendous interest to all:

John Bracken's Lethbridge bill of rights for Canadian farmers has had some effect upon the government's indecisive agricultural position; and, as in the case of our Winnipeg platform, parts of our policy will, no doubt, be adopted. Why did the government wait until after a call from Canada's next prime minister to adopt a policy of putting a floor under the prices of agricultural products?

It is extremely significant that the government should have waited until after it had been in power for eight years, and until the plan had been incorporated as part of the Progressive Conservative agricultural policy, before undertaking to establish floor prices for farm products. What Canadian farmers will want to know is why the government did not see fit to adopt this price floor policy during those pre-war years when the prices which they actually received were only a fraction of what they were justly entitled to and of prices ruling to-day.

During the period this government has been in power, the annual average cash price received for No. 1 Northern wheat, basis Fort William, was as low as 62 cents a bushel; that of No. 2 oats, 29 cents; that of No. 2 barley, 40⅞ cents and that of rye, 40⅞ cents. The prices received at the farm were, of course, very much lower than this. Annual average egg prices were down to 17½ cents. Prices received for hogs, butter fat and cheese were, at certain times, just about one-half as high as those ruling to-day; while good steers sold for as little as one-third of their present value. If reasonable floor prices are needed at present and in the future, they were no less necessary in the earlier years of this administration's tenure of office. Farmers were just as entitled to reasonable floor prices in peace time as they are now in the later period of the war.

I shall not now go over each of the thirty points enunciated by our leader at this time. I shall refer only to two of these planks, leaving the others until a more detailed examination of the agricultural policy can be made in the house.

Here is point No. 8:

> To bring about an expansion of our export markets and thereby higher standards of living generally, we shall be prepared, in accordance with the principles of the Atlantic charter, to progressively lower the barriers to trade; we shall set up a special export agency charged with the responsibility of promoting international trade, maintaining and expanding export markets for primary products, ensuring that domestic prices shall not be depressed because a small surplus may happen to result in making low export prices apply to both; and developing a positive programme of international collaboration, on the part of both exporting and importing countries, with a view to furthering the exchange of commodities and better international understanding and goodwill.

I mention also point No. 21, which deals with the increasingly important matter of agricultural research. A brief debate took place on this subject in the house last session. I now call upon the government to establish at once a national network of efficiently staffed research laboratories in order that agriculture will have at least as efficient research facilities as industry itself.

The government's policy respecting our production and export of bacon to Britain has been one of pronounced instability, fraught with sudden and frequent changes and guided by hindsight, rather than foresight. Various pronouncements of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his department, ostensibly designed to guide our farmers in the matter of future production, have served only to create serious uncertainty and considerable bewilderment. The variation of the arrangements with Britain regarding bacon has resulted in disappointment and dissatisfaction on the part of the agricultural population of Canada. Since the last session of the house, the wholesale slaughtering of brood sows and the general disintegration of the whole bacon industry have belatedly forced the government to give hog bonuses. The irreparable damage already done is a clear indication that these bonuses were long overdue.

Canadian farmers are willing and ready to produce enough hogs to meet Britain's bacon needs. But they quite properly feel that, if they do, the government should go at least part way to stabilize their position. This is but one of many striking examples which indicate the urgency for a forthright, vigorous, agricultural policy for this dominion.

Let the farmers of Canada contrast the single reference to agriculture in the speech from the throne with John Bracken's Lethbridge bill of rights for agriculture, and let them form their own conclusions as to where their friends in public life are. The speech from the throne and the government policy generally is bleak and barren when contrasted to the masterly programme for the relief of agriculture and the liberation of rural people as envisaged in the Lethbridge speech. It is significant that the only useful reference to agriculture in the speech from the throne was taken from John Bracken's address at Lethbridge itself.

Labour will look in vain in the throne address for either sympathy or a broad national labour policy. Not a single concrete proposal is to be found which would indicate that there are plans on foot to give labour its rightful position in the national partnership. High-sounding phrases about safeguarding the basic standard of living and standardizing wages and salary are poor and lame excuses for a government which should have established long before this a national labour code for Canada. The farmer is now having company; labour is joining him in that great group of forgotten men in the dominion.

This government embarked upon a programme of war production without adequately consulting labour or inviting it to share the responsibilities of administration, but let me caution the government that no programme of rehabilitation and reconstruction can succeed without the active cooperation of the labour movement.

Schemes for providing social security are not effective substitutes in themselves for higher earning power and continuous employment. All these plans can do is to spread the national income more evenly. There is grave danger that they may collapse and that inflation will result unless the national output of consumer's goods is maintained at a higher level than ever before. Let us remember that the first and foremost concern of labour is jobs and lots of them with good wages and good working conditions. The incentive to produce must never be allowed to weaken or else the administration of these grandiose schemes of social insurance will be like trying to spread an ounce of butter on an acre of bread—their benefits will hardly be felt.

Surely labour has a right to expect better consideration than the treatment accorded under the wartime wages control order, P.C. 9384, and by labour I mean to include organized labour, unorganized labour and that great section of salaried workers whose wages or salaries have been frozen by the government while their taxes and maintenance charges have been continually increasing. Why did the government not submit this wages control order to parliament by way of legislation, so that the people's representatives could express an opinion on it before it became law? Among other things this order, passed a month or so before parliament met, provided for the incorporation of the cost of living bonus into the wage rate structure and, at the same time, denied to labour that fundamental principle of British justice which declares that a man is innocent until he is found guilty. Against the provisions of this order labour has been rasiing its vigorous voice, and beside labour this Progressive Conservative party stands and joins in their chorus of protests. Why does the government continue studiously to ignore the leaders of labour and deny them a place in the formulation of policies affecting labour? Let us not forget that labour has its rights as well as its responsibilities and obligations. It has fulfilled its obligations at all times and will continue to do so in the future, but it must be also given its rights.

There is talk that the government is going to bring in a labour code wherein the jurisdiction of the federal government will apply to war industries only. This has not been announced because it is a matter of government policy, which apparently has not been quite completed. If this is so, the government is making a colossal blunder in flying in the faces of eight out of nine provinces in Canada who are in favour of a national code covering all industry. The whole project is thoroughly impracticable. Men and women working in a plant, partly on war orders and partly on peace-time work, will find themselves under different codes. People engaged in the same type of work, one producing for war and the other producing for peace, will find that their conditions are regulated by different authorities altogether. The rapid change and transition from war-time activities to peace-time pursuits in itself will show how completely impossible the whole policy must be.

Labour and management must press forward in the future as two great and harmonious partners, under legislation designed to give justice to both. I call upon the government to cease this endless bickering in labour matters; and let us have a code covering all our industries. Then let labour and management sit down together and perfect that partnership which we know is possible, but towards the accomplishment of which no all-out effort seems to have been made.

The government has recently set up a War Assets Corporation, constituted for the purpose of disposing of war materials classified as surplus or obsolete. In the disposal of such material the greatest care and caution must be exercised. At the end of the war, surplus goods will include raw materials, and any indiscriminate disposal of these might very easily lead to the creation of monopolies by those obtaining them. Before the selling process gets under way, I believe that a judicial inquiry should be made into the details of materials purchased, cost prices and use made of them in so far as crown assets of Canada are concerned. The operations of the corporation should be carried out openly. The Canadian people are entitled to know whether value has been received for materials for which they were so heavily taxed. A report should be submitted for the scrutiny of the people of Canada, detailing value received for material classed as obsolete or surplus, and giving information as to the use to which it is being put.

In the war-time economy, many small businesses have been squeezed out of existence. The small storekeeper, the man running the little enterprise, the farmer and others, have suffered. The little fellow should have an equal opportunity to obtain the materials to be disposed of by the War Assets Corporation. It is the job of the government to give every opportunity possible to these people for expansion and prosperity in the post-war period.

It is true that the speech from the throne speaks of the establishment of an industrial development bank to assist in the preparation for the transition of industry from war to peace. I hope that the little man of Canadian business will get the same kind of treatment as big men when this bank swings into operation. There will be some lifting of eyebrows by the farmers of Canada when they find that the principle of credits as envisaged by the setting up of this bank has not been extended by the government to cover their situation as well. The government has followed in many instances the Winnipeg platform, but it has failed to adopt one very important plank in that platform, and that is the proposal for a central farm bank. Why cannot agriculture be treated as well as industry in connection with credit facilities provided by the government?

National selective service earned for itself the title of "Canada's greatest war-time muddle". For quite some time it had no real competitor; but to-day its position in this regard is being seriously challenged by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The C.B.C. has lost the confidence of the people of Canada. I wish that statement were not true. I have been one who has believed that public ownership of our broadcasting facilities, working alongside our private stations, could be made a satisfactory method of handling this vital and delicate means of communication. To-day public ownership in this field is being so seriously threatened that I am expressing grave concern that unless something is done right now, we are apt to have a complete collapse of the whole structure which was so well established in the earlier days of radio.

The government has consistently let radio matters drift in Canada. For years there has scarcely ever been a full board of governors sitting at one time. In one instance, the government permitted a vacancy to stand for eighteen months without filling it. To-day we have the spectacle of two governorships vacant for three months; and of even more importance is the fact that there has been no general manager since early last fall when Doctor J. S. Thomson went back to Saskatchewan university. There has been talk of legislation to improve the corporation's structure; but the speech from the throne gives no hint that this is in prospect.

To the recommendations of the radio broadcasting committees from year to year the government has turned a deaf ear in connection with many of their proposals. The fact is that radio is looked upon as Canada's most important departmental orphan. Its constitution has never been properly clarified, and nowhere is there confidence in those directing its affairs. In the middle of this massive muddle, a second network has been put into operation. In some quarters this move is being viewed with grave concern, largely perhaps because there is no confidence that the present structure of the C.B.C. is in a position satisfactorily to direct anything in the nature of new works.

The question has been raised in the press that the C.B.C. has gone "commercial". If it has, a number of very important points are at once raised, points which concern not only the press of Canada but the citizens of this dominion as well. The government deserves the just condemnation of an outraged public for its lackadaisical happy-go-lucky policy which has allowed this corporation aimlessly to drift into comparative uselessness, instead of directing its course into a field of greater and increasing public service. There is not a minute to be lost. Let the government act at once.

The rehabilitation of those in our armed forces, in our war plants, in industry and agriculture, will call not only for the greatest ingenuity on the part of the government, but as well for the same patriotic fervour on the part of our people as has characterized them in the conduct of the war. Our nation has, of its own free will, raised billions of dollars for its security and defence. When the war is over it can scarcely be less interested in the security of the individuals who comprise our nation, and especially of those who have assisted so vitally in the defence of our security. Canadians have experienced full employment, and our service men and women will be and should be satisfied with nothing short of that when hostilities cease. The wheels of industry must be kept turning; but production must be deflected from the demands of war to the demands of peace, from goods of destruction to the necessary peace-time consumable commodities. Into the flow of employment resulting from such a transition, preferred places must be found for the men and women out of our armed services. Our veterans, men and women, will not be content with blueprints, plans and promises. They will demand effective action. They have not been remunerated on any elaborate scale for the invaluable service they have been rendering us; and they are fully entitled to every opportunity which will assist in making them contented and satisfied citizens of a grateful country.

Second in importance to the paramount consideration of winning this war as quickly and conclusively as possible is the obtaining of full and gainful employment for all our people who are able and willing to work.

To achieve this objective, hand-outs by the federal government will be neither a sufficient nor a satisfactory solution. The dole has gone forever. The cooperation of business and industry will be essential if full employment for our people is to be achieved and especially if it is to be maintained. In a recent estimate, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has revealed that to-day two million Canadians are in jobs which did not exist before the war broke out and most of which will terminate when the war is over, or before. Thus it should be very easily realized that the employment problem facing our country cannot be solved by an incomplete uncoordinated effort.

If the methods of the government to mobilize and utilize our man-power for war are to be the criterion for its effort to meet and solve the post-war employment problem, little hope for success can be held out to our people. Despite the optimism of the Minister of Labour, the operation and administration of national selective service has been a bitter and disillusioning experience for the Canadian people. The government sought and were accorded unlimited powers for the full mobilization of our man-power; they obtained all the necessary—and perhaps some unnecessary—machinery. But they lacked the will and the courage to put it into effective operation at the proper stage of our man-power difficulties.

It is well to recall that in the pre-war period, agriculture, industry and business provided ninety-five per cent of the employment of Canada. And it is only with the cooperation of agriculture, industry and business that long-range plans for the reconstruction period and after can be effective. The people of Canada have accepted with good grace the curtailment of their freedom for the purpose of winning this war. In our peace-time economy they will demand fair wages, fair prices for farm and factory products, and above all freedom to run their own lives. Bureaucracy must go.

Hampering and unnecessarily restrictive measures upon industry and business will do nothing to advance the achievement of full employment. It is well and readily recognized and accepted by the vast majority of Canadians that there must be adequate controls designed to prevent the growth of monopolies and cartels. The Progressive Conservative party stands resolutely against this usurpation by private industry of the place of public power, but will continue to fight to the last ditch in the interests of the small business man, the farmer and the worker. Our belief is that plans should now be in progress which will give all business, all industry, big or little, including agriculture, its legitimate place in our economy, with reasonable opportunity for prosperity in the future.

There is little evidence in the speeches made recently by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie) and the Minister of Munitions and Supply that any well thought-out or coordinated plan to meet the employment problem has been concluded. Speaking in Vancouver on December 13 last—and I might say this is not all he said at that time—the first mentioned minister had this to say:

> We propose having in readiness a great programme of public-assisted enterprise, public works, development projects of all sorts, so that there may be a bridge on which we can cross the gap between war and peace.

Important words, those. In the same day, speaking in Toronto, the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated:

> With our post-war planners thinking in terms of public works and government dole, is it any wonder that the advocates of socialism are finding many disciples?

This is scarcely a striking example of the cooperation and coordination which the government will have to exercise in the solution of post-war employment.

No team work there, and not in agreement with what the Minister of Pensions and National Health said on the subject, the first subject with which he dealt at that time. I suggest that there should be established a new department of government that will integrate all aspects of our economy in its transition from war to peace, problems such as industrial reconversion, readjustment of war workers, demobilization of soldiers, and post-war employment. All the plans for the transition from war to peace must perfectly mesh.

Let there be no mistake; a reemployment division of selective service will not be enough. This war is likely to end in the way it started, that is, in consecutive cycles, not suddenly and abruptly, as did the last great war. And this means that we must be ready now to meet the problems of the aftermath as they arise. The speech from the throne would seem to indicate that the government sees the end of the war in sight, and our entry at a not too far distant date in the era of transition from war to peace. The people of Canada have been very patient in their submission to the greatest network of bureaucratic controls this nation has so far experienced. I charge the government that they have exceeded the limits of vital war necessity and urgency in their rush towards bureaucratic government. The present administration has gone to such lengths in encouraging bureaucracy that our democratic form of government is actually in peril. At this stage of the war's development there cannot any longer be any real necessity for our citizens tolerating the continuance in toto of such a system, which might easily be perpetuated into our peace-time economy.

The rights and privileges of parliament as the trustee and servant of the people which, under the stress of war, have practically ceased to exist must be fully and promptly restored. I believe that our present Prime Minister, in 1935, strangely enough when attacking another government, laid his finger on the most critical spot relative to his own administration now. This is what he said, at page 36, volume 1, of Hansard, 1935:

> I have said that one of the supreme efforts of this administration has been stealthily to alienate the authority and control of parliament, to take power into its own hands and away from parliament with respect to many of the important affairs of the nation.

No words of mine could more adequately be utilized in criticism of the present administration than the Prime Minister's own language on that occasion.

To show how far bureaucracy has gone, let us look at the legislative products since September 1, 1939. I recognize that perhaps this is not the proper yardstick to apply, but it is at least the yardstick which generally indicates the trend. Parliament since that time, the beginning of the war, passed statutes covering 838 pages, a total of 369 thousand words. Proclamations, orders in council, war orders and regulations covered a total of 5,791 pages, with a total of 2,895,500 words. It is a shocking situation and fraught with danger if parliament does not now take the reins of government into its own hands and seal the doom of bureaucratic government. The people are tired and sick of it all. Our party has already declared itself, and I again emphasize that declaration:

> The watchwords of the future must be decentralization, not centralization; cooperation, not state dictation; expanding production, not scarcity; and widening areas of trade, not restrictive practices. The alternatives are continued chaos, on the one hand, or regimentation on the other—chaos with its frustrations, or regimentation with its deadening effect on the impulse to produce, its inevitable tendency toward dictatorship, and the certainty that all material increase will be skimmed off to nourish a growing bureaucracy.

No patriotic citizen of Canada would ask the government, in the midst of urgent war expenditures, to lower the general level of taxation. No such request has yet been made, and I am not making it to-day. No such request is likely to be made. Nevertheless if there shall be some lessening of governmental expenditures in the days ahead, I call upon the administration to give consideration to relieving the small wage-earner in the lower brackets from the comparatively heavy taxation which at present he must endure. He is not kicking. That great section of our population only kicks when they can endure things no longer. It would seem, however, that some relief might properly be given to these people if expenditures are on the down grade and the war pressure is being somewhat lifted. The whole question of the relationship between absenteeism in industry and the income tax should be the subject of much more serious consideration than the government seems to have given the subject to date. Let us not be small as a parliament when we deal with the little men of our nation. Our little men are the biggest assets our country has.

And, speaking of income tax, I want to raise my voice in vehement protest against the complicated methods and procedure used in gathering the taxes from our people. Two things must be wrong, having in mind the confusion among our citizens. Either the incidence of our income tax system is inadequate and impractical, or else the forms on which the returns are made should be altered and changed and simplified. I think nearly every hon. member will agree with me when I say that a lot of people in Canada simply throw up their hands in holy horror and confusion when they see an income tax return. Unless all our people are going to turn into accountants there will be conflict and confusion so long as the present system of levying taxation and making returns in connection with it is followed. People are not nearly so concerned about paying taxes as they are hopelessly confused as to how the taxes are computed. Let us unwind the red tape which surrounds the income tax and make it simpler for the citizens of Canada. Why make a Chinese puzzle out of one of the most important parts of our national business?

Last session I pointed out in vain the necessity for sweeping away a lot of our legislative cobwebs. The Prime Minister thought that war time was not a good time to consider any changes in house rules and procedure, so I lost my case. But, like a lot of other judges who have subsequently found themselves wrong in both facts and law, the Prime Minister has seen fit to now accept my suggestion. He and the nation have, however, lost a year in the meantime; for only now are we to have a special parliamentary committee to see how the House of Commons rules and procedure can be modernized and brought up to date.

Frankly, I have been disgusted and discouraged over the unbusinesslike way in which parliament has been conducting itself. I think the country feels the same. If this nation is to take its part in a new order in a new world, surely it is not too much to expect that parliament shall give a lead in that direction. None of us is wholly blameless for this state of affairs, but surely that is an additional reason why we should seek to reform both parliament and ourselves. We may as well be frank. My remarks last year on the debate on the address were perhaps too long. The Prime Minister himself, I recall, rebuked me at that time for the length of my speech, and then, proceeding to ignore his own advice, he spoke for an hour and a quarter longer than I did. I hope that on this occasion he will follow the advice he gave me at that time and that we shall both show parliament and the country that we are capable of condensing our remarks.

Our system of setting up committees is outmoded and outdated, and we do not operate very well the system we have, either. For proof of this, let us look at our session which has just ended and which covered the major part of 1943. The standing committee on agriculture and colonization did not sit until 115 days had elapsed from the opening of the session. The radio broadcasting committee did not commence its business until 123 days had elapsed from the opening of parliament, while the war expenditures committee began its closed door sessions 171 days after parliament had convened. One of the last things parliament did last session before its adjournment was to set up this war expenditures committee, which should have been convened many months before.

I should observe, I think, at this point that this committee's usefulness was gravely impaired by the fact that the government majority in the committee insisted upon its subcommittee deliberations being in camera. It is about time that the lid was blown off these in-camera sessions of the war expenditures committee. It is little short of a national disgrace that the people of Canada should not know something about the investigations of these contracts. I am opposed to the whole system of pulling down the blinds, closing the shutters and locking the doors when public contracts are being investigated.

As a matter of curiosity and concern I checked up the details in relation to the meetings held by standing committees from 1936 to 1943 inclusive. In those eight years the committee on agriculture and colonization sat in only six of the eight years—that is, it sat only for short times in six out of the eight years—for a total of seventy-one days in the eight years. Yet during that period agriculture passed through one of the most critical and trying stages in its history.

To give some idea as to the outmoded system exemplified by standing committees, I draw the attention of this house to the industrial and international relations committee. It has not sat since 1936, although labour and foreign affairs have constituted, in the meantime, two of the most important matters of national concern. It is hard to imagine that work could not be found for this very important committee during that whole period of time.

Then, again, why should two major matters be lumped together under the umbrella of one committee, while a separate committee sits for such subjects as debates, printing, standing orders and privileges and elections? Four separate committees for these subjects and only one committee to cover the whole area of labour and international relations. The whole thing does not add up. The whole thing does not make sense.

I hope that the new committee will commence its work with courage and determination to see that parliament, its methods, its rules and its procedure are taken out of the mothballs, dusted off, and made to work efficiently for the people of Canada.

To our left and much too far to the left for most people in Canada sits a group in the house to which I desire to direct a few remarks this afternoon. They will not be abusive remarks, because we have to learn in this country that our enemies at the moment do not happen to be Canadian, and, furthermore, that only by calm analysis and the utilization of light rather than heat in dealing with party programmes and policies will this nation get anywhere in the end. I have never cared for violent public denunciations of political parties or their supporters, but I take this opportunity of denying what seems to be an implied claim by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party that they have some monopoly on the will and desire of citizens generally in Canada to see this nation reaching her maximum national stature. No group or no party has a right to make such an implied claim. The Progressive Conservative party yields to none in its desire and, if I may say so, in its capacity, to achieve that objective.

Our party stands for a programme of rational reform, as opposed to a policy, on the one hand, of rigid reaction, and a policy, on the other hand, of reckless revolution. Our party stands pledged to remove the abuses and reform the present system. We will go right up to the precipice on the pathway of rational reform with the C.C.F. or any other party, but at the edge of the precipice we must part company with those who would lose their balance and plunge headlong over the cliff into the unfathomable depths of chaos and revolution below.

Our party stands for a policy of expanding production as the basis of prosperity. Our job, as we conceive it, is to distribute abundance rather than ration scarcity. The economic organization of yesterday was unable to achieve or to sustain that expanding production without which full employment could not be acomplished. State socialism can never achieve it; for socialism is rigid, centralized and coercive. The only hope of a steadily expanding national income lies in the cooperation of the state with all organized enterprise, whether it be private, cooperative or government-owned. As our party sees it, the government must join with those engaged in industry, commerce, agriculture and finance to plan for full, steady and growing production, and complete employment with as little loss of individual freedom as possible. Our party is out to free Canada from the bonds of bureaucracy, while socialism, in our opinion, can only plunge Canada further into the underbrush of red tape and administrative controls.

The policy of the C.C.F. is, to say the least, an elastic one. It stretches all the way from the Pacific coast, where its leader there calls loudly for the militant, revolutionary kind of socialism, with a few policemen and gaols thrown in for good measure, to the easy-going but relatively harmless pie-in-the-sky theories of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). The variation of opinions in the C.C.F. party constitutes a danger signal for the people of Canada, who are anxious to know which way the party is going. Not much wonder the vast majority of farmers in Canada are looking with suspicious eyes upon this movement which never seems to be able to make up its mind how long it would let the farmer mind his own business were it ever to achieve power.

It is a favourite political pastime of some C.C.F. leaders to refer to the "old-line parties". I have no objection if they want to make it singular, because one of the boasts of the present Prime Minister is that Liberalism dates back so far. But Progressive Conservatism cannot truthfully be tied up with any old-fashioned policies or doctrines. From the Winnipeg convention emerged a new policy, and a new leader. Actually, many are of the opinion that old-fashioned parties now in Canada are the Liberals and the C.C.F.'s. Apart altogether from age, however, the C.C.F. party has developed certain characteristics which brand it as a typical old-line party to-day.

I thought that the old days of presenting political promises to the electors of Canada in bushel baskets had gone forever. There was a time not many years ago when people looked down upon the public man who made a speech full of promises. They almost ostracized from society the man who would issue a pamphlet full of promises. That branded the politician as an old-fashioned old-timer in the field. But those days are back again and, strangely enough, ushered in by the party that likes to call itself the herald of the new order. Not only are the promises made in speeches and in pamphlets, but so great has been the volume of promises to the Canadian people that the C.C.F. have had to call in the bookbinders to assist. With all this plethora of promises to swallow, the citizens of Canada will be fortunate if they escape several attacks of acute political indigestion before the next general election. Canada has witnessed nothing like it since confederation. Let Canadians be certain that the cures now being prescribed for our national ills are not worse than the ills they are designed to cure.

The Progressive Conservative party has taken the initiative from one end of the country to the other in the battle against socialism. We are recognized as the main spearhead of Canada's fight against it. When this time comes, we shall call upon all those who oppose socialism, with all its regimentation and bureaucracy, to follow the leadership of John Bracken and the Progressive Conservative party. By that means, and that means only, can Canada stay on the safe road towards rational reform.

It is pretty generally acknowledged throughout the dominion that the present tired, weary administration has lost the confidence of the people of Canada. To look over the present House of Commons and contrast it with the present state of public opinion makes this Commons appear little short of a dream chamber. The government right now controls this parliament by what the Prime Minister in 1935 under parallel circumstances called a "mechanical majority." The weakness of the present administration throughout the country is admitted by its own friends. In its own good time it will be compelled to throw the torch of leadership and responsibility. That torch I predict will be caught by a vigorous Progressive Conservative party led by its able and experienced leader John Bracken, who will be called to save this nation from the chaos of socialism and disaster.

The speech from the throne may properly be said to be a combination of the Winnipeg platform, John Bracken's reform speeches, a death-bed repentance, and several dying declarations. It lacks the real crusading reform spirit to be found in either the Winnipeg manifesto or Mr. Bracken's subsequent addresses, but the effect of both of these factors can be seen in many parts of the throne address. The character of the speech indicates that the Prime Minister has momentarily taken an eye off the war and is now looking over his broken-down political fences.

I was under the impression that the present Prime Minister did not like reform programmes ushered in close to the time of a general appeal to the public. My belief was based upon the Prime Minister's words as found in his address as leader of the opposition in a similar debate to this in 1935, when the then administration brought down its reform for security plan. On that occasion the present Prime Minister, standing where I am to-day, had this to say:

> In other words, I want votes, that is why the Prime Minister to-day brings in this programme of social reform so-called, on the eve of an election. . . .
> Looking at the speech from the throne, I have come to the conclusion that his policies are a sort of omnium gatherum. They are intended to take in a little of everything he can discover in anybody's policy.

How applicable the Prime Minister's words of 1935 now become in relation to the present speech from the throne. I toss them back to the Prime Minister as an appropriate comment on the present government's programme, and I repeat the Prime Minister's own words:

> . . . his policy is intended to take in a little of everything he can discover in anybody's policy.

And I go further along the pathway then chosen by the present Prime Minister when he urged upon another prime minister at that time to bring down at once the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne, in order that it may receive the careful scrutiny and consideration of the elected representatives of the people.

Let us get this programme down out of the clouds to where we can see what it really is. It may well be that these lofty high-sounding phrases mean very little in the way of reform to the Canadian people. I hope that it will prove more than a smoke-screen to blind the electors so that they cannot see the tragic failure of this government's administration. The government has done some attractive political window-dressing. Let us see now what they have on the shelves inside. What is on the shelves is what counts. Let the government bring forward its measures so they can be judged by what they are, not by what the government hints they may be. No speech from the throne in itself ever accomplished anything for the Canadian people. All the vague generalizations this one contains will accomplish nothing either. Let us have the measures which the government proposes. They alone can do anything for Canada. Then we shall see wherein the government's plans are adequate or inadequate to meet the challenging problems of these days.

Turning to the speech from the throne, this is what we find:

Mutual aid for destitute populations! No one opposes that. Let the measure be brought down.

Expansion of world trade? No thinking person but supports that. Bring forward the measure, not a promise.

National security and enduring peace by international cooperation! Brave words that have become hackneyed by over-use. No one in the world but prays for that. Bring down the bill.

A national minimum of social security, full employment, a higher standard of nutrition, more adequate housing, social insurance against unemployment, accident, ill health, old age and death of the bread-winner! Why has the government let eight years pass by without these? No one opposes these principles. Introduce the bills so that they may be enacted into law.

Rehabilitation and reestablishment of returned soldiers! Transformation of war-time to peace-time economy, insurance against social and economic hazards! Let us have, not words, but specific proposals. Adequate plans will find no objectors.

War service gratuities! By all means, and as quickly as our parliamentary system will permit, and let us err on the side of generosity when we are doing it. Tax modifications! This government seems to know how to modify them only one way—upwards for all, which has led to absenteeism by many, even when maximum production is needed as never before.

Expansion of trade commissioner service! A belated admission of previous failure. Research activities! The government's record in this respect is one of lost opportunities.

Housing plans! Health insurance! How long have these been promised, now to be resurrected in an election year? I suggest that the government bring in the legislation as soon as possible.

More generous old age pensions! We are in favour, but the government's repentance in an election year carries no sense of confidence.

A minimum of well-being for the children of the nation by family allowances! After two decades of opportunity to do so the government now in its dying days makes a preelection bid for votes. There is a problem to be met in the care and health and training of children, and it should be met without delay. Until we see the legislation, however, we are unable to tell whether or not this high national purpose will thereby be achieved. Let us have the bill forthwith.

Floor prices for agricultural products! The government in this, as in other matters, will be judged by its actions, not its promises. Not until the fifth year of war did fair treatment for agriculture occur to them. They let many agricultural prices remain at less than half what they are to-day for long periods after they came into power. What will the wheat growers, who got sixty cents a bushel or less for their wheat, and live stock men, who suffered equally, and dairy farmers, who were producing cheese and butter and milk and eggs far below the cost of production—what will all these think of a government which waited eight years to suggest a floor price, and then only after our party had proposed it? Nearly every agricultural commodity has, within the life of this government, sold at less than half of to-day's figure. Why no floor price till the government is threatened with defeat?

Our criticism of this government in these matters is that for eight years it has not brought forward enough progressive social or agriculture or labour legislation, and only now, in an election year, comes forward with these dying declarations.

Not as a challenge to the general principles of this overdue programme announced by the government in the speech from the throne but rather as a protest against certain grave omissions therein, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) the following amendment:

That the following words be added to the address in reply to the speech from the throne:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have:

(a) Failed to make adequate provision and to implement promises already made for the immediate needs and employment of the men and women of the armed forces on demobilization;

(b) Failed to provide adequate measures whereby agriculture can make its maximum war- and peace-time contribution through a stable and effective long-term programme;

(c) Failed to establish such a national code for labour as will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful place in our national partnership; and failed to provide for the correction of the unfairly coercive and restrictive clauses in the 1943 wartime wages control order;

(d) Failed to lessen bureaucratic controls and regimentation and to recognize and restore the supremacy of parliament; and failed to halt the continuing infringement of provincial rights and the centralization of authority.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), when he began to address the house this afternoon, craved its indulgence because, as he said, he intended to follow very closely the notes which he had before him. I must crave the indulgence of the house if I attempt to speak without any notes. To tell the truth I have not had time to write out a lengthy speech, nor have I had the good fortune of having others who would write it for me. What the house and the country will be particularly interested to know is whether the speech to which we have just listened is that of the hon. leader of the opposition, whom I see immediately opposite, or whether it is the speech of the leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the Prime Minister serious? I know he was indulging in a little humour at the beginning of his speech, and I do not want to answer him if it is one of those humorous quips of his; but I cannot imagine that he is serious in what he is saying. However, if he wants an answer to what he has said I shall be glad to give it to him. I made the speech myself, and any speech given in this house by me has been prepared by myself. I want the Prime Minister to accept that statement, because I do not want him or anyone else to make any insinuations with regard to any leader. I do not think it becomes the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am much obliged to my hon. friend for the statement he has just made, because I would repeat that what I think the people of Canada are interested in particularly, what hon. members are interested in, is not the views of my hon. friend or his qualifications for preparing orations, but the views of the leader of the Conservative party in this country. We have opposite a great party that over a year ago chose a new leader, and the country is anxious to know the views of that leader. It is anxious to have those views expressed in this parliament. May I say at once, since my hon. friend has brought the name of Mr. John Bracken into the debate this afternoon, and has spoken of John Bracken's bill of rights, of the Winnipeg convention at which John Bracken was elected, and much else connected with John Bracken, that I believe not only hon. members of this house but the people of Canada generally are anxious to see John Bracken in person, and if he is to continue as leader of his party to see him in this House of Commons.

Apart from all else, as the leader of this House of Commons, I have a certain obligation to the house to see that long and honourable traditions are maintained. I would draw the attention of hon. members and of the country to the extent to which in Canada we are departing from the spirit of representative parliamentary institutions. It may come as a surprise to some to learn that though we are now in the fifth session of the nineteenth parliament, during all that time since this parliament opened, the great party opposite has not had a leader in the House of Commons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh! That is pretty tough on me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. My hon. friend was not leader; he was acting leader.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was the leader until I retired.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend acted very well at times and sometimes very badly.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose that applies to the Prime Minister too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman was not leader of the Conservative party. May I draw this further fact to the attention of the house. The Conservative party, or the Progressive Conservative party, or whatever name it went by at the time, has not had a leader elected to the House of Commons during the life of this parliament. There have been two leaders of the party who have not been returned to this House of Commons during this parliament. The late Hon. Doctor Manion was the leader of the party at the time of the last election. Doctor Manion was defeated. My hon. friend (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury) has said he acted as leader until the party was in a position to choose a leader. Then the party chose a leader. As was expected under our system of government where all who take a part in parliamentary proceedings are supposed to represent the people, are supposed to have a constituency which they represent, the leader first chosen, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, went before the people in his capacity as leader, asking to be returned for a constituency that he might take his seat in this House of Commons. He was defeated; he was not returned, and the party continued on without its leader in the House of Commons. That lasted for thirteen months. Then we had this Winnipeg convention at which John Bracken was elected, and at which he began to put forth bills of rights or other documents of high importance to legislative bodies. But up to the present time John Bracken has not found a seat. He represents nobody so far as representation in this House of Commons is concerned. I say—

Mr. GRAYDON: That would be more applicable to my right hon. friend than to Mr. Bracken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I say, standing here speaking for the rights of the people in their parliament, that the only man who has a right to speak in the name of the people as a leader is one who occupies a seat in this parliament or who has received the approval of the electorate, giving him the right to speak as a representative. The fact that Mr. Bracken sat in a provincial legislature for a number of years does not entitle him to be regarded as a representative of the people of Canada at this time in dealing with the public affairs of this parliament; much less does it entitle him to put forth bills of rights and have those bills of rights quoted in this House of Commons when he himself is not here to stand up for them.

May I direct the attention of my hon. friend, since he has referred to a "bill of rights," to the fact that the Bill of Rights was an important statute enacted for the purpose of securing to the Commons of Britain, and to the parliament of Britain, its rights and privileges. One of the rights and privileges of free people is that there shall be a free parliament, and that their representatives shall sit in that parliament to determine the laws and policies that are to govern. What is to become of parliamentary institutions if we begin to substitute for membership in the House of Commons itself, or in parliament itself, some form of absentee leadership? That is a new development in the political life of our country—absentee leadership over a period of years.

My hon. friend knows that so far as this side of the house is concerned we have been prepared to facilitate the entry of Mr. Bracken into the House of Commons—

Mr. GRAYDON: As you did for Mr. Meighen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The people expressed their opinion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that any leader who cannot obtain a seat is not one who ought longer to claim the right to lead a political party.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend was in exactly that position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am just directing attention to the change that is coming over the spirit of our political institutions when it begins to be the custom to have leaders of parties, who claim they are to be at the head of an alternative government after a general election, direct their followings from outside parliament altogether.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Your friend Mitch Hepburn did that, did he not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is no example.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was your friend then.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That makes the position of my hon. friends worse and worse.

Mr. PERLEY: He succeeded.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, this is not a joking matter. It is not for me to say what road, either to success or to ruin, the hon. gentlemen opposite should take as we approach a general election, but it is for me in my position as leader of this House of Commons to point out that the place for the leader of a political party which hopes to be in a position to form a government, is in the House of Commons in the position of leader of the opposition.

May I here direct attention to the pertinancy of what I have just said. Parliament has given to the position of leader of the opposition a place of exceptional significance and importance. There has been assigned by statute to the leader of the opposition a position which places upon him certain definite obligations, one of which is to be in parliament and to watch the administration, to criticize the administration fairly, and presumably also to make known what alternative policies he would present to those which are being proposed. He draws a salary similar to that of the members of the government. Now, I submit that parliament never intended that that position should be occupied by someone acting in the place of the leader of the party, however amiable and delightful he himself might be. Considering the importance of the great questions which have to be decided in this parliament this year, I hope that before very long the leader of the Conservative party opposite will find it possible—if it is possible at all for him to do so—to get into this House of Commons and let us have the opportunity to debate these questions face to face.

May I point out also the invidious position in which I am placed if I venture to take issue with anything that Mr. Bracken may say; immediately it will be said that Mr. King is saying something in the absence of the person who has made the statement. Well, I wish to say what I have to say to Mr. Bracken in his presence, and I want that presence to be here in the House of Commons. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will believe that the government is most sincere when I say, on behalf of the government, that if, in any way, we can facilitate Mr. Bracken's entry to this House of Commons at an early stage in this session we shall be happy to do so, because I believe the people of this country have the right to see, not how Mr. Bracken performs in matters of political organization outside this house, but how he conducts himself in matters of debate here when the house is in session.

I have said what I have said because my hon. friend attached so much importance in the course of his remarks to Mr. Bracken and his bill of rights. With much of what my hon. friend has otherwise said I am in accord. He did endorse in many directions a large part of the proposed legislation which is put forth in the speech from the throne.

Mr. GRAYDON: Look where it came from.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend now says, "Look where it came from". But he does not deny he has endorsed much of what the government has proposed to this parliament, and for that I wish to thank him.

I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) said he was going to save time and cut short his remarks in that particular. It is one of the traditions of the House of Commons that when hon. members speak at the opening of a session some cognizance should be taken of the manner in which they speak on such an important occasion. I for one, being rather fond of preserving traditions where they are worthy of preservation, have great pleasure this afternoon in complimenting most warmly both the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay) and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) upon their splendid utterances in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The leader of the opposition has drawn attention to the fact that, for some years, both hon. gentlemen have been members of this house, that both are veterans of the last war, that both are on active service in the present war, performing useful service in our country, and that both have regretted that for reasons which are apparent they do not find it possible to serve overseas. However, each has been setting a fine example to others by the manner in which he has sought to serve the country's interests both in parliament and in the armed forces. These hon. members are similar in the respects which I have mentioned. They are similar also in another respect which is important at this time. They are the fathers of fairly large families, and as such are in a position to speak not only as veterans on such matters as demobilization and rehabilitation of the forces, but, also as heads of families on the significance of the social legislation which is proposed in the speech from the throne. I am glad they have expressed themselves so strongly in favour of it.

There is one other point I should like to mention in regard to these two hon. gentlemen. One comes to us from the province of Quebec; he is of a race and religion different from that of the other hon. gentleman, who comes to us from the prairie provinces. In the speeches delivered by these two hon. gentlemen, however, we find that unity—unity in diversity—which is perhaps the greatest of all the outstanding features of our country. We are a united country, though we may have diverse elements; and our unity could not have been better exemplified than it was in the two admirable addresses which were delivered on Friday last.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition began his remarks, quite rightly, by emphasizing the fact that the war is continuing, and that it was or should be the most important of all considerations before us at this time. Later, however, in the course of his remarks my hon. friend said that he thought either the speech from the throne or the government itself had given evidence of a belief that the war would be over somewhat soon. May I immediately take exception to any statement of the kind. I wish I could say to this House of Commons that I believed the war was nearing an end. It is perfectly true that conditions are much better than they were a year ago. We have great reason to be thankful for the tremendous gains which have been made in the course of the past year; that the Germans have been driven out of Africa; that Italy has surrendered unconditionally; that the Italian fleet is now under the control of the allied powers; that Sicily has been successfully invaded and liberated, and that Italy has been invaded. We can be thankful that the Russians have had such great successes, and also that on the other side of the world the United States, Australian, New Zealand and British forces have had the great successes which they have achieved up to the present in their battles against the Japanese. But it remains true as far as both Germany and Japan are concerned that to-day these countries still occupy a very considerable proportion of conquered territory, and that the fighting is still taking place on that conquered territory. In Europe, while Russia is making a magnificent fight, the Germans are still on Russian soil. In Italy, while the British, United States and Canadian forces, and others allied with them, are making a magnificent fight, the Germans still are in possession of the greater part of that country. At the present time Germany is surrounded by a group of conquered countries which serve as outer defences to her immediate territory. Those countries which have been overrun are providing Germany at present with resources which she needs, in the way of man-power, food and raw materials. Their peoples are being made to work and to serve the interests of Germany, which itself remains a perfectly intact fortress. Similarly in the orient Japan controls the many countries and islands which she has taken from the Netherlands, the British and others, and Japan is being supplied with labour and materials in a way which helps to serve her ends and needs.

So, Mr. Speaker, while we have great reason to be thankful for the progress which has been made, it would be wrong to assume that there is like reason to believe that there will be an early conclusion to this war. I have followed the progress of the war, I think, as closely as any man in Canada, and I am sure I am only giving the experience of others who have sought to follow it closely, as well as my own, when I say that I have been surprised at how long it has taken, in the light of the expectations that have been cherished, to reach the different objectives that have been attained along the way. Let me remind hon. members here of what their views were at the time Africa was invaded by the United States armies, and at the time the British were fighting along the north coast of that continent. It was thought first that it would be a matter of only a few weeks before the Germans and Italians were driven out, then of a few months, but as it turned out a very much longer time was required. When this house adjourned last July our forces, along with British and American forces, had entered Sicily. We thought it was going to be a matter of only a short time until Sicily and then Italy were conquered. Certainly when the Italian mainland had been successfully invaded by the allied forces it was felt that it would be only a short time until Rome would be in the possession of the allied powers. Well, Rome is not yet under allied control, and no one can say how long the Italian campaign may last.

We know that in all probability Europe is to be invaded from the west as well as the east and south, but does anyone realize how difficult that invasion is going to be? I want this afternoon to leave that thought, above all others, with hon. members of this house. As I see it, our country, in common with Great Britain and the United States, is facing as appalling a situation as these countries have faced at any time. I do not wish to exaggerate the difficulty of invading Europe, but I do wish to draw attention to the fact that invasion means not merely a successful landing of troops on the continent of Europe and the combined action of different armed forces, but also that once men are on the soil of Europe they have to be maintained there. And they will have to be maintained with supplies brought, in large part, from this continent, across the Atlantic. I need not go into details, because I think hon. members have a pretty clear conception of what the facts of the situation will be. But I do say at once to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada that I am far from believing there is going to be an early conclusion to this war. For that reason I believe parliament must continue to make the winning of the war its first and main objective.

Listening to my hon. friend this afternoon I must say I was surprised, particularly when he dwelt at such length upon matters pertaining to general elections compared with the time he devoted to the present situation in Europe.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was going by the speech from the throne.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, my hon. friend has his own responsibility.

Mr. GRAYDON: So does the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has his own responsibility.

Mr. GRAYDON: The speech from the throne was filled with everything except the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend spoke on his own responsibility, and it was for him to do what I am seeking to do now, namely, to impress the house with the importance of winning the war, before all else.

My hon. friend has just said that he was following the speech from the throne. May I repeat to the house the paragraph which I believe to be the most important appearing in the speech from the throne. It is in these words:

> The winning of the war clearly remains the first of all objectives. My ministers believe it is their duty to see that Canada's war effort is firmly maintained until the enemy is defeated in Europe and in Asia. They believe the government's primary task, and the primary duty of the Canadian people, is to concentrate on the prosecution of the war. Our fighting men must be assured that there will be no diversion from this vital task and no relaxation of Canada's war effort. Till the war is won, the policies of my government will continue to be shaped to that end.

That is the policy of the present administration. In so far as it lies within our power, we intend, in the house, to endeavour to concentrate on measures relating to the winning of the war, until the war is won—and not, I pray, to devote our time to too great consideration of matters which may be more concerned with the winning of elections than with the winning of the war.

Before proceeding further, may I say, so that hon. members may know exactly where the government stands in relation to elections, that I have already made clear to the people of Canada, in an address last September, at a time when members of different parties were saying that we were going to have a general election before the end of the year, that so far as I was concerned, and so far as the government was concerned, we hoped to carry through to the end the trust which had been given to us by the Canadian people, when they returned us to power, a trust that we would put forth the utmost effort in the winning of the war, and direct the affairs of Canada to that end. We intend to do that. Unless prevented, in some way which it would be impossible to control, from carrying on the affairs of government as they must be carried on if we are to win the war, we intend to continue with that work, and not to interrupt it by any general election until the war is won. The people of Canada do not want a general election at this time of war. Our men fighting overseas do not want an election, if it can be avoided, until after victory is achieved, and we are in a position to welcome them and all our armed forces home as a victorious army.

A prime minister is placed in a very difficult position when he is asked to give any undertaking to the country that he will not, in any circumstance, have a general election. It is running counter to the spirit of British institutions, when as regards the time of an appeal to the people any government binds itself in any final way. For that reason I have found it necessary, as I do to-day, to say that situations may arise in which it will be impossible for the government to carry on, with the authority it should have in a time of war. Some questions might arise which would make it necessary that an appeal to the people be made to settle an issue, and get on with the work of winning the war. I see no reason for either at the present time. I have no desire for and no thought of seeking to find an issue of the kind. What I am determined to do, if God gives me health and strength, is to stay in the position I am in at the present time until this war is won. Then, if circumstances warrant, the people will be given their full rights and powers to decide as to what administration they may wish to have in office during the next parliament, whether they wish the present administration to be returned to office or some other to take its place.

I have not forgotten the fact that there is a constitutional limitation upon the duration of a parliament. But this parliament may continue, I believe, until June of next year, if that should be necessary—the war continuing, meanwhile. And, short of that, I repeat it is the intention of this administration, with the cooperation of members of parliament generally, to carry on with the prosecution of the war to the utmost limit of our power.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister one question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I understood him correctly, on another occasion he said he was opposed to any extension of the life of parliament; is that so?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I am opposed to parliaments extending their own terms of office. I think one of the greatest mistakes made in this country was the extension by one parliament of its own term of office. I cannot say what situation might exist a year or more hence, at which time it might be necessary for parliament carefully to weigh all aspects of the situation. But, certainly, unless there are very strong reasons to the contrary, I would wish to see no extension of the term of parliament, and to see the people secured in their full rights to return to this House of Commons for the period allotted under the constitution the government they wish to represent them.

I have made this statement mainly in the hope hon. members will realize that so far as possible their first duty is to cooperate with the government in getting on with war measures. I am sure they will so regard the situation.

Before saying a further word, however, I should like to join in what has been said by the leader of the opposition respecting our armed forces, what we in Canada think of our fighting men and the part they have taken in the war. It is difficult to realize that to-day some of the men who are serving overseas have spent no less than five of their Christmas seasons away from home. If one stops to think what that means in the way of privation to men who have the great duties and responsibilities which all of them have, one will appreciate what is owing to these men. I do not confine my remarks to the men who have been longest in the forces—naturally they are very much in our minds—but I say that this parliament of Canada is prouder than words can express of the manner in which the men and women in the armed forces of Canada have borne their part in this titanic struggle.

I do not speak merely of the growth of the forces. We know how the navy has expanded, as well as the army and the air force. We know what has been done in the way of the production of munitions and supplies of all kinds. I am not thinking of quantities or numbers; I am thinking of individual human lives and of what each life in the fighting forces of Canada to-day represents in the way of personal hardship endured and service given to our country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And sacrifice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And sacrifice. I was coming to that in just a moment. I should like those who are in the armed forces to-day, whether they are serving at sea, in the air or on land, to know that they are first and foremost in the minds of the Canadian people. We want them to know that we are proud of their skill, of their endurance, of their achievements, and that we intend to see that they are not disappointed in the backing which they will expect to receive from the people's representatives in the House of Commons and members of the Senate of their country.

I have not the time to-day to go into many of the matters to which my hon. friend has referred. I agree with him that it is desirable that we should seek to reform in some particulars some of the things to which perhaps we have grown too accustomed. As my hon. friend has frankly stated, one of these is the length of speeches. I gladly accept his challenge made this afternoon and would say at once that I intend to make only a few remarks before concluding, except on one subject about which I am obliged to speak at a little greater length. I should like to see this House of Commons get down to business just as quickly as it possibly can. We have a heavy legislative programme.

In connection with the carrying out of our programme, it has been suggested that the rules of the house should be revised. As the leader of the opposition has pointed out, the government has decided to have a committee appointed immediately to undertake a revision of the rules and procedure. It is true that I took exception last session to this committee being appointed on the score that I did not think it was wise in a time of war to revise the rules and procedure of the House of Commons. But I have since come to the conclusion that this war may be much longer than some of us believed at the time I made that particular statement, and I think it is as well that we should at once take cognizance of the necessity of making some revisions of our rules and procedure to enable us the better to cope with legislation pertaining to the conduct of the war itself. I am prepared to say this afternoon that if hon. members are agreeable the government will, if necessary, interrupt the debate on the speech from the throne to enable committees to be appointed immediately. I am informed that the striking committee already has a list of the names of those who are to be on the standing committees, and we should therefore be in a position to have these committees constituted immediately. It is the intention of the government to have some of the committees that existed last session reestablished, namely, the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation, and the committee on social security. I understand that the names of the members of those committees are ready to be presented to the house at any moment. There is also the committee on war expenditures and the committee on radio broadcasting.

A new committee having to do with the elections act is to be established in order to ensure adequate facilities for voting by members of the armed forces wherever they may happen to be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it intended that the activities of that committee and the legislation to be brought down after it has made its report will be limited only to the taking of the soldier vote, or is there to be a general revision?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is a revision with reference to the vote of members of the armed forces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what we understood.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that covers the committees that the government has in mind reconstituting or appointing at the present time. Those committees may be appointed at once.

I have another suggestion which I should like to make to hon. members, and I hope they will consider it favourably. I am not putting it forward at the moment or until I learn at first-hand the sense of the house. I believe with members generally that much more of the work of parliament could and should be done by committees, and that we would save much general discussion if that were more largely adopted as a method of procedure. We have been accustomed to sitting just half a day on Wednesdays. I believe that we would make more progress during the session if one day in the week were reserved entirely for the work of committees. Members of parliament complain that they cannot serve on committees and watch proceedings in the house at the same time. I am sure it would be a convenience to members generally if there were one day which they could devote entirely to the work of the committees.

Mr. GRAYDON: Now that the right hon. gentleman has brought up this matter, has he given any thought to an alternative scheme under which the time of parliament could be utilized to better effect with a different division of work as between the committees and the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I have given a good deal of thought to it. One aspect to which necessarily I have had to give the most thought is how the government itself can adequately cope with the questions that come before it from day to day as the issues become larger and more serious, with the war reaching the stage which it has reached at the present time. As hon. members know, the cabinet is obliged to meet every day. In addition there is the war committee of the cabinet which is concerned immediately with policy in respect to all the important matters that come up in connection with the war. Ministers of the crown cannot, I believe, give the time that is needed for the careful consideration of the war and other measures that come before this parliament during a war session at the stage the war has now reached without having some day which they can regard more or less as their own for purposes of careful consideration of the different measures. I believe that if, after all committees are appointed, it were generally understood that Wednesdays would be devoted to the work of committees, we would be serving alike the interests of parliament and the interests of the nation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister is suggesting that there should be no Wednesday sitting?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am suggesting that for consideration. But that would not mean for a minute that the members will not be fully occupied. I think the public would understand that there will be plenty of work for all to do. It will result, I believe, in a fuller attendance in the house when we are dealing with important matters, and in much less discussion and help to avoid undue prolongation of the sessions.

I shall leave it to my colleagues in the government to take up other matters which have been referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Graydon).

There is, however, one question which I shall necessarily have to deal with because it has become an issue in the country at the present time. The leader of the opposition stated that he noticed that the speech from the throne had to do with international organization—but that it made no special reference to what I presume he meant were the constitutional relations within the empire. My hon. friend himself made no statement on that important question. May I say to him that I think the country will wish to know where the Progressive Conservative party stands on the question raised of the relations of the different parts of the empire, as it will wish to know where the government stands and where the other parties represented in this house also stand.

May I say that I hope the debate on the address will not be made the occasion for the discussion at length of matters that pertain to external affairs. There is an appropriate time for different subjects to be discussed. I would myself have preferred to say nothing whatever to-day on the matter to which I have just referred if it were not that statements have been made from sources I cannot ignore, and the country is expecting that I should make a statement of the government's position. But there will be during the course of the session an opportunity, when the estimates of the Department of External Affairs are before us, to discuss fully all matters of foreign policy, and I would hope that that would be the time at which such further discussion as may be necessary on some at least of these matters would take place.

I notice in a dispatch from Britain that on January 27 the question was raised in the House of Commons at Westminster as to whether the government did not think a debate on empire affairs at this stage was necessary in view of certain views recently expressed on empire relationship. The acting leader of the house, the deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, said that he thought such a discussion would not at that stage serve a useful purpose, and that other opportunities might come. I mention this simply that hon. members will see I am not taking a different view in suggesting another time for the discussion of foreign affairs than in the debate on the address. I am not seeking to rule out such a discussion, but I am seeking indirectly to shorten, if that is possible, the time that most certainly would be taken by such a discussion in the debate on the address.

The question that has come very much to the fore in the last few days is whether there is to be a common policy for all parts of the empire or commonwealth on foreign relations, defence and other matters—a single or common policy as distinct from each nation of the British commonwealth having its own policy on foreign affairs, on defence and on other matters. Let me say at once that, so far as consultation is concerned and cooperation in matters of foreign affairs, defence and the like, as between the different parts of the British empire or the British commonwealth of nations, whichever one prefers to call it, I feel that there cannot be too close consultation and cooperation. I feel that too great an effort cannot be made to ensure careful coordination of these policies, and for my part, wherever opportunity has presented itself in the past or may present itself in the future, I intend to do all that lies within my power to see that there is, among the different nations of the British commonwealth of nations, full consultation, cooperation and coordination, where possible, of all of these particular policies.

I have no very great fear that this consultation and cooperation will not take place. It has steadily grown during the past couple of decades. We have reached to-day an effective method of consultation and cooperation that has not been surpassed at any time in the history of the British empire. It is capable, I believe, in certain particulars, of further development. The whole development, I would say, has been towards perfecting arrangements for effective consultation and cooperation on all matters of common interest and concern.

The suggestion of an organization of the relations between the different self-governing parts of the empire or nations of the commonwealth which would help to centralize their activities is not a new one. It has been made time and again over many years in the past, and each time it has come up for consideration some assurance has been given, where it has been dealt with at imperial conferences or meetings of premiers, that the nations of the commonwealth need not fear in the least any invasion of their complete autonomy in shaping their own policies. I should like to give the house in succession the assurances that have been given at different imperial conferences. Here may I say that I regret that this question should come up at this time, because I do think, involving as it does discussion in the press, in public assemblies and elsewhere, it is to a very considerable extent taking the minds of the people off the immediate thing, which is the winning of the war. Why we need worry to-day about the form of organization which the empire is going to take after the war, I cannot understand. I think the thing to-day is to win the war, and when the war is won there will be plenty of time to consider what changes in organization, if any, may be necessary.

Just at this point, lest I should forget it, I have been asked the question at different times whether an address which was recently made in Toronto and which dealt with this particular subject had been brought to my attention before it was delivered. I wish to say to the house that I had no knowledge whatever of what was to be said or of what actually was said until after that particular address was made.

Near the close of the last war there was what was known as the imperial war conference of 1917. The suggestion was made by that conference that there should be a meeting for the purpose of considering constitutional relations within the empire. From that day to the present no conference that has been held in Britain has sought in any way to attempt to form an organization which would deprive in any particular the different legislative bodies of the commonwealth of full control over their own affairs.

The first conference of prime ministers which was held after the war took place in 1921. At that conference—I believe that Canada was represented by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen—the following resolution was passed:

> The prime ministers of the United Kingdom and the dominions, having carefully considered the recommendation of the imperial war conference of 1917 that a special imperial conference should be summoned as soon as possible after the war to consider the constitutional relations of the component parts of the empire, have reached the following conclusions:
> (a) Continuous consultation to which the prime ministers attach no less importance than the imperial war conference of 1917, can only be secured by a substantial improvement in the communications between the component parts of the empire. Having regard to the constitutional developments since 1917, no advantage is to be gained by holding a constitutional conference.

That was the view taken after the last war, in 1921, that no advantage would be gained by having a conference to deal with these particular questions of constitutional relations within the empire.

The next imperial conference came in 1923. I was present at that conference, as one of the representatives of Canada. That conference had occasion to deal with questions of foreign relations, communications, signature and ratification of treaties, and matters of defence. The position taken by the conference in these matters is set out very clearly in the following statement, under "Foreign Affairs". After the conference had discussed foreign affairs at some length the statement concludes:

> This conference is a conference of representatives of the several governments of the empire; its views and conclusions on foreign policy, as recorded above, are necessarily subject to the action of the governments and parliaments of the various portions of the empire, and it trusts that the results of its deliberations will meet with their approval.

There was this statement with regard to defence:

> The conference gave special consideration to the question of defence and the manner in which cooperation and mutual assistance could best be effected, after taking into account the political and geographical conditions of the various parts of the empire.
> The conference affirms that it is necessary to provide for the adequate defence of the territories and trade of the several countries comprising the British empire. In this connection the conference expressly recognizes that it is for the parliaments of the several parts of the empire, upon the recommendations of their respective governments, to decide the nature and extent of any action which should be taken by them.

The next conference came in 1926. I was also present at that conference. It was not until 1926 that any conference attempted to develop what might be known as a formula which would set out the existing relations between the different parts of the empire; but at that conference a committee, which was headed by the late Lord Balfour, did present a statement which was adopted by the conference, and which set out in the clearest manner possible the views of the different representatives as to interimperial relations. I read from the report of the conference of 1926:

> All the questions on the agenda affecting interimperial relations were referred by the conference to a committee of prime ministers and heads of delegations, of which Lord Balfour was asked to be chairman.

The committee reported as follows:

> We were appointed at the meeting of the imperial conference on October 25, 1926, to investigate all the questions on the agenda affecting interimperial relations. Our discussions on these questions have been long and intricate. We found, on examination, that they involved consideration of fundamental principles affecting the relations of the various parts of the British empire inter se, as well as the relations of each part to foreign countries. For such examination the time at our disposal has been all too short. Yet we hope that we may have laid a foundation on which subsequent conferences may build.

I quote further:

The committee are of the opinion that nothing would be gained by attempting to lay down a constitution for the British empire. Its widely scattered parts have very different characteristics, very different histories, and are at very different stages of evolution; while, considered as a whole, it defies classification and bears no real resemblance to any other political organization which now exists or has ever yet been tried.

There is, however, one most important element in it which, from a strictly constitutional point of view, has now, as regards vital matters, reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the dominions. Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

And a little further down:

Every self-governing member of the empire is now the master of its destiny.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that no words could be clearer than those in defining the present position; and I must say that the position as thus defined is the position which this government accepts as the present one and which it desires to see maintained.

In regard to defence:

The conference gave much consideration to the question of defence, and to the methods by which the defence arrangements of each part of the empire could be most effectively coordinated.

In dealing with defence the first item that is set forth is this:

The resolutions on defence adopted at the last session of the conference are reaffirmed.

The statement there of what was reaffirmed at the previous conference is:

The conference affirms that it is necessary to provide for the adequate defence of the territories and trade of the several countries comprising the British empire. In this connection the conference expressly recognizes that it is for the parliaments of the several parts of the empire, upon the recommendations of their respective governments, to decide the nature and extent of any action which should be taken by them.

There was, I believe, a further conference in 1930 which was attended by Mr. Bennett. I have looked through the proceedings and am unable to see anything which in any way alters the force of the position that was taken at previous conferences in regard to inter-imperial relations. There was an economic conference which was held in this city in 1932, but it did not touch the question of inter-imperial constitutional relations. There was a further conference in London in 1937, the year of the coronation. I had again the honour of representing Canada, along with others, at that conference. At that conference foreign affairs, defence and constitutional questions were all on the agenda for discussion. I have a copy of the report of the conference and this is what is stated with respect to foreign affairs and defence. The chairman made the following statement:

Though we shall discuss other important subjects, we are agreed that questions of foreign affairs and defence shall be our main subjects.

During the discussion emphasis was laid on the importance of developing the practice of communication and consultation between different governments as a help to the coordination of policies.

The conference recorded the results of its deliberations on the subject of foreign affairs, and this is the pertinent paragraph:

While no attempt was made to formulate commitments, which in any event could not be made effective until approved and confirmed by the respective parliaments, the representatives of the governments concerned found themselves in close agreement upon a number of general propositions . . . they declared their intention of continuing to consult and cooperate. . . .

And in the matter of defence—

The conference gave close attention to the subject of defence, and considered ways in which it would be possible for the governments concerned to cooperate in measures for their own security.

In the course of the discussions, the conference found general agreement among its members that the security of each of their countries can be increased by cooperation in such matters as the free interchange of information concerning the state of their naval, military and air forces, the continuance of the arrangements already initiated by some of them for concerting the scale of the defences of ports, and measures for cooperation in the defence of communications and other common interests. At the same time the conference recognized that it is the sole responsibility of the several parliaments of the British commonwealth to decide the nature and scope of their own defence policy.

At that conference I made a statement of Canada's position in regard to imperial conferences, and the place that they occupy in settling matters of policy. I will read it to the house because it is the position which, if I were attending a conference of prime ministers later in the year, as I may, I would wish to maintain at that time.

The task of an imperial conference has been well defined as that of considering whether the several governments represented, while preserving their individual rights of decision and action, can coordinate their various policies in such a way as to assist one another, and help forward the cause of peace. Its function is not to formulate or declare policy. The value of this, as of other imperial conferences, lies mainly in the free exchange of information and opinion; in furnishing the representatives of the several governments with more adequate knowledge of the problems, the difficulties, the aspirations, the attitudes of other members of the British commonwealth of nations; and in giving that direct and immediate understanding of the national and personal factors in the situation which cannot well be obtained by correspondence or indirect communication. With this further knowledge in their possession, the representatives of each government, in consultation with their colleagues and their respective parliaments, are in the best of positions to formulate policies on questions where cooperation is required.

It will be seen that at all the conferences I have mentioned, it was clearly stated that the governments and parliaments of the different countries represented would formulate and decide their own policies, that the conferences were for purposes of consultation to help to make cooperation more effective in the coordinating of policies. It was not for the conferences to formulate policies.

I wonder very much whether those who are speaking about more effective consultation, cooperation and coordination, begin to appreciate how much has been achieved in that direction, how completely there are existing throughout the British commonwealth of nations to-day most effective means of consultation and of cooperation in everything that affects policy, whether it is foreign policy or defence, or communications, or any other particular matter. Let me very quickly mention just what some of those means are.

In the first place there is the communication which takes place between the governments of the different countries. This government receives every day several communications from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs bringing to our attention matters that are of concern to the different nations of the commonwealth. Our government communicates every day more or less, I think I can say every day, and sometimes sends several messages in a day, to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs giving our views in these matters. There is direct communication between the prime ministers of the different nations of the commonwealth. The Prime Minister of Great Britain communicates direct with the Prime Minister of Canada, as he does with the Prime Minister of Australia and other nations of the commonwealth, and I communicate direct with him or with them when the situation is important enough to have these direct communications in addition to the messages which are sent through the Department of External Affairs to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

Then there is present in Ottawa a representative of the British government in the person of the high commissioner, formerly a very distinguished member of British cabinets. The high commissioner of the United Kingdom is in a position to communicate direct with the members of the government, with myself personally, as he does very frequently, or with officials of the Department of External Affairs, on matters on which it is desirable to have fuller information than that which is likely to come in formal dispatches. But more than that we have also our high commissioner in Great Britain, and our high commissioner is in a position to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister and other ministers of Britain matters on which we feel we should like to give fuller information than is contained in more formal communications. The practice has grown up during the present war of having the high commissioners of all parts of the British empire resident in London meet daily with the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. He has present with him on most occasions a representative of the foreign office, and at these interviews which take place between the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, who has been sitting in the cabinet at Downing street, there is communicated to the high commissioners what is important in reference to interimperial relations and matters of common concern with respect to the war.

A complete system of representation by high commissioners in different parts of the empire has grown up since the beginning of this war. Canada has had her high commissioner in Britain for many years, and we received the high commissioner from Great Britain for the first time in 1928. Since the outbreak of war, Canada has appointed high commissioners to all the self-governing dominions. We have our high commissioners in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Ireland and Newfoundland. These countries (except Newfoundland) have their high commissioners here in Ottawa.

In addition to that we have ministers or ambassadors in a number of the leading capitals. Our ministers are in touch with the ministers or the ambassadors there from other parts of the commonwealth and are in a position to gather a great deal of information which is communicated to the government at Ottawa, matters of common interest and concern; therefore, in all of these particulars there is from day to day the fullest and most complete kind of consultation.

I should add that in addition to all of these communications which take place over the wires there are frequent visits by ministers from different nations of the commonwealth, particularly from Great Britain to Canada and frequent visits by our ministers to Great Britain. Scarcely a month goes by that we have not the honour of meeting either here or in Washington or elsewhere a minister of the British government who is on this continent on some important mission. Take the relations between Mr. Churchill and myself. I have had several meetings with Mr. Churchill since the war began, some of them at Washington, some in England and some here in Canada. All of this is a very much changed condition from what existed prior to the war. Means of travel have been so perfected that a minister can cross from Canada to Britain or vice versa in less than a day, and when any question comes up on which we feel it is necessary to have immediate personal consultation we arrange to see that personal consultation is brought about here or overseas.

I should add in addition to that what I think is most important of all, and it is an answer to those who talk about having some imperial council that is going to decide commonwealth policies. We have to-day a continuing conference of cabinet councils of the commonwealth, a continuing conference of cabinets of the commonwealth dealing with matters of common concern. Let me explain what I mean. When any question comes up that is of common concern to the commonwealth in whole or in part, a communication comes, say from London, if that is the source at which the question arises, to our government. A similar communication is sent to the premiers of other goverments of the commonwealth. Immediately I am in a position, as Prime Minister, to take that particular question before my colleagues in the cabinet; and when I give advice to the British government on any matter I am not giving advice by myself alone, in the atmosphere of London, but I am giving advice based on what judgment I am able to form after consulting with the members of the government from all parts of Canada, each of whom has his immediate responsibility to this parliament of Canada which has its responsibility to the people of Canada. I ask: how can conferences between cabinets be carried out more effectively than that?

The objection I have to going over to London to imperial conferences to try to settle policies, if that should be the object, is that I am at a complete disadvantage in those circumstances; and when I speak of myself it is quite impersonal; I am referring to anyone who holds the office of Prime Minister of Canada. The Prime Minister attending in London meets an entire cabinet. He may be entirely alone. He has not with him all his colleagues; he has with him very few colleagues, unless the business of his own country is to be neglected while he is away. More than that, however, he is without his expert advisers, who are much needed in dealing with great questions of peace or war. On the other hand every minister of the cabinet in London has his expert advisers, when a certain issue is up for discussion, either seated beside him or in an adjoining room, and he is in a position to command their views on any suggestion that may be made. Further, he is in a position to confer with all his colleagues and make his statement to the conference based upon opinions formed in that way. As I say, unless one is prepared to take with him colleagues and experts, and to allow the government of Canada to be carried on minus these responsible ministers and officials while an imperial conference is being conducted, one is not in a position to discuss matters as they should be discussed, and in the light of the responsibilities of the situation, as one would wish to discuss them.

But when, as to-day, we have this system under which every question brought up is discussed fully in the cabinets of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Great Britain; when views are interchanged within a very short time, what more effective means could possibly be found of obtaining a consensus of view, an approach toward common policy, and a coordination of policies? I am one hundred per cent for close consultation, close cooperation and effective coordination of policy on all matters of common concern between the different nations of the British commonwealth. By all means let us within the British commonwealth be as united as we possibly can in thought and action, but let us seek in regard to other countries also to effect a closer cooperation and coordination of policies, which will make for the sort of world organization we hope to see prevail in future in this world.

This leads me to conclude with just a reference—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question? Ever since Lord Halifax delivered his address I have been wondering what further elements of coordination or cooperative machinery he had in mind than those which the Prime Minister has outlined. Would it be asking too much to request that the Prime Minister give us some idea of what further might be required?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not care to attempt in any way to interpret the views of Lord Halifax, but in order to make the position quite clear I think I should say that Lord Halifax was speaking entirely for himself. I have been informed that he was not making any pronouncement on behalf of the British government. He was speaking as an individual who came to Canada to address a large organization in Toronto, and he gave his views on a subject which has been very close to his heart all through his lifetime. I believe a close reading of the address by Lord Halifax will show that in many particulars it has not been understood as he would wish to have it understood. Lord Halifax is a political philosopher as well as a very eminent statesman. He was reviewing the past century and the developments which have taken place during that time, and allowing his mind to travel into the next hundred years as to the possible changes that might be necessary in commonwealth organization. I do not think he meant to do more than put before the particular audience he was addressing, and through it before the public, certain thoughts which he believed it would be well to be considered by all of us who have the future in mind. But I think it was unfortunate, as it has certainly proved, that the speech should have been delivered at this particular time, because it has raised certain issues; and I am speaking here this afternoon very much against my own will in developing this theme at all. I am doing so only because the hon. gentlemen whom I am immediately facing, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. gentleman who just interrupted me, the leader of the Social Credit party, have given their views on the subject which was brought up, and on that account I feel it necessary to give mine.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am just wondering if perhaps the hon. gentleman from Britain was not expressing the very idea that has been outlined by the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman will remember that my comment was to the effect that the ideas expressed were good but that it was unfortunate he did not tell us how they might be put into effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One concrete issue in external policy has been raised not only by Lord Halifax but also by Field Marshal Smuts on which I feel that I should state my position. In this I am stating the position of the government on what was said in recent speeches by these two eminent public men. I shall read what I have to say on this matter, because I feel the great importance of any utterances on matters of this kind at this time, but I think it well that the position of the government should be stated. I should like to have hon. gentlemen immediately opposite make an equally clear statement, some time during this session, as to their position.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if he prepared the speech he is about to deliver?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I prepared this. These are my own views and the views of this government.

A concrete issue in external policy has been raised in recent speeches delivered by Lord Halifax and Field Marshal Smuts. It relates to the domination of certain great powers. Both speeches expressed the view that the future peace of the world depended on the attainment of an equal partnership in strength and influence between the great powers among the united nations. Both took the position that the resources and man-power of the British isles were too small to enable the United Kingdom to compete with the United States and the Soviet Union in power and authority after the war. Both, therefore, argued that it was necessary that the United Kingdom should have the constant support of other countries, in order to preserve a proper balance. Field Marshal Smuts thought that this might be achieved by a close association between the United Kingdom and "the smaller democracies in western Europe"; he had little to say of the place of the British commonwealth as such. Lord Halifax on the other hand declared:

> Not Great Britain only, but the British commonwealth and empire, must be the fourth power in that group upon which, under Providence, the peace of the world will henceforth depend.

With what is implied in the argument employed by both these eminent public men I am unable to agree.

It is indeed true beyond question that the peace of the world depends on preserving on the side of peace a large superiority of power, so that those who wish to disturb the peace can have no chance of success. But I must ask whether the best way of attaining this is to seek a balance of strength between three or four great powers. Should we not, indeed must we not, aim at attaining the necessary superiority of power by creating an effective international system inside which the cooperation of all peace-loving countries is freely sought and given?

It seems to me not to be a matter of matching manpower and resources, or, in other words, military and industrial potential, between three or four dominant states. What we must strive for is close cooperation among those great states themselves, and all other like-minded countries. Behind the conception expressed by Lord Halifax and Field Marshal Smuts there lurks the idea of inevitable rivalry between the great powers. Could Canada, situated as she is geographically between the United States and the Soviet Union, and at the same time a member of the British commonwealth, for one moment give support to such an idea?

The Moscow declaration on general security forecast a system which would involve for its effectiveness, firm commitments by all peace-loving states to do their share in preserving peace. Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union were all represented at the Moscow conference. What would seem now to be suggested is that the prime Canadian commitment should be to pursue in all matters of external relations—"in foreign policy, defence, economic affairs, colonial questions and communications," to cite the words of Lord Halifax—a common policy to be framed and executed by all the governments of the commonwealth. I maintain that apart from all questions as to how that common policy is to be reached, or enforced, such a conception runs counter to the establishment of effective world security, and therefore is opposed to the true interests of the commonwealth itself.

We are certainly determined to see the closest collaboration continue between Canada, the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries. Nothing that I am saying should be construed as supporting any other view than this. Collaboration inside the British commonwealth has, and will continue to have, a special degree of intimacy. When, however, it comes to dealing with the great issues which determine peace or war, prosperity or depression, it must not, in aim or method, be exclusive. In meeting world issues of security, employment and social standards we must join not only with commonwealth countries but with all likeminded states, if our purposes and ideals are to prevail. Our commitments on these great issues must be part of a general scheme, whether they be on a world basis or regional in nature.

We look forward, therefore, to close collaboration in the interests of peace not only inside the British commonwealth, but also with all friendly nations, small as well as great.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I asked the Prime Minister questions respecting the home defence army, General McNaughton and the overseas structure. I take it the Prime Minister is going to wait until the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) provides an answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, unless I run wholly counter to the counsel given me by my hon. friend, not to take up too much time in the debate on the address, I cannot begin to run over the various subjects to which he referred in the course of his remarks. I believe the statement with respect to Canadian defence will be best given by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to that; I was just asking for information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Matters respecting aviation will be best dealt with by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) who, as the house knows, has been giving special attention to those matters. I am not purposely avoiding them, but I simply wish the house to realize that I am not the government. This is not a despotism.

Mr. GRAYDON: Pretty close to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a one-man affair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would say so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It represents collective opinion—a consensus.

Mr. GRAYDON: Collective security.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, would you call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

EXCESS PROFITS

LIMITATION FROM JANUARY 31 OF TAX ADVANTAGE IN RESPECT OF CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS BY BUSINESS CONCERNS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) kindly consented to my having two or three minutes in which to make a statement.

Evidence is developing that business concerns which are subject to tax at the 100 per cent rate on excess profits are being solicited to make unusually large contributions to various non-profit organizations. The activities of these organizations while in many cases not charitable in the ordinary sense of the word are nevertheless classed as such for tax purposes. These contributions up to a point are allowed as deductions from profits for the purpose of computing tax, and under a 100 per cent tax rate on excess profits the main burden of the gift obviously falls on the dominion treasury and ultimately on the tax-paying public generally rather than on the business concern making the contribution.

It is therefore the intention of the government in the forthcoming budget to recommend to the house a safeguarding measure which will ensure that in the case of any contribution by a business concern, whether corporate or otherwise, to an organization classed as a charitable organization which is subscribed after to-day, that is January 31, 1944, the tax advantage in respect of such contribution shall not be greater than that obtainable by a comparable business concern which is not subject to tax at the 100 per cent rate on excess profits.

For example, in the case of the ordinary commercial or industrial corporation the tax advantage in respect of such contribution will be limited to 40 per cent of such contribution, even if the corporation is subject to tax at the 100 per cent rate on its excess profits.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, this may be the last session of parliament before a general election and, if so, it is the duty of all parties to make clear to the electorate where they stand on the fundamental issues of the day. Before declaring the stand of Social Credit and New Democracy I desire to say something about the other major parties in the house. May I turn first to the Liberal party. In the speech from the throne the Liberal government has published what looks very much like an election manifesto. Naturally the government desires to make this manifesto as attractive as possible, and it looks attractive. It is full of vote-getting promises. The only fault with the government's manifesto is that it is illusive and the people should instinctively recognize it as such. It should not be possible to fool the people any more. In the last few years they have gone through too much.

The evidence seems to indicate clearly that the Liberal government will never be permitted to do anything which will hurt international finance and special privilege because international finance manifestly appears to be the boss of the Liberal party. The fact is that if you are going to help the people you must hurt international finance; that is, you must curb its activities. You must put an end to its doctrine of scarcity. You must cut excess profits and wipe out those instruments of scarcity, combines and cartels.

Should anyone doubt that the Liberal party is unable to escape from the control of international finance, let me give him an illustration to support that conclusion. The government now asks the authority of parliament to commit Canada to participate in a plan of international organization which means a supranational government. This is a very natural thing for a servant of international finance to do. I and those I stand for are passionately against any plan which will mean the weakening of Canadian sovereignty and the strengthening of the authority of international finance. Such a plan will render Canada a hopeless victim of its machinations. Such a plan will also prepare the way for a third world war. I am against any proposal which will mean turning the soldiers of Canada into a police force to enforce the policies and programme of international finance. When Europe is set free, Europe must and will work out its own destiny. When Hitler and the Japanese are defeated, I say let us bring the boys home quickly.

Let us take a look at the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The policy and programme of this party is as illusive in itself as that of the Liberal government. The C.C.F. have two types of bosses. It has the Marxian socialist bosses who would impose socialism on Canada regardless of the consequences. Then it has another kind of boss, the political strategist. His aim is power at any price. He figures things out in this way: Everybody knows that the people are heartily sick of the Liberal government, and the C.C.F. strategists plan to make that party a purely protest movement. When a man is asked, "Are you sick of the Liberal government?" and he answers, "Yes", then the C.C.F. strategist will say, "Vote here".

The trouble with this plan is that the C.C.F. have now been ticketed with socialism. Surely the people of Canada do not want socialism. They must know that socialism means confiscation of savings and private rights and the regimentation of private liberties.

Mr. COLDWELL: How ridiculous! Try to get some new ideas.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are just unsmearing the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). When he was out in the Red Deer riding he complained that they were attempting to smear the C.C.F.; we are endeavouring to unsmear them. The people must know that socialism and the socialization of business mean the socialization of everything else. It means a loss of their property; it means the end of private ownership, of farms, banks, pensions and insurance policies. The people of Canada are entitled to maximum security, but they are also entitled to full freedom. The policy of the C.C.F. will destroy the principle of freedom and replace it with bureaucracy. Fundamentally and economically there is no apparent difference between C.C.F. socialism in Canada and national socialism in Germany. Although the C.C.F. will take away a man's freedom it will never bring security. The policy of the C.C.F. means not security but chaos. We do not hear of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation attacking international finance.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who said so?

Mr. BLACKMORE: All we know is that it keeps fooling about with unimportant things, threatening socialization of industry and the banks. The reason for it all is that the doctrine and policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in so far as it has a doctrine and policy, are based upon the outpourings of a gentleman called Karl Marx, who died about sixty years ago. It should be plain that Karl Marx did not know anything about the financial juggernaut of to-day or how to tame it.

But behind the Marxian fanatics and the political strategists are the rank and file of the C.C.F., and nowhere in Canada will you find more earnest people and better patriots than these. The common people of the C,C.F. party are just like the common people of any other party. They want security and freedom. They want an end to scarcity and the beginning of abundance. They do not want needlessly to smash anything. They do not want to change the present system for a new one if the old one when reformed will serve. All they want is results. And it is a fortunate fact that the C.C.F. rank and file are still free enough to upset their irrational leaders and follow along lines of practical reform.

Now what about the Progressive Conservative party? A year ago the Conservative party changed its name; but did it change its attitude to the people? There is no real evidence that it has done so, but we must be patient and give it every chance to prove itself. I am still waiting and wondering. So also are the people of Canada, because the fact is that not only did the Conservative party add "Progressive" to its name, it elected a progressive as its leader. His name is John Bracken. John Bracken was a one-time friend of the common man.

Mr. GRAYDON: He still is.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What we want to know, what the people have a right to know, is this, is John Bracken still a friend of the common people? Have the vested interests or the Tory party broken John Bracken, or has John Bracken broken the vested interests?

Mr. COLDWELL: And the Tory party?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the Progressive Conservative party just as it always was, a hireling of the big interests, or is it at last a people's party, free to really serve? John Bracken had a great chance a year ago. Perhaps that chance remains in this hour of national peril, when the claims of country so far outrank the claims of party. I call upon John Bracken to say where he stands.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where does he sit?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appeal to him to say that he stands against international finance and for the common man. It is to be earnestly hoped that without a day's needless delay John Bracken will declare, "I am a free man. The vested interests have no hold on me. I am against domination by international finance. I stand for abundance. I stand for the total use of the nation's resources. I promise that I will play my part to reform the old economic system so that it will have the power to put at the service of the people the full resources of Canada no matter what may be the reforms required. I stand for maximum production and for distribution upon the level of maximum production. I condemn the doctrine and system of scarcity; I denounce its supporters. I desire the vote and support of no men who put high profits for the few before plenty for the many. I will purge the Progressive Conservative party of such men."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He will be lonely.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If John Bracken will pledge himself that way, then the mighty forces of monetary reform will know where he stands with respect to the common enemies of man.

Mr. GRAYDON: What will the hon. member do if he does that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will have to see him do it first.

Mr. GRAYDON: All right.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Meanwhile no commitments!

The forces of monetary reform want to know where every Progressive Conservative stands with respect to financial Toryism, which is just fascism in thin disguise.

Now, where does Social Credit—New Democracy stand? It stands for abundance and against scarcity. It stands for maximum production and for distribution on the level of maximum production. It stands for total use of Canada's resources. It stands for the right of the people to that which Providence intends them to have. It stands against the power of finance which would deny that right. That is the issue in Canada and the world to-day. The issue is not communism against democracy, or socialism against capitalism. The issue is total use of the nation's resources for the benefit of the people against restricted use of resources for the benefit of big interests.

New Democracy, when war came, stood and stood alone for total use of resources in war. To-day New Democracy stands for total use of the nation's resources when peace comes. Right now the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) may say that the Liberal government has practised war-time total use. It is a fact that fear of Hitler drove the government reluctantly to require something approximating maximum production. It is equally true that fear of international finance will drive the Liberal government and its policies back to where they were before the war, that is to scarcity and limited production in the service of high profits. It is to be hoped that it will take more promising than the Prime Minister has time for, to make the people of this country forget that for nearly a generation this government has imposed on Canada the unjust and harmful rule of scarcity, at the direction of international finance.

How do we get total use of our resources for the benefit of the people? Let me put the issue in a word. The issue is freedom. Economic freedom means political freedom as well. There cannot be political freedom without economic freedom. There is a tragic lack of both kinds of freedom in the world to-day.

We are fighting the Japs and the Germans in the name of freedom. Let me suggest that in the name of freedom we fight as well our own unjust prejudices; for the lesson of Hitlerism is in vain if it fails to teach us tolerance and generosity. English-speaking democracy under its present leadership has yet to learn that lesson. Here is crowning evidence to support my statement. Many years ago the Jews, responding to a religious and national, as well as a natural impulse, sought for themselves a new home in their old home in Palestine. English-speaking democracy encouraged the Jew to hope; they promised him support. That promise came before the Hitlerian massacres. The Jew, with millions of his countrymen tortured and dead, still hopes and looks to us to make his hopes come true.

Where in democracy are our charity and justice? Where is our Christianity if we let the Jew now hope in vain? I tell this house that the homeless Jew is a challenge to all the decencies that make what we are pleased to call our English-speaking civilization. We dare not refuse that challenge. This house should recognize this truth and this duty by an appropriate resolution and should give leadership to all nations along the path of justice and fair play through the fulfilment of the long cherished dream of the establishment in Palestine of a national homeland for the Jews.

Now let me say a word as to how this nation is to get the total use of its resources. The problem is primarily a political one. You can meet the other problem when this country has elected a parliament pledged to put the interests of the people before the claims of international finance, pledged to make financially possible what is physically possible and desirable.

Reformers of the capitalistic system, when they speak of the reforms in that system necessary to ensure an equitable distribution of maximum production, are asked how they will do it. It is a question designed to confuse the people, because, when a sensible and sufficient answer is given, I have found that the answer is taken by the technicians of reactionary capitalism and bent and twisted out of its original shape. There is no difficulty in building the machinery which will ensure effective distribution, and I tell the house that the time has gone by when the reactionary capitalists should be able to make people believe that there is any difficulty.

Let me put the matter positively. I defy any member of this house to rise to his feet and say that it is not possible to devise means whereby to distribute all that the system is able to produce, and to distribute it, too, without adding to the national burden any further debt or taxation, and without imperilling our freedom with regimentation. That challenge stands. Social Credit-New Democracy is not strong in parliament, but it is very strong in the sense that what it stands for is dear to the hearts of the vast majority of Canadians.

Social Credit-New Democracy is not bigoted. It knows that country comes far ahead of party; it also knows very well that there is but short time left within which Canadians might effect reforms by the democratic way.

Let us members in this house bear in mind the danger that if the parliament of Canada will not give the people justice, then the people will seek justice in another way in spite of parliament. At this time of crisis it is the responsibility of all men of good will to forget their lesser loyalties, to forget the claims of party and of class, and to join together so that they may defeat the common enemy at home, even as our soldiers are now joined together to defeat the common enemy abroad. The common enemy abroad is Germany and Japan. The common enemy at home is international finance, special privileges, the kind of big business that chokes the life out of every other kind of business.

It is in this spirit that I appeal to the really progressive members of the Conservative party, and over the heads of the Marxian fanatics and political strategists, I appeal also to the common people of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I appeal to those Liberals who have been able to retain their freedom despite a lifetime of despotic political rule. All honour to them! They will be made welcome to the company of free men. So let us get together, forgetful of our minor differences, remembering only that it will take courage and good will on the part of all free men and women to save this country from the chaos which impends.

If my appeal should fall on deaf ears—I trust it will not—then the party of Social Credit-New Democracy will feel in duty bound to go on alone, confident that we shall swiftly grow in strength; for a party which has the honesty and courage to stand against international finance, and for the common man; against socialism, and for reformed private enterprise, in which money will no longer be master; a party which is proud to give its life if needs be in this just cause, is a party which will deserve to have behind it the overwhelming support of a country whose people are still free. Such a party will merit the overwhelming support of the soldiers of Canada; for a party which dared to declare, as this group did, for the total use of the country's resources when this war began, a party which dared to declare for equality of service and equality of sacrifice, should be believed by all of our soldiers when now it declares for the total use of the country's resources when peace shall be restored.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Why did the Liberal government not declare for total war when war began? Its bosses forbade it to do so. Why will the Liberal government not declare for total use of the country's resources now that peace is drawing near? Because its bosses forbid it. And, Mr. Speaker, they are the self-same bosses.

When our soldiers went overseas they imposed upon those who stayed at home a trust. That trust was to build for them a Canada henceforth free from want and unemployment, free from misery and preventable disease, a Canada of real security and happiness. For my part I accepted that trust and I mean to discharge it.

May I turn for a few moments to a consideration of some of the items in the speech from the throne. There are several things in the speech from the throne which I believe ought to be given special consideration. The government in power has not dealt fairly with agriculture in Canada during the last year. Conditions are gradually improving in agriculture, but it seems to me that the Liberal party has to be forced every step of the way. They do not seem to have a broad, generous, long-range policy; they seem to have a niggardly, cheese-paring policy that concedes a point only grudgingly. I complained of the treatment of the wool producers last spring. The treatment of the lamb producers was a reflection on the intelligence or on the integrity of those who were in charge, and the treatment of the hog situation during this last year has been something to regret; the management of the beef situation casts no honour or credit on the government, while the way in which the beet sugar industry is handled in Canada is a reflection on the government and will be a cause for bitter remorse before this war is over. I do not believe one could persuade any unbiased or dispassionate individual to believe that the men who have had charge of the sugar policy of this country were acting with an eye to the interests of the people of Canada. The labour situation in Canada is far from what it should be. The wartime wages control order, 1943, P.C. 9384, is a most astounding piece of labour legislation bristling with obnoxious features which bear adversely and unfairly upon the workingmen from coast to coast. Our treatment of the returned men is far from reassuring with respect to the future. I find returned men everywhere are dissatisfied. In the first place there has been a removal of the insurance principle from the Pension Act. Very meagre allowances are given to men when they are mustered out of the service, and there is observable indecent haste in the discharge of men from hospital when they are suffering from the results of service.

The reconstruction and rehabilitation programme of the government is causing apprehension, if not consternation throughout this country. We hear of fine and ambitious plans for post-war rehabilitation but never a solitary word as to where the money is coming from to pay for these plans. Yet the plans are being prepared and promulgated by a government that insistently said before the war, we have not the money. And the same mentalities will commence to think after the war, we have not the money. There is a great deal more than political significance to this matter. It seems to me that the average Liberal, if I gauge him aright, thinks of nothing in the world but whether or not he can get back into power. Whenever a matter comes before him he seems to ask himself, will this particular measure bring me votes? He utterly disregards what may be the effect upon the morale of the country, what may be the effect ultimately upon the welfare of the Canadian people.

We hear a great deal about the conversion of war-time industries to peace-time uses. I believe the hon. Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) gave a rather impressive speech somewhere in the east in November, if I remember correctly. In that speech he said there was no reason at all why anyone should be unemployed in Canada after the war. I agree with him. There has been no reason why anyone should be unemployed in Canada since 1930. There certainly was no reason after 1935. But that does not deal with the matter at all. I will grant that we can easily reconvert munition plants in the main and prepare them to produce peace-time goods. The great question is, how in the world are you going to enable the people to buy the goods when they are produced? I am informed we had in Canada in 1939 a production of around three and a half billion dollars, and that during 1943 that production rose to roughly eight billion dollars. We are buying in the neighbourhood of $4,000,000,000 worth of goods with the taxpayers' money and with the money we borrow, and are giving it away. What are we to be doing after the war to correspond with the gifts we are so munificently conferring upon Hitler and the Japanese? I suppose if anyone were to suggest to anyone in this house that we could give $25 a month or something like that he would probably have nightmares for three nights or more. But that does not seem to disturb the mentality of those Canadians who are giving many times that amount to the enemy. The all-important problem after the war will be the selling of the goods. The government steers clear of that problem. I suppose government members will answer me immediately and say, we are planning on export trade markets. Let it be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that when the war closes there will be sixty nations in this world all seeking for export markets, each one trying to sell more than it buys. Does the Liberal mentality find it impossible to conceive the absolute grotesqueness of that situation, or does it conceive that Canada, because of her economic strength, is going to be able to crowd the other nations out of the markets and lay the foundation for another war? If everyone of those sixty nations operates under the system in vogue in Canada it will have a shortage of purchasing power within the nation which will be its most painful disability. Canada in this respect will be one of the foremost among them.

Until we learn how to adjust that shortage of purchasing power in the hands of the people, all talk of reorganizing the world on a peaceful basis is utterly idle.

In the speech from the throne we have the proposal to import goods in order to raise our standard of living. May I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the first task of the government is to enable the Canadian people to buy the goods that Canada can produce, buy a sufficient amount of them to raise their standard of living to the point where it should be. We should enable them to buy grains and grain products, vegetables, fruits, animal products and coal, building material and furniture, shoes, clothing and machinery. All these things we produce abundantly in Canada. Why not arrange matters so that our people will be able to buy all they need of these things? Think what it would mean in this country, a land literally flowing with milk and honey, if every Canadian were given by this parliament the assurance that, if he cooperated, never again would he go in need of the food, clothing, shelter, culture, education and recreation that Canada's fields and mines, her waters, forests and workshops stand ready to provide for him abundantly—if only he has the money with which to buy? Supply Canadians with purchasing power with which to buy their own goods and they will buy the imports they need; the government will not have to worry about imports at all.

Now I come to these social security proposals. The whole system offered by the government is merely a plan to tax Canadians into prosperity; no people can tax themselves into prosperity. The whole scheme constitutes an ambitious attempt to redistribute scarcity. There is no evidence of an expanding economy or that such has been contemplated. Such measures offer no possible means for attaining the total use of resources. Expanding economy and total use of resources can be achieved only through the employment of debt-free money. I submit once more to this house that the all-important thing for us to consider at this time is the feasibility of debt-free money with which we can cancel the debt which accumulates in this debt-creating system of ours, debt-free money with which we can distribute the abundance which God has given us the capacity to produce.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL: (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, first allow me to join with those who have already extended congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address, for their two interesting and able speeches. I want to deal tonight with a few problems which confront the Canadian people, but before doing so I should like to refer to the speech delivered this afternoon by the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). I want to say at once that I agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he suggests that the place for the leader of a political party is in this house. I venture to say that if Mr. John Bracken were to walk down the corridors of this building most of the members of this house would not recognize him, though he has been leader of the Progressive Conservative party for some fourteen months now. It is not that he has not had the opportunity, had he chosen to take it, of seeking a seat here. Sitting beside and behind me to-night are two new members from western Canada, both farmers representing rural seats, one of them almost within a stone's throw of the legislative building where Mr. John Bracken has occupied a seat for twenty years. Had he chosen to avail himself of it the opportunity was there for him to try his luck, if you will, in obtaining a seat in this house, as he should have done; but of course, in spite of the boasting of the Progressive Conservative party, I would remind them that the provincial seat of The Pas, in the Manitoba provincial legislature, which was occupied for so long by Mr. John Bracken, was lost by his followers in that province, and that all the candidates in that by-election lost their deposit to the successful Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate.

I do not propose to comment upon what has been said this evening by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). As I listened to him I was reminded of a verse which I have read, which runs, something like this: "I thank God I am not as other men."

I should like immediately to express the thankfulness which we share with all the people of Canada for the brightening prospects of a military victory in Europe, and for the preparations that have been made to overcome Japanese aggression. However, events in Italy and in New Guinea during the past few days warn us that we have a long and perhaps bloody road ahead. On our home front I think we ought to pay tribute to the splendid self-sacrifice of our farmers and their families and the efforts of the thousands of workers and office personnel who have produced vast quantities of food and material to back the attack. The achievements of women in many fields in Canada, too, have been no less striking than those to which I have just referred. Overseas the bravery, skill and fighting qualities of our service men and women are bringing results of which this nation may well be proud. Nor must we overlook the contribution of those who organized and trained the forces. Particularly may I mention the services of Lieutenant-General McNaughton, who was among the first in our commonwealth to prepare his army corps for the type of mechanized, scientific warfare which this great conflict has come to be. A fuller explanation of his recent retirement than has yet been given is awaited by both service personnel and large groups of our civilian population.

In spite of our military achievements, however, many Canadians have grave misgivings in regard to the future. The prosecution of the war and the shaping of post-war policy are inseparably bound together. Military and political warfare are inseparable parts of the same struggle for security and freedom. There is a grave danger that while we may be victorious on the field of battle we may lose the no less vital political warfare. There are ominous signs that attempts are being made to appease the fascists and reactionary groups that stand for a return to the pre-war status quo throughout the world. For months Franco has been placated, while he has maintained a division of men fighting our allies on the eastern European front. In Italy we have bolstered a discredited monarch and a former fascist general, while progressive Italians demand the formation of a government in which the Italian people can have confidence, under whose leadership the Italians could fight the common enemy. Throughout Europe, we are told, the courageous underground workers lack confidence in our intentions, as we continue to support discredited governing cliques and former monarchs who are obviously distrusted and disliked by their former subjects. Expediency may be the name but reaction is the substance. Nor can Canada escape some responsibility for this disastrous appeasement. As the fifth among the united nations, or first, if you will, among the so-called smaller nations, Canada should exercise an influence commensurate with her military and economic power. Her failure to do so invites the judgment that our government is afraid of the social and economic implications of democracy at home and abroad. It is high time that our external relationships were brought under careful review by this parliament. It is time that we stripped some of the unnecessary secrecy that surrounds some of our foreign policy. I earnestly suggest that the standing committee on industrial and international relations—uneasy bedfellows—be split up into two committees, one concerned with labour and the other with international affairs. We need an informed public opinion to support intelligent national policies in these fields.

The speech from the throne states that the well-being of Canada is bound up with the restoration and recovery of world trade. While that is true, we must not allow a government to rely solely upon such trade for our own post-war recovery and well-being. Certainly the speech reveals little understanding of the means by which trade can be expanded in this modern world. As a first principle I suggest that the orderly planning of our internal economy is vital to domestic prosperity and to our ability to trade effectively; for effective trade surely means that we must accept and use the products of other countries in order that we may dispose of our own surpluses abroad.

There is no indication in the speech from the throne that the government appreciates the need of introducing planning into our trade relationships with other countries, as well as into our internal economy. Has our wartime experience of trade through government agencies taught us nothing? How can we plan trade on the basis of national need? Surely through the adaptation of methods of the bulk purchases and sales made now by national agencies. It is clear that bulk buying and selling on a national scale is surely foreshadowed by several nations including our own best customer, Great Britain. If we fail to use such boards as the bacon board and the wheat board, instead of reopening all kinds of private and speculative agencies, our foreign trade will languish. Perchance it will be strangled by a veritable jungle of tariffs, quotas, irresponsible cartels and emergency policies.

The speech from the throne, however, shows that the government has stolen some ideas from the C.C.F. programme. Unfortunately it is only petty larceny of which I can find it guilty. I wish it were of the grander sort; for, after all, its social security programme lacks the necessary basis to sustain it. It suggests the building of a superstructure without laying the foundation of full employment, productivity and the actual means of distribution.

The central problem of our time is that of full employment. Social security measures, essential as they are, must remain inadequate until this central problem of full employment is solved. If we fail to make plans by which alone full employment can be obtained, the burden of new social security measures will fall upon the workers and farmers. The government fails to realize that fundamental economic and social change is the price of social security and of economic freedom. But even the social security measures proposed in the speech from the throne are not firm commitments. A study of the language used filled me, I must confess, with the suspicion that it was merely a pre-election document. If the government means what it seems to imply, let it put its programme on the statute books this session, and into full effect, before going to the country. The people are suspicious of death-bed repentances. They showed that in 1935, as our Conservative friends will remember.

And the Liberal party has, I submit, a bad record of neglected promises. Let me remind the house that in 1919, now a quarter of a century ago the Liberal party promised the people of Canada, among other things—and I shall quote the exact words:

> An adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability.

Now, after twenty-five years, with a spectacular loss of support across the country, it repeats its promise of long ago.

In all these years, what have we got?—an inadequate unemployment scheme in 1938, and some pre-death loans, called old age pensions. Therefore, when the speech from the throne says—and again I quote—

> . . . a national minimum of social security and human welfare should be advanced as rapidly as possible—

—we in this house have a duty to demand: How soon? Another twenty-five years, perhaps. Actual legislation this session, before an election, is the only answer the house should tolerate.

But again I say all the social security measures contained in the speech from the throne leave untouched the central problems of our time, the problems of full employment and the proper distribution of goods and services. Furthermore, this scheme of social security cannot be achieved without an immediate attempt to solve the grave constitutional difficulties of which we are all aware. These the present government has shelved and shirked.

A few years ago the dominion, and all but one of the provinces, had Liberal governments. Yet, no solution was found, even when the governments were basically as a party in agreement. How does the government face up to the constitutional problems now? Here is what the speech from the throne says:

> . . . the working out of a comprehensive national scheme, in which federal and provincial activities will be integrated and which will include nation-wide health insurance, will require further consultation and close cooperation with the provinces.

And then, note this:

> My ministers will welcome opportunities for such consultation.

To use a slang expression, surely that is a prize example of passing the buck.

No, that will not do. In the absence of an immediate dominion-provincial agreement, let this parliament enact the measure and invite the provinces to cooperate, much as we did in the case of old age pensions.

Those with good memories will recall a somewhat similar statement to the one I quoted from the speech from the throne a moment ago, one which was made by the present Prime Minister in April, 1930, when the depression was deepening. He said, as recorded in Hansard for that year, at page 1226:

> In the absence of any representations indicating that there is an unemployment situation which the provinces cannot cope with, we have no right to say that there is any national unemployment situation in this country.

The time has come surely when the national government must assume the initiative in matters vital to the well-being of Canada. Above all, then, we urge the government to take action now. This social security programme, which the C.C.F. has done so much to popularize across the country during past years, is badly overdue. Other countries have had much of it for several generations. But again I warn that social security measures, desirable and necessary as they are, do not even pretend to solve the central problem of full employment.

Remember, that the present unemployment insurance fund, though nearly $180,000,000, would be a mere drop in the bucket if we failed to provide full employment for the million persons now employed in war industries, and the nearly 800,000 engaged in the armed services. The fund would only provide benefits for all those for less than eight weeks.

To rely upon social security measures to meet the post-war problem of full employment is in our opinion to court disaster. Therefore the proposals in the speech if put into effect, and they must be, can give only limited financial protection against a calamity which the government proposes nothing effective to prevent. On top of that it is questionable how much social security can be financed while the basic economic and monetary issues remain untouched. The truth is, of course, that health is more important that health insurance; work more important than unemployment insurance; rehabilitation more important than disability pensions; decent incomes and good homes more important than family allowances; independence more important than a dole. Health, work, rehabilitation, decent incomes, good homes, economic planning and social independence are the demands of the Canadian people, more particularly the demands of our sons and our daughters fighting the battles overseas. Yet the speech from the throne offers nothing to achieve these ends, so I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) an amendment to the amendment as follows:

> That all the words of the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that in the opinion of this house Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose the fundamental social changes and economic planning which alone can hasten the winning of the war and make possible the establishment of a post-war Canada capable of providing full employment and complete social security."

The only positive approach to an economic problem to be found in the speech from the throne is the government's promise of aid to certain types of business, presumably in the hope that some crumbs may reach the people. We are told that there is to be an industrial development bank. Instead of bringing the banking, financial and monetary system under social ownership and control, the government proposes to establish a new institution which is apparently to assume the most risky and unprofitable part of the post-war credit operations. Instead of a financial system operating solely for the Canadian people, a new government bank is to be set up whose sole aim apparently is to aid certain types of private business.

For generations some of the leaders of the Liberal party—and I remember specifically the former Minister of Finance, the Hon. C. A. Dunning—urged the creation of an agricultural bank to assist our most neglected industry, but without avail. What agriculture asked for years ago, some businesses are about to get.

The farmer is offered a price floor for staple farm products. What sort of floor and for what staple products? True, the C.C.F. has popularized the demand for a floor under farm prices, but any price floor must be related to the cost of the things the farmer buys and uses. In other words it must be a parity price, not a price which is merely a low minimum and out of relation to other prices. Again I warn that a parity price depends upon the extent to which the country is able to plan its economy. In other words parity prices like full employment depend upon our willingness to make fundamental economic changes. That the government and the official opposition will not do. Evidence of this unwillingness is to be found in various phrases in the speech from the throne.

We learn that there are to be "suitable tax modifications." If this means, as I rather suspect, reduction in the excess profits taxes or corporation taxes or taxes in the higher income brackets, then we shall strenuously oppose such measures. If on the other hand it means the release of purchasing power through the reduction of taxation in the lower brackets we shall be prepared to support it.

The C.C.F. contends that big business has profited too much out of this war, not too little. It may profit more through the activities of the new War Assets Corporation. This body will dispose of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of publicly-owned plant and machines, tools, stores, equipment and material, all at salvage prices. The cry goes up that the government-owned plants will be of little value when the war ends. Private business demands that they be disposed of so that their vested interests shall not be jeopardized. To my mind every effort should be made to utilize these plants to give more employment, more goods and services to the Canadian people. The policy of the government in this regard is the direct opposite to intelligent economic planning and to the needs and I believe the will of the Canadian people.

How improvident this sort of policy is can be illustrated by the announcement made in the house last Friday by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). For reasons not disclosed the government has expropriated the properties of the Eldorado Mining Corporation at a price of $1.35 a share, which incidentally is above the price of the stock quoted in Toronto last Friday. In justice to the foresight of our late leader, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, it should be recalled that in May, 1932, Mr. Woodsworth urged that the valuable radium deposits on Great Bear lake should be brought under public ownership and dedicated to human welfare. He stated that if we were to desire the property in the future we would pay a high price to the promoters whereas at that time the only man with a just claim was the prospector. His words were ignored, and so to-day expropriation will cost the people of Canada some millions of dollars. As I have said already, the price paid by the government is higher than the market value of the stock the day the deal was announced to this house.

The speech from the throne when taken in conjunction with the record of the government gives us little hope for effective measures to cope with the stupendous problems of the future. What the country needs is a definite and specific programme, not vague promises which is almost all the speech from the throne contains. The C.C.F. has committed itself to a full social security programme. What we have also done, and other parties have failed to do, is to provide the economic basis which will make such a programme possible and feasible. What should such a programme contain? First, this parliament should suggest a sum which the country is prepared to spend in the immediate post-war period. Last year, and I repeat the suggestion, I urged that we name five billion dollars as the target of expenditure in the first two years following victory.

First, there must be a concrete, comprehensive and good post-war housing programme instead of the pitiful nibbling at the problem suggested in the throne speech. We should state immediately that we will spend at least $500 million a year to provide adequate houses in town and country for the Canadian people. This vast opportunity to bring decency and comfort to every Canadian and to eliminate overcrowding and squalor is a challenge that we can meet only by the boldest attack. This of course is a means also of providing useful employment for thousands in many branches of industry.

Next must come a plan for rural electrification, to bring modern conveniences to every home in the country. Such a programme would lighten the burdens of rural life, raise standards of living, and—again—provide employment. Next comes the essential task of reestablishment of our service personnel. The reference to this in the speech from the throne is distinctly disturbing. Apparently the government views with satisfaction and complacency the totally inadequate measures already provided. I quote the words of the speech:

> A broad programme has already been developed for the reestablishment of veterans of the present war, and for the care of disabled veterans and the dependents of our fighting men and merchant seamen.

During the period of demobilization the armed service personnel should be kept on full pay and allowances until they are absorbed permanently in remunerative employment. This is one promise that we must make now and carry out for the men and women in the services. Government-owned plants set up for the purpose of war production should be retained under public ownership and converted to peace-time production. Farm implements and supplies, prefabricated houses, commercial aeroplanes and other desirable goods could be produced in these plants. In fact, the farm cooperatives in the west are anxious to go into the production of some of these things. We should immediately make it possible for these cooperatives to acquire the necessary plant and should also make available to them credit for this purpose.

There is still room in Canada for great economic expansion, particularly in the Canadian north. This should be a planned public post-war development. Surveys made in Canada, particularly in regard to oil possibilities, and the experience of the Soviet Union in the development of similar territory, indicate there may be vast natural resources in Canada waiting to be tapped.

Another new field particularly suitable for western Canada is that of chemurgy. Organized research should be undertaken with a view to discovering and developing new uses for agricultural products.

Perhaps one of the most essential things is that we should immediately appropriate a large sum of money for the expansion of the work of the national research council and other public research groups. It is vital to retain for the public benefit the services of the scientists now engaged in research activities. This involves for them adequate remuneration and security. We have watched some of these brilliant young scientists enter the service of the research council, be kept on a pittance doing the scientific work for several years, and then picked up by some industry, given a laboratory, a good salary, and security; their brains, their skills and their inventive genius sometimes lost to the people of Canada and acquired by a private corporation. To my mind the remuneration given to the young scientists who have done so much in this war, under our research council, is nothing short of a public scandal.

All this necessitates, of course, the investment and expenditure of money. Thus since the charters of the banks are due for renewal the government should introduce legislation to bring the chartered banks under public ownership and control. This should be accompanied by a national investment board to direct savings into socially desirable channels; and who is there who will rise in his place and say that a government-owned banking system would not be infinitely safer than the privately-owned chartered banks were in 1931 and 1932 when the finance act of this country had to be amended by order in council to allow some of the banks to deposit securities otherwise not depositable, in order to get the necessary funds to meet their obligations to the public? Or who will say that a national investment board directing the savings of the people would not give more ample security to the people of Canada than the present speculative system under which we live?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is not the hon. gentleman wrong in his statement about the banks?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think not. I think, if the hon. gentleman will look it up, he will find an order in council to that effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, we will look it up. I think it will be found that Mr. Bennett's government passed such an order in council in October, 1931.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not in reference to the banks.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, what was it in reference to? The insurance companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the banks?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, the insurance companies in any event.

Mr. ILSLEY: And what was done there is not as is stated by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe I am right, though.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was a valuation of their securities.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will take the correction meantime.

Under the compulsion of war we have seen how national economic planning, however imperfectly administered, can immensely increase production and end unemployment. Judging from the throne speech this striking lesson has been completely wasted.

In short, what we need now is a concrete programme to maintain full employment, at all costs, and definite legislation for an adequate scheme of social security.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, since this afternoon it was suggested that the parties in this house place on the record their views regarding the controversy which has arisen in this country in the last week—the Prime Minister did so this afternoon—I wish to place on the record, not the statement which I made last week, but a statement of the executive of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation which perhaps carries more weight than a statement from a single person.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would sooner have yours.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you very much. They are substantially alike.

The national executive of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation endorses the statement which our federal leader, Mr. M. J. Coldwell, made public with regard to the recent proposals of Lord Halifax. Those proposals are unacceptable, not only because they are against the interests of Canada, but also because they are against the best interests of Britain, of the commonwealth, and of world peace. The principles underlying these proposals seem to be empire isolationism and power politics. Such assumptions are contrary to the principles of the Atlantic charter. They are the present-day version of pre-war Tory foreign policy.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes that Britain with the other nations of the commonwealth can and should play a leading part in the establishment of the necessary international order after victory. Further, we believe that Britain herself has now an unprecedented opportunity of assuming a position of leadership in the world's march toward enduring peace based on collective security and international economic cooperation. Canada should at all times give full support to a policy which, based on the principles of the Atlantic charter, will win the cooperation not only of the members of the commonwealth but equally of all other small and great peace-loving nations. The future international order, if it is to endure, must not be based on power groups, and least of all on domination by a few great powers, but on full participation by all states in the processes of peace building and in the machinery of political and economic cooperation.

This is the kind of foreign policy which the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes Canada and other members of the British commonwealth should pursue.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. member that his amendment lacks something which is required in an amendment. The amendment to the amendment proposes, "That all the words of the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor". The hon. member will have to correct that to read, "That all the words of the amendment after the word 'that' be struck out".

Mr. COLDWELL: The amendment should have read, "That all the words after 'that' in the amendment be struck out and the following words substituted therefor". I am afraid I did not read that.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member so desires, I will make the correction.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you, sir.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the few remarks which I intend to make in connection with the speech from the throne will not be lengthy. We shall have at some future moment an opportunity to discuss the various measures announced as soon as they are introduced and better understood.

Let us note first that the speech from the throne does not foreshadow an early end of the hostilities, and that, on the other hand, it gives us to understand that the Canadian people will be called upon to achieve a still greater war effort, especially through the extension to the United Nations of the mutual aid principle, which was at the outset a veiled formula used in describing the gift of billions of dollars to England.

I have already condemned and I still condemn such free gifts to a country that is wealthier than ours and more interested in the present conflict. I have condemned and I still condemn Canada's war effort, which is out of proportion with our resources. I said last year, and I repeat this year, that I cannot understand, in view of our geographical position, far from the scene of the conflict, with no possessions to protect outside America, that the chief aim assigned to Canada by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should be a war effort proportionately greater than that of any other allied country, regardless of post-war consequences.

On his return from a trip to England, in November last, the honourable the minister of munitions (Mr. Howe) told us again of the amazement with which our war effort was looked upon over there, and he explained how profitable it was for us to supply as an outright gift the goods delivered to Great Britain, in order that we might retain the British market after the war.

Around the same time, unfortunately for our minister, the agricultural advisor of the British Embassy in Washington implied that after the war, England would buy her bacon from Denmark in exchange for her industrial products; Denmark, however, presented England with no gifts whatsoever, nor did she give her, simply as a donation, any of her merchandise.

On the other hand, according to a dispatch from London dated January 18th, Sir John Anderson informed the House of Commons that Great Britain would pay cash for some of her purchases in the United States.

They should stop trying to fool us so as to justify our gifts to a country wealthier than ours. After the war, England will act in her own interests. That is what we should do also.

In this war we have played and still play the part of a servant who is not consulted but who must take marching orders. London dictates, pledges herself, and we pay the price by going to ruin, and the Prime Minister is happy!

A few days ago, Lord Halifax paid us a visit to tell us what we should do after the war to safeguard the Empire's possessions. He forgets that we are living in America and that we are a neighbour of the United States. May I say that the policy of the Bloc Populaire Canadien takes its inspiration from this formula of Lord Tweedsmuir: "A Canadian owes his first allegiance not to the British Commonwealth, but to Canada". And we will act in our own interests, which happen to be in America.

For the first time since the declaration of war, the government seems to show some concern for the future. It is behind England, however, who gave that subject plenty of thought when the war had barely begun. The speech from the throne, as a matter of fact, is very promising, and in the field of promises, it even goes beyond the social reforms programme proclaimed sensationally by Lord Bennett, just before general elections in 1935. A sure sign that elections are coming.

Several social measures are announced. In the first place, we wish to go on record as opposing any encroachment upon the provincial rights, and we shall demand that in the enforcement of the laws provincial autonomy be fully respected.

In reading the speech from the throne, certain passages are noted which deserve particular attention. Thus, the government informs us that its ministers are determined, insofar as possible, to provide for the future. This is an admission that they had not up to now given any thought to the future of our people. Unfortunately we were too well aware of this.

Further, it is stated:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

What a discovery on the part of the government! The Bloc Populaire Canadien deserves perhaps a share of credit for the announcement of this reform, inasmuch as since its formation, a year and a half ago, the welfare of the family headed our programme.

[Mr. Raymond.]

Most of the social reforms announced were sorely needed. I have long been advocating in this house, on behalf of the working man, a living wage, a healthy home, means of properly bringing up his family, in a word social welfare legislation.

I shall confine myself to recalling my interventions on behalf of textile workers. The Turgeon investigation ordered by the government had revealed an intolerable situation. As the report was pigeonholed, in 1939, I called the attention of the government to the recommendations of the investigating commissioner in order to remedy the situation and proposed a bill to implement the recommendations. The government managed to prevent it from going through the required readings. This is the concern which the government has shown for the working man.

From 1930 to 1939, the Bennett and King governments meted out direct relief to the people to prevent them from dying of hunger. From 1939 to this day, the war has filled the bill and for the post-war period, a taxation formula is being worked out to pay for the gifts we have handed out to nations wealthier than we are. To-day, it is sought, by new promises, to help forget past promises that went unfulfilled; such a scheme does not work any more.

No matter how worthy the reforms proposed in the speech from the throne, one fact remains; it is that the government does not enjoy public confidence to such a degree that it could put them into effect. A proof of this statement is to be found in the result of the four by-elections held last August, when the candidates of the government were defeated in each of the four constituencies. Our people have had enough of unfulfilled promises. New promises on the eve of an election will not have the effect of restoring confidence in the present government.

Last year, when the Prime Minister blamed me for severing my connections with the Liberal party, he said that I did not do honour to the province of Quebec. I answered that, when the time would come for me to get the approval of the voters of Quebec, I would not dread their verdict.

The test has been taken in Stanstead and Montreal-Cartier, and you know the result. The government candidates were overwhelmed by the standard-bearers of the Bloc Populaire Canadien, in spite of the fraud resorted to by government officials.

In Montreal-Cartier, the Bloc Populaire candidate crushed the government nominee, and if the Labour-Progressive candidate polled 150 votes more than our man, it is only because thousands of fictitious names had been added to the voters' lists and other thousands of voters had been deprived of their electoral rights. The Labour-Progressive candidate was permitted to name enumerators to revise the lists while the Bloc Populaire representative was denied the same privilege. A royal enquiry should be held, for the parties responsible were in the pay of the government.

In a speech delivered in September last before the National Liberal Federation, the Prime Minister attacked the Bloc Populaire. It happened after the by-elections held in Stanstead and Montreal-Cartier, in the province of Quebec.

He claimed that our group had but a negative and destructive doctrine, that it was attempting to raise Quebec against the other provinces in order to win votes and secure influence by appeals to race prejudice. And he pictured us as a danger to Canadian unity.

His grounds for complaint should be noted. Our doctrine was negative and destructive, he said. Where does he find that? The Bloc Populaire was formed in September 1942. In my first address, delivered in October 1942, I stated as a principle that Canada, being a Christian country, should be governed like a Christian country, that our first concern would be the people. Consequently, we advocated a policy designed to protect and help the Christian family and its numerous children, and to facilitate their education and employment.

I advocated special consideration for public health, the elimination of slums, and a readjustment of salaries, so that our people might live under healthful conditions, and the heads of families might give adequate shelter and food to their children. I also advocated a revision of the taxation system that would take care of large families. Instead of increasing the tax burden which large families have to bear, we would have lightened it. We wanted and we still want, in short, to safeguard the family, which is the foundation of society.

How can the Prime Minister find anything destructive in such a policy? The speech from the throne even seems to have taken a leaf out of it.

In the field of foreign policy, we demand, for Canada, true sovereignty and the attributes of a sovereign state; true provincial autonomy; we demand a national anthem, a national flag, as all other dominions of the commonwealth; we demand that the Governor of Canada be a citizen of the country as in other dominions; we demand the discontinuance of appeals to the Privy Council and of recourse to the Westminster parliament in matters of amendments to the constitution. We wish to make of Canada a truly sovereign nation.

I could keep this nomenclature up indefinitely but I refer you to the Bloc's programme which has been made public.

The Prime Minister added that the Bloc Populaire was attempting to raise Quebec against the other provinces in fomenting racial prejudice. It would be truer to state that it was the Prime Minister who attempted, on this occasion, to raise the other provinces against Quebec.

Is demanding that the constitution be adhered to and that Quebec be represented as it should, equivalent to raising the other provinces against Quebec or fomenting racial prejudice. If so, Mr. Godbout, who, last year, protested against the procedure of the Government in connection with the redistribution of seats, would be as much to blame as we are.

Is protesting against conscription equivalent to raising the other provinces against Quebec? Then the Prime Minister would have been guilty of the same crime in 1917, when he was opposing conscription while all provinces except Quebec were clamoring for it.

Is demanding that the rights of minorities be respected as guaranteed by the constitution, that provincial autonomy be not infringed upon, that we enjoy our legitimate share of government appointments, that the workers of Quebec receive wages commensurate with those paid in Ontario, equivalent to fomenting racial prejudice?

We have become accustomed to hearing the Prime Minister make an appeal for national unity every time he requests concessions on our part.

Our policy is clear and unequivocal. Our movement is national in its principles and it will remain national in its manifestations.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish to follow the tradition of congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address; but they will understand that I cannot agree with all that they said.

During the recess we have witnessed many important happenings, some of them having to do with our national life and others being closely connected with our external policy. One of the most important, beyond doubt, was the Quebec conference in August, 1943. I wish to offer the government my congratulations upon having chosen the city of Quebec, my own city, as the scene of this conference. I do not hesitate to say that the people of Quebec appreciated the choice of their capital for the holding of this historic meeting. I am sure that our visitors had an opportunity of getting to know our people and of learning that notwithstanding certain misinformation spread by some parts of the press, the people of the province of Quebec are as loyal as anyone else and especially as Canadian as anyone else. This conference also gave the people of Quebec an opportunity to manifest their fullest appreciation of those who, coming from abroad, do not attempt to overawe them or treat them as inferiors, as unfortunately happens much too often, but come as gentlemen. This appreciation extends particularly to the British Prime Minister and his colleagues. It was a great pleasure for our people to hear Mr. Churchill, his distinguished wife and charming daughter, speak to them fluently in their own language. I am sure that no one in Quebec will forget the speech delivered by Miss Churchill over the radio on August 27, when she said:

Je me réjouirai toujours d'être descendue d'abord à Québec. C'est ainsi qu'il faut arriver au Canada.

This may be translated: "I will always be delighted to have come down first to Quebec. It is the way one must come into Canada." But I must say, Mr. Speaker, that if our people were happy to receive such important personages, at the same time they were very sorry to notice the insignificant role played in this conference by our own government. Once more it was evident that our country does not possess the international status which would put it on the same footing as the other nations.

Another very important event I should like to recall is the appointment of Mr. Justice Thibaudeau Rinfret as chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. No doubt the government deserves our congratulations on this appointment, because Judge Rinfret was surely the man best qualified to fill such an important post. I am sure the people as a whole, as well as lawyers and others who have anything to do with the Supreme Court of Canada, learned of this appointment with great satisfaction.

Another event occurred which was not so important of itself but which became of some significance because of the declarations made on that occasion. I refer to the Liberal caucus held in Ottawa in September of last year. According to a report published in the Ottawa Evening Journal of September 28 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), addressing his friends of the Liberal party said, as he did this afternoon, that probably no general election would take place before the end of the war; but he added that some circumstances might force the government to appeal to the country sooner. Among those circumstances was the following: any one of the opposition groups, or a combination of them, being able so to impede the progress of business in parliament, or so misrepresenting and distorting government policy, as to make it next to impossible to carry on. I do not know if by this statement the Prime Minister intended to prevent the opposition groups from criticizing the government, but if he did I think he made a mistake. On this point I should like to quote from an address delivered some time ago by the ex-president of the Canadian Bar Association:

Executive control of speech, particularly of speech in criticism of the executive, is fundamentally and completely incompatible with free institutions, whether the criticism be directed against the personnel, policies or acts of that executive or of any board or commission appointed by it. In time of war everyone will recognize the propriety of restricting the dissemination of certain types of information or even of banning the expression of views calculated to injure the country's cause; but to attempt to ban or restrict criticism, however injudicious, of the conduct of the executive or its agencies, is an assault on the very citadel of freedom and the establishment in the seats of power of its deadliest enemy. After all, there are some principles the preservation of which is more important than the fate of any government.

I believe everyone who is interested in the safeguarding of democracy and of our parliamentary system must hold the same views.

The only other event I should like to mention is the result of the by-elections that took place in our province last August. Once more the government has been defeated and has been shown that it has lost the confidence of the people. The result of the elections in Stanstead and Cartier demonstrated that the opinion of the people of Quebec was the same in 1943 as it was in 1942, when I was elected for Charlevoix-Saguenay. These three by-elections in my province give evidence that the Liberal party has lost its grip on that province. This does not mean that any other political group would do much better, because knowing quite well the sentiment of our people I am sure I am right when I repeat what I said last session, that having been tossed for seventy-five years between "reds" and "blues" only to serve as stepping stones to power, without any advantage to themselves, the people of Quebec have become wary; and, though not sure of the political orientation they will ultimately adopt, have decided for the present to support men who, having broken with old ties, can offer them guarantees of sincerity and above all, unselfishness.

I just said, Mr. Speaker, that the by-elections in Quebec in 1943 proved abundantly that this government does not represent the sentiment of the people of Quebec or of the country. To support that statement I should like to recall a declaration made by the Prime Minister himself on January 29, 1934, when he was leader of the opposition, and I quote from page 34 of Hansard for that year:

So the evidence from every side goes to prove that not only has the government lost the confidence of the country but it has lost confidence in itself. May I state further that no matter what majority it may have as a result of the number of hon. members returned at the time the government came into office, that majority no longer represents the opinion of the Canadian people. By-elections have expressed in no uncertain voice the opinion of our people. This government has lost the moral authority to govern. . . .

I repeat the statement. I say that having lost by-election after by-election in all parts of Canada during the last two or three years and the people having spoken so positively and so emphatically, it has been made perfectly plain that the gouvernment has lost the moral authority to govern, and if it followed its duty it would resign, go to the people and allow them to speak. The Canadian people as a whole should be given an opportunity at a general election to express their view upon policies which up to the present they have been able to do only in part in by-elections.

I have no doubt that if the Prime Minister was right in 1934 we should not be too long to-day in repeating his own words; and a statement like this weighs more heavily on the eve of the very important journey which the Prime Minister is about to undertake. If we refer to statements made lately by most important statesmen, especially to the address delivered a few days ago in Toronto by Viscount Halifax, it is certain that at the next imperial conference there will be some discussions of very great interest for our country, and there may be some decisions which will bind the future of Canada. Is it logical, is it democratic when all the other prime ministers who will attend this meeting have received fresh mandates from their constituents—is it fair for the people of Canada to have, as their representative, the head of a political party which, according to his own words, does not represent any more the sentiment of the people. It may happen that in such a state of affairs Canadians will not consider themselves bound by the decisions emanating from this conference.

It is true that we have a very fine speech from the throne, a speech which gives contentment to members of the Liberal party. But this is surely not enough to give the government authority to speak for the people of Canada. There will be much to say about the speech from the throne, and no doubt during the session we shall have an opportunity of discussing in detail the legislation which will come out of it. I hope the government will submit to the house the measures announced in the speech, so that we can give them careful study. I hope, also, that all these measures will be discussed on their own merits with the greatest possible broad-mindedness, and that it will not give to anyone the occasion to raise discrimination against one province or another.

As regards our international policy, we heard not long ago that the government had decided to name ambassadors to some countries. There is no doubt that these nominations constitute another push, leading Canada to a greater independence. But there is always this deficiency in our system, namely that of being obliged to go to another country to amend our constitution. I hope, Mr. Speaker, in the course of the present session to have an opportunity to formulate to the house a project which will enable us to amend our own constitution, ourselves, taking good care, however, to preserve the rights of minorities and the spirit of the compact that gave birth to confederation.

If we appreciate the nomination of these ambassadors, we must, however, deplore the fact that the government has not deemed it advisable to name one to the highest moral power on earth, the Vatican. I state that Canada should hurry to take her place among so many other countries with this international authority, the place on earth where problems are discussed and resolved with the greatest justice and equity. Are we aware of the fact that forty countries are represented at the Vatican? I have here the latest available list, and I think it is well known that those with ambassadors are Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Germany, Spain, France, Italy, Peru, Poland. Those with legations are the following: Great Britain, Bolivia, Costa-Rica, Esthonia, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Austria, Hungary, Ireland, Portugal, Roumania, Santo-Domingo, San Marino, Salvador, Czechoslovakia, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Malta, Liberia, Lithuania, Monaco, Nicaragua, Panama, Uruguay and Latvia. Everybody knows the President of the United States has his own personal representative. If so many countries find it to their interest to be represented there, would it not be the same for Canada, and would it not be for her one of the best aids in helping her to play the role she is eager to play in the international field?

Therefore I am sure I would be reflecting the opinion of the great majority of the people in this country, Catholics as well as non-Catholics, in urging the government to decide as soon as possible upon the nomination of an ambassador to the Holy See. This would surely be the greatest step toward the international status toward which we are heading. Furthermore I should like to tell the Prime Minister, when going to London, that at this imperial conference the finest task he could perform would be to sponsor participation by the Pope in the next peace conference. Since the beginning of the war we have been told we were fighting for democracy and Christian civilization. For us Canadians, we cannot aspire to anything other than the reestablishment of an enduring peace in the world. We cannot expect territorial possessions. We cannot expect much compensation. Therefore, if we wish to reach our end, if we wish to be true to ourselves and to others, we have nothing to do other than to see to it that all the necessary precautions be taken to have this time not twenty years' truce, but a real, everlasting peace. One of the most necessary precautions would most certainly be the attendance at the next peace conference of the most powerful moral authority, the greatest friend of peace, the greatest advocate of the moral brotherhood of mankind. Moreover, this point of view is shared to-day by all those who really care for the welfare of mankind.

I should like to give as an example a quotation from Time of August 16, 1943, as follows:

"No matter what critics might say, it is scarcely deniable that the church apostolic, through the encyclicals and other papal pronouncements, has been fighting against totalitarianism more knowingly, devoutly and authoritatively, and for a longer time, than any other organized power. Benedict XV was expressly barred from Versailles by a clause in the secret treaty of London. But whether or not the Pope is present, the influence of the Catholic church's peace policy will be tremendous. Most Catholics and non-Catholics alike would agree that a peace that does not embody at least roughly, the papal position on fundamental social issues will bring not social peace but a sword. For when traditional justice fails, retributive justice supervenes.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, this opinion of the magazine Time on the participation of the Vatican in the future peace conference is shared by a great many people of all creeds, of all races and of all countries.

It is generally agreed that if peace had been better prepared in 1919, if the peace treaty had not been dictated by the international money powers nor based on the hatred of some prominent figures against certain Catholic countries of Europe; in other words if the peace treaty had been drafted with the co-operation of the greatest moral influence in the world, the Holy See, the world would probably have been saved the horrors of the present conflict.

As long as this great international power, the Vatican, is deliberately left aside and excluded from international discussions, the suffering and unhappy peoples of the world will be offered only incomplete and insufficient remedies. The Church is a peacemaker by the very nature of its mission. Suffice it here to recall the many occasions on which the Roman pastors have been successful in putting an end to oppression, in preventing wars, and in securing truces, agreements and peace treaties.

In times gone by, the Pope was requested to act as arbitrator, and history shows that not once had a country any reason to regret having appealed to the Pope for adjusting its differences. One of the first instances where the European nations decided to exclude the Vatican from the discussion of international problems was the Hague convention of 1899. Notwithstanding the express demand of Czar Nicholas II of Russia, notwithstanding the insistence of Queen Wilhelmina, of Holland, notwithstanding the opinions of the experts in international law, the nations decided, on the suggestion of Italy, to exclude the Holy See from the convention. However, less than two years previously, the Seventh World Peace Congress, held in Budapest, under the chairmanship of General Turr, had expressed their gratitude to the Pope for his numerous peace interventions and had humbly and earnestly requested him to remain the champion of the great crusade for the fellowship of all men and to help the civil governments in their efforts toward peaceful mutual understanding.

Neither research congresses, even though independent of all confessional ties, neither the cabinets of reigning sovereigns, although divorced from the Church, could think of an international peace conference from which the Holy See would be excluded.

On August 24, 1898, Count Mouravieff, Minister of Foreign Affairs in Russia, carrying out the instructions of Nicholas II, invited the nations of the world to a disarmament conference. This invitation was conveyed to the Vatican on August 30, 1898, by Mr. Tcharykoff, resident minister of the Emperor of Russia appointed to the Holy See.

To this invitation, the Pope replied that he united wholeheartedly with the nations who wished to agree on terms of international peace. On January 16, 1899, the above-mentioned Mr. Tcharykoff sent a second message to the Holy See; it was a circular announcing the programme of the future conference.

Finally, on April 6, 1899, Queen Wilhelmina forwarded the official invitations to the various powers requesting their attendance at the meetings that were to take place at The Hague on May 10 following. These invitations, signed by Monsieur de Baufort, Minister of Foreign Affairs for the Kingdom of the Netherlands, did not, however, reach the Pope, in spite of the wish of Queen Wilhelmina and of Czar Nicholas II.

The reason for this is that, during the first fortnight of February, 1899, Admiral Canevaro, Minister of Foreign Affairs for Italy, informed the Czar and The Hague that unless the Pope were excluded, Italy would not take part in the conference. In spite of the steps taken by the Czar, Italy's objection could not be overruled. A short time before the convention Berlin stepped in, warning the promotors that if one of the great powers kept aloof, Germany would do likewise. As the presence of Germany was absolutely necessary, Italy's pressure was heeded.

During that now famous convention, besides the decisions that were taken, resolutions were drafted for future meetings during which the various nations were to continue the work begun at The Hague. Not content with having succeeded in keeping the Vatican away from the convention itself, Italy objected to the insertion in these resolutions of a clause whose sufficiently general scope might later have opened the door to the Holy See's participation.

Having to face, in connection with the drafting of those resolutions which excluded the Pope, most of the other powers assembled at The Hague, Italy endeavoured to obtain the support of some of the greater nations represented at the convention.

Finally, her objection was endorsed by Great Britain's representative, and once more Italy was successful. However, Queen Wilhelmina, ever anxious to have the Vatican ratify the proceedings and the resolutions of the convention, decided, at the final sitting, to quote the letter which Pope Leo III had sent her in reply to the invitation she had extended to him. That letter expounded principles identical to those which Leo XIII had stated some time previously in a consistorial address delivered on February 11, 1899.

A few excerpts from that address deserve to be quoted:

> Accordingly the church has never been and will never be more concerned about the propagation and the defence of the laws of justice and charity. It is for that purpose that the church has worked in the whole world and no one can doubt that it has mollified barbaric nations, in imparting to them the love of justice, and that it has thus turned them from the ferocity of warlike customs to lead them to the arts of peace and civilization; to the lowly as well as to the powerful, to those who obey as well as to those who give commands, it has imposed the obligation of observing justice and refraining from taking up arms for an unjust cause.

And further on:

> It applies itself to requesting from God that, for the salvation and prosperity of nations, He should spare them the dangers of war. Accordingly, every time that the need has arisen and the circumstances have permitted, it has no greater concern than to use its authority with a view to restoring harmony and pacifying kingdoms.

The merit of the Hague protocols, those of 1899 and those of 1908, has been to create a remarkable classification of the rules of public international law; there is no doubt that they contain an accurate and able adaptation of the principles of natural law, in accordance with material conditions and the moral standards of modern societies. It is unfortunate that the legal work achieved at the Hague conferences should have remained as unknown and unappreciated as was the case in almost every country of the world and in almost every social circle.

The fundamental principles of the law of nations would have proved, I believe, less inefficient had they been more widely known, more appreciated and endowed with higher moral prestige. The belligerents could not have, without serious moral prejudice to their cause and their country, violated them as universally and as impudently as our enemies did during the last and the present war.

Had a representative of Leo XIII been present at the first Hague conference in 1899, and a representative of Piux X at the second in 1907, the decisions and resolutions of those conferences would have gained from the moral prestige that would have bestowed upon them the approval and even the cooperation of the Roman pontiff. In all the countries of the world, the principles of morale and justice arising from these decisions and resolutions would have been impressed upon the conscience of millions by the bishops in their pastoral letters and by the priests from the pulpit.

It is indeed not foolhardy to believe that the cooperation of the representatives of Leo XIII and Pius X at the two conferences of The Hague would have helped to make less ineffective this great work of pacification of peoples.

At the outbreak of the war of 1914-18, the Pope, faithful to his mission of peace, attempted to check what he was perhaps in a better position than anyone else to foresee as a catastrophe from which all peoples would suffer without deriving much benefit. After the conflict had broken out, he endeavoured to relieve as much as possible the sufferings of the devastated countries.

The humanitarian works of the Holy See during the last war were innumerable. Its interventions for the exchange of prisoners, for the care of the sick, for the distribution of relief are undeniable and when, in 1918, victory finally crowned the Allied efforts, why was the Pope once more kept away from the discussions which preceded the signing of the peace treaty? Here again the intervention of Italy is seen.

When in 1915 that country agreed to fight on the side of the Allied Nations, a secret treaty was signed between herself, France, Great Britain and Russia. The Italian ambassador in London, Marquess Imperali, upon instructions from his government, conveyed to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir Edward Grey, to the French ambassador, Monsieur Cambon, and to the Russian ambassador, Count Benckendorff, a memorandum containing clause 15 which read as follows:

> France, Great Britain and Russia shall support Italy's opposition to any proposal tending to introduce a representative of the Holy See in any peace negotiations and in the settlement of matters arising from this war.

This document was signed on the 26th of April, 1915 by the four people I have just mentioned. Therefore, it is not surprising that in 1918 the Pope was not invited to attend the peace conferences of the Allied Nations.

Realizing these facts, is it not true that the instability of the Versailles Treaty appears less amazing? Moreover, why is it that on this page of history, the sacred name of Him from whom proceed all authority, all right and all justice, has not been inscribed? It was "in the name of the most Holy Trinity" that in the past the most solemn treaties were signed, those of 1815 as well as the treaties of Utrecht and Westphalia.

Christian institutions were convinced that God alone could put the finishing touch to human agreements to the extent that His spirit penetrated them. What wonderful success resulted from this policy of excluding the sovereign pontiff and of ignoring the rights of Providence!

The treaty of Versailles has probably lasted for a shorter period of time than any other treaty in history. Is it not very evident that after the present war, when we must start from scratch, it will be absolutely necessary to rectify the mistakes made from 1899 to 1919 and ask the Pope to enlighten by his moral authority the nations which will have the task of drawing up the next peace treaty?

[Mr. Dorion.]

Is there not, at the present time, another secret treaty, another convention designed to keep the Vatican out of international discussions? I hope not, for such a state of things would simply be a repetition of a crime for which we might have to pay very dearly.

It may be said in some circles, even among friends, that it is useless and ill-advised to protest against such an exclusion, for the powers that be have made up their minds to disregard our complaints.

I shall never accept this point of view; a great cause must be defended on the grounds that it is a just cause, and not on the grounds that it pleases everyone.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote a short extract taken from the radio message of His Holiness Pius XII broadcast to the Catholic world on Christmas day 1943:

> Give to thirsting humanity a peace that will restore the human race in its own self-esteem and in that of history; a peace on whose cradle will shine not the vengeful glare of hatred and the instinctive unleashed desires of revenge, but rather the resplendent dawn of a new spirit of universal union; this, strengthened by the supernatural help which is indispensable to the Christian faith, alone can succeed in preserving humanity, after this unfortunate war, from the unspeakable catastrophe of a peace based on false foundations, and consequently no more than an ephemeral illusion.

Monseigneur Deploige, rector of the University of Louvain, speaking at a conference on the Society of Christian nations, said:

> To insure peace, in so far as that is possible in this world of ours, recourse to the church of Christ, the great educator of nations, would have been necessary. Indeed, when the task in hand meets so many obstacles the causes of which are buried deep in the human soul, why should the greatest power in the world, heir to the immortal promises of the God of Peace, why should this greatest power alone remain uninvited?

On motion of Mr. Roebuck the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved:

That Standing Order 63 of the House of Commons, relating to the appointment of Standing Committees of the House, be amended by adding to the Standing Committees of the House for the present session a Standing Committee on Railways and Shipping owned, operated and controlled by the Government, to which will be referred accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, The Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines for the present session, for consideration and report to the House; provided however that nothing in the resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in Committee of Supply; and that the said Committee consist of: Messrs. Donnelly, Dubuc, Durocher, Emmerson, Ferland, Gray, Hanson (Skeena), Harris (Danforth), Hazen, Howden, Jackman, Lockhart, Michaud, McCulloch, Maybank, Nicholson, Parent, Pouliot, Roebuck, Ross (Middlesex East), Sanderson, Shaw, Sissons.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

TABLING OF REGULATIONS—PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH AND WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I wish to table two orders in council, one amending the regulations made under the Department of Pensions and National Health Act, and the other amending regulations with regard to allowances under the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has that anything to do with the north west field forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. One has to do with increases in allowances under the War Veterans' Allowance Act, and the other deals with allowances given to those who have been serving and are still under treatment. It provides in a word that they shall continue to have pay and allowances of the rank, with a ceiling of the rank of lieutenant, until treatment has been completed.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know how comprehensive this is, but many complaints have been registered by members generally with regard to the situation and I hope that this clears it up.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Black (Yukon), Fauteux, Golding, Hanson (York-Sunbury), Isnor, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), MacInnis, McIlraith, Maybank, St. Laurent and Quelch, be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the standing orders of the house with a view to simplify, accelerate and expedite its business, and to report to the house during the present session.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if it is possible to have this committee sit at an early day in order that we may be able to do something in connection with the rules of procedure before the session ends?—I mean a considerable time before the session ends, because I do not want the committee to bring in its report at the end of the session and have a discussion on it drag on into another session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the purpose in having the motion introduced at this early stage of the session is that the committee may get to work just as soon as possible. I would hope that it might have some recommendation to make to the house in the course of a few weeks or days. Certainly there is every desire on the part of the government to have the committee report as quickly as possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: The sooner the better.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is right.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, if I am within the rules I should like to say a few words about the formation of this committee that the government proposes to establish. In his speech yesterday the Prime Minister spoke at some length and offered the suggestion that Wednesday sittings be done away with in order to give members the opportunity to do more work on committees, and also to give more time to the members of the cabinet to look after their very important work. What I want to know is this: how are the members who are not members of the committees to make the contribution they should like to make in order to help the administration of the country? On February 22 of last year I suggested that members from the province of Quebec opposing the government should be given places on those important committees, but my suggestion was turned down. If we are to take it for granted that the opposition should be represented on all committees that have to do with important matters affecting the country, then I suppose, according to the same principle, members from the province of Quebec who in this house are opposing the government should be given the opportunity to make their contribution and bring their views to those committees. Therefore, if my request is in order, I would ask that opposition members from the province of Quebec be nominated to the important committees that the government intends to establish before long.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I understand this motion is debatable, and I desire to say a word in reference to it. I had the honour of serving on a committee which in 1928 revised the rules of this house under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker Lemieux, with the help, as a friend of the court, of the present Clerk of the House of Commons. We thought we had done a pretty good job at that time. I regret that the country as a whole, as I understand it, now thinks there were some grave errors and omissions in the work of that committee. I agree that as a result of the demand of public opinion the whole position should be reexamined, and I am glad that the Prime Minister has brought forward this motion.

I sympathize to some extent with the point of view of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Roy), but in connection with a matter of this kind I fear a large committee would not be as effective as a small one. I hope that while there may be some disadvantage—none is apparent to me, at all events—the Prime Minister will adhere to the principle of a small committee. I think it can do more effective and more continuous work than a large committee.

The position taken by the hon. member for Gaspé illustrates what is taking place in this house with a multiplicity of parties. We do not need to tell members of this house what difficult situations arise as a result, but such is democracy and we have to meet it. At the same time a situation of this kind, which has to do with the internal economy of the house, makes it impossible to give representation to every political party that springs up ephemerally, and temporarily I hope, in this House of Commons. Therefore I am going to support the motion as put, in the hope that useful work will be done by this committee, but without any great hope that there will evolve any revolutionary departure from the rules; because after all this is the people's parliament, the high court of Canada, a deliberative assembly wherein the people's representatives meet to express the point of view of those who have sent them here, and I strongly deprecate the curtailment of the right of free speech.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a word or two in respect of the motion before us, may I make an observation or two which I believe will represent the sentiment of a good many of those who sit in this house. I am in support of the motion, but I believe if all the committee does is to readjust a few minor rules, the full importance of the committee's work will not be realized. I fancy it makes very little difference whether or not a member is permitted to speak half an hour or forty minutes, or whether or not we sit on Wednesdays, or whether or not certain language may or may not be used, and the rules and regulations adjusted accordingly. I should like to see the terms of reference extended in order that a more complete democratic form of parliamentary procedure may be brought about. I appreciate what the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said when he pointed out that this is the people's parliament. That may be true in theory, Mr. Speaker, but it is not true in practice. We all represent the people, but because of certain party affiliations we can only act as a sort of sounding board, and when votes are taken it does not make very much difference what the people's representatives say.

I believe that the terms of reference to this committee should be extended to look into the matter I have just referred to. The government of this country should be the servants of the people; they should be the servants of parliament. They are not. We cannot vote along certain lines for fear that the vote may be interpreted as a vote of want of confidence, upon which the government would resign. I do not think that should be so in our parliamentary practice. I think we should be free to vote in whatever way we desire, and the government should become the administrative body to put into effect what parliament desires. It does not work that way in practice, as we know; the government seems to be the big boss of the representatives of the people. I wish the work of the committee could be extended in order to place this parliament upon a more practical basis as representing the will of the people, so that the government would become the administrative body to put into operation that which the representatives of the people desire.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the text of the resolution does not go far enough. This committee should consider the whole question of parliamentary, constitutional, cabinet and law reform. After all is said and done we are now in the fifth year of the war, and parliament has to do very little work indeed. We have appointed outside boards and commissions to such an extent that we have abrogated the functions of parliament, and the so-called supremacy of parliament has become a myth. I believe that with all these controls there is very little business for parliament to do except the holding of post mortems; the money is spent before the estimates reach this house. I believe the work to be done by this committee should embrace the subjects I have mentioned. If we had a rule similar to that of the British parliament, under which on the orders of the day supplementary questions might be asked, five-sixths of the debates in this house would be eliminated.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I should like this committee to consider the suggestion that when the hour of worship is called here the general public should be welcomed. This is the only place in Canada, so far as I know, where the doors are locked against the general public when we meet together for the worship of God. Surely the general public need it as much as we do.

Motion agreed to.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $3,650,000,000 be granted to his majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1945, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or desirable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $3,650,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the War Appropriation Acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask if this is the standard resolution that has always preceded the introduction of the war appropriation bills?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does it differ in any particular?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON TAKING OF VOTE OF ACTIVE SERVICE FORCES

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Blanchette, Factor, Fair, Gillis, Green, Hazen, Isnor, Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane), MacKenzie (Neepawa), MacNicol, McCuaig, McLarty, McNiven (Regina City), Reid and Power, be appointed to consider the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, together with any existing regulations relating to the taking of the vote of the members of the active service forces of Canada, with a view to preserving, continuing and safeguarding the full right of franchise of the personnel of the armed services serving at home and abroad and establishing the required procedure for exercising same; to survey all aspects of the problem; to suggest such amendments, modification or regulations as may be deemed necessary to accomplish the above named purposes, with power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I do not desire to take up any of the time of the house in unnecessary debate on the motion at this stage, for I think the committee should get to work as quickly as possible. However I should like to ask the Secretary of State what arrangements were made for the taking of the votes of the members of the armed services at the time of the 1940 general election. I should like also to suggest to the minister that in dealing with this matter the committee and the government avoid the serious error, amounting practically to a disgrace, which occurred at the time of the last Ontario election; I refer to the proxy system of voting. Perhaps this would be called a post mortem, but I am quite sure that of our people who were overseas at that time, who were perhaps Canada's No. 1 citizens, not more than one in ten actually exercised his franchise under that proxy system. I just point this out to the minister in order that we may not have any disgrace of the kind at the time of the next general election.

Mr. McLARTY: Replying to the first part of the question of the leader of the opposition, I may say that the regulations governing the 1940 general election were passed under the War Measures Act. My hon. friend will remember that there was not a very lengthy session of parliament in that year, and consequently such regulations could not be considered by this house. I am advised and believe, from the fact that no complaints were received at that time, that the procedure then adopted worked satisfactorily and well. However, conditions have greatly changed since then. In the first place the number serving in the armed forces has increased very substantially, and they are widely dispersed all over the world. The government is anxious that the fullest opportunity be given those serving in the armed forces to exercise their franchise in the selection of those whom they wish to represent them in parliament. That is the whole purpose of the motion, and perhaps this statement of government policy will answer the second portion of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words I take it that there will be no proxy system in the next general election?

Mr. McLARTY: I think it would be a little unfair to tie the hands of the committee. The regulations which have been drafted by the chief electoral officer with the collaboration of Mr. Harry Butcher, a former member of this house who served on the committee which sat in 1937 and 1938, and who I believe enjoys the esteem of all hon. members of this house. will be submitted to the committee for consideration, and I suggest that at this time it would be unwise to endeavour in any way to tie the hands of the committee by making any commitment as to the particular procedure which might be followed.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Perhaps I may say a word, since I was to some extent responsible for drafting the regulations governing service voting in 1940. I should like to point out to the house that these regulations will be somewhat more difficult of application under present circumstances. For instance, referring only to the Royal Canadian Air Force, in 1940 there were something like five hundred of the personnel of the air force overseas. At the present time it runs closer to fifty or sixty thousand, and they are widely dispersed over every part of the globe. So that the machinery which was set up in 1940, which I think all parties agreed was reasonably efficient and which at one time was almost unanimously considered by the house and the country to be fair and reasonable, will have to be considerably modified and altered.

Then other suggestions have been made with respect to the methods and manner of taking the vote. For instance there has been a suggestion made, one which I saw in a fairly widely publicized book by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that the members of the forces should be represented in this house by members of parliament at large, a certain number of members elected over and above the 245 for which the constitution provides. Of course that presupposes a constitutional amendment. Also, if I may say so—and I am not prepared at the moment to discuss the question on its merits—it comes perilously close to the fascist system, the corporative form of government, so close, in fact, that I am astonished to find my hon. friend promoting it.

It has some disadvantages, and from the standpoint of draftsmanship great advantages. The drafting of the legislation certainly would be easier if we were simply to say that the members of the armed forces serving overseas would be represented by, let us say, one member for every 20,000, 30,000 or 40,000 as the case may be. As a matter of fact I am informed that in the last war the province of Saskatchewan did have three members at large, one of whom was for Canada, one for Great Britain and one for France. So that the mechanics of that method would be comparatively easy. It would be very easy to make a provision whereby any, we will say, twenty-five members of the forces could nominate any other member of those forces, and after being duly certified as being a member of such unit he would be a candidate. I presume the whole 200,000 or 300,000 soldiers would vote for a certain number of candidates at large, each having the right to vote for ten or twenty members, as the case might be. So that from the point of view of mechanics or draftsmanship, if I had anything to do with the drafting I would welcome it. But I do not know that the country as a whole would support the setting up of a sort of military caste of some twenty or thirty members, in addition to those for whom provision is already made in our constitution. Nor perhaps would the men themselves like to be deprived of their right to vote in the constituency in which they had formerly voted. I suggest this procedure is something which might be studied by the committee. I bring these points forward so that they may be called to the attention of members of the house. The regulations made in 1940 are not in themselves perfect. They will have to be modified and amended, and any other method ought at least to be considered.

There is a further suggestion—and again from the standpoint of mechanics or draftsmanship, it probably presents even greater facilities than any of the others, and it has to do with all due respect to my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), with a sort of proxy system. The suggestion I received was that the regulations called for the right of every member of the forces to vote by proxy, and automatically that there should be inscribed on the electoral lists of the appropriate riding or electoral constituency wherein the next of kin reside, the name of the service man, with the designated next of kin as proxy. This has been explained to me only vaguely, but it would work out something like this: Tom Jones resides on Metcalfe street, Ottawa. His name would be given to the chief electoral officer by the records office of the Department of National Defence, whichever branch might be applicable, and the details would be inscribed on the list with respect to next of kin. Every member of the forces has next of kin. The next of kin also would be inscribed on the lists as being the persons having the right to vote.

Here a new inconvenience, however, is presented, because a great many of those boys might fear that their mothers or fathers, as the case may be, would be so strongly attached to the old political parties that they might not exercise that right to vote as they would exercise it.

Mr. GRAYDON: The soldier might be afraid his mother and father had gone C.C.F.

Mr. POWER: He might. On the other hand, an arrangement might be made, particularly if any such legislation were brought into effect now, whereby the member of the forces might be given the option or the right to state on some approved form, possibly by cable, that he wished some other man to act for him, or some other person who necessarily, I think, would have to be within certain kindred limitations. Because otherwise John Bracken might go around and get a lot of proxies and get into the House of Commons.

Mr. GRAYDON: He will get in anyway, but he will want their votes, not their proxies.

Mr. POWER: I suggest again, however, that this is a method which is worthy of some study. When I was explaining some of the difficulties to someone who had never been in a political election in his life, he thought it was the common-sense thing to do.

To revert to the 1940 regulations, I fear that with the armed services dispersed as they now are, a delay of some considerable time in an election would be involved. It would probably make the electoral period longer. Because one of the greatest complaints—I should say one of the very few complaints received at the last election—was that it was impossible to notify troops of the political allegiance or affiliations of the candidates. The troops received a list; and in the next election I presume they will receive a list of anywhere between 750 and 1,000 candidates. In many instances members of the forces have been away from Canada for three or four years, and the new men who have been coming up in the various parties could not possibly be known to those troops. The result would be that the men overseas would not know the political complexions of such candidates and even with the utmost possible use of cables I fear it would be impossible, for instance, to let a lone airman, a man lost in the wilds of the Hebrides, or—

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Order.

Mr. POWER: I am an oasis entirely surrounded by Scotland, so that I must not talk about the Hebrides. In any case, in an isolated place like the Hebrides, or somewhere in Burma, or the Gold Coast in Africa, it would be an extremely difficult job to let the troops know who the candidates are. So that it may be necessary to have voting by parties. That is, we would allow a man to vote for a party. The candidate would then be designated by the leaders of those parties.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then my hon. friend should explain or should describe who these new parties are.

Mr. POWER: That presents another difficulty. For instance, at the time of the last election the man who voted for my hon. friend in his constituency voted for a national government candidate. This time he will see the name of Gordon Graydon and he will say "Who in—"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POWER: "Who is he?" And there will be other difficulties, too. If leaders of parties are allowed at will to designate candidates as being the men to whom will inure the votes of persons who vote for the Progressive Conservative, Liberal or C.C.F. or other parties, as the case may be, we would have the spectacle of my hon. friend from Gaspe (Mr. Roy) nominating as his candidate the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). When considering that I did suggest to the draftsman that there should be a proviso in the legislation whereby the hon. member for York-Sunbury could repudiate his designation by the hon. member for Gaspe. The leader of the Bloc Populaire or the leader of the Canadian party could nominate the Prime Minister of this country as a candidate in Prince Albert. I do not think that that would help the Prime Minister very much.

These are things that I would draw to the attention of the house in order to indicate that while the 1940 regulation, by the admission of everybody, worked well, they would be difficult of application where the troops are so widespread and where communications are so difficult. I really believe that any method or manner which appears to have some common sense in its make-up should at least be studied by the committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not clear as to whether the former elections act provided that all members of the armed services are entitled to vote, or must they be twenty-one years of age?

Mr. POWER: All members.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Irrespective of age?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a word with reference to the suggestion of the minister as to the consideration of the problem of providing direct representation by the services. If it is the intention of the government that the committee is to consider this wide problem, I submit that the terms of the resolution are not broad enough. It merely instructs the committee to study the elections act.

Mr. GRAYDON: It does not even go that far.

Mr. FACTOR: With a view to preserving the rights of the service personnel. I submit further that it should not be within the province of this committee to study the rather interesting problem suggested by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). I suggest that that problem is in itself a modification of a problem which is so wide that it should not be included in the terms of reference of this committee. I would appreciate it if the minister would enlighten the house on that particular phase of the problem

Mr. POWER: I did not draft this resolution, but I was under the impression that it would cover any method which would protect the right of the soldier. It states that the committee is "to consider the Dominion Elections Act, together with any existing regulations relating to the taking of the vote of the members of the active service forces of Canada"—those are the 1940 regulations—"with a view to preserving, continuing and safeguarding the full rights of franchise of the personnel of the armed services serving at home and abroad and establishing the required procedure for exercising same." The committee is to study the elections act and the regulations and then establish regulations and procedure. It is "to survey all aspects of the problem."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That has nothing to do with representation; it would involve a constitutional amendment.

Mr. GRAYDON: This does not seem to me to be a question of representation by electoral districts in Canada. The Dominion Elections Act provides the machinery by which the vote is taken, and it is restricted entirely to that. I think the minister will find that he is on pretty broad ground when he talks about changing the method of representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. POWER: I am not advocating that. I am merely suggesting that it should be something for the committee to study. I think the phrase "to survey all aspects of the problem" would give them that power, perhaps with a little good will on the part of the chairman and the members of the committee, and on the part of the house if it were necessary to have the reference widened. Personally I should like to see it studied, although I do not think that I would support it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I agree with what the minister says with respect to that.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to hon. members that we are not in committee.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say a word, since my name has been brought into the discussion. I have no intention of debating this question now. I am a member of the committee that will be studying the whole problem, and my opinions will be reserved for the discussion of that aspect of the question. I merely wish to say a word with respect to the observation that it smacked of regimentation and so forth.

Mr. GRAYDON: Fascism.

Mr. GILLIS: The corporate state is nothing more or less than totalitarianism in its initial stages. Nothing was further from my mind. On many occasions I have heard hon. members stress the fact that the opinions of those in the services were absolutely essential at this time. Since the outbreak of war we have changed completely the functioning of government in many directions under our war measures acts. If we are honest in our declaration that we want the opinion of the service man in this house, then that is where he should be. I do not think that an amendment of the elections act with respect to the franchise alone is going to give us the real opinion of the man in the services who is now in a theatre of war; it will not bring that opinion into this house. In order to get that, I think the first thing that will have to be done is to give those in the service a full opportunity of discussing the issues involved in the election. I see no other way of doing it except to grant to the men in the services the same democracy with respect to the exercise of their franchise as we have in Canada. My own opinion is—I am not saying that it is the policy of this group—that the man in the services should have the privilege of nominating his own candidate over there. He should have the same right as we have to elect our representatives in Canada. Men from the scene of operations should be sent back to this house to guide us, and to let us know their hopes and aspirations. I am still convinced that that is the correct thing to do. I do not think any man or any woman should be asked to cast a ballot on any question unless he or she is thoroughly familiar with the issues involved.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the house at this time, but there is one point I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members. When the vote is extended to the members of the armed forces they should be given the right to cast that vote as a secret ballot. I am thinking back to the time when the plebiscite was taken. Under the system adopted at that time it was possible for a vote to be traced, and I think that procedure should be done away with.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I ask your indulgence for a moment? The hon. member for Cape Breton South has raised the question of bringing the opinions of those overseas to bear upon this matter. Will the minister give an undertaking that if we pass this resolution now, and it is found that the terms of reference are not broad enough to cover what the Minister of National Defence for Air thinks it should, the committee will ask for a widening of its powers? Also I should like to know if we will be able to have soldiers from overseas or from Canada appear as witnesses before the committee to give some indication as to what they desire in connection with the point raised. After all, we are only civilians.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I think it would be extremely unwise for me to give any undertaking as to what the decision of the committee may be, or upon what basis they will operate. The committee has the right at any time to refer back to the house if it is found that the scope of its reference is not wide enough to enable it to perform the duties it feels it should perform. The house can be asked to widen the terms of reference, but that is a matter that should be considered at that time. As to bringing in men from overseas or from the service in Canada, I would point out that the resolution is quite wide. The committee is to be given power to send for persons, papers and records, and to sit while the house is sitting. In other words, there is no limitation on the power of the committee to summon whomever they think could give information that would be of assistance in their deliberations.

Mr. GRAYDON: We ought to know what the troops themselves want.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT AS TO "LABOUR POOL" FOR WORK IN FORESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to forward to the Minister of Labour an item in to-day's Toronto Globe and Mail entitled "Labour Pool", written by the correspondent of the Boston Herald in connection with manpower for our Canadian forests. I was not able to give the minister notice of the question. Perhaps he will not be able to give me an answer to-day, but I wish to serve this notice so that he may be able to give me an answer to-morrow. The item, which seems to give authentic information, says that there is a labour pool available for work in Canadian forests and that United States interests are anxious to get a part of that labour pool—

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I can answer that question now, without waiting until to-morrow. There is not a labour pool.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then the minister's answer to my question is that there is no available labour pool such as is indicated in this item?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, we have no pool.

[Mr. McLarty.]

INQUIRY AS TO LAY-OFF AT TORONTO SHIPBUILDING YARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I have not sent him notice of the question, and if he can give an answer to-morrow it will be satisfactory. In the meantime he may be able to straighten out a difficult situation that has arisen in the Toronto Shipbuilding yards on account of the lay-off, last Thursday, on seven days' notice, of carpenters and some other trades. The question I desire to ask is this: Is the principle of seniority rights for these employees in the Toronto Shipbuilding yards being followed and is any consideration being given to the returned soldier preference by contractors for the department in those yards?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be glad to make inquiries.

HOGS

INQUIRY WITH REFERENCE TO PREMIUM ON GRADE A AND GRADE B-1 CARCASSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture based on a press release of January 22, which recites the intention of the government to pay a premium of $3 on grade A carcasses of hogs and a premium of $2 on carcasses of grade B-1. The next sentence is ambiguous and capable of two or three interpretations. The fact that this premium is already in operation is my reason for asking the question on the orders of the day rather than putting it on the order paper, because I have had many inquiries about it. The sentence to which I refer reads:

> The premium of $1 formerly paid by the packers on grade A carcasses will be paid on the carcass grade value for export bacon.

This has created some confusion. I would ask the minister, first, whether it is intended that this premium of $1 on grade A carcasses should be paid by the packers or by the government? Second, will the premium be paid on all grade A carcasses or only on such carcasses as are exported?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the present position is that the plan as announced on the 22nd of January is in substitution for one not yet put into effect. The announcement previously made indicated that it would take two or three weeks to get the plan worked out, but we found within a few days that there was going to be so much difficulty in meeting the situation with regard to individual farmers if something were not done immediately, that on January 22 we asked the packing plants and others who were taking deliveries of hogs to make payment of the premium of $3 on A's and $2 on B-1's when deliveries were made as from the next Monday morning. But at the same time we indicated that the $1 premium which had been previously paid on A's will not be paid after the final set-up is made. In the meantime the $1 premium is being paid by the packing plants and other purchasers of grade A hogs. But after the plan is set up, it is intended that the $1 premium will be spread over the two classifications, A's and B-1's, which are the export grades, in some proportion which will be reasonable in relation to the value of A's as compared with B's. Then there will be an A price and a B price, as well as prices on grades below. The premiums of $3 and $2 will be paid by the government only on A's and B-1's. The present intention is that they will be paid in the form of a warrant which will be attached to the cheque which the farmer receives for his hogs so that he will be able to take it to the bank and cash it along with his cheque.

Mr. SENN: I did not get the minister's idea exactly. May I ask whether this premium of $1 will be paid by the government or by the packer?

Mr. GARDINER: There will be no premium at all after the plan is finally announced, except the premiums paid by the government of $3 and $2. The $1 will be part of the price for A's and B-1's divided between the two in some proportion to be determined on a basis of value.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, may I, notwithstanding the well-chosen words—perhaps I might borrow the adjectives of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and say the amiable words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Graydon) in reference to the form of this debate—nevertheless conform to the ancient and delightful parliamentary custom of offering felicitations to the mover (Mr. Tremblay) and the seconder (Mr. Tucker) of the address. It was an excellent custom, and they were excellent addresses. But I should like to go further than is dictated by ancient custom and offer a word of commendation and compliment in respect to all the addresses which have preceded mine. They were all good addresses. And why not? Why should they not be good addresses? Every one of them was delivered by the leader of a political party, six or seven of them, and of course, with the status of leadership conferred upon the individual, one would expect that his speech would be broad in scope, well delivered, and so forth.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has just now referred to the multiplicity of parties, and I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if the time will not shortly arrive, in the course of the political development which is now on our hands, when we will all be leaders of a political party. Two hundred and forty-five of us, each leading his own party, would surely improve the quality of the debates and we could adopt as our motto "Every man his own leader".

I have observed in the addresses of all the leaders who have spoken so far—some of them leaders of parties of one, but nevertheless leaders—a certain delightful and inspiring flavour of international politics. I cannot say whether that is the result of the status of leadership, or whether it comes from the divinity that doth hedge a king, or what it is. But I have noticed it with a great deal of interest. Or perhaps it was the evidence that I saw in these addresses of the growing importance of this assembly and the recognition of the fact that we who sit here are representative of a nation—Canada's status within the family of nations. I hope that is so.

Not being myself a leader but just one of the rank and file of the common people, I of course can accept a statement of policy laid down by somebody else; and so I wish to say that I approve very highly the statesmanlike pronouncement which was made in this house yesterday afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). It is in my judgment a sufficient answer to the question propounded by the noble lord from across the sea as to the future of Canada within the commonwealth of nations and in the world at large.

There was a time in this country when politicians and rank and file were prepared to accept their international thinking from titled gentlemen in Downing Street, and there are still, Mr. Speaker, some colonial-minded people in Canada. We have been slow, very slow, in shaking off the swaddling thinking of our colonial era, but to-day I believe this house is beginning to recognize that Canada is a nation in her own right—no longer in anyone else's right, but in her own right.

Canada to-day stands in fourth place among the allied nations in both military and economic importance. Canada to-day is a world power and I would remind members of this house that with power is always associated responsibility. We are no longer in a position to shuffle off decisions upon the broad shoulders of imperial statesmen. Canada is playing a part in world affairs and accordingly, in my judgment, Canada must exercise a voice in world problems and questions.

Having said that by way of introduction, I want to utter a word of commendation of some remarks made by the leader of the Social Credit party in this house yesterday afternoon in his reference to that national and international question of refugees. I read from his words just a sentence.

> I tell this house that the homeless Jew is a challenge to all the decencies that make what we are pleased to call our English-speaking civilization.

I agree with that; but the Jewish problem is just one portion of a much broader emigration and refugee problem. The Jewish problem is a portion of the refugee problem and the refugee problem is a portion of the emigration problem. But the Jewish problem is at the present moment the most pressing of all these problems, and that for two reasons. In the first place, it was against the Jewish population of occupied Europe that Hitler and his nazi butchers first directed their diabolical attack upon democracy and decency. They were the primary ones to bear the brunt of nazi brutality. In the second place, the Jewish portion of this big problem has become acute at this moment because of the decision of the British government, made nearly five years ago, to close the door of Palestine on March 31, 1944—that is to say, on the last day of next month—against further Jewish immigration. That makes it a most pressing problem. It creates a crisis in Jewish life and it aggravates the greater question of the refugee. As there are in Canada some 150,000 or perhaps 200,000 Jewish people, Canada is interested in this decision of the British government and in the problem in general; and Canada interested is a Canada with a right to be heard. And so may I trespass on the kindness and courtesy of this very good-natured house to say a word or two upon that great problem to which I have referred.

[M. Roebuck.]

First let me take up the facts of history of a recent date, with which you, sir, are no doubt familiar. A Jewish research committee in the city of New York recently estimated—and its estimate was adopted and published in a notable article by the New Republic—that in 1939 the number of Jewish people in continental Europe when the war broke out was 8,324,000. The estimate goes on to show that to-day, after four years of Hitler warfare, butchery and brutality, there remain in Hitler-dominated Europe only 3,300,000 Jewish people. I have no doubt you will ask me what has become of that other 5,000,000 people who, prior to the advent of Hitlerism, were decent, honourable and useful citizens of Europe. Well with the exception of those who have found asylum in neutral and allied countries, all have perished. In a recent statement published by Mr. S. J. Zacks, president of the Zionist Organization of Ontario, the estimate is made—and I look upon him as an authority in these matters, since he is the head of the Zionist movement of the province of Ontario—that since the outbreak of war Hitler has murdered by starvation, torture and violence 3,500,000 people in occupied Europe. Of the 8,000,000 Jewish people in occupied Europe prior to Hitler's advent and the beginning of this war 3,500,000 have been murdered in cold blood and three million only remain. Those in Germany are in deadly peril; in his very last speech Mr. Hitler was still proclaiming that the ruin of Germany was to be attributed to the Jews. The remaining one and a half million of Jewish people are scattered to the four winds, rescued in some cases by the allies and in some cases by neutral countries. Therefore I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this house that the time for turning a deaf ear to the screams of Hitler's victims has gone by.

I have a statement which I extracted from a book called "The Pillars of Society," by Sir William Beveridge. At page 166 he says:

> The refugee problem is a test both of the humanity of all the united nations and of their capacity as a grand alliance to make up their minds upon the problems for whose solution the alliance exists, and in hopes of whose solution it fights.

Since the Balfour declaration of 1917, Palestine has been the bright hope, the haven of refuge for persecuted Jews throughout the whole world. For centuries the Jewish people have held the vision of the return of the children of Israel to their historic home. That idea developed through the years with the growth of learning, and particularly with the development of the learning of Jewish history.

In 1914, when the last war broke out, there was in existence a world-wide Jewish or Zionist movement. There were some 12,000,000 Jews outside of Germany, or very nearly that many. Jewry, as such had become important from the standpoint of world politics. I have taken an excerpt from the Encyclopædia Britannica volume 23, page 936, which I shall read:

A declaration in favour of Zionism would help to rally Jewish opinion throughout the world to the side of the allies. Further, the settlement in Palestine of a Jewish population attached to Great Britain by ties of interest and sentiment might well be of value in guaranteeing the permanent security of the approaches to the Suez canal. To these practical motives was added a genuine desire to contribute towards the solution of the Jewish problem, in which British statesmen have shown themselves sympathetically interested long before the war.

That was the political situation in the world when in these circumstances, Lord Balfour, then Foreign Secretary of Great Britain, addressed a letter to the Jewish people of the world, through Lord Rothschild, who was the foremost member of that body. I am going to read this letter because it is one of the most important documents of modern times. This is the letter that has become famous as the Balfour declaration of 1917. It is dated November 2, 1917, and is as follows:

Dear Lord Rothschild:

I have much pleasure in conveying to you on behalf of His Majesty's government, the following declaration of sympathy with Zionist aspirations, which has been submitted to and approved by the cabinet: His Majesty's government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country. I would be gratified if you would bring this declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.

Note the words "approved by the cabinet"; approved "a national home for the Jewish people" and the pledge to "use its best endeavours to facilitate the achieving of this object." Immediately following that declaration France assented and approved; Italy followed. In the United States a resolution was passed by both houses of congress, and I am told that as many as fifty-two of the nations of the world expressed their approval and endorsation.

In my judgment, there could be no more sacred, solemn and binding pledge given by any government to any body of people at any time. The declaration was approved by the Jewish communities of the world, and it secured the cooperation of Jewish people everywhere on the side of the allies, the very purposes for which it was designed.

Five weeks after the publication of the Balfour declaration, General Allenby marched into Jerusalem and took over the control of the government of Palestine. Very shortly after that, Great Britain was given a mandate over Palestine by the league of nations. On July 22, 1922, the council of the league of nations approved the terms of the mandate and it is interesting to note that in the statement of terms the Balfour declaration was recited in the preamble. Not only that, but the terms were drawn a few weeks after a statement had been issued by the British government known as the "Command Paper 1922". I will read an excerpt from that document:

When it is asked what is meant by the development of the Jewish national home in Palestine, it may be answered that it is not the imposition of a Jewish nationality upon the inhabitants of Palestine as a whole, but the further development of the existing Jewish community, with the assistance of Jews in other parts of the world, in order that it may become a centre in which the Jewish people as a whole may take, on grounds of religion and race, an interest and pride. But in order that this community should have the best prospect of free development and provide a full opportunity for the Jewish people to display its capacities, it is essential that it should know that it is in Palestine as of right and not on sufferance. That is the reason why it is necessary that the existence of a Jewish national home in Palestine should be internationally guaranteed, and it should be formally recognized to rest upon ancient historic connection.

When the Balfour declaration of 1917 and the command paper of 1922 which followed spoke of the Jewish people, they meant all the Jewish people; they clearly denoted Jews everywhere. When they spoke of "a national home for the Jewish people," they meant a home for the whole body of these people everywhere. That was the pledge, and that this is what was meant I think is established by what immediately followed. Jewish organizations were permitted to bring immigrants to Palestine, and by 1939 the Jewish population of that country had risen to 450,000 people. It is estimated that by 1936 the Jewish capital brought into Palestine since the first world war amounted to £70,000,000. Every inch of the soil of Palestine which during those years has passed into Jewish possession has been bought by Jewish money collected in Jewish communities throughout the whole world, including Canada, and it has been paid for at the price asked by its original owners. The desert places of Palestine have been made to blossom and bloom. Agriculture and industry have been promoted. The Arab population have greatly benefited from these activities. Nevertheless, riots, disorder and violence have characterized the conduct of the Arab majority ever since the emigration began. In 1937, due to the violence of the Arabs, a proposal was made to partition Palestine into two states, one Jewish and the other Arab, but it was rejected by both sides as impracticable. Then in 1938, after a conference in London of both Jewish and Arab representatives failed to reach some compromise agreement, the British government brought down what is known as the Chamberlain white paper. Some of the facts set out in that white paper are interesting. It says:

> Since the statement of 1922 was published, more than 300,000 Jews have immigrated to Palestine, and the population of the national home has risen to some 450,000, or approaching a third of the entire population of the country. Nor has the Jewish community failed to take full advantage of the opportunity given to it. The growth of the national home and its achievement in many fields are a remarkably constructive effort which must command the admiration of the world and must be, in particular, a source of pride to Jewish people.

Then a little further:

> The methods employed by Arab terrorists, against fellow Arabs and Jews alike must receive unqualified condemnation.

Those are the facts set out in the Chamberlain white paper; yet in the face of those facts and for purely political reasons—I mean "political" in its widest sense—this is the statement of policy which follows:

> Jewish immigration during the next five years will be at a rate which, if economic absorptive capacity admits, will bring the Jewish population up to approximately one-third of the total population of the country.

And the next paragraph:

> After a period of five years no further Jewish immigration will be permitted unless the Arabs of Palestine are prepared to acquiesce in it.

I submit to this house that this is the most perfect example of Chamberlain appeasement one could well imagine. It is appeasement in this, that it submits to the very violence which it condemns. It is appeasement in that it not only submits to the violence of the violent but it does so at the expense of the innocent. That, I take it, is Chamberlain appeasement at its worst.

I am not the only one who holds these views, or who has raised his voice in protest in regard to what is expected to happen at the end of next month. The matter was debated in the British House of Commons shortly after the paper was issued in 1939. At that time, referring to this provision that there shall be no more immigration into Palestine without the acquiescence of the Arabs, Right Hon. Winston Churchill made this statement:

> Now, there is the breach; there is the violation of the pledge; there is the abandonment of the Balfour declaration; there is the end of the vision, of the hope, of the dream.

Mr. Amery, who was a member of the war cabinet at the time the Balfour declaration was issued and was later colonial secretary, made this reference:

> It is a repudiation of the pledge on the strength of which the government of Palestine was entrusted to our hands.

In the House of Lords the Right Reverend Cosmo Gordon Lang, Archbishop of Canterbury, made a denunciation practically as strong. He said:

> If the Arabs are willing to allow an extension over that one-third of the population, another of the wonders of the world will have occurred. The position therefore is that the Jews are reduced to the status of a permanent minority. I venture to think that it was precisely from this permanent minority that they hoped to escape.

You may ask why Canada is especially interested in this problem of Palestine. In part my answer has been given already. In this country there are from 150,000 to 200,000 Jewish people, and the Zionist Organization of Canada has actually invested in Palestine an amount estimated in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000, in addition to the private subscriptions to various industrial and agricultural enterprises. This $5,000,000 was invested by the Zionist Organization on the strength of its members' faith in the Balfour declaration. We in Canada have a right to demand fair play and justice to our own investors.

In addition, of the twelve million Jewish people outside the axis countries, about one and a half million are in the armies of the united nations. Even in Canada, with our smaller population and much smaller army, we have some 14,000 Jewish boys under arms. I submit that this house, this nation and the allied nations as a whole must keep faith with these men.

Furthermore, Canada is a member of the league of nations; and so I hark back to what I have said: with power there goes responsibility. With responsibility there is sometimes call for action. Canada is a member of the organization which gave to Great Britain her mandate over Palestine. Accordingly, Canada has a right to point out, if she so desires, that the white paper is not a proper and just rendering of the Balfour declaration, and that, as a practical matter, the closing of the doors of Palestine against one of these large branches of the refugee group is not in the best interests of the world at large, is not a Christian act, or a statesmanlike act. Canada is to-day a world power. She can no longer stand aside accepting the immunities of childhood in an adult world.

Our own position in connection with refugee emigration is not such as to provide a salve for an injured conscience. I have already said that some 3,500,000 Jewish people have been murdered by the nazi butchers, within those areas controlled by Hitler and his gang. Of that number 1,500,000 are scattered to the four winds. May I ask this question: How many of this group of refugees have found refuge on the soil of Canada? The last figures available, those for 1942, show a grand total of Hebrew immigration into Canada for the year ending March 31 of that year of 111 persons. That includes men, women and children. I draw attention to this figure of 111 persons out of the 1,500,000 scattered by Hitler.

Of course all the 111 were not refugees. That is the total of Hebrew immigration or, to be more exact, immigrants who professed the Hebrew religion. In the year before the number was 284. Surely in Canada, with our great heritage of 3,500,000 square miles of territory, we have room for more than one or two hundred persecuted people fleeing for their lives from nazi butchers. I should think we could have found a space in this great heritage to extend a helping hand to more than 111 of such people, or rather that portion of the 111 who were actually Jewish refugees.

At the outbreak of war Canada deliberately and purposely closed her immigration offices in Europe and, I believe, in Asia. The one exception was the office in London, England. We also withdrew our immigration officials. I am delighted to note that within the last two or three months we have reopened our immigration office in Lisbon, Portugal, and the immigration officer there has been charged, I believe, with the responsibility of devising methods of carrying out programmes of relief and help. I do not know what the returns are, because I have seen nothing published about his activities. I have been told, however, that Canada has offered to extend a helping hand to some few of those refugees who have found asylum in Portgual, but that so far as the Jewish immigrants are concerned they preferred to go on to Palestine, where the door is still open, and may continue to be open for a short time after March 31.

I say that because in a debate in the British House of Commons in November of 1942, the colonial secretary gave assurance that the full number of 75,000 immigrants would be permitted as had been promised by the Chamberlain white paper, notwithstanding the passing of the exact date. And so the gates of Palestine are not yet closed. I am hopeful that an expression of opinion, even so humble as mine, coupled with many other such expressions, may result in a reconsideration of this subject, and that Canada may make representations along the lines I have suggested. I am encouraged in that thought by the statement by Lord Halifax, speaking in Washington on January 17 of this year, on which occasion he expressed a doubt as to whether Great Britain would actually carry out the formal declaration of the white paper and close the gates of Palestine on March 31. It would seem therefore that the situation is not hopless—indeed, far from it. It is my view that were public opinion aroused in Canada, and that were our government to express, even in the mildest of terms, some of the thoughts I have voiced, as Churchill has put it, the vision, the hope and the dream of a national home in Palestine for the descendants of the writers of the Bible may yet be preserved.

Since in my opinion the opening of an immigration office in Lisbon was in response to an awakening public conscience, so do I hope that a further awakening may lead to Canada's still further liberalizing her immigration policy. I am not advocating that the immigration bars be thrown down, because that is no longer possible in the world as we know it to-day. But aside from the immigration problem, I do believe that Canada should, and I hope will, extend a hand, along with other Christian nations of the world, with a view to saving as many as possible from the fury of the nazi butchers.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, while the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) opened his address with a condemnation of the Halifax proposals, he proceeded to discuss at length the problem of immigration into Palestine, which, as I understand it, is a subject solely the prerogative of the United Kingdom parliament sitting at Westminster. I do not want to labour this point, but there has been discussed at length to-day in this house an issue which is not one of our prerogatives. I agree with the hon. member for Trinity that this question of Palestine is of importance to those of the Jewish faith in Canada; yet if we are to consider ourselves as a nation, as the hon. member states we should, we cannot wholly disregard or abandon our responsibilities to the commonwealth in connection with a deliberative jurisdictional measure. I shall have more to say on this a little later but the hon. member for Trinity gave me the opportunity of saying a few words now.

When I listened yesterday to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) expound the theme of the supremacy of parliament I thought of some other places where his remarks, instead of being received with the adulation of a mechanical majority, would have brought forth active and violent signs of derision and displeasure. The theory of parliamentary supremacy is all important to the future of the country, because a docile parliament subservient to the rule of the leader has always been the first step to the loss of individual freedom, to dictatorship, and eventually to revolution. That is the danger to-day in Canada, and nowhere is it more evident than in the smoke-screen which is the speech from the throne.

To say that the speech from the throne recognizes the importance of the war is theoretically correct. It recognizes the importance of the war in exactly the same way as the president of a great corporation recognizes the loyalty of the employees in his annual report. In other words, he does it in a stereotyped paragraph, thanking them for their work during the past year and hoping that they will continue to show the same commendable consideration in the future.

Great concern was expressed yesterday by the Prime Minister about the war. I think he was correct in expressing great concern about the war. But a statement was issued some weeks ago by the premier of Quebec to the effect that in conversation with the Prime Minister he had reached the conclusion that we were on the easy road to victory. The main part of the speech was an election manifesto of a unique and in many ways dishonest nature. It did two things. First of all it sets up the vision of a promised land knowing that the attaining of that will require machinery and constitutional changes, the former not being at present available and the latter requiring provincial agreement about which there is very great doubt. In other words, it is like giving a man a cheque for a million dollars and then telling him to go out and get somebody to sign it.

Another point about the speech from the throne is that it endorses the inflationary theme of compensation without contribution. In other words, something for nothing. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has often and effectively used the words, "work and save", but they have now been changed to the jovial exhortation of "multiply and prosper."

At the very time the government endorses a plan of putting more purchsaing power into the hands of the people instead of providing a high and continuing degree of employment, it brings down an order in council freezing the wages of labour in all its three categories, organized, unorganized and salaried. To aggravate matters, it uses the danger of inflation as an excuse in the very first paragraph of the order in council. Yet it brings down a programme which cannot by any stretch of the imagination be considered as anything but inflationary.

At the beginning of the war labour freely and wholeheartedly gave a pledge that it would not use its final and most powerful weapon, namely the strike, until the war had been won. How has labour lived up to its pledge? I believe the figures will show that during four and a half years of the war the number of man-days lost in Canada through disputes has been less on a per capita basis than those lost in any other part of the world. My own district of West York is one of the greatest industrial and railroad ridings in Canada and as far as I am aware there has not been one man-hour lost through labour disputes. This is a record of which I am extremely proud and jealous.

Now in the fifth year of the war when the problem will soon be not so much getting labour as providing employment there has been issued a highly provocative and contentious order in council known as the wartime wages control order, 1943, the provisions of which go into effect on February 15, two weeks from to-day. I should like to say a word or two about the provisions of this order which I consider to be not only provocative but completely indefensible in the light of labour's freely given pledge. The first objection is to the composition of the national labour board. I shall quote from the order in council so that the house can see what I mean. Besides the chairman and the vice-chairman, who are to be appointed by the governor in council, there are to be two other representatives of the public, then only one representing the employers and one representing the employees. With two members representing the public, who would be government appointees, there would be four members appointed by the government. The operative members, or those representing the employers and employeees, would be outnumbered two to one, while labour would be outnumbered five to one. I think that is an entirely undue weighting of the officials on that board and that labour as well as management should receive a greater proportion of representation.

The regional boards are in a slightly different position, but the same objection applies.

My next objection, and this is one of the most important clauses of these regulations, is that the power of the board is supreme over any court in the land. It takes precedence over any court, no matter where the court is situated and no matter what the circumstances may be. I will read the clause. The directions are final and conclusive in any court.

Any finding, direction or order given or made under the authority of this order by the national board, or by a regional board, until varied or revoked by the national board on review or appeal, shall be final and conclusive for the purpose of any proceedings in any court taken pursuant to this order and shall be accepted by and shall not be subject to review in such court.

That is a habit to which we have been accustomed through order in council. I think it is untenable and an unwise practice in this connection.

The next objectionable feature is the method of appeal from the decisions of the regional boards. This is the appeal clause:

Any person interested in or affected by any decision or direction of a regional board may appeal to the national board if the regional board making such decision or direction grants leave so to appeal.

In other words you are tried by a board and the only appeal you have from that board's decision is dependent upon the board's allowing you to appeal. That, I think, is not good legal practice, nor is it justice.

The next clause which I consider indefensible is the anti-strike clause, clause 35. It is a long clause and I shall read only a portion of it. But first let me say that after the record of labour in this dominion in this war, now in its fifth year, to bring down a clause like this which is like a red rag to a bull and would infuriate anybody is extremely bad policy. The clause sets out the penalties as follows:

Every employee who strikes or takes part in any strike to obtain an increase of wages . . .

I shall not read it all, but it goes on:

. . . or for the purpose of obtaining any direction from or of influencing the decision of a war labour board constituted under this order or in protest against or to obtain any alteration in any such direction . . .

Then these are the penalties:

. . . shall be guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars nor more than one hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term of not less than one month nor more than three months or to both such fine and such imprisonment in respect of each day or part of a day . . .

In other words, the individual is subject to three months imprisonment for going on strike for one day or one hour. That legislation, Mr. Speaker, I contend is as restrictive and as dangerous as anything that Germany has ever had before the reichstag was abolished.

Now I come to the worst clause of all of these regulations, namely clause 36, which deals with the prosecution and the methods to be used in the prosecution. It sets out a principle that is absolutely indefensible and that is so absolutely bad that we might think we were no longer in a British country. I will read the operative part of the clause:

Where, in any prosecution of any person under this section, it is proved that such person incited, encouraged or aided any employee to go on or continue any strike the burden of proof that such strike was not in contravention of this order shall be upon the accused.

Mr. MITCHELL: Finish the clause.

Mr. ADAMSON: Certainly. It goes on:

This provision shall not deprive the accused of the benefit of any reasonable doubt—

Reasonable doubt, mark you.

—which may exist after all the evidence has been put before the magistrate or justice by whom such prosecution is tried.

In other words, the man has to prove he is innocent. Reasonable doubt is on the side of the government. That is absolutely indefensible to have reasonable doubt attaching to the accuser and I protest against it. I am perfectly certain that this country will also protest against it. It is something new in British justice, something new in all our ideas of a court of law. We have taken away the right of a man to appeal. We have said that the ruling of the board takes precedence over any court and we have virtually said that the accused is guilty unless he proves he is innocent. I give the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) warning that if this goes into effect on the fifteenth of the month it will be one of the greatest causes of labour unrest that we have seen in Canada. I sincerely hope that he, in consultation with the leaders of labour, who are reasonable men, will have these provocative, indefensible and dangerous clauses amended.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that an extensive opportunity will be given for discussion of the so-called commonwealth council plan. This question cannot be dismissed after the manner of Doctor Pangloss in Candide, by saying that this is the "best of all possible worlds," after the horrible experiences we are now undergoing. It is not perfect by any means, and to reject all suggestions for change as coming from "imperial intriguers" is to continue the petty colonial outlook which has characterized our foreign policy since the last war. As an example of this I am going to quote a paragraph with reference to something that has happened in the very recent past. I quote from a journal known as Labour, the journal of the American Federation of Labor and particularly of the Railroad Brotherhoods. It is discussing the world being staked out by a monopoly, the Duponts, the Imperial Chemical Company, and I. G. Farbenindustrie. The words I shall quote are not the words of a labour leader, they are not the words of an isolationist senator or member of congress. They are the words of the assistant attorney general of the United States. He is talking about monopolies and he is reported as saying:

> To illustrate what he meant by dividing the world into "industrial colonies", Berge showed the effect of the cartel on Canada. He said that in order to protect the markets of the British and American companies, Canadian Industries Limited was restrained from doing any exporting or expanding. The effect, he declared, was to throttle Canadian industry and to treat Canada as a colony.

That is the present situation. We have seen in the last few weeks the closing of our greatest explosives plant. Did it have any connection with our being treated as a colony, or did it not? These are questions which we shall have to discuss and to answer in this house.

That is all that my time will allow, but I will say this finally. I disagree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) in throwing out all discussion without adequate opportunity for this house to debate at an early date the proposals made from time to time that we as Canadians play our full part and have our voice fully heard, not only through the channels of government but through the channels of the people's representatives, first in the councils of the commonwealth and eventually in the new world order which we hope to see.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): First of all, may I say that I did not understand the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his speech, to throw out any discussion. If my memory serves me aright, he invited my good friends of the Conservative party to bring in Mr. Bracken to discuss any matter with him.

It is probably unique for me that I shall agree with a great deal of what the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) has said. I am in accord with the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), to this extent, that I entirely disagree with what he said. We have heard a good deal to-day about the criticisms of Lord Halifax in regard to what he said in our country, and yet in the same speech I hear so much criticism regarding Lord Balfour in his own country. I am expecting any day in this house that Lord Helpus will get up and tell us something else.

I am speaking to-day with reference to the labour situation, which the previous speaker also discussed. In this regard I am fulfilling a promise I made to organized labour not only in my own riding but in Vancouver. I will not go into the details of the different sections of this famous order in council, but I do say that, as far as my riding is concerned, I think the government would be well advised to reconsider the order. I have had the pleasure during the last two years of representing Vancouver North in the absence of my colleague, the hon. member for that constituency (Mr. Sinclair). He has been kept out of the house and will not be here for a couple of days, and in case there should be a vote before he returns I may say that I am expressing his opinion as well as my own on this subject. That riding, I may observe, is the most highly organized from the labour standpoint in the province of British Columbia.

During my service in the army in the last war I did not have the privilege of being court-martialed as some of my friends of the Conservative party may have been. But even in the army a man is innocent until he is proved guilty by court-martial, and it is a most ridiculous piece of legislation to make a man prove his innocence. Moreover, it is unfair to labour that it should have only one man on a committee of six on which three can form a quorum. That is not sense. It follows the line of argument that we have seen advanced—rather, not an argument but a line of policy—whereby no man who was an actual producer in agriculture was permitted to serve on the board so that there might be a reasonable representation of that calling there.

Speaking for the Fraser Valley riding and, I may add, for Vancouver North as well, I strongly urge the government to reconsider that legislation. In our opinion, in my opinion at any rate, it does not conform to the true principles of Liberalism as I learned them from my father.

I want to say something now on rehabilitation, and I might as well get my say in now with regard to the revising of the rules of the house. I wish I had the gift of standing in my place here and, while reading my speech, appearing not to do so. Some hon. members are very adept at reading their speeches from their desks, and I hope that a ruling will be given one way or the other, because I am going to give the house this warning, without intending to tread on the toes of any of my good friends among the members, that I shall use my prerogative under the rules. Every time I see a member reading his speech in the future I am going to draw the fact to the Speaker's attention. I am not referring to leaders or ministers, but to private members. If speeches are read I am going to appeal to the Chair, which I have a right to do as a member of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Take in the ministers too.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No. The ministers have to reply to a lot of foolish questions that some of you people ask. I think it is only fair that if one man is allowed to read an excellent speech written either by himself or by a red-headed secretary, or anyone else, I should be allowed to do the same, because I might get Mr. Brockington and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to write one for me.

My hon. friend the member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) has suggested that there should be a change in the rules so as to allow the general public into the galleries for the benefit of prayers. I always understood that the prayers were said on behalf of Canada after we had listened to some of these speeches.

And now a word with regard to soldier affairs. As a returned man I am greatly interested in this question, and I do not think the government has done its duty by the returned soldiers. At the same time, I would observe that the government is its own worst critic. It has not made known, either to the soldiers or to the public at large, just what it has done. On the statute books we have some wonderful legislation, but we have failed to bring it to the attention of the veterans of the last war or to the attention of the general public. I am free to admit that I did not know much about the legislation that has been brought down in connection with vocational training. There is one thing that I would point out. It was bad enough to have it under the Conservative government, but under such a fine body of men as we have in the government now, we do not want this condition to continue, where a man receiving the allowance given to burnt-out veterans is docked so much per month to make up for his victory bond purchase. The people of Canada do not want such conditions to exist.

There is another thing I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and that is in regard to the men discharged from the army in the present war. Until they receive their pension or full hospitalization they are left as wards of their municipalities. That has happened in the city of Vancouver, and that is not good enough. It is not good enough for us to rise in our places in parliament and say that our principal obligation is to the veterans who are fighting for us in this war. I think the minister should pay a lot of attention to that and to their rehabilitation. In my opinion there is too much delay in planning. I know the government have had excellent committees working on it under very fine chairmen. I have no doubt they have some splendid ideas, but the public do not know that, the soldiers coming back do not know what these ideas are. I agree with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and probably the Social Credit party when they ask, how are we going to finance these plans? No provincial government, municipality or city can plan a proper system of post-war public works until they know where the money is coming from. I believe the government would be well advised to tell us how the financing is to be carried out. I agree with what the leader of the C.C.F. party said yesterday with regard to old age pensions. If I agree with everyone around here I will be very popular in my own riding at least. I do not think this government or any government can afford to delay in bringing about adjustments of old age pensions. There is no excuse for our delaying. We waited until the last day of the session last year before we took any action. Surely we have had time to study the Old Age Pension Act to bring about justice for the old age pensioners, and not wait until the last day of the session.

May I throw out a warning to the government. In my opinion the people of British Columbia will not accept promises of what we are going to do for old age pensioners. In my province at least—and incidentally it is the best province in Canada—it is felt that something must be done.

I give a little word of advice to the government in relation to the Veterans' Land Act. The Canadian Legion, of which I am a member in my riding, are not at all satisfied with the Veterans' Land Act as it stands at present. I urge upon the government that no more amendments be made to the Veterans'

Land Act by order in council. There are approximately fifty soldier members in this house and it seems to me there is no reason why we could not settle these matters in the house or in a committee set up for that purpose. I would urge, as I say, that there be no more amendments made to the Veterans' Land Act by order in council. I think the government has made a good move so far; but I have spoken to soldiers who have come back from this war and to veterans of the last war and they are entirely dissatisfied with the act as it stands at present. I think the soldiers are reasonable enough to realize that no act, when it is first introduced, can be perfect. The government and the people of Canada should bear in mind that from a straight economic point of view it is good business to have a satisfied settler irrespective of the fact that it may cost a little more. I hope the government will take that into consideration when they offer amendments to the Veterans' Land Act.

I should like to say a few words on the subject of family allowances. Probably this is dangerous ground for a member to tread on, especially when he has no children of his own. It may be thought that I am prejudiced; but I think every member, particularly those representing rural ridings, should take into serious consideration the passing of family allowances. I wish to make my point clear in that regard. I am entirely in accord with the principle and I hope the bill will be passed at this session. However, I believe before it is passed—I speak now from the point of view of a representative of a rural riding in British Columbia, and I think it applies to all western Canada—a floor should be placed under agricultural prices. I think that principle holds good for all of Canada. I shall give the house an example of what I mean by that. In the province of Quebec tomato juice can be produced very cheaply. Incidentally, no tomato juice is produced in my riding. Tomato juice can be produced in the province of Quebec at ridiculously low wages in peace time. They run their canneries on slave wages in Quebec, and in Ontario too. We in British Columbia are proud of the fact that during the time the present Minister of Pensions and National Health was a member of the government of that province we passed minimum wage laws. We believe in proper and adequate wages in British Columbia. We cannot compete with child or slave labour as practised in the past in some parts of eastern Canada in producing farm produce. The same thing applies to labour and industry.

In my opinion there should be a floor under agricultural prices and a standard minimum wage across Canada. Why should a particular province in Canada be allowed to pay one dollar a day and board to a logger? We pay reasonable and decent wages. These matters must be taken into consideration. As far as I am concerned naturally I intend to vote for family allowances, but to the best of my ability I am going to see that a proper floor is placed under farm prices. I am not a union man because I cannot qualify. However, I have every sympathy for them and I am going to see to the best of my ability that the wage standard is not set on a basis of family allowances. As I understand it, family allowances are intended to benefit the children and are not to set the standard of wages or farm prices.

My good friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is to follow me and I do not want to take up any more time because I understand he desires to speak at some length. To support my argument in favour of a floor price under agriculture I should like to quote an extract from the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization of Thursday, June 10, 1943. This should be very interesting to every member in the house and not only members representing agricultural districts. The quotation I shall give is from the evidence of Doctor Barton, deputy minister of agriculture, and is found on page 116:

> Of course, the only justification of any bonus is because of war-time requirements. Under ordinary conditions those areas would take their choice of either staying in the canning business or get out of it on the basis of the cost of production, depending on how the market is available to their various products.

In other words, certain provinces in Canada where there are very large families could go on competing at a very small wage with the rest of Canada where an adequate wage is paid.

I may not get another opportunity to speak in this debate; but I should like to say that I am not always in accord with the leader of the Conservative party, yet I agree with what he said yesterday in regard to the standing army, speaking for my riding at least. We should like to know just why this immense standing army is kept in Canada and is not made available for service elsewhere. I think we are entitled to know that. We have many of them in my riding and in my district from eastern Canada. They are stationed there. Frankly we enjoy having the camp there and I must admit they are well behaved soldiers; but I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of my riding can see no earthly reason for these men being there when there is a tremendous shortage of labour in the mines and elsewhere. They can see no earthly reason why that immense standing army should be kept on apparently after two years service when apparently they have no intention of serving beyond Canada. We are not afraid of the Japs attacking us in British Columbia at the present time. If we have not got them licked by now we shall not be able to help ourselves.

We have heard some discussion on the refugee problem. We have a few refugees. We should like to get rid of them. Probably it would be a good idea to make Toronto the centre for refugees and to send them there from all over Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that the government give serious consideration to reconsidering the so-called labour code. After having listened to labour men representing between twenty and twenty-one thousand in the city of Vancouver I came to the conclusion that in most instances they were quite reasonable in their demands. I very much fear that this government will have serious trouble in Canada if the order in council as it stands at present is enforced. We cannot afford to have any trouble in Canada at the present time.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) for his cooperation in hurrying through his speech in order to give me an opportunity to say something before the dinner recess. I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne; I think they made very excellent contributions to the debate and laid the basis for a thorough discussion of all the matters referred to in that speech. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) emphasized the necessity of getting through the business of the house as quickly as possible. I quite agree; and in my remarks this afternoon I shall be as explicit as possible in dealing with the points contained in the speech from the throne which I intend to discuss. I have no intention of dealing with all its ramifications, but before I get through I believe the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and I may be talking to each other. That may give the minister some indication of what I intend to talk about.

In attempting, however, to hurry through the business of the house, we must not be unmindful of the fact that the speech from the throne is a very important part of that business, in that it forecasts the legislation that will be brought down. As I understand it, any measure having to do with the affairs of Canada will be based upon the principles contained in the speech from the throne; and while we may hurry along with minor matters, I believe the measures outlined in the speech from the throne require thorough analysis by this house. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has made a broad analysis of that speech and has touched briefly upon practically everything it contains, setting out the views of the members of this group pretty thoroughly.

At this point I should like to say that I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), and in my opinion the discussion he carried on was timely; as a matter of fact it is long overdue. Last session the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I put on record our opinions concerning the matters discussed this afternoon by the hon. member for Trinity, and I am heartily in accord with everything that was said by the hon. member. Without wasting time in elaborating the matter further I merely wish to place myself on record as endorsing the stand he took this afternoon in regard to the Jewish question and the part Canada should play in endeavouring to rescue what is left of these people from Hitler and those associated with him in the occupied countries.

This afternoon the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) commented briefly upon the new wage order. I am not going to discuss that order at this time, but I endorse what they said in regard to the restrictions and totalitarian set-up of that legislation. Later on, when it is his turn to speak, at least one member of our group will make a thorough analysis of that order. It is a document the implications of which cannot be thoroughly discussed in the course of a fifteen or twenty minute address; but, as the hon. members pointed out, it has laid the basis for a continuing disruption of labour relations in this country which in my view may have serious repercussions in the future. As I have said, I am not going to go into the matter at this time; I merely want to place myself on record as supporting what these hon. members have said and to advise the house that hon. members of this group will continue that discussion when the opportunity arises.

In his remarks the Prime Minister made the statement that the main emphasis must continue to be on the winning of the war, and I heartily agree. While it is good policy for us to lay our plans for the future, we must not forget that the war is not yet won and that there is terrific fighting ahead, with terrific sacrifices to be made by the people of this country. During the past six months I have been disturbed to find prominent men warning the people of North America, both in the press and over the air, that the war might come to a sudden end. Such propaganda is, in my opinion, designed for only one purpose, namely, to prepare the people for a negotiated peace. That is not in accordance with the policy enunciated by the united nations, when they declared that only the unconditional surrender of the totalitarian powers will be accepted. Those who carry on the sort of propaganda that I have mentioned are doing a great disservice to the war effort of all the united nations. We must emphasize the fact that we still have to win the war. Let the people of the North American continent make no mistake about it; that is still their major task, because the termination of this war upon any terms other than the unconditional surrender of Germany and its allied powers will mean that we have lost this war and laid the basis for the next one. Nothing else can happen. In the countries of Europe that we are endeavouring to liberate there is no one but Hitler with whom to negotiate a peace, and any negotiations with him mean further appeasement and the acceptance of at least some of the ideas that he intended to foist upon the world. Therefore, in this respect I think the Prime Minister was absolutely correct when he emphasized the fact that certain opinions being expressed tend to take the minds of the people away from the real, main issue, which is the prosecution of the war to the fullest possible extent until we bring about the complete capitulation of Germany and her allies.

In my remarks this afternoon I intend to deal specifically with a most important matter which is closely related to our whole war effort and to the question of what will be the position of Canada when this war is over. In my view the two questions to which we should give the greatest consideration at this time, in an endeavour to see that the least possible disturbance is caused and the greatest possible good is done to those now in our armed services, are the matters of demobilization and reconstruction or rehabilitation. These two questions will require considerable machinery if we are to do a job on them and carry out our duty as we shall be expected to do by those now in the armed services. We must not lose sight of the fact that we in this house are privileged to talk about reconstruction and what will be the future of society on this continent, because the boys and girls in the armed forces, particularly those serving in theatres of war, recognized that the totalitarian military machine must be kept as far as possible from our shores and made their contribution by getting into uniform and crossing the ocean. They are there to-day. They have been successful in their mission, and have stopped the onward march of Hitler and those with whom he is associated. They are on the offensive to-day, and while the struggle may yet be severe, nevertheless they have guaranteed to us on this continent the privilege to do something about the future structure of society in Canada.

Next to the importance of winning the war, I think emphasis must be placed on the care of those who have made it possible for us to say that in the future we intend to reconstruct this country along democratic lines, and those of a Christian civilization. To them we owe the first obligation in the matter of rehabilitating Canada.

That is our first and main task. There is one paragraph in the speech from the throne which sets out the fact that a broad and comprehensive programme with respect to the re-establishment of service personnel returning to Canada has been developed, and that it applies not only to the armed services, but to the merchant navy. This would lead one to conclude that the government is now completely satisfied with the machinery now functioning, and that it believes such machinery is adequate to take care of this matter. I was disappointed, and I believe the government was presumptuous when it included the merchant navy in the present scheme of rehabilitation. I say that because, with the exception of extending the privilege by order in council of coming under pensions regulations for disability they are not included in the present set-up of reconstruction and rehabilitation, and must be considered as a separate unit.

We are led to believe that they are included in the scheme. However, before the house rises I say it should extend to that particular branch of the service every benefit which is now enjoyed by the personnel returning from the fighting services. In my opinion the programme is totally inadequate, and it is not working. I do not say this by way of criticism, or for the purpose of hearing myself talk or of advancing any particular political philosophy. I believe the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), under whose department this scheme has been functioning, has been working as hard and as conscientiously as any other minister or any other member of the house. I have always found him co-operative, and quite prepared to do anything he could to adjust grievances arising from the regulations administered by him. I am frank to say that about the minister. But the machinery, as it exists now, leaves much to be desired. It is my view that the machinery in the Department of Pensions and National Health is inadequate, that the department is understaffed, and cannot handle a large-scale demobilization. The personnel of the branch will have to be increased to some considerable extent.

I am not satisfied, either, with the methods employed by army boards who board men out of the services and place them under the jurisdiction of the Department of Pensions and National Health. I refer to those men now returning from overseas with disabilities. I was pleased to hear the minister table this afternoon an order in council which provides that when a man is discharged from the care of the Department of National Defence to that of the Department of Pensions and National Health he will be maintained on full pay and allowances until such time as assessed for disability pension and he is boarded out of the army completely. That is a step in the right direction. It represents the correction of a very sore spot, and one concerning which I had intended to speak. However, since the minister has notified the house that the grievance has been corrected, there is no necessity for any further elaboration.

I should like, however, to call to the attention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health some thoughts in connection with the administration of the Pension Act. I would remind him that in 1940 the pension committee of that year broadened the provisions of the act so that it might embrace the new forces. There was one section which had been carried for twenty-five years and which militated greatly against men who came back from the last war. I refer to the section which dealt with the men who were suffering from nervous disabilities and diseases. On seventy-five per cent of occasions, when men would appear before pension boards with disabilities of that description, the stock decision of such boards was: disability is of congenital origin, and no pension is indicated.

Hundreds of men were thrown to one side on that basis. The minister will recall that the 1940 committee removed that section from the act. I now draw to his attention the fact that while the provision has been removed, those who are to-day administering the regulations are administering them on the old basis. He will find that a large number of men who are returning from this war—and let us remember that this is a shock-war to an even greater extent than was the last one—are suffering from nervous disabilities. When they apply for boarding they find, in practically every instance, as shown by the decisions I have seen, that decisions are made along the same lines, namely that their disabilities are of congenital origin. The wording, of course, is a little different. At the present time the soldier is discharged and examined for pension, and if he has a disability of that description it is classified as pre-enlistment.

These men joined the services in A1 condition. They saw service in England, and have endured bombing. As a result their nerves have suffered. How can any board examining a man who when he enlisted, was classed A1, and who after eighteen months in the service appears before it with a nervous condition, make the decision that the man who at the time of application is in class E, is suffering from a disability of pre-enlistment origin? The point is that this is an accusation against those who examined such men upon entering the services, and an indication that they were totally incompetent for the job they were performing. We must accept either that assumption, or the one that the boards are still administering the old section which we thought we had removed from the act. I mention these facts so that the minister may make a check with those who are boarding service personnel returning from overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is my hon. friend referring to the medical examiners of the pension board?

Mr. GILLIS: Those who board the service personnel for pension purposes.

There is another sore spot to which I would call the attention of the minister, namely that connected with those men who are being discharged for compassionate reasons. It may be that as a result of some extenuating circumstances at home a man may be discharged from the services. Such man, however, is not given the benefit of any of the present regulations. In fact one instance, affecting a member of the navy, was drawn to my attention. This man was discharged in Halifax and, although his home was in Vancouver, because he was discharged on compassionate grounds he was not given even his transportation expenses to his home. He had to solicit the necessary funds for that purpose. And, vice versa, I have heard of men discharged at Vancouver who have had to travel to the other side of the country.

I believe that is a wrong procedure. Such men are suffering aggravation greater than those who are coming back to normal homes. Who is more in need of assistance than the man who comes back to a normal home?

He volunteered; he endeavoured to do his duty, but circumstances over which he had no control compelled him to leave the service and he is now treated as though he had never been in the service. I think the minister should endeavour to check up on that particular case.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to do so. I will look into all the points my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. GILLIS: I bring these to the minister's attention because I know he is interested in these matters. He is the one minister who has his finger on rehabilitation matters and these things come within the jurisdiction of his department. I am quite satisfied to leave this particular grievance with him.

Another grievance is in connection with the decisions that are given when men receive injuries or disabilities while serving in Canada. A man may be discharged as medically unfit; but in every case I have seen, even though the disability is admitted the decision is that the disability was incurred on service but was not attributable to military service. The two statements cannot be reconciled. I know of one case that is perhaps a little outstanding. This boy was ordered on a clothing parade and half a dozen of them got into a jeep. While they were riding along the jeep crashed into a pole. This young lad who was not driving received a fractured skull and lost the sight of one eye. He was hospitalized and discharged, but the decision was that his disability was not attributable to military service. Since that time this man has had a stroke and his case is up for another hearing. I do not think there should be any differentiation between the man who receives a wound overseas and the one who is injured in Canada while actually on parade. There are quite a few cases of this description.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was that case before me?

Mr. GILLIS: The minister was written to about that.

There is another matter in the field of rehabilitation that requires overhauling. The throne speech would lead us to believe that the machinery for the placement of men discharged from the service was adequate and satisfactory. The minister will remember, as will other hon. members who were on the pension committee back in 1940, that welfare officers were to be appointed. As I understood it, these welfare officers were to look after the employment problem facing the men returning from service; they were to work in conjunction with the officials in the unemployment insurance offices. This machinery has been partly established. There is one placement officer in Nova Scotia; I believe there is one in New Brunswick, and perhaps there are two in Ontario. I notice the minister is smiling. Last session he intimated he was making an appointment to the Sydney office, but that has not been made as yet. I have no doubt it will be made soon.

The number of these welfare officers should be increased. If they are to do a proper job there should be one welfare officer in every unemployment insurance office. This is necessary in order that the preference which has been delegated to those who return from overseas or from the service in Canada is carried out. If we are not to have proper machinery there is no use in doing anything about it. The machinery we have to-day is totally inadequate.

The work of these placement officers was to be supplemented by the appointment of citizen committees in every section. These committees were to supplement the work of the placement officers in probing fields of employment for those men who are coming back. Little was done about this until November of last year when a committee was convened to consist of the mayors of some of the towns and cities across Canada. These volunteer committees are to return to their respective communities and endeavour to take care of the employment needs of the men who return from the services. That machinery is not going to work. These committees are not responsible to anyone. They have no machinery with which to work; they have no offices and they have no authority to do anything for anyone. I think it is a complete waste of time to expect volunteer citizen committees throughout the country to take care of this question of demobilization and rehabilitation. This machinery might have worked a year ago when there were just a few dribbling back, but I visualize the time when there will be total demobilization of all the service personnel. I think the time has arrived when we should have the proper machinery and the proper administrative authority which would be responsible to some department of government.

I think the suggestion in the speech from the throne that three new departments are to be set up is a good one, and these questions of reestablishment and rehabilitation should be centred in one of these departments. In my opinion this idea of citizen committees should be forgotten and immediate steps taken to increase the number of welfare officers in order to have one in every unemployment insurance office. It would be their duty to find available employment and to see that preference is given to the ex-service men. They should provide advice and guidance in the whole field of rehabilitation. They would have the proper places in which to work and would be responsible to some one. There must be sufficient personnel to handle this problem. Under the present set-up the ex-service man is coming back and is being routed through the regular employment offices. This will continue if the present economic set-up as visualized by the people in power to-day is carried into effect. In addition to the men coming back from the services there will be a million war workers. The present machinery is totally inadequate and does not differentiate between those who have a preference and those to whom no preference has been given.

There is another point in connection with the rehabilitation of veterans to which I should like to refer. Some provision has been made for vocational training and guidance for those coming out of the service who have sufficient elementary education to fit themselves into the present scheme, but there are hundreds or perhaps thousands of boys coming back who have not the degree of education to enable them to take advantage of the present vocational training schemes. I have run into quite a number of them. These men are discharged as medically unfit and they apply to the selective services offices for a job. They write to Halifax to Colonel MacKenzie for a rehabilitation grant or vocational training, but word comes back that nothing can be done about vocational training. Many of these boys have never had jobs and that is the situation they find themselves in to-day. I think there is adequate machinery in the country and it should be used, and used immediately, to do something for this category of ex-service men. I refer to the schools that are now operating. One is in North Bay, and there are three others where illiterate personnel in the service are given an elementary education. The schools are working efficiently and have a very good system. I had the privilege of going through the school at North Bay, and I highly commend it. I think that branch of our educational work should be not only continued but expanded, in order to give this class of boy an opportunity to reestablish himself as a useful member of society. Without such an opportunity he is in the middle of the street; there is no prospect for him, nothing for him to do, and certainly the developing situation with respect to employment leaves much to be desired so far as he is concerned. I leave those thoughts with the minister.

It is not possible for me to tell the whole story, Mr. Speaker, in forty minutes. I have been trying to provoke the minister's thought. I have a lot more to say but my time is limited.

I should like to say a word or two with respect to the machinery of demobilization. That matter will have to be considered. We owe it to the boys who are overseas at the present time and who have been there, some of them, for a long period, to consider what is going to happen on demobilization. There is no doubt that we shall have an army of occupation when the war is over. If that is the case, I think service in such an army should be on a voluntary basis and that reinforcements for that army should be on a voluntary basis. Furthermore, we may have to maintain a large standing army, navy and air force to meet our international obligations in the field of world peace. I think the first choice to serve in such an army, navy and air force, to man and operate it, should go to those who are now serving in an actual theatre of war. Those who are serving at home, while they are making a valuable contribution, have not suffered as have those who have been in actual combat with the enemy. Those who are in service at home are in a position to keep their finger on everything worth-while in the country, and if anything develops which means a future for them they have the opportunity to get there first. But those who are serving overseas have not that opportunity, and so I would like those who have served overseas in an actual theatre of war to be given the first choice to serve in such a force. The Canadian government should insist that our army of occupation retain its Canadian identity and be manned by Canadians, with Canadian officers to look after those of our boys who may desire to serve in that army.

As regards the matter of discharge, undoubtedly considerable machinery will be necessary. We should not do what was done in the last war. Then, when we came back from Europe, we were split up into different camps. Personally I was with a Vancouver unit when the wind-up came. We were taken back to England and shipped to demobilization camps in north Wales. It was not a very nice place to be. But they closed our pay books there, and we were fed very poorly.

I think it should be the policy of the Canadian government as soon as hostilities cease to bring our boys back from Europe as soon as possible; that is, those who want to come back, and the procedure of demobilization should be gone through in Canada. I think the camps we now have all across the country are adequate for that purpose. Once the men are back in Canada they should be sent to their respective military districts for demobilization.

But before demobilization or discharge there is one thing we should do. Every man in the service on coming back to Canada should be given a month's furlough to allow him to go home and look over employment conditions in his own part of the country. That would enable him to make up his mind where he would like to go. After the last war the men were permitted to take their discharge in any part of Canada or the United States. But we should remember that the employment situation is going to be complicated after this war and we should see to it that every man who comes back has the training necessary to fit him into the employment picture so that he may be able to make his best contribution. In that connection vocational training is very important, and I leave the thought with the minister that we have machinery now functioning in Canada which could be used effectively just by reversing the present process. I mean that we have army personnel or induction boards which consider the aptitudes of a man who is entering the service and route him into the branch where he can make his best contribution. The personnel in charge of this work has been trained for four years and has cost a considerable sum of money. It is doing good service, I am informed, and if it can route men who are entering the service into the branch where they can render the best contribution, then it seems reasonable that, on demobilization, it could route the men who are leaving the service into gainful occupation or into opportunities where their services can best be used. That would merely be a reversing of the present machinery.

The schools now operating, army, navy and air force, should also be fully utilized, as well as the schools set up by industry. All these schools should be expanded, if necessary. The Canadian Legion's war services educational personnel which has been largely absorbed by the defence organizations, should also be fully utilized, because they have a highly trained personnel whose services should be taken advantage of. We should not be political about the thing at all but see that that machinery is used to the best advantage in the period of demobilization and rehabilitation.

It is almost six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and my time is about up. I have much more to say, but I shall reserve it for another occasion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Gillis.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, having followed rather closely the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday, when he was discussing the speech from the throne, I was surprised at his avoidance of discussion on the topics contained therein. I was also surprised that he did not attempt to answer the important questions put to him by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) with reference to army organization, the resignation of General McNaughton, and many other weighty matters. However, he did say that his ministers would answer those questions, and in view of that statement I would have thought that probably this debate might be greatly curtailed and the progress of the house facilitated had those ministers concerned been prepared to make such statements and to answer the questions that were asked, instead of having the debate adjourned, as it was last evening, by a private supporter of the government.

While I fully realize that our first concern must be, as pointed out in the speech from the throne, the winning of the war, my remarks this evening will have to do chiefly with the matter of agriculture, since the speech from the throne suggests that a floor price should be set up for that industry. That is a principle which we have fostered for some time and I sincerely trust that the floor price will not be too close to the cellar. Many factors must be taken into consideration before that floor price is established.

A year ago, discussing the speech from the throne, I asked for the appointment of a food minister. I am more convinced than ever to-day that had such a minister been appointed, a great deal of the waste that has taken place in connection with foodstuffs during the past year would have been avoided. During the debates of 1940, 1941 and 1942, I pleaded with the government to guarantee the wheat producers of the country, as a basis of parity, a quota basis, at least $1.25 a bushel. This the government did on September 28, 1943—and remember the new year's crop commences on August 1.

This announcement was made on September 28, well into the marketing season. Many people were compelled by force of circumstances to deliver a large portion of their crop in order to pay expenses. This they had done, having delivered on open market owing to the price existing at that time. At the same time that the price was announced on that day, it was announced that the government would pay a bonus of fifteen cents a bushel on barley and ten cents a bushel on oats, and this was paid to the producers of oats and barley who had delivered this product in that crop year, on open market, on exactly the same basis as the wheat producers had delivered wheat. And remember that those who had delivered wheat were in most instances people who by force of circumstances were compelled to make delivery in order to pay expenses. Those who had the resources to carry on stored their product in most cases on the farm, so that they could take advantage of the $1.25. That was most unfair to those who were least able to bear the loss.

I maintain that the wheat producers should be entitled to settlement on exactly the same basis as the producers of barley and oats who were paid that bonus, because they were the people who really needed it. They needed it more than those who had the means of storing the product on their farms so that they could take advantage of the $1.25.

I have never been able to understand the reasoning of the government in settling for wheat on the basis which they adopted. Some got a fraction of a cent. It depended upon the spread on the day they delivered their wheat. I do not understand it and it is most unfair. I say therefore that the wheat producer is entitled to settlement on exactly the same basis as the producers of oats and barley.

The cost of agricultural production in Canada has greatly increased since the outbreak of the war. There is to-day a great disparity as between United States and Canadian prices in both grain and live stock, and these constitute an important factor in food production for the united nations. May I quote some of these prices. They are the figures at January 27:

	Per bushel
Chicago wheat	$1 71⅜
" barley	1 22½
" oats	78½
" rye	1 30⅝
Winnipeg wheat	1 25
" barley	64¾*
" oats	51¾†
" rye	1 28

* Plus 15 cents bonus.
† Plus 10 cents bonus.

And rye is not controlled in Canada but sold on the open market as in the United States. It will be noticed how closely these prices approximate each other on the Chicago and the Winnipeg open market. Wheat, oats and barley are controlled by the government of Canada. The government, after three or four years, have failed to set a reasonable price for the producers of wheat, but on September 28 they did set a price of $1.25 a bushel in order to prevent a further rise in the price of wheat in comparison with the rising price in Chicago.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the floor. It is not a price.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is the floor paid the farmer at this time and he receives the participation certificate.

Mr. GARDINER: Wheat is selling higher than that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The object has been to prevent a further rise in prices, but we do not know what is in store in the future. We hope that we shall receive the Chicago price. So much for grain.

Now take live stock. On the same date these were the figures:

	Per hundred pounds
Chicago slaughter steers	$17 00
" hogs choice, 200 to 330 lbs.	13 75*
" sheep	15 85
" lambs	16 00
Winnipeg slaughter steers	12 25
" hogs, 140 to 170 lbs.	16 30†
" sheep	4 00
" lambs	11 00

* Live weight.
† Dressed weight.

The Canadian hog dressed is approximately 75 per cent and is now to be bonused $3 per head for the choice hog. However, the penalty of $3 for a hog dressing out over 185 pounds is extremely unfair, and this should be on a graduating scale of fifty cents for each five pounds in excess of this weight. I have maintained that the penalty is a distinct racket for the packers.

Mr. GARDINER: That is off now.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am glad to hear that. It is a step in the right direction, and I am pleased to know that the minister contemplates an agreement over a period of years with Great Britain for bacon. That is moving in the right direction. It was on for some years and should have been off long ago.

Mr. GARDINER: It was on by agreement between the producers and the packers. The government have nothing to do with that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the packers certainly dictated the rule; there is no doubt about it. Since 1938 hog prices in Canada have increased fifty-seven per cent, oat prices have increased 241 per cent, barley prices have increased 245 per cent, and farm labour wages have doubled. Little wonder that last fall, when the government announced a bonus on oats and barley, and said that hog production should be decreased in Canada—I think the Minister of Agriculture had something to say about this, because there was a shortage of help on the farms; every session he has maintained that we had plenty of help on the farms in western Canada—there was a scramble by the farmers all across the prairies to market brood sows after this announcement.

The farmer who grows his own barley and oats and feeds his hogs on his own farm is not entitled to the barley or oat bonus. That is another discrimination. By this policy the government have added to the man-power and transportation difficulties of Canada, which are already numerous. Last October 20, the Winnipeg stockyards and abattoirs were completely swamped with hogs, some 17,000, and at two packing plants alone some 5,000 sows, many of them heavy in pigs, and in some cases they had farrowed in transit. The same situation occurred on several occasions and at several points in western Canada last fall. This is something that should never have been allowed to happen in this country at a time such as this.

During the war years there has been a tremendous increase in hog production on the prairies where the same producers grow the feed and finish the hogs on the same farms. In 1943, Alberta had not only the highest swine population in the history of the province, some 2,337,700 hogs, but the highest ever recorded by any province in the Dominion of Canada. This was quite a record and I think it is something which we had been advised to do over a period of years. We were told that the grain should be marketed through the live stock. These farmers are to be congratulated upon the advance they had made in this respect. Then in the midst of that we had this announcement from the government which completely demoralized all their plans. It was certainly unhealthy and something which I think should have been prevented had we a properly organized food ministry in this country. While they have accomplished that fine record in Alberta the province stood very high in the dominion in the percentage of man-power and woman-power contributed to the armed forces of Canada. It was one of the leading provinces and I think it speaks highly for Alberta and for the other prairie provinces.

Following the government's announcement on Canada's decreased hog production for 1944, the Right Hon. Colonel J. J. Llewellin, Minister of Food for Great Britain, arrived on the scene and somewhat straightened out our muddle, stating that Britain required every pound of Canadian bacon that could be sent across the Atlantic. As I say, the Minister of Food for Great Britain landed here and made that statement, and I am happy to think that our government and our department have since then tried to rectify this muddle, many months too late, after the harm had been done. It is only a guess, but I will venture to say that the people of the prairie provinces had decreased their hog production by twenty-five per cent; it is only a guess, but that is all anyone can say at the present time.

May I refer to the poultry and egg production. The production of poultry and eggs has shown a very great increase in Canada. We are asked for a further production of ten per cent in 1944. At present prices of eggs and poultry feed there will be a decrease rather than an increase in a year's time. On account of very abnormal weather early this winter there was a very large egg production in this country, when the authorities set the present prices of eggs, and as a result many poultry producers have already changed their plans for 1944 production, because the return for eggs is out of line with the cost of feeds and labour. While we have an immense egg production today there will be a decrease rather than an increase a year hence as a result of these prices.

Butter fat with bonus is approximately forty-four cents a pound in Canada. Butter fat with subsidy is approximately 54·9 cents a pound in the United States. Much has been said in past debates in this house about the Canadian farmer's share of the national income. For the period 1926 to 1940, 74·2 per cent of the national income went to the workers and to the farmers of Canada. Labour constituted five-twelfths of the population and received 62·4 per cent of the national income; the farmers constituted four-twelfths of the population and received 11·8 per cent of the national income. That is what they received for their work and their capital investment, which is considerable. There is some disparity there. The average monthly farm wage for the three prairie provinces has increased during the war from $30.13 to $61.17, and the harvest daily wage from $2.86 to $5.56. To be on a par with organized labour it should be further increased, as I pointed out to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in the debates on April 2, 1943, which may be found on pages 1808-9, and on May 20, 1943 at pages 2928-9. I believe that farm labour should be guaranteed the same basis of remuneration as organized labour in this country, but there is a great disparity.

However, to do what I suggest there must be a great deal more national planning for agriculture in Canada than there has been hitherto. The farmer must receive a greater return in money for his products in order to pay the wages to which I have referred. Many of the men on these farms operate mechanized machines, and they are just as important as organized labour in this country and should be entitled to the same remuneration. However, as I have said, much greater planning on a national basis in this country is required.

There has not been anything like equity of sacrifice or contribution throughout Canada during these four and a half years of war. Neither is there equity of return to the agricultural producers of food as between the various united nations. In the west we have a man who operates a farm just across the line between the United States of America and Canada. It takes ten steers to buy an automobile in the United States of America. It takes twenty of the same type of steers to purchase the same car in Canada. He thinks he is going to have a difficult time to make good Canadians out of his sons who have assisted him to operate that farm. I think we should be attempting to do something about this discriminatory situation.

The Prime Minister said in his remarks yesterday that the end of the war may yet be a long way off. After the war we must feed the overrun countries, and this will require careful national and international planning. We should have a food ministry for that purpose.

May I for a moment refer to the inequitable distribution of man-power for the armed services of this country and put on the record the percentages for the military districts up to September 30, 1943, because it is remarkable that the provinces with the greatest contribution to the armed forces are the provinces that are making the greatest contribution to the food production of this war:

Military District	Percentage
1. London, Ontario	37·3
2. Toronto	42·7
3. Kingston	38·7
4. Montreal	23·5
5. Quebec	17·7
6. Halifax	41·8
7. Saint John, N.B.	41·3
10. Winnipeg	39·5
11. Victoria	42·4
12. Regina	35·7
13. Calgary	38·1

I think these figures are significant.

There are other matters that I should like to discuss at this time, the chief of which is the Canadian army organization. I have never been satisfied that Canada with its population could maintain an army on the basis which we have attempted and put it into active combat as an army and properly reinforce it. I have had doubts for some years. I have questioned the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) with regard to it. I do not wish to discuss this matter further until we have a statement from the minister. I say there has always been a doubt. The Prime Minister has suggested that he should answer this question and make a fuller statement on the resignation of General McNaughton, who is responsible for the very fine and efficient training of our armed services. However, as I say I prefer to await the statement by the Minister of National Defence on these all-important matters.

There is another point to which I should like to refer, that of the extension of the insurance principle to all members of the armed forces on active service. I have raised this question in this house in other debates, and have pointed out that following the declaration of war in 1939 this principle was applicable in this country, but that for some reason it was deleted by order in council in May of the following year. It seems to me if there is any meaning to this new order we have had placed before us in very vague terms in the speech from the throne, this insurance principle should be made applicable to all members of the armed forces who are on active service anywhere.

I was disappointed this afternoon when a committeee was set up to deal with the election act and the taking of the votes of the soldiers overseas. I do think the terms of the reference should have been made broader, and at a time like this our election act should have been overhauled. Personally I think we should have the transferable vote for single member constituencies. Hon. members may not realize that of the 245 members of this house seventy-four are here by virtue of having received a minority vote in their constituencies. In a democratic nation, which we think is progressive, it is certainly time to correct that situation. I am the more surprised that nothing has been done in this regard because of the fact that in the chart or guide mentioned by the Prime Minister, which he brought forth in 1919, something of this kind was advocated. Surely at this time we should overhaul the election act and make provision for the transferable vote in single member constituencies. In times like these it is not good enough to have so many hon. members sent here as a result of minority votes, and I still hope that something may be done along this line this session.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to sum up what I have been saying. I advocate the appointment of a food ministry, in order to see that everything possbile is done to produce the necessary foodstuffs for the united nations, both for the winning of the war and for the relief of the overrun countries following the victory. I advocate the reinstatement of the insurance principle for all members of the armed forces on active service anywhere. I advocate the adoption of the transferable vote in single member constituencies at this session. I advocate that there should be made available a much larger allotment of agricultural machinery, which is so badly needed for the production of foodstuffs in this country. Finally I advocate that farmers be allowed storage charges for the grain held on their farms within the quota on the same basis that the government allows storage charges to the elevator companies for the grain they hold

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, we have in this house an official whose loyal services merit the attention of parliament; a doctor of law, a king's counsel, a member of the Royal Society of Canada, who has been Clerk of the House of Commons for almost twenty years. Doctor Beauchesne recently published the third edition of his "Parliamentary Rules and Forms," the work of a master, covering almost nine hundred pages. This wonderful work was prepared by the author primarily for the use of members of this house, and I wish to extend to him my deep gratitude and satisfaction, and to express the sincere hope that the French translation of this most useful work will be made available without delay. Both languages are official in Canada, and we are only claiming our right when we ask for this translation.

The programme for the present session denotes the anxiety of the government in the face of the serious problems which exist in this country. Never since 1935 has the speech from the throne been of such an election character. Who does not recall the anxiety of the Bennett government, which was in power at that time? The Prime Minister of that time sought, by a supreme effort of social legislation, to remedy what was impossible to remedy. He had gained power by virtue of so many promises. The government which followed, was satisfied with denying its formal commitments while asserting candidly that it could not keep them any more. It even asked its voters to forget about its pledges and heaven knows under what circumstances and through what means. This was done by obtaining the monopoly of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in spite of the most elementary justice. The head of a certain party is now complaining about the C.B.C. Why did he not do so when the plebiscite was held? The leaders of the four main political parties in Canada then tolerated the most shameful dictatorship, which gagged thousands of citizens. Through their action they were responsible for making the fight unjust and unequal in favour of the "yes" and against the "no."

As regards the social legislation introduced by the government, history repeats itself with this difference, that the former government made its calculations in peace time while this government adds, subtracts and divides in war time.

The government says that the first of its ends is to win the war. The second is to face post-war conditions. In order to attain this end, it must do better than move a whole complexity of social legislation. In order to win the peace, it must remedy the social upheavals which it has caused. Four hundred thousand men have abandoned their farms. More than 100,000 women also have abandoned the land in spite of the numerous warnings given by our best economists. The government is doing even worse. It insists upon calling back for a revision of their medical examinations the young farmers, who must fill out the new forms in order to obtain a new postponement. This is a loss of time, and a source of annoyance and bother for the agricultural class which, more than ever, needs all its help and all its time.

The sessional programme refers to a price ceiling on agricultural products. Why not set a price ceiling on foodstuffs which are sold by trusts at prohibitive prices. One can find the proof of this statement in the statistics published about five days ago by the federal department of agriculture. These are the figures:

Wholesale prices of milling by-products per carload and per ton: Barley flour from $38 to $40, and crushed oats from $42 to $44.25 on the Montreal and Quebec markets.

And when the crooked intermediary has drawn his benefits the farmer pays $2.75 to $3 for a hundred pounds of by-products.

Am I not right when I assert that we must set a ceiling on the foodstuffs rather than on the farmer? When the farmer is undergoing considerable sacrifices in order to maintain his production he is being exploited by the trusts of dairies, of milling companies and of flour and foodstuffs dealers.

The mover of the address in reply paid tribute to the proposed expropriation of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company by the Quebec government. If this scheme is like the so-called expropriation of Beauharnois, the ratepayers of the province will again be terribly deceived. Furthermore this expropriation will not help the farmer. I do not think it will help the labourer, because state trusts so far have not resulted in anything but deception and exploitation. I am against the expropriation of private enterprise by the state. It is a bad form of socialism, because the governments take advantage of the nationalization of private industries in order to gratify their friends, to the prejudice of the people. Proper laws, and the control of public authorities, will be more effective. The best example is the expropriation of private radio stations by the government. The servile and unworthy Canadian Broadcasting Corporation handled the population of this country with unfairness and arrogance during the plebiscite campaign in 1942.

The liquor trust in Canada is, along with this society, the most detested trust which ever existed in this country. As a result of the guilty complicity of the government this state monopoly sells for excessive prices hard liquors hardly deserving that name. Before Christmas and the New Year one could see in the streets of large cities hundreds of persons of both sexes crowding around the stores of the liquor control boards, in order to obtain for very high prices a little bit of water with a few drops of alcohol added. This is the shameful condition brought about by a hypocritical system of rationing. Many people state that this is the worst swindle of all time. The small and the poor are exploited to the utmost, while the clubs and friends of the regime apparently can sell very dearly old wines and hard liquors which they can accumulate, and still accumulate through a violation of restrictions and rationing established by the federal government. It was not worth while imposing rationing when one knows that families which did not purchase ten cents worth of alcohol a year have obtained their ration books, and now buy all the quantity authorized by the regulations. Can this be called healthy social legislation?

Is it a sane social measure to allow female labour in war-time industry, while infant sons and daughters are dying in nurseries? The family is the very foundation of society, as is stated in the speech from the throne. What has the government done so far to protect families in this country? During more than ten years the last two governments have tolerated in Canada a state of affairs which is very depressing for a father and his sons. More than a billion dollars was spent in direct relief. No money could be found for public works, no salaries for labourers, no work for our sons and daughters. The treasury was empty, for constructive works. But on account of the participation of Canada in this war the government suddenly discovered $10,000,000,000, and more, for destructive work. The unemployment problem was partly solved by the mobilization of our youth in the armed forces. As regards the fathers, compelled by sickness to abandon their jobs in war factories, do hon. members know what fate is theirs? Here is a typical instance: During twenty-seven months a man is employed in a munitions factory. He pays his unemployment dues. He is threatened by tuberculosis. When he becomes sick, he is dismissed. He asks for his unemployment allowance. He is turned down because, owing to his health, this man cannot be recommended for another employment by the selective service. If he were refunded the amount of the dues which he paid, he could support his wife and his three children. But, alas, this man who is a victim of the conditions of labour, where he breathed during eight hours every day the poisonous atmosphere of a munitions factory, will have to beg for his living, or live on public charity. He will be lucky if he is not dead, before a measure of health insurance is adopted. Can hon. members see the injustice this man is suffering because the unemployment insurance which took part of his salary away from him keeps it for healthy labourers who are unemployed? Why is it that in spite of the so-called excellent law more than 100,000 people in Canada were unemployed last December? That is an unbearable situation in a country where approximately ten per cent of the population are in the armed services. The figures given in the January, 1944, issue of Canada at War confirm these striking facts.

(Translation): Think of it Mr. Speaker, the advocates of immigration even have the impudence to urge the government to permit refugees or immigrants to enter this country. Not a single immigrant, not a single refugee, from whatever country he may come and of whatever descent he may be, should cross our boundaries. Why, at a time when one must request the government's permission before he can work, and when, in spite of that, unemployment is rife in this country; when the government do not permit any one to transfer from one job to another without their authorization; when the government allow the family to be broken up as a result of the employment of mothers in factories; when the government ration essential goods; when they even ration farm implements and the maple products; when they begrudge the sugar with which young Canadians sweeten their cereals, and they set up Tuesday as a meatless day, taking no account of the fact that in the province of Quebec and wherever there are Roman Catholics in Canada, Friday is a day of abstinence; when the government have already ordained that one shall wear only one pair of cuffless trousers because that is a practice which is followed elsewhere and must be imitated, since we have ever had and will always have in our midst satisfied colonials; when an army of more than a million men and women will have to be demobilized within two years, perhaps one year, and, who knows, even within a few months; when all those men and women say to the government: you could find money to arm us for war, well, equip us now for peace; when hundreds of thousands of men and women shall have to be demobilized from war industries to rejoin civilian industries that will be unable to absorb them,—a fact of which no intelligent man is unaware,—when the government shall, at last, to keep their solemn promises and their sacred pledges to reappoint in the civil service the employees they have mobilized; when the government shall have to reestablish on the land all the farmers they have kept and are still keeping in the army in spite of our countless protests; when the government shall have to restore the complete land settlement system they had built up at a considerable cost and which they have let go to pieces against the walls of the war plants in our cities; finally, when the government shall have to give back to every one his due, refund war loans, war savings certificates and fill up the abyss into which our yearly billion-dollar gifts have forever disappeared; in view of all that, I do say that there is not and will never be room for a single immigrant in Canada.

It would be criminal to listen to the advocates of immigration, who are all in the pay of international finance and who frequently receive favours from communists and proponents of world revolution.

May I, at this stage of my remarks, place on record in the debates of the house two of the several resolutions which I have received from most of the thirty-three municipalities of my constituency of Laval Two-Mountains. They read as follows:

Resolution in "opposition" to the proposed immigration of European refugees to Canada in violation of the laws of the country.

Whereas according to the Montreal Gazette, page one, the Dominion Minister of Immigration, Mr. Crerar, made the following declaration on November 3, 1943:

[M. Lacombe.]

"Canada offers a home to refugees. An immigration agent is being sent to Europe, and the dominion government will consider sympathetically the immigration to Canada of an indefinite number of refugees."

Whereas it is a well-known fact that the United Jewish Refugees & War Relief Agencies, with head office at 1121 St. Catherine St. West, Montreal, has circulated among the public a petition asking that Canada open her doors to all the refugees from the European continent, and that it is endeavouring, under the patronage of Senator Cairine R. Wilson, to obtain in Canada 500,000 signatures for this purpose.

Whereas in so far as such immigration will take place mostly in the province of Quebec, there is cause for alarm.

Whereas on January 7, 1944, the Canadian Press released a news item bearing the following heading:

"Canada has agreed to accept a limited number of immigrants.

Refugees who come to Canada from the Spanish peninsula, according to a decision reached recently, will be given refuge for the duration of the war."

Whereas the fact of thus allowing refugees to enter the country is not only a further encroachment upon the prerogatives of the people, but will be the cause of social disturbances now and after the war.

Whereas this question has not been submitted to the House of Commons and members of parliament should have the opportunity of voicing their views on this matter before such a policy becomes effective. It is unanimously resolved by the council of the municipality of Ste. Monique, Two Mountains county,

1. That the above-mentioned municipal council is opposed to the suggested immigration plan and to any immigration on a different plan than that which has prevailed in recent years.

2. That in any case, no amendment to existing laws and regulations governing immigration should be made unless parliament has had an opportunity of discussing the matter at the next session.

3. That this resolution be given publicity.

4. That copy thereof be forwarded to the Prime Minister of Canada, to the Premier of Quebec, to the Quebec provincial leader of the opposition and to the dominion and provincial members of the constituency.

Dated January 22, 1944.

(signed) Chs. Henri Giroux.
Mayor,

Chs. Ed. Léonard,
Secretary.

Municipality of Ste. Monique, county of Two Mountains.

The other resolution was addressed to me by the municipal council of St. Elzéar de Laval. Moreover, it is drawn up in the same terms as the one which I read a short while ago.

Is that clear enough? Will the government understand where lay the interests most dear to our people, or will it give in to national and international conspiracies hatched in secrecy and all of them detrimental to Canada? That remains to be seen.

Mr. Speaker, it would be quite useless to put into effect family allowances, social insurance, a health insurance scheme and all other measures mentioned in the speech from the throne, if the Government were to render all social legislation ineffective through an immigration which we do not want in the least. All our efforts in the field of social legislation would be wasted if economic upheaval should arise simultaneously with these measures, excellent though they are in themselves.

In closing, I will say a few words about the international body contemplated by the government for the purpose of promoting peace when the war is over. I fear greatly that Canada will count for very little in this body, and once the struggle is over, we ought to attend to our own affairs. We can no longer afford to maintain a whole staff at a new League of Nations where Soviet Russia may be the ruling power because she will then hold sway over all of central Europe. When that time comes, we will be poor enough to stay at home and straighten things up in our own house. Do you think that our sacrifices in men and money will weigh very heavily in the balance at that particular time? Ask Lord Halifax if I am wrong in my forecast. For the last hundred years, there has flourished here a school of colonialism whose professors emeritus hail from London and from our own country as well. For those people, Canada's participation in the war is forgotten as soon as it has become an accomplished fact. The heroism of our soldiers is to them a laughing matter. Their mission is to ignore the sacrifices of a whole nation. When our sole rampart against military and financial imperialism is the Westminster Statute which is and has always been nothing but a hoax, we are indeed to be pitied. Is it not true that for the last century Canada has been steadily going back to the colonial status? Under the Union, the governing body was neither in London nor Washington. Under Cartier and Macdonald, the administration at Ottawa and no one else, was master of our destinies. We have become the incense-bearers of the empire to whom, on our knees, we pay a colonial tribute of a billion dollars a year. This gesture is devoid of all nobility and greatness.

Mr. Speaker, one more word and I am through: let us remain at home after the war, for we may fall to still greater depths, to an abyss from which I wish to guard my country.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. To me as a newcomer they were symbolic of the growing national unity, a unity between English and French-speaking Canada. They were symbolic of Canada at war; for as soldiers they expressed the sentiments of the armed forces and their relation to the problems of the home front.

I am especially appreciative of the remarks made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) regarding the participation in the war of men hailing from new Canadian stock. It is a better understanding between the national groups of Canada, between peoples of all races and religions who make up the population of our country, that will lead to a strong and democratic Canada.

Likewise, in our international relations it is the conviction of our party that the Teheran, Moscow and Cairo conferences have laid the basis of a great new epoch of human developments. I quote from the declaration of the Teheran conference:

> We express our determination that our nations shall work together in the war and in the peace that will follow. As to the war, our military staffs have joined in our round-table discussions and we have concerted our plans for the destruction of the German forces. And as to the peace, we are sure that our concord will make it an enduring peace. We recognize fully the supreme responsibility resting upon us and all the nations to make a peace which will command good-will from the overwhelming masses of the peoples of the world and banish the scourge and the terror of war for many generations. . . . We shall seek the cooperation and active participation of all nations, large and small, whose peoples in heart and mind are dedicated, as are our own people, to the elimination of tyranny and slavery, oppression and intolerance. We look with confidence to the day when all the peoples of the world may live free lives untouched by tyranny, according to their varying desires and their own consciences.

Here we have a great charter for victory and a better world, not only a charter based on the big powers, as some tend to interpret the Teheran conference declaration, but for all peoples large and small, a charter which shall become the rallying point on a national and international scale.

Before the Moscow, Teheran and Cairo conferences there were danger signs which led many to start speaking about "world war No. 3". There was loose talk about Anglo-Saxon powers running the world. Appeasement raised its head in the form of Darlans, Peyroutons, and similar hirelings in Italy, Yugoslavia, Greece and Austria. An attempt was made to force upon the peoples of Europe the type of leaders who had ruled on behalf of wealthy cliques and had sold their people down the river. The heroic people of China were given all sorts of sympathy and very little else. In fact, in certain of the united nations circles it was considered indiscreet to attack the emperor of Japan. To-day, following the conferences, there is a vision of free peoples who are fighting to reestablish democratic rule and who, although hesitantly, are getting some help from the leading powers within the united nations. We see the world war becoming one of national liberation. A good example of this we see in Yugoslavia, where, instead of a country run by the Serbs, all of the nationalities on an equal basis and with equal opportunities are fighting heroically and winning world recognition. They have established a national assembly of their own.

This is the new age which we see coming into the world at the present time, although with difficulty. The Italian people are, through the Italian commission, gradually winning some possibility to join with the peoples of the united nations in fighting against the nazi murderers for the establishment of a democratic regime, purged of those elements that have dragged their country down to their present difficult condition. In the far east, a free China will be a powerful force for world peace and will go a long way in influencing and securing freedom for hundreds of millions of Hindus, Burmese and other peoples.

As for Canada, I want to emphasize that our own prosperity, freedom, peace and security depend upon a world living under similar circumstances. If one needed any proof of the truth of this, we saw it in the case of the present war. No amount of isolationism could have left us undisturbed.

We have contributed very substantially towards Hitler's plight at the present time. But, as stated in the speech from the throne, "the German army is still very strong." The hardest battles are still coming; and our job is to have an eye on the ball, the battles against the nazis and the Japanese, rather than to fight for parties and advantage. In the face of this test of strength before which we stand, the measure of national unity which we have had in the past should be continued for the duration of the war and for the immediate post-war period.

Unless we are able to preserve national unity, we shall, in our petty quibbling, let down our boys in the armed forces and bring them back after victory is ours into a state of unrest and chaos. I appeal to all parties to work in this spirit of comradeship. That is the spirit of our heroic men in the services, the men of the merchant marine who deliver the goods, the hundreds of thousands of war workers, men and women, who spare no effort to see that we have the goods to deliver. I appeal to all parties to unite in combatting the forces that would rob us of democratic progress in a free world.

Voices are raised by certain individuals, one of whom the hon. member for Dorchester rightly characterized as "le tapageur". These are voices that I would call the voices of inhumanity. We have just had a very fine example of it in the previous speaker, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe). These people, consciously or unconsciously, do the work of the enemy, who in the face of certain defeat, tries to resort to the old worn-out bogey of bolshevism to split the united nations. They take up every argument from the enemy's baggage. Irresponsibly they speak of the impossibility of international unity. They say it will not last; it cannot last; Russia will betray us. And certain scribes of the newspapers use their poison pens to slander the soviet people, whose glorious efforts mean so much to every one of us, to every one of our families. Indeed, many of us would not be here if it were not for their heroic efforts. In the nazi manner they concoct plots and talk about a hundred thousand Jewish refugees who are going to chase the French-Canadian farmers off their land. They discover plots of international Jewry, but Jewry is not the only one who plots. There is freemasonry, and when you say that "free" you want to emphasize it. They resort very openly to Hitler's weapon of anti-Semitism. These elements, although small, are a threat to national and international unity. They are a threat to Canada and Canada's well-being.

Another group are unprincipled enough to resort to any trickery to defeat the desire of our people for a better Canada and a better world. They are the elements who have raised the bogey of socialism and confiscation of savings, and I would not be a bit surprised if in the very near future they said that the socialists were out to nationalize women.

Mr. Speaker, the issue to-day is not what these people call free enterprise versus socialism; the issue is democratic progress versus chaos and insecurity. Our party, the Labour Progressive party, stands for socialism, but we are realistic enough to know and to understand that the vast majority of Canadians are to-day not yet ready for it. We consider that at this time the fight for social progress is a fight in which the people will learn, through their own experience, whether or not they want socialism. The essence of socialism is democracy, and it will not come until the majority of Canadians learn through their experience that socialism is the system they need.

It is in this spirit that I welcome the promises of far-reaching reforms contained in the speech from the throne. Without such reforms, and others which have been omitted, we cannot hope to have national unity. The promise of family allowances is good. I am not surprised to find people who have been talking about family allowances taking the attitude today, not exactly that they oppose such allowances, but that they are not so good. Well, I do not believe that the people in Quebec will fall for any such talk. They will accept family allowances no matter what party introduces the principle. They will be glad to have it. But family allowances must not replace measures for increased wages for labour. Family allowances must not become a bonus to employers, but must be a few extra dollars to people whereby they can buy more milk and more nutrition for their families.

I also believe that family allowances should not be limited to four, five or six children. I do not know how many it is to be, but if it is good for six children, what will the seventh, the eighth and the ninth do? And in our province there are large families. It is unjust to stop at five or six. The issue of family allowances should not be raised as against improving wages. When I speak of wages I think of those paid in our province which are still very low in comparison with those paid in other provinces. I have in mind the thousands of textile workers. For the past year they have been carrying on a just fight to get increased wages. Some of them earn wages as low as 22 cents an hour, and family allowances must not stand in the way of these people getting a just increase in wages. Something has to be done about these textile workers in our province. They have been patient—so much so that one member of the house said to me: "Je pense qu'il y a quelque chose qui ne marche pas dans cette union"; "there is something wrong with the union." There is nothing wrong with the union, if they do not want to bring workers out on strike at the present time. They could have done it. Would that have been just? Would that have been the way for them to get increases? It is the duty of the government to see to it that large concerns like Dominion Textile deal with labour on an equal basis just as a small man does. It is in this regard that I deplore the absence in the speech from the throne of the assurance of a democratic labour code. Promises were made quite a while ago. If the federal government has not the power to deal with this key problem to national unity, what confidence can the people have in the power of the government to apply other measures mentioned in the speech from the throne? I have been told, I may be wrong, that the Premier of Quebec suddenly became what we call provincial autonomy conscious in regard to labour problems and rushed to introduce a bill in Quebec which has won the condemnation of labour forces in the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec. One small group has approved it, the Catholic syndicates, but they stand to lose very little in any circumstances.

I realize that parliament is limited in its power to apply certain measures, but I believe that the time has come when we as a sovereign nation should have the power to amend our own constitution, having full regard for the cultural and religious rights of Quebec. I believe the people of my province will approve measures that will result in improvements in their welfare. Too often have autonomous rights been used by unscrupulous politicians to keep the people of our province in a state of inequality. No doubt the same constitutional objections could be raised in connection with the housing problem. I know that this constitutional problem exists; but again, what are we to do? We have a catastrophic housing problem in the city of Montreal. I am going to quote to the house letters I have received. Some five thousand people may be out of their homes by May 1, 1944. As hon. members know, under order 294 a family can be told to get out of their home if somebody has enough money and makes sufficient profit to buy that home. That home can be taken from them on six months' notice. Where is that family to go? I say it is a criminal act against the war effort. I have received all sorts of letters from people and have had many people come to visit me. Before I cite the cases I should state that there has been an amendment to order 294 whereby only the person who buys the home can force the occupants out of it within six months. In Montreal about five thousand families will be without homes unless we do something about the matter.

Here is a case which I shall call Mrs. A, a French-Canadian woman who is operating a rooming house. Her husband is in the merchant navy and has been torpedoed four times. She has sixteen roomers in her house. They have been ordered to get out. Where are they to go? Here is the case of another woman whom we shall call Mrs. B. There are in her house eleven people and nine children. Her eldest daughter whose husband was recently killed overseas lives with her. They must move. Where are they to go? Here is a man with a family of five; he has one son in the navy and another one in the army overseas. They have nowhere to go. I shall read a letter from one woman because I believe that letter best describes the condition of these people:

I am a widow, a semi-invalid. I have occupied the residence at . . . for over sixteen years.

I will not read it all.

For fifteen years my son, a dentist—

Mr. LALONDE: The hon. member is supposed to give the name.

Mr. ROSE: I shall start again:

For fifteen years my son, a dentist, Captain J. B., has had his office at this residence. He is now overseas with the Canadian active army in the dental corps. Now here is my problem. After having lived in this house for such a length of time I have received a letter asking us to vacate the premises by May 1, 1944. Now where can I go? When my son left and said "au revoir", with the help of God, he asked me to take good care of his office. Now, I telephoned the company where all his machinery was bought and they told me that his X-ray, dental chairs and other equipment is best in a sunny, dry room, because when left in storage damage can be done to rubber tube in X-ray. Can you please help me in this difficult situation? I have another son in the air force. While these boys are in uniform fighting for their homeland (also for the home of this selfish landlady) the dentist's office and all of the furniture the other son bought is about to be sold for very little.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): Who wrote that letter?

Mr. ROSE (Translation): I can give you the address, if you wish: Mrs. Boness, 4580 Park avenue.

(Text): There is no limit to the number of examples that I could cite, but I have not the time. However, I will say that we have a very serious situation there. We have in Montreal between 1,200 and 1,400 families living in garages and warehouses. That is a terrible situation when one considers what it means to the health and morale of people who work in war industries. In addition to that, we have, of course, slums galore. In my own constituency we have about thirty families living in a lane that was condemned many years ago. What that does to the health of the people is nobody's business.

I shall now give the house some figures given to me by a doctor dealing with tuberculosis patients. In one small part of my constituency we have over a hundred cases of tuberculosis. Much of that is attributable to bad housing conditions. Let us compare the situation in the neighbouring constituency of Cartier with that of other areas on the island of Montreal. There ninety-three out of a hundred thousand die of tuberculosis as compared with twenty in Notre Dame de Grace and forty in Westmount. The St. James division has an infantile mortality rate of eighty-one per hundred thousand to forty-nine in Notre Dame de Grace and thirty in Westmount. That is quite a difference and lives are dear. We cannot take them too lightly. What are we going to do about this housing problem? First I say the government must see to it that there are no evictions on May 1, and any measures necessary to prevent this should be taken. I can see no justification for any human being, just because he is fortunate enough to have the money with which to buy a house, moving in and throwing out another family from its home.

Mr. BONNIER (Translation): Where will those who have money to buy a house go to live? On the street?

Mr. ROSE (Translation): I shall answer your question later.

(Text): They have tried to take houses and change them into apartments. I have had people tell me that a family of ten would be put out of a home which would be converted into two small apartments, in which I do not see how more than ten people could live, so why should that money be expended? What is solved by this action? This is no solution at all; we need more drastic measures. Under the War Measures Act we have power to build the five thousand homes which I would say are badly needed in the city of Montreal. Where is the money coming from? Well, I am happy to see that the war budget is a quarter of a billion dollars less than last year, so perhaps we could find some money there. Then the government must have the power, though here again there may be a constitutional problem, to undertake a big building scheme, which is very greatly needed. Men are being laid off in factories; materials are available, and such a scheme could be undertaken to-day. In addition to anything done to provide people with houses which they may rent at the rates they are able to pay, we should also make it possible for people to build homes. We have a credit bank for business men, so why not extend credit to people for this purpose. Many aspire to build their homes; this is their dream, so let us help make that dream come true.

I could mention many more matters, but I should like to emphasize these, because I believe they are measures that are needed at once, measures which would bring results. They are vital to our war effort; they are vital to the morale of our people in view of what is to come. What I have outlined, however, is only a small portion of what we must undertake in order to give work to our people. We should draw up a huge public works plan to include such things as the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, the development of our vast hydro electric power resources, rural electrification, the development of our natural resources, the modernization and reconstruction of our cities, the abolition of slums, the rebuilding of libraries and hospitals, and the development of modern highways to give our people work. Again I may be asked where the money is to be found. Well, during this war we have proved that we can find the money if we look for it and work hard enough to get it.

Then, Mr. Speaker, as a sovereign state we should look to the development of our foreign trade through the more direct handling of mutual aid for the reconstruction of devastated areas. We are an important country from the point of view of production, but what very often happens? We get the orders; we are assigned something; we are just a small contractor, though we have a large production. If we are to have trade; if we are to be a power in the world we must have our own say as to where and when we are to export, as to which countries we are going to help. We cannot be told by others. Look at the United States; through lend-lease they have helped a number of countries, but they have also advertised American goods. Where do we stand? I believe that the aid we grant should be given more directly to the countries involved. We must win their good will to-day for trade to-morrow, for we shall need plenty of trade if we are to give work to everyone. We might increase trade through long term credits to the people of Europe, and let me repeat that we can stake out our share of that trade to-day by dealing with those countries directly rather than indirectly. We are a sovereign nation; let us act as one.

I understand that we are playing quite an important role in the operations of the united nations relief and rehabilitation organization. We are going to supply quite a large amount of material in that connection; in fact if I am not mistaken the head of that commission is a Canadian. We are proud of that, but I understand that all these arrangements are to be handled by the military authorities. I believe they should attend to the war and leave the rehabilitation authorities to handle rehabilitation matters. Then we should let the people know who gives them the goods they receive in their time of need. Yes, we have shown in time of war that we are an important country; we have proved that we can make an important contribution to the world, and we must continue to do so in time of peace, but we must be united and we must be strong.

In this connection I should like to refer to an issue which is being used too often in Canada to divide our people; that is, the issue of anti-Semitism, the issue of racial discrimination, which was used by Hitler to make barbarians out of decent human beings. We have quite a lot of that in Canada. There is no use in adopting a hush-hush policy; I do not believe in it. Recently I have seen some literature which has been distributed in Quebec which is a disgrace to a civilized nation. Jews are painted almost as people with horns, and this literature is being distributed throughout the countryside, where some people have never seen a Jew, so they may actually believe that they are exactly as this literature says. I have had negroes come to me and ask, "Why cannot we get into that dance hall? Why cannot we get jobs? Why do we have it so hard in the air force or the army?" We have the anti-Catholic agitation being carried on by certain people in Ontario. I say that for the sake of unity in Canada the time has come when a royal commission should be set up to investigate all these anti-Canadian activities which are splitting us asunder when we should be strongly united.

I now come to the end of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, which I believe have been made in the spirit in which the Labour-Progressive party wants to work; that is, in the desire to contribute toward a democratic and prosperous Canada. Sometimes I think that certain parties should forget the idea that they have a monopoly on contributions of this kind. We all have a contribution to make for the sake of Canada, for the people of Canada and toward a united effort. So let us go forward to build the type of world that was foreseen by our great leaders when they met in Teheran not so long ago.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all, congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply, upon the eloquent way in which they performed their difficult task. I should like also, if I may, to extend a welcome to the new member for Cartier, Montreal (Mr. Rose), who has just taken his seat. He has expressed himself very clearly, and I hope he will continue to contribute something worth while to the good work of this assembly.

The war has been going on for a long time, and I wish at the outset of my remarks to pay tribute to the record of the government in handling our war effort. This has been mentioned in editorials of many publications, and people from coast to coast are realizing that those who are guiding and directing the efforts of the Canadian people are doing a splendid job, and are deserving of recognition and credit. Standing close to where you now sit, Mr. Speaker, Madame Chiang Kai-shek said that Canada had contributed more per capita to the war effort than any other of the allied countries. Credit for this is due to the patriotism and the enthusiastic response of thousands of Canadian men and women who have set aside their own affairs, and rallied to the service of their country. All honour to those who have courageously joined the armed forces, or spent long hours labouring in industrial plants! All honour to those who have continued to produce the food supplies of this country! Often they have been poorly paid for so doing. Often they have worked at tasks almost beyond their physical ability. And let us never forget the contribution the women have made in so many different capacities, often working long hours in their homes, providing comforts for the soldiers.

The contribution the people of Canada, working as a united nation, have made to the war effort has amazed the world. Let us look at some of the departments of government. The navy, starting with fifteen ships, and some 1,774 men, has expanded until it now has more than 600 ships and more than 70,000 men and officers. An English magazine, Shipping, says that this is an all-time record; it has never been excelled. That navy has patrolled and guarded our shores. Its ships have sailed the seven seas, side by side with the vessels of the British fleet. They have convoyed forty-seven per cent of the material crossing the Atlantic to the united nations.

A United States publication says that if these convoys had not been kept running the allies would have lost the war. A vast Canadian army has been organized. Thousands of airmen have been trained. Those airmen fly four, five or six miles into the thin, cold air. Their efforts are hampered by sleet, clouds and storms. They are harassed by enemy action. They are performing deeds almost beyond human endurance. Indeed, they are making a mighty contribution to the destruction of Hitler.

Then, in connection with the Department of Munitions and Supply, Mr. Churchill when speaking in the United States referred to our output as Canada's massive production. The holding of the price ceiling has been one of the most difficult and, politically, most costly, tasks in so far as the present government is concerned. The New York Times recently said that against war-time inflation Canada's defences have been the best of any of the allied nations. These things have required thought and planning, and it is not by accident that the stores in Canada contain nearly all commodities that are required. It is not by accident that the Canadian dollar retains about four-fifths of its pre-war purchasing power.

Mistakes have been made, and before taking my seat I shall enumerate some of them. Legislation which has proven to be good, and will stand as a monument to those who have put it on the statute books, has been passed. I shall refer to some of that legislation. But there are still great problems to be faced, and great dangers and difficulties ahead. This is no time for complacency. This generation must move, not backward but forward, to greater economic and political freedom. All are now agreed that a mistake was made during the ten long years of depression when, in Canada and in other countries, many people were unemployed and were on the breadlines. All are determined that this condition of affairs shall never arise again, and ex-service men, particularly, will never endure or permit the recurrence of such a condition of affairs.

To prevent a return of those days of depression, reconstruction committees under the direction of hon. members have been planning to bring about a condition under which there will be full employment, so far as it is humanly possible to arrange it. There has been planning to revive the coal industry in the little provinces down by the sea, to reclaim land in the central provinces, irrigating the dry prairies wherever it is possible to do so. There is planning for shipbuilding and the development of fisheries of the coastal provinces. Everywhere in Canada roads, schools, hospitals and bridges will be built, and particular attention has been paid to the building of homes in rural and urban districts.

There is one other problem which must be faced—and this I wish to emphasize as my chief object in speaking to-night—namely that agriculture must be put on a paying basis. Anyone going into the homes of average western farmers will realize that the returns in that industry are not as good as those in other industries. People on the farms plan for better buildings and better conditions. They entertain the hope that their children can be educated, so that they may enjoy a better life. But dreams on the farms seldom come true, because of the many hazards which must be faced. If we took man-hours, woman-hours and child-hours required to produce agricultural products we would find that their values are not comparable with values in other industries. It is quite true that at the present time statistics may show that farmers have more money than they have ever had. But they are frustrated, and they have been exasperated by the many seemingly needless orders which are issued. An order in council will come out which is difficult to understand; it will be long and confusing. Then an amendment will come out and a short time later the order in council may be cancelled. This is all most confusing.

Recently we heard of a bonus on oats and barley. The first announcement was received with consternation in the feeding districts. Later on, the order in council was explained and then a few weeks later a further explanation was issued. But it is still not satisfactory because the man who has oats or barley and who feeds those grains cannot obtain the bonus. We are continually receiving telegrams—I received one to-day—with regard to marketing conditions. There is difficulty in getting a clear understanding of the bonus on hogs. Many of these things are so confusing that the farmers feel discouraged.

In the district whence I come there was a complete crop failure in 1943; even the grass did not grow. In order to meet a condition of this kind I would once more bring to the attention of the house the necessity of irrigating these dry areas. They have a maximum amount of sunshine, the soil is fertile, the only thing required is water. I want to thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for sending out engineers to compile complete records on the engineering phase of one irrigation scheme in southern Alberta. When the war ends it is expected that there will be some measure of employment, and it is to be hoped that these projects will have reached a stage where tenders can be called for and the work started at once. If that is done it will provide homes for those who have been faced with failure or perhaps for those who are returning from the war. It will provide traffic for our railways and provide work for the building trades, for our coal miners and for live stock feeders.

We all want to live as long as we can and we all want to enjoy as much health as we possibly can. Nutritionists tell us that the foods that we generally lack are dairy products and fruits and vegetables. These are the products of irrigated districts. By the development of these districts and the putting in of quick freezing plants these products would be available all year. This would be a great blessing to those who live in parts of the country where such products are difficult to obtain. There are some cooperative processing plants in the district, but there is a danger of their being put out of business. They are not government inspected and thus they do not qualify for the bonus which is being paid for hogs at the present time. This is not fair.

I should like to refer to some of the legislation which I believe is working out well and which will prove to be a credit to the members of this deliberative assembly. In May, 1941, when payrolls were good and when many people were employed the unemployment insurance scheme was placed upon our statute books. The workers now have an equity of $180,000,000 in that fund. Employers, employees and the government all contribute. An employee receiving $20 a week pays thirty cents a week. If he has worked five years and becomes unemployed he can receive $10.20 a week if he is single or $12 a week if he is married for a period of fifty-two weeks. The government is paying the dues of the men in the armed services. If they go into an included occupation when they return they will find themselves in good standing.

As I mentioned when an amendment was being considered last session, it is unfortunate that invalidity and sickness insurance was not included in the Unemployment Insurance Act. The workmen's compensation boards in the provinces look after accident cases, but those who are sick, those who are disabled by any means other than accident find it very difficult when a calamity of this kind overtakes them. Wages, salaries and profits in this country are not sufficient to enable anyone to meet these hazards. I do hope that this problem will be considered under unemployment insurance.

Because of the action of the Alberta government and the dominion government, pioneers in Alberta who are over seventy years of age may now get $30 a month from some source. This problem of old age pensions is mentioned in the speech from the throne and I do hope that something more will be done. I contend that casual earnings should be allowed to reach a higher figure than is allowed at the present time. The years that go by take a toll from the human system and whether we will admit it or not, age creeps up upon us all. When a person reaches the age of sixty-five years he is no longer able to do strenuous work, and so I hope that legislation will be placed upon our statute books to give some relief to those who have reached the age of sixty-five years and are able to qualify otherwise.

A short time ago a dominion inheritance tax was imposed. Wealthy estates are taxed heavily, but the tax is light on the smaller estates. Those below $5,000 are exempt altogether; a widow is exempt up to $20,000, and each child up to $5,000. Near relatives get more out of an estate than do distant relatives. We impose an income tax up to ninety or ninety-two per cent on large incomes, but we have made the burden light on those who are least able to pay. Our income tax is lower on the lower incomes and higher on the higher incomes than is the tax in either the United States or Great Britain. For example, a man earning $700 in Canada pays $13; in the United States he would have to pay $40, and in Great Britain, $45. But if a man has an income of $30,000, in Canada he would have to pay $18,396; in the United States $13,761 and in Great Britain, $18,217.

Vocational training in this country has been a great success. Thousands of young men have been taught trades and have proved to be very useful during this war. They will be most useful after the termination of the war. Vocational training is being planned for those who return from service overseas. During the last war this type of training was available only for minors and those who were injured during the war, but now it is available for all who can benefit by it, men and women alike. During the time these people are taking training, or when they are convalescent or out of work, they are paid an allowance. A single man can get $10.20 a week, while the married man with children will get a higher rate. The married man with four children can get $24 a week. In Australia and New Zealand these rates are slightly lower and they are paid for only thirteen weeks, whereas in Canada payments may be made for fifty-two weeks, and in cases where education is being continued, for as long as four years.

Thousands of contracts are awarded every week for guns, tanks, ships, planes, motor vehicles, et cetera. There is no preferred or patronage list in connection with these contracts. Anyone, everyone, is allowed to tender; and precautions are taken which show that care is being exercised in the handling of these contracts. For instance, every contract for over $2,000 has to be approved by the head of the branch; every contract or agreement over $5,000 by the deputy minister, and every contract over $15,000 by the cabinet. In addition to that there is a purchase investigating committee. This is a group of business men who go into every contract and every agreement to see that there are no weaknesses and no favouritism. In addition, cost accountants check all agreements and contracts and they are responsible to the auditor general. Also we have a parliamentary committee on war expenditure that may dip into any one of these contracts.

Canada has taken a leading part in international conventions, at Hot Springs and other places, looking to a freer exchange of goods, and with the purpose of feeding the starving people of Europe when they are liberated from the heel of the oppressor. Already half the people of Greece are living on Canadian wheat.

The average Canadian, Mr. Speaker, does not want to embark on vague experiments. He wants victory to come as soon as possible. He wants to be assured of a decent standard of living when victory is won. He wants this war to bring a lasting peace. Toward those objectives we in Canada must keep driving with all the courage and fortitude that we can muster, if we would have that future wherein our children can walk in ways of peace and happiness. Truly a glorious opportunity lies before our people; they can rise to heights to which they have never before attained. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has said, "if we in this country keep our heads and pursue high objectives, we shall achieve results in the post-war world which will amaze civilization."

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the framers of the speech from the throne which is now being debated have missed their vocation. They should have followed the vocation of window-dressing, because the speech is the most expert piece of window-dressing which I have seen in this parliament.

The main matter before the country to-day is, what is to become of Canada and the British empire after the war Yet there is no cut-and-dried foreign policy, nor is there an announcement of any empire policy at all.

In referring to the speech from the throne the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred yesterday to various imperial conferences which have been held, in 1926, 1937 and other years, when Canada took the position that we had no commitments but that parliament would decide. But parliament did not decide anything except to enter the war ten days late.

It seems to me that the issue in this debate is not one of Canada's autonomy, her status, or her sovereignty. There is no intention on the part of the mother of parliament to interfere with any of these things. Some of those who have spoken thus far seem to have searched Old Mother Hubbard's cupboard for skeletons of the past, and dragged into this debate a great many things which should have been forgotten long ago, and should not be resurrected, if we are to win this war, at a time when unity is so badly needed. The war is primary; nothing else matters now. The domestic questions which this country has to deal with, although they are of great importance, can be deferred until we know whether we are going to win this war and whether we are going to have collective security or not. The position of the Prime Minister is not altogether consistent with the policy in which, I am convinced, all the people of Canada of all parties believe, in what he said was primary, namely the winning of the war. What is the object of going through two world wars like these in a little over twenty years when we shall have the very same condition of affairs again unless the dominions are united with the mother country in the post-war world to come? Britain cannot exist without the dominions. Her very life is at stake; she has to import twenty-five out of twenty-seven raw materials, and she is dependent upon the dominions. Unless they are a unit in their foreign policy and empire policy, the outlook for the empire and for the mother country is very dark. The dominions must hang together or they will hang separately, because none of the dominions is able to "go it" alone. Together they are the greatest in the world. We have seen what has happened to the small states in Europe; they have been overrun by the mechanized hordes of the German and other dictators.

One of the great prime ministers of France said a few years ago that Britain was the hardest country in the world to make a treaty with; she always spoke with so many voices. With Canada's present sovereign status, hardly a day goes by that some ambassador is not sent out to this or that country, all over the seven seas. These people used to be called ministers or envoys extraordinary, and a great many of them were extraordinary. In the twenty years between the two wars we created a number of ministers plenipotentiary. Now as full ambassadors they have brand new uniforms —at the country's expense, if you please—and there are so many of them that the government has a hard time to find anybody left in Canada to take the job. Dear knows who the next one will be or where he will be sent. This is one phase and one consequence of the policy of isolationism and separatism which Canada has pursued.

The right policy for this country was laid down by the Progressive Conservative party, and they have adhered to it since 1844. It is a consistent empire and foreign affairs policy. Some people are talking about "British imperialism." The word "imperialism" is a misnomer. It is used by the same people who in the period between the two wars forgot all about German imperialism, opposed rearmament, and thought we could depend for peace and security on Geneva. It is the humbug of Geneva which was largely responsible for this second war. We in Canada owe everything we have to the mother country. For two years after 1939 she went it all alone with the help of the dominions, standing against the dictators of the world, and we here, the people of Quebec especially, owe her a great deal. Had the enemy sailed up the St. Lawrence with his land, air and sea forces we would have had no defence at all. Yet there are some who wanted to reduce our military estimates to one dollar—some who are now going through the country posing as super-patriots and criticizing "British imperialism." They never said one word about German and Japanese and Italian imperialism, and the menace of it before this war, as they preached pacifism and disarmament.

Sir John A. Macdonald laid down the policy of this party when, speaking to the electors of Kingston on October 5, 1844, he made the following statement:

> It is my firm belief that the prosperity of Canada depends upon its permanent connection with the mother country, and I shall resist to the utmost any attempt from whatever quarter to weaken that union.

Forty-seven years afterwards, speaking in February, 1891, in his last campaign during his last illness, he reaffirmed that doctrine, which has been the policy of every government since. On that occasion he said:

> For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting aegis of the British crown. Under the broad folds of the union jack, we enjoy the most ample liberty, we govern ourselves as we please, and at the same time we participate in the advantages which flow with association of the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. As for myself, my course is clear. A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die.

That has been the consistent policy of the Conservative party. Look at the record over the past fifty years and what do you find in regard to Canada's stand in the oceanic empire? In this war, all the dominions came forward unasked to the aid of the mother country, and the colonies, the mandated colonies, and the colonial empire including India, all volunteered their help. They have all done remarkable well, and Canada, as the senior dominion, holds an important key position between the United States and Britain.

In 1899 when the South African war broke out Canada played her part, small though it was. Apart from the war of 1812, that was the first contribution she had made to the mother country in waging a war. Canada raised, together with New Zealand and Australia, several hundred men who went to South Africa, and the British government paid all the costs. In the great war of 1914, the same thing happened; the British fleet ensured the peace of world civilization for over 100 years. From 1815, for 100 years apart from one or two minor war engagements, no great contribution had been made by Canada so far to the mother country; but with the outbreak of the great war in 1914 over a million men came from the dominions to the side of Britain and 130,000 of them fell in the war. They came forward voluntarily. They fought not for the mother country but at her side, each dominion in her own cause, which was the cause of all. After all, what Canada has done in the past fifty years for the mother country and in the interests of collective security she has done voluntarily, and she will continue to do the same after this war. She would do the same to-morrow, namely, go to the aid of the mother country again, in the hour of peril.

In the South African war in 1899 there were in this country those people who said, "What have we to do with Britain's wars?" They contended that it was contrary to the constitution; it was against the British North America Act to send troops to South Africa. But the loyal people of the country—and fortunately they are not all in one party—brought pressure to bear upon the government of the day to send a contingent to South Africa, and compelled all governments from that day to this to take the stand that when Britain is at war Canada also is at war. They did the same in 1914, and the contribution that has been made to the mother country in this war has gone up by geometrical progression. There were three or four regiments in the South African war and in this war we have 600,000 or 700,000 men. And what we have done we have done voluntarily. What the dominions did in the two world wars has changed the whole history of the civilized world.

On Armistice day, 1918, there was great rejoicing throughout the world. People everywhere thought, with the close of the war, that there would be no more war, that the world had been made safe for democracy. Well, we, by pacifism and folly, lost all the benefits which the military forces had won in France and Flanders. The Germans saw to it that we did. The League of Nations was created and in 1922 was a going concern. During the years 1923, 1924, 1925, Britain completely disarmed; then came Locarno and with it the purchase of German favour, and after that 1936, when our empire ran down the toboggan and the British government allowed Germany to occupy the Rhine. In addition to that, in 1937, Britain and the United States stood aside and allowed Germany to occupy Austria, and in 1938 the frontiers of Czechoslovakia.

Then the deluge came and we found the British empire completely disarmed. That of course led to the war.

I have always supported the principle of a permanent empire council. Speaking in 1923 and again in 1924 and 1925, between the close of the first world war and the outbreak of the second, I urged on the attention of parliament the necessity for such a council. The last time I spoke was in November, 1941, as reported at page 4513 of daily Hansard. At that time I said that in my opinion the Prime Minister would have been well advised to support a permanent empire council and a war cabinet. I said it was an absolute necessity and that New Zealand and Australia wanted it. He passed it up. Then came the fall of Singapore and Hong Kong, and I urged the government to call immediately a permanent empire council, because New Zealand and Australia, with Canada, could not any longer afford to have these decisions made against them without their consent and advice. So many hundreds of thousands of our young men could not fight without having something to say about it. This war, Mr. Speaker, will have been fought in vain and we shall have another war before the year 1970 or the close of this century unless we take advantage of the present conflict to carry into the peace some measure of collective security and the unity the dominions had in this war. That means an armed Britain and armed dominions. What does an unarmed Britain lead to? Invasion, insult and nearly in the end, extinction, as in this war.

In 1940 young men by the thousand went up in the air in the battle of London and Britain. By night and by day, twenty-four hours a day, these young airmen, some from the high schools of Toronto, played their part in this war in the air and saved Britain and civilization. Six hundred of them have been lost so far from the high schools in the city of Toronto alone. These young airmen in the battle of Britain have saved civilization. We owe to these young men everything we have in this country, and so do the people of Quebec, those of the maritimes and the people of the United States as well. But for these young men we would long ago have made peace with the axis powers. In view of the Prime Minister's stand, since he refuses to cooperate with New Zealand and Australia in the effort to secure a permanent empire council, it seems to me that Canada is at the parting of the ways. I am very much alarmed. I submit that the time has come for the Prime Minister to tell the house what the foreign policy and empire policy of Canada is. Where does Canada stand on the declaration of Churchill that he is not going to allow this empire to go into liquidation or go by default, because without the dominions Britain would be a second Denmark, and a second-class power. With the dominions Britain will be the greatest power in the new world to come.

What is the stand of this country on allowing the empire to go by default? I think the Prime Minister should make his stand clear to parliament before the meeting of the prime ministers in June, because none of the component parts of the British empire are strong enough to go it alone, or separately.

Mr. Curtin of Australia, backed by the Prime Minister of New Zealand, outlined the policy of these great dominions for a regional council and permanent empire council and gave the place which Australia will occupy in the Pacific after the war. Mr. Curtin says conditions will never be the same in the Pacific as they were in 1939; therefore we must have the advantage of a concerted empire policy, which will have the power to stand for democracy in the southern Pacific in the post-war years. These will be complex years and Australia cannot afford to let her economic position be unknown and misunderstood. That should be the stand of Canada. Mr. Curtin said in a most notable speech in August, 1942, that Australia is proud of and completely satisfied with her status and rights as a self-governing member of the British commonwealth which is a partnership of equality and fraternity, a partnership whose history has been marked by great contributions to civilization.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the British commonwealth depends to a large extent on the stand which Canada takes. It will be too late when the prime ministers are meeting in England for Canada to declare her policy. We shall be back to where we were in 1937. We shall have no policy. It will be said we have no commitments; parliament will decide. It is a case of now or never; now and forever. Canada is a wonderful North American country of vast resoures and she has a stake in western Europe owing to the invention of the aeroplane. She has a stake also in the Atlantic region. Canada cannot be indifferent to European affairs if she is to be a great nation. Her destiny requires her to be a leader in the commonwealth. Up to the beginning of this century Britain had to fear only naval power. Now she has to fear the aeroplane, and the whole world is changed.

The United States, that great nation which is allied with us in this war and has done so gloriously is the master of its own destiny. That is so, but it cannot interfere with Britain and Canada having the closest ties. Canada's position is vital for the development of air communications, and these should be planned ahead of the prime ministers' meeting between Britain and Canada. It should be an all-empire, red-air policy. I referred at length to civil aviation on July 15 last, and received no reply from the government. Canada is a great country whose resources are vast. She should unite with New Zealand and Australia in a permanent empire council. The destiny of the empire lies largely in Canada's hands. Canada cannot go it alone or separately. We have had a treaty with the West Indies since 1912. Canada with Newfoundland and the West Indies should form a sort of regional council in the Atlantic for the future progress of the world. Canada is of great value to the world of the future as a member of the British commonwealth. After the war Canada should continue the good work she has done in this war and turn out to be an instrumeint for the keeping of peace in the world. If we do that we shall have captured our objective in this war and little more will be heard of war.

The government talks of equality of status and autonomy. It seems to me, with all these ambassadors going around the seven seas representing Britain and the dominions, we shall have nothing but a hidden Tower of Babel of ambassadors that we have at Washington and all the other capitals of the world. We shall come to be a nation of ambassadors. The government is so anxious about equality of status that it will not work with the other dominions in connection with foreign policy and empire policy, and has forgotten all about equality of function without which status is a myth. That is now up in the clouds. What is the use of us talking about Canada being a nation? The British empire, as Lord Balfour's committee said, is not founded on negations. It depends essentially, if not formally, on positive ideals. Free institutions are its lifeblood. Free cooperation is its instrument. Peace, security and progress are among its objectives. Cooperation within the empire for economic development is therefore absolutely necessary for the commonwealth and the colonial empire alike, and international cooperation in economic affairs would be far more difficult if the dominions be treated as separate units in international affairs.

Article 4 of the Atlantic charter safeguards imperial preference. There are many in Canada who do not realize that that principle is absolutely essential to the commonwealth if it is to exist and to the international status, not only to Britain but to the weaker members of the commonwealth. All the dominions will lose their economic independence if the principle of economic unity within the empire is abrogated.

We have had a lot of talk in this country about this being a class war, a people's revolution and all that kind of thing, but between the two wars we did not hear a word from the pacifists about German imperialism and its menace to the world. What was the cause of this war? It was not for that reason at all. The people who are fighting this war are not fighting for any kind of political nostrum. That is not what the people of the devastated countries are fighting for or have suffered to death for. What caused this war was the determination of Germany to subjugate the continent of Europe so that by her army and military power she would control the people and the industries of Europe and thus have Britain and the British empire at her mercy. It is for that reason that the United States and all the other nations were attacked by Germany, and it is for that reason that Russia came into the war. There are some people who would like to substitute their own economic propaganda for the real German war, and who would like to substitute a political war of their own along certain lines. Imperial unity must be made our first task. We must recognize the fact that the empire can produce almost every article which Britain and her empire need for peace and war. Britain cannot go it alone without the dominions from which she must import twenty-five out of twenty-seven of her raw materials. With the dominions she is to be the greatest power in the world to-day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been something said about parliamentary institutions and the supremacy of parliament. Criticism in time of war has stirred governments and cabinets to action on a number of matters belatedly and after a lot of urging. The functions of parliament have not changed from those first days when in an historic speech to the sheriffs of Bristol, Burke made the statement that a member when he becomes a member does not become the representative only of the constituency he represents but of the country, as a whole, and that to be a good member was no easy task then or now if one does his duty, especially in a world war like this. One of the most important functions of a member is to criticize, to examine, to cross-question the ministry and to debate not merely the policy of the government of the day, but more important the way the trust of administering the affairs of that country is conducted, and to act also as a check on expenditures and further taxation, and especially of examining legislation.

[Mr. Church.]

But if one consults the record of Hansard and the debates one will find that few avail themselves of such privileges. In this war what has happened? Outside boards have usurped the functions of parliament in a haphazard manner over parliament's head; privileges, powers and duties of a democratic parliament and of the ministers of the crown responsible for their actions have been usurped. The minister leaves it all to them with the result that parliament has surrendered and abdicated to those amateurs and overnight they have become experts. As a result legislation is left largely by parliament to the executive and the various control boards, and is carried through by orders in council. So we have these ghosts behind the scenes, these controllers who overnight become experts or bureaucrats and who, with little parliamentary criticism of their actions, pass laws simply because there is a war on. As I see it, to elect or reject governments is not one of the important functions of parliament; the people decide that. Nor is it one of the functions of parliament to propose legislation, since in nearly all cases that is laid down by the government of the day. Yet there never has been a time when it was more important that a useful and efficient private member should function, one who will consider the country's interests and the prosecution of the war as of primary importance, one who will ask questions in season and out of season, since it is in parliament alone that the real truth can be discovered and errors in administration exposed through the questioning and cross-questioning of ministers. In effect and in practice the supremacy of parliament in Canada is a myth. The real debates in this house in which the man on the street is interested rarely get beyond the walls of this building; they might as well be held in secret; yet this is the only place where anyone holding a grievance may have it remedied.

Such, in actual practice, is our new system of government in Canada; yet criticism here could restore the prestige of parliament and perhaps save the government from its friends. Since the beginning of this war, as for twenty years previously, I have urged that constitutional, parliamentary cabinet and law reform were Canada's principal domestic problems, and I have quoted authorities to support that statement; yet nothing has been done. Between the two wars Canada was the chief drifter from the empire. Our main empire interests should be defence, civil aviation, trade, foreign affairs and immigration within the empire, and that should start with British born immigration, and of soldiers first and those who won the battle of Britain, the people of the mother country, with assisted passages. They should be considered before we bring in any other continental people, though I have no objection to the principle to which one other hon. member referred to-day.

As I have said, Canada was the chief drifter from the empire. At the imperial conferences of 1927 and 1937 we refused to cooperate with our sister dominions of Australia and New Zealand in the matters I have mentioned, on the ground that we had no commitments and that parliament would decide, which, as I have said, was a myth. Canada relied on various peace pacts, agreements, pacifism, the Monroe doctrine and all that kind of thing. We threw away our defences on land, sea and in the air; we lost our friends, and in 1937, when urged by Australia and New Zealand to support an empire air scheme, an empire shipping policy and rearmament for collective security, we refused to do so. The government has conducted a Liberal war in many ways, though many very fine things have been done in connection with munitions and food, and particularly in regard to assistance to Britain, which was a splendid action on our part. However, our man-power policy in my opinion has been carried on by fits and starts, with nothing being continued for very long and no equality of either service or of sacrifice. We have no foreign policy; we never had any policy but drift. We have no empire policy, which is the most important of all. Every year I have urged the creation of an empire council to bring about a wise modern system of empire collaboration, consultation and cooperation between Britain, her dominions and colonies and mandated areas. After the fall of Singapore and Hong Kong in 1941, I urged in this house that a permanent empire tribunal be set up, with a permanent secretariat, to meet frequently and decide all empire matters, since Britain cannot exist without the dominions. Mr. Curtin was right in advocating such a plan, and I am sorry that we have not followed him.

In this war Britain and her dominions, alone, saved the world for two years, and saved civilization from being destroyed. The day of isolation in Canada is gone forever. The great dominions should hang together and have unity in action, while retaining their status and sovereignty and autonomy. They can still combine to aid the mother country and the empire but, unless they are united, each will hang by itself, since none is strong enough to go it alone as a separate nation. Britain and her dominions, while willing to aid in rebuilding a better world and allowing the free use of all raw materials, as far as possible, should retain sovereignty over the empire and not lose any of her territory. In this war the loyalty of all the dominions and colonies, and of India, has been shown to a striking degree, as was the case in the last war. But the various parts of the empire should meet as one unit to discuss matters of defence, collective security, civil aviation and so on. While we are always paying great tribute to our allies and working in unison with them, I believe that since this war began parliament has missed a great opportunity each session to discuss for several days primary empire problems. Each session we have been able to discuss the price of wheat for four or five weeks; yet only for part of a day toward the end of the session are we permitted to discuss the important matters of foreign affairs, empire unity, and so on, which will be the salvation of this country. The mother country should be the axis of the empire, and should give leadership. Empire affairs should be prominent in our parliaments, and frequent meetings should be held between representatives of the parliaments of the empire for consultation, collaboration and cooperation in a forward empire policy of progress leading to a better world after this war.

Christianity is part and parcel of our empire; indeed, the empire is founded on Christianity. This principle was reasserted to the people of India by Queen Victoria in 1858, when the British government took over the Indian empire. The British empire is Christian, not in a sectarian sense but because a Christian people founded and developed it, and it has been Christian in all its institutions ever since. We assert the individual right of the human soul and of all faiths; that all have equal rights as long as they are humane. The kindred nations of our empire have had a record of which they may be proud, for their service to humanity, justice, freedom, civilization and progress. The British empire will continue, after this war, to have a leading place in the service of the world and of mankind.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): In my opening remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put what I consider the first thing first. When we realize that every member of this house has been spared to come back and serve here I believe it is our duty to express our thanks to the Supreme Being for having allowed us to carry on.

When I think of the speech from the throne I think of the judgment shown by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he was casting about for brilliant men to move and second the address. He came all the way across to this corner of the chamber, and I am sure we in this loyal corner feel greatly honoured that he should wander over here to select two brilliant minds for this task. I doubt if he could have found two hon. members in any part of the house who would have served better. Both hon. gentlemen are soldiers; both are honourable men; both have brilliant minds, and are men who think for themselves under all circumstances.

As I read and re-read the speech from the throne and then went back and re-read the Marsh report and the Beveridge report, together with the findings of Doctor James, I must say that in my judgment the speech from the throne is the cream of them all. It is the best thing I have seen; it holds the greatest promise of a reconstruction plan. It suits me immensely. I am one of those who demanded, as far as I could, a programme for reconstruction, and we have a right to be grateful to those who have given us this programme. Of course I know that we agree with it or disagree with it, according to the group in the house to which we belong. I appreciated the observations of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) who gave us a clear view of our duty as a dominion toward those who have been wronged and driven from their homes. He has told us our duty toward those refugees. I am not a bit particular whether the men, women and children are Jews or Gentiles, whether they are red, black or yellow. They are made in the image of their Creator, and they belong to the type of people for whom Christ died. I am sure we as a nation are not going to play the role of the priest and the Levite who walked by on the other side, and allow those who are in distress to suffer. I agree with the hon. member for Trinity when he says that we should do our best for those people. I say that 111 in one year is not enough. In the words of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) which he uses frequently; it is not good enough.

There are certain features of the speech from the throne which stand out, and which suit me very well. Family allowances have been subjected to some criticism. In my view this measure has been long overdue. When I think of the Prime Minister, denied the happiness of a family of six or eight or ten to welcome him home at night, and remember that he is helping to put this plan across, and that it is his suggestion for reconstruction, I am convinced that it shows the marks of a great mind. If I were an employer of labour and a man came to me for employment, telling me that he had a wife and nothing else, and if at the same time another man came, telling me that he had a wife and six children, I would think that the man with the children would do a bigger and a better job and would be more entitled to consideration than the one who had no children, and perhaps no home at all.

Another point which stands out in the speech from the throne is the housing plan. I do not know anything that would mean more employment for more people than would be the construction of buildings. Certainly those buildings are needed throughout Canada. We at the head of the lakes, with our abundance of timber which can be cut down and manufactured into lumber, are of the opinion that this housing programme would be a great boon to the Thunder Bay district.

Then, as I look ahead I can see the minister of reconstruction. Of course hon. members may imagine who I think would be the best qualified for that job. I can see him working with an industrial bank close to hand, for his own special use and, in my opinion, such an industrial bank would be a good thing.

Another matter which is of interest to the owner of a farm is the floor price for staple farm products. I have gone to farmers and bought eggs for as little as fifteen cents a dozen. They were glad to get that price. And when we think of farmers raising fowl, and think of all the care required in that operation, and then realize that they have had to sell their eggs for as little as ten cents or fifteen cents a dozen, we must hope that that may never happen again. The farmers are entitled to this new law.

I now come to a subject which is dear to me, namely that of labour. The new labour code has not yet been published, but it is my hope that it will contain a provision for compulsory bargaining. I know it would be better if it were not necessary to have the compulsory provision; but in my opinion such a provision is absolutely necessary for the good of production and of management, and is in the best interests of directors. Certainly it is in the interest of labour.

Then I should hope that under the new code labour would receive holidays with pay. When I see a man toiling twelve months in a year in a machine shop I am bound to conclude that he needs holidays with pay far more than the young man who spends perhaps only eight hours or seven and a half hours in an office. The office worker may work from 9 until 12 o'clock noon, and from 1.30 until 5.30 p.m. Or, let us consider the man who works in a mine. He works deep in the earth, away from the sunlight, and breathes different air. Do hon.

members not think he is more entitled to holidays with pay than even a member of parliament, no matter what position he occupies?

I shall reserve any criticism I may have to make until the new labour code is brought down. However, I should like to bring to the attention of those who are responsible the fact that I have received letters from secretaries of labour unions in which they have dealt with war-time wage control order P.C. 9384. These are the words of H. Rember, secretary for local 132:

> We the members of local 132 feel that war-time wages control order P.C. 9384 when put into effect would destroy the democratic right of workers to bargain collectively.

Also it is pointed out that this order would hurt labour at the present time. I believe the secretary makes a mistake when he says that hon. members should intercede on their behalf in the hope that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) may not permit this order to become effective. I do not think the minister has much to do with the order. He may know about it, but it is not his order—and I shall stand corrected if I am wrong. I do not think the Minister of Labour has fathered everything considered wrong by labour unions.

May I say that I know these unions, and the men in them. They are just as honest as we are. I stand side by side with them in striving to help them get the best possible returns for the energy they put into their work. I have not found them selfish. On the contrary they are straight, honest workers, and I would advise that reconsideration be given this order, and that something better be substituted.

Those who are making reforms might consider the use of the transferable vote. In a single constituency there may be four or five men, and perhaps one lady in a campaign. If there is no transferable vote the result would be that many people would not be represented at all, and for that reason I urge that those who are considering reforms might consider the adoption of the transferable vote.

There is another point I have in mind, one which I might not understand as clearly as I should. I find that the educational facilities in Canada cannot be embraced by certain types of people. There are young men and maidens in outlying districts who do not have the advantage of advanced education. In my view the federal government should put itself on record as being willing to cooperate with departments of education in the provinces to make it possible for these young people, who are keen to acquire education, to secure the degree of education they may desire.

I have a suggestion to offer to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). There should be an amendment to the Pension Act, and in this connection I should like to give one or two examples. I know of one man who enlisted in the air force. He was not there very long before he took what is commonly known as polio. He may not have got the attention he should have received, and to-day he finds himself a hopeless cripple for life. Because he was not long enough in the force he is not eligible for a pension. It is true that he received treatment, and I pay tribute to the doctors at the Deer Lodge hospital for the splendid treatment they gave him, but the fact is that he is not able to get further education without going back to school at the expense of his father and mother. The pension he was receiving has been reduced to $25 a month.

Another young man was in the navy when he was taken down with tuberculosis, perhaps partly owing to neglect. They did not think his case was as serious as it proved to be. He probably will be weakened for the rest of his life. These two men have not got what I consider is their due, and I bring their cases to the attention of the minister.

I join with others who have paid a tribute to the young men who have gone overseas, particularly to those who played hockey, rugby and basketball. I have always taken a keen interest in these games and some of these boys played under me. I receive letters from these boys in which they say, "We are just giving the enemy the same thing we tried to give the opposing team when you were in the sub box." Some of these young fellows will not come back, and others are having a terrific time, especially those on the corvettes on the high seas. But I do not think they are having a harder time than the fathers and mothers who receive word of loved ones who are missing and then the final news that they must be considered dead. I have been in many homes, and I consider it most courageous on the part of mothers and fathers who have lost loved ones when they go out and carry on and help others in the same difficult position.

I have my own way of looking at things just as other men have according to their occupations. I think this country is reaching a position for which it will pay dearly in the future. Sunday work is prevalent all over Canada. Some of us have struggled for the preservation of one day in seven, and I have no patience with any man, whether he be a member of parliament or otherwise, who will use the Sabbath for anything but rest and worship. One time I saw a picture depicting the theme that if you break the ten commandments, the ten commandments will break you. I think it was Gladstone who said, and I like to quote the grand-old man, that righteousness exalteth a nation but sin is a reproach to any people. He said that it was a sad day when we neglected our Sabbath day.

We hear a good deal to-day about juvenile delinquency. It is said that it is on the increase everywhere because there is so much money to spend. I have not my facts before me, but I am convinced by reports that juvenile delinquency in Fort William is not nearly as bad as it was during the depression. In those days I have seen as many as twenty boys in the police court at one time. During this last year there has been very little juvenile delinquency.

I do not know who is responsible for the king's honours, but I do commend the Prime Minister for being very sparing in recommending these honours. I think they should be given to our soldiers, and in this connection I should like to refer to one of the finest armies we have in Canada—the Salvation Army. They are always on the attack, not on the defence. They are on the attack against wrong, and those who are responsible for recommending the king's honours should consider some of these outstanding soldiers because they are doing a great job.

Those soldiers who come back from the front should take care to report to the representative of the department of pensions, the pensions advocate. Right here I should like to pay a tribute to the employment officials in the Canadian Car. I recall one case of a young fellow who had been dismissed from this company for bad conduct. He served with a tank corps in north Africa for some time and when he came back he wanted to get work with the Canadian Car. However, the superintendent of employment said that he did not want him. We then said to him, "Do you not think that a boy who has served in the tanks and has fought for your protection should be given some consideration; should you not be willing to forgive him a good deal?" He said, "We will forgive him and take him back." That is the sort of treatment the management of the Canadian Car in Fort William are giving to the returned men.

There are certain things that we need in Fort William, and there are certain suggestions I should like to make to the committee on reconstruction. The first is the necessity for the building up of the home. The home is the most important institution in the community. If you have a poor home, you have a poor community. Many of us have had the blessing of a good home; we have been trained to do the things that we should do—oftentimes we have wandered far—but we think a family altar should be built in every home. The committee on reconstruction should consider that.

I realize that men and women are needed for war work, but I do say that the place of a mother with children is not in the workshop where she is earning money; she should be at home building up character, making her boys and girls fit to go out and take their places as honourable Christian citizens.

As I say, there are certain things we need in Fort William. I am going to hurry up with my remarks because, if I do not finish now, I shall have to complete my speech when the budget is before us. The minister of pensions knows that at the present time the outstanding need of Fort William is an up-to-date hospital, not only for the old folks and the returned soldiers but for the city at large. The Department of National Defence took away our skating and hockey rink. We need an ice rink now. We need a new home for the army and navy veterans, and there are other public buildings that should be erected. I am going to present these claims to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and ask for money at a low rate of interest.

The shell factory in Fort William was closed down. The workers were greatly disappointed because they had been happy in their work. There had been a particularly fine type of management there. However, all those who wanted to go to work were offered positions with the Canadian Car and many of them took them. The work being carried out by the Canadian Car is very good. There are 6,052 people working there, 3,285 men and 1,875 women with a considerable office staff. The production of the Curtis dive bomber is now one a day which speaks well for Canadian Car and Foundry company, because they had many setbacks.

When we think of what we have in the district of Thunder Bay, which includes Port Arthur and Fort William, when we remember that one of the outstanding things with which we are confronted is that the haematite ore from Steep Rock will be coming down and will have to be shipped some place else, we believe that we should have a plant where that ore can be smelted and the product, after it has been refined, shipped out. It is all right to ship our pulp across the line; our United States friends can make use of it. But I do not agree that our iron ore should be shipped across the line; I think it should be handled at the head of the lakes where we have any amount of power and water and timber, as well as the workers who will be needed.

Regarding the needs of labour at the present time, I feel confident that we may leave the cause of the worker in the hands of the government, because it is not a matter for the Minister of Labour alone; it is the responsibility of the whole government.

I had a good deal more to say, but I have decided, in view of requests which have been made, to finish my speech when the budget is brought down. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your consideration.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, February 2, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the Honourable the Speaker and Messrs. Black (Yukon), Dupuis, Edwards, Farquhar, Furniss, Goulet, Howden, Jaques, Laflamme, Lafontaine, Macdonald (Brantford City), MacInnis, McGregor, McIvor, Mayhew, Pinard, Purdy, Rhéaume, Thauvette, Tucker and Tustin a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both houses on the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the Honourable the Speaker and Messrs. Adamson, Aylesworth, Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon), Bruce, Cardiff, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Castleden, Coldwell, Emmerson, Eudes, Factor, Farquhar, Fontaine, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont), Gershaw, Goulet, Graham, Green, Hansell, Henderson, Howden, Hurtubise, Jaques, Jean, Lizotte, Macdonald (Halifax), Mackenzie (Neepawa), Mackenzie (Lambton-Kent), Macmillan, Marier, Martin, Mayhew, Moore, Poirier, Pouliot, Purdy, Raymond, Reid, Rickard, Ross (St. Paul's), Thauvette, Warren, Winkler and Wood a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the library of parliament so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether or not it is within the purview of this committee's reference to inquire into the question of a national library for Canada? I realize that the wording of the reference indicates that it has to do with nothing more than simply the library of parliament. There has been quite an agitation in Canada and considerable pressure has been brought to bear for the establishment of a national library for Canada. I wonder if this committee, which has never been very busy in the past, might take this matter into consideration. It appears to have some importance in the mind of the public at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the question of a national library for Canada would properly come within the purview of this committee. The committee's functions are confined to matters relating immediately to parliament. That does not, however, preclude discussion on the question of a national library on some estimate or some appropriate occasion.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question? Has consideration been given recently to the appointment of a successor to the late Hon. Martin Burrell?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, consideration has been given to the filling of the vacancy mentioned, and I hope to be able to announce an appointment before very long.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the members of the standing committee on printing, viz,—Messrs. Bertrand (Terrebonne), Bonnier, Bourget, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Castleden, Chambers, Chevrier, Corman, Crète, d'Anjou, Denis, Dubois, Dupuis, Durocher, Edwards, Emmerson, Esling, Evans, Fauteux, Ferland, Fraser (Peterborough West), Furniss, Gillis, Goulet, Grant, Green, Healy, Hlynka, Hoblitzell, Hurtubise, Kuhl, Leader, MacDiarmid, MacKinnon (Kootenay East), MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria), McGregor, McNevin (Victoria, Ont.), Mills, Moore, Mulock, Purdy, Rhéaume, Ross (St. Paul's), Sinclair, Sissons, Soper, Tripp, Tucker, Tustin, Weir, White, Whitman, Winkler and Wood will act as members on the part of this house, on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

POWER TO CONDUCT SALE OPERATIONS WITHOUT PAYING COMMISSIONS TO AGENTS

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 3, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Mr. GRAYDON: Might we have an explanation?

Mr. FAIR: Under the present act the board is compelled to use the services of the selling agencies now established. I believe better work can be done in other ways, and for that reason the bill provides that no commissions shall be paid to these agencies but that the Canadian wheat board shall set up its own selling agencies.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION AND WORK OF SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to make an observation and, founded upon that observation, to ask the Prime Minister one or two questions with regard to the session, if Your Honour and the house will permit me to do so. It appears likely that this year the debate on the address will be less extended than it has been in previous sessions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I hope so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have expressed that hope also. This is not the first time the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and I have hoped for the same thing, though sometimes we have differed when it came to realizing our hopes. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I believe if that were to happen it would meet the wishes of the public, which I am sure the house desires to do. The country wants us to conduct its business with efficiency and dispatch, and I hope that the example we may set in this debate will be followed throughout the session. The duty of the opposition, as you know, sir, is to scrutinize and criticize legislation and to audit the expenditures. I do not think this house should be made a sounding board for political programmes and party plans, and all that sort of thing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: I noticed that most of that response came from the section to my left which is more accustomed to do that very thing. However, I should like to say that so far as the Progressive Conservative party is concerned we are trying to organize to do a job, in connection with our house activities, that will be acceptable to this house and to the country. The tempo of the whole session of course is set largely by the government, and for that reason I am asking the Prime Minister to bring down at an early day the legislation envisaged in the speech from the throne. The rules of the house will permit that to be done, as a result of the reservations contained in the motion adopted on the opening day of the session giving right of way to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I hope the Prime Minister will see to it that this legislation is brought down, if possible this week. There is no reason why legislation which is envisaged in the speech from the throne should not be ready, and if it is, I would ask the Prime Minister to bring it down. I would ask also that all committees be set up this week, if possible. It does not take very long to introduce bills or set up committees, and that work should be undertaken at once.

I have given the Prime Minister notice of these questions, and I should like to ask something else. I presume that when the debate on the address has been concluded we shall take up the war appropriation resolution. Last year we had the budget first, but this time no doubt the war appropriation resolution will come ahead of the budget. I should like to inquire of the ministry whether, when that resolution is brought down, they intend to pursue the course that was followed last year; that is, if they intend to consider it department by department. I think that worked out well last year, with one exception; and therefore the details of all the items coming under that resolution should be brought down before we attempt to deal with the resolution itself, as was done last year. Then I should like to ask the Prime Minister at what stage of the session the government intends to bring down the budget, and also what legislation the government has in mind other than that mentioned in the speech from the throne. All this has a general bearing upon the whole scheme of our parliamentary system. I should like to know also whether, when the Prime Minister goes to the conference of commonwealth prime ministers, it is his intention to ask for an adjournment of the house while he is away.

I am asking these questions only with the idea of trying to formulate, earlier in the session than we have done before, some plan by which the work may be facilitated and the session shortened, because there seems to be a tremendous volume of work ahead of us and I believe we should plan carefully in order to take care of it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say that I am in complete accord with my hon. friend in his desire to have the business of the session conducted as rapidly and efficiently as possible. He may be sure that the government will make every effort in that direction. I regret that I have not the vision of a prophet or a seer and therefore am unable to give my hon. friend direct assurances with respect to all that is going to happen in the course of the session. I shall indicate to him in general terms the course which the government intends to follow, though naturally how the session proceeds will depend, among other things, upon circumstances beyond the control of parliment, to begin with, and, within parliament itself, certainly beyond the control of the government. However, it is gratifying to realize that hon. members of all parties appear to share the hope of the government that the debate on the address will not be prolonged unduly. I have no desire in any way to curtail the right or privilege of any hon. member to speak in any debate, but I do believe that in previous years the debate on the address frequently has run on much too long. Last year it continued for a month or more, and I believe the public deprecated the length of time it took the House of Commons to conclude that debate. If there is general agreement in the view that the address should be voted in short order, I can assure my hon. friend that other legislation is ready now to be taken up immediately the debate is concluded.

As to the general business, if hon. members will look at the speech from the throne they will see that it falls naturally into three parts. The first part refers to the war and the importance of war measures receiving consideration ahead of all others. There can be nothing as important as the winning of the war and making every necessary provision toward that end at as early a date as possible. Then follow the measures that relate to the period of transition between the close of the war and the establishment of peace. The fact that the speech from the throne dwells at some length on these measures, and on others, must not be taken as an indication that the government entertains any belief that the war is going to end suddenly, or soon. The contrary, as I said the other day, is the view of the administration. I believe the war will last much longer than most of us have assumed it would.

However, it is part of the government's obligation to anticipate, so far as possible, situations which may arise in any eventuality. And for that reason we have had already to take carefully into consideration, as did committees of the house at the last session, those situations which will arise once the war is at an end. The first of the new situations would be that arising from the conditions in devastated areas in Europe, conditions in countries which have suffered, and which will experience need of assistance from the united nations, in order that their peoples may be enabled to reestablish themselves.

Simultaneously there will also be the most important work of the demobilization of our own forces, and making provision for their reestablishment in orderly fashion. Certain measures will be necessary in that connection. I might describe these measures as illustrative of what is related to the transitional period.

Then, following that, measures by way of reforms will be required, if the new era is to be an improvement on the old one—and we certainly hope and expect it will be. Many measures of social reform will have to be carefully considered. But they cannot be considered by this House of Commons alone because, as hon. members well know, under our constitution certain obligations are assigned to the federal government, and others to the provincial governments. Close cooperation will be required between provincial and dominion authorities if we are to bring into being a nation-wide programme of social security and human well-being.

I do not wish to discuss a matter which might be the subject of debate, but may I point out that in his amendment my hon. friend opposite has stressed the importance of the dominion in its social and fiscal measures not invading the jurisdiction of the provinces. When my hon. friend, the leader of the C.C.F., was speaking in the debate he said the speech from the throne indicated a first-rate example of passing the buck from the dominion to the provinces. I leave hon. members to judge for themselves as to just in what position the government is placed when dealing with these matters. I, myself, cannot find any sure path to follow, other than that laid down in the constitution of our country as a guide, and what in the way of cooperation will, we hope, be the attitude of all governments in Canada at this time in seeking to meet situations which will lie ahead of us all.

So, speaking broadly, we find the legislation for this session divided into those three fields, namely that which relates immediately to the prosecution of the war, that which relates to the transitional period, and that relating to social problems which will also follow immediately after the war ends, and in larger measure as we enter the period of peace. The government will seek to introduce its legislation, broadly, on those lines.

The measures we wish to take up first of all are those related to the prosecution of the war. Then, as I have said, we will proceed to those matters arising immediately from the war and in the post-war period, and other measures will follow in due course. I am not laying down a hard and fast line. As hon. members know, there are some subjects, the discussion of which will take a longer time than others. There are some we may wish to discuss immediately, and then allow some time to intervene before renewing discussion on them. There are always miscellaneous measures. They will be interspersed. The government will have to judge in respect of those matters what it thinks will best serve to meet the general need. Broadly, however, I have outlined the position.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked if we can have all these measures introduced this week. I do not think he is serious when he prefers a request of that kind. No administration has ever brought down its whole programme within the first five days of the session—unless it was intended that the session should last about that length of time.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not the only reason.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, we will keep the house plentifully supplied with legislation, and if hon. members feel they have not had the time necessary to consider certain legislation before debate is opened in the house, they have only to ask that they be given a little time, and it will be afforded. That is what we seek to do. We do not wish to congest the order paper with a large number of measures, but rather it is our desire to bring before the house in an orderly fashion and in accordance with the plans I have indicated first of all the measures which are the most pressing.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course, the introduction of bills does not congest the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has his responsibility with respect to the introduction of bills, and I have mine. I should not wish to see measures brought down at other than what I regard as the most appropriate time. The government must be the judge of that.

The next query raised by the leader of the opposition was as to whether we can have all committees appointed this week. May I say to him that that depends on him much more than on me. It depends on other hon. members and other parties in the house rather than on the government. The complaint has been made that last year a long time elapsed before some of these committees were established. I shall not at this time go over the reasons for that, but I would point out in passing that one of the reasons was that, time and again, when we hoped to be able to proceed with a motion related to the appointment of some committee, we were prevented from so doing by a motion from the other side of the house, occasioning at different times debate which ran on for some days, and the opportunity to get committees appointed was precluded from day to day and often from week to week.

Then there was a further fact—and this is important—namely, that there was a desire on the part of some hon. members to start debates on the several motions to establish committees. On one or two occasions I was asked to please hold over my motion to constitute a committee—the committee on war expenditures was one—because it was the desire of certain hon. members to have a debate upon the motion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course the Prime Minister knows why that was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have forgotten it—if I ever did know.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, I can tell him, if he wishes to know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am no longer interested as it belongs to the past; but what I wish to say now is that if hon. members are prepared to allow these committees to be constituted without debate, and that is the position they will take with respect to each committee as its appointment is proposed, I would undertake to say that practically all committees will be established this week. As hon. members will have seen, notice appears in Votes and Proceedings of motions for most of committees that remain to be constituted. If it is the wish of the house—and it would be very helpful in every way if such proved to be so—I believe those committees could be established at once. If there could be an understanding that there would be no debate—no lengthy debate—on the establishment of the committees, I am sure we could forward them in such fashion that practically all standing and select committees would be established this week.

My hon. friend asked if it was the plan of the government to go on with the war appropriation measure, immediately after the conclusion of the debate on the address. That is the intention. As soon as the debate on the address is concluded the war appropriation resolution, now appearing on the order paper, will be the first item for the consideration of the house, with the possible exception of some routine motion or motion respecting the appointment of further committees. The bill based upon the resolution is ready to be introduced, and it is the intention with respect to the discussion on the bill to follow the same order of procedure as was adopted last year. That is to say, the estimates with respect to the war appropriation resolution will be broken down, as before, and the debate will proceed on the different branches of the service, taking one service at a time.

My hon. friend asked me at what stage of the session the budget would be brought down. I cannot answer that question offhand because that will depend upon how much time is taken up with the other war measures which will be brought forward in succession. Following the war appropriation measure, without a very long delay, there will be brought down a measure with respect to mutual aid. This year this measure will relate to aid in the nature of relief to countries in Europe as well as to war supplies. I would hope that both of these important war measures might be disposed of before the budget is brought down.

In referring to these matters I think I ought to stress the tremendous load that necessarily falls upon the shoulders of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Most of the measures of defence in a time of war are financial in character and the Minister of Finance will have a heavy load to carry in bringing forward these measures one after another. But he tells me that he feels he is equal to it. If the house will, as it has done before, cooperate with him I think we can have these measures brought along fairly soon.

There are also the estimates. They will be ready and tabled shortly. The government hopes to get on with the estimates a little more rapidly this year than has been the case in previous years. It is an open question as to whether more progress is made in the end by having one particular measure discussed at considerable length until it is completed or to break up the discussion and take on other measures in the interim. I am inclined to believe that perhaps it is better not to stick too closely to any one measure through every day in the week but rather to vary the programme in some particulars, while holding in the main to getting through a particular measure. We should I think introduce other bills, some of which may be of minor importance, and have discussions on different subjects so that the discussion on a particular measure may not become too monotonous. The estimates can be taken up on one or more days in the week and we shall hope to begin with them at an early stage of the session.

The leader of the opposition has asked me what legislation the government intends to introduce other than that mentioned in the speech from the throne. I cannot indicate to him at the moment what further legislation there will be. There is one bill with respect to the disposal of obsolete war materials which will be brought forward and there are other measures I cannot recall at the moment. There may arise a number of measures in the course of the session. At this moment I am not in position to tell my hon. friend what they will be. The speech from the throne does not usually make mention of all intended legislation.

I have been asked whether it is the intention to adjourn parliament while I attend the conference of commonwealth prime ministers. Here again I cannot speak with any degree of certainty because I do not know when this conference will take place. It is likely to be some short time hence, but whether it would be advisable to adjourn will depend, first of all, on the time at which the meeting takes place and, next, on the progress that meanwhile has been made with the different war measures.

I should point out to the house that before very long the government hopes to have a conference between the dominion and the provinces. The government has been ready ever since the last conference with the provinces to have another dominion-provincial conference and we have reason to believe that the provinces now are ready and willing, some of them I understand quite anxious to meet with the federal government in conference to discuss some of the social problems and financial questions that they along with ourselves have had necessarily to consider. It may be that an adjournment would be advisable in connection with a conference of the kind. It might be possible to arrange to have it take place at the time the meeting of prime ministers is taking place in London. However, I cannot say as to that at the moment or whether it will be necessary or advisable to have an adjournment at the time. I do say, however, that the fact that we are faced with the possibility of an adjournment gives an additional reason why this house should in the interval seek to make all the progress it possibly can with the war measures.

The last question my hon. friend asked was whether there were any other general sessional plans which the Prime Minister would care to disclose to the house. I have not any in in mind at the moment. If any should develop I shall be glad to acquaint my hon. friend with them.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members wish to expedite the business of the house. During the past several sessions, however, there have been no private members' days, and opportunities are few for private members to bring forward the ideas that their constituents often wish them to bring forward. To my mind the debate on the speech from the throne offers an opportunity which is now seized by hon. members for that purpose.

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) could expedite the business of the house if he would say whether it is the intention to move the various committee reports that were tabled on the last day of the last session. If it is not, then I shall object most strenuously to the suggestion that all the committees be set up this week. With regard to radio and war expenditures particularly I am certain that some discussion should be undertaken in this house. If we have the assurance that the reports are to be moved, then perhaps there would not be any need to enter into a debate when we are setting up the committees. But if we have not that assurance, members will naturally seize the opportunity—I know I myself intend to do so—when we are setting up the committees to discuss matters concerning radio and war expenditures. Other members may have other reports in their own minds.

As for this house being a sounding board, I take it that this democratic institution affords the right to every member of parliament to bring forward matters which he considers of interest to his constituents and to the country. Therefore I object strenuously to any suggestion that the house is being used improperly as a sounding board.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was just cautioning my hon. friend against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I may answer the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, my impression is that reports made at any session must be dealt with at that particular session. It would require the unanimous consent of the house or the adoption of a special resolution to permit of discussion at this time of reports made at a previous session. I am not therefore in a position to give my hon. friend an assurance.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO PAYMENT OF LOST PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There has been some reference in the press to the possibility of the early payment of participation certificates which have been issued from 1939 to date. Many thousands of these participation certificates have been mislaid by farmers and I should like to have a statement from the minister as to the position of a farmer who had lost participation certificates.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for Lake Centre for asking this question. This matter has been dealt with by the wheat board. That board has duplicates of all participation certificates, and whether they are lost or not, payments will be made. Those who have lost or mislaid their certificates may have to wait a little longer for payment, but they will be paid eventually.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How soon are payments likely to be made?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Payments on the 1940 participation certificates will be started in March. Payments on the 1941 and 1942 crops will be made immediately after completion of the 1940 payments. May I add, in reply to the question just asked, that I am occasionally asked as to the amounts of the payments. It is impossible to say yet what the amount of the payments will be, but they will be announced as soon as possible.

I am also asked as to payments on the 1943 crop. That crop is now only in course of sale and delivery and it is impossible to give any information with respect to it.

The wheat board have had a tremendous accounting problem not only in connection with their ordinary activities but in taking over all the wheat in Canada. They are just as anxious as we are that these payments be made at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to ask a supplementary question. The wheat board took over the wheat at the closing price on a set date at $1.23¼. The board has been disposing of the crop at the market price, which, judging by the United States price would be between $1.50 and $1.60. What becomes of the difference in price?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That will all enter into the participation certificates when the 1943 crop is being closed up.

[Later:]

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister indicated that he was prepared to answer my question. He has not given an answer yet; I wonder if we may have it now.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I was under the impression that the hon. member was referring to the 1943 crop.

Mr. WRIGHT: I was referring to the 1940, 1941 and 1942 crops, not to 1943.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The answer I gave was appropriate to the 1943 crop. I am quite ready to give the answer, and I would have given it had I understood the hon. member properly. When the government decided to pay the wheat grower $1.25 a bushel instead of 90 cents as an advance on the 1943-44 and 1944-45 crops it was understood and announced that all the unsold wheat in the wheat board's hands would be taken over at $1.23¼ a bushel. The 1940-41, 1941-42 and 1942-43 crops were closed out in full on this basis.

ALLOTMENT OF RAILWAY CARS FOR DELIVERIES OF 1943 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I wish to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce another question. There are areas in Saskatchewan, and particularly in Alberta, where farmers have been unable to deliver practically any part of the 1943 crop because of the control of the allotment of cars. That has caused considerable hardship and injustice. Will the minister give the house the assurance that this inequitable allotment of cars will be rectified, and tell us when we may expect effective action?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Yorkton telephoned my office just before three o'clock and said that he intended to ask this question. I do not think the situation is quite as bad as his language would indicate, but undoubtedly transportation difficulties have prevented some producers from delivering as much grain as they wished to sell. The trouble is largely caused by transportation and because of the necessity last fall of getting to eastern Canada and to the head of the lakes for export large quantities of grain. If the hon. member will let me know to what particular points he refers, I shall be glad to have the wheat board check the situation.

I would point out that in the province of Saskatchewan there are 1,128 shipping points. Only four of these are on a three-bushel quota to-day; sixty-four are on a five-bushel quota; 180 are on a seven-bushel quota, and the remaining 880, or 78 per cent, are on a ten- or fourteen-bushel quota.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It does not matter what the quotas are; they cannot deliver.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The deliveries are very close to the quotas except in particular spots, and these are receiving the attention of the wheat board.

VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

PROCEDURE UNDER AMENDED REGULATIONS—PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Yesterday, the minister tabled an order in council providing, under certain circumstances, for increases in amounts paid to veterans under the War Veterans' Allowance Act, and also for certain increases to widows of veterans. I should like to ask the minister this question: Will it be necessary for veterans and widows who are entitled to these increases to make application for them, or will all such cases be reviewed automatically?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): They will be reviewed automatically, and arrangements to that effect went into operation this morning.

LIVE STOCK

NEW ARRANGEMENTS WITH REGARD TO SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS BY QUEBEC FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, although I know, as the Prime Minister says, that he is a very busy man. I asked the minister a question on Monday last in regard to the slaughtering of animals by farmers in Quebec, and their being permitted to sell the carcass without a permit. I asked whether Ontario farmers and farmers in other provinces would have the same privilege.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will give an answer to that now.

Briefly, the new arrangements may be described as follows. The wartime prices and trade board will issue slaughtering permits to local farmers' organizations in the province of Quebec, giving farmers who have registered with the local organization the right to slaughter their own live stock and to sell the resultant meat. The local farmers' organization will be responsible for the distribution and proper use of meat stamping equipment, for the completion of a monthly report by each registered farmer of slaughterings in relation to coupons collected, and for the preparation of a monthly consolidated report by the secretary of the local organization of total slaughterings by all registered farmers in relation to coupons collected.

These arrangements were recommended by and have the approval of the Quebec Department of Agriculture, whose field officials will cooperate with officials of the wartime prices and trade board.

The wartime prices and trade board is hopeful that the plan, which is not yet fully developed, will facilitate the slaughtering of live stock by individual farmers. As hon. members know, farm slaughtering has been almost universal in the province of Quebec, and it was particularly desirable to work out some method of issuing permits which would not interfere too greatly with established practice, while retaining the degree of control essential to the proper functioning of meat rationing. If the plan proves to be successful in the province of Quebec, the board will be prepared to extend the same arrangements to other areas in other provinces where similar conditions exist.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT AS TO LAY-OFF AT TORONTO SHIPBUILDING YARDS—PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) asked a question regarding a reported lay-off by the Toronto Shipbuilding company. He wished to know what procedure was adopted in such cases, with special reference to returned soldiers.

The determination of lay-off procedure is the responsibility of national selective service, and since the question has been raised I should like to advise the house of the procedure which has been worked out as between national selective service, the Department of Munitions and Supply, and war contractors. With the consent of the house I will do this by placing on Hansard the following documents, which are self-explanatory:

1. Circular of the Department of Labour, Employment Service and Unemployment Insurance branch, dealing with lay-offs in war and related industries.

2. Circular issued by the Director of National Service with respect to lay-offs.

3. Letter and circular signed by the deputy minister of the Department of Munitions and Supply which has been sent to all prime contractors to the Department of Munitions and Supply.

4. Circular letter from the Acting Coordinator of Production of the Department of Munitions and Supply to all directors-general of production branches, heads of divisions and presidents of government-owned crown companies, setting out the procedure which is to be followed in any changes involving stopping of production, reducing the rate of production or cancellation of orders.

The contents of these circulars will answer the question of my hon. friend and any other questions of this kind which may be asked during the session.

The procedure outlined affects lay-offs where the number of employees involved is in excess of fifty. The Department of Munitions and Supply does not ordinarily receive advice of any lay-off involving less than fifty persons.

In the case to which my hon. friend refers, I am advised that fifteen carpenters were given notice on Thursday, January 27. These men are no longer required because the specifications of the furniture and fittings on the particular vessel on which they were working have been changed from wood to steel.

I now table the documents:

National Selective Service Circular
No. 317

Subject: Lay-offs:—War and Related Industries

1. This circular supersedes and cancels rulings and procedures Number E 10, dated January 23, 1943, and E 10A, dated March 31, 1943.

2. The procedure outlined below will apply to all lay-offs, involving 50 or more persons, and due to the curtailing, cancelling or completing of orders for war and related materials but will not apply where the lay-off is due to seasonal curtailment of civilian goods or services. Where less than 50 persons are involved the procedure outlined below will apply but notices and reports will not be required.

3. Notifications of lay-offs will come from various sources, and generally head office will notify the regional office, which in turn, will notify the local office of the lay-off. On occasion, regional offices or local offices will be the first to receive a notice of lay-off; in these cases they will immediately notify the other offices; for instance, a local office hearing of a lay-off will advise its regional office, which, in turn, will notify head office, or if the regional office first hears of a lay-off, it will notify head office and the local office.

4. When a lay-off is notified to a local office by a regional office, the latter office will issue instructions on the handling of the lay-off and advise whether a regional officer will advise on arrangements or whether the lay-off will be the sole responsibility of the local office. If a local office first hears of a lay-off it can assume that the lay-off will be its sole responsibility if the number of persons involved is less than 50 and it will immediately contact the employer and make the necessary arrangements, notifying the regional office by mail. If the lay-off involves 50 or more persons the local office will communicate with the regional office by wire or telephone and the regional office will then decide whether it will be necessary to send a regional representative to advise on the handling of the lay-off, or whether this should be handled by the local office. The regional office will immediately notify the local office of its decision and issue any necessary instructions.

5. It should be borne in mind that practically all lay-offs will be in industries covered by NSS Circular 282—A and B Labour Priority Industry—"Freeze" of employment, and consequently no person can be dismissed without the written permission of a selective service officer. This means that no lay-off can take place without the authorization of a selective service officer and further no lay-off is to be authorized until the procedures outlined below are carried out.

6. The officer detailed to communicate with the employer concerned will arrange for an orderly lay-off in the light of the general manpower situation at the particular time. He must courteously point out to the employer that we are definitely interested in who is, or who is not, to be laid off. It is not our intention that the least desirable or least efficient workers will be those to be laid off, but rather, first, those persons available for the army, and, second, other persons who can be moved to the advantage of, or with the least disturbance to the general labour situation. The demands for the army are continuing demands, and must have a definite priority, unless the persons available have exceptional skills which are greatly in demand by high priority industry, for example, tool makers, journeymen machinists, journeymen electricians, etc., should be transferred rather than be called up. The whole situation should be explained to the employer tactfully.

7. In order to obtain men for the army the following procedures will be used:—

(a) Where an Industrial Mobilization Survey has been completed the regional employment officer will direct an officer (preferably an investigator who has worked on the survey) to contact the employer, supplying him with a copy of the industrial mobilization survey plan, and the necessary subsidiary documents including Form NSS (M) 2—job description—for each man listed in the survey. He will then be in a position to discuss the status of each employee on deferment. He should advise the employer that up to the number involved in the lay-off, all men on deferment according to the survey, will be called by the registrar, unless there are very good reasons for not having particular men called. He should further advise the employer that, due to the reduction in production, there will probably be available some skilled men who were previously deemed to be very essential, but who could now be released. After carefully explaining the whole situation he should then go over the survey marking "A" against each man who can be called by the army (men over 38 years of age should not be included) and "T" against the name of each man available for transfer. Where a man is considered to be a key-man, the reasons for this consideration should be noted on the survey. If the number of available men on deferment is in excess of the number to be laid off, the employer will be advised that those who are shown to be replaceable in the shorter periods will be called first and these men will be indicated on the survey. The employer will then be advised that those men will be called for army service, or for transfers and must be given notices of separation. It should be mentioned that a percentage of the men who are on deferment and who will be called by the military authorities, will not be accepted by them and may later be available for reemployment. If such men return to employment additional men on deferment, if available, must be given notices of separation. This procedure will in many cases look after an entire lay-off, but if the lay-off involves more people than can be taken care of in this manner the procedure outlined in paragraph 10 is to be followed.

(b) Where no industrial mobilization survey has been made the officer on his first contact with the employer will request a list of all persons presently on deferment employed in the establishment, and a further list after the first one has been prepared of all other male persons in the designated age groups. These lists should be made up on form NSS (M) 1—industrial mobilization survey and will be supplied by the officer and should contain all necessary information for the registrar to make calls. A similar procedure to that mentioned in (a) above will be followed for the first list, and an endeavour will be made to get as many men as possible for the army, and for transfer.

8. The surveys and lists mentioned in paragraph 7 above will be sent immediately on completion to the chairman of the mobilization survey committee, in whose military district the lay-off occurs, for approval and submission to the divisional registrar. The registrar will thus be advised of the men available for the army and for transfer to high priority industry and will arrange to call up men and approve transfers. Transfers will be approved provisionally but local offices must mail to the registrar, a completed form 144-A—notice to divisional registrar (section C applies), marked "lay-off" in the upper right hand corner, for each individual who is transferred. The lists of men in the designated age groups but not on deferment will be supplied to the registrar by the chairman of the mobilization survey committee to assist in checking delinquents.

9. When men on deferment are laid off and the registrar so notified, the local office must acquaint all placement officers who will be dealing with these men with this information. Men who have received, or will shortly receive their order—military training should only be referred to jobs of short duration and should not be referred to jobs of a permanent nature. If it is decided by the registrar that certain men will not be called, the local office will be so notified. Men who fail to pass the final medical examination, will be handled in the usual manner at the army reception centres.

10. Where persons in addition to those on deferment are to be laid off, they should generally be laid off in the following order, subject, of course, to seniority rights where plants are covered by collective bargaining agreements, or subject to the conditions of any other employer-labour contracts:

(a) Workers with previous agricultural experience, particularly dairy farm or stock raising. These persons will be directed, if possible, to year-round farm jobs;

(b) Workers who are needed in other essential industries in the same vicinity;

(c) Workers who are required by outside essential industries, and may be moved;

(d) Younger workers without family obligations (workers in this group are more adaptable, and are generally more easily moved).

(e) Married women, if their husbands are supporting them.

(f) Older men and women, if the foregoing classes have been exhausted.

It should be noted that generally women should not be laid off as long as they can replace men. Local situations may, however, alter this general rule, and discretion must be exercised.

11. Employers should be requested to prepare nominal rolls on forms NSS 240A and 240B lay-off report—nominal roll, in triplicate covering all persons to be laid off. Samples of these forms are attached, and will be supplied by the regional office to local offices as required. When this nominal roll is completed by the employer, one copy will be left with him and the other copies will be used by the local office as the basic record for the lay-off. Complete instructions as to its use are on the back of the form.

12. When persons are interviewed, forms U.I.C. 701 will be given the number shown on the lay-off report, nominal roll, for purposes of identification, and the name of the firm will be noted prominently on the 701. 701's for each separate lay-off will be kept in a separate file until final disposal of the applicant is made. If disposal of any person has not been made during the period of three weeks from the date of separation, the situation at that time will be considered to be final, and will be shown under the appropriate heading, and the 701 placed in the regular files. In other words, final disposition of all persons from lay-offs must be made in three weeks from the date of their separation. Otherwise, for record purposes, they are treated as ordinary applicants.

13. Additional reports form NSS 240D, lay-off summary report, and form NSS 240C, lay-off summary weekly report, as per samples attached, will be prepared from the lay-off report—nominal roll. Form NSS 240D will be completed at the close of the week following the week during which the first separation took place. Form NSS 240C will be completed for each subsequent week and will give the cumulative or to date totals for the lay-off. The final report, marked "final" in red ink, will be the report for the third week after the week of the last separation. This will allow sufficient time to record the disposition of the persons laid off and will not unduly prolong the period for which reports are required. These reports will be made in quadruplicate; two copies for head office, employment service division (one of these will be forwarded to the Department of Munitions and Supply). One copy for the regional office and one copy for local office files.

14. The regional employment officer shall notify the regional insurance officer of any probable lay-off of fifty or more employees, unless the persons to be laid off can be placed immediately in other employment.

15. Wherever possible, arrangements should be made to interview the workers who are to be laid off during the period covered by the notice of separation, and at the plant. Direct referrals to new jobs will be made when possible, and the required permits issued. By interviewing at the plant, it is believed that situations will be handled in a much more orderly manner, that crowding and congestion at our offices will be avoided and that the workers and the companies involved will appreciate our efforts to offer new employment with as little lost time and inconvenience as possible.

16. Lay-offs are difficult situations from every point of view, and all officers are cautioned to use courtesy, tact, and diplomacy in dealing with all parties concerned.

17. This circular is effective January 3, 1944, and all lay-offs on and after that date must be handled as outlined above.

18. Form NSS 240-0, lay-off summary report—must also be completed, insofar as it is possible for all lay-offs which have taken place in the period from November 1, 1943, to December 31, 1943. Where a lay-off is in progress at December 31, 1943, a report will be submitted as above, and then the procedures outlined in this circular will be followed insofar as it is possible.

Information for War Contractors in Connection with "Lay-offs"

You are no doubt already aware that essential changes in Canada's war production programme necessitate certain "lay-offs". National Selective Service is most anxious in such cases to reassign employees promptly and with the least inconvenience to all concerned.

Definite instructions have been given to all offices of National Selective Service to cooperate fully with employers and to follow the procedure which is briefly outlined herein.

As you know, your establishment has been classified as a "designated establishment" under National Selective Service Civilian Regulations and consequently you may not terminate the employment of any male employee without the permission in writing of a selective service officer. Therefore, the closest possible cooperation will be necessary in working out arrangements between yourselves and the local employment and selective service office.

Before giving any general or individual notice you are therefore required to discuss the matter with the manager of your nearest employment and selective service office. He will be ready to render immediate assistance in working out the details of the "lay-off".

The procedure to be followed in reassigning labour due to "lay-offs" will be as follows:

1. Owing to the needs of the army for a large number of men each month, the first step must be to release those men suitable for the armed forces. If an industrial mobilization survey has been completed for your establishment a representative of selective service will provide you with a copy of the survey plan and discuss with you the status of each employee on deferment with a view to making arrangements with the divisional registrar to call up such men for military training, unless there is very good reason why such men should not be called at this time. If no industrial mobilization survey has been made, you will be asked by the national selective service officer to provide a list of all persons in your employ presently on deferment, also a list showing all other male employees within the age groups and of the marital status designated under mobilization regulations.

2. The next step to be taken should be to reduce working hours to 48 hours per week, or to the normal working hours per week for the industry if less than 48.

3. Where it is necessary to lay off persons in addition to those on deferment, it is the intention that they should be laid off generally in the following order, subject of course to seniority rights where an establishment is covered by a collective bargaining agreement, or subject to the conditions of any other employer-employee contract:

(a) Workers with agricultural experience, particularly in dairy farming or stock raising.

(b) Workers whose services could be utilized in other essential industries in the vicinity of your establishment.

(c) Workers whose services could be utilized by outside essential industries and who could be moved to such.

(d) Younger workers without family obligations.

(e) Married women if their husbands are supporting them.

(f) Older men and women if the foregoing classes have been exhausted.

4. Wherever possible arrangements will be made to have national selective service officers interview at the plant the workers who are to be laid off and direct referrals to new jobs will be made when possible. This will enable national selective service to handle the situation in a more orderly manner and to offer new employment with as little lost time and inconvenience as possible.

Your cooperation in assisting our officers in dealing with this difficult situation will be much appreciated.

Re: Procedure by prime contractors when instructions are received to stop production, to reduce the rate of production of stores or to cancel certain outstanding orders.

The pattern of this war is constantly changing and the demands made on this department and on Canadian contractors will likewise change.

These changed demands will necessitate the issuance, from time to time, of instructions to curtail production on certain stores and to stop production entirely on others. Some lay-offs of labour will doubtless result from such instructions.

If and when such an event occurs, prime contractors are called upon to take certain steps which are outlined in the attached memorandum from the Director of National Selective Service, and in my letter of instruction, also attached.

The careful observance of these instructions will enable the government to make full use of the machinery which it has set up to ensure that Canada makes the best use of all available manpower.

This communication is not to be regarded as an indication that we think the war is over. It is to be looked upon purely as a preparation for changes in war demands. Such changes and the cancellations and adjustments which follow them are a part of the business of waging war—not a sign that the war is over.

Will you please acknowledge receipt of these instructions.

G. K. Sheils,
Deputy Minister.

Deputy Minister

Munitions and Supply
Ottawa, Canada

To Prime Contractors to the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Re: Pre-layoff procedure to be adopted by contractors to this department, immediately definite instructions are received either to stop production or to reduce production rates, or when outstanding orders are reduced—if any of the above acts will result in an immediate or subsequent layoff of labour.

When any one of the above conditions occurs you are requested to take the following action:

(a) Communicate immediately with the local selective service officer as no lay-off may take place without that officer's consent,

(b) Supply the selective service officer with the names and addresses of all sub-contractors affected by the production change,

(c) Advise the above noted sub-contractors and suppliers and request them to communicate with their local selective service officer if lay-offs are to occur,

(d) Consult with your labour-management committee or the plant representatives of your employees before notices of separation are given and advise them, as far as is consistent with security, of the reasons for the production change and ask them to inform the other employees.

Please note that, except in so far as necessary to carry out the above instructions, any and all advices regarding production changes are confidential as between this Department and your company.

No publicity must therefore be given to the said instructions or advices without the specific knowledge and consent of the department. If, in your opinion, some publicity is desirable and would be in the public interest, you will please submit your detailed proposals with respect thereto to the director general of the publicity branch of the department who will discuss the same with all parties concerned, including the censors, and will advise you if and when and to what extent these proposals are approved. If the matter should appear to you to be urgent, the publicity branch may be consulted by telephone or telegraph.

When a contract is about to run out and no renewal appears to be likely and such completion of contract will result in labour being laid off in the near future, it is requested that you give your local selective service officer ample notice of the said lay-off to enable him to make his necessary arrangements, also that you advise the sub-contractors and suppliers concerned and request them to communicate with their local selective service officer as contemplated in paragraph (c) above.

Will you please acknowledge receipt of these instructions.

G. K. Sheils,
Deputy Minister.

Department of Munitions and Supply

To: Directors-General of Production Branches, Heads of Division,
Presidents of Govt. Owned Companies.

Superseding C.P. 8

From: Acting Co-ordinator of Production.

February 1, 1944.

Re: Labour

Procedure for Production Branches and Producing Crown Companies prior to issuing official instructions involving stopping production, reducing the rate of production or cancelling orders.

The Department of Munitions and Supply is responsible for giving National Selective Service advance notice and accurate information regarding labour to be released by prime contractors as a result of production changes, in order that National Selective Service may be able to:

(a) obtain the maximum number of men eligible for the armed forces,
(b) procure by transfer, workers with particular skills urgently needed for other high priority industry, and
(c) place released employees in other jobs with a minimum of disruption or dislocation.

[Mr. Howe.]

1. When it is decided by the programme head that a change of production is necessary, whether this is to be done by stopping production, reducing the rate of production, cancellation of contracts or reduction of outstanding orders, the programme head will communicate with the contractor concerned advising him that a change in production may be required and requesting the contractor to furnish him immediately, by telegraph, information as to the number of employees, male and female, who will be released from his organization if such action is taken, and the approximate dates when such lay-offs will take place. (These figures are not to include sub-contractors.)

2. Directors-General and heads of crown owned companies are held responsible for seeing to it that this request is closely followed up and that no undue delay is permitted in securing the above information.

3. If the contractor reports, or if the programme head considers it likely, that 50 people or more will be laid off as a result of the projected action, the programme head will advise the appointed officer of the Office of the Co-ordinator of Production, local 3781, room B.166, No. 2 temporary building, forthwith by telephone or telegram. This information is to be confirmed in writing, in duplicate.

4. Upon receipt of the above information, this officer will either,

(a) authorize the programme head to communicate the decision to the contractor, or
(b) request the programme head to defer action pending clearance of the lay-off with the Department of Labour through the labour liaison officer. As soon as this is done, the office of the Co-ordinator of Production will advise the programme head.

5. When cleared with the office of the Co-ordinator of Production, the official instructions are to be issued personally by either the director-general, the assistant director-general, the president or general manager as the case may be. These may be sent by letter or wire, two copies of which will be sent to the appointed officer and such other parties as are required by the deputy minister's instructions.

6. In all such advices to contractors, the communication should refer the contractor to the deputy minister's letter of February 1, 1944, copies of which are attached.

J. H. Berry,
Acting Co-ordinator of Production.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): May I ask the minister if there was any consultation with the officials of labour organizations in this connection. I notice that all other parties interested are communicated with; have there been any contacts with labour organizations?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The case in point is a union shop, and the president of the union is consulted. I believe that the procedure laid down by selective service is worked out in cooperation with the unions, and within the framework of the instructions the union is consulted in the matter of lay-off.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like again to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Yesterday I asked, quite distinctly, if the principle of seniority rights was recognized in the shop agreements which the contractors for the department have, particularly with this company, and whether that principle is being honoured with regard to this lay-off of fifteen carpenters.

Mr. HOWE: The documents which I asked with the consent of the house to have placed on Hansard set out the procedure there followed. I might have read these circulars.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That is all right.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think it is very helpful to give the procedure for one particular case when there is a procedure for general application; and the circular which will be printed in Hansard covers fully the point raised by my hon. friend.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the preliminaries to the carrying on of this debate have no doubt been most interesting to those who have been participating, but I can say they are very disconcerting to a member who is trying to rise in his place in order to proceed with the discussion. However, I am not complaining about that; I recognize that within certain limitations these privileges and rights are extended to hon. members.

In rising to take part in this, what has sometimes been called a time-honoured debate, sometimes characterized as a useless debate, I desire to make one or two observations. There is no doubt about it that in days gone by this debate on the speech from the throne has been carried on at altogether too great length. On the other hand, I would deprecate the wiping out in their entirety of the facilities that this debate offers. There is a happy medium; and in view of the announcement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made yesterday, that the speech from the throne does not mean an election, I am hopeful that this debate will be concluded within a reasonable time. I suppose it is all very well for me to say that when I am through and let the other fellow think he cannot speak at all. But there is no doubt about it, in my view at all events, that the debate on the speech from the throne serves a very useful purpose, and particularly at this time. Notwithstanding the clamour in certain portions of the press for the abrogation of this debate, I should like to point out that this house has had a recess of at least six months, that during that period of time events of great importance and moment have occurred, that we have had no opportunity to review these events, and that it is difficult to do so when one is dealing with particular proposals by way of legislation. So that I say to you, sir, and to the membership of this house, that the debate on the address affords a very useful occasion to review events which have occurred in the long recess period of six months.

It is said that parliament is the great sounding board of the nation. That I think is true. Many of us have no other sounding board. We do not control the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, like the government does; we are not allowed to go on the air when we should like to do so. We may be able, if we have the money to buy the time and place, to go on the air and talk to our constituents, but we are subject to a strict censorship. I protest against that, and I hope that this position will be reviewed at a very early date and that there will be freedom of the air as to-day there is freedom of speech in this house and a free public press. The situation with regard to the use of the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is intolerable and it cannot be allowed to stand. The sooner it is reviewed by those in authority, the better.

I come to a consideration of some of the topics which are immediately before this house and the country. I am glad to see that my colleague, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) to-day invited the government to introduce at once the measures visualized in the speech from the throne so that we may have full opportunity of examination and analysis and express our approval or disapproval. The speech of His Excellency, put in his mouth by my right hon. friend and his colleagues, covers an imposing and extensive field. I should say that stress was laid on the transitional period and on the post-war period and the problems relating thereto rather than upon the immediate objective of the nation, the winning of the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, that is not true.

Mr. HANSON: Well, that is my reaction. The public has been justified in assuming from the general tenor of the speech that a general election was in the offing. There is no doubt about that; for without hesitation I say to the Prime Minister that in my judgment—perhaps it is as good as his, I do not say it is better—the major portion of the speech looked like and was intended to be taken by the electorate as the basis of an early election appeal. It was an election speech; there is no doubt about that. I go farther and say that it has all the earmarks of an attempt to raise new issues in the minds of the public and to obliterate all recollection of the errors and omissions of the administration during the last four years in the conduct of the war, errors and omissions, sins of commission on the part of the administration which have turned public opinion against this government. If any proof of that fact is required it will be found in the events of last summer when the by-elections were held, by-elections which, if the administration had the confidence of the country, should in all cases have resulted in the return of government nominees; but which to the surprise and astonishment of myself, at least, resulted, in a series of crushing defeats for hon. gentlemen opposite. These by-elections indicated a lack of confidence in the administration. Some people will gloat over this defeat of the government, but to me it has brought very serious implications. I am not gloating over these defeats. In fact I may say very frankly to Your Honour and to the members of this house that I was rather appalled at the results of the by-elections.

Mr. ROWE: So was the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, so was the government. That it indicated a protest against the administration will, I think, be admitted by all. But in my view it indicated very much more than that. As I analyse the result it would appear that an extremely radical and, if I may be permitted to say so, in my view at least a subversive element in this country had what I hope is only a momentary triumph.

I know little about the position in western Canada, but consider the two elections in eastern Canada. After the result in Stanstead and Cartier can anyone say that Canada is a united nation? When you witness in a rock-ribbed Liberal constituency such as Cartier the election of a gentleman who is, according to all the remarks that I have heard, an out-and-out communist then I say that is something to think about. I know the gentleman's name is Rose, but that which we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. Can anyone say after that result in Cartier and after that result in Stanstead that this country is united? What happened in Stanstead? There was the triumph over a Liberal candidate of a candidate of the Bloc Populaire, a party with a purely nationalistic appeal. What does that mean? It means, if it means anything, disunity in this country and it is a deplorable state of affairs. In my judgment these results indicate that Canada is more disunited than it has been at any time in our history. The results are quite clear. They are very discernible. They are the natural results which have flowed from the policies of the administration in the prosecution of the war. I do not propose to-day to traverse ground that I have covered on previous occasions. I make that assertion. I desire only to emphasize the fact that, in my view at all events, this administration has lost the confidence of the country and I do not think there is any doubt about it.

On Monday the Prime Minister spoke in what I considered to be a chastened mood. I can understand that. It was in marked contrast with past performances. He had his mechanical majority behind him but he has learned the lesson of humility. That is a fine thing for a prime minister to learn. It is a fine attribute for a prime minister to have. I have tried to cultivate that attitude myself, I do not know with what success; but I think it is a fine attribute for any public man to have. The Prime Minister took occasion to say that he wanted no general election before the expiration of the lifetime of parliament in June, 1945; but he so hedged his position, as he always does, by two qualifications, that it is difficult to be certain of his position. The first qualification was that "situations" might arise which would make it impossible for the government to carry on with the authority it should have in time of war. The second qualification which is rather similar to the first was, that some question might arise which would make it absolutely necessary that an appeal be made to the country to settle the issue. He left the door wide open. Make no mistake about that. He always does. That is part of the political strategy for which he is so famous.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Excuse me for just one moment. There was one statement that the hon. gentleman made which I think ought to be corrected. If I gathered rightly my hon. friend said I had said that I wished no election until June, 1945. I think I said I wished no election in war-time. In answering a question as to the extension of the term of parliament I said this parliament has until June, 1945 to run.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am interpreting the whole thing, the two statements together. The Prime Minister said he did not want any election before June, 1945 because by law the life of parliament will expire at that time and we must have an election unless there is an extension of the life of this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was asked a question as to whether I wished parliament to continue beyond that period. I said, no. I do not want the impression to go abroad I had given an undertaking that there will be no election before June, 1945.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister left the door wide open, and I suggest to him that he could always find an excuse. Therefore do not take this promise of no election this year too seriously. I am going to give my opinion about the matter a little later, and I am very serious about what I think ought to be done. If I wanted to be cynical I would say that the Prime Minister was from one point of view well advised in making that declaration. I am thoroughly convinced his party would be defeated at the polls if an appeal were made now or in the immediate future. That is the political angle of this question.

There is another angle to it. Personally I do not wish to be swayed by the political angle. Mere party advantage or place or the prospect of power in the immediate future certainly make no appeal to me as an individual member of this house when there is a war on. I am much more concerned about another great principle and it is this: I believe that the holding of a general election at this time or in the immediate future would be a distinct detriment to the successful prosecution of the war. I am very honest in that conviction. From the very beginning of this gigantic struggle—and I am sure hon. members will bear me out in this—I have taken the position and I have rigidly adhered to it that the supreme objective of the Canadian people, the supreme objective of the membership of this house, irrespective of party, the supreme duty of each and every one of us no matter what our political proclivities, or our point of view may be, is the winning of this war, and all other considerations, party and otherwise, are subordinated to that supreme consideration.

I was very glad indeed to hear the Prime Minister in his speech on Monday last utter a grave note of warning, and again to-day that not only is this war not won, but it is far from being won. In fact, may I emphasize what the Prime Minister has alluded to, that war on the European front is now entering upon its most critical stage. The allied nations have invaded Europe through Italy. Further invasions are contemplated. The most exacting and dangerous no doubt will be on the western front. If we are at all realistic we must know that in attacking frontally the fortress of Europe as now dominated by the German forces the allied nations are undertaking the most courageous and herculean task in all history. Look at the map of Europe; visualize it with me, if you will. Germany dominates over half the whole continent of Europe. She is in absolute possession of Norway, Denmark, the low countries of Holland and Belgium, the whole of France, the major part of Italy and the Balkan states, while her own territory remains inviolate save and except for the destruction of her cities and her production programme wrought by the magnificent work of the Royal Air Force, the gallant Royal Canadian Air Force, and the great and wonderful contribution of the air forces of our mighty ally the United States of America.

There is the position. To say that the war is nearly over is folly and a fallacy. Nothing could be further from the truth; nothing could be more dangerous than to believe anything of the sort. To hold that belief; to relax our efforts in any degree is to invite disaster. And to hold a general election in three or six months, with the prospect of blood and carnage almost unthought of, perhaps beyond the scope and measure of our imagination, I honestly believe would be a letting down of our determination, our morale and our will to support the men at the front, and we must never do that. That is my considered view. Others may differ, but I desire to maintain that position in this house, and I think the Prime Minister might well have taken that position in the speech from the throne. However, he has repaired that omission; and speaking for myself I am satisfied, much as I have deplored the fact that at a time of such great national and international undertakings we in Canada have conducted this war on a party rather than on a national basis.

May I pause here, Mr. Speaker, to express my regret, yea, my astonishment, at the position taken by my hon. friend the leader of the Bloc Populaire (Mr. Raymond) in his recent speech in this house in which, if I understood him aright, he took the ground that we were doing altogether too much, much more than our proportion having regard to our size, our wealth and our resources, and if I follow him to a logical conclusion he would perhaps have Canada get out of this war altogether now that the danger of invasion is over. I read the translation of that speech, and as I pondered it I could not but reflect that some people in Canada have very short memories. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten those hectic days of May and June, 1940, after Dunkirk, when nothing stood between the enemy and this Canada of ours—which I agree we both love—but the might, the power, the courage and I would almost say the majesty of the British navy, together with the magnificent will and determination of the British people under the matchless, indomitable leadership of Churchill, who, along with the British people, the royal navy, the merchant navy and the workers of Britain offered only blood, sweat and tears, and who not only saved this continent from invasion but saved civilization itself? For, make no mistake about it, the resolution, the fortitude and the bravery of Churchill and the British people did just that. Have we no gratitude in our hearts and minds for that magnificent achievement? From that has grown, with the help first of Canada and the other major sister dominions and then with the heartening aid of the United States and the wonderful contribution of the Russian people, the promising position of to-day, when, if victory is not in sight, it is at least within striking distance. In those days Britain attained the moral leadership of the whole civilized world. Standing alone she earned that position, and at great cost and sacrifice; and we as Canadians, irrespective of our racial descent, should recognize that fact and be eternally thankful. And with all kindliness and in all sincerity I say to my hon. friend that no part of Canada was more vulnerable than his beloved part. No part of Canada should be more thankful than that part of our citizenry which my hon. friend claims to represent, the people of his own province.

In the short space of time allotted to one, Mr. Speaker—and I suppose in days to come even that time may be cut down—it is extremely difficult to cover any wide range of subjects, and I am not going to attempt to do so.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is when you read it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not reading it. I desire to turn now to a peacetime subject which I consider to be of very great importance, to give some views with regard to it and to ask the administration some questions. I refer to the question of civil aviation. We have made great strides since the beginning of the war. There is no doubt that the empire air training plan has been a great success; started too late, it is true, but nevertheless a great success. It will be recalled that last year the Prime Minister made a declaration of policy with respect to this question of civil aviation, and that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) did likewise. We also had some observations on the subject in the committee on railways and shipping by the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I am not going to repeat what those declarations were; they are well known to all our membership and to the country generally. I do think, however, that at a very early date this whole position should be debated and reviewed. In the speech from the throne there was an omission, a very significant omission, of any reference to this great problem; it contained not a syllable about post-war civil aviation. My colleague the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) referred to this omission in his address on Monday, at page 20 of Hansard, in these terms:

> There is no single economic subject fraught with such important effects and ramifications of a world-wide character which is so vital to Canada as commercial aviation.

I agree with that statement. We have the Trans-Canada Air Lines. I am not here to-day to criticize the operations of that enterprise, which started from scratch and has done very good work. No one will deny, however, that the government has been a "sugar daddy" to Trans-Canada Air Lines. Somebody had to father it, and the government did so. Perhaps I may be excused for using the term "sugar daddy"; it is a pretty comprehensive term, and everyone knows what is meant. This was used in another connection; it is a bit of slang we have borrowed from across the boundary line. We find that Trans-Canada Air Lines is just a government monopoly. It is operated for the government under the form of a private undertaking. It is not subject to the control of this parliament. It is not subject—or at least only to a very limited extent—to the control of the board of transport commissioners. Control, in the first instance, is vested in the board of directors, who are the creatures of the government, and the real control of Trans-Canada Air Lines is vested in the Minister of Munitions and Supply. He is behind it. He kept his hand on that when he left the Department of Transport to go to the department which he now heads. I am not blaming him; having regard to the circumstances existing in the department, I think he did the right thing. But it is a monopoly. The board of transport commissioners has practically nothing to say about its operation. Judging by results, the policy at the moment would appear to be against internal expansion. There may be a reason for that; I do not know. But their policy certainly is to prevent any competition from development by private enterprise. I do not think there is any gainsaying that. And as I am a supporter of private enterprise I ask for a complete overhauling of both the policy and the actual practice.

We are supposed to have a free economy in this country, outside of war time. That may be a fallacy. We are subject to tremendous control at the present time, under the guise of war—some of which control is wholly unnecessary. Under a Liberal government one would have supposed that a free economy in transportation would be axiomatic. That should be the practice. But what have we? The initiative, the freedom to operate privately sponsored air transport is cabined, cribbed, confined and put in a strait-jacket. Even in the air a limited field has been left open to private enterprise, and allotted by government policy. If any proof is required of that statement, I can give it now. Recently application was made on behalf of a private enterprise to establish an airways route between the cities of Saint John and Halifax in the maritime provinces. The application was refused, and in my judgment the refusal was without justifiable or reasonable cause. The field is not occupied, and present facilities on the main line of Trans-Canada Air Lines do not fill the need.

Mr. HOWE: What method was taken to refuse it? Has the hon. member seen the refusal, or anything of that kind?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand it is a matter of record that it has been refused. I am coming to what I understand to be the reason.

Mr. HOWE: The situation is, if I am not mistaken, that a number of other applications are not being dealt with by the board of transport commissioners at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My understanding is just this—and may I say that that is no reason—that they did not choose to deal with the application. Who told them not to do so?

Mr. HOWE: I did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. The cold hand of the Minister of Munitions and Supply is against this application. Why? The application was turned down, as I understand, on the ground of military necessity.

Mr. HOWE: It was turned down because we believed that valuable air franchises should be held until the return of the people who are fighting our battles overseas.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister propose to give the franchise to another company, or is he speaking of employment? Because, if he is, I would point out to him that there will be lots of boys coming back who will be capable of handling the airways. I am dealing with a situation in my own province, one with which I am familiar. The minister will find there is a good deal of irritation there, because we cannot get an air communication service in New Brunswick that is worth while.

Military necessity was, I understand, the reason given for the refusal of the application. To me that sounds most unconvincing. There is no such necessity. This procedure of restricting private enterprise is dwarfing the progress of Canadian air transportation. Instead of permitting it to function and expand in a normal fashion, it is quite plain to me that the government policy is one which visualizes expansion only on the part of Trans-Canada Air Lines—and they are not expanding. It is a dog-in-the-manger policy, and one which should be reviewed and liberalized.

This government-controlled line has been allotted an absolute monopoly of transcontinental routes. That is an accomplished fact, although I believe in future there will be—and should be—room for competing services. But there is more than that here. This government-controlled company has an absolute monopoly to operate all Canadian services on international routes. But it does not operate any international routes, with one exception. That field is being taken up, not by Canadian enterprise but by United States enterprise. They have invaded this country, and they are waiting to invade it further. And, listen to this: I am informed—and I wish to be corrected if I am wrong—that this government will not allow any Canadian enterprise to approach the United States government for licensing facilities, so that they can enter the United States. They cannot even reach the United States government, because the Canadian government refuses to facilitate their application.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You will elect us again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do not worry about me; look after yourself. That is as much as most of us can do.

Trans-Canada Air Lines has a transcontinental monopoly, and has reserved to itself the sole right to develop and acquire any ancillary routes of a main-line character which it may decide to operate. That is government policy. Private operators which have pioneered routes may be arbitrarily ousted and excluded. That is the position to-day.

I suggest to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Munitions and Supply that the government should not bar private enterprise from secondary, feeder or purely local routes in the domestic field, such as that between Saint John and Halifax.

Then we have before us the question of transocean routes. Services for these, also, are reserved for government monopoly after the war, or when they get around to it—whenever that may be. I point out to the house that that is not the attitude of the United States of America, as far as their post-war policy is concerned. If I understand their position correctly the government in that country is encouraging private enterprise to enter this field. I doubt, too, if it will be the attitude of the government of the United Kingdom, or any other of the free sovereign states in Europe after the war.

There appeared in the January isue of the Atlantic Monthly, which I have on my desk, an article entitled "The Future of Air Transport, A British View," written by Peter Masefield, who is described by the editor as the personal adviser to Lord Beaverbrook on civil aviation as it affects Great Britain. This article is in no sense official. But because of our knowledge of the author and his position, any views he may express must command respect and attention. I commend a thorough study of the article to the minister and his advisers, and to every thoughtful student of the subject of aviation. His opening sentence is fascinating, and I would ask permission to read it. These are his words:

> Air transport, a child of peace reared in war, approaches maturity. Under the spur of war, flying has found its technical independence. It is free to start anew in the peaceful skies of to-morrow, bound only by such artificial restrictions as the nations choose to apply.

He visualizes three great problems. First, there is the problem of policy and diplomacy, and he tells us that it is important that these should be resolved only by international discussion conducted in a spirit of good will and cooperation. The second is the question of operational problems, matters of subsidy, monopoly, national air routes, traffic, frequency of services and of control. The third covers the technical problems of construction and equipment, which are the least important.

Under the caption "operating policy" he states that general opinion in Britain favours regulated rivalry rather than uncontrolled competition in national and international air line operation. Mark these words, "Monopolies are not favoured or considered efficient." I suggest to the house that these words bear the impress of truth and logic as we know them. Nowhere does he suggest either government operation or monopoly.

Participation by shipping and railroad concerns will be welcomed so long as it promotes efficient commercial operation for the good of air transport in general. I have not the time to analyse his position further, but it is quite clear that he does not visualize government monopoly in Britain. Rather does he approach the solution from the point of view of regulated private enterprise. I think that is the position in the United States.

Recently the Minister of Munitions and Supply visited London with Mr. Symington, the president of Trans-Canada. I believe they sat in on the meetings of a special committee which was set up under Lord Beaverbrook to consider empire air relations and policy. I consider that it is his duty to this house and to this country to give us a report at an early day of the deliberations of that committee and the conclusions, if any, arrived at.

I now ask these important and relevant questions. Where does Canada stand in relation to the promotion of domestic air routes by private enterprise? Next, is private enterprise in the post-war period to be relegated to the limbo of the past in this sphere of national activity? If so, I protest. We want no monopoly in air transportation in Canada any more than we want it in railway transportation.

Mr. HOWE: You wanted it in railway transportation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not want it in railway transportation.

Mr. HOWE: Your party did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I challenge the minster to substantiate that.

Mr. HOWE: Your party certainly did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My party did not advocate it. I deny it. Recently I have heard that another party has advocated it in effect when they advocate taking over by this government of the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway held in Britain. When you visualize the position where the government of this country will own the Canadian National Railways and control the Canadian Pacific Railway, the amalgamation of those two roads will be just as inevitable as that the sun will set to-night and rise to-morrow morning. I wonder what the railway workers of this country think of that Cooperative Commonwealth Federation policy? Let them put that in their pipes and smoke it.

Mr. REID: I believe it would suit the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think it would. So far as I know all the Canadian Pacific wants is to be left alone to work out its own salvation. It is quite capable of doing so if left alone and if it is not taxed to death. We have the spectacle of the Canadian Pacific last year paying into the treasury of this country in income and excess profits taxes a total of $23,100,000 and the Canadian National not paying a cent.

Mr. HOWE: Oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In income tax or excess profits tax.

Mr. HOWE: It has paid about the same thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am going to deal with that. I asked Mr. Vaughan that question and he admitted it. Another question I desire to ask the minister is: Where does this country stand in regard to air transport in the field of empire? Are we for or against cooperation in this field? Where do we stand in relation to the United States? In both Britain and the United States this question of post-war civil aviation has aroused the greatest interest. In Britain the big shipping companies are eager to enter the field of international air transport. Are they to be shut out in so far as Canada is concerned because of our monopolistic policy? I say that the whole position should be clarified and liberalized. If not, we are just one step nearer to the socialist state, and the next step is fascism. I do not know how much time I have.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you very much. I am obliged to the house for its indulgence. I do not want any special privilege to be granted to me that would not be granted to somebody else, but I did desire to say one word with regard to empire relations. I would not do this had the Prime Minister not gone as far as he did on Monday last. I regret exceedingly that at this time, and for reasons which I shall indicate in a moment, the Prime Minister has seen fit to reject practically out of hand the proposals of Lord Halifax as enunciated recently at Toronto, especially so at this time when he has announced his intention of attending in the near future an empire conference in London. I pause here to say that in our view he should attend this conference when it is called and as soon as it is called and that we on this side will facilitate his attendance and wish him Godspeed and a safe return. But since the proposals of Lord Halifax will without doubt be before that conference, it is more than passing strange that those proposals should be rejected out of hand in advance of the conference. I cannot understand that attitude.

I have not had an opportunity of studying the Halifax proposals in detail and therefore I am not going to discuss them either in detail or on their merits. But they were made by a responsible man; whether he made them in his official capacity or not is another matter. I suggest to the Prime Minister that they merit cool and careful study. It may well be that after examination it will be found that Canada cannot accept these proposals either in toto or in part; I do not know because I have not come to any conclusion, but have we given the matter cool and careful study? I do not think we have. There would appear to be a good deal of heat over the matter, and when there is heat there cannot be very much calm consideration.

The attitude of the Prime Minister reminds me of a situation in which I found myself as a young lawyer. With the temerity that characterizes a young and courageous counsel I once went before an old judge. He had been reading my factum and he said to me, "Mr. Hanson, have you a case?" I said, "Yes, My Lord." I thought so, and I still think so. He said to me, "I do not think you have." What an approach to a case! It took the heart right out of me, but I battered away at the old chap as long as I could. He overruled me, but I had the supreme satisfaction of reversing him on appeal.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then you were still in the same position?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member will just take a chair behind the curtain I think it would be better for us all. I think that is where he belongs. This is all I am going to say about the Halifax proposals until a later date.

In one particular sphere of empire cooperation I hold the opinion that at the peace conference which is to be held, we hope within a measurably short time this country will cooperate with Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and all the other dominions and with the United Kingdom so that in unity there may be strength. If we do not, and it is unthinkable that we should go into that peace conference a divided commonwealth, then I say to the house and to this country that the influence of the British empire will be greatly nullified. I would deplore that, that a country which has saved civilization would be wiped out by disunity among our peoples.

I hope it will not be found necessary to have a division of opinion especially with reference to our friends in the United States. But if we find ourselves in that unfortunate position my views in that regard have not changed since last session; when speaking in this house on foreign relations, as reported at page 4639 of Hansard, 1943, I expressed these views, which I reaffirm now:

> Canada has become a nation by reason of the contribution which she has made. Britain has the moral leadership of the world, and she won it as a result of standing almost alone, yea, in fact alone, at and after Dunkirk. They are our blood brothers over there. On the other hand there is the geographical propinquity of Canada and the United States. Canada, it has been said, has been the intermediary between the United States and the United Kingdom, and the interpreter of one to the other. I am not sure that that has worked out in practice, though I think to a degree it is true. But if the testing time comes, and we have to choose between the one and the other—and I pray God for the sake of the general good of the world, of peace among nations, and of the great world which we would like to see afterwards, we shall not have to do that—I say, if the testing time comes, then I tell my right hon. friend that so far as I am concerned—and I would not pretend, like the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, to speak for the nation—my vote and my voice, my advice to the Canadian people in so far as it may be asked or heeded, will be, "Let us stand by the empire."

I have but a word to add. The Prime Minister has indicated that in empire affairs his government has followed a policy of consultation, cooperation, and coordination. I say to him that if that be true now, it was not always true. If we have arrived at a stage of consultation, cooperation and coordination, we have gone a long way, and let us pursue that path to its logical conclusion, which is unity in action.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any great length, or to show any acrimony. In the first place, I do not want to repeat what has been said, or be included among the grumblers mentioned by the mover of the address (Mr. Tremblay) and also referred to by the new member for Cartier (Mr. Rose).

The speech from the throne is a complete political programme, and in spite of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I still believe that the foremost concern of the present Government is their reelection. It seldom happens that four by-elections held within one year mean the entrance of four opposition members in the house. In the present case, the standard-bearer of the Bloc Populaire was elected in Stanstead, two socialists in Humboldt and Selkirk and a communist in Cartier. I shall not delve further into that, although I may at some future time discuss the complaints of those who talk about grumblers.

I note with satisfaction that the Liberal members seem to have fully recuperated from the fatigue of their pilgrimage to Stanstead. However, the fact remains that among them were some who had voted against conscription in the house, who had delivered impassioned speeches and yet gave the help of their eloquence to a candidate who was all out for conscription, a circumstance which will surely compel them to explain to their constituents such a change of front.

The leader of the Bloc Populaire Canadien, in addresses broadcast on the 16th and 23rd October, 1943, has clearly defined the stand of that party as regards family allowances. On page 8 of the provincial programme he made the following statement:

> Where private enterprise remains powerless, the family must resort to cooperation, to that truly democratic formula that is within the reach of, and provides such a boon for, people who, like us, lack abundant capital. Especially since 1930, as was noted by Mr. Beaulieu, the cooperative movement has had in this province an encouraging development. We now have credit cooperative societies—the Desjardins caisses populaires which have been so helpful to us—we have farmers', fishermen's, consumers' and builders' cooperative societies, and so forth.

Then, here is what I find on page 9:

> (a) The great agricultural problem is connected with the settlement of young people. It is a question of helping the heads of large families to ensure their children's future. For that purpose we are now studying the methods of an institution which will ensure to farmers advantages similar to those which workers will derive from family allowances.
> (b) Farmer families must be helped to secure the comforts of modern living: electricity, running water, telephone, radio, transportation. We shall help financially the organization of cooperative societies for the supply of electricity, telephone service and water.

The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Edouard Lacroix) had already implemented, in his constituency, this policy concerning telephone cooperative societies. In order to prevent certain companies from exploiting the rural population, he supplied capital to the tax payers who organized cooperative societies and even bought some lines outright. Only recently, one of these cooperative societies was in such a financial position as to be able to repay the money borrowed at a small interest and become sole owner of the entire telephone system.

The present government—supposing some of its members read this programme, and some must have done so since the speech from the throne mentions family allowances for the first time—have omitted cooperation from their policy. Indeed, a newspaper reports the following, taken from an article by André Roy and published in l'Action Catholique of January 29:

Are they attempting to destroy cooperative societies?

Everyone realizes the efforts of the cooperative societies to improve the economic situation of French Canadians. Among those that have best succeeded in overcoming all the inherent difficulties of a new enterprise stands the Coopérative des Pêcheurs unis de la Gaspésie (Gaspe United Fishermen's Cooperative Society).

Trusts and cartels enviously watch the growth and development of these concerns. They fear that French Canadians will some day throw off the yoke, triumph over adverse circumstances, and rid themselves of the "inferiority complex" which implies that they are not fit to engage in industrial and commercial enterprises. Indeed, they never miss an opportunity to hamper our institutions. The United Fishermen were the latest victim of these powers. The remarkable success achieved by this concern during the past two or three years has not gone by unnoticed; it netted an appreciable benefit for the fishermen of the Gaspe area, and we know the stage of technical perfection to which it has raised the fishing trade and industry in our province. The fisheries trust, however, in league with the wartime prices and trade board, has dealt them another blow: Mr. A. N. McLean, administrator of fish products, has ordered it to sacrifice goods on the simple pretext that the F. T. James Company, of Toronto, and the O'Connor Fish Company, of Montreal, can no longer obtain fillet of cod.

How did they go about it? Very simply: they only had to place the United Fishermen in a different category; they were reclassified from wholesale dealers to "processors"; this forces them to sell their product 10 per cent less, and to sell it to middlemen who will net the 10 per cent profit which belongs to the United Fishermen.

Everything becomes quite clear when it is known that the man who assists Mr. McLean in controlling the price of fish is on the board of directors of a chain company having interests in the fishing industry.

This United Fishermen Cooperative had wrested from the clutches of a trust human beings who had been kept in shameful bondage for almost a century. They were forced to sell their fish for the prices which they could get. Kept in poverty, they had to meet the demands of their masters, lest their boats or their fishing tackle be seized. They were not properly clothed for their hard work, and they were not fed adequately; as a result, tuberculosis was rampant among them.

Charitable men had urged them to unite, and the cooperative had brought a ray of sunshine in their lives; the prices of fish had risen, and they were looking to the future with renewed hope. Now, the trust, ever on the alert, has just turned everything upside down and their cooperative will lose 10 per cent on the selling price to enable the trust to grab this profit.

I ask the government to remedy the situation if they have not already done so. They must certainly have received protests from someone or from certain quarters.

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand, Laurier) should put an end to such exploitation by the trust. It is rank injustice and an unbearable situation; these people have suffered enough in the past. Like every citizen, they are entitled to a fair remuneration for their labour.

The mover of the address, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay) has expressed his opposition to immigration, and he deserves to be congratulated. I shall go farther than he, however, and I shall add that so long as settlers have to endure hardship on uncleared lots—I do not mean all the settlers—on rocky land, so long as they have not been given the opportunity of securing lots which may be cultivated or old abandoned farms—and there are several—so long as workers in war plants have not obtained employment elsewhere—and there are some who are already out of work—so long as there is a single unemployed person, immigration cannot be considered and refugees, irrespective of their race, cannot be accepted.

I have heard the hon. member for Toronto Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) make an appeal in favour of Jewish refugees, the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Gillis) and finally the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) take a similar stand. I shall be brief but to the point. Our cities are already overcrowded and their population is out of proportion with that of country areas. Therefore, only farmers could be accepted.

In 1932-33, I believe, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett had an amendment to the Immigration Act passed by this house, under which the government could accept farmers only or, at least, a large proportion of farmers.

There are no farmers among these refugees; if there are, the number is negligible, as it is a well-known fact that Jews are not farmers. This is obvious and true. There are two hundred of them to-day, but there will be two thousand to-morrow.

We have been bled white in order to send gifts to much wealthier nations than we, and as intimated in the speech from the throne we have not reached the end, as evidenced by the following excerpt:

A measure to extend the principle of mutual aid so as to provide for relief, as well as for materials of war, will be submitted for your approval.

The house is being prepared. Nevertheless, it must be borne in mind that Canada is not inexhaustible. The arrival of refugees will not add to her wealth. If other nations—and I do not make any exception—wish to be charitable, let them indulge their whim at their own expense, as we do in respect of the war, but not at the expense of our country.

And if some day we should accept immigrants, we want to select them ourselves and not accept all those who are sent.

But I am inclined to believe that this immigration plan is part of the general policy which includes defence, foreign policy, England's trade policy, and I should now like to discuss the declaration made by Lord Halifax.

In 1937, during the first discussions on increased military appropriations, this imperial defence policy was brought to the attention of the Government.

In order to prove that Lord Hamilton's policy was a policy of imperial defence and not an isolated or colonial policy, I quoted a statement by Sir Samuel Hoare, which was also quoted by Le Droit in its issue of February 11, 1937. Sir Samuel Hoare said:

All the costs, all the risks, all the expense entailed by the defence of the empire are at present borne by England, which is a grave injustice, for she must not be alone to arm against the enemy who will be a common enemy to the empire, that is to all the dominions, in the event of war. The dominions should outline their projects for the defence of the empire at the imperial conference. They must help Great Britain, and the sooner they do so the better we shall be protected.

Further, I quoted in the same speech the statement made by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier when speaking on the Guthrie amendment to bill 21 of the 1912-13 session, page 7232 of the Hansard:

(Text)

I now come to a consideration of the fact, made manifest by one of the last speeches of Mr. Churchill, that the admiralty favours contribution and not autonomous organization. This is not a new thing: the British admiralty has always preferred a system of imperial contribution to the idea of autonomous organization. At the imperial conference in 1902, Lord Selborne, the predecessor of Mr. Churchill, made a proposal that we should have imperial contributions.

(Translation): Lord Halifax was rather tactless, he spoke too soon. He should have waited a little while longer, until elections in Canada were at hand, and the government would have used his statements as a rallying cry, the call of the autonomist which taught such a bitter lesson to Lord Byng of Vimy who had made the mistake of expressing his views in peacetime. This same cry we ourselves have uttered so often, believing that all who advocated Canadian autonomy would stand firm when war threatened. It is quite probable that the Government will resume its policy of autonomy, that its partisans will oppose, as they did for twenty-two years, participation and conscription, but only a simpleton will believe that the people can be taken in a second time.

In the past, the Conservative party came to grief for having imposed conscription in 1917; the Liberal party is now beginning to feel the ill effects of the wound, for that party also is tainted; the difference lay in the fact that the Conservatives put it into effect openly while the Liberals proceed by way of small doses at a time. Theirs will be the same punishment.

The C.C.F. made a good start, but it has given ground and fallen in step with the two imperialist parties in the house; all have voted what was needed to pursue a total and extravagant war effort. I say to its members, as to those of the other two parties, that imperialist parties will get no support in the Province of Quebec, whether they are openly imperialists or otherwise.

Indeed, the speech made by Lord Halifax was not of our taste, but it is none the less true that it reflects an imperialist policy which has always been in existence and will not cease to operate. We all recall feelings of indignation evidenced on different occasions when tactless imperialists spoke too soon or too loudly.

England without the Empire could not radiate or preserve her European influence, not to speak of her world prestige. One even wonders if she could survive without the Empire. To think that some hon. members have asserted in this very house that the imperialism is on the way out!

During the post-war period, we can expect various imperialist crises to come to a head. It is unquestionable and inevitable; the facts are there to prove it. The present situation is obvious. Canada cannot run the risk of becoming a new Belgium. Whether we like it or not, our country is part of America.

Can we hope that the men who so strongly advocated autonomy, and even nationalism in time of peace, and yet showed their true imperialistic colours in wartime, can we hope that they will stand firm this time?

How many opposed any resistance? How many maintained the views they had held for so long? Count them and see.

The hon. member for Cartier spoke of slums; that is the best part of his speech. To the building of houses he should have added, however, the destroying of slums so that those infected areas might not be used once again. Because, for countless reasons, such as unemployment and the resultant lack of money, as well as the greater facilities for reaching the work-shops, they will again be filled if they are left standing. They must immediately be levelled down. They have contaminated too many citizens, mothers and children; they deserve to be destroyed.

That is where governments are remiss in their duty, tolerating as they do such a situation in the larger cities. Within every great urban centre which is left to itself, through negligence, ignorance or carelessness, there are inevitably wretched and unruly people as well as radicals. Some one has said—I think it was a Spanish prelate—: "Give a pretext to hotheads and an illusion to the wretched and you shall have a revolution".

Having said that, I shall now discuss socialism.

In the first place, it is recognized and history shows that socialism has never transformed any country into a land of milk and honey. Socialism has risen, in all countries and especially in France,—it did its work underground long before that,—as an aftermath of revolution. Socialism was at that time converging from England, where Karl Marx was living, and from Central Europe, then included within Germany; it has fully blossomed forth in Russia with the Mensheviks and the Bolsheviks, the latter, more radical and daring than the former, have achieved the success which we all know.

They always resort to revolutions in order to usurp power. They have preached everywhere the equality of wealth, of the social classes while raising the latter against one another. Do not believe that these socialist leaders have remained poor. Jaurès was a millionaire when he died. It was he who was going down into the coal mines, with a Bible under his arm, saying to the workers: "We must share our wealth. The rich must share with the poor." This is what prompted a French writer who had followed the evolution of socialism to write: "Once upon a time, there was a socialist who did not own a castle."

Lenin was by no means a poor man, and history tells us of the shady methods he resorted to in order to obtain funds for his propaganda. The socialists of Russia have for leader Stalin, the most crafty politician ever. It cannot be gainsaid that he has had the tact necessary to rouse the Russian people and to mould them into a warlike and well organized nation.

Those who believe that his decree abolishing the communist party in the world frees the nations from the menace of a world revolution must be very credulous indeed: the communist party has a new name, that is all there is to it. The cells have increased their activity due to relaxation of watchfulness on the part of statesmen and democracies. In our country, communism was declared illegal, but it has changed its name. Its old leaders head the Labour-Progressive party, however the name is different. This nefarious joke has lasted altogether too long and we shall fall victims to our credulity before long.

I read a small pamphlet written by the hon. member for Cartier, "La cinquième colonne d'Hitler dans Québec" (Hitler's Fifth Column in Quebec). It has a green cover and is fairly well printed. Some hon. members of this house are mentioned in it. I am not a socialist and, on the other side of this house, I see other members who are not either. It may be that a few historical facts will refresh my hon. friend's (Mr. Rose) memory and prove to him that Hitler's fifth column is not recruited in the league for the defence of Canada nor in the Bloc Populaire Canadien, but elsewhere.

Barthou had, one day, succeeded in negotiating commercial agreements to the advantage of France. He was a Republican. He was assassinated as soon as he set foot on French soil. The man who defeated these treaties to Hitler's profit, a socialist named Bonnet, was convicted of espionage, with his wife, and was accused of this crime by all French writers. He was not a member of the Bloc Populaire Canadien. He was a member of Hitler's fifth column in France.

Enough said. I might be called a grumbler. Now, I come, at the end of my remarks, to the slogan coined by the Prime Minister, to the anathema uttered against the Bloc Populaire Canadien: the bloc, that is the enemy! It must be defeated in Quebec, or the party is lost. Not that way, though, not by stating that the Bloc Populaire is appealing to race prejudice. That was not swallowed in Stanstead, neither will be swallowed elsewhere in Quebec or in the other provinces where we shall have a certain number of candidates in the next federal election. In Stanstead—and this was stated by the Prime Minister himself at the Liberal convention last summer—we were accused of appealing to race prejudice and expounding a destructive policy. Some members showed more cleverness and they delivered finer speeches. I notice some of them on the other side of the house and I offer them my congratulations.

How can it be said, Mr. Speaker, that the bloc populaire appeals to race prejudice, when 38 per cent of the English-speaking population joined the conscriptionist candidate Davidson against our people. They did not make their bid openly and frankly as we did ourselves, but they did it just the same. Because we asked the French Canadians to give their support to the genial member for Standstead (Mr. Choquette) we are accused of appealing to race prejudice. Did the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix) appeal to race prejudice when he requested the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) to appoint a French-speaking official in the overwhelming French Canadian city of Montreal? I suppose that was an appeal to race prejudice. We are not permitted to ask our fellow-citizens of French descent to join forces, but other nationalities are permitted to do so.

When Paul Massé advocated in the constituency of Cartier the union of French Canadians who form 55 per cent of the population, not according to the spurious lists prepared by the Liberal enumerator, but according to a true census of the population, was he appealing to race prejudice? For twenty-five years the constituency of Cartier has been represented by a Jewish member, Conservative, Union Nationale, or Liberal. The majority in that constituency is not Jewish but French Canadian, why, then, should it be a crime and an appeal to race prejudice to ask for the election of a French Canadian? Was Lazarus Phillips more entitled than we were to ask his fellow Jews in the Jewish Eagle, to unite and vote for a Jew because otherwise twenty-five years would elapse before the constituency of Cartier could be won back? They have the right to ask their people to unite, but we, French Canadians, have no such right; we appeal to race prejudice, we hinder Canadian unity. The former leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has said a few moments ago that the leader of the Bloc Populaire had not a very good memory. He has told us about Dunkirk where the British army fought so successfully to cover the evacuation and added that we French Canadians should thank England for having stopped Hitler's march at that time. Have we blamed England for protecting that evacuation? No.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

But reverting to a subject dealt with by the former leader of the opposition, I would say that, had not the French Canadians been here, in 1775 and 1812, to hold the country for the British crown he would not have been in this house to make his utterances, this afternoon.

We do not forget easily, our memory is good, faithful and well exercised. We are little impressed by the anathema uttered against us. We have a programme, we intend to realize the union of French Canadians; we shall seek this end; we have the right to do so and whenever we have the opportunity to do so and we shall continue to work with that object in view. This is clear, very clear indeed. Attempts are made to spread all kinds of rumours on the Bloc Populaire. Some say that we are secessionists, that we aim to ostracize all races in Quebec first, and later in Canada as a whole and then to hound everybody out of Quebec and Canada. This is nothing but political intrigue of the first water and we are used to it. But, I repeat, we shall go ahead in spite of all. There will be other elections in which we shall have candidates who will fight for unity among our fellow-citizens even if we are accused of appealing to race prejudice, every time we demand that the rights and privileges justly belonging to us on account of our numbers and our ethnical importance, be respected. Such accusations leave us unimpressed; that is our right and we intend to use it.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne indicates certain objectives which the government intends to pursue both for the present and for the future. As to the statement contained in that speech, that the winning of the war clearly remains the first of all objectives, there can be no difference of opinion. So far as the armed forces are concerned and the war machinery which has been set up, we are satisfied that the war will be brought to a successful conclusion. We can rely, as we have relied in the past, on all members of the armed forces to acquit themselves nobly. In regard to the war machinery at home, it is true that there are still many squeaks in it, some of them louder than others; nevertheless we are fairly well satisfied that it will carry us through successfully. So that the question which concerns not only the members of the armed forces but also those still at home is whether, when this awful tragedy has been concluded, parliament will have made provision for a way of life in this country which will be worthy of a nation of heroes.

I believe it was the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who said on one occasion that if no preparation was made for the new order before peace came, we should look in vain for that new order. That being so, it is the primary duty of those of us charged with the responsibility of making the laws of the nation to see that adequate preparations are made for the peace when it comes. This leads me, then, to a consideration of some of the objectives for the time of peace, as indicated in the speech from the throne.

If there was any one problem which more than another caused headaches and heartaches between this war and the last one, it was the employment and unemployment situation, and all matters relating thereto. The speech from the throne makes several references to the attitude of the government on the question of employment in the post-war era. I shall point to a few of these statements, one of which is as follows:

> The maintenance of full employment will require, in the period of transition from war to peace, a rapid and efficient conversion of war industries.

Another paragraph which refers to the three broad fields of post-war planning contains this expression—> —the reconversion of the economic life of the nation from a war-time to a peace-time basis, and its reconstruction in a manner which will provide opportunities for useful employment for all who are willing and able to work.

Still another reference is made to employment, when the matter of world trade is dealt with. The reference is worded thus:

> During the period of transition, the provision of international relief will help to maintain full employment of Canadian man-power and resources.

In another paragraph, which refers to social security measures, we find this statement:

> Such a national minimum contemplates useful employment for all who are willing to work.

These numerous references to the question of employment indicate the importance attached to the subject. Consequently I feel impelled to express a few views on matters relating to employment, particularly the objectives which the government and others have in mind.

These extracts from the speech from the throne, statements which have been made by almost all hon. members thus far, and many speeches made outside the house, indicate that one of the outstanding and most important objectives in the post-war world is what is called full employment. I cannot agree or disagree with those who indicate that full employment should be our objective, until I understand what those who enunciate such an objective have in mind. I should like to know what they believed would constitute full employment. What has the government in mind when it uses the term "full employment"? What has the Progressive Conservative party in mind when its spokesman refers to full employment as an objective in the post-war world? What has anyone either in or outside the house in mind when he refers to full employment as an objective? Does he mean that all people from sixteen to sixty must put in eight, ten, twelve, fourteen or sixteen hours a day before they are entitled to live? Do they mean by full employment that it is not possible for the people in Canada in the post-war world to enjoy the standard of living they desire unless they put in eight or ten or more hours of work a day? Or do they mean that the amount of work which all people, everywhere, will be obliged to do will be only that which the power machines are unable to do?

Before hon. members in the house, or any group of individuals charged with the responsibility of formulating policy, can make any progress in respect of this subject connected with employment in the post-war world, we must have a clear definition of our terms. One great thinker has said that all intelligent discussion begins with a definition of terms. I have yet to hear any individual, either on the government side or on the opposition benches, indicate what he understands by full employment. In my view it is imperative that those who advocate full employment as an objective indicate what they have in mind.

Even before defining the term to which I have referred, I think there is another matter we must settle in our minds and must first determine, namely, the purpose of an economic system. Why do we have an economic system? What is an economic system for? Judging from most speeches I hear both in and out of the house, the complete purpose of an economic system is to keep people at work, to keep their noses to the grindstone. As one who subscribes to what I believe is a new philosophy, I wish to dissent completely from that point of view. I have a different attitude in respect of work. I assert that the purpose of an economic system never was, is not now and never will be that of providing jobs. My contention is that the only sound, sane, sensible, logical and legitimate purpose of an economic system is to provide the maximum amount of goods and services for the minimum amount of work and trouble. I consider that a major premise upon which to base proposals for the post-war period, and I challenge anyone, either in the house or out of it, to refute the soundness of that premise.

I wish now to consider for a few moments what constitutes full employment. What should determine the number of hours of work any worker in industry, any farmer, any office worker, or any worker anywhere should be obliged to perform? I would say the number of hours of work are entirely dependent upon the standard of living which the people of Canada collectively desire, and the extent to which power machinery displaces human effort. I believe most hon. members, as well as many economists and others who speak as economists outside the house, have not reconciled themselves to the fact that we are living in 1944 A.D., and not 1944 B.C. My criticism of many orthodox economists and the people who hold an orthodox point of view is that most of them were born a hundred years too late. They should have been born back in the eighteenth century. In spite of the facts which stare almost every one of them in the face every day of his life, many fail to recognize that the discovery of electricity, steam power, the diesel engine, radio, electronics and many other things, has increased man's productive capacity by about forty to fifty times what it was a century or more ago. This being so, it should follow that our standard of living to-day—I mean in the post-war period—should be forty to fifty times greater than it was a century ago. Or, on the other hand, if a man does not desire a standard of living any higher than what it was a hundred years ago, he should be required to put forth forty to fifty times less effort in order to enjoy such a standard of living.

This war, as did the last war, has precipitated a technological displacement of human labour much more than would have occurred in a time of peace. I believe we shall all have to reconcile ourselves to the fact that because of this technological displacement of labour we should be able to look forward in the post-war world to a work day much smaller than eight hours. All persons capable of working probably could be kept employed in the post-war period for quite a number of years. We have extensive public work programmes to carry out, but surely we are not going to complete the public works programmes for the next three, four or five generations. Surely we are going to leave something for them to do.

We need public works projects, irrigation schemes and many other things, but in considering these in the light of employment we should decide to build roads for the sake of roads and not for the sake of the jobs which will result. We ought to build roads because we want roads. We ought to provide more irrigation because we want irrigation and the resulting produce from the lands which will be irrigated.

If in the post-war world all our farmers and workers of every kind are permitted to enjoy the fruits of the machinery available, in leisure as well as in the form of commodities, I believe that the hours of work will be reduced to six, five or even four per day. If the farmer is able to obtain the prices for his commodities which will permit him to buy all the farm machinery, tractors, power, electricity and so on that he needs, the same circumstances will apply to him. We must recognize, as I believe very few in Canada recognize, that the power machine has come not only to remove the drudgery of our everyday tasks but to provide us with more hours of leisure and fewer hours of work. I believe that is the state of things which everyone in this chamber desires to see brought about. I believe that is a set of economic circumstances which everyone desires to see created.

If the truth were known I think it could be said of every one of us that we are constantly trying to get out of all the work humanly possible in order that we may have more leisure. Leisure is not a loafer's paradise; it is an opportunity for self-imposed and self-initiated activity. When people are freed from the necessity of having to spend most of their time in order to keep body and soul together, they indulge in voluntary activities. In most instances they will expend more energy in those voluntary activities than they do in their hours of work. It is not work that anyone objects to so much; it is being compelled to work, whether that compulsion is by the government or by nature. No one wishes to be compelled to do anything. What the people want and desire is to choose their own activities.

When a government, whether it be this government or any other, seeks to compel the people of the nation to work, whether it be on public works or on work of other kinds, then that government is imposing a condition of slavery upon the people. That is the condition we had before war broke out. In many instances roads were being built with picks and shovels and wheel-barrows while the machinery capable of doing the work was rusting. I consider that a condition of slavery. To arrange our national economy so that the people may choose their own forms of activities and put themselves to work is a different situation.

I believe that the extent to which the people of Canada will be free after this war is over will be the extent to which they are freed from compulsory work, whether that is imposed by a government or by natural circumstances. The work state is nothing less than a slave state. From my conversations with members of the armed forces as well as with other people it is my belief that what they desire most of all when they return—those who will be fortunate enough to return—after this awful calamity is brought to a conclusion is the greatest possible freedom from compulsory labour, and the greatest possible opportunity to indulge in voluntary activities. One reason we are fighting this war is to drive from the earth the philosophy of compulsion of any kind. If our heroes come back to a work state, then much of the sacrifice they have made during the war will have been in vain. Man was made in the image of his creator, and as such he has been blessed with creative instincts. Man will never really be free until he has had the greatest possible opportunity to express those God-given instincts. The power of the machine and all the accumulations of inventive science have made it possible for man to-day to have a greater opportunity for self-chosen activity than ever before in the history of the world.

The real question, as I see it, in connection with employment or unemployment is not so much the question of employment as it is the question of empayment. Naturally, when one talks about a six-hour day, a five-hour day or a four-hour day, the worker's reaction is: Well, if the number of hours of work is cut down to that extent, what is going to happen to my income? If the number of man-hours necessary to produce the standard of living which the average Canadian desires is reduced to six or five or four, what will be the consequence so far as the income of the individual worker is concerned? Will it be cut accordingly? That is a question which naturally arises in the mind of any worker. What happens when a machine is placed in a factory and displaces one hundred or five hundred or one thousand men is that not only does the man's job disappear but his pay cheque too. Private enterprise has been condemned for this. There are those who say that private enterprise failed before the war broke out because it did not provide jobs. There are those who are saying now that if, after the war, private enterprise does not provide jobs it must be eliminated.

I wish to say with respect to private enterprise that I do not consider it the duty or obligation of private enterprise anywhere to provide jobs. That never was the duty or responsibility of private enterprise. The only legitimate function of private enterprise is to provide goods; that is all. I say to those who are so speaking on behalf of private enterprise that they assume that the provision of employment is an obligation of private enterprise. They are assuming a situation which is simply impossible, and furthermore it is undesirable; for, after all, the only legitimate and sound function of the economic system is to provide goods, whether that requires jobs or not. If we can produce most of our essentials of life and the common luxuries as well through the use of a lot of mechanical robots, then I think we should do it.

There is a lot of criticism being made of private enterprise to-day. I do not believe that the thing which is at fault is the principle of private enterprise. The only thing which I can see wrong with private enterprise is the abuse of that privilege, as well as the deficiencies which are inherent in the system, and which are nobody's fault, but which must be corrected.

The low wages to which the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) referred when he spoke last night of the Dominion Textile company paying twenty-two cents an hour, is an abuse of the privilege of private enterprise. It is not because of the use of the principle. Likewise improper working conditions, abuses of one kind or another which are resorted to, monopolies and so forth—all these are abuses of the system, and the criticism which I make of our friends, the socialists, and those who criticize private enterprise is that they are constantly confusing the use of the system with the abuse of the system. I believe it was last session that the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) on one occasion spent almost the whole of his forty minutes in making a speech in attributing all the evils of society to private enterprise. I do not consider that that is fair or just, for after all, if the truth were known, I believe that every last individual in this country, whether he calls himself a socialist, a communist or anything else, really believes in private enterprise for himself. If the abuses of the private enterprise system are corrected and its deficiencies taken care of, I believe that it is the best system that we can ever have. When the socialists and those who advocate government ownership contend that the way to deal with the abuses of the private enterprise system is for the nation to take it over, I say that is equivalent to saying that we ought to abolish freedom for fear of its being abused. My personal belief is that it is only under a system of genuine private enterprise that we can ever have genuine freedom. Substituting state monopoly for private monopoly is no remedy for the abuses, because one monopoly is just as bad as another.

Just a word with regard to the deficiencies inherent in the private enterprise system. This brings me to a point which we Social Credit people have made ever since we have been in the House of Commons. It is the original premise upon which Major Douglas based his proposals. It is a point which we contend is still true and will be still more so when the war is over. It lies at the basis of the deficiency of purchasing power which exists all the way through our system. The one fact in industry to which most economists and members of this house as well have to reconcile themselves is that industry is not self-liquidating. There has never been as much distributed in wages and salaries and in payment for raw materials in the process of the production of any article to equal the prices of the commodities which are offered for sale. I believe that the majority of the people of this country who think and speak upon economics still assume that when a thousand dollars worth of any commodity is produced, automatically there is one thousand dollars worth of purchasing power with which to purchase the commodity. They assume that when a shoe manufacturer produces ten thousand dollars worth of shoes, automatically there are ten thousand dollars worth of purchasing power in the system to buy those shoes. It is assumed by most economists that the ability to consume is always equal to production. That, I consider, is one of the major fallacies of economic thinkers. Major Douglas was one of the first to point this out, in saying that there is inherent in the system a chronic shortage of purchasing power which is never overcome.

I have here one statement which members of our group have placed on record before. I do not like to repeat facts and figures, but this is so fundamental that I think it must be repeated until it is acknowledged. The national bureau of economic research reports on the income of the United States—No. 2, pages 242 to 248—state that American industry in 1918—this is quite a way back, but we have no more recent figures, and the principle was just as true before the war as it will be after the war—paid out $45,548,000,000 in wages, salaries, dividends, bonuses, pensions, compensations, and all consumer purchasing power, and at the same time consumer goods were produced of the value of $60,366,000,000. In other words, there is a difference of practically twenty billion dollars between total income and total prices. Of that forty-five billions, about five and one-half billion dollars was reinvested in new production, so that cannot be considered as purchasing power in that cycle, and as a consequence the deficiency of purchasing power that existed at that time in the United States of America was approximately twenty billion dollars. That is not money which was in someone's savings somewhere; it was nothing other than the prices of commodities which were not monetized. It was not represented by money anywhere. The only way in which the people of the United States were enabled to make up that twenty billion dollars was through issuance of debt money on the part of the American government for public works, bonuses, pensions and so on. The cost of that was the increase of the national debt.

The point I wish to make is that in so far as Canada is concerned in the post-war period we shall have a very similar condition here, since it applies to all countries which operate on the private enterprise system. In that connection I wish to emphasize that the people who have the first claim on the production of any country are the people of that country. The only way in which the people of the United States could avail themselves of the sixty billion dollars worth of goods was to have sixty billion dollars in purchasing power, but they had only forty billions. Supporters of social credit say that this twenty billion dollar difference represents the cultural heritage of the people of the nation; it is that which belongs to them by reason of being citizens in this modern generation. The difference between total income and prices is there by reason of the substitution of power machinery for human effort. The wages of men were displaced by machines, but the prices of the goods continue piling up, and therefore the difference between total income and total prices is something which belongs inherently to the people as a whole, and they cannot acquire it until it is monetized. It is the duty of the state to monetize the difference between total income and total prices and distribute it to the consumers.

I do not think it requires much stretch of the imagination to see Canada, after the war has concluded, producing annually about twelve billion dollars worth of consumable goods. If we compare that production with the deficiency which existed in the United States, according to the figure I have just given, that would mean that Canadians would be short of about four to six billion dollars in purchasing power. If the Canadian economy is to be balanced, the consumers in Canada must have four to six billion dollars of extra buying power, which should not be issued either through increased taxation or increased borrowings. I notice that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on the occasion that he spoke indicated that there should be five billion dollars spent in Canada, I believe for public works.

Mr. COLDWELL: Post-war reconstruction.

Mr. KUHL: Post-war reconstruction. I noticed that he did not indicate where this money was to come from, whether it will be borrowed or raised by taxation or issued by the central bank of Canada debt-free. I wish to indicate that the only manner in which the Canadian economy can be balanced will be through the issue of five or six billion dollars, whatever is required to balance consumption and production, as a debt-free, tax-free issue of national money.

Mr. COLDWELL: Through a government-owned bank.

Mr. KUHL: Well, we have a government-owned bank at the present time.

Mr. COLDWELL: But not a government-owned banking system.

Mr. KUHL: Well, that raises the matter of chartered banks, which I have not time to discuss at the present time, much as I should like to do so. The essence of the whole thing is that there must be an addition of buying power to the extent of four to six billion dollars to balance our economy.

Mr. GRAYDON: Never mind the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. They just want a political bank.

Mr. KUHL: Well, we shall discuss that matter when the subject of banking is under discussion.

I should like to have concluded with a little elaboration of the ways and means whereby this four to six billion dollars could be expended in Canada, but my time is up, and I shall have an opportunity to deal with the subject at a later day. It is the principle of the thing about which I think we must be concerned. When that is done, it is my contention that our economy will balance without expropriating anybody's property. Personally I want to see a system in which the people have the greatest possible freedom, and I do not think that is possible unless private enterprise is permitted really to be private enterprise.

On motion of Mr. Bryce the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 3, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting the appointment of Mr. John Laundy, as Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, laid on the table of the house on Thursday, January 27, 1944, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTER (FRENCH)

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the recommendation of the Honourable the Speaker with respect to the resignation of Hector Benoit, Esquire, Parliamentary Reporter, French, House of Commons, laid on the table of the house on Monday, January 31, 1944, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LACOMBE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two-Mountains): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. L'Action Catholique, of Quebec, in its issue of February 2, 1944, makes the following statement:

Mr. Lacombe's Surprising Remarks

The member of parliament complained of the fact that the liquor commissions cheat the public by selling watered liquor.

That newspaper's correspondent does not select from Hansard even one sentence of the speech I made in the house on February 1. In short he distorts my words. By using such a procedure, which is disloyal, to put it mildly, he also distorts the meaning of my remarks. Therefore, I ask that the correspondent publish a textual report of my speech and of this sentence in particular, which is found in the House of Commons debates, on page 91:

It was not worth while imposing rationing when one knows that families which did not purchase ten ounces of alcohol a year have obtained their ration books, and now buy all the quantity authorized by the regulations. Can this be called healthy social legislation?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN OFFICIALS OF CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Press reports would appear to indicate that Mr. Norman Robertson, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, has recently been in Washington discussing current matters with United States authorities. Will the Prime Minister indicate to the house the nature and extent of these discussions, and also whether or not similar discussions are taking place between Canada and the United Kingdom and other parts of the British commonwealth?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that officials of the government of Canada and the government of the United States frequently exchange visits and discuss matters of general interest, among them some of the questions which will come up in relation to post-war policy. A few months ago I tabled in the house an exchange of notes between the United States and Canada with regard to an agreed point of view which the two countries entertain as to the trend of developments in the post-war period. There have been informal discussions between officials from time to time in relation to these matters.

I might say in answer to the second part of my hon. friend's question that similar exploratory discussions or talks have taken place between officials of the Canadian government and of the British government. They are part of a general plan of seeking to ascertain in advance of the moment when it comes to settle them, how far different governments may be in agreement on some of the all-important matters connected with post-war settlement.

WHEAT

AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce based on a report appearing in the Winnipeg Tribune of recent date, to the effect that the wheat delivery quota, which at present stands at fourteen bushels to the acre, is likely to be increased to a maximum of twenty bushels in that section of western Canada. This would be a great help to the farm storage situation. Will the minister tell the house if that procedure is likely to take place?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended making this statement to-day—it was my intention, rather, to make it to-morrow; nor had I any knowledge of the hon. member's intention to ask the question. Since it has been asked, however, I believe I can make a statement now.

The Canadian wheat board regulations are being amended to permit the delivery of eighteen bushels of wheat per authorized acre during the present crop year. This will represent an increase of four bushels over the fourteen bushel limit in effect to date, but will not become effective until established in the regular way by Canadian wheat board instruction.

The raising of quotas at country points already at the fourteen bushel limit will be deferred until the wheat board has been able to raise all country points to at least a ten-bushel quota, and steps have been taken to supply cars to the points which have been below that level. Before the end of the crop year it is intended to raise all stations to the eighteen-bushel quota, as a result of the heavier export movement than was envisaged a year ago when the 1943-44 delivery policy was first announced.

POSTAL SERVICE

AIR MAIL TO TROOPS IN THE MEDITERRANEAN AREA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General. In view of an announcement made by him a few weeks ago that direct aeroplane service had been established to carry mail to our troops serving in the Mediterranean area will the minister say whether letters bearing surface mail stamps are carried both ways by this service?

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as to the first part of the hon. member's question, in which he intimates that I made a statement a few weeks ago, I may say that he is in error; I did not make a statement. In fact I gave instructions to the officials of the department not to make any statement, or to hand any statement to the press, because I did not wish one made by the Post Office Department until such time as a regularly established service was in operation.

In regard to the second part of the hon. member's question, my reply would be that when the service is in full effect, and established, airgraph and armed forces air letters will be carried first; secondly, surface mail on which are affixed air stamps and, thirdly—if there is additional space—we will carry as large an amount as possible of the surface mail.

In regard to mail coming from our troops I would point out there is no charge on such mail, if posted in an army post office. I believe I have covered all the points about which the hon. member asked.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question? Is there any possibility of improving the mail service from overseas in the near future? From my own experience I know that letters bearing air mail stamps sometimes require a month for delivery, and arrive at the same time as letters posted at the same points with ordinary surface mail stamps on them.

Mr. MULOCK: My reply to the hon. member would be that of course it is a matter of securing the necessary space in aircraft coming in this direction. The situation is improving. Naturally the Post Office Department has to rely on such aeroplane service as it can arrange for. For instance, there is an arrangement with Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the facilities are being increased. That of course is a matter for the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). Then, additional arrangements are being made with the Royal Canadian Air Force, which of course comes under the supervision of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). I can assure the hon. member, however, that the Post Office Department through its officials is doing everything possible to obtain all the space it can get. As the hon. member will understand, there is difficulty in obtaining aircraft of the size and cruising range necessary for the carrying of mail across the Atlantic.

Mr. COLDWELL: The point is that the men overseas are paying sixpence for the sending of air mail which apparently is coming by ordinary surface mail service.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

BUTTER

QUESTION OF SUPPLY TO BRITAIN THROUGH EXPORT FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, in view of Britain's anxiety to maintain and perhaps increase her small ration of two ounces of butter per week, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he has received any request from Britain to increase our exports of butter. If so, will he state what steps he has taken to bring this about?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Very early in the war Great Britain placed a ration of two ounces per week upon butter. About the time that was being done she entered into an arrangement with different countries to supply different dairy products. The intimation to us was that we should put forth every effort to supply all possible quantities of cheese. We have been doing that since the beginning of the war, and our supplying any butter has been only a matter of accident. It has not happened intentionally on our part.

Last year we shipped the first butter which had been shipped from this country to Great Britain since the beginning of the war. In that year we shipped about 7,000,000 pounds. But the shipment was not made as a result of any intention on our part, or any desire expressed previously by the British government. Our present position is that Great Britain desires all the cheese she can get from Canada, and has expressed no desire that we should take any milk from cheese production in order to produce a supply of butter for her. Our present intention is to follow her wishes in that regard, and to produce as much cheese as possible.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, rising to speak for the first time in the house I should like to take this opportunity of extending my thanks to hon. members on each side of the house who have been so courteous, and have shown me so many kindnesses.

I come from the constituency of Selkirk, one of the largest in Canada, and represent the many classes of people there. In that constituency, adjacent to Winnipeg, we find industrial workers, office workers, and people in the professional classes. Then, going a little farther north, we have market gardeners and dairy farmers; and still farther north we come to those great inland lakes, with their fishermen. In the inter-lake country a large number of men are engaged in mixed farming, and also there are extensive Indian reserves. Our industrial workers are dissatisfied with labour conditions. They hope that in the near future the government will establish a code that will be satisfactory to the working classes.

For a moment I should like to deal with our market gardeners and dairy farmers. Prior to the war these farmers were forced to exploit their own families to the greatest extent; their wives and sons and daughters were forced to work for nothing in order to produce the necessities of life. Some of these boys have volunteered, and some have been called up. I appeal to the government to make every possible arrangement at seeding time so that these boys may be allowed to come back to carry on the necessary farm work. No doubt national selective service has done what it can, but ten men of the type that national selective service will send to these dairy farmers and market gardeners will not take the place of one man who is skilled in these occupations.

When prices are being discussed I should like the government to take into consideration the livelihood of our fishermen who fish from a boat in the summer and through the ice in the winter time. They face all kinds of hardship, and they represent another class, along with our farmers, which has been victimized to the utmost through low prices.

I should like to touch upon some of the injustices which our mixed farmers have been up against. Take wool, for instance. In 1942 the dominion government called a conference at which all nine provinces were represented, and explained what they were up against in connection with wool. They stated that they needed another 8,000,000 pounds of wool. To get that amount of wool would mean clipping another million sheep. With representatives of different farm organizations I went through my province and pleaded with the farmers to produce the increased supply of wool necessary to provide our boys with uniforms. It was most unfortunate that the federal Department of Agriculture made an agreement with the provincial governments and then left it to the discretion of the provinces whether or not they would live up to that agreement. I appeal to the government to make right that wrong.

A bonus on wool has been paid in Ontario and in Saskatchewan, our sister provinces, but Manitoba sheep men have not received any bonus because that province does not think she should subsidize the production of wool or anything else. This decision reacted not only on the production of wool but also on the production of lambs. We kept back lambs which we could have sold for twelve to fifteen cents a pound. When they were yearlings and we had a clip of wool we could get only five cents a pound for them on the Winnipeg market. To make the best of a bad bargain we disposed of the ewes and kept the yearlings, and we had to take seventy cents a sheep on the Winnipeg market. Mutton sold under the same ceiling as it did when the packing companies were paying four or five cents a pound for ewes. That is one injustice the farmer of Manitoba has had to suffer, and I should like the government to correct it.

A floor under prices is mentioned in the speech from the throne. I view with suspicion the establishment of a floor unless it is based on the cost of production. A floor has been placed under the price of butter; that product requires a subsidy of ten cents in order to make it profitable for the farmer to produce. We have a floor and a ceiling in connection with beef, but there is no ceiling on live cattle. The farmer does not sell beef; he sells live cattle, and that is where the ceiling and the floor should be.

To-day on the Winnipeg market 11¾ cent steers go into 19¼ cent beef. If you send in a carload of two-way cattle, which are not only fit to go into the feed lots—something that the Ontario feeder wants—but are fit to kill, what happens? If the Ontario feeder wants to feed those cattle he bids 9¾ cents, because he requires a spread. The processor or packer comes along and bids 10 cents, and the highest bidder gets them. The result is that the farmer loses from $25 to $27 on each one of those animals. You would expect 10 cent cattle to go into 17½ cent beef, but they do not. Those cattle go into commercial grades; they become 19¼ cent beef and, as I say, the farmer loses from $25 to $27 on each animal in the carload. The packer benefits and is able to earn excess profits. These things will have to be stopped.

Next I should like to refer to hogs. I have always been against the compulsory rail grading of hogs. When the government gave us compulsory rail grading, the same system that they had in Denmark, it looked good, but we got only half the system. We were not given the benefits of the cooperative abattoirs whereby the deductions and cuts, et cetera, would come back to the man who produced the bacon. I am against the compulsory rail grading of hogs unless the farmer is able to control the sales of his bacon. He might be better off if the government set the price of the grades, but now the packer does this.

The dominion government has brought in new rail grading regulations. They are not yet in operation at Winnipeg, but they will be in a few days. It is the 186-pound hog that is causing so much dissatisfaction among the farmers. That weight of hog is just between the select and heavy grades, being just over 185 pounds, and this difference represents a loss of $3.50. The farmer is apt to lose $3.50 over one pound of bacon. If the farmer had had the good fortune to have his hog weighed the next day it would have shrunk a pound, because there is that much difference between hot weight and cold weight. When one is standing on the floor of a room and wishes to reach a higher point he asks for a step-ladder, and by this means he can get up and down, step by step. That is what the farmer is asking for to-day, a step-ladder, a graduated scale. It is not fair that the farmer should lose $3.50 because his hog is one pound over the weight. I know that there has to be a jumping off point somewhere, but why make the farmer jump over a precipice? Let us do the thing more gradually.

The grading of these hogs is not satisfactory. The hog is graded on its way from the producer to the packing company. That is the grade set by the government. Then the hog is graded from the processor to the bacon board, and again from the bacon board to the British food ministry. There are eight grades under the new regulations, and five of them are for the bacon hog from which you get export bacon. Between the processor and the bacon board there are twelve grades; there are four sizes and there are grades A-1, A-2, and A-3 in each of those sizes. From the bacon board to the British food ministry there are two grades, A and B. The thing seems screwy to me. Why does not the first grading carry right through? I think that is what should be done; if the grading is good enough for the farmer, that grade should apply right through. Look up and see how many select A's the farmer gets. In October, ninety-two per cent of A's went to Britain. I hope that the government will do something this session to rectify the situation for the benefit of the farmer who is producing a heavy hog, because in every litter there is a heavy hog.

Some hon. members may ask me, how are you going to rectify the present situation? I would rectify it by establishing a board of live stock commissioners, with producer representation—and by producer I do not mean the man who spends his holidays on a farm; I mean the man who is a bona fide live stock producer, and he should be chosen by the people who produce the goods.

I know that the next objection raised will be, where is the money coming from? I am going to tell you where the money can come from, too. In 1906 the packing industry in this country was granted power to collect half of one per cent as T.B. condemnation insurance on every animal they bought. Since that time the government has been very active in establishing T.B. free areas all over this country. Our cooperative organizations which carry their own T.B. condemnation insurance to-day are carrying it for less than one-quarter of one per cent. If you allow the packers to retain one-quarter of one per cent, with the other quarter of one per cent you could establish a board of live stock commissioners to administer this board.

I wish to draw the attention of the government to the deplorable conditions among the destitute Indians in the northern part of my constituency. I visited that district some time ago, and I found terrible conditions in the hospital at Norway House. It is a sixteen-bed hospital, and I found there forty-three patients, in the corridors and everywhere else. The Indian band there comprises approximately one thousand people. There will be many fewer now because they were dying like flies from tuberculosis while I was there. Nine had died in the seven weeks previous to my visit, and they were between two and sixteen years of age. Those destitute Indians receive every fifteen days ten pounds of flour, two pounds of bacon of the sow belly type, two ounces of tea and one bar of soap. I found one man who was totally blind receiving that allowance. This is a deplorable state of affairs, and I urge the government to correct it.

These, Mr. Speaker, are a few of the conditions which mark the failure of our economy. There must be a planned agriculture in a planned cooperative economy. Then the fruits of the labours of all the farmers will be returned to the farmers, and not to a few industrialists as excessive profits.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne delivered a few days ago contained some of the most pronounced advances in social legislation measures that have been proposed by any government in Canada. It was interesting to hear the different reactions from the various opposition groups, after they had recovered their breath. Some chided the government for stealing its measures from their platform of rights. Others stated that the government's proposed social legislation was due to the activities of their own particular group. On the other hand, these measures have been referred to as the beginning of a new era. In this connection I wish to quote from a speech from our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in London, England, on September 4, 1941, in which he said:

> Much is being said about a new world order to take the place of the old world order when the war is at an end. If that new order is not already on its way before the war is over, we may look for it in vain.

That was said, Mr. Speaker, in 1941, before some of the parties in this house got the idea that perhaps they might next be called upon to assume the reins of government.

As was to be expected, the speech from the throne dealt first of all with the war effort and the favourable position in which the allies find themselves to-day. The timely warning that the war is not yet at an end was justified, and I believe was made at the proper time. We have this sobering fact before us, that this year will be the last year on earth for many of Canada's splendid citizens; it is a sobering thought indeed.

The government's foreign policy, that its first objective is to continue with the principle announced in 1939, namely, the winning of the war, will be commended by all citizens of Canada.

Regarding the recent speech which was made by Lord Halifax, and which has excited considerable comment and criticism, the reply of the Prime Minister has been very well received, and, what is more significant, it has been well received in Great Britain. To my mind the remarks were premature. It is premature, especially, when one views the state of affairs in the world, for us to make any definite commitments regarding our foreign policy. One remark I would make, however, in passing, is that it is high time that the people of Great Britain knew as much of Canada and of the Canadian people as we know about the people of Great Britain. It might help to a better understanding if Canada's position and its people were more generally understood in that country. We must face facts to-day; we are not dealing with idealism. True it is that in holy writ it is prophesied that there will come a time when the nations shall beat their war weapons into agricultural implements; but as I look upon the world I recognize that I for one shall not live long enough to see that day; to my mind it is still a long way off. Therefore we must look at the world as it is to-day and so face the actual realities. Nations are not considered strong simply because they have great numbers of people within their borders; they are considered strong through the strength of their military equipment. As an illustration I cite the great country of China. In 1935 the nations of the world were pitying poor China because she had been attacked and ravaged by Japan, although China has between four and five hundred million people. To-day she is regarded as one of the great powers which will help to decide the peace following the conclusion of hostilities.

I think we are all agreed now that Russia will have quite a say in settling the affairs of Europe. I take some exception to the suggestion made the other day by Lord Robert Cecil that British judges should sit upon tribunals to prevent injustices to the Germans. My own opinion in that regard is that such a suggestion is both premature and mischievous—premature, because the winning of the war should be our first consideration; mischievous, because one could interpret it as being aimed directly at some of the powers in Europe that might want justice following the conclusion of hostilities. No wonder that Lord Vansittart, who by the way had quite a lengthy experience as Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in his book "The Promise", makes the statement that there is little doubt that the English have been idiots in their handling of foreigners. Whilst I would not care to go as far as that, Mr. Speaker, I would say this, however, that the handling of foreigners by the British people and by the people of this country has often been interpreted by many foreigners in this land and in Great Britain as a sign of weakness on our part, and by certain groups has not been appreciated; certainly we have not been given credit for it.

Coming for a moment or two to Russia, I wish briefly to outline to the house a little of the history of that nation. I have one particular reason in mind, namely there is an opinion prevailing throughout this country that the great sacrifices and the great fighting qualities of the Russians have come suddenly upon the Russian people, especially since the new regime under communism, or since the inception of the Stalin administration. Such is not the case. Russia has had seven centuries of fighting. As far back as the year 1380 they were the first to beat the invincible Tartars, the first to throw off the Tartar yoke. Coming to 1702, the scorched-earth policy was first put into effect at the time when Peter the Great defeated Charles XII of Sweden; and then in the war with Prussia, 1756-63, when Great Britain was on the side of Prussia. I wonder how many hon. members realize that in the year 1760 Russian troops marched into the city of Berlin. Again in the year 1779 Russian troops entered Rome, and the line of General Suvorov's march across the Alps is still marked on the Swiss maps. In 1805 Russia, in alliance with Austria and Britain, fought against France; and she fought her again in 1812, when Napoleon invaded Russia—because he felt, as Hitler did afterward, that he should first of all put Russia under his heel. The great fighting qualities of Russians have come down through all the ages, and they have one characteristic which to my mind we could well take to heart in this country, and that is their love of their land.

There must be a better understanding with Russia, based on good will, if we really desire a lasting peace following the end of the war.

There are some matters I wish to discuss before dealing with the proposed social legislation. The first one I have in mind emanates from a remark I interjected when the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) was speaking yesterday, when he was dealing with a statement made by the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation advocating the taking over of certain shares owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway company. I disagree with part of the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, my interjection being that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation might well be playing into the hands of certain Canadian Pacific interests. Those large interests are not concerned entirely with the railroad; their ramifications to-day are many; and whilst we see a great freight and passenger traffic to-day, there was a time not so long ago when the railroads might have been taken over for a mere song, so to speak. But I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury in his statement that taking over those shares can have but one end, and that is the amalgamation of the two railroads, and I think there should be no mistaking that fact. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has soft-pedalled a little, as he does at times. He first makes a statement about taking over certain railway shares, and then when criticism arises he tries to tell the public, "Oh, but if we take that road over as a government-owned concern, the two railroads will be made to compete one with the other." Did anyone ever hear a more absurd or impractical suggestion than that? I have not. We might as well call a spade a spade and be done with it. I take exception to that—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Give him rope enough and he will hang himself.

Mr. REID: And I will probably take more exceptions to the remarks of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation later on in the session. In my opinion, and I am reaffirming it, it will mean the amalgamation of the two roads. Make no mistake about it.

Some members have already commented on P.C. 9384, and while I have no doubt full opportunity will be given the house to discuss this, I want to place myself on record now as being absolutely opposed to that order and the ramifications contained therein. I speak not only as a member of the house but as one who has held practically all his life and still holds a very honourable union card. I am not going to go into the various ramifications of the act, but I am at a loss to understand why at this late date such an order should have been passed, and I would advise the Minister of Labour and the government to reconsider this order before it becomes effective. We have been giving labour just praise for the splendid things they have done since the war began. If we mean this, then why this order, and one I would term iniquitous, after we have been four years at war? However, I expect to have more to say when the matter itself comes before the house.

I have one or two words to say to hon. members, through you, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the proposed changes in the rules of the House of Commons. No doubt the rules of the house have to be changed as time goes on in order to meet changing conditions, but I hope I am making myself clear when I say that I for one am going to protest against the curtailment of, or any attempt to curtail, free speech within this House of Commons. I fear if it starts here the process of curtailment may well be carried on outside this house. There was a time in the House of Commons when a member could speak as long as he liked, and the same arguments were used then against the length of speeches. Oh, it was said, too much time is taken up with speeches. And so a limitation was set at forty minutes. Now again we have reached the stage where it is said that there is too great a waste of time. Well, there may seem to be a waste of time, there may seem to be a repetition of speeches, but after all we must be careful in this matter. Let us take thought where we are going, because this is the only place where the people's voice can be heard.

Do members of this house realize how complex our life has become these days with a multiplicity of boards? The men at the heads of these boards in many instances care not for the public, and they care much less for the people's representatives. Since the war began, my complaint has been, not that there has been too much speaking but that there has not been enough speaking on the part of many members on the government side against some of the injustices which have been growing up. I therefore want to place myself on record in this matter, even though I know there may be endless repetition of speeches. My fear is that the move to curtail free speech here, if encouraged in this house, will lead some time in the future to the curtailment of speeches outside the house.

With regard to the proposed social legislation, I would say first of all a word touching the announcement made the other day by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) concerning certain beneficial changes dealing with war veterans and their allowances. I believe the proposed changes will be well received, and I want to pay my meed of commendation and praise for what the minister has done. I would say this with regard to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and I say it fearlessly. When I look over the proposed social legislation I think I can see some of his handiwork, and I know something of the fight he has had to carry on in order to bring about some of the proposed changes.

My first comment on the proposed social legislation is with reference to family allowances. I was surprised to see, the moment that announcement was made, the different points of view that were expressed in various parts of the country. For instance, there was the view advanced by a very reliable paper in the province of Quebec, L'Action Catholique—I hope I am pronouncing it correctly. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that my French is not as good as yours, much as I would like it to be. I have had enough trouble speaking the English language without learning another. However, this paper attacks the allowance plan as "pagan", and it goes on to say that it may well result in curtailing families in the province of Quebec. This to me is a novel idea. It is the first time I have heard the view advanced that the granting of money to families would have any effect on large families in the province of Quebec. I have heard the opposite advocated in other provinces, that the lack of money has resulted in curtailing families. As I say, this is something new. No decision has been made by the government, however, as to the limitation in the number of the family; therefore the attack is perhaps somewhat premature.

It may interest the house to know that more than thirty countries in the world have already established family allowances. Included in this number are Australia and New Zealand. In 1942 Mr. Curtin, the head of the Australian labour government, stated that the reaffirmation of that legislation in Australia had been universally applauded because it was a real and permanent benefit to children.

In some respects labour has taken exception to family allowances. I differ entirely from those among the ranks of labour who say that it may keep down wages. Be that as it may, there is no doubt that it would be a great help to the farming community, and I draw these figures to the attention of farmer members. The farming community in the country have one-half of the nation's children; yet they receive only one-tenth of the national income. That is very significant. I bring that seriously to the attention of every hon. member.

I was very much pleased, as must have been all members representing farming communities, to hear the announcement that a floor would be placed under agricultural prices. I am glad that this matter will be handled by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), for whom I have had a great deal of sympathy since the war started, because I am one of those who have said that agriculture was in some respects bedeviled by having three ministers of agriculture in the cabinet. I have said fearlessly, and I will keep on saying, that agriculture might have been a great deal better off had agricultural policy and prices been left entirely to the present Minister of Agriculture, who has been one of the most outstanding ministers holding that portfolio that Canada has ever had.

The war record of the government has been an excellent one, and so far we have heard little adverse comment either in this house or anywhere throughout the country on the great effort the nation has put forth under the present administration. However, I trust that as soon as possible, following the end of hostilities all regimentation will be removed.

I mentioned something a short while ago with regard to the multiplicity of boards that had been set up, and this is what I find in my travels around the country. I find that the multiplicity of boards, each acting independently, have sent many people almost crazy. I am going to mention one or two instances, just to show what I mean by that. In the city of Vancouver one firm which handles the renting of apartments had a complaint sent in by one of the tenants, a woman who kept all the windows of the apartment open day and night but who complained to the rental control authorities that the apartment was not properly heated. An officer was sent down and, failing to notice the open windows, he saw that the temperature was low and reported accordingly, so those renting the apartment were told they would have to put on more heat. They did so, and then what do you think happened? Someone in the building complained to the coal controller that the building was kept too warm, and two days later he sent down a man, who ordered part of the coal supply of that building cut off. The manager said to me, "Mr. Reid, it is these rulings that are just driving us frantic."

I am very sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is not in his place, because I have one or two complaints to make in regard to matters which come under his department and as to which he should be kept posted. Various comments have been made with regard to selective service, and you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that last year I pointed out that practical men should be in charge of the selective service offices instead of men who had simply done office work, but the salaries offered are not sufficient to attract highly qualified men to these jobs. Among others there was one complaint which was very unusual. Men were required for the Oakalla prison, and you know that in order to look after prisoners you must be able-bodied. Selective service sent up, not at the same time but on following days, two men, each of whom had only one arm. Then before coming east, as part of my duties I visited the penitentiary where I found being introduced a system which on examination seems most ridiculous and which has greatly upset the personnel of that institution. It appears that there is what is known as a labour relations bureau being built up under the Department of Labour, and many heads of departments are being asked to take a course in this particular instruction. The entire course I believe lasts ten hours, after which a certificate of competency is granted. In Vancouver a man by the name of Jones—I do not know whether or not he had a certificate or whether he had ever been inside a penitentiary—came to the penitentiary one day with some authority and told the warden, deputy warden and guards that they would have to parade before him because he was going to give them a lecture on how to handle convicts. The warden said to me, "I have been handling convicts successfully for thirty years. Do you think we are going to parade out there and have him tell us in a half hour lecture how to handle these men?" I do not know what experience Mr. Jones had; for all I know he should have been in there with the men.

I want these criticisms to be taken seriously by the minister, because it is this sort of thing that is just driving our people crazy. We have enough to do in connection with the war effort without having these other things inflicted upon us. Then again, while no doubt it was a splendid move when we took steps to keep down inflationary prices, in my opinion prices have been raised by many manufacturers as a result of the system now in effect of offering for sale at the ceiling price goods which are of very inferior quality. I believe that whatever department is responsible for this sort of thing ought to carry on some further investigation with regard to the distribution of goods, because certainly the shelves of many stores in Vancouver and New Westminster are bare of certain articles though we find that many of those things are easily obtainable in stores in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto. I make that statement seriously. All we ask is our fair share. We are quite willing to make sacrifices, but it causes a great deal of unrest among our people when it becomes known that articles which are not procurable in the province of British Columbia are easily obtainable in the other provinces. As one man said to me, British Columbia is looked upon in the east as away in Timbuktu, and not as part of the Dominion of Canada.

I see that my time has almost expired. I conclude my remarks by saying that later in the session I shall deal more fully with many of the matters I have touched upon to-day, unless of course in the meantime the rules are amended so that no hon. member may speak more than once.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne divides itself into two principal parts. The first has to do, and very rightly, with advising this house that it is our immediate duty to prosecute the war as vigorously as possible. I am one hundred per cent behind that, but at this moment I am not going to discuss the war or its prosecution; I prefer to wait until I have heard the several ministers of defence tell the house what is being done to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion. I am going to deal with the second part of the speech from the throne, which calls for vigorous preparation for post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation. I am heartily in favour of vigorous preparation for the period of reconstruction and rehabilitation which will follow the war, and I am glad to see from the order paper of to-day that a rehabilitation committee is once more to be set up. In that connection may I express the hope that the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon), who was chairman last year, who was an indefatigable worker and always on the job, may be reappointed as chairman this year.

For quite a few years now, with other hon. members of this house, I have listened to western members tell us of their difficulties. I am sorry to have to confess that several years ago I did not give the attention to either the origin or solution of those difficulties that I have given during the last four years. I always felt that there must be a cause, but since no major remedy was brought forward I did not see at the time what could be done. Some few years ago I began to inquire into the matter personally, to see if I could find any major cause of the difficulties and, if so, whether I might discover a remedy. I was greatly depressed a few years ago when I made a trip from Regina to Estevan; in that particular year everything was dried out. I said to myself, there should be some way to overcome dried-out areas in the west. There have been droughts throughout the history of the world, and I began to examine into the causes of those droughts in other countries, and to see how the difficulties were remedied.

I learned that prior to the advent of the "golden hordes" of Genghis Khan into the Turkestanian plains in the fourteenth century, those plains were a smiling area of prosperity, with marvellous crops. But when those hordes went through and destroyed the reservoirs of the two great rivers on the plains, namely the Amu and the Syr, for the following five hundred years much of those plains was barren. Only within the life of modern man have the Turkestanian plains come back to full fertility. The Russians have done what Canada has not done, and they have done it in a major fashion by building vast reservoirs on those rivers. To-day there is no part of Asia more prolific of crops than are the Turkestanian plains, which otherwise would have been barren. The improvement is brought about by irrigation, in the same fashion as it was done by their ancestors five hundred years ago.

The same applies to a large portion of the Punjab. Before the hordes of Akbar marched through that part of India, it, too, was an area of prolific crops. Now that dear old Britain has erected and recently opened a huge dam across the Indus, that country will all come back.

And who is there who does not know that before the British went into Egypt great famines were frequently experienced, until the population of that country was reduced by millions? But the British have restored the productivity of Egypt by building vast dams. I have in mind particularly the one at the first cataract. The Assuan dam is 132 feet high, and approximately a mile wide. It backs that great river up for 140 miles, and provides irrigation facilities for 3,000,000 to 6,000,000 acres, depending on the season. The result is that never in its history has Egypt had such productivity as it has to-day.

The same applies to North Africa. Before the hordes of Mohammed marched across Libya, Cyrenaica and Tripolitania, all the northern fringe of those states was thoroughly settled by millions of people. Crops were grown by means of irrigation from the small rivers flowing down to the Mediterranean sea from the hills of North Africa. But after the troops of Mohammed marched through, from that day until recently those plains have been a barren desert. Our soldiers have fought in that country, and they know something about it. It is true that the Italians had begun, in recent years, to restore productivity through irrigation. But these are examples of what can be derived from irrigation, and the condition which follows when there is no water to accelerate growth.

Our cousins to the south of us have shown us the way, here in America, where they have made millions upon millions of acres of dry land fit for the growth of good crops. Let us consider Arizona—a state which derives its name from the word "arid". To-day Arizona is one of the finest states in the American union, because they have harnessed their rivers from the mountains and diverted the waters of those rivers to the plains of Arizona. Let us consider what they have done recently at Grand Coulee and Boulder dams. When Boulder dam is in full operation, 2,000,000 acres of arid land adjacent thereto, either in Arizona, California or Nevada, will come into productivity. That, Mr. Speaker, is an example of what Canada should do. The same applies to Grand Coulee where shortly another million and a quarter acres will be in productivity in the state of Washington.

Canada must do more in her western country, and I am going to advocate this both in the house and out of it until I see something done in a major way to restore the west. I say that because I am convinced if it is not restored and if farms from which thousands upon thousands of good honest farmers in Saskatchewan, southwestern Manitoba and southern Alberta have been forced to flee, because of a lack of water, are not restored, we shall have reason to regret not taking action.

The failure of those farmers has meant the ruination of much business in Canada, and I shall continue to advocate development of the west until it has received a square deal. We hear some talk about what it would cost. Well, it may cost up to $100,000,000 but what does that matter? That is no more than it cost to build Shipshaw—it is even less. Two or three of the programmes I shall present would not cost more than $20,000,000 each. That is not much more than the cost of the Montreal bridge—and I should like it to be understood that I am in favour of both the building of the Montreal bridge and the Shipshaw development.

It is up to the members from the east to rally to the support of the west. This is the industrial part of Canada. Having been in big business myself for many years, during which time I watched a plant grow from a small to a very large business concern, I believe I know my subject. That plant grew most when the west started to grow. It receded in the past few years, because the west receded. We have got to restore it.

This is only one of the things I am going to talk about to-day. I shall confine my remarks to irrigation. Last summer I travelled some 8,000 miles by boat, motor, horse and otherwise, making a survey of this problem. I am convinced that the west has not had a square deal, and as an eastern member it is my duty to raise my voice in an attempt to see that it does get a square deal.

What is the situation to-day? A few nights ago I read the tenth verse of the second chapter of Genesis, "And a river went out of Eden to water the garden." That is a verse upon which I can base my remarks, because the foothills of the Rocky mountains and the eastern slopes of those glorious mountains make me think of what Eden might have been—a beautiful, beautiful land. We have many such beautiful pictures in Canada. I think particularly of standing at Cardston and looking to the Rocky mountains in the west. One of the most beautiful pictures I have ever seen was in that part of Alberta west of Cardston. Stand at Morleyville, west of Calgary, and look at the Rocky mountains. We Canadians have not been fair to that country, and I refer to eastern Canadians especially. I, too, have not taken the interest in the west I should have taken. I charge myself perhaps more than others because from travelling and reading I believe I should have considered the matter earlier.

The country roundabout is wonderful country. The soil has all the chemical ingredients required for complete production. I discussed the matter with professors. Many of those men took me out on the prairies; but one in particular said, "Mr. MacNicol, this bald-headed prairie, covered with sage, wild grass and wild rose, will grow prolific crops, if it obtains water in season." But the water has to be harnessed. We have been asleep at the switch so far as harnessing the water of western Canada is concerned, the water which will give life to those prairies. We must divert water on to the land, as our cousins to the south of us have done, and as has been done in other places throughout the world.

There are four rivers which flow from Montana into Alberta. One of them, the Milk river, I shall not discuss. But there are three others west of the Milk river, known as the Waterton, Belly and St. Mary rivers. They flow with beautiful clear water, having their source in the Montana Rocky mountains. Their water is full of all the chemicals, in solution, which are required for the growing of crops. What are we doing with it? In 1921 we entered into a treaty with the United States by which each country was given permission to erect reservoirs. Why? The state of Montana was the first to use the waters, and they could have taken all these waters and developed their country to an even greater extent than it is developed to-day. Mr. Charles Magrath, I believe at that time the chairman for Canada of the International Joint Commission, protested and as a result a treaty was entered into by which Canada was given a fair share of the waters from these three rivers.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) perhaps has a better knowledge of these matters. The treaty stated that each country should build reservoirs to conserve the portion of the water allowed it, and implied that if either country did not attempt to conserve the waters, then the other could have the waters. Our American cousins have built magnificent reservoirs south of the international boundary, but we have not built any on our side. Hon. members will find in their boxes copies of a sheet I have been using in talking about this subject. I hope those who are interested in trying to do something for Canada will read it, in conjunction with Hansard.

I am talking for all of Canada, not merely for the west. I am convinced that Canada cannot progress if the east alone progresses or if the west alone progresses. We must progress together. If we have a depression in the west, we are bound to have it in the east. As I say, we have not built reservoirs on our side of the line. I examined the sites where reservoirs could be built. We could obtain water from the St. Mary river, alone, had we reservoir capacity, capable of covering 362,000 acres one foot deep. An acre contains 43,560 square feet, so that if you multiply 362,000 by 43,560, you have a volume of water which could be conserved from the St. Mary river alone amounting to about 35 billion cubic feet.

On our side of the line this surplus water is running away. We have not equipped ourselves in southern Alberta to use this surplus water. Our American cousins have, but we have not. If we do not do this, we may lose this water. This should be one of the first programmes for post-war rehabilitation. It was presented by Mr. George Spence when he appeared before the reconstruction committee. We should build these reservoirs so that Canada can conserve this surplus water for more irrigation.

South of the general line of the South Saskatchewan river—I am referring to the Oldman river and other tributaries which form the South Saskatchewan—we are now irrigating something like 200,000 acres, and we are irrigating approximately another 200,000 acres immediately north of that general line. I believe the total acreage now actually taking water in this area is something between 350,000 and 400,000. But we could irrigate much more than this. With the present equipment we could irrigate 500,000 acres if we only had the water, and with adequate reservoirs and canals we could irrigate 600,000 more. We have not the reservoirs and we should have them.

What have been the results of irrigation in Alberta? They have been incredible. I have never seen anything like it. On one side of the road—I am speaking figuratively—you have the bald prairie, while on the other side you have the cultivation of sugar beets and all sorts of crops. There are 27,000 acres in southern Alberta in sugar beets, producing an average crop of twelve tons to the acre, with a top production of eighteen tons per acre. There are two sugar beet factories, one at Raymond and the other at Picture Butte. Those are fine factories, but there should be at least five sugar beet factories in Alberta to provide employment after the war. Employment should be provided for the fine boys from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba when they come back from overseas by and by. Those two sugar beet factories in 1942 produced 900,000 bags of sugar. I do not know just how many pounds are in a bag, but that is a lot of sugar. But the production should be four or five times that amount, and that would be possible if these reservoirs were built and the water were made available to the farmers for greater irrigation.

The first picture on the front of this sheet shows the St. Mary river with the first irrigation dam across it. This is a small dam, and an irrigation canal flows off to the right. The second picture shows the water dropping down from the first to the second level. The day I photographed it the flow was 445 cubic feet per second, but in the growing season they require at least 1,000 cubic feet. That amount would be available all through the growing season if these reservoirs were built.

Why should not southern Alberta be given a chance to shine in the sun? In reality it is always shining in the sun, but it should be given this opportunity economically just the same as eastern Canada is able to shine in the sun. The third picture shows the first artery leading off from the general canal. That flows out to the farms, and then small capillary canals run off that artery into the different farms.

In addition to growing sugar beets, vast quantities of marvellous corn are grown. I visited two canning factories, one at Taber and the other at Lethbridge. They are able to produce 750,000 cases of corn of 24 cans each, and perhaps as much peas. I understand that each acre produces 150 cases of corn, or about 300 cases of peas. There is much non-irrigated prairie land capable of similar production; why should it not be put into production? Other vegetables are produced in comparable quantity. No relief has been necessary in that part of Alberta. If they could not sell what they produced, they would have plenty to eat. There are some wonderful towns in that part of the province, like Raymond, Cardston, Magrath, and so on. Lethbridge was the most prosperous city I saw during my travels last summer. These irrigation canals should be extended to the limit. I notice the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) is in the chamber. He represents a fine city; I spent more than a day there last summer. There are great irrigation possibilities north and south of the Saskatchewan river, west of Medicine Hat. On the north side of the river an unfinished, unwatered irrigation canal now extends towards Medicine Hat, and if completed they could have irrigation right up to the city. From the end of the canal I could see the chimneys of Medicine Hat, or perhaps it was the chimneys of Redcliff, a suburb. There was not a drop of water in that canal for seventy miles because they had not the money to finish it. That is not fair to Medicine Hat or to the people on those plains where you see abandoned farms in every direction. People who had settled there with their families had to get out because they could not produce on dried-out land. I am going to advocate as strongly as I can that that irrigation canal, with the necessary reservoirs on the north side of the Saskatchewan river, be completed up to the suburbs of Medicine Hat; and the same on the south side of the river, east from Taber. There would be plenty of water available, if conserved, which could be used for irrigation purposes, and it belongs to us. All we have to do is to build the reservoirs and irrigation canals to make this fertile land produce. It would not in the end cost this country a single dollar, because the project would be self-liquidating. Why it has not already been done I do not know. If I had had charge of any department with control of irrigation, that work would have been done long ago, even if it had been necessary for me to tour the country and ask the people to subscribe $100,000,000 to complete the project. I have spoken to many boards of trade in the east on this subject and they were one hundred per cent behind putting that part of Canada in a position where it can live, and it is not in that position now. Farmers on irrigated land go into mixed farming. They raise many cattle, horses, hogs and sheep. Only the other day I read about the vast number of cattle shipped out of Alberta last year.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his seat, but I hope he will come forward with an irrigation project as part of an after-the-war rehabilitation and reconstruction programme. It would do several things. It would provide a lot of employment locally, it would give the farmers a better opportunity to produce, and it would help our eastern manufacturers to provide jobs. Of course, I have to say a word for my own workers.

There are other areas in Saskatchewan and Alberta where thousands of acres could be put into production. West of Saskatoon and directly north of Cabri and on to Tramping lake, there are 2,000,000 acres which could be put under irrigation. I believe that the engineers who have been searching for a safe site have now found one near Saskatchewan Landing, where they can build a dam 150 feet high and back the river up for 100 miles. Talk about foundations on the Saskatchewan river! Last summer I went east twenty-six miles from the fine city of Prince Albert, where in 1913 the people of Prince Albert commenced to build a dam across the Saskatchewan river at La Colle rapids, the first one on the Saskatchewan. The city of Prince Albert itself undertook the project, I think, although I am not quite sure about that. But it matters not who undertook it. They built the dam half way across the river, and then for very good reasons went no further. I believe they had made no provision for the reservoirs which would be necessary up the river. That dam which was built in 1913 is of the Ambursen type, which is a very good type, I believe, with a broad base and of reinforced concrete. That dam has been standing for thirty years and has withstood all the buffeting of floods and ice and is still in very good shape. I am going to suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that that dam be finished, as a start on a North Saskatchewan river rehabilitation project, which would include the building of other dams, including one at Fort à la Corne and elsewhere. The government would be justified in taking over that dam and completing it and returning to Prince Albert a million dollars or more which the people of that city sank into it thirty years ago.

There are two million more acres which could be irrigated in the area to which I have referred, directly north of Cabri and on up to Tramping lake and west of Saskatoon. I also examined the area east of the river, between Regina, Moose Jaw and the river, carefully with engineers. I took someone with me who knows engineering and he stated that at least another 500,000 acres in Saskatchewan could be irrigated in that area. We passed by many abandoned farms. People had settled there years ago. I took a picture of one of these farms. It is shown on the last page of this circular near the bottom, picture No. 6. It was unfair to allow these fine settlers of early days to go in and settle there, whether they came from the old country, from the maritimes or from grand old Ontario—unfair just to let them settle there and say to them; root, hog, or die. I do not say that any government took that attitude, because I do not want to mention politics in discussing a problem of this kind. This irrigation plan is a gargantuan programme, a nation-building programme which, if carried into operation and completed, would bring wonderful returns all across Canada.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): How about reclaiming the marsh lands in the bay of Fundy?

Mr. MacNICOL: As I said at the beginning, I am confining my remarks to one programme. I shall be glad to make a speech on behalf of the east at another time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You are not against that?

Mr. MacNICOL: No; I am for it, and in due course I will give a speech on behalf of the maritimes. Just now I am speaking of an area in the west covering altogether three million acres which can be irrigated. What would that mean for the west? It would mean thirty thousand more farmers producing, with an average of 100 acres to a farm. It would also mean another thirty thousand people working in the cities to take care of the farmers' wants. It would mean employment for many thousands of people. For instance, when I was out west, on many occasions I saw products made by the Amherst boiler company, in my hon. friend's riding. I saw shoes that had been made in Quebec city, brushes made in Saint John, fine large equipment made in Sherbrooke, sewing machines that had been made in St. Hyacinthe, paper from Cornwall, vast equipment made in Montreal, builders' hardware from Belleville, refrigerators from Renfrew, filing cabinets from Pembroke, motor cars from Oshawa, and a great deal of equipment from that fine old city of Peterborough, one of our very finest cities in the east, and of course a great quantity of material made in Toronto, much of it made in the riding I represent, such as boilers, radiators, tools, electric equipment and many other articles. I also saw products from London, Windsor, Stratford, Winnipeg and many other cities. Just fancy what the opening up of another thirty thousand farms would mean to the east as well as to the west! It would mean a lot to the west directly, of course, and I hope it would also mean the introduction of many industries in the west; for there is no reason why they should not manufacture in the west many of the things they require. There is no reason why they should not have manufacturing in the west, but they first have to have power. They have it in Alberta. They have little in Saskatchewan. With the project I advocate there will be a provision at Fort a la Corne of approximately 125,000 horsepower; a dam at Riverhurst would supply 86,000 horsepower, and one near Saskatchewan Landing, about 75,000 horsepower. At Riverhurst the average flow every day of the year is 11,500 cubic feet per second. It goes lower and it goes much higher. At the La Colle site located east of Prince Albert the average flow is 9,500 cubic feet per second every day in the year. Of course sometimes it is higher and sometimes lower.

That river has never been used to help this country as it should be. God made it for a purpose—to save the prairies. These prairies have a purpose. We have not been fair to the west. We have done a good deal in the east; I am in favour of that, and more; but we have not sufficiently looked to the west. As an eastern member I am going to do what I can to help the west; not, of course, forgetting, in my remarks on the west, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) and his part of the country.

What would 30,000 new irrigated farms mean to the west? They would mean a vast increase in the population. Years ago I hoped for the day when Saskatchewan would have, not twenty-one members, but fifty members of parliament, and Alberta, not seventeen, but fifty. Why should these provinces not have that representation? Why should not these great smiling prairies grow in population? Another thirty thousand honest-to-goodness sure-return farms like they have in the riding of the hon. member for Lethbridge, where there are no failures for lack of water, would mean business for the east.

That is a programme, Mr. Speaker. It is an after-the-war programme. It is far too big for one province or even for the three provinces; it is not too large for Canada in association with the three provinces. I am told that the Alberta programme to put 600,000 acres under irrigation works would cost approximately $20,000,000. Every irrigated acre provides, I am told, an average profit return of fifty dollars a year, once it is in operation and paid for.

It is not fair to ask those two fine cities, Regina and Moose Jaw, to suffer under their present adverse water conditions. Regina derives her supply from wells. In Moose Jaw they draw it through sand points in sand fields west of the city. They can have any amount of water if the South Saskatchewan river is dammed near Riverhurst and I would dam it, no matter what it cost. We have got to do it, or that whole area may be like a desert. That cannot be allowed; it would be ruinous not only to western Canada but to eastern Canada as well. The time has come when this whole country should look at the country as a whole, and should in particular consider the present condition of the west, with its dried-out areas, and do what can be done to provide water for those dried-out areas and for the fine cities I have mentioned. The dam will operate itself. That is like what is going on in Egypt, where north from the Assuan dam the water flows in irrigation canals, but where they can pump it out and deliver it south if required. Pumps at a Saskatchewan river dam could pump the water over the height of land.

As regards the picture on the last page of this circular which you will receive, I will not say anything about it more than that it demonstrates that, once the water is pumped over the river bank at or near Riverhurst, where the bank is over 320 feet high, it then can flow down to Moose Jaw and Regina. In the case of the two cities I would follow an engineering plan which I have looked into, of building a pressure stave or steel conduit of sufficient capacity to conduct ample water, safely and without being exposed to loss by evaporation or sinking into the sands, as far as Moose Jaw and Regina, and to also irrigate on the way.

There is a rehabilitation programme, and there is not any reason why this country should not undertake it. It would rebuild the country west of Regina. I cannot speak of the district around Swift Current, because I have not examined that area, but I am told they are doing something there in a small way. There is no reason why that area should not be put under irrigation too.

There, then, is a nation-building programme. I hope I have said enough about it to impress the house, and if they will do me the honour to-morrow of examining this sheet in conjunction with what I have said to-day, I believe they will support that programme.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I was very much interested, Mr. Speaker, in the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). He is speaking on a subject with which he is very familiar. I agree with him that irrigation in the west will benefit not merely western Canada but the whole of Canada. The constituency I represent is very much interested in a project known as the William Pearce project. If it were put into operation it would be one of the largest of its kind on the north American continent. I trust that when the committee on reconstruction meets this year it will be in a position to recommend a number of concrete projects of this kind.

I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Tremblay) and the seconder (Mr. Tucker) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think their task this year was a little less embarrassing than in the past, because undoubtedly there was somewhat more ammunition in the speech.

I was amused by the headlines in the press on the day the speech was delivered. It reminded me of what one sees on a bottle of patent medicine, advertising it as a general cure for all our evils; and probably one is just about as effective as the other. On the front page which carried this headline I also noticed a statement by Mr. Mitch Hepburn to the effect that before the end of the war we shall probably be eating horse meat, and I could not help thinking at the time that if we have a general election before the end of the war a very large percentage of the Liberal members will not only be eating horse meat, but crow as well, and that crow will be rationed to them, not by the wartime prices and trade board, but by the general public of this country.

I say that for this reason: it is just another example of "too little and too late." The people are always suspicious of deathbed repentances, and the government's record in the past ten years has not been altogether an enviable one. The depression is still fresh in the minds of the people. They remember that the government proved itself absolutely incompetent to deal with the problem of unemployment before the war, and therefore they naturally doubt whether it will be competent to deal with the problems, magnified many times, that will face us at the close of hostilities, when we shall have the tremendous job of rehabilitating and reestablishing about two million people.

The programme outlined in the speech from the throne savours altogether too much of the era of scarcity. It would have appeared perhaps quite progressive in the days of depression, but to-day it stresses altogether too much the awarding of a minimum for this and a minimum for that, instead of laying the emphasis, as it should, on the very high standard of living that will be available to the people of this country at the close of the war or shortly thereafter. Of course, a great deal depends upon the standard at which these minimums are set, and therefore we shall have to wait until the legislation is brought down before we can pass judgment. In the meantime we can only hope for the best. I suggest that the government should keep in mind at all times the fact that the national income to-day is at the very high figure of $8,000,000,000. Indeed, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has put that figure as high as $9,000,000,000. That means an average of about $3,000 per family of four. I do not think therefore that penny-pinching measures will be tolerated by the people in the future.

There can be no possible justification for the paltry incomes that are awarded the old age pensioners, and those receiving benefits under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. No family after the war should have to live on an income of less than $1,000 a year. I hope the government will bear that in mind when they bring down the legislation later on.

I would have been far more enthusiastic about the speech from the throne if it had stressed to a greater degree the very high income we have to-day and the government's determination not only to maintain that income at that high level but to take steps to ensure its fair distribution after the war. Our income at the present time is at a high level largely because the government is spending $5,500,000,000 annually. Any attempt to reduce these expenditures at a greater rate than private industry is prepared to take up the slack can only result in reduced income, loss of confidence, and increased unemployment.

The speech from the throne refers at some length to the importance of foreign trade; but foreign trade should be kept in its proper place. It is nonsense to suggest that the people of Canada should not be able to have as much of the production of the country as they require unless a certain proportion of that production is shipped overseas. That is to say, the proper function of foreign trade should be to exchange goods which we cannot consume for the goods which we cannot produce. That, however, has not been the function of foreign trade in the past.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) blames our troubles upon tariffs. I think the hon. member knows better than that in reality. He knows that tariffs are an effect and not a cause, but unfortunately the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has shown no recognition of that fundamental fact. Why do nations raise tariff walls? Why have they done so in the past? Because they have not been able to sell their total production and therefore they tried to solve their problem by maintaining a large favourable balance of trade, that is, by exporting more wealth abroad than they imported back. Tariffs are maintained in order to discourage imports. Of course, in the past all nations have been trying to do this and as a result tariff wars have ensued. Nations try to scale tariff walls by depreciating their currency, and international friction ensues, leading up to international wars. Instead of trying to blame tariffs for our troubles, we should first of all remove the cause of tariffs. In other words, we should endeavour to raise the purchasing power of the people up to the level where they would be able to buy the total production of the nation or the production of other nations for which their own can be exchanged.

To sum up briefly, if we want to sell abroad we must be prepared to buy from abroad, and if we want to buy from abroad we must be prepared to place money in the hands of the people so that they may be in a position to buy the goods that are brought into the country; otherwise, naturally, the importers will stop bringing in goods. For that reason I deplore the attitude of certain officials in this country in issuing a pamphlet called "International Exchange Union". If these proposals were put into operation the result would be that a great deal of our production would be exchanged for foreign securities instead of for goods. It might not be so in the immediate period after the war; but after a few months, as soon as certain foreign nations have exhausted their quota of international currency, they will be placed in the position of having to pay us in gold or exchange foreign securities for the goods we ship to them. And of course that situation is bound to be resented by all the nations that do not produce gold, and is bound to cause international friction.

I want to touch briefly upon a number of proposals in the speech from the throne which apparently are aimed at raising the purchasing power of the people. First of all, take the question of housing. This statement appears in the speech:

> A measure to amend and supplement existing housing legislation will be introduced.

It is often suggested that the reason why we have been able to have the type of war effort we have had is that we have had an incentive, the incentive to win the war. In my opinion, after the war a very good incentive to encourage the people to work for an all-out peace effort would be the objective of a decent home for every family in the country, especially having regard to the returned man. Such a programme would provide a great deal of employment, and the money paid out in the building of houses would help to stimulate the demand for consumer goods.

In the past the type of housing legislation we have had has helped people only in what might be called the middle income brackets. In the future we must have legislation that will make it possible for those in the low income brackets to acquire houses. That has not been possible heretofore. If we had legislation of that kind it would mean that money would have to be made available at an extremely low rate of interest. These loans will have to extend over a long period of time and be repaid at a rate not faster than the depreciation of the houses which those people have bought. National housing should be made a national scheme, financed by national money, at a rate of interest at cost of handling accounts, which might be one or two per cent. To talk of a housing scheme for people in the low income brackets and then to charge 5 or 6½ per cent interest is idle; it means that the scheme cannot be carried out effectively.

I welcome the proposal for a floor under agricultural prices, but whether or not that measure will be effective depends entirely upon the level at which the floor is placed. It should be placed closely under what we might call parity prices for agriculture; and when I say parity prices I do not mean the prices based on levels of 1914, or the prices of 1926 or 1929. I mean the level that will assure to farmers their fair share of the national income. And what is that level? According to figures placed before the reconstruction committee by Mr. D. G. MacKenzie, we find that from 1915 to 1919 farmers representing one-third of the population received one-third of the national income. Undoubtedly that was a time when the farmers were receiving parity prices. From 1926 to 1929, however, the farmers received only one-sixth of the national income and from 1930 to 1940 only one-tenth. So, when we advocate parity prices, I think we should have in mind prices which will guarantee the farmers their fair share of the national income; and the only period when that has ever happened was the period from 1915 to 1919.

I am not impressed with the reference to a national scheme of contributory old age pensions on a more generous basis than that at present in operation. What we need to-day is more generous provision for non-contributory pensioners. The people who are in a position to contribute to an old age pension plan are, generally speaking, in a position to buy government annuities. What we want is to take care of those aged individuals who are not in the fortunate position of being able to contribute to any scheme. Certainly there can be no justification for the old age pensioners of to-day or of the future having to accept the very low income that they receive at the present time. We have been told, of course, that if we tried to increase the amount of the old age pension there would be difficulty with some of the provinces. That difficulty will exist only as long as we make the provinces contribute to the cost of old age pensions. I should like to see old age pensions paid purely on a national basis, financed by the national government. I do not think any province would object to the old age pension being increased provided the federal government paid the total cost, and in that case there would be no reason why the old age pension could not be increased to $40 per person or $80 for a man and wife, which would give them an income of approximately $1,000 a year.

I very much welcome the government's proposal to pay family allowances. This is a step in the direction we have been advocating for a number of years. We first began to advocate something of this kind in this house in 1936; and I think most hon. members will recall how the suggestion that money should be paid directly to individuals outside the industrial system was scoffed at in this house. We were continually told that we were advocating something for nothing. However, apparently the government now see the light and are proposing to issue money directly to consumers instead of having it paid out through industry.

Since the declaration of war the government have had to travel quite a long way in the direction we have been advocating here since 1936. For instance, in the years when we had many unemployed we urged upon the government the necessity of expanding the amount of money in circulation in order to provide employment. Hon. members who were here at that time will remember how the Minister of Finance of that day would become almost hysterical every time that suggestion was made, and would accuse us of advocating inflation. Well, what has happened since the war? When it became necessary to expand production in this country we did not hesitate to increase the amount of money in circulation, so that to-day we find there is over a billion and a quarter dollars more in circulation than was the case at the beginning of the war, in currency and deposits. Another proposal we made back in 1935 was that a discount should be paid on prices, subsidized by the federal government, to make it possible for industry to sell at less than the cost of production, thereby increasing the purchasing power of the people without any danger of inflation. In those days the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) did not hesitate to ridicule that suggestion. I remember how he claimed that this would cause inflation; yet what have we to-day? We are paying millions of dollars in subsidies to industry to make it possible for them to sell at less than the cost of production, thereby maintaining the price ceiling; and the minister himself in this house called it a form of insurance against inflation. Back in 1937 it was called inflation; to-day it is insurance against inflation.

Those are a few of the measures we advocated back in 1936 that the government have had to adopt, though at the time we were ridiculed for having suggested them. Unfortunately, however, the most essential step which must be taken, and which has not been taken up to the present time, is the issue of national money so that national projects can be financed without increasing the interest-bearing debt of this country. Until such time as this measure has been taken the government will always be in the difficult position of having either to curtail its expenditures or steadily to expand the national debt.

I should like to make a few brief observations with regard to the amendments now before the house. The amendment offered by the Conservatives contains nothing at which one could take offence, that is anyone sitting on this side of the house. It just refers to the fact that the government has failed to do this and that, and I think we all agree that the government has failed to do these things. Therefore we will support the amendment. The amendment offered by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation reads:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that in the opinion of this house Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose the fundamental social changes and economic planning which alone can hasten the winning of the war and make possible the establishment of a post-war Canada capable of providing full employment and complete social security.

I think most people, if they are frank, will admit the truth of that statement. If I had been drafting that motion I would have added the words, "with the greatest possible degree of individual freedom", because none of us likes to have regimentation of the individual, and if those words were added it would be made clear that this is not intended by the motion. In drawing up plans for the future we should do everything in our power to avoid bureaucratic controls and regimentation of the people. During this war planning has been absolutely essential; we never could have had a total war effort without planning, and I am satisfied that we shall never have a total peace effort without planning, particularly in the transition period between war and peace and especially in regard to finance. Therefore our group will also support the amendment offered by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

I wish now to deal with one of our major responsibilities of to-day; that is, the question of rehabilitating the men of the armed forces. I recall the promises which were made during the last war; I think all hon. members who served in the armed forces at that time will recall that the men were promised that after they were demobilized they would be guaranteed jobs and their dependents would be looked after. I think most hon. members will agree that we failed miserably to fulfil those promises, and I think we also agree that this must never be allowed to happen again. I was very much interested in an article which appeared in the February issue of the American magazine entitled "Canada Cares for its Heroes" written by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). The hon. member for Rosthern referred to this article, which is an exceedingly glowing account not only of what Canada is doing but of what Canada will do for her soldiers in the future. This, however, is what puzzles me. If that is a correct statement, why should there be such widespread discontent throughout the country among the returned men and the various returned men's organizations? I think when the minister wrote that article he painted a picture of what he would like to see rather than a picture of what actually exists, though I am not for one moment suggesting that the minister was not sincere when he wrote the article. I do not believe there is an hon. member more anxious to see the returned men get a square deal than is the Minister of Pensions and National Health, but of course he has great obstacles to overcome and his word does not necessarily prevail in the cabinet or wherever these things are finally decided.

I shall deal with some of the main causes for the discontent which exists to-day. Just before coming to Ottawa I stayed in Edmonton for a few days and had communication with the Edmonton branch of the Canadian Legion. I found there a tremendous amount of indignation owing to the fact that the men being returned from overseas in a wounded condition were being discharged while still in hospital receiving treatment. One of the cases which received a great deal of publicity was that of Captain Gilchrist. He was seriously wounded overseas and was returned to Canada, but while still in hospital with his leg in a cast he was discharged from the army. His pay was reduced from that of a captain to $44 a month. There was a deduction of $30 a month for hospitalization, so that he received a net income of $14 a month. This man was contributing to the keep of his mother and father, and his case received a great amount of publicity. It made returned men in that city simply wild to realize that that is the way men who had been wounded overseas are being treated.

I was pleased when the order in council was brought down in the house to correct this situation, and I trust its operation will be made retroactive. But I cannot understand why a situation like that was permitted to exist for such a long time. The fact is that it existed for many months, and caused a tremendous amount of indignation in the ranks of the armed forces. Even though we have now changed the situation, that resentment will continue, because the men will have lost confidence in the department and the government and, I think, rightly so.

There appears to be a great deal of carelessness in the way in which men are handled after they are discharged from hospital. While I was in Edmonton I was asked to go out with members of the legion to inspect a certain case. This man had been discharged from the hospital about five days before I made my visit. He was living with his mother at the edge of the city, in one room. There was no furniture in that room, with the exception of a bed. He had not received any clothing allowance or any demobilization pay. The Red Cross later provided him with some clothes. This man had seen service in Sicily and had been severely wounded. He had lost his speech, to the point where he could only say, "Yah". He was not able to use the fingers of his right hand. His right arm and leg were partly paralyzed. In short, he just did not know what it was all about.

The legion had approached certain officials with the idea of having the man transferred to a convalescent home or a reconditioning centre. They were informed there was no such establishment in Edmonton. But this is what angered the legion representatives: It is a fact that the provincial government of Alberta had offered to the federal government the use of Government House as a convalescent home for soldiers. In the past the provincial government had been receiving from the United States authorities $2,000 a month for the use of that building. The time arrived when the United States tenants stopped using the building, and when that time arrived the use of it was offered to the federal government free of charge, as a convalescent home for the duration of the war and for six months thereafter. That offer was turned down.

But when these men are discharged and the legion asks that they be put into a convalescent home they are told that no such accommodation is available. I understand, however, that reconditioning centres are being built for future use at certain points in the Dominion. Action is now being taken, I understand, to send the man in question to Christie street hospital, Toronto, for treatment. But the mere fact that that situation was allowed to exist, a condition which permitted the sending of a man to a house in such poverty-stricken circumstances, arouses the ire of our people. I believe if the man in question had been left there for any length of time he would have become a mental case.

In his article in the American magazine the Minister of Pensions and National Health states, in effect, that the officials of his department will lean over backwards to do justice to the returned men. I believe that is true of the minister, and I do not doubt it is true of the deputy minister. Unfortunately, however, there are many officials across Canada who are either careless or callous, and I think disciplinary action should be taken where the men in charge allow conditions such as I have described to exist. We must assure ourselves that such things will not occur again.

Then, ever since the beginning of the war there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction over the fact that soldiers boarded A1 upon enlistment are refused pension on the ground that their disabilities are of pre-enlistment origin. We have been told in the house that upon enlistment recruits are given a very thorough medical examination. It seems to me therefore that when these men are discharged on account of a disability they should be awarded a pension until their disability is cured, and pension should not be denied them upon the ground of pre-enlistment origin.

Further, I do not like the manner in which some of the men are treated when the medical authorities are trying to find out whether or not the disability was of pre-enlistment origin. It amounts almost to a third degree, and is no credit to the department which allows that kind of thing to take place. I shall not take the time of the house to describe the procedure by which some of these admissions are obtained. I know, however, that very often a medical officer will get into conversation with a soldier, the soldier having no idea that his evidence is being taken down. Then, probably some time later, he may be confronted with the statement he is supposed to have made, in which he has admitted that at some time or another he suffered some slight accident, and that therefore his pension must be refused on the grounds of a disability of pre-enlistment origin.

The other day I discussed this general situation with a naval officer. He said to me, "The government is like a lawyer with a bad case, because it tries to settle for the smallest possible amount." That certainly does seem to me to be the general impression throughout Canada. There are many cases where the applicants would appear to be eligible for certain payments, and yet because of some technical point such payments are refused.

In 1940 I sat on a subcommittee of the pensions committee, dealing with mental cases. That committee recommended that the section debarring a soldier from pension, when disability was of congenital origin, should be deleted. It was my understanding that the clause had been deleted, but I am not now certain whether that is so. Judging from the actions of various medical boards throughout the country one would think that the section is still operative.

Another injustice—and in my opinion a glaring one—is that men who have served overseas for a number of years and who are then returned to Canada and allowed a discharge on compassionate grounds, are refused any rehabilitation grants. Only this morning I received a letter from the Canadian Legion at Edmonton referring to several such cases. Two of the men to which reference was made in the letter had been enlisted, one for three years and the other for four. Upon returning to Canada they had little or nothing to do, so they asked for their discharge. They were refused any rehabilitation grant, including that of clothing and one month's pay. This is what the legion has to say in the matter:

> I think this is one of the grievances that certainly should be rectified, as men who have been overseas and are returned to this country certainly get fed up hanging around not doing anything, and they naturally, after a time, make application for discharge which is inevitably granted.

In my opinion any man who has served overseas, no matter for how short a time, and is discharged on compassionate grounds, should be eligible for rehabilitation grants. In so far as those men who have served only in Canada are concerned, it is my opinion that each case would have to be dealt with on its merits. But a man who has had long service, even though he has not been outside Canada, should be eligible for grants On the other hand, if his service has been short, or if he has been in some building where he expects to sit for the duration, such as the Jackson building, it might be a different state of affairs.

I might add that the postscript to the letter is in these words:

> I am very pleased to let you know that I have been successful in having Jossul's rehabilitation granted so maybe the others will come through.

I am glad to hear that because that may mean that a new policy has been put into effect with regard to the granting of rehabilitation rights to these men who get discharged on compassionate grounds.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I thought that was always the policy.

Mr. QUELCH: If it is, how is it that there are so many cases where they have not been getting it? Many of these cases have been placed before the department and grants have been refused, cases where men were discharged on compassionate grounds.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Which ones?

Mr. QUELCH: One is Corporal Wallace number R-93837, and I quote:

> The above named N.C.O. joined the air force on the 25th of April, 1940. He was then 45 years of age. He has now made application for discharge so that he can go back on his farm but has been informed that if he accepts his discharge on these grounds he will not be entitled to his rehabilitation grant, i.e., his month's pay and also his dependents would not get the month's allowance.

He then goes on to deal with Private Jossul who had four years overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The month's pay is not a pension; that would come under national defence.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not blaming the minister of pensions by any means for all these injustices. As I have pointed out already, I do not believe that there is any man in this house who is more sincere in his desire to see that these men get a square deal. However, the minister does not have the final say in these matters; he can only recommend, and apparently in the past his recommendations have not received the kind of treatment they should have received.

Another matter which has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction is the fact that men receive only one month's pay and allowance upon discharge. I notice from the speech from the throne that gratuities are to be given. We cannot criticize or commend this proposal until we know at just what level these gratuities are to be set. In my opinion when a man returns from overseas he should immediately be given one month's leave with full pay. During that time he could get into touch with his relatives and make plans for the future. Then, when he is discharged he should receive a substantial gratuity based upon his length of service. The Edmonton Legion passed a resolution asking that a man coming back from overseas receive one day's pay for each day's service. I do not think that is asking too much.

The clothing allowance which was given in the past was totally inadequate. This has been increased to $65, but I wonder how many members of parliament would like to buy a complete outfit of clothing for $65. By the time you bought a suit and overcoat you would have exhausted your funds, and you would still need a hat, boots, underwear, et cetera.

An hon. MEMBER: And braces.

Mr. QUELCH: Somebody says "braces". They probably would before they got a job. Many soldiers' dependents are suffering injustices. I know this does not come under the minister of pensions, but I have taken up a number of these cases with the dependents' allowance board. I am frank to admit that I have not had much success. There is a practice of stopping a dependents' allowance when a man is absent without leave for a certain length of time. He may be absent without leave for twenty-one days before the dependents' allowance is stopped—if he is overseas the time limit is three months—but after that time the government jumps to the conclusion that the man is a deserter. We know there are many cases where such men have been blown to pieces in air raids, and instead of the wife continuing to get compensation, she is told that her husband is a deserter and her allowance is cut off. I do not think the dependents' allowance should be cut off until there is positive proof that a man has deserted. Just as long as there is any possibility that he may have been killed, the dependents' allowance should be paid in full.

When a man is finally apprehended and sentenced, we will say, to two years in the army prison his dependents' allowance is paid for six months, after which time it is stopped. I contend that as long as the army has the man's body they should continue to pay an allowance to his wife and dependents. Why should they take it out of the dependents? We have in this country many wives and children on relief because soldiers are serving sentences in army prison camps. Just as long as the army has the bodies of those men under control they can get a certain amount of work out of them and the dependents' allowances should be paid. They could be charged up against the man who would work it out. I think most people will agree with the justice of this claim. Why should the wife and children be penalized just because a man, perhaps as a result of war service, has developed some kind of mental quirk and refuses to assume his responsibilities. The man cannot always be blamed. Sometimes desertion is a result of mental trouble resulting from the strain of service.

Another grievance is that deductions from dependents' allowances are made when the dependent receives hospitalization. There are a number of wives of soldiers in Alberta who are obtaining treatment in the sanitarium for tuberculosis. This treatment is absolutely free in Alberta. Anyone in the province may obtain free treatment. Yet the dependents' allowance board deducts $20 a month from the allowance of these women and then pays it to the provincial institution as a maintenance cost. Since this treatment is free in Alberta the province does not want to charge for the maintenance of these women, the provincial government has offered to pay this money over to the dependents, but the dependents' allowance board has ruled that if the provincial government pays this $20 to the dependents, the board will have to make a further deduction. I have taken this matter up with the dependents' allowance board and they tell me that they cannot do anything because they are governed by the departmental regulations. Those regulations are man-made and there is nothing to prevent their being changed. It is high time they were changed. Here we have a most undesirable situation where a civilian can obtain free hospitalization and yet the dependent of a soldier is charged.

In closing, I should like to make a recommendation to the minister. He knows, as we all do, that there is a great deal of criticism of certain of the measures which come under his department and under the dependents' allowance board. I urge that a committee be set up to deal with soldiers' affairs and that the terms of reference should be sufficiently wide to permit it to deal with pensions, dependents' allowances and the reestablishment of the returned soldier.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) for referring to the wives and families of soldiers who may be A.W.O.L. overseas. I know of a number of cases where wives and children have suffered all kinds of distress because the government just like the cut of a knife has taken away their living. The children's aid society have had to take over in many cases.

I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for referring to old age pensions. He has suggested that the old age pension should be $40 a month. If you look in Hansard for 1940 I believe you will find that I suggested, not only that it be $40 but that the age limit be reduced to sixty years. The old age pension should be given to those people who are in need, not as a charity but as their rightful due.

The speech from the throne this year was a speech that left the people of Canada speechless. When the people read that speech and found out what was promised—I say promised—by this government they said, I have had them say to me, why, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has promised everything except the kitchen sink. I believe that is right; he has promised everything. I know that the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), in seconding the motion for the address, certainly hit the nail on the head when he said, as reported at page 16 of Hansard of January 28:

> In his book, "Industry and Humanity", written twenty-five years ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) set out certain ideals which we shall seek to attain in regard to better social security. It is not often that a young man who dreams of a programme for the betterment of his country is given a chance twenty-five years later, as prime minister of his country, to begin to carry out in such large measure as is proposed in the speech from the throne that programme.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He is still dreaming.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think every person in Canada will agree with me that the Prime Minister is still dreaming, as the hon. member has just said. Why should the Prime Minister have waited twenty-five years to do these things? He has been in and out of office for practically that length of time—

An hon. MEMBER: And he is coming back.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He is still dreaming and that is what the people believe. The Prime Minister said that we would not have an election this year, but the speech from the throne certainly looks as though the Prime Minister were preparing for an election very soon. It looks as though he had been holding this dream in reserve for twenty-five years, so that he would have something up his sleeve, an ace in the hole, as it is often called, to save him at some future time, because it is only by a miracle that the present government can be saved from defeat at the polls at the next election.

I do not believe that the present government could possibly carry out the programme set forth in the speech from the throne, because a programme of that kind needs to be carried out on sound business principles in order to make it stay with us—not for a year or two, because if we are to have social security of the kind that is set forth in the speech from the throne we do not want it for just a short time but until such a time as a better programme can be found. That is why I say that the present government cannot give us the utopia that is set forth in the speech from the throne.

I have often urged in this house and on platforms throughout the country that we should have a better social security set-up in regard to health, particularly, in Canada. But so far as I can see, the speech from the throne does not mention hospitalization at all, and hospitalization is one of the greatest needs, if not the greatest need of the country to-day. Not only the working man and the farmer but you and I, Mr. Speaker, are in fear of having to go to the hospital or have some member of our families requiring hospitalization, and we all know that hospitalization drains one's resources almost to the limit. In the case of the working man and the farmer it would certainly do that. But we have another fear, namely that if by chance we or some member of our family had to go to hospital there would not be a room in any hospital to accommodate the patient. That is the case to-day. Hospitalization should have been one of the subjects dealt with in the speech from the throne. I believe that in any post-war programme hospitalization should have priority. I believe that this government should at once announce to the different municipalities throughout the country what it proposes to do to help them build new hospitals or remodel their old hospitals. We know that there is not a proper place to-day even for our returned soldiers, those who have fought in the armed forces, in the army, the navy or the air force and have returned to Canada to receive hospitalization and be taken care of, and we know that very little is being done to remedy the situation. Hospitalization and education are two of the things that should be on the priority list in our post-war reconstruction. I include education because we need new schools in many sections. Many of our schools are out-dated. We should also have up-to-date laboratories where our boys and girls can carry on research work.

In regard to hospitalization I should like to mention a case that was brought to my attention, in which the Department of Mines and Resources refused to pay one municipality the prevailing hospital rate in that city. The prevailing rate in that city was $3 a day. The Indian Affairs branch, which comes under the Department of Mines and Resources, would pay only $2.50 a day to that hospital, which is in the red all the time since the cost is over $3 a day.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) mentioned the harnessing of power in the west, and I was pleased to hear him mention the city of Peterborough in that connection because our industries in Peterborough, Ontario, can supply whatever power machinery and equipment are required. We have also in the city of Peterborough an industry which wakes up every morning the workers not only in Canada but throughout the empire, for the alarm clocks made in Peterborough wake up the whole British empire.

In the speech from the throne mention is made of the fact that three new departments are being created. I would suggest that another minister be added to the cabinet, a minister of education. I believe that the people of Canada to-day would welcome a dominion educational set-up. At the present time each province has its own educational system, under which a teacher in Ontario cannot teach in Manitoba or British Columbia or a teacher in any of the other provinces teach in a different province on account of the qualifications prescribed. I would not want to see the dominion encroach upon provincial rights, but I should like to see the dominion government cooperate with the provinces in order to bring about a better educational set-up for the people of Canada as a whole. We shall never have unity in Canada unless we have proper education.

Health insurance is mentioned in the speech from the throne. Health insurance really means the minimizing of the hazards that cause sickness. When the item for industrial hygiene was brought up last year and in 1942 I suggested that every worker be examined annually, or if possible twice a year, checked for tuberculosis, and X-rayed; and I feel that if that were done we would have happier workers in our plants. Prevention of disease is essential also to any workable social security or health insurance set-up. We have to start at the bottom. At the present time tuberculosis is on the increase, and if that state of affairs is allowed to develop nobody knows what will happen in a few years. In Canada the problem of sickness is not only physical but mental. Unless preventive measures are taken, in a few decades this country, instead of being the home of sound, physically fit people, will be a country of degenerates. The remedy is to start with health insurance at once, to start checking up without any more delay. I notice in the press that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has at last got off his hush-hush horse with regard to venereal disease. I am very glad that at last the government has come out in the open with regard to that.

I should like to know what the government is doing toward checking tuberculosis among the children of this country. I include those of pre-school age. These pre-school age children should be thoroughly checked, not once or twice but a dozen times a year, in order to prevent the child from developing, when it grows a little older, rheumatic fever, which has been the cause of so many men and boys being found unfit for service in the Canadian army.

I noticed in the Ottawa Journal of January 31 an editorial which certainly is a dandy. With the permission of the house I am going to read it:

> The C.C.F., with all the courage in the world, makes no bones about what are its aims. Young Mr. Jolliffe, Ontario leader of the party, is quoted in an official document as saying: "What the C.C.F. is aiming at is a system of socialized medicine as a part of a general scheme of socialization." With no worry about provincial rights, Mr. Jolliffe says: "When a C.C.F. government comes into power in the dominion (reformed health services) will be transformed with the least possible confusion and delay into a thoroughly socialized medical system which is a natural part of a socialized society." All the doctors young and old under the C.C.F. scheme are to be regimented and salaries and areas of work fixed, and Mr. Jolliffe says frankly that if there are any doctors who don't like it they can be left to stew in their own juice or starve.
> About the C.C.F. proposals there is to be said that they are open and above board and not camouflaged by "approval in principle". Mr. Jolliffe said to a meeting of doctors in London: "The public will have to stop demanding 24-hour service; that is all there is to it." One of the doctors present asked: "Can your party arrange for all babies to be delivered between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m.?" Mr. Jolliffe didn't answer that one.

Does that mean that Mr. Jolliffe spoke for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party of Canada? If so, I say there is not one of them that is human. And the doctors of Canada, who have done everything in the world to look after humanity here, working night and day, twenty-four hours a day, covering miles and miles and miles of rough roads, winter and summer, are invited to stew in their own juice if they do not like what the C.C.F. do! Just imagine if some hon. member happened to have an accident in his family, and when he phoned the doctor and said, "Doctor, my wife has fallen downstairs, broken her arm and, I believe, cut an artery in her head," the doctor answered "Well, I am very sorry but it is two minutes to five; I will call on you to-morrow morning after eight o'clock or after I have made out my reports in the morning."

Mr. GILLIS: Why not put them back on relief?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am making the speech. And suppose the doctor went on to advise the hon. member to give his wife some sleeping tablets and maybe stick his finger in the cut to stop the artery from bleeding! That is a lovely kind of doctrine or platform for any party to have; and God help Canada and the people of Canada if people of that kind ever get control here. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada to-day are awake and "wise to" these sayings of the C.C.F. party, the persons who will say something in London, Ontario, and contradict it in Vancouver; who say something in Vancouver and it is contradicted in Nova Scotia. God help the country if it should be controlled by people of that kind.

As regards health insurance, in a little booklet issued by the Canadian Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' association, entitled "Health Insurance," page 24, paragraphs 67 and 68, it has this to say:

> One of the root causes of much of our ordinary sickness is bad housing, with its poor ventilation, its inadequate protection against winter cold, and its lack of sanitary conveniences. Bad housing occurs in its worst form in our city slums, where overcrowding adds one more to the factors that breed and spread disease. Should not better housing be recognized as the joint responsibility of federal, provincial and municipal governments, and be adequately provided for in any plan of national health insurance?

That is what I said before, Mr. Speaker. We have to start at the bottom in order to build a sound basis of health insurance. We must start right in the sub-basement, so to speak, if we are to have a healthy nation.

The booklet goes on:

> An important cause contributing to physical unfitness and the frequent spells of sickness from which many people suffer, is the inadequate income on which they have to live.

That is perfectly true. There are many people in Canada who are not receiving a proper income, and there are others who receive an adequate income but are not educated in the proper spending of that income so as to ensure good health for themselves and their families.

> Poverty can be one of the worst of all disease-breeders. Its attendant evils of undernourishment and malnutrition are not only sicknesses in themselves, but they predispose their victims to every kind of infection to which they happen to be exposed. To people in that class, medical care with hospitalization can at best provide only a temporary escape from sickness, for when they are forced to go back to the old way of living, the improvement they made under medical care is quickly lost.

That again is absolutely true. I know of a young child who was taken out of a very poor home because her mother was expecting another baby. The child was taken to a certain home and looked after and given proper clothing and care, and what happened?

She put on extra weight and at the end of a month was a really strong and healthy child. Then the mother wanted her back and the child returned to her old surroundings. At the end of the next month the mother came to this lady and said, "Mrs. N."—I will not mention her name—"will you please take my daughter back? She has been unwell during the past week. She has failed in health". The whole trouble was that the child did not have the proper surroundings. To continue:

> The form of social security such people need most and given which they would soon have much less need for sickness insurance, is the security obtainable through steady employment at good wages. The responsibility for providing that kind of security, based as it would have to be on national fiscal and economic policies, lies squarely at the door of the dominion government.

That does not apply merely to the workers of Canada; it applies to the farmers as well.

Now I am going to say something and I say it absolutely on my own and not for the party to which I belong. Throughout Canada during the last four or five months organizations have been issuing circulars, booklets and what-have-you, and speaking on the radio—I do not blame them for doing it—asking the people of Canada to take in all the refugees possible from Europe and to bring them to Canada. I have no objection to refugees coming to Canada, but I do say, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me, that not one refugee should come in until every man and woman, and child too—because there are some children of only fourteen or fifteen in our army—now serving in the forces are returned to civilian life and have secured jobs. I do not think these people should come in now and be given the advantage of jobs over our men who are overseas fighting for you and me, and I will fight to the last ditch the entrance of these people into Canada. I say also that immigration should be stopped until our boys and girls return from overseas and until the workers at present in our factories and war-time work return to jobs in normal civilian life. Not until then should these refugees and immigrants be allowed into the country. I shall be criticized throughout Canada for saying this, but it is my belief, and I know there are thousands of others who feel exactly as I do. I suggest further that not one immigrant and not one refugee should be allowed in until they have had the strictest and most rigid medical examination including X-ray. And they should be examined not by one doctor but at least two, and at different examining points. We do not want these people to come into the country unless they are healthy. I would go further and say that those who come in should be morally and mentally well. We do not want little Hitlers in the country; we do not want screwballs—pardon the language.

In the period 1939-43, 11,510 children from babyhood to the age of seventeen were admitted to Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the dinner recess I had only a few more words to say, and I believe I shall take only about five minutes to conclude my remarks. The speech from the throne contains these words:

> A broad programme has already been developed for the reestablishment of veterans of the present war, and for the care of disabled veterans and the dependents of our fighting men and merchant seamen.

I know that a great many returned men, reading that statement in the newspapers, would say it was absolutely wrong, because they feel that nothing has been done in many instances. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) also mentioned this matter this afternoon. There have been a great many men discharged from the army. In many instances they have been given a few dollars, or perhaps a small pension, but they do not want just a hand-out. These men are anxious to be given something to do, some kind of job at which they can earn a living. They do not want to be handed a pension and told to go sit down on the curbstone and watch the parade go by. They want to be part of that parade themselves; they want to be part of this Canada; they want to help make it a great nation. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has been very kind to me in most of the matters I have brought before him, but I feel that he should survey all the cases he has on his files, to see that these men are given not just pensions but real jobs, no matter how small. Show these men what to do, how they can make a living and become useful citizens once more. They fought for us; surely they deserve every possible consideration. I have some of these men in my own riding, and I think they are entitled to jobs after having fought for their country.

There is another matter I should like to discuss for a moment; that is, the matter of underwear for children. At the present time many men and women are being discharged from our munition plants, and very little is being done to place these people in other work which will give them a decent living wage. I believe many of these men and women could be placed in the textile industry, where they might help make underwear for our children and adults. There is an absolute shortage of underwear of all kinds in this country to-day; and if God had not been very kind last fall and this winter in giving us springlike weather instead of the sub-zero weather we had last year, I feel quite sure that many children and adults would have perished from the cold. This springlike weather has also been a Godsend in that it has allowed the men in the woods to cut cordwood for next year. To return, however, to the matter of children's underwear, I know of one hospital auxiliary that has had to take sizes six, seven and eight and cut them down for babies only a year old. They have also taken worn underwear and tried to make it over for babies and young children.

I do not think the government really appreciates the need for proper underwear in this country. The men and women who work in our factories find it necessary to change their clothing very often. In Britain the women who work in the munitions plants handling explosives and powder are compelled to change their underwear at least every other day; and to make sure they do change it the government has compelled them to wear one colour on Monday and Tuesday, another colour on Wednesday and Thursday and a different colour on Friday and Saturday. I suppose what they wear on Sunday is their own business, but the government in Britain has seen that there is enough underwear to go round, and I think it is up to this government to do the same. I believe the workers who are being let out of our munitions plants should be permitted to go into the textile industry, which I think is classed as B1.

Of course another reason for the shortage is the definite increase in the birthrate. The number of births from 1939 to 1942 was 1,001,082, of whom there are 936,590 now living To this number must be added the immigrant children allowed into Canada, totalling 11,510. In a letter to me under date of January 29 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stated that in 1943-44 there would be 886,000 dozen garments made, as compared with 749,475 dozen in 1942-43; but many of those garments have not been made as yet, and even if they were available the increase would only give the additional children one and a half garments each.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the amendment, which states that the government has failed to lessen bureaucratic controls. The Toronto Globe and Mail of October 8, 1943, carried the following dispatch:

> People who have been salvaging foodstuffs destined for destruction at the city incinerator had their knuckles rapped by the prices board here to-night.
> In a statement issued on authority of the regional prices and supply representative, Stanley Lee, the board pointed out that acquisition of rationed food without surrendering valid ration coupons was illegal. A general warning was issued that unless all such articles of food were surrendered to the board, the holders would be liable to prosecution for contravening prices board regulations.
> Large quantities of food, including sugar in sealed containers, tinned bacon, evaporated milk, canned fruits and jams, have been dumped at the incinerator for disposal, and some had been salvaged by nearby residents.

Well, Mr. Speaker, none of those people has died as yet, so that the food must have been good. But why should the prices board demand coupons for food that was to be destroyed? It seems to me that is carrying things a little too far. If people need the food I say, give it to them.

A short time ago I asked the Minister of Finance a question with regard to the slaughtering of cattle and other animals, and he has confirmed my understanding that the farmers of Quebec are allowed to do so, while the farmers of the other provinces are not. He went on to state that if the scheme proved successful in Quebec the other provinces would be allowed the same privilege. I feel that if the wartime prices and trade board is to function properly every province must be treated exactly the same. If it extends a privilege to Ontario then Quebec and the other provinces should have it also. If the prices board gives a privilege to British Columbia then Quebec, Ontario and all the other provinces should enjoy it also. I know of one man who has slaughtered animals for over thirty years in Ontario. He is a law-abiding citizen; yet they took away his licence and would not give it back to him, while other people are allowed to slaughter without licences. There is something wrong with the wartime prices and trade board when they play favourites like that. I believe there should be a great deal of lessening of the controls.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have used my full time.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in the debate because I believe it is very necessary that the reactions of our people toward the speech from the throne should be made known in the house, so far as any hon. member is able to do so. I wish to join with other hon. members in congratulating the mover (Mr. Tremblay) and the seconder (Mr. Tucker) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Before I proceed further there is one matter I should like to touch upon briefly. I am sorry the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) is not in his seat because I think he should know that I consider the very thinly veiled insult which he offered in his speech yesterday to the new member from Cartier, Montreal (Mr. Rose), coming as it did from an older member of the house—or shall we say a senior member—to say the least of it was unbecoming. What did he say? Oh, he was alarmed! He was dismayed! He was horrified, in fact, that the people of Montreal, the constituency of Cartier, should have sent this new member to the house!

It seems to me that these remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, meant as an insult, will be more of a boomerang. I was not at all sorry he made them, because I think members of the house and the public generally will realize what a thin coating this "progressive" is on the Conservative party. When he said definitely that he was horrified at the election of this new member, what did he really intimate? What did he give out to the country at large? His own real feelings, that he was against democracy in action, when it elected as a representative to the House of Commons a member whose views he did not happen to share. He hated to see democracy in practice. It revealed, in fact, the very core of reaction which lies within the Conservative party. In fact, he made me think he stood there like a very ineffective old King Canute trying to hold back the waves of progress—

An hon. MEMBER: There he comes.

Mrs. NIELSEN: —standing there, hating to see the expression of new thought that springs up from within the heart of the people. And he will be just as ineffective. We do not have to worry about him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And I am not worrying about you.

Mrs. NIELSEN: The people of Montreal elected their member to the House of Commons because he was an honest man, because he was a man of the people, and they believe that he will represent them truly. Many of them possibly were not socialists, but they elected him for his honesty, and because they felt they could trust him. For my own part may I say this, Mr. Speaker, that I feel very happy to think that we shall have in this house a member who will help to do something to relieve the somewhat stuffy atmosphere of this chamber, and I am very happy to have with us a little red Rose.

After its long recess, parliament has met again in momentous times. We know that to-day the whole world stage is set for the last great act of what we hope will be the annihilation of fascism in the world, at least its heart. People the world over are ready in their places for the final conflict. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that everything which can be done by the government to add to the determination of the people, to give them courage so that they may go forward and hasten the day of unconditional surrender of the enemy, must be undertaken.

I find myself to-night more pleased to take part in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne than has been the case in previous sessions. In the speech at this session, and in the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), without doubt it is easy to see the government does have a desire to participate with the other great democratic forces in the world, first, by winning the war, through a close military collaboration with the other great powers, and second, by working in the international field for sane collective measures afterwards, to try to ensure peace at least for some generations. There is the further fact that the speech from the throne did bring up, in some measure, the fact that we in Canada intend to do this in our own name; in other words, that we have achieved a degree of nationhood, something which is welcomed, I believe, both by French- and English-speaking peoples in this country.

In the months which have intervened since the house last sat vast plans have been laid for the collaboration of the democratic forces. These were made at the three important conferences of Cairo, Moscow and Teheran. The plans outlined at those conferences have given to humanity a new outlook, a new perspective, which previously we did not have. Of course we have known all along that the forces of reaction, those which have feared the progress of democracy in the world, have done everything in the past to try to divide democratic forces, both internationally and here at home. But the declarations which were made by the leaders of the three great nations at Teheran were definitely a triumph for the democratic forces, and I believe to some degree have caused dismay among the forces of reaction. The agreements and the plans made at Teheran, while not going into intricate details which, at that time, were of course impossible, did offer a very broad scope for collaboration among the nations of the world who believe in and mean to maintain democracy. They do offer to very wide sections of the Canadian people the hope of achieving not only victory over the enemy but a peace which will give the world an opportunity deliberately to plan its future without the necessity for further war. The fact that the one great socialist nation of the world, and the leaders of the two great capitalist nations were in agreement upon these matters, gives cause for satisfaction to all of us, and does not give any of us reason to disbelieve the sincerity of those who do not happen to think just exactly the same way we do upon economic problems. I would say that, to whichever group we may belong, whether we be socialist in our thinking, or whether we still believe in the power of capitalism, very definitely we can give our support to the plans made at Teheran. The only other alternative for us at a time like this is that when the war is over we shall find, particularly in Europe, civil wars and further devastation. We shall find confusion, lack of opportunity for world trade upon which the security of our own Canadian people depends.

Therefore it seems natural and right that we should favour and do everything in our power to make concrete and to substantiate these plans, so that they may become a reality. If by any chance the plans made at Teheran cannot be carried into effect, with the world itself reverting to chaos, there is no doubt whatsoever but that the most predatory and the fiercest of the reactionary forces of the world will take the opportunity to plunge the people back into an age of servitude, another dark age, comparable with that of mediaevalism.

Although some of us do hope and believe that socialism will be the ultimate solution to give the fullest democracy, to give the finest well-being to our people, yet to fail to see the great step which is outlined for the whole world in these historic conferences, and not to support it would be to fail to give leadership to the people in their struggles for freedom and security and the gaining of the reforms which are definitely one step forward in the progress of humanity.

Speaking on behalf of the people in my own particular part of Saskatchewan irrespective of their party affiliations, I think I can say to you, sir, that they regard this speech from the throne as definitely an advance. The suggestion embodied in the speech that the winning of the war is our first task undoubtedly will have their support. They would urge also —and this I say to you most emphatically— that this government accept its responsibility, as one of the most important if perhaps not the most important of the smaller nations of the world, in making its own definite and independent contribution to the peace plans and in establishing its own trade relationships on the basis of its own contribution in materials and men to the war effort.

Personally and on behalf of my people at home I think I can say definitely that we regret the reduction of twenty-five per cent which is contemplated in our mutual aid. I feel that we should increase rather than decrease this contribution of money and goods.

If the long needed reforms which are promised, perhaps not very definitely, in the speech from the throne are fully implemented they will be most welcome to my people. In order to be able to make their full contribution to the winning of the war, the farmers and small town people of northwest Saskatchewan need definite assurances from this government. As the work of the house progresses I hope that legislation will be placed before us which will give satisfaction and certainty to them.

The great majority of those living in that part of Saskatchewan which I represent in this house are concerned with agriculture. Therefore their main and primary consideration is that agriculture in Canada shall rest upon a sure foundation. I think most hon. members who represent agricultural ridings will agree with me when I say that the security of agriculture depends upon the degree of world trade we are able to develop and secure for ourselves. I think rather than decreasing credits at the present time, we should be increasing them. Such action would help greatly to establish among the nations of the world which need foodstuffs a feeling of friendship which would make them willing to accept our products at a later date. I noticed the other day that one of the representatives in the United States said this:

> It is impossible for us to continue to be an island of prosperity in an ocean of adversity. We cannot be a healthy nation surrounded by a sick world.

Those words apply equally well to Canada. Upon the degree of international cooperation and trade that exist depends the security of the world in general and ourselves also. I feel that we should do more than we are doing to advertise the products we are giving to other nations on long term credits. We should definitely develop our own policies for mutual aid to Europe and Asia to a greater extent. There was a time when we had considerable exports of grain, wheat and flour to China. In 1929 our exports of wheat and flour to China and Hong Kong amounted to $21,565,000. That was a considerable export, but unfortunately after 1933 it dwindled down until in 1939 we were exporting only $698,000 worth of grain and flour products to that country. There is no reason in the world why we could not regain these markets by rendering more help to China during a time of extreme need, which is right now.

I think we are in a position to tell the people of the world that we are the producers of the finest foodstuffs to be found anywhere. We should let them know that after the war we can supply them with agricultural machinery and all kinds of raw materials and minerals. We should advertise these things in order to make our position for export later on known to the countries of the world which are likely to take advantage of it. The well-being of agriculture in Canada depends upon our export market, but, of course, it will never be secure without the guaranteeing by parliament of a definite parity price, with guarantees to extend for a period of at least two years. That would give our farmers an opportunity to plan and regulate their production.

We welcome the suggestion of placing a floor under agricultural products, but when the actual legislation comes before the house I reserve the right to criticize it, if necessary. I hope it will not be necessary, for I definitely hope that these floors will not be basements. We do not want basements; we want the same treatment for agriculture that industry has demanded, that is cost-plus. For too long our farmers have been producing at less than cost and the time has come when this situation should be changed. The farming people of Canada need protection. They need a stabilization of prices by the elimination of grain gambling, and the elimination of the excess profits of those monopolies which are so closely connected with agriculture, such as the milling industry and packing plants.

I am pleased to see that the government intends to set up an industrial development bank, but in this connection I have a suggestion to make. I would propose that in the legislation to be brought down during this session provision should be made not only for an industrial bank but for a bank for agricultural development. I appreciate that small business interests need such a bank, but I insist that even to a greater extent the smaller farmers, particularly those in the west, need a similar bank. First of all, they need a scaling down of their present debts. They need access to funds on long terms and at low rates of interest. They need the opportunity to establish themselves after the many years of drought and depression through which they have persevered and tried to keep their farms in operation. I hope the government will do what is possible to see that such a bank is instituted.

During the last recess I talked with many farming people in my province and I found that they considered it a disgrace that the province—undoubtedly because of pressure exerted by this government—is insisting upon the collection of old seed, feed and relief debts. During 1937 and 1938 there was a drought, and many of our farmers were forced to take the seed and feed which was given to them through the relief agencies maintained by this government and operated through the provinces and the municipalities. Why does this government feel that those farmers should pay back that relief? It may be said that the farmers got the relief. Certainly they got seed and feed, but when they got it they were actually producing wheat at less than cost. I do not think the Minister of Agriculture will contradict me.

Mr. GARDINER: Since the hon. member has referred to me, I will contradict her. The feed and relief which were given by this government at the period of time referred to by my hon. friend were given as a free gift.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am very glad to hear the minister say that. But when I was speaking to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in August he assured me that he had to see to the collection of the seed, feed and relief debts still outstanding in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: It will be noted that I did not include seed. I said that feed and relief were given practically as a gift.

Mrs. NIELSEN: It is particularly the relief that was given in the matter of seed that I would mention. I ask hon. gentlemen, did not that relief benefit, not so much the farmers of Saskatchewan when they were producing wheat at low prices, as the railways, the grain exchange, and the small businessmen who benefited from the fact that the farmers were able to put in a crop? That relief helped to keep alive the whole economy of western Canada, and therefore I say that in justice to the farmers it should not be only the farmers who should be asked to pay back that relief but rather the country at large. Let the country at large accept the responsibility for the relief which the farmers were forced to accept.

Mr. GARDINER: I repeat, the farmers were not asked to pay back the relief that was given by this government.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is charged against their farms.

Mr. GARDINER: No, it is not.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They have been notified by the municipalities to that effect.

Mr. GARDINER: Not as regards the relief given by this government. That was given as a free gift and not charged against the farmers. The provincial government did borrow and give relief, but that was not relief given by this government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The relief was given by the country, not by the government.

Mrs. NIELSEN: At some later time I shall be glad to bring before the minister definite statements from my people to substantiate what I have said.

We are very happy to think that the government will consider setting up research laboratories in western Canada, and if we have an industrial bank which will help to finance small industry, we hope that we may have set up in Saskatchewan certain industries which will improve the economy of our province and benefit our people.

No doubt many members will be speaking on the question of housing, particularly with regard to cities. But I want to assure the House that housing is not a matter of concern only to city people. Overcrowding in slum areas in the cities is a ghastly thing, but in the rural areas we also have slum conditions. There, however, it is not overcrowding but the terrible isolation which makes conditions so bad for the settlers who have to endure them. In one of the publications of the Department of Agriculture, the Economic Annalist for November, 1943, there is an article about housing conditions in Saskatchewan. It says in part:

> It is readily agreed that improvements in the condition of farm homes in Saskatchewan are badly needed, and that some thought should be given towards rural housing in a broad reconstruction programme.

It goes on:

> Farm houses in the pioneer fringe region are generally in poor condition. The majority of settlers' houses in this region are built of logs and are of rough construction. This situation is in direct contrast with that in the prairie and park regions where the usual house is of frame construction with a small proportion of brick and stone construction. The poorest condition of houses for the pioneer region was shown by the Goodsoil-Pierceland area.

That happens to be in the northwest corner of my riding, and in that particular area the percentage of homes definitely acknowledged to be in poor condition was 70·2; the percentage of homes acknowledged to be in fair condition was 27·4, and those homes acknowledged to be in good condition were only 2·4 per cent of the total. So that in our part of the country, especially if we have a development bank set-up to grant agricultural credits, we hope to see a definite and constructive programme of rural housing undertaken by the government. Not only should the government do that, but I feel that there should be some supervision over the material and equipment used and over the construction companies which undertake such a housing scheme. Unless the government exercises some supervision there will be great variations in quality and price. We need to have prices minimized and standards of material and equipment set, before a housing project of this kind can really be efficient.

We would also suggest that plans for the electrification of Saskatchewan be made at the earliest opportunity. Some of our areas on the eastern side of Saskatchewan might be linked up with the electrification which is being undertaken by the province of Manitoba. We should also do something in the development of our northern water powers. In the northern areas of my riding there are some people who live thirty miles away from the nearest telephone, and in any programme of reconstruction and rehabilitation better telephone communication should be provided for these areas. In times of sickness or accident, with people as far away from a telephone as thirty miles, it will be seen how difficult communication is, particularly at certain times of the year when the roads are impassable.

With regard to health measures, there is unanimous agreement that these are not only necessary but extremely urgent. We need these things. As far as I can gather, the great majority of Saskatchewan people are supporting the Saskatchewan state medical league. They feel that to create conditions of positive health it would not be wise or prudent to take from the incomes of those who are farming in a small way or from the low salaried workers contributions toward a national health insurance scheme. They want the best of health insurance, not a makeshift policy.

We welcome all these things, but I want it definitely known that these measures will not be an alternative to providing for the basic needs of agriculture, which are world trade and guaranteed prices. These other social security measures will just add to the security and well-being of our farming people.

In the far north there are regions in my constituency where in isolated settlements only Indians and half-breeds live. I would suggest that in the period of rehabilitation, in order to give these people a little better opportunity, we might see what can be done in the matter of flooding certain areas, to give these people who live by hunting and trapping a better opportunity of catching muskrats and of selling furs. We might also consider the development of handicrafts in certain districts because that is work which Indians can very well do.

I mentioned this before but it is worth mentioning again. We would like to see an extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to include the northern areas of Saskatchewan. In some submarginal areas people have been settled on land which will never be able to provide them with a decent standard of living. Some of these families might be moved, under the act, to land more suitable which would give them a better return for their labour, and the lands which they vacate could be reforested and used as game and forest reserves.

My constituency is of tremendous size, and up in the extreme northerly corner of settled territory there is an area of roughly 6,000 square miles without a railway. It is a country which is well settled. There was the beginning of a railway built there ten or twelve years ago. It was a spur line sent in from Alberta to link up with Meadow Lake and St. Walburg. That line was not completed. The roadbed ends in the wilderness. If it were completed it would give the people in that district a chance to ship their cream, eggs and other farm products. I think the building of that railway should be undertaken immediately on the cessation of the war.

I do not think the small farmers, even if we have the measures which I have advocated, will feel that they are quite secure. Therefore, on behalf of those farmers who are farming on a small scale, I think that definitely this government must guarantee to them that they have security of tenure of their land, that we make evictions and foreclosures of these small farmers impossible, because how else are these people to try to develop their farms with any degree of hope for the future? Not only that, but we should prohibit the seizure of farm machinery. Government-owned machine stations should be established, so that these people are not left to antiquated methods of old farm machinery when they can have the chance of something new and better at low rentals. Furthermore, I believe that in these areas of pioneer and homesteading the government should definitely decide to do something to improve the nutritional standards of the people, and by that I mean not after the war, but now. I suggest that something along the lines of the United States stamp plan should be inaugurated to enable these people whose nutrition is low and whose income is poor to have some of the grains, fruits and other surplus foods which will from time to time be available. I think the provision of school lunches for children in these pioneer areas should also be undertaken.

These are things which should not be left until after the war, but should be organized to-day, to aid and increase the ability of our farm people to put their hearts and souls into the winning of the war and to look forward with hope toward the future.

I would again recall the statement made by one of the representatives in the United States house, that it was impossible for us to continue to be an island of prosperity in an ocean of adversity. On behalf of my own people in northern Saskatchewan may I express the hope and the belief that we should never again have islands of adversity, as the northwestern corner of Saskatchewan has been in the past—islands of adversity in an otherwise prosperous world.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate, but in view of the controversy raised by the address which Lord Halifax, British ambassador to the United States, delivered before the Toronto board of trade, on which occasion Mr. John Bracken, leader of the Progressive Conservative party of Canada was in attendance, I deem it my duty to submit to this house a few considerations which I regard as necessary.

As a matter of fact, what was stated by Lord Halifax is that, since the imperial federation exists in fact, he could not see why it could not also exist by right. I am convinced that the ambassador himself was the first to derive some amusement out of the rumpus which some people have, for electioneering purposes, raised about his address.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, from the time of the Transvaal affair to this day, have not the successive governments taken an active share in bringing about, in point of fact, the imperial federation referred to by Lord Halifax?

The Canadian government stepped in first through participation in a war whose object was to deprive of its freedom a small defenceless country which only wanted to live, Transvaal. In 1914 at the request of the British government, they once again sided with England in what was then called a "struggle for the salvation of democracy." Now, dictatorships have never been so numerous in Europe and everywhere else than after that war of 1914: there have been dictatorships in Germany, in Italy, in Spain, in Russia, et cetera. All of them resulted from the Versailles treaty in the drafting of which the former prime minister of Britain Lloyd George, took an outstanding part. Finally, in 1939, we declared war to guarantee the Polish boundaries, which latter, if I may say so in passing, will shrink noticeably as a result of the present conflict. Besides, here is what Lord Halifax stated on that point in the course of his address:

> We can imagine the bewilderment of an intelligent visitor from another planet on being confronted with its manifest contradictions. . . . The visitor, baffled by this extraordinary confusion of functions, would suffer a further shock if he went on to study what actually happened in September, 1939. He would find that on September 3 Great Britain declared war on Germany; that Australia and New Zealand declared war on the same day, and that South Africa and Canada followed a few days later.
> He might well wonder why. He would naturally be puzzled to determine what possible interest the Polish corridor could have for a Canadian, or Danzig for an Australian, or the western frontier of Poland for a South African.
> The dominions had not been parties to the Treaty of Guarantee to Poland which was the immediate cause of Great Britain's action. . . . They had influenced, but had not been responsible for, the foreign policy of Great Britain.

Lord Halifax was justified in saying, from his own standpoint: "Since you are members de facto of an imperial commonwealth, why would you not be members de jure?"

Speaking with the authority which he derived from his threefold title of Minister of Justice, right-hand man of Mr. Mackenzie King and dean of the House of Commons, when he maintained that Canada was compelled to take part in the war, Mr. Lapointe, on September 9, 1939, and February 22, 1940, uttered these words: "Neutrality is impossible." On September 9, 1939, he quoted neutrality as defined by Oppenheim "a recognized authority in international law": "Neutrality may be defined as the attitude of impartiality adopted by a third state towards belligerents and recognized by belligerents, such attitude creating rights and duties between the impartial state and the belligerents." On the strength of this rigid definition, the former minister of justice painted a dark picture of Canada remaining neutral in a war which involved Great Britain. Not only did he claim that neutrality was impossible, but he went so far as to assert that there was no such thing as mitigated, partial or sympathetic neutrality. To those who were advocating a policy of mitigated or sympathetic neutrality towards Great Britain, Mr. Ernest Lapointe replied, on September 9, 1939, I quote:

> Well, Mr. Speaker, as a constitutional student —as I think I am—as a public man and a Minister of Justice of Canada I state, with all my responsibility, that there is no such thing as mitigated or partial neutrality.

In his recent address, Lord Halifax stated:

> As opposed to that policy, which Ireland showed could be followed, the world had watched the amazing spectacle of free nations flying into common action as a result of policies in which they had had little share, but in defence of common ideals.

Ireland adds her testimony to that of Lord Halifax. On January 26, 1943, the Canadian Press released from Ottawa the following dispatch—I quote:

> Mr. John D. Kearney, High Commissioner of Canada to Dublin, stated that the official attitude of the government of Eire in the present war, as defined by Prime Minister de Valera, is an attitude of benevolent and friendly neutrality. All that Ireland can do in the circumstances is to show goodwill and friendship toward the united nations. Mr. Kearney made this statement to the newspapermen to-day, on the occasion of his first visit to Ottawa, since he has assumed his post in Ireland, two years ago.

In a report on this subject, a daily French paper of Montreal stated: "Ireland's neutrality in this war is a benevolent neutrality."

Mr. Speaker, after all these gestures worthy of colonials, made by the governments which have successively held power since the Transvaal war and which the King administration has amplified during the present conflict, Lord Halifax has considered that it was only logical for him benevolently to stoop down towards Canada and charitably offer our country a seat in the imperial council that will be called, after the war, to pass on matters pertaining to the foreign policy of England.

Was it not a former prime minister of Canada, Mr. R. B. Bennett, who made the following statement, as reported by radio station CFCF, a few days ago:

> I do not believe the British empire is an accident. I believe that the miracles of this war are indeed miracles, and that we have survived and will continue to do so because we have a divine mission to rule the world.

More than that, Mr. Speaker, did not the parliamentary secretary to the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, who is supposed to express the latter's views, state and define, in the course of an address recently delivered in the United States, the future policy of the Canadian government in the following terms:

> Cooperation with the United States in the protection of the North American continent and of Great Britain, a country which must be considered, in these times of fast transportation, as the outpost and bastion of our continent.

Therefore, if Mr. Claxton wishes Canada, in cooperation with the United States, to contribute to the defence of Great Britain, it is because the latter is considered to be a bastion and outpost of our continent.

In a few words, Mr. Speaker, our whole war policy leans towards the views held by Lord Halifax. Is not Canada the only British commonwealth dominion without a national flag, and where the union jack is still the emblem unfurled over all public buildings? Is not our country, with its small population of some eleven million, the nation that has done most to hold that bastion, England, by a per capita war effort greater than that of any other country in the world?

Our total income, as compared with our total expenditures, have diminished from 82 per cent in 1939 to the pitifully low figure of 46 per cent in 1943. The total deficit in our budget increased from $119,000,000 in 1939 to the fantastic sum of $3,018,000,000 in 1943. The financial help granted the United Kingdom, which was not anticipated in the budget, climbed from $104,000,000 in 1939 to $1,053,000,000 in 1941, and since then, it has sky-rocketed to tremendous heights.

At the conference which took place in Toronto, Mr. John Bracken, by his presence and applause, gave full support to the words spoken by Lord Halifax. Moreover, all those who heard the speech made by the temporary leader of the Progressive-Conservative party in the house noticed that he considered the proposal of Lord Halifax, simply as a matter of controversy, when both he and Mr. Bracken should have protested and insisted that Lord Halifax leave the country never to set foot here again; for no other country in the world would have tolerated for one moment that foreign ambassador, even though a lord, ask that country to sacrifice its independence in order to please a caste of tories and imperialists who have but one thought in mind, that being to go on milking Canada indefinitely.

In the face of the unspeakable claim suggesting that we be associated to an empire with which we have nothing in common from the geographical and economic standpoints, our present-day Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) felt a sudden throb of Canadianism; this reawakening was evidenced by protests against this proposal, protests which I heartily endorse; the proposal, however, is but the corollary to an imperialistic policy for the shaping of which he must assume a large share of responsibility. We must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the audacity of the British government which, in spite of what might be said, inspired Lord Halifax, is but the natural consequence of our own weakness. Lord Halifax thought, quite simply: "If they have set the stage for this request, why should I not take advantage of it?" That is one of the reasons why, in September, 1939, I voted against Canada's participation in the war.

As far as I am concerned, I protest vigorously against the proposal of Lord Halifax, just as I have always protested, ever since I have held a seat in the house, against any tightening of the bonds which unite us to England.

I would much rather have my country take a course leading to complete independence than follow blindly in the winding wake of England's foreign policy, a policy which will fatally lead us again into war every twenty or twenty-five years. The sooner we realize that, the better.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to state that if I disapprove of the mad effort which we are putting forth in our participation and which is out of proportion with our financial possibilities, I nevertheless wish to congratulate the government for having announced, in the speech from the throne that they intend to introduce legislation designed to afford farmers the necessary economic stability in the post-war period, through the establishment of minimum prices on the chief farm products. That is a measure which I have advocated every year since I have been a member. I am glad to note that the government has at last adopted it.

Moreover, I wish to congratulate the government for having recognized the principle of family allowances. I hope that the bill which will be introduced in this house will include no restriction as regards the number of children to whom the measure may apply. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, out of 2,486,920 families in Canada, 617,990 or 24.84 per cent live in the province of Quebec. If there are grounds for the rumour that no allowance would be granted to the seventh and subsequent children, this would deprive the province of Quebec from an advantage to which she is rightfully entitled, for it is in our province that the primary notion of patriotism which consists in giving children to the Canadian nation is best understood. Out of 84,920 Canadian families with seven, eight or nine children, Quebec accounts for 43,170, and out of the 20,890 Canadian families with ten or more children, Quebec has 13,220.

The other day I heard certain persons say that this measure would help extend French influence in Canada. May I, Mr. Speaker, reply to this argument as follows: This legislation will tend rather to give recognition to the unsung heroism of the Canadian mother who daily in her home ignores the urge of selfishness, denies herself in order to do her humble share for a greater and finer Canada where life is worth living. In regard to the development which this legislation may give to the French tongue and influence, I assert that Canada can but benefit from two cultures developing along parallel lines without, however merging entirely. To those who out of racial fanaticism oppose the principle laid down by this legislation may I say also that no matter what may be done in regard to the use of the French language, I state positively that it will endure for, as the poet said:

> Trying to stop its impetus is just like trying to prevent rosebuds from bursting into full blossom. Trying to annihilate its charm and power is like dreaming to dim the radiance of dawn.

No matter what campaigns are launched to suppress the traditions which we inherited from our ancestors, the French pioneers who settled the country, those traditions will remain alive always, for Providence willed, and rightly so, that we should stand guard faithfully, on the shores of the St. Lawrence, in this north American continent, over the genius of French thought.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the words in the speech from the throne in regard to our armed forces; I think they have done a magnificent job. The air force lived up to the best traditions of Canada when it took part in the battle of Britain and helped to defend that citadel of freedom in the dark days of 1940. The men of the navy have been responsible to no small degree for the winning of the battle of the Atlantic and for holding open the life-line to Great Britain and other countries. The men of the army had a tedious wait for several years, and it was remarkable that their morale held up as well as it did. However, they were ambassadors of good will in Great Britain and helped to further the splendid relationship that exists between Canada and the motherland. The women of the armed forces have done very well also. Our men are now conducting themselves wonderfully in Italy, I think far better than the general public really know. They are going through a terrible time over there, and I sometimes think the exploits of our men are taken too much for granted by the people of Canada. I believe it would be better if we knew a little more about the grim conditions under which our forces have to carry on.

That being so, let us see that when the men and women of the armed forces return to Canada they are not disillusioned by the treatment they receive. Every effort must be put forth to see that the ideals for which they fight are realized. Perhaps the majority of the workers—and I include everyone—on the home front have some realization and appreciation of the efforts put forth by our armed forces, but the more closely the hardships and sufferings of our men are brought home to the people in Canada, the more they realize the difficulties that are being encountered, the greater will be their understanding of what must be done in future for those men and women who have saved the world from nazi terrorism and brutality.

After our successes in North Africa we heard it said in many quarters that the war would probably be over by June. I never held that view, which to my mind was greatly to be deplored. Even the speech from the throne, I thought, gave that impression in the first few paragraphs; perhaps that impression was given because what was actually said was so overshadowed by window-dressing. Certainly it looked like a pre-election speech, and I think has been so taken by a great many people. Therefore I thought it was very timely that in his address on January 31, after reviewing the favourable position that the allies are in to-day and the position of the axis powers, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should say, as reported at page 33 of Hansard:

> But I do say at once to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada that I am far from believing there is going to be an early conclusion to this war.

Something along the same line was said to the British House of Commons by Mr. Churchill. Perhaps people were beginning to think too much about the post-war period and too little about the winning of the war itself. The Prime Minister also disillusioned those who thought there would be an early general election, when he said, as reported at the same page of Hansard:

> The people of Canada do not want a general election at this time of war. Our men fighting overseas do not want an election, if it can be avoided, until after victory is achieved, and we are in a position to welcome them and all our armed forces home as a victorious army.

However, the Prime Minister left the door open pretty wide, so that I think it is obvious that in the speech from the throne he was dressing his windows and showing his wares to the people of Canada in preparation for a general election, and I imagine that if the right time should present itself the window-dressing will not count for much, though there will have to be some issue on which he will go to the country. I for one think a general election at this time would be deplorable. Look at what lies ahead of our fighting men. Perhaps we may gain some idea of the difficulties they will encounter if we look at the illustration which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star not long ago showing some of the fortifications which will have to be overcome on the western front. Think of the terrible blood-bath that will have to be endured; think of the loss of life, the loss of property that must take place before victory is won. When we consider the care with which the campaign in Italy is being conducted it seems obvious that it will be some time before the war is over; and the war will be over only when we are in complete control of the nazi countries. Another point is that as far as I can see there is no need for a general election just now, because the government have an overwhelming majority and can do anything they like.

I have one or two suggestions to offer in connection with the reform of the procedure of the House of Commons, though perhaps some hon. members who come from a distance will not agree with them. Reform is very badly needed because of the tremendous growth of the business which must be done and the multiplicity of subjects which must be debated. I think everyone in the country deprecates the fact that to a large extent the nation is being run by order in council. I believe most of these measures should be debated on the floor of the house. For instance, order in council P.C. 9384, the wartime wages control order, was passed on December 9 only a short time before the house met. Perhaps the decision in that connection had to be made promptly; I do not know. But it seems to me that a measure of that kind might well have waited until the house was in session. Had that been the situation, some of the unrest among working men might have been eliminated. However, so far as that measure is concerned, I know several hon. members have spoken with respect to it, and I do not wish to repeat what has been said. I simply raise my voice in vigorous protest against the measure as being un-British and undemocratic. I say it should be repealed, and we should have discussion on the floor of the house with respect to it.

It seems to me that when the committee is considering amendments to the rules of procedure some thought might be given to the length of session. We come to Ottawa in the early part of the year, remain here five or six months, and then return to our homes for the remainder of the year. Of necessity, orders in council have to be passed while we are not here, and without debate. Why could the session not be divided into three parts, the members coming here for two or three months, and then returning home? In the first part of the session we might discuss the speech from the throne, vote moneys, pass the necessary appropriation measures, and the required supply. Then we could go away for a couple of months, and return for a further two or three months of discussion, or whatever may be necessary. We might then go away again and, if necessary, come back a little later on.

So far as I know, all orders in council of major importance dealt with by the British government are placed before parliament, and opportunity is given for their discussion when the house is in session. Under our present system I believe the government have taken advantage of the powers given under the War Measures Act to govern by orders in council to too great an extent. Also, they are unnecessarily infringing upon provincial rights. They have taken powers to which they are not entitled. As I have said before in other sessions, a great deal of discussion and many long speeches might be obviated by the introduction of a question hour. Question hours might be allowed two or three times a week during which questions could be asked, replies given and supplementary questions asked. If that were permitted I am sure much of the lengthy discussion and debate would be obviated. There is no doubt of the success of that principle in the British House of Commons.

I am in agreement with much of the proposed legislation in the speech from the throne, but I urge that the government introduce its legislation and bring it down on the floor of the house. The people of Canada do not want window-dressing to-day. Rather, they want something concrete; promises are not enough. They want legislation.

There is a further matter I should like, on account of its urgency, to bring to the attention of the house, rather than wait until a later date. I refer to a revision of the remuneration paid to letter carriers in Toronto, a revision which is long overdue. When one compares the wages or salaries paid to other public servants, such as policemen, firemen, motormen and the like, he realizes at once that the remuneration of postmen or letter carriers which, at present, ranges from $1,020 to $1,500 a year, is inadequate. To these sums, of course, must be added the cost of living bonus.

The intelligence required to perform the arduous duties of these men is often overlooked. I have not now the time to make a comparison with other services, in figures, but the importance of letter carriers, as far as the performance of their duties is concerned, has been underestimated. The letter carrier is the last link in the system of communications. He corrects all mistakes previously made, he manipulates mail, and attends to incorrect or insufficient addressing by the public. He offers the only means of effecting delivery. He records businesses and householders, and also keeps a record of guests, home-owners, and those people who are in hospitals and hotels. All information in connection with these men is set out in a circular forwarded by the letter carriers branch No. 1—F.A.L.C. committee, which circular I have no doubt has been put into the hands of Toronto and district members. This is an urgent matter and one which should receive immediate attention. That is my reason for bringing it up at the present time.

I was pleased to see in the speech from the throne that at last the government has decided to do something in connection with low-cost housing. I have discussed this matter on many occasions, and I have always been told it was one within the control of the provincial government, the cities or the municipalities directly concerned, and that it was not a matter of federal responsibility. Last year, when it was so difficult to get housing accommodation for workers in Toronto I described some of the conditions under which people were living in my own riding. In some instances I have found families with as many as five or six children living in one or two rooms. Often the house was old, in bad condition and infested with vermin, a condition which was bad for the health of the children. However, city officials did not enforce the by-laws because those people, if ejected, had no place to go. It is about time some consideration were given to conditions of that kind.

I do not wish to discuss the questions arising from the speech delivered by Lord Halifax, or from that of General Smuts. These are matters requiring careful thought ,and I do not believe we should have preliminary discussions on the floor of the House of Commons. The proper place for such discussion by the Prime Minister of Canada would be in round-table conference with the other prime ministers of other dominions. There are many intricate and complex problems involved. The Prime Minister has spoken to us about the means of communication at his hand, with which he may communicate with various members of the commonwealth, or premiers of the provinces. However, all hon. members who are in business know that in their own daily lives, despite the advanced methods of communication, nothing will take the place of a round-table conference. Good and all as communications are, I think we might conclude that the Prime Minister is not going to communicate by telephone with the premiers of the different provinces. I understand that they are to come to Ottawa for a conference in the near future.

It is my hope that the Prime Minister will attend the round-table conference of which mention has been made recently. I hope it will be called at as early a date as possible. Above all, I hope the Prime Minister will go over there with an open mind.

This brings me to another matter which I should like to discuss a little more fully, the question of radio. When we first set up radio in Canada an effort was made to make it a government monopoly, but times and conditions have changed. In Canada we have both free enterprise and public ownership working in cooperation with each other and the state. We have free enterprise under government control and we have public ownership under government control, both surrounded by safeguards to prevent abuse of their powers.

For instance, we have the Bell Telephone company, a free enterprise, operating in conjunction with rural telephone systems, many of which are publicly owned. We have the Canadian Pacific Railway operating in conjunction with the Canadian National Railways. We have privately owned power companies operating in conjunction with publicly owned systems; although in different territories. All these different enterprises compete one against the other. That is a good thing because they act as checks. But they are all operating under the control of the state. We have publicly owned water systems and some privately owned systems. At times privately owned systems have been changed to public ownership and it has been found that they did not work as successfully. We have both publicly owned and privately owned transportation systems in our cities, but they are all under control.

It is important that we should have this dual system because our whole economy has been built up on that principle. Our whole system was evolved on that principle. People talk about our democracy as being a government of the people, for the people, by the people, and let it go at that. But it is more than that. Our system of democracy is built up on one important principle, the diversification of powers of influence. Government of the people means our parliament. For the people means for all classes. By the people means that the people elect parliament. Parliament is not elected by one class; it is elected by all classes. Perhaps this is done differently in other countries, but that is how it is done here. Parliament is the servant of all, of the power of capital, of labour, of the civil service, of science and so forth, and last but not least, of the power of the freedom of the individual.

Our system has been built up having in view the danger of absolute power. We have always been trying to safeguard against uncontrolled monopolistic power. This is especially bad when such power is controlled by the government or by the state. I see this as an approaching danger in connection with radio in Canada. A British statesman said, "Give me the complete use of the radio and I will elect any party to power." I think he was about right when he said that. The absolutism of the radio corporation in Canada is becoming more intolerable all the time and is becoming more dangerous to the country. I see great danger in the future if it is allowed to continue.

Radio in Canada is nominally controlled by the board of governors, but in fact it is not controlled by the board of governors, it is controlled by the government. At the present time it is controlled by the Liberal party. The board of governors sits every once in a while, but there are at present two vacancies on the board. In addition, there is no general manager, only an acting general manager, and there is no assistant general manager. The bylaws call for certain duties to be performed by the assistant general manager, and I do not know who is performing those duties. However, enough of that. The government runs it; so that is that. With all the excuses in the world, with all the camouflage that can be offered that it is an absolutely independent enterprise, the fact is that it just is not so.

For some time we have had the acting general manager of the radio corporation acting as a referee as to who shall or shall not speak over the radio, whether an address is or is not controversial, or whether it is or is not political. He decides what prominent citizens are to be given the right to speak. If the subject matter of the speech is considered to be political, then the speaker is not allowed on the radio. There have been some slight adjustments in these rules because certain parties are now allowed some time on the air.

On the other hand we hear forum discussions of the most controversial subjects and at times the discussions are inaccurate and misleading. These forums last for half an hour, and they take up subjects which could be debated for at least two or three hours before a proper conclusion could be arrived at. The inaccurate results of these things are left in the minds of the public. Just the other day I listened to a radio broadcast over the new network coming from Philadelphia. This was a speech by a gentleman in the United States whose name I have forgotten. He was referring to Mr. Nehru of India and his persecution by the British government. I do not know anything about that, nor do I know much about Mr. Gandhi or the political significance of all this. But I do know that at the meeting of the empire parliamentary committee held here in the House of Commons the facts were given to us by members of the British government. We listened to a most instructive talk on the matter. I am not defending Gandhi or Nehru; I am simply referring to the discussion about them as an example of the controversial matters that are heard over the radio. If such things are allowed over the radio, is there any reason why other speakers should not be allowed to speak? I only make that comparsion.

Mr. Bracken was refused the use of the Radio Broadcasting Corporation facilities and there was a great deal of controversy over that decision. His speech was rejected by the referee for the corporation on the ground that it was political and that something must first be deleted from it. Who was the judge? Was it the acting general manager of the corporation? Was it the board of governors? Was it some other body that decided that Mr. Bracken should not be allowed to speak because he was too popular? But Mr. Bracken is a prominent citizen of this country and his speech was broadcast over a private radio station and also received wide publicity in the press. I defy anybody within sound of my voice to tell me that that speech was political or controversial. It was a good speech, made by a sane man on conditions in Canada and giving the speaker's suggestions as to what ought to be done. It was not a political speech in any sense, and I might add that it was very well received by the public of Canada.

Last year the committee of this house on radio broadcasting made this recommendation, at page 260 of this report:

> Outstanding speakers of national importance should continue to express their views.

In view of that recommendation of a committee of this house, why was Mr. Bracken not allowed to use the national hook-up to express his views, simply because he was the leader of the Progressive Conservative party? This is not the first time that a speaker of national importance has been refused the air simply because he was the leader of a political party. But all the ministers of the cabinet can use the air all they like and their speeches are not censored.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): All right. I think it is quite proper that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should give a message to this country. But it is a different matter entirely to have political broadcasts by ministers of the crown, as has happened in the past.

Mr. HOMUTH: They were not very effectual though.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If ministers of the crown are to be allowed to make political broadcasts, then prominent citizens, no matter what their political stripe, should also be allowed to give their views over the air because the public want to hear them.

The committee on radio broadcasting last year reaffirmed the principle of 1932, namely:

> The paramount importance of a single national authority to control all broadcasting in the public interest.

In view of the situation as we find it and the evolution which has taken place in broadcasting, it becomes a matter of public importance that there must be set up some independent body, such as the board of transport commissioners, free entirely from the control of government, publicly owned enterprise and privately owned enterprise, which will have the authority to control radio and act impartially. This body would formulate the general principles upon which broadcasting shall be carried on in Canada so that both private and public enterprise will carry on their business according to their own policies, subject only to the control of the board. The position today is that decisions are given by an official who is under control and his decisions therefore cannot possibly be impartial. He has to make decisions, for instance, with respect to private stations and decide how much power they shall have. Imagine all that being decided by a man who is running a radio system in competition with the private stations!

A commission or board such as I have described would also coordinate all broadcasting in Canada. Another necessity for this is shown in the contradiction which appears in the recommendation of the 1943 committee on radio broadcasting. It reaffirmed the principle of the 1932 report, as follows:

> The public ownership of all high-powered stations under a national system of broadcasting, with low-power stations individually operated or coordinated in relation to the dominant system.

In other words, the publicly-owned stations were to be the high-powered stations, and the privately-owned stations were to be allowed only low power.

Yet the 1943 committee recommended:

> . . . that the independent stations be encouraged to improve their facilities and that they be permitted to increase their power and to arrange for multiple station hook-ups, and generally do anything that makes for better broadcasting in the public interest.

It is true that a new network has been set up utilizing the private stations, but it is under the iron fist of government control. The 1943 committee also stated:

> Evidence was presented to the effect that there may be danger of losing full use of the channels now assigned to Canada by the Havana agreement.

That is so. Yesterday in the house we heard an answer given to a question put by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) in respect to aviation, which is a public monopoly in this country at the present time, pointing out the strangling of civil aviation. We do not want to have our radio channels lost to us in this country because of government radio monopoly here, but it is becoming abundantly clear that the monopoly control by the broadcasting corporation and the obstructions placed in the way of private stations has placed Canada in a very serious position with respect to channels. We cannot be a dog in the manger. The Havana agreement definitely states that unless these channels are taken up by a certain date by Canada they may be lost to us. We have to the south of us a country of 140,000,000 people, who want to be served by radio. We already have encroachment upon our channels by the United States, and unless we do something about it we shall not be left with the channels we now have and be subject to the control of radio by the United States. There is plenty of room for competing radio chains in this country, and for the reasons which I have stated we must not allow in Canada one all-powerful radio system.

The recommendations of the radio committee have been followed to a certain extent. Another network has been established. I do not know what the full implications of that are, but I imagine I shall find out later on.

Consider for a moment the implications in regard to other media of advertising. It is well known that paper rationing in regard to newspapers is in effect. There are other war-time restrictions on the publishing industry which of necessity have curtailed advertising in newspapers and magazines. Direct mail and similar forms of advertising have been seriously reduced by war-time restrictions, that is by the wartime prices and trade board. These restrictions have been imposed by the government for reasons known to these industries. One of the main reasons, of course, is to curtail the demand for consumer goods and thus set up another barrier to inflation. Yet we have the spectacle of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation going into the advertising business to an increasing extent, setting up new facilities for advertising, and thereby stimulating, in this most unfair way, the demand for consumer goods, notwithstanding the edict of the wartime prices and trade board.

Here is a statement made by the chairman of the board of governors in 1938:

> Beyond the figure of $500,000 per year of commercial revenue from network and local stations, it is not desirable nor the intention of the corporation to go, and that only until we are self-supporting from other sources.

The then Minister of Transport confirmed that idea.

The latest statements of the broadcasting in 1943, given to the committee, showed that the commercial revenue was $1,204,600. Also, the write-off from real estate, buildings, equipment, et cetera, was $411,000 on fixed assets of $800,000, or fifty per cent. Also there was a total surplus of $230,000.

Surely under present conditions there should be some reduction of the licence fee, or else the corporation does not need this commercial advertising, and it ought to be able to devote its whole time to giving good service to the public.

It is very necessary to-day, in view of the absolute powers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that another commission be appointed.

Mr. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne is interesting not so much for what it contains as to what it hints at. We are engaged in a total war and the government, in the speech from the throne, state that they intend increasing our effort if possible. However, it is the same government who told the Canadian people in the election campaign of March 1940 that our participation in the present conflict would be moderate. They have repudiated this promise together with all the others connected with our share in the bloody conflict now in progress. To ruin the country, shamelessly to sacrifice our man-power and capital, are their foremost and sole concern. All that we have is offered to the god of war, leaving nothing but ruin and bankruptcy for the Canadian people. The speech from the throne again hints at the government's intention to authorize, in the course of the present session, the payment of another tribute of a billion dollars to Great Britain. I state right now, Mr. Speaker, that I shall oppose this measure with all my strength, as I have done on two previous occasions.

Instead of paying an annual tribute to England, the government would be far better inspired in endeavouring to relieve the distress which is to be met all over the country.

The adoption of refugees is now to the fore, as well as immigration. Ever since it has been my privilege to sit in this house I have most strenuously opposed immigration to this country. I strongly condemned the admission to Canada of immigrants picked up on the docks of London and Liverpool, and I have not changed my mind. This means, Mr. Speaker, that I am a relentless opponent of immigration of whatever kind it may be and from whichever country it may come. Let the government encourage rather than discourage large families, thus, our population will increase normally and the immigration problem will no longer exist. As regards the admission of refugees to Canada, I oppose it just as strongly as I have condemned mass immigration. We did not want war and we have done nothing to foment it. Let those countries which have a share of responsibility in this war take care of the refugees whom it is proposed to pour into Canada. Let us first take care of our Canadian people, and above all let us mind our own business before meddling with the problems of others.

Mr. Speaker, I have received a large number of petitions from municipal councils in my constituency, protesting against immigration and, if one may say so, the adoption of refugees. I shall read one of these resolutions to this house:

> Resolution in "opposition" to the proposed immigration of European refugees to Canada in violation of the laws of the country.
> Whereas according to the Montreal Gazette, page one, the Dominion Minister of Immigration, Mr. Crerar, made the following declaration on November 3, 1943:
> "Canada offers a home to refugees. An immigration agent is being sent to Europe, and the dominion government will consider sympathetically the immigration to Canada of an unspecified number of refugees."
> Whereas it is a well-known fact that the United Jewish Refugees & War Relief Agencies, with head office at 1121 St. Catherine St. West, Montreal, has circulated among the public a petition asking that Canada open her doors to all the refugees from the European continent, and that it is endeavouring, under the patronage of Senator Cairine R. Wilson, to obtain in Canada 500,000 signatures for this purpose.
> Whereas in so far as such immigration will take place mostly in the province of Quebec, there is cause for alarm.
> Whereas on January 7, 1944, the Canadian Press released a news item bearing the following heading:
> "Canada has agreed to accept a limited number of immigrants. Refugees who come to Canada from the Spanish peninsula, according to a decision reached recently, will be given refuge for the duration of the war."

Whereas the fact of thus allowing refugees to enter the country is not only a further encroachment upon the prerogatives of the people, but will be the cause of social disturbances now and after the war.

Whereas this question has not been submitted to the House of Commons and members of parliament should have the opportunity of voicing their views on this matter before such a policy becomes effective. It is unanimously resolved by the council of the municipality of St. Valérien of Rimouski county,

1. That the above-mentioned municipal council is opposed to the suggested immigration plan and to any immigration on a different plan than that which has prevailed in recent years.

2. That in any case, no amendment to existing laws and regulations governing immigration should be made unless parliament has had an opportunity of discussing the matter at the next session.

3. That this resolution be given publicity.

4. That copy thereof be forwarded to the Prime Minister of Canada, to the Premier of Quebec, to the Quebec provincial leader of the opposition and to the dominion and provincial members of the constituency.

Dated January 24, 1944.

Municipality of St. Valérien.

per H. C. . . . Sec.-Treas.

Municipality of St. Valérien, Rimouski county.

I give my strongest support to resolutions passed by municipalities of my constituency opposing the admittance of refugees and immigration in general.

The speech from the throne contains the announcement concerning the adoption of family allowances by the government. I hope that this is not simply an election campaign promise but that, on the contrary, a bill will be brought down in this connection, in the course of this session. Allowances should not be granted exclusively to families of five or six children, but should apply to all families irrespective of their size.

Families of ten or twelve children are not a scarcity in the province of Quebec. Some are even larger. Personally, I am one of fifteen children, twelve boys and three girls, and I am convinced other families just as large can still be found in the constituency of Rimouski. The government, who had always refused to help large families has now an unique occasion to do so through family allowances. This is not the first time I take the opportunity of pleading this cause in the House and I shall continue to do so until the government decides to be fair to large families.

For us French Canadians, large families are our means of survival, and, as long as, in the province of Quebec, large numbers of children are brought into the world, we shall not need refugees or immigrants from whatever country they might come; that is the way to bring happiness and prosperity to the province of Quebec and to Canada. It is all very well to say that our territory could support 200 million inhabitants, but the numeric strength of our population is less important than its quality. Even if, in ten or fifteen years from now, Canada should support only 20,000,000 inhabitants, this number of Canadian-born citizens would be preferable to 50,000,000 people drawn from every European country or, as I said before, picked up on the wharves of London or Liverpool. Personally, I am for a Canadian population composed of our offspring, especially in the province of Quebec, of real Canadian citizens rather than of people brought from overseas and with whom attempts would be made, after the war, to merge the rest of the population of the province of Quebec. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I gladly support the petitions sent by the great majority of the municipalities of my constituency and I hope that, at least, the government will understand that helping large families—the best guarantee of prosperity for the country—is promoting their own interests.

Mr. JOSEPH-ARMAND CHOQUETTE (Stanstead) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I may say that I do not intend to trespass on the time of the house. Looking over the speech from the throne I notice that the government intends to introduce several measures of general interest. I do know, however, that if those measures were promised by a government still enjoying the confidence of the Canadian people, by a party that had shown more sympathy toward the people of this country during the last depression, I should be more hopeful of seeing those measures implemented.

That the people no longer trust the government is evidenced by the fact that in the four by-elections held in August 1943, the government candidates were defeated. The government supporters in this house were loud in their applauding the right honourable the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he spoke on January 31. They had been much less enthusiastic during the introduction of new members on January 26, the day on which parliament was prorogued, because each and every one of the new members were in the opposition.

The government now wish to redeem themselves in the public esteem, by including in the speech from the throne measures taken from the political programmes of rival parties. In September, 1943, in a speech delivered before the National Liberal Federation, a short time after the elections, the Prime Minister stated that the Bloc Populaire Canadien had but a destructive policy which raised the province of Quebec against the remainder of the country. Yet the Bloc Populaire's programme included family allowances, but the government have nevertheless discovered that the family and the home constitute the foundations of national life. They had to be reminded of that by the Bloc Populaire. With the family allowances that our political movement will ensure us, we shall have the true Christian ideal, based on fraternity and charity. Needless to say, the family is going to derive much benefit from such allowances. We all know that from 1929 to 1939 large families were those which suffered most and had to make the greater sacrifices at that time, and the governments of the time had no thought for family allowances.

Even to-day, on account of the present salary structure, the worker who has a large family, can hardly supply his children with the bare necessaries. The members of the family lack food, clothing and decent housing. The consumption of milk in the working class families is much lower than it should be, and it is the same with meat, vegetables and fruits. Too many workers live in slums. The salaries now being paid do not allow the heads of large families to give their children the bare necessaries.

In the case of the farmer, the situation is different. A farmer who has many children is unable to provide for their education and establishment. In the cities educational facilities are numerous and varied. In rural areas, when children grow up and become old enough to work, they scatter here and there. It is humanly impossible for a farmer who has many children to provide for their establishment, and frequently he must resign himself to letting them take their chance as soon as they are able to earn their living.

Such are, in brief, the difficulties which our families must face. That is why we, the supporters of the Bloc Populaire, have included family allowances in our programme. But let there be no infringement on the rights of the provinces because we hold autonomy as a sacred right. We are against centralization.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne refers to war. We are told that the German army is still quite powerful, that future operations will entail desperate fighting and heavy casualties. But are not those who plunged us into this disastrous conflict the very people who for twenty-five years have been advocating a pacifist policy? On May 24, 1938, in a remarkable speech filled with Canadian inspiration, the right honourable the present Prime Minister stated:

[Mr. Choquette.]

Our foreign and external policy is a policy of peace and friendliness, a policy of trying to look after our own interests and to understand the position of other governments with which we have dealings. It is a policy which takes account of our political connections and traditions, our geographical position, the limited members and the racial composition of our people, our stage in economic development, our own internal preoccupations and necessities—in short, a policy based on the Canadian situation.

And he added:

We have neither the power nor the will to attack any other land for our own ends. Nor are we inclined to organize or join in crusades in other continents. We have neither the power nor the knowledge to settle the destinies of countries thousands of miles away. We are no more likely of our own motion to intervene in Europe than Sweden or Bulgaria or Switzerland is to intervene in America.

Mr. Speaker, these are the very words uttered in this house barely sixteen months before our country was thrown into this war. And what have we done with this moderate, voluntary effort which had been promised? It will suffice to glance through a small pamphlet entitled Canada at War, of December 1943, to realize what the pledges of our public men are worth. Present strength of our armed forces, over 725,000 men; women in the armed forces, 37,800; in the navy, present strength 70,000 men; in the army, present strength, over 470,000 men; at present overseas, approximately a quarter of a million men; in the air force, over 200,000 men and women; maximum number of persons identified directly or indirectly with the war effort, over 1,100,000 men.

And what has this war cost us? The estimate up to March, 1944 is $10,824,000,000. And the Liberal party, and its most prominent leaders, have for the last twenty-five years promised to the Canadian people that Canada would never take part in foreign wars. The mistake made by the Conservatives has been conclusively shown, for they are responsible for the fact that 60,000 Canadians have died on foreign battlefields. And what has the first world war cost us? For the six fiscal years beginning in April, 1914 and ending in March, 1920, $1,670,406,213, including the cost of demobilization. Are we better off with the Liberals than with the Conservatives? No, it is the same policy. For that matter, since the outbreak of the war the Conservatives in this house have supported all the important measures introduced by the government. We are sometimes told: "We must help the empire because the empire protects us." What help have we received from the empire? And we derive very little encouragement from the statement which appears on page 24 of the same pamphlet:

Canada at War

In 1918, after four years of war, Canada had suffered heavy losses on battlefields. So far the present conflict has not cost so many lives, but it must be borne in mind that Mr. Churchill has declared that the 1944 campaign in Europe will be harder and more costly in human lives than all the operations carried out to date by the western powers.

And these are the consequences of an imperialistic policy, of a policy which is contrary to our interests. We are quite justified in raising a cry of alarm and in attempting a National Awakening, in order to promote the interests of Canada instead of visiting ruination upon her and jeopardizing her future. The policy of the Bloc Populaire Canadien is opposed to any effort so out of proportion to our means, and the victory in Stanstead and the success in Montreal-Cartier have shown to what extent our party meets the aspirations of the province of Quebec; however, they have given the representatives of the old parties a salutary fear.

Mr. Speaker, there is no reference in the speech from the throne to a question which cannot leave us unperturbed, the question of immigration. I have received numerous resolutions passed by the municipal councils of Stanstead county, opposing any immigration and asking

That in any case, no amendment to existing laws and regulations governing immigration should be made unless parliament has had an opportunity of discussing the matter at the next session.

We are opposed to any immigration until the war is over, until our armies have been demobilized and reestablished in civil life; we shall oppose any immigration until all our workers have a job enabling them to support their families decently; we shall oppose any immigration until all our workers have a healthy home; we shall oppose any immigration until our farmers are in a position to give their sons a start in life. The Government have found billions to give to England for the prosecution of the war; they will have to find money also to overcome the numerous difficulties with which we shall be faced after the war.

Mr. Speaker, has the economic crisis ended? What legislative measures this house has passed to settle that question, I should like to know. Is it not true that the present artificial prosperity is brought about by the war and that soon, poverty will be widespread in the country, perhaps to a greater extent than even in 1939, because we are poorer and saddled with a greater debt than at that time? That is what we are attempting to avoid, Mr. Speaker.

The speech from the throne has little to say about agriculture and, at any rate, nothing very precise. It is true that for the last five years the main concern of the government has been the prosecution of the war, but has not a British minister of agriculture said that "the first line of defence of a country is agriculture"? In this country farming is the foundation, the cornerstone of the whole economic setup. What has the government done to induce farmers to produce more? Among other things, the greater part of the farm labourers have been taken for the army or sent to munition plants and the farmers are left without help after having made such tremendous sacrifices to stick to the land during the ten hard pre-war years. They are in urgent need of farm machinery, but the government request them to produce more while it is impossible for them to buy the implements and even the spare parts necessary for the operations of their farms. They have to wait long months before their orders are filled and, in spite of all that, they are requested to increase their production.

A permit is required to butcher hogs on the farm and very few farmers hold such permits. They are therefore forced to ship their hogs on the hoof on the Montreal market or others to powerful concerns who shall not be impoverished on account of the war. At these points, the hogs are kept for a number of days and their keep is charged to the producers, because the abattoirs are short of help. Last fall, the price of pork had fallen, when the price of feed was rising. In spite of all that they are told: "You farmers are used to that kind of thing, maintain your production at the present level anyway."

This brings me to say a few words about the assistance given by the government to cooperative societies. A cooperative butter factory was refused a permit to collect the cream produced by its shareholders under the pretext that gasoline and tires were rationed. The farmers have to attend themselves to the delivery of their dairy products, which is a waste of time when the help is scarce. It is ridiculous. My hon. friend from Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), on the other hand, has pointed out the schemes worked against the Quebec United Fishermen in order to promote the interests of two large fish-dealing firms, one from Montreal and the other from Toronto. Well may we wonder whether these schemes were not intended to put the small industries, the private trader and the cooperative societies out of business.

In the economic field, the Bloc Populaire Canadien will first of all promote the maintenance and, in some cases, the reestablishment of private enterprise. Take good note of this: to-day anything may be done under the easy pretext that we are at war. However, even in peace time, economic dictatorship tended to eliminate private businesses. Large trusts, powerful organizations, were crowding out the small or medium operators as well as the small and medium-sized industries and endeavouring to centralize all economic activities in the large cities. That is what we wish to avoid, Mr. Speaker. We are in favour of a new political economy to promote progress in agriculture.

Here is another article of our programme: the diversification of markets. The political value of this proposition is not so pronounced in war time; however, we expound it nevertheless as an essential element of national sovereignty. For many years past, eighty per cent of Canada's actual trade was done with two countries, Great Britain and the United States. It is easy to realize how far such a dangerous policy binds our destinies to those of the great imperialistic nations. If we ask that new markets be investigated it is not that we are opposed to those we already have, but simply that we are determined to insure that Canada will more effectively attain full autonomy.

Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday, the honourable member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) suggested to the government that the representatives of the province of Quebec who are opposed to the government should be appointed to the committees charged with studying important national matters, to which the honourable member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) replied—I quote from Hansard:

> The position taken by the hon. member for Gaspé illustrates what is taking place in this house with a multiplicity of parties. We do not need to tell members of this house what difficult situations arise as a result, but such is democracy and we have to meet it. At the same time a situation of this kind, which has to do with the internal economy of the house, makes it impossible to give representation to every political party that springs up ephemerally, and temporarily I hope, in this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, who is responsible for this situation? Why have the people lost confidence in the Conservative party? Why has that party failed to name candidates in the counties of Stanstead and Cartier in August, 1943? Why is the leader of the honourable member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) outside this house? Why has the honourable member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), who was elected as a Conservative in 1940, abandoned that party sometime later, declaring that there was no room for French-Canadians in the ranks of the Conservative party? The Canadian people, and especially the electors from Quebec have lost confidence in the old parties who too frequently have misled or betrayed them; their policies are no longer popular, and the policy of the Bloc Populaire alone is essentially Canadian.

If I have risen in this house to take part in the debate, it was to defend the rights of the electors of my constituency who have entrusted me with a very definite mandate last summer, to demand justice for the French-Canadians of my province and to urge the adoption of a real Canadian policy. I am not here to look after the interests of Russia or England or any other country, but of Canada, my only mother country. What does it matter if mud is flung at me; for my part, I feel that my country is worth fighting for and I am quite prepared to put up with such slight inconveniences.

Mr. EUGENE DUROCHER (St. James): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make a lengthy speech, but merely to pass a few remarks. At the very outset I should like to join with the other hon. members in offering congratulations to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay) and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) upon the magnificent way in which they moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the contents of which I am sure must have been acceptable to the great majority in this house. Never in the history of this parliament has such an elaborate programme been presented to the House of Commons for its appreciation and acceptance.

In addition to the assurance of a continued war effort, the government presents a series of social reforms which should satisfy even the most exacting, under present conditions. First, we find a plan for social security and human welfare; second, a plan for the housing and the health of the whole population; third, social insurance against unemployment, accident, death of the breadwinner from ill health or from old age; fourth, a measure to amend and supplement housing legislation; fifth, family allowances, and sixth, a revision of the Bank Act.

These are the main points which are being brought to our attention. It is gratifying for us to note that such reforms are the work of a Liberal administration. It would be premature to try to discuss these various items at length at the present time, because the details are not known to any of us, and they will not be known until such time as the bills are placed before the house.

For that reason I shall touch upon only one point now, namely that of family allowances.

This measure is surely worthy of our highest praise, and comes at a time when it is most needed by the Canadian people. It will help families balance their budgets, and bring up their children in a more satisfactory and appropriate manner, and at the same time it will to a certain extent relieve the wage problem in Canada. In spite of the criticism which has already appeared in some newspapers, and the remarks of hon. members, among whom were the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) and the newly elected member for Stanstead (Mr. Choquette), I feel certain the government will see to it that this measure for family allowances covers not only so many children in a family, but all the children under a specified age. Our critics, who do not know all the facts, should wait and see what the government has to offer in this direction. We all want an increased population in this vast dominion of ours. Before we allow foreign immigration we should attempt to encourage large families and help them the best we can.

This government, I feel certain, does not wish to tell parents that if they have so many children the state will help only so many, for this would mean the establishment of a new policy of birth control in Canada, but I suggest that that has never entered the mind of any minister of the crown in the present cabinet. Birth control would be the worst thing that could happen to our society at the moment. We need more and more good Canadians. It is better to encourage large Canadian families and provide assistance from the state than to bring in foreign immigration. The latter does not always prove profitable either from the standpoint of the nation or from the assimilation with true Canadians. I have before me a clipping from La Patrie of Montreal concerning a family of seventeen children. That is the kind of family we want in Quebec. Ten of these children are below the age of fourteen. If we had more families like that our immigration problem would be solved and we would not have to touch it.

It is sometimes hard to get reforms, but a reform is needed in connection with old age pensions. Last year the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) took up this matter and drew the attention of the government to the need of raising the allowance. We were all pleased when during the last days of the session the government announced that the allowance would be raised from $20 to $25 a month. We feel that at this session the government should make an effort to increase this allowance to $30 a month and reduce the age limit from seventy to sixty-five years. When a man or woman has reached the age of sixty-five—this applies to men more than to women—it is hard to find a new position should he or she be out of a job. No employer wants to take on anyone that old because he considers they cannot turn out the production. We should be more generous to these people. I feel certain that the government is going to look into this matter and that before the end of the session we shall have the assurance that the old age pension will be raised to $30 and the age limit lowered to sixty-five years.

I should like to refer now to the housing problem. I know there is a housing problem in every large centre in Canada, but I am better acquainted with the problem in my own city which I suppose is the same as that facing Toronto. Along with some of my colleagues this matter was taken up with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) last May, and we received the assurance that a survey would be made in Montreal and some other Canadian cities and a report submitted at the earliest possible date. Mr. Fripp of the housing administration was delegated to Montreal. I met him and went over the whole question. He spent some time in the city and then went somewhere else, and in the late fall he presented a report to the Minister of Finance. Nothing definite has come out of that, but just a few days ago I received a letter from the minister stating that the matter was receiving his earnest attention and that he hoped something definite would come out of it within the next few days. I appreciate that he has taken such an interest in this matter.

But the first of May will soon be here and, if something is not done, many people in Montreal, and I suppose also in Toronto, will be out on the street. We are looking after the older people, and we should be ready to do something for those tenants who will be without homes on the first of May. I am told that this is more a municipal problem. That may have been true before the war, but since the government can do anything under the War Measures Act I think it has now become a federal problem. Huge plants have been established in some of our cities and, while much of the population that has come in might be considered as floating population, large numbers of these people will remain. We are now faced with a position that will not improve after the war. If this is a federal problem, let us get after it without further delay. I suggested to the minister that loans bearing an interest rate of one and a half to two per cent should be made to the municipalities. Whoever builds a home to-day must spend more money than it is really worth and, if it is built for the benefit of the state, the state should see that the man who invests his capital in a building should not be the loser in the end. There are other matters I should like to take up, but I shall wait until the appropriations are before the house. I reserve the right to discuss them at that time.

Before I close I should like to say a word about our soldiers overseas. Like many others, I have been receiving letters not only from my own but from friends and from boys of my friends. I am glad to say that each and every letter I have received seems to show that our boys are being well treated in England. They are satisfied and hope to see action at the earliest possible moment. That is the spirit we want to see in our boys. But when they come back they will expect something of us and we must have the goods to deliver. We have many social problems in hand and I realize that they represent a lot of hard work. We may not be able to do everything at once, but let us not forget that bricks and mortar are not enough to build new homes in the world of to-morrow.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this fifth session, like the preceding sessions, will deal with the war. Victory being apparently certain and nearer, the government announces, in the speech from the throne, measures which they feel adequate to maintain the country's equilibrium during the period of readjustment, and to insure the people in the future against the hazards of life, as well as to provide social safeguards appropriate to modern times.

Canada will emerge out of the war crushed under a burden of debt and weakened by the loss of thousands of her sons; she will have to rebuild her commerce and her industry, as well as to straighten her general economy which has become out of balance, to say the least. Will it be possible to make this post-war readjustment without running counter to the traditions, without breaking old covenants, and the conventions which ensure autonomy to the central authority and to the provinces in certain spheres. Some claim that we should forget about traditions and even that we should run ahead of evolution. Is it possible to break away from the past of a nation? Others advocate the most arbitrary measures, but that view is to be condemned just as the doctrines of those who would sabotage the present structure of the nation and replace it by the fragile columns of an exaggerated socialism. Would Canada be at peace if on the morrow of the hostilities, she were torn by internal dissensions, and tossed about by doctrines foreign to her national soul.

Here as elsewhere, the most fantastic theories made their way. In peacetime they ceaselessly ran against repeated failures but war gave them strength and boldness. They are now coming out, undisguised and self-confident. Born from discontent, they thrive by it; every cause of complaint means to them an easy opportunity to achieve new triumphs and to strengthen their hold.

For discontent exists. What is it attributable to? Less to democracy itself than to abuses to which it gave rise. Less to wealth than to bad uses to which it was put. Less to the existing laws than to their enforcement, often ill-advised. War, an easy pretext for abuse, has added to existing evils, the abuse of laws. The nation, owing to the necessities of war, proudly accepted most of them; unfortunately, a multitude of orders and decrees which look too much like brilliant discoveries or outstanding inventions, hence their unpopularity, have been grafted to these laws. These hundreds of orders and decrees have been, I believe, the cause of discontent, the effects of which our democratic system has started to feel. The pyramiding of petty causes inevitably leads to great consequences. Small facts, harmless by themselves, one day or the other will tend to the same end. Consciously or unconsciously, they give rise to movements of opinion, unimportant at first, but which grow in magnitude and become irresistible. Such movements are in existence at the present time in Canadian life. Shall we wait until the dam bursts?

Every Canadian is willing to do his share to win the war. But how many times has national spirit been cooled down or even upset by an uninterrupted series of disappointments; how deeply, at times, has the Canadian nation, so gladly performing its duties, felt that war was a pretext for repeated injustices in the army, and particularly in the price boards, in the intricate machinery of national selective service, as well as a pretext for so many steps taken by a bureaucracy whose policies were bordering on autocracy, or even dictatorship.

It may be said that these are but details in the vastness of a huge organization. Are not rivers made up of drops of water? I agree that they are mere details, but they have enough power when added together, to rout the most powerful organization, to shake the very foundations of a regime and to offer to any party, be it socialist or even communist, easy chances of success. It is said that socialism and communism are dispensers of happiness. I know it; and it is the reason why I fear them. Can we blame the people, panic-stricken by the abuse of laws, the restrictions of all sorts, the excesses of capitalism, to believe in happiness, when happiness is the fond delusion of every human being. In these four years of war, the world conflict has imposed on every citizen of this country a crushing burden of sacrifices; why then have these hundreds of petty measures, too often drafted on the spur of the moment by controllers not responsible to the people, been added to the burden which weighs already so heavily on our shoulders.

Problems which get more difficult each day and which were in the past reserved to a group prepared to weigh them in all their details are confronting the masses rendered uneasy and even impatient by the course of events. The spirit of emancipation has made its way nearly everywhere. Too often maybe it has confused excessive privileges with necessary inequalities, power with right. But this spirit of emancipation springs only from compulsion. It was caused by the innumerable details which ceaselessly have offended human liberty, violated the most elementary sense of justice, affected even the brotherhood which belongs to democracy. What will come from all that? The people are looking towards new horizons.

I am against communism; it is the worst of all systems and I do not need to comment on it. If I am against socialism, I am for the measures of real social solidarity. The two terms are vastly different. Can socialism, which wants to do away with natural inequalities and establish equal status for all, attain its objective without abolishing private riches which are the most direct incentive to work and private property which is the outcome of work and without entrusting to the state the management of all private enterprises? That means: the state takes over private property, the state manages and controls everything; that is state socialism. State socialism involves a host of officials, feudal coalitions, little states within the state. The least important civil servant, under the banal pretext that he is part of the state, has then the opportunity of believing himself a little dictator and of treating the people as if he were one. Such is the picture.

I am against socialism because first of all it runs counter to the principles of the faith to which I belong, the Catholic religion, because it is meaningless and utopian. History—the best book of human experiments—is there to prove it. The Greeks lost their independence when they adopted socialism; the Romans saw their republic collapse when they embraced it. The French revolution accepted it at the start, but soon deserted it and proclaimed that private property was sacred. Socialism, wherever it was tried, has caused disappointment when it was not the prelude to the decline of the state. For socialism hates all forms of superiority, whether it comes from talent, fortune, intelligence, initiative or work. That explains its obscure programme set forth in vague words to hide its real aims and made to fit opportunities as they change from day to day. Now as then, it is characterized by the same soothing words that seem to make realities out of illusions, the same prejudices hidden under the bright flowers that are its promises of happiness, the same fanaticism hypocritically toned down if need be by tears shed on the misery of the people, or increased if necessary by terrible provocations against capital. Examine the system and you will find that its leaders own nothing; they have no business, no industry. What have they got to lose? Most of them were not even born here. Could they have a true love for the country they live in? What are their ambitions? They want to rule. They must get into power first so as to enforce measures that have nothing in common with the laws of human liberty.

I am in favour of private enterprise. I contend that a government may at times resort to certain measures of expropriation in order to settle a matter of national scope or to defend the rights of the people against the unrestrained ambition of finance. I believe, however, that private enterprise can, in a sort of magical way, obtain from labour the most powerful and productive energies, provided it is backed by sound capital, enterprising patrons and the indispensable cooperation of the working class. Private enterprise that abuses its power becomes a monopoly or a financial octopus whose tentacles draw from their victims the people, fabulous fortunes, swiftly made. If capitalism is vitiated, let us apply the branding-iron. If it has secrets, let us unmask it. If it commits abuses, let us check it and subject it to strict and impartial laws capable of preventing further exploitation of the public. Let us regulate it so that the worker will be the master rather than the slave of machinery. To abolish private industry would reduce its workers to poverty. At this important turning-point of our history, private enterprise shows signs of unrest and discouragement. It dreads socialism. Are not the champions of socialism guilty? A French economist, whose country was ruined by the guilty negligence of the bad governments it had chosen—addressed these pregnant words to the socialists:

You hope that before long there will be no more rich people. When there are no more rich people, everybody will be poor. The poor will be poorer still, and poverty will be general.

Social solidarity is a different thing. It is the duty of governments to grant to the poor the advantages of material and moral progress: insurance against the hazards of life, hygiene, education, rural credit, housing, public health measures, family allowances, et cetera. That is nothing but a social duty. Pope Pius XI, in his encyclical Divini Redemptoris, calls for and recommends as a measure of social justice "a system of public insurance for the workers against old age, sickness and unemployment". We can never do too much to alleviate poverty in all its aspects. It could even be extirpated, because poverty is a disease of the social body. If billions and billions could be found for the prosecution of war, there is no reason why money could not also be found for the abolition of poverty, and the elevation of work to a nobler plane. Why could funds not be found to establish within the whole nation a great system of social insurance, so as to eliminate forever the dole which demoralizes, to enact legislation designed to hearten the social outcasts, the old men and women, as well as the orphans, to comfort those who suffer, to extend to destitute children the boon of education, to put within the reach of labouring classes social, welfare and health services, and enable them to own their own homes, in a word to enact legislation based on the great Christian principles of justice and charity. I am in favour of measures of that kind, but if such legislation is to fulfil its ultimate object, it must take into account a multitude of details relating to provincial jurisdiction, to large families and to individuals, according as those families or individuals live in well developed centres or in remote settlements. Those various social measures—and I shall deal only with them for the time being—will be judged on their merits when they are introduced. I must state quite frankly, however, that social solidarity is essential at a time when war saddens all hearts, and I believe, on the other hand, that socialism would be a sore affecting not unlike a tumor the still healthy body of the nation.

The people in other provinces are no doubt wondering about the views of Quebec on socialism. Without any fear of being mistaken, I can assert that Quebec may, in an election, vote for the liberal, the conservative, the independent, or the Bloc Populaire or the Parti Canadien standard-bearers but that it will never vote for socialists. The French Canadians cannot be counted among those who give blind support to subversive doctrines, to theories which aim at disruption. They have for three centuries clung to the Canadian soil, where are to be found, even beyond the Rocky mountains, the imprints left by their first missionaries and settlers When they were ceded to England, my forbears clung to the native land, not like parasites but like true citizens in the knowledge that it was their home and that they had rights to claim and that they were entitled to keep those which they had won. Inspired by the love of freedom, they fought for responsible government. Anxious as they were to preserve their freedom, they refused to become assimilated, and any attempt at assimilation would remain unsuccessful whether it was based on force or persecution. Confederation must have the support of Quebec. It cannot do without it. My province was blamed for having answered "No" in the plebiscite. Quebec has never asserted more emphatically than it did on that occasion its undying love for the native land, and the sincerity of its essentially and primarily Canadian patriotism. Therefore, if a socialist government ever comes into power in Ottawa, it will not be Quebec's fault. My province is urged to save the country from the socialist menace. Quebec is ready, but let the other provinces cease to criticize and blame her about everything imaginable, let them cease to treat her as the waif of the family, since for many reasons she should have been pampered and complimented. Let the other provinces have the kindness and condescension—if they do not want to do it out of mere justice—to give her a fair share in the administration of this country. Let them be broad-minded enough to refrain from raising against her stupid prejudices often resulting from fanaticism and also from the ignorance of facts as well as from a lack of understanding of her characteristic spirit. Quebec is just as loyal as any other Canadian province. Quebec has more than any other province identified herself with our Canadian land. Imperialism is rejected in the province of Quebec; the only imperialism she knows or accepts is the appeal of the Canadian soil to which she is attached by her history. Quebec likes order and harmony; her tolerance is traditional. Deeply steeped in our religious and national principles, we do not want the disruption of our heritage. Transitions that are too sudden cannot but lead to cruel deceptions. We are in favour of evolution, but in the economic or in the spiritual field, we are against revolution. We enjoy certain rights under the constitution, and we are anxious to preserve them. We have no fear for the future, for the very reason that we find our inspiration in the courage of those who were the builders of the nation.

The future belongs to nobody. The trend of events is in the hands of God, while passions nest in the heart of men. Governments must not forget that spiritual values are highly essential; they must not forget either that no one can be a good citizen without a certain degree of comfort. If socialism is a paradise of dreams and illusion, social solidarity may become a blessing for the whole nation when controlled and ably directed by the state and proudly upheld by capitalists imbued with a deep sense of humanity. The misfortunes of war must not be followed by the misfortunes of peace. In a well-balanced readjustment the people should have a clear and definite understanding that social well-being is within their reach and that they are not excluded from happiness. They must be treated with fairness and equity by governments and employers. They must be protected against abuse from the powerful; that is essential. And I repeat with Victor Hugo: "Humble folk must be sacred to the great, and it is the rights of the weak that go to make the duty of the strong."

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, February 4, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT TO BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table of the house a copy of order in council P.C. 530, dated February 3, 1944, appointing William James Parker, Esquire, of the city of Winnipeg, a governor of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

May I say a word as to who and what this distinguished gentleman is. Mr. Parker is a practical farmer, a graduate of the Manitoba Agricultural college and a member of the board of governors of the university of Manitoba. A comparatively young man, he has won a name for himself throughout the west as an authority on general agricultural problems, and is recognized as one of the foremost scientific agriculturists of the dominion. He farms on an extensive scale in Manitoba. Mr. Parker served in the last war as a member of the Royal Flying Corps. He is married and has two sons. He is president of the Manitoba Pool Elevators, and a vice-president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the other vacancy to be filled as well?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The matter is under consideration, and I trust to be able to make an announcement before very long.

SOCIAL SECURITY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL SOCIAL INSURANCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that we are not likely at this stage to encounter a desire for debate on the constitution of the committee on social insurance. If the house is agreeable to having this committee constituted at once, I shall move:

That a select committee of this house be appointed to examine and report on a national plan of social insurance which will constitute a charter of social security for the whole of Canada, and, to that end,

To examine and study the existing social insurance legislation of the parliament of Canada and of the several provincial legislatures; social insurance policies of other countries; the most practicable measures of social insurance for Canada, including health insurance, and the steps which will be required to effect their inclusion in a national plan; the constitutional and financial adjustments which will be required for the achievement of a nation-wide plan of social security; and other related matters.

That the said committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary to deal with specific phases of the problems aforesaid, with power to call for persons, papers, and records, to examine witnesses under oath, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and members of the house; that the said committee shall report to the house from time to time; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Adamson, Blanchette, Bourget, Breithaupt, Bruce, Casselman (Mrs.) (Edmonton East), Claxton, Cleaver, Cote, Diefenbaker, Donnelly, Fauteux, Fulford, Gershaw, Gregory, Hatfield, Howden, Hurtubise, Johnston (Bow River), Kinley, Lalonde, Leclerc, Lockhart, MacInnis, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), MacKinnon (Kootenay East), Macmillan, McCann, McGarry, McGregor, McIvor, Maybank, Mayhew, Mitchell, Picard, Shaw, Slaght, Veniot, Warren, Wood, Wright.

Hon. members will observe that the wording of this resolution follows the wording of a similar resolution under which the committee on social insurance was appointed at the last session. The members of the committee are, I understand, for the most part the same; there may be one or two changes.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne is indefinite with respect to the introduction of a health insurance bill in Canada, and this motion would seem to indicate that the whole matter is receiving further study. I take it that the conference with the provinces to which the Prime Minister referred the other day, will discuss health insurance along with other matters. Can the Prime Minister enlighten the house as to whether or not it is expected that the legislation with respect to health insurance will be brought down this session? It has been awaited by the people for a long time now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Everything depends upon the progress of the work of the session and of the committee. I cannot say more than that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it from that, that the government is anxious to get the measure in as soon as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One of the purposes of reestablishing the committee at once is to begin as speedily as possible the consideration of the matters referred to.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to start a lengthy discussion on the setting up of this committee, of which I was a member last year, but there are one or two remarks I wish to make.

It seems to be the general opinion throughout the country that the social security committee was in favour of the medical health bill which was before it. Some two months ago I was listening to a nation-wide broadcast over a national hook-up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I was astonished to hear Doctor Routley, the secretary of the Canadian Medical association, make the statement that this must be a good bill because the only body that had studied it was in favour of it, and that was the social security committee of the House of Commons. That statement was not justified, because the committee did not make any study of the draft bill during the last session. All we did was to hear briefs presented by various people who would either render or receive services under the bill. About eighty-five per cent of the submissions were by those who hoped to render services under the bill. I believe there were only two briefs from those who hoped to receive services, one from the Canadian federation of agriculture and the other from the trades and labour council.

It is not my intention to enter into any discussion of the details of that bill; I believe that can be done better in the committee. But I do wish to make it clear that so far as this group is concerned we believe there are certain principles which should be incorporated in a medical health bill. First, we believe that such a bill should be all-inclusive, both as to personnel and as to the services rendered. Any medical health bill should cover everybody, rich and poor. It should not be left to the provinces to say whether certain income groups shall be excluded from the provisions of the bill. Next, the services rendered under the bill should be the same in all provinces. These should include preventive medicine, hospitalization, nursing, and the necessary drugs and medicines. No province should have the right to say that it will accept only some of the provisions of the bill; that it will give hospitalization without providing medicine, for instance, or any other combination. The cost should be a charge not against the individual but against the total ability of this country to provide the necessary health services.

Next we contend that the administration of the bill should be left in equal proportion to those who are receiving services and those who are rendering services. The Canadian Medical Association should not be the sole body in charge of the administration of the bill. The government should have the right to decide when there is any division of opinion between these two groups. With these three principles inporporated in the bill—they are not covered fully in the draft bill as it is at the present time—we will be in favour of complete medical health coverage for the Dominion of Canada.

While I am on my feet I should like to say just a word with respect to the statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) along the same lines. Apparently he is suffering from a disease—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I interrupt at this time? I do not know how this happens to come into the debate. I do not want the hon. member to drag in some extraneous matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is referring to a debate on some other matter which is not a matter suitable for discussion at this time.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member ought to find out what disease he is suffering from.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. member was referring to medical services, and he mentioned our group in particular.

Mr. SPEAKER: That was a discussion on another matter. The hon. gentleman would not be entitled to discuss another matter which is already under discussion.

Motion agreed to.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND REESTABLISHMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee of the house be appointed to study and report upon the general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war, and all questions pertaining thereto; with power to such select committee to appoint, from among the members of the committee, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to deal with specific phases of the problems aforementioned, with power to said select committee and to such subcommittees as may be formed therefrom, to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and for such select committee to report from time to time to the house; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Authier, Bence, Bertrand (Prescott), Black (Cumberland), Brunelle, Castleden, Dupuis, Eudes, Ferron, Fraser (Northumberland), Gillis, Gray, Harris (Danforth), Hill, Jean, MacKenzie (Neepawa), Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), MacNicol, McDonald (Pontiac), McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River), McNiven, Marshall, Martin, Matthews, Mitchell, Mrs. Nielsen, Poirier, Purdy, Quelch, Ross (Calgary East), Ross (Middlesex East), Sanderson, Turgeon, Tustin, White, and that the provisions of standing order 65 limiting the number of members on special committees, be suspended in relation thereto.

The wording of this resolution is similar to that under which the committees were appointed last year and the year before.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to delay the setting up of this committee. When these committees were set up last year the debates took some considerable time, a good deal of ground being covered. In his remarks the other day the Prime Minister referred to the time which had been taken at the last session in discussing the setting up of these committees. I proffered an explanation, and perhaps I now have the right to give it. The reason why so much time was taken up in discussing the motion to appoint these committees was that the social security committee was being set up for the first time, and some hon. members were anxious to discuss the general problems relating thereto. Another reason, of course, why in the setting up of committees time is consumed in debate is the failure of the government so to arrange the reports of the various committees that they can be debated some time before the session closes. One of the difficulties experienced last session was in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The report of that committee was brought down, not merely in the dying days of the session, but almost on the last day. No motion for concurrence was moved. I doubt whether it would have been of much use to move concurrence, because the session was practically on its way out. So that when a motion to appoint the committee is made, no one can wonder that some time is taken up in discussing matters which normally would have been discussed had concurrence in the report been asked. I wish to make that clear.

In consenting to the setting up of the reconstruction committee I am hopeful that the government and those who are members of the committee will see to it that the report of this very important committee is brought down within a reasonable time before the end of the session, so that the house may be able to have some general debate with respect to its recommendations. I rather regretted that the Prime Minister the other day, speaking of the report of the war expenditures committee, which was brought down on the very last day of the last session, said that it would not be revived for discussion. At least that was my understanding of what he said. I think his words were that the report would die with the session which had just closed. I hope that is not so, because after all there should be an opportunity to discuss it. I think it is within the power of the government and the house to provide an opportunity of debating reports of committees which may deal with contentious matters on which hon. members may desire to express their opinions.

I point that out to the Prime Minister now, so that when committees are being formed he must not expect debate to be avoided when we have not had an opportunity of considering and discussing the previous committee's reports. The present motion of course does not come within that category, because this is a committee which, as I understand, is continuing, and will report some time during the session; and I am hopeful that when the report is brought down there will be full opportunity for debate.

Motion agreed to.

GENERAL McNAUGHTON

INQUIRY AS TO REASONS FOR RESIGNATION FROM CANADIAN OVERSEAS ARMY COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct an inquiry to the Prime Minister, notice of which I gave him earlier to-day. In the course of the debate on Monday last I indicated that many rumours were in circulation regarding the resignation of General McNaughton, and that public interest demanded that the Prime Minister should at once give a full and frank explanation of the facts in this regard, let the chips fall where they may. In view of the comments reported to have been made to the press by General McNaughton yesterday, I am asking the Prime Minister to-day to make a statement for the purpose of clarifying the whole situation.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has referred to the debate on Monday last. It is true that at the conclusion of the debate my hon. friend drew my attention to the fact that I had not, in replying to him, touched on the questions of the home defence army, General McNaughton, and the overseas structure. I replied to my hon. friend by saying that I was leaving some matters to my colleagues and that I thought that such was the proper procedure to follow unless time was to be taken up indefinitely with the debate on the address. My hon. friend then said that he assumed that I was leaving the reply with respect to army matters to my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and I indicated to him that in that he was quite correct, and he said that that would be satisfactory to him.

Mr. GRAYDON: When I said that it would be satisfactory to me I had no idea that we would wait so long for some statement from the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That may be. However, hon. members will I think agree that one has to view the business of the session as a whole and plan accordingly. There is a proper time and an adequate time for taking up different questions, and I have felt that the time at which it would be most appropriate for the Minister of National Defence to make a statement on matters pertaining to the Canadian army and on all other aspects of matters relating to defence would be when the house would be considering either the resolution or the bill on the war appropriaton. I have intimated to the house that just as soon as the debate on the address is concluded the first item to be called will be the one relating to the resolution on the war appropriation which is now on the order paper. I had hoped that the debate on the address might conclude this evening, but I understand that it is pretty certain to run over until next week. Were it to conclude this evening, we would of course ask the house on Monday to consider the resolution on war appropriation and the Minister of National Defence would then make a very full statement. I hope the debate will not run on far into next week. Just as soon as it is concluded the Minister of National Defence will deal generally with matters pertaining to the army. Certainly I must say to my hon. friend, and I think he will agree, that any statement I might make at the present time would not be regarded as sufficiently comprehensive to avoid further questioning and the opening up of a discussion —one discussion in the middle of another. Under these circumstances it is I think best that the government should adhere to what I have outlined as the procedure, namely, to discuss army matters, not one incident or one particular matter, but matters generally, when all hon. members will have their opportunity to question and the ministry its opportunity of answering in adequate fashion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Frankly I am amazed at the position just taken by the Prime Minister. It never occurred to me for a moment, in view of the uncertainty and the doubt which seemed to exist throughout the country in connection with this McNaughton matter, that either the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence would assume such an attitude. By virtue of General McNaughton's comment yesterday in the papers, the whole question has been thrown into bold relief—the question of the original statement officially given by the government, and then the statement which was given by General McNaughton yesterday. It is not very often that I take such a positive and emphatic stand on matters of this kind, but I call upon the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence to clear this matter up now. Let us not wait until next week or whenever it may be. That is not good enough. The people of Canada are agitated over this thing. I would not be pressing my case as I am if I did not conscientiously believe that it is in the public interest that the Prime Minister make a statement with respect to the reason why General McNaughton resigned. Everybody knows that in the statement previously made by the government it was declared that he had resigned because of ill health. General McNaughton now comes to this country and says that he is all right. That, in effect, is the situation. How can anyone expect the morale of the Canadian people not to be affected by the silence of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of National Defence this afternoon? I call upon them with all the emphasis at my command to disclose the exact situation with respect to General McNaughton. Let us not be kept waiting another minute. I shall not be satisfied with the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence saying that the matter will come up in the ordinary course of events. This is something which has come up outside the ordinary course of events, and for that reason I call upon them to make the statement I have asked for.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the minister replies, I would like to point out that we are on orders of the day and there is nothing before the house. A question has been asked by the leader of the opposition, to which the Prime Minister has replied. If any part of the answer requires elucidation or explanation for clarification, a further question would be in order, but a general debate cannot take place on the orders of the day.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to support the leader of the opposition in asking for an immediate statement from the leader of the government on General McNaughton's resignation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, nothing could better illustrate the wisdom of the course which the government intends to pursue in this matter than the speech just made by the leader of the opposition, and by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, supporting him in his request. In the course of his remarks the leader of the opposition made two or three statements which I do not think are wholly correct. I do not wish at this stage to go into the right or wrong of the statements he has made, but in the short time he has spoken he has made it perfectly clear that in discussing matters which relate to the army and to the relinquishment by General McNaughton of his command of the Canadian army there are many matters of which the house will wish to be informed in order to have a clear view of the entire situation. It is not the custom, so far as I am aware, in this parliament, and certainly it is not the custom at Westminster, to begin a debate on a matter as important as that which pertains to the affairs of the army in a time of war on a question asked on the orders of the day. I would expect my hon. friends opposite to be the first to wish the government to set apart, if need be, a special time when the whole matter could be discussed. That would be the correct way to proceed, and as far as I am concerned, if the debate on the address continues to run on for any length of time and hon. gentlemen wish to have a day set apart for the discussion of war measures, the government will be prepared to consider such a request. But I do submit that we shall make far better headway with the business of parliament and get on more expeditiously with our war measures and matters pertaining to the war if we conclude the debate on the address speedily and then take up at once the resolution dealing with the war appropriation.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the Prime Minister that a very heavy responsibility rests upon him in this decision.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Prime Minister has said that he will set apart a day. Would he set aside Monday for debating this question and let the Minister of National Defence speak on the address?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot agree at the present time to setting aside Monday. I said that I would be prepared to consider setting aside a day, but in considering that I shall have to take into account the length of time that it is probable the debate on the address will continue, and what may be most advisable. I do not know why my hon. friend should be so keen about this particular matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: The public is keen about it; that is why.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. After all, the great question that is before the country and before the world at the present time is the prosecution of the war, and the prosecution of the war is not being impeded in the least by General McNaughton being at the Seigniory club at the present time or by the government's seeking to conclude this debate before we begin a fresh debate on war measures. I say to my hon. friends that if the matter were urgent in any way the government would be the first to consider the urgency of it, but I am sure that everyone throughout the country who is interested in knowing the whole situation as it exists and as it not only affects hon. members of this house in the course of their discussions here, but affects the whole Canadian army and affects the war, would wish this question to be discussed when there is ample opportunity for a full discussion.

GLYCERINE

REMOVAL OF CHEMICAL CONTROL RESTRICTIONS AFFECTING SALE OF ANTI-FREEZE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply a question with reference to a press release from his department dated February 1, 1944, stating that all chemical control restrictions on the use of glycerine have been removed. Does that mean that anti-freeze, with glycerine base, will be released to the public without the necessity for a permit from the wartime prices and trade board?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): That is the purpose in removing the restriction, so that glycerine may be sold for any purpose.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), seconded by myself, first may I, even at this late period, extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Tremblay) and the seconder (Mr. Tucker) of the address. These two hon. and gallant members served during the last war and are in this war contributing their part. May I also, and in this I think I speak for all hon. members of the house, extend a welcome to another hon. member who to-day is in the house for the first time after serving overseas in this war, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), who in seconding the address in the dark days of 1940 did more than he can realize to arouse the people of Canada from the complacency of that time.

To-day I intend to follow the course I have endeavoured to follow throughout as a member of this house, and take the attitude that I believe should characterize an opposition in time of war, and that is to commend where I believe commendation is fitting, and yet fearlessly face the issues that are before us and reveal weaknesses which in the opinion of the opposition require to be rectified. I am not going to deal to-day to any extent with the tremendous programme that is outlined in the speech from the throne. Having regard to the serious conditions referred to a moment ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), arising from the war, I wish that he had spoken with greater certainty on the question whether or not an election is to be called in the midst of war. In September last he made a statement that might very well be paraphrased in the words he used in connection with the plebiscite—not necessarily an election, but an election if necessary. On Monday last, in view of the serious position in which we now find ourselves in relation to the war, he warned the country of the crucial period which we are approaching, and indicated that an election was not in prospect; and on Wednesday, in answer to questions put by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), the Prime Minister made the issue more baffling than it had ever been before.

[Mr. Howe.]

When I look over the speech from the throne, promising, as it does, allowances for all, and when I realize that the only allowances referred to in the Beveridge report which are not covered by the speech are funeral allowances and death payments, and that dead men do not vote, my suspicion of the purposes of this speech from the throne becomes stronger. As I read it over it is the most tantalizing bill of fare ever offered to the Canadian people; but I fear, having regard to the appointment of committees such as those set up to-day on social security and the like, it will be far removed from translation into the feast it promises.

I wish to deal to-day not with social security but with certain matters which for some reason or other are not dealt with at any length in the speech from the throne. First let me say that I find it difficult to understand the attitude of the Prime Minister to-day in refusing to answer statements made by General McNaughton yesterday which indicate that the explanation given last November by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) for General McNaughton's resignation is far removed from the facts as they were revealed yesterday by the general.

Six months have gone by since the last session of parliament, and yet we know nothing of the man-power situation of the dominion. We do not know whether adequate reinforcements have been provided or are being provided for the army overseas, for the army which is now in Great Britain and which will sooner or later take its place in the offensive. General McNaughton is in our midst, the architect of Canadian army efficiency, the man who was held up as the general who meant so much to the Canadian army in its efficient operation, the general who was going to lead that army as the spearhead of attack, the dagger at the heart of Berlin. While there may be security reasons denying us the privilege of having him speak frankly, the government owes it to the people of Canada to say to General McNaughton, "King's regulations and orders to the contrary, your lips are not sealed." If things are not right in the Canadian army overseas, they should be revealed to the people of Canada, and if for reasons of national security they cannot be revealed, I for one, who have opposed the secrecy that too often has characterized this government, suggest that we, the representatives of the people, have the right to have General McNaughton come before this house in secret session and let us know the facts.

I suggest that the Prime Minister, in the stand he takes to-day in denying to the membership of this house an opportunity to know the facts, has taken steps which are not in accordance with the principles of good parliamentary government or in keeping with considerations of the welfare of the army overseas. I ask the Prime Minister, in the interests of the morale of the people—and the people of the nation are aroused—to place before the house, even later on this evening, the full situation, so far as it can be placed before us without danger to the national safety.

I wish to refer to one other matter dealt with by the Prime Minister in his speech and it is one upon which I do not believe there should be any partisan or biased discussion—namely, the attitude to be taken by the Prime Minister when he attends the next conference of prime ministers. He began by indicating that he did not wish the subject discussed, and then he proceeded to discuss it at considerable length. Personally I believe that, bound as we are to the empire by tradition, by history, by interest, in the years to come there must be closer cooperation with the empire, and closer cooperation with the United States of America having regard to our North American situation. Speaking personally and expressing my own views, I have been a consistent advocate of the setting up of an empire council—not with executive but with consultative powers, continuing from week to week deliberations of the kind that will take place when the Prime Minister goes to Britain some time later this year. In reference to the war effort of the empire and to the constitutional relations between the empire countries, I ask the Prime Minister to consider whether recognition of the principle of continuing participation by a representative of the Canadian ministry in an empire council with deliberative powers only would assure a closer relationship than there is to-day through the instrumentalities he mentioned. This is a subject that does not require nor should it be permitted to enter the realm of, partisan discussion. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, Canada cannot afford the luxury of a fence-sitting policy in reference to her relations with the empire or with other countries of the world. I believe that nothing should be done that would interfere with the free discussion on the part of the Prime Minister at this conference in Great Britain. On the other hand, as a member of this house, I believe each of us has the right, yes, and the duty and the responsibility, to place before the Prime Minister and the government his individual views. It is in this spirit that I place before the Prime Minister my own personal view in regard to the matter.

I now come to the man-power situation. Six months have gone by and not a member of this house has any idea of the man-power situation in Canada. We hear from time to time statements made by the director of national selective service indicating that there is a shortage of man-power—yes, during the last few months a shortage of man-power on the farms. Farmers are still being called up and enrolled in an army for service in Canada. That to me is not understandable. In the period October 31, 1942 to September 30, 1943, the total number of men who served in the army in Canada under conscription for service in Canada has been increased by 31,491. The total number of men that have been enrolled in this army for service in Canada is 125,640, in spite of the fact that they are required to serve in Canada, except to the extent that the boundaries of Canada were extended by order in council to include Kiska. Yet they are still being called up at an annual cost to the country of from $150,000,000 to $175,000,000. I think that is a fair estimate.

What is the man-power situation? Nothing effective has been done since the last session of parliament directly to guide men into occupations which will enable them to make a maximum contribution to the war effort. Oh, yes; bureaux have been set up. Orders in council have been passed. Immediately after the session ended a tremendous reorganization took place; an administrative board of full-time members was set up in addition to an advisory board, a deputy director of the civilian branch and the military branch, five regional or provisional directors, directors for logging priorities, fishing, canning, war industries and other departments. Associate directors' staffs were established in all parts of Canada. Setting up organizations does not solve any problem. On September 9 Mr. MacNamara said there was an over-all shortage of a hundred thousand workmen on the farms and in wood production. These men are needed, according to Mr. MacNamara, for farm and wood production, yet the government goes on conscripting them and increasing the army for service in Canada.

Let me refer to another aspect of the problem. This statement is subject to correction by the Minister of National Defence. During recent months voluntary recruitment has fallen away very considerably. Voluntary recruitment in the armed forces is at a level the like of which has not been seen before since the beginning of the war. Yet we continue to call up men, take them from their useful occupations, place them in an army, and give them training—an army that is all dressed up with no place to go. We do not know, nobody in this dominion knows, outside of the cabinet and the officers concerned, whether or not there are reinforcements available for the army overseas.

Australia in September last found it necessary to consider whether, with the danger of invasion removed, the question of reallocation of service men to production would not enhance their war effort. On the one hand you see advertisements asking men to go back to the farm, farmers to go to the woods, and on the other hand competition with the farms continues. You see advertisements saying to men in the industrial services engaged in wartime production that their place is in the air force, their place is overseas in the armed forces of this country. Surely the time has come when the whole system of man-power administration in this dominion must be rationalized. There are man-power shortages in the key industries, and yet the garrison army remains. Can it be said any longer that the policy in effect makes for efficiency in the utilization of man-power resources?

I should like to say a few words on selective service. General Marshall says, as reported in the press of to-day, that it is necessary to bring in national selective service on an even greater scale in the United States than ever before. What is our position? We have a tremendous selective service organization operating in various parts of the dominion, and yet in spite of the criticism of last year the government apparently has a policy that still is not equalizing the call-up in the various military districts. What is the reason? I can well visualize that in one military district so many men have volunteered in the service of their country that it would be impossible to call up more than a very low percentage if those who are left endeavour to enlist and are turned down. Only a few days ago there was turned out a booklet "Canada At War", January, 1944. I ask hon. members to compare that "Canada At War" with the issue of January, 1943. What it reveals is this: In the first place, in January, 1943, the male population of Canada from 19 to 45 was set out. Since that time the male population from 18 to 45 has been estimated. In every military district of Canada, except No. 5, there has been an increase of from 18 to 20 per cent in the male population available for service. In other words, by reason of the inclusion of the 18 year olds, including the 18-year-old class, adds about twenty per cent to the numbers that were available when the call-up limitation was 19 years of age. And yet, with every other military district showing an increase, in No. 5 military district there are 300 men less of the 18- to 45-year-old class than there were last year in the 19- to 45-year-old class. Based on those figures, the record of enlistment, while shown as 17·7 per cent, in point of fact is 9·8 per cent.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Here is the record of the call-up all the way across the dominion, which shows that there is no equalization, no even distribution of the load. The government, as a policy, apparently deliberately takes the stand of not equalizing the call, and the people of Canada have a right to ask the reason.

Taking the military districts one by one, the following is a record of the call-up during the period from October 31, 1942, to September 30, 1943:

Military district—Location	Percentage
No. 1—London, Ont.	7·8
No. 2—Toronto, Ont.	7
No. 3—Kingston, Ont.	5·7
No. 4—Montreal, P.Q.	7
No. 5—Quebec, P.Q.	5
No. 6—Halifax, N.S.	7·9
No. 7—Saint John, N.B.	8
No. 10—Winnipeg, Man.	7·8
No. 11—Victoria, B.C.	8·1
No. 12—Regina, Sask.	8
No. 13—Calgary, Alta.	7·5

What does this reveal? It reveals—and I take the figures for my own province—that in Saskatchewan, with an enlistment record of 35·7 per cent, sixty per cent more are being called up than in the military district where voluntary enlistments are the least. I believe in the principle of Canadian unity. In adopting a policy under which men in all parts of Canada are not given an equality of opportunity to serve—because it is denied them under the call-up—the government is doing more to cause disunion and friction across Canada than could be occasioned by any other act in the administration of the war effort.

Earlier I made reference to selective service. It is top heavy with employees. A return several inches thick was brought down the other day, setting out the record of employees in that branch of the service. As I see men moved about, I ask myself this question: Does that department, or some of its officials, believe that their work in life is simply that of pushing people around? An example comes to my mind, one of many others, respecting a young French Canadian from Montreal, an electrician by trade, who last November was out of work. He was ordered to go to Drumheller, Alberta, to work as an electrician in the mines. He paid his way out to Drumheller, and upon arriving there he was advised that there was no work for him as he was not the kind of electrician required. He was 2,500 miles from home without a job. The selective service officer in Drumheller advised him that the proper thing for him to do was to go to Flin Flon, Manitoba. to stop off at Prince Albert for instructions. This was a trained man, and he is still at Prince Albert. He has been there for two and a half months trying to get action from selective service, but none of the officials will accept any further responsibility for him.

I know of two or three men who were farming several hundred acres of land, and who, although they had work to do at home, have been ordered to leave home during the winter months as a condition of postponement. Those men have been directed to travel two or three hundred miles to other farms. The time has come when the whole system of selective service should be reorganized. Changes should be made in its personnel to the end that conditions such as I have mentioned shall not be permitted to exist in this, the fifth year of the war.

I could go on and record many other examples, equally direct and equally revealing. It all comes back to this, that such conditions have arisen because of the fact that, in the midst of war, realizing that the selective service can be made operative only in one way, the government has failed to carry into effect the principles necessary to that end. We have been in session now for more than a week. The man-power situation is serious. The question of reinforcements for our troops overseas is one about which we want to be reassured. The Prime Minister indicated on Monday last, as I understood him, that some time in the course of this debate the ministers concerned would place before the house and the country the position of affairs. Again to-day we face the same attitude that has characterized the administration of the manpower problem, namely, a postponement of action, a postponement of revealing the situation as it exists.

In the time remaining at my disposal I have a few suggestions to make in connection with the men who are being discharged. This is not a partisan matter. All of us want to make sure that the service men and women shall be assured of a fair opportunity when they return to civilian life. There is not a little resentment among the more than 100,000 service men who have been discharged, owing to the fact that only 5,950 of them are in receipt of pension.

Another matter of complaint is the inadequacy of clothing allowances. The allowance on discharge was increased recently from $35 to $65. I say that $65 is insufficient with which to clothe the men who are discharged from the armed services after serving one or two years overseas.

Another matter I wish to discuss is in connection with soldier settlement. I ask the minister why it is that the soldiers who served in the war of 1914-18 and who still hold land are still in debt must pay five per cent interest, which is a rate of interest forty-three per cent higher than is being charged the men who return from this war and who have taken up land under the Veterans' Land Act? That is something that should be remedied. It is discrimination against the man who served in the last war, and it is causing no end of ill feeling among them.

I think the time has come when mothers dependents' allowances should equal those of wives. In many cases dependent mothers are unable to carry on with the present allowances. There is no reason at all why a mother who gives her son should not receive an allowance equal to that paid to the wife of a soldier to enable her to escape destitution.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and other members have dealt on more than one occasion with the necessity of the readoption of the insurance principle in connection with pensions. Why it was taken away in 1940 has never been satisfactorily explained. Why it has not been restored in 1944 and made retroactive to the beginning of the war is something that I ask the minister to explain when he speaks on this matter. I know of the kindly attitude of the minister and his desire to see that these anomalies are rectified. Where is there any opposition to the bringing into effect of this principle, to the equalizing of mothers' allowances and to the granting of a cost-of-living bonus along with dependents' allowances equal to that paid to civilians?

Many of our men have been overseas for more than four years, some of them having spent their fifth Christmas there, removed from their loved ones and friends. If the government now takes the stand that there are sufficient reinforcements available, that the manpower situation in so far as the armed forces are concerned is reasonably good and the shipping situation has improved in recent months, I suggest that the time has come for the government to grant a furlough to men in the armed forces who have been overseas from the beginning of the war. A similar scheme is receiving close attention in the United States. The men in the air force are brought home after a certain period of service, and the same treatment is given men in the navy. A similar system should be put into effect for those serving in the army. I realize the difficulty, but an effort should be made to establish a system of rotating leaves or furloughs. It would do much to improve enlistment in the army and enhance the morale of those who serve overseas, as well as of their dependents at home in Canada. I have heard men in the army say, "I am going overseas, and I will have to stay to the end; if I went in one of the other services I would come home sooner or later, whether or not I were a casualty; I would be given an opportunity to return to my loved ones." The adoption of my suggestion would, I submit, improve the morale of the soldier.

I appreciate the opportunity offered by the speech to bring these matters to the attention of the house and the country. I ask the government to place before the people of Canada the true man-power position, both in the domestic sphere and in the armed forces.

Reference has been made in the speech from the throne to agriculture but time does not permit my discussing that to-day, except to say that I believe in the principle of floor prices, but like hon. members who have already spoken I ask the government what level is to be set. Is it to be a price level in accordance with present prices and subsidies? Is it to be a level that will ensure the cost of production and a reasonable profit? If it is not, it will be a denial of the farmers' due.

The promise to bring in price levels for agricultural products cannot be made effective beyond the period of the war, unless there is an amendment to the British North America Act or the provinces and the dominion agree on concurrent legislation. The farmer should realize that in that promise there may be little or much. There may be new hope for agriculture if the government is prepared to attack the matter from the constitutional angle. On the other hand, if the government does not do that, whatever floor price is set will cease to exist with the termination of the operation of the War Measures Act. That is something I should like to hear explained by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and those associated with him. What has been done in that connection? What course is being followed to secure the cooperation by the provinces? What amendment will be asked to the constitution to permit of minimum price fixing once the war is over?

There are other matters with which I cannot deal at the moment. I conclude by saying that the man-power problem is of transcendant importance to the future of the war effort of this nation, one that must be faced now, and cannot be faced by merely setting up new board or by the passing of orders in council. What action will the government take now to solve this problem?

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Until very recently it was my resolve that I would not take up very much of the time or the attention of this house by participating in this debate; but on reflection, having the honour and of course the responsibility of representing one of the best, if not the very best, constituencies in this vast dominion, I felt that the voice of that constituency should be sounded in this chamber, even though it would be through the rather non-resonant medium of my humble self. Another reason why I thought I should rise, for a very short time anyway, was to offer my hearty felicitations to the mover (Mr. Tremblay) and the seconder (Mr. Tucker) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The matter contained in their addresses was sound; it was consistent with what was revealed in the speech from the throne, and it was rendered with an eloquence and impressiveness which reflect credit not only upon the hon. gentlemen themselves but on the constituencies which have the honour of sending them to this house.

Possibly I should make a few remarks with regard to the matters contained in the speech from the throne. Before doing that I wish to refer to a few matters which were commented upon by the last speaker, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Anyone, even though a stranger to the house, would recognize that the hon. member is a lawyer, because with very little material he can make a very strong case; but a stranger would never suspect him to be of a mechanical turn of mind, because he deals so much with man-power; it is his hobby. I know that the hon. member is just as anxious as I am to have the forecasts of legislation in the speech from the throne brought to effectiveness, but I think that when he urges too hasty legislation, particularly in a matter such as the health insurance plan, without first the removal of the constitutional hurdles which are in the way, and before the prelude of a programme of education, he is not taking the most effective way to bring this legislation into administrative usefulness.

I notice he also referred to the matter with regard to General McNaughton which took up so much time in the house this afternoon. Last night I read in the Ottawa Journal that General McNaughton was interviewed by reporters—I imagine, of the Journal—and it was expressed there that General McNaughton unqualifiedly stated that there was nothing wrong with him. In that very same newspaper, in the same column of the next edition, I read an interview which he had with press representatives last night at the Seigniory club, and what he said there was an altogether different statement; it was qualified; he said that organically there was nothing wrong with him but he was advised to take a rest as a precautionary measure so that he might avoid what was possibly a threatening organic condition. I do not understand this. Surely there is nobody in the house who cannot wait for a day or two to find out which is the truthful statement.

I am not going to take up any of the time of this house by entering into a detailed discussion of the history of this great global war, and particularly of Canada's record in the war effort. Suffice it to say that Canada's war record is a splendid one, and if there be those who feel that this sentiment is incited by regional prejudice or by ultra-egoism, all they have to do to dispel that view is to refer to the laudations by Churchill, Roosevelt, Stalin, the press, and every worth-while magazine on the north American continent. To bring about this military achievement in Canada is not an easy matter. It cannot be dealt with at random; it must take some planning and require some executive qualities; it must take some cooperation. We in Canada are fortunate to have at the head of our war ministries men who had distinguished military service in the last war. Not only are they qualified in that way, but they have had the wisdom to make a selective draft on good men, men competent to initiate, to organize and to develop programmes and to bring them to a successful termination. But even this could not have been done through these instrumentalities without the hearty cooperation of the industrialists. We had the cooperation of the industrial worker, the producer, the transportation utilities, the merchant marine, last, but not least, we had the patriotism, the generosity and the tolerance of the civil population of Canada itself. If we doubt that, all we have to do is to look at the record of the civilian population. Ever since the war began, young men by the thousands have flocked to the forces, voluntarily offering their services in any theatre of war. We find young ladies holding lucrative and responsible clerical positions leaving these positions and entering industrial plants, thus releasing able-bodied men for the forces. We find to-day comparatively old men, men beyond middle age, who endured the hardships and the horrors of the last war, standing in arms and protecting our shores. Men and women are giving not only from their savings but from their current earnings vast sums of money in order that Canada can carry on her gigantic war effort. Uncomplainingly our people accept the taxation imposts which by necessity are growing greater and greater. Tolerantly they accept our rationing, our regimentations and our restrictions. We find in the country to-day business men affected by these regulations and regimentations to the extent of doing only about one-half the volume of business which they did in peace time. Yet we find no general complaint about that. What does that show? It shows the patriotism and the intelligence of our people. It shows they are aware that this is a total war effort and that the price of victory is common; it is not only a common price but a common sacrifice. They know that this is an all-out war and that these little restrictions and inconveniences which we suffer to-day are but trifling as compared with the tyranny and the serfdom and butchery, I might say, to which they would be subjected if these homicidal would-be world dominators were to gain possession of our country and our institutions. They know that their money would be no good to them at all in that event. I think the manner in which the people of this country have cooperated shows not only their patriotism but their wisdom.

When a nation is at war the government has a double obligation. First of all it has to provide the war materials required; second, it has to preserve the economy of the nation. If the economy of the nation is not preserved, the war supplies cannot be provided. At the very beginning of this war—three hours, in fact, after Canada had declared war on Germany—this government established the wartime prices and trade board. I maintain that the institution of that board was the greatest possible step that could have been taken to preserve the economy of Canada and to throw up barriers and hurdles on the road that would lead to the ignominy of inflation, from which we suffered sufficiently after the last war. Because of the establishment of that board we have escaped hoarding and profiteering, and we have not had to witness the disgraceful spectacle of watching some men and some corporations waxing wealthy on the blood and sacrifice of the nation.

In the speech from the throne it was very well stated that the promises of impressive victories were being fulfilled. But the war is not over. This war may be over in 1944. When that day comes we shall be confronted with the terrible cost of this war, and it is up to us to search our hearts now, because I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the youths who are fighting for liberty and freedom on the other side are searching their hearts to-day. They are praying for life, they are praying for comradeship, they are praying for devotion, and it is up to us to see that we cooperate with them even in their prayers, because without our cooperation, even with their devotion and their prayers, victory will not be achieved.

One would think, listening to some speakers in this house, that this government has not done anything during the period of the war, and even now intends to do little, to improve our democratic condition after the war. I believe that this government has had in mind the right major attitude, and that was the prosecution of the war. But mark you, while they felt that the main intent and purpose of the nation as well as of the individual should be the prosecution of the war, they realized that some consideration should be given to the time when our soldiers will be returning home and when the thousands of people who to-day are engaged in the manufacture of implements of destruction will revert to their peace-time pursuits. As early in this war as 1940 this government put on the statute books three very important measures, all of which tended to help that situation.

There was the amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act. We all know how ineffectually the old act worked, and I think all agree that the reason why it did not work was that, through laxity, the wrong men were put on the wrong farms. The amendment redeemed the old act from some of its weaknesses, so that a settler will no longer be allowed to go on a farm that is not up to a certain standard of productivity, and further he will not be allowed to go on a farm that is up to the standard of productivity required unless he has had some experience in farming. But not only was the old act improved; it was extended so that a fisherman or a man engaged in industry who wished to spend part of his time as a farmer was afforded the same concessions as a soldier.

Then there was the act dealing with compulsory employment after the war of those who left their employment to join the armed forces. Under that act a man will have the legal right to ask for and get, if possible, his old position when he returns.

Then there was the Unemployment Insurance Act. It was instituted at a time when there was very little unemployment. The result is that to-day we have a large repository of funds under the Unemployment Insurance Act which will at least look after the acute stages of unemployment.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I say that while this government has always had in mind as its main purpose the prosecution of the war, it has attended to these other matters in order to be prepared to deal with the crisis which will be upon us in what I might call the conflict of peace. When it is considered what the government has done in these matters, and then when one turns to the speech from the throne and sees what is proposed to be done to improve the social and economic conditions of our people, who will deny that what is embodied in the speech from the throne is intended to bring about betterment in our social and economic conditions? Take, for instance, the plans for the establishment of a national minimum of social security and human welfare, which are to be advanced as rapidly as possible. That is a matter which the hon. member for Lake Centre mentioned. I sat on the committee referred to by my hon. friend, and I know something of its work; I also make inquiries as I go about the country, and I want to say—and here I am not interfering at all with the plans of our chief and of the cabinet—that before we introduce a scheme of national health insurance we should be assured that the people are well educated in the matter and that they are in a position to absorb it.

The speech from the throne says:

> A broad programme has already been developed for the reestablishment of veterans of the present war, and for the care of disabled veterans.

We know that, and I am sure everyone appreciates it.

One thing that I would like to see go further is the floor that has been placed under farm staple products. I cannot see why a floor is not provided for fishermen. They also are producers. They are honest working folk, and as a matter of fact their life is more hazardous than that of the farmer. In fact, we may say they are more or less taking a chance every day in the pursuit of their calling. I do hope therefore that it is only by an oversight that this provision is not also made for them, and that before this particular item reaches the stage of legislation it will have been made elastic enough to extend to the fishermen.

All these things should merit our approval. I fail to see why hon. members, speaking in this house, can say that this government has made no provision for our people. They ignore the statements contained in the speech from the throne, and suggest that when the time of demobilization comes everything will be in chaos because no preparation has been made to take care of our boys.

There are different conceptions of the kind of world that we shall have after the war. There are two definite schools of thought. There are those who believe that we shall have a utopia, and there are others who say that we are going to have a terrible depression and mass unemployment. I do not belong to either school. I do not believe that we shall have a utopia in Canada, any more than there is likely to be one anywhere else in the world. I do believe however, and I am sure that those who have been at all observant must certainly have seen it, that there has been providential guidance in this war. We have seen it in the almost impossible escapes of our men from conditions that were seemingly inescapable. We have seen it in the blunders of the enemy, for which no explanation could be given—because they have made major blunders where they could have taken advantage of conditions which might have turned defeat into victory for them. I believe that that great providential guide is still at the helm, and He is just as much interested in peace as He is in war.

I believe that what will happen in the peace conflict, as it might be called, will be this. There will arise able executives, competent men capable of initiating, developing and extending programmes for peace such as we have had in the war. But as I have said, just as in the war programme, we must have cooperation. We must have the same cooperation we had in the war. We must have industries. We must have the industrial worker and the producer, and we must have all the necessary transportation facilities. In fact, we must have everything that came to our assistance in time of war. We are not going to do this by thinking that we are going to have a utopia. We shall have to work and to manage the same as before.

I do not believe that the economic condition of Canada will remain static. It will never remain static so long as we have men and women who are free to act and to back up their ideas, men and women who are willing to work and to make sacrifices if necessary. If you make sacrifices for the conduct of war, surely you should be willing to make sacrifices for peace. In a complex society such as we have, governments are certainly bound to introduce some restrictions. Let them beware, however. If we want a democracy we must allow to enterprise at least as much freedom as is consistent with our modern civilization.

In conclusion, let me say this. God forbid that in Canada after this war there should remain a condition where enterprise will have no reward and where thrift will be of no avail. We do not want to see that kind of government. But there is one thing I would mention before resuming my seat. In the constituency I have the honour to represent, we were unfortunately given little in the way of industrial or military projects in connection with the war. Experts were sent to look over the situation, and they came back with the report that for military purposes there was no site that had the strategic importance that was called for in the establishment of such projects at this time. I hope that when the time of rehabilitation comes the government will remember that we were left without projects of this kind while other sections in Canada were absolutely cluttered up with war projects. I hope they will not leave it to the last to do something for us in the way of rehabilitation, but will give us some of the many things that we certainly need; because, after all, we have been very patient during the war, recognizing that the winning of the war is the all-important thing. I trust that when the period of rehabilitation comes we shall not be the forgotten men.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon we were treated to a liberal helping of Scotch; this afternoon we have been treated to a liberal helping of law; and now we have had a liberal helping of medicine, so I see that I have to watch my step in the few moments at my disposal.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche), announce the appointment of Mr. Parker of Winnipeg as governor of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think it is about time that agriculture was recognized on these boards, and I hope that other ministers will continue along that path.

In the speech from the throne I have noted quite a number of things which are possibly to the good provided they are brought along and finished up along the right line. If they are not finished up in the right direction then I am afraid the Canadian people will be sadly disillusioned.

Before dealing with that I wish to make a few comments on the speech delivered by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I am sorry he is not in his seat, but I want him to know that I am in accord with the speech he made for different reasons. He told us that it would be a benefit to the west. With that I agree. He also told us it would be a benefit to Canada. With that I also agree. But there is one thing that he did not tell us, and that is, when we have all this production where are the markets to come from? He did not tell us that. At the present time with the few farmers we have at work to-day we have produced far more in some lines than the country can take care of. I was thinking over the project suggested by the hon. member for Davenport and I came to the conclusion that there is still a lot of good cream on the milk in the prairies. Perhaps some hon. members wonder what I mean by this. If you wake up with me at five o'clock in the morning you will find that the farmer is awakened by the ringing of an alarm clock which has been manufactured in Ontario. He grabs his milk pails, which are also manufactured in Ontario, and goes out to the barn. Then before proceeding to milk his cows he takes hold of a fork—you know for what purpose—which is also manufactured in Ontario. Then he milks his cows and takes the milk to the milkhouse and there proceeds to separate it in a separator manufactured in Ontario. He then comes in for his breakfast and nine times out of ten the breakfast food is manufactured in Ontario. After that he goes out and cranks up an American-made tractor and fills it up with American fuel in a lot of cases. He then goes out and hitches on to his machinery for the day's work, and you usually find with a very few exceptions that that machinery has been manufactured in Ontario. We could go on with this process right through the day until bedtime arrives and we find that the poor farmer goes to bed, which bed was manufactured in Ontario, and sleeps under blankets made in exactly the same province. Notwithstanding that I am in favour of the irrigation project mentioned by the hon. member for Davenport.

We are told that in some cases the west is not doing its share. But perhaps if the west were turned away, then some other parts of Canada would find they would be in a rather peculiar position. I am mentioning these matters not for the purpose of creating disunity, but I do want to show that when Canada's agriculture is prosperous other parts of the country and other industries of the country are prosperous. Let us go back to 1928. In ordinary times the west purchases from the east not less than $387,000,000 worth of goods. At that time wheat was selling at $1.05 a bushel, on the average. Then we come to the depression period of 1933 and we find that the west's purchases from the east amounted to only $80,000,000. At that time the average price of wheat was sixty-eight cents. That indicates a decrease in the purchases of the west in the east of approximately eighty per cent. In 1928 the purchases of farm machinery in eastern Canada by western farmers amounted to $89,306,000. At that time wheat was selling at $1.05 a bushel. Now let us come to 1933, one of the depression years. We find that those purchases had decreased to $8,196,000, or to approximately ten per cent. What about the sales of implements manufactured in eastern Canada? We find in the case of the International Harvester the western sales amounted to 77·60 per cent; eastern sales, 22·40 per cent. In the case of Massey-Harris it would appear that their products are not as favourably accepted in western Canada. The figures were 66·69 per cent in western Canada against 33·31 per cent in eastern Canada. Slightly over forty per cent of the farmers of Canada are in the west. Even though we have only slightly over forty per cent of the farmers in the west it costs us between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 annually because of the tariff.

We were told in the speech from the throne that we must have export markets. In that connection I think one of our first duties is to supply the home market. That is one of the best potential markets provided we have the money with which to buy the produce. If we have a surplus of goods, then it would seem good business to export it and bring back in return goods which we cannot easily manufacture here.

As a farmer I believe I am expected to say something about hogs. That is one of the vexed questions of the time, and was particularly so a few months ago. In the past four or five months we have had several statements which did not seem to be in the interests of Canada or of the Canadian producers. Just a couple of months ago we had quite a glut of hogs on the market, and about that time the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was trying to get the western farmers and farmers all over Canada to continue to produce more hogs. About this time also we had an increase in the price of oats and barley, an increase of ten cents a bushel in oats and fifteen cents a bushel in barley. Because people did not feel at that time that hogs were a paying propostion with grain at the prices indicated, a number of farmers decided that they would ship out a number of their brood stock, and while thousands of those brood sows were on their way to market or on the market an order was put through prohibiting the slaughtering of sows or other off-grade hogs, with the result the farmers of Canada lost millions and millions of dollars. The packers took advantage of this glut market. To my knowledge and in my own locality of Paradise Valley one farmer shipped out some hogs averaging $23 to $24.50. During this glut he also shipped out some of the same lot and had grades "B", "C" and "D", which averaged him for the same weight of hogs $18 per head. A few weeks later when the situation had cleared up to some extent the remainder of that bunch of hogs was shipped out and netted $25, and fifty per cent graded "A" and fifty per cent graded "B". I think that is sufficient to prove that the packers took advantage of a situation over which the farmers had no control whatever, and as a result millions of dollars that rightfully belonged to the farmers poured into the pockets of the packers. In that connection I believe that because hogs had to be shipped from western Canada to eastern Canada for the purpose of slaughtering, the government should stand the heavy shrinkage, and in cases where hogs could not be marketed, the government should stand the cut which had to be taken by farmers on these heavy hogs.

In connection with the cattle markets, we have many complaints. We were told in the committee on agriculture last spring that the government was watching this matter very closely, and that plans had been made, if necessary, to go on the market and buy live cattle. Up to the present time I have not heard of this being done, although I have here a dozen complaints from farmers stating that they have not been at all satisfied with the prices they have received. I understand that at the present time the packers are guaranteed a floor price for any beef which has been placed in storage, and which can be turned over to the government. I am suggesting that the same privilege should be extended to farmers, because if the packer is entitled to a floor price, surely the farmer who produces the cattle should be entitled to exactly the same privilege.

In connection with sheep and lambs we have heard many complaints. Some of those complaints were described yesterday, and they are common throughout Canada. We had a lengthy discussion on the price of wool last year, and several comparisons were made by the Minister of Agriculture. But when we look at the wool prices listed this year we see that the farmers are still being robbed, as compared with farmers in other parts of the world, particularly those across the boundary line. As a result of low sheep and wool prices we find that children in this country have been deprived of woollen underwear during the winter months, a condition which should not be permitted.

In the belief that credit should be given where credit is due may I say the farmers are encouraged by the increases in grain prices recently announced. At present the top price for wheat is $1.25; for oats, 61½ cents, and for barley, 79¾ cents. Those prices, it must be understood, are not net to the farmer, but rather prices, top grades f.o.b. Fort William. In respect of wheat something like eighteen cents a bushel is deducted for handling and freight charges, and there are comparative amounts for oats and barley.

Some people believe that the farmers who grow these grains are becoming millionaires. I do not feel that way about it, because I am in that line of business myself. If the farmers were receiving the same treatment as organized labour we should be receiving $1.60 for wheat, 69 cents for oats, and 90 cents for barley. I am not complaining about the wages received by organized labour, but I am still complaining about the prices received by farmers for their products. I am afraid farmers individually and in organized groups have developed the habit of asking for a dime when they are entitled to a dollar. That applies to most of our organized groups, as far as agriculture is concerned. The sooner we get away from that, and see that we get that to which we are entitled, the sooner will agriculture be on a sound basis.

For the moment I am going to deal with wheat. Taking the period 1926 to 1929 we were told last year the parity price was $1.41. That is sixteen cents a bushel higher than we are now receiving. It might be of interest to know that in 1926 the farmers of Canada comprised approximately one-third of the population, but at that time that third received only one-sixth of the national income. For that reason I do not feel that the 1926-29 period was a fair basis upon which to figure our parity price. If a third of the population of Canada are on the farms, then I believe the period 1915-19 would be much more suitable, when the farmers received a third of the national income. I have before me a table which sets out the farm income during the period 1926 to 1940. During that time the high percentage was received in 1926, in which year we received 17·8 per cent of the national income. In 1932, while a third of the population lived on the farm we received only five per cent of the national income. This table gives other figures in connection with annual wages and salaries in manufacturing industries and, with the consent of the house, I should like to place the table on Hansard. It gives the average income during the period 1926-40 as 9·4 per cent, for one-third of the population. And, just in case there may be any question as to the sources from which this information comes I would point out that it is derived from a study prepared for the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations by Messrs. MacGregor, Rutherford, Britnell and Deutsch, and a supplementary volume bringing the figures up to date by the staff of the commission. The figures relating to manufacturing are based on the census of industry figures supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The figures for the number of farms are from the "Canada Year Book".

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member leave to place the table on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Very well; it may be placed on Hansard.

Mr. FAIR: It is as follows:

In order to take care of some of the wrongs I have mentioned in connection with hogs, cattle and sheep I say we should have more strict supervision of packing plants. Some of the instances I have given will show that the grading is not as it should be and, because farmers are being robbed of millions of dollars every year, something drastic should be done. We well remember that some years ago an investigation of packing plants was made, one in which the Hon. H. H. Stevens was interested, but not very much was done along that line. Why action was not taken may be realized and understood by some who sit in the house to-day.

As was mentioned in the speech from the throne, we should have in connection with our grain and all other farm produce a floor price. But like other hon. members who have spoken in the debate, I am deeply interested in where that floor will be placed, whether it will be on a proper level or down in the basement. Before the government begins to set those prices, or the levels at which the floor should be maintained, I suggest that the proper period of 1915-1919 should be accepted as the basis upon which the floors should be fixed.

Then, in order to help out our basic industry I believe we should have research laboratories such as have been described on other occasions. Having them in one section of Canada is not sufficient. In my opinion they should be extended throughout the dominion. Again in that connection I believe research for the benefit of Canada should be the purpose, rather than some of the things done in the past.

I have before me a brief item from the Rural Cooperator dated October 12, 1943, which will possibly give some idea of my meaning. This article is headed "Wallace exposes monopolies forming super-government" and states:

Long before Pearl Harbor many of us in government had done our best to build up a rubber stockpile, to encourage the growing of natural rubber in this hemisphere and to get synthetic rubber production started. As Secretary of Agriculture I personally took the initiative in some of this work. Later as a member of WPB I continued to push for prompt butyl rubber expansion.

What I didn't know and what 130,000,000 Americans did not know was that the private rulers of world industry had their own private approach to synthetic rubber. Synthetic rubber was the subject of a private treaty between a great American oil company and I.G. Farben, the German chemical colossus. These two great concerns made a deal. The Germans were given a world monopoly on synthetic rubber. The Americans were given a monopoly on synthetic gasoline. This monopoly was good over the entire world, with the exception of Germany. The Germans knew what they were after. They would not yield their own development in their own country to foreign interests.

This secret agreement between an American monopoly and a German cartel was submitted to no public authority in this country. It was far more important than most treaties but it was never acted upon by the United States senate. The peoples and the governments of the world had unwittingly let the cartels and the monopolies form a super-government by means of which they could monopolize and divide whole fields of science and carve up the markets of the world at their own sweet pleasure.

The people must get back their power to deal with this super-government. This super-government has misused the people of the United States not only with regard to rubber but in a host of other critical industries as well.

That is signed by Henry Wallace, vice-president of the United States.

Looking back to the last session I am reminded that at that time we had two different statements in connection with synthetic rubber, one by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the other I believe by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). When we set up our research laboratory I hope we do so with the intention and for the purpose of benefiting the people of this country rather than those who would abuse the privilege of free enterprise.

It will also be necessary to have an equitable adjustment of debts. The act which was passed at the last session is not good enough. It should be amended or something worth while passed in its stead. Something else that should have been taken care of long ago is the question of interest on farm debts. This interest should not be payable until the farmer is able to sell his wheat or other products which are now under quota. The farmer should also be allowed storage for the undelivered portion of the quota left on the farm. He is now compelled to accept certain losses over which he has no control.

Education has been sadly neglected in Canada. We can provide millions of dollars for other things not nearly as worthy—I have mentioned some of them—but education seems to be neglected. Some of the provinces are doing the best they can, but under present financial and economic conditions they are not able to provide the necessary money to take care of educational needs. The dominion government should assist the provinces by means of grants which would be administered by the provinces. They would then be able to pay their teachers higher salaries and provide a better set-up for education all round.

The hon. member who preceded me stated that the health programme is being taken care of very ably. I trust his hopes will be realized. I hope that instead of collecting pay for these services from people who can ill afford to pay it, national money will be issued and in this way we can take care of our health programme. I want to refer to one of the scourges of this country—cancer. A short time ago I met a doctor who had retired some years ago, but after the outbreak of the present war he got back into harness. He suggested that there should be a tabulation made of all cancer cases which would be kept at one place. All these cases could be studied with a view to finding out something definite about this dreaded disease. Tuberculosis and other diseases should be taken care of and I hope that our health programme will do these things.

I come now to some of the other items mentioned in the speech from the throne. It is stated that a department of veterans' affairs will be set up to take care of pensions and all that kind of thing. When speaking on the soldier settlement estimates on July 24 I suggested that this matter should be taken from the Department of Mines and Resources and placed under the Department of Pensions and National Health. I hope my suggestion will be put into effect when the new department is set up. It is also rumoured that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is to be in charge of the new department. I know he is sympathetic and wants to do the best he can, but from cases that have been brought to my attention I feel certain that the minister is not getting all the assistance he should from many of his colleagues. For this reason I believe the members of this house should impress upon the government the need of doing everything possible for the men and women who will return from the present war.

I listened with a great deal of interest last night to the speech of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), and I heartily associate myself with his remarks. He served with distinction in the last war and he knows exactly what he is talking about. I have been in touch with the officials of the Edmonton branch of the Canadian Legion and I feel satisfied that they want something better for our returned men than is being given them at the present time.

I come now to the question of our soldier settlers. I have referred to this matter on several occasions, but without result. Before the new department is set up the government should discharge its responsibility to the soldier settlers of the last war and give them clear title to their lands. Some one will ask where the money is to come from, but my reply is that it will cost much less to give six or seven thousand clear titles than it will to continue to pay the staff needed in Ottawa and all across Canada to carry on the affairs of the old soldier settlement board. There is no doubt in my mind that it would prove to be a money-saving proposition for the government and it would give these veterans of world war one a chance to breathe for their remaining days. I understand the average age of these men is somewhere around fifty-five or fifty-six years and many of them are up around the seventy mark. They are being asked to sign a new contract for another twenty years in order to fulfil their obligations to the soldier settlement board. It is not necessary for me to give figures; I wish merely to state that I feel the government should not keep these men in bondage and deprive their wives and families of the necessities of life so that a contract which was poorly devised may be lived up to. This has been admitted by the government on different occasions. I should like to refer to the statement made by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) when we discussed this matter on July 24, the last day of the session. Speaking about myself he said:

> The hon. member identifies himself with the request made by a small group of soldier settlers who met in Saskatoon some time during the past year. They have put forward the demand that they should receive titles to their property and should not be asked to make any further payments, either of arrears or of amounts owing in the future. That point of view has been very strongly pressed by this little group, but I say to my hon. friend that to consider anything of the kind would be a gross injustice to the thousands of soldier settlers who have met their obligations and who are meeting them to-day and are not asking for treatment of this kind.

A little further on he said:

> In the light of those facts, for my hon. friend to rise and endeavour to give the committee and the country the impression that this government is dealing harshly and hardly with these soldier settlers is wholly misleading. On reflection I think my hon. friend would agree that such criticism is not very wide of the mark.

Commenting on that, may I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources to tell this house how many of these settlers during the past three or four years or since the war broke out have signed quit claim deeds or were served with thirty days notice. A thirty days notice means: Make your payments or a certain portion of them within thirty days or get off the farm and go out on the roads—we don't want you any longer. When the minister gives us that information we shall be able to judge whether or not the government has dealt hardly and harshly with the soldier settlers.

Concluding his remarks the minister had this to say, which I think is no credit to any government:

> I repeat that to meet the hon. member's request and wipe off the outstanding indebtedness of soldier settlers would be unjust to those settlers who paid off their debts and to-day have title to their land. Why, during the last year several hundred of these soldier settlers have paid off what they owed on their land and acquired title to it. I can assure hon. members that the government has no desire to deal harshly with any of these men. We recognize what they did from 1914 to 1918 but, after all, governments have to shape their policies in line with the general good. If to-day we took the action urged by my hon. friend and wiped off the existing indebtedness of soldier settlers, it would be a gross injustice to those who have met and are meeting their obligations.

I take it that the minister means by that, that injustice has been done to some of these settlers and that we have to continue that injustice to those who are still on the land because to give them a square deal might make the other fellows sore and perhaps they would not vote for the government.

But let us take a hint from the statements that have been made not only by that little group that met in Saskatchewan but by soldier settlers all across this dominion. If these injustices are not corrected I tell the minister and the government that before this session is over he may expect to hear not only from the little group that met at Saskatoon but from thousands and thousands of Canadians who will seek to place their views on this subject before this house, and the minister will find then that I am not a lone voice crying out for justice for these soldier settlers of the last war. At another time we shall press for a chance to discuss this further.

There is one more group about which I wish to speak before I sit down, namely the old age pensioners. In the speech from the throne it is intimated that we are to have a contributory system of old age pensions. With that I do not agree. I agree that we should have a more liberal system of payments for these old age pensioners and that the age should be reduced to sixty. After the war there will be a cry of unemployment. I think we should take the older people off the work list so that after the war our younger people will have the chance to work, and for those who have served their country faithfully but have been robbed of the products of their labours during past years we should provide an old age pension that is worthy of Canada. I am quite satisfied that this can be done. I am quite satisfied that millions of dollars are being paid out to-day to interests who are not entitled to it, and I am suggesting that by adopting a scientific monetary system we can not merely make these payments to our old people but make Canada the best country in the world so far as our standard of living is concerned.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, several members of this house have already indicated that this session of parliament has a special significance. Some have intimated that that significance arises out of the fact that we may have a general election before another session is called. But the real significance of this session lies in the fact that we are now in the fifth year of a war that has not yet been won, a war that has come to have a very special significance for the common people of this country. Consequently the Canadian people are rightly expecting a great deal of this parliament at this session. They expect us to enact whatever legislation or measures are necessary to secure a speedy victory over our enemy. They expect us to enact such measures as are necessary to ensure full employment for our men returning from overseas and full employment for those at home. They expect us, in the third place, to enact legislation which will provide adequate social security for all our people, both now and when the war ends.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in speaking on the address, called the attention of the house to the fact that many members of the forces have already spent their fifth Christmas overseas. Our people were conditioned at the beginning of the war to expect a long war, but they have been led by expressions made by allied leaders to believe that the war in Europe would end in 1944; and while they are prepared to make whatever sacrifices are necessary for as long a period of time as is necessary, they are insistent that we take every possible measure to bring the war to as speedy a conclusion as possible. I have no hesitation in telling the government that the people of this country are not satisfied that we have been up to this time taking all possible steps to secure that speedy victory.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) called attention, as did the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), to the large army being maintained for home defence. That is a matter of very grave concern to vast numbers of people in this country. It is a matter that is becoming of increasing concern and one concerning which the misgivings of the people are increasing rather than diminishing. We should know in this session whether in the opinion of the government there is such an imminent danger to Canada as warrants the maintenance of that army for home defence or whether it is the intention of the government to use that army overseas should the necessity arise. The policy of the government, whatever it may be, in that matter should be clarified and made known. It will be a grave injustice to the men serving overseas, to the allied nations, as well as to our own people, should we withdraw, as we have done, all these men from productive enterprises and train and maintain them at public expense, unless we are to use them as soldiers either at home or overseas.

There is much misgiving in the public mind regarding the production of war materials both in the field of agriculture and in the field of industry. A few months ago I read in the morning paper that the people of Britain were faced with the necessity of reducing their meagre bacon ration: at the same time I learned from farmers in New Brunswick that they were obliged to kill young pigs, to kill these litters as they were born, because they were unable to secure feed on which to raise them. I have seen stacks of flour stored in farmers' garages, more than they can consume for the rest of their lives, flour that they were forced to buy in order to secure a few bags of feed for their stock. I saw only a month or six weeks ago pens of cattle ready to be marketed for which there was no market. The Swift Canadian company, the only company to which these farmers were allowed to sell their stock, had, I am told, refused to send their buyers forty or fifty miles from town because there was an abundance of stock nearer at hand. The whole nation has been put on a sugar ration. Only two weeks ago citizens of Chatham, Ontario, called my attention to a refinery for the production of sugar from sugar beet which was closed in that town.

Instances such as these are causing our people to question whether we are seriously trying to provide a maximum supply of war essentials for the allied cause or a maximum of profits for those who control our manufacturing and processing enterprises.

The same question arises in the matter of production in the industrial field. I am constantly meeting men who are paying taxes from their wages who complain of evidences of waste and extravagance on every hand—examples of gross waste of time and material in many plants in which they are working. I have heard no single criticism of our war effort more frequently than that as I have moved about the country. I am satisfied that much of this could be prevented if employers were more willing and ready to grant their employees a voice and some responsibility, as is being done in England, in the matter of management in those plants; if the government were more willing and ready to grant representatives of labour a voice on those committees and councils which set forth the conditions under which workers do work, as, for example, are set forth in order in council No. 9384.

I have as yet been unable to find that the government has any adequate means of determining whether the prices charged on initial contracts, granted on a cost basis, are fair or equitable or whether the people of Canada are getting a fair return for the money spent. I raised this question in the house two sessions ago. I have raised it since. I am still satisfied, when I take the statements by the Bank of Canada and find that, in 1942, 620 companies had accumulated $379,000,000 for distribution as income to stockholders in comparison with $269,000,000 in 1938, that somebody is still profiteering in this war. My information, gathered from reliable sources, is that the government is up until this day dependent for its information, and for its check on these initial war cost contracts, on government accountants, government accountants who have no engineering knowledge, no means of telling what machines or tools are required to do a specific job, no means of telling what material is needed, no means of telling how many man-hours are needed, but are forced to rely entirely on figures which the producers supply. I am told that there is no auditing of many of the oil companies' books in connection with government orders. In England, war contracts are paid for on the basis of a fixed profit, usually seven and one-half per cent, and the profit is based on the original investment of the company and not on the turnover of goods that are produced in the plant.

We were told a year ago that the excess profits tax takes care of or prevents the accumulation of profits. The British government has issued a statement in which it contends that, were there no other controls than that of the excess profits tax, there would be no deterrent to the accumulation of profits on goods sold to the government. It is impossible to secure a statement showing the reserves that are being built up by many of these companies. The London Economist a few months ago estimated that Canadian companies had built at the end of 1942 reserves of 700 compared with 100 as the index figure in 1939, whereas 2,000 British companies had been forced to reduce their reserves over the same period to 80 from an index of 100 in 1939.

In other words, there has been more than seven times the accumulation of reserve by Canadian companies than by British between 1939 and 1942. Very little light has been thrown on this whole subject of profits in Canada in war time. Numerous investigations by government officials in the United States have revealed some very startling facts. It is not surprising that Canadians should have misgivings regarding the profits of some of these firms whose parent companies in the United States have been profiteering on a grand scale.

Sessional paper 139, tabled in this house on January 26, shows that the Department of Munitions and Supply has employed 257 dollar-a-year men and that more than one hundred firms represented by these men have received contracts from the government ranging from a few hundred dollars to $270,000,000 in one case, and amounting in toto for the one hundred companies to more than $800,000,000.

The wartime prices and trade board has employed another 216, the majority from large commercial and industrial firms, concerning whose dealing with the government, the return tells us, no information is available.

This situation affords so many opportunities for profiting out of the war that, in my opinion, some more adequate means is required to safeguard the public interest than that afforded by a war expenditures committee overloaded with government supporters and sitting behind closed doors. I think we should be told, for instance, why a certain advertising company with a dollar-a-year man in the Department of Fisheries gets two contracts for $50,000 each to advertise the sale of canned lobster when within a short time after his appointment and the granting of the contract that commodity disappeared almost entirely from the shelves of the stores in this country.

Has it become the policy of the government to let this house occupy itself with insignificant matters of legislation while all matters of most vital importance to the people of the country become subjects of order in council? Wage control, price control, rent control, rationing, all subjects that are of vital importance to every citizen, are removed completely from the control of this house as far as discussion and debate are concerned, and have become subjects of orders in council.

This is amazing from a government led by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Has the Prime Minister forgotten a resolution which he himself moved before the Liberal convention twenty-five years ago, which provided for:

> The restoration of the control of the executive by parliament and of parliament by the people through a just franchise and its exercise under free conditions and—

This is important.

> —the discontinuance of government by order in council.

There are a few more passages in that speech of twenty-five years ago which I would quote, not by way of criticism, but in order to urge the present government and the party which the Prime Minister leads to seize the present opportunity that this session affords of placing on our statute books legislation which will make his dreams of twenty-five years ago a reality. They may never again have so great an opportunity as they have to-day. The country is waiting for legislation of that kind. It would make a grand finale for the Liberal party, for, regardless of what party is returned to power after the next election, no party would rescind such measures for the alleviation of society's ills as this government can now, if it chooses, place on the statute books during this session.

On the occasion, twenty-five years ago, on which the present Prime Minister introduced a resolution which was incorporated as part of the Liberal platform on the methods and principles for regulating labour conditions, which had been adopted by the international labour convention, he called special attention to the fact that the Liberal party would be the first political party in any country in the world to accept this programme. The verdict of history is that Canada has to-day the most backward labour legislation of any important country that was represented in that international labour convention, and that notwithstanding the fact that the party which was the first to adopt its principles has been in office eighteen years since that time.

Let me read again from the same document. The Prime Minister made this statement: This resolution—

> . . . is an expression of the belief that industry exists for the sake of humanity, not humanity for the sake of industry.

Again I quote:

> Is it not true of most of the large industries of the country, as organized at the present time, that the capital investors choose the board of directors, that the board of directors select the management, and that the management determines the terms and conditions of employment, without necessarily inviting the cooperation of labour in matters which affect its own well-being?

Most interesting of all, on page 134 of the report of the national liberal convention of 1919, he is reported as having said:

> I think the time has come in the history of Canada when the people of this country are determined to have a government that is not ruled by any railway, by any financial interests, or by any business or other corporations. We want a government that is going to be free from the control of the interests, from the control of specially privileged groups; a government that is representative of the principle of government by the people and for the people, and which will be carried on at the instance of the people's own representatives.

If any change has taken place it is that after eighteen years of Liberal rule those interests now get the ear of the cabinet and the cabinet determines the terms and conditions of employment by order in council.

The country expects this parliament this session to enact legislation that will ensure full employment when the war ends; full employment, not merely for the purpose of keeping people busy, but employment that is socially useful and that would provide all our people with all the necessities of life. That must be our first aim. To do this we must take steps to see that the necessities of life, in food, clothing and housing, are produced in sufficient quantities to feed, clothe and house our people. In days prior to the war thousands of our people lacked food, clothing and housing accommodation, yet at the same time we spent millions of dollars attempting to bribe people to buy goods that they did not want to buy. We permitted the price and profit mechanism to determine our economy and based our production solely on that which could be provided with the greatest profit for the producer. The war came and we made two radical changes. First we planned production on a priority basis and recognized basic needs. We gave priority in our production programme to those things that were needed by a nation at war. We curtailed the production of non-essentials until those other needs were met.

To achieve prosperity for our people after the war we must apply the same principles to peace-time production, and the government must accept the responsibility of seeing that first of all there is an available supply of food, clothing and housing for all our people.

In the second place we made available to our allies and to our own people, without undue regard for price or profit, those things that they needed. When our allies needed war materials we did not let either price or profit prevent us from supplying them. To enable our own people to be fed and clothed, and to some extent housed, the government made some effort to see that the prices were kept within reach of their purchasing power. When we recognize in peace time, as in war, that basic needs are of vital importance we shall then place welfare before wealth. In the words of the Prime Minister that I quoted some moments ago, we shall recognize that "industry exists for humanity, not humanity for industry", or I may add, the profits of industry. Price and profit will cease to be the sole determining factor of production.

In the third place the government has, in part, financed the increased production of things essential for war out of savings accumulated by voluntary or restricted consumption of non-essentials. Before the war we talked of spending for prosperity. Since the war began we talk of saving for victory. What is true of an armament programme is true also of social reconstruction. Such a programme must be financed largely out of savings, and I think we have to accept the fact that if we are to spend money on social reconstruction we must save it on non-essentials.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

In addition, of course, to our savings effected as I have outlined the government has used the nation's credit for the production of essential goods. That credit must likewise be made available to meet the peace-time needs of our people. It is in order that the nation's credit may be made available and used for the production of socially useful and essential goods that we in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believe that the government should have the sole right of expanding or contracting or issuing credit. Because we believe that this control cannot be exercised while private interests own our banks we advocate the public ownership of these institutions.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING SECRECY

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 4, to amend the Income War Tax Act (communicating information).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. KNOWLES: This bill would add to the proper section of the Income War Tax Act these words:

> Provided that nothing in this subsection shall operate to prevent a minister of the crown from communicating to the Senate or to the House of Commons any information obtained under the provisions of this act.

In my view the restrictions as to secrecy imposed by subsection 1 of section 81 as it now stands have the effect at times of preventing a minister of the crown from giving the Senate or the House of Commons information which might be legitimately asked for and given. This amendment would also affect the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, since sections 40 to 87 of the Income War Tax Act are by section 14 of the Excess Profits Tax Act made to apply thereto.

Mr. HOMUTH: Has the Minister of Finance nothing to say on this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Any hon. member has the right to introduce a bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This matter is not debatable.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is ridiculous, though.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WAR APPROPRIATION—REQUEST FOR BREAK-DOWN OF ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Finance in connection with the procedure relating to the war appropriation resolution. I should like to ask the minister if, following the procedure adopted last year in connection with the war appropriation resolution and the bill founded upon it, he will give, not only the total estimated expenditures of each department of government, but also a complete detailed break-down of the estimates of each such department, in order to enable us to scrutinize more closely and in greater detail the various governmental expenditures which enter into the war appropriations. In view of the fact that the government intends to proceed with this resolution almost immediately after the conclusion of the present debate, it is essential that the break-down be furnished at once; otherwise we shall be severely handicapped in debating both the resolution and the bill. I might add that a similar request was made and acceded to by the government last session.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had in mind going even farther this year than we did last year.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then I hope my request will not stop you.

Mr. ILSLEY: My recollection is that last year when I moved the resolution I gave a break-down of the expenditures of the various departments, but that the ministers supplemented the information which I gave by giving a more detailed break-down when presenting their respective estimates. I intend this year to give as far as possible all the information when I introduce the resolution, and to give also comparative expenditures for the present fiscal year, which I think will facilitate the discussion of the resolution. I intend to give that information in the speech with which I introduce the resolution.

MOBILIZATION ACT

QUESTION AS TO PROCEDURE IN ISSUING CALL-UP NOTICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Labour what steps he has taken to ensure that call-up notices under the mobilization regulations are not sent to those who are already in the armed forces? This question has been before the house in previous sessions, and I thought by now the whole matter had been cleared up. However, a young soldier, who had been in the army since March 30, 1942, came into the parliament buildings yesterday and saw me quite by accident. He said that although he had been in the army since March 30, 1942, the day before yesterday he received his notice of call-up, order for medical examination, transportation warrant, and a single ticket from his home town to Ottawa, which he left with me. I want to ask the minister why such things are still occurring in connection with the call-up notices for our armed forces.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, since the mobilization work was taken over by the Department of Labour one of the matters which has been giving us constant concern is the question raised by the hon. leader of the opposition, and a great deal has been done to prevent the sending of notices to men who are already in the armed forces. During the latter part of 1943 regrettable occurrences of this kind were, I am glad to say, few and far between.

The whole mobilization plan is worked out on the basis of the 1940 national registration; that is, the basis on which the notices are sent out is the record as indicated by the national registration. The plan is that the registration as to addresses, movements, and so forth will be kept up to date through the method of the person concerned notifying the registrar at Ottawa and the registrar of the mobilization division, in the place of residence, as to change of address and other relevant matters. Hon. members will realize that it is not too easy to keep these records up to date, nor is the importance of notifying the registrars fully realized by all our citizens. In the earlier days of the war the importance of having a prompt report go from recruiting officers to registrars, I am afraid, was not fully appreciated, and in many cases we found that men were in the armed forces and a report had never reached the registrars. I think, too, it is only fair that I should say that in the earlier days of mobilization registrars were not fully organized to take care of the work of keeping their records up to date.

With reference to the young man referred to by the hon. leader of the opposition, who, he said, joined the armed forces in 1942 and was called for service in February, 1944, I cannot without investigation give factual information but I suspect that this young man had joined the armed forces and that through some neglect on the part of the recruiting officers, or indeed it may be of our registrars themselves, this fact was not recorded. If the hon. gentleman will give me the particulars of the case we shall be glad to get the exact facts.

My hon. friend in his question mentioned that the man was young. We have found quite a number of cases where young men have joined the armed forces when they were considerably under the age of eighteen years and six months. In their anxiety to get into the army they would not state their correct age. At the time the age was attained, a file would be made and a notice sent out. It is just possible that something of the kind occurred in this case.

As to what we have done to prevent this kind of thing occurring, I would say that we have strengthened our organization and arranged for cross-checking with the records of the three armed forces, and generally developed many plans which have the effect of perfecting our records. While I have not the exact figures, I think a good guess would be that over one million men have passed through the armed forces, and I think it is to the credit of the recruiting officers and of the men and women throughout the country engaged in the registration that we have not had more cases of this kind. On the law of averages, human nature being what it is, some people are bound to make mistakes; I am frank to admit that I do myself sometimes, and I hope that we shall never live to see the day in this country when all the people in this chamber are as perfect as some members of the opposition think they should be.

Mr. GRAYDON: I sent over to the minister an envelope containing the information in this case, and I should be glad if he would return it to me when this matter is closed.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to do so.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT ON PRESS REPORT AS TO "LABOUR POOL" FOR WORK IN FORESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. leader of the opposition referred to a press report as to a labour pool for work in the Maine forests, as reported at page 70 of Hansard. I replied at the time, "There is not a labour pool." That was with reference to certain Quebec counties along the border of the New England states. Since then a survey has been conducted by the local agronomes under the supervision of Mr. Theriault, agricultural director of the Quebec regional office, and Mr. Rioux, the director of the dominion-provincial farm labour programme. It may take me a few minutes to read this report but in view of the publicity given to the matter in certain directions I think it is just as well that the whole matter should be placed on the record.

In the ten border counties of Quebec, after the intensive campaign carried on in the autumn, 2,235 men left farms for winter woods operations, of whom several hundred have since returned to the farms to do necessary work before spring.

Mr. HOMUTH: Seven hundred and six have returned?

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that; I said "several hundred".

Mr. HOMUTH: Will the minister say what he means by "several hundred"?

Mr. MITCHELL: If the hon. member waits until I have finished he will probably find that I have covered that.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am doubtful.

Mr. MITCHELL: I quite appreciate that my hon. friend would doubt it.

In the opinion of the agronomes, 1,575 more men could be used at present on farms in these counties to maintain agricultural production. There are, however, a few men on individual farms who could be spared until spring, men who refuse to move to other farms where they are more urgently needed, but the agronomes would not place the total of these at more than 185.

In this same area of ten counties the employment offices have 500 or 600 outstanding orders for woods workers needed by Canadian companies.

A check was made by the agronomes of 100 representative farms in the area under survey. Out of 201 men on these farms normally, 108 are now in the woods, 7 in other industry, and 86 remaining on the farms. The proportion of men away from the farms is much higher in counties like L'Islet, where out of 23 men only two remain on the farms, and Beauce, where out of 24 only four remain on the farms. Further, those who remain on the farms are usually the old men and the boys.

A good example is the farm of Mr. Xavier Belanger, at St. Marcel in L'Islet county. This farm has 200 acres, of which 110 acres are under cultivation. There are 19 milch cows, 10 other cattle, 4 horses, 4 pigs, and 25 poultry. The three men who are regularly employed on this farm are now in the woods, leaving a wife and a young boy to look after milking and the other farm work.

In Quebec as a whole there are almost 60,000 men employed in woods operations at present.

Mr. HOMUTH: How many of military age?

Mr. MITCHELL: This is eighty-five per cent of requirements, but at least 7,700 more are still needed.

Since receipt of the report covering the survey, I arranged with Mr. Paul Goulet, associate director of national selective service, to telephone the mayors of several communities in the border area to obtain definite statements as to their views. Charges have been made that the general opinion in the communities was that hundreds of men were available and should be allowed to go to the state of Maine for work. Mr. Goulet reports that the mayors responded as follows:

Mayor Thibaudeau, of Aubert Gallion (Beauce), stated that he himself had difficulty in securing help when he needed any, which proves that there are not many without work in this village. As to farmers in the vicinity, he indicated that it was very hard for him to give any kind of definite statement on the number available.

Mayor Larochelle, of St. Prosper, stated that there may be five or six men in his village unemployed. As to the farmers in his vicinity, he stated that all who could leave the farm had already done so for the reason that they are anxious to work during the winter and earn some money.

Mayor E. B. Groleau, of St. Zacharie, stated that there were possibly fifty men on farms not of military age and thirty-five of military age around this village who might be available. Most of these farmers, however, cannot leave their farms for more than two weeks and have to come back every five or six days to do essential work. For this reason they will not accept work for Canadian operators because they would have had to go 125 miles north.

Mayor Elie Boulanger, of St. Come, claims that in his village it is very difficult to obtain help when needed. At times, transients from distant parishes remain in the village for a few days hoping to get an exit permit. He said that there might be about 100 farmers in the district who have come back from the camps of Canadian operators because their cutting is about terminated, and who, due to the lateness of the season, cannot leave for other camps in the north because of the heavy railroad fares involved. Logically, these same men should remain on the farms for the reason that they are needed there, since when they are away the women and children have to look after the work. The only reason actually for their willingness to accept work in Maine is the alluring high wages to the south of the line.

Mr. Gregoire, manager of the employment and selective service office at Thetford Mines, states that his quota was filled up to 98 per cent, and he understands that the quota of the Levis office was filled 100 per cent. In his opinion, out of the 3,500 men authorized, there are about 3,420 who are actually working in Maine. He claims that quite a few men of military age were anxious to go and work in Maine on account of the high wages and that this might have impressed the companies' agents. These men could not be allowed to go, however, and are now busy on the farms looking after the cattle, cutting the fuel wood, repairing machinery, etc., and otherwise preparing for the spring work.

In review the following would appear to be significant facts:

1. That there are many farms on which the work is being done by women and children. Those in a position to know, namely, the agronomes, say that too many men have been taken off the farms. It seems evident that the task of national selective service in a very few weeks will be to move men back or productivity of the farms will suffer.

2. All told, in this very large area the agronomes estimate that there are not more than 185 men still on the farms who could be taken off. It should be noted that during the time this survey was being made we were recruiting men to fill out the 3,500 total, and no doubt all or mostly all these 185 men will have been recruited for this purpose.

3. Emphasis should be placed on the fact that our Canadian woods operators are still urging the need for more men.

4. It seems evident that this district has been thoroughly and efficiently checked over for man-power and all the men that can safely be taken from farms have been taken, apart from a few individuals in whose case there may be some doubt.

In view of the situation revealed by this survey, the labour department reaffirms the necessity of maintaining the limit of 3,500 men allowed to cross the border for employment in the forests of the northeastern United States this winter.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister one supplementary question after his long statement? If national selective service is functioning in that district, why is it necessary, first of all, to have a survey, and second, why is it necessary for the minister to give the opinions, which are only opinions, of mayors and other heads of municipalities in connection with the labour situation in that part of Canada? That is what selective service is for —to know through its local offices the exact position of the labour market in the dominion. I think the minister owes the house an explanation as to why he has taken secondary evidence when first-hand evidence should be available.

Mr. MITCHELL: The question is a fair one, and I think when my hon. friend reads this statement in Hansard he will find that his question is answered. In view of the statements carried by some newspapers in this country, made by a certain newspaper writer in another country, he felt it necessary, even prior to my hon. friend's bringing the matter up in this house, that thorough check should be made so that we might be assured of the true state of affairs. I have quoted the evidence of the selective service officer in charge of the district, but it is only natural that we should get the opinions of the mayors of the communities where this individual is supposed to have had interviews. I think the statement shows conclusively that there is no surplus of labour in that district as claimed in a certain newspaper article published in this country.

WESTERN STOCK FEEDERS

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL OF BEEF CATTLE AVAILABLE FOR MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Has the Minister of Agriculture received representations from western Canada to the effect that feeders of beef cattle finishing for market there cannot market this beef? If so, what is the minister doing about the situation?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Representations have been coming in for about a month to the effect that some fat cows that are ready for butchering cannot be disposed of. The reason is that very early in the season, last November and December to be exact, the packing plants across Canada found it impossible to handle all the hogs and beef coming on the market. The farmers were asked to hold their unfinished cattle and cows and sows off the market as long as possible. The result of that has been that in some areas, mostly in Alberta —all the representations have been from that province—there are some fat cows that have not found a market. The department therefore has been attempting to find facilities whereby these cows can be handled, and some have been taken in; but we have not been able to take care of all of them. The meat board is in touch with the situation at all times and is doing the best it can to see that cows are marketed.

HOGS

EFFECT OF REGULATIONS UPON SMALL SLAUGHTERERS OF HOGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture what is being done to enable small slaughterers to carry on their business, which has been interfered with by the new regulations? Not having the right to get the subsidy on hogs, the small slaughterers are going out of business, and everything is being shifted into the hands of the big packers of the country.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member, as the representative of a constituency in which a packing house is located, probably knows the answer fairly well—

Mr. HOMUTH: I don't know the answer and I want it.

Mr. GARDINER: —but I may say that a very much larger number of the hogs that are being slaughtered in Canada at the present time is going through the small butchers than was going through them six or twelve months ago. That is due not to the change in regulations referred to by the hon. member but to the change in the regulations made last fall which permitted those slaughtering for home consumption to slaughter any number of hogs for which they can find a market.

Mr. HOMUTH: That does not answer the question at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, the fact that the hon. member makes a statement does not say that it is true either.

Mr. HOMUTH: Of course, I never believed the Minister of Agriculture in my life, because no one else in Canada does. No one ever did believe him. The Minister of Agriculture has been swinging on—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: He doesn't know where he is.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am asking—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must place the question on the order paper.

Mr. HOMUTH: All right, but I am asking—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, when he sits down I will stand up. I am asking the Minister of Agriculture what he is going to do about the small slaughterers who to-day are not put on a par with the big packing houses of the country. What is he going to do for them?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: They are not being treated fairly and they want to know what he is going to do.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has asked his question—

Mr. HOMUTH: And the minister cannot answer it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You cannot ask it properly.

Mr. SPEAKER: —and if the hon. member is not satisfied—

Mr. HOMUTH: I certainly am not.

Mr. SPEAKER: —he has the right to place the question on the order paper and get a reply.

Mr. HOMUTH: You cannot get a reply.

Mr. GARDINER: I have listened to the hon. gentleman asking questions for some years—

Mr. HOMUTH: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: —and I would say to him that when he comes into the house to ask questions—

Mr. HOMUTH: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: —he should ask them in accordance with the rules of the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister has no right—

Mr. GARDINER: The rules require that members shall place their questions on the order paper. When the question is put on the order paper I will answer it.

Mr. HOMUTH: You cannot answer it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You cannot ask it.

MEAT SUPPLY

AVAILABILITY OF SURPLUS — RATIONING — MEAT CONDEMNED AT QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): May I ask a question of the appropriate minister, perhaps the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Munitions and Supply. It is based on a press report appearing in the Ottawa Journal of February 5. The caption of the article is: "Surplus of Meat, Period of Scarcity Over for Duration." I should like to read one or two sentences that explain the question:

> J. S. McLean, president of Canada Packers Limited, said to-day that within the past few weeks the meat supply situation in Canada has swung from a position of acute scarcity to surplus and "we can all make up our minds that the period of scarcity is over" for the duration of the war.

The article states that every foot of freezer space in Canada is full. In view of these facts, is it the intention of the appropriate department of government to discontinue, or at least to make some change in, the rationing regulations in regard to meat? I would ask another question with reference to the same subject.

Mr. HOMUTH: Ask a lot of them.

Mr. SENN: The next question is based on another press report, appearing in the Montreal Gazette of February 5, under the caption: "500,000 Pounds of Meat Condemned at Quebec." Is it the intention of the appropriate authorities to investigate this great loss and assign the responsibility? If so, will appropriate action be taken, if it is found that responsibility has been improperly assumed, to ensure that these men are prosecuted?

Mr. SPEAKER: These are certainly questions that should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister cannot answer them anyway.

GRAIN

EFFECT OF WHEAT DELIVERY QUOTA ON DELIVERIES OF OATS AND BARLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I wish to direct to the Minister of Agriculture a question arising from an article appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 3, which states that, by arrangement of the railroads and the Canadian wheat board and the Department of Agriculture, feed grain shipments were held up to provide cars for wheat shipments. The government asked producers in 1943 to maintain decreased wheat acreage and increase oats and barley acreage, stating emphatically that wheat producers could deliver only fourteen bushels per acre on the basic acreage of 1940. The Minister of Trade and Commerce having stated that the wheat delivery quota will be increased to eighteen bushels per acre, may I ask whether this will be done before the producers of oats and barley, who find it very difficult to finance, are allowed to deliver an equitable quota.

Mr. HOMUTH: Leave it to the minister of pensions. He will tell you whether it should be answered.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That question is entirely out of order under the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have at various times pointed out that on the orders of the day questions involving policy, and the procedure which the government intends to adopt, should be put on the order paper. These questions must be put on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with your consent, I would point out that it is a distinct rule that questions on the orders of the day may not be based on extracts from journals outside. That is a distinct violation of the rules of the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: The point is not well taken.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have had similar questions on the order paper since the opening of the house and other members have risen and asked the same questions on the orders of the day. We have not come to those questions yet.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I have been particularly pleased this session with the number of members who have called attention to the omission from the speech from the throne of any reference to the subject of education. Apparently all the members of this house are becoming education-conscious. I want to emphasize, as I have emphasized before, that no national plan for social reconstruction after the war can be considered complete that does not give education the proper place to which its importance entitles it.

There was an excellent report presented to the James committee last summer. The substance of that report was that where Canadians are now spending one dollar on education they require two, not for something fantastically idealistic, but for the moderate practical advances in education in keeping with the aspirations and the temperament of the Canadian people. It is not a question of interfering with provincial rights; it is a question whether this government is prepared to assist the provinces in assuming and carrying out the responsibility which the British North America Act left on their doorstep. Until this government realizes the importance of education to the point where it is prepared to assist the provinces on an equitable basis of need in financing education, young Canadians will remain deprived of the equality of educational opportunity which is their heritage and their right in a democratic society. I would urge upon this government that they give consideration in their reconstruction programme to the need of assisting the provinces to carry out their responsibility as outlined in the British North America Act. There is no necessity that financial assistance should in any way interfere with the rights and autonomy of the provinces in that regard. As I have already stated, until we are prepared to give assistance to some of the provinces, which cannot under any circumstances provide an adequate educational programme for the use of these young people, we shall not be giving the youth of Canada, their right.

There are one or two points, Mr. Speaker, that I should like to suggest. There are certain needs the satisfaction of which will contribute to unity in Canada, and no institutions of this country can do more to build Canadian unity than the public and secondary schools of the nation. We need an anthology of Canadian poetry by French and English authors, in both languages. We need an anthology of Canadian prose. We need a book of Canadian songs. We need reprints of those pictures that were done by Canadian artists for distribution overseas. We need a book that will give the young people of Quebec "an insight into" life in English speaking Canada; we need a similar book for the English speaking students of this country that will give a picture of French Canadian life. These cannot be sold at a price that will make them available to the schools unless they are subsidized. No province can subsidize a book for the entire country. May I suggest to the minister responsible for education, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that some consideration be given to subsidizing these books, if the government is unwilling to do anything else in the field of education. That, I am confident, will render a great service and cost the people of this country very little.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, it is more than three years since I last had the opportunity to stand in my place and address this house. I have no apology to offer for my absence; for my constituents knew when they elected me that I had enlisted in the R.C.A.F. I am very glad to say, however, that they have not suffered by my absence, because my colleague and very good friend the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has taken care of my riding in the interval, and for that I thank him. I have, however, one complaint. He has set so high a standard of service to my riding that it is going to be very awkward for me to measure up to it.

When I last spoke in this house I believe I was regarded as a rather impatient and critical supporter of this government. I may tell this house I was consoled when I was in the British House of Commons in 1942 to hear Mr. Churchill tell his followers not to be mealy-mouthed in debate and chicken-hearted in the lobbies. May I now tell this house that while I may still be critical of some points, my service overseas has given me increasing pride and confidence in this government's conduct of Canada's war effort. I know it is increasingly the custom in this country to complain and rant about every minor restriction and regulation that the government has of necessity to impose in this country because of the war. People also point, of course, to other countries and compare our actions in the most unfavourable light. That seems to be the line taken in Canada. Those of us who have served in Britain and the middle east and the far east have a much better appreciation of what Canada has done. We have lived in countries where there has been a very marked increase in the cost of living, where there is no wage ceiling. Because of government control of wages soldiers realize that there is no great gap between their earnings and the wages of war workers in industry.

It is not, however, only the members of this house who feel an increasing pride in Canada's war effort. I need not recount to this house our efforts on the war front; I need not recount to this house our efforts on the production front. That has been very well said by Mr. Churchill himself. I can, however, tell this house of my own personal pride in that last great advance across Libya in seeing that the greater part of the vast fleet of trucks which moved the supplies of the 8th army and desert air force across the desert came from Windsor and Oshawa. A very great portion of the supplies in those trucks, of food, guns and ammunition, were also of Canadian origin —even a little beer; very little beer. I shall speak of that on a later occasion.

On the home front I believe the government is worthy of much more praise than has come its way. What has impressed me, and I know what has impressed most returning soldiers, is the abundance of everything in Canada, an abundance of food, of clothing, of cars on the streets. After the war-worn clothing of England, needfully strict rationing, and the total absence of pleasure driving, we find Canada practically a country at peace. The second thing which impresses a returned soldier is how little the cost of living has changed in this country in his absence—a signal tribute to the government's lone and brave fight against the perils of inflation. I say "lone" advisedly; for I believe the government has received little praise in this country for its magnificent effort.

The imposition of ceilings on wages has I believe aroused labour. The imposition of a ceiling on prices has aroused the farmers and business men; yet these steps are unavoidable if there is to be a real control of inflation. Everyone in this country seems to agree with the principle but objects very bitterly to the practice if it affects them personally. No mention of wage control can be made at this time, however, without reference to P.C. 9384. I am not one who is going to rant and rail against government by order in council. Anyone who has been at war knows the necessity of instant executive action, and that power should be given to a government which has the confidence of this parliament. But I do believe that any such order in council should be capable of justification to parliament by the minister concerned. I do not believe that a Liberal minister of labour can so justify certain clauses in this order.

May I turn first to the actual constitution of this war labour board. There is a common complaint in this country from coast to coast that labour has not been given adequate representation on the many government war boards. If there is one board on which labour should have decent representation it is this national war labour board; yet we find that on a board of six they have one nominee. It is true that the government nominates four members and that one of these may be a labour man, but labour does not want government appointees; labour wants its own nominees.

To my mind there are three groups involved in wage control, the employer, the employee and the public as represented by the government; and I would say that it would be fair to set up a board of six consisting of two nominees from each of these groups.

My next objection is to the third stated object of the order, which is:

> . . . to provide machinery for an orderly rectification of any gross inequalities and injustices in wage rates so established. . . .

Up to this point I agree, but in the mention of the words "gross inequalities and injustices in wage rates" I take it to be tacitly admitted that such conditions still obtain in some parts of this country. The wage ceiling should be elastic. There is no intention of freezing sweatshop wages for the duration of the war. However, the joker is in the last clause, which reads:

> . . . in so far as it is possible consistently with the paramount principle of the maintenance of stability in prices. . . .

In other words an increase can be given in sweat-shop wages provided it does not affect the price of the product of that sweat-shop, which is manifestly impossible. The people of Canada do not believe in sweat-shop wages; they are willing to pay prices which will give the labourer a decent wage.

I think all hon. members will agree that strikes caused by disputes between unions over jurisdiction and other such illegal strikes should be outlawed in time of peace as in time of war. Hon. members may debate whether the right to strike after due arbitration and conciliation should be given to labour in war time; but I do not think many hon. members of this house will agree to the terms contained in sections 33 to 36 of this order. These have to do with prosecutions for offences, the first with the case of an employer who contravenes the order by paying illegal wages or causing a lockout. Section 33 (2) provides that the burden of proof shall be on the accused. Section 35 deals with the employee who is alleged to have taken part in an illegal strike; it provides that the burden of proof that the strike was not illegal shall rest on the accused. Section 36 deals with the man who is alleged to have aided or abetted an illegal strike; it provides also that the burden of proof that the strike was not illegal shall rest on the accused. To my scanty legal knowledge this means just one thing: that the man is taken to be guilty until he proves his innocence, and this in the year 1944, in the fifth year of this war for freedom. I cannot conceive why the Minister of Labour should introduce these things; I cannot conceive why the Minister of Justice should permit it. It cannot be said to be due to the exigencies of war, because I have taken part in summary trials and in courts martial in Libya within the sound of battle, and even there the airman was considered innocent in every particular until he was proved to be guilty.

These bad causes have had one good effect; they have united Canadian labour from coast to coast as never before. A.F. of L. unions, C.I.O. unions, independent unions, and in fact all but the lackey company unions, are unanimous in their opposition to these features. I therefore urge the government to rescind this order, and to replace it with an order which will treat labour, to use the phrase of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), not as a commodity but rather as a deserving partner in Canada's war effort, because the record of Canadian labour in this war is good. We who have been overseas know that it is better than the British and American records. Our wonderful war production record has been made possible by the efforts of the Canadian working man. In so urging I speak not only for the labour unions in my riding but also for the Liberals of my constituency, who at their annual convention last month condemned these clauses in the strongest terms as being contrary to their conception of Liberalism.

Next I should like to touch very briefly upon the speech from the throne, which I believe to be one of the most heartening and progressive programmes ever offered to the people of Canada. I believe that national health insurance, adequate old age pensions as a right and not as a charity, and a national housing plan, when carried to fruition will be the very brightest jewels in my honoured leader's long career of public service. As far as health insurance is concerned, fortunately in this country there is a very large body of men who are completely sold on the idea; I refer to the 750,000 men in the services who are now receiving the benefits of state medicine. So, too, with family allowances; here again we in the services have had actual experience. I have never heard a single unmarried airman complain because a married man of the same rank, doing the same job, actually was getting more money because of his dependents' allowance; they all agree that it is a first-class thing. I understand that there is considerable opposition from some groups because they feel that this is going to give undue advantage to the large families of French Canada. I say this is a reproach not to the large families of French Canada but to the small families or lack of families in the rest of Canada. If family allowances increase the size of the families in the rest of Canada it will be a very fine thing, far better than any system of unrestricted or selected immigration.

The part of the speech from the throne which most interests me, naturally, is that part dealing with reconstruction, rehabilitation, demobilization and reestablishment. I do not intend to speak of reconstruction or demobilization now, but I should like to speak on the rehabilitation of the soldier who returns from overseas. I do not pretend to be the spokesman of the man overseas; however, I do say that I have a fair knowledge of what the airman overseas is thinking. Life with the 8th army in the desert and with the Canadian army in Sicily has given me a little knowledge of the soldier. The sixty-five days I spent at sea in convoy and my trip home on a Canadian destroyer at least gave me contact with our sailors and our merchant mariners. Discussions with these groups have convinced me that they have a common outlook on rehabilitation, so that when I say "soldier" or "sailor" or "airman", these words are interchangeable. In one way the service man of this war is very different from the service man of the last war. Those who fought so bravely in Flanders fields really believed they were fighting to create a world worth living in, because they had not known the aftermath of a world war. Those who are fighting in this war have no such illusions. They know the bitter disillusionment of the soldiers of the last war. They remember the years of the hungry thirties, and they are determined that this is not going to happen to them. Unlike the soldiers of the last war, when they return they are going to have two very powerful organizations to give them guidance, the Canadian Legion and the Army and Navy Veterans.

The soldiers know what they want; what they want must be established in concrete legislation long before the end of the war, and they must know of it. That the government realize this is shown by the fact that legislation has been brought down, that blue cards were issued to soldiers telling them about it, and that later on little blue booklets were issued. I feel, however, that the present programme falls far short of what the soldiers expect in one respect. Since the speech from the throne has announced that certain amendments are to be made I hope that my comments will be taken not as critical of the past but as constructive for the future. To introduce this subject to the house I can do no better than quote the collective opinion of the members of the squadron which I have just left, the City of Windsor squadron. This squadron could well be taken as being representative of the Canadian fighting man overseas. They have had greater and more varied combat experience than any other unit in the Canadian army or air force during this war. They have served in Great Britain, in Egypt, in Cyprus, in Libya, in Tunisia, in Malta, in Sicily, and now they are the crack fighter squadron with the desert air force in Italy.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit me to observe that my city will be most grateful for his observations?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Shortly after the government issued these little blue cards, one of which I have here, the squadron had an open forum of both aircrew and ground crew to discuss these problems. That little meeting on a forward landing ground at dusk was to me the most educative and interesting experience I had overseas. Out of it emerged one bald, bare fact. These men do not want charity or pity in the way of being given a hand-out. All they want is the same fighting chance in peace time as they are now taking for their country in war time. I think I can summarize briefly as follows the collective opinion of their meeting that night:

When the war broke out and our country needed us, the government accepted our services. They took us and trained us in the best manner in the very best of training institutes. During that period of training they clothed and fed us and provided full medical and dental treatment. They paid us a basic rate of at least $1.30 per day and full service dependents' allowance to our dependents, amounting in all to $75 per month for a single man, $110 per month for a married man and $134 a month for a married man with two children. When we have served our country and returned to train for peace we want, first of all, jobs. If we cannot fill those jobs, we want the necessary training. We want jobs not of death and destruction but of peace and construction, under similar conditions of pay and allowances.

With this simple demand no one can find fault. I believe the people of Canada themselves are willing to give these boys that much.

Let me trace what happens to a soldier when he is honourably discharged under existing regulations. Here I must compliment my friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) upon his recent action which has cut my feet from under me in my criticism of the old regulations. Under the old regulations a man needing medical treatment was discharged and then given a pension on a much lower scale. Under the existing regulations he is retained in uniform while undergoing treatment. Officers are paid at the rate of flying officers or the equivalent, and airmen at their existing pay. The retention of the uniform is a fine thing, because a disabled man in uniform is an object of respect; in civilian clothes he is quite often the recipient of unwanted pity. If he is partly disabled, on completion of the treatment he comes under the Pension Act. I do not propose to speak of that matter at this time, although here again I should like to compliment the minister on the recently announced extension of the burnt-out pension scheme.

We now have a man in good health ready for discharge. First he gets his clothing allowance so that he may return to civilian life. Previously this was the ridiculous sum of $35, but it has lately been increased to $65. This sum may be sufficient for a man who has been less than a year in the service, because it would permit him to supplement his civilian clothing, but it certainly is not sufficient for a man who has been overseas for three or four years. Quite often when he returns he has outgrown his clothing; it may be moth-eaten, or his loving relatives may have given it away to the Salvation Army or the Red Cross. I would say that the clothing allowance should be based on a sliding scale according to length and character of service.

There is another important point about the clothing allowance which I want to bring out. Before a man gets his clothing allowance he must turn in his uniform. He is allowed to keep his shirts, underwear, socks and shoes, but he must turn in his gun, tools, uniform, blankets and things like that. Since I returned home I have been stationed at a west coast station. One wet day a man paraded in the squadron dressed only in a sweater and a pair of white cook's trousers and wanted a pass to go to town. He was reproved for parading in such clothing, let alone for asking to go to town, but he explained that he had just turned in his uniform, had got his $65 and now wanted to go to town to get his civilian clothes. When I told that to my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley, that old soldier, with his customary vigour, said that if he had been in that man's place he would have paraded to town in the shirt, underwear, socks and shoes which his grateful country had allowed him to keep.

The very least this country could do for an honourably discharged soldier is to allow him to keep his uniform. The cost of a No. 1 blue is $13.70. When it is turned in it becomes a No. 2 blue worth just $7. A No. 2 blue when turned in is either made into salvage or given to the Indian department. It would not cost the government over $7. Giving the uniform to the air man—I am confining my remarks to the air force—would permit him to return to his home town in uniform. More than that, he would be able to spend his $65 wisely. He could use that money to supplement his civilian clothing when he is at home by purchasing from the home town stores. Let me tell this house that every sailor, soldier or airman is just as proud of his uniform as any officer, and will want to keep it so that in the years to come he can show his children and his grandchildren the uniform in which he served his king.

Next, our man is given a discharge button. This is a most excellent thing, as is the provision of a button to those who have volunteered but have been found unfit, who have tried to join but have been rejected for medical reasons. My one suggestion here is that these buttons are not well enough known in Canada and do not get the honour they deserve. I suggest that the government should omit one of these civilian morale advertisements that clutter up our newspapers and devote the same space to returned soldier morale by featuring, first of all, the red maple leaf of the man who tried to join, who tried to do his bit, and the discharge button given to the man who has been honourably discharged, who has done his bit. In that way the people of Canada would come to know these badges and honour them.

Now our man is ready for his gratuity. I dislike the term "gratuity" because it implies charity. What he actually gets is a grant in aid to enable him to tide himself over the very difficult period of demobilization. At present this is one month's pay of rank and allowances for those with more than six months' service. With both the method of payment and the payment I disagree. There is a great difference between the need of, say, a Seaforth private in Italy who has been serving for $1.50 a day and who is returned to civilian life, and a major-general whose service has been confined to the rigours of Ottawa at $20 a day. Theoretically the higher the rank, the easier it is for a man to return to civilian life. The Seaforth private will go back to civilian life with $45, whereas the major-general will be given $600. This is a case of to them that have had, more shall be given, and to them that have had very little, very little shall be given.

I would take the minister's own yardstick in the case of medical treatment. The basic pay of a flying officer, an army lieutenant or a navy sub-lieutenant should be the basis for paying gratuities to all service men on discharge, and for each year of overseas service or eighteen months of voluntary service in Canada the man should be given one month's pay at this rate.

Our man is now fit, discharged with his clothing allowance, button, and grant in aid. Now comes rehabilitation. Men in this war differ from men in the last in another way. There has been a high degree of mechanization in this war, and there is a great proportion of skilled tradesmen in the service. Three-quarters of the ground men in the air force are highly skilled technicians, fitters, riggers, wireless operators, welders, and so on. The same is true to a lesser extent of the men in the army and navy. These men are going to have very little trouble in getting jobs when they return, if the jobs are there. That, of course, is the problem of reconstruction.

There is a second group who will have little trouble, those who will return to their civilian occupations because of the government's very good soldier reinstatement act.

There remains another group, estimated by the Canadian Legion to be between 150,000 and 200,000, who will have no civilian trade or who will want to complete their training which was interrupted by the war. In this group will be the very greatest number of the men who deserve best by this country, the actual combatants, the soldier in the line, the aircrew in the air, the sailors on our fighting ships whose only trade right now is to kill or be killed. I have had the opportunity of carefully studying the educational programme drawn up by Doctor Weir and his staff under the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and I find it a wonderful scheme. No returned soldier can say that a suitable training syllabus to train him on his return to civilian life was not prepared. My objection is a simple one. The soldier, sailor or airman will not be able to take this programme because of financial inadequacy. Let me read from this little soldier blue book on the subject of grants-in-aid:

> Grants may be provided to service men while taking refresher courses, vocational training, university education, awaiting return from crops or private enterprise, temporarily incapacitated or out of work, if fit and capable of working.

All very admirable and completely comprehensive. These grants cover (a) tuition fees, student fees, athletic fees or other charges and costs of courses given; (c) allowances for dependents. These are on the service scale as regards children, and I find no complaint with either of these clauses (a) and (c). It is clause (b) that I find fault with. Clause (b) provides for living allowances of $44.20 a month for a single man and $62.40 a month for a married man. This living allowance can be regarded as a basic $44.20, plus $18.20 for wife. Against this I protest.

To begin with, as a mathematician I am fascinated by the $44.20. I would certainly like to know the mathematical basis on which the need and reward of a service man can be figured right down to twenty cents. I am told it is based on unemployment insurance benefits. I scorn that comparison. There is no conceivable relation between reestablishing a veteran who has served his king and country and unemployment insurance benefits.

Some will say it is a wonderful benefit. How they wished they had had it when they attended college! I am sure that the minister, when he recalls his own grim struggle on meagre bursaries through Scottish universities, might regard it as munificent. I worked my way through university by working in the mines, and would have been highly pleased with such assistance. But here again the comparison fails. These are not boys struggling ahead for themselves, but men who have earned men's wages, who have hazarded their lives and sacrificed the best and most formative years of their lives for their country, on meagre pay, and who deserve well by their country. Now when they return they are to be trained for peace. Even from the point of view of the narrowest and most selfish of national interests it is our duty to see them properly reestablished; for they represent our greatest single national asset. the fittest, the bravest, the most self-sacrificing of our youth, those who will create the Canada to come.

I am going to give you actual examples of what is happening to-day. At the beginning of the war, when air force standards were high, junior matriculation or better was required. As the drain on man-power began, standards relaxed, but still a certain minimum equivalent to second year high school mathematics was necessary. To enable candidates lacking this to qualify for the air force, the dominion-provincial youth training plan began giving this training to otherwise qualified candidates. They got only $1.25 a day subsistence. As the need grew greater, the air force took over those lads who where deficient in elementary education and sent them to public schools. In Vancouver, for example, to-day there are about 400 attending two public schools and a technical school. Now these lads get $1.25 a day for board as they lodge near the schools, and $1.30 a day basic airman's pay, a total of $76.50 a month in cash, plus airmen's clothing, full medical and dental care, all costs of tuition, and all the opportunities for free or cheap entertainment and recreation available for men in uniform. Their one complaint is that $37.50 a month is not adequate for board and lodging in Vancouver.

Also in Vancouver we have returned men starting rehabilitation training. Take the case of a pilot with three years' overseas service who is resuming his interrupted course in engineering at the university of British Columbia. He gets his tuition fees, as the trainee does, and $44.20 in cash—nothing else. No clothing, no medical care except for war injuries, no dental treatment, no opportunities for free or cheap entertainment or recreation. Deduct the $37.50 which the government deems adequate for board for the trainee and we get this comparison:

To the man who is getting elementary education to enable him to begin real air force training to serve his country, $39 a month in cash, tuition fees, board and lodging, clothing, full medical and dental treatment, free or cheap recreation and entertainment. To the man who has served his country on the field of battle and is now training for peace, $6.70 in cash, tuition fees, board and lodging, no clothing, medical treatment only for war injuries, no dental treatment, no chance for free or cheap entertainment or recreation.

I mentioned before that in this group are going to be a large proportion of the most deserving, the actual combatants, the soldiers in the line, the aircrew and the fighting sailors.

In a sympathetic and understanding speech some sessions ago, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) pointed out that this group would present the greatest problems on return; for not only had jobs to be found, but the men would have to be conditioned to accept the quiet routine of civilian life after years of great hardships, intense excitement and the most incredible nervous strain in the line of battle. What hope is there for conditioning these men to a normal civilian life on a net cash grant of $6.70 a month, out of which they must pay for replacement of clothing, laundry, car fare, medical and dental treatment, recreation, and then find money for leading a normal civilian life? I tell this house that if these men return to such conditions their song will not be "Land of Hope and Glory"; it may well be the red flag. They will remember Kipling's bitter little song, "Tommy Atkins":

> But it's "Thin red line of 'eroes", when the drums begin to roll.

That is what it was when they were called up. But when they find themselves getting $6.70 a month it will be "We serve no redcoats here". These men will know the score, just like Kipling's Tommy did.

> An' Tommy ain't a bloomin' fool—you bet that Tommy sees!

No Canadian at home should accept the excuse that what we are doing is more than any other country is doing. There is only one standard: to our ownselves be true. Give these men the one thing they are asking for, the same fighting chance in training for peace that we gave them when we were training them for war. I therefore propose that a basic sum of $75 a month be paid, plus standard service allowance to wife and children, plus medical and dental care at the nearest military establishment, for the duration of the period of rehabilitation. This is still less than the trainee taking elementary training gets, but it will give the returned soldier a fighting chance. That is all he wants.

While on the subject there are one or two other things in this booklet that I would like to mention. First, soldier land settlement. I do not know very many airmen who are proposing to go on the land after this war. That may be because farm life is unsuitable after service in the air force. It may be because they remember too well soldier settlement after the last war. It may be because they remember too well the plight of experienced farmers before the present war.

Those who are going on the land expect three conditions to be fulfilled. First, that the land be suitable. They are not going to try to raise crops on barren acres. Second, that it be cleared. No British Columbia boy is going to spend the rest of his life trying to tear up British Columbia stumps by hand. Third, that the land be accessible to market.

I have two observations on finance. Every soldier, sailor or airman who reads page 13, and continues to read until he finds that the ex-service man must make a down payment to the government of ten per cent of the cost of the land, or $480, and that this down payment must be made prior to the receipt of any financial assistance, is going to say, "Where the blank am I going to get a down payment of $480?" Out of their savings or their war pay of one dollar and one-half a day? No. Out of this gratuity of $45 in all that the government is proposing to pay? No. From our chartered banks or money lenders? No. Where? I ask the government. It may well bother them. It is bothering, I know, many soldiers, sailors and airmen.

I had thought that in view of the experience in soldier settlement after the last war, the government's approach would be a little different. I do not like making statements without figures, but I am quite sure that if all the cost of land settlement boards and administration and legal costs and surveys and royal commissions were added up, the total would vastly overshadow the actual returns. I therefore propose that any soldier who is still farming his land after five years be given his farm outright. This would save the government money; it would give the soldier a real incentive to farm, and it would mean the end of at least one war board after the war, because five years after the end of the war the work of the land board would automatically end, not drearily drag on for twenty-five years as has the present land board.

There is one conspicuous omission from this little booklet. The soldier will read it through and say, "Where am I going to live after the war?" We all know what an appalling shortage of houses there is all over Canada. A national housing scheme must come, but ahead of this must be a provision of some decent place for the returned soldier to live in. I am proud of the industrial war workers' housing project in my riding. Similar provision can be made for the soldiers—not mansions fit for heroes to live in, but decent homes fit for good Canadians.

One thing more, in conclusion. In my maiden speech I am supposed to have suggested that there was too much complacency in Ottawa. I heard a lot about that. As a returned soldier I would like to say again that there is far too much complacency and self-satisfaction. Not in Ottawa, however, but in the country at large. I believe that the government are far ahead of the people in realizing that 1944 is no year for complacency or self-satisfaction. Our early days in this war were nothing but one long tale of defeats and reverses. Now that the tide has just begun to turn, and we are having occasional victories, too many people in this country are relaxing and thinking that the war is practically won. The days of great advances over the deserts of Libya or the plains of Russia are past. The fighting becomes more dogged, more bitter, day by day. The bloodiest battle that British troops have ever attempted is just over the horizon.

When we come back we hear a lot about sacrifices in Canada, restrictions, regulations, loss of earning power, and things like that. These are not sacrifices; they are minor hardships incidental to war. It is those who have given their lives, those who offered strong young bodies to their country and who have returned with those bodies shattered, those who have lost sons, husbands, fathers—these are the ones who can talk of sacrifice. Our women folk too: the mothers who are sick with apprehension when they read of our nightly loss of bombers for fear their boys have gone flaming down in the night; the wives who pale at the approach of a telegraph boy for fear he brings the dreaded message; the quiet anguish of all women who can but watch and pray at home while separated from their men overseas—these know the terror and horror of war.

A little earlier I spoke rather strongly of this wage control order. When I read, however, in yesterday's press that certain labour leaders in Canada are proposing an illegal one-day strike as a protest, I am filled with nausea and disgust. Such an action will not help labour with the people of Canada, and I should be ashamed of this government if it paid any heed to such a protest. Such a strike will hurt just one group—the fighting men overseas. A one-day strike will mean that when that bloody morning dawns and our Canadians wade ashore on the beaches of France under a hell of fire and bombing, they will have been weakened by the lack of one day's output of war material, in the most terrible battle in which Canadian troops ever engaged. Let me tell you that those who survive will remember it.

This is no time for self-satisfaction and self-complacency in Canada about our war record, our industrial record, our home front record. This is the year of decision, the year which will decide a rapid victory or a long and protracted war ending probably in a stalemate; a year of blood, sweat and tears for every one of the united nations; a year when our fighting men must be given every conceivable aid and support and encouragement by every man, woman and child in Canada, no matter what the personal cost may be.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): May I join with all members of this house in a generous welcome to the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), who has just returned to his parliamentary duties. He has given the people of this country a clear and accurate presentation of the indebtedness of the government and the people to the fighting forces overseas, and it is to be hoped that full note will be taken of his submission.

As the speech from the throne presents an extensive programme of new and revised legislation, my reference to it at this early stage of the session is with the hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will include in that programme better provision and better opportunities for handicapped people in the dominion, no matter what that handicap may be. The speech contains one point about employment and another on pensions, each of which is closely associated with a third, social security, and on that social security is to be based the new post-war order which is the topic of discussion in every community across Canada. If the government is really in earnest in bringing this new order into effect, there is no better time than the present to establish a foundation for it.

At the meeting of the social security committee, perhaps the most interesting and informative submission was that presented by Colonel E. A. Baker, of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. If I could persuade the members of this house to visit the workshops of the blind in the larger cities across Canada they would get a first-hand view of the effort and the energy of blind persons to become self-supporting. They are doing splendid work and their one endeavour is to be free and divorced from all government support.

Colonel Baker's submission was unique in the fact that, instead of asking the government for something, it proposed to relieve the government and the taxpayers from a contribution by way of old age pensions. As hon. members know, a blind person is pensioned at forty. He is permitted to earn, in addition to the pension, the sum of $200 if he is single. That makes $440. A married man is permitted to have $805 including pension. Because he is blind it must not be thought that he is not just as keen to have the comforts and joys of family life and to bring up his children as the children of sighted persons are brought up. And so I ask hon. members this question: Would any man in this House of Commons like to be in the position of having to rear a family on $805 a year, which is the limit set for married men?

It is to that end that Colonel Baker suggests the new method whereby, instead of deducting dollar for dollar in excess of the amount a blind person is permitted to earn, the government will deduct only fifty cents from the pension, so that the blind person may continue to earn until he has reached $680, at which time the pension is wiped out entirely and he no longer receives benefits from the government. That looks like a reasonable proposal. Further, the proposal is that a blind boy who is taking his limited vocational training be pensioned at the age of twenty-one. He too will be better fitted to earn his living. As his earnings increased there would return to the government that proportion of his pension, so that the government would be free. It would be an incentive to all blind persons to earn as much as possible and be released from the receipt of a pension from the authorities. Regardless of what a man's earnings might be in one year, he would still be eligible for pension the next, but he would be most earnest in his endeavour to free himself from the necessity of receiving a pension.

The submission further suggests that legislation for the welfare of the blind, including pension, be placed under a separate act.

[Mr. Esling.]

I should like to refer to a matter that came up at the last session. It has to do with those people who are hard of hearing. That is in the nature of a handicap and it is something to which people give little thought. Many times a child in school is backward, perhaps depressed, and is often spoken of as indifferent or as being, in more direct terms, "dumb", Quite often that is due entirely to the fact that the child's hearing is impaired. That is borne out by a national health survey made in 1935 and 1936, which showed that there were in Canada 155,000 adults who were hard of hearing. The survey showed also that two per cent of the children of school age had defective hearing. As a result there has been incorporated in Canada the national society for the hard of hearing and for the deaf. It has a splendid membership across the dominion. The purpose of the society is to assist people who are hard of hearing or deaf, by way of welfare work and particularly by placing them in positions so that they may be able to maintain themselves.

At the last session, in referring to certain people, I used a word which I know some distributors and manufacturers take exception to—the word "racket." The fact is however that there are people who are making immense sums of money out of the afflicted. The hearing device is beyond the reach of so many people who are hard of hearing. In the first place, these people are not able to earn a normal standard of living and they are deprived of the benefits of this device because it sells from $150 to $200, though the instrument is a very simple one and the material in it represents just about one-eighth of the cost of this hearing aid.

I asked the Minister of Finance during my remarks last year if he would not appeal to the wartime prices and trade board and ask what was a reasonable price at which this instrument should be sold, and the minister kindly did so. I think he was disappointed in the reply, as I was, because the board seemed to assume that it had no concern about hearing devices except as the price applied to the base period of September to October, 1941. The minister must have thought that he was right or he would not have asked his question of the board, but the board replied that they had called in half a dozen distributors from the Montreal district and had been informed that the prices at which these distributors were selling the instrument were the prices that prevailed in the basic period of 1941. Suppose that by some combination of circumstances or war conditions just before that basic period the distributors had jumped the price $100, the reply of the wartime prices and trade board would have justified the asking today of $300 or $250 instead of current prices. What I particularly asked last year was that the wartime prices and trade board refer this matter to the national research council and to have the national research council determine a fair and reasonable price at which the people of Canada could be supplied with this device. Apparently nobody seemed to be responsible. As I say, the wartime prices and trade board was not concerned. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) said that his department was having an expert body look into the matter, but in so far as it went beyond the department he did not think he had any authority to deal with it. Well, it does seem to me that the minister, as minister of health, should take particular steps to see that the Department of Pensions and National Health does take up this matter and does see that the national research council determine a reasonable price.

There are other complications that arise, because the picture has changed entirely since the last session, and the change indicates exactly what the national research council could have done. One of the largest radio manufacturers in the United States has placed a cheaper instrument upon the market. It sells at $40 in the United States as against $150 and $200 in this country. The Department of Pensions has accepted that instrument. It is being dealt with through the orthopaedic branch. It has secured the approval of the American medical society; it has secured the approval of our own national research council. What should be kept in mind is this: that United States concern has practically broken the combination which sells the hearing device on the Canadian market at a price of $150 to $200; and it is for that reason we may expect chaos in the distribution or in the marketing of cheaper grades of instruments to the deaf and hard of hearing people. There are other difficulties. There are high pressure salesmen who are able to convince a buyer that he should have this instrument or that. After he has paid his money, however, he finds that it does not answer the purpose. My suggestion to the government is that they have the national research council go into this matter and establish a specific code for the standardization of material and construction; for achievement and performance; for the permit and for the nature of advertising, and arrive at a graded cost of such instruments in accordance with the cost of the material, the cost of construction, distribution and research that should apply. I know that the government does not want to go into this business, but it should go into the business of protecting the general public against these high pressure salesmen; it should go into the business of seeing that no instruments are sold in Canada unless they pass the approval of the national research council.

I make an appeal to the Minister of Finance. I ask him to have a thought for these people who with great difficulty have saved sufficient money to purchase one of these instruments. It is true that there is no customs duty on them, but there is a war exchange tax of ten per cent and a sales tax of eight per cent. There is also an upkeep cost of about $25 a year. I ask the minister if he will not, in thinking this matter over, endeavour to have these three items deducted from a person's income tax, just as is a reasonable portion of one's doctors' and hospital bills.

The other day the Prime Minister spoke about the various committees and the work which was ahead of them. Every member of this house knows that the members of these committees were worked to the limit at the last session. They were worked to the extent that they had to sit between sessions. May I offer the suggestion that some of this work be turned over to the members of the red chamber. Senators are capable men. They are able to deal with this committee work perhaps as well as the members of the House of Commons. Any committee appointed in the red chamber has a majority of government members; therefore there is no danger of a report being presented contrary to the wishes of the government. If you go through the "Parliamentary Guide" you will find that of the eighty-one members of the red chamber one-third of them have been either members of a government occupying ministerial positions or leaders of parties in their respective provinces. Surely we all know that when they were called to the red chamber, due thought was given to their responsibility and to their qualifications for carrying out the duties of their office, and it is merely with a view to hurrying the session and placing a lot of the work where it could be well done that I offer this suggestion. There is another reason, and it is this: for practically one-quarter of the time of the last session the Senate was without anything to do.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have undertaken a task that is beyond my ability because I am going to venture into the professional realm this afternoon. I am not professionally minded by any means, nor have I had any training whatsoever along that line. I pride myself on being a practical man though, and I believe even in the professions—and the medical profession especially—one can be practical.

The speech from the throne declares that provision should be made to expand research activities, and that will be the basis of my remarks this afternoon. I am going to speak on only one phase of it, and that is the phase of cancer research. Coupled with that I wish to give the story of Doctor J. R. Davidson, 232 Somerset block, Winnipeg, and some of the results of his investigations of over thirty years in searching for a cure, or as he puts it, a preventive and a possible cure for cancer.

This matter was introduced in this chamber last year by two hon. members. It is true I suggested that these hon. members might mention the case of Doctor J. R. Davidson, because they had both known him well, and at least one hon. gentleman had been associated with him for thirty or thirty-five years. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) was the first to bring the matter before the house. He was kind enough to mention my name and to say that I certainly appeared to be improved in health as compared with previous years. Following that mention of my name I received literally hundreds of letters from all over Canada. I did not know that the newspapers had got hold of it, but evidently some of the newspapers in the east did, because I received some of the most pathetic letters I have ever read. One woman wrote to ask me what she would have to do in order to bring her husband, who was afflicted with cancer, to Winnipeg to undergo the treatment prescribed by Doctor Davidson. I asked Doctor Davidson if I should tell her to bring her husband to Winnipeg for treatment, but he replied, "Harry, don't; I have far more than I can attend to now." Two months later I received a letter in which this lady told me that her husband had passed on.

I mention that instance to indicate the ravages of this, the world's greatest scourge. The other hon. member who mentioned this subject was the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). He is a medical man, and I was particularly anxious that he, with his knowledge of the situation, should bring up this matter in parliament. It was not that I wanted to shirk my responsibility, but I told him that in a few days I was going home to continue my treatments with Doctor Davidson, and that in my opinion he could deal with the matter much better than any hon. member, because he had the advantage of having known Doctor Davidson for so long.

[Mr. Leader.]

Mr. MacNICOL: And he is sincere.

Mr. LEADER: There is no question about that; he is one hundred per cent sincere.

I do not intend to tell the story of Doctor Davidson's work or to outline his treatment, though we have discussed it many times. I am a patient of his, and from my place in this house I say that he has done me a lot of good. I am not going to say that he has cured me, because I have had cancer for twelve years. I am sure he would be the last man in the world to say he could cure me; but he did say, "I think I can help you," and that is just what he has done. I should like, however, to recall the gist of what was said by the hon. member for St. Boniface, who, as I have said, has been associated with Doctor Davidson for thirty-five years. He pointed out that medical associations, even as far away as Rochester, have been kept informed of Doctor Davidson's work, and he told us that Doctor Davidson has carried on his work on his own premises and at his own expense. Finally he paid tribute to Doctor Davidson as a doctor and as a good citizen.

Hon. members who are interested, as I am sure all hon. members are, may find the story of Doctor Davidson's professional investigations in Hansard for Wednesday, July 14, 1943, in the speeches of the two hon. members I have mentioned. I should like, however, to quote from the discussion that took place at that time, in order to show the interest that was taken in what these hon. members had to say. The hon. member for Fort William asked, as reported at page 4800 of Hansard for last session:

> Will anything be done in regard to this matter? I do not wish to press the minister too hard, but the people who have been cured are most anxious that all the scientific research which has been carried on by Doctor Davidson shall not be lost.

The minister, who has been entirely sympathetic to every effort to have the work of Doctor Davidson investigated, replied:

> There is a committee functioning now in conjunction with the national research council which investigates cases of this kind, and I am sure it is important that this be done in connection with this matter. Certainly I shall bring this discussion to the attention of that committee.

If the records are consulted it will be found that within a very few days the minister did bring the matter to the attention of this committee, which is a branch of the research council. Then the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Graydon) had a word to say which showed his kindly interest:

> Has this work by Doctor Davidson been under consideration by the national research council?

To this question the minister replied: "Not to my knowledge." Then the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall), continuing the debate, said:

I think we were all very glad to hear the statement made by the hon. member for St. Boniface; the members of the medical profession can make valuable contributions to the debates of this house.

This leads me to remark that we can all make valuable contributions to the debates of this house, but it will take more than debate to settle many of the difficulties which confront Canada, and particularly the matter with which I am dealing to-day.

Dyson Carter, a scientist, had an article in Saturday Night of October 23 in which he quotes the authoritative Journal of the American Medical Association as saying editorially:

The only hope of solving fundamental problems of cancer lies in research.

Then in the draft national health bill the first explanatory note reads:

To place within the grasp of the people of Canada the benefits of a comprehensive scheme of health insurance, designed and organized for the prevention and cure of disease and the conservation of health.

In the proposed bill the statement is made that deaths from cancer number 12,000 annually, but I believe that in 1942 that number had increased to 14,000, and since cancer is on the increase it is only reasonable to suppose that in this year upon which we have just entered the number will be even greater, perhaps 16,000. Dyson Carter concludes his article, which is based on Doctor Davidson's work and the speeches made in this house last session, by saying:

One savage fact to strike home the truth: so rapidly is cancer increasing that to-day, on our continent, twenty-four veterans of the great war are entering hospital with this disease every twenty-four hours.

As a rule, Mr. Speaker, it is not nice to deal with one's personal affairs in a public way. Sometimes the less said about one's own personal affairs, the better it is for everybody, but it is necessary for my purpose to bring my own particular case to the attention of the house. I told you a few moments ago that I have suffered from cancer for many years. Of course I did not know this at the start. I finally went to Rochester and my trouble was diagnosed as cancer. This was arrived at not by a physical examination but by the exploration of my abdomen. They told me—I shall deal more fully with this in a few moments—that nothing could be done for me, but if I would be good I might live a long while. Then comes a joke which perhaps should never be told in parliament. However, it is so good that I want to tell it to-day. They told me not to do any hard work or to have any mental worry and I immediately said, "Will I be able to attend to my duties at Ottawa?" and a doctor said, "Oh, yes."

I was persuaded to go and see Doctor Davidson. I found him a very modest man, reluctant to speak of his achievements. He would not claim that he could cure cancer, but he was enthusiastic in his belief that cancer could be prevented by the proper diet. He said that all of his experiments led to that conclusion. May I repeat in this house that Doctor Davidson has helped me. If I am allowed I should like to tell you how simple and easy it has been to effect a better condition of life. For ten years I had been constipated and in constant danger of bowel stoppage. He said, "The first thing we must do for you, Mr. Leader, is to get nature functioning properly; we will prescribe a certain diet for you and see if we can get you back to normal." I followed that diet religiously. It consisted of vitamin pills, wheat germ on my porridge and radio-malt twice a day. I am able to eat anything that agrees with me. I have followed this diet religiously and for nearly a year after starting Doctor Davidson's treatment I have not had a laxative. He has helped me to regain my health. As Doctor Davidson says, it is all so simple that most people will not believe it. However, many people are now following his advice.

I started this dietary treatment and then commenced with his cure. It must be remembered that he did not say he could cure me; he never told me he could cure cancer, but he feels he is on the right track and I believe that he is. He has a preparation which he has developed—I will call it a serum but that may not be the proper term—which the hon. member for St. Boniface referred to last year. I could go into this at greater detail to-day but I have not the time. I started to take his treatments and they have done me a lot of good.

I was taking these three times a week, and one day when I was in Winnipeg I went to the office of Doctor J. R. Davidson and his secretary told me that he was sick in the hospital with a heart attack.

I had feared that something like this would happen, because he had been working entirely too hard with the very limited staff which he had at that time. I asked at which hospital and then I went out to see him and found he was feeling a little better. But he had suffered a heart attack even though he was able to come back to his office in a few days. Then I realized that it was time for me to move. At that time it was perhaps three or four months since the matter had been mentioned in the House of Commons and still no action had been taken. I wanted to keep in the background until I was able to rise in my place before you and offer myself as a living example of this man's work. I wanted to be sure; I did not want to try to put anything over. However, I thought it was time for me to get busy. I called up my friend, the hon. member for St. Boniface, and asked him whom I should approach in the medical profession in Winnipeg in order to direct attention to the condition of Doctor J. R. Davidson. He told me to call up Doctor Cadham, the pathologist in the Manitoba medical college. I talked to him over the telephone. He said he knew Doctor Davidson and had great respect for him. I asked if he knew he was in the hospital and he said that he did not, that he was sorry to hear that. I told him that there was a danger of this man passing, and that with his passing would perish the secret of his years of investigation. He then told me that I would find Doctor Davidson a very difficult man to deal with, that he had worked with him during the first years of his experiments but that he always played a lone game, that he would not play ball with the rest of the profession. He told me that they had investigated his early work but that there was nothing there. I told him that I had been to Rochester; I explained my experience there, and I offered to go to Doctor Cadham that afternoon to have a physical examination. I received no encouragement. I told him that if the medical association of Winnipeg would appoint a committee I would come down any day since I was in Winnipeg three times a week. I did not receive any invitation. When I suggested that the research council should take this up he did say that that was the proper body to deal with the matter.

Right here I might just as well say that the research council has a representative in Winnipeg. You may wonder why I mention names, but I do so because I believe in telling the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Doctor Thorlakson is the representative in Winnipeg of the research council, and I have been told that he is absolutely opposed to any investigation being made into the work of Doctor J. R. Davidson. He represents a body that is going to investigate, or should at the present time be investigating the work of Doctor Davidson. I then wrote to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), and I should like to read this letter because it outlines in a concise manner the situation as it existed at that time. The letter reads:

Dear Mr. Mackenzie:

I am again drawing to your attention the case of Doctor J. R. Davidson of Winnipeg, Manitoba. You will remember the reference to the doctor's work when the matter was mentioned in the house last session by Daniel McIvor, M.P., and Doctor Howden, M.P. I also mentioned the matter to you during the recent national Liberal convention in Ottawa.

Apparently nothing is being done to check officially, the work of Doctor Davidson in his search for prevention and a possible cure for cancer notwithstanding the publicity given in several magazines and first-class newspapers.

As a patient of Doctor Davidson and as a public man, I can assure you that I am deeply interested in Doctor Davidson's cancer experiments, and believe that he has long passed the experimental stage and that his work should be given the proper official recognition. Therefore I would respectfully ask you, the responsible minister in such cases, what procedure I should follow that would hasten an official investigation.

Within the last month Doctor Davidson was sent to the hospital with a heart attack. He is again attending his patients, but the danger of collapse is ever present. Can we afford to sit idly by and see this Canadian doctor's work in cancer research perish with his passing?

Will you please designate the procedure that I should follow in getting some immediate definite action in this supremely important matter.

The minister answered promptly. I am not going to quote his letter. In fact, I wrote him again soon after that, and again the minister answered promptly. But I wish to quote a paragraph from his letter just to confirm the argument which I made a moment ago in regard to the attitude of some of the medical men at Winnipeg and some of those who are higher up. This paragraph says:

Two items of information have come to the department recently by way of gossip:—(1) that the medical men in Winnipeg, many of whom were quite outspoken in regard to the hopefulness of something genuinely good coming out of Doctor Davidson's studies, have in recent months apparently been less hopeful. The second point is that we have been informed, that the Doctor, who is 73 years of age, has suffered a stroke or some other serious disability.

I perhaps was responsible for the latter rumour.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member say from which letter he is quoting?

Mr. LEADER: I have just quoted a paragraph from the minister's reply to me. I have other replies from the minister here which I shall not quote. I have another letter here from which I should like to quote a paragraph, but I dare not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Go ahead.

Mr. LEADER: No, not that it is very serious at all, but it just makes me a little dubious of the outcome of the investigation which is now taking place in Winnipeg.

I learned in correspondence with the minister that the research council had never received any request from Doctor J. R. Davidson for any aid in his experiments. When I heard that I got busy and advised Doctor Davidson that that was what he would have to do. The research council went on to say that they were prepared to deal with the matter in a judicial manner after a request had been received. I told Doctor Davidson that he would have to have his findings put in concrete form, substantiated and certified by medical men who had dealt with his particular cases. He told me that he had done that just the night before. "I sent it away last night," he said. Then I found out that others were working besides myself, many others, in fact, but the man I speak of in particular lives in Regina, and he says that his wife was cured by Doctor Davidson. This man had found out that an application for aid was necessary; I think he supplied the information to Doctor Davidson, and the request for aid from the research council was sent down, I believe, on December 14. Acknowledgment was made on January 5. A questionnaire was sent at that time to Doctor Davidson by Doctor Ettinger, of Kingston, secretary of the research council, I understand, asking the doctor to fill out the questionnaire so that the council would have a basis on which to make an investigation. That questionnaire was sent back January 25. I have here the questionnaire, filled out by Doctor Davidson himself, which I shall not read.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member will permit me, I called to see Doctor Davidson twice with reference to someone I knew, and he showed me a long list of people whom his serum or treatment had evidently cured. Has the hon. member seen that list?

Mr. LEADER: Yes, and I have also with me the addresses of some of the patients. I will give them a little later. I have them here.

I want to give the house a little personal experience that I had with Doctor Davidson and his work. Doctor Davidson emphasizes the prevention of cancer rather than its cure. His original theory that a nutritional deficiency in diet causes cancer has been abundantly proved by his experiments with mice, and the serum treatment he has developed is a direct result of his research work in discovering the cause of cancer. He has told me many times that his deep concern centred in finding preventive measures to control the incidence of cancer rather than in finding a cure, where a cure so often is impossible. The old adage that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure applies with terriffic force in matters of public health.

May I now give some concrete examples of Doctor Davidson's work. I have before me cases certified by medical practitioners and by representatives of clinics which have made investigations of cases treated by Doctor Davidson where the cancer had cleared up and the people were now evidently in good health and showed no symptoms of cancer. Let me refer to my own condition.

Here is the report from Doctor Waugh of the Mayo clinic, Rochester. I asked Doctor Waugh if I had his permission to use this letter and I told him about Doctor Davidson in Winnipeg. Doctor Waugh sent a copy of this letter to Doctor Davidson and he closes by saying that if he could render help he would be glad to do so. The doctor found a condition in my abdomen which had been there for many years and which had become so extensive that it was not even wise to try to find the primary site. He said my case was hopeless.

Mr. MacNICOL: Your case?

Mr. LEADER: Yes; he said my case was hopeless. He went on to say that he had thought of doing some short-circuiting because of potential bowel obstruction, of which so many people die, but he said even that was impossible. Doctor Waugh told me when I left Rochester that he has known of cases like my own, carcinoid tumour, where people have lived for twelve or fifteen years after the condition was surveyed. If you will recall, sir, what I told you about this vitamin diet which the doctor prescribed for me, and remember what he did to take care of that potential obstruction, you will realize what Dr. Davidson has done for me and is doing for hundreds of people in Manitoba at the present time. It is no exaggeration to say that Dr. Davidson's fame is becoming known all over the world. He is getting letters from Australia. The other day I read a letter in his office inviting him to California, telling him that there are a number of institutions in that state which would be glad to have him continue his experience in those institutions. I said "Doctor, you would not want to leave Canada?"—remember he is seventy-four years old—and he replied, "No; this is my home, I want to stay here." But this goes to show that unless some effective action is taken immediately, either this man will leave Canada and go to another country, or, on account of his age, pass on and we shall lose the value of his experiments.

I should like to say something about the case of Mrs. J. N. de Stein, of Regina. An abdominal operation on November 22, 1941, was performed by Doctor J. A. Brown. At that time an extensive cancer condition was found. The pathological report confirmed the diagnosis as cancer. The patient also received radiation treatment, but no hope was held for her recovery. Since November, 1942, the patient has been under the care of Doctor J. R. Davidson. On examination by Doctor John H. Gunn on December 15, 1942, she was found to be in excellent health. Mr. de Stein is using all the persuasive powers at his command to see if something cannot be done in the way of investigation. A statement was published in the papers in which he said that owing to Doctor Davidson his wife was completely cured of cancer and has been living at her home, happy, and in good health. This is the type of record with which the research council will have to deal.

I come now to the case of Irwin Cowan, 202 Brooklyn street, Winnipeg. I give addresses in case some hon. members may wish to write to these people and get their own personal story. This boy was admitted to St. Boniface hospital on July 24, 1936, under the care of Doctor Edwin Corrigan. He had a mass of glands removed from the neck, but no pathological report was made at that time. He returned to hospital in January, 1937, and had more glands removed. A pathological report determined the case as cancer. The patient returned again in December, 1938, and another gland was removed. Since that time he has been under the care of Doctor J. R. Davidson. An X-ray examination on December 2, 1943, conducted by Dr. Wheeler, revealed the boy as absolutely free from cancer. This boy was a patient of Doctor Davidson and is still under his supervision.

Here is another case, that of S. S. Coulter, 212 Maryland street, Winnipeg. This man was referred to the Abbott clinic on October 26, 1939, by Doctor J. R. Davidson. In 1937 the man had an operation for cancer of the lower lip. Another operation was performed in October, 1939, and a third operation on May 22, 1940, when more portions of the cancer were removed. On May 29 the patient was sent home. On December 3, 1943, he returned for examination. There is no evidence of any recurrence either in the lips or in the glands of the neck. The patient is enjoying the best of health and is apparently free from cancer. He has been under Doctor Davidson's care for some years and is still under his supervision.

Here is the case of Mrs. A. MacDougall, of Pembina, North Dakota. She had a tumour removed in 1933. It returned in 1938, and she was again operated on, on October 23, 1939. The pathological report pronounced cancer of the breast. This patient has been undergoing treatment by Doctor Davidson, and an examination by Doctor Wheeler found her free from cancer and in excellent health. I met this woman in Doctor Davidson's office one day, and she told me that she was in perfect health, but that when she came to Winnipeg she always wanted to look up the doctor who had made her well.

Another case is that of Mrs. J. Catton, of 1308 Portage avenue, Winnipeg. She was sent to hospital for operation re cancer in breast. The pathological report was "cancer," and the cancer was removed in July, 1942. Examination in November showed no sign of recurrence and the patient appeared in good health. This is a report by Doctor Neil H. Blakie.

One of my hon. friends advises me I have only two minutes left, and I shall conclude in a moment. I do not wish to take advantage of the good nature of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: Go ahead and finish.

Mr. LEADER I thank hon. members very much for the attention they have given me. It shows deep interest in this subject.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Go on and finish.

Mr. LEADER: Remember that there are thousands upon thousands of people in Canada who are just as concerned about the treatment and cure of cancer as is any hon. member.

What I have had to say is for the purpose of getting definite action and no side-stepping, and let the chips fall where they may. If, after a thorough investigation by a competent tribunal, it is determined that Doctor Davidson has discovered nothing of value, the people should know. We want no false hopes: that is the danger: if there is nothing to Doctor Davidson's experiments, false hopes are being built up in the breasts of many people, and the reaction will be very serious. If, on the other hand, a great discovery has been made, the world should share in its blessing. This is the whole purpose of my remarks.

Mr. McIVOR: Will the hon. member for Portage la Prairie say what is the attitude of the Kiwanis service club toward an investigation and towards support of the work of Doctor Davidson?

Mr. LEADER: The answer to my hon. friend, and it is something I should not have overlooked, is that the Kiwanis club of Winnipeg have set aside a sum of money to help Doctor Davidson in his work over a period of six months. I believe the amount donated was $2,500.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the governments not doing anything?

Mr. HOMUTH: What is the attitude of the government with regard to Doctor Davidson?

Mr. LEADER: The attitude of the government, as far as I can understand, is that this is a proper function of the research council; that they have within the research council a medical council whose duties are to go into these matters. But I am fearful, and I am basing my concern on remarks which I have made this afternoon, that that investigation will not be final. I take this opportunity to ask the government—and I think it is their duty—to undertake a thorough investigation of their own and give the matter all the support which any government can extend to one of the most worthy of causes.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I am sure that all hon. members were glad to hear the opening remarks in the speech from the throne, that war conditions had improved. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leaders of other groups, and also the member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), when he spoke to-day, warn the house that while the situation has improved, the war is not ended. Indeed, far from its being won, there is much fighting and much suffering and there will be many casualties before peace comes.

Like other members of this group who have already spoken in this debate, I welcome the modest programme of social betterment mentioned in the speech. I wish it were as comprehensive and as important as friends to my right fear it is. Possibly they are thinking of it in terms of vote-catching while I am thinking of it in terms of social improvement, which makes all the difference in the world. Some objections have been made in various places to this modest programme of social reform, to the effect that it would detract from the country's war effort. Personally I do not agree with that. In my opinion, not only will it not detract from our war effort but it will do much to improve it.

Defeating Hitler is not the only objective in this war. While that is very important we must also have as an objective the elimination of those conditions that create Hitlers. If we do not remove the cause, other Hitlers will arise. I do not believe that there can be a better time than the present, when the minds of our people are attuned to change, for making social improvements that are long overdue.

I was astonished that there was nothing in the speech from the throne in regard to labour. If it were not realized before, I think it is realized now that industrial relations in this war constitute one of the spots in our whole war effort where we have fallen down. In previous sessions, since the war began I have done my humble best to try to get this government to realize the direction in which we have been moving. No heed was taken of the dangers I was trying to point out. The result is that never has discontent been so rampant as it is at the present time.

Just before coming to Ottawa, along with other members of parliament from the greater Vancouver district, I attended a meeting of the Vancouver, New Westminster and district trades and labour council, affiliated to the American Federation of Labor. In the language of the street, we heard an earful from the three hundred delegates present who represented some 22,000 workers. Since that time I have received resolutions from labour organizations all across Canada denouncing the government's latest wage control order. To put on record what I believe to be the universal attitude of organized labour, I cannot do better than read a resolution passed by the Trades and Labour Council of my own city:

Whereas the new wage control order, P.C. 9384, announced by the government on December 10 following a broadcast on the subject by the Prime Minister, reflects the further intensification of an anti-labour attitude in official government circles that has long stood in the way of implementation of a constructive labour policy in Canada;

And, whereas we are alarmed at the increasing influence over government of big financial interests and large industrialists so clearly demonstrated by many of the orders in council adversely affecting the workers of Canada;

And, whereas said wage control order is in opposition to all the basic principles of the trade union movement and against the recognized principles of freedom and justice;

And, whereas there is a growing tendency of ruling the country by order in council instead of by acts of parliament:

Therefore be it resolved that we urge upon our elected representatives in the dominion parliament the immediate need of them performing the duties for which they were elected and to insist on the reestablishment of the rights of parliament.

Be it further resolved that we most emphatically protest the refusal of the government to heed the expressed wish of labour for a more constructive policy.

And be it further resolved that we hereby demand the immediate withdrawal of the new wartime wage control order, 1943, P.C. 9384, and we hereby authorize President Bengough to make any representations on our behalf, and promise to support him in any action he may recommend us to follow.

That, I believe, is a fair expression of the feeling of organized labour throughout Canada, and I think members of parliament who sit here year in and year out and see these things being done without a word of protest have something to account for to the labour people in the constituencies which those members represent. I believe that members of parliament are beginning to realize this.

I have in my hand this morning's Globe and Mail in which is reported a meeting held yesterday at Hamilton. I am not going to read all that is here reported. I will give two paragraphs that indicate that organized labour is at last receiving some support from their representatives. This report states:

A surprise feature of the rally was the admission by two local Liberal M.P.'s . . .

I will not give their names.

. . . that the members of parliament have not been consulted on such matters.

Mr. MacNICOL: The paper does give their names.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for Hamilton East and the hon. member for Wentworth.

Mr. MacINNIS:

. . . that the members of parliament have not been consulted on such matters.

It goes on to quote what these men said, and it is as follows:

The government is run by a bureaucracy; the members are nothing, and I frankly admit it. If the order had gone through the house it would have been better prepared.

Then the other hon. member spoke along somewhat similar lines. He had a good word to say for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). If it was not a good word it was at least not a bad word. He said:

The Minister of Labour is not as bad as you think he is, but his hands are tied by these men who supposedly guide the destinies of this country.

I have tried to help the Minister of Labour. I am afraid, however, that he thought when I was trying to help him that I was really criticizing him. I wish to say that I was not. I tried to help him privately by advice, but it appears that my advice was not taken. I am not as much surprised as are those members of parliament, or as the representatives of labour at this new order. It is a legitimate successor to all the wage control orders that preceded it, P.C. 7440 of December, 1940, 8253 of October, 1941, and 5963 of July, 1942. Each of these orders took a little bit away from labour and the government got away with it. The government seeing that labour stood for it took a little bit more next time. I have not the time, and it is really not necessary to analyse this new order in detail. Its various points have been touched on by other hon. members, by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) and by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) as well as by other members.

This group has been advocating adequate labour representation on war boards. When the national war labour board was first organized under P.C. 8253, it had nine members—a chairman, four members representing employers and four members representing employees. A year ago that was changed and we had a board made up of three—a chairman, one member representing employers and one member representing the workers. Under the new order the board is composed of six members—a chairman, a vice-chairman, two members representing the public, one member representing the employers and one member representing the workers. Organized labour believes, and I agree, that under this new set-up they have one representative out of six. It may be said that the chairman, the vice-chairman, and the two members representing the public may be taken as representing labour as well as the employers, but from my experience I would say that any person the present government appoints to a board of this kind, if he is not appointed with the approval of organized labour, will have the employer's point of view. I submit that is not the way to give labour equal representation on war boards.

The order is bad in many ways. The machinery for appeals is inadequate. Regional boards have really no power at all in the present set-up. They are merely agents or the puppets of the national war labour board. The regional boards must submit every decision and every finding made to the national board; the national war labour board of itself, without these findings being submitted to it at all, is authorized to review and vary in any way it sees fit the findings of a regional board, and the decisions of the national board become the decision in that particular case.

The hon. member for Vancouver North pointed out for the first time in this house the worst section of this order, namely section 14, which outlines the purposes of the order. I shall read it:

14. It is the purpose of this order

(a) to provide for the establishment of wage rates incorporating therein cost of living bonuses, payable in respect of the rise in the cost of living.

I submit that is not correct. The order does not provide for the establishment of wage rates. They have frozen the present wage rates and incorporated in those wage rates the cost of living bonus. Therefore the first paragraph gives an altogether wrong impression of the purposes of the board.

(b) to stabilize the wage structure in Canada established in this manner in order to maintain stability in prices and prevent increases in the general cost of living; and

(c) to provide machinery for an orderly rectification of any gross inequalities and injustices in wage rates so established, in so far as this is possible consistently with the paramount principle of the maintenance of stability in prices, and this order shall be administered and enforced to give effect to these purposes.

As was pointed out this afternoon, it can be clearly seen that the national war labour board or the regional boards have authority only to deal with cases where gross inequalities and injustices are apparent, but if in the opinion of the board the removal of those gross inequalities and injustices should interfere with the maintenance of the price structure they are to leave them there, they are to freeze inequalities and injustices. It is no wonder that organized labour resents a policy of that kind.

I should like to make this quite clear. As I have said in this house on many occasions, I am not opposed to wage control and price stabilization. I am convinced they are absolutely essential at the present time. I will go farther than that and say that this government is to be commended for its achievements in that regard; but I submit it is not fair and it is not just to put the burden of price stabilization on the shoulders of those least able to bear it—the underpaid workers. That is what this order in council does.

I should like to read a short paragraph from the majority report of the national war labour board in regard to the matter to which I have just referred. The report states that a wage of fifty cents an hour, $24 a week, could not provide a decent or a healthy standard of living for the heads of families. I agree. But this order in council freezes wages not at fifty cents an hour but at thirty-five cents an hour. I should like to point out that it has long been an axiom of the capitalists that in the carrying on of their business they should not have to draw on capital assets. This applies equally to workers. The capital of the worker is his health and energy; and if he is compelled to live, as he will be compelled to live under this order in council, on a wage rate which does not give him a standard of living sufficient to maintain his health and strength, then he is using up the only assets he has. This is the view of the national war labour board, and I suggest to hon. members that they read the majority and minority reports of that board, for they make good reading. I derived a great deal of comfort from reading the majority report, because it bears out almost every contention in regard to labour that I have raised in this house since 1940. At page 17 the report says:

Even in a war economy a policy which consigns human beings to economic serfdom when a large portion of the community escapes it is incompatible with the ideals on behalf of which we are waging war.

I agree with the national war labour board, and I believe the government must agree also. If they do agree, then they will have to do something about it; at least they will have to leave persons working for a wage of less than fifty cents an hour free to negotiate for increases in wages without being tied down by the condition mentioned in this order, of maintaining prices.

I would and could and do take exception to various other sections of the order in council under review. There is the provision forbidding strikes and providing penalties for striking. Personally I do not believe in the strike as a weapon. Sometimes, however, the workers have no other recourse, but I believe that it is a rather unintelligent weapon and that it should be used only under the greatest provocation. But a time comes when workers reach the stage where it makes no difference to them whether they remain at work or go on strike. When that time comes they will strike, I do not care how many laws are on the statute books saying they shall not; and there is nothing you can do about it. It would be just as effective to pass a law saying mules must not balk as to pass a law against strikes, because when the burden becomes intolerable both men and mules will balk.

The order is totalitarian in its conception and, as I pointed out in regard to strikes, it is foolish and cannot be enforced. The sections that place the onus of proof in connection with violations of the order upon employers or employees in my opinion is wrong; I believe it is something new in British jurisprudence, and we should not tolerate it at this time. I believe we should more and more compare our actions with the ideals for which we are fighting; and if we do so we shall find that this practice of placing the onus of proof upon the accused and many of our other practices are altogether out of harmony with our contention that in this war we are fighting for freedom. There is also the provision in the order which gives the national board the right to change agreements, to reduce wages, to change hourly rates to piece work rates, and so on. This takes away the whole function of organized labour to negotiate wage agreements.

In concluding what I have to say on this matter, I suggest to the government that as an indication of its good intentions toward labour it refrain from putting this order into effect on the date mentioned, which I believe is February 15. Further I would suggest to the government and in particular to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that the whole question of the stabilization of wages and industrial relations be referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations. Let that committee, composed of members of this house, hear what representatives of labour and of employers have to say. There is no reason why that could not be done. Officials of the government could appear before the committee, if they wished, and in the presence of representatives of labour outline the difficulties they have to meet. I am sure that if we had a full discussion of these questions some satisfactory means of dealing with them would be found. I also associate myself with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and with the leader of this group that this committee should be divided, that there is sufficient material under those two headings for two committees. I see no reason why a person who is conversant with labour matters would of necessity be conversant with international affairs or vice versa.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was referring to the government's labour policies and their inadequacy in the situation in which we now find ourselves. When one looks back on our labour policy and our labour difficulties since the war began; when one realizes the resistance of employers to collective bargaining, the failure of the government to give labour representation on war boards, the resistance, I believe, of both employers and the government to the inauguration of labour-management production boards, one really feels that we are not progressing very fast. I should like to quote once more from the report of the national war labour board inquiry. I quote from the majority award because it is signed by the chairman and the representative of the employers, although I believe the minority report is just as worthy of consideration. The majority report has this to say:

[Mr. MacInnis.]

To any one with an eye to see and an ear to hear, it must be clear that labour, more particularly organized labour, is suffering from a sense of frustration as far as the war effort is concerned. It wants to take a responsible part in production, the planning of production and the revising of planning when the same becomes necessary.

We expect the cooperation of labour and we do nothing to give labour an opportunity to show that it can cooperate. The failure of the government's labour policy, the failure of the government to understand labour's place in modern production and indeed the government's hostility to organized labour are aptly demonstrated by two orders in council. One of these, recognizing collective bargaining in crown companies, was passed in 1942, in the third year of the war. The other was tabled a few days ago by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin). This order in council sets up an industrial production cooperation board. In the fifth year of the war we have come to the stage where we recognize, at least on paper, the value of labour's cooperation in industry.

I should like to say something about the proposal in the speech from the throne to pay family allowances. There is not much I can say because I do not know exactly what is implied in the reference in the speech. It is extremely vague and we cannot offer an opinion in regard to the particular legislation until we know what it is going to be. But I should like to know if this is part of the government's social security legislation, or is it proposed as a substitute for low wages? From the way it has come up it appears to me that it is a substitute for low wages. In the majority report of the national war labour board two alternatives are set out. Labour must be permitted to bargain up to a certain wage or provision must be made for paying family allowances. If it is the purpose of these family allowances to supplement low wages I am opposed to family allowances.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I can put my hon. friend right; that is not the purpose.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am glad to hear that. That being the case, there is no reason why I should say anything more on the subject at this time. Real family allowances will be supported by the group with which I am associated.

I should like to make a brief reference to a matter which was referred to on Thursday last by several speakers. I refer to the question of refugees and immigration. I think it is disgraceful that such statements should be made in this house. I can understand people who are opposed to Canada's participation in the war making such statements, but I cannot understand people who favour participation in the war rising in their places and saying that we are not going to allow any refugees into this country unless they are examined, not by one doctor or by one board but by a series of boards and doctors. That is not understandable to me. However, I am glad to say that there is another view in this house. I am happy to associate myself with what was said by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck). I should like to read his closing reference to this matter in his speech, and I commend it to those who would put immigrants and refugees in the same position. The one has no relation to the other. The hon. member for Trinity said:

> But aside from the immigration problem, I do believe that Canada should, and I hope will, extend a hand, along with other Christian nations of the world, with a view to saving as many as possible from the fury of the nazi butchers.

That is the kind of attitude that will make this country a nation. We cannot build a wall around ourselves and say that we are going to enjoy all the good things of life; that other people must stay outside. We cannot say to people, "No matter how you are persecuted, no matter how cruel your rulers may be, we will not help you until we look after every last man, woman and child in the country." That is not the way to help the refugees meet their problems. That is selfishness of the very narrowest kind.

In the few minutes I have at my disposal I should like to make some comments on the statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) when he spoke. I am glad to see he is just taking his seat.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have been here all the time.

Mr. MacINNIS: He said that the Progressive Conservative party was the spearhead in the fight against socialism. All I can say to that is that both the spear and the head were conspicuous by their absence in the place where socialism could have been most effectively fought, that is in the by-elections which took place in August last. If that is an indication of the effectiveness of the spearhead, then we feel quite easy about it. He goes on to refer to the policies of his party:

> Our party stands for a programme of rational reform, as opposed to a policy, on the one hand, of rigid reaction, and a policy, on the other hand, of reckless revolution. Our party stands pledged to remove the abuses and reform the present system.

I ask hon. members to take note of these words:

> We will go right up to the precipice on the pathway of rational reform with the C.C.F. or any other party, but at the edge of the precipice we must part company with those who would lose their balance and plunge headlong over the cliff into the unfathomable depths of chaos and revolution below.

I do not know whether the leader of the opposition gave much thought to the figure of speech he used, but it is unfortunate and most peculiar. This is the first time I have heard of reforms leading us to the precipice; I always thought that reforms took us away from the precipice. Reforms were conceded when it was realized that if they were not conceded there would be trouble. The use of the word "precipice" in this connection is very revealing because it indicates a fear of reforms by my hon. friend and his party. They associate reform with danger, and they are willing to go only a certain distance.

Mr. GRAYDON: You taught us that lesson.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, and we will teach you a whole lot more if you will listen. My hon. friend also said:

> Our party stands for a policy of expanding production as the basis of prosperity.

That is fine! We all agree with that. But the fact remains that capitalism can no longer expand. I wonder if it has escaped the observation of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that the only two occasions on which capitalism has been able to give full employment within the last forty years have been in periods of war, and unless my hon. friend proposes a policy of permanent war, capitalism can no longer give full employment.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was there a war in 1919?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, we had just finished one; in fact we had not quite finished it. But there was no war in 1930, and no war from 1930 to 1935 and no war from 1935 to 1939. Yet did my hon. friend or his friends use their opportunities to expand production? As a matter of fact we have reached the fantastic position where a war is necessary for capitalism to give full employment.

Mr. JACKMAN: How about New Zealand?

Mr. MacINNIS: New Zealand has done very well. I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker, and I shall conclude with two or three words. Capitalism is not able and has not been able for years to make full use of the potential productive capacity of the nation. This is only now being realized and admitted by the capitalists themselves. Full employment under the present system is impossible, and so now they insist that private enterprise must have its way, but that the government must meet the problems that private enterprise cannot solve.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Tremblay) and the seconder (Mr. Tucker) of the address. These two members made a notable contribution in the first war and are to-day serving again.

I should also like to offer to the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) my most sincere congratulations upon the very fine address that he made to the house this afternoon. He gave to the members an insight of what our fighting boys overseas are thinking about and the kind of Canada they wish to come back to. This young member is typical of the young Canada of to-day who are serving in the army, the navy, or the air force and writing the name of Canada high up on the scroll of history. This young member is attached to the air force, and I think all hon. members will agree that Canada is especially proud of the boys who serve in the air force. Only a short time ago these were the boys who filled our schools and playing fields. Yet to-day they are flying with silver wings to blast the enemy wherever he may be found, and in their flights they bring hope and comfort to millions of people, now slaves, that the day of victory and peace is coming nearer. It is to that type of young man who represents young Canada to-day that we who stay at home owe so much, and our first duty must be to see that these young men will be fully reestablished and rehabilitated in the peacetime life of this country.

As was well pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver North this afternoon several times during his speech, our boys who are fighting to-day do not want charity; they do not expect charity. All they want is the opportunity to have a stake in Canada, the chance to reestablish themselves in the peacetime economy of this great country. It is quite fitting, therefore, that the speech from the throne should indicate that there is to be a full-time minister charged with the administration of soldiers' affairs.

Another very interesting announcement in the speech from the throne was that at last some further attention is to be paid to mustering-out pay for the men in the armed forces. There have been many debates in this house on the welfare of soldiers returning to civilian life, and members of all parties have indicated their earnest desire that the very best that Canada can do for these young men should be done. Many of the measures passed by this house and many of the measures described in the press indicate in glowing terms the things we are proposing to do, but unfortunately when we see how some of these things work out, we find they are not so satisfactory. An indication of this was given only a week ago to-morrow when the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) tabled in the house two new orders in council whereby the grave injustice in the matter of pay to soldiers in hospital has been corrected. I for one find it very difficult to understand why such a condition was allowed to exist until the first day of February, 1944. The minister must have full knowledge of the many sore spots of which the returned boys complain. But it seems as though the government will never act until they are forced to do so by public opinion through the press. One illustration of that is what happened in regard to Christie street hospital. Hon. members will remember the debate which took place in this house last year. It was not until after that debate and the clamour that arose in the press that any change was made in the most unsatisfactory and disgraceful conditions which existed at that hospital. Canada expects that we shall provide well for our returned soldiers, and I am quite sure that the minister found out through the clamour which arose that the general public was not satisfied with the treatment our boys were receiving at Christie street hospital.

I have learned from my experience in talking to discharged soldiers—and there are many from my section of Ontario who have been in action overseas and who have now returned home—that there are many things of which they complain. As I mentioned before, these men do not want charity; they do not expect any benefit that is handed out in a grudging spirit by the pensions department or any other department of government. These men have a first claim upon the country, and they are legally entitled to full compensation for any injury to their health through either sickness or war wounds. What must any soldier who has served overseas and gone through experiences there far worse than any described in Dante's "Inferno" think when he comes before the pension board and is brushed aside by some hard-hearted official or when he is confronted with a form letter with his name typed on the top and that newly-coined phrase that is now being used on the form letters "pre-enlistment—not aggravated by military service," or when he is told that he has no apparent disability? Our soldiers are entitled to the most sympathetic consideration by the officials of the pensions department. It was not for the kind of treatment that I have described that these young men gave up everything and went overseas to defend freedom. In many cases the long and unreasonable delay in dealing with pension cases is most embarrassing to the soldier. It is quite true that he receives certain benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, but in many cases these benefits are exhausted before his pension claim is adjusted. It is many, many years since the scale of pensions has been revised in any way. Various other benefits, such as pay, clothing, and dependents' allowance, have been increased. Labour has a cost of living bonus; it is enjoying much higher wages than it received before the war. But in the matter of pensions payable to soldiers there have been no changes for years, and I think it is only reasonable and fair to expect that a soldier drawing a full disability pension should have some reasonable increase to cover the increased cost of living.

Many hon. members have spoken about the clothing allowance. I was very glad to hear the announcement of the minister that it had been increased to $65; but, along with other members, I wish to say that in my opinion that is not sufficient. I for one would be much interested in having one of the defence ministers place on Hansard a table showing how the sum of $65 is broken up to enable a soldier to refit himself for civilian life. A soldier while he is in the army is very proud of the uniform he wears. I think the very least we can do is fit him up properly so that when he steps out into civilian life he will still be proud of his appearance, and I do not think he can do so on a grant of $65.

Then there is the question of the amount of pensions payable to officers and men. I have always felt that a soldier, whether an officer or a private, if he should lose an eye or a limb, should receive the same amount of pension. Rank should not affect the award in any way, because both officer and private have to compete in civilian life.

I should like to draw to the attention of the minister of pensions the case of soldiers who have a pensionable disability of less than fifty per cent. On the death of the soldier with a disability of less than fifty per cent his widow does not continue to receive a pension; yet it has always seemed to me that during the lifetime of the husband the pension department recognized the right of the wife. It seems to me that after the death of the husband the wife is more than ever in need of that help.

The hon. member for Vancouver North dealt this afternoon with the matter of the very small rehabilitation grant, which at the present time is only one month's pay and allowances. I was very glad to see the statement in the speech from the throne that this matter is to be investigated, and I sincerely hope that the amount granted will not be small, but liberal, and that when the amount is decided upon the provisions will be made retroactive to cover all soldiers discharged to date.

Each session many hon. members speak of the insurance principle, and I think the minister of pensions will agree that this provision should be reinserted in the Pension Act. I for one have never heard in this house any explanations of why this provision was taken out. Surely a man who served in the army in Canada is entitled, whether on duty or on leave, to the benefit of the Pension Act. It is quite true that under certain amendments—I believe it is section 11—there are compassionate provisions, but I do not think that is enough. They are of a charitable nature, and at the best they are only temporary. There have been many cases where soldiers discharged in "E" category received no pension. To date the number of men discharged from the armed forces exceeds 100,000, yet the number receiving pensions is somewhat between five and six thousand. This seems rather hard to justify, where a man enlists and is placed in "A" category. Hon. members who know anything about the method of the medical examination of a soldier will agree that it is a thorough, rigid and complete examination, including X-ray. If that man is accepted for service and placed in "A" category, and after service in Canada or overseas is discharged in "E" category, it is only reasonable that any disability should be attributed to war service. This is not now the case. Every hon. member must know of many cases where soldiers have been discharged in "E" category and have received no pension. How can any medical doctor, examining a soldier upon his discharge, say, two or three years after his enlistment, that his present disability is not due to war service, when on the medical history sheet there is no record of a disability? Unfortunately, however, the onus is always on the soldier to prove his case. Surely in any case where there is doubt the soldier should receive the benefit of that doubt, and private soldiers should not have continually to fight the pensions department to get their rights.

I have said before in this house, and I repeat, that in my opinion it should never be necessary for any soldier to have to consult his reeve, his mayor, a lawyer, or his member of parliament, in order to prove his case before the pension board and obtain the benefits to which he is entitled. The people of Canada most earnestly desire and expect, I am sure, that every member of the armed forces will receive the most careful and most considerate attention in the matter of pension allowances.

I would like to concur in the proposal made last week by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), that any changes in legislation, or any new regulations affecting the welfare of soldiers or their dependents, should not be instituted by order in council but should be brought before this house for discussion and debate. The new regulations announced a week ago by the minister illustrate the importance of this suggestion, because they will affect the welfare of many thousands of soldiers. Surely this change is of enough importance to be brought before the house.

While some changes for the better have been made, there are still many points to which soldiers object. I would draw the attention of the house to two letters which have appeared in the press throughout Canada, one written by Everett Bristol, district commander of the Canadian Legion, the other by Mr. Williamson, dominion secretary of the Canadian Corps Association, and I wish to quote very briefly from them. In Mr. Bristol's letter he states:

> In addition to unfair discrimination against officers, there are other unsatisfactory features in the new regulations. For example, only those who qualify for the increased hospital allowances whose treatment is "continued without interruption from the date of discharge from the armed forces."
> This may mean that if an officer or man discharged from hospital as fit or on pension has a relapse within a few weeks and has to go back for prolonged further treatment, he will get only hospital allowances instead of and lower than his service pay.
> Further, the new hospital allowances may be continued only for a period equalling that of the man's service or for twelve months following discharge from the forces, whichever is lesser. What has length of service to do with a disability incurred on service? A man may get badly injured early in his training and require months of hospitalization. Surely he is not to be discriminated against unless there has been misconduct on his part.

I quote from the letter by Mr. Williamson:

> In its opinion, no officer or man should be discharged from the service until he has been released from hospital to return to civilian life. Less than this is unworthy of this country and detrimental in the extreme to morale in all the services. Any person disabled by reason of military service should be retained on the strength until his period of treatment is concluded. If, as will be the case with a small minority, men are confined to a hospital bed for the balance of their lives, these men should be encouraged to feel that Canada is mindful of their welfare as long as they shall live. The cheese-paring implication that, after one year, they are to be forgotten will not do.

The minister will be the first one to admit that these provisions, while they correct and improve many of the conditions, are still far from what they should be, and I think he will agree that any soldier suffering any injury is entitled to hospital treatment until he is fully restored to health.

When the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) speaks I should like him to explain to the house the present and future role of the reserve army in Canada. There is no doubt the reserve army has played a very important part in obtaining recruits for the armed forces. The cost of the reserve army must run into many hundreds of thousands a year and the minister should explain how this very large expenditure is justified. He should explain also the present and future role of the home defence army in Canada. This army, whose numbers are between 80,000 and 100,000, is maintained solely for the defence of Canada, and I think everyone is most anxious to know whether or not these men are to be made available for service anywhere in the world. Other hon. members have raised the same point, and the time is long past when the people of Canada are entitled to a public declaration by the government as to the future role of the home defence army; for if these men are to remain in Canada, what is the advantage of continuing to call men for service? To-day men are being called from the farms; schoolboys are being called, as well as men from industry and from the small businesses. Why put these young men into the army if they are to serve only in Canada? The cost of the home defence army must run into hundreds of millions a year, and I hope that the minister will justify this large expenditure if it is the intention of the government to keep these men in Canada. If they are to remain in this country, what was the object of the plebiscite vote? Is the government still afraid of the "no" majority given in the province of Quebec? What about the matter of reinforcements for troops in England? The Minister of National Defence should give the house a very frank and complete statement on the question of reinforcements for the troops in England. To-day, with the invasion hour drawing nigh, there will be great need of many reinforcements, and if the minister feels that the matter cannot be discussed in public, let him tell the members in secret session. What an opportunity to have General McNaughton present—the man who knows more about the matter of reinforcements than anyone else! All members of the house, as well as the citizens of Canada, are entitled to this information.

Let me mention briefly the two tables that appear in "Canada at War," January, 1944, and January, 1943. These tables set out the percentage of enlistments in the three branches of the armed services and also show the number called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. It is the same old story of eight provinces making more than a fair and equal contribution of men to the armed forces and the ninth province lagging behind. An examination of the tables will show the truth of this statement. I would ask the government if this is what it considers equality of service. In fact, I think there is grave doubt about the matter, if the figures in this table are correct, as pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he spoke on Friday last.

I would ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), with reference to military district No. 5, whether young men are not called until they reach the age of nineteen. If this is not correct, then I think the Minister of Labour should explain to the house how the difference in figures is accounted for, because in January, 1943, the male population was shown as 214,300 between the ages of nineteen and forty-five, and yet one year later, when the eighteen year olds are included, it is shown as 214,000. If they are called when they are eighteen the minister should so inform us—or are they not called until they are nineteen? Would the Minister of Labour also amplify the statement he read to the house this afternoon in which he said that some 3,500 men from the province of Quebec had been given permits to cross the border and work in the New England states. This is the first time, to my knowledge, that we have had such a great surplus of manpower in Canada that 3,500 men from one province could cross the line to work in the New England states. It might be interesting to know how many of the 3,500 are of military age and also how many work permits have been granted to men in the other provinces permitting them to cross the line in order to work in the United States.

I concur in what has been said by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) with regard to the new wage order, P.C. 9384, which has given rise to so much controversy. This new wage order was well analysed by the hon. member for York West, who indicated the grave injustices that are being done to labour in particular from the point of view of appeals and the onus of proof. I am amazed that the cabinet should pass such an order. Where is their sense of fair play or British justice when an order is passed which takes away rights which have existed for every British citizen from the time that magna charta was signed at Runnymede? Surely it is well established in British jurisprudence that every citizen has the right of appeal to the highest court in the land. When has the new doctrine come into being in this country that a man must prove himself innocent? Why is it necessary to write into any statute or any order in Canada that the benefit of the doubt is not to be given to the accused? I think every hon. member has a duty to rise and protest against this infringement of rights which has existed for so many years. I, for one, should like the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to explain to hon. members why it was necessary in the fifth year of the war to insert any such clause in any order in Canada. Surely the day is never going to come in this country when the right to appeal to the court or the right of a citizen to be presumed innocent until proven guilty is to be taken away. The inclusion of any such restrictive regulation as that smacks of the gestapo of Germany.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize the following points for the attention of the government:

1. A long furlough for all soldiers on discharge with full pay and allowances.

2. No member of the armed forces to be discharged without being provided with a suitable job.

3. A speeding up in the handling of pension applications.

4. Clothing allowance to be increased from $65 on a sliding scale and made retroactive.

5. The insurance principle to be reinserted in the Pension Act.

6. The provisions of the Pension Act to apply to all soldiers injured on leave in Canada, and a review made of all such cases.

7. Soldiers to have all necessary hospital treatment irrespective of the length of service.

8. Rehabilitation grant to be increased and made retroactive to cover all soldiers discharged to date.

9. That the widow of a soldier who had a pension disability of less than fifty per cent be granted a pension after the death of her husband.

10. Dependent's allowance to a mother to be on the same scale as now payable to a wife.

11. That a review be made by the pension commission of all soldiers suffering from shell shock, mental or nervous cases where no pension has been granted.

12. That the onus of proving that the disability was incurred or due to war service be on the pension commission.

13. That a committee of this house be appointed to review scale of pensions to members of the armed forces, pensions to widows, dependents' allowances, clothing allowances, mustering-out pay and all other matters affecting the welfare of the soldier or his dependents.

14. That the Minister of National Defence tell this house whether or not the members of the home defence army are to be made available for service anywhere in the world.

15. The introduction of a system of calling men for military service whereby all parts of Canada will make an equal and fair contribution.

16. That no policy of immigration be undertaken until such time as proper provision has been made for full-time jobs and the complete reestablishment and rehabilitation of all members of the armed forces and all other Canadian workers.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, prior to the commencement of the present session of parliament and upon several occasions during the debate which is now taking place reference has been made to the fact that the members are engaging too extensively in debate. It would appear to me that there is a definite tendency, or probably I should say a definite effort from some quarters, further to deprive the private members of this house of the opportunity of giving full expression to their thoughts relative to the many matters that come before the house. How could it be otherwise when the members of this house find it so necessary to occupy so much of their time in debate? Why is it that members of the house should be accused of devoting too much time to matters of little consequence? I have given a good deal of thought to this matter and I find that it is wrapped up largely in the following facts. First, we find throughout this country boards actually legislating, such legislation having the effect of law. These boards deal with the most important matters, matters which, in my opinion, should be dealt with by parliament. In the second place, the government have perfected a scheme of mass production of orders in council. These orders in council are being passed not only between sessions of parliament but also during the actual time that parliament is in session. I find therefore that we have to devote so much time to dealing with matters regarded by some as of little consequence because the major issues are decided outside this House of Commons.

I am becoming extremely suspicious of any attempt to curtail the rights of the private members of the House of Commons, whether in connection with debate or in connection with any other matter which may in effect deprive the individual of performing his duties as an elected member of this House of Commons. We find that this dissatisfaction with respect to the actions of the government is not confined to any small group in this house, nor is it confined to any particular cross-section of opinion in this house, because this afternoon an hon. member asserted that two members of the Liberal party during the past two days expressed what I would call almost absolute disgust regarding the attitude of the government in failing to consult members of the house with respect to major matters affecting the country.

In referring to the speech from the throne, I find that emphasis is laid upon the fact that the winning of the war clearly remains the first of all our objectives. With that statement there is no possibility of disagreement. We are as one, I am sure, in that objective. Canadians who still have their feet on the ground and their heads out of the clouds will recognize that we must continue to exert our utmost energy toward an early and successful termination of hostilities. During the past year much has taken place to give us renewed hope and renewed confidence; yet we are certain as we gaze about into the various theatres of war that the road ahead is bound to be long and bound to be rutted. However, we have confidence in the calibre of the men of our fighting forces. That is reflected from the heroic achievements in the various theatres of war, in Italy, over Europe and elsewhere where they are engaged in conflict. If one reflects upon the decorations that have been awarded during the war he will find that every province in Canada has been represented; he will find that those of the various racial origins within the country are represented, as are also the various creeds. The army on the home front and the civilian population have acquitted themselves most magnificently. I refer to the farmers and to the industrial workers, in fact, to all of those engaged in work associated with the prosecution of the war.

The future, though, will depend largely upon the policies instituted by this government and the action the government may or may not take in connection with the prosecution of the war and the preparation now for the post-war period. As to both of these matters I shall have something more to say shortly, but at this point I should like to make reference to a matter which is of extreme concern to me. When fascist Italy was presumed to have capitulated demonstrations took place in many parts of Canada, particularly in that part in which I happen to reside. I do not know under whose direction this was done; I do not know who were responsible for making the people in certain quarters think that in effect the war was over, but that was the feeling. Shortly after, however, when our forces were engaged in such mortal conflict on the soil of Italy, the reaction set in. It was a feeling of distress and discouragement. If I recall correctly some of the demonstrations were called off, but others were carried through. Those responsible for causing the people to believe that in effect the war was over should guard against a recurrence of any such error.

The speech from the throne refers to the various social security measures which the government propose to introduce during this session of parliament. It mentions "a national minimum of social security and human welfare," and later, "such a programme contemplates social insurance against privation resulting from old age." Presumably this refers to contributory old age pensions. One encounters extreme difficulty in restraining himself when speaking on this matter of old age pensions, in dealing with the consideration or lack of it which is given to thousands of our older people, the pioneer citizens of Canada. As all hon. members are aware, within the boundaries of the dominion we have thousands of worthy citizens in the lower income brackets, many of whom are in receipt of meagre incomes insufficient to provide the necessities of life. They are utterly unable to secure employment, and thus must depend upon one of two things: the hopelessly inadequate pension which they may obtain to-day, provided they can prove themselves paupers or provided they have the ability to conceal the truth; or the charity of friends, relatives or others who may take pity upon them. In my view the present Old Age Pensions Act, which was passed by this parliament, and the regulations related thereto, have stained the statute books of this land long enough. I contend that if we are sincere in our promise with respect to social security measures we can prove our good faith by setting out to-day to erase from our statute books the act which now exists, replacing it with one which might be regarded as a Christian act, or by so amending it as to make adequate provision for those people who, all hon. members of this house will agree, at least in private, are deserving of more consideration than they are receiving at the present time. The rates of pension established in 1928 bore no relation at all to the cost-of-living index of that day, nor have they borne such relation at any time since. As I indicated a moment ago, a person who has reached seventy years of age and is able to prove himself a pauper or who has the ability to conceal the truth, may qualify for the pittance we now offer. It is then charged against property owned at five per cent compound interest.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I can have no faith in the intentions of any government until such time as the conditions now prevailing are rectified. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is very well aware of these conditions. On one occasion he said that the war had not banished suffering from this land. On another occasion he said that we could not put forth our utmost strength if we neglected the elementary human needs of the unfortunate and the suffering in our midst. On another occasion he said that the people of this country were committed to the utmost of our strength to the cause of humanity in its hour of greatest peril, and then he declared that we could not afford to forget claims equally pressing upon our generosity and upon our social and individual consciousness. In the light of that; in the light of what we all know is absolutely true, I say we should immediately take the steps necessary in connection with this matter.

Then the speech from the throne says:

> While giving to the needs of the war precedence over all else, my ministers are resolved that, so far as the future can be foreseen, Canada will be in a position to meet the difficult situations which will have to be faced when victory is won.

I assume this refers specifically to our post-war relationships with both allied and non-allied nations of to-day. In my humble judgment Canada stands destined to play a most important role in shaping post-war world relationships. Moreover, I think our success or failure in the role that we shall be certainly called upon to play will depend entirely upon the calibre and motives of the men who speak and act for Canada. The task will not be an easy one; we all know that. But the experiences of the past few decades do cast a most ominous shadow over the future; one need not be a pessimist to realize this. We have fought wars in the past, and each has been more costly and more devastating than the one which preceded it. Between major military wars, minor military wars have been fought; and while those military wars were being fought, and in between them, economic warfare was carried on. I charge that the effects of the economic warfare have been just as devastating as those of military warfare, and in no small way responsible for such warfare. These boys of ours who are fighting on the blood-soaked soil of Italy or who are facing danger over Europe to-day and every day are fighting, it is said, to preserve our democratic institutions and the integrity of the British commonwealth. Others say they are fighting in the hope that after the war will come an opportunity for reestablishment in a land free from war. Third, it is said that they are fighting in the expectation that their sons will not have to pay the supreme sacrifice twenty years hence. I am inclined to believe that we should bear all three of these in mind when considering post-war matters. In referring to the returned soldiers, the speech from the throne states:

> A broad programme has already been developed for the reestablishment of veterans of the present war, and for the care of disabled veterans and the dependents of our fighting men and merchant seamen.

Then it goes on to state that gratuities will be paid to these men of the service. I think all the people of Canada are of one mind as to the men of our fighting forces and the debt of gratitude, transcending any other debt claim which may arise from this war, that we owe to them. We know that the men of our fighting forces are looking to the people at home to see that we make this country worthy of their magnificent courage and unstinting sacrifice and of the ideals for which they are fighting. The carrying out of this obligation rests squarely upon and is the responsibility of all the people of Canada. It is a vital aspect of Canada's war effort, and therefore I find it utterly impossible to agree with those who assert that during the actual prosecution of the war we should be devoting no time to the consideration of and preparation for the post-war period.

In referring to the treatment that we are now according the soldiers who have returned from overseas, may I say that I have been filled with alarm over the fact that many of those soldiers who have come home from the theatres of war have not been given their just desserts. I know that as far as my home district is concerned, too many of these men are having to go to their member of parliament in order to secure what most of them refer to as simple justice. Hon. members who have preceded me have referred to the matter of physical examinations. The speaker who just preceded me indicated that the examinations preceding enlistment are thorough. I am not going to challenge his statement; I am simply going to say that many of the cases which have come to my attention in western Canada have proven the contrary to be the case.

For instance, a lad proceeds to a recruiting depot and is directed to those whose duty it is to give him a physical examination. In a number of cases that have come to my attention the lads have referred to disabilities which were incurred as youngsters, and yet they were categorized as "A1". Later on, following discharge, a lad would be told that his disability is not attributable to or aggravated by war service, that his trouble was due to the disability he had had before. Therefore he cannot secure pension. I contend in all sincerity that if a man is examined as thoroughly as it is indicated he is and is placed in "A1" category and comes out an "E" category man, it is only fair to conclude that his disability was attributable to or aggravated by his war service.

I wonder too about the examinations given to men who are moved from one depot to another, one examination being given before they leave the one place and the other after they arrive at their destination. Being from the west, I find it difficult to use language that would convey to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) what the boys in uniform call that type of examination. Some time I hope to be able to give a description of it to him in person.

Mr. HOMUTH: We have the same language in the east.

Mr. SHAW: It is not parliamentary.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is not parliamentary, but it is nice language.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to refer to some of the cases where men have been injured, let us say while in the performance of duty in the British isles. I will refer to one case which I believe illustrates the point I am trying to make. A man was injured during commando practice. His injuries to his lower abdomen were so severe that it was necessary for his comrades to carry him back from where they were carrying on manoeuvres. He was hospitalized for a lengthy period of time; he was shifted from one hospital to another and was examined by one medical board after another. His disability was diagnosed as being three or four different things. In one instance they called it ulcers of the stomach, but they neglected to add that his stomach had fallen because his disability was low in the abdomen. They had him ready for operation, but shortly before the operation was to be performed they moved him out of the hospital in anticipation of Dieppe casualties arriving, it being just at that time. After he had been moved about for approximately three months he was sent home to Canada to be discharged. Before discharge they confined him in the neurological ward of a certain hospital in Quebec and then discharged him with depressive psychosis, not pensionable. I have no doubt that if any hon. member of this house received treatment of that kind following an injury he would have a disability far more serious than depressive psychosis. If this man has that, the government is responsible.

An hon. MEMBER: Maybe the government has it.

Mr. SHAW: My hon. friend says, "Maybe the government has it." That's possible. There are too many such cases. I refer to one other case. This man went through the Dieppe raid and received a bullet in his spine. He was decorated because even with that bullet in his spine he carried an officer out of the field of battle. He was sent back to Canada to be discharged. He was kept in military district 13, Calgary, for almost a month, until they could find out what they were going to do with him. One day he was paraded before the medical officer who was seated behind a desk. The medical officer asked him how he felt. Most of us in the west say that we feel fine whether we do or not. After a few moments of conversation he was handed a paper. When he walked out of the office and looked at it he found that he was recategorized as "A 1" to be sent back overseas. He got as far as Debert before a friend of his, a captain in the medical corp, discovered him and asked what he was doing there. He told him he was on his way back to England. That young captain prevented his being moved on. He was held there a month, discharged on the spot and told to discover some method by which he could get home.

I am not blaming the minister for these things, but I sometimes wonder what check there is upon some of these individuals who are responsible for cases like these. Why is it that the bulk of the cases I take to the Minister of Pensions and National health are reopened and either higher pensions granted or a pension granted where none was given before? Does that not indicate to the minister that there must be something wrong with the whole system?

Mr. HOMUTH: You must have some pull with the minister.

Mr. SHAW: I would hardly say that. I must say in all fairness that he has been very fair as far as I am concerned. It should not be necessary to bring up such matters as these in this house, but as far as I am concerned these cases are coming much too frequently. Out of those who have come home to my community, too many have had to come to me to have their cases taken up. I presume there are others who did not come to me but endeavoured to secure justice from other quarters.

I wish now to refer to the Progressive Conservative amendment. The first clause (a) refers to the failure of the government "to make adequate provision and to implement promises already made for the immediate needs and employment of the men and women of the armed forces on demobilization." I find myself in a position where I must agree with that. I feel that the government has not done more than enact a measure here and a measure there; it has not laid down any concrete over-all policy to meet the over-all problem which will confront the country upon demobilization. Many existing measures are inadequate. The amendment goes on in paragraph (b) to say:

(b) Failed to provide adequate measures whereby agriculture can make its maximum war and peace-time contribution through a stable and effective long-term programme.

There can be absolutely no disagreement with that. I wonder why it has not been possible for this government to do more than adopt a very short-range policy in connection with agriculture. For instance, in my part of Alberta last fall a serious situation developed with respect to hogs. Due to hail and frost feed shortages existed. It was extremely difficult for them to purchase feed at the prices prevailing. Hog prices fell. Farmers immediately set about to dispose of their breeding stocks. Liquidation took place which has impaired the potential hog production, and I contend that it will be years before the hog producers of areas in the Red Deer constituency will be able to recover the loss which was sustained when they found it essential to dispose of their sows.

Then paragraph (c) of the Progressive Conservative amendment states:

(c) Failed to establish such a national code for labour as will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful place in our national partnership; and failed to provide for the correction of the unfairly coercive and restrictive clauses in the 1943 wartime wages control order;

I doubt if there is a private member of the house who will disagree with the sentiment there expressed. That wage order has been discussed in this house by many hon. members since the debate began, and I agree with what the amendment states. I vehemently disagree with the order that was passed.

Then (d):

(d) Failed to lessen bureaucratic controls and regimentation and to recognize and restore the supremacy of parliament; and failed to halt the continuing infringement of provincial rights and the centralization of authority.

I wonder if Mr. John Bracken has changed his ideas with respect to the Sirois recommendations. Nothing within my memory has been presented in Canada that so seriously threatened the autonomy of the provinces of Canada as did the recommendations of the Sirois report.

Mr. HOMUTH: No.

Mr. SHAW: I answer my Progressive Conservative friend by again expressing wonder: Has Mr. John Bracken changed his attitude with respect to the Sirois recommendations?

Mr. HOMUTH: Not at all.

Mr. SHAW: If he has not, you may as well strike out that clause of your amendment. If Mr. Bracken still holds the same views he did in that regard, this is the strangest proposal ever presented in any Progressive Conservative amendment.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, you do not understand it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Neither do you.

Mr. SHAW: I now come to the amendment to the amendment. I would hardly care to try to convey the impression that by moving to strike out the whole Progressive Conservative amendment the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party are in disagreement with it all, and I am not going so to charge. The C.C.F. party say in their amendment:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that in the opinion of this house Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose the fundamental social changes and economic planning which alone can hasten the winning of the war and make possible the establishment of a post-war Canada capable of providing full employment and complete social security.

I am confounded by that wording; I wonder what it means. The expression "fundamental social changes" may mean anything. It refers to planning. What type of planning? I wonder that the C.C.F. party did not strike out both those expressions and put in "socialism". Why did they not do so? The issue would then have been clear. I have reason to believe that there may have been a good reason for not doing so. When it comes to determining the value of that amendment I must make a decision in the light of what has gone before and in the light of the interpretations that may be put upon a vote one way or the other after the subamendment has been voted on. During the past three months I have become more suspicious, particularly in view of the assertions made by the leader of the C.C.F. party during the byelection in Red Deer, in Alberta.

Mr. DUPUIS: What did he say?

Mr. SHAW: I was so incensed, Mr. Speaker, by what he said that I might have to refer to two or three of his statements. In fact, my people would consider it strange if I did not do so, because, after all, here was the leader of a national party who came into a provincial by-election in Alberta and made the most startling assertions, so startling that I could hardly credit them to him. One of them was that the C.C.F. party was the only party in the House of Commons which had protested against the shipment of scrap iron to Japan. He also said that his was the only party which had opposed the present financial monopoly. His was the only party, he also said, which had consistently opposed fascism. He also said that his was the only party which had a programme which comes out of the people. Then, to cap the whole thing, he asserted that the government of Alberta had given away the resources of the province to private monopoly and corporations; but when he was asked to name one he said, "I am not in a position to know what the government of Alberta has or has not done." I would not accept those statements, if they were merely hearsay, but I drove into the city of Red Deer one night during the campaign and parked my car across from the Crescent theatre and heard the hon. gentleman's voice coming over the loud speaker. As I sat there I took notes. I heard these statements. Others sat with me in the car and heard. So it is not hearsay; it is facts. I say to the members of the C.C.F. party that I deplore that sort of thing. I have always tried to be perfectly fair, and I have not made assertions unless I am reasonably certain that they are correct and that I can support them.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, who won the election?

Mr. SHAW: Of course their candidate was crushed in the election. The Social Credit candidate won.

Mr. HOMUTH: There will be a lot more of them squashed before this thing is over.

Mr. SHAW: My point is this, that had the people of Red Deer constituency not been informed, it is quite possible that they would have accepted these statements as true. I repeat that I deplore the fact that the statements were made, especially by the leader of a national party; one who, I believe, knew better. I might have expected it from certain lesser satellites of the party.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are no satellites. They are just duller stars.

Mr. SHAW: It all depends on the interpretation you put on the word "satellites".

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They are not always lit up either.

Mr. HOMUTH: Some of them can stand a lot of it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SHAW: In supporting the C.C.F. amendment I am not supporting socialism, that is bureaucratic planning.

In the speech from the throne reference is made to the question of foreign trade. That is, to exports and imports. I have given considerable thought to this particular aspect of our national life because, after all, foreign trade has occupied in the past a dominant position in the life of this country. Exports, tariffs and exchanges have caused governments headaches or have been the major worry of governments for decades. Thus far, difficulties have developed with respect to foreign trade because governments have endeavoured to carry on a foreign trade policy by stimulating production within the country, increasing exports from the country, and at the same time erecting tariff barriers to keep the produce of other countries out of Canada. All the while the vain hope existed that unemployment would in some miraculous way cease to exist. Most nations were engaged in an almost identical policy, that of endeavouring to stimulate production by exporting and at the same time erecting tariff barriers to keep out the produce of other countries. We all know that the result has been the most bitter type of economic warfare which the world has ever witnessed, and one which has played no small part in the developments of military warfare, in one of which wars we are at present engaged. While these governments were so endeavouring to export and refuse to import, we witnessed the international discount houses rendering the situation far more difficult by the manipulation of exchanges. We must pray that when this war is over, and even before it is over, as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has so often suggested, our first major concern will be the creating of an effective demand against our own production, exporting surplus production in exchange for the goods of other countries, goods which we may require and can buy and the elimination of the policy which we have been following in the past will do much toward preventing a recurrence of the conditions of war which confront us at the present time.

I had hoped to expand this topic, but I understand that my time has elapsed.

Mr. G. T. PURDY (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should like my first word to be one of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Tremblay) and the seconder (Mr. Tucker) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Of the hon. member who moved the address, I can say that he lived up to the high traditions of his race; of the hon. member who seconded it, that he upheld the splendid reputation which he has built up for himself during the past few years.

I know that the last speaker will pardon me if in my few remarks I do not follow his arguments. He seemed to pick out a few individual cases in an attempt to build up a case against the government, without giving the government credit for the many good works it has done. But probably he was on sounder ground even there than he would have been had he attempted to expound the theories of his group. Hon. members in that section of the house are very sincere types, preachers and teachers, rather critical, but lacking practical experience, and for that reason we from the maritimes cannot follow their strange philosophies.

The speech from the throne, as is right and proper, puts first things first. It refers first to the war, which after all is our main concern, because if we do not win the war there is little good in our planning for the future.

Taking an over-all picture of the war effort of this government, I cannot but feel that each and every Canadian, no matter what his race, creed or political affiliations, must recognize that it has in every possible way done credit to Canada. It is true that some of our people are not taking too kindly to many of the regulations which are of necessity imposed on them. However, as I say, taking a broad view of the matter, I believe that to-day, for the most part, these things are necessary.

In the part of the country from which I come one problem which is staring us in the face is the man-power situation. This situation is such, on account of voluntary enlistments, and of men leaving our province to work in other provinces, or joining the merchant navy, that our pool from which we can draw men for practically any work is now at a very low ebb. I propose to quote one paragraph from a letter from a person who is very close to the national resources mobilization board in our province. He says:

There is no new reservoir to call from now in this province except as they come of age. This is going to mean that from now on to quite a considerable extent men taken into the forces have got to be culled who previously have had postponements.

You have only to be engaged in industry in our province to realize how true that statement is. Men are being called up every day and we have no one to take their places. I cannot quite understand why, in our little province, which has been in the lead in voluntary enlistments, we are still called upon to furnish the same percentage of men under the National Resources Mobilization Act as those provinces which have not furnished the same percentage of volunteers. This is a matter that should be given very careful study by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of National Defence, and I respectfully suggest that the time must have arrived when there should be put into force a system that uses the same yardstick across Canada to bring men into the services. In other words, I feel that after more than three years of applying the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act there should be a more general levelling off in the number of men in the services as between one province and another.

I now come to my own constituency. In that constituency we have a population of roughly 52,000; and while I may be a little generous in my calculations, yet, on the basis of several yardsticks which I will mention later on, it seems to me that roughly ten per cent of our total population have joined the forces in one way or another. This is only an estimate, not based on any information from the various departments, since they do not keep records in this manner, but I take three yardsticks from which I shapp attempt to prove my point to some extent. First, in the county of Hants, with a population of 22,000 one of the newspapers, the Hants Journal, has kept a record of the men and women in the service. That list is in excess of 2,000, and it does not take into account the men in the merchant navy. Let me take another method of measurement. A few Sundays ago, in the church which it is my privilege to attend, St. Andrews United church, Truro, an honour roll was unvieled disclosing 120 names out of 600 adherents. Let me take still another point. The coloured population in Truro numbers 503, and out of that population more than fifty young men have joined the forces. I feel we can find the same situation in any community in the constituency. My point is that our young men and women, irrespective of colour, creed or race, have joined the services in very large numbers, and I am glad to say that practically all are ready and willing to serve anywhere. These young men and women are serving wherever Canadians are in action, and casualties are mounting. Their graves are found in many lands, and there they will rest until the great day when they will be joined by their loved ones and their fellow-warriors, whose last resting place is known only to our Creator. Our duty to the loved ones of those who die is clear, as it is to those who are wounded and to their dependents.

The present government has gone a long way in this direction, and I feel that under the wise guidance of our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) it will continue the good work and improve our pensions and veterans' allowance legislation.

To those who return in health we also owe a deep debt of gratitude and we must see that the Canada to which they return is a Canada worthy of the high ideals for which they are fighting. They do not want charity. They do not want to be wards of the state. They do not want to be regimented pawns in a socialistic state. They want an opportunity to work and live in a country of free enterprise where initiative will bring its rewards. We must see that they have this opportunity, and as long as I am a member I pledge my efforts along these lines and trust that the government will lose no time in bringing in the necessary legislation.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the days of ancient Rome when Horatius kept the bridge he was rewarded, together with his fellow-warriors, and Macaulay has commemorated it in the following lines:

> They gave him of the corn-land,
> That was of public right,
> As much as two strong oxen
> Could plow from morn till night;
> And they made a molten image,
> And set it up on high,
> And there it stands unto this day
> To witness if I lie.

In this enlightened age we cannot do less; indeed, we must do more for our enlisted forces.

I will now deal for a few minutes with the peace-time programme outlined in the speech. Coming from the maritime provinces, I shall no doubt be expected to raise the cry of maritime rights. You have not heard much of this in the last few years, but I will say that while that cry has been allowed to rest during the war it is not dead. Perhaps you will expect me, coming as I do from the little province of Nova Scotia, to speak of ships and sailormen, of the present-day equivalent of the wooden ships and iron men of confederation days, or of fish and fishermen. The land of which I am now speaking is referred to by another poet, Bliss Carman, in these lines:

The tides go out, the tides come in,
With the breath of the living sea.
And what will they take in trade again
From the ports of Acadie?

The freshening wind and the saving salt
They bring from the outer vast,
To mould and quicken the men they need
To serve their Lord at last.

Then get you down to the sea, my lads,
And go you forth, my dears,
You have reaped the tide, you must sow the tide,
As it was these thousand years.

Certainly in this crisis our young men have gone down to the sea wherever the opportunity has presented itself. However, I will not speak of these activities of our province. I will leave it to members who are better qualified to speak on ships and shipping. I do wish, however, to take as my text this evening—perhaps you think I am going into the poets—a few lines from Longfellow's "Evangeline":

Giving the village its name, and pasture to flocks without number.
Dikes, that the hands of the farmers had raised with labour incessant,
Shut out the turbulent tides; but at stated seasons the flood-gates
Opened, and welcomed the sea to wander at will o'er the meadows.
West and south there were fields of flax, and orchards and cornfields
Spreading afar and unfenced o'er the plain; and away to the northward
Blomidon rose, and the forests old, and aloft on the mountains—

And then along a little further:

Late, with the rising moon, returned the wains from the marshes,
Laden with briny hay that filled the air with its odour.

I quoted that, Mr. Speaker, because I wish to refer to the marsh-lands of Nova Scotia, and this is my introduction. My constituency has over a hundred and fifty miles of shore along the Cobequid bay and Minas basin. This country was settled by the Acadians and is very close to the village of Grand Pré made famous by Longfellow's poem. We have splendid farming lands in the valleys of the rivers running into this bay and into Minas basin and also into Northumberland strait. I make this explanation because it is often thought we have in Nova Scotia very poor agricultural land. However, we must remember that the lands I have referred to were settled back in 1655 and have been producing crops for more than three hundred years. Where the dykes have been kept up and the ground properly looked after there is no sign of the crops lessening. I give that explanation because we often hear of areas in the west subject to soil drifting where there have been crop failures following a few years of cultivation.

What I should like to propose to-night is a five-year plan for the rehabilitation of agriculture in Nova Scotia. It is true it is an ambitious programme; however, I think it is a programme that would produce excellent results. I break this programme into six parts. Much has been said in this house with respect to our marsh-lands. My proposal would be to expend $200,000 a year for five years to bring our marsh-lands back into a productive state. I would propose a further expenditure of $150,000 a year for five years to build up a system of small abattoirs and cold storage plants situated at various points throughout the province. At the present time we have no abattoir and very few cold storage plants. Any slaughterings that are to be marketed under government inspection must be done outside the province.

I come now to another item of $100,000 for five years to control flood conditions on our streams. The rush of waters in the past years, brought about to some extent by heavy timber cuttings on our mountains, has destroyed hundreds and hundreds of acres of splendid land. I would propose the expenditure of $50,000 a year for five years to encourage the raising of sheep in our little province. Textile experts in the town of Truro tell me that Nova Scotia wool is the best they can get anywhere for the work they have to carry on. They tell me that the fleece is heavier than the fleeces of sheep produced in other sections, and that the wool is stronger. Nova Scotia lamb requires no words of mine to advertise it because it has a market in the United States, in Ontario and in Quebec; in fact there is a great demand for it. I would propose $50,000 a year for five years be spent to bring our people into the growing of flax. I was talking to two experts from the federal Department of Agriculture and they say they have in their possession wonderful linen made from flax grown in Nova Scotia. May I refer again to experts from the textile mills in my constituency. They tell me that the soil and the climate of Nova Scotia are excellent for this class of agriculture. I have one more suggestion to offer and it is in regard to our farm woodlots. Many of our farmers have woodlots adjoining their farms. In the old days they would sell their timber en bloc; an operator would come in; he would cut what was on the woodlot, and it was fifty or sixty years before the farmers got another crop. My idea is that we should spend $50,000 a year for five years to teach our farmers how to crop their woodlots. That would give them a steady income each year instead of a few thousand dollars one year and nothing in the next fifty years.

This programme is, as I said, rather ambitious. I suggest the expenditure of $3,000,000 in Nova Scotia extending over a period of five years. However, that is very, very small when we compare it with the expenditure made on agriculture in western Canada. We have no objections to that in Nova Scotia, but we think our farmers should be given the same treatment. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act there has been over $16,000,000 spent in the past eight years, an average of something over $2,000,000 a year. If that was the only claim I had in asking for this $3,000,000 for my province, perhaps I would not feel satisfied that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who comes from down our way and keeps of course very close watch upon the purse-strings, would give it to us; but I propose to try to show to the minister that under our present system of taxation we would only be getting back what we are paying in. Under the dominion-provincial agreements, income tax and certain corporation taxes have been taken away from the provinces in an effort to level out the tax structure in the various provinces.

I will attempt to show that under our present system we in Nova Scotia are contributing a greater proportion of the taxes than are some of the other provinces. In other words, if we could obtain $600,000 a year for five years we would, under the present differential in taxation, be getting back only what we are paying into the federal treasury in excess of some of the other provinces. That seems like a big statement. To prove my point I shall mention first the sales tax on electrical enegry. That tax is only eight per cent, it is true, but it is based on the dollar amount of the bill; and with electrical energy in Nova Scotia costing twice as much as it does in most Ontario towns it means that the ordinary individual in my province pays some twenty cents a month or $2.40 a year more than he would pay for the same amount of electrical energy in Ontario. Assuming that we have sixty or seventy thousand outlets, that would mean somehting like $150,000 a year to begin with. Then I have something else to add. Under the dominion-provincial agreements the gasoline tax was guaranteed to the various provinces at a fixed rate. In Nova Scotia we imposed a very high gasoline tax as well as a very high licence fee for motor vehicles in lieu of income tax. Our good friends in Ontario and the other provinces were very fortunate. It is true that they had a personal income tax, but they did not have as high a gasoline tax, nor did they have to pay as much for their automobile licences. Here are just two examples. In Nova Scotia the annual licence fee for a Chevrolet coupe is $20.09. In Ontario I could licence that car for $7. For a two-ton truck, licensed for 16,000 pounds, the fee in Nova Scotia is $152, and in Ontario, $17.50. In Nova Scotia the gasoline tax is ten cents a gallon; in Ontario it is eight cents. That differential may be all right in the case of companies which are allowed to deduct these taxes before they file their income tax return, but think of the position of an ordinary person like a member of parliament or a salaried individual. He must pay a greater tax on electrical energy; he must pay a greater licence fee for his car and more for his gasoline. At a rough estimate I would say that in filing our income tax returns we are probably at a disadvantage of some $40 or $50 a year in non-deductible items, as compared with Ontario.

There is another item in connection with which I believe the federal government has guaranteed provincial revenues; that is, in revenue from liquor sales. In Nova Scotia, again in order to avoid personal income tax, we had a higher rate of provincial profit on liquor sales. To-day I am told that for a twenty-six ounce bottle of a fair brand of Scotch an individual in Nova Scotia must pay eighty-five cents more than he would in Ontario. If he buys two bottles a month he would be worse off to the extent of $1.70 a month or approximately $20 a year than his opposite number in Ontario; and again that is an item which is not deductible from the income tax. So I say that if we should figure out these various items we would find that the little province of Nova Scotia, under these differentials as compared with the big province of Ontario, is contributing enough to the federal treasury to permit the Minister of Finance to refund that $600,000 a year for five years, and I hope he will take that suggestion under advisement.

I am only a very ordinary individual, Mr. Speaker. I do not claim to represent the people of Canada as a whole, but from time to time I try to present the views and rights of my constituents to the house and the various members of the cabinet. If in so doing I sometimes run contrary to the ideas of the government, that is my misfortune. Nevertheless I act on conviction, which in my opinion is the only basis upon which a true democracy can exist.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate

I should like first to compliment the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I hope that in their caucuses and their councils they will endeavour to see that the government bring down measures which are adequate with respect to the matters mentioned in that speech. Too often the speech from the throne has been like the advance billing for the circus which used to come to my town every year when I was a boy. That billing promised great things, but the performance seldom lived up to the advance notices. I hope the legislation brought down by the government to implement the speech from the throne will be adequate. If it is, the government may rest assured that they will receive the support not only of their own party but of all parties in this house. However, if it brings in only palliatives or half-way measures, then it will receive the criticism which it deserves.

In the speech from the throne the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicated that this might be the most serious year of the war as far as our effort is concerned, that we might expect more casualties this year than in the preceding four years of this conflict. I believe that to be so; I think the fighting in Italy would indicate that this is a probability. I do not propose to-night to deal with our war effort; I believe that can be dealt with better after we have heard the ministers of the various war departments and have their programme before us. However, I should like to deal with one matter mentioned in the speech from the throne; that is, the setting up of a department of veterans' affairs. I believe this is a measure which will receive support from all sides of the house. Up to the present time there appears to have been a great deal of confusion among the men discharged from the army. Unless they were sent direct to the Department of Pensions and National Health apparently they had no idea of the various measures which had been provided for their rehabilitation, and as a consequence we as members of this house had them coming to us for information which they should have been given before discharge. When this new department is set up I would hope that the files of all men discharged will be transferred to it, and that the department will see that this information is available to the men in order that proper use may be made of it.

One matter to which I believe the department should give attention is the setting up of convalescent homes for our soldiers whose injuries are not such that they require hospitalization. Our hospitals are going to be crowded, and many cases could be dealt with in convalescent homes. Just recently I had a case brought to my attention. This man served three years in the last war, enlisted during the first months of this war and served two years, one of which was overseas. While over there he had a hemorrhage as a result of stomach ulcers and was sent back to Canada. He was sent to the pension board and his disability was indicated as thirty per cent, six per cent due to war service, and he was given a pension of $3.70 a month. He returned home and began working in the local creamery, but after two months work he had another hemorrhage. The local doctor told him it would be necessary to have six months complete rest on a special diet before he would be fit to work again. This man has a wife and two children and he is expected to take six months rest with no worry on $3.70 a month.

There should be convalescent homes to take care of cases like this where men could be sent on full pay and allowance until they were ready to again take their places in civilian life. There will be a number of nervous cases from this war. The strain on men in the air force and in the other mechanized units of our army is much greater than it was during the last war, and there should be some place where these men could be sent to have a real rest among congenial surroundings until they are able to take their place in civilian life. I suggest that the department of veterans' affairs make an effort to establish convalescent homes in Canada immediately.

Another matter with respect to our army to which I should like to refer is that of the home defence army. Many hon. members have referred to this and I must say that I agree with them. We have some 80,000 men in this army who are not available for overseas service, and this at a time when the war has changed from a defensive to an offensive war. This condition does not make common sense. These men should either be available for overseas service or be given their discharge and made available for useful service in civilian life. I suggest that if they are given their discharge they should automatically go into the reserve army so that they would continue to receive part-time training and the authorities would know exactly where they are should they be needed again. There are several industries in Canada where man-power is needed. Agriculture certainly needs more men, so does lumbering and our pulpwood industry. Unless these men are to be available for overseas service I contend they could contribute more to our war effort in civilian life than they are doing to-day.

To-night I propose to deal mainly with agricultural subjects. There is very little with respect to agriculture contained in the speech from the throne, the only mention being the intention to establish floor prices for agricultural products. I think most of us will agree with that; I only hope that the floor is not so full of trap-doors that most farmers in this country will find themselves in the cellar before two or three years have passed. That is the kind of policy this government has had in connection with agriculture ever since the beginning of the war. It has been a minimum policy.

The only advance there has been in prices of agricultural products has occurred after organized agriculture has made a definite fight. That is what happened with respect to butter prices. It was only after the organized agriculturists of this country had put up a tremendous fight that we got any advance in butter prices. The same with beef prices and again with grain prices. Hon. members from all sides of the house have endeavoured to direct the attention of the government to the prices being paid for grain in western Canada and to the fact that they were entirely inadequate. Large delegations came here from western Canada to place these matters before the government, but no action was taken until this fall. Apparently two by-elections in western Canada had more influence on the government than all the rest of the members. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) and the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) upon having done more for the farmers of western Canada than we had been able to do in the four years previous.

I do not like the phrase "floor prices"; I would rather call them "basic prices". Any price that is established for agricultural products must take certain essential things into consideration. First, such price must be sufficient to enable the farmer to pay a fair wage to his help and to his wife and family if they have to be used to produce the products which we need during this war. For ten years before the war and for the first three years of this war agricultural prices were at such a level that the farmer in all parts of Canada was able to produce only because he was using the unpaid labour of his wife and family or paying wages to his help which were a disgrace. I hope that in establishing a basic price for agricultural products this matter will be taken into consideration.

Any basic price for agricultural products should be sufficient to enable the farmer to have a decent home and home surroundings. I have seen sections in many of our cities where better homes were needed, but I have seen nothing quite as poor as some of the homes in some of our agricultural districts, especially in northern New Brunswick, northern Ontario and northern Saskatchewan. If a thousand of those homes could be placed adjacent to one of our cities there would be such a howl of public opinion raised against them that something would have to be done. However, because they are scattered and very few people see them we have allowed them to exist as a disgrace to this country for the last twenty years. This basic price should be sufficient to permit the farmer to have the necessary electrical equipment and other amenities of life now available to many of his brothers in the city.

This basic price for agricultural products should be sufficient to permit the farmer to have decent educational facilities. Here again I know that if I could bring a thousand of the schools I have seen in agricultural districts and place them adjacent to one of our cities there would be such a howl of public opinion that something would have to be done. But again, simply because they are scattered throughout the country and few people see them we allow them to exist.

Any basic price established for agricultural products should be such as would provide decent medical attention for the farmer and his family. For the past number of years there has been only a very poor type of medical attention available to the farmer. While it may be partly due to the war, the fact is that there are many districts in Canada where proper medical attention is not available. Many of our medical men are now serving in the navy, army and air force. Our country doctors have been the most abused group of people in our dominion. They have travelled for miles over bad roads in all kinds of weather, giving what service they could to our people and very often receiving only from forty to fifty per cent of the worth of their services because of the prices being received for agricultural products. Again I say that in the establishment of a basic price for agricultural products the matter of medical attention should be taken into consideration.

I feel that basic price for agricultural products should be a price that will fluctuate with the cost of production. If it is established as a floor that cannot be varied, then if the cost of production rises it is no longer a floor but a cellar. So I say that the price should fluctuate with the cost of production.

I feel certain of this, that if we are to have anything like full employment in Canada after the war, we must give to the people of this country the ability to purchase the goods they need, and I know of no greater market for goods than our agricultural areas. We talk about export markets. Export markets are very fine, and we need them. But our home market, after all, is our greatest market. With twenty-five per cent of our people engaged in agriculture, there you have a tremendous market in satisfying their needs for goods. We need better homes; we need electrification. What would it mean to Canada if instead of ten per cent of our farms having electricity, ninety per cent of them had that boon? What a demand there would be for electrical equipment in Canada! It would put thousands of people to work in our factories producing the goods we need on the farm.

Our farm equipment in Canada has also become depleted during the war. To-day it is not modern by any means. If we receive a basic price for agricultural products we shall be able to modernize our farm equipment, and that will mean employment for thousands more of our people in Canada.

Another matter with which I wish to deal is referred to in the speech from the throne, which states that it is the intention of the government to establish an industrial bank. Apparently the government is going into the banking business. We in this group have stated that we believe in the nationalization of the banking system. But we do not believe in doing it piecemeal as the government proposes to do it. The government proposes in the speech from the throne to establish an industrial bank. If it is going to establish an industrial bank, why not an agricultural bank too? Agriculture needs credit even more than industry does. Agriculture has always paid more for its credit than industry has, from 50 to 100 per cent more, and it will continue to pay more for its credit unless something is done about it. We in this group believe that credit should be made available to agriculture at approximately 2½ per cent. This government is borrowing millions for war purposes at 1½ per cent, and surely one per cent would be a sufficient charge for the distribution and collection of agricultural credit. So I say that if we are to have an industrial bank, we should also have an agricultural bank, and see that credit is made available to agriculture at a price that agriculture can afford to pay. That bank would extend long-term loans. We in this group believe that, so far as short-term credit is concerned, probably the encouragement of the credit union movement in this country would serve the purpose. Credit unions are growing by leaps and bounds, and we believe that with proper encouragement they might be able to take care of a large part of the short-term credit needed by agriculture.

If we fail to establish a basic price for agricultural products and to provide credit for our farm industry I am afraid that the ownership of our farms and homes in Canada will pass out of the hands of those who own them and are farming to-day. Very few people realize just how quickly ownership has been passing from the people in Canada during the last forty years.

I have some statistics here taken from the 1941 census and from the Economic Annalist for October, 1937, with regard to farm tenancy in Canada. They indicate that in Manitoba the drop in farm ownership has been about 25 per cent; in Saskatchewan 45 per cent, in Alberta 34 per cent, in Ontario the percentage is now almost 48 per cent lower than in 1901.

In the matter of urban home ownership we find that over 48 per cent of the homes in Canada are rented; ownership has passed out of the hands of the occupants of these homes. These statistics also indicate that for the rural areas, farm and non-farm, the percentage occupied by tenants in 1941, when the last census was taken, was 24·4; for farm homes alone, 18·8 per cent; and for rural non-farm homes 33 per cent. In urban centres, which includes even villages with less than 1,000 people, 58·8 per cent of the homes were occupied by tenants. In cities of 30,000 and over, two-thirds of the homes were in this category; in cities of 15,000 to 30,000, and smaller centres of 5,000 to 15,000, about 53 per cent. Taking all urban centres of 15,000 and over combined, almost 65 per cent of the homes were occupied by tenants.

I shall not take time to read the figures for all the provinces but I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that with the consent of the house I might be allowed to place these two tables on Hansard because they give a complete picture of home and farm ownership in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to place these tables on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. WRIGHT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The tables follow:

We in this group have been accused of intending to take home ownership away from the people and of intending to take away the ownership of farms from the present occupants of farms. Some people have gone so far as to say that while we may not do it now, immediately the present owner of the farm dies the farm will not be allowed to pass on to his son or to whomever else he wills it. That has never been the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, nor is it to-day. The policy of the C.C.F. party is one which is designed to give home ownership back to the people, homes which have been stolen from them through the capitalistic and monopolistic system during the past fifty years. As indicated by the tables which I have just placed on Hansard, that ownership has been gradually declining, and if we allow the present trend to continue for another twenty-five or thirty years we shall find that from seventy-five to eighty per cent of our people will become tenants, and as a result we would have drifters in our agricultural areas.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do the tables which the hon. gentleman has just placed on Hansard show the number of tenants as compared with the number of home owners in eastern Canada?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, the figures are given by provinces. As a matter of fact it will be found from the tables that there are only two provinces in Canada in which ownership is as great as it was in the year 1901, and those two provinces, if I remember aright, are British Columbia and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since these tables are being put on Hansard I think we ought at least to be told what is the proportion of tenants to owners in Ontario.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is shown in the table. I would not give it off-hand, not having the table in front of me just now, but it is indicated in the return which has just been tabled. I may say that the increase in tenantry in Ontario, if I remember correctly, in the last ten years has been eight per cent.

Mr. WEIR: As a matter of information—if the hon. member will excuse me—in the figures he has placed on record is there any weighted consideration given to the trend to living in large apartment blocks and moving into central places in cities and towns?

Mr. WRIGHT: There are figures given with regard to the various cities. I do not think they are broken down to the extent that the hon. member is inquiring about, but only with respect to the size of the various cities. But they are comprehensive, and well worth studying as an indication of a trend which is going on in Canada to-day, a trend which we in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believe should be stopped, and which, if our programme is put into effect, definitely will be stopped.

There is one other matter with which I wish to deal, namely the cooperative movement in Canada. We of the C.C.F. believe not only in private ownership of your home, your farm, and your small business, but we believe that another type of ownership which is to be commended in this country is cooperative ownership.

Mr. GRAYDON: You fellows must be capitalists.

Mr. WRIGHT: No, we are not. I will explain to my hon. friend in a moment the difference between capitalism and cooperation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about the viewpoint of your colleague in the Ontario house?

Mr. WRIGHT: If the hon. gentlemen will wait to make their speeches until I am through, I shall be delighted.

As I have stated, we believe in the cooperative movement. In Canada that movement has grown by leaps and bounds during the last number of years. I have here statistics which show that in the year 1942 the reported membership of the cooperatives in Canada exceeded half a million, and the aggregate business was over $250,000,000. Reserves and surpluses reached the high point of $46,000,000 and the working capital position showed general improvement. This is according to A. E. Richards, who is head of the extension department. The cooperative movement is, I believe, the only thing we have in Canada to-day which is a real block to the growth of monopoly capitalism, and as such it should be encouraged by any government in this country. The people who are opposed to the cooperative movement to-day are joining forces to try to stop the growth of that movement. I have in my hand a copy of the Maritime Co-operator for February 1 of this year. In it, Professor MacDonald, speaking before the Nova Scotia Credit Union league on January 12 and 13, makes this statement:

> In the United States big business had already formed an anti-cooperative league, pooling thousands of dollars in an attempt to smash cooperative enterprise. Similar efforts, he declared, were already gathering strength in Canada advocating a return to unregulated free enterprise, which he called "a system of free exploitation, favouring the ousting of government control."

It is beyond me how any person can in the same breath say that he believes in competition and capitalism and that be believes in cooperation and cooperatives. Such people are either ignorant of the true meaning of cooperation or they are deliberately trying to mislead.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) wished to know the difference between cooperation and capitalism. The cooperative way of doing business is the direct opposite to the competitive way. Cooperation emphasizes service and equality; competition emphasizes profits and special privileges. We need in Canada to-day a dominion cooperative act which will coordinate the cooperative movements throughout the dominion. We have in many of our provinces fairly good cooperative acts; and I hope that this government will see fit to bring down a cooperative act which will clarify the position of the cooperatives in Canada in many respects, especially in the matter of taxation. At the present time the pools in western Canada are in a position where they do not know whether they are to be taxed on their earnings during the past number of years, and it places them in a serious position, and one which should be clarified at the earliest possible moment. We have in western Canada also the first co-operative oil refinery established anywhere in the world. It has been doing a fine piece of work as far as western Canada is concerned. It was established some eight years ago with a capital of approximately $32,000; and to-day, after eight years of operation, it has assets of a million and a half dollars, and last year did a business worth two and one-quarter million dollars. Not only has that cooperative been able to build up that capital during this past eight years, but it has reduced the price of petroleum products to the farmer in western Canada to the extent that the savings in one year on one section of land farmed with mechanized equipment are over three hundred dollars, that is compared with what it would have cost the farmer had that refinery not been established. That is a remarkable showing, and our cooperatives should be encouraged in every way possible.

The fourth point which I wish to bring to the attention of the house is the matter of establishing marketing boards in Canada. I believe we should have a dominion marketing act under which we can establish boards for the marketing of various farm products in the dominion, and the act should make it possible that, where sixty to sixty-five per cent of the growers engaged in the production of any particular farm product agree that they should have orderly marketing through the marketing board, it would be compulsory for all that product to be marketed through that board. I believe that is the only way in which we shall be able to obtain orderly marketing in the dominion. As long as small groups of people are left free to disturb the orderly marketing of a particular product because they do not agree to go into that marketing board, I do not think we can have orderly marketing. The greatest factor which is operating against the orderly marketing of farm products in Canada to-day is the surpluses which we may have from year to year on account of weather conditions. We often find that, with very small surpluses existing, products are dumped on the market by a few people and the market for those products destroyed. I believe that there should be marketing boards controlled by the growers themselves, in conjunction with an export marketing board which would take care of the surpluses which may occur from year to year, and which, after all, we need. We should not draw the line too close in Canada so as not to have a surplus, because we do not know what the weather man has in store for us. This surplus should be taken off the market by the government board and processed and kept as a reserve against years of crop failure, or it should be made available for export to countries where there are deficiencies. In Hot Springs, Virginia, about two months ago, there was a conference with regard to the supply of food to countries in which there are deficiencies, and the surpluses which we may have in Canada from year to year, now that we have dehydrating plans and we know more about quick-freezing, could be processed and made available to these other countries instead of becoming a drug on the market in our own country, thus destroying the price system which may obtain at the time.

I believe also that we should have in Canada a programme whereby we might have a reserve of non-perishable products such as grains against any year of drought or a series of years of drought, and the best place in which such products can be stored is right on the farms where they are grown. Under the present system we are taking these grains and storing them in large terminals hundreds of miles away from where they are grown, and if we should have a drought in Western Canada again, or two or three years of drought, we might find ourselves in a position where we would be hauling grain again for seed and feed for the farmers. In the United States they have established such a system as I have suggested. They store grain right on the farm. There is no reason why the same thing cannot be done in Canada. If it were done it would be the best insurance we could have against crop failure and it would give a sense of security to the people living on our farms.

We have a modified form of crop insurance in Canada under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That act has served a very useful purpose; but unfortunately, like practically everything else the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has had anything to do with, we find that the operation of this scheme has become riddled with political patronage, thereby destroying in part at least its usefulness. I believe that not only should we have crop insurance for western Canada but that this crop insurance should be made available to any group of growers of any particular agricultural product who want their crops insured. It might very well be made available to our tobacco growers, or our potato or apple growers, and the cost of that insurance should be taken into consideration in the establishing of basic prices for agricultural products in Canada. There is no other line of industry where the cost of insurance is not written into the price of the goods it produces, and that should apply to the insurance of agricultural products. Any basic price established for agricultural products should be a price which has taken into consideration the cost of insurance of that crop. If we had that type of scheme in Canada it would give more permanency to agriculture.

Another scheme which has been developed by this government and which has been a very good one is the prairie farm rehabilitation scheme in the west. This has been the first attempt by any government on any large scale to rehabilitate land in Canada. No one who has followed the course of land settlement in Canada during the past one hundred years can fail to be saddened by what has taken place.

Mr. GARDINER: Any politics in that?

Mr. WRIGHT: I am afraid there is considerable politics in prairie farm assistance.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a pretty good outfit.

Mr. WRIGHT: I will say this, however. They have done good work, and the scheme inaugurated is something that should be encouraged and extended not only to the area in which it is operating in western Canada but to the whole of the west.

Mr. GARDINER: What is wrong with politics anyhow?

Mr. WRIGHT: Politics as some people play it is not so hot. That scheme should be extended to cover all the western provinces, and there should be set up in conjunction with it another scheme in the east to cover Ontario and Quebec, and one for the maritime provinces, because there is absolute need of the rehabilitation of farm lands in this country. One hundred years ago our people came to this country and settled in the maritime provinces and Ontario. No direction whatsoever was given them. They took up land wherever the land companies could secure it and sell it to them. Land was cleared that should never have been used for agricultural purposes. The result was that those people were able to live for a few years on those farms where they established homes, but because the land should never have been used for agricultural purposes they had to abandon those homes.

Travel throughout Ontario and the maritimes and see these places. Every one represents not only an abandoned farm but lost hopes and ambitions on the part of those who settled on them. We allowed people to go to western Canada and there the same process was gone through They settled on land and after a few years found it was worthless as far as agriculture was concerned, and people left the south of the province and came to the north. This is my criticism of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, that people were allowed to come from the south and settle on the same kind of land in the north. I know of thousands of people who have been brought from the south of the province and established in the north and in twenty years from now they will find themselves in exactly the same position as they were in before. The land is not fit for agricultural purposes. We have had land surveys in Saskatchewan and they have served a useful purpose, but the information has not been disseminated with regard to the land and we have allowed lands to be settled which should never have been settled.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not wish to trespass any longer on the time of the house and therefore I will leave for another occasion what I intended to say now. At that time I may be able to deal more fully with the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. WRIGHT: No. What I have to discuss will take a good deal of time.

Mr. L. P. LIZOTTE (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this session the view seems to prevail that speeches could very well be shortened as much as possible so that contemplated measures might all the sooner be put into execution. I am heartily in accord with that idea, and, as usual, I shall be quite brief in the remarks I wish to make.

At this stage of the proceedings, we must ask ourselves whether it is convenient, in the interest of the Canadian people as a whole and of our constituents, to support generally the policy outlined by the government in the speech from the throne, which we are now considering. For the present, we must confine ourselves to the principles set forth, reserving the right to discuss each measure and to consider each proposition on its merits as soon as the details are communicated to us.

Ever since I have the honour to be a member of this parliament, I have endeavoured to consider in a spirit of honesty and independence all problems in their true light, and to approve or disapprove of them conscientiously, outside of all personal or party considerations.

Of course, that is not the best method for avoiding difficulties, but it is the safest way of being at peace with oneself and keeping the confidence of those who have entrusted their interests to us.

Without any further preliminaries, I do not hesitate to state that we should be unfair if we did not congratulate the government, as warmly as we have sometimes opposed certain measures, for the splendid programme they have outlined for the present session of parliament. The proposals which are being laid before us are so timely that they can seemingly gain the almost unanimous support of this house. As was to be expected, the government's opponents, who are here for the furtherance of opposite political interests, have referred to that programme as an election manifesto, made out on the eve of an election. Although my experience in politics is by no means lengthy, I quite understand their embarrassment, but I think it is an indication that the programme is good, and such as to meet the wishes of the people. If there is no election before the session ends or before those measures are implemented, no one will be able to claim that this manifesto is nothing but an election promise.

I believe I may say, therefore, that the fate of the government is in its hands and that its future will depend upon the fairness with which it will carry out the proposed measures.

I do not wish, for the time being, to discuss the war programme of the government. I have had numerous occasions of expressing my views in this connection and I still hold to the same views. We are all agreed that it is absolutely necessary to win the war and to hasten victory, but the fact must be borne in mind that after all Canada is a young nation and that she must act in her own interests and according to her own means, leaving older and wealthier nations more directly concerned to follow the same policy.

I shall therefore confine myself to the plans respecting the period of transition and of peace, outlined in the speech from the throne. How shall we assess these plans?

How could we, on principle, object to the government's plan of increasing our exports by facilitating the exchange of our products with those of other nations after the war? We have forests, mines, water-power and other natural resources of untold value, which may be used in international trade. The interests of our people demand that we should be prepared to take advantage of these resources in order to anticipate prosperity.

How could we, on principle, object to our country's individual participation in an international organization which will strive to avert future wars, further catastrophes, and promote universal security? Would not such a policy tend to give recognition to the sovereignty of Canada, a dream which we have so long cherished?

How could we denounce the putting into effect of certain plans to establish, during the post-war period, a minimum standard of welfare—better food and shelter, social insurance against the hazards of life, setting-up of a national contributory old age pensions scheme on a more generous basis? If we did, it would be tantamount to opposing the new order which has been held out before our eyes and which can only be attained by properly directed social measures.

Who would say that they oppose the setting up of a body intended to supply the credit necessary for the launching of new industrial enterprises, small and medium in size, and to help those already in existence? That will be our greatest need, both in rural and urban centres, if we are to put all our manpower to work after the war.

I should be amazed beyond words if even one member in the house opposed the principle behind a measure which would carry out family allowances. The idea has been under consideration for the past fifty years in this country, and the time has come for a government to have the courage to identify itself with such a plan and implement it. It must be well understood, however, that these allowances shall be apportioned so as to reward and encourage a high birth-rate and help particularly the many Canadian mothers who did not shrink from filling the cradle over and over again, in accordance with the precept laid down by the Creator: "Be fruitful and multiply". A government which would apply this one measure of family allowances with Christian fairness would find that it has done enough to secure the support of the people and their forgiveness of its past mistakes in the management of public affairs.

I am pleased to see that the government has expressed its intention of setting a minimum price on farm products. For too long has the farmer, king of the universe, been treated as a poor relation. I have never understood why, if the workingman is undeniably entitled to a fair salary, the farmer should not also have the right to be paid prices just as fair and reasonable for his products. Because the farmer, who is a peaceful and orderly man, has never cared to resort to force in order to press his claims, he has had to muddle through as best he could until now, and it seemed as if he would remain in a class where the income could not budge. If the government carries out its purpose in this respect, it will be entitled to the gratitude of the most interesting class of people.

For all these reasons, I shall support the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

If the contents of the speech from the throne are reassuring and give us good reason to hope for the future, we cannot, however, overlook the dark clouds which still threaten on the horizon. Too often do we hear birds of ill-omen croaking every type of propaganda intended to fray our nerves and fill us with anxiety for the future of our country and the social security of our people.

I wish to denounce the proponents of extreme imperialism and of a policy of immigration on a vast scale. There are also the proponents of state controls whom I intend to denounce when opportunity offers. It is certain that, once the war is over, our people will balk at all the vexatious restrictions imposed by a new bureaucracy, which must be done away with as soon as possible.

The Canadian people believe that they are at home in Canada. They are ceaselessly reminded that they are a sovereign state and that the Westminster statute is a step in the road to independence. If so, be they allowed to keep their delusions and let there be a stop to the procession of salesmen of imperialism who come with statements hurtful to Canadian sentiments.

I congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for having disapproved of the terms of Lord Halifax's last proposal. Let the latter attend to his mission in the United States and abstain from offering us suggestions of an imperial federation. If the former leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the present leader (Mr. Graydon) have refused to take a positive stand on these matters, it is probably because his views expressed follow very closely those of the Tory party, as formerly expressed by Lord Bennett, of whom we have such an unpleasant recollection. One may be convinced that this policy of imperialization is not accepted any more by the proud people of Canada.

While still shouting that nothing matters except the winning of the war, an attempt is made, in certain quarters, to take advantage of the willingness of our country to go the limit on the road to sacrifice to ask that further sacrifices be made to promote the interests of foreign nations, when peace has been won. An incidious propaganda is spreading the idea that Canada, with its 3,500,000 square miles of territory, should accommodate all the refugees from other countries who wish to take their chances in our midst. In my humble view, this proposition is for the least premature. In spite of their traditionally charitable dispositions, our people will oppose the entry of outsiders, from whatever country they may come, until our returned men and our unemployed have secured jobs bringing them enough money to ensure their welfare and the stabilization of our commerce and industry. Personally, I would resent it if strangers were to take the places, on this hemisphere, that rightly belong to Canadians.

A lot is said about devastation and ruin in countries that have fallen victims to aggression. Our help and sympathy have so far gone to those countries, but do you not believe, Mr. Speaker, that their reconstruction will call for the efforts of all their sons? Should Canada send her people abroad for reconstruction work, while refugees who should logically be at work in their own countries, would take the place of our people in Canada and enjoy here a more comfortable life? That would be absurd.

The complaint is heard that some European countries have a too low birth-rate. Would not their problem become more acute if they were deprived of the elements necessary for the restoration of their population? After the war, each country will have to set its own house in order.

I have received many protest petitions from my constituency and I fully intend to support them. May I suggest that all those advocates of mass immigration should be strongly advised to stop their agitation and wait until our country's economic and industrial structure recovers from the injuries it has sustained before they put forward any immigration plan. We must show forbearance, but I still believe in the old motto, which the British have taught us by word and deed: Charity begins at home. To sacrifice the interests of our people to those of outsiders, would be ill directed charity while being detrimental, at the same time, to the countries of those who would benefit by our excessive generosity.

I have made these few remarks in the house in order to call the attention of the hon. members to the serious disturbance that might be engendered in our country by the implementation of a policy advocated by utopians prompted by momentary enthusiasm, without a thought for the real interests of our people.

These thoughts have been inspired by one single hope, that of seeing Canada, after the war, once again a unified, happy and prosperous country.

On motion of Mr. Tustin the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE (ARMED SERVICES)

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina) presented the first report of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, (armed services), and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN STOCK FEEDERS

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL OF BEEF CATTLE AVAILABLE FOR MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to address two questions to the Minister of Agriculture. The first is in respect of the western stock feeders who find themselves at present unable to market their finished beef. Have representations been made to the minister to the effect that in some cases feed is scarce, that the prices for the finished beef are too low, and that the feeders therefore face heavy losses and even possible ruin? My second question is, has the minister considered the advisability of suspending the meatless Tuesday and the rationing regulations as they apply to beef until such time as the regrettable congestion in beef marketing can be cleared away?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): As to the first question, there is a delegation here from Alberta this afternoon, a delegation I think of one, who has been telephoning to me since this morning to make an appointment. I have not yet met that delegate, and until I do I would not wish to say anything further about the matter. The other question is one to be dealt with, of course, by the wartime prices and trade board.

[Mr. Lizotte.]

SOVIET RUSSIA

CONSTITUTION OF SIXTEEN REPUBLICS—QUESTION OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Newspaper dispatches would appear to indicate that each of the sixteen republics comprising the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics are now to be free to carry on their own relationships with other powers. Is the Prime Minister in a position to inform the house whether or not this will necessitate any change in connection with our present diplomatic arrangements with Russia?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to my hon. friend, I do not anticipate that the change which has been made in the constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will necessitate any change in the existing diplomatic relations between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

MEAT

CONDEMNATION OF 500,000 POUNDS IN GOVERNMENT WAREHOUSE IN QUEBEC CITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture or the appropriate minister. Will the minister make a statement to the house concerning the recent condemnation by government and municipal inspectors of some 500,000 pounds of meat stored in a government warehouse in Quebec city?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Just as soon as I have a complete report on the matter I shall make a statement to the house. I have not yet received a complete report.

WHEAT

PROCEDURE IN REALIZATION OF PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he make a statement in regard to the disposal of wheat board certificates by the farmers? Should they be sent to the wheat board, and if so, when?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The wheat board will make an announcement this month as to the proper method to be followed by the producers in realizing on their participation certificates. Forms will be sent to all elevator agents and to banks for the use of producers, who will use the forms in registering their certificates and will then forward their certificates with the form to the board in Winnipeg. It is very important that the certificate be not forwarded without being listed on the form. The certificates will be checked by the wheat board with the duplicates at head office, and then cheques will issue. Payment on the 1940 certificates will commence in March, and immediately following that, the certificates for 1941 and 1942 will issue.

To anticipate another question, it is impossible at this stage to give any estimate of what the payments on these certificates will be.

EXPROPRIATION OF PROPERTIES

BEAR EXPLORATION AND RADIUM, LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, a copy of which I have already sent to him. The question arises out of a communication made in New York this morning. Has the government taken any steps to expropriate the properties of the company known as Bear Exploration and Radium, Limited? If not, has the government any intention of so doing, or is it in any way interested in this company?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The answer to the first question is no. The answer to the second question is that the government has no intention of taking action.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker it was very refreshing to have the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), just back from the front, where he did such valiant service, tell the house and the country something about the thoughts and aspirations of the men at the front. May I congratulate and commend him for the contribution he has made and the courage he has shown in not being afraid to point out the defects in the rehabilitation plans at present operating, and express the hope that the government will take early remedial action in regard thereto.

Intimately connected with this subject is the question of housing. I am going to refer to that for a moment because it was mentioned in the speech from the throne.

Of the various acts respecting this subject, one was passed in 1935 called the Dominion Housing Act; in 1937 there was another act, called the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act, and in 1938, the National Housing Act. I will deal only with the latter.

I would like to quote first from sessional paper 122T, laid on the table on July 6 last. On page 9 it is stated that:

> Part II of the National Housing Act was designed to assist local housing authorities, including limited dividend corporations, to provide decent, safe and sanitary housing to be rented to families of low income which could not afford the "economic rental" for such accommodation. Under section 18, subsection 2, a provision was included that no loans might be made and no contracts entered into after March 31, 1940.

It is claimed that certain objectives, however, were achieved; in particular, progress was made in promoting a better understanding and appreciation of the nature and purpose of low rental housing and in working out some of the problems and details involved in this type of undertaking. I am sorry that the act was allowed to lapse in 1940, because I think it might very well have been continued until the present. I am well aware, of course, that the argument will be adduced that the war was on and we had other things to attend to.

May I for a moment recapitulate the events in connection with this low-cost housing programme. The present government, by order in council on May 13, 1936 appointed the national employment commission with Mr. Arthur B. Purvis as its chairman. Amongst other duties it was asked to "formulate regulations regarding practical measures for increasing employment." I cannot pass without paying a word of tribute to Mr. Arthur

B. Purvis for the tremendous energy he displayed during the two years he was engaged in this work, giving freely of his great ability and business acumen to a labour of love. Although all his recommendations have not been implemented, his work will stand as a great contribution to our national life. From the interim report of the commission of which he was chairman, I quote as follows, under "Housing Construction," page 11:

> The commission recognized the desirability of a rounding out of governmental housing policy, particularly as regards accommodation for those unable themselves to afford an economic rent —often associated with slum clearance. Action in this field was considered necessary both from the viewpoint of eliminating a social sore all too prevalent, especially in the larger cities, and because of its effect in stimulating employment in the construction field.

The commission recommended that the dominion and to a certain extent the provincial contributions should be in the form of direct subsidies, or, alternately, loans at a rate below the commercial rate, leaving to the municipalities contributions largely in the form of direct monetary payments equivalent to but not in the form of tax exemptions.

On September 9, 1936, the dominion government based certain principles upon recommendations made by the national employment commission. These will be found on page 101 of the commission's report issued on January 26, 1938. It was then announced that the principles which should govern that section of this broad housing plan to be devised to meet the requirements of those unable to pay an economic rent often associated with slum clearance, should be as follows: (a) participation by the dominion, by provinces or municipalities in any aid that may be given, whether by subsidy, loan, guarantee, or omission of taxes; (b) encouragement of the participation of private capital.

Then the commission, on February 9, 1937, presented its detailed plan to the minister, feeling that dominion government action was justified at the time for the following reasons:

> (i) As a measure of public health and social advancement, low rental housing projects will have a direct influence in imporving conditions of life for the low wage earner in urban areas and will be a factor in increasing the employability of our workers after a period in which their employability has been greatly reduced;
> (ii) The field of low rental housing is the only one in which a direct and decisive stimulus can be given to home building without the risk of subsidizing competition to private builders and thus discouraging more building than is stimulated;
> (iii) The employment created by such housing projects will be greater and more widely spread than that afforded by large scale public works.

I have referred to the fact that to encourage building corporations to undertake this form of building under this part II of the National Housing Act, the dominion government was being asked to lend money to limited dividend companies at a lower rate than that prevailing in ordinary commercial loans. Such corporations might very well decide to limit their dividends to a smaller amount, especially if they received such long-term loans at a low interest rate.

To give in a few words the need for slum clearance in low rental houses, I cannot do better than quote from the report which was made in 1934 by a committee of which I was chairman. In that report we said:

> Bad houses are not only a menace: they are active agents of destruction. The committee is satisfied, from its investigations and inquiries, that they destroy happiness, health and life. They destroy morality and family ties. They destroy the basis of society itself by their destruction of self-respect and their promotion of delinquency and crime.

Until slum clearance and rehousing of slum tenants is undertaken as a national duty and responsibility, to be discharged by national policies put into effect on a national basis, we shall quite unnecessarily be condemned to pass through all those very costly experiences which other nations have already passed through before being confronted by the ultimate inescapable truth that without government assistance there can be no effective slum clearance and rehousing of the lowest wage earners.

I find towards the end of the report that we urged on the dominion government that no public grants are so urgently needed as those for the rehousing of the poorest members of the community, and that, in order to make such grants most effective, a national housing commission should be appointed to assist the provincial and municipal housing authorities in the formulation of plans, in the choice of materials, and possibly, if a nation-wide housing scheme can be initiated, in securing economies by the large-scale purchase of such materials.

I hope the government will revive this portion of the National Housing Act by amendment or otherwise; for I believe the time has arrived when municipalities and limited-dividend housing corporations will be anxious to provide this form of housing by taking advantage of the opportunity to secure dominion loans at less than commercial rates for a period of thirty or forty years.

I wish now to turn for a few minutes to another subject which was dealt with yesterday very effectively by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), the subject of the rehabilitation of returned men. The national council of veterans' associations of Canada, after making a thorough investigation of the subject, made certain recommendations to the government. Let me refer for a moment to these.

Formerly the clothing allowance of soldiers on discharge was as low as $17 if granted in the summer, but afterwards it was increased to $35. The council of the veterans' associations recommended that an allowance of $100 be given to men with overseas service; secondly that $75 be given to men with more than six months' service in Canada; thirdly that a wardrobe reconditioning allowance of $35 be given those with less than six months' service in Canada; and that the personnel of women's services should be given equal allowances.

The recommendations of the national veterans' councils are a minimum and do not provide for working clothing. Immediately following the presentation of these recommendations the clothing allowance was increased to $65, but I still think that this is inadequate and that the sum of $100, as recommended by the veterans' associations, should be the minimum, because it is quite obvious that $65 would not do more than purchase a suit of clothes and an overcoat.

The present regulations provide for a grant on discharge of one month's pay and allowances. The national council of the veterans' associations in Canada has recommended to the government that rehabilitation grants of one month's pay and allowances be given for each six months of completed service. This seems to be more equitable. It is fair to assume that the longer the service the more time will be required for readjustment into civilian life. The present scale of dependents' allowances does not permit the accumulation of any surplus by dependents of men on active service, nor has it been generous enough to more than take care of essential living expenses.

Under these circumstances it will be found that on discharge or demobilization money will be required to reestablish families on a pre-war basis. Length of service will have a direct relationship to reestablishment cost.

Now a word in regard to the hospital allowances during treatment. Formerly service personnel were discharged during the period of active treatment when they became wards of the Department of Pensions and National Health, with consequent serious impairment of their financial situation. Now the regulations in part correct this injustice, but they do not go far enough. The national council of veterans' associations in Canada has recommended to the government that in no case should pay and advowances of a former member of the forces in this war, in hospital, be less than those of his rank during active service for the whole of his period of initial continuous treatment. This will ensure equal treatment for all ranks if adopted, and it would seem to be just without being overgenerous. It is advocated that no officer or man be discharged from the services until he is discharged from hospital; in other words that he should be given the moral stimulus of considering himself on the strength as long as he is suffering in hospital from war-time disability.

The present regulations are unfair for the following reasons: First, they discriminate against officers of higher rank than a lieutenant; secondly, they limit the benefit of full pay and allowances to a period of one year, or the length of service of the recipient, whichever is the lesser; third, they do not take into account the cases of men who may be discharged from hospital prematurely and have to return later for further treatment. A point should be made of the necessity of establishing proper regulations with respect to all matters of rehabilitation now, when there is general public sympathy with men on active service. When the war is over they will again be faced with public apathy, and I am afraid indifference, so that it will prove difficult to have regulations revised to correct any half-way measures which may be adopted at the present time.

I should like to say a word in regard to the promise made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) in respect of the Sunnybrook hospital which is to replace Christie street hospital. I understand that progress is being made in the preparation of plans. Early construction of this hospital however will depend upon the energy shown by the minister and his department. If the plans have to be completed to the last detail before tenders are called there will be a long delay in actual construction. May I say to the minister it will be possible to start construction within a month or six weeks if the government is anxious to do so and will allow tenders to be let on a fixed fee basis for profit, established on a reasonable estimate of the ultimate cost. The government should assume responsibility for any fluctuations of price of material or increase in wages of labour during the period of construction. Priorities for all types of material and equipment should be secured immediately and orders placed as soon as quantities of specific requirements are determined.

Increasing numbers of seriously wounded men resulting from the operations in Italy and elsewhere will soon be coming back to Canada. Present accommodation is quite inadequate, so that Sunnybrook hospital will be absolutely essential at an early day. May I therefore urge upon the Minister of Pensions and National Health that he do his utmost to expedite the construction of this building at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped on reviewing the speech from the throne to find in it some concrete proposals, but I am inclined to be of the opinion of a great many other members in this house that the speech contains just a lot of propaganda material which can be used to great advantage in an election. The more I read it, the more carefully I examine it, the more I am forced to that conclusion. One thing, however, which is outlined in the speech from the throne, and it appears in the first part of the speech, is I think, very commendable. It is that we are to continue to have an all-out war effort; or probably I should more correctly say it is hoped we shall have an all-out war effort. I do not think anyone can honestly say that we have had an all-out war effort up to date; certainly not from the time the war started, because I can well remember speaking in this house of an all-out war effort when the war started. We of the Social Credit New Democracy party were the only ones in this house who took a stand for an all-out war effort. We are still proud of that record, and we are grateful that we have made at least a dent in some of the thick skulls which opposed us at that time when we were talking about an all-out war effort.

Mr. ADAMSON: An all-worn-out effort.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is an all-worn-out effort; but I am speaking of an all-out war effort. I think that one of the grandest factors which must be considered in an all-out war effort is public morale. I listened with a great deal of interest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he spoke at the beginning of this session in regard to the war effort. He condemned those who went about the country preaching that the war was almost over. I think that was the proper stand for the Prime Minister to take. I am not one of those who believe that this war is nearly won. I recall reading the other day in one of our Canadian papers an article reprinted from a United States publication, to the effect that one of the United States generals had said that the German army was stronger to-day in man-power and equipment of all types than it ever was. I think it would be better for us to take that mental attitude than the attitude which might lead us to believe that the war is about over and we should relax our efforts. You can scarcely pick up a newspaper in Canada, even since the Prime Minister spoke, without seeing that some official has said the war is likely to be over this year. I remember reading a statement issued by General Montgomery just a day or two ago to his troops in England saying that he hoped and expected that this war would be over this year. That is in direct opposition to what the Prime Minister is trying to establish. We should begin to censor some of the statements that are made at home, in order to encourage an all-out war effort.

One of the other matters mentioned in the speech from the throne in regard to an all-out war effort is the total use of our resources. I do not think we have begun to use all of our resources in that regard. I recall oil, for instance. In my opinion we have not begun to develop the oil resources that could have been developed in western Canada, and which would have been of great asistance to us in our all-out war effort. Another important point in regard to an all-out war effort is to see to it that public morale is kept up to the maximum and that we are using every available man in this country to the best advantage. The department which can perform that function to the greatest extent is the department which has control of the selective service boards. In my opinion the selective service boards are in some instances a disgrace to this country. I do not particularly blame the minister in charge, but I do blame the officials who are administering these boards. I had occasion to visit one of the selective service boards of this country—and I will name it, the one in Calgary—in an endeavour to get a farm boy, who could be spared from the farm for the winter months, a place in an essential war industry. As I entered that selective service office I was not very well impressed with the set-up. It seemed to me that the officials behind the counter were endeavouring to frighten the men who came in to make application. That seemed to be the atmosphere of the whole place.

I want to give the history of this case in order to show how this works out. This boy was given an indefinite postponement for work in agriculture; and after he had been partly hailed out last year and had taken off the remainder of his crop, he made arrangements with his father, who lives not far away, to take care of his stock in order that he might accept employment in other essential industry. The government was continually asking farmers to do that very thing. This boy came to see me, and I said I thought that was a very commendable step to take. He had been offered a position in the Kimberley mines of British Columbia, he told me, at a salary of $175 a month, and he asked what he should do. I said, "The first thing you must do is go in and consult the selective service board, who will make the proper arrangements for you." He went in to consult this board and came home and told me the result. Then I went in personally to interview the officials of that board, and I must say that the attitude of those officials was anything but conducive to getting boys on the farms to take employment in essential industries. One official told me that he had informed this young man that he should go to the lumber camps if he wanted to work. The boy told him he did not have any experience in lumber camps and did not want to go there, that he had been offered this other job already. Then this official told me, "These boys must remember that they are in the army, and if they do not go where we tell them to go we will push them back into the army." Such threats should not be permitted. I pointed out that this boy was not in the army in any sense of the word, and that no official of the selective service board had authority to put him into the army. This boy came to me again to see what he should do, and I replied that I did not know. His answer was, "Well, if he thinks I am going up there to work in the woods when I already have a job offered to me, he is wrong." I said I did not blame him, and then he said, "I will go home and sit down, then; I will not do anything." I said I did not think we had quite reached that point, and I sent a wire to the deputy minister, Mr. MacNamara, asking if this was the policy of the government, and stating that I did not think it was. I received a wire in reply saying that they would investigate the case and let me know. That was over three months ago, and I have heard nothing since. I got in touch with one of the district agriculturists of my province, and we talked this matter over. As a result this boy went to British Columbia, regardless of our selective service board; he went to the mine and had his position confirmed, then went to the selective service board, who immediately put him on the job, and he started to work. Why should people be required to get out of the province altogether in order to assist our war effort? I am not particularly blaming the minister, but he must take the responsibility because he is in charge of the department.

Mr. MITCHELL: Frankly I think that young fellow should be in the army.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Why?

Mr. MITCHELL: Because I do.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): This young man has two hundred acres in crop; he has fifty or sixty head of cattle and forty or fifty hogs. Now the minister says he should be taken out of that essential industry and put into the army, though the government and the minister have said time and again that if these boys can possibly get away from the farm for a few months they should get out and assist in essential industry.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, but they have to go on the basis of priority; they cannot just go where they like. If that young fellow was in the army he would have to do what he was told; and if he wants to go into some other industry it is not asking too much to let us decide on the priority of that industry.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, here was a boy who was willing to do that. He went to the selective service board and they threatened to put him into the army if he did not go where he was told. Yet he had a job offered to him at good pay. Well, it is just as I said to the selective service official; this set-up is not a selective service, it is a gestapo. From what the minister tells me now I am more than ever convinced that this is so, and I can tell the Minister of Labour that there are thousands of young fellows who are anxious to get off the farm during the winter months and assist in essential war industries, and who would do so but for the bureaucratic dictatorship administered by the selective service board. If you want an all-out war effort you will have to change your attitude. I have run across some funny things this last year, especially in connection with selective service, but the minister thinks it is fine.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is the best organization in the united nations; what do you think about that?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You just go ahead and stick up for it; you are the only one who does so, as far as I know. I do not mean that the whole selective service organization is carried on like the branch at Calgary, but I do suggest that the Calgary office needs a little housecleaning.

When I was down at Drumheller I was speaking to the manager of one of the mines there who asked, "What kind of outfit is this selective service board"? I tried to outline what I thought of some of them—

Mr. HOMUTH: Could you say it here?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Hardly.

Mr. MITCHELL: Go ahead.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Somebody says it is the "neglected service," and I think that is a better description. The manager of this mine told me that last year, when they were short of miners, they applied to Ottawa to have some miners sent out, and as a result five men were sent from the east, with their fare paid all the way. Three of them were old men, and after working three shifts they were declared physically unfit to do further mine work. Then they were given transportation all the way back to Ottawa. Why could not these men have been properly categorized and given a proper physical examination before sending them three thousand miles across Canada, when our railway trains are supposed to be so overcrowded? At least that would have obviated the necessity of bringing them all the way back east at government expense.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): At the taxpayers' expense, you mean.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, the government are supposed to represent the people.

If we are to have an all-out war effort I think there will have to be some changes in the attitude of the government toward some of the returned men, veterans not only of this war but of the last war and their dependents. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) went more fully into this question than I intend to go, but I would like to draw one particular case to the attention of hon. members of this house. I know that some men who are fighting overseas to save democracy have dependents in this country who are barely eking out an existence. I had one particular instance brought to my attention, and concerning which I have communicated with the department. But it is only typical of others I have received. According to the regulations, if a boy happens to be overseas, or in the forces at some other point, and his father or mother are dependent upon him, the mother cannot receive any dependent's allowance unless the father is totally incapacitated from earning a living. When one realizes that the dependents' allowance board has to function under those regulations, he realizes that it is placed in a bad spot, no matter how desirous it may be of correcting an evil. These old people may be receiving a very small allowance, possibly only $5 a month. The father may be working as janitor in a school, and as such he may be earning $5, $10 or even up to as much as $50 or $60 a month. In any case it is an amount insufficient to provide them with a decent standard of living. Under the regulations, however, the mother is prevented from receiving any dependent's allowance unless her husband is totally incapacitated from earning a living This means he must be an absolute pauper. If he is earning as little as $5 a month they cannot receive the allowance. Surely that is a condition the department should consider and change.

Provision is made in the speech from the throne for the setting up as a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada, of an industrial development bank to provide credit facilities for both fixed and working capital, so that industries may be converted from war-time to peace-time operations. I believe the government is to be commended upon endeavouring to take some action to facilitate the transfer of industry from a war-time to a peace-time basis. My experience in the war expenditures committee gave me some insight into the tremendous productive capacity of Canada. All the factories we visited had the very best of equipment, and were doing good work. I shall not say anything about the quality of work being turned out, or the extent of production, but the point I make is that we have facilities right at hand, now to put out after the war a production unequalled in our history. It can be done, if we make the proper use of our facilities.

We note that the industrial development bank is to be set up as a subsidiary to the Bank of Canada. This morning I happened to see the Ottawa Citizen of Tuesday, February 8, and I noted particularly a misleading statement. This is what I read: "Bank of Canada cuts rediscount rate; debt-free money and ending fight for markets urged by Lord Sempill." I showed this heading to three men and asked them what it meant. Their reply was, "Oh, the Bank of Canada is cutting the rediscount rate, and they are going to issue debt-free money." Ninety per cent of the people are headline readers and I believe many persons across Canada after reading that headline are going to say, "Well, we are beginning to have some sense. The Bank of Canada is issuing debt-free money." But when one looks through the article he finds that it states something entirely different, and that no great change is intended at all. It states that the rate of discount will be lowered from 2½ to 1½ per cent, on advances to chartered or savings banks. This is no great reform. Once the chartered banks get the advance from the Bank of Canada, they can expand their credit from ten to twenty times, and the rate works out to only a fraction of one per cent. It does not in any sense indicate that either the chartered banks or the industrial development banks will be in a position to make loans to industries or agriculture at a lower rate. Unless we have some means of issuing national money for a national cause we are going to fall into the same error as that into which we have fallen many times before. The government seems to take a great deal of pleasure in passing the buck to industry, if I may use that expression.

There is a widespread belief that the onus of taking up the slack in respect of unemployment should fall upon industry. Industry cannot and never will absorb all the unemployed in Canada. We had better understand that right now, because such is not the function of industry, nor was it ever intended to be. As I pointed out a while ago, the industries of Canada are well organized, and they are turning out the necessary production. The war has proven their ability to produce goods. I am not saying anything about the profits they are making, nor am I expressing any opinion as to whether they are making too much or too little. That is a matter entirely for control. The function of industry is to produce goods, and it is doing that. But to expect industry to give back jobs to all the men who have gone overseas, and who before enlistment were employed with those industries, is just pure nonsense. They cannot and they will not do it.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) delivered a good speech the other day, in which he encouraged the development of industries in western Canada. With his views in that respect we from the west entirely agree. He pointed out the potentialities accruing from such a programme. But one must always have in mind the markets to be supplied. There is no use in having industries, and a greater production of goods, unless we have markets in which to sell those goods. Why, even in the years of depression there was no scarcity of goods in the stores. Industry was producing as much as it could sell.

I recall visiting a plant in Canada just before the war, and upon returning to the manager's office I said to him, "Why do you not keep those fellows employed for the full twelve months of the year? Surely your mental make-up is not such that you would deliberately dismiss a man and place him on relief for six months in the year, with the possibility that he and his family might starve." "Well," he said, "no industrialist would take that attitude; he would be inhuman if he did." He showed me the great pile of stores in their warehouses, and said to me, "If you will get these goods out of here, I will put the men back to work very quickly—and for twelve months of the year." He was perfectly right.

It is the government's obligation to see that we have markets for these goods. Once we have the markets we shall have no difficulty in securing their production by industry. The assumption that foreign markets are going to solve our problems is, to my mind, quite wrong. True, foreign markets are necessary to a certain extent. We must have them so that we may exchange our surpluses, the goods which cannot possibly be consumed within our own country. The greatest and probably the most important of all our markets is the one at home. But in order to have a home market sufficient to take care of our population, we must have the purchasing power in the hands of the people so that they may buy back the consumer goods produced for them by industry. Unless we do that, we shall find difficulty ahead.

That purchasing power can be made up in several ways. A large portion of it can be supplied through industry, which pays the wages and salaries, but there is never enough paid out by industry in wages and salaries to begin to buy back the products of industry, and so there is always a lag. We have advocated the issue of national dividends to make up that lag. Every other party in the house has criticized and ridiculed this principle of national dividends. In view of that, it is amazing now to see in the speech from the throne mention made of family allowances. I have not heard anybody criticize them. Family allowances are in part a national dividend, but only to a very selected portion of our citizens. I am waiting with a great deal of interest to hear what the rank and file of the Liberals supporting the party which proposed these family allowances have to say about that. The principle of the family allowance is sound. But when you issue a family allowance to only a portion of our citizens, that is discrimination.

Mr. GIBSON: Who says that it is being issued to only a portion?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is being issued only to the children. Here is what the speech from the throne says, and I am glad to hear the minister take exception to it because evidently he thinks that is wrong. The proposal as contained in the speech from the throne is this:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

I take it that "children" means what it says. It does not mean adults.

Mr. DUPUIS: Why adults?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You answer that.

Mr. DUPUIS: You are there to say.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We have been eight years or more trying to educate some of the people here to the fact that the family is the foundation of our national life and should be taken care of, that you cannot have a prosperous nation without a prosperous family, that without the family you can have no nation at all. Of course the statement in the speech from the throne that the family and the home are the foundation of national life is only part of the truth, because they are the nation itself. What are we going to do about it? Further on the speech from the throne says that we are going to assist the family in the battle of life. So that the Prime Minister recognizes there that the family is the nation, the most important thing of all, and that the family is to be aided in the battle of life. Why "battle" unless it is a very serious affair?

Then what is it proposed to do for them? Listen to this statement of the meagre infinitesimal action we are to be asked to take! We are to be asked to aid "in ensuring a minimum" of well-being to the children of the nation. We recognize them as the foundation of the nation. We recognize that the battle of life is ahead of them, and yet we as a parliament are not going to be asked to supply them with a minimum of aid but simply "to aid in ensuring a minimum". What kind of legislation is that? Can anyone expect the people of Canada to be serious about a proposal of that kind? All we are to be asked to do is to aid in ensuring a minimum. I have not a great deal of hope from this, Mr. Speaker.

I am pleased to know that labour agrees with us on the principle of a national dividend. I want to read an extract from the McTague report, from the minority report written by labour's representative, Mr. J. L. Cohen, a former member of the national war labour board. I quote from page 47:

> The proposal to substitute some family allowance relief measure instead of correcting substandard wages ignores the true character of wages.

With that I agree entirely. It goes on:

> The principle of family allowance in a general programme of social security is commendable, if it is available for all sections of society, rural as well as urban, but to put it forward as a substitute for the correction of substandard wages means to force all families, now in the substandard wage area, to become permanent wards of the state for the whole period during which the order in council would remain operative.

I agree with that one hundred per cent. The principle of a national dividend is acceptable apparently to the then representative of labour on that board, but labour does not want it to be used as a means of driving down wages. That is what they are fearful of, and that is what I too am fearful of. No wonder we are having a great deal of discontent all over this country in regard to P.C. 9384, the new war-time wages control order. No wonder labour is concerned about it. Let us look at the representatives that labour is to have on the new war labour board. I think it is a disgrace. The national war labour board, which is appointed by the governor general in council is to have only one representative of labour out of six representatives. Unquestionably the chairman and the vice-chairman of the board will not represent labour. Provision is made for two representatives of the public; they may not represent labour at all. Then there is one representative of the employers and one representative of the employees. On the old war labour board, labour had at least one out of three representatives, while on the new board labour is to have only one representative out of six; consequently they have not the ghost of a show, in my opinion, in getting justice when they bring their grievances before the board and try to convince the five other members of the board.

There also is provision for a national war labour committee, which is to be set up to consult with and assist the war labour board. They have no power at all; they act only in an advisory capacity. Look at the wording of the order in council setting up that committee. I was amazed when I read the wording, and every one of these words must have been carefully weighed before being used. There are eight or more members, four or more "having regard to the interests" of the employers, and four or more "having regard to the interests" of labour. "Having regard to the interests of" is certainly not the same as being representative of. So that on this war labour committee, labour may not have one solitary representative. Is it any wonder that labour is concerned over this thing?

When it comes to the question of wages—and the whole purpose of this order is to control wages, which might be all right in itself—see how they are to go about it under the order. The employer is forbidden to give an increase in wages unless the employee, that is the labourer, the worker, can prove that this increase in wages will not cause a rise in price. I say that is an impossible position for labour to be put in, because the labourer as such has no possible way of accurately determining the cost of production. That data is contained in the company's books, and the labourer as such has no access to the books of the company. How is he to discover what the cost of production is?

Furthermore, if the labourer goes contrary to the order, he is immediately prosecuted. He cannot even go on a strike unless he proves that that strike is not in contravention of the order, or he is liable to a fine of anywhere from one thousand dollars to one year's imprisonment. I agree with what an hon. member said the other day, that this order is just nonsense. It is going to create much difficulty and hardship, and labour is not going to pay any attention to it. Neither this nor any other government can stop the workers of this country from going on strike. It was tried in the United States, and it did not work. You cannot use a big club over such organizations as this, and if you could it would be an injustice. Why not substitute some provision which will work, which will be fair to both parties? You should not take away from anybody, especially from labour, the right to strike. It is the only defence they have; they have fought hundreds of years to get it, and now they have got it, do you think they are going to give it up? Of course not; they would be fools if they did.

There are many other subjects upon which I would like to speak. Old age pensions, health insurance, and pensions for the blind are most important subjects and should be examined in this house with the greatest care. To my mind the way the blind and the old-age pensioners have been treated is a disgrace, but I have not time to enlarge on the subject on this occasion; I shall deal more fully with these matters later on. I wish, however, to say a few words about agriculture.

In the speech from the throne it is stated:

> To ensure economic stability for agriculture, you will be asked to make provision for a price floor for staple farm products.

Of course the important question is, what will this floor be? A great many people seem to pride themselves on the fact that a floor is to be set for agriculture. A floor in agricultural prices is merely a protection against a sudden fall in prices, and to that extent it is good. It is not justice, but only a protection against manifest injustice; it will not remedy the cause and it will not effect a cure. I think that agriculture should be placed on an entirely different basis. During the years 1915 to 1919 farmers received about one-third of the national income. That was the only time wherein they received anything near parity. From 1926 to 1929 their share of the national income was about 16·6 per cent; in 1930 to 1940 it fell to about 9·4 per cent. We have come to the time when we must change our attitude towards agriculture and put the prices of its products on a different basis. I have before me Votes and Proceedings No. 8, Monday, 7th February, 1944, where the following proposed resolution appears in my name:

> Whereas agriculture has seldom received its fair share of the national income of Canada;
> And whereas the cost of producing all agricultural products varies considerably from year to year;
> Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house and in the interest of the nation as a whole, the government be requested to set the prices of agricultural products at such a level that it will guarantee to the farmers of Canada such a yearly percentage of the national income as will have the same relation to the national income as the agricultural population bears to the national population of Canada.

The values of field crops in the prairie provinces in 1943 and 1942, as given by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, are as follow:

	1943	1942
Saskatchewan ...	$343,233,000	$378,210,000
Alberta	201,426,000	239,121,000
Manitoba	141,490,000	117,593,000

It will be seen that despite the fact that in 1943 the price of wheat was set at $1.25 a bushel, the national revenue from field crops in the prairie provinces has fallen definitely below what it was in 1942. That is really my basis for putting forward this resolution, that no matter at what you set the price of agricultural products, it may not be parity and it may not give the farmer the share of the nation's income which it is his absolute right to have.

My time is up. I will continue the subject at another time.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): My first word to-day will be to the men and women of our armed forces; of the navy, the army, and the air force; those who are serving us in all parts of the world, fighting to preserve our freedom; and not overlooking, too, the doctors and the nurses who are rendering such wonderful service. Our casualty lists are heavy, and we fear will continue so. Our thoughts go out in deepest sympathy to those at home who have been bereaved of loved ones. They are examples of the great fortitude which must be the strength of the nation in these serious times. Our sailors have endured the rigours of the ocean in all kinds of weather and under extreme difficulties, never knowing when they might face the submarine or the enemy from the air. We cannot but pay the highest tribute to those heroic men who night after night go out and fight our battles over Germany. Our tribute goes too to the men of the army in these trying days, in the difficult situation they face in Italy.

These men and women, who have been training now over several years, are acquiring an entirely new outlook on life. Men from the maritimes have visited as never before our Pacific coast. Men of the Pacific coast have visited, in training, our eastern provinces. Many of them also have found that their training has taken them to distant parts in the neighbouring republic of the United States.

The course of training during this war has been entirely different from that in the previous war. This is a war of science and mechanization. Consequently our men, when they return from this war, will come back with a knowledge of mechanics and, in many respects, of science which they never had before. We must remember that; we must keep pace with them, realizing that their point of view will not be that of the men and women who left us to go into training and into battle. When they come back to Canada they will find different conditions also. They will find a prosperous country. Men and women have been working for good pay and under good conditions. They have had money to spend and have enjoyed a measure of prosperity despite the difficulties of the time. Our war effort has been huge. There may be things we can criticize, but the word that comes from other countries, from great leaders elsewhere, is always that of praise for the magnificent effort that Canada has put forth in this war. The men will find when they return that conditions are not as they were after the last war. They will find that prices have been controlled and that the country will not be facing a period of reduction in prices and losses of inventories, as was experienced in 1919.

Prosperity makes prosperity, and in the prosperity that has been created in this war we can see the great value of creating, in the world that is to be, conditions under which our men and women will have continuous employment. We will welcome them back to better conditions, and it will be our problem and responsibility to see that those better conditions are maintained.

[Mr. Gladstone.]

Many of the men will come back to join their brides of the early days of the war, or perhaps to bring brides with them from the old land. There is a great responsibility for us in the way of assistance in setting up new homes; for, as has been said here so frequently, the home is the foundation of the nation.

I say therefore that in all our arrangements for the future, and for these men and women as they return, we must take into account the fact that they have a changed point of view, and that they will be determined that in future there shall be no repetition of the disappointments that followed the last war. We owe a great deal to these men. Our men were at Dunkirk, at the fall of France, and they took part in the battle to save the British isles, which no doubt prevented the enemy from reaching our shores.

What I have said, Mr. Speaker, with regard to consideration for these men as they return, and the efforts to rehabilitate them, goes also for our most generous consideration, as the days go by, for the veterans of 1914-18 who even yet may be experiencing difficult conditions. I am not one who is learned in the law but I have had considerable business experience, and so it has been natural, during the eight years or so that I have been in this parliament, that I should think along the lines of business and business procedure. That trend of thought has led me as an observer to be irritated at times perhaps with the methods of parliament and the business approach to the consideration of the expenditure of money, and so on. And so, with this attitude, I was prompted, back I believe in 1937, to introduce into this house a resolution calling for a revision of the rules of the house. I mention this to-day because already a committee has been set up to consider means whereby the procedure of parliament may be improved.

It has always seemed strange to me, and I suppose it is the way in politics, that all of one party should vote one way and all of another party should vote another way. That apparently is necessary under our system of government, whereby the defeat of any measure means the defeat of the government. We may not agree with some particular measure, but according to practice it seems that if we oppose that measure in sufficient numbers the government which we support on the sum-total of its efforts may be defeated.

My attitude has been to take an independent view of the questions that come before us, and that will always be my attitude. I feel that I am here to represent all my constituents and not only those who voted for me. It has been my desire therefore to see an improvement in the rules governing procedure in this house which will leave me freedom to vote for the measures I approve and to oppose the measures I cannot approve. In order to make my attitude clearer on many of the questions that are before us to-day I have had it in mind, following the practice of political parties, to set down a number of points that represent my way of thinking on the questions of the day.

My theme in general is this, that with an improvement in procedure, so that members of parliament may consider legislation on its merits, and with provision to make corrections where there may be weaknesses in our methods and weaknesses in legislation, we can draw upon the past to build for a better future. I do not see the necessity of uprooting the past in order to have a prosperous Canada in the future. I think we can rely on the past, with adjustments and corrections, so that there will be opportunity for every man and every woman to make a decent living in this Canada of great resources. Therefore I desire to enumerate briefly a number of points to indicate my way of thinking and the course I would wish to pursue as the member for the riding of Wellington South.

1. Christianity is our accepted conformity to the divine purpose. Encouragement, in government, to things Christian, and discouragement of things unchristian, is the sure foundation of national worth.

2. National individuality develops with the lapse of centuries. To-day Canada is a growing force in the British commonwealth of nations. In that sphere we can exert a powerful influence, in association with the United States of America, for peace and good will amongst all peoples.

3. Unity of purpose of our peoples of many origins can be attained best by a policy that will encourage a blending of the races in an atmosphere of understanding of civil and religious freedom.

4. Parliament should aim to promote these ideals in our development as a nation. There is need for recovering the confidence of Canadians in their parliament as an institution for safeguarding and promoting equality of rights and equality of opportunity for all.

5. To this end members of parliament, especially in this time of world crisis, ought to exercise their right to advocate and consider legislation with less regard to party affiliation. Members now have freedom, in theory but not in general practice, of voting according to their judgment. Consequently I advocate that the defeat of a government measure shall not constitute defeat of the government.

[Mr. Gladstone.]

6. Confidence or want of confidence in the government, after non-acceptance of proposed legislation, should be determined by a separate vote. An adverse majority on a confidence vote would then constitute defeat of the government.

7. Speeches frequently are ill-prepared, irrelevant and wasteful of time. Reduction in the time allotted for speeches, with certain exceptions, should be made.

8. Procedure in parliament should be revised to minimize general debate. Procedure in committee should be revised to broaden members' opportunity of scrutinizing departmental administration and to give parliament a greater measure of advance control over expenditures. Calling departmental officials before committees would stimulate efficiency and sometimes, perhaps, unearth situations unknown to the ministry.

9. The civil service system should be revised for better recognition of merit and vice versa as to incompetence. There should be flexibility whereby persons with essential qualifications can be sought for special work.

10. Senate reform is being called for in many quarters. Members of that body might very well take the initiative in organizing, in a non-partisan way, for an enlarged programme of national service during the entire session. Unless the public is assured of greater usefulness the demand will grow for change to an elected senate.

11. Agriculture is becoming more and more a scientific and mechanized vocation. Our colleges must be financed more generously for the best obtainable facilities and equipment and to attract specialist personnel for skilled service and leadership. Prices to the farmer must be scaled upwards. His profits will flow back into purchases of machinery, better houses and barns, electrification and modern conveniences. These needs will contribute to employment in industry.

12. Forest reserves in Canada are being depleted by fire, insects and destructive logging methods. Steps must be taken to institute scientific methods and sound business policy to maintain and increase our forests.

13. Mineral production in Canada has expanded enormously for war purposes due to the diligence and skill of the prospector and the scientist. Canada's northland is a vast prospect largely untouched. We must give all possible encouragement and support to those who seek out and develop its hidden treasures. Active mining production means increased factory operations.

14. Merchant shipping is a war-created industry of Canada capable of much expansion. Our trained seamen will respond to this new opportunity of sailing Canada's products to the ports of the world and back with much needed cargo. Our fisheries resources, both salt water and fresh water, are unsurpassed anywhere. Our rivers await harnessing to turn the wheels of industry.

15. Air transport is another war-created industry of Canada. We are the link between the world areas of most dense population. Just as our brave airmen have conquered in war, so will they serve in peace for all manner of transport via our Atlantic to Pacific resources of the air.

16. The tourist trade in our playgrounds of the north is a potential resource of Canada capable of enormous expansion. I suggest that thousands of the temporary war-time houses be reerected along our lakes and rivers in colonies as tourist homes. Under direction we can have these as attractive summer homes for visiting Americans and as comfortable stopping places for our own citizens on vacation. Colonies of tourist homes could be made to give all-year employment to an ex-service man as supervisor, storekeeper, postmaster, et cetera.

17. Boys and girls, especially in our cities and larger towns, should be given the advantage of physical training for health, deportment, and discipline. For confirmation of the value of such training, see members of any branch of the armed forces. They have a glow in their cheeks. Their shoulders are squared. They walk with evidence of purpose. They know the importance of team work.

18. Our prisons are becoming comfortable hiding places for those who would escape military service. These and many delinquent youths should be set to work under guard in lumber camps and mines. Besides board and lodging they should receive modest wages, the same to accrue for assistance to dependents or for themselves by instalments on release to assist them to a new start along better lines.

19. Warning is given that the public is becoming critical of overstaffing of army and other officers in Canada; likewise at headquarters overseas.

20. Warning is given that many men who have been in the reserve army for two or three years consider it futile now to spend time at a summer training camp.

21. Warning is given that after the war our continuing organization for reasonable defence precautions should not be permitted to grow into a costly military aristocracy.

[Mr. Gladstone.]

22. Canada occupies a strong position for industrial development of the aforementioned resources through abundant power, an advantageous world location and a virile people. Persons or corporations must not be permitted to gain monopolistic control. The remedy lies within the power of parliament. Maximum industrial progress can be assured best by encouragement to vision and to the pioneering spirit of our people in association with modern science in a system of due recognition of individual initiative and enterprise.

23. Finance is a service for exchange of values and should be made to serve that purpose at fair cost to all. Persons or corporations associated with finance must not be permitted, through interlocking directorates and in other ways, to adopt policies detrimental to the maintenance of employment on a balanced keel as opposed to cycles of prosperity and depression. Again the remedy lies within the powers of parliament. Canada should aim to be financially independent of other countries.

24. Labour, both men and women, merits the praise of the nation for its contribution to the war effort. Canada will be richer with better paid working men supporting more comfortable homes, better clothed and better fed children and an assurance of security if sickness comes or when they can work no longer. I shall support every fair means possible that our workers may have assurance of the four freedoms.

25. Government proposals for security are on a huge and unprecedented scale. Before the present war the total annual expenditures of the federal government for all purposes, including pensions and veterans' allowances, was around $550,000,000. The estimated cost to-day of the far-reaching programme of social security and veterans' rehabilitation as outlined in the speech from the throne approaches $600,000,000. This amount includes, according to forecasts, $300,000,000 for veterans' gratuities, allowances, rehabilitation, et cetera; $150,000,000 for family allowances and $75,000,000 for national health insurance. Additional amounts in various fields will be provided by the provinces. This surely is an answer for those who are wondering if money can be found for needs in peace time as it has been found for war.

26. There is need for establishing better the supremacy of parliament. Why the methods of careful business administration cannot be employed in parliament is more than I can understand. This criticism is directed towards all governments, past and present, federal and provincial. Perhaps it is that regimentation of members best serves political ends. I call for commitee scrutiny that will reach into places and situations probably unknown to ministers.

27. It must be apparent that I support democracy freed of hidden selfish direction, either from individuals or groups. I take the past, make corrections and build for the future. I stand for fair and equal opportunity for all men to exercise their initiative and their qualities twice beneficially, to themselves and to the nation.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr Speaker, on this, my first opportunity of speaking in this house, I wish to express my appreciation to you and all other hon. members on both sides for the very kind welcome that has been extended to me as a new member.

At the very beginning let me frankly state that one of the main reasons I am here is that last year in Saskatchewan a group of men took it upon themselves to deny to the citizens of that province the democratic right of passing judgment upon the stewardship of their elected representatives, by extending their own term of office without the consent of those whom they govern. Why did not this government exercise its powers of disallowance, when the democratic rights of the citizens of the province of Saskatchewan were interfered with, as promptly as it did when the special privileges of certain financial institutions in the province of Alberta were threatened? Speaking on behalf of the people of the constituency of Humboldt—yes, and on behalf of the majority of the people of Saskatchewan—through you, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the government to disallow that act extending the life of the Saskatchewan legislature, which is one of the darkest blots on the annals of any democratic country. It is the very negation of democracy. Even though it is somewhat late for such action, I contend that the disallowance of this legislation is the least that can be done to remove that blot and to avoid the establishment of a dangerous precedent that might make a farce of our democratic system of government. On Monday, January 31, I was pleased to hear the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) state that he did not approve the idea of parliament extending its own life. I now appeal to him and to his ministers to take the necessary action to restore to the people of Saskatchewan their democratic rights. Some may argue that this government should not interfere in the domestic affairs of any province. In reply I say that the democratic rights of any part of this dominion should be of greater concern to us than the special privileges enjoyed by financial institutions.

There are other reasons why the electors of Humboldt constituency decided that they could no longer support this government. In the past they were prepared to march down the aisle to the altar of political union with the Liberal party to the strains of "Oh Promise Me", but that day is gone The people of Saskatchewan realize that the Liberal record has been a series of broken promises. While any fair-minded person realizes that in these trying times it is most difficult for any group of men to conduct the affairs of government, yet such fairness ceases to be a virtue if the people would continue to tolerate the inefficiency of this administration. When political expediency takes precedence over the safety of our country; when political patronage supersedes justice, then the people demand a change.

The great majority of the people of Humboldt constituency are farmers, and even most of the residents of the towns and villages depend for their livelihood on the purchasing power of the farmers. The greater part of this territory was settled some forty years ago by people of many races and creeds working together in a neighbourly way to carve out of the wilderness homes for themselves and their children. Scarcely had the sod shacks and log houses been constructed in a community before the neighbourhood got together and built a place of divine worship. They had faith in God; they loved their neighbours, and their desire was to have the opportunity to establish homes and raise their families in peace and security. With visions of comfort and security in the years to come, these pioneers cleared and broke large fields and raised enormous crops. Situated on the edge of the park belt, part prairie and part bush land, and dotted with many small lakes, the greater part of this territory never had a complete crop failure. Hundreds of millions of dollars worth of new wealth were produced in grain and live stock. These provident, hard-working people did not squander their money. Their homes are very modest; in fact many are quite inadequate to their needs. Very few made trips to California, and fewer still back to the land of their birth. But after all these years of hard toil, do you find these people enjoying the well-earned comfort and security that they are entitled to? Many are still struggling along, doing work far too heavy for their advancing years. Others have been forced to give up the struggle and eke out a drab existence under the so-called old age pension, while the great majority of them have only a load of debt to pass on to their children.

When an industrious people cooperate with a bountiful Providence with no better results than these, then there is something wrong somewhere. This may give hon. members some idea of what I mean. From the book "Down North" written by the British High Commissioner for Canada, Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, I quote:

> Such people have made Canada. They love the open spaces and their passion is to produce the fruits of the soil. But they sow the seeds also of greater things. Other people come after them and gather that harvest.

Though the right hon. gentleman wrote those lines in describing one small group of people with whom he had come in contact, they are equally descriptive of practically every farming community in western Canada.

Ever since the west has been settled the policies of the two old political parties have made it impossible for the farmer in the west to obtain a just return from the fruits of his labour. In spite of glowing promises, Liberals and Conservatives allowed their friends from other parts—yes, from other lands—to reap the harvest. These pioneers and their descendants still have faith in God. To produce the fruits of the earth is still their passion, but they have lost confidence in this administration.

For the information of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I can assure him that his Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), with all the resources and help at his command, left no stone unturned in trying to convince the electors of Humboldt constituency that the agricultural policy foisted on the west by this government was in their best interests. But for once the Minister of Agriculture found himself without a band wagon; so that finally in desperation he climbed on to the water wagon. For years the citizens of the town of Humboldt have been in need of an adequate water supply. Water for domestic use is being hauled to the town by tank wagons. For a number of years both the Canadian National Railways and the town council have made extensive but unsuccessful searches for the source of an adequate water supply. Just two days prior to the by-election last August, supporters of the Liberal party, carrying in honey tins samples of water which were alleged to have come in from some test holes several miles out of town, canvassed the town. Their stock-in-trade argument was that they were prepared to admit that the C.C.F. was going to win the constituency, but that the Minister of Agriculture had promised that if only the town of Humboldt would give the Liberal party a majority the necessary funds and the priority for pipes would be made available. The town of Humboldt did give my Liberal opponent a majority, although it is quite true that their former majority of 400 or 500 was cut down to around 30 votes. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the town did give the Liberal party a majority. What I wish to know is this: When is the Minister of Agriculture going to fulfil that promise?

While the citizens of the town of Humboldt were being given the water treatment by the Liberal board of strategy, the Minister of Agriculture's henchmen covered the constituency, promising each community according to its local desires. For example, in some sections they tried to lead the people to believe that an all-out war effort could be entrusted only to a Liberal administration and its supporters, while in other places the argument used was that the Liberal candidate was the one who could get their boys out of the army. However the electors refused to be sidetracked from the real issues, and voted want of confidence in the government, on the following grounds:

1. The failure of the government to protect the democratic rights of our citizens;

2. The hampering of our war effort by allowing the profit motive to dominate the war industries;

3. The refusal of the government to place agriculture on an equitable basis with other essential industries;

4. Failure to solve the man-power problem, and

5. The hampering of our farmers and small business men by unnecessary and bureaucratic restrictions and control.

On this occasion it is not my intention to deal with all these matters, because other hon. members have already dealt with some of them. But, as a farmer, and as the representative of an agricultural constituency, I wish to speak on behalf of the farmers. For a great number of years the farmers, with justification, asked for better grain prices. This was denied them, for one excuse or another. In later years we have been told that we could not have those higher prices because it would break the price ceiling. What the farmers would like to know is why their prices were frozen at less than the cost of production. On the other hand, spokesmen for the Liberal party urged the people that if they wanted a better deal for the west they should send more Liberal members to parliament.

I have been rather busy in the few days I have been in Ottawa, and have not had time to count the Liberal members from the prairie provinces. However there seems to be quite a number of them, and I have come to the conclusion that my colleague the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) and myself have more influence with the ministers than all these back-bench Liberals put together. The ninth of August had a startling effect upon the administration. It suddenly became aware of the fact that the farmers in the west meant business. Practically over night, ninety-cent wheat became dollar-and-a-quarter wheat. Roughly estimating this year's crop at a little less than 300,000,000 bushels, the farmers are about $100,000,000 better off in this one year alone because the electors of Humboldt and Selkirk refused to be kidded any longer.

There is no reason why that increase in price could not have been made five years ago. During that time the farmers producing grain have been penalized to the extent of at least $500,000,000—and, Mr. Speaker, out in my part of the country that is a lot of money. It would have helped to pay off quite a few mortgages. However I wish to warn the Minister of Agriculture that he and his government have not yet redeemed themselves in the eyes of western farmers. The maximum production of bacon has been seriously jeopardized by the hesitating and inadequate action of the government. The bonus for top-grade bacon hogs recently announced by the minister is just another example of too little and too late. We have heard quite a bit about hogs during the course of this debate. It is not my intention to elaborate on that. On the one hand, my colleague, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) showed that the producers of hogs were just about being rail-graded out of business supplying the export market. On the other hand, I should like to know about the pork products consumed in this country. Why is the producer of heavy hogs being penalized to the extent that he is? At least, why do not the consumers get the benefit? Do the consumers have the opportunity to buy any of this pork cheaper because it comes from heavy hogs?

Another matter of vital interest to western farmers with which I wish to deal is the unfair allotment of railroad cars for shipping grain. We all realized the urgent necessity during past years of making full use of all available storage space, and we were prepared to co-operate to fill up that space even to the extent of hauling some of our grain to elevators with which we did not want to do business. But having filled that space once, we object most strenuously to being compelled to refill that space time after time and to being denied the opportunity of delivering our grain to our own elevators. For example, at some points in the west, before this quota and car allotment system came into effect, our elevator handled from seventy-five to eighty per cent of the business, where now, through this unfair car allotment system, our volume has been forced down to forty per cent, and in some cases as low as thirty-five per cent. Someone somewhere, with the blessing of this government, has been playing sugar-daddy at our expense to the very interests that are opposed to our cooperatively owned elevators.

The other day I was pleased to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) announce that we were to have more cars allotted to where we needed them. Following that announcement I received a telegram from a man at Humboldt who had made it his business to find out just what the situation was in two municipalities in which there are ten shipping points, and he reports that of these ten shipping points seven are still without sufficient cars to enable them to handle their quota. He sent me a covering letter giving all the details, and after I am through with it I shall be pleased to give the details to the minister.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall be glad to have them.

Mr. BURTON: Those two municipalities constitute only a small part of my constituency, and Humboldt constituency is only a very small part of the west. When we have seven out of ten shipping points short of cars to handle the quota in only two municipalities, and we have fifty shipping points in Humboldt constituency, what about all the rest? I have not had an opportunity to make inquiries, but I am going to make it my business to do so, and I am going to take the minister at his word and inform him as to every shipping point that is short of cars.

Another thing that alarms me is that the agricultural policies of this government are forcing the family farm out of our national economy. More and more are we being forced on to a mass production basis. The only way the farm family can compete with modern mass production is by the use of the unpaid slave labour of the women and children on the farms. If it were only that the family farm was in danger I would not be so much concerned, but the very existence of the farm family is being severely threatened. Remember, the family unit is the very foundation of our nation, and statistics prove that the farm family is the keystone of our national life.

The family allowance forecast in the speech from the throne, if properly put into effect, will be of some assistance, but in itself, it cannot preserve the farm family. In addition, with the rest of the people of this country, we are entitled to know if this and the other legislation forecast in the speech from the throne is just another dream by the dreamer of twenty-five years ago.

I should like to say something about the man-power problem, but to deal properly with the man-power muddle we are in would take much more time than I have on this occasion, and I shall have to leave most of my remarks on that subject for some future occasion. I want to say this now, that if the government in their wisdom consider it necessary for the safety of our country to have fewer men on the farms and more men in the army, then let them say so, and then the farmers will know what is expected of them. But the government cannot expect us farmers to continue to produce the amount of foodstuffs which we are asked to produce unless provision is made to retain at least our experienced help.

In addition to that there are many farm boys who have already, I believe, spent sufficient time in the training camps, and who could now be allowed to return home on extended leave, subject to immediate recall in case of emergency. They would be of greater service to their country helping their folks at home than they are at present, kicking their heels around in these camps, with no place to go.

We have stepped up our production to the very limit of our present farm population, and to do that, the farm families are being driven beyond their endurance. Already there are signs of decreased production. This statement is confirmed in a pamphlet "Canada at War", No. 32, of January, 1944, issued by the wartime information board, on page 51 of which a table is shown giving the agricultural output per male farm worker. The table takes 1939 at 100, as a base, and shows that in 1940 and 1941 we had only eighty-nine per cent of our male workers left on the farms; in 1942 and 1943 we were down to seventy-five per cent. On the production side, again taking 1939 at 100, the table shows than in 1940 we produced 105 per cent; in 1941, 112 per cent, and in 1942, 186 per cent. That is a wonderful achievement. But at what a cost! I venture to say that the last three years have taken more than an extra ten years off the life of the average man and woman on the farm.

Now we come to the 1943 estimated production. With only seventy-five per cent of our workers left on the farms, we still produced 160 per cent of the 1939 basis. But we had an alarming drop of twenty-six per cent in our production from that of the previous year. Speaking in the Saskatchewan provincial legislature a year ago, I told the provincial minister of agriculture, who also acted on various boards for this government, that if they continued to drain our boys from the farms we could not meet the production goals set for us. A deaf ear was turned to my warning. But, Mr. Speaker, this table proves that I was right.

The question is, what are we going to do this year? In my opinion we are facing a still greater drop in production, especially in those lines most needed. I want to give just two examples of many which I could furnish right from my own constituency.

I have in mind one couple, a man and woman seventy years of age. They had no children of their own. They raised a nephew. When the war started that lad wanted to enlist. His uncle told him, "O.K.". The lad enlisted, but before he did so he made arrangements with a younger brother to take his place on his uncle's farm. The younger lad and the man proceeded to operate that farm. Right in the middle of harvest and threshing time that boy got his notice, his call, and he had to go—no ifs or buts about it. The old man told me, "Joe, if God continues to give me good health I shall be able to keep the weeds from running away with the farm, but I certainly cannot do the field work and at the same time do the necessary chores, with all this live stock, all these hogs that I have around. The result is," he said, "that they will have to go." That man carried on. I was seriously afraid that he would break down. Finally, this fall, he realized that he had to do what he said a year ago he would have to do; he had to dispose of his live stock. He used to have a considerable amount of live stock on his place, and now he has no more than he needs for himself and his wife. He is keeping the weeds from running away with the cultivated land; that is all, and more than all, he can do.

Another case: a man, who is now seventy-five years of age, for the past two years has stood on a tractor and operated the tractor and a 15-foot combine alone while his boy took the grain away from the combine. On that farm—again—they used to have live stock, hogs whose value ran into hundreds of dollars value every year. But these people could not carry on the other work which had to be done and at the same time do the necessary chores which live stock entails in our part of the country. What these people needed were, not high school boys and university students some of whom would not know a tractor from a combine, not that kind of help, but boys right from their own neighbourhood who would know how to operate and handle machinery, and which end of a cow to sit down to if they wanted a pail of milk.

Mr. PERLEY: And which side.

Mr. BURTON: I could give you dozens of examples of the same kind. We are going to run shorter and shorter of the very things we need to produce on the farms, because experienced help has been and is continuing to be drained away from us.

People of the Humboldt constituency have always been willing to do their part as citizens of this country. Enlistment records show that descendants of all racial groups in that constituency are serving in the various branches of the armed service while their elders are working and sacrificing to the limit of their ability to help bring about a victorious peace.

Within a short time we shall again be entering that season of the year when we commemorate the sufferings, death and resurrection of the Founder of Christianity. We also think of the sword of sorrow that pierced the heart of the Mother Mary as she stood at the foot of the cross and beheld her Son, the victim of man's wrongdoing, selfishness and greed. To-day for the second time within a quarter of a century the flower of our manhood, the youth of our nation, is being crucified on the cross of world selfishness and greed. What is yet in store for us no one can foretell, but this much is certain, the hardest part is yet to come. Before many months pass, many a mother will stand with her hands clasped to her breast, with a sorrow in her heart that only the mother Mary can understand. In view of this, the least we can do is so to fulfil our duties that these sacrifices and sufferings will not have been in vain.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I first present my compliments to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne; and may I particularly compliment the hon. member from Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) whose few remarks in French seemed to my untrained ear to be more understandable French than that of those who learned that language at their mother's knee.

Not a word was said in the speech from the throne, however, about the restoration of the supremacy of parliament over the executive. When the War Measures Act became operative by proclamation at the outbreak of war, it was necessary that the executive be given the power to legislate on the most vital matters affecting the life and security of our people. But after nearly five years, what a reflection on this government if it has not so organized the fighting forces and the production front at home that legislation by executive order should still be necessary! In the opinion of our people the executive is now an overholding tenant, tenacious and avaricious of dictatorial power. The exigency and need for haste in executive action without discussion among the people's representatives has long since passed. Surely the time has come when there should be some revision of the War Measures Act whereby the sovereignty of the people's representatives should be restored to them and exercised by them and not delegated to a handful of dictators who, in cabinet council, sit behind closed doors and order our people about as if they were no longer free men.

Typifying the methods of dictatorship of this government, which does not even consult its own mechanical Liberal majority, are the confessions of two Liberal members, one of whom said, in regard to order in council P.C. 9384 regulating wartime wages, "The government is run by a bureaucracy. The members are nothing, and I frankly admit it. If the order had gone through this house it would have been better prepared." And again, in answer to the remark that labour was being used as a guinea-pig for bureaucrats to experiment upon, a Liberal member said, "The members of parliament are dead guinea-pigs. I have never been consulted or called in on these measures. I admit there are powers behind the government and I know who they are." Assuming that the executive may still need emergency powers of dictatorship, does that excuse it for such flagrant abuses of such power? What an affront to the people's representatives! What a mockery of parliament! What a throwing of democracy into the discard!

The house leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) graphically pictured this bureaucracy by pointing out that since September 1, 1939, statutes passed by parliament have covered 838 pages, while proclamations, orders in council, war orders and regulations have required 5,791 pages—seven times as much legislation by executive order as by parliament. The people no longer run their own country. We are no longer a sovereign parliament. The government is a sovereign executive.

Mr. Speaker, very little has been said about that section of the speech from the throne which was undoubtedly inserted as a result of the speech by Lord Halifax. May I, however, correct an observation made by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay) in moving the address. From his knowledge of Lord Halifax's speech—which from his deductions I doubt if he has read, but has on the other hand rather relied on press clippings and editorial comments from his local newspapers—he appears to labour under a misconception of the purpose and content of the speech. Wherein would he find justification for his statement that: "The latest edition of these mysterious travellers is attempting, it seems, to refloat the foundered ship of the imperial federation"; and, again, "to shower upon us instructions which we shall term indiscreet to say the least"?

The people of Canada as well as the people of the whole British empire, indeed the people of the whole world, are acutely concerned with the achieving of an enduring peace. If a distinguished representative from another country accepts our invitation to visit us, surely he is entitled to fulfil the purpose for which he was asked to come, namely, to present worth-while thoughts for our consideration in respect of one of the gravest questions facing mankind.

As to the remarks of the member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), he seems not to have crept out of his colonial shell, which the rest of Canada has long since left behind. He said:

> So far as I am personally concerned, I feel that we should continue on our course of moving toward complete sovereignty within the British commonwealth of nations.

Does the hon. member think Canada is anything less than a sovereign power and has been anything less for many years, with power to save its national life or to lose it? Rather let me agree with the speech made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) in Hamilton recently, in which he is reported as having said:

> Canada is as much the master of her own foreign policy as is any sovereign state in the world of its same size; but neither Canada nor any state in the world can of course stand alone.

I think we shall admit that there are many small states in the world which have full sovereignty; but there are few if any who, for their own protection, do not find it necessary to move within the orbit of some larger constellation, if not within the orbit of the whole universe itself. I hope no one in Canada will be so ignorant of our true constitutional position as not to know that Canada is a free and independent country. If membership in that great British commonwealth of nations was thought to be any bar to this view, I have only to point to the peculiar and invidious position of the free state of Eire, whose constitution is so closely modeled on our own. While the future lies ahead, our present autonomous position should be plain to all our people. The decision taken at the forthcoming meeting of British commonwealth prime ministers will be far-reaching in its effect, affecting not only the destiny of the British empire but the destiny of the whole world. That decision may result in the strengthening of the forces for peace, or it may result in the beginning of the liquidation of the British empire, the greatest force for peace the world has ever known.

The people of Canada look forward with great interest to the amplification of the following statement in the speech from the throne:

> You will accordingly be invited to approve of Canadian participation in the establishment of an international organization to further national security through international cooperation.

There is little on the international horizon, with the exception of the declaration of principle contained in the Moscow agreement, to indicate what that international organization is likely to be. The failure of the last effort, a failure due in part to the uncooperative and blind policy of our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who was adamant in his refusal to apply sanctions to Italy, just as was the United States at an earlier date to support coercive measures with force when Japan invaded Manchuria, leaves little to inspire one with confidence in a new but similar organization. Do we find our own Prime Minister at the present time taking the lead in building up any international organization such as President Masaryk of Czechoslovakia took after the last war? The end we all seek is plain—peace, prosperity and the right to live our own way of life. But I for one have no intention of grasping at the shadow and losing the substance. Our security and trade lie primarily within the British empire, and old friends are best friends. Our propinquity and close relationship to our cousins in the United States can be strengthened, as can the whole world position, through our membership, first, in the British empire, and secondly, in an international organization.

In that brilliant editorial appearing in the Ottawa Journal this morning the theme was built around the following quotation: "No sight is more pathetic than to watch the perfect impede the good." Are we to be placed in the position of refusing to give up some aspect of our sovereignty within the British family of nations for our mutual protection and then to be asked to give up that same aspect of sovereignty to some international organization of strangers? If we cannot live as brothers within the British family it is unlikely that we can live happily as an international club. Let us not bask in the idle undertakings of the President of the United States, who in his Ivy Lea speech before the war undertook to protect Canada from attack when he was unable to protect even his own country. Are we to rely on a big cousin who every time our common liberty is at stake finds himself shot through with the cancer of isolationism? The Royal Navy has always been the protector of the American Atlantic seaboard; and only the constant readiness of that navy—ready, aye, ready—and the unconquerable courage of the Royal Air Force in the battle of Britain have given civilization the chance to preserve itself while the North American continent armed itself for the conflict. Yes, and in those pre lend-lease and pre-mutual aid days we and our United States cousins sent Britain a bill, to the extent of her ability to pay, for keeping the hun from the shores of North America. What a conception of international morality!

Turning to the domestic sphere we find that family allowances have been proposed in order to ensure a minimum of well-being and a closer approach to equality of opportunity to the children of this country. But one wonders why the government proposes this measure at the present time and if it is the intention of the government to implement that proposal immediately. It appears that in the mind of the government it is money that creates this closer approach to equality and this minimum of well-being; but unless the treasury of this country is inexhaustible it may well be that there are more necessary reforms which should be given a priority over family allowances. In estimating the cost of those family allowances, Doctor Charlotte Whitton, one of the foremost sociologists in North America, placed the figure at $400,000,000. We do not find, however, in President Roosevelt's bill of rights any mention of family allowances. He gives other matters concerning social legislation first place. Doctor Whitton has made ten suggestions which should be given consideration before we embark on any scheme of family allowances costing $400,000,000 a year. Doctor Whitton recommends:

1. More adequate protection for children without decent parental guardianship.

2. Custodial care for feeble-minded children, especially girls and young women.

3. Strengthening of family welfare and adult education services.

4. Better housing for rural and urban homes.

5. Electrical power and appliances for rural homes.

6. Better nursing care in all homes.

7. Enlargement of Canadian hospital resources.

8. Improvement of elementary schools in other than urban centres. This, Mr. Speaker, is one of the crying needs of our great country.

9. More free diagnostic clinics.

10. Food subsidies.

Where is the $400,000,000 to pay for family allowances coming from? The people are going to pay for these allowances; for that is the only place where it can come from. The total share of the national income now going to investment income, to those who own government and other bonds, stocks and mortgages, et cetera, is less than ten per cent. If that ten per cent of the national income is where the hon. gentlemen of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation say it is, in great concentrations, then it is obvious to all that with a personal income tax rate which runs up to well over ninety per cent there is practically nothing left after the state gets its take. Since nearly every family holds a government bond or an insurance policy—there are over three million holders of victory bonds in this country—we know that investment income is very widely distributed and it is perhaps not unreasonable to assume that not more than half of it is taken by taxation. Thus, of the ten per cent of the national income going to pay interest or dividends on the capital savings of the people, only half or five per cent would be left after the tax-gatherer has taken his as net income capable of being spent or reinvested. That does not leave very much for the government still to take. Even if capital were drained to the last drop it would not provide funds for more than a fraction of the social security programme outlined by this government.

If it is not obvious to all that the main burden will rest on the great mass of the people of Canada, then they should be told in no uncertain terms; for it is one thing to be delighted with gifts which other people pay for, but quite another thing to have gifts forced on one and then be sent a bill for the same at the end of the month, if the amount is not deducted from the weekly payroll. Is it any wonder, sir, that the president of the trades and labour congress, as well as the congress itself, inveighs against family allowances. Mr. Percy Bengough, president of the trades and labour congress, said:

> The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada has consistently opposed family allowance legislation. We are astounded that the suggestion is being made that workers' income be based on bare living standards to be increased by subsidies from the government according to the number of children.

They know who is going to pay for these allowances, and their fear is that the money will be collected at the source through some tax on industry, which, in the competitive struggle for world markets, will mean that their wage returns will not be as high as they otherwise would. Money, which is a claim on the goods and services of our fellowmen, does not grow on trees but is created by the sweat of the brain and the brow of the workers of this country, and the workers of this country not only are concerned with getting their fair share of the national income but in most cases prefer to spend that share as they best see fit, rather than to have a paternal government, no matter how well-intentioned, spend their own money for them.

At school one used to hear about the iron law of wages—an outworn economic theory—whereby labour was believed never to receive more than sufficient to maintain itself and to reproduce its kind. Is this government suggesting that that is the best standard of life which it can promise our workers? Labour is entitled to a fair wage, and when I say "fair" I mean that labour is entitled to most of the benefits arising through new ideas and more efficient methods of production. It is sufficient to leave the owners and managers just enough to keep them saving and working their heads off and their hearts out improving the general standard of living. But never let us kill the goose that lays the golden egg; for it is leadership, whether in statecraft, industry or elsewhere, which gives life to the mass. Without leadership we are lost. With fair wages and adequate unemployment insurance to cover any temporary period of unemployment, surely a worker can be paid enough to maintain himself and his family.

Family allowances undoubtedly have their uses, but unquestionably they have their abuses. Where the balance lies I am not prepared to judge at this moment; but if the people who are going to pay for it do not want this piece of paternalism I see no reason why it should be forced upon them.

The Prime Minister suggested that the speech from the throne divides itself naturally into three sections: first, the winning of the war; second, the transitional period from war to peace, and third, the resolutions for social security, presumably in the post-war period. It is important that we should know when the government plans to make operative a scheme such as family allowances, which at a time like the present is wholly inflationary in all its aspects. If one of the chief purposes of our victory loans is to drain off the surplus spending power which cannot be utilized because civilian goods are not available on which to spend it, then surely the pumping back of some hundreds of millions of dollars annually into the hands of the people at this time, through family allowances, will put a pressure on the price ceiling which will blow the lid to kingdom come. Is it any wonder that when the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), in seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne, mentioned that the government had found a way of effecting a much needed adjustment in farm income, through various measures for the financial benefit of our farmers, without increasing the danger of inflation, the colour in the face of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) mounted visibly? Perhaps the rosy effusion was for other seasons, but the coincidence was most marked, for no one knows better than the minister the danger of every hand-out to our people, no matter how well justified, is to the price ceiling. Greater than the wrongs which are sought to be remedied is the danger of inflation which may well be brought about by the very means used as a cure for the lesser evil.

When speaking on the need for social security measures I have always expressed the hope that the Christian spirit of brotherhood among our people would be sufficient for them to be willing to introduce such measures as are necessary not only for the protection of those who are less strong but also for the protection of those who may be strong but who, because of the impingement of world events upon our economy, from time to time may suffer hardship. Some forms of social security measures undoubtedly are necessary because of our dependence upon world trade, as the fourth or fifth trading country in the world, and because we cannot be entirely masters of our own economy, whether that economy be capitalism, socialism, fascism or communism.

Let us look first at our whole social security programme. It must be based upon our post-war plans and outlook, just as the Beveridge plan for social security is based on not more than ten per cent unemployment. Instead of enacting social security measures piecemeal, let us sketch the whole canvas before filling in the detail and throwing the whole picture out of balance. Let the people of this country have a look at the total financial commitments they will have undertaken in regard to social security and other measures before they are asked to rush headlong along any one particular field. Health insurance I should consider an exception to this general rule, because the good health of the people not only reflects adherence to a humanitarian principle but is a sound investment.

In the consideration of the over-all financial obligations we are about to undertake, let us have an eye to the means whereby they will be paid for. I have already declared that the great mass of our people are the only source left to bear the major part of the burden; but our people are also concerned with the rate of taxation, not only on themselves as individuals but on themselves as employees of business organizations which must be allowed to live if they are to give leadership in supplying the goods which will raise the standard of living and at the same time create jobs. If the government wishes to consider post-war planning it must consider first what kind of economy we are going to have. If enterprise is stifled through taxation burdens which kill incentive, then it is perhaps better that we should at once lose our freedom and become a totalitarian state rather than suffer a slow, lingering and blood-letting death through a policy which stifles all development and all new employment. In a recent speech Wendell Willkie said:

> When peace comes taxes must be minimized rather than maximized in order to stimulate the flow of goods, the taking of risks and the creation of millions of jobs. We must solve the post-war tax problem, not by imposing the biggest possible rates on our income, but by creating the biggest possible income on which to impose relatively modest rates.

Let the government declare itself so that both small and large business men may know where they stand, so that they may plan for job creation. During the war there has been no need for new industries for the production of civilian requirements which would give our people a more abundant life. Indeed the demands of war production made it desirable that the dead hand of heavy taxation and priorities should be laid upon new business ventures for civilian consumption. With victory that position will change, and the business man must know where he stands if he is to create employment, a field in which he is particularly qualified to give leadership if he is not interfered with by political agencies whether they be of the national or international variety.

Time will not permit me to discuss socialism, but I point out that while this government makes no profession of state ownership of private industry, through its taxation measures not only has it captured one hundred per cent of all war profits of industry, which is perhaps as it should be, but it has cut itself in, through the minimum taxation on any business, to the extent of forty per cent of the average amount which that business earned in the four pre-war years 1936 to 1939. Thus the government takes not only all new profits, but forty per cent of all pre-war profits even if the company is earning less than it did in peace time. And this, Mr. Speaker, goes one better than socialism; for the government bears no risk whatsoever of loss, and at the same time has never put up one cent of the capital which goes into the ownership and creation of those industries. Can business be expected to survive and develop under such conditions as those, under a "heads I win, tails you lose" policy, where there is no reward for the assumption of risk and there is thus no offsetting recovery for the losses which business sustains when the dreams and hard work of businessmen, whether in the field of industry or commerce or in the development of natural resources, go awry and the only dividends are losses?

The reference to the creation of an industrial development bank as a subsidiary to the Bank of Canada in order to provide both fixed and working capital for the conversion of industrial plants has not so far been mentioned in this debate, and I desire to make a few observations before the resolution is brought down or the bill debated. Indeed, while the government often borrows good ideas which are developed by the opposition in the debate on the resolution, it is even better to have suggestions accepted before the administration allows its preconceived notions to crystallize and thus obstruct the acceptance of a major change in principle or organization.

In the post-war period there will undoubtedly be many cases where an intermediate credit bank is both desirable and needed. The reconversion of war industry to peace industry —from production to kill to production to live—will entail many problems and many risks.

Despite the recommendation of the British Macmillan commission of 1931 and the need for such intermediate credit facilities in peace time, no great development ever took place. Being interested in the possibilities of such business in Canada, I called on the managing director of such a company in the city of London in 1937 and came away with the impression that while the idea was theoretically sound, it was practically of little value because of the great amount of time that had to be given to the oversight and operation of the small borrowing companies. In ordinary times it is not likely that the application of more than one borrower in twenty could be accepted. The post-war problem of Canadian industry may well be different and the bank's usefulness to the country in the transitional period from war production to peace production need not be determined solely by the profit motive. The benefit of job creation may more than offset any losses of such a bank to the public treasury if reasonable business judgment is used.

It was indicated that such a bank will be a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. May I suggest that there is no possible connection between the kind of credit granted by a central bank and the financing of industrial development. The two types of mind necessary for success of each would seem incompatible. The industrial development bank takes on many of the lesser aspects of an investment planning board. The training of commercial bankers is not such as would normally fit them for the operation of an industrial development bank.

The British Macmillan report said in regard to such banks:

> The best course might be if the leading private institutions and the big banks were to cooperate in creating one or more such concerns. We understand that the creation of the Bankers' Industrial Development Company was due originally to the belief that help in these directions might be given to industry by the City, which was not being given. We have been told, however, that the authorities of the Bank of England consider, as we do, that these are not proper permanent functions for a subsidiary of a central bank. It would seem desirable, therefore, that the Bankers' Industrial Development Company should at a convenient stage be definitely separated from the Bank of England, have an independent existence, and rely upon its profit-making capacity as a private institution. It is possible that it might form a nucleus for that closer cooperation between finance and industry which we think is required.

The judgment required for the extension of credit for machinery and fixed assets requires an entirely different background from that required for either central or commercial banking. There is a much closer affinity with the judgment required of some of the leading personnel of the Department of Munitions and Supply. The proper procedure is to set up an industrial development bank entirely separate and distinct from any existing bank or government department.

Better still, if the government would announce its post-war business tax intentions and restore the life impulse to industry, it might well find that there was no necessity for the establishment of the bank under government auspices with the taxpayers standing the brunt of any losses. If the credits are economically justified they will be self-supporting and will be financed by private capital if the government does not continue its "heads I win, tails you lose" taxation policy in regard to new ventures.

The reconversion of industry must be planned for now, if we are successfully to reestablish 1,500,000 of our best young men and women out of the armed services and war industry. Under proper legislation as to social services, as to supplemental public works when necessary, as to business regulation and as to private incentive, we may look forward to the useful employment of 1,500,000 additional people. With the product of their services added to our present civilian production we may confidently look forward to a better way of life than we have yet known.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MAURICE BOURGET (Lévis): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, before the conclusion of the debate on the address, I should like to make a few brief remarks on some features of the speech from the throne which, in my opinion, are particularly interesting.

I was glad to read that the government recognizes the family and the home as "the foundation of national life" and that "in order to aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, the members of this house would be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances".

That matter was broached long ago and I do hope that the implementing of such a plan will not be indefinitely postponed. For some time, many rumours (which fortunately had no official character) were abroad to the effect that such allowances would be limited to a certain number of children in each family. I have every reason to believe that those rumours are groundless, and that the government will introduce into such a generous, humanitarian and necessary legislation no feature that might bring about a lowering of the birth-rate in this country.

I, for one, will heartily support that measure and I have no doubt that it will apply to all children. Does not that legislation aim at helping the heads of families, and especially those who have many children? At first sight, it is hard to understand any restriction in its application, because the heads of large families are generally those who are most frequently in need of government help.

In some European countries, and especially in England, the authorities having noticed, not so long ago, a steady lowering of the birth-rate and viewing with the greatest concern its direful consequences for the nation, have appointed a commission empowered to investigate the causes of such a situation and suggest possible remedies. I have no accurate recollection of the recommendations made by that investigating commission set up in England, but I am sure that a measure like the one providing for family allowances was suggested with a view to improving the situation and increasing the birth-rate. I do believe that were the principle of granting allowances—subject to no restriction, of course—adopted in Canada, we would soon notice the advantages of such a measure.

Another feature of the speech from the throne has particularly impressed me. I refer to "the measure to amend and supplement existing housing legislation".

With the hon. members who have already dealt with that matter—and I wish to single out my colleague and friend the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Durocher)—I wish to emphasize the serious problem that exists especially in centres where war industries are to be found. Such towns are now facing a serious housing problem which becomes more acute as the month of May draws nearer.

I know that many of our towns where dockyards are established have experienced a population increase. The housing problem has reached a point where it has become urgent that the government step in to help these municipalities whose financial resources render it impossible for them to solve this problem brought about by the war.

I have already, on many occasions, in the course of a year or so, discussed this deporable condition with some ministers, especially those from the vicinity of the city of Quebec. They are showing some interest in this matter and I hope my efforts will have practical results. Because of the urgency and importance of the conditions obtaining, I wish to call this matter to the attention of the house.

It seems to me that the government should help these municipalities by granting subsidies that would allow persons who will be without a home next May to start building houses immediately. It may be said that the war will soon be over and that the towns will then have a number of unoccupied houses. I do not hold that view for, in my opinion, many of the people who have moved from rural districts during the last four or five years, to work in our cities, will stay in urban centres after the war and it will naturally be necessary to find hygienic and comfortable houses for them.

Another plan that might be considered by the government would be that of granting loans at a small interest, 1½ or 2 per cent, for example, in order to make it easier for those of small means to get the funds necessary for the construction of dwelling houses. It might be advisable to set up an organization that would work and cooperate with the municipalities and individuals concerned.

In view of the urgent need of solving this problem, the government should see that such an organization is set up immediately to ensure that we shall not have to face a serious condition at some future date. Besides fulfilling an urgent need, such a measure would be very commendable from the social point of view, and, what is more, would help to increase the number of small property owners which unfortunately is at too low a figure. I hope the government will soon introduce a bill to remedy this evil or submit to the municipalities concerned some project in this connection.

Another matter on which I wish to dwell particularly, is the labour question, since I have the honour of representing in this house a constituency, peopled mostly by workers, in fact, it is probably the best labour constituency.

Since the beginning of the war, we have unfortunately witnessed strikes and disputes of all kinds between employer and employee. I do not wish to be unfair to anybody, but, during the last few years, in the course of which I have been more closely associated with both employers and employees, I have been led to believe that the cause of all these misunderstandings do not originate exclusively from faulty legislative measures, but, above all from the lack of cooperation between industrial leaders and workers and mutual mistrust.

I am sorry to have noticed so often that some industrial leaders, trying at all cost to keep the workers in the virtual state of slavery—if I may so express myself—which existed before the war, do not seem ready to abandon this method and will neither trust the leaders of trade unions nor cooperate with them for the purpose of improving their relations and thereby increasing production in their industries.

I should now like to point out that I do not claim the workers are always right, but I simply wish to mention what struck me during my interviews with company officials and workingmen, ever since I have had the honour of representing the constituency of Lévis in this house.

It is quite logical to say that good legislation naturally helps to promote better relations between capital and labour, but I can state confidently that it remains ineffective until these two classes have developed good understanding and mutual trust.

To my mind, the worker should be reasonable in his claims, and should work to the extent that his employers expect of him; on the other hand, the employers should show greater fairness in dealing with the workers and treat them not as hirelings but rather as collaborators and devoted servants.

I wish to state here that I am in favour of private enterprise. On the other hand, I warn those who are most vitally concerned in the maintenance of this system after the war to change some of the methods which they are using at the present time; otherwise, they will compel our leaders to exercise a more rigid control over these industries so that better understanding may prevail in our industrial undertakings.

I take this opportunity to call the attention of the government, and especially of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) upon the administration of the various laws under his department. I have found that there was a lack of supervision in the administration of these laws. Commercial firms appear to have too much latitude, and they interpret in their own way, and frequently to their advantage, of course, the various measures passed by the government.

Such methods naturally breed discontent within the labouring classes. Sometimes blatant injustices are committed and the government has no opportunity to intervene. I understand that the Industrial Relations Branch, which comes under the Department of Labour, is doing excellent work in this field. Unfortunately, it is inadequately staffed, and the adjustment of the grievances which are too frequently reported is unduly delayed. I have personally found that certain grievances have remained unsettled for two or three months due to the fact that this particular branch of the Department of Labour was short of inspectors.

I would therefore ask the Minister of Labour to see to it that his staff is increased so that any misunderstandings which may arise may be adjusted with as little delay as possible.

In "Facts and Figures" published by the wartime information board, I read recently that:

> On January 21, 1944, the honourable Minister of Munitions and Supply and the honourable Minister of Labour released a joint statement announcing the recent establishment by order in council of an industrial cooperation board, entrusted with the duty of assisting and promoting the appointment of labour-employer joint committees in war industries.

Personally I am in favour of the setting-up of such a board. Production committees have already been organized in some industries. Representatives of both employers and employees sit on these committees. Unfortunately—and here again, due to the lack of confidence and good will between employers and employees—these organizations have proven ineffective. The employees, realizing that the suggestions which they were making in order to increase production and reduce costs, were not put into practice, simply discontinued, in some cases, to sit on such production committees.

Under the circumstances, the government's purpose in appointing such a commission is praiseworthy, but I hope that the new body will be able to function properly. Otherwise that new commission will not achieve results such as we might expect from it.

I wanted to make those few remarks, Mr. Speaker, not for the mere purpose of criticizing private companies, but rather to help in the improvement of the relations between capital and labour.

I should like to say a few words on another matter; I know that we shall have an opportunity to discuss it when the budget is brought down, but, in passing, I request again the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to remove the tax on the salary paid for overtime.

I sincerely believe that the amount collected by the government in the form of such a tax is not very large and that the removal of the tax would greatly enhance production. As a matter of fact, everyone realizes that such a tax has the effect of discouraging workers from doing any overtime.

Last year the Minister of Finance had promised that he would look into that matter. I hope that, when the next budget is brought down we shall have the pleasure of learning that such a tax will no longer hinder war production.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say a word about immigration? In my opinion that subject should be dismissed, at least for the time being, because its discussion proves useless.

We have noticed for some time past that some war plants were laying off thousands of employees on account of the lack of work. Therefore, nothing should be done that might increase the unrest and bring us back to the pre-war depression years. Before any immigration plan is considered, all our people who are physically fit should be given an opportunity to obtain work. Once the employment problem is solved, the immigration question can be considered, a wise selection being made as regards those accepted as new citizens of this country.

In that particular, we shall not be influenced by those pilgrims who come here every year to deliver speeches and teach us lessons. We are old enough to take care of ourselves, and I hope that authoritative advice along those lines will be imparted to such people.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are the few observations I wanted to make in this debate. Before resuming my seat, I should like to express the opinion that, when this war is over, the new world which will emerge will not be entirely free from poverty, hardship and anxiety. Nevertheless, with the help of the new beneficial legislation which is imperative and which will be administered with equal fairness to all classes of society, I hope we will be able to bring about and maintain a better understanding, which will be all to the good of the country. May this disastrous war soon come to an end, and may the good days of a beautiful and intense family life be restored to all homes which at present stand empty.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne has been hailed by the section of the press that supports the government as a remarkable document, full of promise for a better day. We of this group welcome its few good points, but we are in duty bound to point out its serious shortcomings. Our criticisms of the speech are in the main two. First of all we are skeptical lest the government fail to reduce the proposals contained in the speech to actual legislation to be enacted before this session ends. Our second criticism is one that we feel is shared by the entire country, namely, that the suggestions in the speech do not begin to go far enough. They do not even scratch the surface of the tremendous problems facing us at the present time.

To turn for a moment to our first criticism, our scepticism as to whether anything will be done following the giving of this speech, let me call attention first of all to the kind of language in which the speech abounds. One paragraph starts something like this, that "in the opinion of my ministers," and so on, "plans . . . . should be advanced as rapidly as possible." Plans should be advanced! Further, certain things "are contemplated." We suggest, Mr. Speaker, that language of that kind, in the face of the tremendous problems which we had hoped would be dealt with in the speech from the throne, is adequate ground for our scepticism as to whether anything will come of this speech. Surely the phrase, that "a broad programme has already been developed for the reestablishment of veterans," sounds hollow after the remarks of other members, particularly the speech yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). I find that another paragraph states that "the maintenance of full employment will require"—and a long list of things is given—but no suggestion is made as to how these requirements are to be met. There is another paragraph, to which attention has already been called from this corner, that states: "When suitable agreements are reached with the provinces, my ministers will be prepared to recommend" measures for social advancement.

Not only are we led to be sceptical by this language in the speech from the throne, but we take that position because of what has happened during the course of this debate. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who usually speaks at considerable length in this debate and deals in detail with the items in the speech from the throne, surprised us this year by delivering a rather brief speech, by dealing hardly at all with the speech from the throne, and by failing completely to touch upon the paragraphs that suggest social security and other measures of post-war advancement. Not only has the Prime Minister failed to give us any dissertation concerning this glorious document, but not another member of the cabinet has risen in his place to outline for us the glories of the speech or to sell to us the proposals and the promises that are suggested in it.

We are told to-day that it is the desire of the government that the vote be taken on the address to-night. I assume it will be taken to-night or not later than to-morrow, and yet up to this point neither the Prime Minister nor any other member of the government has dealt with the suggestions in the speech from the throne which have excited the interest of the Liberal press throughout the country.

We are quite convinced that the speech, even if its suggestions were to be enacted, does not go far enough, and it is really a bitter disappointment to the people of Canada at this time. Canadians everywhere realize, whether the government does or not, that once victory has been won, there will be required on that day for Canadians almost two million jobs. We suggest therefore, whether that day is soon or even not so soon, that it is high time that some proposals were set forth to deal with that basic requirement of almost two million jobs for Canadians when victory in the field has been won. It is on the background of that basic need that we feel that the speech is a bitter disappointment.

The times call for a really broad plan that will provide jobs, certainly not just for the sake of jobs, but that will also provide for meeting the post-war needs of our people, for seeing to it that our workers and farmers are given a chance to provide the things that are needed and also a chance to enjoy them when they are provided. We suggest that in the fields that are basic, housing, clothing and food, there should be enunciated at this stage plans that will provide for the employment of our people and in turn for the distribution of these things among our people for their enjoyment.

This war has taught us among other things the importance of the market here at home, and the needs and requirements of our own people. We have learned that particularly in the matter of food. We have discovered that whereas before the war we had huge surpluses, while some of us were pointing out that thousands of our people were underfed, now even with our productive resources in food being strained to the limit we are able to make use of all that we are producing because our people, in city and country alike, have better incomes and are able to translate their needs into an actual economic market for food. We suggest that, important as international trade is, valuable as it can be to the economic welfare of our country and to the countries with which we trade, the important thing is to see to it that we pay attention to the market to be found in the needs of our own people. It is on that basis that we are highly critical of the speech from the throne brought down in this critical year, at this critical stage of our history, with these tremendous problems facing us, with the experience of the war, in which we have learned what can be done by national organization, yet with no suggestion that the government is prepared to institute economic planning in such a way as to provide jobs for our people and the things that our people need.

I should like to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, in connection with social security, to which there are references in the speech from the throne, but no promises of any measure except the measure relating to family allowances. This measure has been brought in along with a restrictive labour policy, P.C. 9384. This government's labour policies have made organized labour wonder whether this otherwise desirable social service is being brought in simply as a substitute for an adequate wage policy. Apart from that one measure, the other references to social security which are found in the speech from the throne are so many pious promises and suggestions as to what should be done, what is contemplated and so on. The fact is that social security can only be provided adequately if we have an economy that is functioning to its maximum capacity. I do not wonder that the ministers have not risen in their places to discuss the speech from the throne. There is nothing definite there to discuss along the line of social security and post-war social progress. When they do start to discuss these plans and suggestions for social security they will have to give us some hint or at least answer questions as to how such schemes are to be provided and maintained. The fact of the matter is, if we are prepared to establish economic planning and social ownership of the basic means of production so that we can put our economy on a full-fledged basis, then literally there is nothing in the field of social security that we cannot provide if we have a mind to. The question of how it is to be paid for largely disappears. We of this group have pointed out again and again that social security is not something that is to be had for nothing. It has to be paid for; but the real cost of social security, like anything else that a community has and enjoys, is to be found in the labour that people expend and in the raw materials we use. We have these things in this country, vast labour power, tremendous resources of raw materials. We are asking in the name of the better world for which this war is being fought that there now be given us a plan to put these things together so that we may have a full-fledged economy, jobs, homes, food, clothing, and on top of that a social security programme adequately maintained and guaranteed because of a proper basis in that kind of economy. That is the reason for the amendment moved by the leader of this group, which we are supporting, an amendment which points out that the government has failed to propose the fundamental social changes and economic planning which are necessary if we are to have full employment and if we are to provide and maintain adequate social security.

I should like to turn to something else that is along the line of social security. Apart from the fact that the speech from the throne makes only pious references to social security; apart from the fact that no basis has been provided for sustaining an adequate programme of social security, I should like to say to the government that if it wishes the country to think that it means business in the field of social security and care of our people in time of need, there are certain steps that the government can take without any further delay. I mention first of all old age pensions. It has already been demonstrated that the government can take action to make changes with respect to old age pensions, even changes with respect to the amount that is paid, by order in council, without seeking amendments to the old age pensions legislation. It has done so by raising the maximum amount payable to $25 a month. I urge again that members of the government realize that it is ridiculous, if not criminal, to ask our old people in this day and age, under living conditions as they are to-day, to try to exist on $25 a month. If I were to suggest that the Prime Minister, who will reach the age of seventy this year, should try it, I would be told that that is a ridiculous suggestion. I would be reminded that the Prime Minister has made a tremendous contribution to the well-being of Canada. Granted, but that is exactly the point we are making. When our old people from coast to coast have reached the age of seventy they, too, have made a contribution to the welfare and to the well-being of this country, a contribution on the basis of which they deserve something better than $25 a month. Not only should the amount be raised to $30 or $40 a month, but the age limit most certainly ought to be lowered. If the government wants to argue that it should not do some of these things without bringing the matter before parliament, my first reply is, bring it before parliament and it will receive support without any question, I am sure, from all sides of this house.

But apart from that there are certain other things that the government could do without delay. Let me give a few details. According to the old age pensions legislation as it now stands a pensioner qualifies for his pension either on the day that he becomes seventy years of age or on the day that the old age pension authority in the province has received all of the necessary documents, whichever of those dates is the later. This means that in many a case an old age pensioner who was entitled to draw his pension from the day he was seventy years of age, must wait two or three months because of that technicality. I happen to know that some of the provincial governments have appealed to this government to change that regulation. I suggest that this should be done without delay.

Another point is that the act and the regulations as they now stand say that if a person becomes seventy—let us assume in this case the other qualification about getting all the papers in is in order—on the 1st day of March, he will draw his pension as from the 1st day of March; but if seventy years ago the stork was two or three minutes late, so that a person becomes seventy on the 2nd day of March he does not draw his pension until as from the 1st day of April. There is no proportioning of the amount at all. I know that many a pensioner becomes utterly disillusioned when he comes up against this fact, that he loses twenty-seven, twenty-eight or twenty-nine days of his pension, merely because he was not born on the first day of the month.

There is another thing that bothers these people—and I stress these things, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me that this is the point of contact of many people with the government, and it is on the basis of this contact that people form their opinions about political democracy and government. I think it is highly important that we refrain from disillusioning and discouraging people in this way. Here is the case of a man who turned seventy in the month of December and became eligible for his pension as from January 1 of this year. Last year, when he was not on pension, despite his years and ill health he picked up $80 by doing odd jobs. This year there is no chance of his earning any money whatever, because of the condition of his health, but because he earned $80 last year the old age pension authority has to rule that he may earn $80 this year, which is $15 more than he is allowed to earn in addition to his pension in the province of Manitoba, so that the $15 or $1.25 a month is subtracted from his pension. Actually this man is not making any money this year, and will not make any; but when the year is over he will have no chance as long as he lives to pick up that meagre $15 that was deducted from his pension.

I might go on with other cases. I stress the point that this sort of thing is disillusioning to many people, and it is on this basis that many people form their opinion of democracy. It is high time that changes were made in the regulations respecting old age pensions.

Other matters that should be dealt with are the regulations concerning the transfer of property, liens on property, and all that sort of thing, which have made old age pensions only pre-death loans. I shall take only a sentence to refer to the blind, the deaf and other handicapped people. I support most heartily the appeal which has been made in this house on several occasions by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) that Canada do something more for these people.

I wish to say a word also on behalf of the veterans of the last war and their widows. I agree with the appeals that have been made during this debate on behalf of those being discharged from the services at the present time and those who will have to be demobilized when the war is over, but at the same time we must not forget the veterans of the last war and their widows. To my way of thinking the pension legislation, as well as the War Veterans' Allowance Act, needs to be overhauled. I know the story that is told of how generous this legislation is in many cases; but those I run up against appear to have attached to them strings of one kind or another by reason of which the veteran who has offered his life for his country finds that, though his later days are ruined as far as health is concerned, he can get nothing but a cold refusal on the ground of some technicality. Therefore I appeal for an overhauling of the Pension Act and the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Similarly I want to make a further appeal on behalf of the widows of veterans of the last war. These do not form a very large group; politically they are not of special consequence in any particular constituency, but they deserve better treatment than we are giving them. The other day we welcomed the announcement by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) of a possible increase in the amount paid to these women. I call attention to the fact, however, that as yet this increase to $30 and a few cents a month has not been made basic for all these widows; the order in Council merely says that they may be paid up to that amount. I hope that order in council will be amended shortly by another that will make this amount, if not more, the basic payment to these widows. When this matter was before the house last year the minister promised or at least told us that while at that time we were only voting an item of money, this year he hoped to bring down legislation to care for these people on a permanent basis. I had hoped there might be some reference to such legislation in the speech from the throne, or by the minister if he took part in this debate, but as yet there has been no reference to it. Another point in connection with widows of veterans of the last war is that when the amount payable to them was increased the other day the ceiling on the total income they might have was not increased, except in the case of those who might have up to $25 a year of unearned income. The widow who in the past may have supplemented her allowance with a little money that she earned by going out and doing odd jobs may do so no longer, because the new regulation provides that she may receive up to $365 a year from the war veterans' allowance board provided she has no other income. In other words, the ceiling, apart from unearned income, is exactly where it was before this increase was made. I appeal as strongly as I can to the Minister of Pensions and National Health and to the government to take these matters under serious advisement.

While on the subject of the widows I would stress also the difficulties we have been running into in connection with the provision that nothing can be given to the widow of a veteran unless that veteran saw service in an actual theatre of war. Does the minister not know that there are scores if not hundreds of widows whose husbands got to England in the last war, some of whom were injured while on active service in England, but to whom nothing is available because of the definitions contained in the order in council? I appeal for the withdrawing of that line of distinction, which is working out as an unjust discrimination against a large number of these women.

I should like to turn for a moment or two now, Mr. Speaker, to the new wartime wages control order, order in council P.C. 9384. There is no reference to this order in council in the speech from the throne except the oblique reference to the necessity of maintaining wage stabilization. On the second day of this session, when I asked the Prime Minister if he would set aside a period for discussion of this order, he expressed doubt as to my inference that there was wide and active protest against it. I am sure he now knows that there is wide and active protest, for it has been expressed frequently on the floor of this house and the matter has been drawn to his attention in statements by members supporting the government not only in the house but even more bluntly outside the house, within the past few days. The reasons for labour's opposition to this order are well known. First of all there is the failure on the part of the government to consult labour before this order in council was brought down. There is also the fact that labour's representation on the national war labour board has been reduced from one in three to one in six Then there is the fact that the order makes possible the freezing of gross injustices, practically in so many words; for it is provided that nothing can be done about changing wage rates unless there are gross injustices or inequalities, and even then nothing can be done by way of raising those rates if that would increase the price of the product the manufacturer has to sell. The order also gives power to the national war labour board to reduce wages, to order a change from a time rate to a piece rate or, in that very lovely phrase of the order, an incentive rate. Then there are the provisions which are so drastic against labour's last resort, the strike weapon, and the other provisions which run so counter to British justice and which already have been brought to the attention of this house. I refer to the clauses which place the onus of proof of innocence upon the accused employee.

There is just one good thing about this order. It has united labour; it has shown labour the utter inability of a capitalist government to treat labour as a partner even in time of war. One hears rumours of various kinds around the halls of these buildings. I have been interested in the rumours that are circulating to the effect that the government may yet rescind this order and replace it with one not quite so drastic. Whether there is anything to these rumours or not, I do not know; but I certainly hope the government will do something in response to the appeals and protests, and that they will do it early, certainly before February 15 which, according to the terms of the order, is the date upon which it comes into full effect.

I should like now to turn to another matter to which reference was not made in the speech from the throne, but which was introduced into the debate by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). I refer to the question of post-war civil aviation. The other day the hon. member roundly condemned the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) for refusing a licence to certain private interests which wanted to operate a service between Halifax and Saint John. I take the opposite view from the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and in this instance I am going to commend the Minister of Munitions and Supply for his action. I say quite frankly that my reason for offering my commendation is that I learned from an editorial in the Montreal Gazette that the private enterprise which sought the licence was none other than the Canadian Pacific Air Lines.

But while I commend the minister for his action in that instance, I am afraid I have no option but to follow my commendation with condemnation of the government for its action, particularly in the north and northwest, by means of which it is literally giving away to this privately-owned concern, Canadian Pacific Air Lines, something that is of great value to us—our northern country. Speaking in terms of aviation, the value of our great north country is obvious, as far as international flying is concerned. I should like, too, to stress the fact that there is also in that area great value domestically. There is a tremendous amount of mineral wealth in that great north country, and possibilities for settlement beyond our dreams. Yet at the present time, the air being practically the only means of communication with that country, we are literally giving it over to this privately-owned enterprise which, incidentally, has a very interesting tie-up with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, in the matter of aviation there is no such thing as private enterprise. Private enterprise in flying would mean that every individual concern would build its own airports, would establish its own meteorological services, would set up its own radio beams. What a hodge-podge we would have! Under such a set-up where would there be safety for the travelling public in this new means of transport?

Hon. members know what has been done. The people of Canada through their government, and rightly so, have invested huge sums of money—I believe our investment is now at least $200,000,000, if not more—in the building of airports, lighting facilities, radio, meteorological services and the like. Actually, flying is a public service which the public, through government funds, has to make possible. I call as my witness for this view none other than one of the former leaders of the Conservative party in this house, the Right Hon. R. B., now Viscount, Bennett. Hon. members who were in the house in those days or who have studied the debates for 1937 will recall that when the Trans-Canada Air Lines bill was before the house the then Right Hon. Mr. Bennett appealed to the government not to give away something then held by the people of this country. As a matter of fact it appears that he was able to exert some influence upon the government at that time. I call not only Viscount Bennett as witness, but also the Winnipeg Free Press, which has been quite definite on this point. Although I have not time to quote from it, I have before me an article which appeared in that newspaper on May 12, 1943, entitled "TCA versus CPA". The Free Press points out that so far as flying on main line and international lines is concerned, there is simply no such thing as private enterprise. The people have a basic interest and concern in this matter, which must not be given away.

We should realize that aviation can add tremendously to the wealth of Canada. It is not just a matter of having planes available for the use of a few individuals who need to make a quick trip. Planes, like trains, can add to the wealth of our country and the people in it, even though many of those people may never travel by plane. We must see to it that the wealth which can be added to the life of this country by this new means of transportation and communication is not given away to private enterprise, and I appeal to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, whom I have already commended for his action in one respect, to take this matter under serious advisement, lest we find that we have given away something which should be held for the people of Canada.

If I may add just one further word in this connection, I would mention the international field, concerning which I feel the government of the day should take certain steps. This is a matter of great importance to Canada. Frankly, if private monopolies in various countries are able to put over the idea of what is miscalled freedom of the air, so that private companies are free to fly anywhere and everywhere, Canada stands to lose. If we go to the other extreme and build a fence around each country, so that the national lines of various countries can fly only within their own borders, again Canada stands to lose. There is one basis upon which Canada stands to gain. The one basis upon which our geographical position, valuable as it is, will not be circumvented, is in international control of the international air routes of the world.

In that connection I wish to refer to an announcement made by the Australian High Commisisoner to Canada on January 24, in which he drew the attention of this country to an agreement signed on January 21 of this year by representatives of the governments of New Zealand and Australia. Let me quote one or two of the more important paragraphs of this New Zealand-Australian agreement:

(17) The two governments agree that the regulation of all air transport services should be subject to the terms of a convention which will supersede the convention relating to the regulation of aerial navigation.

(18) The two governments declare that the air services using the international air trunk routes should be operated by an international air transport authority.

There are in the agreement other sections of equal importance. I have not time to read them, but I am earnestly hoping that at an early date the government will take a stand similar to that which these two governments have taken, lest Canada find herself, despite our present favoured geographical position, out in the cold.

In closing, I understand the vote may be taken to-night or to-morrow. Our subamendment, coming first, will naturally have the support of this group, to a man, because we believe that it expresses what is basically missing from the speech from the throne. We believe it expresses the view of the people of Canada that the time has come for fundamental social and economic change.

If, perchance, our amendment is defeated, we come then to the Progressive Conservative amendment. We are not satisfied with it; that is why the leader of this group moved a subamendment. However, it states some things which are very obvious. Boiled down, the substance of the Progressive Conservative amendment states that the government has failed. Well, that is fairly obvious, so that we shall support that amendment as well.

If, perchance, that amendment is likewise defeated, and we are left with the address itself, then we have no option but to accept it, not because we are satisfied with the speech from the throne, by any means, but because we feel that at this stage of the game, surely anything less would be unthinkable. If the proposals which the government has made in the speech from the throne are endorsed by a vote in this house to-night or to-morrow, and if it does not want them to backfire, I suggest that the government not merely be content with pious promises but consider seriously reducing these proposals into legislation to be enacted before this session ends.

I suggest also that the government without any delay rescind the obnoxious order in council, P.C. 9384, and replace it with a democratic labour policy.

I suggest also that the government do something without further delay on behalf of the groups I have mentioned, the aged, the blind pensioners, the widows of veterans of the last war, the veterans themselves of the last war, those who are being discharged from the services now, and others who would be covered by a social security programme. Even then it would only be scratching the surface. Even then a great deal would be left for succeeding governments to do, and we shall leave it to the people to say what government shall succeed the present one. But if we are to win not only the war but the peace, surely the present government should do nothing less than to meet the requests that we of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation have set forth in this debate.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne rightly emphasizes the fact that the winning of the war remains the first objective of the Canadian people. No government and no Canadian can hold any other view so long as we are engaged in this struggle; for despite the fact that we are now in the fifth year of the war no one seems to be any too certain that the war's end is anywhere in sight. For that reason I heartily concur in the statement made in the speech from the throne concerning the prosecution of the war.

Post-war reconstruction can be divided into three distinct phases. The immediate phase will be the gradual demobilization of the armed forces; the intermediate phase will be the period of reconstruction and rehabilitation, and the third phase will be the long-range planning of our economic development.

Before dealing with these three phases I assert, after listening to the numerous speeches which have been delivered in this house during the last few days, that neither will a reactionary philosophy satisfy the needs of the Canadian people in the post-war period nor will the philosophy of the extreme left satisfy those needs. No one would argue that the people of Canada would stand for the reactionary philosophy of pre-war days or that it would be fair and just to our people. On the other hand, no one will tell us that everything that has been built up over centuries of progress must be thrown overboard and something else substituted in its stead, although, of course, the advocates of that philosophy seem to be certain that it would work like a charm.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Social credit?

Mr. HLYNKA: Social credit is one philosophy that can solve the problems of this nation, yes.

Mr. HOMUTH: And it is not as vicious as some philosophies.

Mr. HLYNKA: I repeat, reaction will not satisfy the needs of the Canadian people in the post-war world, nor will the other extreme do it. But we of the Social Credit group believe that there are many good things which must be preserved, things which have been handed down to us over the ages. On the other hand, we believe that some change is absolutely necessary. We believe that reform is essential. We believe that our proposals with respect to the supply of purchasing power for our people will solve the problems before us.

But, as I said, the immediate post-war problem will be that of demobilization and the transition from war-time to peace-time production. Undoubtedly this will be a period of confusion. Our industries will have to be readjusted and our factory workers and war-time civil servants will have to be assisted in finding profitable occupations. Our returned soldiers must be reestablished in our national life and be guaranteed allowances as well as gratuities. What is more, they must be guaranteed security.

Canadian agriculture must be placed upon such a basis as to guarantee to the farmer a fair standard of living. It must be remembered that one-third of our total population is engaged in agriculture.

Our aged people must also be provided for. No longer must the Canadian people tolerate the conditions which existed in the past and which still exist with respect to our old age pensions. Reference has been made by a number of hon. members to the fact that the amount of the old age pension is inadequate. A great number of people with whom I come in contact and who have asked my assistance in this matter are in their late sixties, and some of them are in such a state of health that they cannot possibly make their own living. Yet these Canadian pioneers, as the law stands today, are not entitled to receive the old age pension just because they do not happen to be seventy years of age. I feel that that is an extreme injustice to our pioneers. I consider that anyone at the age of sixty or over who is physically incapable of making a living should be granted an old age pension.

Then let me mention our youth. On numerous occasions I have read statements in the newspapers that young people between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one should not be granted the right to vote because they are immature, their judgments are immature, and it is best in a democracy to let them grow up to the age of twenty-one before they are given an opportunity to vote. But I would point out that it is these young men who were called upon first to serve this country in time of war. I know that some individuals in certain quarters are afraid that these young men will be too impulsive, that they may not accept the same old promises in the same spirit as those who carry heavier responsibilities, or something of the like. But I maintain that after this war our young people of the age of eighteen and over should be allowed to vote.

Mention has been made of the condition of the blind and other individuals who through physical incapacity cannot look after themselves. If we are a civilized nation we should so amend the existing legislation as to provide pensions for these unfortunate people, regardless of their age. This is something which we should do immediately.

In my opinion the period of post-war reconstruction will find us unprepared. I believe that the promises which are being made almost daily, and so liberally, will amount to very little and will bring results which will greatly disappoint our people.

I do not intend to deal to-night with the subject of rehabilitation of our fighting men; I hope to have an opportunity to discuss that particular subject on another occasion. But I wish to say something with regard to agriculture.

We have come to a point where every political group in Canada should state its policy clearly to the people. No longer must political parties aim at catching votes in confusion. Every group should take its stand on all important problems, giving the people the opportunity democratically to choose that philosophy which they believe will give them the results they desire.

I have touched so far on the first phase of post-war reconstruction. The second phase is the intermediate period of reconstruction and rehabilitation. I know that in the speech from the throne industry is promised considerable assistance. Personally I have nothing against that; I believe that it is a proper stand to take. This is what the speech says:

> Suitable peace-time uses for war plants are being sought, and plans are being made for their speedy conversion. To assist in the conversion of war plants and in the development of small and medium-scale industrial enterprises, the provision of additional credit facilities, for both fixed and working capital, will be required. To meet this need, your approval will be sought for the establishment of an industrial development bank as a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. Expenditures on developmental work, in preparation for the transition of industry from war to peace, will be encouraged by suitable tax modifications.

Now let me read the promise which is given to our farmers. This is all I can find in the entire length of the throne speech:

> To ensure economic stability for agriculture, you will be asked to make provision for a price floor for staple farm products.

Nothing else is said about agriculture. Let me emphasize that I have no doubt that the present government will assist industry when it comes to the period of adjustment, the period when concerns will have to change and tune up for peace-time production. With this policy I agree. But why not give the same consideration to our farmers? Why should the farmers be penalized to the extent that they are actually ignored? The only thing that is promised to them is a floor under agricultural prices—a floor! What that floor will be, no one knows; it may be fair, it may be poor. No mention is made of other problems which face agriculture. Let us see to it that the government offers the farmer something which will make farming a profitable occupation.

If one were to analyse the attitude throughout the years of our federal governments toward agriculture, it would be found that they have failed agriculture in every respect. In my opinion at least five things should be guaranteed to agriculture. I mentioned that one-third of our total population is engaged in this calling; surely they deserve a more sympathetic consideration than is being given them by the government.

The forecast which is made in the speech from the throne is only a straw in the wind. The farmer should be guaranteed parity prices which will ensure to him the income he needs to buy the things that are necessary for the maintenance of a decent standard of living. Unless agriculture receives an adequate income, no one can possibly expect the farmer to be able to pay his debts, to educate his children, to carry on efficiently and, in addition to that, to put by the odd cent for a rainy day. Under those conditions that is an utter impossibility. The farmer must have an adequate share of the national income.

In the second place, a definite long-range policy in regard to grain and live stock production should be introduced. As it is to-day —and many hon. members have referred to it—the farmer gets by day in and day out, but he does not know what order he may expect from the government.

In the third place, a comprehensive scheme of non-contributory crop insurance is necessary. I say that many farmers in the west have suffered greatly because of the odd bad year, because of frost, hail and other hazards of nature, and it takes the farmer years to get back on his feet again. Surely the government is in a position to give the farmers a non-contributory insurance.

In the fourth place, there should be adequate low cost credit facilities for agriculture. We know that agriculture needs assistance at all times. Every business man who wants to carry on his business effectively needs credit, and the same is true of the farmer. What has happened? We find that in the province of Quebec credit has been supplied to the farmers over a long period of years at six and seven per cent; in Ontario it has been supplied at five per cent. In the prairie provinces, on the other hand, the farmer has had to pay from five to twelve per cent.

I suggest that governments which were in office at the time and permitted financial institutions to bleed the farmer at these rates of interest permitted a racket. It was nothing but a racket! They skinned the farmers alive! In the future we must not permit this sort of exploitation in any part of Canada.

Let me give a few figures on agriculture as I find them in the 1941 census. The figures of that census show that there were 732,715 farms operated in Canada. Of this number, 549,972 are operated by owners and others are operated either in part by owners and part by tenants or simply by tenants. In the province of Quebec tenants occupy one farm out of every thirty; in Ontario, one out of every nine; in Manitoba, one out of every five; in Saskatchewan, one out of every four; in Alberta, one out of every six. The census shows further that from 1931 to 1941 the ownership of farms dropped 5·8 per cent and there was an increase of 25·3 per cent in rented farms during the ten-year period. I may explain that the average size of farms in Canada increased from 198 acres in 1921 to 238 acres in 1941. Again, according to the 1941 census, Canadian farmers owed $629,000,000, which amounts to an average of $2,372 per farm, and that does not include debt written off and smaller private debts. Further, forty-eight per cent of all owned farms in Canada are mortgaged.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what future is there ahead for these people when almost every second farmer is in the hands of a mortgage or trust company? Here are the percentages of farms operated by owners and carrying mortgage indebtedness in 1941:

Province	Per cent
Nova Scotia	13·1
New Brunswick	19·0
British Columbia	31·5
Quebec	39·9
Prince Edward Island	46·4
Ontario	50·7
Manitoba	53·3
Alberta	61·0
Saskatchewan	77·6

Let me emphasize this point. In Ontario half of our farmers are mortgaged. In that province only half the farmers have title to their lands and homes, and Ontario is one of the oldest provinces in Canada. Surely the farmers in this province should be better off than that.

Just a few more points before I conclude. May I just refer to credit facilities as they are provided in the United States. In the United States a farmer can be supplied with the necessary amount of credit at 3¼ to four per cent. In Canada the farmers have had to pay from five to twelve per cent, and if they can obtain credit from the Canadian farm loan board they are advanced money at five per cent interest. What we must do in Canada is to set up an agricultural bank so that the Canadian farmer may be provided with the necessary credit to carry on his farming operations. If industry is to be given assistance, why not give the same assistance to the farmers? We know that industries have been assisted during the war, industries that were in a better position to carry on than were the farmers. We shall see after the war that industries which have made considerable money will be given assistance, while the farmers on the other hand who have not been able to obtain farm help and who have had to pay almost double for everything they bought will receive nothing. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate that the government is anxious to help agriculture or to place agriculture on a better basis than it has been so far.

I say again that the farmer must get the same treatment that the manufacturer is getting. If he received that, no one from western Canada would have any criticism to offer, because it is only fair that agriculture should get the same treatment. It is only fair, too, that the government should assist industry, agriculture or individuals to enable them to make a living.

Mention has been made of family allowances. I have referred to old age pensions. Several members of the Social Credit group have pointed out that it was not so very long ago that hon. members jested at any idea of someone receiving "something for nothing", as they called it then. Now that very idea has been adopted or assimilated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and we may now expect family allowances of a sort. Well, it remains to be seen what the government will be able to do along that line. In some instances the government may have some good ideas, but I am going to ask one question. It is all very well to say that we are going to take care of our soldiers when they come back. Oh, yes, we certainly should. After the last war the government of the day did make loans to our soldiers at five per cent extending over a period of twenty years. After this war the present government intends to be more liberal; it will not deal as severely with the soldiers; it is going to tie a debt around the soldier's neck which will hang there for twenty-five years and at three and one-half per cent interest. Just because they were not bled to death on the battlefield, when they come back the government of this country and the financial interests are going to see to it that they finish them at three and one-half per cent interest, because anyone labouring for years and paying three and one-half per cent on loans which should or could be given to these men free, cannot last.

I should like to emphasize as emphatically as I can one final point, namely, that unless the government declares its policy as to where the money is to come from, all the promises about social legislation, assistance to industries, old age pensions and all the other talk, do not amount to anything at all. I felt that at least one minister would have risen in his place in the course of this debate and explained how the government proposes to finance all these projects. So far, apart from the Prime Minister, no one has said anything.

On another occasion I intend to deal with soldier rehabilitation and the scheme which the government proposes to inaugurate. On this occasion I have made a rough review of some of the things which are staring us in the face. I wish to plead for agriculture that it be given a fair chance to exist.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LOCKHART: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Macleod has the floor.

Mr. HANSELL: —I know the house is very anxious to take the vote to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you for the applause. I will try not to keep the house too long; but as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) sometimes says, something ought to be said. I do not know why he uses that term so often, because it does not seem to make any difference what the opposition says at any time, the government goes ahead and does just exactly what it wants to do anyway. However, I think I have something that ought to be said.

As I look over the motion and the two amendments I have to make up my mind as to which I am going to support and how I am going to vote. I am particularly concerned with the wording of the amendment to the amendment that strikes out the Conservative amendment and puts in its place:

> We respectfully submit . . . that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose the fundamental social changes and economic planning which alone can hasten the winning of the war and make possible the establishment of a post-war Canada capable of providing full employment and complete social security.

As a Social Credit member my interpretation of the wording of this is, I am sure, entirely different from the interpretation that would be placed upon it by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group of this house. I often have to ask myself why some people cannot say exactly what they mean. This subamendment needs to be clarified. The position it places our group in is that if we vote against it the country will say: "Oh, you are against any fundamental social changes. If we vote for it, part of the country will be able to say that we want the same social changes as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation wants. Well, that is not so either. I ask myself, why could not the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who is the national leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, have stated plainly an amendment to this effect so that there would be no misunderstanding whatsoever:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that in the opinion of this house Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose a fundamental change in the present system to one of a socialistic state.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not what we meant.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, you see what is happening now; there is confusion as to what the thing means.

Mr. COLDWELL: No confusion.

Mr. HANSELL: There is not in my hon. friend's mind, but there is in my mind.

Mr. COLDWELL: Get a mind that is not confused.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend says for me to get a mind that is not confused. If he is not careful he is going to prompt me to say something else; and I will say it. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar comes into Alberta; he has a convention of his party, and he gets up and says that this group to which I belong is the weakest group in the House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: Maybe you all agree with that, I do not know.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, that is better; that makes me smile. I say it does not become the leader of any national party to go into other provinces and make remarks of that kind. I do not know how great a leader the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) may be, but I am certain he would not do that. I do not know how great a man Mr. Bracken is, but certainly he would not say that. Furthermore, I can promise my hon. friends that we will not go into their constituencies and make remarks of that kind about them. As far as I am concerned the strength or weakness of a group in this house is not to be judged by how they may say a thing. For my part I judge the weakness or strength of any man or any group on how often he is right in what he says, and how often he is wrong. When I view the record of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who is now responsible for the stands taken by our C.C.F. friends, what do I find? Has he been right in everything he has said? Well, when it comes to financial matters I recall that only a few months before the war the then Minister of Finance asked this house to vote the sum of $750,000,000. We moved an amendment to the effect that $200,000,000 of that amount should be created by the Bank of Canada. What did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar do? He submitted an amendment to our amendment suggesting that the amount issued by the Bank of Canada should be $100,000,000 instead of $200,000,000. I do not know why that was done; I cannot make any sense out of it, because now the hon. member is asking this country to make available five billion dollars for post-war expenditures. That does not add up. If it was wrong to issue $200,000,000, then surely it would be wrong to issue five billion dollars after the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who suggested it?

Mr. HANSELL: You have suggested that five billion dollars be—

Mr. COLDWELL: —appropriated.

Mr. HANSELL: All right. I know what my hon. friend is getting at; he is saying that this five billion dollars would not necessarily be issued by the Bank of Canada. Let me tell him that in the past year nearly a billion dollars of new money has come out of the banking institutions of this country for the war; and the one or two hundred million that my hon. friend was afraid of was supposed to be new money. How can you reconcile those two facts?

Mr. COLDWELL: Quite easily.

Mr. HANSELL: All right; my hon. friend can do it some time. The fact of the matter is that a few short years ago my hon. friend did not know that you could issue that much money. That is the truth. I simply say that he was wrong there. Then again, did my hon. friend not support the motion to reduce the defence estimates just a few years before the war? I am not going to cast any reflection on his ability to speak; as a matter of fact I think he has a good deal of ability, but that was another case in which the hon. gentleman was wrong. And of course when the war broke out his policy was that not one man should be sent overseas. Suppose we had listened to the hon. member's oratory in those days; what would have happened? The fact is that he was wrong again.

I could go on and tell the house quite a few stories. Later the Prime Minister asked this nation to vote on a plebiscite, and according to propaganda it seemed that the Prime Minister wanted a "yes" vote in order that he might conscript men for service in any part of the world. Well, my hon. friends galloped up and down this country asking the people to vote "yes". What happened? When they voted "yes" and the Prime Minister brought down his mobilization bill, my hon. friends voted against it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And we told you why.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, they told us why.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But you could not understand.

Mr. HANSELL: The reason why they voted against the mobilization bill was that it did not contain any provision for the conscription of wealth and industry.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, why did you not go up and down this country telling the people not to vote "yes" until the government had conscripted wealth and industry? Once again your judgment was wrong. Then what happened just the other day? Great publicity was given to the fact that General McNaughton had returned to this country and that he was a perfectly well man. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) rose and questioned the Prime Minister on the matter. Of course the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had to jump up and support the leader of the opposition. If I had been in his place, and could have reviewed my stand on the war, I would not have dared to rise; for let me say that if this country had listened to my hon. friend there would have been no General McNaughton over in England in the first place.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I might make a further comment—and I am not blaming my hon. friend for this; perhaps he wanted to get a little publicity, and believe me he got it. I happened to listen in on the radio to two programmes that night. The leader of the opposition was mentioned once in connection with the McNaughton question, and my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was mentioned twice. Of course, that may not be a very big thing, but I do interject here that much has been said about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation being controlled by the government, and having to do what the government said. Well, my opinion is this, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during the past year has given more publicity to the C.C.F. group than to any other. It has given more publicity to them than to the Liberals, Conservatives, and Social Crediters, all rolled into one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Quite right.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We have news value.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes? I wish the sub-amendment had been defined, because I like to know what I am voting for. The country wants to know where it is going.

I will tell the house something else—and I am taking the responsibility, myself, for what I say—that there is no danger in publicizing a man who does not know where he is going; because the fact of the matter is that if he ever got into power, not knowing where he was going he would have to ask somebody. Whom is the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar going to ask? He certainly would not ask this group; he would not ask Social Crediters, that is certain. I do not know whether he would ask the Liberals or the Conservatives. I am quite sure he would not. He would have to ask advisers. Who are their advisers going to be?

Mr. DUPUIS: Tim Buck.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, I do not know; perhaps eventually Tim Buck will be their adviser. Furthermore, I will say this, that I feel incensed a little bit about this, because our group have tried to work with our C.C.F. friends in the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSELL: There is no "oh, oh" about it at all. We have nothing against these men. We are their friends. Their offices are on the same corridor as ours, and we like to get along with them. But when they gallop into our province and do things like this, it does not tend toward the best possible cooperation and friendship.

Someone has said that maybe Tim Buck will be their adviser. Maybe he will, eventually; I do not know. But I will say this: I am not a socialist; I am not a communist; but if ever I were one I would rather follow Tim Buck than the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. ROWE: You would at least know where you were going.

Mr. HANSELL: I was about to say that. Tim Buck makes no bones about it. He tells you what he means. He tells what socialism means, and he says, "Vote for me and you will get it; that is all there is to it." On the other hand, we do not know where the C.C.F. are going. They may be on their way, I do not know.

Perhaps I should give some consideration to some of the more weighty matters in the speech from the throne. I feel very much concerned in respect of any plans which might be made for post-war reconstruction. In my view, if something is not done soon, the whole matter will be hopeless. I cannot say I have any confidence that the present administration will bring about the changes that the post-war reconstruction period of this country would demand, and I shall give my reasons for saying that. I realize of course that the government will have to take the final responsibility. The fact remains, however, that the advisers the government used in pre-war days are the same advisers it uses to-day. If those advisers could not show us a way out during the depression, how can they show us the way out after the war is over? If the system is the same, if it has not changed, can they advise any differently from what they did in prewar days?

I trust I shall not sound too harsh when I say that the advisers to the government should be asked to appear before the committee on post-war reconstruction, and should be asked this question: "Why were you not able to advise the government what to do in pre-war days? Why could you not find employment for the people?" We hear a good deal about a programme for full employment. Much as I disagree with some of the principles embodied in that phrase I would ask why it was they could not provide full employment before the war. They should be asked, distinctly, how they hope to do so after the war if they could not do so before. And if they reply, "Oh, well, we hope our national income will be bigger", or "We hope our foreign trade will be larger and that foreign markets will be open to us"—if they say, we hope, we hope, we hope, then the committee should tell them that that is not satisfactory. Let them put their cards on the table and tell us how they are going to advise. If they cannot give a satisfactory answer, then I say they should be dismissed as not being required as advisers for the post-war period.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I think in all sincerity, stated on one occasion, according to press reports, that agricultural production had increased by some forty-eight per cent, while actual consumption in Canada of agricultural products had increased by only six per cent. What was his answer for the post-war period? "We hope that by quality production and by good merchandizing Canada will sell in other lands." He should know it is a little too late to be talking about matters of that kind. Why could that not have been done in pre-war days? Furthermore, he must know that all nations will be clamouring for foreign markets. That kind of musing in respect of the post-war period is not good enough at this time. We should know where we are going; we should have plans, and we should know from where the money is coming, and how our plans can be financed. That is one criticism I have with respect to the post-war reconstruction committee. I cannot discuss that matter now, but I believe that committee must discover how it will finance these projects, and do so without going into debt. It must show how it is going to pay the way, and to raise the standard of living so that we can consume to the very ultimate of our productive capacity; that will give us a high standard of living and give us real social security.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): The mover and the seconder of the address having received a great deal of well-deserved praise, I will reserve my thanks for the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), who spoke the other day in favour of the fishermen of the Gaspé peninsula.

Ever since I have had the honour of representing the county of Gaspé, I have been diligent in representing the interests of my constituents and on every occasion I have discharged my duty to them. I have sponsored all their needs and all that I thought was worth while on their behalf in this house. If I have not previously brought up the question dealt with in the order in council regarding the fish trade that was passed by the wartime prices and trade board, it is because I was aware of what was going on in view of a settlement of the matter. I knew that the fish board or the officials of the board had been for some weeks trying to come to an agreement with the united fishermen of Gaspé and were having conferences in Quebec and Montreal with the representatives of the united fishermen and with the deputy minister of the department of fisheries of Quebec, Mr. Labrie, as well as with some other independent fish dealers or processors on the Gaspé coast. I think there should come out of these conferences an agreement that will be acceptable to all those who are interested. It should be reached in a few days' time if it has not already been decided upon. I know that the motives which have inspired the hon. member for Portneuf were motives of sympathy for our fishermen, and I therefore offer him my thanks.

Before making any comments on the sub-amendment which I intend to move, I should like to say a few words with reference to the speech from the throne.

Although there are quite a few measures, proposed by the government, which I approve in principle, I will not support the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I withhold that support because of the government's war policy. I am going to support the Conservative amendment because I am in perfect agreement with the reproach which it makes against the government for its policy. At the same time—and I want to emphasize this—my support to the Conservative amendment does not mean that I support the war policy of that group. It is only what is contained in that amendment that I approve.

At the conclusion of my remarks I shall move an amendment to the amendment, and the first paragraph will read as follows, under the letter (e):

Failed to limit Canada's war contribution to the promise of moderate participation made by the leaders of the government in 1939 and to the means of our country.

A great deal has been said by many members on the international policy of the government, and I will not go over all these questions again. I would say this, however. The policy of the Liberal party is one that has brought about so much discontent throughout Canada that the present administration has lost the confidence of all Canadians, evidence of which has been given by the results of the by-elections which were held last summer.

Of course, there are many causes. In one part of the country it may be one cause, in another part it may be another cause. But the government's war policy is no doubt the principal reason for the general discontent that prevails to-day among the labouring classes throughout Canada, among our farmers, and among other sections of the population. What is going to happen as a result of that policy? When we emerge from this war Canada will be nothing but a ruin and will be thrown into the arms of the extremists. That is what will happen.

Another paragraph of my proposed amendment will read:

Failed to demand Canada's partnership in our allies' conferences on account of her independent status and her important share in the war.

We are told on the one hand that Canada should continue after the war is over—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot hear the hon. gentleman because of the conversations that are going on. I would ask hon. members to moderate their voices.

Mr. ROY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We hear on the one hand that after the war Canada should continue to share in this imperial federation which we have been in for so long a time, and on the other hand we are told, as an encouragement to support the struggle, that after the war there will be a sort of international body composed of the allied nations, and in which the small nations will be on an equal footing with the larger ones. That would be a very fine thing for Canada as a peace policy and in so far as her international trade and commerce are concerned. That is all very well; but when one considers the opportunities that the government has had up to now to prove its sincerity, and has not taken advantage of any of them, how can we now believe in such statements? Why should a certain class of people start moves to bring Canada within an imperial federation to which most of the Canadian people are opposed?

Since the beginning of the war we have had quite a few interallied conferences. We were told that Canada entered this war as an independent nation under the signature of her own king, and that we were fighting the axis as such. After the war began there was concerted action to impose the conscription of men for overseas service. There was an effort made to get everything possible from Canada in the way of blood, money, or other sacrifices. Let us see now what was going on in the meantime. There was a conference which took place on the Atlantic ocean. At that conference there was drawn up what was called the Atlantic charter which is supposed to be the basis of governing all the democratic countries when the war is over. Was Canada asked to take part in that conference as an independent country? Was the Canadian Prime Minister invited to that conference? No. As I say, we were told that it was a charter for all the allied countries after the war is over. We had another conference at Washington and yet Canada was not there. We had a conference at Casablanca and we find that it was just like the others. There was no place there for Canada. No attention was paid to Canada at all. We were just a negligible quantity. Since then we have had another conference at Teheran. At this conference China, Russia, the United States and Great Britain were represented. Canada, being the fourth largest power in the war, was not represented by its Prime Minister. There was no place for Canada at all, although she is in the war with all her resources. What had then become of our independence? And who was speaking for Canada at those conferences? The British Prime Minister? Before the Teheran conference was called we had a conference which was advertised in the newspapers as a tripartite conference. It was held in Quebec city. We were very well satisfied with the choice of Quebec city as the site of that conference. We were pleased to receive such distinguished visitors. As I say, this was advertised as a tripartite conference, but, although it was held in Quebec city and although our Prime Minister was there, the resulting decisions of that conference were signed only by the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States. Canada was again excluded. Although Canada was excluded, did we hear any protests, or criticism such as we heard for the establishment of conscription and for an all-out war effort? We have not heard any complaint at all from anyone. It is amazing. We have not enough pride to demand our place at these conferences.

The next paragraph will read as follows:

Failed to undertake public works to prevent the already existing unemployment.

I should like to comment on this subject to a certain extent. According to the figures which were published recently in some official publication of the government, and according to a statement which was made not very long ago by the deputy controller of the national selective service commission, we shall have before the month of June some 100,000 workers dismissed from the war industrial plants; therefore, unemployment will prevail again. We have a proof of that in Quebec city, where, according to what I have been told by responsible authorities, nearly 2,000 men are unemployed to-day and there will be about 6,000 or 7,000 unemployed in two months' time. This supports well my point that unemployment has already reappeared in Canada.

For two years we have been told an awful lot about reconstruction works, about post-war plans to give work to everybody in Canada; we have been told that unemployment would not come back, that the government was to prevent the return to a state of things such as existed in the depression years we lived through before the war. As I said a while ago, the government has had many opportunities to show its sincerity but we are already facing unemployment. I say that the government should have undertaken public works to prevent unemployment and to serve other purposes.

This brings me to a project which was investigated last summer by a French writer whose name is well-known throughout Canada, Mr. Robert Rumilly. Mr. Rumilly was asked by some concern to undertake a complete investigation and to inquire as to all the possibilities that could be offered by Gaspe peninsula in view of the post-war reconstruction, and the report of his investigation was published by Le Soleil, a newspaper of Quebec, supporting the government and by La Nouvelliste, a newspaper of Three Rivers, also supporting the government. All his findings were published, and to make a long story short his report suggested the construction of a railroad running through the interior of the Gaspe peninsula, in order to shorten the distance to Gaspe harbour, which should be properly organized as a winter seaport. If these works were undertaken to-day, in the first place they would take care of the unemployment situation perhaps for the whole province of Quebec. In the second place the construction of this railroad would permit the development of the mineral deposits in the interior of Gaspesia, and I believe the exploitation of the resources of the Gaspe peninsula alone would be enough to justify the construction of this line. That is not all however. It would also offer a shorter road to the Atlantic than the one actually existing between Winnipeg and Halifax, and facilitate the export of our Canadian wheat to the European market.

I have some figures, Mr. Speaker, which I am sure will interest you and especially hon. members from western Canada. I have said that the construction of a railroad and the opening of Gaspe harbour as a winter seaport would solve the question of the export of wheat which has not found its solution yet. Let me prove that statement. The distance from Winnipeg to Halifax is approximately 2,200 miles, while the distance from Winnipeg to Gaspe, if this railroad were built, would be about 1,930 miles. According to the Canadian National Railways the freight rate on wheat from Winnipeg to Halifax is forty-three cents per hundred pounds, or within a small fraction of twenty-six cents a bushel. If you take off 270 miles from the distance between Winnipeg and Halifax, this would amount to one-eighth of the total distance, and if you carry that into the cost per bushel it would mean a saving of almost exactly three cents. If our total exports of wheat after the war should amount to about 300,000,000 bushels annually, and if half that quantity should be shipped by way of Gaspe, it would mean a saving of some $4,500,000 annually for the western farmers; this would represent interest on a capital investment of $150,000,000, or much more than would be required for the construction of that railroad, which would be 160 miles in length, and the work at the seaport.

I have given the distance and rates from Winnipeg to Halifax over the Canadian National Railways. Perhaps hon. members would be interested in knowing the freight rates on other routes we sometimes use for the shipment of wheat. The rate from Winnipeg to New York via the Canadian National Railways is fifty-three cents per hundred pounds, as compared with forty-three cents to Halifax and thirty-eight cents to Gaspe. The rate from Winnipeg to Albany is fifty-two cents, via the Canadian National, while the rate via the Canadian Pacific from Winnipeg to New York is 50½ cents per hundred pounds and to Albany fifty-three cents. So that it is more expensive to ship wheat via New York and Albany in the winter than by Halifax. Then I might give the distance between New York, Halifax, Gaspe and Liverpool. The distance from Halifax to Liverpool is 2,475 miles, and from New York to Liverpool, 3,119 miles, while from Gaspe to Liverpool it is 2,450 miles via St. John's, Newfoundland, and 2,300 miles via the strait of Belle Isle. These figures would show that Gaspe offers Canada a great opportunity to solve the difficulties of export, and to help the solution of our railroad problem in peace time; they confirm the wisdom of the advice which was given for more than one hundred years by engineers and even by the British admiralty, that the Gaspe seaport is the commercial and military key of Canada. If we would recognize this truth we would be able to organize our transportation system in such a way that the wheat of the west would compete in the international market. Of course the advantages I have mentioned would apply not only to wheat, or to outward traffic, but to all our traffic, inward as well as outward.

The last paragraph of the amendment I intend to move reads as follows:

[Mr. Roy.]

Failed to grant farmers and fishermen exemption from military service, in order to remove from them the vexatious proceedings resulting from the narrow application of the national selective service regulations.

The hon. member who preceded me rightly said that everyone would know where he stood after having heard what he had to say. I think my stand on this question is also well known. In 1942 I moved amendments asking for the exemption of farmers, but I received very little support. At the following session there were loud cries heard from all corners of the house about the shortage of man-power for the cutting of fuel wood and also on our farms. I have in my hand sessional paper 135. This contains only a few of the letters sent to the Department of Labour and the Department of Agriculture by municipal councils, county councils and agricultural organizations in Ontario and the western provinces. When the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) asked for the production of these documents he was requested to go to the department and choose what he wanted, because there were cabinets containing thousands of these requests from all over Canada, and they were too numerous to be all produced. So we have here requests from Ontario and the western provinces, with only two from Quebec in this lot. These ask for the exemption of farmers, or for a regulation by national selective service with respect to the calling up of draftees, so that the man-power on farms might not be disturbed. Taking into account this general and huge protest, I believe I was quite right in asking for the exemption of farmers. In fact, I am now more convinced when, in the last few days, I have heard from different parts of the house hon. members reproaching the government for keeping more than 60,000 men under arms in Canada, when they are not needed. The government is being asked to dismiss these men. Well, if we do not need them, why do we keep them? Why does national selective service keep calling men every day, if we do not need them. Why do we call them if we have already too many, and if their being called is useless and a bad thing for the country?

In order that I may have time to move my amendment, I shall not speak at greater length this evening but shall complete on another occasion what I had intended to say. I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion):

That the following words be added to the amendment:

"(e) Failed to limit Canada's war contribution to the promises of a moderate participation made by the leaders of the government in 1939, and, to the means of our country;

(f) Failed to demand Canada's partnership in allies conferences on account of her independent status and of her important share in the war;

(g) Failed to undertake public works to prevent the already existing unemployment;

(h) Failed to grant farmers and fishermen the exemption from military service, in order to remove from them the vexatious proceedings resulting from the narrow application of the national selective service's regulations."

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend this evening to discuss the merits of the amendment, but in my humble view it is out of order. I understand that in our parliamentary code there are no precise and definite rules respecting the form of such an amendment, but I have always felt that, to be legal, it cannot be worded as is this one. We find in it these words:

I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) that the following words be added to the amendment.

I draw particular attention to the words "that the following words be added to the amendment", and humbly submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is out of order in asking that something be added to the amendment of the Tory party. Had the amendment now before the Chair asked that something be stricken out, and that such part be replaced by something else, then we would have before us a proper amendment. But now we have before us only a completion of the amendment offered by the Tory party.

Mr. GRAYDON: Out of courtesy, if nothing else, would the hon. member refer to us properly as the Progressive Conservative party?

Mr. LALONDE: That is another question which will be debated later.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, surely there should be at least courtesy in the House of Commons. The name of the official opposition is the Progressive Conservative party, and I would ask my hon. friend to have the courtesy to call this party by its proper name.

Mr. LALONDE: It has changed its name so many times we sometimes do not remember it correctly. However, I accept the correction.

May I in this connection quote from May, page 173:

In both Lords and Commons, since the commencement of session 1890-91, the answer to the royal speech has been moved in the form of a single resolution, expressing their thanks to the sovereign for the most gracious speech addressed to both houses of parliament and amendments to the address are moved by way of addition thereto.

In my humble opinion the phraseology of the amendment means that it is out of order

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Lalonde the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 9, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. McGarry be substituted for that of Mr. Isnor on the special committee appointed to revise the standing orders of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN STOCK FEEDERS

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL OF BEEF CATTLE AVAILABLE FOR MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I desire to direct two questions to the government through the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government carefully considered the seriousness of the possibility that undesirable prices and marketing conditions at present facing beef producers in western Canada may so discourage them as to cause an embarrassing beef shortage next year? Inasmuch as the present lack of markets confronting western Canadian producers might indicate that Canada does not need their beef, would the government consider permitting producers to sell their beef for a time in the United States market?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question which has been raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge, on each of the last three sittings, I think, of the house, is answered in the following words:

During the first month of the present year, hog slaughterings have been at unprecedented levels and slaughterings of other classes of live stock have been substantially greater than during the same period a year ago. Cattle slaughtered in Canada during the first four weeks of 1944 totalled 86,991 as compared with 52,279 during the same period of 1943, an increase of 34,712 head, or 66 per cent. Sheep and lamb slaughterings totalled 65,169 as compared with 44,318 in 1943, an increase of 20,851, or 47 per cent. Calf slaughterings were 24,795 as compared with 19,066, an increase of 5,629, or 30 per cent. Hog slaughterings totalled 901,767 as compared with 501,334 a year ago, an increase of 400,435, or 80 per cent.

I give these figures in order to call attention to the suggestion which is made in the question of the hon. member, namely that unless we do something now we are going to have a shortage a year hence, and to remind the house that I have heard that same story every year since the war began; and now this year, when we are entering upon the session, we are reporting an eighty per cent increase in deliveries of, let us say, hogs, and comparable increases of other live stock coming in from the farms in different parts of Canada. The figures which I have given are only for the month of January, but comparable figures exist with regard to the three months preceding the month of January, all of which should suggest to the house that there has been very little in all this talk with regard to any possibility of there being a decrease in meat supplies in Canada, at least in the immediate future. That, I would say, possibly would have some bearing even on the suggestion that there will be a decrease a year hence. Handling and movement of this record volume of live stock has taxed the capacity of the packing plants, storage warehouses and shipping facilities.

Purchases of bacon for the United Kingdom account have averaged over 20,000,000 pounds for several weeks, and an average of 20,000,000 pounds for fifty weeks out of the year would be 1,000,000,000. I give these figures to emphasize the great quantities of live stock which are coming on the market at the present time.

All available storage space was used for storage, but all product over and above what could be stored was placed in cure for current shipment, and the record volume that had to be moved placed a great strain on the shipping space available. I may say, with regard to this matter too, that recently three boats which were intended to be made available for the shipment of meat have met with mishaps, and that has made it impossible for them to take meat out until repairs are made. That too is a difficulty that governments cannot avoid during a war period.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

The following statement shows the storage stocks at January 1, 1944 as compared with January 1, 1943, the figures being in thousands of pounds:

	1943	1944
	Thousand pounds
Frozen beef (bone in)..	15,498	13,065
Frozen beef (boneless)..	4,498	8,735
Veal	2,308	5,445
Mutton and lamb.....	5,038	9,345
Fresh frozen pork.....	22,142	27,582

This last figure includes approximately 18,000,000 pounds of export bacon stored for later shipment.

While at the moment, owing to heavy slaughterings of all classes of live stock during recent weeks, there is what might be considered a surplus of meat, the fact is that the United Kingdom desires all the surplus meat that Canada can provide. What happens to be a surplus at the moment is due to lack of shipping facilities to move the surplus product immediately. The reasons, in part, for that I have already given.

Steps are being taken to divert additional shipping space to Canadian ports not only for the purpose of handling additional bacon but also to lift surplus quantities of beef and mutton. That is a diversion of ships from some ports further south, to Canadian ports, in order to take out Canadian meat. That would emphasize the fact that there is just as great a difficulty in handling meat on the American side of the boundary line as there is on this side. As a matter of fact, there have been controls even more stringent with regard to getting hogs into packing plants on the American side of the boundary line than there have been on this side. All one needs to do at present is to examine the price levels in the two countries to realize that difficulties are as great on the other side as they are on this side.

Our pork to-day, in the markets in Canada, is bringing a higher price, with the premiums that are being paid, than the prices quoted on the American side of the line at the present time. This is particularly true of the Buffalo market as compared with the Toronto market. I have before me the figures on most live stock products. One would find it difficult to ship many live stock products into the United States under present conditions, pay the freight and any duty which there might be upon these meat products, and land the products in the markets there at higher prices than can be obtained here, or at prices as high as can be obtained in Canada, or at any rate as high returns as are here obtainable, including subsidies in some cases.

The immediate problem is (a) to secure additional shipping space and (b) to relieve the congestion in cold storages by exporting products now in storage so as to permit the packing plants to handle and store the surplus live stock that is offered. The meat board stands prepared to purchase and export to the United Kingdom all surplus quantities of pork and beef, and arrangements are being made to export some quantities of mutton as soon as shipping space is available. Notwithstanding the heavy volume of live stock being offered—and this is important as an answer to a part of the question—prices for hogs and finished cattle have not been depressed, and all good butcher cattle has remained well above floor prices. With ample meat supplies available, the packers have found it difficult to move lower quality cattle and cows in the domestic market. The meat board found it difficult to handle the quantities being offered owing to the shortage of storage and shipping space, and in that connection I think I should say that there is no diffierence in the present conditions, so far as the marketing of live stock is concerned, as compared with conditions that always prevail. A man who is bound that he will ship live stock just when he thinks it ought to be shipped is always in the position, whether the government has control or has no control, of having to accept a price lower than the market would have provided for him had he waited another week or two to deliver. In the present situation, under more or less government control, he can move his live stock, more particularly cows, and have those cows processed in packing plants, frozen if necessary in the form of beef, and shipped to Britain. That is the market which is available under the arrangements now made, and when the government says to people with cows, "You had better hold them off for another two or three weeks, or another month, if you want to get a fair price for them," I submit the hardship is no greater in doing that than it was when on other occasions one was obliged to do it in order to meet the laws of supply and demand. That is the situation which does exist at present and it is creating some difficulty.

There is one other thing I hesitate to say, but I ought to say it in view of some of the representations that have been made in the resolutions which are coming to us from the section most affected, and that is that cows that run on the range have to be marketed somewhat earlier in the season than many cows that do not run on the range. The reason for that is obvious to men who are accustomed to handling cattle in the range country. It is that the cattle have to be got to the butcher before calving time comes. I am not so sure that getting them to the butcher before that time will affect the quantity of meat in the manner suggested a few moments ago. It might even increase the quantity to have the cattle kept off the market. That may not meet the wishes of those desirious of selling cattle at present, though it does affect somewhat the price that can be secured for the quality of beef obtainable from a cow that is heavily in calf. While an ample meat supply is available, the packers have found it difficult to handle the lower quality cattle and cows in the domestic market. The meat board found it difficult to handle the quantities offered owing to the shortage of storage and shipping space. During the past few days, however, the board has been able to accept immediate shipment of some seven million pounds of beef, and this movement has had an immediate effect on cow prices, which moved sharply upwards in all markets. There is every reason to believe that in future all surplus beef available will be handled and lifted as offered for export. There has been a decline in sheep and lamb prices as a result of the temporary over-all meat position. While there is no floor price established for mutton and lamb, steps have been taken to export some of the surplus accumulation now in storage with a view to creating a better market for this class of live stock.

That, I think, covers the position pretty well with regard to the matter of beef, particularly the lower qualities which are not required on our home market. There does not appear to be any difficulty in connection with the quality of beef which is required on the home market.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): In view of the statement of the minister with regard to the surplus of meats throughout Canada, will the government consider the discontinuance of the meatless Tuesday and of the rationing of meats in Canada?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Consideration can be given to that.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister says "consideration can be given." Consideration can be given to anything. Is consideration being given to it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I should have said "will be given".

MEAT

CONDEMNATION OF 500,000 POUNDS IN GOVERNMENT WAREHOUSES IN QUEBEC CITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to give an answer to the question asked yesterday by the hon.

member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) with regard to the beef which had been found spoiling in Quebec. I may say this beef was in the storage of the national harbours board at Quebec. As I understand it, the inspector, Mr. C. A. Rose, assistant chief veterinary inspector, was called in to make a report, and has made a report, which I now table.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce based on a report appearing in the western papers to this effect, that the United States are after all the wheat they can get from Canada. The report goes on to say that the United States government have purchased forty million bushels of wheat from Canada and have sent twenty-seven hundred cars to Canada to transport it. It also says that this is necessary to prevent the rationing of flour and bread in the United States. When similar sales have been made by the Canadian Wheat Board the minister has always made a statement to the house. Would he care to make a statement as to the conditions under which this wheat is being sold, the price and the conditions in respect of duties, freight, et cetera, and what Canadian export agencies are handling the transaction?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think, Mr. Speaker, that I can give the house at a very early date a statement on the point raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

QUESTION OF PROVISION FOR DEPENDENTS OF THOSE IN WORK CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour, or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. It has come to my attention that in many cases the wives and children of conscientious objectors who are being sent to work camps in Ontario are being left without any means of support. Is it the policy of the government merely to pay these men fifty cents a day and to make no additional provision for their dependents?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): The question that the hon. member has just asked came to my attention a few moments before I came into the house. If he will allow the question to stand I shall be able to give a complete answer to-morrow.

FUEL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO COAL, OIL AND NATURAL GAS SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if he will give the house a statement some time soon with respect to coal, oil and natural gas, and what the situation is likely to be in the future?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be glad to discuss that subject when I speak on the war appropriation bill.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Roy.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, last night I raised a point of order with respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), on the ground that it was not in order because it suggested additions to the amendment of the Progressive Conservative party. In my remarks last night I quoted May to support my contention. I had not concluded my argument last night. I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the subamendment is not in order on the ground that it is not relevant to the amendment and raises new issues. I refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, 1943, citations 367 and 368, at page 142:

367. A subamendment on the address in reply to the speech from the throne may be moved subject to the same rules as any other amendment. It must be relevant to the amendment and cannot raise a new issue. Great latitude is allowed in this debate. If the amendment and the subamendment both take exception to the government's financial policy and the former refers to customs duties, the latter is in order if it refers to income tax or any other mode of collecting revenue; but if the amendment deals with conscription a subamendment dealing with tariff is irregular.

368. A subamendment on the motion for the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne must be relevant to the amendment. . . .

One can readily see that the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé is not relevant to the amendment moved by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. To support that contention, referring to page 29 of Hansard of January 31, 1944, I find that the amendment deals, first, with employment of the men and women of the armed forces on demobilization; second, failure to provide adequate measures whereby agriculture can make its maximum war- and peace-time contribution through a stable and effective long-term programme; third, labour questions, and fourth, bureaucratic controls. As I read the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé I find that it deals with Canada's war effort, Canada's partnership in allied conferences, public works to prevent already existing unemployment, and the exemption of farmers and fishermen from military service. I humbly submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that according to citation 364 of Beauchesne, third edition, the amendment is out of order. Citation 364 reads as follows:

> Since the purpose of a subamendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment if it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

I should like to speak to the merit of certain questions that have been dealt with by the hon. member for Gaspé, particularly the question of the exemption of farmers from military service, but I believe I should be out of order in doing so at this stage of the debate. I reserve my right to speak on these matters later. For the reasons I have given, I humbly submit to you, sir, that the subamendment is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

The hon. gentleman has quoted May, at page 173, and that dictum of May has been adopted by Doctor Beauchesne in his latest book, of which all hon. members have copies; it appears in citation 336 at page 135. I would draw to the attention of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken citation 335 on the same page:

> A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words; (b) by leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; (c) by inserting or adding other words.

The subamendment now before the house seeks to add other words to the original amendment. Then citation 338, at page 136 of Beauchesne, reads:

> The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the house an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. This may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word "that", and to substitute in their place other words of a different import. In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

As the hon. member has pointed out, under citation 367 at page 142, great latitude is allowed in the debate on the address, and exceptions taken of a highly technical nature as a rule are not considered when amendments are made in that debate. The effect of the amendments is as follows. The motion is made; the amendment is moved, and the subamendment follows. In our practice the procedure is to deal first with the subamendment; then having disposed of that either by adoption or rejection, we deal with the amendment. If the subamendment is approved, then the amendment is put before the house as amended by the subamendment; and in like form when dealing with the motion, if the amendment has been adopted, then the motion is placed before the house as amended by the amendment or the subamendment as the case may be. The consequence is that in the debate which is taking place hon. members are addressing themselves to the motives contained in the original motion, the amendment and the subamendment, and additions to an amendment, when adopted, are really additions to the main motion.

For the reasons I have stated I think this subamendment is in order. The hon. member who raised the point of order referred to the question of relevancy. If one is dealing with all the motives contained in either the motion, the amendment or the subamendment, then the question of relevancy has some bearing, not as directly affecting the amendment or subamendment but as affecting the subject matters of the three motions before the house. In this case we are dealing with the speech from the throne, which embodies many principles; and the principles which have been set forth in the subamendment of the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) are I think relevant to the subject under discussion. For that reason I am of opinion that the subamendment moved by the hon. member is in order.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, with one statement that was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the course of his remarks the other day I am in complete accord; that was when he said, as reported at page 34 of Hansard:

. . . I am opposed to parliaments extending their own terms of office. I think one of the greatest mistakes made in this country was the extension by one parliament of its own term of office.

With this point of view I am in complete agreement, as I think most people will be who are desirous of retaining our free institutions and maintaining our democratic form of government. It is a great pity, however, that the Prime Minister was not able to impress his point of view upon the Liberal government of Saskatchewan, which last April supported a bill to extend its own term of office. This was done in spite of the protests of the official opposition. What has amazed most people has been the complete acquiescence of the federal government in this very apparent violation of established constitutional procedure. I have made a careful search of the records, and I cannot find a single case in the history of the parliament at Westminster, or of any of the self-governing dominions, or of any of the legislatures of the Dominion of Canada, in which a parliament or a legislature extended its own term of office without the consent of the official opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend suggesting that the federal government should have interfered in any way in a matter which was the exclusive concern of the provincial government?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the Prime Minister will have patience with me I shall come to that very point, as to what I think the government ought to have done. In 1916 Sir Robert Borden introduced a humble petition asking the parliament of Westminster to amend the British North America Act to extend the life of the Canadian parliament. On February 8 of that year, as reported at page 622 of Hansard, he said:

It is hardly necessary to say that it is a motion which we should not press if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house should oppose it as a party. In that case I should feel it to be my duty to withdraw the motion, and then it would naturally be for the government to consider its course.

He was followed in that debate by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who at page 634 of Hansard is reported as having said:

If this resolution was not adopted unanimously, even though carried by a majority of this house, and even if my right hon. friend himself were to carry it to the foot of the throne, I have no doubt whatever that in the face of such a minority as would be arrayed against it, the British parliament would never grant the power sought.

A similar petition was introduced in the following year by Sir Robert Borden, but when some of the official opposition expressed their disapproval the Prime Minister immediately withdrew the resolution on the ground that unless the opposition gave virtually unanimous consent the British parliament would be unwilling to permit the Canadian parliament to extend its own life. It has remained for a Liberal government in Saskatchewan to defy the parliamentary traditions of several centuries and use its majority in the legislature in order to cling to office without giving the electorate an opportunity to express their wish in the matter.

The Prime Minister asks what we think the federal government should have done about it. May I point out that the federal government, and particularly the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), have a responsibility to discharge to the people of Canada, and especially to the people of Saskatchewan. Under the British North America Act the power of disallowance was given to the federal government not merely to prevent the passage of legislation which might be considered ultra vires; as a matter of fact legislation of that kind can be taken care of very well in the courts. The power of disallowance was granted to the governor in council, in order that, as George Brown put it very succinctly:

. . . no injustice shall be done without appeal in local legislation.

The Minister of Justice is charged with the responsibility of seeing that provincial legislatures cannot pass legislation which deprives Canadian citizens of their democratic rights. The Minister of Justice and the government have been quick to use this power of disallowance when property rights were at stake, or when Canadian bankers felt that they were being discriminated against. But when the people of Saskatchewan were being denied the right to decide who would constitute the government of that province the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister failed to take any action. It is not enough for the Prime Minister to say that he is opposed to parliaments extending their own terms of office. He must do more than that. He must act. He is the custodian of the rights and privileges of the Canadian people, and in failing to disallow legislation by which the Saskatchewan government extended its own life the Prime Minister and his government, it seems to me, were derelict and negligent in the discharge of their duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the hon. member a question? I think he was in the house when the Ontario government, on perhaps more than one occasion, extended its tenure of office by extending the term of the legislature. Did the hon. member or anyone else raise the question he is now raising as to the dominion's interfering with the province in that matter?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I reply to the Prime Minister by saying that in respect of the action of the Ontario legislature, that government had the consent of the official opposition. It is true there were eight votes cast against it by Liberal members, but the official opposition in the Ontario legislature voted in support of the resolution to extend the term of office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point goes beyond the opposition and the government; it goes to the rights of the people themselves as they are protected by the constitution. It is not for members of parliament, through agreement among themselves, to extend the term of parliament and the time for which they were elected.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why did the Prime Minister of Canada not recommend to the governor in council that some action should have been taken in that regard?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I feel very strongly that it is not for the federal government to interfere with provinces in matters which by the constitution have been assigned to them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Prime Minister certainly believed in interfering where Alberta was concerned, when he thought the bankers and some of the property owners of this country were being discriminated against.

In my view the government still has until April of this year to take some steps in the matter. I think the Prime Minister has a responsibility to inform the premier of Saskatchewan that any further attempt to extend the life of his government, without a mandate from the people, will compel the federal government to use the power of disallowance, in order to protect the democratic rights of the people of that province. If the Saskatchewan government should once more attempt to extend its own life, let me tell this government here and now that we in this group will take appropriate measures to bring the matter before parliament and the country, in order to ask the federal government to use its power of disallowance to preserve that democracy for which brave men daily are laying down their lives.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend, when he suggests that we should tell the Saskatchewan government what they should do, also say that I should raise at the same time a question about absentee leadership, and if they approve absentee leadership, whether it be in the leadership of the opposition in the provincial or in the federal field?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I say to the Prime Minister that the only reason why I am at the present time an absentee leader in Saskatchewan is that the Liberal government of Saskatchewan has not dared to call any of the four by-elections that are due, or a general election in that province.

May I now turn to the speech from the throne—and I hope I shall be given some extra time, because of the interruptions made during my speech. This is the ninth debate on speeches from the throne I have witnessed in the house, and I must say it is the most astounding of them all. A speech from the throne debate is not generally considered something to be got rid of. It has generally been considered a debate during which several ministers of the crown would give an account of their stewardship, and during which they could outline the legislation they intend to present to the house. It has been considered that during the debate on the speech from the throne ministers would enunciate the principles and directives underlying that legislation. This debate would probably have closed last night, had it not been for the subamendment, and yet not a single minister on the treasury benches has taken part in it, with the exception of the Prime Minister—and he did not discuss the speech from the throne, but rather discussed Mr. John Bracken, and the speeches made by Lord Halifax and General Smuts.

Why this veil of silence? The ministers of the government make me think that the government programme is something like a little boy who has been given a lovely Christmas box wrapped in silver paper and bound with red ribbon, and that they are now standing aside in apprehensive timidity lest the little boy should ask permission to open it in order to see what is inside. I do not think they care to discuss this very promising programme they have placed before the Canadian people. After all, it is not sufficient to say that the war appropriation resolution will serve as a substitute. The people of Canada would like to know what plans the government have to deal with that period of transition from a war-time to a peace-time economy. That will not be covered by the war appropriation measure. Has the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) no plans concerning the period of transition to place before the house? Has the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) nothing to say about the tremendous problems which will face agriculture when some of these subsidies are withdrawn, and when agriculture is faced with peace-time problems? Yet none of these ministers has had a word to say in the course of the debate.

In some quarters this speech from the throne has been held out as an epic-making document, while in others, the people are suspicious of it, and it is not hard to understand why they are suspicious. I hold in my hand two documents, the first of which is a copy of a paper dated August 13, 1919, containing the programme passed at a Liberal convention at which the present Prime Minister was elected as leader of the Liberal party. It certainly is a promising document. I see here that the principal articles of food are to be placed on the free list. Farm implements, farm machinery, flour mill and saw mill machinery and repair parts are to be placed on the free list, and wearing apparel and footwear are to have a reduction of at least fifty per cent in duty. I see further that there is to be an increase in the British preference to fifty per cent. I see further a resolution moved by W. L. Mackenzie King and seconded by Arthur Roebuck—a most interesting resolution. I cannot read it all, but I notice that they were to give us the federal incorporation of cooperative associations. I notice further that there was to be an acceptance of the principle of proportional representation. Then I find here a long resolution moved, I believe, by Colonel Ralston, who is now Minister of National Defence; and it is just as rosy as some of the promises which now, twenty-five years later, appear in the speech from the throne. Soldiers were to have cash grants, such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity and pay for disability resulting from service. It states:

> That such pensions or allowances be granted as shall enable soldiers or their dependents, as the case may be, to maintain a liberal standard of living sufficient to guarantee health, education and all the necessities, comforts and amenities which go to make up a standard of living worthy of Canadian citizenship.

After twenty-five years each of those promises has been more honoured in the breach than in the observance. I have another document here which helps to make me more sceptical about the speech from the throne. This is a reprint of the statement handed to the press by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the night of the general election, October 14, 1935. It is an interesting document. It states:

> The election is an endorsation of the Liberal view that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to every citizen.

And again:

> The electorate has declared that a responsible ministry, not organized finance and international money power, is to control in all matters of state.

It says:

> It is a verdict for the democratization of industry, in the rights of labour and consumers to have their voice heard and influence felt in the control of industrial policy. It is a warning and rebuke to arrogant employers of labour who have sought to intimidate their employees to prevent them from enjoying the free exercise of the franchise which is the birthright of every Canadian citizen.

I ask hon. members to put that statement alongside P.C. 9384 and see how they compare. Further on in the same statement:

> It is a verdict in favour of personal liberty, electoral reform, and of measures which will, among other things, prevent the national radio being surreptitiously used by any political party for the defamation of character.

And again:

> It is a verdict in favour of a more equitable distribution of wealth, with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good.

Then one more statement:

> In the new era which dawns to-day, the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery, are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from the land.

And again:

> We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe.

This effusion of eloquence was followed by four years of young men riding the rods, with 400,000 unemployed and in the neighbourhood of a million people on relief. Is it any wonder that we are rather sceptical of the speech from the throne and the fine promises that are now held out to the Canadian people? As a matter of fact, when one comes to examine the promises they are not so specific. After a cursory mention of the fact that the first objective must be the winning of the war, the speech from the throne proceeds to say that there are three main tasks which must be accomplished after the war: first, demobilization; second, conversion of our machinery of production from a war-time to a peace-time economy, and, third, social security measures.

With regard to demobilization it says that a broad programme has already been developed. Are we to take from this that the machinery now set up for the demobilization and care of our discharged men is the ultimate? Has the government nothing new to add except establishing a veterans' welfare department? Is there no new machinery to be added? If there is not, then heaven help the thousands of young men who will be coming back after this war. Heaven help them if something more adequate is not provided by the government.

With regard to the transfer from war-time to peace-time economy the speech from the throne states that the maintenance of full employment will "require" certain things. There is no statement as to how it is proposed to accomplish them. Two things are mentioned, an industrial bank and a sop which is thrown out to industrialists in the form of certain tax modifications.

Then we come to number three, social security. Some newspapers have set out fourteen points covering what the government is going to do, but the speech from the throne does not say what the government is going to do. The social security measures that have been set up already are very meagre, and the speech states that the working out of a comprehensive national scheme will require further consultation. Then follows the only promise:

> My ministers will welcome opportunities for such consultation.

That can mean very little, "will welcome opportunities for further consultation." It states further that they are prepared to provide for federal assistance in a nation-wide system of health insurance. There is no guarantee there that they are going to set up a nation-wide system of insurance. It states only that they are prepared to provide assistance. Anyone who has examined the findings of the Sirois report knows perfectly well that the provincial governments with their present limited sources of revenue will require more than assistance; they will require that the federal government either accept almost full responsibility or give to the provincial governments much larger sources of revenue than are now available to them.

In the light of what has happened in the past; in the light of these very vague statements, we in this group are not greatly encouraged by the speech from the throne. We shall welcome any social security measures which the government may bring down during this session, but we have no confidence as yet that these measures will be adequate or that the government is prepared to deal with the fundamental economic base which must be set up in order to provide full employment and make possible adequate social security.

May I deal now with what the speech from the throne says about agriculture? In all of the long speech—this is one of the longest for many years—only three lines are devoted to agriculture. It states:

> To ensure economic stability for agriculture, you will be asked to make provision for a price floor for staple farm products.

That will all depend upon what the floor is. If it is a basement floor it will be of no value. If it is to be the floor we now have it will be of little worth the moment subsidies now paid under the War Measures Act are taken away. I may say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that the farmers of this country are concerned as to what will happen when the subsidies now being paid—subsidies which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has suggested are being paid for the benefit of the consumer and not for the benefit of the producer—are removed. The floors which are now set will be totally inadequate.

It is true that the farmer has been receiving better prices for some of his products during the past few months. This may be partly due to the fact that two by-elections in western Canada did not deal very kindly with the Liberal candidates and it may be due partly to the fact that we are coming close to a federal election. As a matter of fact, I have always suspected that if you X-rayed a Canadian farmer you would find that he was pretty well streaked. There would be four streaks of lean for the four hard years and then one streak of fat for the election year. Every four or five years something has to be done for the farmer, and then he goes back to the lean years again after the election year.

The case of wheat is a good example. For years, hon. members on this side of the house have asked the government to suspend trading on the Winnipeg grain exchange and to establish a parity price for wheat. A delegation of four hundred farmers came here from Saskatchewan nearly two years ago and placed their case before the cabinet. No action was taken. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and I both moved motions last year in this house calling upon the government to take steps along the lines I have already mentioned. No action was taken. But this past year, when the world surplus of wheat was shrinking visibly and the demand for wheat was causing the price on the open market to rise, on the 28th of September the government stepped in, suspended trading in wheat, and fixed the price at $1.25; and fourteen days later, on the 12th October, passed an order in council giving them authority to do what they had done fourteen days before. Why? Because as a matter of fact the government, which had pinned its faith up until then on an open market, found that if the open market were to continue the farmer would probably be getting $1.50 a bushel for wheat. Therefore they stepped in, at long last, not to help the farmer, but because they realized that the open market was now going to work to the advantage of the farmer, whereas before it had worked to his disadvantage.

I want to remind the Minister of Trade and Commerce that about fifty-four per cent of the 1942 crop was sold by the farmers on the open market, and that they will get no benefit out of the participation certificates, or any increased price, for that wheat.

What is true of wheat was equally true of hogs. During the last two sessions hon. members on this side of the house tried to impress upon the Minister of Agriculture that, unless we got a price for hogs which was commensurate with the price of other commodities, and unless the farmers could have some help retained on their farms, they would be forced out of hog production. What happened? To bring the situation to a head, this fall a subsidy of ten cents a bushel on oats and fifteen cents a bushel on barley was paid. The farmers, short of help, now realized it was better to sell coarse grains than to use them for feed. Last fall the farmers began to go out of hogs; and what was most alarming to me, watching the figures, was that twenty to twenty-three per cent of the hogs being shipped were breeding hogs.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member did not follow the figures.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did, and I followed them very closely.

Mr. GARDINER: Those are not the figures.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, the minister can give the figures when we reach the war appropriation debate. That will give him plenty of time to get the figures.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member will get them as soon as he is through.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am glad if I have succeeded in getting the minister on his feet. If I have got him to break the veil of silence I shall be more than satisfied.

When the farmers began to put their live stock on the market in such quantities that it was glutted, the minister had to find a scapegoat, and the scapegoat he found was the C.I.O. workers in the packing plants whom he blamed for holding up the slaughtering of the farmers' hogs. I do not mind a man making a mistake, and I do not mind, indeed I rather admire him if he accepts responsibility for it; but when he tries to lay the blame on a group of workers in the packing plants who are working long hours, often with inexperienced help, I think he is taking advantage of people who cannot answer back.

The objection which we have to the programme outlined by the government is that, while they may mention a social security measure here or a social security measure there, without any definite commitments, there is nothing to indicate that they propose to deal with the fundamental changes which must take place in our economy if we are to maintain full employment, provide a maximum market here in Canada, and provide for the exchange of our surplus commodities with other countries.

In the time allotted to me I cannot discuss the changes which must take place in other fields of our economy. I should like to say a few words about the changes which must take place in agriculture in order to enable it to pass from war-time economy into our peacetime economy with the minimum of dislocation for the country and for the farmers. After all, we are on the threshold of a new era as far as agriculture is concerned. As regards the decisions of the conference at Hot Springs, the united nations agreed to set up certain minimum nutritional standards whereby we shall guarantee to every man, woman and child in the united nations all the food they require, and guarantee to the farmers who produce that food an adequate living for doing so. If that policy is followed, then, as the vice-president of the United States has said, "the breath of the future is upon us," and we are now coming into a new era as far as agriculture is concerned.

I should like to outline here, briefly, twelve points, some of which we of this group have brought to the attention of the house before, and will continue to bring to the attention of the house throughout the session in asking the government to give these matters consideration. I enumerate them because I have no time to discuss them at length.

1. The establishment of basic parity prices for all farm products; this price to bear a direct relationship to the cost of production. That is not a floor price, but a price which will vary with changing costs of production.

2. The establishment of marketing boards for the purpose of carrying on orderly marketing of farm products.

We believe that, wherever two-thirds of the producers of any farm commodity agree, there should be set up a marketing board on which there shall be adequate producer representation for the purpose of taking delivery of that particular product.

3. A comprehensive system of crop insurance to apply to all Canadian farmers producing crops in which there is an element of risk.

The premiums for such crop insurance to be included when computing the basic parity price.

4. The setting up of a board of live stock commissioners with power to license, regulate and control the facilities for assembling, transporting, yarding, slaughtering, processing and packing, together with the facilities for grading and selling all live stock and carcass products designed for human consumption, and in addition all live and dressed poultry and eggs should be subject to the jurisdiction of this board.

5. The establishment of an agricultural bank for the refinancing of farm mortgages at a maximum rate of two and one-half per cent interest.

6. The passing of a dominion cooperative act to enable farmers to establish cooperatives and to permit the coordination of present provincial cooperatives under a national charter.

7. The setting up of a farm implement board for the purpose of working with the cooperatives in order to manufacture and distribute farm implements at the lowest possible cost.

8. Federal and provincial legislation to provide that every farmer who is honestly endeavouring to pay his way shall be able to retain his farm and to pass it on unencumbered to his children or to make such other disposition of it as he may see fit.

9. The establishment of an ever-normal granary to store surpluses of non-perishable goods, and the building of storage facilities in order to carry a reserve of prepared and processed goods which are of a perishable nature.

10. The setting up of export and import boards in order to dispose of surplus products in conformity with the principle laid down by the united nations conference on food and agriculture held at Hot Springs, Virginia, last May, at which it was agreed that freedom from want of food suitable and adequate for the health and strength of our people can be achieved and that in supplying this food the producers can and should be adequately rewarded.

11. The provision of large sums for soil and water conservation and for irrigation projects in order to preserve Canada's farm lands and to provide employment in the post-war period.

12. Immediate research into the field of chemurgy. The erection of factories in western Canada after the war for the purpose of utilizing agricultural products for industrial purposes.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that this would constitute a bold and imaginative programme for agriculture. We believe that unless we are prepared to adopt such a programme we shall not lay the economic base without which it is impossible to have in this country either full employment or adequate social security.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I had not intended to speak in this debate, but in view of the challenge which the last speaker (Mr. Douglas, Weyburn) has given I shall say a few things with reference to what he has stated to the house.

In the first place he has suggested that no minister during this debate, excepting the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), has spoken up to the present time, and he has been more or less critical of that fact. Well, at the beginning of the debate I had understood that it was the consensus of the house generally that we should do everything possible to shorten the debate. Members of the government have a number of opportunities upon which to deal with the questions with which their departments are particularly concerned. When estimates are brought before the house it is our opportunity to place upon Hansard a record of all the activities of the different departments, and we have the opportunities which are presented when we are bringing down legislation. We have also the opportunities which are presented when members from different parts of the house ask questions on the orders of the day, and I took advantage to-day of one such question in order to place certain information before the house.

The debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne has never been regarded as the special opportunity for ministers of the crown. Rather it has been looked upon as the special opportunity of private members to voice their views, a time when they have the privilege of speaking on any question concerning matters of government. I think therefore that ministers are to be commended rather than condemned if, on an occasion of this kind when it has been considered essential by all that the debate should be shortened as much as possible, they allow private members to take up the greater part if not the whole of the time devoted to debate.

When the hon. member for Weyburn rose he said he would agree with a statement made by the leader of the house, the Prime Minister, and on this occasion I would like to agree with the statement made by his leader the other night, when, as I noticed, the hon. member for Weyburn was not as much in agreement with what that hon. gentleman said as I was, judging from the expression on his face. When the Prime Minister was discussing these matters the other day he referred to a number of things, one of which was the advisability of appealing to the people at the end of a term of office; and that has been referred to by the hon. member for Weyburn. Another matter touched upon was the advisability of leaders of parties, who intend to represent the people, finding a seat in the house where it is meant that they should attend to lead their group. I was surprised to hear my hon. friend, referring to that matter a few moments ago, say that the present government in Saskatchewan has not called an election, in constituencies which have been vacated within the last few months, in order to make it possible for him to enter the house in that province.

It has been, I believe, the almost invariable custom for members of a party who already have seats in the house to resign a seat and challenge the government to put up a candidate against their leader when he has been chosen to lead them in the house. But in the province of Saskatchewan, where by the way the real leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party is serving his country overseas with the armies of the empire, a convention was called during that gentleman's absence and a new leader was chosen. That new leader holds a seat in this house, and I am not surprised that no follower of the real leader of the C.C.F. party, who is at present serving overseas, has seen fit to resign his seat in the house in Saskatchewan in order to make it possible for the hon. member to contest that constituency.

What gave me considerable pleasure, when listening to the hon. member for Weyburn say that he agreed with statements made by my leader, was the privilege which I have of agreeing with statements made by his leader,—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I agree too.

Mr. GARDINER:—when he said the other night that he agreed with the leader of this party and of this house that it was essential that a leader of opposition should find a seat in the house in which he aspires to leadership. Well, my friend claims that he is leader of the C.C.F. in Saskatchewan, and he uses this house as a sounding board and as a platform to make a speech which to all intents and purposes would be a campaign speech in an election in the province of Saskatchewan. I agree again with the leader of his own group, that the proper thing for my hon. friend to do, if he desires to discuss provincial questions in the manner in which he has discussed them this afternoon, is to seek a seat in the Saskatchewan legislature and discuss those questions there where they can be properly debated and answered.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): One cannot enter the house unless the government calls an election.

Mr. GARDINER: The next point that occurs to me is one that was brought up by his leader the other day. It seems to be a favorite topic of discussion when C.C.F. speakers make speeches, either in this house or outside, to refer to the Liberal platform of 1919. He brings into the house a copy of an old paper and recites that platform. He reads it to the house and makes no explanations with regard to it and then he proceeds to be critical. I had the privilege of being on the resolutions committee of the convention of 1919 as representative of the Liberal group who were sitting in the legislature of Saskatchewan at that time, and I would like to tell members of this house, including the leader of the C.C.F. party and his chief supporter, the leader of the C.C.F. party in the province of Saskatchewan, that that convention was made up of representation from the Liberal parties from every province in the dominion and from the different sections of the different provinces which had more than one Liberal organization represented. The information submitted to the resolutions committee and to the convention as a whole was a document about three-quarters of an inch thick and it contained the plaftorms of all the Liberal parties in all the provinces of Canada. Those platforms were studied, and out of them, with the assistance of men representing every provincial Liberal group in Canada, there was worked the platform from which my hon. friend was reading.

What has happened since that time? The Liberals went back to the provinces. They did not do what my hon. friend has done here to-day—suggest that the government of Canada should start to direct the activities of the provinces. They went back to the provinces and in their own legislatures they placed upon the statute books of those provinces the legislation that was embodied in the principles of Liberalism as drawn by the 1919 convention in so far as they related to provincial affairs. My hon. friend comes here this afternoon and instead of reciting these facts he starts to read twelve points drafted in Regina a short time ago—at a meeting behind closed doors, by the way—that ought to be applied to agriculture in Canada. In doing that he recites that his party is in favour of cooperation. If he will go back to the province from which he comes and examine the statutes of that province he will find that it has the most advanced legislation with regard to cooperation that can be found anywhere in Canada, and just as advanced as can be found anywhere in the world. As a matter of fact, much of that legislation has been copied by others. Then he relates the same kind of argument to the importance of public health and social security. I would call his attention to the fact that there is not a single thing in all the recommendations of the Beveridge report that is not already covered in principle in legislation of the province from which he comes, with the one exception of family allowances, and this government has taken care of that in this session. That being so—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In principle, not in legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: It has been announced that it is going to be done.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is always announced; that has been the cry for years.

Mr. GARDINER: Then my hon. friend says we are going to ask the provinces to consider with us some of the suggested social legislation. Why, of course we are. The province of Saskatchewan has municipal doctors paid for out of the tax rates of the municipalities in which they serve. It has municipal hospitals. It has free treatment of tuberculosis. It has clinics which have been operating for many years. It has maternity grants, mothers' allowances, et cetera. I could go on and recite one social service after another. Does anyone suggest we are going to bring legislation into this house without consulting the provinces that have these services established, in order to determine what the relationship is to be in the future between the set-up of this government to administer such legislation and the set-up that already exists in the provinces? Of course the thing is unthinkable. But the point I wish to make is this, that the platform of 1919 recommended that all these things enunciated as policies of the Liberal party be brought into effect by any institution of government that we might have in the dominion, from the municipalities up to the parliament which meets in Ottawa, and much of it has been brought into effect.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Much has not.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend took occasion to speak of farming, and in speaking of farming he demonstrates about the same amount of information as he does with regard to political platforms drafted by other political parties. Apparently he does not know that every farm product grown in Canada is being sold to-day at prices which are at parity or above parity, and I do not exclude the recent sales of wheat.

Mr. WRIGHT: What parity are you taking?

Mr. GARDINER: The prices asked by the farm federation based on 1926 and 1929, which the farm federation takes as parity, and I would much rather take their figures than those of my friends on the other side of the house.

Mr. WRIGHT: They did not take those.

Mr. GARDINER: The parity prices asked for by the farm federation are the parity prices I refer to when I make that statement. In dealing with that matter my hon. friend takes his usual course. He states it in such a manner as not to give all the facts—therefore, to give a wrong impression. He left the impression in this house, Mr. Speaker, that when wheat was rising in price the government stepped in and said: We are not going to let it go any higher. Of course he knows the government did not do any such thing. He knows as well as I do that during the period between the time when our American friends and others came on the Canadian market to buy wheat and September 28 there was no way of hedging the purchases which had been made, and thus securing anyone who purchased the grain against possible losses, with the result that the farmers in western Canada during that period of time were being asked to take a spread as high as seventeen cents a bushel between Fort William and street prices; whereas the usual spread would be somewhere around six or seven cents a bushel, and if we had continued with the market open at Winnipeg over any considerable length of time there would have been no possibility of farmers being able to regain that amount of money which had been denied to them in order to carry any risks which there were. Therefore the government undertook to carry the risks, and in undertaking to carry the risks we took over all the wheat that had been marketed. That wheat was purchased at $1.23¼ a bushel. After we had purchased that wheat we said to the world and to the farmers of Canada: That wheat belongs to the government. It is going to be used to make up any gifts which we make to any country in the world by way of relief, and it is going to be utilized in connection with mutual aid.

Those wheat purchases by the government made possible participation payments on 1940 wheat, 1941 wheat and 1942 wheat. Again my hon. friend does not give all the facts when he comes to deal with participation certificates. He picks his own year. He picks 1942, and he says that in that year fifty-four per cent of the wheat was delivered to the open market. That would leave only forty-six per cent of it to be delivered to the board. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that in the year 1940 nearly all the wheat was delivered to the board. In the year 1941 nearly all the wheat was delivered to the board.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, a very large percentage of it. Why was it not delivered to the board in 1942?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The market price was above the board price.

Mr. GARDINER: The market price was above the board price; that is exactly right. Then my hon. friend says the farmers of western Canada came down here in the spring of 1942 and asked for a number of things, none of which was done. Well, if he will come to my office I will show him quite a number of communications from farm organizations in western Canada thanking us for what was done as a result of that mission of farmers to Ottawa. And even in connection with this very question some things which were very material were done. In the time at my disposal I cannot go into details with regard to the matter, other than to say that the advance on wheat—not the price—was set at ninety cents a bushel, and finally, late in the season, as has been said, the price of wheat was higher and wheat went to the trade in considerable quantities. What I wish to say about that is this. Every member of this government that I have heard discussing the question—and certainly I as Minister of Agriculture—went through the length and breadth of western Canada and warned the farmers not to pay any attention to my hon. friends across the way who were saying that because there had been no participation on wheat in the past there would be no participation in the future.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise to a point of order. The minister cannot make a statement like that unless he is prepared to corroborate it. No member of this group to my knowledge ever made such a statement. We told them to sell to the wheat board, not on the open market. The minister ought to know that.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend admits this, that I at least advised them to deliver to the wheat board irrespective of the price. He will admit, too, that men who are supporters of his group and opponents of the party to which I belong went around the province of Saskatchewan making exactly the statement I have just made.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not to my knowledge.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, to my knowledge, and I could quote extracts from newspapers and other publications. What is the present position in regard to this matter? My hon. friend leaves the impression that a price of $1.25 a bushel has been established for wheat, and that this price cannot go up. No such thing has been done. What this government did last September was to place a floor under the price of wheat for two years, until July 31, 1945, on wheat taken in after September 28, 1943. We guaranteed that for every bushel of wheat delivered to the elevators we would pay on the basis of $1.25, No. 1 northern Fort William; and then what do we say with regard to that wheat? We say that this wheat, differing from the wheat which is to go under mutual aid or to countries to which we are giving relief, is to be sold for what it will bring. I am not in a position at the moment to state what the price is, but I submit that this wheat is being sold at considerably more than the floor price which has been referred to, so that the statement I made a few moments ago with regard to parity is correct as far as recent sales are concerned.

That being the case, why does an hon. member of this house rise in his place and say that this government fixed a price of $1.25 a bushel for wheat, and thus stopped wheat from going to $1.50 a bushel? Wheat is being taken in by the government on a guaranteed floor of $1.25 a bushel and is being sold in the markets of the world for prices up toward $1.50. Every farmer who delivers a bushel of wheat under that programme is given a participation certificate which entitles him to the earnings of the wheat which is being delivered to the markets of the world at the present time or which will be delivered in future. My hon. friend says he did not go around the province of Saskatchewan advising farmers against the plan which was in effect prior to last year, but as I listened to him this afternoon he gave me the impression that we were having wheat delivered at $1.25 a bushel and that the farmer would have no further interest in that wheat, that he would not obtain the benefit of any increase in the selling price. That is exactly what his group said previously with regard to wheat delivered to the board or to the trade.

In the few moments he was on his feet my hon. friend also dealt with another matter, in connection with the delivery of hogs, and at the time I said I would place the figures on record as soon as he was through. I have these figures before me, by the way; the reason for having them is that I have had them on my desk ready to hand in the first time questions are called. The question, in reply to which these figures were prepared, was asked a few days ago by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), and I have been awaiting an opportunity to lay them on the table. His first question was:

How many sows were marketed in Canada each month, (a) from July 1 to December 31, 1942; (b) from July 1 to December 31, 1943?

Now listen to the answer:

	(a) 1942	(b) 1943
July	45,384	69,465
August	34,533	69,484
September	27,050	71,320
October	19,034	61,381
November	24,768	39,868
December	25,421	24,489

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister those figures by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: I can get them by provinces, but they are not so given in this return.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If he takes the western provinces he will find that the percentage of sows delivered was much higher.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall deal with those figures in a moment. As I have stated, this information was obtained in response to a question placed upon the order paper, and it will appear in Hansard within a few days. What do they show? We made an announcement of policy on October 22, as my hon. friend said a few moments ago. The heaviest deliveries of sows in 1943 were in July, August, September and October. Then we made our announcement. The next month deliveries amounted to 39,868, and the next month to 24,489. There is no indication in these figures that any announcement made by this government on October 22 had anything whatever to do with the marketing of sows in great numbers in western or eastern Canada or anywhere else.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend will just contain himself, I have the rest of the information here and he will not need to ask the question. The next part of the question asked by the hon. member for Souris reads:

How many barrows and gilts were marketed each month between the above dates under (a) selects; (b) B1's; (c) heavies; (d) all other grades?

If I have permission I should like to place this table on Hansard and not take time to read all the figures.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. GARDINER: The table is as follows:

	Grade A (a)	Grade B1 (b)	Heavies (c)	All other grades (d)	Total
1942—
July	123,170	201,220	14,223	122,958	461,571
August	92,029	144,691	8,001	86,529	331,250
September	138,490	211,762	11,895	98,688	460,835
October	147,450	221,979	20,185	103,565	493,179
November	172,495	273,404	29,032	139,846	614,777
December	201,537	325,592	36,234	158,960	722,323
1943—
July	146,573	204,956	18,171	180,662	550,362
August	104,701	143,570	14,019	137,963	400,253
September	151,432	210,855	18,313	162,300	542,900
October	172,890	246,338	24,504	170,260	613,992
November	227,709	352,054	32,038	203,574	815,375
December	291,139	476,859	35,961	239,441	1,043,400

Let us look at the figures for July. In 1942 there were 123,170 grade A's delivered and in 1943 there were 146,573, or an increase of 23,403. In the B1's, 201,220 were delivered in 1942 and 204,956 in 1943. In the heavies, 14,223 were delivered in 1942 and 18,171 in 1943. Of all other classes or grades, 122,958 were delivered in 1942 and 180,662 in 1943. The totals show that in July, 1942, there were 461,571 deliveries while in July, 1943, there were 550,362 and there is a constant rise in deliveries from July to December, which is the last month given. Let us look at the figures for that month. In 1942 there were 201,537 grade A's delivered, while in December, 1943, there were 291,139. In December, 1942 there were 325,592 B1's and in 1943 there were 176,859. In December, 1942 there were 36,234 heavies delivered, and in 1943 there were 35,961, or fewer heavies in December, 1943, than in December, 1942. Of all other grades, in December, 1942 deliveries amounted to 158,960, and in 1943 to 239,441. What do the total figures show? In December, 1942 there were 722,323 hogs of all kinds marketed, while in December, 1943, there were 1,043,400 hogs marketed, or an increase of more than 33 1/3 per cent. My hon. friend gets up this afternoon, waves his arms, spreads them out to take in all Canada, and goes on to say that it is evident to everybody, that what they have been saying, that some day calamity was going to overtake agriculture, has materialized, and that we are down in the production of hogs in 1943.

Mr. WRIGHT: Would the minister give the date at which the embargo against the delivery of sows was put on in western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Also why did you reduce the amount of bacon to be delivered to Great Britain?

Mr. GARDINER: I am coming to that, too, in a moment. My hon. friend (Mr. Wright) has asked about sows, and because he is a farmer, and differs in that respect from the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), he will understand what I am going to say. My hon. friend knows that when you are marketing 33 1/3 per cent more hogs on the market you are going to market more sows on the market, too.

When did these farmers decide to market their sows? It was not after changes were made in the Canadian prices of feed grain in September. It was not after an announcement of policy on October 22. They had started to do it away back in June, and, so far as these figures are concerned, they carried it right through July, August and September, into October, and right down to the time we put the embargo on, about which the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) has been talking. And then the marketing of sows went down, naturally.

Why were they up before? The hon. member for Melfort knows that many other farmers did what I did. Those of us in western Canada who raise hogs know this, that unless you have a superior kind of equipment you cannot raise successfully and market more than one litter of hogs, especially in Saskatchewan, from any one sow in any one year. What we do when we undertake to increase our production is this, if we are doing the thing we ought to do: We take a gilt that was littered, let us say in April or March, and we breed that sow in December of that year or January of the following year. Thus we have pigs from her when she is a year old. We wean the pigs in May or June. Then we sell the sow. Naturally anyone who is carrying on business on his farm economically in the western provinces marketed his sows as early as he could. And those of us who did not get them marketed before the embargo was put on found ourselves with sows on our hands. Yes, we found ourselves with those sows on our hands. That is no indication there was or was not to be a reduction in hog production. It is an indication that we just missed. We should have sold our sows, and would have been better off if we had done it. These high sales of sows in Canada during that period were natural to greatly increased production. It was good business for the farmers to sell their sows during that time.

My hon. friend says we have come to the time when the production of hogs in Canada is down. I gave figures earlier this afternoon indicating that if we market the number of pigs that we have been marketing for the last three months we shall have close to a billion pounds of bacon to send to Great Britain this year, even with increased marketings of hogs in Canada at the present time. I notice my hon. friend shakes his head. Well, he shook his head a year ago when I said that. He shook his head two years ago when I said it. They have been shaking their heads for four years. In other words, I agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) when he says that the people of Canada are not going to believe in people who make mistakes so often. The production of hogs has been going up every year, and it is still going up. Our problem to-day is not the problem of getting greater production in order to supply the market that we have. Our problem is to get shipping in order to take the hogs from where they have been produced, to the British market, or from where they are to some other part of the Canadian market. That is our problem to-day. And that is so with nearly all the farm products we have been discussing in the house.

May I say that no member of the British government since this war started has ever suggested to the government of Canada that we are not measuring up to our obligations in connection with the production of hogs. As a matter of fact, my colleague who sits in front of me went to Great Britain in the fall of 1939; and with the best efforts and support he could get from the officials of my department he was able to make a contract in Great Britain for only 291,000,000 pounds of bacon and ham. It was not until well on in that season that they consented to take 330,000,000 pounds, the amount we had for sale.

I myself went to Great Britain in October of 1940, and I worked on a contract. I tried to persuade the British that they needed the 425,000,000 pounds of bacon we had in sight at that time. After I had been there a month I came back to this house. What was the criticism I heard? The criticism was that I had been dickering with the British government and refusing to accept the price they were able to pay, in spite of the fact that we had these great quantities of bacon products to sell. But inside of two or three months, when my friends got out into the country, what did we hear? The story then was that we had not foreseen what did happen, and that we should have taken proper action to serve a greater market. When the time came we had the quantity available. Then my friends said, "You will not have enough." In 1942 we had 600,000,000 pounds; in 1943 we had 675,000,000, and this year they are coming in faster than they have ever come in in any preceding years. Our concern to-day is this: What are we going to do with them? That concern requires us to make some changes, and to evolve policies to take care of the matter. In working out these policies we must of necessity communicate with our friends to the south. Why? Before our American friends came into the war we stopped shipment of our food from this country, to the extent that was required, in order that we might send more to Great Britain. Since the Americans came into the war they have been lease-lending food to Great Britain, and much of that food is the same kind of food we produce in Canada. Through an understanding which we have with them we attempt to lend-lease our own food to Great Britain, and they lend-lease theirs. Producing all the food we possibly can for our own consumption and for British consumption, we have found the desire to produce to the limit on both sides of the line to have resulted in our packing plants being filled to capacity with hogs, with cattle, and with meat products of all kinds. The shipping from both countries is not sufficient to take care of our meat supplies, for all concerned. Some adjustments have to be made. But these adjustments are made by the shipping board, which has a very strong representation on it from the British government. As they require these greater quantities of food, from time to time, they will see to it that the ships get here to take it away, and in that way we will find a market for it.

But in the meantime there are certain things which have to be considered in connection with that matter. We shall have to be a little bit patient about some matters, and not simply say that because yesterday we did not have the market open into the United States and something has happened here that creates difficulty for us, at a time when there are just as great difficulties on the other side of the line, we should take off our restrictions and throw the food to them so that they will have trouble with it. That cannot be done in war time, when we have problems which concern us both.

Our intention is to get as much as possible of this meat over to the British front, where it is required, and to the fronts where our soldiers are fighting in different parts of the world. But what I wish to emphasize is the fact that our friends are still doing what they have been doing ever since this war started: They are praying for a calamity to come, and it has never come in so far as agricultural production is concerned. They are not quite big enough—I am not a big man myself—to stand up in their places and say that in spite of their prophecies last year, in spite of their prophecies of the year before, and in spite of their prophecies of the year before that, agriculture in Canada has gone on to greater and greater heights in production, and has done that in spite of the fact—this is their next statement on most occasions—that our opponents claim we have had a muddling of man-power in this country. When my hon. friend gets up and says, "You have not enough labour in agriculture, you have not enough labour in industry, you have not enough labour in shipping, you have not enough labour in our transportation organizations, you have not enough labour in our schools to teach our children, you have not enough labour in our armed forces," what does that mean? That means that all the available man-power of this country is engaged in prosecuting this war. That is all it means.

With reduced man-power upon the farm we have produced forty-eight per cent more farm products than we produced in the last year before the war. That does not indicate any muddling in man-power; it indicates that the man-power of this country is working more effectively and to better purpose than ever before. Why? An hon. member, I think it was the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), said last night that I said something the other day about the necessity of having markets for our products. He made light of that statement. He lost the point entirely of what I said. In the speech from which he was quoting I stated that in spite of the fact that we have reduced the man-power and woman-power on our farms by almost half a million we were producing over forty per cent more tonnage of food than we produced in the last year before the war. I went on to say that in spite of the fact that we have purchasing power in Canada greater in proportion to our population than we have ever had before, we are able to eat only six per cent more food in tonnage than we ate before the war. When those two facts are considered, I am afraid that those who criticize the statement that we must export some of it from this country, in other words find a market elsewhere for it, are advocates of the policy they sometimes accuse us of advocating, namely, a policy of scarcity, producing less so that you can sell each unit at a higher price. That would be the only policy which would be an alternative to the one I suggested in the remarks I have just made. That would be applicable to all primary production as well as other products produced from the natural resources of this country with the labour of Canadian people.

If my hon. friend really wants to know what the Liberal policy is, let me tell him that the whole intent of Liberal policy has been the same since it was first laid down in principle by economists and political leaders in the British isles. I said the same thing before the war; I said it again during the war, and I think it ought to be taken as proof that I should say it again after the war is over. If a man is right once, he ought to repeat the thing; if he is right the second time, he ought to say it again and not do as my hon. friends do, express one statement in the fall of 1939 with regard to the war and possible production, and then change that statement in 1942, make a new guess, and then change it in 1943 and make another guess. Then when we are in the fifth year of the war we find that they are still going right on guessing.

We on this side of the house are convinced that there is only one thing for the people of Canada to do in order to provide the amount of employment we talk about, and that is to produce everything that we are constituted to produce in the greatest possible quantity and then look about the world for places which produce the things we would like to have and without which we cannot live at the standard at which we desire to live, and endeavour to trade our surpluses with them. Someone said the other day that we had been twenty-five years in bringing that policy into effect. May I say to the hon. member who said that that in 1932 we got down to the lowest level of trade in relation to production in this country. There was a slight come-back down to 1934. What did we say to the people in 1935? We said that if we were put in power we would go out through the world where people are disunited and discontented and endeavour to make trade agreements. We made something over twenty and in spite of the threat of war we increased our trade with the outside world by fifty per cent. While increasing that trade by fifty per cent we decreased unemployment by fifty per cent. That is an indication of what the policy will do under the most difficult possible conditions in peace time.

What do my hon. friends say? They say, "No; give us socialism." Where did they go to find it. They went to the only countries where there was national socialism.

An hon. MEMBER: England?

An hon. MEMBER: New Zealand?

Mr. GARDINER: No, they did not go to New Zealand.

An hon. MEMBER: Sweden?

Mr. GARDINER: They went to central Europe. All one needs to do in order to be convinced of that is to read the recent books they have had published on the subject. They went to those countries which they said had learned the value of control in the last war—there were three of them—and they contended that we should apply it in this country. They are trying now to get away from the label of national socialism that was placed on them after they had—

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no point of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are at war with the national socialist states, and to call any group in this house "national socialist" is in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of this house, something that is unwarranted, particularly when we in this group derive our hopes, our aims and our aspirations from the democratic socialism which is carried on under the labour party in Great Britain and throughout the British empire.

Mr. GARDINER: I may not understand the English language, but when my hon. friends talk about the national socialization of everything in this country I should like to know what their right name is. Last night my hon. friends opposite were saying that we ought to call them Progressive Conservatives. Any one who reads history knows that no political party necessarily bears the name it has given itself. Political parties in the countries of the empire, the Tories, the Whigs, the Grits, and so on, have been so named by their opponents. Names given by political opponents usually stick, and there is no name that describes them as well as national socialism. That being so, may I say to them that in the very books they have had written in order to convince the people of this country that they ought to vote for them, they talk about our young boys riding the rods before the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: To which you condemned them.

Mr. GARDINER: We did not condemn them; we were not in power. I shall deal with that in a minute. Why were they riding the rods?

An hon. MEMBER: Because of Liberal policy.

Mr. GARDINER: We will deal with that. They were riding the rods because we could not market the products of Canada in other countries. We were denied the right to market them in Germany; we were denied the right to market them in Italy; we were denied the right at certain stages to market them even in France. Apparently my hon. friend cannot solve a plain mathematical problem, one so simple that it would not be given to a grade eight class. The statement is that if you increase your production by forty-eight per cent and increase your consumption by only six per cent, if you were exporting a large percentage of your products before the increase, then you must trade your surplus to someone else.

Mr. COLDWELL: And people were starving in this country.

Mr. GARDINER: This was exactly the condition—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Three cents a meal for those on relief in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason your wheat was twenty-six cents a bushel when my hon. friends opposite were in power was that Germany and France would not take it. There was no other legitimate reason. The reason why it was only seventy cents at the beginning of this war, or shortly before, was that we could not find people to take it. The reason why we are getting over $1.25 for it to-day is that we have demands for it, all over the world, and shipping is our shortage. There is not any other solution of this problem. My hon. friends have sent their emissaries over to these countries to examine into their institutions, and they came back here and said, "Apply them here".

Mr. COLDWELL: Who said that?

Mr. GARDINER: It is in your book. I have a copy up in my room and I can bring it down to-morrow and read it to you.

Mr. COLDWELL: Name one of the emissaries.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Name one.

Mr. GARDINER: I will get down to it in a moment.

Mr. COLDWELL: Name one.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Name one. We are not in Saskatchewan now.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, I will name one. That will end it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister's time has expired.

Mr. GARDINER: Wait until I answer this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend asked me to name one. I will name him, the most prominent one I know of, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in Saskatchewan, who is over in Europe to-day fighting for us, Mr. George H. Williams.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is he a national socialist?

Mr. GARDINER: He went to Russia.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say, is he a national socialist?

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, well, now, you asked the question. He belongs to the C.C.F.

Mr. COLDWELL: Certainly.

Mr. GARDINER: He went over to Russia and to other European countries, and came back and wrote a book. That book is still in print, and anybody can buy it and read it.

Mr. WRIGHT: Did he advocate national socialism?

Mr. GARDINER: And some of the people who write books whose principles are still being followed by my hon. friends also went over and examined these institutions, and came back and stated, "There are not any young men riding the rods over there." On the very next page they told us the reason. What was it? They said that the only three countries in the world which have taken a lesson from the last war and have adopted controls as against our free way of living are the only countries where young men are not riding the rods; and therefore, they said, we ought to adopt something similar over here.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister give the source, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. In the first place the minister has exceeded his time; and in the second place, he cannot make quotations in this house without stating what he is quoting from. I do not know what he is using, unless it is his fictitious imagination; is he quoting from that?

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I will not sit down, and nobody over there can make me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is no objection to the minister speaking over his time, and I do not hear any, he may continue.

Mr. COLDWELL: There were no objections as long as the minister was sticking to facts. But he has departed wholly from the facts and is drawing on his imagination, and I object to his time being extended further.

Mr. GARDINER: May I speak to this point of order? I am not sure that any hon. member has the right to restrict me to forty minutes. My hon. friend said a few moments ago that no minister has spoken in this house on this amendment; it was moved only last night; I am the first minister to speak on it; and I am not so sure that anybody can stop me if I wish to go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. REID: I told you the minister had an answer.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says "Quote the book". I will quote that book exceedingly often before the session is over, and satisfy everybody. I have it upstairs. I did not know I was going to speak or I should have had it with me.

An hon. MEMBER: You should carry it around.

Mr. GARDINER: I will carry it around.

Mr. GRAYDON: Which one?

Mr. GARDINER: The reason why they have no young men riding the rods over there—

Mr. COLDWELL: May we have the point of order settled?

Mr. GARDINER: We shall have it in a few minutes.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I rose to a point of order, and Mr. Speaker is on his feet to give a ruling.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister cannot run the show as he could in Saskatchewan.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 37 reads:

> No member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

I take it that the subamendment, taken in conjunction with the motion and amendment, comes under the category of a motion of "no confidence" in the government. The minister may therefore continue his reply.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just get a clarification? Do I understand you, Mr. Speaker, to say that the moving of a subamendment is a want of confidence motion? If so, I want to point out that last year I was prevented from speaking for more than forty minutes.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. member is not a minister of the crown.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the house knows, an address of humble thanks to His Excellency the Governor General having been moved, an amendment was moved by Mr. Graydon, seconded by Mr. Diefenbaker, regretting that His Majesty's advisers have failed in certain respects, to which Mr. Roy moved a further amendment, that the government has further failed in other respects. Amendments of this kind from any quarter of the house, if approved, would mean a vote of "no confidence" in the government. The government has not yet replied to the subamendment. Therefore hon. members making such amendments and a minister replying thereto have the right to speak without being limited in time, under the provisions of standing order 37.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, what I was stating when I was interrupted was that there was a reason why young men in those countries were not riding the rods. Those of us who belong to the Liberal party, and perhaps some others, gave that as a reason at the time. One of the reasons why I myself gave it in the years following 1936 was that I had the privilege of sitting in the gallery of the House of Commons in London in 1936, and I listened to the man who was sitting on the right-hand corner, as I faced him, in the front bench just across from the government. He was asking the government of Great Britain of that time, which I have heard my friends condemn on quite a number of occasions, for the privilege of forming a small committee, a committee of four or five members of the house, and of meeting the government in council in order to discuss the conditions existing over on the continent of Europe which made unemployment not a possibility there at that time. After he had stated his case, a member of the government rose and denied him that right, and said that no member of the house knew better than he did that any hon. member could go to the government at any time and discuss any subject as important as that with the government, but they did not consider that any small group in the house knew so much more than the government itself knew with regard to that situation to lend sufficient importance to it to have a meeting of that kind. Well, now, that was during a debate on defence, and what he was trying to point out was that they were building on the continent of Europe at that time the greatest war machine the world has ever seen. At that time the man who was giving that warning got a very indifferent hearing, both in the house and outside. War came, and during the period before the war there was unemployment for reasons I have been indicating, namely, that we could not sell our products in the countries that were preparing for war against us. The war came in 1939, and it had been in progress only a few months when that same man was called to the premiership of Great Britain, and he has led us through the war. And what have we found out during that period? We have found that we could end unemployment by building a war machine. The United States has found the same thing; Britain has found the same thing; every country in the world has found the same thing; and in building a war machine at least as great as that of our opponents we have for the time being brought about lack of unemployment in the country. But, like my hon. friend who spoke last night, I am not going to follow the socialists into the next election or into the future and maintain that, in order to end unemployment, we must have the same kind of regimentation and control throughout peace time as was required in those various countries for war whether in preparation for or during war.

What is needed in the world is the new spirit spoken of by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and ridiculed a few moments ago by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). My hon. friend apparently does not understand what the brotherhood of man leads to. The brotherhood of man does not lead to nationalism, with consumption in your own country of everything you are going to produce, and only the production of those things which you can consume in your own country. The spirit of the brotherhood of man leads to the production of all that can be produced in this country of those things which are needed in other parts of the world, and the distribution of them to all parts of the world. That is the ideal of Liberalism and it has been the ideal of Liberalism ever since the Liberal party has been known in Canada.

One thing that pleases me is that most other parties in this country are coming to think the same thing, and when they do come to think the same and meet behind closed doors in Winnipeg or Regina to draft a new platform, what do they do? A new platform in these days toward the end or in the middle of the war, days during which we are fighting for the freedoms that Liberalism has established in different countries throughout the world, under whatever name the principle may have operated, means simply this, that these people take up all the things done by the Liberal party, provincially and federally, and recite them as their own.

My hon. friends opposite say that floor prices came from John Bracken. They forget that we had a floor price under butter in 1938. They forget that we had a floor price under hogs and cheese in 1939-40. They forget that we had a floor price—their own party put a floor price, if you like to go back—of 87½ cents under wheat when Mr. Bennett was in power, but they have dropped the name of his party. We have put floor prices all the way from 70 cents to $1.25 under wheat at different times, and if anyone cares to search the records he will find that the week before Mr. Bracken made the announcement of his policies in Lethbridge I announced this particular policy, in connection with floor prices, in London on October 15 last, and the Prime Minister himself read it over the radio into the platform of this party very shortly after. The Prime Minister tells me that it was in the platform of the Federation before Mr. Bracken spoke.

In any event, a floor under farm products has been the policy of this government ever since the war started, and all we have said in any policy announced lately is that we shall bring down legislation to make it possible for us to apply that policy when the war ends to those products to which at present we can apply it, under the War Measures Act. The War Measures Act, as it now stands, applies only for six months after the war. We are to bring down legislation which will make it possible for us to have floors under farm prices put into effect by this government and maintained beyond the war.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) raised the constitutional question the other night, and someone else said that floors may be in the basement, while still another person said something else about it. Well, I should say this. My hon. friends opposite ask, where will you find markets? I have been saying something about that in the last few moments; but the market that has always been supplied, where floor prices have been involved, is the market supplied by the government of this country when it says that when products reach a certain price we shall take control of them and then try to find a market for them, after having taken them over at that price. There is nothing constitutionally wrong with that. There may be some other things that are difficult about it, but constitutionally there is nothing wrong with it.

And so finally, with regard to the attack made this afternoon, I say that we have in Canada an agricultural policy of which we are proud. We have the satisfaction of being able to stand anywhere in the dominion and say that the returns from agricultural products are better than they ever were previously in the whole history of the country, war time or any other time. We have the further satisfaction of being able to say that men are getting out of the debts they incurred during times when some others were administering the affairs of this country, that men are paying their debts and getting into the position where they can go on at the end of the war and operate more successfully than ever before.

My hon. friend makes an appeal to us to help those who are coming back from overseas. I agree with the hon. member who spoke from over in the corner the other day, after returning from overseas, that to be able to say that you are doing more than any other country has done is not enough. I do say, however, that we are doing so much and attempting to do so much more that I am quite sure that what another returned man said the other night over the radio is true, namely, that if the young men over there knew all the things he knows, after listening to certain things he has heard since coming here, they would be fairly well satisfied with what the Canadian government is doing to prepare for their home-coming. And those things which we have not done and which probably have not occurred to us, those things which others are suggesting ought to be done, are always given full consideration, and if they are helpful they are adopted from time to time as, I have no doubt, they will be adopted in the future.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

This government is in every sense a liberal government and we do not intend to apply state socialism either to agriculture or to any other line of industry in order to bring about prosperity in Canada, because we know that in a free world such as we shall have after the war, where there will not be national socialist states in Europe, where people will be prepared to trade with one another, and to treat one another as brother men, conditions will be very much better under a spirit of Liberalism than under any other spirit which can be established in this country.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I must thank hon. members for the very long and loud ovation that I have just received.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Wrong again; try again.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON: I refrained from participating in this debate in the hope that a division might be reached last night, but to allow the minister's speech to go unanswered would indicate that he has spoken the truth. He does a great disservice to democracy when he fails to distinguish between the national socialism of Germany and the socialism that is practised in Sweden, in Australia, in New Zealand, or that is advocated in Great Britain where there are members of the cabinet who have called themselves socialists. We have refrained from saying "yes" when people have asked us if we are socialists, because it has been quite clear that many of our questioners have refused to clarify their own ideas as to socialism.

The minister does a great disservice to a former colleague of his in the Saskatchewan legislature, Major George H. Williams, M.L.A., who is the only leader in any legislature in Canada on active service. Major Williams did visit Russia a number of years ago and on his return wrote a book entitled "The Land of the Soviets". I should like to remind this house that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) visited Germany in 1936 and interviewed the fuehrer himself. Is there anyone in this house or in this country who would suggest that the Prime Minister of Canada is a national socialist because he visited Hitler?

Mr. ADAMSON: And gave him a buffalo.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am informed that he presented some buffalo as a gift. I think the wartime information board should do some educational work on the cabinet ministers of this country so that they might understand more about the fundamental differences that are found in the different countries participating in this war. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) had as his guest upstairs to-day Doctor Henry Sigerist, professor of the history of medicine at Johns Hopkins university, who is here in Ottawa as a guest of the health league. I think the minister is to be commended for trying to find out what has been done in Russia, so that we might benefit by some of their achievements.

In connection with some of the concluding remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I say to him that the country which has done such a remarkable job in the 1940's is the same country that could do so little for its young people, for its unemployed, in the 1930's. The Minister of Agriculture must take responsibility for the conditions which prevailed in different parts of this country from 1935 to 1939 when five dollars a month was offered to many of our young people, when heroes of to-day were riding the boxcars of yesterday.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member will permit me, what I was referring to in the general statement was references to Germany and Italy, which are referred to in "Social Planning in Canada".

Mr. NICHOLSON: At the moment we are referring to Canada. Major Williams' book was written after his visit to Russia. I gathered from what the minister said that he was making some reference to what Major Williams had written on his return.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend asked me to name any member from his party who had been over there, and I named Mr. Williams.

Mr. COLDWELL: The reference was to national socialist countries and the Prime Minister is about the only one who has been officially in those countries.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, in support of my argument I should like to refer to the January issue of "Canada at War". I find on examining this booklet that thirty-five per cent of the man-power of Canada between the ages of eighteen and forty-five has joined the armed services. The sixty-five per cent at home includes cripples and many who have tried unsuccessfully to join the services. They, with women, children and the old people, have done a remarkable job for which the government of this country should not take too much credit. This job has been done in spite of the feeling in agriculture that the farmers are the forgotten people, in spite of the feeling amongst labour that the workers of this country are not accorded the consideration that the employers are receiving. Notwithstanding that, I find on page 39 of this publication that the production of miscellaneous military stores in 1943 was nearly six times as much as in 1939 and 1940, mechanical transport four times as much, cargo and naval vessels twenty times as much, aircraft eight times as much, armoured vessels ten times as much, guns and small arms 196 times as much, guns and ammunition fourteen times as much, instruments and signalling apparatus sixty-one times as much, chemicals seventy-six times as much, small arms thirty-seven times as much. In the field of agriculture our farmers have a wonderful record. In 1943 we had on the farms only three farmers for every four we had in 1939, but per farmer in Canada as a whole twice as much was produced. In connection with our shipments of pork products to the United Kingdom in 1943, this booklet shows that they were about three hundred per cent of what we sent in 1939, about fifty per cent more of wheat, about two hundred per cent more canned fish, about fifty per cent more cheese and about forty times as many eggs.

I should like to correct the impression that the minister gave that we were consuming only six per cent more food in 1943 than in 1935-39. In this publication I find that we were consuming 18 per cent more dairy products than we consumed in the 1935-39 period, 12 per cent more meats. We were up to 29 per cent in beef; poultry, 2 per cent; eggs, 24 per cent; potatoes, 7 per cent; tomatoes and citrus fruits, 20 per cent; coffee, 11 per cent, and cocoa, 19 per cent. In a few items we were down: tea, refined sugar and butter.

Mr. GARDINER: These are in dozens and quarts; I was speaking of tons.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This booklet says "Consumption in Canada in percentages." We were down in butter and tea. With thirty-five per cent of our man-power in uniform we have established this remarkable record. The point we have been making again and again is that it should not require a war every generation to speed up our production, to give our people more beef, pork, butter and eggs than they had in peace time. The figures I have given show what we have been able to do under the stress of war. We have made these very, very large gifts to Great Britain—and we are all for it—and at home we have had more and better food. Why? Because for the first time in twenty years many of our people are able to go into a store and buy adequate supplies of food.

The minister intimated that he is well satisfied with the social security legislation that is in effect in many parts of the dominion and he thinks the Liberal party should deserve a good deal of credit for it. I should like to turn now to what has been done in the field of health in Canada. The reports that have been submitted to the advisory committee on health insurance contain some material that is well worth further study. We should consider how Canada stands in regard to the health of her people as compared with other countries. Look at maternal mortality rates, for example. The figures per thousand live births for 1936 were as follows:

Canada	5·6
United States	5·7
New Zealand	3·7
Australia	6·0
England and Wales	3·8
France	2·1
Netherlands	3·0
Norway	2·6
Sweden	3·1
Denmark	3·9

Infant mortality rates per thousand live births for the same year and the same countries were as follows:

Canada	66
United States	57
New Zealand	31
Australia	41
England and Wales	59
France	67
Netherlands	39
Norway	42
Sweden	43
Denmark	67

Canada has a very bad record; it is right at the foot of the list in regard to maternal mortality rates, and our infant mortality rates bring shame to most people who are concerned about the health of our country. Doctor Heagerty, director of public health services for the Department of Pensions and National Health, points out quite correctly that when a mother dies at childbirth a child usually dies also. He informs us that on an average we have been losing a thousand mothers a year, and that during the past ten years we have lost yearly an average of 15,000 children under one year of age. He asks:

> Would you tell me why a child should die of measles? Is there any reason for it?

The only reason is poverty on the part of the parents, who just cannot afford to call a doctor or nurse, or who call them when it is too late. Then in connection with the tuberculosis deathrate and our treatment of that disease in Canada, Doctor Heagerty comments:

> And now, it is obvious that Ontario and Saskatchewan having succeeded in reducing the tuberculosis deathrate, and that it could be done in other provinces; and we know that given an opportunity we can eliminate tuberculosis altogether in one generation; and it does not take very much money to do it.

What is the story as far as tuberculosis is concerned? The deathrate per 100,000 population, excluding Indians, was 47 for the dominion, which was a reduction of 46 per cent during the last twenty years. Our Indian deathrate from tuberculosis, however, was 631 per hundred thousand. The figures by provinces are as follows:

Tuberculosis Deathrate per 100,000 Population

	Deathrate 1941 census	Percentage decrease 1921-1941	Indian deathrate 1936-37
Prince Edward Island	74	48	429
Nova Scotia	72	46	319
New Brunswick	67	37	534
Quebec	80	34	319
Ontario	26	63	362
Manitoba	30	58	1,040
Saskatchewan	21	51	485
Alberta	24	54	1,036
British Columbia	46	40	752

Hon. members will notice that in Saskatchewan we have a record of which our citizens are proud, the best record in Canada in 1941. The reason, of course, is that many years ago we provided in a socialist manner for people suffering from tuberculosis. I was interested in observing a graph showing the deathrate from tuberculosis in Saskatchewan over a period of years. A decided drop appeared when the first sanatorium was built. There was another drop a few years later, when rates were reduced from $2.50 to $1 a day per patient. A few years later there was another break, occasioned by the introduction of free treatment for every tubercular patient in the province. According to the evidence which has been compiled, Ontario and Saskatchewan are the only provinces which have services as complete as should be provided. It is interesting to note the deathrates in two provinces very close together. In Quebec it was eighty per 100,000, while in Ontario it was twenty-six, though climatic and other conditions are very similar in both provinces. If adequate provision could be made for the treatment of those suffering from tuberculosis in Quebec, over a period of time that province could have a similar rate to Ontario.

When we consider the tuberculosis deathrate among our Indians I believe the people of this country who have concerned themselves with the health of people in China, India, Africa and other places should blush with shame. In the province where the minister in charge of Indians lives—1,040 Indians per 100,000 died from tuberculosis, while the deathrate among white people was only thirty.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the hon. member repeat those figures?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The tuberculosis deathrate among Indians in Manitoba was 1,040 per 100,000 as compared with thirty among the white people.

Mr. HOWDEN: We have more Indians in Manitoba, and the climatic conditions are not as good.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Climatic conditions there are not very much different from those of Saskatchewan, and at that we are ashamed of our record, though in our province the Indian deathrate was only 485 per 100,000.

Mr. HOWDEN: But we have more Indians.

Mr. NICHOLSON: These are figures per 100,000, not the number of deaths.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are Indians more susceptible to tuberculosis than we are?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, and the white men must take responsibility for bringing this plague to the first citizens of Canada. Having brought it to them, we must see to it that these fine citizens have the sort of treatment they deserve.

I should like now to discuss the question of health services in connection with those in our mental institutions. The deputy minister of health of Ontario gave evidence before the committee last year to the effect that 17,000 more beds were required to meet the situation in Canada. Doctor Heagerty said we had 47,000 patients in our mental institutions and that we were short about 10,000 beds to accommodate them. He also said there were not enough doctors or nurses or orderlies to care for the patients properly; and he pointed out that we have been told by experts that a great deal of mental illness is preventable. Specialists tell us that if they could get hold of children who have either the hereditary factor or an inclination toward mental illness they could do away with a great deal of it.

Coming to the question of our general health services, I have obtained a great deal of information from the bureau of statistics in regard to our provision for the health of the people of this country. I find that according to the 1941 census we had a doctor for every 1,098 people in the dominion. The figures for 1941 by provinces for doctors and dentists, not including those in the armed forces, are as follows:

	Persons per doctor	Persons per dentist
Canada	1,098	3,121
Prince Edward Island	1,419	4,320
Nova Scotia	1,350	3,959
New Brunswick	1,694	4,529
Quebec	1,107	3,883
Ontario	927	2,318
Manitoba	1,107	3,475
Saskatchewan	1,700	4,766
Alberta	1,320	3,961
British Columbia	1,010	2,548

These statistics prove clearly that people in all parts of Canada are not given the advantage of adequate medical service. In my own riding we have eleven doctors practising now, each looking after an average of 5,217 people. Our three practising dentists look after an average of 19,131 each. I am informed that in the Canadian army we have a doctor to care for every 245 soldiers, a dentist to look after every 535, and a nurse for every 294. In the army, of course, provision must be made to look after the wounded, after they have joined in battle. But I cannot see any reason why it is necessary to have a dentist for every 535 in the Canadian army, and why the people in the Mackenzie riding should have to get along with a dentist for every 19,131 people.

Before the war we were not in quite such a serious situation. We had a dentist for every 11,000 people. I wonder if hon. members realize what it means to people in different parts of the country who have to live year after year without being able to go to a hospital or a doctor? In 1930 I found my abode at Hudson Bay Junction, in the north country. We had left Edinburgh, Scotland, where the very best of medical services were available for every man, woman and child. The Scottish people are much maligned, but it should be said for them—

Mr. GRAYDON: Who maligns the Scots?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Too many. In the city of Edinburgh is found one of the finest hospitals in the old country, the Royal infirmary. There one receives the very best of treatment, and a bill is never submitted. The Hudson Bay Junction district was served by one medical doctor who cared for farmers, townsfolk and about 800 men working in the bush. But when the depression came, and the sawmill operators could not sell their lumber, many of the mills closed down.

At the same time, large numbers of people in the drought area came north, and brought with them very little money. I happen to have with me the pictures of three of the heroes of the last war, who came north from the city of Regina. In one case the man is fighting for democracy for the second time. The two others have sons fighting in this war. The arrangement was made whereby they would receive $10 a month for food, for the first year, and that they would have other expenses which would not make a total expenditure of more than $300 for the year. It does not require much imagination to appreciate that the $10 a month to city dwellers going to the north would not allow much for medical services. It would be used for the purchase of foodstuffs.

Accordingly the board of trade and the citizens in the community thought something should be done by the government of the day to provide medical service for these settlers. They were being given food, and it was argued that medical service was also important. What I am about to say is for the benefit of my hon. friends to the right, the Progressive Conservatives. While many of them would rather not take responsibility for the administration of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, as he was then known—now Viscount Bennett—and for the Conservative administration in the province, I must remind the house that many of those who are now supporting the Progressive Conservative party were active in the Conservative party at that time.

What did the government of the province say? It said, "This is a matter the people must look after themselves." No help was provided. Conservatives said, "Our doctor is a Liberal; if he were not such an active Liberal the administration might do something about it." Liberals said, "If we had a Liberal government a different policy would be carried out."

Mr. GRAYDON: Is my hon. friend referring to specific cases?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, at the place where I lived for ten years.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the name of the doctor?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Doctor Collins, who practised in Hudson Bay Junction at that time. By and by we did have a change of government. Under that Liberal administration we did get much better treatment. We were without a doctor for some considerable time, as no doctor could provide medical service for this large area under such conditions. There was not a doctor within seventy miles when he left for another location. His going was a great loss to our community.

How would hon. members like to live in a community where there was no doctor within seventy miles to look after people who became sick. But when the Liberal government did decide to do something about those people, they made provision for $50 a month to pay the doctor. The doctor had to agree that every person who was on relief could come to him and receive treatment. He was not prevented from making additional collections. But people who were getting $10 a month for relief, and were selling cordwood at a dollar a cord were not likely to be able to pay much to a medical doctor. However, the doctor was concerned about the health of the people, and he did accept $50 a month from the provincial government, and did give medical service to the people in a very large area.

I submit that $50 a month to give comprehensive service to such a large number of people in an area where the nearest hospital and doctor is seventy miles away is not sufficient. Many of the people in that area were men who had fought for their king and country at the time of the last war. That was one of the areas which was available for settlement when they came back from overseas. They settled on these bush homesteads, up in the north country.

After criticizing ourselves for our failure to care for people in times of sickness, we might ask ourselves if people in other countries have done better. If we examine the evidence placed before us in this large volume by the advisory committee I think we shall find that there are two countries which have outstanding records, as far as providing health for their citizens is concerned. I refer to New Zealand and Russia. And, in passing, I urge hon. members to take advantage of the opportunity to hear Doctor Sigerist this evening in the Glebe collegiate, or to-morrow before he leaves the city. Hear what this outstanding professor of the history of medicine has to say about what has been done in Russia.

In his book, which I have before me, I find some significant statements. He says this:

> It seems to me that the following four points represent the most characteristic features of the soviet health system:
> 1. Medical service is free and therefore available to all;

2. The prevention of disease is in the foreground of all health activities;

3. All health activities are directed by central bodies, the people's commissariats of health, with the result that—

4. Health can be planned on a large scale.

Then he says:

There can be no doubt that the soviet system of social insurance is infinitely superior to any insurance system in capitalist countries. The costs are what they should be, part of the cost of production. The benefits are infinitely greater than under any other insurance scheme. The worker is guaranteed complete medical service, he is given social security. He is entitled to it, because after all, he is creating the values that make such a scheme possible.

Most people are agreed that changes will have to be made in our health programme in Canada. Some doubts exist as to what type of changes should be made. I have here a copy of "You Knew What You Were Voting For", written by William S. Gibson, President of National Cellulose of Canada, Limited.

On page eight he says:

All the planners start with the premise—"We must not have another depression." I could bring many arguments to show that nations and individuals profit more in adversity than in good times. I know that I would rather start a new enterprise during a depression than in good times.

Of course Mr. Gibson would rather start an enterprise in poor times. In January I talked to a man working in one of the sawmills in my riding. He is receiving forty cents an hour and his board, but he told me that the first time he met me, in 1932 or 1933, he was working for four cents an hour for a ten-hour day. They could not even make it five cents an hour. Naturally Mr. Gibson would rather start an industry when he could have his materials produced by men working in the bush for four cents an hour, when there are fifty men looking for every job available.

I think this war has proven one thing conclusively. It has proven that if we want it we can have a high standard of living in Canada in the world of to-morrow. We should understand that a nation can plan its production and consumption on a low plane, with mass unemployment and low standards, or on a high plane with full employment and high standards for its people. I should like to point out that it was stated by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), when he was Minister of Finance, that whatever is physically possible must be made financially possible. His successor, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), has emphasized that. We must always keep that in mind. If that is true in war time, then it is equally true in peace time. Whatever is physically possible in peace time must be financially possible.

I have not the time to go into all the details that must be considered, but finance is not now and should not be a limiting factor in our effort in any direction. The only limiting factors should be: first, raw materials; second, labour; third, the machinery of production and, fourth, our power to coordinate these things. I submit that if the war should end to-morrow—we know that victory will be achieved some day—Canada would be a richer nation than ever before. By that I mean that we would have more new factories, more trained workers and more new resources to develop.

In order to plan a health programme for the post-war period there are certain physical necessities which must be kept in mind. We must have: first, nutritious food; second, adequate supplies of heat, light, potable water, sewage disposal facilities and fresh air; third, preventive and restrictive health services; fourth, adequate clothing and proper housing for all our citizens. I shall have something to say about most of these at some future time.

Mention was made a few days ago by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) of an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal and which had been prompted by the report of a speech by Mr. Jolliffe, leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Ontario. During a discussion before a group of eminent medical men Mr. Jolliffe outlined in some detail the plans of the C.C.F. for improved medical services. This was during a meeting of the London academy of medicine on September 23, 1943. In his remarks Mr. Jolliffe made it quite clear that on the whole the doctors of this country had done a good job. We do not want to place the doctors of Canada in a position where they are not going to have a great deal of freedom. The president of the Canadian medical association made some reference to the fact that the C.C.F. would limit the salaries of general practitioners to $3,000, and of specialists to $6,000. I have made a careful survey and I can find no record anywhere where any C.C.F. speaker made any statement of that kind.

I would remind the house that in Russia they have provided the highest standard of living available for their doctors. The C.C.F. in any province in Canada would recognize that our doctors are highly trained and must be given as high a standard of living as we can provide collectively.

Then the hon. member for Peterborough West asked if the C.C.F. could arrange for babies to be delivered between eight a.m. and five p.m., but no answer was given. Both the editorial in the Journal and the hon. member for Peterborough West assume that no answer could be given. Again I would remind the house that arrangements have been made to look after the medical and dental needs of our troops without any one doctor having to work for twenty-four hours a day.

Some of my best friends are of the medical profession and I have the greatest respect for them, but there is one thing I must say about them. While they are ready to look after their friends, most of them seem to be unable to look after themselves. Many of them are burnt out by the time they reach fifty or fifty-five years. We must provide machinery so that the medical services of this country can be carried on without any one doctor having to work for sixteen or twenty hours a day.

On motion of Mr. Marshall the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 10, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

FIRST REFORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE STANDS

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Caribou) presented the first report of the special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, as follows:

February 10, 1944.

The special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment begs leave to present the following as a first report:

Your committee recommends,

1. That it be granted leave to print from day to day 1,500 copies in English and 400 copies in French of its minutes of proceedings and evidence, and such other documents as it may authorize.

2. That on account of the demand evinced for copies of the fourth report of the 1943 special committee of the house, presented on January 26, 1944, an additional 500 copies in English of the said fourth report be printed.

3. That standing order 64 be suspended in relation to the above.

4. That ten members shall constitute a quorum.

5. That your committee be granted leave to sit while the house is sitting.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. TURGEON moved that the report be concurred in.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Before the house gives leave, can the hon. member tell us whether this is just the ordinary formal report of the committee's proceedings or whether there is something special in it? We have not seen it.

Mr. TURGEON. This is a formal report asking, as we do every session, that the quorum be reduced and that we be authorized to have certain printing done. It is a report of the organization meeting of the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: When the house is asked for leave in this way, I think that if the report is so very short we might have the terms of it.

Mr. TURGEON: The report was read to the house by the acting Clerk Assistant.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the mover of the report that paragraph 2 recommends that, on account of the demand evinced for copies of the fourth report of the 1943 special committee of the house, presented on January 26, 1944, an additional five hundred copies in English of that report be printed. There was nothing in the terms of reference to the committee to enable them to make such a report. So far as this report is concerned, therefore, it is irregular, but that does not prevent the house, if it so desires, from complying with the wish embodied in that paragraph. The hon. member, however, must have regard to the circumstance I have pointed out.

Mr. TURGEON: What would you suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we eliminate that portion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, I think so. I take it, then, that paragraph 2 will be omitted from the report as presented.

Mr. TURGEON: Thank you.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask how long it would delay the adoption of the report if it followed the regular course? Is it so urgent that we cannot wait one day to get the real details of the report? There is no occasion for this rush.

Mr. TURGEON: I do not wish to rush it, but it would permit the committee to get to work so many days earlier.

Mr. NEILL: One day.

Mr. TURGEON: It can stand.

Motion stands.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WAR-TIME WAGES CONTROL ORDER—LABOUR RELATIONS CODE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to say a word with respect to the war-time wages control order.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister just got in ahead of me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend will not hold that against me.

May I read to the house a paragraph which appears in the speech from the throne at the closing of the last session. The paragraph is as follows; Hansard, page 5575:

> During the course of the year, the price ceiling has been splendidly maintained. My ministers have reaffirmed their determination to do all in their power to prevent inflation and to safeguard a basic standard of living. To this end the war-time wages control order has been simplified and strengthened. It will continue to be administered by the national war labour board. Consultation is proceeding with the several provinces regarding the enactment of a comprehensive code of labour relations which will be administered by a war-time labour relations board, and which will include the principle of compulsory collective bargaining.

May I speak first on the second of these matters, the one related to a code of labour relations. I am happy to be able to say to the house that the consultations which were proceeding between the provinces and the dominion have been concluded, and there have also been concluded consultations between representatives of labour organizations and the government with respect to the code. I am advised that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), expects to be in a position to table early next week the enactment respecting the code of labour relations.

As to the war-time wages control order, many representations have been made to the government, some by hon. members of the house, some from labour organizations and others from other sources. These the government has already had under consideration. To-morrow the government will be meeting a delegation of representatives of the Canadian Congress of Labour. As hon. members know, there are four outstanding labour organizations representative of the different labour unions throughout the country: the one which I have just mentioned, the Canadian Congress of Labour; another organization, also large in numbers, older in years, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; there is the Canadian Catholic Confederation of Labour; and there are the organizations representing the railway brotherhoods. On January 27 of this year the government met the joint legislative committee of the railway running trade organizations as a delegation from that body. At that time certain representations were made to the government with respect to the war-time wages control order. To-morrow, as I have said, the government will be meeting the delegates of the Canadian Congress of Labour, and we expect that representations will be made by that body to the government with respect to this order. At any rate I now extend an invitation to the delegates of the Canadian Congress of Labour to make such representations as they feel they may wish to make to the government with respect to the order.

Very shortly the government will be meeting a delegation of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and also a delegation from the Canadian Catholic Confederation of Labour. These are the customary annual meetings with the government. We will expect, and I now invite, the delegates of these other large organizations to make to the government such representations as they deem advisable with respect to the war-time wages control order.

When the government has these various representations before it, the government will then be in a position further to consider what amendments should be made to the order. It is the intention of the government to make certain amendments, but we wish to have these representations from the leading labour organizations before us when we are considering these further amendments; and after that opportunity has been given to labour, and the government has had the opportunity of considering all representations which have been made, amendments will be made by the government to the war-time wages control order.

I would hope that these various labour organizations could meet with the government within the next two weeks. One meeting as I have said has been arranged for to-morrow. I do not know that there has been a definite date fixed for the other two; but I would say now that we would seek to meet their convenience at as early a date as may be possible.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister rose to make a statement with respect to the war-time wages control order of 1943, I rather expected that he would make a much more comprehensive and perhaps much more satisfactory statement than he did, and having that in mind, I suggested that he was "getting there first", before I had asked my question. But I want to say this to the Prime Minister: as he rose, I was about to make an inquiry, and it was on this basis. What the Prime Minister has now said in connection with calling in the other representatives is, of course, a very good thing. I hope he will do that. I hope he will give some real consideration to what they say. But in the meantime February 15 is the deadline for the operation of the war-time wages control order of 1943, and that is where the emergency and urgency of the matter arise. May I ask the Prime Minister, as I intended to before this statement was made, that the government give consideration to the postponement of the application of war-time wages control order of 1943; otherwise it will go into effect and then all the representations that are afterwards made cannot be regarded in perhaps the same light as those which are made before the order goes into effect. At the same time, and following up what the Prime Minister has said, and doing what the Prime Minister now suggests be done in another way, I suggest that he refer this whole order to the industrial and international relations committee of the house, so that those interested in and affected by the provisions of the order may have an opportunity to appear before that committee.

These two suggestions, I think, are most important, and I impress them upon the Prime Minister: first of all, the postponement of the application of the wages control order—because it is going to be too late by the time he sees all these people—and second, that the parliamentary committee have a chance to hear the representations of these people in a proper way. I ask the Prime Minister to give consideration to these suggestions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am always pleased to give consideration to any suggestions which my hon. friend may wish to make.

He has referred to the 15th of this month being the date on which the order itself takes effect in some particulars. In that connection, there is one very important consideration, it is that there are certain benefits which accrue to labour, under the order, on the 15th. They relate to the basic wage in which the cost of living bonus is embedded; and I understand that already steps have been taken by employers to see that the benefits to be derived from that section in particular will be accorded. It would I think be inadvisable to postpone anything of the nature of a benefit. I cannot see that there would be any possibility of anything inimical happening from effect being given the order in other particulars as, in fact, is now the case, before the further representations of labour have been heard. I assure my hon. friend that the government is most anxious in this matter, above all others, to have the cooperation of labour. We believe that labour, as well as all other classes in the community, is interested in preventing inflation in this country, and that labour realizes that a measure of wage stabilization is essential if we are to preserve the price ceiling. We all recognize that it will require close and helpful cooperation on the part of government, labour, employers and the community, to maintain the price ceiling and prevent inflation. We have no desire to be in any way coercive in this matter, but rather we wish to make the measure as effective as it can be made through good will on the part of all parties concerned. At a later stage it might be advisable to have the committee which my hon. friend has mentioned, the committee on industrial and international relations, consider some of these matters. If so, I should be prepared to advise my hon. friend accordingly; but at the moment I think the step proposed by the government will expedite the revision of the order in a manner which will help to meet at least some of the objections, and I should hope all fundamental objections.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may ask one supplementary question, the Prime Minister mentioned that the national labour code would be brought into being by order in council, as the war-time wages control order was brought into being. May I ask the right hon. gentleman if, in view of the dissatisfaction that has been expressed at the way this order was put through, by order in council, the government will not bring in legislation dealing with the national labour code, so that this house may properly consider all the aspects relating to labour relations in Canada, instead of doing it by order in council as was done in connection with the wages control order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has carefully considered the matter to which my hon. friend has just referred. One thing we must keep before us at the present time is the fact that these are temporary measures. We are not enacting permanent legislation. These measures are being enacted for the purpose of meeting conditions relating to the war. How long the war will last none of us can say, but it is certain that as conditions in the world change some of these orders will have to be changed considerably. To bring into parliament legislation which would be as comprehensive as these measures are; to have that legislation considered by this house, in addition to the heavy legislative programme already before the house, I fear would not be helpful in enabling us to keep our minds concentrated above all else on the prosecution of the war itself. There are important war measures that must be taken up ahead of all other legislation, they have been mentioned to the house already. I submit that parliament itself enacted the War Measures Act to enable the government to meet by order in council situations arising out of the war, and this is the kind of enactment it was intended should be dealt with under that act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When parliament is in session? That is just rendering us impotent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I think my hon. friend is overlooking the very important consideration I just mentioned, namely that parliament should be giving its attention to the most important war measures and not be devoting its time to discussing at considerable length measures that are solely in the nature of temporary measures, which can be dealt with effectively under the provisions of an act of parliament passed for the very purpose of meeting such conditions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That means we are to abdicate our functions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I am expressing the position in a way that will be regarded as sensible and will be readily understood by all. I should add this further word. The enactment, presented in this form, is a flexible measure the provisions of which may be altered by order in council, just as the enactment itself is by order in council. That is very different from the procedure required to amend a statute. One could not say whether parliament would be in session at the moment at which a statute might have to be amended. On all counts, taking these various points into consideration, the government believes that the supremacy of parliament will be fully maintained by the power which is being exercised under its authority in this way. Certainly by this procedure the time of parliament will be preserved for the discussion of the most important of all measures.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: In the light of the Prime Minister's statement as to the advantages to labour contained in order in council P.C. 9384, I should like to ask if any organized body of labour has suggested that they would like to have this order applied on February 15 because of those advantages.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot answer my hon. friend categorically, but I do know that some of the labour organizations feel that there will be substantial benefits to them under this order and would welcome those benefits coming into effect on the 15th of this month.

EXTRADITION TREATY

CANADA-UNITED STATES—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister on an entirely different matter, and perhaps he will be obliged for the interruption. Last year the government signed or arranged—I do not know exactly the correct position—a new extradition treaty with the United States which if ratified and put into effect would, in my judgment at all events, have a devastating effect on Canadian citizens. I desire to know from the Prime Minister, if not to-day then perhaps to-morrow, what is the present position of the proposed extradition treaty with the United States, and whether it is the intention to have parliament ratify that treaty.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

CONFERENCES WITH R.A.F. ON ADJUSTMENTS IN AIR TRAINING PLAN, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Are conferences now being held in Ottawa between the Minister of National Defence for Air and representatives of the British air ministry with respect to adjustments between the R.C.A.F. the R.A.F. and the joint air training plan? Is the minister prepared to make a statement now with respect to the conferences, or will he make a statement to the house when the conferences are concluded on the agreement reached and the decisions made?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, conferences are now being held between a member of the United Kingdom cabinet, Captain the Right Hon. Harold Balfour, Under-Secretary of State for Air, Air Marshal Sir Peter Drummond, air member for training of the R.A.F. and members of his staff, on the one hand, and officers of the Department of National Defence for Air and myself on the other hand, with a view to making adjustments in the air training plan and to bring about better conditions of service for our R.C.A.F. personnel overseas, as well as other matters. The conferences are continuing; as a matter of fact they are being held every day. They will not conclude until some time next week, and I shall be only too glad to inform the house as to the results thereof.

ALLOWANCES FOR TRAVELLING TIME TO PERSONNEL ON LEAVE

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Air a supplementary question. He speaks about making certain adjustments which will be to the benefit of Royal Canadian Air Force men overseas. Has any consideration been given to making adjustments in Canada to the end that travelling time may be allowed to the men of the R.C.A.F. when they are on leave, as it is allowed for the navy and the army? I understand there is discrimination in this regard, and I should like to ask the minister if he will rectify it.

Mr. POWER: That being purely a domestic question, it would hardly have anything to do with the discussions between ourselves and the British government representatives. However, I shall be only too glad to take my hon. friend's question into consideration, and look into it.

Mr. GRAYDON: But will the minister do something about it?

POLICY WITH RESPECT TO RETIREMENT OF OFFICERS

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a further question of the minister. In view of the recently reported retirement of a large number of high ranking officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force, has he any statement to make to the house in the matter?

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of the question. In reply I may say that there is a definite retirement policy in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

When the war broke out the R.C.A.F. was a small organization. It comprised a number of excellent officers who had done magnificent service in the last war. These men were the backbone of the R.C.A.F. development and expansion. The principal job of the R.C.A.F. during the first years of the war was the organization, development, expansion and administration of the air training plan. The plan has produced results and dividends far surpassing our own expectations and frustrating those of our enemies.

These officers, who gave of their time and experience to bring about those results, though comparatively young in years, were mainly too old to take an active operational part in this war. Besides, their experience, their prestige, their authority, made it necessary to retain them here or elsewhere in non-operational duties.

[Mr. Power.]

The rapid expansion of the joint air training plan, the western hemisphere operations and the overseas air force brought increased responsibilities and with these accelerated promotion. There are now many officers of comparatively high rank in our forces who have not seen operational service. They could not. But rapid promotion brings the penalty of early retirement, otherwise there would be stagnation at the top. The air war and the air force must be dynamic, not static.

The air training plan has reached its peak of development. From now on there will be contraction rather than expansion. The favourable war situation has brought about a shifting and contraction of our defensive home war establishments.

If all these men were retained in their positions or promoted right up to their full retiring age we might be faced with a thick ceiling, a bottle-neck at the top, comprised entirely of men who, through no fault of their own, have seen no active flying service overseas in this war. Now, after five years of war, we have at our disposal, overseas especially some younger men who have had actual fighting experience against the enemy in this war. More and more we are calling on overseas headquarters to send these men back to us.

If we are to encourage the initiative, the ambition of these young men, we must show them that there is room at the top, that the ceiling is not closing in, but that the upward path will be made clear for them.

This is the policy. There is no stigma, no reproach in retirement, but there is ruthless necessity if the R.C.A.F. is to continue during the war and after to be the young, virile, dynamic force which I am sure all Canada wishes it to be and has a right to expect from it in return for the sacrifices made on its behalf.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I wish to commend the minister for that answer.

TREATMENT OF CANADIAN PERSONNEL ATTACHED TO ROYAL AIR FORCE

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I was interested in the minister's statement respecting promotions, and I agree with it. I should like to ask him a further question with regard to men who are serving overseas and who have seen operational work. Are Canadian personnel who are serving in the Royal Air Force, and who enlisted in England, to receive the same consideration as Canadian personnel who are merely attached to the Royal Air Force?

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend will put that question on the order paper I will answer it at that time. I understand he is speaking of Canadian nationals who were residing in England either during the war or prior to it, and who joined the Royal Air Force. He is not referring to R.C.A.F. men who are now attached to the R.A.F. I would have to look into that.

BEER

REQUEST THAT FURTHER SUPPLIES BE MADE AVAILABLE FOR THE ARMED SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. When liquor rationing was introduced I understood it was on the grounds of temperance and man-power. In view of yesterday's report that 2,300,000 gallons of beer have been shipped to the United States, I should like to ask, first of all, whether the man-power situation in Canada now justifies that, and, second, whether this course is one to aid temperance in the United States. If the minister's answers to those two questions are in the affirmative, will he now divert some of that beer to British Columbia, to relieve the very great shortage of the supply offered to the soldiers, airmen, sailors and war workers who are out there.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): I think that is a question which should be on the order paper. My hon. friend sent me a copy of a question he intended to ask, and I have the answer to it. But he did not ask that question.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am merely enlarging on my question. I think it is of more and more importance, as it would seem that beer is going to the United States and it is not going to the Canadian army.

Mr. GIBSON: I have the hon. member's question which he sent me, in which he asked: "In view of the very marked shortage of beer in the soldiers', sailors', airmen's and veterans' canteens of British Columbia, will the minister divert more of this traffic to British Columbia." I would point out that there is a difference in the method of supplying beer to the active service forces, and to veterans' clubs. Active service units secure a quota on the basis of a gallon per man per month, and that amount is considered sufficient by the military authorities. In regard to veterans' clubs, the allocation within the province of the provincial quota to hotels, veterans' clubs, other clubs and individuals is a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of provincial authorities and is subject to provincial control.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister cannot pass the buck to the province on that.

CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

PROPOSED MEETING TO CONSIDER SOCIAL SECURITY, HEALTH AND OTHER MATTERS

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Earlier in the session he expressed the intention of calling a dominion-provincial conference with respect to social security and health measures. Will he tell us what steps he has taken in that regard, and if the conference is to be convened at an early day?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the session opened a communication was sent by the Clerk of the Council to the several provinces, seeking to ascertain what date would be most convenient to the different provinces to meet at Ottawa with the dominion government. I should have said that, first of all, they were asked as to whether they would wish to have such a meeting. All the provinces, I believe, have signified their readiness to meet with the dominion government in conference on matters of mutual interest and concern in connection with social security, health, and other matters—financial matters being among that number.

It is difficult at the moment to say just when the conference can be held, as it is almost impossible, simultaneously to suit the convenience of all the provinces. At the present time some of the legislatures are meeting, or will be meeting within another few weeks. It looks, however, as though it might be possible to suit the convenience of all some time about the Easter season. That is as near as I can come to giving a date which is considered most acceptable to all.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

PROVISION FOR DEPENDENTS OF THOSE IN WORK CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I should like to reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas).

Conscientious objectors who have dependents are in camps as a result of a magistrate's decision due to refusal to comply with the regulations. Men of this class when declared to be conscientious objectors are given the opportunity of performing alternative service by assigning a part of their wages to the Canadian Red Cross and adjustments are made in the amount of the assignment so that the man will be able to maintain his dependents.

There are certain cases, however, where individuals will not accept any direction at all, and in these cases it has been necessary to have them committed to service camps. Unfortunately their dependents have to rely upon their own resources, these cases being parallel to the cases of men committed to a prison. These men are encouraged to reconsider their decision, and when this happens the arrangements originally proposed to them are put into effect.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. L. D. Tremblay for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Graydon, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Roy.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, if I were allowed only sixty seconds in which to express an opinion upon the proposals to be found in the throne speech, I would say two things. First, these proposals serve only to relieve and not to cure. They are merely palliatives. My second thought is that all reforms depend upon monetary reform.

Canada in the matter of production ranks high among the nations of the world. Human effort, combined with material resources and unfettered by financial limitations, has raised Canada to a position where she is admired, where she is the envy of the whole world. There flow from Canada's shores to-day vast quantities of war materials and foodstuffs, not only to our own fighting men and women but to every one of the allied nations. Such an achievement is highly creditable and reflects upon the wonderful work which is being done by our men and women in industry, in mining, in fishing, in forestry and on the farm. I should like too to pay a tribute to the men and women of our fighting forces, who are to be found not only in our own country but in Great Britain and in almost every theatre of war. They are doing a magnificent job; they are writing history which future generations will read with pride and satisfaction.

I was deeply impressed by the speech made several days ago by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). Here is a man who has spent three years in close association with Canadian men and women in Africa, in Sicily, and in Italy. He has come to know their thoughts, their dreams, their aspirations, their plans, and their difficulties. He has returned to this country, and at the first opportunity has presented these difficulties to us as members of the House of Commons. I believe he deserves the support of every hon. member in his endeavour to get these wrongs righted. I for one shall be glad to give him every support in this work

But there is one thing I should like to say at this time. Just as long as Canada is fettered with an outworn financial system, just so long will it be difficult for us to bring about necessary reforms. As the editor of the Ottawa Citizen aptly expressed it the other day: Reform our monetary system and ninety per cent of the ills of society will be cured. There must be no financial restrictions to Canada's post-war programme, but I fear that as long as the governor of the Bank of Canada, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board and the deputy minister of finance are the chief advisers to this or any other government, there is little hope of much change in our financial policy.

On February 11 of last year, within a day of one year ago, I spoke during the debate on the throne speech. On that occasion I said I believed that forces were at work which had as their object the accomplishment of three things: (1) the return of Canada to the gold standard; (2) the establishment of a supranational government, backed up by an international police force; and (3) the complete destruction of British idealism, individualism and initiative and the substitution therefor of state autocracy. Any right-thinking individual who has been following the course of events through the newspapers can readily see that these objectives will eventually be attained unless some action is taken to thwart the move.

I turn now to the speech from the throne itself. We find in it, as someone aptly expressed it to me the other day, a strange mixture of pious platitudes and ponderous piffle. In support of my first assertion I read the third paragraph of the speech from the throne:

The winning of the war clearly remains the first of all objectives. My ministers believe it is their duty to see that Canada's war effort is firmly maintained until the enemy is defeated in Europe and in Asia. They believe the government's primary task, and the primary duty of the Canadian people, is to concentrate on the prosecution of the war. Our fighting men must be assured that there will be no diversion from this vital task and no relaxation of Canada's war effort. Till the war is won, the policies of my government will continue to be shaped to that end.

Our armed forces at sea, on land and in the air have added lustre to the name of Canada.

Those are wonderful words, and I agree heartily with the sentiments there expressed. But in the mind of the common man in this country, confusion and doubt and anxiety exist with respect to the trend of events at the present time. It is difficult for the common man to understand when he picks up his newspaper and reads that General McNaughton has given up the command of the Canadian forces, the reason given being ill health, to find a few days later that that statement is contradicted and the government take no action to clear up the puzzle. It is difficult, too, for the common man to understand why it is that when Russia and the United States are fighting as allies, Russia is attacking Finland while the United States is still on friendly relations with that country. It is difficult, too, for the common man to understand why it is that when Britain and the United States are locked in deadly combat with Japan, Russia, which is our ally, gives to the Japanese valuable fishing concessions in Russian waters. It is little wonder that doubt and confusion and anxiety exist in the minds of the people of Canada. It is little wonder that our people do not understand what Lord Vansittart meant when he said just a short time ago, in an article appearing in an English periodical, that this is a phoney war and we may get a phoney peace.

Now I turn to the second assertion which I made. In the seventh paragraph of the speech from the throne I read this:

Canada's prosperity and the well-being of her people are bound up with the restoration and expansion of world trade. Export markets are essential to the efficient employment of vast numbers of Canadians. Larger imports are needed to raise the standard of living.

That is a strange statement. It leads me to believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is still living in the ox-cart age of economics. This whole question of foreign trade, export markets, imports, and so forth, was I think very satisfactorily dealt with by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when he spoke the other day, but because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) showed the same deplorable lack of knowledge of economics yesterday, I think it is necessary for me to bring a little more evidence to bear on the matter.

I have here a copy of a report of the London Chamber of Commerce on "General Principles of a Post-War Economy". This was published on the 12th of May, 1942, and is the outcome of a study by a special committee appointed by the council of the London Chamber of Commerce on March 10, 1942. In order that hon. members may get a picture of the background of the London Chamber of Commerce, may I read the first paragraph of the report:

The London Chamber of Commerce has a direct membership of 9,000 firms and companies. Thirty-nine industrial and commercial associations, with an approximate membership of 50,000, are affiliated to it and are represented on its council. The chamber is therefore vitally concerned in the nature of the framework within which industry and commerce will be called upon to function after the war.

The special committee appointed by the council studied this whole question of markets, imports and exports, favourable and unfavourable balances, and tariffs. I quote from pages 8 and 9:

It is an obvious absurdity that nations should regard it as necessary to export their real wealth, not for the purpose of paying for imports, but in order to solve their domestic unemployment problem by passing it on to other countries. Exports with this end in view are nothing more nor less than an excuse for distributing wages to people who otherwise would be unemployed. This purpose would be equally well served if the goods were to be thrown into the sea or if the people were to be employed to dig holes and to fill them up again.

When, however, it is remembered that even wealthy nations have a large percentage of their population under-fed, ill-clothed and ill-housed, it is clear that these would be the best recipients of this alleged surplus wealth. What is necessary is to improve the technique for the internal provision of money, so as to convert this human demand into effective demand.

The chamber considers that it is a perversion of export trade to employ it for the purpose of exporting domestic unemployment and dumping it on other nations which already have their own problem to solve. These surplus exports might confer a benefit on some countries if they were sent as a gift; and the recipient country had an interal financial mechanism capable of distributing enough purchasing power to its people to enable them to buy excess imports of consumers' goods in addition to, instead of in competition with, the goods already there. They are, on the contrary, used for the purpose of getting other nations into unpayable debt; and moreover, the recipient nations have not the mechanism for distributing additional purchasing power to buy them so that they do, in fact, displace goods already in the market, and cause distress selling and a slump in prices.

The chamber submits that international trade must now be raised to its true function, that is, nothing more nor less than an exchange of goods and services of a mutually advantageous character.

I would like hon. members to compare this with the unrealistic attitude of the government on this question as given in the speech from the throne. In the language of the air force the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture are off the beam and lost in fog.

The question in my mind which I have to answer to my own satisfaction as I study the proposals is simply this: To what extent will they solve present and future national problems? The amendment of the Progressive Conservative party and the amendment of the Bloc Populaire are of little concern to me; they are designed to put people on the spot. They are nothing more or less than political by-plays.

What are some of the things which we propose to do in this session of parliament? We are told that the government proposes to set up three departments—a department of veterans' affairs, a department of reconstruction and a department of social welfare. We are asked to approve of Canadian participation in the establishment of an international organization to further national security through international cooperation. We are asked to give approval to an industrial bank. We are asked also to approve of housing legislation, a nation-wide health insurance plan, contributory old age pensions, provision for family allowances, and a price floor for staple farm products. In a word, all this legislation means bureaucracy, regimentation, and cruel taxation, if carried out under the present economic set-up.

I believe that members of parliament, in discussion, are constantly confusing two things, methods and objectives. These proposals in the throne speech are methods whereby we can attain a certain objective. So far as I can learn, very few members have discussed paragraph 10, which deals with the objective this government has set for the Canadian people.

Let me say at the outset that objectives are not the concern of members of parliament or of cabinets; objectives must come from the people themselves, and if they do not come from the people themselves they are of little value. Paragraph 10 of the speech from the throne sets out the post-war objective:

> While the post-war objective of our external policy is world security and general prosperity, the post-war objective of our domestic policy is social security and human welfare.

It is strange that we should place our foreign policy ahead of our domestic policy. We have given it precedence in the speech from the throne. The reason for this is not clear. It is not my intention at the moment to discuss the question of foreign policy, but I wish to say one or two words with reference to the post-war objective of our domestic policy. We are told that that objective is social security and human welfare. The inmates of a gaol or penitentiary or an asylum enjoy those things; they have social security and welfare. The slaves in the early days enjoyed the same condition. The people of Germany, the people of Italy and the people of Japan enjoyed a high standard of social security and human welfare, but two things they did not enjoy were individual freedom and personal initiative. It is strange that these things are not to be found in the domestic objectives as outlined in the speech from the throne. I say that the people will reject this objective when they come to realize what it all means. I think I am safe in saying that what the people of my constituency, one hundred per cent of them, want is economic security with individual freedom; and I cannot support that part of the throne speech unless the Prime Minister and his advisers are prepared to make those necessary changes.

In order to obtain these objectives, methods are suggested. To me, methods are clearly the responsibility of experts. Neither the mass of the people of Canada nor the members of parliament are experts, so that I do not think that we are in much of a position to judge the merits and demerits of these various proposals. My opinion is that it is the business of members of parliament to frame and place upon the statute books of Canada laws which will make these proposals effective. Therefore, we must first settle upon the objective. Having settled upon our objective, we should retain the services of competent experts to get us those things which the people desire. Having had these submitted to us, we should pass the necessary legislation. That is the only place where a member of parliament should come into the picture.

For instance, I should like to know the names of the people who have suggested to the government that the ills of industry can be cured by the setting up or establishment of an industrial development bank. If industry want another bank, of course they must have it, if they feel that that will solve their problems. But I want to know which section of industry have petitioned for it. I want to know who have recommended this bank to the government, so that, say four or five years hence, we can highly commend them for their action if it has proven a success and has benefited industry, or, on the other hand, wreak our vengeance upon them if it has bound industry more strongly to finance. Personally I do not think it is a bank that they want; I think what they need are plenty of customers with plenty of buying power. Industry after this war will be capable of turning out goods in tremendous quantities; yet if the consuming public have no buying power, what purpose will be served by turning out so much goods?

Lord Melchett said, just a short time ago:

> The problem of the modern world is to provide the population with mass purchasing power to absorb the output of mass production. This lies within the field of finance.

So much for the industrial development bank.

We are to be asked to give our approval to a national health insurance scheme. If it means the sort of thing which the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) complained about a few days ago, I want none of it. If it means the denial of the right of a citizen to engage the services of a chiropractor, an osteopath, or any individual who can relieve suffering and pain, I do not want to have anything to do with it. If it means the denial of the right of the citizen to embrace the philosophical teachings of Christian Science, then, again, I do not want anything to do with it. In other words, if it in any way curtails the freedom of the individual and substitutes an enslavement to bureaucratic regimentation, we shall be better without it.

A few words on family allowances. Here we have a direct admission on the part of the dominion government that industry does not distribute through wages, salary and dividends, sufficient buying power to the consuming public to purchase total production.

Here we have a government endorsing Major Douglas's theory without giving credit where credit is due. If we admit that there is a deficiency of purchasing power inherent in the system, in my judgment we should extend this plan to give to every Canadian citizen sufficient buying power to provide for him and for his family the bare necessities of life. Stuart Chase said recently:

> Steadily, reluctantly, even kicking and screaming, western civilization is being driven to the hitherto abhorrent notion that the consumer must be furnished with purchasing power whether he works or not.

That is a very important admission on the part of a man who has held orthodox views for so many years.

In conclusion, I want to say a word to the post-war international planners who are springing up like mushrooms all over the country. One of the most picturesque figures in all biblical history was that wise old patriarch Solomon, king of Israel. In his day he was pestered with planners, until in a fit of anger he turned to them and said, "The eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth". I think that might be fittingly applied to the international planners of our day. We should wish our friends of the Soviet Union, China, France, Norway, Belgium, Holland and all other countries, success in reconstruction and reestablishment, of their countries, but we ourselves should get on with the immediate task of solving our own problems at home. Haakon Lie, secretary of the Norwegian Federation of Labour, speaking recently to the Wellesley Institute for Social Progress, said:

> We do not want any army of occupation. We can administer our own affairs. We can buy what we need from Britain and America. All we want is our freedom. You can educate your administrators and send them over with the best will in the world, but in a short time they will be as much disliked as the German administrators.

That is something for our meddlesome planners to ponder. I feel quite sure in my own mind that there is a very rude awakening coming to those individuals when the "cease fire" sounds and our young men return from overseas.

I see my time has gone, Mr. Speaker, and there still remain such important questions as agriculture, old age pensions, housing, and so on. They are all big questions, and when they are under discussion in this house I shall have something to say in respect to them. I do want to say, however, that each of these questions is capable of a simple solution. The old axiom "there are none so blind as those who will not see" applies most fittingly to our present administrators. Will it take a revolution to shake them from their complacency?

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this discussion. I was prepared to accept the suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) who, in moving his amendment, spoke briefly and said that in his opinion there should be few speeches on the address, that we should wait until the legislation was brought down and we knew what it was all about. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) accepted that suggestion and also spoke briefly, taking only about twenty minutes to deal with general matters before going on to read his statement in regard to the speech by Lord Halifax. It seemed to me that, since the speech from the throne was not very definite, we should wait until we had the actual legislation and then get on with the business of the country. After listening to the political speech delivered yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), however, in which he referred to Liberal policies and to the floor prices on agricultural products, I came to the conclusion that I should say a few words at this stage.

May I say quite frankly at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that my first concern is the winning of the war. To my mind that is our most important problem, and the only thing that matters now. Having said that, however, I want to repeat what I said last session, that I have no apology to offer for having supported certain measures brought down by this government since the beginning of the war, when I thought those measures were in the interest of Canada's war effort. Neither have I an apology to offer for having on occasion criticized this government, I hope constructively, when I thought such criticism would also help the war effort.

When I looked over the speech from the throne point by point, as was suggested by the leader of the opposition, I had to agree with him that most of the legislation there suggested was taken from the platform drawn up by the Progressive Conservative party at Winnipeg in December, 1942. But even at that the Progressive Conservative party is by no means stranded, for there is much remaining in that platform which the government could well adopt and much that the people of Canada will approve when they have a chance to express themselves at the next general election.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Poor old Tory party!

Mr. PERLEY: If the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will just keep quiet for a little while I may have a few suggestions to offer him. I do not think I have said anything as yet that would call for any interruption by him, but when I do so, as always I shall be glad to hear from him. I hesitate even at this stage to offer any constructive suggestions to the government with respect to marketing problems or similar questions, because during the last eight years I have had many such suggestions refused by the government at the time they were offered, only to see them put into operation a year or two later.

Mr. SENN: Too late.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, too late; but I think the government will agree that I made the suggestions before they thought of them.

Yesterday we listened to two able speeches, delivered with great energy and force, by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and the Minister of Agriculture. It developed into a real bout. I am not going to get mixed up in any of their little differences; I am not even going to suggest that I might act as referee, because each scored so many points that it might be a little difficult to say who won. I noticed, however, that each took many of his points from the Progressive Conservative party. The minister took credit, in a forceful way, for the policy of floor prices. In doing that he referred to the fact that the first person to establish floor prices in Canada with respect to the marketing of grain was Right Hon. R. B. Bennett in 1935. This is what the minister said:

> My hon. friends opposite say that floor prices came from John Bracken.

Hear, hear; they did.

> They forget that we had a floor price under butter in 1938. They forget that we had a floor price under hogs and cheese in 1939-40. They forget that we had a floor price—their own party put a floor price, if you like to go back—of 87½ cents under wheat when Mr. Bennett was in power, but they have dropped the name of his party. We have put floor prices all the way from 70 cents to $1.25.

Then he goes on to say that on October 15 the Prime Minister made a statement with respect to floor prices. The minister's memory is not good. The statement made in October was made about a year after the Winnipeg convention, where the principle of an initial floor price was established and put into our policy. Then the minister mentioned the different prices—the initial price, the parity price, and the floor price—and said they were all practically the same, namely, floor prices. When the minister made reference to all these prices I was surprised that his memory was so short. He did not mention all the names pertaining to prices, because he and his party were responsible in the fall of 1935 and the beginning of 1936 for establishing what was termed a fire sale price. It will be recalled that following the election, Mr. McFarland was thrown out and Mr. McIvor took office. It was at that time that a fire sale price was established in an effort to dispose of surplus wheat, which later proved to be a blessing in disguise. They tried to sell that wheat at fire sale prices, offering it in large quantities which the market could not absorb. The minister forgot to mention that yesterday.

The minister then reviewed the situation with respect to prices in 1937, 1938 and 1939, down to the present time. I am not going to go into detail on that matter. I shall say only that it was not very long before the Canadian Wheat Board Act, passed by Mr. Bennett's government in 1935, was set aside by what was described by the late Hon. Mr. Motherwell as an illegal order in council. Hon. members know what happened. After the fire sale price had been established, in an effort to dispose of the wheat, the price changed; it went up until in 1937 it reached $1.47. Then the act was brought into operation again, and hon. members know the record from that time. As the minister said yesterday, we had a floor price of 70 cents, and then floor prices of 80 cents and 90 cents, down the line. The minister yesterday tried to take credit for the price at $1.25, but we shall have something to say about that later on.

It is hardly necessary for me to say anything respecting my own stand in these matters. I think every hon. member knows where I stand in regard to prices, and particularly grain prices, which were under discussion yesterday. In 1938, after the fiasco of the fire sale price, I proposed in the house a policy which amounted to a floor price, to be effective not only from year to year, but over a ten-year period. After setting out the circumstances and conditions in connection with marketing I suggested, in 1938, that the government should authorize the board to fix a minimum price of a dollar per bushel for a period of not less than ten years. I mentioned further on that occasion that coarse grains should be brought under the operation of the board, and that a fixed minimum, or, if you like, a floor price, should be placed on coarse grains of export grades. So, who was practically the first to suggest floor prices in the house? On the occasion on which I made the suggestion in the house we had discussion in our caucus, and I had the support of every hon. member there present for the policy I advanced. We discussed it, and in the main that was the policy of our party.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The Conservative party, or the Progressive Conservative party?

Mr. PERLEY: I was at the Progressive Conservative convention at Winnipeg when we adopted that policy in a plank providing for floor prices. The policy was adopted by the party as a whole on that occasion. The orders of the day in each session from 1940 will show a resolution in my name, asking for a parity price and a minimum price with participation certificates. I say therefore that my record in that respect has been consistent.

Last fall, when the price of $1.25 was announced, in my effort to be fair, as I try to be in all cases, I wrote to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and complimented him upon his action in setting that price. In my letter I expressed regret that it had not been done sooner. I pointed out that the minister could have taken similar action in March, at the latest in July. It will be recalled that in March he had announced the policy that the 1943 price was to remain at 90 cents. Then in July, having in mind the circumstances surrounding marketing in western Canada, the United States and Europe, I asked the minister to reconsider his policy and to advance the price by at least twenty cents. He replied that he could not do so.

It is of interest to note that when the price was set at $1.25 I had made a motion in the committee on agriculture, in addition to my resolution on the order paper which, because it was private members' business, could not be reached. But on July 16 in the committee on agriculture I made practically the same motion which had stood in my name on the order paper. My motion in committee asked the government to consider increasing the price by twenty cents to $1.10. The committee's report states:

> This committee recommends that in view of the changed market conditions the wheat committee of the cabinet should authorize the initial payment of wheat being increased to $1.10 a bushel basis No. 1 Northern at Fort William, instead of the present 90 cents paid by the Canadian Wheat Board, and the Wheat Board Act should be amended to permit this higher payment, at the present session.

The motion was made on the 16th, and it was ruled out of order on the 19th. When the committee met on the 19th the chairman announced that he had consulted with you, sir, and I believe also with the Clerk of the House, and he then ruled my motion out of order on the ground that it would involve the expenditure of public money. It is interesting to note that having ruled that out on July 19, they proceeded in September to adopt the principle. They even went a little further, for which I am glad.

There is another thing about which I am quite pleased. On that same day I moved, as will be seen from the records of the agriculture committee, as follows:

> This committee recommends that the government should authorize the Canadian Wheat Board to handle all oats and barley on a pooling basis according to grade, with initial price not less than the established ceiling price.

They struck out the words "with initial price not less than the established ceiling price" and then adopted the motion. It is interesting to note that within two weeks they passed an order in council which was my original motion almost word for word. When that motion was put to a vote in the committee only the Conservative members and the C.C.F. members voted for it. It is interesting to note, too, that they have adopted some of my suggestions in that respect.

The farmers have done their part, and all they want is a square deal. They have done everything that has been asked of them in the way of producing products of all kinds. They have helped as much as any other class of our people to finance this war. I am proud to say that the agricultural districts in my constituency have gone over the top early in every victory loan campaign. They have done their duty in many respects and, as I say, all they want is a square deal and an adequate return for their labour.

They also want some controls with respect to our marketing system. The government proposes to establish floor prices, I trust that these prices will not be lower than the ceiling prices now prevailing. There should be participation certificates and the wheat board should be given the necessary control in order to carry out orderly marketing. As has been suggested already, I am firmly of the opinion that the Minister of Agriculture should set up a board of live stock commissioners. If that board had the proper agricultural representation—no one knows better what should be done for the farmer than the man who is actually in the business—it would prove of great help to the minister.

Within the last two or three days questions have been asked by the leader of the Social Credit party and others in this house with respect to the marketing of beef, live stock and so on. This goes to show that conditions are not satisfactory. I shall not take the time now to go into this in detail, but I think the minister would be well advised to consider some of the suggestions that have been made. The western beef producers are dissatisfied, as are the hog producers. I should like to quote from the Regina Leader-Post of January 26, 1944. This is the mouthpiece of the Liberal government and the Minister of Agriculture in Saskatchewan. It says:

> Returns for hogs are the lowest since 1938 and the bonus will only put the net return to where it was in 1942.

That shows that his own organ is not very well satisfied. The government should give more attention to what agricultural and co-operative organizations have to say. These organizations are playing a most important part in the affairs of this country. The federation of agriculture is well organized, and it represents every branch of the agricultural industry.

I said a moment ago that I hoped the floor prices would be set at a level comparable to what the farmer has to pay for the things he consumes, comparable to the prices now being received in the United States, and they should be set for a term of not less than five to ten years.

There are other suggestions I could make with regard to marketing and agricultural questions with which I am familiar, but I shall not take the time now. There will be an occasion later on. The chief whip of the Liberal party laughs. We shall have something to say on these matters. All the government has to do is to bring down its measures and we will dissect them. I am generally on the job, and I think I shall be able to give him something to laugh about later on.

There are many matters forecast in the speech from the throne, most of which have been discussed during this debate. I refer to rehabilitation, social security, man-power on the farm, and other labour problems. With respect to social security I shall say just one word. If you want to solve that problem, if you want to provide security for all the people of Canada on a proper basis, all you need to do is to enact measures that will provide employment for all.

I am going to make one or two suggestions. The government should adopt measures to put the four basic industries of Canada on a proper footing. First, there is agriculture with its subsidiary industries of milling, baking and so on. Then there is the lumber industry, with the different forest products. Then there is the mining of minerals, with which would be associated the production of hydro-electric power. And there is the fishing industry. If these four industries are put on a proper basis, every secondary industry will fall in line. They are our four chief industries, and if proper consideration is given to them our difficulties with respect to labour and other problems will be taken care of. I do not intend to go into the details of what should be done with each industry; there will be another time to discuss these matters.

I regret that the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat at the moment. I noticed he was here yesterday; it may be that it takes a speaker like the hon. member of Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) to bring him into the chamber. I listened with close attention, as I always do, to what he said yesterday. He made a speech with some punch in it. He tried to convince the members of this house that the present government of which he is a member had implemented the policies laid down from time to time in the different platforms of the Liberal party, and I was surprised to hear the minister take credit to the government for the fact that the employment situation to-day is more or less satisfactory. He sought to leave the impression on the house and, through Hansard, with the people of this country, that the alleged policies of the Liberal party were responsible for the present lack of unemployment. I use the word "alleged" advisedly, because I doubt if there are many people in Canada who have the remotest idea of what the Liberal policies are; they have been changing with such frequency that no one can keep track of them.

An hon. MEMBER: That is progress.

Mr. PERLEY: It is progress to change your policy? Surely, Mr. Speaker, thinking Canadians know full well the price we are paying in blood, sweat and tears for the synthetic prosperity of which the minister spoke yesterday.

The minister also suggested that trade treaties alleged to have been negotiated by his government with twenty different countries were in line with Liberal policy and at least a contributory factor to the prosperity that he mentioned. Here again I think the people of Canada know that the present shortage of goods and services and any measure of prosperity we may now enjoy are not attributable to the government's policies at all but to the curse of this war.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The minister was speaking of the period up to 1939.

Mr. PERLEY: And since 1939, because there was no prosperity under the Liberal government prior to 1939. I know that the minister referred to the low prices of 1932. But who in Canada who knows anything about agriculture is not familiar with the conditions that prevailed in 1932? What about Mr. Dunning and the manifesto of 1930, when the Liberals admitted that they were responsible for the drop in prices and the depression that came upon us?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In 1935 the people showed by their votes who they thought were responsible.

Mr. GRAYDON: You had better stick to fish.

Mr. PERLEY: The credit for our larger domestic and foreign trade, to which the Minister of Agriculture referred, cannot be given to this government. Every man in Canada knows that our expanded foreign trade and our enlarged domestic trade is due to the producers in Canada, who are the ones, and the only ones, who should get the credit.

The Minister of Agriculture yesterday, in his little bout with the hon. member for Weyburn, devoted a lot of time to socialists and socialism. I said at the outset that I am not going to assume the role of referee between them. I will content myself by saying that I do not think the people of Canada are ready for complete socialism. The failure of the Liberal government to solve the economic problems of Canada before the war, despite the ample opportunity they had to do so, and the feeling in the minds of the people that they would not be able to solve the problems of the after-the-war period, was responsible, I think, for the adverse vote which the government received in the by-elections that have taken place in recent months throughout Canada. This was the only opportunity that the people of Canada have had since war broke out of expressing themselves; and how did they do it? Evidently they had concluded that the government was not responsible for the prosperity of which the Minister of Agriculture spoke yesterday.

I have one complaint to make in conclusion, and it is this, that the government, which boast now of setting a floor price of $1.25 for wheat, did not do it earlier. They announced their wheat policy in March of last year, when they said there would be no change in price for the 1943 crop. I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce in July of last year whether he would not reconsider the government's wheat policy, but to no effect. The government did not take action until September 21, when a great deal of our wheat had been marketed under the first quota —because with the present system of harvesting in western Canada, where combines are used, a lot of wheat is marketed in August and September. The open market price at that time was considerably over 90 cents, and many farmers, taking the government at their word that there would be no change in policy, sold their wheat at the open market price. I myself took the minister at his word and sold a considerable amount of wheat on the 1st of September. If I had held it a few days I would have got a better price, but I took the minister at his word and sold a considerable portion of my wheat at the open market price. I think the farmer should receive a proper settlement for the wheat he sold during that period from August 1 to September 21. The settlement on the basis of the spread is not good enough, and the farmers will not forget it. I got three-quarters of a cent in the spread between the price on the day I sold my wheat and the price on the day the government set a floor of $1.25. I think something should be done even now about that. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when we may expect a statement from him with reference to the amount of wheat taken over by the board, the price paid for it, and the profit made. I think we should have that statement before long.

Much has been said in this debate about the price of hogs and other products, and I listened to the Minister of Agriculture yesterday trying to square himself or get himself out of the mess in which he apparently finds himself because undoubtedly there is a lot of dissatisfaction with the government's agricultural policy. It reminds me of the pictures of a boy riding a donkey. In one picture you see him riding facing one way, and in the next picture you see him facing in the opposite direction, so that you cannot tell where he is going. The minister has been riding the hog both ways and has got into trouble. We shall have something to say later on this question, but I trust that this debate will close soon and that we shall get down to the business of the session.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I had not intended to participate further in this debate, but yesterday's remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) have prompted me to do so. First, however, let me say that I agree with very much of what the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Perley) has said, though I would remind him that if we are entering into a competition to see who first suggested parity prices or floor prices we should look to many of the farm organizations in the west. I believe that as a matter of fact the movement for which I speak to-day was the first movement to incorporate such a plank in a political platform. I have before me our Regina manifesto of 1933 and I find in it clause 4 under agriculture:

> The encouragement of producers' and consumers' cooperatives; the restoration and maintenance of an equitable relationship between prices of agricultural products and those of other commodities and farm services.

As long ago as 1933 we were urging and advocating that form of price level guarantee.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture made a political speech in the course of which he saw fit to make a number of statements that were inaccurate and that misrepresented the viewpoint and the basis of the movement which the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group represents in this house. He attacked particularly my hon. friend the member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and chided him because he had not yet found a seat in the provincial house at Regina. Well, we must remind the minister, as we did yesterday, that for almost two years one provincial seat has been vacant in the province of Saskatchewan and that since July last three others have been vacant, one of them a seat formerly occupied by the present hon. member for Humboldt in this house (Mr. Burton), a seat occupied by a C.C.F. member. At any time the government of Saskatchewan could have opened one of these seats, and I am quite sure the hon. member for Weyburn would have been glad to seize the opportunity and attempt to enter the Saskatchewan house at Regina.

I presume the minister is alarmed because the political machine in Saskatchewan, upon which he has relied so long, has shown signs of breaking down. In the Humboldt by-election we had that machine in full force in the constituency. The minister was there himself, having left parliament before this house rose in July, to supervise that campaign, and he gathered round him the old cohorts of the Saskatchewan Liberal machine. And let me say that there has been no more devastating machine in the democratic world than that organized by the Minister of Agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan. Let me tell the house that employees of the federal government were there in force with cars belonging to the Dominion of Canada. We made a check of them. I have before me only a partial list of some of the cars that were present during the time I myself was in that constituency. I saw some of them parked outside the hotel where I was staying, which also happened to be the headquarters of the Liberal party. We took a number of car numbers; all the following are Saskatchewan licence numbers of the dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A. Regina.

Mr. GRAYDON: They must have been a fleet of jeeps.

Mr. COLDWELL: No. They were not jeeps. Some were fine modern cars, including one fine maroon car which I am told the minister himself drove on one occasion to attend a political appointment. Who paid for the gas and upkeep of the cars? The people of Canada. But the political machine is so brazen in the province of Saskatchewan that it dared to do this sort of thing in the midst of a by-election. And so, when the minister talks about regimentation, let me remind the house that no other province in this dominion, at any time, has been regimented in poverty by a political machine to the extent that Saskatchewan was regimented during the depression years. Unless you were a member of the Liberal party or had a recommendation from that party you found it difficult to get relief work.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is untrue.

Mr. COLDWELL: You found it difficult to get anything at all. I know the facts.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That statement is not correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: This statement is just as correct as the statement about the cars, the basis of which statement I witnessed with my own eyes. No other province has been controlled to the extent that Saskatchewan has been under the regime of the present Minister of Agriculture. And so I say that when the time comes we shall want to know what the expense accounts were of those gentlemen who were in the town of Humboldt during the by-election between the middle of July and the 9th of August when the minister himself was there.

The minister took particular credit yesterday for the fact, as he claimed, that the province of Saskatchewan had on the statute books, in principle at least, everything that was to be found in the Beveridge report. Well, they may be there in principle, but there are thousands of square miles of territory in Saskatchewan without adequate social services upon which a community must depend at this time, particularly medical services, as the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie well knows. And as for taking credit for the municipal doctors and other cooperative medical facilities in that province, those of us who know their history know that health organizations arose out of the needs of the people and were organized first by the people themselves and then the government came along with its legislation.

As for social services like education, there were schools without teachers, teachers working in the province for $350 a year and not getting paid during long years of Liberal administration in that province, so that when the minister rises in this house and gives us the province of Saskatchewan as an example of what the Liberal government would do, I say heaven save us from a Liberal government in the dominion who would follow that example.

We learned yesterday too that the government took credit for the improved conditions when the war broke out or prior to the breaking out of the war. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who has just taken his seat, gave the house the reason for the improved trade conditions immediately prior to the war. Canada was assisting in the rearming of the aggressor nations. Session after session we and others in this house rose and pointed out the exports of nickel, exports of aluminum, exports of copper, exports of scrapiron that were going in an ever-increasing stream to the present enemy nations, particularly to Japan. We know that one large mine, the Granby mine, in the province of British Columbia, was permitted for several years to send to Japan all its output of copper concentrates. We know that well into 1940, long after we were at war with the German reich, this government was permitting the export of nickel, copper, aluminum and scrapiron to Japan, in order that she might rearm herself.

Mr. DUPUIS: Part of which went to Russia.

Mr. COLDWELL: That, let me add, was the cause, to some extent at least, of the increased trade figures which were presented to this house at that time. So I say that the government can find very little comfort in the statements made in that regard.

Then, of course, he twitted us with socialism. I am going to say something about that in a moment. But let me point out here that no government could have regimented our young men and women more thoroughly than the Liberal government regimented them in those years before the war. They regimented them in poverty and want. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) made a statement regarding the condition in 1939 which was disputed by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). If he will look up the relief figures for 1939 he will find that at one time in that year there were nearly one million people in this country on relief, and four hundred thousand registered unemployed. I say that no government in any country could have regimented in poverty and want the people to a greater extent than the present government which sits opposite.

Mr. MARTIN: Those were world conditions.

Mr. COLDWELL: Five dollars a month on a farm and three cents for a meal. The minister yesterday denied that men were riding the rods during the regime of this government. True, they were riding the rods in 1933, 1934 and 1935, when Mr. Bennett was in power, but they were also riding the rods in 1939, 1938, 1937, 1936. I remember vividly one incident which occurred under this roof in 1939. About this time of the year, early in February, there came into the office of my friend, Grant MacNeil, half a dozen young men, who were the vanguard of a number who had ridden the rods into this city, having been sent first of all from Vancouver to the province of Ontario. They came in homeless, foodless and cold. We got in touch with the then Minister of Labour, one of the kindliest men who have ever sat in this house, the late Hon. Norman Rogers. Mr. Rogers said: "My department can do nothing for them. We make grants to the provinces." Grant MacNeil got in touch with the province of Ontario: "We can do nothing for them; they have not been in Ontario a year." Mr. MacNeil phoned the civic authorities: "We can do nothing for them; they have not been in the city three months." And a Liberal member in this house at that time rose in his place and described those two or three hundred men who were here the following week as—what? "Bums, toughs, yaps, ne'er-do-wells." And they drifted away. After the war broke out, in September, 1939, I happened to be walking down O'Connor street, away from this house. As I passed a recruiting station, or what I supposed was a recruiting station, for there were a lot of young men around there, I heard someone say, "There is Mr. Coldwell." I turned to him and asked, "What part of Saskatchewan are you from?" He said, "I am not from Saskatchewan; I am one of the boys who were in Mr. MacNeil's office in February. I have joined up." I shook hands with him and I wished him good luck. That boy, who could not get a fifteen-cent meal from the Dominion of Canada in February, who was a "bum," "spineless," and all the rest of it, according to a Liberal member of this house, in February, joined up. What did he get? He got a good suit of clothes, a good warm overcoat, good underwear, socks and shoes, three good meals a day, a ticket to the Y.M.C.A.—and socialized medicine thrown in with it, as my hon. friends remind me. These boys were "no good" in peace, but when war came they became necessary for our defence. But the government, which is yet in power, sat unmoved and did nothing to relieve their distress. They left them to ride the rods.

Mr. MacINNIS: They waited on world trade!

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; as my hon. friend says, they waited on world trade. Yesterday the minister spoke to us of world trade. I believe in world trade; you export in order to import the goods which you need. But my hon. friends dare to tell me that world trade was the solution in this country when there were a million people on relief and four hundred thousand unemployed? In the city in which I live, and which is probably one of the best in the dominion in respect of relief so far as amounts go, three meals a day at three cents a meal was the average family allowance. And my hon. friends tell me that we ought to have exported more food? We say we ought to have fed some of the people. And we have reaped the nemesis since. I remember a former minister, the Hon. Mr. Thorson, rising in this house and telling us that forty-four per cent of the young men who had volunteered and been examined were turned down on account of physical unfitness. That was the result of the years when this government was in power. And then they say, "Put the C.C.F. in power and they will regiment you." We want to free men from that kind of regimentation, and if we ever get the opportunity, as we shall, we shall do it.

The minister said that we sent emissaries to national socialist countries to see what they were doing there. Where did he get his information from? We sent no emissaries. When we asked him whom he had in mind he named Major George H. Williams—a man who to-day is serving in the Canadian army overseas—as having been an emissary to a national socialist country to come back to teach this country national socialism, the thing we are fighting against. Major Williams is not only serving in this war but took part and was wounded in the war of 1914-18. Where did he go? He went to Russia. Did we send him there? No, we did not send him there. He was sent there by the farmers of Saskatchewan to study the agricultural problems of that country and how they were going to meet them, and what effect they might have in the future on the agricultural economy of our own country, and particularly of our prairie provinces. That is why Mr. Williams went to Russia. A few years ago, of course, even three or four years ago, hon. members would rise in their places and call us communists. "Russia" was thrown at us. Now, of course, Russia is our ally, communism is a bit more popular, and so they turn around and call us national socialists.

Mr. MacINNIS: They have to have something.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, they have to have something. But let me tell them that calling names will not meet argument, and calling names of that description will do them more harm than it will do us. As far as we are concerned we are the most democratically based political party in this country, indeed probably anywhere in the world; and our democratic associations are recognized in other countries.

May I interject this personal experience. I know I am the only member of this house ever to be invited to sit in at a labour party caucus in Great Britain, as I did on November 10, 1941, with Clement Attlee, Ernest Bevin, Herbert Morrison, A. V. Alexander and the other men who to-day are giving leadership in this struggle against national socialism but who hold to exactly the same kind of democratic socialist principles that we in this group hold to in this country; and that is recognized. So that I do not think that such stupidity is going to carry any weight in this country; and to vilify a man who is serving his country overseas at this time is almost beneath contempt.

The minister said he was quoting from a book. What book? Well, at the conclusion of his remarks he held up this book, "Make This Your Canada." I would recommend that all hon. members read it; then perhaps they may know something more about the C.C.F. and be prepared to discuss it intelligently. But later on, when the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) was speaking, I noticed that the minister interjected that the book was "Social Planning for Canada." We did not write or produce that book. It was written by a group of men associated with the League for Social Reconstruction of which, if I am not misinformed, some hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the house were members in the early nineteen-thirties.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who would they be?

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I am not going to say, but I will ask this. Who were the authors of that book? It was written by a group of brilliant young men, one of whom, Doctor Leonard Marsh, is in an advisory capacity to one of the most important committees this government has set up, the social security committee. Indeed, he drafted their plan for them. Another one, Graham Spry, is now the personal assistant to Right Hon. Stafford Cripps in Britain. Some national socialists, aren't they, people of that description? Page the Minister of Agriculture, somebody says. I should say so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Where is he?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Probably busy.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Probably scared.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Of what?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yesterday I think this house took the measure of the minister in the kind of speech he made, when he tried to suggest that people like those I have mentioned were national socialists. If he had called anyone in this house a national socialist then he should have gone further and laid a charge with the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and had that person interned, because we are at war with national socialism. Therefore when we examine a speech like the one made yesterday, so full of misrepresentations, it makes us wonder just what idea the minister has of the quality of thinking of our Canadian people.

A few moments ago I said that ours was the most truly democratic movement in Canada, and it is. We are the only political party organized in this manner. Back in our constituencies and throughout the country there are literally hundreds of clubs of ordinary, plain people meeting together regularly, studying the economic and social conditions of the country in which we live, formulating their ideas, putting them into resolution form, sending them to our constituency conventions, then up to the provincial conventions, held every year, and finally to the national convention, held every two years, to which the delegates are elected by the people. That is not like a Liberal convention held once every twenty-five years. The minister said yesterday, "Oh, yes; they held a meeting in Regina behind closed doors." Every political party holds its caucuses behind closed doors. The meeting referred to was a meeting of elected representatives, in the main, federal and provincial, in order to sort out some of the problems that confront both parliament and legislature. We thought that was a real contribution to the welfare of Canada at this time. What about the Liberal party? It has not had a national convention for twenty-five years. Oh, yes, they had a meeting last September. I happened to come into the House of Commons at the time a meeting was being held; and the meeting place, the railway committee room, was very carefully guarded by police. We did not have any police at our meeting in Regina; we did not need them.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That was not a meeting at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was a caucus, and ours was a caucus, too. Then a meeting of the Liberal federation was held at the Chateau Laurier. Was the press admitted?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Part of the time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does anybody know what was adopted at that Liberal federation meeting?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes; it was given to the press.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it was not. We were told that we would hear what the Liberal federation had decided when the programme of the government was brought down.

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes, we were; I can produce the press clippings to that effect. So that I say to the minister, let him beware when he hurls stones at some of the other people in this house, that he does not live in a very thin glass-house himself, for some stones may be hurled back at him.

I say we are a democratic political movement based on the people themselves. I have no preemption of the position I hold to-day. I am elected or reelected every time there is a national convention, unless they wish to replace me by someone else. That is mass control; that is control by the people; that is democratic control, if you will, and we intend to keep it that way. I noticed, too, that the minister said he wanted to agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) the other evening. I am prepared to place the record of this movement in pre-war international affairs beside the record of any other party in this house. We are not provincial isolationists, like my hon. friends to the left; nor do we dodge every issue that comes along, like my hon. friends to the immediate right; nor do we delay issues, like the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: You were getting along pretty well until now.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I should like Mr. Bracken to make a statement on some important matters. During pre-war years we demanded collective security, and the carrying out of league obligations. From 1931 right up to the outbreak of war we condemned the support that was being given by powerful interests throughout the world to Germany, Italy and Japan. We demanded that that cease. We denounced Mussolini when others were praising him, when they were coming back from Italy, as Colonel George Drew did, telling us that Mussolini was a wonderful man, that he had drained the marshes, made the trains run on time, and so on, and so on. We were denouncing the same Mussolini.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is great to be perfect.

Mr. COLDWELL: And we were denouncing Hitler all through those years, even when we were told that if Hitler had only stopped at a certain point he would have been a pretty good man. I remember that being said by the late Doctor Manion, the then leader of the Conservative party in the house. And we denounced Hitler, too, when some of our Liberal friends in Saskatchewan were addressing meetings in swastika-decorated halls—yes, in swastika-decorated halls.

True, we did demand disarmament as had been agreed to in the league covenant. We did denounce wars which were fought for economic interests, imperialist interests, and purely for trade and for commerce. And during those years we drew attention again and again to the preponderance of league power, if we cared to use it, for the preservation of peace.

With respect to Munich I am prepared to put the record of this movement opposite that of any other group in Canada. When Munich came in September 1938, I telegraphed the League of Nations Society in Canada, a member of whose executive I was at the time, and stated this:

Chemainus, B.C., Sept. 30, 1938.

European situation direct result of desertion of league covenant and collective security by great powers. Believe shameful partition of Czechoslovakia could have been prevented and war averted if league nations had resisted unitedly.

Result of fascist aggression demonstrates peril of small nations which rely on pledges of great powers and the honour of their reactionary politicians.

Urge world-wide campaign to revitalize league to prevent further aggression so clearly foreshadowed by success of Hitler's threat to world peace and human brotherhood.

That was my view at the time of Munich.

What was the view of the leader of the Liberal party? I shall read it, and place it on the record. This communication is dated at Ottawa, September 29, 1938, and states:

The Right Honourable Neville Chamberlain, P.C., M.P., Prime Minister of Great Britain, 10 Downing street, London, England.

The heart of Canada is rejoicing to-night at the success which has crowned your unremitting efforts for peace. May I convey to you the warm congratulations of the Canadian people, and with them, an expression of their gratitude, which is felt from one end of the dominion to the other. My colleagues in the government join with me in unbounded admiration at the service you have rendered mankind. Your achievements in the past month alone will ensure you an abiding and illustrious place among the great conciliators whom the United Kingdom the British commonwealth of nations and the whole world will continue to honour. On the very brink of chaos, with passions flaming, and armies marching, the voice of reason has found a way out of the conflict which no people in their heart desired, but none seemed able to avert. A turning point in the world's history will be reached if, as we hope, to-night's agreement means a halt to the mad race of arms, and a new start in building the partnership of all peoples. May you have health and strength to carry your great work to its completion.

W. L. Mackenzie King.

That was signed by the present Prime Minister.

I did not rejoice in the autumn of 1938 when the gallant little nation of Czechoslovakia was sacrificed. Now we know that the sacrifice of that nation had tremendous and serious effects on the future of the world. Doctor Riptka, under-secretary of state for foreign affairs in the Czechoslovakian government now in London has published in his book, "Munich and After", the whole story of the Munich agreement, together with the Czech documents. Among them one will find, if he reads the book, that they had a firm commitment from Russia that if France marched, and Britain marched with her for the protection of Czechoslovakia, Russia would march, too. And because of the deep distrust placed in the hearts of the rulers of Russia at that time, a year later we have the Stalin-Hitler pact, and the way cleared for the outbreak of war in which, for a time, the British Commonwealth and Empire stood alone.

And so I say to-day I am not ashamed of the part we played before the war. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I might refer to a speech I made on September 26, 1938, in the city of Victoria. I have the report of that speech as it appears in the Regina Leader-Post on September 27 of that year. This is a Canadian Press dispatch from Victoria, British Columbia.

Mr. GRAYDON: What year was that?

Mr. COLDWELL: 1938.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is important to have the right date.

Mr. COLDWELL: It states:

"Believing that Prime Minister Chamberlain has been forced into the present situation, if war comes we must give whatever assistance we can," he said.

"As a fundamental of participation, Canada must be organized economically to render maximum assistance. All essential industries must be placed under national control and profiteering of all kinds eliminated completely."

You see, at that time I thought perhaps the great powers might honour their obligations. The report continues:

"Canada must decide what her best contribution can be. To my mind this is economic. There probably is insufficient national unity to organize a large expeditionary force."

Practically everybody agreed with that. Speaking in this house in March, 1939, six months later, the Prime Minister made the statement that in his opinion we would never again send a force overseas, and that it was unthinkable that every twenty-five years or so we should send our youth across the seas. That was pretty much the general opinion at that time—that it would be difficult to organize and dispatch an expeditionary force.

Then the report goes on to say:

"The present situation arose from conditions that prevailed, prior to the great war," the C.C.F. member said.

"We desire not national rearmament but collective security," continued Mr. Coldwell.

"In other words, we hold that peace cannot be maintained by armed alliances. The League of Nations has not failed, but the statesmanship of the great powers has failed.

"To-day humanity seems to reap the whirlwind, whereas collective security properly applied could have prevented this situation.

"We tolerated the Japanese seizure of Manchuria in 1931.

"Having failed to disarm themselves the league powers allowed Hitler to commence arming. In 1936 his remilitarization of the Rhineland was permitted.

"Toward fascist Italy we have pursued a similar policy. Non-intervention policies in Spain in the face of German and Italian aggression strengthened the fascists."

That was my view in September, 1938. And I say quite freely that in September, 1939, with the people who had made the Munich agreement still in power I was afraid —yes, afraid, that we might once again find our boys sacrificed to the people who were in office, and had made the Munich agreement. But when Dunkirk came, when that government was overthrown and was replaced by one which represented the people of Great Britain, one in which we could have more confidence, the situation was different. To-day my own late leader, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, who is sometimes vilified, has two sons in the armed forces, and my own son is serving in the air force overseas. So let us stop this kind of foolish name-calling and bandying of words. That was all the minister indulged in yesterday. If we stop that sort of thing we should get along with the business of the house and the war. But I am going to add this, that the kind of argument we heard yesterday will be met whenever it is made in this chamber. We are not on the defensive; we are on the offensive. It is the government that has to answer for many things. It is the government that kept the people regimented in starvation during the depression. It is the government that has no plan for the future. We will cooperate to make plans for the future, but when there is misrepresentation or vilification we shall not let that misrepresentation or vilification go unchallenged.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, until the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) rose in the house I had not the slightest intention of taking part in this debate. With what my hon. friend had to say concerning my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I am not going to deal in my remarks. The Minister of Agriculture has demonstrated on more than one occasion that he can look after himself, and I have no doubt whatever that he will look after himself so far as the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar are concerned. But it is in connection with the latter part of the speech made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that I wish to make a few observations to the house.

If my hon. friend seeks to give the impression to this country that his record and the record of the C.C.F. so far as the war is concerned, so far as the conditions leading up to the war are concerned, are as rosy and fine and wholesome as he indicates, then he has a big job on his hands. My hon. friend states the position he took at the time of Munich. If Great Britain and France at the time of Munich had gone to war with Germany in support of Czechoslovakia, I put this question to my hon. friend and to those who sit behind him: Would they have favoured Canada's participating in that fight to crush the tyranny of Germany?

Mr. COLDWELL: I said so in the very speech to which I referred.

An hon. MEMBER: 1939?

Mr. COLDWELL: 1938.

Mr. CRERAR: If that was the view of my hon. friend, then the position he took when war broke out was an extraordinary position.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not trust the governments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend gives a very lame reason for not standing unanimously with parliament in support of the war when it was declared by Canada in September, 1939.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did. I voted for it, as did every hon. member of this party except Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend did not stand for effective participation by Canada in the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I did.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall read the record in a moment. He gives us as a reason for his vacillating attitude at that time the fact that he did not trust this government or the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Is a great national question like that to be decided by the hon. gentleman by his not liking some one who is in a government or at the head of a government?

Mr. COLDWELL: I have to decide according to my own conscience.

Mr. CRERAR: All I have to say is that my hon. friend has quite an extraordinary conscience.

Mr. COLDWELL: If we are going to talk about consciences, I am not going to take anything of that from my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not interrupt my hon. friend when he was making his speech. I want to go back a little prior to the declaration of war by this parliament, September 9, 1939. What was the attitude of my hon. friend and those who sit behind him when we were dealing with the defence estimates presented by the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) when he was Minister of Defence in 1936, 1937 and 1938? I have the record here. I shall refer the house to the pages of Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): "Facts are chiels that winna ding."

Mr. CRERAR: It was clear to any one who knew anything about the international situation that the storm clouds throughout the world were rising. When the Minister of Pensions and National Health as Minister of National Defence sought to get a modest increase in the estimates for national defence for Canada, what was the attitude of my hon. friend? I happened to have some notes in my desk which I sent for after my hon. friend rose in his place. The hon. member who leads the C.C.F. party in the House of Commons is reported on page 3203 of Hansard of May 28, 1936—my hon. friend can mark down the page number and check it up—as follows:

> . . . in my opinion a country the size of Canada, with its diverse peoples and small population, is best defended if we rely upon our weakness physically and our good will as a good world neighbour, rather than attempt to ape the military powers of the European countries.

If my hon. friend's policy had been adopted when war broke out and the Japanese nation had attacked the shores of Canada, as was quite possible, where would we have been in the defence of Canada?

Mr. COLDWELL: Oil sanctions.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend refers to the shipping of materials to Japan, Germany, Russia and other countries. I am not going to debate that matter at the moment more than to say that it is a difficult and dangerous thing in peace time for a government of one country to throw down a challenge to the government of another country in the way suggested by my hon. friend. There is another delightful gem of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) who took part in this debate yesterday. This was delivered when we were endeavouring to get a modest increase—let me repeat that—in the defence estimates in 1937.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Far too modest.

Mr. CRERAR: Far too modest, the Minister of Pensions and National Health suggests, in the light of events that later occurred.

When on February 19, 1937, we were endeavouring to get this modest increase in the defence estimates the hon. member for Weyburn delivered himself of this gem, and I invite the attention of the house while I read it:

Against whom are we arming? What potential aggressor is more aggressive to-day? Oh, I know that bogeymen have been trotted out in this chamber. It has been suggested that it might be Italy, it might be Germany, it might be Japan!

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Finish the paragraph.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not need to.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): You dare not finish it and give the context.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not interrupt my hon. friend yesterday when he was speaking, and I ask him to refrain from interrupting me.

An hon. MEMBER: That is typical.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister, without a Hansard before him rises and quotes a sentence from my speech without giving the context. He is quoting from page 1063, and I know the rest of that paragraph. I will give it to the minister if he wishes. But I ask him to quote the rest of that paragraph or to withdraw what he has already said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Otherwise it is tantamount to a complete misrepresentation of my remarks.

Mr. CRERAR: May I say to my hon. friend that I have had a little too much experience in this house—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Weyburn has raised a point of order with regard to the quotation made by the minister. If the quotation made by the minister is not correct, of course the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of correcting it. But the minister is making his speech and he is entitled to make it as he sees fit.

Mr. CRERAR: The quotation I have made is a correct quotation from Hansard.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But an incomplete one.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend will find nothing in his speech at that time that will water down or qualify the definite statements which he made and which I have quoted.

But there is more than that. In 1937 the hon. gentleman who now leads the C.C.F. took part in the debate on the defence estimates of that year and made this statement on November 15, at page 888:

Are we in Canada going to join in this mad race without knowing precisely the policy that underlies the increased estimates upon which we shall shortly have to vote? Our answer in this little group is, of course, no, because we believe that such defence preparations only breed fear, and that hate, which, in turn, is the child of fear.

That was the lofty sentiment expressed by my hon. friend on that occasion. That would have been of very little avail against an armed Germany and an armed Japan, and I say to my hon. friends of the C.C.F. and to this house that if their point of view had been accepted by parliament at that time, not only would there have been no increase in the defence estimates, not only should we have had not even a modest preparation against the dangers that everyone could see were rising, but we would have dropped our defence estimates altogether and would have retired or, as my hon. friend suggested the year before, to defencelessness as our best defence.

Mr. COLDWELL: We would have had an international policy.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I leave that to my hon. friend.

There was a by-election in Selkirk last August. It did not turn out very well for the government; my hon. friends' candidate won. I have here that candidate's circular and some of his campaign literature in which he said: "If you want to win the war, vote for the C.C.F." My hon. friend nods his head in approval. But what was the position taken by my hon. friend himself when war broke out? The might of Germany then was known. Russia was not then a member of the allied nations fighting Germany because she had a truce, temporary it is true, with Germany, a truce that was uncertain in character. But at that supreme moment, when Britain was threatened as she never had been threatened before in a thousand years of her history, what was the position of my hon. friend and those who sit behind him?

Mr. COLDWELL: The same as the government's.

Mr. CRERAR: When this government decided to declare war on Germany, my hon. friend made a declaration in this house. I do not wish to deal unkindly with him at all, but it is well known that in his group there were strong differences of opinion. The leader of the party at that time was the late Mr. Woodsworth, for whom I had a very great respect, and Mr. Woodsworth took a line in this house different from that taken by my hon. friend because Mr. Woodsworth said that we should not take any part in the war whatever. But my hon. friend made the declaration that our effort should be wholly economic in character and that no forces should be sent overseas. What would have happened to the commonwealth air training plan under that policy? What would have happened to the assistance we have given on the ocean in carrying and convoying supplies to Britain, without which she could not win the war? I say to my hon. friend and to this house and to the country that if my hon. friend's policy had been accepted and adopted by this country at that time Canada would have done nothing toward helping to win this terrible war. So when my hon. friend endeavours to give the impression that his party were the only real patriots at that time—

Mr. COLDWELL: I never said that—

Mr. CRERAR: No, but my hon. friend has criticized everyone else, so what else can we think? I have not the slightest doubt, Mr. Speaker, that when the people of this country get all these facts before them, as they will, they will deal and deal effectively with my hon. friend the leader of the Commonwealth Cooperative Federation and those who sit behind him in this house.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. This afternoon the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) was permitted to place on the record a statement which he read from a piece of paper and which purported to be an extract from Hansard of a quotation from a speech which I had made. I objected at the time, and I now claim the right, first of all, to point out that the quotation made by the minister was incomplete and therefore incorrect—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. I was not incorrect.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): —and I claim the right to read to the house and to place on the record the statement from Hansard, not from a piece of paper which I hold in my hand but from volume 2 of the session of 1937, February 19, page 1063. The quotation follows—

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member claims the right to reply to the Minister of Mines and Resources with regard to a statement which the hon. member declares is incorrect? Do I understand that to be his point of order? The Minister of Mines and Resources is of course the judge of his own speech, and if he makes a quotation from any speech or any document which has a bearing, as in this instance, on what the hon. member said on a former occasion, if the quotation he makes is in the exact terms of the record, he is entitled to make it. If the hon. member thinks and states that he has been incorrectly reported and therefore that what has been said is untrue, he has the right to make a correction. In this instance, however, I understand the hon. member to say, not that he has been incorrectly quoted, but that the whole quotation has not been given and that therefore the meaning which the hon. member intended to convey in the speech in question has been distorted. There is nothing incorrect, nothing untrue, in what the Minister of Mines and Resources has said, and the opportunity may arise when the hon. member for Weyburn will have the right to place on the record his interpretation of the statement made by the minister. On the basis of what the hon. member has now said, however, I cannot hold that he is in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I point out that it is not a matter of interpretation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am pointing out—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have a right to rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of course willing to give as much latitude as possible, but the point of order as stated by the hon. member is not well taken. It is a question as to the correctness or incorrectness of a statement made by the minister and is therefore not a point of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): My point of order is this: I am not calling in question any statement; the question I am discussing is whether or not the minister was quoting correctly from my statement. He had on his desk not a copy of Hansard but a piece of paper, and I contend that no member in this house has a right to quote from Hansard unless he quotes correctly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order, I have before me a copy of what the minister said this afternoon and I have also before me a copy of Hansard, and on my honour as a member of the house I say that what the minister said is absolutely correct in every detail.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must rule against the point raised by the hon. member for Weyburn. In the first place, I do not think it is a point of order. If an hon. member wishes to quote in his address any part of a speech he is entitled to do so. Here, however, no point of order is involved, and the hon. member will have to take any opportunity afforded him to place before the house what he intended to convey.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): An opportunity to refute political dishonesty.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The dishonesty is over there.

Mr. SPEAKER: That of course must necessarily be a matter of opinion.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Anybody rising at this stage of the debate on the address usually starts by saying that he had no intention of speaking but is forced to do so through some intervention in the debate by some other member. I will follow the tradition and say that I did not intend to speak but that the sub-amendment proposed by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) and now before us is the reason for my addressing the house to-night.

I do not feel that I should deal with the first three paragraphs of the subamendent because my position on such questions is well known. I have dealt with them on previous occasions and I shall have an opportunity to do so again in the future. But, Mr. Speaker, I represent an entirely rural constituency in the province of Quebec, and as the fourth paragraph in this subamendment reads that the government—

> Failed to grant to farmers and fishermen exemption from military service in order to remove from them the vexatious proceedings resulting from the narrow application of the national selective service regulations.

I feel I should explain my position.

Even with these words in the subamendment I declare at once that I cannot vote for it because I am convinced that the farmers of my province as well as the farmers of all Canada have been treated fairly.

The farmers are not asking for any special law for themselves. The regulations existing at the moment give them all due opportunity to get deferments and to be left to till the soil if they properly present their applications to the different boards organized by the Department of Labour. The farmers want to be treated as all other good citizens of this country are treated, and they are just as patriotic as other classes in the community. They know that the policy of this government has been to keep in their present occupations all men whose labour is considered essential to the prosecution of the war. In this regard they know that all important industries dealing with the war effort, munition plants, shipbuilding plants, and most of the war industries, have been given the privilege of declaring who, among their men, when they are called, are essential to production. And these men upon the declaration of these industries are given deferment.

The farmers occupy an even better position from the point of view of preferment. In the first year of the application of the mobilization act a farmer had to prove that he was essential on the land in order to obtain deferment. Soon after the plans for agricultural expansion in Canada were brought down the Department of Agriculture realized that, in order to send to Britain and to the other united nations the quota they had agreed to supply, all men occupied in agriculture, farmer-owners, sons of farmers or others engaged in agriculture, were necessary and had to be left to till the soil.

As I stated in this house on two previous occasions, the government realized "that the land is the first element that enters into the question of production and that farming is the primary industry and most essential in carrying on the war, because the best trained men, with the best and most modern equipment, cannot fight on an empty stomach."

From then on the farmers throughout Canada had only to establish their status to get deferment from military service either to work on their own farms or to work on the farms of their fathers, or, if those farms were well enough supplied with labour, to be sent to work as farm hands on farms where there were no sons of an age to work, or where there was lack of man-power.

My experience—and I say again that I represent a constituency 98 per cent rural—is that the farmers are satisfied, and I have ample evidence from letters from my own constituents showing that they recognize that they have been well treated and recognize what has been done by this government, not as a favour to one class of the population, but to ensure adequate production of food for Canada, to be sent to Britain and to be supplied to the United Nations. As I say that they have been well treated I intend, for the sake of the record and although we all know about this, to outline in a few words the procedure which was followed, and which, when followed, permitted these farmers to remain on the farms if they were bona fide farmers.

The moment these men were called, as every other Canadian citizen coming of age was called, if they were notified that their medical examination classed them in a category where they were callable for service, they had to file a form stating the size of the farm, the quantity of cattle or hogs or other animals that they had; in short, to explain what sort of farm they had and how many people there were on the farm. Immediately that procedure had been followed, the registrar of their district would, if the evidence was sufficient, immediately issue to them a certificate stating that they were deferred until further notice, which meant that unless the enemy landed on Canadian soil they would be left to till the soil and produce the food necessary for our armies.

Those who may not have supplied all the documents necessary to prove to the registrar their good faith, or the necessity of their remaining on their parents' farm, were, if there was enough evidence to show that they had been the larger part of their life on a farm and knew about farming and desired to carry on that kind of work, given deferments of from three to six months; and that limit was not to cause them any trouble, as this amendment might lead us to believe, but to make sure, as the government had to do, that these men would remain and work on the farm for the production of food, and were not trying to get deferment in order to go into industry, as was done under regulations which were in force during the last war.

Our people in good faith produced that evidence, showed it to the registrars or to the courts of inquiry that had authority to revise the decisions of the registrars and, once they showed their good faith, were immediately given deferments. Those who were given three to six months deferments, received further extension from six months to six months, after evidence was produced that they were really on the farms.

Some will say that there were men in the first months of the application of the mobilization act who were called at the time for four months and did not ask for any deferment, as they were willing to go for four months, that they entered the army, and that afterwards the procedure to get them out to go back and till the soil was a little difficult. Well, such cases have happened. I have had some myself in my constituency. I have some that are not yet solved. But most of them have been carefully scrutinized by the army authorities, and I must say that, especially in the last year, there has been a great improvement. When the Department of Agriculture impressed upon national selective service authorities that all the men needed for agricultural production had to be returned to the land whenever the man was not in an operational unit and it could be proved that his father needed him on the farm, and when we presented the case to the military authorities, men who were in the different camps throughout Canada were released for periods of from three to six months for duty on the farms, and some of them had their leave extended for other periods of six months. Furthermore, these agriculturists have even been begged by the government to go into the forests during the months they were not absolutely necessary on the farms and work for lumber companies. This was not done to give preferences to special classes of the population, but in order that they could produce the lumber so much needed for the war effort. As regards most of these cases which at first gave trouble to some hon. members because the men had not applied for deferment and were inducted in the army because they were willing to serve, and whose fathers seeing the production on their land lagging, asked to get them back for a certain period of the year — they have been for the most part redressed. I myself have some cases which have not yet been solved, of men who are already over one year in the army on the Pacific coast or the Atlantic coast. There may be difficulties in connection with their farms. I say there may be some such cases, but would this house be justified in passing such an amendment merely because in certain cases the circumstances have not been understood by some officers of the Department of National Defence as we expected they would? I do not think the situation justifies any hon. member voting for the subamendment. The farmers of Canada are satisfied to comply with the regulations as at present applied, and under which, if they choose to ask for deferment of their service when called, they are sent back to till the soil, to work and fight as soldiers of production.

I should not like to conclude this first part of my remarks without a word of praise for the sons of the soil who volunteered for service, or who, when called under the present regulations, reported for service. What would Jean-Baptiste Montminy, from St. Just de Montmagny, think of such an amendment? Jean-Baptiste Montminy volunteered in the first days of the war and has seen service in Italy, and a month ago this man was awarded the Military Cross, with the following citation:

During the attack against hill 246 at Santa Maria he led his platoon to assault. After the machine-gunner was killed he took hold of the machine-gun and ammunition and advanced in the direction of two nests of enemy machine-guns and by skilful manoeuvring of his arm succeeded in reducing them to silence.

Climbing the hill with his platoon, despite heavy enemy fire he operated on his own initiative an encircling move, and utilizing resourcefully geographic accidents he succeeded in dislodging the enemy who was then impeding the advance of the Canadian unit.

Here was a man who had tilled the soil. Here was a farmer from Quebec, who had enlisted and is keeping alive by his exploits the tradition of the old 22nd battalion of the last war.

As to those who are yet on the farm, they are by their labour and their energy serving on the home front to help feed the country, to help feed Britain and our allies.

One thing I should like to say just now. I am sure that French Canada will realize when this war is over that it owes more to men like Jean-Baptiste Montminy of St. Just, who was decorated in Italy; that it owes more to men like Flight Sergeant Marc Chabot, who was reported missing after an air raid in North Africa in 1941 and who since then has been presumed dead in action and whose father and grandparents are from St. Francois in my constituency; that it owes more to all its sons who have served in this war and who have vindicated its reputation, than it owes to the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) and those who surround him and who share his views, or to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), who seconded this subamendment.

It might be opportune at this moment to see what the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency had to say in this debate, to examine his attitude during the past two years, and to form a conclusion as to the use it has been to his own province and to his own people. Speaking in this debate, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency criticized all Liberal administrations since 1900. He criticized the late Mr. Lapointe's statement in this house in September, 1939, as to Canada's participation, and called it a gesture of colonialism. If the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency was so much against what Mr. Lapointe said in 1939, why did he support him; why did he run in Montmorency as a straight Liberal in support of King and Lapointe in 1940? I remember a meeting in the good constituency of Quebec East, with which I have many links because for a long time I was secretary to the then hon. member for that constituency, Mr. Lapointe. Everyone wondered what would be said by the brave member for Quebec-Montmorency, who only a few months before had spoken against Canada's participation in the war. Everyone wondered how he would act when the election came along. In Limoilou, in the large hall where most political campaigns in Quebec East are begun, we had our honourable colleague sitting in the front row. When his time came to speak he rose very pompously, bowed very nicely in the direction of the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, and said, "My respected leader, Mr. Lapointe." Then he bowed a little more mildly in the direction of the then minister of pensions, now Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) and said, "My good friend, Mr. Power," and proceeded to support the Liberal party which was appealing to the people at that time.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that what the hon. member calls gestures of colonialism had been made before 1940, before that campaign opened. Why, then, did the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, who now criticizes every move made by the government, support the government at that time? I will tell you it was because he felt that the province of Quebec, and indeed the whole of Canada, were behind King and Lapointe. Why does he not cross the floor now and sit in the far corner? Again, because he has his nose in the wind; he wants to make sure whether the people of Quebec will follow King again in the next election, he senses that the people of my province, with those of the rest of Canada, at the next election will be behind Mackenzie King again, and he wants to play safe if he can. The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency tells everyone privately, "Well, I am just following the advice of Mr. Lapointe. I am staying within the party and trying to bring about reforms." That was what Mr. Lapointe said one day when he saw a few Liberals in Quebec form a group called L'Action Liberale Nationale; men who differed with the provincial government on no real question of principle but who did not agree with certain actions taken by that government. One of these men was a friend of Mr. Lapointe who, without trying to bring about any change within the party, had left to help form this other group. Mr. Lapointe said. "The Liberal party is broad enough to tolerate discussion within its ranks. Could they not have aired their views and differences within the party, instead of forming another party?" There is a great difference between that attitude and the one taken by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency in this house during the last few years. Mr. Lapointe meant that any reforms or alterations to be brought about in a party policy, or any differences of view, should be aired within the party councils rather than in public. Any member of the party whose views differ from those of the majority should endeavour in party caucus, by private conversations and in group meetings to influence the views of the party and have the policy changed. Of course liberty of action should exist within any political organization. At one time or another any member of this house may vote against his party if his principles or ideals force him to do so. That may show the strength of mind of the individual member, and it also demonstrates the true democratic value of our parliamentary system. However, Mr. Lapointe's words, so often quoted by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, never meant that a man whose views differed radically and constantly with those of his party, on matters of national importance, should remain apparently within the party in order the better to stab it in the back.

When an hon. member differs with his party on a vital question, or with the views generally accepted by his friends, he should do as the hon. member for Gaspe did when he left the Conservative benches. We know he is still a Conservative, though of a different species—a different brand of the same make, only temporarily isolated from the flock for the duration of the war—yet he did the proper thing when he stepped down into the realm of pseudo-independence. The same might be said of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), who I understand has been called in to reply to my remarks. He entered this house not as a Conservative but as an independent, but it might be interesting to see what he was in the past. During the election of 1940, when the present Conservative party was called the National Government party, if that is the right thing to say—I want to be precise and correct—the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay was the chief organizer in Quebec for that party. We must believe, however, that later on he saw the light and became converted to a spirit of independence, so that he now sits in this house as an independent. He has done the right thing; he is against the government, and we know it, so he sits in that corner. When the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) and the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) felt that their views could not be reconciled with those of the Liberal party, they crossed the floor; they moved, shall I say, to another "block." I do not approve their views; but if they considered that their views and those of the Liberal party were irreconcilable, they did the right thing. I have more respect for those who, having views opposed to those of the government, cross the floor and fight from the opposition benches, than for those opportunists who try to get whatever prestige they may from being considered Liberals but who are always lurking in the dark, a dagger in hand, ready to stab in the back those with whom they still pretend at times to be associated.

While our late leader, Mr. Lapointe, was in this house the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, like many others who now invoke Lapointe's memory to try to justify certain attitudes, had not a word of friendship for him privately; yet in 1940 the hon. member rallied to the cause of the Liberal party and ran in Quebec-Montmorency as a Liberal. In his remarks a few days ago he criticized the policies of Laurier, which are a part of Canadian history. He criticized the stand taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at the beginning of this war, which is a matter of record. He criticized the action taken in 1940, not many months before he ran as a Liberal; yet at the time he proclaimed himself as a Liberal and acknowledged King and Lapointe as his leaders.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these matters at issue in your part of the country?

Mr. PICARD: The issues in all parts of the country are really the same; they mean the winning of the war. My hon. friend should realize that what I am doing now is trying to convince the house that the people of my own province are all really united against the isolationists, so that the hon. gentleman has no reason to interrupt what I am saying. I am trying to prove that in Quebec sentiment is as good as in any other part of the country, and that my compatriots should not be classed with some few members in this house, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency and others, who have taken the same attitude and spread the same doctrine at large in the province, believing that they can get more popularity by stating that they are against participation, and by criticizing every phase of the war effort. Let me tell them that they are mistaken. With the help of their near-seditious paper in Montreal, on the radio and on the platform they try to poison the minds of our population. And as we failed to counteract immediately, they may have influenced temporarily those of the less well informed elements and may have pleased a very small minority of people who accept their views. But the people of my province are intelligent enough that when we went and explained the situation in its true light they reacted with their usual good and sound judgment, and soon realized that their true friends were not those who tried to ring the bell of narrow provincialism, or to awaken racial prejudices, as some of them do in Quebec, and as the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) never fails to do each time he rises to speak in the house.

In the early days of the war, soon after the declaration, it might have been possible that some who were not well informed in Quebec might have thought that some elements of the Anglo-Canadian population had been influenced more by their love for Great Britain than by Canada's interests, when they had pushed Canada into the war. I do not believe it was a fact. I was convinced we were going into the war because of our own interests. Ill-informed people might have been led to believe otherwise at that time. But after every country in Europe was involved, after the fall of France, after Pearl Harbor, was it still justifiable for any one in this country to be isolationist? I think everybody in my province, when the situation was properly explained, understood that Canada was joining with all liberty-loving nations in preventing the enslaving of the world by the axis nations. Canada was acting to protect her sacred heritage of the past, and to ensure our liberty in the world of to-morrow.

I can assure the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, and all others who take the same attitude, that the people of Quebec, just as the people in the other provinces, have greater confidence than ever in the present administration. They are just as proud as other people throughout the country in the government's war record. They cannot overlook the fact that, due to wise administration by this government, Canada has accomplished a magnificent war effort, undreamed of by many, while at the same time disturbing as little as possible the life of the country.

They cannot overlook the fact so eloquently outlined yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), that Canadian farmers are more prosperous to-day than they were before the war, that industry has been mobilized, and that the working class is better off to-day than at any time before the war—and all that while Canada has mobilized vast armies, has enlarged its navy tenfold, and has equipped and trained the most magnificent air force and managed so efficiently the empire training scheme—and all that while Canada has helped so magnanimously to feed and equip Britain and the united nations.

And I say here that these extraordinary accomplishments have done more to make of Canada a great nation, an important sovereign state, than can or will the wailing of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, and those who adopt the same attitude.

I am not more of an imperialist than the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency. I have just as much at heart the interests of Canada, and I want to point out to that hon. member that Canada evolved from colonial status to that of a great dominion, under Laurier, whose policies were criticized only a short time ago by the hon. member. Canada evolved under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) from the status of a dominion, as the word meant in 1911, to that of an autonomous nation within the empire, as meant by the declaration of the imperial conference of 1926. Canada has continued to evolve from that condition to that of a sovereign state, again, under the present Prime Minister.

I attach more importance to the broad policies of the government than to the eradication of a few symbols of the past, to which the hon. member ties his policy, and that can and will be corrected by one simple gesture at the proper time.

I am as much of a nationalist as is the hon. member, not in the narrow sense of provincial nationalism, as the hon. member advocates, but in a true, great, Canadian, nationalist sentiment, viewing Canada as a great united nation where the descendants of two great races and those who later associated with them, will develop in harmony with one common objective—not the narrow view of their own province, nor with the antiquated mentality of colonials, thinking always in terms of imperial interests, but with one common objective, making their Canada one great sovereign state, claiming its due part in the concert of nations, and helping to shape a better world for to-morrow.

That is what the present government is aiming at. It is, I believe, the reason of their actions, a reason which the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency and the hon. member for Gaspe and others of the same type fail to see, in their lack of perspective of the future. That is my reason for supporting the government, and that is why I am ready, as I have done in the past, to go to my people, and why I am confident they will understand me and give me their support.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), I shall merely say—

Mr. SPEAKER: I saw the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

Mr. HOWARD C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, this evening I would ask hon. members for a few minutes to turn their thoughts to the west, not to the near west, the prairies, but far across Canada, over the Rocky Mountains, to the Pacific Coast, where they would find snowdrops and crocuses blooming —and, I must admit, might also find a little fog; and then to direct their thoughts farther out, across that vast ocean, the Pacific.

It is my purpose to-night to deal primarily with Canada's position in the war on the Pacific. Then I shall discuss the new Australian-New Zealand agreement signed less than three weeks ago. Following that, I shall touch upon British commonwealth defence and foreign policy.

But before doing so I wish to say a few words with respect to two points in the amendment to the address offered by my party, the Progressive Conservative party. Those two points are the failure of the government to provide adequately for the men and women in our forces and the protest contained in the amendment against the recent wages control order.

First, with respect to the men and women of the forces: The young fighting men of Canada have set a standard for the nation which has never been surpassed. I was very much pleased to read a statement by that great elder statesman Field-Marshal Smuts, where he said on December 8, referring to our present younger generation, that this war has proved that our generation is not degenerate, and accordingly that he looked forward with confidence and faith to the future.

Canada can expect great things from her young men and women on their return from this war. They will bring bold and forward-looking leadership. They will bring a new and broader vision to this, their nation. In the meantime, however, what about those of us who are on the home front and, in particular, what about those of us who are members of the House of Commons of Canada? Our young men are going into heavier battles; there will be greater casualties as the year progresses. Canadians at home, particularly during this year, must never forget the personal aspect of waging war, that our fighting men are placing their lives between us and our enemies. They are making the greatest sacrifice possible; let there be no mistake about that. The very least we can do is to make certain that they and their dependents are cared for adequately, are treated in a spirit of gratitude rather than grudgingly. I regret to say that that is not being done by the government of Canada and I propose to give several examples.

[Mr. Speaker.]

My first reference is to the medical examination given to recruits. This has been far more thorough than was given to those of us who enlisted in the last war and there has been far less chance for mistakes. Yet we find that only a small number of men who have been taken on the strength as being in category "A" and then discharged as being in category "E" have been able to qualify for a pension. That is something I cannot understand. Last year I asked for a return, and the information received was that less than fifty per cent of the men who had enlisted in category "A" served overseas, come back and been discharged in category "E" were able to get pensions. Of the men who served in Canada, only one in thirty-three could obtain a pension and yet, when they enlisted, they were placed in the top category and, when discharged, in the lowest.

The Pension Act is wrong, and it should be changed to provide that there shall be a definite presumption that a man's condition as recorded on his admission to service was in fact his condition and that any subsequent deterioration is due to service. It should be the responsibility of the government to overcome that presumption or else award the man a pension. Further, the insurance principle should be extended to men serving in Canada. It applied to them in the last war and it did in this war until some time in May, 1940. The present position is that a man must prove that his disability arose out of or was directly connected with service. A direct result of that provision in the law is, as I have mentioned, that only one in thirty-three of the men discharged in Canada under the conditions outlined has been able to qualify for a pension.

In another regard the government has not treated these men fairly. I refer to their pay and allowances on discharge. A man is given one month's pay and a clothing allowance which has recently been raised to $65. That is not sufficient to clothe a man coming out of the forces, and one month's pay is not sufficient to enable him to readjust himself and get settled in civilian life. I have had men come to my office who have served with our own Seaforth battalion which has given such gallant service in Sicily and Italy. They find that this allowance is not sufficient to purchase a proper outfit and it has proved a shock to their morale. They cannot understand why they should be treated in this way. This condition cannot be remedied too quickly.

As a third example, the government has failed to enact a Sparkman act for Canada. Members will recall that last year we had a debate lasting a whole afternoon on the advisability of setting up legislation of this kind in Canada. The Sparkman act is the United States act which protects the fighting man's home, protects him with regard to debt, mortgages, insurance, leases, loan interest and so on. Members of every party in the house spoke in favour of such an act, and so did the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). As reported at page 3055 of Hansard of May 26, 1943, he stated that a committee had been appointed to consider this legislation and had reported. He then went on to say:

> I anticipate that action will be taken along lines which I feel ought to meet the situation.

And further on:

> I can only assure the committee that every study will be made of the matter, and active consideration will be given to it.

Almost a year has gone by, but as far as I know no such provision has been made.

To sum up, I repeat that the government has failed to provide adequately for the men and women of the forces. The ministry seem to have little realization of the sacrifices that are being made, they go just far enough to save face and only that far after there has been a great deal of coaxing and prodding and long delay. So much for the men and women of the forces.

Then a word with regard to our protest against the recent wages control order, P.C. 9384. I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister (Mr.Mackenzie King) state to-day that there would probably be an amendment to that order in council. I think he would be well advised to go further and scrap the whole thing and start over again. When I read that order in council I was amazed at the government dealing in such a cavalier fashion with any group of law-abiding Canadian citizens, large or small. The whole tone of the order is punitive rather than friendly, and this at a time when labour generally has shown a keen desire to cooperate, has shown by and large a high sense of responsibility to Canada, as great a sense of responsibility as any other body of men or women in this country.

For example, the order in council provides for the setting up of a national board upon which the employees are to have only one representative out of six. This board must review the decisions or the directions of the regional boards which are on the spot and have a far greater knowledge of local conditions. The national board may of its own initiative, without a hearing of any kind, vary or revoke an order of a regional board. Then an iron-clad ceiling is clamped down on wage rates, and there are drastic terms outlawing strikes. The burden of proof is thrown on the accused, contrary to all our ideas of British justice. There is set up a dictatorship with regard to prosecutions, which is placed in the hands of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Finally, there is an intimation in the recital of the order in council that the order is necessary not only in war—goodness knows it is bad enough in war time—but also during the post-war period. That period will be difficult enough even with friendliness and cooperation between all groups of Canadians, but with orders in council of this type there will be nothing but chaos. I urge that the order be cancelled and something at least approaching Canadianism substituted in its place.

I come now to Canada's position in the war on the Pacific. Our position in that theatre of war is most unsatisfactory. Although we are a nation on the Pacific and vitally interested in what goes on around the shores of that ocean, we are failing and have failed to accept our share of the responsibilities. Before Japan struck in December, 1941, we sent out our ill-fated and ill-equipped force to Hong Kong. I was saddened just last week to see a press dispatch covering the experience of a Chinese who had escaped from Hong Kong and returned to Canada. He reported the bayoneting of nine Canadian officers and men. He then went on to say that he had been in a prison camp with men of the Royal Rifles and the Winnipeg Grenadiers and that they had very little mechanical transport and were disappointed and angry over the delay in the arrival of their equipment. Some day, Mr. Speaker, there will be much more said about the failure to equip properly that force which was sent to Hong Kong. After Japan had struck; after great pressure from every sort of people in the Pacific province, and after, I believe, pressure from the United States of America, the government finally established defence forces on the Pacific coast. Eventually some airmen were sent to Alaska, most of whom I believe have since gone to other parts, and then last summer a small task force was sent to Kiska with the United States forces which attacked that island. The Canadian troops did good work there; they made a good name for themselves and upheld the reputation of Canadian fighting men. Now they have returned to Canada, and once again Australians, New Zealanders and the Americans are left to do the fighting in the Pacific war zone. If Canada continues in this way she will have very little voice in Pacific affairs, and she will deserve very little voice.

Why does the government adopt this policy in Pacific affairs? The answer is simple. It is because the troops on the coast, including the troops who went to Kiska, are home defence troops, and under the government's policy, not under the Canadian law, they cannot be sent to fight away from the American continent. That is the position despite the plebiscite vote, which was overwhelmingly yes. The result is, of course, that the government is in effect defying the expressed wish of the great majority of the Canadian people. These home defence troops on the Pacific coast cannot go abroad under the government's policy despite the fact that they are fully trained and equipped, and that those at least who went to Kiska are experienced, have a high morale and are eager to fight the Japanese. They are not so keen about going to Europe. I believe that questions have been asked throughout the force and there is a desire among them of their own free will to go and fight the Japanese. The government still maintains its policy despite the further fact that behind these Pacific coast troops there are in Canada thousands and thousands of other home defence troops piling up who can never be used in fighting unless that fighting takes place on Canadian soil. Finally, these troops are held in Canada despite the fact that Canada's duty is to do her full share in the war on the Pacific. And so I appeal to the Prime Minister of this country to stop this farce at once and send these troops to fight either beside the Australians and New Zealanders in the South Pacific or beside the Americans in the Central Pacific.

Canadians facing on the Pacific ocean are always greatly interested in what is done by our sister nations, Australia and New Zealand, because our outlook and our interests are much the same. We were therefore greatly interested in the agreement recently negotiated between Australia and New Zealand known as the Australian-New Zealand agreement, 1944. I think that agreement is of great importance not only to those of us who live on Canda's Pacific coast, but to all Canadians, in fact, to the whole British empire and to the different members of the united nations because it points the way to world peace. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that consideration should be given to printing this agreement and the accompanying press releases of the ministers of Australia and New Zealand in the Votes and Proceedings of this house so that the members may be able to give them more careful consideration. The agreement contains no secret clauses; everything is open and aboveboard. It begins with these words:

> . . . having met in conference at Canberra from the 17th to the 21st of January, 1944, and desiring to maintain and strengthen the close and cordial relations between the two governments, do hereby enter into this agreement.

Then it goes on to define the objectives of Australian-New Zealand cooperation. It deals with such things as the prosecution of the war, and with the armistice and the subsequent arrangements, and I would remind hon. members that the armistice period after this war is apt to be a long period, perhaps running into some years.

It also deals with the question of security and defence, and with civil aviation, outlining a new policy which Canadians should very carefully consider, a policy which among other things advocates international air trunk routes and the setting up of an international air transport authority.

Then it deals with dependencies and territories and with the welfare and advancement of the native peoples of the Pacific. It also provides for the calling of an international conference relating to the southwest and the south Pacific and for permanent machinery for collaboration and cooperation between Australia and New Zealand. That part of the agreement sets out measures whereby these two nations may cooperate for defence, and may collaborate in external policy; also for the development of commerce between them, for the full employment of Australians and New Zealanders, the highest standards of social security and the encouragement of missionary work and other activities directed toward the improvement of the welfare of native peoples. It goes on to invite other nations interested in the Pacific, of which Canada is one, to join Australia and New Zealand in promoting these objectives. That particular paragraph reads:

> The two governments declare their desire to have the adherence to the objectives set out in the last preceding clause of any other government having or controlling territories in the Pacific.

I suggest that the government of Canada should give thought to collaborating with the Australians and New Zealanders under the terms of this agreement.

Then it provides for setting up a permanent secretariat with one branch in Australia and another in New Zealand. In explaining the agreement the minister of external affairs of Australia, Doctor Evatt, makes this statement which I think is of great importance to Canadians:

> The war with its extension to the Pacific and its long sustained threat of utter disaster—

And these are words which Canadians would do well to mark, "its long sustained threat of utter disaster".

> —has brought the two peoples closer together than ever before; it has made us realize that we can help each other only by pulling together in the struggles that still lie ahead; in winning, not only the war but the great struggle for improved standards in the years of post-war reconstruction.

Doctor Evatt concluded with these words:

> This agreement is in effect a permanent understanding between two nations which are completely autonomous and are at the same time united by a common allegiance to the King and also trustees for British interests and British civilization in the Pacific.

The prime minister of New Zealand, Mr. Fraser, used these words:

> It is an agreement of positive value in the sense that it is directed against no other people; on the contrary, other powers are invited to adhere to the principles enunciated . . . . I should like to make it perfectly clear that neither the holding of this conference, nor the agreement resulting from it, is in any sense a departure from the principles of the British commonwealth of nations, membership of which is in the very forefront of the policy of both Australia and New Zealand.

The agreement therefore is a very practical step not only in the direction of security but also toward cooperation among all nations, in short, toward world peace. Obviously it would be absurd to say that it endangers world peace and equally absurd to say that any similar British commonwealth pact would do so; Doctor Evatt has suggested in his release that:

> In the successful outcome of the present Australian-New Zealand consultations, there may well be a precedent of considerable value to other members of the British commonwealth.

That brings me to my final topic, namely, British commonwealth defence policy and foreign policy. Recently there has been considerable discussion concerning the advisability of working out a British commonwealth defence policy and foreign policy rather than each nation of the commonwealth having its own policy on these matters. It is a question which will require calm and careful consideration by the Canadian people, of whatever party. Personally, I believe that the condition of the world is such that a commonwealth policy on defence and on foreign affairs is advisable. Apparently the Canadian Prime Minister does not. He believes otherwise. He differs from such men of the empire as Field Marshal Smuts, Prime Minister of South Africa, and from the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand, and Lord Halifax, a member of the British war cabinet; and he has rather summarily rejected the suggestions made by these men.

Now it can be agreed that all persons participating in this discussion have one common aim, namely, security and world peace. Prime Minister Smuts made that perfectly clear in his speech on the subject when he stressed as an objective human welfare, peace and security. Personally, therefore, I am hopeful that having this one end in view, it will eventually be possible for all those who are involved to reach common ground.

Another fact upon which there is agreement is that all Canadians participating in this discussion are conscientiously thinking first of Canada's own interest. That must always be the basis for the foreign policy of Canada. What is the interest of our own nation? No one is questioning for a moment Canada's autonomy. That was settled long ago, not by a lot of politicans either, but by the men who fought in the last war, and it is being established further by young Canadians who are fighting in the present war.

So what about this question of a defence policy and a foreign policy? Before the war there was a very sketchy British commonwealth defence policy. There was no foreign policy; really, no part of the commonwealth had any foreign policy. Canada's foreign policy, as enunciated by the present government, was to have no commitments. We had no commitments to anyone; we buried our governmental head in the sand and let the rest of the world go by. That was one reason why the British peoples in the world were nearly wiped off the face of the earth in 1940 and 1941. During the war the reverse has been the case. The British commonwealth has had but one policy on defence, one foreign policy. We had to have such a policy; otherwise we would have perished, and with us civilization.

And so to-day, this very night, there are young Canadians fighting and dying beside young men from all other parts of the British commonwealth. We have in war time a commonwealth defence policy and a commonwealth foreign policy. What about after the war? Are we to continue in the same sensible way, or are we to have five or six defence policies and five or six foreign policies? Why not continue with the commonwealth policy and at the same time try to modernize and improve it?

Our Prime Minister says that Canada should aim at creating an effective international system. That is all very nice, all very general, and probably all very harmless. As reported at page 41 of the present debate he advocates creating an effective international system inside which the cooperation of all peace-loving countries is freely sought and given. No one can quarrel with that proposal, but it would not be affected or defeated by a commonwealth policy in addition. The Prime Minister thinks otherwise, because at page 42 he is reported to have said:

> I maintain that apart from all questions as to how that common policy is to be reached, or enforced, such a conception runs counter to the establishment of effective world security.

There, Mr. Speaker, he is dead wrong, and if Canada follows his lead she, too, will be dead wrong. He bolsters his argument by attacking statements made by Field-Marshal Smuts and Lord Halifax on the ground that behind their conception of three great powers in the world, the United States, Russia and the British commonwealth, there lurks the idea of inevitable rivalry. He is wrong to stress rivalry. It is unfair to shout power politics on this question. It is not only unfair but misleading to the Canadian people. Field-Marshal Smuts, in the course of his speech, stresses partnership. There is no question of rivalry. He stresses the word partnership—the partnership of this trinity, the United States, Russia and Great Britain. For example, he said:

> In that trinity you will have two partners of immense power and resources—Russia and America. And you will have this island, the heart of the empire and of the commonwealth, weak in her European resources in comparison with the vast resources of the other two. An unequal partnership, I am afraid.

Then, referring again to an "equal partner", he used these words:

> . . . an equal partner with the other colossi in the leadership of the nations.

He then pointed out that he would like to have the trinity, a trinity of equals:

> I should like to see all three of them equal in power and influence and in every respect. I should not like to see an unequal partnership.

Field-Marshal Smuts is afraid that Great Britain alone, as distinct from the British commonwealth, will be unable to do her share in the trinity; so he advocates that, rather than Great Britain alone being a partner, the British commonwealth should be a partner, and he says that this trinity is a protecting wall behind which the other nations of the world can organize. He uses these words:

> I think this trinity will be the stabilizing factor, the wall of power behind which the freedoms and the democracies of the world can be built up again. It will be the protecting wall.

He appeals not only to the other members of the British commonwealth to join that partnership, but also to the small nations of western Europe. He says.

> To my mind, it is a question whether those who think alike and feel alike, whose interests and whose safety rest on the same broad human political basis should not be together in building up that splendid trinity to which we look forward for the future leadership.

There spoke a realist. The Canadian people are realists, and if this issue is put fairly before them they will see the point. What Field-Marshal Smuts proposes in effect is a very practical step; it is that this trinity will have to maintain peace until an effective world organization can be set up, and that may take years.

Therefore I appeal to the Prime Minister and to the government to give the whole question further consideration, and not to put Canadians in the position of arbitrarily opposing this plan for the commonwealth, not to put us in the position of refusing to take our part; and I warn him and I warn the government that if they do put the Canadian people in that position they may wreck the whole plan. Canada might be responsible for the wrecking of the partnership of these three great peoples, and Canada might be responsible for preventing the world peace which we all so much desire.

The record of the governments led by the present Prime Minister of Canada in international affairs is not as good as it might be. It does not cause one to have very much hope of the proper stand being taken. I have here a book entitled "The Lost Peace," by Harold Butler, who at one time was director of the international labour office of the League of Nations. He points out in this book that in 1924 Great Britain and France brought in a protocol the effect of which would have been to put teeth into the League of Nations, to give the league some force to back up its decisions. Then he goes on to say that that protocol was opposed by the dominions, and he adds:

> The objections of the dominions were summed up by Senator Dandurand as delegate for Canada: "In this association of mutual insurance against fire, the risks assumed by the different states are not equal. We live in a fireproof house, far from inflammable material."

That was referring to Canada, and subsequent events have shown how foolish the statement was. Mr. Butler adds:

> That was the prevalent feeling not only of the dominions, but of other non-European countries. They thought they were living in a big world. Europe was thousands of miles away; therefore nothing that happened there was likely to affect them vitally. They did not have this attitude on emerging from the world war; then they had subscribed willingly enough to the covenant. But when, only five years later, the protocol was framed to implement it, the drift back to isolationism was already so strong that they repudiated it.
> This was without doubt the first turning point at which the league turned downhill instead of up.

In conclusion, may I say I am convinced that the destiny of Canada, of our Canada, is not to be a small nation, one of many small nations including now, I suppose, the new fifteen or sixteen small Russian nations: the destiny of this nation is to be a world power standing beside Great Britain and the other dominions in a British commonwealth, a commonwealth that will be the leader in preserving peace and justice among the nations of the world.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), may I quote the words spoken by Disraeli to Lord Peel, then Prime Minister of Great Britain:

I was elected to this seat and here I remain. It is, indeed, not I, but the government who have effected a change of policy.

Lord Peel reproached Disraeli for sitting on the side of the government. Disraeli then reminded the government of the promises they had made.

Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Bellechasse, may I say that I was elected by the voters of Quebec-Montmorency to the seat which I now hold, and that their decision only, and not his, can remove me therefrom. As regards the upholding of my views on the war and on imperialism, I should like to assure him that he need lose no sleep over them, as I shall keep on defending them in this house or elsewhere without asking for his opinion, and shall, above all, disregard the party spirit which, until now, has obscured the clear-sightedness of our ethnical group under the narrow red or blue angle. I feel convinced, moreover, that the hon. member for Bellechasse will long since have relieved this house of the poisonous gas he distills and of the servile attitude he displays, while I shall still have the honour of representing the ideas and interests of the voters of Quebec-Montmorency.

Mr. Speaker, may I say further, that I extend to him a cordial invitation to discuss this issue in my constituency, if he so desires.

I also wish to give some explanations in regard to my attitude on the sub-amendment proposed by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) and on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) acting leader of the opposition. In so far as the amendment of the hon. member for Peel is concerned, I wish to say that, notwithstanding my great reluctance to support an amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative party, with whose imperialistic policy I disagree because it is utterly opposed to Canada's interests in regard to the war effort, I must admit, however, that an amendment must be considered according to what it purports and not according to the party which sponsors the motion.

Well, in the text of which I approve there is a passage which has given me particular pleasure, it is paragraph (d) which reads as follows:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have:

(d) Failed to lessen bureaucratic controls and regimentation and to recognize and restore the supremacy of parliament and failed to halt the continuing infringement of provincial rights and the centralization of authority.

There does not exist a shadow of a doubt that the province of Quebec has the greatest number of small commercial concerns and industries and that the vexatious measures enacted by the federal bureaucracy work the most havoc there, with the result that eventually the large trusts will gobble up all industries and small enterprises and that the rights of the province of Quebec will gradually be infringed upon, thereby depriving the French-Canadian minority of the influence necessary to maintain its prestige and separate entity.

Besides, these controls and enactments of the federal bureaucracy do not take into account the peculiar conditions affecting the Quebec farmers.

For these reasons, although opposed to the type of war effort advocated by the Progressive Conservative party, I shall support the amendment as it now stands.

I wish to add that I have not supported the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), because I am averse to any kind of socialization tending to a greater centralization in Ottawa.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I would not have participated in this debate, had not the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) made a personal reference to me. I think the hon. member, in speaking as he did, has brought little credit on himself and still less on his party.

In connection with the first part of his speech, I have not much to say because he discussed politics. He voiced his opinion. To that part of his speech I know that the electors of Bellechasse will answer for me. But in the second part of his remarks, he claimed that I still had ties—if it were true I would not be ashamed to acknowledge it—with the party of which I have been an organizer. Neither am I ashamed to admit that, because I am not ashamed of my past record. If, in 1940, I was the National party's organizer for the Quebec district it was because I trusted the then leader of that party. I am not ashamed of having trusted the Hon. Mr. Manion. When after the 1940 election, I noticed that the party of which I had been a member was reverting to the imperialistic policy which we had already condemned, there was only one course open to me because I wanted to be consistent with myself and honest toward those with whom I had worked in the province of Quebec. Accordingly, in 1941, after the first session that followed the 1940 election and in view of the stand taken by the leaders of the then Conservative party, I severed my connection with the latter. In September, 1941, I called, in cooperation with the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), a meeting at the Palais Montcalm, in Quebec city, which was attended by more than four hundred former active members of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec. At that meeting which took place on September 6, 1941, we defined what we deemed to be a true Canadian policy, consistent with the best interests of Canada. Let me quote the resolution adopted at that meeting:

This meeting expresses the wish that success may attend the Canadian people's efforts in the present war; it prays the divine Providence to help our armies and those of our allies achieve complete victory. Our country will then be in a position to enjoy an enduring peace, which will enable the various racial groups to achieve their full development and to cooperate in a spirit of constitutional freedom and social justice, so as to form at last a truly and wholly Canadian nation.

On that occasion I did not hesitate to tell all my friends that it was necessary for us to leave the party to which we had belonged. Since then the people of my province have shown that they know I have not betrayed them. Indeed, in November, 1942, in the Charlevoix-Saguenay by-election, after a campaign that lasted for a month, although the friends of the hon. member for Bellechasse claimed that "A vote for Dorion is a vote for Borden, for Meighen, for the war, and so forth," the electors of that constituency elected me because they trusted me, and I do not think I am remiss in my duty to them.

Mr. Speaker, a while ago the hon. member for Bellechasse, following an interruption by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), claimed that his speech was made as part of his war effort and to help win the war; he also said that such an attitude was preferable to the speeches made by the isolationists, and so saying, he pointed to us. It is on account of that declaration that I rise from my seat believing that the House of Commons should know, once and for all, where are the isolationists, and why such people are to be found in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a number of Le Soleil, which is known to everyone and styles itself the organ of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. On July 25, 1930, on the eve of a federal election, this paper ran the following headline in five-inch type on its front page:

London, the Tories, and the War.

And please note the sub-title, on the eve of election day in 1930:

In Great Britain, it is hoped that the conservatives shall triumph in Canada so that war may be waged in Egypt and India.

In 1930, attempts were still being made to stir the population of Quebec against conscription, just as they had been made in 1917, also in 1921, then again in 1925; such attempts were repeated in 1926 and renewed in 1935. Then, Mr. Speaker, people wonder why it is that there are isolationists in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I heard the hon. Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) maintain that the leader of another group in the house had not been as loyal as he claimed to be since he had opposed certain estimates for national defence in 1936, 1937 and 1938. Well, on December 17, 1937, the former chief of the hon. member for Bellechasse, the right hon. Mr. Lapointe, speaking at St. Flavien de Lotbinière, stated the following, and his words, reported in the December 20th edition of Le Soleil, of Quebec city, are found in the fifth column of page 10. I quote:

Our opponents say, he adds, that we incur these expenditures because we want war. But we want to preserve you from war, we advocate sending no one to war. I shall repeat this afternoon what I have already said from my seat in the Canadian parliament: every single one of these disbursements have been made solely and exclusively for the defence of Canada. Is there a single Canadian who could oppose that? You remember 1916 and 1917, the darkest period of the great war; at that time we opposed certain measures forced on Canada. We are all for the defence of Canada and its territory, but we shall never go beyond that. I have told parliament that I would not support anything more, and that if we went any farther Lapointe would not be a minister any more.

And, during the same election campaign in the Lotbinière constituency, the hon. Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), who was then and who is still sitting in this house, made a statement which Le Soleil, of Quebec, again reported, as follows:

I have been to the war and I have returned; I shall not go back nor send anybody there.

That is what the hon. Minister of National Defence for Air stated in the Lotbinière constituency. Further on, Mr. Speaker, Le Soleil of Tuesday, December 13, 1938, page 12, reported the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe as having stated, at a meeting held in his own constituency:

Instead of going to war in foreign lands, we shall stay at home to defend the Canada we love.

There is more, Mr. Speaker, for the hon. Prime Minister of Canada has also made statements reported by Le Soleil, of Quebec city. He spoke at a meeting held in St. Roch market, on September 8, 1935, and, on September 9, in a report concerning this meeting held the previous day, we find the following utterances of the Prime Minister:

The people of Canada are against war and a conflict raging in these far countries hold no interest whatever for Canada. No one has the right to engage our country in a war as remote as the present one without going before the people through a plebiscite.

And here is a statement of the hon. Prime Minister, on May 24, 1938, as reported at page 3178, vol. 3 of Hansard for 1938:

Our foreign and external policy is a policy of peace and friendliness, a policy of trying to look after our own interests. We have neither the power to attack other countries to promote our own interests nor do we wish to do it. Nor are we inclined to join in crusades in other continents.

Those are the words spoken by the Prime Minister of our country, in this house, on May 24, 1938.

And here is what he declared at the session of 1939, page 2419, vol. 3 of Hansard:

We have tremendous tasks to do at home, in housing the people, in caring for the aged and helpless, in relieving drought and unemployment, in building roads, in meeting our heavy burden of debt, in making provision for Canada's defence, and in bringing our standards of living and civilization to the levels our knowledge now makes possible.

This quotation seems to be a repetition from this year's speech from the throne.

There is no great margin of realizable wealth for this purpose; we must, to a greater or less extent, choose between keeping our own house in order, and trying to save Europe and Asia.

And here is a further statement made by Mr. Lapointe in Quebec city, on December 13, 1938, as reported by Le Soleil:

Instead of going to war in foreign lands, we shall stay at home to defend the Canada we love.

But there is something else, Mr. Speaker. In 1925, Dominion elections were held in this country, and you will recall that following those elections the Liberal party was returned to this house with 105 members including 65 from the province of Quebec. How had it succeeded in obtaining these 65 members from the province of Quebec? Mr. Speaker, I shall tell you. It is with such literature as I have here and with cartoons which I invite hon. members to examine, as they are very interesting. I have one here which depicts the honourable Mr. Meighen confronted by two grasping hands on which is written the word: "Imperialism". These hands drip with blood and the hon. Mr. Meighen is shown offering Canada to these blood-stained hands which are labelled "Imperialism". After this, can we be surprised that there are isolationists in the province of Quebec?

And on the following page, there is another cartoon; this one depicts Mr. King uttering these words:

Not a cent will be expended, not a man will be mobilized for the empire without the people's approval.

This is the kind of political campaign which was waged in the province of Quebec. This is the kind of political campaign which was carried out in the province of Quebec for twenty-five years, and to-day we find a member who has benefited therefrom, who, to say the least, has thrived upon such campaigns, and who now questions the Canadianism of those people, and twits them with being isolationists. Let him come to the province of Quebec, let him come, I shall not say to my constituency, as the member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) stated, but to his own constituency of Bellechasse, anytime, anywhere, and we shall discuss the speech which he has delivered to-night.

And, Mr. Speaker, there is more than that. In the same newspaper Le Soleil of May 12, 1942, an editorial reads as follows:

Notwithstanding the direct pledges to the province of Quebec, the political heir of Wilfrid Laurier is exposing the French-Canadian youth to an imperial servitude which has always been distasteful to him.

And this, Mr. Speaker, took place during the war, on May 12, 1942. Now, who is trying to arouse passions in the province of Quebec? Who indulges in isolationism, if it is not the friends of the Liberal party who, as I have stated a moment ago, have far too long thrived upon such policy? Fortunately, the people of the province of Quebec are beginning to see through that little game. This is the reason why there is not a single constituency where the government can have one of its supporters elected. Let them open any constituency in the province of Quebec and let them try to have a member of the government elected.

I shall conclude these brief remarks by saying how proud I am sometimes to note that certain English-speaking quarters realize the position in which the Liberal party has placed the province of Quebec in the last twenty-five years. And in concluding I wish to quote the last part of an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Toronto, on January 26, 1944. The situation as depicted by this article is so true, so realistic that I wish to read it to this house. Referring to the separation of the province of Quebec, the newspaper says:

(Text)

The separation was deliberate. It has been continued deliberately as a political stratagem since the last war. There is no mystery about where the real blame rests. And it does not rest wholly on the racial spokesmen of Quebec. It rests even more heavily on the Prime Minister and the Liberal party in Canada. They have fanned the prejudices of Quebec to maintain political security, and in doing so they have worked a cruel injustice on the people of that province and on the nation which only time and deeds can remove.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne contains a complete programme of social legislation, and is self-explanatory. I would have been content to vote for it without saying a word, had not so many other subjects been discussed during the debate. It is far from my mind, however, to undertake to cover all of them; on the contrary I shall limit my few remarks to the one subject which formed the theme or basis of the speech delivered recently by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), who also seconded the amendment of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). The subject matter of his speech was Lord Halifax and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). I do not wish to give too much importance to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, but since his voice is quite loud in volume I thought it might take both the voice of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) and mine to equal his.

At the outset may I say in all sincerity that it is a pity that such a speech should be made on the floor of this house, especially since the suggestion made by Lord Halifax had then been turned down and rejected by the Prime Minister. When that had been done at the beginning of this session it should have settled or closed the case. Most of the utterances of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency referring to the Prime Minister are contrary to the facts. I shall deal with just one of the hon. member's statements, that which referred to the Prime Minister as an imperialist. By what process of thinking the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency comes to this conclusion, I do not know. In this house more than anywhere else statements should be based upon facts and truth rather than upon suspicion, intuition or simple suppositions. The hon. member made the following statement, which I quote from the translation of his speech:

We must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the audacity of the British government which, in spite of what might be said, inspired Lord Halifax, is but the natural consequence of our own weakness.

In making such a statement he bases his opinion upon suspicion, upon unfair suspicion, because the Prime Minister had already given it as his opinion that Lord Halifax was only expressing his personal views. Mr. Churchill had also stated that Lord Halifax had not spoken on behalf of the British government, but only for himself. The hon. member said that the British govenment had inspired Lord Halifax. Surely the opinion of our Prime Minister, whom the hon. member calls his leader, and that of Mr. Churchill, who is usually not afraid of the truth and who is certainly no weakling, should have made upon the mind of the hon. member in question some impression different from that which he expressed in this house.

Then he says that the speech of Lord Halifax is but the natural consequence of our own weakness. The hon. member should speak for himself and not associate too many of us with him in his own weakness. Speaking of weakness and strength and courage, I would say to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency that the most elementary act of bravery is for a man to face his opponent and not stand to one side or behind him. The whole public life of the Prime Minister bears witness to the fact that he has never been an imperialist. He has not the time nor is it worth his while to rise in his place every time someone makes an untrue or unfair statement about him. I crave the honour in a humble way to do this little job of correction.

There may be some explanation, if there is no excuse, for an opposition member making a statement which is not in conformity with the facts; but when such a false statement emanates from one sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, I claim that the case is much different, that the case is deplorable, and a correction is then necessary. First, let us ascertain just what imperialism is. I find the following simple definition in Webster's dictionary:

Imperialism. The policy or practice of seeking to extend the control or empire of a nation.

The Americana encyclopedia defines "imperialism" as follows:

The national policy which tends toward the expansion of national domination and national ideas over a geographical area other than that of national boundary.

According to the opinion of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency the Prime Minister of Canada follows the doctrine of imperialism which I have just quoted. That is a ridiculous opinion. Anyone who is serious, anyone who cares anything about the truth, anyone who knows the Prime Minister and his life will know that the opinion of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency is contrary to the truth. I do not hesitate to say that our Prime Minister has always stood for the autonomy and independence of our country within the commonwealth of nations. Let me give only one of the utterances of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency. He said:

> In the face of the unspeakable claim suggesting that we be associated to an empire with which we have nothing in common from the geographical and economic standpoints, our present-day Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) felt a sudden throb of Canadianism; this reawakening was evidenced by protests against this proposal—
> The proposal of Lord Halifax.
> —protests which I heartily endorse; the proposal, however, is but the corollary to an imperialistic policy for the shaping of which he must assume a large share of responsibility.

I assert that this statement is not borne out by the facts, and I should like to give some proof of my assertion. Following out the principle that a wise man says nothing that he cannot prove, I shall quote to the house the opinion expressed by the Prime Minister in 1923 when there was a crisis in the near east. England had had some difficulty with Turkey and had asked the dominion to send a contingent. The Prime Minister of Canada then made this statement in answering a question put to him by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, who was then leader of the opposition:

> As regards the part which our government has taken in this matter, I would say to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) that we have felt and feel very strongly that, if the relations between the different parts of the British empire are to be made of an enduring character, this will only be through a full recognition of the supremacy of parliament, and this particularly with regard to matters which may involve participation in war. It is for parliament to decide whether or not we should participate in wars in different parts of the world, and it is neither right nor proper for any individual or for any group of individuals to take any step which in any way might limit the rights of parliament in a matter which is of such great concern to all the people of our country.

Now let me give the opinion of our Prime Minister as expressed in London during the conference which took place in 1937 on the occasion of the coronation. The Prime Minister then applied himself to keeping Canada out of any general imperial scheme. This is what he said as to imperial conferences and their purpose:

> The task of an imperial conference has been well defined as that of considering whether the several governments represented, while preserving their individual rights of decision and action, can coordinate their various policies in such a way as to assist one another, and help forward the cause of peace. Its function is not to formulate or declare policy. The value of this, as of other imperial conferences, lies mainly in the free exchange of information and opinion.

Let me now quote a statement made by the Prime Minister in London, England, at the Mansion House, on September 4, 1941, at a luncheon tendered to him by the Lord Mayor. The Prime Minister said:

> Canada is proud of her position in the sisterhood of the British commonwealth. But that position and association, had other reasons been lacking, would not have sufficed to bring Canada into a European war. Ours was not an automatic response to some mechanical organization of empire. Canada's entry into the war was the deliberate decision of free people, by their own representatives in a free parliament.
> Canada is a nation of the new world. As a nation of the new world, we placed ourselves freely at Britain's side because Britain's cause was the cause of freedom, not in this island alone, not in the British empire alone, not in the old world alone, but everywhere in the world. Lincoln, in his day, saw that the United States could not survive half-slave and half-free. . . . We saw that if Hitler was successful in his immediate aims, the whole world would soon be threatened by the unlimited ambition of evil men, and by the might of the greatest military machine the world has ever known.

Now let me quote the words of the Prime Minister expressed on June 17, 1941, in a speech which he made in New York at a dinner tendered in his honour by the Associated Canadian Organizations of New York city. I quote:

> The Canadian people entered this war of their own free will. As one people, we made the momentous decision by the free vote of a free parliament. Our declaration of war was signed by the king upon the recommendation of His Majesty's Canadian ministers. The king's proclamation was in the name of Canada. We, in Canada, are as free to make war or to abstain from making war, as the people of the United States are free to make war or to abstain from making war.
> The decision of the Canadian parliament was given as soon after the outbreak of war as parliament could be called together. It was a prompt and united decision. There was no hesitation. There was no compulsion.

Let me interject at this point that when Canada through this parliament decided to participate in the present war there was no opposition from any one of the members who now compose the Bloc Populaire in this house. The Prime Minister continued:

> We knew humanity's crisis was upon us all. We took our stand as a free and independent people who wished to do our utmost to thwart aggression, to maintain freedom, to crush the cursed creed of nazism, to preclude world domination by any power, and to end forever, if that were possible, the substitution of force for reason as an instrument of national policy.

Our people went to war for the sake of Canada, but not for Canada alone. We went to war as well for the sake of Britain, for North American civilization which we are proud to defend, and for the sake of that humanity which is above all nations. We saw clearly that Canadian freedom, that North American freedom, was one with British freedom.

We went to war at Britain's side because we believed hers to be the right side. We committed ourselves to her cause because it was our cause—the righteous cause of the liberty of nations, great and small, and of all men, great and humble, rich and poor. If Britain had not been on what we believed to be the side of righteousness, the cause for which she had taken up arms would not have been our cause. I do not hesitate to say that Britain, or no Britain, Canada would never have entered the war if, at the outset, our country had not seen the issue clearly for itself, and believed it to be what all free peoples know it to be to-day.

Having so refreshed the mind and memory of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency as to the stand taken publicly and officially on all occasions by our Prime Minister both in the past and recently, as to the declaration made by Lord Halifax, I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this house whether it was not a pity, to say the least, to hear the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency denounce the Prime Minister as an imperialist.

In resuming my seat, I wish to say that I did not rise to flatter the Prime Minister. I rejoice very much, however, in the fact that his actions pay him the highest of compliments. In rising, I was really moved by a sense of gratefulness and fairness to the right hon. gentleman, in whose veins runs the purest of Canadian blood. In brief, I only wished to do justice to him.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, there have been so much passion and heat to-day in this house, that, I think, we have performed the patriotic duty of saving one ton of coal in five. Before you put the question there is one item discussed in this debate that should be brought up in the house to-day. It is of immediate and vital interest to the country, the house and the government. I refer to the public statements made by a number of members of this house, outside the chamber, to the effect that they protested against the new wartime wages control order P.C. 9384. They will now have an opportunity to show their consistency and carry out, by their actions in this house, their promises and protests made outside these stone walls. I refer to the petition to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) by hon. members supporting the government from the province of British Columbia and by hon. members from Hamilton and Wentworth, expressed at an open labour meeting, to the effect that they protested against the wholly indefensible and coercive clauses in this damnable order in council.

We in this party have officially stood against this order in council by a clause in our amendment which I wish to quote—clause (c): That the government has:

> Failed to establish such a national code for labour as will ensure maximum production and give to labour its rightful place in our national partnership; and failed to provide for the correction of the unfairly coercive and restrictive clauses in the 1943 wartime wages control order.

If these hon. members and all others who think likewise wish to give action to their words, action which the government cannot overlook, they can do so by supporting this amendment.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the supreme test of democracy and free parliamentary representation. If the power of the party whip is to be greater than the freely expressed opinion of individual members, then we have truly gone far on the road to dictatorship. The next few minutes will tell the story, they will be historic. I challenge hon. members who have taken this stand outside the house to support by their action the words they have uttered, and support this amendment.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Roy), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne outlines some measures which we have long recognized as necessary. In an address broadcast on October 16, 1943, the leader of the Bloc Populaire Canadien made the following statements which are to be found on page 12 of his provincial programme:

Salaries

1. The salaries now paid to Quebec workers are generally lower than in Ontario, even within the same industry, notwithstanding the fact that large families are much more numerous in our province. We shall put an end to such an unfair and absurd situation and we will see to it that the salary level is the same here as in the neighbouring province.

2. We denounced last week the individualistic salary system which disregards the family. Accordingly, we advocate a generalized and compulsory system of family allowances. Single men should have no fear of such a system, which will enable them, incomparably better than does the present system, to fulfil their legitimate desire to settle down for life.

This is a preelection session, as evidenced by the spirited debates. The government did not wish, at least in words, to lag behind and through the governor general they have announced a series of reforms taken haphazard from the programmes of other political parties, in an attempt to regain the prestige which, after four years of war and expenditures beyond our means, and twenty years of antimilitarism they have lost in the minds of the Canadian ratepayers.

Family allowances are among the measures that had been advocated even before they ever thought of them. On the other hand, the speech from the throne announces measures which we cannot support, which we have denounced and against which we will continue to fight. They include the help out of all proportion with our resources, which the government is going to ask for the United Nations. Outstanding public men recognize—as evidenced by what Mr. Churchill, Mr. Eden, and Madame Chiang Kai-shek have stated in this house—and statistics show that on the basis of population, our effort is greater than that of any other of the united nations.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come for Parliament to remember that besides the empire, there is a country called Canada which is now being bled white, with the result that its economy will have to be built up anew and her citizens will suffer both from the moral and the physical standpoint. That will be a consequence of the hardships, the vexations of all kinds, and the various controls forced on the labouring classes, the farmers and workers.

It is a far cry from the days of 1940 when the Prime Minister and the late Minister of Justice, the Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe, were giving us the assurance that conscription would be for service in this country and not outside our boundaries. It is a far cry from the free, voluntary and moderate war effort.

Yet the statute of Westminster made us independent, and free to take whatever decision we liked. We know to what extent our decisions are free.

I have here a book by Mr. Emile Vaillancourt, entitled "Le Canada est-il une plantation?" (Is Canada a plantation?) which amply shows, to what extent Canada is mistress of her fate and of her decisions. According to Lord Tweedsmuir's interpretation of the Statute of Westminster, Canada is independent and can govern herself from the standpoint of international relations. This is true of Australia, of New Zealand, of the Union of South Africa, but these countries, even though they are members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, have their own flag. Here, the Union Jack waves over the Parliament buildings, the army headquarters, the customs buildings and the post office building. Canada has no national anthem of her own; the only official national anthem is God Save the King. When passports or passes are issued to Canadian citizens, they bear the description: British subjects by birth or by naturalization. These passports are not issued by the Governor General in the name of the King of Canada but in the name of His Britannic Majesty. Mr. Speaker, according to the statute of Westminster, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa may amend their own constitution, whereas Canada is required to ask the Parliament of Great Britain for leave to amend her constitution. Australia is a commonwealth, South Africa is a union, Ireland is a republic and Canada is a dominion. Now, according to the definition given by certain legal authorities, the word dominion is synonymous with colony, possession or plantation.

This evening's newspapers—I have one here—contain a statement by the Minister of National Defence, entitled:

Reduction of reserve army.

I quote from Le Droit.

A man-power pool will be set up for the active army.

[Mr Gauthier.]

And the statement goes on:

While the reserve army is still necessary, it is possible, due to the improved military situation—

And mark these words, Mr. Speaker, mark them well.

—and the efficient results obtained, to curtail its training programme during the forthcoming year.

And further, it is stated:

Function of the reserve.

(a) form a man-power pool for the active army in the event of future mobilization;

Not present, but future,

(b) take part in the territorial defence of Canada in case of necessity;

(c) supply a continuous flow of reinforcements to the active army;

(d) assist civil authorities in the event of disturbances.

Therefore, according to the statement of the Minister of National Defence, Canada is no longer in danger, and we do not need conscription for the country.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a speech of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), leader of the Bloc Populaire Canadien, delivered on September 9, 1939, in regard to Canada's participation in the present war. The hon. member said the following:

Politically, in the first place, it would mean a formal recognition of the formula resorted to by the Prime Minister, with all its consequences, namely, "When Britain is at war, Canada is at war."

The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie spoke of the consequences of our participation.

Consider the enormous investments which Great Britain must protect everywhere; reflect that she must undertake to defend on land, on sea and in the air a world-wide empire covering one-fourth of the earth's surface, that she occupies strategic and commercial posts located on every sea, that she must protect her markets against foreign competition everywhere, that the most important interests of her whole empire lie in Asia along routes which lead there, and that for their protection her policy must extend over the entire east, including the Black sea.

At that time the leader of the Bloc Populaire Canadien spoke against participation. In so doing, he was only following the arguments and teachings against participation and conscription which we had heard in the province of Quebec and to which the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay referred a while ago.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of moving, seconded by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Choquette), that all the words following "that" be deleted, and the following substituted:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed:

(a) to take appropriate measures to suspend conscription of men for military service and to put an end to mutual aid to the united nations;

(b) to recommend the suppression of recourse to the Westminster parliament in matters of amendments to the Canadian constitution and the adoption of a distinct national flag for Canada;

(c) to take such steps as to establish in the limits of the federal constitution, for labour and agriculture, a general plan capable of supporting the workers of both categories, during and after the war, in each of the Canadian provinces.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to detain the house, but wish merely to avail myself of the opportunity of placing on Hansard the remainder of a paragraph, part of which the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) quoted this afternoon. I asked for that privilege earlier to-day, but it was not possible to have it at that time. Therefore I wish to give the quotation now, and my reason for doing so is that this is not the first time that these few sentences have been wrested from their context, in radio broadcasts in Saskatchewan and other parts of Canada. These sentences have been quoted over the air, without any statement as to the circumstances under which they were made, and without giving their context. In an advertisement which appeared in the Brandon Sun during the recent by-election this is the sort of thing which appeared:

Rev. T. C. Douglas, M.P., chief military critic of the C.C.F., in a pre-war public debate on defence estimates asked this question:

"Against whom is this country preparing to defend itself? Is it against Germany? Is it against Japan? Or is it against an invasion of Canada by the Eskimos?

They did not even take the trouble to keep close to the text, let alone keeping it within the context. This afternoon the Minister of Mines and Resources came into the house with a sheet of mimeographed paper on which were some extracts purportedly from Hansard. He quoted one statement by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and gave the date November 15, 1937. The House of Commons was not sitting on November 15, 1937. I found out later that the proper date was February 15, 1937. The Minister of Mines and Resources is too old a parliamentarian not to know better than to come in here with a piece of paper from which to quote extracts without having Hansard on his desk and being prepared to give the proper date and proper quotation.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member is out of order. He is referring to a previous debate.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The debate is not finished.

Mr. GARDINER: The debate was finished when the vote was taken.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to quote from page 1063 of Hansard of February 19, 1937. At that time I had placed on Hansard a table from the dominion bureau of statistics giving the exports of nickel from 1929 to 1936, after which I made this statement:

Against whom are we arming? What potential aggressor is more aggressive to-day? Oh, I know that bogeymen have been trotted out in this chamber. It has been suggested that it might be Italy, it might be Germany, it might be Japan.

That is where the Minister of Mines and Resources stopped, but Hansard does not stop there. It goes on:

I cannot suppose that the government has any real fear of the intentions of these nations, for I noticed in the figures I have just read that Canada is shipping nickel to them. Knowing that we control the major part of the world's nickel supplies, I cannot believe that we would ship to them material which we feared would be returned to us in the form of high explosives. Surely those who talked about the Italians bombing this House of Commons did not imagine that the government of the day would allow us to send them the nickel with which they made those bombs, or did they?

That is the rest of the paragraph which the Minister of Mines and Resources so conveniently omitted to quote.

Mr. J. GORDON ROSS (Moose Jaw): I should like to quote from the same speech of the hon. member. On page 1059 of Hansard of February 19, 1937, a few pages prior to that from which he quoted, I find the following:

I speak for my colleagues and myself when I say most categorically that we are opposed to the increases in the defence estimates.

Then in the same quotation which my hon. friend just gave there is a first part which he left out. This reads:

May I now state the three reasons why I cannot vote for the increase in armaments. First, I do not feel that the government has shown that we are in any way more menaced this year than we were last year. This group has not said that it is not in favour of defence, but we are opposed to an increase in the defence estimates because it has not yet been demonstrated that the danger has become any greater now than it was twelve months or twenty-four months ago.

Then he continues with what he said in regard to nickel. He knows quite well that Canada could not have stopped exporting nickel unless she stopped the export of that commodity to every country in the world.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not at all.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Further on in the same speech as reported on page 1064 of Hansard, there is a full sentence, as follows:

I object to increased armaments.

No matter how much the hon. member wants to read Hansard, if he goes back to the debates of 1937, 1938 and 1939 he will find that his party was against increasing any estimates for defence when we were badly in need of them.

Mr. ROY: I was paired with the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. PICARD: Is there not a rule, Mr. Speaker, that any hon. member in the house at the time of a division must vote?

Mr. SPEAKER: I should prefer not to give an opinion on that point at the moment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the said address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is a rule of the house that immediately the address has been agreed to the house then appoints the two committees of the whole house, the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means. I therefore move:

That this house will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Friday next this house resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

It being twenty-five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday February 11, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

MAIN ESTIMATES 1944-45

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1945, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTION AND GOVERNMENT ORDERS AFTER FEBRUARY 14

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday the 14th February, 1944, to the end of the present session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word in regard to this motion. I realize it follows the practice that prevails at Westminster, and that in time of war, in the interests of the safety of the state, it is necessary to abrogate the rights of private members. Nevertheless, having regard to the fact that during the entire period of the last war, with the exception of the last four or five months, private members' days were left untouched. I again bring to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the house the necessity of protecting the rights of private members. It is all very well to say that in Great Britain those rights have been taken away; but in Great Britain private members enjoy rights which are not granted to members of this house. Each day they have an opportunity of questioning the ministers of the crown, and if the ministers give unsatisfactory answers, supplementary questions are allowed. In any event the rights of the private members are protected in that at adjournment time they may again bring the question before the house.

I realize that the all-absorbing and exclusive business and responsibility of members of parliament is the mobilization of the nation for war and the making of plans for peace. As private members we have a great responsibility here. During the last few days statements have been made by members on the government side indicating an attitude in reference to parliament that is far from encouraging. Our responsibility as members of parliament in connection with the war is to strengthen the resolution of the people to carry on to the end; to energize our people against the apathy that too often follows military successes; to assure our men and women of the forces that other men, with the necessary equipment, will be available as reinforcements and to see that our manpower is fully mobilized and put to the greatest possible use. For peace the challenge that comes to us as members is to make sure that the fullest possible plans and preparations be made now. I think I speak for the ordinary member of the house, Mr. Speaker, when I say that these aims and ideals for war and peace cannot be achieved if the membership of the house devotes itself, as it has to some extent during the past few days, to partisan discussions, and to turning this house into a cockpit of contending factions, each desirous of preparing for the hustings. Our responsibilities are too serious for that.

I ask the Prime Minister not to take away entirely the rights of private members. I realize that in time of war there must be a diminution in ordinary rights; that matters concerning the war must be given precedence; but we are living in times when parliament is losing its place in the opinion of the country. We are being criticized for wasting time; we are being criticized for abdicating two of our great functions, the deliberative and legislative functions. During this period of war we have given up many of our privileges; we have put these things in pawn for victory. Private members are just as desirous as the government that we should get on with the business of the country, but we find our rights being whittled down, it is true with the consent of the house, until to-day we are almost in the position of being bound by the answers of the government. We cannot challenge the answers we get to questions asked on the orders of the day; we must accept what we are told. That is why ordinary members of parliament such as myself have reached the point where we feel that our rights should not be further curtailed.

Let me point out that this is not a partisan view I am expressing. The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) dealt with this matter the other day, and two other hon. members are reported to have made speeches in the city of Hamilton last Saturday in connection with the same matter. I am not expressing a conception peculiar to the opposition. The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross), referring to the labour order, is reported to have said:

> The government is run by a bureaucracy; the members are nothing and I frankly admit it. If the order had gone through the house, it would have been better prepared.

Then the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Corman) is reported to have said:

> The members of parliament are dead guinea pigs. I have never been consulted or called in on these matters. I admit there are powers behind the government. . . . I think most of them are necessary, but I cannot see why the members should not be consulted. The Minister of Labour is not as bad as you think he is, but his hands are tied by these men who supposedly guide the destinies of this country.

Those are serious allegations against the power and prestige of the House of Commons. We find too that as time goes on the legislative authority of this parliament is being gradually diminished. No one can deny that. Orders in council of all kinds are necessary between sessions of parliament, but I submit that when parliament is sitting no orders in council should be passed at the instance of boards and commissions responsible only indirectly to parliament, carrying on uncontrolled by the representatives of the people, except those necessary for administrative purposes. We have only to look at the labour order to see what bureaucrats can do when they bring into effect legislation concerning the substantive rights of the individual, when there has been no discussion in parliament by the representatives of the people.

I realize the need to get on with the business of the war. On the other hand, Mr.

Speaker, I say that private members should not be unnecessarily denied the privileges that are theirs. I appreciate the fact that for the first two or three months of the session the rights of private members must be abrogated; but I make the appeal that toward the end of the session at least one day a month be set aside as private members day. It may be argued that private members have that opportunity in other ways, but I point out that the same argument would apply in peace time. I am not one of those who believe that the importance of parliament is actually lessening. We have stood here together through dark days, but throughout the country the man on the street feels that we do not discharge our responsibilities. That is why I am offering this suggestion to-day, asking the Prime Minister, who has always stood as a proponent of the principles of parliamentary government, to protect the rights of the private members who, occupying no positions of power, nevertheless collectively have in our custody and care the rights of the people.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I whole-heartedly support what has been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Year after year since the war began we have agreed to dispense with private members' days, but few opportunities are given hon. members to bring before this house ideas which they think would be beneficial to the country. If I remember correctly, last year we made a similar appeal to the Prime Minister, suggesting that while the government should get along with the business related to the war in the early part of the session, later on some opportunity should be given to private members to express their views, and I concur in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre in that regard. I am particularly anxious that this should be emphasized this year because we are now approaching, we hope—I say, "we hope"—the time when we shall have to be giving closer consideration to the matters which will relate to the end of the war. If that is so, then it seems to me all the more important that private members, apart altogether from the legislation the government has foreshadowed, should be able from their places in the house to bring before parliament suggestions which they think might be beneficial to the country in the period which will follow.

I thoroughly agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre that if we were to study the opportunity given in the British parliament to private members, we would realize that we are more greatly restricted than are the members in what we sometimes call the mother of parliaments. As has already been said, they have their question hour, at which time supplementary questions may be asked and ministers interrogated. They have also a custom which to my mind is an invaluable one, that of bringing matters to the attention of the house on the adjournment. A half hour is allotted to that daily. We have not that procedure here. As a consequence, sometimes hon. members have to take advantage of the motion to go into supply to bring some matter to the attention of the house, a procedure which often leads to long debate. Opportunities of that sort are few and far between, particularly in connection with appropriations made for war purposes, which in reality are a budget in themselves. I would urge the Prime Minister that he endeavour so to arrange the business of the house that, later in the session, when the pressure of war business has been eased somewhat, private members' days may be restored.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I moved this afternoon is similar to those which have been approved by the house at each session of this parliament. The arguments made in support of it are, if anything, stronger to-day than they were at any preceding session. I am glad to see, therefore, that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) both agree that there are reasons why, at least for the beginning of the session, the government should have an opportunity to get on with government measures, and that, if private members are to have an opportunity of bringing forward resolutions of their own, such opportunity should be postponed until later in the session. I think we are agreed on that.

So far as an opportunity being presented later in the session is concerned, I would say the government will be only too pleased to consider granting that opportunity in the light of conditions as they may develop. I did say in the last session that we would be prepared to consider giving private members an opportunity to bring forward resolutions when we got through the main part of our business. But I think all hon. members felt that by the time we reached the month of July they much preferred to have an adjournment of the house than to stay on for the purpose of debating the different motions placed on the order paper by private members.

Reference has been made to the position at Westminster. I believe a comparison will show that in this house private members have an even greater opportunity of bringing forward matters of interest to themselves, and of questioning the government, than is afforded at Westminster.

For instance, let us first consider the matter of questions, which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre. He said that at Westminster the government can be questioned at considerable length. My understanding of procedure there is that all questions to be answered by the government must be placed upon the order paper, and that the only questions which may be asked of the administration during the question hour are supplementary questions, growing out of those already asked. We adopt quite a different procedure here, one which gives hon. members a much greater opportunity to ask questions of the government. Almost every day the government is questioned in regard to some matter of which it has had no notice at all, and of which nothing whatsoever has appeared upon the order paper. On some days an hour's time is taken up in questions asked of the ministers. That would not be permitted under the procedure at Westminster. In this way, an opportunity does exist here for private members which does not exist in London. More than that, there is here no restriction upon the introduction of public bills by private members. In London during this time of war that right has been taken away from private members. They have not the right even to introduce a public bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course our public bills do not get any further than the introduction stage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, they do provide an opportunity to place before the public certain views which private members may wish to put forward. However, the point I am emphasizing is this, that the government in taking its stand in this matter, and in making a request of the house, is not seeking to deprive private members of their rights. It is seeking to gain a high degree of co-operation on the part of hon. members in getting on with the all-important business, the business pertaining to the war. I am sure the leader of the opposition would recognize that fact if, on Monday next, the house were to begin a debate on some of the private members' motions; he would be the very first to say that the house had put itself in a false light before the public. The people of Canada would ask: Why is our parliament at this stage interesting itself in a number of motions which have been introduced by private members, instead of considering the war appropriation bill and other important war matters?

After all, what is the extent of the privation? In the first four weeks of the ordinary session hon. members have certain rights on Wednesdays and, I believe, Mondays. But after that government business has precedence. In this session two weeks have already gone by, and hon. members have been perfectly free to discuss anything they liked, and have been under no restrictions whatsoever. The fact is that they have been discussing what they liked. We have had half a dozen amendments, apart from everything else, to the speech from the throne, and on them almost every subject of immediate concern has been discussed by one member or another. In those discussions there have been no restrictions whatsoever.

I do not like to have the impression develop in the public mind that private members have not full opportunity to discuss subjects in which they may be interested. The speech from the throne, we have been told, is lengthy. It contains a number of subjects, each of which will come before the house in the course of the session. Hon. members may then address themselves to any of these questions.

Let us consider what would happen if we were to proceed now to a discussion of the private members' motions as they appear upon the order paper. The first of these motions is one which relates to measures for the better protection of all soldiers who serve in His Majesty's forces. There will be ample opportunity to discuss those matters on the war appropriation measure now to be proceeded with.

The next one has to do with the giving of clear titles to all soldier settlers who still hold land under contract with the soldier settlement board. That subject will come up under the estimates connected with soldier settlement, and in other connections.

The next resolution is one relating to reconstruction and rehabilitation; developments ensuring employment and opportunities in connection with transportation, and other matters. We shall be dealing at length with the whole question of reconstruction, and any member who wishes to discuss any particular phase of the subject will have his opportunity at such time.

The next resolution relates to the marketing of western Canada's wheat. My recollection is that in every session parliament has taken a couple of weeks to discuss wheat, and opportunities will come at such a time.

Next we find a resolution supporting feasible irrigation schemes in connection with post-war reconstruction. Such irrigation schemes can be discussed when we are dealing with the reconstruction measure.

Another has to do with the development of mineral resources under government control and operation. That, surely, would come up when we are discussing questions related to the resources of our country, and their development.

Finally there is a resolution relating to the prices of agricultural products. At other sessions we have discussed these matters, and ample opportunity will be given at this session for like discussion. And I suggest further that they will be much more effectively discussed when dealing with government measures on these subjects than they would be if discussed under private members' resolutions.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask a question? I hope the Prime Minister is not building up an argument for use after the war is over because actually what he is saying now about this resolution covering something that may be dealt with in the course of ordinary debate would apply equally to peace time. I hope the Prime Minister is not going to deny to private members in time of peace the opportunity of placing resolutions on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend for assuming that I will be directing the affairs of government at that time.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the war will be over very soon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not at all surprised that my hon. friend should assume what he has, but let me say that the purpose of this resolution relates to war time only. There has been no attempt at any time that I am aware of to restrict private members' rights and privileges during a time of peace, by action similar to that being taken at this particular time because of the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: The same argument would apply to both peace and war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The whole thought behind this resolution is that we are at war and that the country is interested in seeing that this parliament concentrates on the prosecution of the war, and regards everything else as secondary until victory has been achieved.

I might say more on this, but the house has passed a similar resolution in previous sessions and hon. members understand its purpose. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has repeatedly made remarks, about parliament losing caste with the people, private members being reduced to ciphers and comments of that kind. I cannot understand why he should go on trying to belittle parliament in the eyes of the public.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why deliver him a lecture at this time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Because he delivered a lecture to me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There was no question of any lecture. When the Prime Minister talks about—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:—our prime purpose I would say to him that what I was talking about was the past two days when the Prime Minister's own supporters were doing anything but trying to win the war in the discussion that took place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Seventy-five members have spoken during this debate, and I think if my hon. friend looks over the list he will find that there were comparatively few on this side who have participated. I do not want to go into any small discussion, but I have regard for the larger question, namely, the impression that the public may get with respect to parliament. I say that that impression may be created in two ways. First, it can be done by taking note of what actually has taken place in parliament and, second, by the iteration and reiteration of criticisms of its action by members of parliament themselves. I say that the latter kind of thing does no good either to parliament or to the public. My hon. friend has referred to the present session but I do not know of any session of any parliament in Canada's history where more has been accomplished in the first two weeks after the opening of a session than has been accomplished in this session up to this time. Committees have been appointed, the speech from the throne has been agreed to, the estimates have been tabled, and there has been a full debate. If hon. members would direct the attention of the country to what has been accomplished in this way they would be serving a much better purpose than they are by criticizing adversely.

Motion agreed to.

EXTRADITION TREATY

CANADA-UNITED STATES—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked a question with respect to the present position of the extradition treaty with the United States, and I promised that I would have a statement to-day. If hon. members are agreeable, it might appear on Hansard, but I shall read it if it is desired.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it very long?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. Would the hon. gentleman like to have it read?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On January 29 of last year I informed the house that the government had received representations from many organizations in Canada which are interested in the marketing of securities and which feared possible adverse effects from the treaty upon legitimate Canadian business. I informed the house that these representations were being given careful study.

Since making the statement to which I have referred, a hearing was held on May 18 last before a special committee of the cabinet consisting of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), at which all organizations and individuals interested in the possible effects of the treaty were given an opportunity to make any representations they wished concerning the treaty. Following that hearing, the whole matter was discussed informally with the security commissioners of all the provinces in the course of meetings held in Winnipeg at the end of May. Following these discussions, representatives of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Justice proceeded to Washington to have further consideration of the position with the United States authorities.

The position at present is that discussions are going on between the Canadian and United States governments as to the nature and extent of any modification which it might be desirable to make in the effect of the treaty in order to ensure that no legitimate business operations are affected by its terms. It is hoped that it will be possible to conclude these discussions very shortly and to have the matter placed before parliament for approval. Such approval will be sought before ratification of the treaty is proceeded with. The treaty was tabled in the house by the Minister of Justice on August 1, 1942.

SUGAR

PRODUCTION OF BEET SUGAR IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): There are three questions I should like to ask the government through the Minister of Finance. First, in view of the danger of a sugar shortage during 1944 and 1945 which is indicated by a recent statement by S. R. Noble, the sugar controller, has the government taken any measures to facilitate the production of beet sugar in Canada during 1944? Second, if so, what measures? Third, if not, why not?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is the type of question that should be placed upon the order paper.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

TRANSFER OF CANADIAN PERSONNEL FROM ROYAL AIR FORCE TO R.C.A.F.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air or his parliamentary assistant. Yesterday the minister informed the house that he is now holding discussions with representatives of the British air ministry on matters affecting the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F. There is one matter which is of great interest to all Canadian airmen serving overseas, that is, the transfer to the R.C.A.F. of Canadian airmen who enlisted in the R.A.F. either prior to or subsequent to the declaration of war. These men have given heroic service and have added great lustre to Canada's name. I ask the minister or his parliamentary assistant if consideration is being given in these discussions to the transfer of Canadians in the R.A.F. to the R.C.A.F.

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air): While it is hoped that the minister will not be pressed for piecemeal reports of the conference, since he has undertaken to give a report when it terminates, I can say, now that the matter has been raised in the house many times, that the question of transfer from the R.A.F. to the R.C.A.F. of Canadian nationals is one of the problems being considered. It has been under negotiation for some time. In August last, concrete and detailed proposals were made to the air ministry and the minister hopes that out of the conferences at present being held there will be a final and mutually satisfactory solution.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

AUSTRALIA-NEW ZEALAND—REQUEST FOR PRINTING IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in the course of yesterday's debate I suggested that the agreement between Australia and New Zealand which was signed about three weeks ago is of sufficient importance to warrant its being printed in Votes and Proceedings, together with the press releases issued by the Minister for External Affairs for Australia and the Prime Minister of New Zealand. Will the Prime Minister tell us to-day whether it will be possible to have that suggestion carried out; and if not in the form suggested, perhaps in some other way so that members of the house may be able to study the agreement and the press releases?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there will be no difficulty in having the agreement printed in a form which will make it available for hon. members. As to whether it would be advisable to print it as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings, I would have no hesitation about that if my hon. friend would be satisfied with the agreement itself; but if he wishes to have the press releases made by Prime Minister Fraser and Prime Minister Curtin at the time the agreement was signed also printed, I think it would be better to have them printed with the agreement in a separate document, and not to appear in Votes and Proceedings. I say that because I do not think it would be a wise precedent to begin printing press releases in the Votes and Proceedings of this house. I shall undertake to see, if the house is agreeable, that the agreement is printed together with the press releases referred to by my hon. friend, and they will be available as soon as the printing bureau has the work done.

Mr. GREEN: Thank you very much.

GASOLINE RATIONING

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF ORDER WITH RESPECT TO THE USE OF TRUCKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in regard to a recent order of the wartime prices and trade board forbidding the use of trucks for so-called "wasteful or unnecessary purposes". During the last month or so there have been a number of prosecutions against farmers for attending social or church gatherings in their trucks, even though they have no other means of transport. My question is this: Will consideration be given by the government to having that order altered so as to permit farmers and others who have no other means of conveyance than the truck to attend social or church gatherings without rendering themselves subject to prosecution and conviction?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. We have had similar inquiries from a number of other hon. members. As my hon. friend knows, the substance of the order forbids the wasteful and unnecessary use of gasoline used in going to and from social gatherings, recreation meetings and so on. The underlying purpose is to conserve trucks, gasoline, and rubber, which is still in very short supply. When the amending order No. 318 was passed last September, careful consideration was given to whether or not an exception could be made for the owners of trucks who were not the owners of pleasure vehicles. However, the gasoline ration for trucks is more than double, I think, the ration for the ordinary pleasure vehicle, and in addition gasoline and new tires can be obtained, if necessary, for trucks. So that after consideration it was felt that to make such an exception would contravene the fundamental purpose of the order. I shall be glad to bring my hon. friend's question to the attention of the officers of the board, but the information I now have is that it is unlikely that any change will be made in the order at the present time.

QUESTIONS

*SALES TAX, FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL

Mr. ROY:

Can the federal sales tax collected by way of stamps affixed on goods and merchandise be taxed over by a provincial sales tax?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I deal with this question orally? It calls for an opinion on a matter of law not connected with any of the business of the house at this time. I think it would be quite inappropriate and certainly contrary to the practice of the Department of Justice to give opinions on such matters. But I can give the hon. member some factual information. Something that comes pretty near his question was dealt with in a judgment of the privy council which was rendered on July 30 last in the case of the Atlantic Smoke Shops Limited, v. Conlon and the Attorney-General of Canada and others, which is reported in the English Report, Appeal Cases for 1943 at page 550.

Mr. GRAYDON: Any charge for that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is not an opinion. That is just a statement as to a fact.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CONTRACTS BETWEEN GRANBY MINING CORPORATION AND JAPANESE INTERESTS

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence and other documents relating to contracts made between the Granby Mining Corporation, of Princeton, British Columbia, and Japanese interests, together with a copy of such contracts submitted to the government from time to time for its consideration or approval.

PENSIONS—OLD AGE AND THE BLIND

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all communications, agreements and other documents, from January 1, 1943, to the present, exchanged between the government, including any department or official thereof, and the governments of the several provinces of Canada, relating to old age and blind pensions; also for a copy of all orders in council dated since May 19, 1943, relating to the same subject.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no objection to this order passing, provided it is understood that it does not cover a lot of routine correspondence such as correspondence relating to individual pensions and pay-lists covering pension payments. I take it that the hon. gentleman does not want that type of correspondence. If that is understood, the motion may pass.

Mr. KNOWLES: The correspondence that I am interested in is that relating to the total amount of the pension, adjustments in the amount, changes in regulations, and that sort of thing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the explanation made by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

WAR-TIME WAGES CONTROL ORDER P.C. 9384

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all communications relating to wartime wages control order, 1943, P.C. 9384, received by the Prime Minister and/or the Minister of Labour, dated since December 9, 1943, from the Winnipeg and district trades and labour council, the Winnipeg labour council of the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Winnipeg central labour council of the One Big Union, and any other trade union or organized labour bodies in Winnipeg; also for a copy of all replies to the said communications by or on behalf of the Prime Minister and/or the Minister of Labour.

SHIPBUILDING COSTS—GOVERNMENT AND PRIVATELY-OWNED YARDS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a return showing, (a) cost of material; (b) cost of labour; (c) amount of overhead cost, of each ship of the 10,350-ton class, and of the 4,700-ton class constructed since the beginning of the war in, (i) government-owned yards; and (ii) privately-owned yards.

Mr. HOWE: I must ask that this resolution do not pass, on the ground that it is not in the public interest to give the information. As hon. members know, my department has consistently taken the position since the beginning of the war that it will not give costs of war materials. I think that aside from the policy, which is also the policy adopted in the United Kingdom and the United States, there are reasons of public interest that the production of one yard shall not be compared with the production of another yard without giving the circumstances which might account for variations in price over a period or from time to time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, the time-worn reason given by the minister, that it is not in the public interest, has been resurrected again this session. I quite understand that the minister may think there are special reasons why this motion should not pass. But I would point out that we had a committee investigating the question of shipbuilding, a committee which for similar reasons seemed to find it necessary to sit in camera, and I should like to know whether the people of this country have the right and are entitled to have some information with respect to the money that they are spending themselves through this government in connection with our war effort. If I were satisfied that the disclosing of this information would give help and comfort to the enemy, I think the minister himself would be the first to admit that I would not make such a suggestion, nor would any other hon. member. However, there is a feeling across Canada that umbrage is taken by the government and the ministers when the phrase "not in the public interest" is objected to. I think that the minister ought to go farther in assuring this house before he requests the government and the members to turn down this motion.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty is that these are private yards competing against each other in peace-time work. The conditions in the various yards are not the same. One yard may have a run of the same type of ships throughout the entire season. In that case naturally the costs would be low. Another yard may be asked to build three or four different types of ships in the same yard. Another yard may be primarily a repair yard. We may have forced them under pressure into the shipbuilding business, perhaps against their will, and the yard is doing shipbuilding work and at the same time attending to a great deal of repair work. If I could take the time of the house sufficiently to give an analysis of the reasons for the costs in each case it might be fair to bring them down. My hon. friend suggested that my department refused to give the information to the parliamentary committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not say that at all.

Mr. HOWE: We simply told the parliamentary committee the facts that I am giving here. We said to the committee, "If you insist, we will give the information, but we prefer not to disclose the competitive position of one private yard with another yard."

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister do us the courtesy of allowing this particular motion to stand?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that I am within the rules in raising the objection with respect to this motion. I call your attention to citation 439, which is found on page 136 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, 1927:

> A motion for a return may be opposed on the ground of public policy, such as that the disclosure of the information sought is not for the public interest, or that its supply would involve unreasonable labour or expense.

The last clause of the citation is particularly applicable because we have not the cost of each individual ship. It would take a good deal of time and expense to analyse the costs of the various yards and bring the costs of individual ships into anything like the same proportion.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, this bears out exactly what the member for Lake Centre said, that private members have nothing to do in regard to these important matters. The people believe that, too. We do not get the information that we should have. If we cannot get the information publicly we should get it privately.

Motion dropped.

VICTORY AIRCRAFT LIMITED—J. P. BICKELL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda and other documents exchanged, etc., between Mr. J. P. Bickell, former president of Victory Aircraft Limited, and the Honourable the Minister of Munitions and Supply, or other official of the said department, touching on the resignation of Mr. Bickell from the presidency of the said company.

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

LABOUR CODE—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of each of the provinces of Canada having relation to the drafting of legislation for a labour code or the formulation of a joint dominion-provincial policy in regard thereto, together with a copy of any letters or telegrams or other communications between any minister or official of the federal government and any minister or official of any provincial government relating thereto, from January 1, 1943, to date.

Mr. MITCHELL: That will be subject to the approval of the provinces.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not think they should mind, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not as simple as that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister mean that if one province out of nine decides that the correspondence should not be brought down the government is relieved of the responsibility of tabling it in the house?

Mr. MITCHELL: The government is not asking to be relieved of anything.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have asked to be relieved quite often in the past.

Mr. MITCHELL: We are not asking to be relieved in this case. It has been the policy as long as I can remember to get the consent of the provincial governments before correspondence between provincial governments and the federal government is tabled. That is the only reason for making the reservation at this time.

Mr. GRAYDON: That point has been argued many times in this house, and the minister has been present on those occasions. No very convincing argument has ever been put forward as to why this government should hide behind the provinces in regard to this matter. There is no cogent reason why these papers should not be brought down. There may be some reason in the government's mind why they should not be brought down, but so far as parliament is concerned there is no valid reason why the minister should take the position he now takes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is this not a departure from the understanding we had in this house several years ago? I was under the impression that when another government of a sovereign state was involved, the permission of that government should be sought. But we are dealing with the provinces of Canada, and this practice seems to be something new that has cropped up within the last two or three years. I think we are going far afield when we allow the government to say they cannot produce correspondence carried on between the dominion and the provinces on the ground that the provinces must first be consulted. By and by I suppose we shall be told we must ask the municipalities as well because they are the governments of their particular localities. I think we should distinguish very clearly between the courtesies that ought to be followed in our dealings with other nations and the methods we should adopt in connection with the various provinces. I think this parliament has a right to all correspondence passed between the dominion and the provinces, provided that it is not of a wartime confidential nature.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance was dealing with the second motion for papers, which also asked for correspondence with the provinces, he made no reservations with regard to the provinces; therefore, I do not see why the Minister of Labour should make any reservations in this instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say a word to my hon. friend? This question was discussed at some length last session, and I think the understanding was this. The government has no desire not to bring down correspondence with provinces, but I do think it is what my hon. friend has just said, a matter of courtesy to inform the provinces that this information has been asked for, and to say that we propose to table it unless there is some reason they wish to put forward for not tabling it. Parliament ought to be informed of their reasons, but I do think that courtesy is courtesy, whether between nations or provinces, municipalities or individuals, and I for my part would wish to preserve that courtesy.

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree with the Prime Minister in that.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is different from what the Minister of Labour said.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the minister.

[Mr. Graydon.]

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $3,650,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1945, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or desirable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $3,650,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the War Appropriation Acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944.

He said: You will note, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution asks for authority to introduce a bill which is designed to provide the appropriation we shall require for war expenditures during the new fiscal year which begins on April 1 next. Except in regard to the amount asked for, the resolution is in exactly the same form as on previous occasions; and similarly the house will find that, with the same exception, the bill itself, when introduced, will be in exactly the same form as the main war appropriation bill introduced at the last session of parliament.

This will be the tenth appropriation for direct war expenditures which parliament has been asked to provide during the present war. It may therefore be of some historical interest if I review the previous appropriations. The house will note that I am speaking of appropriations to cover only Canada's direct war expenditures; I am not including the appropriations for indirect war purposes, that is to say, appropriations to provide munitions and other war supplies to our allies.

At the first war session in September, 1939, parliament voted a war appropriation of $100 million. War expenditures during the fiscal year 1939-40 amounted to $118 million, the remainder of the funds being supplied from the ordinary vote of the Department of National Defence which had been included in the ordinary estimates for the fiscal year.

In May, 1940, parliament appropriated $700 million for direct war expenditures during the fiscal year 1940-41, and on April 4, 1941, voted a supplementary appropriation of $135 million. Direct war expenditures during the fiscal year 1940-41 charged to these two votes amounted to $752,045,000.

The main war appropriation for the fiscal year 1941-42 amounted to $1,300 million, and had to be supplemented by a further vote of $135 million in March, 1942. Direct war expenditures during the year totalled $1,339,700,000.

For the fiscal year 1942-43, three war appropriation acts were passed, one for $500 million in March, 1942, one for a further $1,500 million in June, 1942, and the third for $858 million at the end of the year. Total direct war expenditures during the fiscal year amounted to $2,724,200,000.

These eight votes for direct war expenditures total $5,228 million. Total direct war expenditures to the end of the last fiscal year, March 31, 1943, aggregated $4,934 million, to which should be added loans and advances charged to active assets, of $144 million, making a grand total of $5,078 million. This figure excludes indirect war expenditures to provide war supplies to other united nations.

For the present fiscal year, the house will recall that we passed last spring a main war appropriation act for $3,890 million—in addition, of course, to the Mutual Aid Act appropriating $1,000 million for the provision of war supplies to other united nations. We are still too far from the end of the fiscal year for me to forecast with any accuracy to-day the probable total of our direct war expenditures for the present fiscal year. However, I am hoping that when the accounts for the year are closed, we will find that actual expenditures for the year have run very close indeed to the original estimate we made and that no further funds for this purpose will have to be voted by parliament. Parenthetically, I may add that I expect the mutual aid appropriation of $1,000 million to carry expenditures for mutual aid purposes several weeks beyond the end of the fiscal year.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the appropriation which parliament is being asked to provide for the coming fiscal year, namely $3,650 million, is somewhat smaller than the provision which was made for direct war purposes for the current fiscal year. Actually the decrease is $240 million, or slightly over six per cent. I need not assure the house that this probable reduction in direct war expenditures, like the corresponding decrease forecast by President Roosevelt in connection with United States war expenditures, does not represent any slackening in the war effort but rather merely the result of the stage of the war and of our preparation for war which has now been reached. The speech from the throne clearly indicated that while the war situation has improved from the point of view of the united nations during the past year, nevertheless the duty of the government is to see that Canada's war effort is firmly maintained until the enemy is defeated in Europe and in Asia. The winning of the war clearly remains the first of all our objectives. The primary task of the government and of the Canadian people is to concentrate on the prosecution of the war and assure our men in the armed forces that there will be no diversion from this vital task and no relaxation of Canada's war effort until victory is conclusively won.

Despite the reduction, the vote asked for is still a huge one, judged by any Canadian standard. Its magnitude and the fact that it is to provide for our direct war financial programme for the new year makes the war appropriation bill the most important by far of the many measures with which the house will have to deal during the present session. As in previous years, the resolution and the bill itself will provide ample opportunity for discussing and appraising not only the war programme which we are proposing for next year but also the record of war activities and war expenditures during the fiscal year now drawing to a close. It will be the purpose of my colleagues and myself to afford full opportunity to hon. members to make such inquiries and comments as they may wish to make, and to give them pertinent information in as complete a form as may be practicable.

To facilitate such inquiries and debate, I will now place on Hansard a break-down, by the main categories of expenditure in the form used last year, of the estimated expenditure of $3,650 million for the fiscal year 1943-44. For the convenience of the house, I am also showing in the same table the corresponding estimates for the current fiscal year. Unfortunately, as I have already indicated, I find it impracticable to be responsible for giving, in addition, estimates of probable actual expenditures under each item during the current fiscal year, but I have no doubt that my colleagues will be prepared to report actual expenditures to some recent date and perhaps also will be willing to hazard rough estimates of probable total expenditures for the various items which come within their own jurisdiction.

The table showing the break-down of the estimated war expenditures for 1944-45 to which I have referred is too long to read, and if the house will permit me I will merely place it on Hansard and then direct attention to some of its major features and the more important items.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: The table is as follows:

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that in the same form as it was last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. When hon. members have an opportunity to examine the table they will note that in round numbers the aggregate expenditures of the three defence services are estimated at $3,057 million as compared with the original estimate of $3,405 million given for the current fiscal year. Breaking down these totals, we find that army services account for $1,535 million in 1944-45 as compared with $1,764 million in 1943-44; air services $1,090 million as compared with $1,129 million; naval services $410 million as compared with $489 million; and sundry services $22·3 million as compared with $22·5 million.

As I have already indicated, these somewhat smaller figures in each case reflect primarily the stage which we have now reached in the war itself and in our preparations for war. In other words, we have at long last reached, or at least nearly reached, the end of the costly period of preparation for total war, the end of the discouragingly long period during which we, like other peace-loving nations, have been trying to "catch up" in trained man-power, in armoured strength, and in the capacity for making the weapons for war with an enemy who had devoted several years to war-like preparations before he finally "struck" and who had therefore caught us largely unprepared. For the united nations, therefore, the initial years of war were primarily years of holding the enemy at bay by rapidly improvised programmes while we reorientated our whole economy, built new plants and extended old ones for war purposes, mobilized our man-power and trained it in the new technique of modern war and war industry, and gradually built up supplies of initial and reserve equipment considered adequate to knock out a powerful and resourceful enemy already armed to the teeth.

Fortunately, as I have said, we have reached or are reaching the point, varying to some extent in varying fields of equipment and activity, when, thanks to the superiority of our industrial resources and the resourcefulness which characterizes the democratic organization of the united nations, we can deliver against the enemy that overpowering weight of armed power which is essential for assuring victory as well as for minimizing the loss of human lives. What I have been saying applies to the united nations as a group as well as to Canada; for this tremendous mobilization for war against the common enemy has been a cooperative process involving mutual help and the integration of resources of the several nations to a very high extent. Had such cooperation and mutual assistance been lacking, the period of preparation to which I have referred would have taken much longer—perhaps indeed the victory we aim at could not otherwise have been achieved.

The huge war appropriation which this parliament voted last year represented in a very real way the harvesting of much of this prolonged work of preparation. The very large increases in the sums then made available to our three defence services, as compared with those provided in preceding years, were to enable them to fill up their quota of initial equipment and build up reserves as far as practicable. The somewhat smaller sums being asked for this year reflect to a substantial degree the fact that this process is nearing completion and that what is now primarily necessary is to provide equipment and supplies to repair the wastage of equipment and supplies that will accrue in a period of more intense and more continuous war activity, and to keep constantly abreast or ahead of the enemy in the development and provision of new and better weapons which the changing phases of the war require. To some extent also it reflects the completion or near-completion of the construction programme of the three services.

The Department of Munitions and Supply, which is the procurement agency for the defence services as well as for other allied governments in respect of Canadian war supplies, estimates its requirements for the coming fiscal year at $183 million. This compares with the estimate of $166,300,000 for the current fiscal year which I gave for this department at the beginning of the year, although I understand that the funds actually required by this department will, because of working capital requirements, be found to have substantially exceeded this estimate.

For the war activities carried on by all other departments or agencies of government, the estimate for 1944-45 is roughly $375 million as compared with the estimate of approximately $249 million for the present fiscal year. Of this total the two largest single items are $156·6 million for administrative expenses of and subsidies to be paid by the commodity prices stabilization corporation, and approximately $74 million for the Department of Agriculture (including almost $47,600,000 for subsidies to food producers paid through the agricultural food board, $16,500,000 freight assistance on western feed grains, and $8,000,000 subsidy on western wheat used exclusively as feed for live stock). The amounts estimated for other departments are of much smaller magnitude and compare more closely with the corresponding estimates for the current year.

Finally, there is an estimate of $30·5 million as the amount required to cover cash outlays charged to active assets rather than to expenditure, leaving a small amount for contingencies.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has not the total of subsidies?

Mr. ILSLEY: The total estimated subsidies will be apparent from the tables I placed on Hansard.

I shall not at this time say more about the details of these estimates by departments and functions. As I said last year, to do so would be needlessly confusing to the house, because it has not yet had time to study and digest the salient features of the table which I have placed on Hansard.

It also seems to me unnecessary to dwell at length on the general economic and financial significance of the over-all figures and it is too early for me to present to the house an accurate picture of our probable total expenditures for all purposes during the coming fiscal year.

The main estimates, which I have tabled to-day, show an increase, due primarily to increased interest on the public debt, but on the other hand we expect to be able to effect a considerable reduction in the appropriation which it will be necessary to request for mutual aid purposes. The global figure for government expenditures for all purposes during the coming year is therefore expected to be smaller than the total which parliament appropriated for all purposes during the present fiscal year.

In commenting upon the general significance of the sum requested for direct war expenditures, I wish to emphasize again that it is based on the assumption that Canada wishes to maintain a total war effort—wishes to make the maximum contribution of which it is capable during the coming year to the achievement of victory. That, I believe, represents the point of view of this house and of the country generally. The vast majority of hon. members and of the Canadian people do not wish it to be said of this country that we fought a "comfortable" war—that we stopped short of doing the most we could do to assure victory and, moreover, assure it at the earliest possible moment and with the least possible sacrifice of human lives. On the contrary, I think they will wish to look back on their record in this war in the way that Walter Lippmann looked back to the record of the united nations during the past year. Let me quote from what he wrote on the eve of the new year:

> The year which lies behind us will in the perspective of time be remembered proudly and gratefully. . . .
> The nations have been put to the test and they have met the test. Facing defeat, they have not despaired. Confronted with impossible tasks, they have accomplished them. In the judgment of history there will stand forth the grand result, and not the trouble and confusion by which we have reached it. . . .
>
> We may say with sober confidence that we shall have the victory and that we shall come through the ordeal into one of the great epochs of human history. We have faced fearful danger and a monstrous evil; let us not be too timid to believe that in the certain triumph of this righteous cause our children will find peace and the good life again.
> Our assurance that this is so rests upon the proved fact that for the greatest things in this enormous conflict—for resistance to evil, for the courage to fight, for patience to wait, the resolution to work, the readiness to endure—our people have not been wanting. It is in the incidental and secondary things that we have been least successful.

I do not contend that everything that he says is applicable to Canadian conditions, athough some of it is. He continues:

> The nagging contentions which disgust us and disgrace us have not been about the central and mighty issues of this momentous struggle. The contentions have been about seventeen cents an hour and two cents a quart for milk, and a few dollars of taxes, and a little more or a little less profit on a war contract; the contentions have been about who should stay in a public office or who should replace him, and how to finagle to stay in and how to manoeuvre to get in. These are the small change of the small transactions of small men who live in the little private worlds of their personal grievances and their private ambitions, while the majestic drama of the great world, which alone can give purpose and meaning to any human life to-day, passes them by. . . .
> The great things are going well, and they have been made to go well by thought and work and faith, not by accident and good luck.

There are, I am convinced, very few Canadians who wish to live meaninglessly in comfort or luxury while "the majestic drama of the great world" passes them by; few who fail to realize that we as individuals get out of life what we put into it and we as nations will share in "the grand result" of this struggle in proportion to the contribution we have made towards it. It is true that there were one or two voices raised in this house which have condemned Canada's war effort on the alleged ground that it is "out of proportion to our resources" and indeed—believe it or not—that it is "proportionately greater than that of any other allied country." The facts, I think, speak for themselves. The fact is that our war effort cannot be too big, for the simple reason that we have been been able to accomplish it. It is a travesty of truth to say that it is proportionately greater than that of any other allied country. We have done well for a small and youthful country; we have done more than the world thought we could do and more indeed than we ourselves ever dreamed that we could do, but he makes a mockery of words who says that our effort and our sacrifices are proportionately greater than the achievements and the sacrifices of the heroic people of Britain and of Russia, or the nameless suffering of the peoples of the conquered countries.

What have we in Canada suffered or sacrificed? I speak not of our fighting men or of families who have lost their loved ones. I speak only of those of us who have remained at home and are supposed to support the home front. Well, the fact is that we have suffered a few inconveniences and sacrificed some chance of profit that fattening on the extremities of other nations might otherwise have brought to us. But when you have said that, you have said all. For the nation as a whole the standard of living has risen substantially, and again on the whole it is higher than it has ever been before. Our national income has risen to unprecedented heights and it is distributed far more equitably than ever before. True, our national debt is also far higher than ever before but the significant thing is that when we take into account lower interest rates and other offsetting factors, we find that the annual burden created by that debt, the net interest charge, is smaller in relation to national income and taxable capacity than the burden of the national debt before the war or even twenty years ago. That debt will create its problem of management, no doubt, but that problem will be by no means beyond our capacity to solve. The key to it will be found in the maintenance of a high level of employment, production and national income.

To that objective we are committed. I have no doubt of our ability to achieve it, if we show boldness and intelligence in our planning and do not allow our constructive efforts to be frustrated by bickering and strife. Fortunately, thanks to the fact that we have conceived our war effort in great and noble proportions, we shall go into the post-war period with many new assets. In particular, we shall have a vastly expanded and more highly diversified industrial equipment, a wide range of newly-acquired skills, a larger, better-trained and healthier population, and a new sense of achievement, a new confidence in our capacity to do great and difficult things. Some of these assets are of an intangible character but they are of the first importance for the tasks that will face us.

Neither now in planning our war effort nor later in planning for the new and better world which we hope it will make possible can we afford to be timid or selfish or short-sighted. We cannot afford to take counsel of small minds or selfish hearts. We must seek to do our best, the utmost of which we are capable.

That is the philosophy which has guided us in planning the war programme which requires the appropriation for which we are now asking. That programme is large and varied, but it is one which we believe we can accomplish.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the house resolving itself into committee to deal with the war appropriation resolution. I rise simply to repeat what I said last session when I indicated to the minister and the government our desire to have before us the details of the expenditures proposed for the further prosecution of the war. The Minister of Finance has now tabled the details for this year.

We are anxious this year, as we were last session, to discharge our obligation and our duty as members of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. We intend to see that the money which has been raised by taxation, by loan and otherwise is spent to the best advantage. At this moment I think I should caution and warn the government that we are taking a definite stand with respect to war expenditures. The government may expect a closer and more effective scrutiny of each item in the war appropriations than was given last year. There are more people who are conscious of the expenditures of our government. More people in Canada are paying taxes than ever before, and when a man pays taxes his consciousness of public expenditures becomes that much greater.

It will be a strange thing if there is not great waste and great extravagance in certain parts of our effort. Perhaps that may have been expected in the hurly-burly and hurry of the early stages of the war, to which the minister has alluded, but now an entirely different set of circumstances exists. The plan and the chart and the course of the war are known to the government. They have their organization in shape to handle the vast enterprises they are now conducting, and there is not the same reason why there should be any evidence of waste or extravagance in connection with the prosecution of Canada's national effort. Again I caution the government, and particularly the Minister of Finance and the other ministers charged with departments directly concerned with the prosecution of the war, that we shall accept nothing less than the fullest information, freely and willingly given in reply to the inquiries that we shall put from time to time in the committee stage. We are not desirous of continuing this general debate because we feel that the interests of Canada can best be protected and advanced by allowing the resolution to proceed into committee as soon as possible.

There is an additional reason why I think that at this time neither the house nor the country would wish that time be spent unnecessarily in a general discussion. This nation has been awaiting for some considerable time answers to certain questions which have been put more particularly to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). He is here in the house and ready, I understand, to go ahead with his estimates under the war appropriation. I think myself that we have already waited too long for the information he is about to give to the committee when we reach that stage. We are desirous of fulfilling our obligations as an opposition by giving the closest possible scrutiny to every dollar of expenditure which the government is making in the prosecution of the war. Our people do not mind raising the money by whatever means may be necessary, but there is at the same time a corresponding demand on the part of every taxpayer in Canada that we see to it that the money that is raised is properly and efficiently and economically spent, even in the hurry and haste of war. That is something that the taxpayer of Canada has the right to expect. That is something which we here, as members of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, will endeavour to accomplish by scrutiny, audit and investigation of the accounts.

In taking my seat I want it distinctly understood that I do so not for the purpose of hurrying this resolution into committee but rather because we feel that by facilitating the business of the house in this way we shall the sooner be able to deal with the indivdiual items, which after all are the most important part of the discussion which will follow.

May I before I sit down ask the Minister of Finance two questions. I would have done so while he was on his feet but I was intrigued particularly by the latter part of his address and I did not wish to interrupt him. I should like to know, and I think the country would like to know how much this government intends to appropriate for Mutual Aid during the coming year. I do not think the minister gave that although he came very close to it on one occasion.

I should also like to know the government's plans with respect to the procedure that will be followed in committee. Are we going to follow the same procedure as last year? So far there has been no agreement, as I understand it, among the different parties with respect to the procedure to be followed in discussing the war appropriation resolution this year. I think it is a proper inquiry for me to make in order that we may find out in what sequence the departments will be taken up when we get into committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, we are not yet in committee, and I do not want it to be understood that if the minister now replies to the questions just asked he will be closing the debate, because I do not wish to lose the privilege of saying a word or two.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I can answer the questions now, although we are not in committee. The amount of the Mutual Aid appropriation has not yet been agreed upon. If it were I could state the overall estimate for our total expenditures for the coming year, which I am not yet quite prepared to do. I know what I think the Mutual Aid will be but I do not wish to announce it until I am sure. All I can say is that it will be less than last year.

Mr. GRAYDON: Less than a billion dollars?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, less than a billion. My hon. friend's other question was as to the procedure this year. I propose that the procedure shall be exactly the same as last year, that the departments be taken up in rotation.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the same rotation?

Mr. ILSLEY: We will take the defence departments first. I do not know about the other departments. There might be some variation there; I have not given any thought to that. At present I can see no reason why they should not be taken up in the same rotation, except that, by agreement, some department might be taken up in advance of another that was expected to be taken up at a particular time. The intention is to follow the procedure of last year.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have all listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Whether or not we agree with his views on social and economic matters, we all respect him and realize that he gives close attention to the work of his department and carries his heavy task with a good deal of honour to himself and to this house.

The expenditure this year, he has said, will be smaller than that of last year, but it is still ten million dollars a day—a very large sum of money for Canada when stated in those terms. We of this party are agreed that whatever is required of us to win the war should be given without stint, and we are prepared to support the government in all that is necessary in order to carry on the great struggle against the forces which are threatening the freedom of the world.

I did not rise at this stage to discuss the resolution but rather to say a word about the procedure to be followed. The war appropriation is, after all, the biggest budget that this house has to consider during the course of the year—many times larger than the civil budget which we shall adopt later in the session. In looking over the records of the last few years I find that this main appropriation is passed in the form of a bill; the bill becomes an act, and it is unlike any other budgetary act because it has not attached to it the schedules of expenditures. This afternoon I sent for a copy of the new edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. At page 168, paragraph 439, dealing with a money resolution, it is stated:

> The object of the resolution recommended by the crown is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure. The details of the projected measure are not then disclosed and debate is confined to the resolution which should not be lengthy, although care must be taken that the terms used are sufficiently wide to cover the whole of the bill which will be subsequently introduced.
