Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to have that information; it clarifies a position which has given me a good deal of trouble. I thought the position was that once the soldier married the mother was out, and I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had the same impression. The minister now states definitely that if, in addition to the pay assigned to the wife, five days' pay is assigned to the mother, she still gets her dependents' allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, but not automatically, of course.

Mr. REID: I have a case I should like to bring to the attention of the minister, and I would say at once that there will always be exceptional cases no matter how well the act is framed. I think there is a principle involved in this case and, since a change must be brought about in the regulations, I believe this is the proper place to bring the matter to the attention of the minister. A man with a wife and one child assigned fifteen days' pay to his wife who was in receipt of dependents' allowance for herself and the child. Then the wife died and the child was placed in care of a home. Immediately the allowance for the child was cut off, and the reason given by the dependents' allowance board was that the pay assigned by the soldier more than covered the cost of keeping the child in the home. The soldier contended that he was as much entitled to dependents' allowance for his child as any other soldier was entitled to it, and that there was no reason for the dependents' allowance being reduced merely because he was continuing to assign pay to the home which was looking after the child. There may be many similar cases throughout the country, and I believe the point is well worth looking into.

Mr. RALSTON: If I understood my hon. friend correctly the situation was that there was a wife and child, the wife died and the child was then placed in a home?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The child would be in the same position as the soldier's mother, in that the fact and extent of dependency would have to be shown. In the particular case cited the assigned pay was sufficient to care for the child and provide for its support.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And nothing more was allowed.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the case of a soldier who is not married but who has a dependent mother, is it a condition precedent that he shall assign the full fifteen days' pay, or would five days' pay do in that case?

Mr. RALSTON: It would be fifteen days.

Mr. KNOWLES: Apparently the minister did not quite understand my reason for making reference to his two statements in Hansard. In the statement at page 613 I felt that the minister had laid down as the government's reason for the dependents' allowance the desire to relieve the anxiety of the soldier in the forces. I felt there was some inconsistency between that statement and the one appearing at page 619, because in the second case the minister tried to draw a line between the needs of wives and mothers.

Mr. RALSTON: No, not the needs.

Mr. KNOWLES: At least the minister pointed out that in practice the wife gets the allowance as of right, whatever may be her economic position, while the mother gets it only if dependency can be established and then to an amount not exceeding $25 per month, which can be reduced if she is making any other money, though this condition does not apply in the case of the wife.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): She is allowed to make $40.

Mr. KNOWLES: My point is that if the statement on page 613 is correct and it is the desire of the government to relieve the anxiety of the man in the forces, it should be realized that in thousands of these cases there is as much anxiety over the condition of the mother as there is over the condition of the wife, and I cannot see any reason for making the difference ironclad. I might agree to one difference being allowed, namely that the wife should get the maximum amount as of right while the mother's allowance should be up to a maximum, but at least it seems to me that the maximum should be the same in both cases. Again, I do not see why the mother should not have the privilege of earning other income, even beyond the $40 to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury refers, the same as the wife may.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe my hon. friend is mixing up two things. The relief from anxiety, or some similar term, was the principle laid down in the passage I read from article 98 of the dependents' allowance regulations, but relief from anxiety does not depend on whether the amount is $25 or $35. Relief from anxiety depends on whether the need is relieved; and if the need is relieved by $25 there is relief from anxiety. If the need is not relieved, then the dependents' board of trustees comes in, in any special case of emergency and hardship, and makes a supplementary grant The theory of the assistance to the wife is, I grant, on a little more generous scale; but in each case the board has sought to establish, and they believe have established, a reasonable ceiling for the purpose of seeing to it that anxiety is relieved.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has left the chamber; I wanted to have a word with him about the case he mentioned. But let us say a mother is earning $40. This, with the $25 of dependents' allowance makes $65. In addition, there is an assignment of pay of possibly as much as another $23, giving a total of $88. My hon. friend can see that that is a fairly respectable situation. On the other hand if the mother had no outside income and was not able to do anything it is possible that the anxiety would not be relieved, and in such circumstances the dependents' board of trustees might have to consider any emergency needs specially. The anxiety is not relieved simply by fixing a dollar sign. Each case must be considered on its merits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In respect of the wife there is the question of marital relationship, which cannot be ignored.

Mr. RALSTON: That is so, and that is different from the relationship of the mother.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to present certain facts respecting the treatment of soldiers who have returned from the old country, and particularly those who participated at Dieppe. Am I in order?

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member's question deal with pay and allowances?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am asking if I have the right to ask my question. I shall be only a moment or two. I shall not give the names of the men or of the detention barracks they are in.

I fear a certain condition surrounds soldiers who have returned from Dieppe, which may not have been handled in the best possible way—and I am not blaming anyone. These men who were on the Dieppe beaches, as was the one I have in mind, and were wounded—the one in point was wounded in three places—may not be as easy to get along with as would be the trainee troops.

Mr. RALSTON: And the hon. member would not blame them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, I have been thinking that when they return to Canada they should be put with other men who have served in active warfare. The case I have in mind is that of a young man who, upon returning from overseas was sent to a barracks. Having been there only a few days he found he could not stick it any longer. Apparently his nerves were wrought up, with the result that he went away A.W.L. That young man came to see me, and I said to him, "Why are you here in uniform?" He said, "I am away without leave." Then I said to him, "My dear boy, I think you ought to go right back to barracks and report." He replied, "I am now away four days." I pointed out to him that that did not make any difference, that he could not take the law into his own hands, and urged that he report back to his superior officer. The young man did go back, and he was put into the clink for four days. When he got out his nerves again got the better of him, and he went away for a period of sixty-five days, returning to his home in Toronto. Apparently no effort was made to find him. After he had been away those sixty-five days he went back to barracks, and told me that when he returned to barracks his name was written off the rolls. I had suggested to him that he go back and tell his full story. This time he was put into the clink for twenty-eight days.

After that detention—and I shall not say whether it was inflicted rightly or wrongly; I do not know, and I have no fault to find—he went away again, and stayed away without leave for a further number of days. Upon his return he was put into the clink for another twenty-eight days. Upon his release he went away again. When I was home I went to see him in barracks, because he had written me a letter. I said to him, "You should not do this. When you get out you ought to act fairly with the officials." "Well," he said, "I cannot stick it; my nerves are so shot that I cannot do otherwise." Then he showed me wounds on his hands, another on the side of his head, and he told me that he had suffered a third, and pointed out that he could not stand it. I told him I was going to report his case to the officials, and that has been done.

I have mentioned the matter because I have felt that there might be other cases of a similar kind. I do not wish to give this man's name or barracks, but I should like the minister to look into the matter as presented in my letter and see what can be done when he comes out again on or about March 4 after a total of 128 days' detention. I am only a layman, but I was convinced that his nerves were in bad condition. I have no fault to find with the treatment he has received from the officials. But if this is a condition which applies to other soldiers returning from actual warfare, they should be placed in separate camps and ought not to be in close association with the young men who are coming in, particularly in view of the fact that they do not seem to get along well when they are placed together.

Mr. RALSTON: I am advised by the official sitting in front of me that the hon. member's letter has been received. I believe as a matter of fact this case has already been referred to the medical authorities. My hon. friend is quite right when he points out that this does not seem like the actions of a normal man. I must add that I am greatly surprised that steps were not taken earlier to have an examination made. I can only assume that steps were taken, and that it was felt that this boy was incorrigible—although my hon. friend's description would not lead me to that conclusion. I shall certainly have the case investigated, from a point of view altogether removed from that of disciplinary treatment.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does not look normal to me.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: May I return to the matter of mothers' allowances, and ask two questions of the minister? First, do I understand if the $25 allowance is not sufficient to cover a mother's needs, in the event of her having smaller children dependent upon her, there is a provision under which more than $25 can be paid? My second question is this: Will the minister undertake to reconsider the ceiling price placed upon earnings? This is working an unfairness. The effect is that no mother can take a full-time job, paying $10 a week or more, without losing part of the $25 allowance. There are no full-time jobs for women to-day for which less than $10 a week is offered, although in depression days one might have found that condition. The result is that if a mother works at all she must forfeit a part of her $25 allowance. She will see others who work only two or three days a week but who receive the full $25. On the other hand if she works five days a week she must forfeit a part of the allowance. Surely that is unfair. Will the minister consider raising the ceiling on earnings to the point where a mother can work five or six days, if she chooses, and still receive the $25?

Mr. RALSTON: I believe it is the other principle with which my hon. friend is quarrelling, the principle of need.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That will take care of it.

Mr. RALSTON: If the mother is earning money and wants to work five days a week—God bless her if she does—and if the principle is based upon need, then the basic condition for dependents' allowance in respect of mothers does not arise—or, at least, it is reduced to the extent that she is earning from other sources. The anxiety of the son is not there, because he knows his mother is being provided for. He knows, in other words, that she is looking after herself, and that the country is making up the difference, to the total of $65, plus assigned pay.

My hon. friend asks me to reconsider this matter. He makes his request of one who is most sympathetic to the mothers of these men. All I can say to him, however, as I have said to the committee before—and it does not mean anything more than I am saying—is that the position of these mothers is always under consideration. When I say it does not mean more than what I am saying, I mean just that; if there are cases or situations which really justify intervention, then we endeavour to intervene.

I should like the committee, if it will, to remember that what we are endeavouring to do is to take the place of the sons with regard to mothers' earnings. The hon. member for Weyburn referred to a mother, a daughter and a son on the farm, and pointed out that the son had been contributing to his mother's support for many years. I was going to ask him, not to give me the name in question, but to tell me how much a month the son had contributed through the years, and how much the mother was getting for teaching in the school instead of doing the work she did on the farm. It looked to me as if she must have been getting $25 a month dependents' allowance and at least $40 a month additional from the school. In fact I take it she was getting more than that, because my hon. friend said that she could not get any dependent's allowance at all, having taken a position at the school. She must have been getting at least $65 at the school, and then she was getting her son's assigned pay, whatever that was. I wondered if she was not better off financially under the circumstances than she had been, having regard to the amounts which the boy had been contributing when they were on the farm. We must remember that the country is taking the place of the boy so far as supporting the mother is concerned, but only up to limits which are considered reasonable. However, the dependents' board of trustees is able in meritorious cases to step in and to provide a supplementary grant to that given by the dependents' allowance board.

Mr. BENCE: I believe I have a still more to the point case than any suggested so far. A man is receiving an old age pension of $25 a month, and his son assigns so much pay to the mother. Both the father and mother are totally incapacitated and are unable to earn any money. Their only income is their old age pension and the assigned pay. The mother is entitled to have an income up to $40 a month, but because her husband is receiving an old age pension he cannot receive a dependent's allowance. There is conflict between the old age pension authorities and the dependents' allowance board. The old age pension regulations provide that if a man has an income, or if there is an income in the family, the old age pension is reduced proportionately. I ask the minister to take up this matter and see if some agreement cannot be reached between the dependents' allowance board and the old age pension authorities in the respective provinces in order that hardships such as this may be obviated. It is obvious that a case of the kind is outside the principles which govern the dependents' allowance regulations.

I should like to say a word or two about dependents' allowances generally, and to draw to the attention of the minister what I think are anomalies in connection with their application. The principles which govern the granting of dependents' allowances are set out in regulation 98, and it is stated that a dependent's allowance may not be claimed as a right. As the minister has put it, the reason for the granting of dependents' allowances is to relieve the anxiety of soldiers who have enlisted. There is another principle involved in connection with the relationship of a man and a woman to which I think the dependents' allowance board should pay more attention.

I refer to possible legal rights as between the two parties. It seems to me that more attention should be paid to the actual legal rights of a woman. Let me give one case as an example. A man deserted his wife, ran away with another woman and set up a separate establishment. They were living in northern Saskatchewan under circumstances where he did not have any property. It was impossible for his wife to obtain a court order under the provincial jurisdiction. This man had lived with the other woman for three or four years. His legal wife was guiltless, but when her husband enlisted she was unable to get a dependent's allowance. The other woman, of the type commonly described as a common-law wife—I do not recognize the term—was able to get a dependent's allowance. It is true that some adjustment was made under which the soldier assigned a certain amount of his pay to his legal wife, but she could not get a dependent's allowance or anything like what she would have been entitled to if the soldier had not gone away with the other woman.

There are other similar cases. A wife may have a husband who is continually badgering her, and things reach the stage where he no longer contributes to her support. She finally loses her temper and puts him out of the house. He goes away and joins the army. Despite the fact that she has legal rights and could obtain a court order for maintenance, the dependents' allowance board still will not recognize her claim. It seems to me that in considering these cases the dependents' allowance board should depend more upon what are the legal rights of the wife. Like all other hon. members I have had considerable experience with individual cases. I believe the practice is to send an investigator, generally a member of a federal government department, into the community. He makes an investigation and presents a report upon which the dependents' allowance board makes its decision. This practice seems to me to be unfair. Because of an investigation carried on by one man, a woman may be deprived of her legal rights. If a woman is able to obtain a court order against a man, then she should be entitled to a dependent's allowance, and the report of a man appointed by the board to look into her case should be disregarded. The judge sitting on the case is in a position to hear the evidence and determine the rights as between parties.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has given me three cases?

Mr. BENCE: Yes. Here is another one along the same line. A wife divorces her husband because he has committed some statutory offence which entitles her to a divorce. She is guiltless but just as soon as the decree nisi is granted the dependents' allowance board arbitrarily reduces her allowance, so that she is receiving less than she would be entitled to receive if she continued in her married state. This condition is brought about through no fault of her own. Her husband has been unfaithful, and the result is that she is left in a worse position than she was before. I suggest that that is an unfair position to put her in. A woman may not feel like going to court to obtain a divorce, because she knows that if she does, the amount she receives will be drastically reduced. The woman may be elderly and not able to earn anything; she may be depending entirely upon her legal rights in the civil courts, and yet the dependents' allowance board rules that she is entitled to considerably less than she would receive if she continued in her married state.

Could the minister give us some information as to the number of cases in which duplicate dependents' allowances have been paid?—that is, where a wife has been receiving more than one allowance because she is married to more than one man. There are one or two other points I should like to draw to the attention of the minister. I understand that this is a general item under which we can discuss matters which do not come specifically under other items.

The CHAIRMAN: No.

Mr. BENCE: Where in the agenda can I discuss general matters?

The CHAIRMAN: It could only be with the consent of the committee, because we had a general discussion under item No. 1.

Mr. BENCE: It was restricted to the particular item. I do not think there is a specific item covering prisoners of war but I wish to ask a question on that. It has come to my attention directly from men who are prisoners of war that they are concerned because, being prisoners of war, they are not entitled to obtain promotion as the years go by, while men who serve in Canada, by sticking to their job, are entitled practically automatically to promotion in the ordinary course of events. I have seen communications from prisoners of war with respect to this matter. I would not say that they feel bitter, but they are concerned because they are kept in statu quo as to rank, while the men who joined up at the same time with them and are back in Canada are receiving promotions by being made squadron leaders and wing commanders while the prisoner of war stays in his present rank. I realize that no such promotions are recognized by the German authorities, but so far as the Canadian authorities are concerned I think the minister should take into serious consideration whether prisoners of war should not automatically be raised in rank as the years go by, in the same manner as the men in all branches of the services who serve in this country.

I also have a question to ask with respect to the men, and particularly officers, who are returning from overseas. I would ask the minister to give serious consideration to the possibility of placing in positions here in Ottawa these men who have been overseas for three, four or five years, and have been retired or returned on account of age or for other reasons. I do not think they should be necessarily discharged, but advantage should be taken of positions available in Ottawa to place some of these men who have served overseas for three, four or five years in posts which have been occupied by men serving in comparative comfort as compared with the men overseas.

Mr. RALSTON: Dealing first with the old age pension case raised by my hon. friend, I will look into that. I think he has stated the situation correctly, that the old age pension is taken into consideration as income.

Mr. BENCE: It is the other way round. If they took it into consideration as income, that would be only $240 a year, and the mother would be entitled to the dependents' allowance. But the position is this. If the mother is given a dependents' allowance, the provincial and dominion authorities in charge of old age pensions would reduce the old age pension. If it were the other way round, as the minister says, the matter would be simple. It would be only $240 or $300 a year, as the case might be. But the situation is just the reverse, and the mother cannot get anything extra at all.

Mr. RALSTON: Even at that I would not throw up my hands. It is the action of the provincial authorities administering the old age pensions which results in the situation whereby both the dependents' allowance and the old age pension are not receivable. But I will look into the matter and see if there is anything from the federal point of view that can properly be done and that ought to be done.

Mr. BENCE: In view of the fact that the federal government pays seventy-five per cent of the pension.

[Mr. Bence.]

Mr. RALSTON: But the provincial authorities administer it.

My hon. friend's next case was that in which a man had left his wife to live with another woman, and the wife could not get a separation. I presume she had not the money, or something of that sort. The common-law wife, so called, was receiving a dependents' allowance. I am told that the board have power in such cases to make a grant to the legal wife. But I would point out to the committee that it is pretty hard to blow both hot and cold in this matter. I do not suggest that my hon. friend is doing so. But we have one member saying that we should reply on the principle in the regulations to the effect that this soldier shall be relieved from anxiety while serving, which is really the reason why the country is paying the allowance. Apparently, however, this man was completely relieved from anxiety by leaving his wife and going and living with the other woman. His legal wife's situation is not worrying him in the slightest and his service is not affected at all by the fact that she happens to be in want. I do not know whether the country is called on to provide for the legal wife in this case, but the dependents' allowance board have power to do this in individual cases, under the proper circumstances. Has my hon. friend a particular case in mind?

Mr. BENCE: I have a case in mind, but I wish to deal with the principle, rather than with any particular case. The common-law wife has no rights at law to proceed against a soldier for support. She takes that risk when she goes to live with him. I suggest that we should pay more attention to the rights of the legal wife than we are doing.

Mr. RALSTON: That is contrary to the principle which was argued for the other night. It seems to me that to-day the discussion is getting into the right groove. The other night I listened to pleas on behalf of those who were absent without leave, on behalf of those who were in detention, and on behalf of common-law wives and illegitimate children. Now we are talking about mothers of soldiers and my hon. friend has put the case of the legal wife. While the fact that the woman is his legal wife does not disturb the soldier's sleep at all or interfere with his service, and while it is true that he has escaped a moral and legal responsibility, the country is being asked to help him—

Mr. BENCE: It is a position which has been determined all through the centuries.

Mr. RALSTON: But remember this, that the wife is not in any way worse off because her husband is a soldier. The man my hon. friend speaks of had run away with the other woman before he enlisted. If he were not a soldier she would be in exactly the same position.

Mr. BENCE: No. Because the man is a soldier she cannot proceed against him and get an order in the courts and collect, whereas if he were in a civil job she would be able to get an order against him. No money was available at the time the desertion took place. Now the man is a soldier, and the soldier is given protection by the law of the land against the wife's proceeding against him and having an order made against him which will procure some of the money the soldier is earning.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend is stating the principle rather too broadly. There are actions being brought all the time against soldiers for divorce.

Mr. BENCE: An order against a soldier's property cannot be enforced.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Mr. BENCE: Can you garnishee his wages?

Mr. RALSTON: It is not a matter of garnisheeing. It is a matter of getting a separation order. That brings me to the next case, where the wife left because conditions were such that she could not live with the man any longer, and she got a separation order of some kind. I am instructed that the board will pay attention to that separation order and will pay the amount the man is obligated to pay under that order, first, out of the assigned pay and the remainder out of dependents' allowance up to the maximum amount payable under the regulations.

Mr. BENCE: I may not have put the position as clearly as I intended to. In that particular case there was no court order. The wife was in a position where she would have to apply to the court for judicial separation which, as the minister knows, is a rather expensive piece of litigation. She was not in a position to do that. My suggestion is that the dependents' allowance board should take the position that until the husband has paid the minimum of the court's order the payment should be made notwithstanding.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend is putting a pretty heavy burden on the dependents' allowance board. That is really trying a case of marital relations between a husband and his wife.

Mr. BENCE: They do that, anyway.

Mr. RALSTON: They do on the question of whether husband and wife are living together, but apparently not on the question of whether the husband has deserted the wife or the wife has deserted the husband. On the question of paying the wife's dependents' allowance when the husband has deserted the wife, the situation as I understand it is, if a separation order is made the dependents' allowance board pays the amount which the man is obligated to pay. I am instructed further that there are, shall I say, escalator clauses which permit payment to be made in what are considered to be meritorious cases. I come back to this. I am assuming my hon. friend is right; that conditions are perfect in every way. The wife's position is no different from what it would be if the man were not a soldier. My hon. friend asked another question which had to do with duplication of the wife's allowance.

Mr. BENCE: There was another question before that, the question of a wife divorcing her husband.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought that was a case in which a separation order was obtained, or at least where an order for alimony was obtained—

Mr. BENCE: The point I made was that the dependents' allowance board put a ceiling on it which is considerably lower than what she would be entitled to if she were living with her husband.

Mr. RALSTON: The dependents' allowance board does not necessarily carry out the order to the full extent.

Mr. BENCE: They will not pay the full order of the court.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, they do not pay the amount which the husband is obligated to pay under the alimony order up to the amount of the dependents' allowance and assigned pay.

Mr. BENCE: I can produce correspondence with the dependents' allowance board which says that is not so.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall appreciate seeing that. These are the instructions. I shall be very glad to get the details of the case, if that is not so.

My hon. friend spoke of cases in which the wife's allowance has been duplicated. He asked for the number. I cannot tell him the number. I can tell him, however, that the total amount of overpayments, on all counts, is less than one-twelfth of one per cent of the amount of money paid.

My hon. friend raised the question of prisoners of war. I am very sympathetic to that, as a matter of fact. What is done in so far as prisoners of war is concerned is that acting ranks are confirmed. Up to date there has been no provision for promotion. I shall look into that matter further.

My hon. friend referred also to officers returning from overseas and retired on account of age. He asked that they be not discharged but be put in places of men here who could be sent overseas.

Mr. BENCE: That consideration be given to some of those officers, at any rate.

Mr. RALSTON: I say to my hon. friend that we act on that basis constantly. If my hon. friend has any cases in mind I invite him to bring them to my attention. I do not want him to go too far in my department, but I shall be very happy indeed to receive any suggestions in regard to any cases of that kind, where he thinks a man returned from overseas can handle a job that somebody else is doing. That is exactly what we are looking for all the time. I know some people are sceptical about it, but I believe the committee will believe me when I say that men doing national defence jobs are just as anxious to get overseas as the cases that have come to the attention of my hon. friend. We are not keeping them from going overseas. Every man who comes up for appointment has a limit on the time during which he can hold the appointment. I am talking, of course, of men of the age and category for going overseas. He goes overseas whenever the opportunity offers itself. We do give them a certain amount of training here, and we do keep them here for administrative work. That applies particularly to ordnance work.

Mr. BENCE: I was thinking of positions held by men who are in a category which would entitle them to go overseas. They are allowed to continue in their positions, and I think those positions should be held by men who come from overseas. They should be given the opportunity to fill some of those jobs.

Mr. RALSTON: I say to my hon. friend that every time I initial an appointment—I do not initial in all cases, particularly junior positions—both the military secretary and the adjutant-general who look at it first know that I look first to see whether or not the man is fit for overseas service. If he has not had overseas service I make inquiry as to why and raise immediate question as to why recommendation is made.

Mr. MAYBANK: I wish to express agreement to a certain extent with what I understand to be the principle enunciated by the last speaker. I believe it would be better for the dependents' allowance board to be given authority to pay attention to and be guided by the rights of the wife, as between her and the husband. I realize the overriding principle in connection with these cases is that of freeing the soldier's mind from worry; but in the great majority of cases there is no violence done to that by recognizing also the rights of the wife with respect to the soldier. I am not suggesting that the dependents' allowance board give no attention to that, but I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the fact, as I believe it to be, that there is a tendency on the part of the dependents' allowance board to get away from recognizing the wife's rights as much as possible. I do not mean that it is done all the time. It has seemed to me in the last year and a half that in dealing with questions where there was something in the way of a dispute between husband and wife the dependents' allowance board was moving with much greater reluctance than seemed to be the case before. Of course I speak only from my own experience. It may not be in accord with the experience of other hon. members. I have seen a sense of tightening up on the part of the dependents' allowance board. I wish to draw to the attention of the committee two or three cases which have passed in front of me. I do so only for the purpose of citing them as typical of several. I am not interested in taking up the time of the committee with any particular case; I refer to it only as a type in order to illustrate the more or less mild complaint that I am making at the moment.

Before I mention the cases I wish to protect myself against you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee thinking that I am very critical of the dependents' allowance board and that I have had a bad experience with them. That is an impression I would not wish to convey because the contrary is the fact. I find in general that the dependents' allowance board are excellent people to get along with. They are doing an extremely fine job, but I think it would be a good thing if some directive could be given to them by the minister in connection with one or two matters.

May I illustrate the difficulty by giving the following case? A man and his wife got into trouble, the one with the other. They separated and had a case in court. The man was not working. There was no possibility of making an order against him for maintenance for the wife. The only thing the court could do in the circumstances was to give an order of separation and to give the custody of the child of the marriage to the wife. That having been accomplished, the husband departed from the neighbourhood for some little time at any rate. Later on he was found to be in the army. Of course, the wife always had the right to apply for maintenance from this man, if, as and when she could catch up with him and he was in a position to maintain her. No order was given, for the simple reason that there was no use giving an order to get blood out of a stone. But when he is found in the army application is made for two things, the wife's maintenance and the child's maintenance. The dependents' allowance board follow the procedure whereby a soldier in such a case can be required to make an assignment. I think it is called D.A.B. form 14. This woman demonstrated the soundness of her position and the forms were filled in. This is many months ago. It was made perfectly clear by a certified order of the court that this was a proceeding between husband and wife, where they were both present and both represented by counsel. It was not a case where a wife sues her husband after he has enlisted and gets an order ex parte. They fought it out in court and she established her position. The custody of the child was granted her. She has the child and is supporting it.

The procedure that was adopted was to endeavour to get the man to make an assignment, but he said he would not make an assignment. Apparently no further pressure was put on him, on behalf of the wife or the child, to make an assignment, except this. He said, "I will make an assignment in favour of the child if you put that child in such-and-such an institution". There the dependents' allowance board stood still. They said, "He will make an assignment if the child is put in such-and-such an institution", and that is as far as the woman can get. No dependent's allowance is paid either for her or for the child.

The case with respect to the child is unarguable. They fought out the question where the child ought to be; they were both present in court, and the court decided where the child should be. But this lad takes the position that he will pay the allowance for the child, which he has admitted he ought to pay, only if they will do something different from what the court ordered on behalf of the woman. I am giving this as typical of some others, and I suggest that such a case requires some direction either from the minister in charge or from some other person on the government benches. I am quite sure of the facts. I am not stating anything hearsay; what I have said is absolutely correct. There is not the slightest variation from what is factual.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand the situation, an application was made for allowance for the wife and child. The board said, "You must have an assignment of pay in order to found that application". The man said, "I am not going to make any assignment of pay". Finally he said, "I will make an assignment conditional on one thing, namely, that the child shall be put in a certain institution or school". The board did not treat that as an assignment. The wife does not accept that condition, I suppose, while the board on the other hand refuses to order a compulsory assignment. Is that the condition?

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes, but there is one important step left out in the minister's repetition of what I stated or intended to state; I may have left something out myself unintentionally, though I do not think I did. The board made it clear that the power resided either in them or in some other arm of the service, through which they would work, to force an assignment from the man, and it was that action of the government agency upon which the woman relied. She relied upon the assistance which the board could give her, and indeed it was the board that pointed out that it would be done. I was told that. But they did not follow it through. That is one very important point that the minister did not state.

Mr. RALSTON: I stated it the other way, that, the woman having refused to consent to the conditional assignment which he had agreed to give, the board refused to make an order for an unconditional assignment.

Mr. MAYBANK: I am not quite sure that we are at one yet. The steps are these. There is an application to the board, showing the board that she is resting under the benefit of a certain court order; the board make it quite clear that they have power to force an assignment and will undertake to do so, and they get in touch with the officer commanding with a view to doing that. But when the soldier makes answer to the king's officers that he will make an assignment on such-and-such a condition, the board say in effect—they do not put it down this way in black and white, but they say it by inference: "If you will place that child in the institution we will see that you get the allowance for it". I have not pressed the case with regard to the wife's own allowance because there is a little more argument there, and I do not want to press anything that is not open and shut; but with respect to the child, there can be no argument that a man is required to support his own child. Probably we are completely at one now.

Mr. RALSTON: Did the husband give any reason for imposing the condition?

Mr. MAYBANK: No reason whatever, though I may say that the dependents' allowance board did for its own purposes effect a very careful investigation into the life of the young woman. There was a real examination of that sort, something which I am sure every person will agree was quite the proper thing to do, and the result of that examination was entirely to the credit of that young woman. I think that is what the minister had in mind. No problem of that sort arises at all.

Another sort of difficulty I have come across from time to time involves also a domestic problem. A soldier marries a woman who already has one or two children by a former husband, or at any rate she has them whether by a former husband or not. It is perfectly clear that under provincial law that man marrying that woman with those children is responsible for the children of his wife just as he is responsible for the childen of himself and his wife. I find this curious development now, that although the soldier is admittedly liable for the upkeep of these children and is perfectly agreeable to maintaining them—whether he is agreeable or not he is liable at any rate —the board are now saying, "We won't give you dependents' allowance for the children of your wife unless you go through the procedure of adoption". Very often, and I think probably in the great majority of cases, the husband is quite agreeable to adopting the children, though I can conceive many instances in which the mother might not desire to have that done. But it does not make any difference whether or not one is agreeable; there is no reason why the dependents' allowance board should say, "We know you are liable for the maintenance of these children, but we will not grant any allowance for them unless you go through the courts in your province and become the foster father". That was not the situation formerly. I know of instances where it was suggested that the man should become the foster father—this was some three or four years ago—but he was told that he did not have to go through that procedure in order to have this allowance paid. I have come across two or three cases of that kind. Knowing what the practice was in the past, therefore I was greatly surprised recently to find that the board would not give these allowances unless the procedure I have mentioned was gone through, and I submit there is no reason why that should be the situation. I believe a directive should be given to the dependents' allowance board that in cases such as I have mentioned the allowance should be paid, so that the matter may be settled on proper legal grounds. There is no use in having one law with respect to liability while we follow a completely different course.

[Mr. Ralston.]

There are other typical cases which I wanted to bring to the attention of the committee. I cannot do so at present because in a very short time I must get away to attend a committee meeting, but I should like the opportunity of presenting further cases a little later on.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend has to leave I should like, before he goes, to say a word or two with respect to each of the cases he has mentioned, and I understand what he has said, namely, that he regards them as type cases. I am not so sure that the first would be a type case; I should not think that type of case would occur very often. I think my hon. friend is right in connection with the second case; there is a principle involved in connection with the requirement that the child should be adopted.

With regard to the first case, I should like to examine into it. I am sure my hon. friend knows far more about the circumstances than I do, and I am sure he has stated all the salient facts that he thinks are necessary; but as I see it from the statement he has made there must be some reason why the dependents' allowance board did not exercise what is, after all, a discretion; that is to say, why they did not decide what allowance should be granted and the number of days' pay per month which should be deemed to be compulsorily assigned for the benefit of the dependent. That can be done under article 100 of the regulations, and I shall have to find out from the board why they did what they did, and ascertain whether or not there is need for any change in the regulations. I wish to say that I have never yet given a directive to the dependents' allowance board. I think it is a wrong thing to do, because it seems to me that if the board has a discretion it should be allowed to exercise that discretion, while on the other hand if you intend to make a provision mandatory you should do so.

Mr. MAYBANK: Will the minister permit me to say that I am not suggesting at all that there should be a directive in a particular case; I should like to make that perfectly clear. Sometimes, however, we get type cases, which may indicate the need for some change in the law or the regulations, and that was what I had in mind. I was not advocating any interference with the board.

Mr. RALSTON: I realize that. It seems to me, since we all have to read these regulations, that it would produce a serious situation if hon. members or others interested in dependents' allowance came to read the regulations and were not aware that some directive had been issued which was really interpretive of the regulations and which to some extent at least substituted the minister's discretion for the discretion conferred upon the board. I would rather see a regulation made mandatory if it is a case where mandatory action is required. I think the same thing applies to the second case referred to by my hon. friend. In that connection I should like to read, for the benefit of the committee, article 97 (e) of the dependents' allowance regulations. It will be remembered that my hon. friend said this soldier married a woman who had two children and the soldier thereby became legally responsible for the maintenance of those children.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the law in all the provinces?

Mr. RALSTON: That would depend entirely upon provincial law; in some provinces it might be so and in others it might not. In section 97 (e) the regulations provide that the definition of the word "dependent"— —shall, at the discretion of the board, include a child, even though not legally adopted, providing a married applicant has assumed in his own home the care and maintenance of said child for a reasonable period prior to his appointment or enlistment, during which period he has continuously wholly maintained such child and was so maintaining such child at the date of his appointment or enlistment, and continues to do so after his appointment or enlistment.

The important words in that provision are "at the discretion of the board". Apparently the board exercised its discretion and decided not to grant the dependents' allowance in this particular case unless the man legally adopted the children. I do not know why that was done. That was why I said I agreed with my hon. friend that this was a type case. It may be that in this case there should not be discretionary but mandatory provisions; I shall have to inquire into the matter before I can give any opinion that would be worth anything.

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not wish to bring particular cases to the attention of the minister, but I think it will be helpful if the minister can clarify matters of policy in one or two instances. At the outset I want to say that I could bring many cases before this committee; I have had many cases before the dependents' allowance board, and it has been my experience that if all the details are laid before the board they try to interpret the regulations as fairly as possible. I know they have been very lenient in many matters I have brought to their attention, and have done their best to straighten them out satisfactorily.

I have in mind a matter of policy in connection with the power of the regional board of trustees with respect to mothers of soldiers overseas. As I understand it, these regional boards have power to deal with such cases, and I should like to inquire whether there is any limit or ceiling upon what may be done for a mother. The second point I wanted to bring up is in connection with soldiers' wives. In the beginning of the war soldiers' wives who were receiving dependents' allowances for themselves and their children were restricted in the amount they might earn. Later on I believe the regulations were changed, but in the beginning a soldier's wife could not earn more than a certain amount of money.

Mr. RALSTON: I am advised that this limitation applied only where the money was received from some public authority, but that the wife could earn any amount while employed in a private capacity.

Mr. LOCKHART: There was some conflict of opinion in the case I have in mind, but I think the point is pretty well established now.

Mr. RALSTON: I was sure my hon. friend would want me to correct him on that point, because what I have said constitutes a serious limitation on the statement he made.

Mr. LOCKHART: I assume that at present, if a soldier's wife has special training, and some service to which she may apply herself, particularly in connection with the war effort, there would be no limit to her earnings, and she would still receive the whole of her dependents' allowance. Would the minister explain why the policy of his department is not to allow the same latitude to the mother? I should like to have that cleared up definitely.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand there is a limitation on the wife's earnings to the extent that if she is earning more than $3,000 in the civil service her separation allowance is affected.

Mr. LOCKHART: I understand that.

Mr. RALSTON: An amendment was made last year which permitted that extra earning. Outside of that, however, there is no limit at all. I have explained a number of times, and I can only repeat to my hon. friend that in the case of a mother, as distinguished from a wife, both in these regulations and under the Pension Act of 1917 the mother has been placed in a position different from that of the wife. The principle has been, as I tried to enunciate a short while ago, that in respect of the mother we are simply trying to take the place of the son, with regard to support, whereas in respect of the wife the country pays the amount for which provision is made, regardless of whether or not the wife needs it.

Mr. LOCKHART: I understood that before. My understanding is that under no circumstance is that latitude given to the mother. I could cite certain extenuating circumstances, but there would be no necessity to detain the committee by such procedure. The fact is that the mother is definitely restricted, despite any circumstance which might obtain in any given case. It is a definite restriction.

Mr. RALSTON: That cannot be so. The circumstance to which my hon. friend has referred is the very circumstance which the dependents' board of trustees would take into consideration in deciding whether or not a mother is in need. To answer my hon. friend's question directly, one could say that if there was a case where a mother had no need, then there are no circumstances which would give her any amount.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is clear.

Mr. RALSTON: And by "need" I mean a need, having regard to the necessary comforts.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is another question which has not been answered, in connection with the regional board of trustees, dealing with mothers. I understand the board is allowed a certain latitude in those cases.

Mr. RALSTON: The regional committees, as I understand it, are given a limit for direct immediate grants which may be necessary in any emergent situation. They do not even have to refer it to the board itself.

Mr. HOMUTH: But there is a ceiling on it?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, there is a ceiling for the regional committees, but in the case of grants by the dependents' board of trustees there is no ceiling.

Mr. LOCKHART: What is the ceiling in the other instance?

Mr. RALSTON: It is $35, without reference to the board.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to discuss this matter respecting the position in which the mother who seeks employment is placed. I do not think it is possible to lay down any hard and fast regulations with regard to these allowances. There are many different cases which can crop up, each of which may have different angles. To my mind, before there can be complete satisfaction the dependents' allowance board will have to be given administrative latitude where extenuating circumstances are shown. If the discussion has shown anything surely it has thus far shown that.

I believe the mother who has some earnings is definitely discriminated against. The minister makes the statement that the allowance is established on the basis of replacing whatever earnings a son may have had, or what he may, prior to enlistment, have contributed toward the support of his mother. That is not a fair premises from which to work, because prior to enlistment employment conditions were such in this country that the great majority of these young men, on account of lack of employment, were not contributing anything.

In my opinion the proper light in which to view the situation would be that of present employment possibilities. We would decide what a boy would be contributing, where the mother now seeks to augment her income. Many of these mothers are placed in the position where they must maintain homes. I have in mind a case where the father is incapacitated and has no earnings. There are two or three small children, and the only income the mother has is the $25, and the allowance granted by the board by virtue of assigned pay. At the outside it does not exceed $50 a month. In order to support the home the mother is obliged to take work.

One case I have in mind is that of a mother who works as a waitress at one of the local airports, and receives approximately $80 a month. Prior to enlistment the son was employed, and was maintaining the home. Her allowance is cut off on the ground that she is earning more than the ceiling permits.

Mr. RALSTON: No, not what the ceiling permits; with respect, I suggest my hon. friend is putting that incorrectly.

Mr. GILLIS: If she earns more than a certain amount a month—$40, I believe it is—no allowance is indicated.

Mr. RALSTON: No. If she is earning over $40, the amount by which her earnings exceed the $40 is deducted from the dependents' allowance. But that does not affect the assigned pay.

Mr. GILLIS: She is permitted to have an income of $65 a month.

Mr. RALSTON: Plus assigned pay.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the decision which was made in the case I have in mind.

Mr. RALSTON: I am instructed that if the facts are just as the hon. member has set them out, the decision was not correct. This is what we find in section 102 (c):

> 102. No allowance shall be granted . . .
> (c) To a person, other than those entitled to receive allowances under paragraphs (a) and (b) of article 101, who has income (from any source other than pay assigned by sons who are serving in the naval, military or air forces of Canada) greater than $65, but if the person has income less than $65, any allowance awarded together with such income shall not exceed $65.

That is apart from the assigned pay.

Mr. GILLIS: The case I have in mind was on the ground that she was exceeding the amount permissible under the regulation.

Mr. RALSTON: Was the dependents' allowance cut off entirely?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. I do not think, in view of the many ramifications connected with allowances, that we should have hard and fast regulations. Every case cited in the house has had merit, and in order to have any kind of satisfaction it is my view that the board will have to have more administrative latitude. It is not possible to draft hard and fast regulations. In this particular case where a home is being maintained I do not think the earnings of the mother should be restricted by the regulations. I realize that a blanket order cannot be made that the government will pay sufficient to maintain a home regardless of the income of the family, but where circumstances exist such as those I have described I think the board should be given some latitude.

Another matter to which I should like to refer has to do with those cases where soldiers get into difficulties overseas. Under the regulations the allowance is paid for six months, and if a man gets into trouble with the military authorities he may be restored to his former status later on. I am referring particularly to the soldier in England who may have some difficulty with the civil authorities and receive a prison sentence of from eighteen months to two years.

In the case I have in mind the sentence was eighteen months. In this case the wife was notified that her allowance would be cut off at the end of six months, which would leave her without any allowance for a period of twelve months. I understand that a man such as this is automatically discharged from the service. That is not a nice prospect for a wife to face who has a family to take care of in Canada. She is to be put on her own resources after a certain period. If that man were in Canada there are ways and means of taking care of the woman and helping her out with her family obligations, but because the soldier is in England she is cut adrift without any assistance after the six months period. I do not think the wife and family in Canada should be forced to pay for any trouble the husband may get into in England. We have some responsibility for that family. I am not going to suggest what it should be—I have my own opinion—but I leave this with the minister, so that he may take it up with his officials and see if some relief cannot be given to families who find themselves in circumstances such as I have described.

The next matter I should like to deal with has to do with trades pay. I understand that the regulations are not working as satisfactorily as we would like to have them work. Some of us who went through the last turmoil will remember that for twenty years we carried on a fight for tunnelers in particular in connection with trades pay. I have received several letters from men who were overseas and who claim that they have worked at occupations which entitled them to trades pay. They have returned to this country and have been discharged from the service, but up to date they have not received the trades pay which was promised them at the time. The same complaint is made by men serving in Canada. They say they have taken the necessary trades tests but that trades pay has not been paid as yet. I realize that this matter is pretty much in the hands of the commanding officer and that certain recommendations must be made by him, but there would appear to be considerable laxity.

I should like to cite another case of a soldier with foster parents. I have taken this case up with the department. This boy was taken by foster parents when he was six months old and raised to the age of twenty-two or twenty-three years. Apparently no legal adoption papers were taken out. The boy has made a good record in the service and has been promoted to a fairly high position. He made application for a dependents' allowance for the parents who gave him the opportunity to grow up and serve his country, but the claim has been disallowed because no adoption papers were taken out. There should be no doubt about a case of this kind. The parents who have raised such a boy should be entitled to the same consideration that is given to a mother under similar circumstances.

Mr. RALSTON: Was the boy supporting the foster parents?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. The department rendered a decision against this case.

Another matter to which I should like to refer concerns the notification sent to the next-of-kin when a soldier is killed overseas. In many cases insurance has been carried by the soldier, and his widow or mother make application to the insurance company. I know of cases where the next-of-kin have had to wrangle for months with the insurance company before the insurance was paid. It was claimed that there was no official notification of death from the Department of National Defence. The insurance companies do not accept a telegram as official notification; they say they must have an official death certificate from the department. I took up one or two cases of this kind and they were attended to, but the department should send out some form which would be acceptable to the insurance companies.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member began his remarks by saying that there were so many different kinds of cases and such diverse sets of circumstances that it was impossible—I think he rather indicated that—to have hard and fast regulations to govern such cases. We do have to have regulations. We do have to have some principles laid down and some rules to guide the dependents' allowance board. The hon. member said that there should be some administrative latitude where there were extenuating circumstances. I have read some sections to-day which I think indicate pretty clearly that there is administrative latitude and in great degree. In extenuating circumstances the board has the discretion to give special consideration. In order further to extend those principles of equity we have established the dependents' board of trustees. This is another body which also has wide discretion in connection with cases considered to be meritorious. I should like to refer the committee to two sections in the dependents' allowance regulations which indicate the extent to which the board has discretion to exercise the administrative latitude to which my hon. friend refers. I refer first to proviso (vii) of article 101 on page 15 of the pamphlet, "Assigned Pay and Dependents' Allowance Regulations," which states:

> In dealing with applications for allowances for "other dependents relatives", described in clauses (i), (ii), (iii) and (vi) of subparagraph (c) of this article . . .

Those clauses provide that "other dependent relatives" shall mean: (i) widowed mother or widowed foster mother; (ii) mother or foster mother whose husband has deserted her; (iii) mother or foster mother whose husband is alive but totally incapacitated; clauses (iv) and (v) refer to mother or foster mother having two, or three or more sons in the forces, and (vi) applies to father or foster father whose wife is dead. Proviso (vii) then continues:

> . . . an allowance may be granted to such dependent relative provided that, in the opinion of the board, such relative is in a dependent condition and that the applicant has contributed wholly or to a substantial extent to the maintenance of such relative during a reasonable period of time immediately preceding enlistment; provided further that, even where the applicant has not actually so contributed, the board may in its discretion make a special allowance (not in any case exceeding the maximum amount specified in subparagraph (c) of this article) in a case where, in the opinion of the board, the applicant would have so contributed but was prevented from doing so by circumstances beyond his control.

That is a fairly wide section to allow the board to take in dependents who are not included in the regular provisions of the act.

Let me refer now to article 119 of the regulations, which is even wider in scope and can be regarded as a superstructure built on all the regulations. It says:

> Notwithstanding any provision of these regulations, whenever the board is of the opinion that a state of dependency exists—

A "state of dependency" does not mean only full dependency but also includes partial dependency:

> —and that the granting of an allowance is in the public interest, but the board lacks authority to make an award, it may make a recommendation to the treasury board, and if that body concurs, the matter shall be decided by the governor in council, but no such grant by the governor in council shall be construed as broadening the terms of these regulations.

That is another article in the regulations, and in addition there is the dependents' board of trustees. So that I find it difficult to see how we can widen the terms of the regulations themselves and at the same time keep any principles on which all of us can work, least of all the board, if we go farther than the regulations which already confer so much discretionary power.

My hon. friend referred to one other matter, the question of mothers. I wish to make myself clear on this because my hon. friend took something that I said as indicating that the country would provide only the amount which the son had been contributing at the time he was supporting the parent. He said that I had said it was only a replacement of the son's contribution that the country was paying. I did not intend to convey that impression. It is not any replacement of the son's contribution so far as the amount goes. But the country does say, even if the son was not contributing at all to the parent's support, the question of an allowance may be given consideration. I want to point out that all that is required in order to qualify a widowed mother to receive a contribution from the board is to show that the officer or soldier was her sole or partial support. Even if he contributed only partially—I do not mean one dollar a month or something like that—the board may pay an allowance and need not limit its contribution, as I understand it, to the actual number of dollars which the mother lost by reason of the soldier going into the army. The board can say: We will pay in case of need up to $25 a month to the mother notwithstanding the fact that the son may have contributed only five or ten dollars a month. I mention the point so that the committee will not get the idea that the allowance is just a meticulous replacement of the son's contribution and that nothing more can be provided. Whatever is granted must be within the limit set out in the regulations.

My hon. friend came back to the detention cases to which he referred the other night. I have every sympathy with the wife and with the children. I say to my hon. friend that he made a case the other night for this particular set of circumstances, but I do feel that he is not on very strong ground when we come to the matter of dependents' allowance. If the dependents' allowance is being paid in order that the man may be a good soldier, and the man is in detention and is not earning, then if the country pays the dependents' allowance for six months altogether, it seems to me that the country has contributed substantially toward the maintenance of the dependents and toward making whatever provision should be made for the wife and the children. My hon. friend was very careful in his suggestions. He did not say: I am suggesting a particular amount or a particular rule; but he did hope that the minister and his officials would take the matter into consideration to see if better provision could not be made than the provision which is here. I do want my hon. friend and the committee to bear in mind that we have to think of the good soldier too, as well as the soldier who is in detention for eighteen months and is going to be discharged afterwards. The good soldier stays on the job day in and day out; he does his training; he is ready to go overseas and get into the show; he makes his assigned pay, and he knows his wife receives dependents' allowance. It is not much of an inducement to keep him at his job to know that the other fellow who has deserved detention, who is absent without leave, or who has gone to gaol for eighteen months, is having dependents' allowance paid to his wife and children. One hon. member suggested the other night that in addition the country ought to pay the soldier's assigned pay which he would have assigned himself if he had stayed on the job, and that it should not be charged against him when he comes back to his regular duties. I suggest that is not quite a fair deal to the soldier who is trying to do his duty. I know it is tough on the wife and tough on the children, but at the same time a reasonable amount of consideration was shown them when six months provision was made. Nevertheless, as I said the other night, and I repeat, these matters are always open for consideration. This class of case, and the absent without leave case which was brought up by my hon. friend and by some other hon. member, I am looking into and will keep before me.

My hon. friend also mentioned trades pay. I will look into cases of that kind at any time and keep on examining them. If a man has not received trades pay to which he is entitled, I am the last to say that that should be denied to him. Quite the reverse. I will try to see that payment is made if entitlement is shown.

Lastly, with regard to the sombre case of the casualty and parents having to make proof of death, if there is anything in that respect that can be done to speed things up, I assure my hon. friend that it will be done. I am constantly impressing that on my officers, not only with respect to the formal proof of death for purposes of insurance claims but also that all information with regard to casualties should be given just as speedily and as carefully and as sympathetically as it can possibly be given.

Mr. QUELCH: On February 15, at page 533 of Hansard I drew the minister's attention to the practice of the old age pensions branch in refusing a man old age pension because the wife was receiving dependents' allowance and assigned pay, in spite of the fact that the wife was investing the full amount of the assigned pay in victory bonds in the name of the soldier. I thought that where the total amount of the assigned pay is being held in trust for the soldier upon his return it should not be taken into consideration in figuring out the wife's income. If the assigned pay were not taken into consideration then the amount of the dependents' allowance itself would not in any way affect the full payment of the old age pension. I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a letter that was written by the deputy minister of pensions to Mr. MacFarlane, director of old age pensions. The letter is dated January 20, and in part reads as follows:

> During the time the writer was chairman of the war veterans' allowance board we established the policy of exempting assigned pay where such was placed in trust for the return of the soldier or used to keep insurance in good standing or to meet taxes or payment on property owned by him. Where it is a veterans' allowance case and it was established to the satisfaction of the board that the moneys from the assigned pay were not being used for the maintenance of the parents of the soldier but kept in trust for the soldier himself, such sum would not be taken into consideration.

It does seem to me that the ruling of the war veterans' allowance board with regard to assigned pay invested in the name of the soldier is a good one. There is no reason why a similar attitude could not be adopted by the old age pensions branch. I would suggest to the minister that perhaps he, in collaboration with the Minister of Pensions and National Health, get in touch with the Minister of Finance to see whether or not this matter could be reconsidered. When I brought this matter to the attention of the minister on February 15, he stated that he would reply on the following day. It no doubt skipped his memory on the following day and I did not have a chance to bring it to his attention.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer. Would the minister clarify the situation with regard to the rights of men receiving their discharge at their own request? As I understand the situation, a soldier receiving discharge at his own request does not receive the rehabilitation grants, namely, one month's pay and clothing allowance. This matter was discussed the other day, but I am still not clear with regard to it. I have three different classes in mind: first, the soldier who is brought back to Canada because his health has deteriorated and who has received a discharge at his own request. I understand that in that case he is eligible for the rehabilitation grant. Second, there is the case of a soldier overseas who receives his discharge on compassionate grounds. As an example let us assume that the father dies and the mother asks that the soldier be brought back in order to run the farm. I understand that in that case the rehabilitation grant is not paid. I have had two or three cases along that line referred to me. The third class refers to the soldier who has not gone overseas but who has had two or three years' service in Canada, and who applies for his discharge on compassionate grounds for reasons similar to the one I just mentioned. Would the minister clarify these three cases?

I should like to mention again the question of reductions from the dependents' allowance of dependents in T.B. sanatoria. The minister said the other night that he would be taking up that matter. I am wondering if he has had an opportunity to get any information in that connection. I received three more letters this morning regarding these cases. I hope I can get a reply that consideration has been given to them.

Before I sit down I should like again to mention the question of dependents' allowances, particularly the question of the assigned pay of soldiers serving sentence. I believe in a case where a man is serving a sentence and where the government have the man's body they should be able to get enough work out of him to continue dependents' allowance. If the minister feels that that cannot be done, at least the dependents' allowance ought to be continued and deducted from the man's pay after he has completed his sentence. I think the government should be able to do that in view of the fact that they have full control of the man, rather than to see the wife and the children penalized and put in a position where they have no money. In any event, the government could very well continue the allowance and take it out of the pay of the man when he has completed his sentence.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend referred to the first point the other night. I confess to him and the committee that I have not had a chance to look into it. If I understand my hon. friend correctly—I did not understand him correctly the other night—he is asking that I take up with the war veterans' allowance board, the Department of Pensions and National Health and the Minister of Finance the question of old age pensions to endeavour to see if possible that the assigned pay can be set aside and used for the purpose of investing it in bonds instead of for the purpose of maintenance.

Mr. QUELCH: I realize this comes under the old age pensions branch, but I thought, if the minister could get in touch with the Minister of Pensions and they to get in touch with the Minister of Finance, they might be able to get the old age pensions branch to change their attitude.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall talk this case over with my colleagues; that is all I can say to my hon. friend. My hon. friend knows that so far as the dependents' allowance board is concerned it is required that the assigned pay shall be used for the maintenance of the dependents; otherwise, what the soldier does is to evade—I am not saying he does it culpably—the provisions which we have for deferred pay overseas. Overseas a man's pay is deferred if he does not assign pay; it is not deferred if he assigns pay. The effect is the same really. He gets the benefit of the money, but instead of deferring his pay he is having it come over here and it is invested in bonds, thereby building up a fund.

Mr. QUELCH: Under the Veterans' Land Act he is eligible, provided that he has saved enough money to pay down an amount equal to one-tenth. If he has to assign pay to his mother he will not be in a position to save any money and is thereby debarred from that privilege.

Mr. RALSTON: The point in assigning pay to his mother is that it is for the purpose of supplementing the dependents' allowance which also goes to her. I say to my hon. friend that I shall discuss the matter with my colleagues, the Minister of Pensions and National Health and the Minister of Finance. That is as far as I can go in connection with that case.

As one of my colleagues points out, if the soldier does not send his pay over here it is deferred over there. He has built up a fund and it could be used under the Land Settlement Act.

Mr. QUELCH: If he did not make an assignment no dependents' allowance would be paid.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the point.

The next case had to do with the rights of a soldier receiving rehabilitation grants under three categories. As I understand the rule, he does not get a rehabilitation grant when he is discharged at his own request. If the discharge is at his own request in any one of the three cases mentioned, then it seems to me that the rehabilitation grant under the present regulations would not be payable.

Mr. QUELCH: I have a letter here which cites the case of Jossul. This man had been overseas for three years. He was returned to Canada on account of his health. He asked for his discharge because he said he had nothing to do. He has now been paid one months' pay and the clothing allowance. That is the only case I know of in which it has been paid.

Mr. RALSTON: If it is a case of health, although there may have been a request, he may have been found ineligible anyway and therefore dischargeable and not properly in the service; that is to say, they do not regard that discharge as being at his own request. He would have to go out anyway. The other two cases refer to compassionate grounds, in which the request is, of course, an element. In these cases the rule I have spoken of would, under present regulations, preclude payment of a rehabilitation grant, but would not, as my hon. friend knows, preclude payment of the clothing allowance.

With regard to the sanatorium matter, I find I have given the dependents' allowance board a good deal to think about. The board had what they thought was a very easy way out of the situation, but I am not sure that it is really quite so easy, notwithstanding the fact that both they and I are anxious to meet the same objective. I wrote to the Hon. Mr. Cross, minister of health of Alberta, and told him I had taken the matter up with the board and was seeing it through as quickly as possible. My hon. friend cannot write any more than that to his correspondents. It may be only a little to be able to write; but, if I may say so with respect, he can send them Hansard to-night so that they will know that he has not been neglecting their interest and that I have taken account of the matter.

With regard to the detention case, I cannot add to what I have said to the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. QUELCH: Will the minister give further consideration to the payment of the rehabilitation grant to the man who is discharged at his own request? The man will not be discharged at his own request unless there is good reason for it. Any man who has served for three years is entitled to as much consideration as the man who enlisted one year before the end of the war and has seen only nine months' overseas service. Surely the man with three or four years' service is entitled to the grant. He would not ask for discharge unless there was good reason for his doing so.

Mr. RALSTON: I will certainly give the matter further consideration along with my colleagues. My hon. friend realizes, as has already been announced, that certain matters are now under discussion with regard to rehabilitation and it is impossible to make an announcement at the present time. However, the representations which have been made in this respect will be taken into consideration in formulating measures.

Mr. GREEN: There are two matters about which I should like to ask the minister some questions. The first has to do with the enactment of some measure similar to the Sparkman act in the United States, which is in effect an act to protect the civil rights of men in the forces. As the minister will remember, this subject was thoroughly discussed during the last session. It came up on May 26, 1943, and members from all parties in the house advocated that some such measure should be passed quickly. I understood the minister to say then that the question had been given consideration by a committee, that recommendations had been made and that he hoped to be in a position to take action shortly. For example, at one stage in his remarks he said:

> I can only assure the committee that every study will be made of the matter and that active consideration will be given to it.

That is almost a year ago and, so far as I know, no action has been taken. It does seem to me that the matter is of vital importance to the men and women in the forces. As hon. members know, the Sparkman act contains different provisions which protect the fighting men. For example, it protects life insurance contracts up to the sum of $10,000 against cancellation for non-payment of premium. It protects the man against foreclosure of mortgages and against cancellation of instalment contracts and also sets a ceiling on interest that may be charged on any loans made to the soldier. It also provides for suspension of action against him in respect of debts and gives certain protection in respect of leases. I think it may be summed up as providing that where a man's ability to perform a civil contract has been impaired by his enlistment the state shall step in and protect him, provided, of course, that there is no bad faith. In other words, if he is able to pay he does not receive protection. It was pointed out during the discussion last year that there is protection of a type given men in some of the provinces.

Mr. RALSTON: All now, I think.

Mr. GREEN: Do I understand the minister to say that there is provision of some sort in all the provinces?

Mr. RALSTON: I think so.

Mr. GREEN: But there is no standard protection, and I suggest that the dominion government should provide for at least standard protection. The Americans took this step in 1940 before they were in the war at all at a time when they were raising their forces, and yet, though we have been at war for over four years, we have not enacted any such measure. I would ask the minister to explain to the committee why it is that protection has not been forthcoming during the last year.

The other matter on which I should like to have an explanation has to do with the clothing allowance given men on discharge, and the rehabilitation grant. I propose to say something about these after the dinner recess. My question really mounts to this: Why are these two allowances not adequate?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GREEN: Just before the committee rose for the dinner recess I had asked the minister why the government has not yet enacted a measure for Canada similar to the Sparkman act of the United States, under which men and women in the forces are protected in respect of their civil obligations. Then I went on to ask my second question, which was why Canada is not giving an adequate clothing allowance and rehabilitation grant to the men and women of the forces upon their discharge.

As I understand it, the clothing allowance was $35 until about December 1 last, when it was increased to $65. Surely the allowance should be large enough to accomplish its purpose, which I understand is to enable a man who has been discharged to outfit himself with civilian clothes. I do not suppose any hon. member will contend that $65 is sufficient for that purpose. It is not sufficient even in the balmy part of the country from which I come, out on the Pacific coast, let alone being sufficient back here in these arctic wastes. I find it very hard to understand why these young men and women are not given a proper clothing allowance.

The rehabilitation grant consists of one month's pay, together with whatever allowances the man was receiving at the time of his discharge. That, too, is insufficient. We must remember that many of these men have been in the forces for more than four years, and they should be given a grant large enough to afford them a reasonable chance to become reestablished. I know it may be said that provision is made for the training of these young men and women, that they may take certain courses and, while taking those courses, receive certain allowances. I do not wish to quarrel at all with the training provisions; I think they will be very beneficial, but the allowances paid during the training period are also ridiculously small. It may be contended also that these men can get unemployment insurance for a certain time if they are unemployed, but I suggest to the minister that in the majority of cases our young men and women who are being and will be discharged from the forces merely want to get jobs, to get back to work. That will be the wish of the great majority, and I think they would ask for only a fair amount of help from the government. Probably they would believe that if they could get six months' pay, say, that would be fair. Perhaps not; they might want a greater amount. I see it was suggested by the national council of veterans' associations last December that the rehabilitation grant should be one month's pay and allowances for every six months of service, irrespective of the length of service.

The point I wish to make is that the grant should be such that these young men and women will feel that it is fair. Then their outlook will be friendly and cooperative. They are all good sports. If they received a fair grant, spent it as they saw fit and then, through any chance, failed to become reestablished, I do not think they would blame anyone but themselves. It is so important that these young men and women should believe and be convinced that they are being treated fairly, and I do not think that is the situation at the present time. Certainly many of them believe that these allowances are not fair; that the government is chiselling, and so on. Not only do many of the men who are being discharged believe that; their friends believe it also, and I must admit that I do.

The outlook of these young men and women is vital to the future welfare of this nation. They are the most important portion of the Canadian population at the present time and will continue to be such after the war is over. I say that because of the sacrifices they are making, because they are young and fit and keen and disciplined and trained, and because leaving the forces they do so feeling proud of Canada, feeling proud that they have worn the name "Canada" on their shoulders. I believe the great majority of them have that idealism about their country which comes from serving it and being willing to make sacrifices for it. I believe further that they are prepared to take their full part in the life of the nation, asking and needing first of all only a little understanding on the part of the remainder of the Canadian people, and second, a fair chance to become reestablished. In many cases the effect of the smallness of these allowances, and also the inadequacy of our present pension law—which unfortunately I cannot discuss under this item—is to shatter their vision of a new Canada.

That is a most unfortunate situation, and I suggest that the government and parliament must take the lead in remedying it. There is a great need right across Canada for an awakened and determined public opinion with regard to these young men and women. I am afraid that across the nation there is a great deal of indifference about what may happen to them, which reminds me of the indifference with which we all treated the young men who were picked up and sent to gaol during the depression days because they went around shaking tin cans, trying to get enough money to keep themselves alive. We did not like that; we felt that it offended our dignity a bit; but as a people, by and large, we did not rise in our wrath and say, "This thing has to stop. We are prepared to give up anything in order to see that these young men get enough to live on." We did not feel like that as a Canadian people, and I am afraid that as a Canadian people we are not feeling deeply enough now about seeing that these young men and women are properly resettled when they leave the forces. Everyone is busy; everyone is working; there is the excitement of war events every day; men who are being discharged now are able to get temporary war jobs, and therefore the people do not see why they should bother.

I am afraid that is the general tendency, and I think it is a tragedy; I think it is something about which parliament should take some steps, for in my opinion parliament should give the lead. We need in Canada now—right now, not after the war, though we shall need it then as well—a determination to see to it that these young men and women are resettled no matter what the cost, and that they are given an opportunity to take a prominent part in the life of the nation. We have many problems in Canada to-day, and we shall have far more after the war. They will become increasingly serious, and we need the help of these young men and women if we are to solve those problems. I believe our hopes for a better Canada are based almost entirely upon those young men and women who are now in our fighting forces.

And so I say, in summing up, that I do not consider these allowances or the present Canadian pension law fair to these young men and women. I believe that this committee, regardless of party lines, should insist upon fair treatment—in fact, upon generous treatment for these young folk, something that is more worthy of our country. If we will insist upon fair treatment I am convinced the people of Canada as a whole have only to be shown the need, and they will follow. They will make every necessary sacrifice in order to see that these young people get a proper start.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall not trouble the committee by going into details in respect of the matters to which the hon. member has referred. He has really used, as the basis of his remarks, two measures, one of which he has said is the Sparkman act which, if I may put it this way, is not a major measure of rehabilitation or relief for ex-service men.

The remaining feature to which he has referred has been the matter of the clothing allowance given to the men on discharge. I share with my hon. friend—and he knows it, and I think the committee knows it, too—a full appreciation of the seriousness and the importance of looking after the men and women of our fighting forces. I can assure him that I am determined—and this is more than words—that every effort which can be put forward by the department over which I have the honour to preside shall be put forward.

First, of course, comes the winning of the war, as has been pointed out time and again. Second, and along with that, is the endeavour to ensure that we bring down and put into effect such measures as will make, not only for the peace but for the happiness and security of the men and women who will have made victory possible. I say to my hon. friend when he asks for a lead in this regard—and I do not say it in any petty, party way, at all, nor do I suggest that he has done so—I agree that all of us have to be united in taking the lead in order to awaken this nation to the necessity for receiving these men and women some day, and helping to make Canada a country fit for heroes, both men and women, to live in.

I say to my hon. friend this, that we must put first things first. The first thing is to ensure that there is a post-war; that is to say, to ensure that there may be an end to the war, and to ensure that it is a successful conclusion. We are making every effort to make that just as sure as possible. When I made my short statement to the house I indicated the activities of the army in that respect, and I know my colleagues, the Minister of National Defence for Air, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, and other ministers who have to do with activities connected with the war will indicate what has been done in their departments to help to make victory certain.

But I wish to remind the committee and my hon. friend that the government has not stopped there. I have said, and I repeat that sometimes I am concerned with the thought that perhaps there is too much talk and thinking about post-war, about rehabilitation, and about all the things which will come after the war when peace has been secured. We hear that talk when we have not yet reached our goal. At the same time I realize that, as is their right, people are thinking about these matters, and are looking forward to a future which will be brighter than the conditions we find to-night. I realize, too, that the men and women in our forces have similar thoughts. They are not professional soldiers; they are clerks; they are men from the farms; they are men from the factories and men from every other civilian occupation. They are Canadians who have turned aside from their real jobs, that of making Canada a great and prosperous country, to the job of making Canada free and secure. Those young people have a right to expect us to think of their welfare, and to endeavour to make plans for their future.

The government is trying to do that, and it has tried to give the lead to which my hon. friend has referred. That is mentioned in the speech from the throne, although it is not discussed in detail. There are a number of things to be done post-war, in the larger sphere, to which I shall not take the time to refer this evening. It will be sufficient to mention them: the matter of export markets, the matter of world security and general prosperity.

After his excellency announced that "the winning of the war clearly remains the first of all objectives", we find these paragraphs in the speech from the throne:

> Post-war planning falls naturally into three broad fields: preparation for the demobilization, rehabilitation and reestablishment in civil life of the men and women in the armed forces—

I say to my hon. friend that the government is trying to give a lead in that respect. I thank him for his support, and I believe the people of Canada generally will support that objective in every possible way. Then the paragraph continues:

> —the reconversion of the economic life of the nation from a war-time to a peace-time basis, and its reconstruction in a manner which will provide opportunities for useful employment for all who are willing and able to work—

Let me say to my hon. friend here that I believe I am speaking the mind of the men and women of our forces when I say that they are not as much concerned with the actual amount of a rehabilitation grant as they are with the question as to whether they will be able to find useful employment in this Canada of ours, and where they will get it. The paragraph continues:

> —and the provision of insurance against major economic and social hazards.

Then, speaking particularly of the subject to which my hon. friend has referred, we find this paragraph:

> A broad programme has already been developed for the reestablishment of veterans of the present war, and for the care of disabled veterans and the dependents of our fighting men and merchant seamen. You will be asked to approve a measure to provide war service gratuities for all who have served in the armed forces, and also measures to supplement the existing rehabilitation programmes.

I refer to these matters because they cover the things to which the hon. member has referred. The matter of the Sparkman act, of which he has spoken, is one for the welfare of dependents. The matter of the clothing allowance given to men at the time of discharge is another matter of rehabilitation. The matter of one month's grant is still another rehabilitation matter. The objective is indicated by the programme I have read. It is indicated there that during this session the house "will be asked to approve a measure to provide war service gratuities for all who have served in the armed forces, and also measures to supplement the existing rehabilitation programme."

Mr. GRAYDON: Would that be in one bill?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend at the moment. I would say this, that all these matters are being considered and taken into account in connection with these rehabilitation measures. The hon. member will understand that the rehabilitation measures which have already been taken are those which have seemed necessary, as time has gone on. If I may say so, there has been a remarkable programme of various items under which men are given assistance in a vocational way in the matter of treatment, in the matter of out-of-work benefits, and in the matter of employment in some particular vocations, but not in all. It is felt that the time has come when that programme should be broadened and when there should be some further announcement and development toward the objective we are all seeking, namely, the assurance of assistance to get back to civil life when the time comes and that employment is provided for all those who are willing and able to work.

I say to my hon. friend that the matters to which he has referred will be studied. They have had and are having attention. I am not saying that they will be what he considers sufficient, but I think he will find, when the house is asked to approve the measures which will be brought down, that they will meet the objective which we all have in mind. not only to recognize but to give assurance to the men and women who are fighting the battles of Canada to-day.

With respect to the Sparkman act, may I say that its principal feature is a provision of moratoria or of some sort of arrangement by which men who have insurance premiums to pay may not lose altogether the benefits of their policies in case they are not able to meet the premiums at the time they come due. A complete study has been made of this whole matter. There is one rather remarkable fact about the lapses in policies which have occurred during the years of war. According to the information we have, these lapses have been less proportionately for the men in the service than they have for the civilian population.

Mr. GREEN: There should not be any lapses.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend will find that there has been very little request for this particular form of legislation. The situation when premiums are not paid is different in Canada from what it is in the United States. I understand that when a policy lapses in the United States they issue term insurance for the years or months which the cash surrender value of the policy would cover and that there is no provision for reinstatement. As my hon. friend knows, under our system the cash surrender value of a policy that lapses is devoted to the payment of premiums. So long as the cash surrender value lasts the policy is kept in good standing. Whether we should have had a Sparkman act or moratoria before is another matter. I have some opinion on that, but I think my hon. friend will find that the principle of the Sparkman act would be almost impossible of administration now. If policies have lapsed, they have lapsed, and there would seem to be almost insurmountable administrative difficulties in handling the situation in order to secure equitable treatment for holders of these lapsed policies, as well as equitable treatment for dependents.

I mention this to indicate to my hon. friend and the committee the serious doubt as to whether the principle of the Sparkman act would be workable in this country. As my hon. friend knows, the matter of moratoria is, strictly speaking, within provincial jurisdiction. He belongs to a party which claims to be fairly strong on provincial autonomy.

Mr. GREEN: I advocated a standard protection which the dominion would enact so that if the protection in any province did not come up to that standard, then the dominion provision would apply.

Mr. RALSTON: A provincial legislature having undertaken to enact a law along certain lines, the dominion walks into the province and enacts a law along different lines on the same subject. That is only one feature of it, but that is one feature which is different in this country from that in the United States. As everybody knows, their division of legislative jurisdiction is different from ours.

When the amount of the clothing allowance was fixed at $65, there were a number of items of clothing which would be retained by the soldier. I think one item is boots, and another is also underclothing.

Mr. GREEN: You could not go very far in civilian life in army boots.

Mr. RALSTON: I will undertake to say that when the boys come home they will wear army boots just as long as they can get them. I say that with some assurance. I know a good many civilians would like to have them. The returned soldiers are allowed to retain one pair of boots, their underclothing, their necessaries such as shaving kit, tooth-brush and other items in the hold-all, shirts, canvas shoes, socks and gloves. Whether the amount is enough will be considered in connection with the matter of rehabilitation.

The rehabilitation grant itself will be considered in connection with the measures to which I have referred and which are now under consideration by the government. I cannot announce the policy to-night, nor can I announce the details. I say to my hon. friend that a note will be taken of what he has suggested and the whole matter studied. The programme will be brought before the house in due time.

Mr. GREEN: Are we to take it that the government has decided that there is no need of a Sparkman act in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: No; distinctly no. I was indicating some of the difficulties there would be with regard to adopting the principle of the Sparkman act in Canada, and I questioned whether or not it would be as effectual as my hon. friend and I would like it to be.

Mr. GREEN: Would there be any objection to furnishing us with a summary showing the advantages and disadvantages of the Sparkman act as applied to Canada, showing why it might not be effective in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: That will be discussed when the measure is before the house. At that time my hon. friend will have an opportunity to present any objection or argument he has to offer. I do not think any advantage would be gained at the moment by launching on an argument as to the value of the Sparkman act, having regard to the fact that it would be only one of literally many factors in a rehabilitation programme.

Mr. GREEN: Is some legislation along that line to be brought down?

Mr. RALSTON: I can only say that when the legislation is brought down. I am unable to make any announcement as to policy.

Mr. FACTOR: There is one small problem I should like to submit for the consideration of the minister. A non-commissioned or commissioned officer holding an acting rank is discharged on medical or other valid grounds. The gratuity which he receives is based on his former rank. I submit that when a man is discharged under those circumstances, either he should be confirmed in his rank before discharge or the gratuity should be based on his acting rank. I know of an actual case where a man overseas was killed while holding an acting rank and the allowance paid to his dependents was based on his former rank. This may be a small problem, but it is proving irritating to both the service men and their dependents.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that at least in the case of other ranks, the acting rank is confirmed before the man is discharged.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to take exception to what the minister said about the clothing allowance. A pair of boots might be quite valuable to a farmer in the Fraser valley, but I should like to see a lawyer on St. James street wearing a pair of army boots after the war. I do not think the argument is consistent at all. I do not think anyone in Canada can buy a pair of shoes for less than $7.50 or a shirt for less than $2, and I think I am conservative in those figures. Surely a man coming out of the army who is going to compete in professional life as a doctor or a lawyer will need three shirts; that would be at least $6. You cannot get a suit under $35, and where can you buy a hat for less than $3.50 or an overcoat for less than $25? That makes $77. I have every deference for the minister and for the legislation in contemplation, but the only possible place where the rank and file coming out of the army have for their claims to be presented publicly before the department is here through private members. It is all very well to say that a man coming out of the army is to have a carry-all, a suit of underwear and so on. His wife, I suppose, will look after putting the buttons on if he has a carry-all. But a man coming out of the army has to be properly dressed to compete with his fellow citizens, and I do not think that can possibly be done on $65. It is all very well to say that legislation is in contemplation; it was under contemplation when the government allowed $35 per man. This is the only place, I repeat, where the rank and file, the soldiers of my riding who will be coming out of the army, have to bring this up. So much for clothes.

I think that both this house and the Dominion of Canada owe a debt of gratitude to a member of this house who brought to my attention and, I think, to the attention of ninety-five per cent of the members, that a soldier coming out of the army—and this applies to all three branches of the service—was not allowed to keep his uniform. It is very important to me that the soldier—and again I have reference to all three services—should be allowed to keep his uniform, and so far as I have any say in the matter these estimates are not going to be carried until the government gives a clear-cut decision in the matter. We have been at war for a few years now and I can see no earthly excuse for the Department of National Defence, in all three of its branches, still having under consideration whether the soldier is to be allowed to keep his uniform. Surely the government can give a decision in a matter of that kind. They do not need to bring in all their experts to advise them on details. It is a simple question requiring an answer yes or no. Is the soldier to be allowed to keep his uniform, and I mean all three services? I say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister that I intend to keep these estimates going until we have a decision in the matter. I do not think it involves any detailed information. Is it the treasury board that is to say whether a man can keep his uniform or not? I ask the minister, before he asks us to pass these estimates, to tell us whether a decision has been arrived at.

Mr. RALSTON: I can say to my hon. friend that he need not hold the committee up for one minute, for as a matter of fact the decision has been made that a man in the army, navy, or air force may keep one uniform. Let me tell my hon. friend, who is rather scornful of the difficulties and wants a simple yes or no, that I do not think he quite realizes all the difficulties that are involved. Does he realize that it means that a man who is out of the service and wears the uniform and gets into difficulties is likely to run foul of the provost? There may be a great deal of trouble regarding that very matter. But I am not disposed to cavil at all. We shall do the best we can. I like the idea of giving the man his uniform, not for the purpose of ordinary everyday wear, but because of the sentiment attached to it and for wearing on special occasions. As far as I am concerned, I think there should be some idea of having that rule observed, because otherwise you are going to have men going to work and doing some job which sometimes may not be a very pleasant one, may be even more or less menial, and then people will say, "See that soldier in uniform working at that mean job." My idea is that the uniform ought to be kept for special occasions, and I think most of the men will feel the same way about it. But I do say that during this time of war when you have the number of men in uniform that we have in Canada, and the number coming back from overseas and being discharged, it will not be an easy matter by any means for those who have to do with discipline in the three services to handle the situation, because you will have men on the street in uniform, some of whom will be soldiers and some not. If my hon. friend thinks a simple yes or no answer can be given, I am afraid he does not realize the implications. However, we are prepared to undertake that every man shall receive his uniform. We shall do what we can to see to it that the restrictions upon its use are as limited as possible, having regard to the necessity of ensuring that the distinction is properly preserved between men in uniform who are soldiers and men who are not. We shall endeavour to give those who have to do with discipline instructions in regard to the matter. I say to my hon. friend that perhaps we can continue with the discussion in committee now that I have answered his question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thank the minister for his explanation. I believe the minister knows what I think about the soldiers. I am glad that the men in all three services are to be allowed to keep their uniforms, and that out of the discussion arising in this corner this decision has been made.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I have had cases of pay and allowances brought to my attention and I have taken them up chiefly with the officials of the department rather than bring them up on the floor of the house, and I must say that I have had consideration and fair treatment in every case, with the reasons assigned when requests were refused. Of course not everything asked was granted. But I do think conditions with respect to pay and allowances in this war are much better than they were in the last war. Then there were no mothers' allowances and no grants for the children, but we have gradually broadened the basis since the beginning of this war.

I should like to say to this audience composed chiefly of men—I have not worked it out mathematically, but the composition of the chamber must be 99·9 per cent men—that the disabilities that hon. members are now bringing to the attention of the committee are disabilities under which women have suffered from the dawn of time. It has always been the case that when a man has been sent to prison, or has been A.W.O.L., or has deserted his family it has been his wife and children who have suffered, and when the war is over we shall have to consider giving a little fairer treatment right across Canada to the women and children involved in these cases.

I think the soldier's wife has had a larger percentage of the family's income to spend than the civilian's wife has had down through the years. I do not want to make the share of the family income which the soldier's wife receives any less. I want to see the fairest and most generous possible treatment of the soldier's dependents. I think the new provision for family allowances that is to be discussed this session is something along the line of what I am thinking, where the woman will have more of the family income to handle.

I should like to say also that since the dependents' board of trustees has been set up I have had far fewer cases brought to my attention. The dependents' board of trustees has been one of the best things the department has set up. This board has been able to handle cases according to need, after investigation. It has been able to give not only financial help but advice, which has been very helpful to those who want it at this time. With the elasticity that the minister spoke of this afternoon to deal with other cases that are brought up, I think we shall have even better results from the dependents' board of trustees.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister announced this afternoon that other ranks will be permitted to keep their uniforms on discharge. I should like to ask him one or two questions along that line, since I was the first member to bring it before the committee. First of all, how long service must the man have before he is permitted to keep his uniform?

Mr. RALSTON: No regulations have been made with regard to that. I indicated a few moments ago that we must have regulations with regard to it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The decision has been made that the men can keep their uniforms?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to bring one or two matters to the attention of the minister, because I think the debate has shown the need for them. I understand that the Whitelaw committee has recommended the doing away with, or has actually done away, with the office of the district welfare officers in the military districts. I think that was a very unwise move, because the district welfare officer is an officer given authority by the district officer commanding. His judgment carries a great deal more weight with the civilian authorities than does the opinion of the auxiliary services themselves. In view of the increasing number of cases that are brought to the attention of hon. members by soldiers' dependents and by soldiers themselves, I think the district welfare officers should be reestablished. I anticipate that the difficulties will become worse as time goes on. I wish to make that point quite definite. This officer, who is responsible to the district officer commanding, has a very important function to perform.

The second point I wish to make is that a number of soldiers are at present classed as deserters because they have been absent without leave, struck off strength, or lost to their units sometimes for many, many months or even years. A case was brought to my attention while my own unit was outside Liverpool during the bad blitz. Our headquarters was a transit depot. A number of troops were passing through, and when the blitz was on, these troops, who were not part of the unit, and not known personally to our officers except by name and number, went out and helped the civilian authorities and A.R.P. workers in putting out the fires and removing bomb damage. In Liverpool, and in a number of other cities, there are still air raid shelters and cellars where, because of the lack of workers, there are unidentified bodies which have been sealed in. I wish to ask the minister if anything has been done in that regard. We may have a soldier whom we now class as a deserter who may actually have been killed while engaged in the heroic duty of A.R.P. work during the bad blitzes. That situation was brought to my attention while I was in Liverpool. I do not know how many cases there are. I do not think there would be many, but I believe that there may be some soldiers who are now classed as deserters who may have died an heroic death.

I come back to the case of the soldier undergoing detention and having his dependents' allowance stopped. I do this because I have had some first-hand experience in the matter. While passing through the district depot at Aldershot I spent a day in the Aldershot military prison. I was in good company; I had a member of the cloth with me. This prison is used only for soldiers serving sentences of two years and upwards. I understand it is the supreme military prison in England. In a discussion of the matter with the commandant, the intelligence officer and the psychiatrist it was stated that our regulation was acting as a deterrent to making soldiers out of the Canadians in their custody. They pointed out that the families of the British, the Australians, the New Zealanders and the men of the Royal Marines received dependents' allowance, while our men were discriminated against, and our men were very bitter about it. Instead of accepting training willingly—and I may say that the prison was magnificently run and an excellent institution; it contained some of the most modern equipment and some of the most excellent training instructors I have ever seen were there—the Canadian soldiers in the prison were disgruntled and had a grievance. They were likely to try to escape. When they came out, instead of adopting the attitude, "I will never go back there again but try to become a good soldier," they had a grievance against the army generally and frequently were found to be repeaters. I believe that simply for the sake of the soldier himself and the psychological reaction that he undergoes while serving a prison sentence, some thought should be given to this particular matter of dependents' allowance being paid on behalf of men undergoing detention. That is all I have to say about that particular question, but I think it is an angle that has not been emphasized sufficiently in this house.

When the United Kingdom soldier comes out he is smart and he is very likely to be non-commissioned officer material because the training is good, the rules in the prison are excellent and he receives intensive instruction; whereas when our man comes out he has a grievance because of the discrepancy or differential in his treatment as compared with that of his brother in arms.

There is just one other point that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister, and that concerns him jointly with the Minister of Pensions and National Health. It concerns the question of hospital allowances. When a soldier or an officer—and it is particularly hard on the officers—is discharged and is sent to hospital, when he is struck off strength he is put on hospital allowance, and the rates which I shall give to the committee constitute a great handicap to the officer undergoing hospital treatment. I should like to quote from the report of the Toronto rehabilitation committee with respect to hospital allowances under P.C. 91.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the date?

Mr. ADAMSON: The date of the letter I have here is February 3, but I do not know the date of the report. However, it is some time in January or February. It is the most recent one. I will give it to the minister afterwards. I wish to put the figures on the record to show the serious discrepancy to which officers are subject when undergoing treatment in hospital:

Immediately upon his transfer to the Department of Pensions and National Health, his service pay and allowances, including assigned pay and dependents' allowance, is stopped and he is placed under clause 20 of the regulations of the departmental order in council P.C. 91, whereby he becomes entitled only to the special hospital allowance, which is the same for all ranks, and in the case of a single man, is $44.20 per month less $30 per month maintenance, and in the case of a married man $62.40, with any deduction for maintenance, of which he gets $10 and his wife $52.40 plus $12 for the first child, $10 for the next two children and $8 each for the next three children; provided that if the man and his wife have a private income this is up to $50 a month and if the wife is working and earning $40 per month there is a further deduction up to $18.20 per month.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the date?

Mr. ADAMSON: This was sent to me just the other day from the Canadian legion.

Mr. RALSTON: Order in council P.C. 1/602 of January 31, 1944, changed all that.

Mr. ADAMSON: What are the rates now?

Mr. RALSTON: I have a statement with regard to special hospital allowance which I will read:

(c) D.P. & N.H. allowances—Numerous post-discharge benefits are available to personnel subsequent to discharge which are summarized hereunder—

My hon. friend is not dealing with men in the army but with men discharged, which does not come quite within the item before us but comes under the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Special Hospital Allowance

(a) Where institutional treatment is continued uninterruptedly from date of retirement or discharge, a hospital allowance may be awarded at a monthly rate equal to

(i) 30 days' pay of rank, including tradesmen's pay, at the rate he was being credited as at the date of retirement or discharge, plus an amount equal to the monthly rate of dependents' allowance which was being paid on behalf of any dependents, or

A monthly rate equal to 30 days' pay, plus dependents' allowance on behalf of such dependents for the rank of lieutenant, whichever is the lesser rate.

The foregoing allowances are only payable for a period equal to period of service or one year whichever is the lesser.

(ii) Where disability for which treatment is furnished is attributable to service, hospital allowances at the following scale may be paid in lieu of the monthly allowances set out in (i) hereof if more beneficial—

Former member of forces—

Single	$ 45 00
Married	86 00
With 1 child	95 00
2 children	104 00
6 "	137 00
Each additional child	10 00
Parent, where full dependency is established	15 00

(iii) Additional allowances may be awarded on behalf of a dependent (other than a brother or sister) who has become a dependent of a former member of the forces subsequent to his discharge from the forces, at a rate equal to the monthly rate which would have been awarded had he continued to be a member of the forces.

(b) (i) Where a former member of the force does not require continuous treatment from date of discharge, but who is admitted to hospital or whose treatment has been authorized and commenced upon a date not more than 365 days subsequent to date of discharge, a special hospital allowance may be payable to the former member of the force and his dependents at the following monthly scale, subject to such conditions and regulations as are determined—

Former member of the forces.....	$44 20
Additional allowance for:
Wife	18 20
Person in lieu of wife.....	18 20
Parent or parents.....	15 00
First and second child, each.....	12 00
Third child	10 00
Fourth, fifth and sixth child, each	8 00

Provided that the above rate for a former member of the forces who is in hospital and who has no dependents or other obligations may be further reduced by $30 per month or by such lesser amount as to the department seems right; provided further that in no case shall the special hospital allowance, reduced if necessary as herein provided, be paid at a rate in excess of the rate of pay plus dependents' allowance of which he was in receipt at the date of his discharge.

(ii) The foregoing allowances may be payable for a period not exceeding the period of service or one year, whichever is the lesser, reduced by any period during which treatment has been furnished under any other class, and in no case shall treatment be furnished beyond a date more than eighteen months subsequent to date of discharge.

(iii) Treatment shall be granted in Canada only.

Then it provides for men who go to the Department of Pensions. The Minister of Pensions and National Health called my attention to the fact that he tabled that order in council on February 1 as shown in Hansard of this session, on page 63.

Mr. ADAMSON: I had a letter to-day and that is why I brought the matter up. I understand that the maximum is the pay of lieutenant.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, plus dependents' allowance.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is, $195 a month is the maximum irrespective of rank?

Mr. RALSTON: It depends on the number of children.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is this retroactive?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Only to the first day of February, 1944.

Mr. MAYBANK: There are two matters to which I wish to direct the attention of the minister. The first relates to the clothing allowance already spoken of. It may be true that $65 is not sufficient for clothing. Frankly I subscribe to that view, and I should not be surprised if the minister himself does. At the same time, while we are talking about $65 not being the proper allowance, I do not think we should fail to give credit for the fact that the government has but recently made the increase which it has. It is all very well for us to talk about such-and-such an amount not being enough, but we might also pay particular attention to improvements that have been made, and I should like to preface anything I have to say by commendation along that line.

The only other remark I have to make with reference to clothing allowance is this. I understand it is not given to the officers, and I submit that there is just as much reason for giving a clothing allowance to officers, particularly in the lower ranks, as there is for giving it to those men in other ranks.

The problem of rehabilitation for lieutenants and like officers will be probably just as great as it will be for men in the ranks. I would seriously submit to the minister that further consideration should be given to this question, with a view to granting these men a suitable clothing allowance on demobilization, as is now given the other ranks.

The other proposition I wish to mention to the minister is something entirely different. A number of years ago an organization was started in Winnipeg on a strictly non-profit basis for the purpose of hospitalizing people who would subscribe in groups. This is generally known throughout the country as the Blue Cross organization; the minister's department has some knowledge of it, because a good deal of correspondence concerning it has passed back and forth. Briefly, this organization arranges hospitalization for those who subscribe, but will take only groups of people. They will go to an electric light company and take in several hundred employees, but they will not take individuals as such. They have always wished to enroll people who were steadily employed, to make sure there would be an income, and of course it was necessary that they have some organization for the purpose of bookkeeping, in order to make sure of their collections. I hold in my hand a letter from the executive director of the organization from which I read one paragraph which should be of interest to the committee and the minister:

> Immediately at the outbreak of war, the Canadian Hospital Association with vivid recollections of the headaches this service had given them in the previous war waited on the federal government and urged the adoption of a policy of a monthly deduction from the payroll of enlisted men to cover medical and hospital care. This plan was refused. Subsequently interested groups vainly endeavoured to have such a policy adopted. I have never been able to understand why such reasonable action could not have been taken.

I believe that since that time this and other organizations have striven to secure the co-operation of the Department of National Defence in working out a hospitalization scheme for the dependents of men in the forces. As a class they do not come strictly within the rules of the organization, but if the government would cooperate, some of the necessary conditions could be met; that is to say, there would be certainty of collection and they would all be in the one class, or in other words the risk would be similar in all cases. At any rate the organization was willing to work out a suitable hospitalization scheme for the dependents of men in the forces, but it has not met with any success in working with the government. I have had some communications with the department; frankly I thought the suggestion might be accepted and that some such hospitalization plan would be worked out, but that has not been the case. In another paragraph the writer of this letter says:

> It is only within the past month that the women's auxiliaries and other bodies interested in families of enlisted men came forward with a proposal which might be entertained. It has now been decided to offer a contract to these families on the basis of enrolment through groups arranged by the auxiliaries, or a community or common employer group, meeting the usual enrolment regulations, subscription fees to be collected by a remitting agent, with payments to be made not less frequently than one-half yearly in place of the usual monthly collection.

Then he goes on to speak of the fee, which is extremely small. I would ask the minister to have the proposition of this Blue Cross organization carefully looked into, with a view to seeing if it would not be possible even yet to cooperate with the organization in order to effect the hospitalization of these dependents. It must be borne in mind that this organization is in no way interested in profit; it is simply an organization of forward-looking citizens of Winnipeg who have worked out this plan for the mutual benefit of all, and I understand that the scheme has been widely imitated. It must be borne in mind also that there is no suggestion at all that the government should be put to any expense. The principal thing would be for the government, upon request by or upon the authorization of a dependent, to do the necessary bookkeeping in regard to the remittance to the organization. From many conversations I have had with women who are dependents of soldiers, sailors and airmen, I know that if they could get into a scheme of this sort it would relieve them of a great deal of worry. Large numbers of these people came under the scheme when their husbands were home at work. Then, when their husbands joined the army they, having left the insured group, for a time lost the value of this service. I might add that where a man had been insured and then went into the army, thereby losing his group insurance, this organization made a special contract; but large numbers of people who know about this service desire to be relieved of the worry incidental to the fear of illness, and a great deal would be accomplished if the department would extend the cooperation that I have asked. I know the matter has been looked into, but I would recommend that it be examined further, because I am quite sure that in this way we could be of great help to many of these people throughout the country.

Mr. RALSTON: I can tell my hon. friend that this matter has been examined by the department more than once, and particularly by the Department of Pensions and National Health. It is not a closed matter, and I shall have it looked into again.

Mr. MAYBANK: What about the officers?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not wish to be put in the position of constantly resisting demands with regard to allowances for men in the armed forces, but I do feel constrained to put to the committee the other side of the picture. The position is not that officers are entitled to an issue of clothing. Officers get a clothing allowance at the beginning. It was never intended, I think, that this allowance should cover the full cost of their clothing, but it has been increased so that it does cover the cost of the initial outfit. Now my hon. friend is suggesting that when an officer comes out of the army he should be put in the same position as an other rank, to whom there is a free issue of clothing all the way through, and that the officer should be given a clothing allowance. I say to my hon. friend that he is dealing with two altogether different classes of people as far as pay and allowances are concerned, and at the moment I am not prepared to say that anything can be done along the line he suggests. There also has been quite a bit of talk about the maintenance of clothing by officers, as though an annual allowance should be made for this purpose. An officer is paid at a higher rate than the enlisted man and, at least in my time, the officer maintains his own uniform. As I say, he does get the clothing allowance originally. But, so far as pay and allowances are concerned, there has been no suggestion that he should be reimbursed for the cost of upkeep of his clothing, in addition to his pay and his regular allowances.

Mr. GILLIS: I am going to discuss an entirely different matter. This is about the only item under which an opportunity would be afforded to speak about this matter. I shall be brief and explicit. I have not had an opportunity of taking it up with the minister's department, although I like to have a decision from that source before discussing any matter in the house.

The question I have in mind is one of discipline, and its application. I intend at some time in the future to go into this matter thoroughly with either the minister or his deputy. The fact is, however, that I happened to be in Camp Borden area yesterday morning and part of yesterday afternoon, and I had the privilege of sitting in on a magistrate's court. I was amazed to find that the Ontario provincial police had brought in a corporal from Camp Borden who was alleged to have committed an infraction of the regulations within the camp area. This corporal was in charge of one of the camp stores, and it was said that a revolver was missing. The provincial police were called in to make an investigation.

The point which arouses me is that that was an offence which took place within the precincts of the camp area. The boy was a clean-cut young fellow of about nineteen years of age and, in my opinion, instead of being taken to a civilian court by the civilian police, and instead of being placed in the hands of a rather tough crown prosecutor, without any representations being made from his unit, he should have been placed in a more favourable position. In this instance he had to hire the services of a civilian lawyer to defend him, and the amazing fact was that at least seven or eight members of his unit, headed by his company commander, and followed by his sergeant-major, his quartermaster-sergeant, and down to one of the troopers, took the stand and gave evidence against the boy. He was alone, with the exception of the civilian defence counsel he was obliged to hire.

The point is that if that young corporal is convicted in a civilian court and is sentenced to a term in a civilian gaol, he is a criminal and is automatically discharged from the army. He leaves the service with the record of a convict. Having had some little experience in the service, and with an understanding of the experience the minister has had, I think he will agree that if that is the esprit de corps being developed in that camp area—because I do not think it happens anywhere else in Canada—it does not speak very well for those who are in charge of that camp.

My question is this: Are the people responsible for discipline in that camp administering the policy of the minister's department with respect to an important matter of that kind? There is a lot more to this than what I have said. This is not the only case, but I have no intention of delaying the committee, or of arguing the matter further. What I have said is based on what I saw myself, yesterday. In my opinion it is a most unfortunate mess. If it is not the policy of the department, then those who have placed the boy in that position should be called to account immediately. And if it is the policy of the department—and I do not believe it is—then I am sorry for the mothers and fathers of Canada who are placing boys of seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years of age under the control of people of that kind. Would the minister say if that is the policy of his department?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think I propose to answer yes or no to the recital of facts regarding what the hon. member has said he saw, but with regard to which I have no information whatever. I cannot say what policy was being administered in connection with that matter until I have the full facts. From what my hon. friend has said, it would seem that the provincial police were seized of the case, for some reason which I do not know, but which may have been as a result of policy in that particular case.

I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend that a young man who is in the army should be defended in connection with a serious offence. But I do say that in connection with civilian offences, offences which are strictly civilian—and I say this straight from the shoulder—I have felt it was much better that civilian authorities should deal with such civilian offences, and that the army should deal with army offences. I have felt very often that discipline in the army to some extent has been rather flouted by the idea that we have had to have sometimes as many as seven men try a court martial, for weeks on end, on account of procedure which is laid down, and which has been in force so long that it is almost like the laws of the Medes and Persians. Then we might have an acquittal, and have the public wondering whether justice had been done, or whether something was being covered up.

With regard to civilian offences, I say to my hon. friend I have rather leaned toward the idea of having offences under the criminal code dealt with by the civilian authorities, even though committed by a soldier. On the other hand, with regard to army offences I have taken exactly the opposite position, because I consider offences such as neglect to the prejudice of good order and military discipline are matters which should properly be dealt with by army authorities.

In this instance I do not know what the case was about. From what the hon. member said it would seem to me that this might have been a plain charge of theft; I do not know what else it could be. If it was theft, then I say to him that theft is a civilian offence. These are cases which I believe the public will be better satisfied to have dealt with by civilian authorities. They are offences against the laws of the land, although committed by soldiers. Courts are set up for that purpose, and it seems to me that they could probably deal with such cases to better advantage. Then no suggestion could be made that the army is covering up something in connection with its own administration.

Before I could give my hon. friend a categorical reply as to whether or not that particular case represents the policy of the department, I would want to know all the facts, and the reasons for what took place. He can be sure of this, that I will know before this time to-morrow just what the circumstances were, and be prepared to tell the committee about it.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: I allowed the hon. member for Cape Breton South to put his question, although he said he realized it might be out of order. We have had a general discussion on item No. 1, and we are now on item No. 2, dealing with pay and allowance. It will be readily realized that I must ask the committee to remain within the item.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of transgressing the rules of the house, but the minister did say that this item was sufficiently broad to permit of discussion of almost anything. It will be realized that in the matter I have brought to his attention I have touched only a very small part of the situation which exists at that point. I realize that the minister has not the facts, and cannot get them unless he approaches the authorities at Camp Borden. However, as I saw it, the matter was entirely a military one.

A box of revolvers was shipped to the camp. This boy was in charge of the stores and one of the revolvers was found to be missing. There is the provost corps, the unit police and other machinery for investigation within the camp, and I cannot understand why the provincial police were called in to investigate something that happened within the confines of the camp. I am not concerned with the boy being charged with a military offence because that would be something between him and the army, but when he is tried and convicted in a civilian court he is given a criminal record. He is then automatically discharged and he carries the stigma of that record for the rest of his life. I agree with the minister that anything of a civilian nature should be tried in a civilian court, but anything that happens within the confines of the camp should be handled there.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think the camp area is the thing that is the determining factor; the nature of the offence is more properly the principle which should guide.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do I understand the minister to say that the new regulations with regard to hospitalization provide that irrespective of a man being a captain, major or colonel, he receives only a lieutenant's pay as allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: I think that is right, but I have learned too well that one cannot summarize three or four pages of a departmental memorandum in a sentence or two.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has just brought up a question that I think raises a question which is of interest to this whole House of Commons. He feels that in considering these estimates he is justified in bringing up the case of a soldier who is being tried in a civilian court and asking the minister to answer for what is being done there. He has taken up the time of this committee to discuss such an individual case. If he can do that, then every hon. member is entitled to do the same thing and if they did so, it would take up so much time that our whole system of parliamentary government would break down. I have heard the hon. member say that every case he has put up to the minister has received careful, considerate, generous and sympathetic attention, and there is no reason in the world that I can see why a case like this should not have been taken up privately with the minister. On his own admission it would have received the same sympathetic attention given to other matters and the time of this House of Commons would not have been taken up in dealing with this individual case.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On a point of order, what item is being discussed by the hon. member for Rosthern?

The CHAIRMAN: This goes back to what I said a few moments ago. I thought the hon. member for Cape Breton South was out of order for the moment, but I allowed the question to be put and the minister had to answer. I believe the hon. member for Rosthern is in order now.

Mr. GILLIS: He is creating a lot of discussion on this.

Mr. TUCKER: This is not the first time that the hon. member for Cape Breton South and members of his group have brought up individual cases. On their own admission any cases they bring to the minister's attention receive careful attention and I ask them why they bring them up in the house. I think most members of this House of Commons are tired of their bringing up individual cases in this house for purposes which we all understand.

Mr. GILLIS: I rise to a question of privilege. I brought up this question to avoid a possible wrong being committed to-morrow, or to offset a possible wrong which may have been committed to-day. I make no apologies to the membership of this house or to any hon. member for taking up the cudgel on behalf of the underdog.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. GILLIS: My question of privilege is this—

The CHAIRMAN: There is no question of privilege raised. You may answer what has been put forward, but it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Rosthern definitely stated a few moments ago that I raised the matter for political purposes.

Mr. TUCKER: I said nothing of the sort. I said that the hon. member raised it for reasons which we all understood.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member is committing an infraction of the rules of the house by imputing motives. I brought this matter to the attention of the minister to-night because I expect that he will now get in touch with Camp Borden and a soldier may be prevented from being designated as a criminal to-morrow, or a sentence of a court may be offset.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre raised the question of hospitalization. Where a dependent wife or child of a soldier serving on active service becomes ill and hospitalization is necessary, does the department become responsible? Where a man is on active service I think it is unfair that the municipality should become responsible for the cost of hospitalization of his dependents. Has anything been done to correct this situation in any way?

Mr. RALSTON: I would say that assistance in connection with the hospitalization of dependents makes up from fifty to seventy-five per cent of the expenditures of the dependents' board of trustees. That does not mean that the department becomes responsible—to use my hon. friend's words—automatically for the hospitalization of the dependent, but it does mean that this particular item has been regarded by the dependents' board of trustees as being a proper one to be considered and in connection with which assistance should be given under the special powers granted to the board if the conditions under which the board acts exist. As I say, large amounts have been paid out on account of families who are in need and who require hospitalization.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is that a recent amendment?

Mr. RALSTON: No; it has been in practice since January 1, 1942.

Mr. JACKMAN: I should like to ask a question with regard to the issuing of official notices of presumed death. I have one case in my riding where a claim for pension is being made by the parents of a young man who was presumed to have lost his life at Dieppe. The first letter from the Department of National Defence is dated March 4, 1943, and it reads in part:

> It is with deep regret that in view of the lapse of time and the absence of any further official information regarding your son, since he was reported missing as a result of the action at Dieppe on the 19th day of August, 1942, it is now proposed to take action to presume his death for official purposes.

The parents of this boy are in necessitous circumstances and have applied for a pension because they need some means with which to carry on. On January 11, 1944, the best part of a year later, the pension commission replied, and I quote one paragraph as follows:

> I have to-day received notification from the Department of National Defence to the effect that the marginally named is still listed as missing in action. Under the circumstances, the commission are unable to take any action to have a claim considered on behalf of the parents until such time as the soldier is officially reported dead or a presumption of death may be issued.

The parents cannot proceed with their claim for a pension until official notice of presumption of death is issued. I would ask the minister what the policy of his department is in such a case, so that the parents may proceed with the Department of Pensions and National Health?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend understands, in the first place, that pay and allowances are continued all the time?

Mr. JACKMAN: Unfortunately this was a case where there was no dependents' allowance because of certain circumstances. But there is a claim for a pension.

Mr. RALSTON: Generally speaking, the practice under K.R. and O. is to have what may be the final examination of the facts within six months after the man is first reported missing. I cannot tell my hon. friend about this particular case, but I shall certainly look into it. If my hon. friend will permit me, I should like to put on the record what the provisions are with regard to dependents' allowance and presumption of death:

Pay Account. Pay and allowances are credited to the end of the month in which an officer or soldier is reported dead or missing.

Dependents' Allowance and Assigned Pay. The dependents' allowance board may make monthly payments to the dependents comprising the dependents' allowance in issue and a supplement up to fifteen days' pay of rank.

Should dependents' allowance not be in issue to persons to whom pay had been assigned at the time the officer or soldier is officially reported dead or missing, the board shall investigate and if dependency is established may put into effect the monthly payments referred to above. If at the end of the period of six months the officer or soldier is still reported missing, or should the eligibility of his dependents for pension be undetermined, the monthly payments referred to shall be adjusted to the amount of the maximum pension rate which would be payable on the death of the officer or soldier and may be paid to the dependents until status is determined.

That seems to me to fit the case of which my hon. friend speaks. There is an adjustment to the amount of the maximum pension which would be payable on the death of the officer or soldier if at the end of the period he is still reported missing. May I ask if any payment was made at all?

Mr. JACKMAN: I have not had an opportunity of taking up the case with the department. The family did not have any dependents' allowance; I am not certain about assigned pay. The case came to me in the mail and I have not yet had an opportunity of following it up, but I shall be glad to follow the suggestion of the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: They wish to apply for a pension?

Mr. JACKMAN: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: I was saying that the board was required to pay the maximum pension rate up to the time the actual decision was made that the officer or soldier must be presumed dead. I am very much interested in the case because I want to see how these regulations are working out. They were framed after a good deal of thought after Hong Kong and Dieppe. The memorandum I was reading continues:

If pension is awarded to such dependents prior to the expiration of six months, the monthly payments of dependents' allowance and fifteen days' pay of rank shall cease—

That is, if definite evidence comes that the man has died before the six months, then, of course, the monthly payments cease and pension is taken on. The memorandum continues:

—but if the pension awarded is less than the monthly payments a grant amounting to the difference between the monthly payments and pension for the remainder of the six months period shall be issued in a lump sum to the dependents.

Should a pension be granted retroactive to date of death the monthly payments, referred to herein, shall be recovered from such pension but only to the extent of the amount of pension payable for period during which the monthly payments were made, i.e., if monthly payments were in excess of amount of pension awarded no refund of difference is called for.

That is, if the monthly payments were in excess of the pension awarded, no refund of the difference is called for. They get monthly payments, which comprise the dependents' allowance and fifteen days' pay of rank, and that is payable up to six months at least. If pension is awarded before that, the amount of money which is represented by that dependents' allowance and fifteen days' pay of rank continues up to the end of six months, notwithstanding that the pension awarded may be smaller than the amount.

Mr. CARDIFF: I would ask the minister to clarify a statement he made a few minutes ago. If a theft takes places inside a camp, is that considered a civilian crime?

Mr. RALSTON: It is an offence against the criminal code.

Mr. EMMERSON: This afternoon there was a discussion of pay and allowances, and unfortunately I was not able to be present for the first few minutes of the discussion this evening when the minister may have covered the point I wish to raise. It has to do with a dependents' allowance for a widowed mother. The mother is dependent upon the father at the time the soldier enlists. The father dies. Prior to death he had been living on a retirement allowance, which of course ceased upon his death, leaving the widow in needy circumstances. Is a dependents' allowance granted in a situation of that kind, where it is really needed?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot put my finger on the exact regulation, but the board interpret dependency to mean this: if at the time of the application the soldier was the logical support of the mother and was willing to support her, then she would, even though at the time of the enlistment the soldier's father was her support, be entitled to a dependents' allowance and assigned pay. I am saying that subject to correction, but I think that is the principle they work on. I take it that my hon. friend has had some difficulty in a case of that kind and that it has not turned out that way. If he will give me the particulars I shall be glad to look into the case.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understood the minister to say a little while ago that a bill was to be brought down dealing with a gratuity allowance after discharge, and that at that time the one month's pay and allowance would be under review and would likely be increased. Will the clothing allowance be also under review? We have had the clothing allowance increased from $35 to $65, but the higher rate was not made retroactive. It seems to me very important that something should be done about this soon, because otherwise those who are now being discharged will not benefit unless the provision is made retroactive. I do not think $65 is sufficient for clothing allowance, because a man has to buy a whole new outfit. It certainly does not go nearly far enough to take care of him.

Mr. RALSTON: I say to my hon. friend that I cannot tell him what will be in the new measures with regard to rehabilitation and gratuity. I have indicated that returned soldiers' problems and veterans' welfare will be considered, and when it is brought down my hon. friend will have an opportunity of seeing it and discussing it. I cannot make any further announcement now. I assure my hon. friend that there will be more features in it than simply the feature of war service gratuity alone. May I say something else? It seems to me that the farther we go—and I am not taking any particular credit for it—the farther some hon. members feel we should be pressed. If I were talking about retroactivity I would suggest that we make it retroactive to the last war. I want to remind my hon. friend that all the way through the last war the clothing allowance was $35. It was $35 at a time when $35 were not worth what $35 are worth in 1944. I should like my hon. friend to remember that. There seems to be considerable criticism and strictures about the amount of this allowance, as if it were something that nobody had ever heard of before. The clothing allowance was put into effect in this war because it was the clothing allowance of the last war, and it was known that the purchasing power of that sum to-day was more than its purchasing power of 1914-18. Whether the increased clothing allowance should be made retroactive I cannot tell my hon. friend at the present time.

Mr. FAIR: What happens in the case of a soldier or an airman who is captured and held as a prisoner of war? Do the assigned pay and allowances continue to be paid to his dependents?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Some days ago the minister dealt with the question of the retirement of officers. Would he tell us whether there is any distinction made with regard to retirements between the officer who is a permanent force officer and the officer who is not a permanent force officer? Some people have made the suggestion that non-permanent officers are being retired in some cases and their places taken by permanent force officers who perhaps have not had the experience in that particular work or who may not be as efficient, or perhaps are older than the man who is going out. There is a feeling that it is very unfair during the war and after these men have served so well, that regardless of whether officers are permanent force or non-permanent force there should be no distinction made in the retirements. In other words, if a man is no longer needed and could be retired he should be retired even though a permanent force officer. Can the minister tell us whether or not that distinction is made?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know of any such policy, although I can say from the treasury point of view that policy might very well be put into effect because the permanent force officer is entitled to pension, and goes out on pension to which, of course, he has contributed over the years; whereas the non-permanent officer does not. There has been no such policy put into effect. If my hon. friend has any case in mind and he would care to mention it to me personally I should like to know of it. I know what is sometimes said with regard to permanent force and non-permanent force personnel, that there is generally a disposition in this war, as was said also in the last war, of course, to suggest that non-permanent men are not receiving the recognition they should. I assure my hon. friend I have been alive to that possibility and criticism and have endeavoured to check all instances. I have endeavoured to check it with the officers who I think would know. Notwithstanding the fact that a great deal has been said along that line, I do not think my hon. friend will find that that policy exists. As far as I know, merit has counted in appointments in this war.

Mr. GREEN: I am not dealing with the question of appointments so much as the question of retirements.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, the same thing applies. I do not think my hon. friend will find—

Mr. GREEN: The suggestion is that the non-permanent officers are not given the consideration to which they are entitled.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know of any such policy. Let me say frankly to the committee what I think I would do in a case where there were two men of equal merit. I would favour the retirement of the non-permanent man because he is going into civil life one of these days. He is not going to stay in the army permanently; whereas the permanent force officer is. He is in the army. The non-permanent man ought to go and become reestablished in civil life as soon as he can. On the other hand, if you retire the permanent force officer you would subject the country to a considerable obligation on account of pension. As my hon. friend knows, in a number of cases we have retired permanent force officers on substantial pension because the 60-year rule came into effect. We felt we ought to carry it out, and non-permanent officers have been given appointments in some cases to take the places of permanent officers.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has any consideration been given to paying an officer who retires at his own request. In some cases officers are retired automatically or imperatively. We know of a lot of officers who might be willing to retire if that clause could be put into the act. I think it might be easier not only for the officers in the army—

Mr. RALSTON: And for the minister.

Mr. ADAMSON: —but for everybody.

Item agreed to.

Army services—

3. Travel, transportation and freight, $92,957,866.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I presume that this item gives me an opportunity to ask the question which I brought up some three weeks ago, with respect to which there has as yet been no answer. The question whether or not consideration has been given to the establishment of a rotating system of furloughs for our men overseas, so that after the expiry of a given period of active service they will be enabled to come home to their loved ones. In bringing this matter up I realize that difficulties would be encountered, but I do not believe that they are insurmountable. A system of rotating furloughs is now being brought into effect in the United States. I think this is a matter that would do much to improve the morale of the men who serve in the army. In so far as those who serve in the air force are concerned, after a period of tour of duty an opportunity is given them to come home on furlough. The men who serve in the navy are given opportunities of furlough; after a period of service they are permitted to return home on furlough.

The system that has been considered over a period of time and is being adopted in the United States is one that is enabling men in the armed forces, particularly in the army, to return home. I think I can do no better than to quote from a periodical some of the provisions and the comments on the provisions that are made in respect thereto:

> The military services are giving more and more attention to the problem of rotating men who have served long periods overseas. Plans already have been worked out by the war department to provide trips home and furloughs for men serving in certain areas, and consideration is being given to similiar rotation for men in some of the foreign theatres.

I point out that many of our men have spent five Christmases overseas.

> A limited number of men in the North African theatre, who have eighteen months' foreign service behind them are being rotated home each month. The marine corps tries to bring home each month three per cent of its men serving overseas.

I realize there are difficulties. One of the difficulties would naturally be the question of reinforcements. We have the assurance of the minister, if I understood him correctly, that the necessary reinforcements are available. Another difficulty would be the question of the necessary shipping. I do not think that is an insuperable difficulty any longer, having regard to the production of ships. Quite a number of the loved ones of these men who have been overseas for four and a half years have asked me whether it would be possible to bring into effect in Canada a system similar to that now being put into operation in the United States, to the end that men in the army shall receive a measure of the consideration in this regard as do those who serve in the navy and the air force. It is a matter which I am sure would meet with the favour of the men who have been overseas and are denied the opportunity of being with their loved ones for a long period. I would like a statement from the minister in this regard.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not in a position to make a statement on a matter of that kind, and the committee will understand why. Great events are pending and, if I took down correctly what my hon. friend said, he refers to a plan for rotating furloughs from certain areas and consideration being given to some foreign theatres. My hon. friend knows the location of our troops generally speaking, and I am not in a position to make an announcement of that kind to-night.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I am one of those, from all quarters of the house, who have been rather keen about free transportation under certain conditions for members of the armed forces. From the start of the war I advocated that consideration be given the men in this regard, because I think the members of the armed forces in Canada are in much the same situation as those of us who were situated in the British isles in the last war. We travelled free on warrants issued in that war. I do not say that members of the forces should travel free at all times, and I want to say a word in appreciation of the Minister of National Defence because, having argued with him for some time that these men should be given free transportation and having finally asked him in March, 1941, if he would negotiate with the railway companies with a view to having some arrangement put into effect between the government and the companies for a reduction for the men, steps were taken to bring this about. At that time civilians were granted week-end excursions at reduced rates, and I am happy to know that, as a result of the representations made, members of the armed forces can travel to-day to their homes at greatly reduced rates. Notwithstanding all that, however, I submit that they should be allowed free transportation on their annual furloughs and embarkation leave. It would not add greatly to the cost at this time if the minister could bring this about in regard to annual furlough and embarkation leave. It should be done if at all possible.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to give my hon. friend a short answer, but I have dealt with the question two or three times and I will not take up the time of the committee further to-night. I did indicate that there was one matter very much in my heart, though it did not go to the extent my hon. friend has indicated. I am working out something, and as a matter of fact I have it under consideration now, but I am not making promises. However, it has to do with the railways, the government and my colleagues. I refer to the possibility of a ceiling. I have not given further consideration to the matter of free transportation, for the present at least.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. FAIR: As another member who has advocated for quite a while the granting of free transportation for annual leave and embarkation leave, I support what other hon. members have said in this connection, and I wish to thank the minister for what he has done.

Item agreed to.

4. Construction, purchase, repairs and operating expenses of properties—

(a) Capital expenditure, $28,987,000;

(b) Repairs, operating expenses and rentals, $51,059,856.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not sure whether the matter I wish to discuss comes under this item, since it is involved with the Department of Pensions from the point of view of hospitalization. I refer to the casualties from Dieppe and other places. I know of some hospitals where these casualties are placed in the same ward with very sad cases of human wrecks from the last great war. In fact I have been told that there are casualties from that war who are placed in the same wards with men from this war and who have passed out. That is rather an unfair state of affairs. Surely at this time these chaps who have gone through the stress and strain of the war and have become casualties should not be put in such a situation. I believe that happens sometimes. I am wondering if in the building of these hospitals to-day provision will be made to obviate such conditions. I hope that the men will not be placed in such locations as Christie street hospital, in the midst of all the din of a manufacturing centre. They should be put in some quiet isolated part of the country where they can enjoy the peace of the countryside. Certainly they should not mingle with casualties of the last war. I realize that the matter is involved with the Department of Pensions, but probably the minister will have something to say in this connection. I hope he will use his influence to ensure that proper conditions are established for the care of the casualties of this war so that they may be placed by themselves and every opportunity be taken advantage of to nurse them back to a state of health.

Mr. RALSTON: I will take note of what my hon. friend says. I thought at first he was thinking that such a situation exists in army hospitals. Such a situation does not exist in army hospitals unless it is the odd case of a member of the veterans' guard who happens to be ill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I realize there is a difference.

Mr. RALSTON: I will bring the matter to the attention of my colleague.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. RALSTON: The next item, No. 5, includes medical and dental stores and services. The hon. member for Souris rather ingeniously got in his remarks under construction, though they should perhaps properly come under the next item.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I realize that, but I was thinking of the construction of hospitals.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: My question was along the same lines.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is this $80,000,000 for construction in Canada, or does it apply to overseas as well? It seems a lot of money.

Mr. RALSTON: The actual construction item is $28,000,000. repairs $11,000,000. operating expenses $40,000,000. The operating expenses include rental of properties as well.

Mr. ADAMSON: Can the minister give a break-down of items of $5,000,000 and up or $2,000,000?

Mr. RALSTON: I will break this down again. Of this amount $15,000,000 is for construction that was started in 1943-44 and will not be completed or paid for by April 1 next. Then $5,000,000 is for C.W.A.C. accommodation if required.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is a contingent item.

Mr. RALSTON: Then $1,200,000 is for ordnance buildings; my hon. friend knows as well as anyone the need in this connection in Toronto, where they are using the post office building.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is so.

Mr. RALSTON: Now to break down the figure in another way, about $2,000,000 is for overseas; $4,800,000 is for operational units in Canada; about $5,000,000 is for home war establishments in Canada, that is the non-operational units, and miscellaneous activities and equipment not included elsewhere account for $16,000,000. I can give my hon. friend a break-down of that if he desires it.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would such items as fire damage and repairs at Camp Borden come under this vote?

Mr. RALSTON: In connection with fire damage we put in an item for repair construction, looking forward to the sombre possibility that there will be fires.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would this item include the repairs necessary after the fire at Camp Borden?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, it would.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain why it should be necessary now to devote practically $29,000,000 to capital expenditures during the coming fiscal year; and when he does so, would he also explain whether any consideration has been given to what is to be done with the army camps in various parts of the country that are becoming vacant?

Mr. RALSTON: As to what has been done?

Mr. GREEN: Has any consideration been given to what is to be done with the army camps as they become vacant? There has been a large expenditure on these camps, and I am wondering if any plans are on foot for making use of them.

Mr. RALSTON: There are three or four ways in which these camps could be used. In the first place some of the camps are stand-bys for operations in connection with demobilization—I think of two large camps in particular in that connection—and that is one thing for which they can be used. Then they can be used by the Department of Labour in connection with instructional programmes and vocational training.

Mr. GREEN: After the war?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. Then they can be used by the Department of Pensions and National Health for the same thing, and in the fourth place they can be used by the Crown Assets Corporation, about which my hon. friend knows, if it should become necessary to dispose of them. However, I am not anxious to plan for the simple abandonment of many camps in Canada, in view of all that is ahead of us. Some camps are closed down either permanently or temporarily, but generally speaking use is being made of most of them in some capacity, if not actually for the purpose of training.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not answer the first question, as to why it should be necessary to spend $29,000,000 during the coming year.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend was not in the committee when I dealt with that. Some $15,000,000 is for finishing items which were started and which will not be paid for by April 1 next. About $5,000,000 is for C.W.A.C. accommodation if required. Then $1,200,000 is for ordnance buildings. Then $2,200,000 is for overseas and $4,800,000 for operational units in Canada; that is for finishing some camps.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister resolved his differences with the Postmaster General in regard to ordnance?

Mr. RALSTON: This does resolve the difference.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister referred to $40,000,000 for operational charges.

Mr. RALSTON: $39,000,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Practically $40,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give us a little information in regard to the expenditure of that amount? Does it cover the expenses of ordnance used for operational purposes?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend means ordnance equipment?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I would not think so.

Mr. STIRLING: How is it to be expended? Would operations in connection with the ordinary military camp in Canada come under this $40,000,000?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, and it covers fuel, light, water, disinfectant, barrack services, all sorts of rentals which we have to pay all over Canada, and so on. All rented buildings are included here, ranging from the Sun Life building in Montreal, which is used as headquarters in that city, to C.M.H.Q. in London and the building in Prince Rupert.

Mr. STIRLING: And all the Ottawa buildings?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Is any of this money intended for internment camps in which prisoners of war are kept?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that the care of those prisoners comes under the Department of National Defence. Could the minister tell us whether or not there has been any change in the handling of prisoners in view of the fact that so many of them are now allowed to work on farms? As I understand it, the discipline within camps is handled entirely by the nazis themselves; they have a little gestapo inside which handles all the occupants. I understand there have been certain cases of men being murdered in the camps and of other men who have come running to the wires for help. I am just wondering whether there has been a change in the administration or in the sort of control that is exercised over the nazis in the camps.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: I want to say to my hon. friend that I do think the statement he makes is a bit ill-advised. I have not heard of the occurrences of which my hon. friend speaks. Within the last three weeks a representative of the protecting power has visited internment camps all over Canada. Of course he will make his report to the German government, and we endeavoured to show him everything there was to be seen. I have not heard of any such events as those to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. GREEN: That has nothing to do with the guards; it is all within the camps.

Mr. RALSTON: As my hon. friend knows, a certain number of these men are out on parole, and I think they have done very good work; but that is a comparatively small percentage of the number we have in camp. There has been no change in the camp organization to which he refers; and that organization, under which there are camp leaders, is the organization that has been adopted from the very beginning, the usual organization in connection with internment camps. In fact, I think it is by all means, so far as I can find out, the best way to run an internment camp, namely, to have the camp leader responsible to the camp commandant, or to his staff, for order and discipline among the men.

Mr. GREEN: The German leader inside is responsible?

Mr. RALSTON: He is the one who represents the wishes, representations and complaints of his fellow prisoners of war. Everything to be brought to the attention of the camp officials is done through the camp leader. Generally he is the one who deals with the representative from the protecting power, when that official visits the camp to ascertain what the conditions are, in order that he may report to the German government. On the other hand, we also get a report from camps in Germany.

Mr. GREEN: The German leader in the camp is responsible for the discipline?

Mr. RALSTON: I would not say he is altogether responsible for the discipline, because he has not himself any power to enforce. However, he is the head of the organization in the camp, and the one who is regarded as the representative of the men. I suppose they have the same troubles as similarly organized democratic bodies have. Sometimes a leader does not always represent everybody in a camp. But it seems to me that this is eminently the most desirable and the best way to run these camps efficiently.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do these men have to give parole?

Mr. RALSTON: As a matter of fact, I think there are different conditions in different places for different work and different classes of internees. As my hon. friend knows, there are some prisoners who are first class, and others in different classes. There are different nationalities, and even within one nationality these are different types.

Item agreed to.

5. Personnel supplies and services: food, medical and dental stores, clothing and personal equipment, $159,566,238.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister tell us how much of this amount is to be spent on military hospitals within Canada. Then, can he tell us what is now being taken care of in army hospitals?

Mr. RALSTON: The number?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then will the minister give us the government's policy with regard to the discharging of men from hospitals. How long do they keep the men in the army before they are discharged and passed over to the Department of Pensions and National Health?

Mr. RALSTON: I believe my hon. friend asked with respect to the building of hospitals. The buildings themselves would be included in item No. 4. Have I misled him in that respect?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No.

Mr. RALSTON: If not, shall I give a break-down of the item?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The break-down is as follows:

Object of expenditure	Estimate 1944-45	Change
		More than 1943-44	Less than 1943-44
Clothing and necessaries	$40,574,900	.....	$10,479,344
Personal equipment	17,229,120	.....	8,870,779
Camp, barrack and miscellaneous equipment	14,015,459	.....	10,992,587
Supplies—food, forage	64,502,018	$3,969,783	.....
Medical stores and services	16,571,556	.....	387,076
Dental stores and services	3,227,535	712,291	.....
Laundry	1,657,290	.....	542,710
Casual labour	1,788,360	288,360	.....

It will be noted that this is a table showing personnel supplies and services, including food, medical and dental stores, and services, clothing and personal equipment. The objects of expenditures are listed as follows: Clothing and necessaries; personal equipment; camp, barrack and miscellaneous equipment; supplies, food and forage; medical stores and services; dental stores and services; laundry and casual labour.

The estimates for clothing and necessaries, personal equipment, and barrack camp and miscellaneous equipment show considerable decreases because the initial equipping of the army is now largely complete; it is now chiefly necesary to provide for original issues to new recruits and for wastage. The decrease in laundry services is due to increased activity of mobile and static laundries overseas and to the reduction in the size of the army in Canada.

Shortage of military personnel in ordnance depots has necessitated employing civilians, and an increase in casual labour.

The increase for supplies of food can be attributed to an increase in the army overseas, and to the higher cost of rations in Canada.

Medical stores have increased slightly due to the necessity for quantity ordering in advance and to a slight increase in basic costs. That is a general statement of this item.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What are the facilities for military hospitals in Canada? How many cases are we dealing with under the army system, and what are the facilities for increase?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot answer my hon. friend, because I have not the aggregate before me showing the total accommodation in military hospitals. From memory I could speak about hospitals across the country from Cogswell street in Halifax to hospitals on the coast. However, I know that would not suit my hon. friend, and I would prefer to have a statement with respect to it. I shall get the information for him under another item.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Shall I be able to get it later?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. I am not sure when I say this, but I do not think the Department of Pensions and National Health is giving the capacity of hospitals. I do not mind giving that information privately to hon. members, but it just occurs to me that perhaps I should not give the total hospital accommodation in Canada. However, I can give the locations, and anyone who wishes to ask me privately as to the accommodation available will be given the answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I presume that under this item one might discuss the matter of army boots. I should like to secure a statement from the minister in regard to allegations made in the press early in February.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps this is not the correct item; however, we can hear it now. This involves the inspection board, and would come under sundry services.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would not boots come under this item?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Although I am not going into details in the matter, I desire to ask certain questions with regard to one James Clark, a former chief inspector of the inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada, and allegations made by him, to which reference has been made in the press to the effect that in the supplying of shoes for the Canadian army materials were not in accordance with specifications, in connection with about a million pairs of boots, and that 30,000 pairs were made on lasts contrary to specifications.

My questions are these: Have these allegations by the former chief inspector been brought to the attention of the minister? What investigation has been made by him of the allegations made by Mr. Clark? Will the minister lay on the table the findings of any investigation that was made? Finally, what does the government intend to do toward having a judicial investigation into the allegations?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot believe that my hon. friend really understands the genesis of this matter when I consider the questions he has asked.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What does the minister mean by the genesis?

Mr. RALSTON: The genesis of this inquiry. These allegations were made by a man who was dismissed last August. As I remember it, he started out with the allegation that he had discovered, I think in November, 1942, nine months before, that some other inspector had received a bottle of liquor as a present from one of the contractors, and he admitted that he himself had participated. Having been dismissed in August, 1943, Mr. Clark has several times since insisted that he be reinstated because, as he says, that he was wrongly dismissed. He has accompanied that request with certain charges. In November or December, 1942, he alleged that there were irregularities on the part of other inspectors nine months; that was about nine months before he was dismissed. The allegations he made with regard to the boots were with regard to boots that had been inspected—I have not the dates before me—I believe in 1941 and 1942.

It is necessary for the committee to understand that the board for which Mr. Clark was working was the joint inspection board of Canada and the United Kingdom. That board was set up in 1940 under Major-General Sir Robert Lock, a British officer, and it has approximately 15,000 employees. It does the inspection in the United States of munitions and supplies purchased for the United Kingdom and Canada, and in Canada of munitions and supplies for Canada, China, Great Britain, Russia and other countries purchasing Canadian goods. It is a joint board which reports to the British government through the Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, the High Commissioner for Canada, and to the Canadian government through the Minister of National Defence. Neither the Minister of National Defence nor Mr. MacDonald have interfered in any way with the administration of that board. All we have done is to follow the terms of the order in council with regard to salaries and appointments of employees and to see that the financial commitments were within the terms of the order.

I feel it is necessary to say this because my hon. friend has asked whether the minister made an investigation of these charges. I say at once that the minister did not make an investigation of these charges. The matter was referred to the board and the board made an investigation. I understand that Colonel Currie, my deputy minister, went into the matter again so far as the Canadian government was concerned, and the board later filed a categorical answer to each one of the allegations made by Mr. Clark.

When these charges were made, Mr. Clark felt that he had not received satisfaction from the minister, from the Department of National Defence or from the board, and he intimated that he was going to publish his charges. It was felt that it would be distinctly against the interest of our war activities if allegations of this kind were made, particularly in connection with boots, the quality of which I think has been par excellence so far as I can find out from the troops themselves. It was thought that possibly the publication of this article would be reconsidered when the report of the board was received. Therefore Mr. MacDonald and I took the unusual course of furnishing such information as the board had at hand on each of the points mentioned in the draft article submitted We did that instead of allowing the article to be published and the matter to be plunged into the maelstrom of controversy.

As I say, this board has some 15,000 employees and it inspects guns, Bren guns, tanks and all sorts of equipment purchased by the allied nations in Canada and the United States. To have a statement made by an employee of the board that there had been wrong inspection or something of that kind would undermine confidence, and it was felt that the examination which had been made indicated that publication perhaps would be unwarranted. At the same time as I have said, full information was given by the board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who made the examination?

Mr. RALSTON: The examination was made by the board, by Brigadier Howard, who is now chairman of the board since Major-General Lock has resigned, and his officials. The result was that a full statement was made with regard to these matters. I shall just give my hon. friend an answer to two of them.

Mr. STIRLING: Was the reply published?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. The first thing my hon. friend mentioned was that about a million pairs of boots were made with inferior material.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I said that was the allegation.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Clark's allegation was that about one million pairs of army boots had been made with ground cork mixed with resin used as a filler between the outer sole and the inner sole in place of tarred felt filler that had formerly been used. Then follows a statement in brackets:

(Mr. Clark explains that heat from summer pavements and the heat from the soldiers' feet combined with the weight of the body when walking caused this ground cork to creep into mounds as large as two fingers inside the boots.)

The answer was:

Tarred felt or leather filler was specified and supplied until May 28, 1940—

That is nearly four years ago.

—on which date specification was changed to ground cork and resins compound (as a filler between the middle and inner soles) as the felt was unobtainable when stocks on hand were exhausted. Furthermore, skilled workmen were not available to process the leather filler, which was not in general commercial use. On December 16, 1941, when tarred felt again became available, the specifications were changed back to tarred felt. After this change in specifications had been implemented no further boots were accepted with the cork and resins compound filler.

That is the first allegation my hon. friend has made. The answer, to make it short, was that because of a lack of materials the specification had to be changed in May, 1940. The changed specifications were in effect until December 16, 1941. After December 16, 1941, tarred felt again became available and the specifications were changed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not understand what the minister means when he says, "the first allegation my hon. friend has made". I said that that was the allegation made by Mr. Clark.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has taken the responsibility for bringing it up in the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am asking what the government is going to do.

Mr. RALSTON: He has taken a serious responsibility. I was going to bring down the papers which have been asked for by my hon. friend, but he has seen fit to bring it up and he will have to have the statement; that is all. I do not propose to have anybody get the idea that there is anything wrong with the boots being inspected by the joint inspection board for Canada, which board has, I think, done as magnificent a job in the way of inspection of Canadian equipment as any institution anywhere in connection with this whole war. For my hon. friend to bring this up now, a two-year old complaint, made by a man dismissed in August, 1943, is for him to take quite a responsibility, and I do not blame him for trying to get out from under by saying that this is Mr. Clark's allegation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I only asked questions which the people of Canada have the right to have answered.

Mr. RALSTON: They have been answered already in the newspapers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend does not answer them by not answering them.

Mr. RALSTON: I have answered them just as my hon. friend has asked them. My hon. friend is bringing into this house an allegation made by a dismissed employee of the board, dismissed last August, and this dismissed employee himself admits, in November, 1942, that he received presents of whiskey, an irregularity which he says occurred nine months before that. That is the man my hon. friend now cites as making these charges. I am pointing out that the first charge is just two years old now, and has to do with boots the last of which were supplied two years ago. I have given the statement which was given me by the board and which I have verified through the Department of Munitions and Supply, that on account of lack of materials a change was made in the specifications. That is the million pairs of army boots as to which Mr. Clark, my hon. friend says, makes changes, but I say that my hon. friend is in effect making the charges himself and taking responsibility for them. According to the report of the board these million pairs of inferior boots were delivered according to specifications, the specifications having had to be changed because of a lack of material.

What was my hon. friend's other question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It had to do with thirty thousand pairs.

Mr. RALSTON: The statement was:

More than thirty thousand pairs of army boots were made by one contractor on lasts contrary to the specifications. These lasts had hunks of leather called cheaters built on them to give the approximate measurements of the proper lasts. This practice, he says, is wrong and would produce ill-fitting boots, and is never adopted by manufacturers of good quality boots when proper fit and comfort are demanded.

And this is the answer of the board to that:

One contractor was permitted by the inspection board to use so-called "increasers" for a period of approximately three months early in 1941 as a temporary expedient at a time of change-over in lasts because he could not obtain new lasts in time to meet urgent delivery requirements.

That charge is in regard to 1941, and my hon. friend knows it. He has read this statement, and yet he stands here to-night and makes himself the mouthpiece of Mr. Clark in connection with this charge. The board's answer continues:

During that period it is estimated that he produced on these altered lasts less than—

How many?

—4,500 pairs of boots.

That was early in 1941.

. . . The fit of such boots was considered satisfactory by the inspection board.

There are the two charges to which my hon. friend has referred. The matter was brought to the attention of the department. As I say, the minister never investigated the charges. I have not time to investigate charges of that kind under those circumstances. I handed the matter over to the deputy minister; the deputy minister had the inspection board examine it, and there is the board's answer with regard to it. I say to my hon. friend that if he wants an investigation—I have consulted the Right Hon. Mr. MacDonald, the High Commissioner, and regrettable though it is that this matter should be brought up under these circumstances and at this stage two or three years after the thing occurred, Mr. MacDonald did concede that if my hon. friend wants any investigation he is welcome to it and we will see that the papers are furnished to the war expenditures committee or whoever is the proper authority to deal with it.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have one complaint against this item. It is like a salad, made up of things that are not supposed to go together. There is first of all: Personnel supplies and services; then food, medical and dental stores; then clothing and personal equipment. There should be a separate item for each. We should know how much is to be spent for food, how much for medical stores, and how much for dental stores.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend was not in when I gave the break-down.

Mr. POULIOT: We should not have to ask for it in the house. It should appear in the estimates before us. It should not be necessary for the minister to put it on Hansard. The estimates should be complete in the first place. Moreover, I complain because the minister appears to think he is gracious to give us this information. We are entitled to it; we have a right to it. He is not doing a favour to any hon. member by giving the details. We have a right to get them at firsthand, in the estimates themselves. It should not be necessary to give them in the house. They should appear in the estimates, I repeat, as was done in the last war. Why has this change been made? The minister is responsible because he is perpetually the acting Minister of Finance. It is nothing to make a joke of, and if it is to be treated as a joke I will tell again the story of Barclay's bank—and even about the empty bottles of John de Kuyper "compound gin." All these items I have mentioned are mixed up together, instead of appearing separately in the estimates, and they are mixed up deliberately in order that members of parliament may remain in a fog.

I do not agree often with the hon. member for Lake Centre, although he is a friend of mine; but he was right, from the start, in bringing forward the case he did to-night. Every member who has asked for information was right. I do not agree with their political opinions; but if an hon. member is thirsting for information, he has a right to have his thirst quenched. It is not a matter for laughter; it is nothing funny. We are responsible to the electors of this country for the expenditure of this money. Moreover, we are responsible to the army for the expenditure of this money, in order that the army may get the most benefit from it. That is my point. It is no joke; it is a very serious matter.

The other day I mentioned to the parliamentary assistant to the minister the case of a young man who suffered with heart trouble, and who asked for a doctor and was refused a doctor, and who died that night. Then there was a case at Barriefield, where soldiers do not have the proper care they are supposed to receive. How is it that members of parliament have to complain of these things? It is a real shame that they have to be aired in the House of Commons of Canada, when there should be no complaint at all about the medical services being provided for our army. When I complained about that last year I was jeered at by the minister, but afterwards I made my case and established clearly that I was not exaggerating. Here again I should like to praise the parliamentary assistant to the minister, and I give credit to the minister, too, for understanding afterwards that the case was serious and deserved special consideration. It is not fun for me to rise now and mention these things. There is no excuse for that in our country. Soldiers should not be dealt with by the medical corps as they have been. There have been numerous instances like those I have mentioned, and it is not only in the province of Quebec that they take place. It happens also in the Simon-pure province of Ontario. You have only to go to Barriefield, and many other places to see that.

For the edification of my colleagues from other provinces I will say that in the province of Quebec we have at least fifteen non-Aryan doctors, some with names that are not even Jewish. There are some with names like Ashkezany, and other names I cannot spell. Where do they come from? They are not British. They are not French Canadian. Where do they come from? They are the doctors who examine our boys. There are at least fifteen non-Aryan, to use classical language. At least one-third of the doctors in the province of Quebec are English-speaking. When I complain that the boys have not been attended to as they should have been I put the blame on the organization as it is. It is impossible to get reforms in the province of Quebec unless the district medical officer there is fired. I have complained, but he is kept there by political strings. That is why there is no order in the medical corps in the district of Quebec.

I can speak about Montreal, too, and about the way young men are dealt with at Longueuil, how they were attended to by the non-Aryan doctors. I am thinking of a young man who suffered from a heart condition and who was told to shovel stones in a cart for a whole day. I looked after him. I fought his case for a long time. The parliamentary assistant to the minister must remember the case. He helped me. I thank him for that, but I, as a member of parliament, should not have been forced to go to the parliamentary assistant to the minister to have that wrong redressed. It is a shame that I was forced to go there. The father and mother were so thankful that after the boy, who had a weak heart and could hardly walk, was discharged from the army, they told me that they had no objection at all to the boy staying in the army if he was well enough, if his health permitted it. But when a fellow is sick like that, why should he stay in the army? He should be discharged at once, if he were examined by competent doctors.

I am not exaggerating now, but the father and mother were so thankful that they motored from Montreal at six o'clock in the morning and came to see me at Rivière du Loup the same evening. They came there to thank me for what I had done. I had not done anything except brought to the attention of the department the incompetence of some doctor.

I have other cases. I recall a boy who was staying on the farm for some time due to some misunderstanding. He was brought to the camp, and this is what happened. He was confined to barracks as a deserter, condemned to ten or twelve months. I fought his case again, and successfully. They finally decided to free him, and after months and months they found that he was unfit. He should not have been called into the army. He should not have been put in the C.B. He was unfit. Why was he a prisoner, and why did he have the shame of a deserter on his brow? It was precisely on account of the incompetence of those doctors.

Not only that, but they are snobs. Why is it that dentists and doctors have commissions and druggists have not? The druggists are snubbed by the medical corps. They are not considered as doctors although they could kill the whole German army with poisons they could prepare, and they could cure lots of our boys by giving them the proper treatments. I bring this to the attention of the minister. I hope he will reconsider it. I hope he will realize that the druggists are suffering an injustice by not receiving the same commissions as the medical doctors, the dentists and the nurses in the army. The nurse is an officer. Why should not the druggist be an officer? He is a responsible man. When somebody prescribes without being qualified the consequences must be serious. These men are leaving a profession which is honourable and which deserves the same credit as the medical profession. I do not see why they are snubbed, why they are given the cold shoulder in the army. Those who get easy promotions in the army are those who are backed by powerful drug companies. I do not know what strings they pull, but when they belong to some big drug-making organization then they are sure to be captainized and majorized, made captains and majors. Everybody knows about that. Is it fair for a man who has taken the same course of study, incurred the same expenses to be a dentist and who belongs to that honourable profession to be treated like that? I have sent letters to the parliamentary assistant to the minister from the president of the society of druggists in the province of Quebec. I hope that matter will be considered and that the letters will be answered in due course.

Now I shall scandalize you, Mr. Chairman. There is an item in the estimates for clothing. For several years while the present Minister of National War Services was deputy minister of the Department of National Defence and when his successor, a very good man, Colonel H. Desrosiers, was in office, I succeeded in getting some second-hand clothing, especially long coats that had been worn by the soldiers, for the poor and needy, and one year just before New Year's I obtained 300 coats like that which I divided in two. I gave 150 to the needy families at Rivière du Loup, one for each family. I then had bales made of the second group, and this second-hand clothing was sent to the settlements and distributed by the parish priest or the mayor to needy families whose children could not go out in the winter because they had no clothes. I paid the freight from Quebec or Ottawa to Rivière du Loup and from Rivière du Loup to the other places where it was distributed. That clothing was of no use to the Department of National Defence. It was worn, but it was still good when it was tailored by the mothers for little children who are poor and could not go out in the winter, could not breathe fresh air, could not play in the snow. The present Minister of National War Services did it very well and so did the present deputy minister of National Defence. But finally I had a lot of difficulties on account of what had been decided by the war expenditures committee of the house. With all their learning the members of that committee decided, on the advice of some outsider, naturally an expert, that it was better to sell that kind of clothing; but there was an exception. The Indians have a right to it, but the whites cannot have it. It has gone to the Indians because if they did not get that clothing the government would have to purchase some new clothing and give it to them. They are given the second-hand clothing. If it is good for the Indians, why is it impossible for the good, red-blooded Canadians to have it? There is something else. It is sold at 12½ cents a pound to the Jews. I have been informed, and I wish to inform the minister, that some clothing has been sold to the Jews for 12½ cents a pound, some changes made and re-sold to the government afterwards as new. I do not say that as a definite matter, but I hope that the department will make an investigation into it.

I will go further than that. A friend of mine, who is the head of the colonization department in my county, wrote to someone who looks after the distribution of war material after the war and asked him if he would be given the same privilege as the Jew and if he could buy these clothes for 12½ cents a pound to distribute to the needy settlers and the poor, and he was told that he could have an answer only after the war. Well, after the war the quantity of military clothing will naturally be much less. If Canada decides to occupy the whole of Europe then we may have some old clothes, but it will be pretty hard to bring them back here.

I hope that this matter will be considered. I do not believe in these pink soap-bubbles of future felicity. If we are to have a post-war that will not be worse than the present we must organize the present at once and realize that the health of little children, not only in the cities but also in the settlements and in any other part of the country, is most valuable and is a great national asset. What is the use of thinking of doctors and of remedies when the illness of the future can be prevented? Is it not better to prevent it than to cure it? The minister would be playing the role of Good Samaritan if he would see to it that this stupid recommendation of the war expenditures committee is overruled. I do not blame the members of the committee for that; they did not know. It was suggested to me that I should get in touch with all the members of the cabinet and I waited for a time to put the matter before the committee and to bring the committee to a consideration of brass tacks and the reality of facts.

This country will never be saved by dreams, however beautiful they may be. We must realize that there is poverty in our midst and that those who are poor deserve help. It is not a pleasure to go around the departments asking for old clothes; but when it helps even a few of our fellow citizens it is worth doing; and at the present time when wool is so scarce, when it is impossible to get good woollen clothing for the little ones, is it not reasonable to ask for the crumbs that fall from the table of the rich? Is it not reasonable to ask for the clothes that do not serve the army any longer, but which could very well serve another purpose for the betterment of living conditions in this country?

It is a serious problem. It is not a problem of rags. It is a problem of giving the needy as much as possible under the hard circumstances we are going through, and I insist upon it. I am sure that what I have said has been a revelation to many hon. members who honour me by listening to what I am telling them. But there is no humiliation in speaking of these matters when good comes out of it. Is it not possible to come to an agreement about it?

I have no objection to the Indians having their share; they were the first citizens of the country. But when they get something I do not see why the whites cannot have it too. Moreover, let us not live in the future but in the present; and let us try to improve present conditions before discussing the future. The future will be what the present is. If the present is chaotic the future will be chaotic, and there will be no order in the future unless there is order now. But we can make the present orderly, provided we have no fancy schemes suggested by brilliant economists to make us forget what the present is. We must look the present in the face and try to do our best to remedy what is wrong by using sometimes the very simple means which are at our entire disposal. The only thing for the cabinet to do is to say yes; then to-morrow the matter will be settled for this year and for the year after, and every member will be in a position, if he needs it, to have some help for his constituency. This must not be neglected; it is important.

There is a lot I could say about the health of the boys in the army, and I am greatly surprised that it was left to a layman to speak about it. I waited for a long time because I expected some doctor to raise the point. I expected some doctor to explain how the pulhems system is working. It is a most absurd concoction from the British war office.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about. It was not invented by the British war office.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell the minister it is very dangerous to speak to me in that way, and to-morrow I will take the trouble to explain to him what the pulhems system is. I will ask him to explain to us—

An hon. MEMBER: Address the Chair.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask my hon. friend to keep quiet. It is a question of geography, and he is not interested in anything except the civil service and increases in salaries. I hope he will give me an opportunity to fight for my own people while he does his best to increase the salaries of the civil servants.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 25, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO ASSIST MR. SPEAKER IN REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS—REQUEST FOR SUGGESTIONS

Mr. SPEAKER: May I address the house for a moment? This morning a meeting was held of the committee considering the rules of the house. We have proceeded to some considerable extent in our deliberations. It was thought however that some hon. members who are students of parliamentary procedure might wish to place their views before the committee at its meetings. With this in mind I would ask that any hon. member who wishes to place his views before the committee might forward a letter addressed either to me or to the Clerk of the House of Commons before Tuesday next, when any such letters as may be received will be considered by the committee.

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ANNUAL REPORT AND REVIEW POLICIES OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services) moved:

That a select committee be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Bertrand (Prescott), Boucher, Casselman (Mrs.) (Edmonton East), Coldwell, Diefenbaker, Douglas (Queens), Durocher, Hansell, Hanson (Skeena), Hazen, Isnor, LaFleche, Laflamme, Macdonald (Brantford City), McCann, Martin, Matthews, Mullins, Picard, Rennie, Ross (St. Paul's), Tripp, Veniot, and that the presence of at least nine members shall be a quorum of the said committee and that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister purpose making an explanation first? Or does he expect us to go ahead and make some suggestions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He should speak.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The purpose of the motion is very well put in its present form. It is the same as it was last year, and I have no introductory remarks to make.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion I wish to place before the house for the consideration of the committee certain views and suggestions. I do this with only one thought in mind, namely, the wishes, welfare and interests of the Canadian people as a whole.

I accept the cardinal principle that radio, as an important medium of enlightenment and entertainment, should in its major aspects be national in scope, and should be and continue to be free from control by private interests. Experience over the years has shown that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has not been able to fulfil its functions without the assistance of private radio stations. I believe some seventy-six of these stations are permitted to operate subject to certain limitations in respect to increase in number, and increase in power of those already in existence. Their facilities have been used throughout the last few years for the distribution of many of the programmes of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. There is an advantage in the national system and the privately-operated stations working in cooperation; it provides stimulated competition, mutual competition, if I may say so, in the improvement of programmes.

The report of the committee which sat last year was tabled but not concurred in. Page 656 of Votes and Proceedings of July 22, 1943, contains a summary of the recommendations which had been made by previous committees. With your leave I should like to run over the various recommendations, to the end that I may be able to discuss the suggestions I have in mind. In 1932 they emphasized the paramount importance of a single national authority to control all broadcasting in the public interest. There can be no argument about that recommendation, but later on I shall submit that, since the national radio in recent years has become ever increasingly commercial in its scope and activities, there must be set up a new type of national authority to control broadcasting in this country. In 1932 it was recommended that the public ownership of all high-powered stations under a national system of broadcasting—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The motion before the house is to set up a committee; it is not to discuss the report of a previous committee. I would say that the discussion should be confined to the motion. Earlier in the week we spent two days trying to get a committee on war expenditures appointed. Time was taken up, not in discussing the merits of having such a committee appointed but in discussing a previous report. I do not think the time of the house should be further consumed in that way at this time. There will be an opportunity to discuss the whole radio broadcasting question on supply or on other occasions, but in the setting up of a committee I submit that the discussion should be limited to the motion. I hope my hon. friend will pardon me for having interrupted him. If he is permitted to discuss the report of a previous committee, others will wish to be given like latitude, and the time of the house will be taken up with a discussion altogether apart from the motion before the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On the point of order, with due deference to the Prime Minister may I say that I was not discussing the provisions of the report. I was summing up the recommendations which were set forth in last year's report to the end that I might make certain suggestions as to what the committee should take into consideration once it is convened.

Mr. GRAYDON: The report of the last radio broadcasting committee—I think the same applies to the previous report—was brought in during the last days of the session and there was no opportunity to discuss it. While it would facilitate the work of the house not to go into too great detail in discussing this report, I fancy the house will want some latitude shown the discussion which has now arisen. I do not think it will take very long, but there are certain points that have not been discussed and I believe the house generally would wish to have them brought out. As I understand it, that is what my hon. friend is attempting to do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it the idea of the Prime Minister that hon. members who were not members of the broadcasting committee will not be permitted to suggest certain questions that the committee should study during its sittings? For instance, I have some strong views about commercial advertising over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am sick and tired of hearing about soap and laxatives, and I just turn off those programmes. There will be no opportunity for me to discuss these matters if the report of the committee is tabled at the end of the session and concurrence is not moved. So far as I know this is the only opportunity to discuss these matters. The Prime Minister speaks about supply. At the moment I have not in mind the item he may be thinking of, but it seems to me that this is a proper occasion upon which private members could intimate to the committee certain topics which they think should receive consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has asked me a question. Replying to the two leaders of the opposition may I say that my point is simply that there is a time for everything, and that time is governed by the rules of the house. The rules of the house afford ample opportunity to discuss all questions relating to radio broadcasting. If one wishes to do so, he may discuss radio broadcasting on the speech from the throne, at an appropriate time on supply, and on the budget and there are other occasions. The purpose of the motion is to get a committee appointed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To do what?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says, "To do what?" It is to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development. The committee is to be appointed for that purpose, but that certainly does not mean that this is the time to discuss a report tabled in a previous year, or matters other than those that come strictly within the terms of the resolution.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling I should like to point out that there is no way in which the debate on this motion can be limited except by arrangement between the government and the opposition. It seems to me that this motion is wide open for a debate on everything connected with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That is quite clear from a reading of the terms of reference:

> That a select committee be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that every item there is a matter for discussion in this debate—that is, if the members want to carry on a debate. I am not advocating a debate on this motion. I have nothing to say on it personally, but there is no way in my opinion, under the rules of the house, in which debate can be limited on the terms of reference here set up. The question is whether the committee shall be appointed or not. What is a member to discuss if not the matters mentioned in the terms of reference?

Mr. HANSELL: I did not quite hear what the leader of the opposition or the hon. member for York-Sunbury said, and I trust that my observations will not be repeating what they have said. They still seem to be a "still small voice crying in the wilderness."

If we are to confine our remarks to the setting up of the committee, there is nothing we can talk about. All we can do is to look over the names proposed: Messrs. Bertrand, Boucher, Mrs. Casselman, Mr. Coldwell, Mr. Diefenbaker, and the rest, and discuss the colour of their eyes and what they are wearing, and so forth. It seems to me that when a committee is being set up, hon. members of parliament have the right to express in parliament, which is supposed to be the voice of the people, what they expect of our government-owned broadcasting corporation, and of broadcasting in general in Canada, in order that the committee, when set up, may take into account the matters that have been brought before parliament by the people's representatives. I do not see how we can discuss that fully without discussing the report that was made last year.

We all know that these committee reports come down to the house in the dying hours of the session. Perhaps my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party were talking about that; I could not hear. But very often we have asked in the committee itself whether concurrence would be moved when the report was brought down. Sometimes concurrence is not moved on the understanding that when the committee is set up the following year we might be able to discuss further the matters contained in the report. That is why some of us do not insist on moving concurrence in the report in the dying hours of the session. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that on this motion a review of broadcasting in Canada is entitled to discussion.

Mr. McCANN: Speaking to the point of order, among the other purposes for which this committee is being set up is to review the policies and aims and development of the corporation. In the various reports which have been submitted to parliament in the last number of years, the committee on radio broadcasting has made certain recommendations which, if carried into effect, would constitute the development of the corporation. I submit that the proper place to discuss the report of last year is before this committee when it is set up, when it can be determined whether or not the recommendations which have been made in former years have been put into operation and whether or not there has been development in any particular lines.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope my hon. friend is not suggesting that the report of last year's committee is to be considered by this year's committee. That is what he seemed to intimate, and it strikes me as a strange suggestion.

Mr. McCANN: I see nothing strange in that. So far as development goes, I think it has been the practice to review, perhaps not minutely, what has been accomplished from year to year in putting into effect the various recommendations which have been made. I know that last year in the committee many of the recommendations which had been made by the 1942 committee were reviewed, and comment was made as to the progress and development which had been made by the corporation over the past year.

So far as moving concurrence in the report goes, it is a question of just what concurrence means, whether it means merely acceptance of the report or endorsation of the report. A report such as the committee made last year or the year before, in my judgment, might be concurred in, in the sense that it would be accepted but not necessarily endorsed, because a great many of the recommendations would take a long while for implementation and the government or corporation would have to be given considerable time to put the recommendations into effect. I submit that any member of the house could appear before the committee and give his opinions there with reference to the policies and regulations and development of the corporation, and so forth, and that the time of this house would be saved by having the discussions there rather than before the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, may I add, with the consent of the house, one word to what I have already said because of the Prime Minister's reply? Under the terms of reference as incorporated in this motion it is open to any hon. member to discuss each of the substantive matters referred to, that is to say, the report of the corporation; to review the policies and aims of the corporation; its regulations, revenues—and under that I suggest I could discuss soap—expenditures and development, and so on. Surely it cannot be held under the Prime Minister's suggestion that we cannot discuss those matters. If so, we might as well fold up again. The mere setting up of the committee does not confer any opportunity for discussion that is worth while for the country. What we want to discuss are the terms of reference and the subject matters to which they refer.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that confusion has arisen in the minds of some hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Macleod, who said that if we are to confine our remarks to the setting up of the committee some dire result—I did not catch just what it was—would follow. He seemed to think we ought not to confine our remarks to the question whether or not we should set up a committee, and I apprehend that the hon. member for Lake Centre is bursting with a magnificent speech on the problems to come before the committee. But is not this the point? This house could take unto itself by an appropriate resolution the consideration of the annual report and a review of the policies and aims and regulations of the corporation, and so on and so on, or it could follow the established procedure and refer these problems to a committee. I find on that committee the hon. member for Lake Centre, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson)—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I am not on it.

Mr. SLAGHT: Pardon me. That is my colleague who represents the distinguished constituency of Skeena.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A good name, you know, but—

Mr. SLAGHT: It is. I can understand the urge in the minds of many hon. members to discuss this matter, and at the appropriate time I want to discuss it as well. But after all we are facing to-day, with reference to the problems involved in this resolution, the simple question, shall we have a committee set up? What for? To hear witnesses, receive evidence, delve into the facts regarding the matters which will ultimately be dealt with? Or shall we do all that in the House of Commons? Now, surely it was never intended under our rules that you should turn a resolution on the question of a committee or no committee to consider a given project like this, into a matter for a round debate on all the problems on which the committee itself will have to take evidence and ultimately report back to the house.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that your ruling should be that hon. members confine themselves to the question whether the personnel of the committee is or is not satisfactory. I understand, although I do not know definitely, that it has been usually chosen after conference with the whips; that gentlemen who have special knowledge of the subject are placed on the committees. Or are we to have a debate here and now for a day or more or less on the very problems as to which the committee is appointed to take evidence? You do not ask juries to bring in their verdicts before they have heard the evidence. I suggest to hon. members that if they stifle their appetite to talk, as the hon. member for York-East (Mr. McGregor) described it the other night—I do not agree with him—

An hon. MEMBER: The minister did.

Mr. SLAGHT: —we shall have an opportunity of rendering a considered judgment after they get all the facts which the committee will seek to obtain during its operations. You can multiply debate in this house; you can discuss it now and discuss it all over again in committee and again on the report. May I point out that any hon. member has a right to move concurrence in a report. In this case the complaining members have never so moved; any of the hon. members who have spoken could have placed upon the order paper a resolution asking a review of the policies of the corporation, and so could have got a debate on them. This has not been done. I suggest the rule is plain, the situation is clear, and we should not delay the many important war measures to come before this house by an auxiliary or preliminary and supplementary debate, when the evidence and the facts can all be investigated in the committee and the matter debated at the proper time.

Mr. POULIOT: Let us come back to fundamentals. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation committee will be composed of twenty-three members. The membership of the house is 245. Is it right to say that 222 members will be prevented from expressing their views on the motion to appoint this committee in order that the committee may have the advantage of the wisdom of the 221 members?—excluding myself; that is why I say 221 instead of 222. But I have listened carefully to what has been said. It is true that we have important war problems to discuss, but public information is one of them, and if hon. members are precluded from expressing their views at the time of an appointment of a committee which is to supervise the work of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, there is no use in members of parliament expressing their opinions in these matters. Naturally, the report of the committee may be discussed in this chamber when it is brought up. But when is that? As a rule it is at the last stage of the session, when everything is railroaded, when hon. members are told that it is time to go home, that it is very warm in Ottawa, that everybody is sick of the session and has had enough of it. Besides that, sir, what is the use of appointing the committee without discussion when the committee's report, naturally, —for it cannot be done otherwise—is not discussed until after it is brought before the house?

Besides this, sir, I am a traditionalist. From time immemorial when hon. members had anything to say about the appointment of a committee they had the right to say it, and unless the rules of the house are changed I do not see how such a practice could be changed.

I ask you, sir, kindly to weigh the pro and con in your wisdom, upon which we rely, in order that the best national use shall be made of the C.B.C. No one will deny the importance of that organization to keep the home front well informed and in good spirit. For all these considerations, sir, I hope you will give a ruling which will be in accordance with the jurisprudence that you have established during your occupancy of the Chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: Speaking to the point of order raised by the Prime Minister, I should like to refer for a moment to Hansard of 1943, pages 931-937. At that time there was before the house a similar motion, one for the setting up of a select committee to examine and report on a plan relating to social security. The Prime Minister, who moved the motion, made a speech covering six pages dealing with the speech from the throne, which we had already debated; the war effort, dominion-provincial relations, the Atlantic charter, and quite a number of other matters. I felt at the time that they did pertain to the matter of setting up a committee on social security, and did not, nor did anyone else, raise a point of order, feeling that he was perfectly in order in debating the whole subject of social security at that time. There followed a debate which lasted two or three days, because of the precedent set by the Prime Minister, and I feel that the precedent he set at that time is one that we should be right in following to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I could wish that I had more time for deliberation on a point, which is so important, which has been raised as to the procedure of the house. It has been the practice in the past in the setting-up of these committees that a debate ensue, in some cases with wide latitude; in others, more restricted. I find in May, 13th edition, page 307, that:

> On a motion for the appointment of a select committee or for determining the number of its members, the merits of the matter referred to the committee have not been allowed to be debated.

In the motion before the house both the appointment of the committee and the order of reference are included. The terms of that motion almost invite discussion:

> That a select committee be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records. . . .

As I say, the terms of the motion almost invite discussion, but I do not think it would be well for the discussion to take the latitude that has been allowed in the past, in similar proceedings, especially if a report, the property of the house, tabled in a previous session, should now be made the subject of discussion. I may feel disposed later on, after further consideration, to reconsider the view I am now stating, but at the moment my inclination is to allow hon. members freedom to discuss the motion, for the purpose not of dealing with matters that belong to the past, arising out of the report of the committee of last year, but of considering exclusively the aims and objects of the committee now to be set up. I realize, of course, how difficult it will be for hon. members to make the distinction between what is actually past and what pertains to the moment; nevertheless I hope that hon. members will confine their remarks as precisely, as simply and as briefly as possible, to the purposes of the motion, which is to set up the committee. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) intimated that he was referring to the recommendations of the report of last year in order to lay the foundation for a discussion of the aims and objects of the committee that is to be formed, and on that ground I would rule that he may proceed.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The point I was endeavouring to make, Mr. Speaker, is that there are certain salient principles which we all accept, irrespective of party in this house, in connection with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. One of these is the coordination of all broadcasting in Canada through the vesting of exclusive control in a nationally-owned system, and the independence of the corporation from partisan control, to be ensured by its constitution. We urge that the independence and flexibility of the national broadcasting authority be thus established.

I wish now to refer to these cardinal principles, to apply them to the situation as it exists to-day, and to ask whether or not the policies and aims and regulations of the corporation, to use the words of the motion, have actually been carried into effect.

First, the general manager, according to the by-laws of the corporation, is the chief executive officer, and is responsible for the carrying out of the provisions of the Canadian Broadcasting Act. For a long time this important corporation, which can contribute so much to the war effort of the nation, has had no general manager, no executive head. In recent months, owing to failure on the part of the government to appoint a general manager and administrative head, chaos has resulted. One of the greatest dangers facing this corporation is the possibility that it may become a political football. Many are apprehensive that because of the lack of directive in the last few months, their fears regarding the corporation may be justified.

In my opinion the present board of governors as such has lost the confidence of the people. On that board there are men of ability, and I compliment the government on its recent appointments giving representation to labour and agriculture. But in order that the confidence of the people in the corporation and in its members may be restored, all the members of the board of governors should put their resignations in the hands of the government, and the government should reappoint such of them as it believes will carry out the great principles of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as enunciated in the reports of the committees of the house in successive years. To do otherwise at this time is to endanger the future of the corporation.

When I look at the situation that has obtained during recent months, I ask myself this question: Why has not the government acted? President Thomson of the university of Saskatchewan has long since returned to the university. Months have passed by and the corporation moves without direction, without the controlling influence of a man of the calibre necessary to fill the position of chairman of the board.

I know that members in all parts of the house will demand, as they have a right to do, that this corporation shall not be permitted to become a political instrument; nor must it be permitted to get into such a position that anyone can suspect such a thing as possible. That is why it is so necessary at this time, in the midst of war, when there is no greater institution than the radio for mobilizing public opinion, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should have directive leadership.

Radio is one of the great instruments for the mobilization of a nation; it can do more than any other to arouse public opinion. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other ministers often speak, and the influence of their addresses is immeasurably enhanced by the dissemination afforded by the facilities of the corporation and of private companies affiliated therewith.

A national radio system must be available to all political parties. It must not be subject in any way to governmental control in that regard. If it is, then the sources of educated public opinion are destroyed. This corporation can carry out its great responsibilities and duties only if it commands the confidence of the people, only if it is free, untrammelled and devoid of any influence exercised by the government either directly or indirectly.

I have referred to the appointment of a representative of agriculture and one of labour. The leader of the opposition, over a period of years, has advocated representation for these two great bodies, and I suggest now for the consideration of the committee, seeing that the radio and the press are complementary, that one of the appointments to be made to the board of governors should be a representative of the press of Canada. I have advocated in the past that there should be a representative of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association on the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Because the press of Canada works so generously in cooperation with the broadcasting corporation, and because the activities of the corporation should be correlated to bring them in line with the activities of the press, I believe such a step should be taken.

The appointment without further delay, of a general manager and a strong board of governors would restore confidence in the corporation, and the independence of this great instrument as a benefit to the Canadian people would be safeguarded.

I come now to my second point. I believe in the necessity of a government-owned national corporation. I do not need to go into the arguments in support of that. I do not believe in monopoly. The private stations, whose contribution to public and civic service is beyond praise, have also a necessary place in our set-up. When you think of the privately-owned radio stations in this country you think of community effort. In the Prime Minister's constituency of Prince Albert there is a privately-owned radio station, one that has done much, as have all the others across the country, in behalf of the community and the welfare of the people as a whole. It has made an important contribution to the victory loan campaigns, and to charitable and patriotic drives. The private radio stations give their facilities to the broadcasting corporation for the benefit of the tastes of their own listeners. They represent the epitome of unselfish public and civic service in whatever towns and districts they happen to be located. To-day the position is that all the private radio stations are under the control of the broadcasting corporation.

May I refer to sections 21 and 22 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act in order to place before the house the power that the broadcasting corporation has over the private broadcasting companies in Canada:

21. No private station shall operate in Canada as a part of a chain or network of stations except with the permission of, and in accordance with the regulations made by, the corporation.

22. (1) The corporation may make regulations:

(a) to control the establishment and operation of chains or networks of stations in Canada;

(b) to prescribe the periods to be reserved periodically by any private station for the broadcasting of programmes of the corporation;

(c) to control the character of any and all programmes broadcast by corporation or private stations;

(d) to determine the proportion of time which may be devoted to advertising in any programmes broadcast by the stations of the corporation or by private stations, and to control the character of such advertising.

(6) In case of any violation or non-observance by a private station of the regulations made by the corporation under this section, the corporation may order that the licence of such private station be suspended for a period not exceeding three months and any such order shall be forwarded to the minister who shall forthwith communicate the same to the licensee of the station and shall take such steps as may be necessary to carry out the terms of such order.

These provisions may have been fitting and proper when the Act was passed, having regard to the conditions then in existence, but tremendous changes have since taken place. The broadcasting corporation has become strongly commercial in its offerings over the radio. There has been a pronounced change in that regard. It was originally intended that advertising should not bring in more than $500,000 a year. In 1940 the commercial revenue of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was $700,000; in 1941, it was $895,000; in 1942 it was $1,019,000; in 1943, $1,204,000. No doubt an equal or a greater amount will be taken from advertising during the current year.

In the interests of all I believe the time has come when some limitation should be placed on the extent of commercial advertising over the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Altogether too much time is being devoted to the sloppy sentimentality that often characterizes some of the radio advertising. These and other things will not be controlled under the law as it now stands; because the corporation now makes the decisions that affect not only itself but the rights of the private stations. I therefore suggest that the committee should study the question with a view to preventing monopoly, with a view to protecting the rights of all parties, public and private, and in particular the rights and powers of private stations in relation to the public corporation. An independent body should be set up, a body similar in legal standing to the board of transport commissioners, or, as my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) suggests, similar to the radio commission in the United States.

The situation to-day is peculiar. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is more and more becoming a commercial corporation, its board of governors enjoying almost monopolistic control over its competitors. The private stations, in competition with the broadcasting corporation, are subject to the provisions I have already mentioned. Where the private stations bring their objections to the corporation to be adjudicated they find that they are bringing them to a competitor. In other words the radio corporation exercises of itself a semi-judicial function. In determining the rights as between private and public corporation, the broadcasting corporation is in the position of being both litigant and judge, both investigator and jury. It is in the position of being, as someone has said, a cop and a competitor. Therefore I suggest that in order to restore confidence it is absolutely necessary that a body such as I have advocated be established.

I come now to the question of censorship. I should like the minister to explain one thing. To what extent is there censorship? To what extent is it applicable to the commentators who use the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and are in receipt of payment from the corporation for the services they render? I find considerable interest in this matter. Do those who speak as commentators submit verbatim statements of what they intend to say before they use the national facilities? Are they in any different position from political speakers, if you like, representatives of the different parties who utilize the facilities of the corporation from time to time? Must they submit manuscripts? On February 20 an outstanding commentator from Vancouver, Mr. Elmore Philpott, in a broadcast dealt with the case of the former commander in chief of the Canadian Army, Lieutenant-General McNaughton. He made certain suggestions and certain statements. I have not before me the verbatim report of what he said, and in my summary I do not wish to be unfair, but it left the impression with those who heard it that he was stating that Canada had been fighting two wars, not only one with the enemy, but another with the war office over the question of the right of the Canadian Army to operate as a unit. After the government had said it was not in the public interest to discuss the matter, parliamentary leaders refrained from doing so. Yet, after that agreement, based upon the question of public safety, this commentator over the facilities of the corporation was able to discuss matters which by reason of public interest were not considered a proper subject of discussion.

I should like the minister to explain this: Was this broadcast made with the approval of the broadcasting corporation? Was it submitted to any representative of the board? Was it subject to censorship? If it was subject to censorship, by whom was the manuscript censored, and when? These are questions which I believe must be answered by the minister on behalf of the government.

There are various other matters with which I could deal, but they can be discussed later. To sum up, I say that we, all of us, must rebuild the highest confidence in the corporation, first, by the appointment of a board of governors having the confidence of the people of Canada, with representatives as at present of agriculture, labour, the press, and others; second, by the appointment now of a general manager; third, by the setting up of a semi-judicial body to adjudicate upon the claims of the corporation and those of the private operators, and, finally, by giving the people knowledge of the basis upon which broadcasts are made and the degree of censorship applied thereto.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the appointment of this committee affords one the opportunity to review, not the matters discussed by earlier committees, but those which should be considered by the committee about to be set up. For a number of years, the house has annually reiterated certain fundamental principles in relation to our broadcasting system. We have endorsed the paramount necessity of setting up a single authority which will control broadcasting in the public interest. Every year we have supported the public ownership of all high-powered stations, to be operated under that single national authority. We have endorsed also the principle that the local or community stations fulfil a useful function and serve a useful purpose in the Canadian broadcasting picture. We have approved the coordination of broadcasting in Canada through the exclusive control being vested in the nationally owned system. Control of what? Of the character of all the programmes, political or otherwise, broadcast by all stations, and of their advertising content. We have approved the national control of all wire networks used to carry broadcast programmes.

Year after year, ever since the establishment of the corporation, the house has endorsed these principles. Undoubtedly in the country to-day there is a powerful attempt to upset the very basis of the act which established the corporation, indeed to destroy that corporation itself, a national organization which laboriously this parliament has built up. Sometimes I fear that even hon. members, perhaps unconsciously, lend themselves, to that kind of propaganda. In recent days we have heard accusations in the house that certain people in the corporation favour, we will say, the C.C.F.—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: On the other hand the C.C.F. believes that, as a matter of fact, we have been discriminated against—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: —in the dissemination of news. Now, just a moment. The other day certain specific statements were made in the house. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) rose in his place and made the statement, for example, that in the night bulletin of February 4 undue prominence was given the leader of the C.C.F. over the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). So, as was my right, I sent for the script, and I am going to place it on record. This is a copy of the official script from the broadcasting corporation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did the hon. member hear the broadcast?

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not hear the broadcast, but I got the official script from the broadcasting corporation.

Mr. GRAYDON: That might not be proof.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member knows that is not evidence of what was said.

Mr. COLDWELL: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. This is the official script from which the announcer gave the news broadcast on that particular evening.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what the hon. member is told, but it is no evidence that he used that script.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am prepared to take the statement of the responsible officials of the corporation, besides those who listened to the broadcast that evening told me the statement made in the house by the hon. member for Macleod was incorrect.

Mr. HANSELL: I heard it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am prepared to take the statement of those who heard the broadcast, and I place the script on record as follows:

> In the House of Commons to-day Prime Minister Mackenzie King indicated that the government might have a statement to make regarding General McNaughton when the Minister of National Defence (Colonel Ralston) spoke on the war appropriation bill.
> Mr. King made this suggestion after two party leaders of the opposition asked that the government make a statement on General McNaughton's resignation.
> The Progressive Conservative house leader (Mr. Graydon) said he was amazed at the position taken by the government. He said the government had said that General McNaughton had left the command of the Canadian Army overseas because of ill health, but General McNaughton had been quoted in the newspapers as saying that he was in good health. Mr. Graydon said the government should explain immediately.
> The C.C.F. leader (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that the whole question be discussed next Monday, but Mr. King replied that he would have to consider the length of time the debate on the speech from the throne would continue.

There is a fair and accurate statement of what actually occurred in the house that afternoon. The script simply recites the facts as a news item.

I have a much longer one, having to do with another occasion. A broadcast of the national news on February 9 was criticized in the house on the ground that undue prominence was given to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). I am not going to read that script, because it is too long. May I point out however that fifty-two lines are given to members of the government and of the opposition. To the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) —and I have counted every part line I could— six lines are given. Let us try to keep a proper perspective in these matters, and see to it that we in the House of Commons, in making criticisms without first of all having a basis for them, do not ourselves undermine the corporation in the minds of the people.

Throughout the existence of this corporation this parliament has urged support for a single national authority, and that the affairs of the corporation be conducted by a general manager and an assistant general manager responsible to the board of governors. Parliament itself—the corporation is a creature of parliament, not a department of government— has endeavoured on every occasion to enact legislation to safeguard the complete independence of the broadcasting corporation. As a trustee for the people of Canada and of those who pay licence fees, the board of governors reports to this parliament through the committee we are to set up to-day.

We have been told that the ministers of the crown are merely channels of communication between the board of governors and the government of Canada. That has been iterated and reiterated before the committee on numerous occasions. As late as last June 9 I questioned the minister closely on this point, and I have a transcript of that evidence before me. I did so because I had some doubts as to whether the minister was carrying out the intentions of the act and not interfering in any way with the broadcasting corporation. My concluding question was whether there had been any interference, and the minister said:

> There has not been any exercise of any political pressure or any attempt made to dominate the board politically and I believe the same goes for those who were in the position before I was.

Since that time there has been evidence of direct political interference with the broadcasting corporation. On November 17 last the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) issued a statement to the press in which he indicated clearly that he had interfered directly with the management of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. He announced that a series of broadcasts planned by the corporation had been suspended. I use the word "suspended," because while most of the newspaper reports used the word "cancelled," subsequently it was shown that the series had been suspended. I think this is the first time on record that any minister has taken unto himself the right to interfere with the management of the broadcasting corporation. The minister's statement was:

> The acting general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation recently discussed with me an item of Things to Come which have been proposed for the CBC programmes.

It matters not whether hon. members were or were not in approval of that programme; the fact remains that the management of the corporation is in the hands of the board of governors; the minister had no right to issue any statement suspending a programme of the corporation, nor had the assistant general manager any right to place this matter before the minister instead of before the board of governors. The board of governors was the only authority that should have been called together if there was any doubt about this programme. As I say, the general manager should not have consulted the minister, or, if he did, the minister should have refused to give any opinion. The act is quite clear as to the functions of the minister, and, as I say, at no time has any other minister misunderstood its provisions.

This house has always recognized the danger of political interference and has endeavoured to safeguard the corporation in every way. The minister had no more right to interfere with the programmes of the C.B.C. than he had to interfere with the programmes of any private radio station. His authority is strictly limited by the broadcasting act. The government itself must to a large extent assume responsibility for the condition into which the broadcasting corporation has fallen. They retained, I think inadvisedly, the board of governors against which the committee of 1942 made very strong recommendations. I say without fear of contradiction that a great deal of the difficulty and the undermining of the corporation was due to the kind of person who was general manager up to the middle of 1942. We know now from his own written record that that gentleman admitted that in his activities in Great Britain before he came here he went to the British Broadcasting Corporation in order to safeguard the rights of what he called private enterprise, in whose employ he is to-day.

I am not going to pursue that. During the following year the gentleman who was appointed as acting general manager, Doctor Thomson of the university of Saskatchewan, did a job upon which we can well congratulate him. He raised again the standard of the C.B.C. and restored it considerably in the public esteem. The failure of the governors to appoint a competent general manager since he left is in my opinion responsible to a large extent for the condition in which we find the broadcasting corporation now. I am certain that the people of Canada are anxious that this parliament and this government shall safeguard this great vehicle of information, this great educational arm, against private interference of any sort.

The dangers of handing over the control of such a corporation or of its facilities to purely private profit-making organizations are recognized even by those in the employ of some of the great private profit-making radio corporations. If hon. members will look up page 247 of appendix No. 1 of the proceedings of the special committee of last year they will find recorded a remarkable address given by Doctor James R. Angell, public service counseller of the National Broadcasting Company of the United States. I noticed in the newspapers that he was in Quebec a few days ago attending a radio convention. He said that the first concern of private broadcasting companies in the United States was that of making money, and of making as much of it as possible. If I may quote his speech in part:

> Critics of the system are also disposed to raise the question as to who really owns our broadcasting. The obvious answer would be the stockholders or the individual owners and, from the legal point of view, this is undoubtedly the correct answer. But when one gets behind the scenes and discovers what part is played by sponsors and by agencies who act as middle-men between the sponsor and the broadcasting company, this answer may be regarded as not quite telling the whole story. If, by leasing the facilities of a broadcasting company for a given period of time, an agency or a sponsor can in fact largely determine what the public shall hear, the practical effect is much the same as though the sponsor and the agency actually owned these facilities. Naturally, the management of a company exercises final control over the programme which goes on the air. Nevertheless, there is still a measure of truth in the old adage—that he who pays the piper can call the tune.

A little later he said this:

> No one can think it strange therefore that, as compared with the ringing tones of the sponsor and the advertising agency, the voices of the church and the school, to mention only these two, are often going to sound rather distant and faint in the broadcaster's ears.

In discussing the soap programmes, to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) indicated some objection or dislike, and which I myself have often criticized, Doctor Angell said this:

> Now there are many who deplore the fact that an industry in which truly enduring and basic public interests are involved, one potentially capable of doing so much to educate taste, to increase understanding, to deepen and strengthen the foundations of our national life, should so often yield to the itch for money and, in consequence, should so frequently indulge in puerile forms of entertainment appealing to the very low brackets of intelligence, on the assumption that only by programmes of that kind can the goods be sold that chiefly support radio.

Just one more quotation from the same address: He said:

> I have met a great many owners and managers of American broadcasting stations in my time and found them fine upstanding business men, but I have infrequently met any whose concern for the public service they were rendering could be mentioned in the same breath with their interest in making money.

I think we should profit by the experience of this man, who has been so closely associated with the National Broadcasting Company. When I have time I listen to radio programmes, and while there is much in our national broadcasting programmes that we may criticize, I say without fear of contradiction that the absence of advertising on so many of our programmes and the attempts that are being made by the broadcasting corporation over the national network to raise the standards of tastes in music, drama and so forth, deserve favourable comment. They have done and are doing a job of which, in many respects, we may be well proud. Some programmes we can criticize, but on the whole the absence of advertising and the type of programme produced compare very favourably with the constant advertising content of the programmes of the great American broadcasting chains. Remember, the words I have quoted this afternoon are not mine but those of the public service counsellor of the greatest privately-owned broadcasting organization in the world, and it was to ensure for the people of Canada radio services that would be freed from the influences to which Doctor Angell refers, that our broadcasting corporation was established.

It is the duty of parliament to see that this corporation is not destroyed. Money-making interests are anxious to undermine it. It appears to me, as it does to many others, that the government has failed in some instances to appoint the right kind of persons to the board of governors. It has appointed persons not sufficiently interested in the subject even to attend, as we found in the broadcasting committees of former years, a sufficient number of the meetings of the board of governors.

Speaking of the board of governors and the right kind of appointments thereto, I congratulate the government upon having appointed recently to the board of governors a man of the type of Mr. Parker of the Manitoba wheat pool, the head of a great cooperative farm organization. I am sure that he will bring to the corporation the point of view of the large number of people who want to cooperate in maintaining this great and effective national service. Of course, there are others of the same type on the board; I am not saying it is true of the whole board, because it has seemed to some of us that some have not taken a sufficient interest in the corporation to do what was required of them.

There are other matters I have in mind, but since I am a member of the committee I shall not detain the house to discuss them now, they can well be brought before the committee itself. I want to say, however, to the government, that the committee of last year and the year before were anxious that Canada's voice should be heard across the air waves of the world, and that to this end a short-wave broadcasting station might be built as rapidly as possible. I do not know just at what stage it is, but in the final analysis it is a matter of money, and at this stage of the war, when we are hoping that within a measurable time we may see its end—although it may be further away than some of us hope—it would be well that Canada's voice be heard on occasion by the oppressed peoples of Europe, by the people of South America and other parts of the world. It is of vital importance that Canada, of which we can well be proud, a country which has attained first place among the smaller nations, should maintain the closest contact with other nations, particularly the small nations, and I am therefore most anxious to see our short-wave broadcasting station completed at the earliest possible moment. We make heavy contributions in mutual aid to our allies. It seems to me a relatively small thing to ask that the necessary equipment for this Canadian short-wave broadcasting station should be given special priority. Construction has been delayed now for some months. I appeal to the government to see to it that the station be completed soon.

These are some of the matters I wished to place before the house, because I feel we have a duty not only to ourselves and to the people of to-day, but also to posterity. A former leader of the Conservative party, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, said on more than one occasion in this house he was quite sure that if the people of Canada had to do things over again, such as the building of great railway systems, they would never allow these railways to get away from the public control; and, he added, how much more important it is that we should not allow the air and the air waves to be alienated from the complete control of the people of Canada. I concur entirely in that opinion.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I am prompted to say a word or two with respect to the setting up of this committee on radio broadcasting and the matter of broadcasting generally. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has referred to a statement I made the other night in respect to a certain proportion of publicity being given his party. That has need for some comment; for since making that statement I have had numerous requests for further information. I have had letters and telephone calls asking me for an explanation; many have congratulated me on the statements I made in bringing this matter to the attention of parliament, and of course it goes without saying there were some who severely criticized me. I shall not deal with that matter at the moment. I will come to my hon. friend a little later.

I know there are views held in Canada in respect to greater control of radio, and there are views in respect to government ownership. Some people believe in government ownership because they hold that the profits that accrue to private industry should be turned back to the public. I am sure that this principle under the present economic system is very greatly misunderstood. However, even granting for argument's sake—I say, for argument's sake—that the principle has some merit, I am certain that when it is applied to national radio broadcasting it becomes only a pretext to focus public opinion on a less important principle, without recognition of the real danger, namely, that of national radio gradually becoming a huge monopoly of government propaganda. Imagine a situation in which a government has the sole right—excluding all others, the government being the only authority—to mould public thought; and may I interject that I should not like to see that day come with a socialist government in power.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or any other government.

Mr. LaFLECHE: There won't be.

Mr. HANSELL: No, or any other government. I will add that, but I am making a distinction by emphasizing a socialist government, because our socialist friends do believe in control.

Mr. COLDWELL: Democratic control—which you do not have under private enterprise.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend likes to interject, and I have no objections. In his speech this afternoon he advocated a greater measure of government control of radio broadcasting.

Mr. COLDWELL: Public control.

Mr. HANSELL: However, for the moment I am not dealing with that. I was talking about profits; and, since the matter of radio profits has been brought to the attention of this country by discussion at previous sittings of the radio committee, I am going to suggest that some investigation be made of that part of commercial broadcasting where profits accruing to the sponsors are involved. I do not now refer to profits which might be made by private stations, although I have no objection to investigation there also. I am not so strongly convinced that huge profits are being made by the private broadcasting stations of Canada. I refer in this respect particularly to profits of commercial sponsors in relation to advertising costs. Commercial broadcasting is essentially a business of advertising, and these advertising costs, paid for by commercial sponsors, I am told run into hundreds of thousands of dollars, or, taking the whole continent, millions upon millions of dollars a year. These advertising costs must be written into the price of products advertised, with the result that the consumer pays the shot. I know that it does not always work out that way, because I realize there is the principle that when a product has sufficient advertising to give it a sufficient volume of distribution it can be produced at a less cost than otherwise. That factor enters into the matter, but it does not make any difference in respect to some investigations which I think should be carried on in that respect. I do not know that it is the duty of the radio committee to do that. It might be the duty of the banking and commerce committee or some other committee of the kind. But I believe that such an investigation would throw quite a light on that subject.

For instance, I have a chart here which gives the talent cost of certain radio programmes. This talent cost is not the whole cost which a sponsor will have to pay. The talent cost of the Jack Benny programme is $20,000 for one programme.

Mr. MARTIN: Jack Benny gets $25,000 a week.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know what his salary may be.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is that the Canadian cost or the international cost?

Mr. HANSELL: No, he is paid by the sponsors of the products, General Foods.

Mr. KNOWLES: We all pay for it.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, you may. That is my argument. The talent costs for the Bob Hope programme are $11,000.

Mr. MARTIN: He is worth it.

Mr. HANSELL: I am sorry; I do not agree with my hon. friend. I do not believe any man is worth $10,000 to read—I am going to say this in spite of the risk of unpopularity—a lot of silly gags which some other men behind the scenes have written up for him.

Mr. MARTIN: What about Charlie McCarthy?

Mr. HANSELL: Well, Charlie McCarthy, the wooden-head, gets $10,000 every time he broadcasts. The Lux Theatre gets $10,000 a programme; Bing Crosby, $10,000; Abbott and Costello, $10,000, and so forth and so on.

Mr. MARTIN: What does Mortimer Snerd get?

Mr. HANSELL: I would not mind being a comedian myself if I were able to get such a salary. But what I was saying is that these are the talent costs, and commercial sponsors have to pay for radio time besides that, on, I believe, anywhere from 100 to 200 stations.

While I am talking about this talent might I make this observation, and I do it on behalf of a minority of people. There are some of us who like to regard the Sabbath as the Lord's day, and yet I find that four of the most outstanding comedians, namely, Fred Allen, Jack Benny, Bob Hope and Charlie McCarthy—perhaps I should say Edgar Bergen—come on the air on Sunday; and since the new network has been set up in Canada some of them have crowded out church services. I do not like that. I know that Sunday is a good day for broadcasting because people are at home and listen to the radio and they naturally listen to these programmes. But we are permitting the commercialization of the Sabbath.

Mr. FAIR: The destruction of Christianity.

Mr. HANSELL: It is one instance of the thin end of the wedge to destroy our great Christian principles, and I abhor it. I am not going to say that we should make them come on the air on some other day because we have no control over that. They are United States broadcasts and there is not very much we can do about the matter. I understand, however, that representations have been made for other programmes to come over Canadian stations. For example, the Tabernacle choir of Salt Lake City is, I believe, one of the greatest on the North American continent. I have heard it. It would come in the east here about twelve noon on Sunday, but I am quite certain that people in eastern Canada do not get it. They might get it from a Buffalo station or some other station in that vicinity, but the people in this part of the country cannot get that programme, and yet it is one of the best, one of the highest types. I mention that in passing.

I come back to the argument with regard to the cost of broadcasting being put into the price of goods, or otherwise. There is another thing that happens. I understand that the advertising costs of a corporation are written into its cost sheets and therefore are not subject to taxation. They are hidden. If I am not right I stand corrected.

An hon. MEMBER: There is a limit.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps so. If there is it is a good thing. But I am simply saying that any taxation which might accrue to the public treasury by reason of the lowering of advertising costs would be a good thing; or conversely the public are paying by reason of a loss of revenue, a part of the advertising costs of these corporations. All these things enter into the picture.

I must spend a little time commenting on the matter my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) brought up. I do not blame him for raising it because it has been mentioned. I call the attention of the house to what my hon. friend said about my remarks the other night. I said he had been given undue publicity, as I thought, on a certain night when, over the air, came the news that the leader of the opposition had asked about the McNaughton affair. Of course, when I mentioned it my hon. friend had to trot down to the office of the corporation and dig out the news broadcast to see if I was right. He claims, of course, that I was not right. There is one question I will ask him. If, when reading that news broadcast, he had found that I was right, would he have read it here this afternoon? However, there is one thing he did not do. He did not check the statement I made. Oh, no; he runs to the C.B.C. This is what I said:

> I might make a further comment—and I am not blaming my hon. friend for this; perhaps he wanted to get a little publicity, and believe me he got it. I happened to listen in on the radio to the two programmes that night.

I did not say that the C.B.C. mentioned him twice. You see, my hon. friend was wrong again. I said further:

> The leader of the opposition was mentioned once in connection with the McNaughton question and my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was mentioned twice.

That is what I heard when I listened to these two broadcasts and I might make this observation. This is a very minor matter perhaps, and I would not bring it up had it not been for the fact that this matter of the C.B.C. publicizing my good friends the C.C.F., and particularly my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar, had been brought to my attention before by many people. I went home after the last session. After driving home from the station I went down town. The first man I met put out his hand and said, "How do you do, Mr. Hansell? Glad to see you back." Then he said, "How is it that the C.B.C. are always talking about this man Coldwell?" That was man number one. I talked with this gentleman for a moment or two and when I moved on a pace another gentleman met me and, of course, shook hands, "How do you do, Mr. Hansell? Glad to see you back; been away a long time?" I said, "Yes, six months or so," and he, too, made the same comment about my hon. friend. I thought to myself, this is rather strange. However, when I went a few paces farther a third gentleman met me, and lo and behold he made the same comment. Incidentally he said, "When was this man elected?" I said, "In 1935." "Well," said he, "where has this man been all these years? I didn't hear very much about him until the past few months or so."

An hon. MEMBER: He wasn't good news.

Mr. HANSELL: Maybe he was not. My friends are jibing me now. Now they say he is good news. Well, he may be, and so are the Katzenjammer Kids. I was not particularly alarmed when the third man spoke up in that way; but living in Ottawa and attending the parliamentary session I must confess I do not listen to the radio news a great deal, because it comes on at an hour when we are sitting or when we are not in our offices. When these men made this comment I recalled a certain incident that occurred during the last session of parliament. The debate in the afternoon was on the estimates of the Minister of Finance and we were discussing an appropriation of half a million dollars in respect of the woollen industry. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) is quite a student, and when he undertakes to master a subject he gets his books and he masters it. I think I can say that on that afternoon the hon. member for Lethbridge was master of the situation; when for an entire afternoon he engaged the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in a debate on one of the most important subjects in this country, the woollen industry. That is all right. At eight o'clock that night the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) came on and during the course of the debate the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar walked in, rose and made a little speech, which recommended that medical services should be distributed a little more adequately throughout the country. It did not take any brains to figure that out.

Mr. COLDWELL: None whatever.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member did not need a variety of books around him to figure that one out; yet he rose and spoke as others did. I recall I went up to my office at ten o'clock; I switched on my little radio unconsciously; I was not expecting to get anything in particular, and the C.B.C. news came on. Lo and behold, what did they report on parliament? "Mr. Coldwell"—it is always Mr. Coldwell—"the leader of the C.C.F. advocated to-night that the government make a more adequate distribution of the medical services of the country." I thought, is that news?—and I listened and listened for the name of Blackmore, but I suppose I could still be listening; nary a sound of the name of Blackmore came over the air. I will invite my hon. friend to trot down to the C.B.C. again and dig that one out.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is your business.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The world never does appreciate genius.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to bother about that; but I will say this, my hon. friend's speech on that occasion occupies half a column of Hansard, and the speech and discussion of the hon. member for Lethbridge that same afternoon occupies eleven pages of Hansard.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That should be pretty clear.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They could not find what he was saying.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend can go down to the C.B.C. and dig out the information that was given over the air on February 22, if he wishes. On that day we were discussing the war expenditures committee. What happened that afternoon? My hon. friend did not talk at all, but the C.B.C. talked about him. He did not talk at all except when somebody rose and irritated him. Of course, such had to be corrected. Something ought to be said. I thought the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) made a speech in the house that threw some light at least on what took place in the committee with respect to my hon. friend's charges. In fact I gathered from reading the speech and listening to it that he attempted to show that my hon. friend's charges were weak. I am not saying whether he proved anything or not, but I am saying that when the C.B.C. reported it, though my hon. friend had not spoken at all, they took about one-half a minute about him. Maybe I should not exaggerate; maybe it was only twenty-nine seconds. You must be exact, you know. They gave this hon. gentleman from Rosetown-Biggar a lot of mention. My hon. friend, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Chevrier) was mentioned quite a little bit as were also a few other people. While many may think they are good speakers, they just got honourable mention that night, and the hon. member for Rosedale never got a word. They never said a thing about him.

I do not want to continue in this vein; perhaps it is not worth mentioning. Perhaps these are just tiny little items in news broadcasts. It may be that I have dug out the wrong ones; but I do say it is my belief, notwithstanding what my hon. friend says, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is giving undue prominence to our hon. friends, and to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in particular. Sometimes I feel like saying, "Who is this superman?" He likes to rise in parliament and say he is the leader of a major political party. I do not know whether this is so or not.

Mr. GILLIS: You are giving him a lot of advertising now.

Mr. HANSELL: Maybe I am. I may want to join your party some day, but I do not think so. I say that because I believe it. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, the C.B.C. cannot dangle the name of Coldwell in front of the people of this country almost every day without its having some effect on them. I believe in some way or another—do not ask me to prove it because I cannot; I have only the same belief that many others have—the hidden hand is there trying to build up the C.C.F. party.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We have news value; that is all.

Mr. HANSELL: You say you have news value.

Mr. REID: That is why he is in favour of it; he is all for it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Do not be envious.

Mr. HANSELL: To get back to the corporation itself; my hon. friend has said that he wants the C.B.C. to control all programmes in Canada; he wants a greater measure of control placed in the hands of the C.B.C. I do not believe that would be a good thing for Canada. I do not believe we should have a body set up to control anything that the public really wants. I do not think it will work out. I am certain it will not. The public are going to make their demands; and furthermore it is a very dangerous thing to have such authority centralized in a body that is so powerful in respect of propaganda.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has talked about the board of governors and has mentioned some changes that should be made here and there. I do not think he went far enough. My opinion is that the whole organizational structure of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be revamped. That is my view. If you want a board of governors, then let them be the governors of the C.B.C. and not the governors of all radio broadcasting in Canada. That is my firm conviction. I have nothing against the corporation; I believe it is a great asset to Canada. But I say that the C.B.C. should operate on a competitive basis with private broadcasting stations. I believe there should be a separate body, a sort of semi-judicial body—not administrative; we may call it a board, a three-man commission, or whatever we like—to which the C.B.C. would nominate one member, the private broadcasting stations another and the government the third, who would be chairman. Let that body administer radio in Canada—and I should not use the word "administer" because I have said it should not be an administrative body.

Let that body supervise, and issue rules and regulations in the best interests of broadcasting; not in the best interests of any corporation or any private station; but rather in the best interests of the Canadian people. That is what we want and what we should have. If we do not have something like that, what are we going to have? We shall have something the same as we have to-day. Some of us have said that if we are to have a board of governors we should have on that board someone familiar with agriculture. I agree with that principle, and I believe the government was wise in listening to our suggestions in that regard. Someone else advocates that on the board we should have a representative of labour. That is all right. The first thing we know someone will suggest that there should be a representative of the professions, and someone else will say that the janitors and office boys should be represented on the board.

Where are we to stop? Let the government name its board of governors for the broadcasting corporation, but revise the rules and regulations so that the supervision of all broadcasting will be placed in the hands of an entirely separate body composed of men with some knowledge of radio, some knowledge of business, some knowledge of art, and some knowledge of what the people want.

This is what I advocate. I do not believe broadcasting in Canada will be satisfactory until something along this line is done. In my view broadcasting in our country under the rules and regulations set out under the present act is not suitable even to the government. They may say it is, but I do not believe that is so. It is a sort of sore spot or irritation, so far as the government is concerned. Let us revise those rules and regulations; let us have a new broadcasting act, and put broadcasting where it belongs.

That is what I ask, and what I would advocate when I sit as a member of the committee.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, after all is said and done, if the programmes had a little more of the humour of the hon. member who has just taken his seat it would not be such a headache to turn on the radio and listen to those programmes broadcast across Canada. The people of Canada are humorous; they understand humour. The corporation, however, seems to be under the impression that the humour of Charlie McCarthy is all that is worth transmitting across the international boundary line.

Many of the United States programmes carry out the policy of those who were in control between 1936 and 1939, and who have been in control since the beginning of the war in 1939. That was a policy of surrendering too much political, economic, social, financial and military initiation to Washington.

After all is said and done, we must look at the constitution of the board. We have before us the original act of 1936. Before that, committees met in 1934 and 1935. The formation of the board was supported by a former prime minister, Lord Bennett, who was leader of the party to which I belong. It was under him that the commission of 1934 was created, and through him that investigations by a royal commission were made in Japan and many other places, before the report was presented. It was never intended that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be outside the control of parliament, either as to policy, name, regulations, expenditures, revenue or development. It was never intended it should be a law unto itself, or that it should operate over the heads of the high court of parliament.

In my opinion the mistake made was that we should ever have had a board. We should have had one chief administrative officer who, with the help of his assistants, would administer the affairs of the board. What are these boards? Undoubtedly any board appointed by the government is a political board. The government of the day appoints the members of the board. Former governments have done the same thing, and the government after this one will probably do the same. Under the act why should clergymen sit on the board? I say the whole administration of the C.B.C. should be administered from the commercial aspect. Why should sectional interests be considered in making appointments? Why should the policy of the board be sectional, rather than national in scope? Why should certain people be appointed only because they represent certain localities, or because they represent a church or some other society?

Should not a commission be a public body administering public funds, and should it not be operated under public ownership, and alone from the commercial aspect? Should it not be free from any of the errors I have mentioned? One section in the report of the committee says:

> Members of the board of governors to be persons of broad outlook, having knowledge of the tastes and the interests of the listening public, and able to make a definite contribution to the solution of the problems before the corporation.

If one looks over the list of those who have been appointed through the corporation can it be said, even by the widest stretch of the imagination, that those who have been appointed have received their appointments for the reasons of efficiency set out in that section?

In addition to that, I believe that nominations to the board should be abolished, and that a chief executive officer should be appointed, who alone will administer the C.B.C., and we would get better results from radio, this mysterious instrument of modern society, than are being obtained from radio operated in the present way. The executive, however, should be completely under parliamentary control.

Another principle laid down by the committee which considered radio broadcasting was this:

> The independence of the corporation from partisan control to be assured by its constitution. As a trustee for the people of Canada and the payers of licences, the Board of Governors should render an account of its stewardship regularly to parliament and be subject to ultimate parliamentary control.

In my opinion we have had too many managers and temporary managers; we have not had a long-term policy of administration, and politics in the C.B.C. have been rampant. The policy has been one of drift, particularly in the last two or three years. I believe that those who are paying $2.50 for licences would receive better results and better programmes and would have more confidence in the system if we had one chief executive.

The political provision was violated in connection with the Winnipeg convention, when Mr. Meighen was not allowed to speak. Again at Hamilton Mr. Bracken was not allowed to speak. If there is no humour in the corporation, there should be some sportsmanship and those who are leading parties should be allowed to give their views on the political situation. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) should be allowed to give his views, and also the leader of the Bloc Populaire (Mr. Raymond). There are other leaders of groups in the house; in fact there is a noble seven at the other end of the chamber. Why should not they all be given equal rights? Some of them may provide some humour. The other day the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains provided considerable humour when he was discussing another matter and his remarks were taken up by the humourists all over the country. He might entertain certain views on some of these public questions.

From 1936 to 1939 when disarmament was taking place, when we were losing our friends and when the causes of the present world conflict were shaping up, this corporation seemed to misjudge the whole situation. Since 1939 they have continued to misjudge things. For these reasons I think the board should be reconstituted and made up of those who have some knowledge of present day matters.

There is a kindred body which seems to be quite a favourite of this board. I refer to the Gallup poll. As I said last year, it is all gallop and no poll. This is one of the most mischievous institutions there is in the country and the Canadian Broadcasting Corportation seems to have a particular fondness for it. The Gallup poll endeavoured to obtain an opinion as to what different countries had done toward winning the war. No one gave any credit to Germany, but the returns showed the following percentages:

	Per cent
Russia	50
Great Britain	42
China	5
United States	3

The same question was asked in the United States with the following results:

	Per cent
United States	55
Russia	32
Great Britain	9
China	4

I cannot understand why this mischievous organization should have so much influence by radio special speakers with the board of governors. This is shown by the announcements that are made. Mr. Gallup, the founder, is a United States citizen and his work seems to be a repetition of Mr. Al. Smith's celebrated "straw vote". Announcements are made which in my opinion should not be allowed during the war. This is just political propaganda, and there should be some censorship or control over this corporation to prevent their sending out political propaganda of this or other description.

The public of Canada are beginning to lose faith in this corporation, not only because of their programmes but because of their failure to do what they were supposed to do. The board of governors, the general manager and the acting general manager have never properly or efficiently taken up the question of education as applied to public broadcasting. This corporation could be a great instrument for furthering education and national unity as well as providing entertainment. They could not draw ten people into a theatre with the humour and entertainment they send out over the radio. On Sunday nights at eight forty-five o'clock the speakers who are to talk on public questions give at times only half truths to the public. More use should be made of the radio as an instrument of education.

The time has come when there should be a reorganization of the whole system. Those who pay licence fees should be given value for their money. Certain sections of the act and of the regulations have not been enforced. Toronto seems to be a dumping ground for officials from all over Canada, and some of the programmes they put out are certainly not up to date. I hope this house in the year to come will see to it that we get a permanent organization with a continuity of policy as intended by the founders of the system. The system we have to-day does not commend itself to the wisdom and judgment of the country. There is wide dissatisfaction throughout Canada, not only with regard to the programmes but with regard to the administration.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): I should like to draw attention to something which I think is of importance to this parliament. We are in a time of war, and it seems to me that the administration of this country and the activities of this parliament should be of greater interest to the people than anything else that happens at any other place within Canada. I am told that the news of what happens in this parliament is edited by a board in Toronto, the members of which do not observe what occurs. They are attempting to interpret to the people of Canada something which they have not seen, something which they can judge only by what is sent to them from Ottawa.

Perhaps this is one reason why at night the ten o'clock news broadcast sent out from Toronto does not seem to us who have been here to portray accurately what has taken place. I most urgently suggest that the doings of this house are important enough to warrant their being edited by people who observe the house in session.

Just to give an example of what this leads to I should like to refer to the news broadcast sent out at ten o'clock on February 21. Before I go on with this may I say that I have been and still am a believer in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation operating as a nationally owned and controlled public institution. I have been a believer in that ever since radio came into existence. The reason why I speak is that the people I come in contact with claim that there is a shading of the news in favour of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) is continually being held up as the leader of the future, as the man who is to lead us into the promised land and all that sort of thing. They claim that, to the extent the radio can do so, it is tending to build up a feeling throughout the country that the leader of the C.C.F. is a man of destiny. There is a widespread belief that the C.B.C. is continually shading the news in that way.

If the C.B.C. is to be used as a political instrument of that kind, then something must be done. People who believe in the C.B.C. just as much as anyone in this house have said that to me. If that opinion exists all over the country, then there must be something wrong and it is not for me or anyone else to prove it by going deeply into the matter. To come to this broadcast of February 21, it outlines in full the charges of the leader of the C.C.F. party in regard to the aluminum contract, and he is given about twenty-five lines. I will now read from the transcript of the broadcast and leave it to the judgment of the house whether it gives a true picture of what actually happened. The transcript goes on to say:

> The Minister of Munitions—Mr. Howe—said that some of the statements which Mr. Coldwell had quoted as having been given in evidence appeared incredible. He thought that the evidence should be tabled in the house.

Then it goes on to speak of the Progressive Conservative member for Danforth, (Mr. Harris) and says:

> The Progressive Conservative member for Toronto Danforth—Joseph Harris—suggested an amendment to Mr. Cleaver's motion for approval of the committee's report. The amendment would require all evidence to be tabled, and discussion of the motion postponed until it had been studied.
> As the Speaker was about to put a motion by Mr. Harris, Mr. King said there were the best of reasons for having the committee sit in camera. He added that the government would welcome full discussion, but that the committee could not fulfil its function if the evidence were made public. Mr. Howe said he was aware it would be a breach of confidence if the evidence were disclosed.

In other words, it starts off with the charges of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and deals with them seriatim and at great length, and as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has stated, the next night the broadcast repeated the charges he had made, apparently to make quite sure that the people would know what the charges were.

Then it creates the impression that just as Your Honour was about to put the motion, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stepped into the breach and saved the motion from being put to the house, and it makes out that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) then changed his mind after the Prime Minister had stepped in. But we who were here in the house know that it was made plain, taking all his remarks together, that the Minister of Munitions and Supply never had any intention that the evidence should be tabled. Here is just one statement of others which should have made it plain. At page 711 of Hansard, he is reported as saying:

> I am quite aware that it would be a breach of confidence, and particularly a breach against myself, if that evidence were tabled.

Can anybody who sat in the house say that the Minister of Munitions and Supply seriously intended that the evidence should be tabled when he had said that it would be a breach of confidence against the government of the United Kingdom and particularly against himself to table it? It was obvious to all that he had no such intention; but here in this broadcast it is held out to the country that the Minister of Munitions and Supply had the idea that the evidence should all be tabled and that then the Prime Minister stepped into the breach, the Minister of Munitions and Supply then fell in line. That is the way it struck me when I heard it. It was held up to the people that the Prime Minister stepped in and stopped him. The fact is it was quite clear that the whole house felt that the evidence should not and could not be tabled. It was not a matter at all of the Prime Minister suddenly stepping in and stopping the evidence being tabled. It was a matter of confidence, trust and good faith toward others, particularly the government of the United Kingdom.

There are people throughout this country, thousands of them in the armed services, who are too busy to follow the daily newspapers carefully, and there are thousands of farmers who take only a weekly newspaper. But they do follow very carefully what comes over the C.B.C. They feel that that is one thing they can rely on to be absolutely unbiased and fair. The reason why I am speaking this afternoon is that it is the duty of this house to see to it that these people's trust is not betrayed and that we do not permit some unknown persons in Toronto, who are not following the proceedings of this house, to shade their reports in such a way as not to give a true picture of its proceedings, and particularly they should not convey to the listeners a wrong impression of what happened in this house. Therefore, I urge that these news broadcasts be absolutely fair and impartial. If they are not; if the idea gets around that these reports are being shaded, what is to become of the people's confidence in national broadcasting? What is to become of their confidence in the nationally owned and controlled radio institution? We had better see to it, if we want to maintain the people's confidence in the national radio system, that such items as this are not repeated and that what happens in this House of Commons is portrayed to the people, not in such a light as this report from which I have quoted, but in the true light, reflecting faithfully the deliberative proceedings of this legislative body of a great nation conducting its business in parliament in a dignified manner worthy of the great nation that Canada is.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) make their accusations against the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, it does seem to me that we should not let this occasion go by before we in this house give the national radio system our fair consideration and look upon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and radio broadcasting generally, from the point of view of what it should mean in our national life. I do not think the man on the street, the average Canadian, has any opinions about radio other than it is one of the greatest organizations for improving human welfare and one of the worst organizations for destruction, if it is used in that way, that this country could ever produce. Taking that into consideration, I think that in setting up the radio committee this year we should try to appreciate the immeasurable importance to Canada of the necessity of national control of radio, having due regard to the importance and efficiency of private radio stations as well. We should take a long-sighted and broad-minded view of radio, realizing the leadership it can give in culture and education, in action, and in insight into future development, instead of being merely the interpreter of the views of any one man or any one party. It is abhorrent to me to think the Canadian government has allowed a regulation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to ban political discussions over the air. What is political? What is not political, I ask? Surely the banning of political discussions by the foster child of the government of Canada casts a slur upon that which is political, a slur which we members of the House of Commons should not stand for. Surely things political should not be represented as being some sort of scurvy generated here which the government cannot allow to be cast out over the air to the people of Canada through the national radio system.

Mr. CRERAR: If the hon. gentleman will allow a question, without agreeing or disagreeing with his point of view, do I understand him to take the position that the government should have issued an instruction to the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the matter of broadcasts?

Mr. BOUCHER: I am very glad to answer that question. Here we have the government of Canada and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation still without a head; it has an incomplete, inefficient and incompetent board of governors, and the government takes no steps to amend that situation at the earliest possible date. Surely that responsibility rests on the government.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is not answering my question.

Mr. BOUCHER: I answered it very clearly, I think.

[Mr. Boucher.]

Mr. CRERAR: No; there is a point of principle involved in it. Does my hon. friend take the position that the government should on occasion, when it thinks it advisable, instruct the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as to their duty?

Mr. BOUCHER: My answer is certainly no. But I also say this, that the government cannot shirk its responsibility by having as its nominees men who cannot reflect its opinions to the people of Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend earlier in his remarks criticized the government because it had not given an instruction to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. BOUCHER: Because the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have carried out a policy that was not consistent with Canadian thought and Canadian desires. As a matter of fact, what has happened to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the past year? I do not think there is anybody in Canada who would not say that the policy of the board of governors, and indirectly of the government, has been a policy of drift. I do not think the leadership has been shown by the C.B.C. in the national, cultural and educational life of the country which the people expected of it. As I see it, cultural and educational matters, as well as music and entertainment, should have priority over commercial or partisan subjects.

We learned last year that the board of governors were pleased over the fact that their income was supporting their programme, so that the C.B.C. was not involving the government in any expense. It does not seem to me that that is to the credit of the corporation. We all realize that in Europe the radio has been used as one of the greatest propaganda machines on the fact of the earth, and that in some places it has had a very evil influence. It is true that in many private stations, particularly to the south of us, where commercial interests preponderate over the radio, another undesirable extreme is reached. Canada set up the C.B.C. with a national network to give an example and to provide leadership to the people, but that leadership has not been forthcoming.

I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that some board should be set up which would coordinate and adjudicate in an impartial manner upon the multifarious problems of radio, not in the roles of judge, jury, prosecutor and accused, but as an impartial body. I believe the board of transport in its dealings with the railways is performing an important function in an impartial way, permitting public ownership and private enterprise to run side by side to the benefit of the people of Canada. In the C.B.C. a similar rule could be applied, but that is not possible while control is confined to one power with a national station, operating at once as judge and jury, as accused and prosecutor.

I am sure the average Canadian citizen is anxious to see the tone of radio broadcasting much higher than it is. He would like to be able to look upon the board of governors of radio as men not only inspired by the national viewpoint and beyond partisan, local or community influences, but having a far-sighted national and international vision, men ready to give leadership and encouragement, men not afraid to delve into the problematical or to engage the best authorities on current problems to broadcast their views, even though those views might savour of something political; for, after all, politics is in our very being, and we must keep our eye on the political ball and the factors of political progress. It is not enough that the C.B.C. has a policy of propagandizing accepted ideas more or less confined to one group or one community. It is my contention that the public are not represented as they should be on the board of governors. Why cannot we have a board unhampered by political, sectional and other prepossessions, prepared to deal with matters on a basis which will give a proper place to commercial, cultural and educational matters, while dealing adequately with news and amusements? Will anybody say that our present board of governors has done that? Can anyone feel that parliament has enabled the board to perform these services, when there has been for so long no governor, no managing director, and a shortage on the board itself?

I do not believe that the C.B.C. has risen to its opportunities. Canadians have not the respect or admiration for the corporation or for the board of governors that such bodies should be able to command. Surely, in relation to matters of current interest, the C.B.C. could broadcast the leads which are given, instead of merely repeating their version of these events. As a member of the house, I reflect the viewpoint of the men I meet when I say that if government enterprise, as exemplified by the present management of the C.B.C. has done the best it can, we want no more of such a board of governors. The time has come, with the war at so critical a stage, with conditions in Canada as they are, to raise the standards of the C.B.C. to a much higher level and to make much greater use of it.

Mr. BERT H. SOPER (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal of criticism this afternoon, some favourable and some unfavourable, of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) raised the old complaint that Mr. Bracken was not allowed to speak over the radio. I should like to ask you and this house why Mr. Bracken should be allowed time on the radio of Canada. Whom does he represent? He does not represent this house; he does not represent anybody; he is neither a member of the House of Commons nor a member of any provincial legislature. It seems to me that any member of this house has more right to ask for time over the C.B.C. than Mr. Bracken has. If anybody is to be granted time to express his political views, let those who are privileged to represent the people of this country come first. If Mr. Bracken wants to "sell" himself to the Dominion of Canada, let him get elected to this house. This is where he should be. He should not be going up and down the country criticizing and trying to defeat every piece of constructive legislation which is put before us. It is easy to go out and criticize; let him come here and take an interest in what is going on and show the people of Canada what he can do.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I feel it is only common courtesy that some member of this group should rise to express a word of sincere thanks to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) for the opportunity they have given to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to-night to mention the name of Coldwell. I suggest to Your Honour that a radio might be brought into the chamber this evening at ten o'clock in order that too many hon. members may not yield to their curiosity to go and find just what is reported on the news.

Before I deal with the one specific point which I wish to mention, I think I should correct the hon. member for Rosthern when he tried to create the impression that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) did not actually change his mind the other evening on the matter of tabling the evidence which we were discussing at that time. The hon. member quoted from the remarks of the minister after, as we feel, he had changed his mind. But the hon. member did not quote the earlier statement when, in response to the question of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) whether he felt the evidence should be tabled, the minister said quite clearly, as reported in Hansard at page 704:

> Yes, I think so; and I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that he move to have the evidence in this particular case tabled in the house.

A little later the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) came into the chamber and spoke to the matter, as reported on pages 709-711. The Minister of Munitions and Supply then rose again to explain his position, and it was at that time that he gave the opposite view which the hon. member for Rosthern has already quoted.

However, I rose for only a moment or two to refer to one matter in connection with the work of the committee which is to be set up under the terms of this motion. It is my privilege in the city from which I come to have fairly extensive contact with trades union organizations and to be at many meetings of trades union bodies. These organizations naturally discuss matters mainly relating to labour conditions, matters closely affecting their own work. But there are many occasions when these bodies discuss other matters of public interest. I know of no matter of public interest which has caused so much discussion in trades union circles over a long period of time, apart from actual labour questions, as the alleged interference by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) in connection with the programme "Of Things To Come," which took place last November. As many hon. members know, many protests have been made by labour bodies as well as by others; and I urge, not only on my own behalf, but on behalf of organizations such as those to which I have referred, that this committee, when set up, go into the matter thoroughly. A full investigation should be made to determine what actually happened at that time, and responsibility for any interference should be definitely fixed. One reason for this inquiry and for fixing the responsibility should be to make sure that this kind of thing will not occur again.

Mr. G. B. ISNOR (Halifax): As a member of the committee for several years I had intended to inquire of the last speaker (Mr. Knowles), the moment he stopped speaking, whether he was making the charge that the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) interfered in connection with the broadcast of a programme known as "Of Things To Come." Was that his charge?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. KNOWLES: If the hon. member wishes to check the record he will find that I insisted that the committee should make an inquiry into the "alleged" interference.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Why don't you be plain about it?

Mr. KNOWLES: If he checks the record he will find the word "alleged" there.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Back-door stuff.

Mr. ISNOR: I am willing to accept the correction.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is no correction.

Mr. COLDWELL: Somebody interfered and we want to know who.

Mr. ISNOR: This debate has taken a rather different turn from that which I expected it would in the discussion of a motion of this kind to set up a committee to inquire into and report upon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in respect of its regulations, revenues and expenditures and all matters coming within the scope of the committee.

In following the several gentlemen who have spoken I was greatly impressed with the remarks of some and not so much impressed with the remarks of others. Perhaps it was a good thing that this debate was brought on instead of having the whole matter referred to the committee without such a discussion, because the public will be able to judge of the attitude of certain speakers. The public will know what their stand is concerning public ownership and private ownership. I have particularly in mind the words used by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in which he said: We have every year endorsed a single broadcasting system, and no effort should be made to destroy our present system. Then he went on to refer to the one single public broadcasting system, indicating in other words that, as far as he was concerned, he was simply saying what he had said in public, that he stood wholly for public ownership.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I happen to have before me a copy of my speech for correction and the hon. member is not quoting it accurately.

Mr. ISNOR: I can only trust to my memory. If the hon. member says I am not quoting correctly—

Mr. COLDWELL: I have the script.

Mr. ISNOR: —I would not wish to do anything that was not right in that respect. I was under the impression, and the great majority are under the impression, that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has repeatedly stated that he stood for public ownership and was more or less against private ownership.

Mr. COLDWELL: That was not involved. As a matter of fact, I was quoting the report of last year's committee when I said that every year we have endorsed public ownership of all high-power stations to be operated under a single national policy.

Mr. ISNOR: I bring the matter to your attention, Mr. Speaker, because of the stand which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has taken. As a member of the committee of last year he took a very active part in making known his views. He was a good member of the committee and he made it quite clear that he recognized that there was a place for private enterprise and private broadcasting.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did to-day.

Mr. ISNOR: Not as clearly as in this perhaps:

> I think we should put this with our record. It is a very interesting criticism of private broadcasting. Now, I am not opposed to private broadcasting. I believe, as I said this morning, that the community station performs a real function.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said that to-day.

Mr. ISNOR: I think we should have that on the record because of the feeling throughout the country, which the hon. member this afternoon has created in the minds of the great majority, that he and his party are for public ownership entirely and against private ownership. For my part, I take the stand that we have a good organization in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I cannot agree with those who criticize it on the ground that there is no head. It is true that at the present time the position of general manager is not occupied, but it must be remembered that this organization has existed for twelve years. We have always had a head, a board of governors, a general manager, and an assistant general manager. In private life, in a commercial business or in any other organization, when there is a vacancy the duties of the vacant office are discharged for the time being by the next in charge, and in this case that happens to be the vice-chairman or assistant general manager, who, I may say, is an exceptionally efficient operator, whose ability I believe is recognized throughout the country. He has done very good work in carrying out the duties of assistant general manager. I refer to Doctor Frigon. I say, therefore, that it is hardly fair for hon. members to rise in their places and say that we have no head, as did the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He said that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has moved ahead without direction and without a head. We have the same control as though we had a general manager to-day. I believe that on the whole the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has shown business ability, as reflected in its financial reports each year. It is true there has been some criticism in regard to the revenue derived from commercial advertising. At one time we thought that $500,000 would be the limit. It has grown to $700,000, $895,000, and over a million dollars in 1942. There might be criticism that that is altogether too much, because it reflects a lot of time devoted to advertising and not sufficient time, as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) said, devoted to other programmes which would be of a nature that would perhaps be more helpful to our morale.

If there is one criticism that could be offered I believe it should be directed toward the manner in which the news is placed before the public. I do not wish to deal with the matter in a partisan manner. If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has been able, by some method or system or organization either within or without the ranks of the employees of the C.B.C., to bring about the result which has been mentioned to-day, the receiving of greater prominence than other hon. members—

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order or privilege, I am not sure which. If the hon. member is suggesting that by some means of organization or otherwise, without or within the corporation, we have special privileges I wish to deny it emphatically and conclusively. I believe that such a statement reflects on the organization I represent and on the corporation. For my part, I wish to deny it explicitly. These unsupported charges against individual members ought not to be made without proof.

Mr. ISNOR: I said I did not wish to make any charge. I say I give my hon. friend a certain amount of credit if he has been able to bring about an organization to supply the news and to have it broadcast in such a way as to receive headlines. I say that because that has been possible during the past month or so it may lead one to think—and perhaps I join with the group—there is a weakness somewhere in the C.B.C. I think that is a matter which could very well be looked into by the committee on radio broadcasting.

Mr. COLDWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. ISNOR: I feel it should be dealt with if for no other reason that to clear the name of the hon. member in the feeling—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I object to this. The hon. member suggests that my name needs to be cleared before this committee. I should like to know what you think of that? I rise to a point of privilege. I am not under a cloud; as far as I know no charge has been made against me. I want that withdrawn.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not know what the hon. member wishes withdrawn. I did say that if there were such an impression existing in the minds of a great many—and apparently there is because of the remarks made by the various hon. members who have taken part in this debate—then in fairness to the hon. member perhaps it might be well for the committee to look into the matter, investigate and clear up the whole thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is a very different matter.

Mr. ISNOR: I am pleased—

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member does not need to have his name cleared anyway.

Mr. ISNOR: I am pleased to reword the thought I had in my mind to meet with the approval of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The fact still remains, Mr. Speaker, that I believe a large number of people in the country are not entirely satisfied that impartial reports were made in connection with the proceedings of this house during the past several months, shall I say?

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar quoted at some length from an address given by Doctor Angell. If I interpreted his remarks correctly, he wished to place before us the views of Doctor Angell as applied to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I believe the situation existing in the United States is altogether different from that which exists in Canada. We have a broadcasting corporation, publicly owned so-called, paid for by the country, in competition with privately owned broadcasting stations. I do not think the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar carry much weight.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say that when I placed Doctor Angell's views before the house I referred to him as being the public service counsellor of the National Broadcasting Company of the United States.

Mr. ISNOR: I was not quoting the hon. member. I pointed out that the reference he made might apply to the system under which they operate in the United States, but it does not apply in the same way to the system under which we operate in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I tried to make that clear.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock we were dealing with the resolution moved by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) in respect of the appointment of a special committee on radio broadcasting. During my remarks I made reference to statements made by hon. members who had preceded me in the debate. I referred particularly to the observations of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, in a brilliant, legal manner, and making the most of a poor case, endeavoured to show that at the present time the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was moving forward without any real direction. He made reference to the fact that it has no general manager, owing to the Reverend Mr. Thomson having resigned from that position.

I then endeavoured to point out that, notwithstanding the resignation of the Reverend Mr. Thomson as general manager, the corporation was still able to carry on in its usual manner. It has an assistant general manager whose duties have been defined and laid down in the by-laws of the corporation, a man who perhaps had a more thorough knowledge of the organization than did the general manager. Possibly the assistant understood the broadcasting system better than any other one person in Canada. Not only has he technical knowledge, but he is known for his judgment, his ability to organize and his thorough knowledge of financial affairs. Therefore I say to the hon. member for Lake Centre, and to others who have voiced similar thoughts, that their contentions in that connection are not well founded.

The hon. member also referred to the appointment of a board of governors who would have the confidence of the people of Canada. In this connection the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher), who blew hot and cold when referring to the efficiency of the administration, expressed similar views, and he was supported by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). The hon. member for Broadview said that the public was beginning to lose faith in the C.B.C. Those remarks, as applied to the individual members comprising the board of governors, or as applied to the board as a whole are uncalled for and ill-timed. We know those men as having sound business ability and judgment. I hold no brief for them, and I know very few of them personally. However, they have appeared from time to time before the committee and have shown by their judgment, their actions and their interest in the affairs of the corporation, that they are well versed in those matters which relate to the corporation's business.

I have in mind particularly the able report presented from time to time by the chairman of that board. Hon. members know he is an outstanding businessman from Montreal. He, in a public-spirited manner, along with the other governors, has shown a willingness to give up his time to work for something he believes to be of real benefit to Canada. The same observations would apply to all the members of the board. I do not believe the people of Canada will welcome the criticism to which we have listened this afternoon.

Just before six o'clock I was interrupted by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Apparently I had misunderstood his remarks in one or two instances. I was pleased to be able to correct any impressions I may have gathered from his speech. However, during the evening recess someone said to me, "Apparently the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is not very consistent. In one instance he and his followers make a strong plea for public ownership of practically everything affecting the Canadian economy. Then he takes an altogether different stand, when occasion arises, by stating that he has no objection whatsoever to private enterprise." It is difficult for the average person to understand the position taken by the leader of a political group who on one day leans over backwards to proclaim his strong belief in public ownership, and the next day, seeking to make his position clear in respect of public ownership, as far as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is concerned, states, "I like competition, and we can have it only through privately owned stations." He and I are in accord in that thought. I believe in competition and in free enterprise. I believe firmly that that is the only way in which we can build up the best possible system and bring about the greatest possible good. We can do that only by having and using private enterprise in a way which will help our Canadian economy.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar quoted a United States authority in reference to certain matters. I stated just before the evening recess that I did not believe his references would apply to Canadian broadcasters in the same way that they would apply to the systems operating in the United States. It must be remembered that two distinct systems are involved. One is a so-called public ownership system, and the other private ownership. One is largely subsidized by fees from the Canadian public which, in 1942, amounted to $3,485,331.92. That is the size of the subsidy which is being passed on to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to use against the private companies, which are obliged to carry all their overhead expenses and do their broadcasting without any outside assistance whatsoever. That is a real handicap.

We are reminded that the commercial broadcasting revenue or income of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation amounts to over a million dollars, with miscellaneous income of about $19,000. We see from this that the corporation had about $4,500,000 with which to carry on its work in the year ending March 31, 1942. Its total expenditures, which I shall not detail, amounted to about $4,000,000, leaving an operating net surplus of $299,321.36. I have placed this net operating surplus on record to show that the corporation was able to carry on in a successful manner. Therefore, once again I return to the remarks of hon. members sitting in opposition who have said that this was not an efficient administration, and that the corporation's affairs were not carried on in a manner befitting an organization of that kind.

The balance sheet of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation demonstrates its business abilities. I do not wish to take up the time to go into all the details, but the balance sheet shows that there are assets of $2,478,518.45 which have been created during the period of their operations. It is true that there are liabilities, but the operating surplus is shown as $1,725,000.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar quoted a United States authority. I want to repeat that I think there is a place for private broadcasting in Canada. If we are to get the best out of our publicly owned system it will be achieved through the competition given by private broadcasting. I should like to refer to a statement made by Mr. Joseph Sedgewick, K.C., in which he states that there is a place for both publicly and privately owned broadcasting facilities. He said that the private station has a vital place in Canadian broadcasting which would suffer severely if it were driven out of existence. For some years Mr. Sedgewick has been general counsel for the Canadian broadcasters' association. He goes on to refer to their usefulness. For years the democracies have prided themselves upon having free speech, free broadcasting facilities and so on, and I contend that nothing should be done to hamper the private stations in fulfilling their duties and carrying out their functions. I question if there has not been too much restriction placed upon private broadcasting.

I am inclined to agree with hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), who have suggested that a small commission should be set up. I believe I would support such a system. The corporation could carry on with its board of governors, but their duties would be directed more particularly to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. There would be another small board or commission having jurisdiction over all broadcasting in Canada. This board would be similar to the board of transport commissioners. The Canadian National Railways, a publicly owned system, and the Canadian Pacific, a privately owned line, both come under the jurisdiction of the transport commissioners and their rates are fixed and other matters attended to by that body.

I would direct the attention of the committee to the manner in which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has expended certain moneys during the past year, and especially to what it has written off in the way of depreciation. I should like to draw this to the attention of the minister under whose department the C.B.C. operates. While the policy of the government has been to restrict expenditures they have allowed the C.B.C. to make some rather large expenditures. I have in mind particularly the new secondary network which has been established. I realize that there may be a need for such a network, but I think it would have been as well to hold up any such expansion until the close of the war.

In the eyes of the average business man the write-off for depreciation by the corporation appears to be altogether too large. In ordinary business we are allowed to write off two and a half per cent or five per cent on property and ten per cent on fixtures, but the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have, I understand, written off as much as fifty per cent. These are matters which could very well be considered by the committee being set up.

I believe the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is doing a good work in Canada. It has done much to advertise our victory loans. Without its work the public would not have known of the benefits to be derived from subscribing to these loans, and the loans might not have been as heavily subscribed. It has made it possible for outstanding speakers from different parts of the world to make known to our people what other countries are doing. At times these speakers have complimented Canada upon the excellent work done during the present war. This committee has an important job to do. Having worked with the members in previous years, I am satisfied that they will carry out the duties entrusted to them in a very able manner.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, in reading over this motion I see that one of the objects of appointing this committee is to have them review the policies and aims of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as well as its regulations. There is one point I wish to emphasize in particular. This committee should lay stress on the necessity of more control over the broadcasting of lectures through the private stations. As an example of what I mean I should like to give particulars of a case which has been submitted to me in connection with lectures broadcast over station CHRC in Quebec by two individuals, Jean Bourget and Jean Duval, organizers of the Progressive Workingmen's party.

It may be said that the Progressive Workingmen's party is a political party, it having a representative here in the house in the person of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), but everyone is aware that this party is the communist party and is recognized as such by its leader Tim Buck. To permit people to lecture over the radio and insult the religious feelings of the larger part of the population of Quebec is working against the unity of Canada. These two cases have been submitted to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), but he has replied that he has no power to stop this.

May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in framing future regulations the committee should see to that point and emphasize the necessity of not permitting any lectures that may be an insult to a large portion of the people and their respected traditions. I have every confidence that the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche), who is also a member of the proposed committee, will see to that very important point.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to compliment the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) upon his able defence of this great publicly owned enterprise notwithstanding his declaration of faith in private enterprise.

There has been much criticism of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during the course of this debate. That criticism is, I think, good for the C.B.C. It is a safeguard against that eventuality which some hon. members visualize, the growth of a powerful publicly owned system becoming an instrument of political propaganda. But so long as the C.B.C. and other government-owned enterprises are subject to criticism and control by this parliament, elected by the people, I think we are on safe ground. Those who are afraid of that situation are in reality expressing their fear of democracy in action. They are afraid of putting democracy into action. They are afraid of leaving in the control of a parliament elected by the people an institution such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The corporation has been criticized on account of its earnings, because it has been a commercial success. I am confident that if the corporation had not shown a favourable balance some of these same critics would have criticized the corporation for being inefficient. Actually most of the criticism this afternoon boils down to this, that Mr. Bracken and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) did not get enough publicity over C.B.C. and that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) got too much. One hon. member has already questioned before the house just why Mr. Bracken should be entitled to so much publicity. Let me remind the house that Mr. Bracken has not yet a single Progressive Conservative elected to this house; there has not yet been elected to this parliament any member as a Progressive Conservative. Every member of that party sitting in this house was elected as a member of another party or a party that went by another name. I have no objection to the hon. member for Lethbridge getting more publicity. Actually I think the country could profit if the C.B.C. did carry some of the things that the hon. member has told us in this house.

I do not see why the C.B.C. should be criticized for giving publicity to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The C.B.C. is not alone in giving publicity to the C.C.F. I recall being in New Brunswick last summer, a province which had scarcely heard of the C.C.F., and yet one of the papers of that province carried the name of a provincial leader of the C.C.F. on its front page for nearly two weeks.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who is he?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: As a matter of fact, during several months last summer the press of this country gave more publicity to the provincial leader of the C.C.F. in British Columbia than to either Mr. Bracken or to the premier of that province. Actually it will be found that the press of this country is constantly keeping the C.C.F. before the public. Look over the records of Hansard for this session and you will find that the same hon. gentlemen who have criticized the C.B.C. for publicizing the C.C.F. have done very little else during this session but publicize the C.C.F. You will find pages and pages of Hansard devoted to nothing but to publicizing the C.C.F. party. So that you cannot blame the C.B.C. for publicizing a party that is so much in the news to-day.

I should like to compliment the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, not upon the publicity they have given to the C.C.F., but upon the good work they have done in helping the Canadian people to appreciate the finer things of life. During this war the C.B.C. have struggled against numerous obstacles and the difficulty of securing good talent in war time. I think they have done a remarkable job in maintaining the morale of the people and giving us an opportunity of appreciating some of the best in literature, art and music and in the discussion of public and social affairs. I compliment the corporation upon that good work.

There are one or two points I should like to call to the attention of the committee before I take my seat. They are not serious. I found last summer, while in New Brunswick, considerable criticism of the fact that a great many people there who were paying licence fees to the broadcasting corporation were unable to get the broadcasting station at Sackville. My information, gathered from radio engineers, some of them employed at that station, is that because of the land area of the maritimes it is practically impossible for one high-powered station to cover that territory adequately, and consequently there are a great many people living in parts of New Brunswick who find it difficult to get that station.

My attention has been called by a number of correspondents to the fact that some of the privately owned stations which have been changing hands during the past few years have in reality been coming under the ownership of private chains contrary to the act. Theoretically these stations are supposed to be privately owned; actually, I am told, a considerable number of them are in reality owned by the same interests. I am quite confident that the committee will look into this matter.

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): The setting up of this committee to-day for the purpose of inquiring into the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is but an implementation of recommendations which were made by the committee last year and the year before. I am sure that, in taking the course which they have, the government are taking a course which will renew the confidence which the people of Canada have, and which the parliament of this country should have, in this great public utility.

The criticism which we have heard this afternoon and this evening with reference to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been mostly of a destructive nature. Criticism, we all agree, can be of two kinds; it can be either constructive or destructive. So far I have not heard from those who would criticize the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation many suggestions which, if put into operation, would tend to make that body better or to have more of the confidence of the Canadian people.

I am not disturbed about the place of prominence which appears to have been given to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) in some of the news broadcasts which are made, because I fully realize that the more prominence which is given to the hon. member and his party and the policies of that party, the more clearly will the people realize what they would come to if that party should by chance ever come into power.

He complains of the "soap programmes". What will happen if his party should come into power? Not only would the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation become publicly owned and publicly operated, but all the private chains and stations in this country would be taken over, and not only the soap advertising but the "baloney" advertising as well would be paid for by the people of this country through the licence fees which they pay. Let me say to him that our people are not so gullible as all that. So that the more prominence that is given to Mr. Coldwell and the policies of the party he represents, the more it will work to their detriment and to the advantage of the system which is in vogue in this dominion at the present time.

I am sure that all realize that radio is a vital organ in Canada's national life, and the people are convinced of the soundness of the policy of publicly owned radio as an instrument of education, information and entertainment. Above all, in war time no greater instrument of building up and sustaining public morale exists.

It is very easy to criticize. While we are making that criticism, would it not be well if we had some knowledge of the accomplishments of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? I think it can be fairly said that the corporation has a fine record of accomplishments in the last six or eight years. Radio coverage has been extended from 46 to 92·4 per cent of the population. Four high-powered stations have been completed across Canada. Interference from United States and Mexican stations has been limited by wise agreements. Programmes have been most materially improved and extended by fostering native talent and securing the best programmes from the United States and Great Britain. Since we last met, a new type of news service has been inaugurated. The C.B.C. subscribes and pays for a news service which is supplied by the Canadian Press and the British United Press. That has given greater coverage. More particularly, the corporation's contribution to war publicity in every phase has been outstanding and has formed a valuable link between the soldiers overseas and their relatives at home. In addition, we have with the armed forces at the present time in Italy, as we had in Africa, a mobile unit which has operated continuously throughout the different theatres of war.

In addition to these achievements, since the last report was given to parliament there has been started the building of a short-wave station. Also another network, known as the Canadian network, has been established.

These, Mr. Speaker, are achievements which the Canadian people ought to know of, and I am sure that they have accrued to the benefit of the listening public throughout Canada.

Criticism has been made with reference to the directorate. That directorate has been considerably strengthened. The directors who have been added are Mr. Chase, Mr. Parker and Mr. Crawford. These men are outstanding in their particular lines of endeavour or of business; they are men who enjoy the confidence of the people who know them, and who bring to the directorate years of experience and good judgment.

It is true that the position of general manager has been vacant, as such, for a number of months. There cannot be any great criticism in that particular regard. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) says that that has brought about chaos in the direction of the management. There is nothing at all, in my judgment, which would indicate that there has been chaos of any kind with reference to the management of the C.B.C. The assistant general manager, Doctor Frigon, stepped up to the position—temporarily—as general manager of the corporation. There is not a man on the North American continent who has greater technical knowledge of radio than has Doctor Frigon. I submit that the direction of the management of the corporation has actually been bettered by stepping up Doctor Frigon to that position than if a new man had been appointed to it.

With reference to the managerial set-up, I believe the time has come when it would be advisable to have a full-time, well-paid general manager of the corporation, a man who would have the same rank as a deputy minister and would have under him a general manager who would be his executive head. In that event it would probably be possible to have a much smaller directorate. I realize very well the difficulties there are in this country with reference to a directorate of such an organization as the C.B.C. Canada's geographical position, the various national aspects and, if you wish, religious aspects of the undertaking, and other considerations make it extremely difficult to secure a directorate which will work in harmony all the time. Since the last report of the committee, the directorate have been meeting much more frequently than they formerly did. Meetings are held every two months, but I would suggest that if there were a smaller board of governors it might be well to have regional advisers for the four different sections of the country, the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and western Canada. We could easily have managerial or regional advisers in these four sections who would give the benefit of their experience, and they would probably be much more conversant with the problems that confront radio management in their own particular sections.

Let us, however, face the facts. There will never be a radio set-up in this country which will entirely satisfy all sections. In the very nature of things that is not possible, because there is such a diversified interest in the public. One part of the public wants sports; another part wants music; another part wants some kind of intellectual lectures, and when they turn on the radio and do not get the particular programme which they like they think the radio is to be condemned for that reason. We have to cater to a great population with a diversified interest, and as long as the national system is making an attempt to cater to that diversified population, with its various tastes, we cannot please all at the same time. That might just as well be borne in mind when there is criticism of the corporation.

Some mention has been made of the amount of commercial work which is carried on by the organization; I mean the fees which are collected from industry for advertising purposes. It was never contended, as has been stated in some of the newspapers of the country, that the C.B.C. could carry on entirely on licence fees collected from the public. It was always thought there would have to be some revenue from commercial advertising. It has been said that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was originally constituted on the altruistic basis recommended by the Aird commission, that all revenues which the publicly-owned corporation required were to be provided by the licence fees. Mr. Morin, chairman of the board of governors, answering a criticism by a newspaper in this country in that regard, has this to say:

> This statement, though completely erroneous, has been circulated so assiduously and continuously by critics of the corporation and especially among the newspapers, that many who have never consulted the record have come to believe it. The Aird report says definitely: "It is rather difficult to estimate what revenue would be collected for the rental of time, but we think that an amount of approximately $700,000 annually could be expcted at the beginning." Note, the Aird commission says "at the beginning", which indicates clearly that the commissioners expected this sum to increase from year to year.

The second error has to do with the revenues of the C.B.C. from advertising. It was stated as $1,800,000 a year in 1943. As a matter of fact, that is exactly $500,000 or nearly forty per cent more than the estimated revenue for 1943-44, which is $1,300,000. Then Mr. Morin goes on:

> Even this revenue, however, is not net. There are numerous items which must be deducted from it to obtain a net figure to the corporation. Moreover, it includes a very substantial volume of governmental war advertising which is obligatory and transitory.

That is to say, when the C.B.C. do a certain amount of advertising for the government they are paid for it and that is business which they cannot look to continuously from year to year, so that it is of a transitory type which the organization cannot count on.

> If all these are considered it will be found that C.B.C. revenues from commercial broadcasting even after several years of operation do not greatly exceed the figures originally set in 1928 by the Aird commission. There is no enormous jump in advertising revenues as suggested.

I see no harm in the C.B.C. getting a certain amount of revenue from advertising. All organizations having to do with broadcasting in the United States are privately owned and obtain their entire revenue from commercial advertising, and the revenue of some of these organizations is very high. That of the national Broadcasting Company is $80,000,000 a year, and that has something to do with the type of programmes we are bound to have. Any organization that has a revenue of $80,000,000 a year and a population of 130,000,000 from whom talent can be drawn is in a much better position to give programmes that are considered better than those we are able to provide in this country.

What we want to do is to build up in Canada a type of programme that will be indicative of our Canadian people and Canadian culture, and it is folly to think we can have programmes put over the C.B.C. network that will compete with those in a country in which bigger organizations with much more money to spend are operating.

It has also been said that there is conflict between the C.B.C. and the privately owned stations. I do not think anything could be farther from the facts. The C.B.C. and the privately owned stations are made to appear as competitors, implying beyond question that there is unfair competition and disaffection among the privately owned stations. The facts are anything but as represented in that type of statement. The relationship between the C.B.C. and the privately owned stations is one of cooperation, not competition. Of the eighty-nine private stations that are on the air, seventy are on one or other of the C.B.C. networks and share in the revenues from network advertising, and they share on a very fair and equitable basis. They receive every day many programmes which they could not otherwise broadcast and which listeners in many parts of the country could not hear were it not for the C.B.C. network programmes which enhance the prestige and greatly increase the audiences of the privately owned stations.

I submit that were it not for the C.B.C. with their two extensive networks across the country, the manner in which they feed the privately owned stations with programmes, and the contribution they make to the revenues of those stations by passing on advertising to them, these privately owned and operated stations could not exist. It is because of that fact, because they are willing to cooperate with this great national and publicly owned utility, that the relationship between the privately owned station and the nationally owned station is as harmonious as it is.

In conclusion, I see a great future for radio in Canada. Let us remember that it is only in its infancy. I hope that the government will continue to maintain it as a strong public utility and a great instrument for education, information and entertainment. I hope that the committee, which is about to be set up, will give the affairs of the corporation earnest and sincere consideration and will make without fear or favour such recommendations as are considered to be in the interests of this public utility of the Canadian people.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I should like to support the hon. member who has just taken his seat; but in the words of another we might well say that "the half has not been told". I have appreciated the work of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in many ways. We have fun for the children; we have beautiful swing music for the young people and the help in the home, and we have relaxation for those like ourselves who have a good deal to think about when we can turn on the radio and listen to the broadcast of a hockey match. If we turn down the lights we can visualize ourselves witnessing a really thrilling game.

But that is not what I want to speak about. I should like to say, in support of the management of the C.B.C., that they are doing a great job in putting on "The Church of the Air" on Sunday afternoons. That half-hour on Sunday afternoons is better than all the rest that is put on the air on Sunday. It gives a colour that is badly needed to the citizens of Canada. Not only that but "The Church of the Air" on Sunday afternoons does two things. It permits the citizens of Canada to hear the best clergymen of the dominion, and those who listen in to "The Church of the Air" can go back and tell their own minister that he compares favourably with the best doctors of divinity in Canada.

I should like to pay my tribute to the local broadcasting stations. We are permitted to have a devotional period over our local station nearly every morning in the week, and they do not charge us five cents for it. Anybody who would not appreciate that is extremely stingy. I was one of those who tried to help along that line, and I have received more letters because of that than I ever received from giving a political speech over the radio. Therefore I say that the management have the right to be supported in giving leadership of a kind that is badly needed all over Canada, in allowing each of the denominations to have its turn on the air, to enlighten the citizens of Canada and to tell them of the Master Workman whom if they will follow, they will never come to grief.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): It is not my intention to delay the passing of the resolution to set up the committee; but before the motion is put to a vote I should like to suggest to the minister under whose department the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation comes, that they should be furnished with more powerful stations, stations that can send the message over the air for a greater distance than any of the stations we have in Canada can now send them.

In the Yukon we are not very far away from Vancouver, or Edmonton or any of those northwest cities. But in our locality it is seldom, if ever, that we can get any sound of a Canadian broadcast. We can get San Francisco, Seattle, Chicago, New York and London, England, but not Toronto, Vancouver or any of the Canadian cities.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do you get Watrous?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): No. If the work of the corporation is to be effective in Canada it should have better equipment. Something has been said about the commercialization of the C.B.C. Advertising over the radio can be overdone, or, at least, I think it can be. There was an instance that came to my attention just a few weeks ago. Those of us who listen to the radio recall that usually when a broadcast is begun, the listeners are told the time of the day by a certain make of watch. I have never seen the watch they refer to and I do not know whether it is a good watch or a poor watch; but I do know that one listener said to me, "If I had to buy a watch and could not get any watch other than the one they advertise I would carry a sundial rather than buy one of those." As I say, advertising can be overdone, but I should like the minister to consider the suggestion that radio broadcasting stations be made stronger and more effective in order to reach the distant points in Canada.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Some of the remarks and speeches made this afternoon impel me to rise in my place and say a word or two regarding some of these before the resolution is passed.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), in speaking about publicity, pointed out something each and every hon. member knows and fully realizes, namely, that speeches made in this house against either the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) or the C.C.F. have the effect of giving him or them lots of publicity; and they have had lots of publicity so far this year, due to that very method being applied. The hon. member for York South who, by the way, is one of the newer members of the house, may think he is letting the members of the house into a secret. Let me say to him in all sincerity that he is entirely wrong. Many of us have realized for a number of years that the more you attack a person or a party, the more you are publicizing that individual or party and making them better known to the world. I just wish to disillusion his mind in that respect and to tell him that many of us are fully aware of that. Three years ago the viewpoint was held by many members of the C.C.F. party that their speeches and debates in the house had the members of parliament buffaloed, but at least some members of that party have changed their minds in that respect, because they have realized this year that there are members on this side of the house who can hold their own when it comes to debating. I point that out in passing, because I should not like the impression to go abroad that the members on this side of the house are a lot of greenhorns; they are not.

Some references were made to the fear that some of us had of turning all radio over to the C.B.C.; that we were somewhat afraid of democracy. That is not an entirely true interpretation of the views which many of us hold. May I say that I am one of many other hon. members who fear a government monopolistic concern, just as much as we fear a private monopolistic concern. There is just as much danger in one as there is in the other, for this reason: we are nine provinces, and I view with some alarm much of the centralization that has taken place in Ottawa since the war commenced. Perhaps I speak as one who comes from three thousand miles away and who views with alarm this centralization; yet I say to the hon. members, let us be very careful and watchful of this government monopolistic concern. We know not what the future may hold; but, if not properly controlled or adjusted, it may be just as evil an any private monopolistic concern could be.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, because, to my mind, they have done a great work. I do not think, however the entire picture has been put before the house this afternoon. I rather suspect the C.C.F. realize to a greater extent what the act actually contains than do some other hon. members. I was one who sat in the house in 1932 when the first radio bill was passed. I was more susceptible in those days than I am to-day, and I fell for things much more readily than I do now. I must admit that I was somewhat carried away by the statement of the then Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, who painted a wonderful picture of what the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would be for this country. He had in mind something which is still incorporated within the powers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but which is not generally understood, namely, the idea that there would be no private stations, once the corporation could operate fully.

There are those in the house who believe that everything in this country should be government-owned or state-owned. I differ from those views, and especially as it applies to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It was pointed out in 1932 and has been pointed out since that radio in Great Britain is entirely government-owned. The statement was made further that in the United States, our neighbour to the south of us, it was entirely privately-owned.

I am one who believes we should follow neither country. This country is entirely different from the United States. We are a country of only some twelve million people. The latest report I have from Great Britain is —and it might be well for the committee to look into this—that the people over there are just waiting for the end of the war so that they can throw overboard their government-controlled radio. That is the information I have. Let us not be too easily carried away with the thought that as a part of the commonwealth we in this country might very well follow along the lines of Great Britain. I say to members of the house, and to the committee to be set up: Let us have our own system, one peculiar to this country of ours, following neither the one in Great Britain nor that in the United States.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I believe by way of interjection, compared the radio with the two railway companies to-day. That is just the idea I should like to see carried out, a radio system somewhat similar to the two railway companies, one privately owned and the other government-owned, with a body supervising both. While there has been a good deal of criticism against private ownership by those who say, "criticism is just an attempt by the privately owned radio stations to throw the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation overboard," the information I have is that the owners of private radio stations have nothing but praise for the government-owned corporation. They realize, however, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is working under difficulties, and that those difficulties are contained within the very act under which it works.

The owners of private radio stations do not want the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to be done away with. And while we give praise to the C.B.C. we must also give praise to the private stations, because it must be remembered that they were in existence long before the C.B.C. came into the picture. They would be in a better position to-day, were it not for the fact that they are circumscribed by the rules and regulations laid down by the C.B.C., the object of which in 1932, and I think in 1936 when the bill was put through, was gradually to have all radio absorbed under government ownership.

That thought and that information has not been put before members of the house, and I am taking a few minutes time just to place it clearly before them, believing that the act itself should be changed, and also that there is a place in this country for both privately owned and government-owned stations. If that change is not made, and privately owned stations are put out of business, we might have a serious monopolistic state-owned concern which none of us would like, and for which the country would suffer.

Information is given to me that on account of this very fact Canada's position will be very weak in 1946 when the conference is held at Havana, because the lines in this country have not been fully and properly developed. As is well known, the privately owned stations are held down to not over 1,000 watts. We in British Columbia can very well complain about the discrimination we suffer because, while Toronto and Montreal under the C.B.C. have 50,000 watt stations, there is no such station, or no station of that power in British Columbia. I bring this matter to the attention of the committee, and would ask that they give it consideration.

Something has been said about freedom of the air. I draw to the attention of the committee that there is some danger of allowing too many newspapers or newspaper chains to own and control private radio stations. In that lies a danger. A short time ago ex-Premier Pattulo of British Columbia introduced a measure which, I understand, has been refused by the legislature, under which he would compel newspapers to print letters sent to them in self-defence by those who have felt that they have been defamed through either editorials or letters sent to the newspapers concerned. Nothing so far, I believe, has been done about that bill, but it has some merit. It does show, however, the trend of things, and that matters of this kind will have to be considered. I would ask the committee to view that aspect of our radio set-up, and find out how many newspapers are in control of private radio stations. More than one newspaper has taken the attitude, and so stated, that it was in control of many of the public men in this country and, by criticism, could put some of them out of public life. I, for one, do not want to see freedom of speech, either through the medium of the press or over the air, put into the hands of private monopoly, nor do I wish to see freedom of speech over the air put completely under a government monopoly, such as we are drifting to in this country.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon and this evening I listened to some excellent and constructive criticisms, and to others which, to my mind, were to the contrary. First, I shall say a few words, not about that which is constructive, but in answer to some of the allegations which have been made in this honourable house.

Before proceeding to do so, may I observe that we in Canada have in operation a dual system of radio broadcasting. We have a system which last year I described in the following words—words which I believe still describe the situation prevailing in Canada:

> In the matter of radio broadcasting as in so many other respects, Canada occupies a midway position between Great Britain and the United States. In Great Britain, broadcasting is controlled by the crown, whereas in the United States, radio is privately owned. In Canada we have both systems and I have not yet observed anything which has convinced me that we should be better off with either one or the other system alone. It is a matter for serious consideration whether it were wise to make up our minds in regard to this matter whilst Canada is engaged in war, or even until some time after the war is over, until victory is won, and we are well advanced in the reconstruction work which must necessarily follow this war.

I make the further observation that Canada is still engaged in a life or death struggle with her enemies. The flower of our young manhood and womanhood are fighting our enemies thousands of miles away from their homes. It might not be fair to those who have undertaken the great responsibilities of defending us so that we may live safely in peace at home to decide certain problems before they are able to return to this country. War time is not a normal time. Situations are aggravated in times of war. I am really stating my personal belief that we would do well to make haste slowly in deciding finally whether Canada is to adopt one of these two systems or whether we should try to do better with what we have.

It is possible to do better with what we have. That applies not only to our radio broadcasting system but to every other human endeavour. It is our purpose in life to progress, to do better with those things which we control. It was with real regret that I heard to-day what sounded to me like reflections upon those Canadian citizens, all persons of standing and quality, who have assumed the onerous duties of membership on the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is indeed poor recompense to be criticized in a place where they have no voice.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister if he has read the report of the 1942 committee because that is all that was quoted?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not want to lose the thread of my thought. As I say, I was grieved to hear these persons dealt with in a manner which I thought was unfair in a place where they had no voice. I want to come to their defence in all fairness and in all decency to them as well as to other persons who serve Canada and who have no voice in this house.

Some of the members of the board of governors of the broadcasting corporation have been praised and they should be praised. I believe the nominations which I had the honour to recommend were highly meritorious. Those people honoured the board of governors by accepting the positions, just as they were honoured by Canada by having those positions offered to them. A lady was named a governor in order that the women of Canada might have a representative on this board to defend if necessary the particular interests of Canadian womanhood. That lady is a jewel in the crown of the broadcasting corporation. I know of no one I would rather have on the board of governors than one gentleman who has had such a splendid and long experience in matters concerning labour—I refer to Mr. Howard Chase. He has done an extremely good job since he was appointed, as has the lady.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who is the lady?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mrs. Sutherland. She replaced Mrs. McClung who had to resign because of ill health. Another appointment was that of Mr. Crawford of Toronto. He is a man of affairs, a broad-minded and fair-minded gentleman. Let me say to my hon. friend who does me the honour of looking at me at this moment that there are many excellent men in Toronto.

Mr. BRUCE: I would approve your selection there.

Mr. LaFLECHE: It was my good fortune to have my invitation to join the board of governors accepted by another gentleman who for years has been actively engaged in agriculture. He is still carrying on that occupation, but his activities have increased to the extent where he has assumed responsibilities over matters concerning many thousands of his fellow farmers. I refer to Mr. Parker of Winnipeg. I suggest that that lady and those three gentlemen could not be bettered anywhere in Canada. We in this House of Commons owe those four persons a debt of gratitude for their willingess to continue to serve under what I submit are not very pleasant circumstances because of the things that have been said about them and about their work.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there not one jewel missing from the crown you spoke of?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is going to be filled.

Mr. LaFLECHE: There is only one jewel in the crown; the others are mere gold; they constitute the setting. I was coming to that vacancy. That vacancy has caused considerable concern to some of my hon. friends in this house and to some people outside the house. I have been taken to task by a genial hon. gentleman who sits on the other side. He is such a genial and fine gentleman that I have trouble at times in believing that he can speak so harshly and drastically to me and to others of his colleagues in this house. But to relieve his feelings, to bring his blood pressure down a little, let me say that having given the house the measure of the standard of quality of the members of the board of governors as I would like to continue to choose them, I hope very soon, next week, to announce the appointment of a person who will compare very favourably even with those I have mentioned. But the board of governors have not yet made a recommendation to me in regard to the general manager. I know on good authority that the board of governors have been able to operate very successfully even though there has been one missing, No. 9. It must be remembered that the radio broadcasting act provides for the automatic filling of the position of general manager when he is absent. Therefore, there has been at all times a general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Section 6 of the act makes the provision I have in mind in regard to the appointment of a general manager of the corporation. It says that the general manager shall be named by the governor in council on the recommendation of the board of governors of the C.B.C.

I know the board of governors have been giving extremely careful attention to this matter. They have wanted to make a recommendation to me, but they have not yet done so, and until they do I am quite powerless to take any action in the matter. I say that plainly, and I know that when hon. members realize the position they will be quiet in their minds in that respect.

I have heard something said in the house to-day about commercial advertising on the radio and it seemed to be in the mind of some hon. gentlemen that the C.B.C. has entered upon a field where it has no right. I do not believe that is the case. I have read the act again, and paragraph (f) of the objects of the corporation will relieve any hon. member's mind as to its being quite within the intended objects of the corporation to enter into contracts here in Canada or elsewhere in connection with programmes.

In view of what I have brought to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the position of the corporation has become weakened, it has been suggested, in the minds of the Canadian public, which is something that I do not admit or believe. But were such the case, I am very sorry to have to say that in my opinion such weakened position, such impaired reputation of the corporaton, would be due to those who have thoughtlessly or for other reasons spoken so often to the public in that vein. They themselves are responsible. In that connection I would say this. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a valuable piece of property. That piece of property belongs to the people of this country, and I submit that it is a piece of property the value of which should be safeguarded by all Canadians. I think all hon. members have a direct and specific duty in helping to preserve the value of that piece of property. I know of no better way of protecting that property than by each of us in this house doing what he can to preserve and enhance the reputation of those who are there doing the work.

So far as the board of governors are concerned, they are working for nothing, and again I bring that to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to that of hon. members because I know that in the final issue this house is a very fair-minded body of men. Until we win a victorious peace, the main objective of our lives to-day, I should so much like to see in Canada some of that peace-loving here at home for which our boys are fighting so far away from us.

I have heard something said about the new short-wave station at Sackville, New Brunswick, I should like to reassure hon. members that there has been no delay in the matter of bringing the station to completion as yet, for the reason that we have not yet reached the date first estimated as that upon which the station would be in operation. But I have to report, as was mentioned last year to many hon. gentlemen, that there is still difficulty in obtaining certain equipment necessary for the completion of the station. I know something about what has been done in an attempt to gain better priorities, which one hon. gentleman mentioned this afternoon. I would like to reassure you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. gentleman that the authorities of the C.B.C. have been taking steps for several months to try to secure higher priorities so that there will be no delay in this matter. But there again, important as our short-wave station is going to be, I understand and believe that it is still more important that the factories should turn out the radio equipment and other technical equipment needed for our boys in the air and on the land and at sea to enable them not merely to carry on their fight for us but to preserve their lives in the face of the enemy. I think that is the correct position, and I give it to you, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon asked the specific question of me, whether a certain article or talk on the radio had been censored. At the beginning I must confess that I did not quite understand his reference, but during the recess I did obtain some information. I take it that the hon. gentleman means: Was that speech submitted to the government, to the headquarters of the C.B.C., or was it submitted to anybody? I should like to make a categorical reply to that. It was not submitted to the government. I am convinced that it never reached Ottawa, was not submitted to Ottawa. I do not know whether the manager of the station over which it was proposed to give the talk had it submitted to him. It might have been, but if that were done I would say to the hon. member that that is quite in keeping with the regulations, because there are certain regulations which must be observed and respected. I am sorry that I have not had time to get more definite information about the local station than I have just given, I am speaking with definite assurance about the government, I am quite sure that the speech was not sent to Ottawa. It might be, though I do not think so, that the script was looked at by the manager of the local station. I trust that that will be acceptable to the hon. member.

Mr. GRAYDON: In such a case as that which was mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) with respect to the commentator in Vancouver, can a commentator make statements of such a nature without running counter to the censorship regulations? I raise the point because, I believe, the minister is also the minister in charge of censorship.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I regret very much that I cannot give my hon. friend the answer I should like to give, because I have never read the article and I do not know really what is in it. He will agree, therefore, that I cannot give him any conclusive answer. I might say this to assist him in coming to an opinion of his own, although I am really repeating what I said, that there are certain regulations having to do with the defence of Canada regulations, the safeguarding of which is in the keeping of the manager of the radio station in question. That is all I can say. I cannot guess better than that. If he wishes, I shall be very glad to go into the circumstances with him; but I should like to read the talk in question.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am reluctant to intervene at this time, and I would not interrupt the hon. gentleman but that the matter seems to me to be so important. I do not press the minister for an answer to-night, because obviously he is not in possession of the necessary facts; but I should like him, first of all, to produce the script which the commentator used on that occasion, and which there will be no difficulty in obtaining; also, to make such inquiries and investigations as the minister can, so that at another time, perhaps during the ensuing week, we may be able to get, on the orders of the day, or on some of the estimates on the war appropriation, a satisfactory answer. I am frank to say that this has caused me no little concern.

Mr. GOLDING: Let the minister make his speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is a matter of grave concern.

Mr. GOLDING: It does not need half an hour to state that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, well now, I am trying to be helpful on this. It is a matter of serious import so far as the country is concerned, or I would not try to intervene. I should like to have the matter cleared up. We as members of the House of Commons have respected the government's attitude on this matter, and we think those outside should not have special privileges in dealing with questions of this kind which we ourselves do not have.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall look into this matter as quickly as I can arrange to do so, and I shall do my best to have the information available for the satisfaction of my hon.

friend. I add that I do so with great pleasure, because what is a matter of concern in regard to what I deem to be the nature of this talk is necessarily of great concern to all Canadians, including myself.

I heard something said earlier to-day about political broadcasting. I heard something also about that classical case of absentee landlordism as represented by a very worthy gentleman, the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. That case caused a great deal of comment and a bit of interest at the time. My conception of the whole incident is that it was a piece of clever—I think, too clever—publicity on the part of the publicity staff of Mr. John Bracken. I do not believe that Mr. Bracken knew just what was being done for him or in his name. I have been informed that the publicity office in question believed that their offer could not be accepted on the script which was shown, not submitted, to the C.B.C. authorities. It has been expressed to me, and I have seen it in the press, that those responsible purposely made a gesture knowing that it could not be accepted because there are regulations governing such matters. Those regulations are known to all and sundry. They were published, and pamphlets distributed in large numbers a long time ago. Furthermore, I understand that the political party of which Mr. Bracken is the leader was a party to an understanding in regard to these particular regulations. Well, now, whatever the victory for the moment of such a good piece, sly piece of publicity might have been, I suggest—

Mr. GRAYDON: Did I catch the minister aright: he said, a "sly piece" of something?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes. If the hon. gentleman is affronted by that word I shall try to find another. I shall use, if you like, "too clever" publicity stunt. I do not believe that the Canadian public can possibly be impressed with such publicity work as that, for the old political party I mentioned a moment ago—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The brand new one.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have not succumbed to the temptation of casting sly remarks about the continued changing of the name of these hon. gentlemen. I believe that they are a legitimate party, and I would not question either their parentage or their baptism.

Mr. BRUCE: Nor their sincerity.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Nor their sincerity; but their wisdom, of course!

Something also was said about General McNaughton. That may be the Philpott article; I am not certain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has covered that.

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. LaFLECHE: I wish to add that I respect an officer who has had the honour of commanding a Canadian army too greatly to bring him too much into the limelight in a case like this.

I heard this afternoon the term "amazement" used—and I think this was done by the C.C.F. party—at certain things that had happened. That reminds me of certain ejaculations or expressions used by spinster ladies when they are amazed at something they know full well has happened.

Something was said this afternoon about manipulations and working behind the scenes, something about working surreptitiously, and I took it to mean certain publicity for the followers of these hon. gentlemen. I recall also that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) repeated time after time that the hon. member leading that party was trotting down continuously to the C.B.C. If he did that he wore rubber heels, but it does not mean that he did not go. Only he, of course, would know.

I come now perhaps to the only serious thing said to-day—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am sorry the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is not here. He implored us, and I think he was right, to cultivate a more acute sense of humour. Let me say that the only serious thing—because there was an implication in it—that was said this afternoon was that there had been government interference with the C.B.C. This is an honourable house. Our conduct and our language are both governed by rules and usage. I must therefore respect the ancient custom. I shall use mild language in flatly denying that there has been any interference with the C.B.C. politically by the Canadian government. If we were in camp, honest soldier talk would permit me to use a word which Mr. Speaker will not let me use in this house. It is just as short as that, Mr. Speaker, and that is the truth. Now come along—

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister to put on the record the statement he made on November 17?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. gentleman has anticipated me, sir. Yes; I shall put it on the record, accompanied by an expression of my regret that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) felt it advisable to stop after he had read just one-third of my press release of November 16, 1943.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was diverted from it. I did not realize until I read Hansard that I had not read it all. I apologize for that.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I thank my hon. friend. May I read it from beginning to end:

The acting general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation recently discussed with me an item "Of Things to Come" which had been proposed for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programme. The acting general manager stated that this item had not progressed satisfactorily and, indeed, that it had never been submitted to the board of governors. He added that he deemed it necessary to refer the matter to his board and therefore, in the meantime, this item would be considered closed until the proposal had been properly surveyed and approved by competent Canadian Broadcasting Corporation authority. What the acting general manager told me was his own decision and that of no other person.

That is the end of the press release. I wish to add at this time an expression of admiration for the acting general manager, Doctor Augustin Frigon. He acted, in my opinion, as he should have acted. He acted on his own and he acted like a man. Statements made this afternoon had to do with this programme "Of Things To Come." The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, in my opinion, and the hon. member for, I believe, Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) both levelled charges of government interference. Now, the hon. gentleman I mentioned in second place very quickly drew to the attention of you, Mr. Speaker, that he had used the word "alleged." Well, to take the trouble to protect oneself by slipping in the word "alleged" when one has nothing plain in one's heart is not the act of a brave man, and I regret very much to say this, but actions of that kind remind me that it is well in war time to act the man even though one has not chosen to go to meet the enemy. I have no admiration for men who do nothing of which I know to help to win the war, but remain at home, perhaps not willingly yet effectively, to cause trouble in a family which should remain united so that we can do a better job in helping the other united nations in downing our enemies.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. gentleman not casting an innuendo with an imputation reflecting upon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

Mr. LaFLECHE: And the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the minister admits that he was casting an imputation by innuendo on the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and on myself. That is clearly against the rules of this house and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I speak, Mr. Speaker? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had asked Your Honour a question. I was assisting him in putting his question to you.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, let us be truthful at least.

Mr. STIRLING: That is another.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not catch what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said last.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said, let us be truthful.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me that both hon. gentlemen should withdraw. I think it should be dropped.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. minister's time has expired.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I ask a few moments to complete—

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask for a ruling, Mr. Speaker. I am quite prepared to withdraw my remark if the minister withdraws his.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Of course, Mr. Speaker; if I am at fault, of course I wish to make amends. I am a law-abiding man and I am truthful.

Mr. COLDWELL: I give up.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I wish to be very, very brief, sir. I heard the hon. member for Macleod mention a subject this afternoon on which I wish to afford him all the support of which I am capable. He said that it is wise and necessary that we respect and do what we can to see that the Sabbath is respected. I believe that is a proper thing, and in that connection may I say to him through you, sir, that there was set up by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation a long time ago what I believe is termed a religious committee. I am not certain that that is its proper name, but whatever its name may be it was given all facilities to broadcast the Word.

I recall also that the hon. gentleman mentioned the high cost of talent. It is not for me to defend the C.B.C. operations in this respect; but is it not a case of the labourer being worthy of his hire? I do not believe any very great salaries are being paid in Canada. I think it is rather unfortunate, but remember that high-class talent is like a delicate flower, it does not live long, and even if it is well paid I personally cannot follow the hon. member in that respect.

The same hon. gentleman expressed some fear that this country might some day be governed under nationalist socialism. Well, I wish to give him my assurance in that respect again. I do not think that will be the case.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nor do I.

Mr. LaFLECHE: We have now the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar expressing publicly in this house the view, the opinion, that he will never come to power.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. We are at war with the national socialists and when hon. gentlemen in this house try to apply that term to this group, the members of this party, I say that that transgresses the rules of this house and decency. I would not call any member of this house a national socialist, and I say that either it be withdrawn or you arrest me as an enemy of this country, one or the other. You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. LaFLECHE: High-class talent. My hon. friend is melodramatic.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is just about time this stopped. We are fighting the national socialists and I object to this epithet being hurled at me personally in this house.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is this a speech or a point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has taken exception and has stated his position; there is no point of order. The hon. gentleman has made a statement denying that he is identified with the national socialists. He has stated his position emphatically, and no point of order arises.

Mr. COLDWELL: I ask that the minister withdraw the term.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I think Mr. Speaker has given me the floor. Would the hon. gentleman care to continue?

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is asking the minister to withdraw the statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: As an imputation against my character.

Mr. SPEAKER: The statement I heard the minister make was not one that identified the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as a national socialist.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes.

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Do not deny what the Speaker says.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the minister would repeat the statement that he made. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has the right to object to a statement which he thinks imputes something which he has emphatically denied. I wish to be sure as to what the statement was. I did not so identify the statement as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has, and I wish, therefore, to know exactly what the statement was.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I express regret that my voice is not clear to-night. I shall try to speak loudly enough so that Your Honour will understand me. A moment ago I attempted to give assurance, assurance in the form of my opinion, to the hon. member for Macleod that he had no reason to fear that this country would ever be governed by a party of national socialists. Then the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar hurriedly took that unto himself by saying "not us".

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. LaFLECHE: "Not I", whatever it was.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said, "nor do I."

Mr. LaFLECHE: I must be given an opportunity to make my cracked voice heard by His Honour, the Speaker.

Mr. COLDWELL: You know what you said.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I said that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, as I understood him, immediately claimed that I was aiming at him. He immediately—

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. LaFLECHE: He immediately came forward and accepted the name.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. LaFLECHE: By saying, "not I" or "not us," or whatever it was.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Then, Mr. Speaker, I gave some further good news to the hon. member for Macleod. I have been sympathetic to that hon. gentleman for a long time. I am not laughing a bit, and I trust the reason is not one for which one might laugh. This evening I agreed with him very readily, very heartily and very sincerely on the point of the Sabbath. There is then some communion between the two of us, and I wished to give him that further assurance. I did so in good faith. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not like to be called, or his party to be called, national socialists, despite what has been said many times and despite that his lieutenant in British Columbia preached the methods employed by that party in Germany of which our friend says he is not a—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I ask, if I may, to get a transcript of what the hon. member has said. This reminds me of nothing more than the hon. member's evidence when he was appearing before the committee some years ago.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Speaker, that confirms my view in regard to the hon. gentleman's position in regard to making war against the enemy in our country.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am asking, Your Honour, that you get a transcript.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have sent for the transcript.

Mr. LaFLECHE: If I may proceed, something was said this afternoon about Canadian Press and British United Press dispatches, and the editing of the newscasts. We have heard a great deal about that. I wish to enlighten the house by saying that quite a number of employees of the corporation work throughout the day. I am told that there are sixteen working hours in the day. It is in my opinion a most appropriate subject to be taken up by the committee which, I trust, will be sitting before very long.

In that respect I think it is the duty of the committee we have in mind to do everything possible to assist the governors, the officials and the members of the staff of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in making of the C.B.C. a Canadian system for the betterment of our country and all its people.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would ask leave to return to the order for motions. We have now appointed all the committees. In other years there has been a suggestion that the auditor general's report and the public accounts should be referred to the public accounts committee at an early stage of the session. I would therefore move:

That the public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1943, and the auditor general's report for the year 1942-43 be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $130,406.

Mr. REID: There are two matters I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. While neither of them may come directly under his administration, still I cannot see how the procedure I am about to discuss could become effective unless through the advice of his officials, or of the minister himself.

The first item has to do with the cost of hay. In British Columbia the ceiling price on hay amounts to some $22 a ton. May I point out that I thought it was foolish to put a ceiling price on hay because, as is well known, hay is one commodity which is exchanged between farmer and farmer, and does not as a rule travel any great distance from one market to another.

What is the present situation in regard to hay in British Columbia, and particularly at points along the Pacific coast? It is maintained that the ceiling price is away below the cost of production. Many farmers have taken the attitude that they are not going to sell a product, the cost of which has been far more than would be the selling price. The result is that hay has not moved, and that there is a shortage in certain districts. I understand hay is being brought in from the prairie provinces, and that $35 to $39 a ton is being paid. Usually straw is sold for half the price of hay. However, the situation on the Pacific coast, and in the Fraser valley is that in many instances straw is being sold for $24 or $25 a ton, whereas the selling price of hay, no matter what the quality, is set at $22.

That is the situation faced by the farmers in that area, and it is a condition which is affecting purchasers of hay. I suppose the wartime prices and trade board officials have discussed this matter with officials of the Department of Agriculture. But if they did I am wondering if they took into consideration the extent of the country, and that the fixing of a ceiling price at one point may work a hardship and have no bearing whatsoever on actual conditions in another.

The other point to which I would direct the attention of the minister has to do with potatoes. The treaty on potatoes allows potatoes from the United States to enter free. But, generally speaking, all potatoes going to the United States have a duty placed upon them. We in British Columbia have been developing a seed potato market, and it is estimated that there are about a thousand tons of first-class seed potatoes available and for sale, for which a ready market can be found in the state of Washington. But when those potatoes are exported to Washington, those purchasing the seed have to pay a duty of $15 a ton on which, to keep the record straight, I believe they have a rebate of $7.50 a ton after six months. But in effect the price given by the Washington buyers of seed to the sellers of seed potatoes in British Columbia is set, with that tariff to be paid in lieu.

I am one who believes in reciprocity. If we allow potatoes to come into this country free, then they should allow our potatoes to go into the state of Washington, or into other states free. I do not know how this situation affects the farmers of the maritime provinces, but I know the potato situation is greatly affected in British Columbia, on account of the tariff condition.

I believe these regulations are set, first of all, by the Minister of Finance, under the trade treaties, and, second, by the wartime prices and trade board, in so far as the question of hay is concerned. But I am beseeching the minister to do something about these matters. On many occasions I have said I should like to have seen the minister in charge of these matters, because I do not think the injustices and inequalities prevalent in agriculture would have been so marked, had all agricultural matters been under his control.

Since these matters have been drawn to my attention, and because they affect our people greatly, I am asking the minister to make a statement. If he has not the information at hand, I am asking if he will present the matter to his departmental officials, and to the wartime prices and trade board.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): This is a matter under the control of the prices board and I have not before me the details with which to deal fully with it. From what has been said by the hon. member for New Westminster I understand that farmers in his district find it difficult to carry on trading in hay as between farmers in the same area, because certain price ceilings have been placed on that commodity. I am not sufficiently familiar with the regulations with regard to hay to deal with the matter to-night, but I shall bring down this information when my estimates are up at a later time.

I should think there is some argument for maintaining that where a transaction is between farmers in a district it should be pretty well taken care of as it is in connection with most other commodities upon which the price board has placed control. I understand why ceiling prices are necessary in order to maintain controls when hay is delivered to a market, or when it is shipped from one part of the country to another, but as a rule the transfer of a commodity from one farmer to another within a district is pretty well taken care of. This principle is generally applied in connection with the ceilings placed upon different products.

Mr. REID: What about potatoes?

Mr. GARDINER: They are under the control of either the customs or the prices board, and I would not care to offer an opinion at the moment without getting further information from them.

I have before me a statement in answer to some of the questions asked the other evening by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and having to do with grass seeds, particularly clover seed and alfalfa seed. I think I should put these answers upon the record at this time. Under authority of order in council, P.C. 5428, dated July 9, 1943, the special products board was authorized to purchase and to become the sole exporter of surpluses of agricultural seeds, subject to determination by the Minister of Agriculture as to classes of seed to be included. The board was also authorized to arrange for the distribution to producers of each class of seed of any net profits resulting from its transactions. The reasons for the establishment of this method of control were set forth in the order in council as follows:

> That prices for certain agricultural seeds used only for seeding purposes obtainable in the United States and other allied countries are considerably higher than prices obtainable in Canada under established price ceilings;
> That these differences in price have rendered it impossible to control exports in a manner equitable to producers and at the same time to assure retention and distribution in Canada of supplies of seed necessary to meet domestic requirements;
> That to secure for producers the full advantage of export outlets for such seeds and to secure equitable allocation of supplies to allied nations which are looking to Canada as a source of supply of these seeds, it is necessary to centralize all export transactions.

In other words, all seed purchased is purchased by the board and distributed to the different allies. Up to the present time it has been found necessary to make the special products board the sole exporting agency for only the following classes of seeds: alfalfa, alsike, red clover and alsike-white clover mixtures. Subject to the securing of export permits on the recommendation of the agricultural supplies board, the seed trade or producer cooperatives have been free to take advantage of any export outlet available for seeds such as sweet clover, timothy and brome grass, production of which in 1943 was greatly in excess of Canadian requirements.

Purchase by the special products board of alfalfa, red clover, alsike and alsike-white clover mixtures has been limited to quantities surplus to Canadian requirements and to supplies required, as in the case of alfalfa, to meet allocations by the combined food board to the United Kingdom. Seeds required to meet Canadian requirements are handled as in the past through regular seed trade channels.

Prices at which the board has been prepared to purchase any of the seeds brought under its control were set forth at the beginning of the season in detail by grades on an f.a.s. Halifax basis, and at levels in relation to established retail ceilings which should permit seed needed to meet Canadian requirements to move freely. These prices are materially below those available not only in the United States but in the United Kingdom at which seed exported by the board will be sold.

Net profits to the board from its transactions resulting from the difference between the prices at which seed is bought by the board and resold by it, less any cost of moving the seed other than the administrative costs of the seed export office, will be returned to producers who sold their seed on a participation plan. In other words, producers will receive in full measure any profit resulting from export sales uninfluenced by the operations of speculative interests. The value to producers of participation certificates issued for any kind of seed sold by them will be dependent upon the amount of seed of that kind exported and upon the total quantity of that kind of seed purchased by the trade on a participation basis from farmers up to March 15. That is the total statement in answer to the questions asked the other evening by the hon. member for Melfort.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member for Melfort wished to know whether or not those who are purchasing seeds on participation certificates have been instructed to issue certificates to those from whom they purchase. It seems that some farmers who have sold seeds to these purchasers did not receive participation certificates, and they had no assurance that they would participate in the profits obtained from the sale of the seed.

Mr. GARDINER: When the statement is read in Hansard I think it will be found that it is made quite clear. There is a possibility that seed may be sold without its being placed in the hands of the board, and of course in such cases there would be no participation certificate. A man may make a deal with another person who desires to buy seed and he will probably not ask for a participation certificate. If he desires to deal through the board, or if the board is purchasing for export, then participation certificates will be asked for and obtained.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Who is doing the purchasing for the board?

Mr. GARDINER: Any of the approved seed houses.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If purchases are made by persons not operating seed houses they would not have to give participation certificates?

Mr. GARDINER: The term "seed dealer" would cover practically any person in the habit of purchasing seed from farmers and selling it to others. Such a dealer would issue a participation certificate.

Mr. HATFIELD: I understand the war distribution board of the United States are now taking a great many cars of potatoes off their market in order to support the floor under potatoes and that our wartime food corporation is bringing those potatoes into Canada to supply our market when there is a surplus of potatoes in this country. Can the minister tell me how many cars have been purchased in the last few days by the wartime prices and trade board and how many they intend to bring into Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure my hon. friend will realize that it would not be possible for me to have information here as to the number of cars purchased within the last few days. That information is not available. I would suggest to the committee that these detailed questions about individual items should be asked when we reach the particular items, and then we could carry on any general discussion we wish to have from where we left off last Friday.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister is quite right. There was to be a general discussion on this item, and questions on the details of individual items should be asked when the items are reached.

Mr. REID: When I asked my question a few moments ago I could not find an item in the estimates on which I could ask about the exportation of potatoes, nor did I see any item on which I could ask about hay prices. That is why I brought those two questions up now. I said that in British Columbia there were about a thousand tons of first-class seed potatoes available and for sale. I particularly mention that because the committee will remember that last year I had an argument with the minister and some of his officials who had said that the Fraser valley was a deficiency area so far as potatoes were concerned. I pointed out then that the Fraser valley could grow any amount of potatoes, and this year the Fraser valley producers saved the situation in Ontario, because twelve cars of good British Columbia potatoes were sent to Ontario from there not long ago, but for which the potato situation in Ontario would have been very short indeed. We are anxious that the minister will make representations soon regarding the exportation of seed.

Mr. GARDINER: The question might have been asked under the item relating to fruits and vegetables. I give the only answer I could give to the question asked a few moments ago, because it really does not touch this department at all. I just made a general statement with regard to it. I think we should discuss details about individual items as they are reached.

Mr. HATFIELD: If too many potatoes come into our market they will demoralize the market. It is up to the minister to protect the market on agricultural products.

Mr. SENN: The minister has made a statement regarding the seed situation and regarding the remarks made by the hon. member for Melfort. I think the minister's answer was fairly complete, but as I understand it the hon. member for Yorkton asked about participation certificates and whether they had been handed out to everyone who had sold seed. In my area a certain amount of seed had passed out of the hands of farmers before this order came down, and for that reason they did not receive participation certificates. I think what the hon. member for Yorkton had in mind to ask was whether these gentlemen who had sold their seed prior to the bringing down of the order which the minister read are going to receive participation certificates. I believe it is true that they did receive a higher price than that received after the order came down.

I would ask the minister to explain to the committee, just why the special products marketing board set the price for the seed for export at the levels they did. It certainly is not in line with the retail ceiling price which we can get for seeds in Canada; setting the price they did on red clover, alfalfa and alsike had the effect of bringing down the price to the farmer, and as a result the seed that was sold in the domestic trade is going to give a handsome profit to the dealer. If I understand the situation there will be little, if any, alfalfa to be shipped out of the country and no red clover at all. So that the participation certificates will not be of any value on these two classes of seed. On the other hand, there will be quite a handsome profit on alsike seed. These participation certificates will be worth a considerable amount. The primary dealers bought the seed first from the farmers, cleaned it once and resold it, and the result will be that the farmers are going to say, when the proceeds of a big participation certificate are returned to them, that the dealers have not paid them enough. They are going to say: We have been gypped for years past by those dealers. I do not think it is fair to the dealers that they should be blamed. I would ask the minister to explain, if not now, on some other item just why the special products marketing board placed these prices where they did. In my opinion they were not high enough.

Mr. GARDINER: I probably misled the committee in bringing down this answer at all at this time. The question was asked the other evening and I passed it over then. The discussion properly comes under item 19 relating to plant products, seeds, feeds and so forth.

Mr. SENN: Or else under the item for the special products marketing board in the war appropriation.

Mr. GARDINER: Either one or the other. There were two or three statements made by the hon. member for Melfort the other evening which covered the points raised and now I have specific answers for them which I should like to place on the record. For example, it was stated by the hon. member for Melfort:

> This year, the special products marketing board has taken over the complete marketing of grass and clover seed, all domestic requirements being handled through that board.

That is his statement. Now here are the facts: Up to the present time the board has not been handling all clover seeds as, for example, sweet clover, has not taken over the sole export of any grass seeds, and has not been authorized to handle seed for domestic requirements. The board is not handling much of the seed. Much of the seed is being handled by seed houses and others, unless it is being purchased for special purposes. Not all of the different kinds of grass and clover seeds are being handled by the board.

The next statement was this:

> According to a return tabled yesterday on the motion of the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor), the export price is 34½ cents a pound.

That is the statement already on Hansard, made by the hon. member for Melfort. The answer to that is: This is the price at which the board is purchasing registered No. 1 alfalfa, f.a.s. Halifax. The price at which this seed will be resold to the British ministry of agriculture will be materially higher. Therefore there will be a further distribution to persons with participation certifications.

Another statement made was this:

However, I do not see why the producer of alfalfa seed should bear the brunt of this action. He is facing a loss of from 8 to 10 cents a pound.

That was the statement made the other evening. The answer to that is this: As stated, any profits resulting from export transactions in respect to any class of seed handled by the board will be returned to producers who sold on a participation basis seed of that class ultimately used either in meeting domestic requirements or in filling export orders.

Those are the facts with regard to the matters discussed the other evening. If the committee is agreeable, I should like to have further discussion of seed matters take place when the officials are here with all the facts.

Mr. SENN: I fully agree with the minister and will make only one further remark now, and that is in the nature of a warning. This other item might not come up before a considerable time. If I am correctly informed, there is not enough alfalfa seed in Canada this year to meet our domestic requirements. It would be too bad if seed were exported from the country by the special products marketing board or any other organization and not enough seed left in the country to go around. That is particularly true of eastern Canada. We must get our supplies from the west this year. I hope the minister will take these facts into account before any damage is done.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the objective of the order in council which was passed last year. By the sixth of July there could not have been much seed exported out of last year's crop. The intention is to do the same as is now suggested ought to be done, namely, to take control over the export of seed to see that too much does not go out of the country.

Mr. SENN: Some has gone out?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. PURDY: When the agriculture estimates were being discussed last week and again this evening, we covered western agriculture fairly well, and got into Ontario and back to British Columbia. This evening, perhaps, we should be able to start east and work west, east being the cradle of agriculture in this Canada of ours.

These lands that I wish to speak about were growing excellent crops when the buffalo and the Indian still inhabited the western plains. In any event, we have the sun in our backs instead of in our eyes, as some of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation from the west must think when they come to our province from time to time, and try to convince those of our farmers who are chafing to some extent under controls made necessary by the war, that in the socialistic state which they advocate the farmer will not be regimented, but can continue as a free enterprise individualist as he is at present. That was all I had to say to my hon. friends from the west. We certainly appreciate what they are up against in their agricultural problems, and we wish them well.

What I desire to speak about more particularly this evening is our marshland problem in Nova Scotia. I do not know whether this is the proper item under which to discuss it. Will the minister say if it comes under some other item?

Mr. GARDINER: The proper place to discuss it is under "specials," I would say, the rehabilitation vote, if there is any place to discuss it here. The suggestion is that rehabilitation activities should be extended to all parts of Canada, and that kind of discussion of course would come up in connection with "specials," the last items in the estimate.

Mr. PURDY: What is the number?

Mr. GARDINER: Number 29.

Mr. PURDY: The minister will be able to give us some information on that item concerning this problem, what was done last year and if anything is proposed to be done this year?

Mr. GARDINER: I think I could give now all the information under the general discussion, that could be given at any time. It is not really any item in these estimates.

Mr. PURDY: That is what I thought. I thought we could discuss it at the present time.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the hon. member desire the information now?

Mr. PURDY: I had a few remarks which I should like to make at some time. There came to my desk this morning, as I think there came to the desk of all hon. members, a pamphlet regarding the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act entitled, "A Record of Achievement", and I certainly agree that it is a record of achievement of which the present government may be proud, in taking these dried-out areas from relief and converting them into productive areas. On page 13 of this pamphlet is a picture of a very extreme case, a group of buildings almost completely covered by sand. I admit that it is a dreary picture, but I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this committee that it is no drearier than to see hundreds, yes, thousands, of acres of land which produced crops for many years now covered twice a day by the tides of the bay of Fundy; and that is exactly what is taking place in the maritime provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

I know this problem has been before the authorities for some time. A small survey was made last year, but no actual work has taken place. I believe the suggestion was made that this was a provincial problem, or a municipal problem, but not a federal problem. On the other hand, if I understand correctly the operations of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, it is carried out entirely by the federal government. As is known to hon. members, the situation with respect to the maritime farm lands was studied by the committee on rehabilitation and reestablishment, and in two of their reports they have referred specifically to the situation. They recommended the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to cover eastern Canada. That is what we from eastern Canada are looking for, because we feel that our farmers need some assistance along the general lines of this act.

I could refer to other measures which have been passed specifically to assist western agriculturists. As I said before, we have no quarrel with that policy. In addition to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, there is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act, and the prairie farm income regulations, all of which seem to have been aimed specifically at the western provinces, while eastern agriculturists have been left pretty much on their own. Now we are hopeful that, with the rehabilitation programme before us, we can see some constructive steps taken for the relief of our marshland problems and other agricultural problems in the maritime provinces.

I happened to be at one of our municipal council meetings this fall before I came to Ottawa. People were appearing before the council asking for reduction of taxes to almost nothing, because their dike lands had gone back to the sea and they were not in a position to build up the dikes again. The problem is now too big for the individual; there must be some other organization behind us; and it seems to me that in that respect the federal government has an excellent chance of being of some real assistance to our farmers.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the hon. member tell us how many acres are affected and why that result has come about? I am much interested.

Mr. PURDY: The acreage, or at least the amount of marshland, is somewhere between one hundred and fifty and two hundred thousand acres. The condition which we are in now has been brought about very gradually, by the operation of the tides wearing into the dikes, and the waters carrying them out. It has probably come to a head more in the last few years on account of the great shortage of man-power. Men are not available to repair the dikes, and even if they were, I question if at the present rate of wages the farmers could afford to hire them. The marshland has been gradually going back. One piece of dike would break out and would flood a hundred or two hundred acres this year, and then more the next.

Mr. GRAHAM: When were the dikes built?

Mr. PURDY: The original dikes were built somewhere between 1600 and 1755, the time the Acadians were settling in the country. They were built by the French settlers and kept up by hand by the individual farmers right down through the generations. With the loss of our hay market, the result of losing to a large extent the export market in cattle to the old country, the farmers lost heart in the marshes and did not take the same interest in the work. Then there was the labour situation. The hand labour used to build the dikes fifty or sixty years ago has gone entirely. I was going to suggest in the meantime that prior to some general plan, if some temporary assistance could be given our farmers in repairing their dikes, through the use of machinery at low cost, perhaps in cooperation with the provincial government, perhaps in cooperation with the various defence forces, a large number of suitable machines in the adjoining areas, which for some reason or other cannot be obtained by the farmers, could be utilized to assist them in throwing up temporary dikes. This would save the situation and prevent further inroads by the sea until such time as a general plan could be worked out. I would commend to the minister some temporary arrangement whereby these temporary works could be undertaken to prevent further breaking of the dikes and prevent further land from being flooded. I would strongly urge that a study be made of the machinery necessary to make the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act apply to all eastern Canada. I know that the introduction of such a measure would meet with approval from all sides of the house as far as private members are concerned; at least, that is the impression I get. It might meet with opposition from certain sections from the treasury benches, but I am looking to the Minister of Agriculture to overcome that.

Mr. BURTON: The problems confronting the farmers are so many and varied that in discussing them a person finds himself apt to get from one department to another. I have no wish to go beyond the Department of Agriculture, because I feel that the minister has enough to answer for without having to bother with the sins of omission and commission of some of the other ministers. When the estimates were last under consideration some hon. members had something to say about the expenses of the Minister of Agriculture and also of his department. The minister seemed ready to go to any length to show that he was not very much concerned about the matter. In fact, he appeared to be rather proud of it. I quote from page 673 of Hansard of February 18, where he is reported to have said:

> That is the only explanation I wish to make in connection with the expense accounts, so far as my own expense account is concerned. Incidentally, it has been throughout those whole eight years one of the highest expense accounts among ministers of the government, and I am rather proud of that fact.

To me it seems a good deal like whistling in the dark. I think the minister was more concerned about it than he tried to let on, and for that reason I intend to make a suggestion to him this evening. I suggest that when the minister finds it necessary on some future occasion to pay a visit to Humboldt constituency he should let me know. If he does I shall be pleased to make all the necessary arrangements for transportation and I shall see that he gets around the constituency. In that way I suggest he will be able to save a good deal on the cost of tires and the use of that famous car which last year carried licence number 20456, about which we heard so much.

What some of us are interested to know is whether the minister also used that car to go to Selkirk to look around in his official capacity.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not. I can answer that right away.

Mr. BURTON: Or did he have another car at his disposal there?

An hon. MEMBER: That is the time he went over the ditch.

Mr. BURTON: There are some people in Humboldt who were quite concerned when they heard that a certain car had met with a slight mishap because they were afraid that the country might have to get along for a while without a minister of agriculture. I can assure the minister that if he accepts my invitation I will drive with a great deal more care and see that he does not land in the ditch, because the policies of our Minister of Agriculture have so nearly run so many of us into the ditch that we do not want the hon. gentleman to go into the ditch along with them.

In connection with expense accounts the minister said, as reported on the same page:

> Having said that, may I add that there is no inspector in the Department of Agriculture who is inspecting agricultural activities throughout the rural areas who would be worth his salt if he did not have a high expense account.

I have found that in the Department of Agriculture there are some very fine and able men, some men who do their jobs and do them well. There are in the various branches of the department inspectors who are really inspectors and who do get around and attend to their work. But I am very much afraid that too many of the inspectors in some of the departments under the Minister of Agriculture have heard him say, or had some reason to believe, that he was proud of their large expense accounts. I know of different cases that I could relate from now to midnight, but we do not want to sit so late to-night. I could tell of inspectors who seemed deliberately to run up big expense accounts. Let me mention one instance. I know of an inspector under the P.F.R.A. who had six or seven dug-outs to inspect in one locality. He landed there between three and four o'clock in the afternoon and inspected one dug-out. He asked that man where the other five or six were—I forget whether there were six or seven altogether in the neighbourhood—and this man said, "There is one over there, another over there, and I have a couple of hours to spare, so that I can go around with you and we can have them all checked now." Oh, no; he was sorry, but he could not take advantage of that man's kindness. He had to be back in Humboldt at a certain time and somewhere else later on. That inspector made a separate trip into that neighbourhood to inspect every one of those dug-out locations. He was certainly trying to be worth his salt. And there are other inspectors I have known who have carried on in such a way that they accumulated enough salt to pickle the whole agriculture business in that part of the country—because out of salt we make brine, and some of them believe in piling up the brine for some future occasion.

I have mentioned the P.F.R.A. I will now give another example under the P.F.A.A. An inspector stopped along the road inspecting for the dried-out bonus. I happened to be broken down with a combine alongside the road and I was trying to repair it in a hurry. This chap came along and started talking, wanting to know about this and that. Finally I looked at him and said: "Are you another one of those inspectors running around here?" He said, "Oh, yes, I am supposed to be inspecting these dried-out areas." I said, "There is the field; look it over." He said, "I am not supposed to go any farther than three hundred feet. Do you think that crop will bring twelve bushels to the acre?" I looked at him and said, "Friend, it will be just too bad for me if it does not bring more." He said, "It won't bring more than twelve bushels to the acre." I said, "I have not time to argue with you. Go out and take a look." He stayed around for half an hour talking. He said, "What do you think it will bring?" I said, "If I could make one round with this combine I would be able to give you a far nearer estimate. At the present time, I do not know." I am telling you, Mr. Chairman, the grain that we were standing in there at that time was very good. If the whole field had been like that it would have brought between thirty-five and forty bushels to the acre, and that chap was asking me if it would bring twelve. I made the first round after he had gone, after I had got the combine fixed. By the time I had the hopper filled and placed in the box I said to the chap with me, "This grain is running somewhere around twenty-four bushels to the acre at the present time." Later on, it thinned out a little bit, but it averaged somewhere around twenty-two bushels to the acre, and this chap was standing there wondering whether it would run twelve bushels to the acre.

That inspector was as useless as the fifth wheel on a wagon. He had no more idea what that crop or anybody else's crop would bring than a child. Furthermore, that year we were required by law or regulation, after our harvesting operations were over, to report to our elevator where we were making our deliveries and to give an affidavit as to the number of bushels that we had threshed. That being the case, what was the need for the inspector and others like him running around the neighborhood?

I come now to the W.A.R. I may say that the first time I had any experience with the W.A.R. was in the city of Regina when the first wheat acreage reduction bonus was on. I went there to attend a provincial session. I had a whole flock of letters from different people around the country with me, complaints about their wheat acreage reduction bonus. Finally I located the office. It consisted of a whole floor in one building. I said to myself, this is quite a good-sized establishment. They should be able to handle this. A day or two afterwards I found they had another whole floor taken up with offices somewhere else. Was there turmoil in those offices? The reports that were sent in by most of the inspectors were enough to turn anything into a turmoil. I met some of my colleagues at the buildings. They said, "Where were you; you should have been at a caucus this morning?" I said, "I was in a war office." They said, "Where is that?" I said, "Down there on a certain street in the city. It is war." I remarked that the way these fellows are going about their work we shall have a war before we get the bonus, and things straightened out. There were men running through the province drawing salaries and building up these handsome expense accounts who did not do anything else but make a heap of trouble for the people.

I admit there were some who were good and who tried to do their best.

Mr. McNIVEN: Most of them were good.

Mr. BURTON: After a whole lot of them were cleaned out, most of them were all right. I say it was a disgrace, when you think of the men who came out there and the amount of useless time and effort they put in on a lot of that stuff.

There is one more point I should like to take up with the minister. I hope he does not take it too seriously because he has been used to it for a long time.

Mr. GARDINER: Not at all.

Mr. BURTON: The minister made a statement a week ago that I was surprised to hear. I thought he was just pulling off a nice little joke when he made the reference to which I am referring. I shall quote a part of his statement which is found at page 676 of Hansard. He said:

> I know there are fellows who live outside large cities like Winnipeg who pride themselves upon being farmers, but they spend most of their time in Winnipeg sitting on boards of one kind or another.

First of all, I think a man who has had the experience of the minister and who has served the length of time he has in parliament and in public life would have had a little more consideration for a new member, but he used the language I have just quoted in connection with my colleague. I think he simply could not overcome the temptation to use that little paragraph. After thinking it over more seriously I have come to the conclusion that in an unguarded moment when the opportunity arose to use that little crack the truth came out. The policies of his department and of the government have been for years that we farmers should stay out on the farm and do the slugging and grubbing and let the other fellows run our business. For too long we have let armchair farmers and swivel-necked politicians run our business. The time has come for us to do more along the line of that which the hon. member for Selkirk was doing, take an active part in our affairs and have something to say in what is going on.

I noticed throughout the evening while the discussion was going on in regard to these estimates that practically every hon. member on the government side of the house failed to recognize the main point that the hon. member for Yorkton made when he was delivering his speech, namely, that while we are prepared to admit, and no sensible person will deny that at the present time as far as the farmers are concerned they are receiving more money for most of their products than they have for a long time, the hon. member for Yorkton was pointing out something which is undeniably true, namely, that for all these years we have been so far below parity that you can go out into the homes and on the farms of the farmers and you will find that it will take a whole lot more than one or two years of fair prices before these people can get anywhere near to what they are entitled.

I believe it was the hon. member for Qu'Appelle who said that he did not believe in going around knocking. I agree with him; yet at the present time it is necessary for us to face facts. There is no person in his right senses who can say that just because we have had one or two years in which we have been receiving—in fact it is not even two years, it is not even one year—anywhere near a suitable price for our wheat, everything is all right. But admitting that, in one or two years you cannot erase the past ten or twelve years that the farmers have faced. It will take quite a number of years of decent prices for us to be able to say that now the farmers are enjoying that security to which they are entitled.

I would urge the minister in all fairness and sincerity to look upon those farmers who are doing the farming as men who are prepared also to do their share for the welfare of our country. I say that the farmers are becoming more and more concerned about what is to be done, and they are going out to see that it is done.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

23rd February, 1944

I have received with great pleasure the address that you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

Athlone.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COLDWELL

REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the rules of the house and as my right I wish to direct your attention to a speech made by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) on Friday evening. I asked you to get a transcript to see what the record had to say. At page 901 of Hansard the Minister is reported as having said:

Well, to take the trouble to protect oneself by slipping in the word "alleged" when one has nothing plain in one's heart is not the act of a brave man, and I regret very much to say this, but actions of that kind remind me that it is well in war time to act the man even though one has not chosen to go to meet the enemy. I have no admiration for men who do nothing of which I know to help to win the war, but remain at home, perhaps not willingly yet effectively, to cause trouble in a family which should remain united so that we can do a better job in helping the other united nations in downing our enemies.

I then said:

I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. gentlemen not casting an innuendo with an imputation reflecting upon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

And the minister said:

And the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

I particularly wish to draw your attention to the accusation hurled across the floor of this house that we of this party are national socialists. On page 902 of Hansard the minister is reported as having said this:

The same hon. gentleman expressed some fear that this country might some day be governed under nationalist socialism. Well, I wish to give him my assurance in that respect again.

And I interjected: "Nor do I." Then the minister said:

We now have the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar expressing publicly in this house the view, the opinion, that he will never come to power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just interject to say that in my opinion this applause for that kind of statement is unseemly in this house. Then at page 902 the minister is reported as having said:

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not like to be called, or his party to be called, national socialists, despite what has been said many times and despite that his lieutenant in British Columbia preached the methods employed by that party in Germany of which our friend says he is not a—

The record breaks there. Mr. Speaker, I contend that we are at war with national socialism in Germany, and to endeavour to attack any party in this country as being a national socialist movement is to accuse that party of disloyalty to this country and falsely to imply a position which is not borne out by the facts. May I say that this movement in its philosophy and outlook is exactly the same as the labour and socialist parties of Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and other countries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is your opinion.

Mr. REID: That is just not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to get your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Since the last sitting of this house I have had the opportunity of reading the official report of the preceedings of this honourable house. This afternoon I have listened to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and in reply may I say that in the course of my reading I came across certain statements in Hansard attributed to the hon. member. In an effort to understand their position one must have recourse to what can be found. Among other things I find the following on page 545 of Hansard of June 5, 1940, where the hon. member is reported as having said:

. . . the secret of the recent success of the Germans is the fact that they have consciously planned their economic structure.

And then later on on another occasion he said that the prosperity built up by the socialists was a type of economy which is causing so much trouble today; and also that they did a remarkable job in a short space of time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman rising to a point of order?

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I ask the hon. gentleman to quote the context of the remarks which I made at that time. If he does, he will find that I said the Germans did it for an evil purpose. I asked for your ruling on Friday evening, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must have quiet in the chamber. I have to listen to the hon. member to see that his rights are protected as well as those of the house. I must say that I can see no point of order there.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not know whether it is in keeping, but the hon. gentleman reminds me of a cry baby.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I seek your protection against insults being hurled across the floor of this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish hon. members would direct themselves to the question of privilege. A question of privilege has been raised and a quotation has already been made by the hon. member.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have attempted to give in a very few words what has been running through my mind in connection with the party, or if you like, the purposes of the small group headed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. If in any way I have done an injustice to anybody, of course, I would make amends.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not good enough. I ask for your ruling Mr. Speaker, whether it is a proper term to use in this house of this party, the term national socialist.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has risen on a question of privilege, not only on his own behalf but also on behalf of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr.

Knowles) and has asked for a withdrawal. The hon. minister has made reply and said that if he has offended any hon. member of the house he wishes to make amends, which I presume means he withdraws his statement. There is no point of order now before the Chair.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, as one who is involved in this incident. I direct Your Honour's attention to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 3rd edition, page 57, citation 123, which says:

A personal attack, by one member upon another, is an offence against the house, in the person of one of its members, which, on account of the respect due from every member to the character and dignity of the house, as well as the importance of preserving regularity in the debates, calls for the prompt interference of the Speaker.

I also direct Your Honour's attention to Beauchesne's 2nd edition, page 96, citation 295:

The House of Commons will insist upon all offensive words being withdrawn, and upon an ample apology being made which shall satisfy both the house and the member to whom offence has been given.

Without reading certain other citations, I simply draw Your Honour's attention to them: Beauchesne's 3rd Edition, page 106, citation 256—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has risen to a question of privilege. I understood that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar embodied in his statement the question which the hon. member is now raising.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I am stating my understanding of the situation. I understand that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was really dealing with the charge against him; that he arrived at that charge by indicating that it arose as a result of the attack made by the minister upon me and it is in connection with the attack he made upon me, in which he imputed motives against me and charged me with insincerity and with being cowardly, that I feel an apology is due not only to me but to this house. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who, as leader of this house is custodian of the rules and rights and privileges of the house, to support me in this request for an apology for this unwarranted attack.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understood the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, he referred to Hansard and quoted remarks made by the hon. minister against the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The hon. member also embodied the remarks which had been directed against him personally and asked for a withdrawal of both these statements. The hon. minister has now made a reply, and although he referred only to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I take it that he was making amends, as he phrased it, in respect of both the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and that raised now by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the hon. minister state that his withdrawal includes withdrawal of the imputations against me?

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I had not the privilege of being in the house on Friday evening, but I should like to associate myself with every word uttered by the minister as reported on page 901 of Hansard with respect to this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The incident is closed. The minister has made the statement that if he offended any hon. member of the house he desired to make amends.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL CREDIT FACILITIES FOR FIXED AND WORKING CAPITAL

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 7, to incorporate the Industrial Development bank.

Mr. GRAYDON: Explain.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Speaker, I presume the house would prefer a more detailed explanation on the second reading of the bill. Briefly, the establishment of this bank represents one part of the government's programme to prepare the way for a high level of employment and of income after the war. As set out in the preamble, the bill is designed to promote the economic welfare of Canada by supplementing the activities of other lenders and by providing capital assistance to industry with particular consideration to the financing problems of small enterprises.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask whether farmers are to be included in the benefits under this legislation?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; this applies only to industrial enterprises.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there to be another bill applying to farmers?

Mr. ABBOTT: The government is giving consideration to other measures having similar purposes in the field of credit for agriculture and housing development.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

APPEALS UNDER SECTION 42 OF ARMY ACT

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many appeals or requests for redress have been made under section 42 of the Army Act, either to the Minister of National Defence, the army council, national defence headquarters, Ottawa, or to the Canadian military headquarters, London?

2. How many of these appeals or requests have been dealt with, and how many are pending?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. No segregation of the number of complaints submitted prior to January, 1943, has been maintained.

From January 1, 1943, to date, 52 complaints under section 42 of the Army Act have been presented to the Minister of National Defence who exercises in Canada the powers of the army council, or to Canadian military headquarters overseas, of which 49 have been dealt with. Three are pending.

2. Answered by No. 1.

PREMIUM ON HOGS SLAUGHTERED BY LOCAL BUTCHERS

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Is the government giving consideration to the necessity of making provision for the payment of the premium of $3 on Grade "A" hogs and of $2 on Grade "B-1" hogs to apply to hogs slaughtered in plants where government-grading is not practised and to hogs slaughtered by butchers in localities where no such grading is possible?

2. If not, will other means be provided to correct the existing situation with respect to hogs slaughtered by local butchers?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The object of the government premiums on grade "A" and grade "B-1" hog carcasses is to encourage the production of better quality hogs for export and the channelling of such hogs through inspected plants so that the product will be available for export. An official grading service is now maintained at all inspected plants in Canada. Hogs purchased by operators supplying the domestic market only are automatically eligible for the premiums if such hogs are custom slaughtered in an inspected plant. Other than this, consideration may be given to the larger domestic suppliers who slaughtered an average of 50 hogs per week in 1940 and who have satisfactory plant facilities for the weighing, grading, and holding of hog carcasses.

2. Answered under No. 1.

RADIO BROADCASTING—SHORT-WAVE STATION NEAR SACKVILLE

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has a contract been let for a short-wave radio broadcasting and receiving station at or near Sackville, New Brunswick?

2. Were public tenders called?

3. If not, what firms were asked to tender, and what was the price of each tender?

4. To whom was contract let, and for what amount?

5. When was contract to be completed?

6. When will contract be completed, stating reasons for delay, if any?

7. When is it expected station will be put in finished operating condition?

8. What is the estimated total construction cost?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The following firms were asked to tender: Cook and Leitch, Montreal; Stewart Construction Co., Sherbrooke; Ambrose Wheeler, Moncton; Foundation Maritimes Ltd.; Acme Construction, Saint John, N.B.; John Flood & Sons, Saint John, N.B.; R. A. Corbett, Saint John, N.B.; Colette Frères, Montreal; Anglin Norcross, Montreal; Dansereau Ltd., Montreal; A. Janin & Co., Montreal; Redfern Construction Co., Montreal.

Tenders were received from the following firms: Cook and Leitch, Montreal, $254,881; Stewart Construction Co., Sherbrooke, $257,834; Ambrose Wheeler, Moncton, $298,721.19.

4. To the lowest tender, Cook and Leitch, Montreal.

5. May 1, 1944.

6. May 1, 1944.

7. It had been expected that the station would be completed in the early fall of 1944, but there will be some not great delay due to the now expected late delivery by manufacturers of essential equipment.

8. Original estimated cost was about $800,000, but the present estimated cost is $1,100,000, the difference being due to the advisability of attaining a greater efficiency of transmission, in keeping with the best practice of constructing radio installations, so that the new short-wave station shall compare favourably with other modern stations in other parts of the world.

FIFTH VICTORY LOAN

Mr. QUELCH:

1. What was the total number of subscribers to the fifth victory loan?

2. How many of these were on the special names list?

3. What was the total amount subscribed in, (a) those on special names list; (b) all other subscribers?

4. How much money was advanced by the chartered banks for the purchase of bonds in this campaign to, (a) subscribers on special names list; (b) all other subscribers?

5. What is the total amount of bonds sold in the five victory loan campaigns that still remain in the hands of the people of Canada, excluding banks?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1 and 2.

	Cash	Conversion	Total
Total number of subscriptions	3,008,336	24,715	3,033,051
Special names subscriptions	7,089	605	7,694
All other subscriptions	3,001,247	24,110	3,025,357
3. Total amount subscribed	$1,383,275,250	$188,036,300	$1,571,311,550

All other	603,655,300	38,210,200	641,865,500

4. No information. As at November 30, 1943, borrowings outstanding from the chartered banks to finance the purchase of Fifth Victory loan bonds were as follows:

Corporations	$218,456,251
Employers for employees	71,919,673
All other	71,811,644
	$362,187,568

5. No precise information is available. However, based on estimates prepared by the National War Finance Committee, holdings of Dominion Government direct domestic funded debt by non-banking investors have increased by approximately $4,900 millions between September 1, 1939 and December 31, 1943.

WINNIPEG-SASKATOON-EDMONTON AIR SERVICE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has Winnipeg-Saskatoon-Edmonton been designated as a civil air route?

2. Is consideration being given by the government to the flying of this route by Trans-Canada Airlines?

3. If so, when will such service commence?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Under the Trans-Canada contract, made pursuant to the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, a line of aircraft from Edmonton to Winnipeg via Saskatoon has been designated as a line of aircraft to be organized, maintained and operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines. No civil air route has been designated between these points under The Transport Act, 1938.

2. Yes.

3. As soon as the radio range and other airway facilities are installed. This work is now in hand.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—PAYMENTS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What amounts have been paid as at January 1, 1944, to each of the following by the Wartime Housing Limited: Hutton & Souter; Prack & Prack; W. L. McFaul; W. L. Somerville; James, Proctor & Redfern; B. R. Coon?

2. What amounts were owing to them as at January 1, 1944?

2. Amounts owing as of January 1, 1944:

To Hutton & Souter	$4,791 77
To Prack & Prack	1,773 14
To W. L. McFaul	240 00

To other firms specified—nil.

TRANSIT CONTROL—SAINT JOHN, N.B. SUPERVISOR

Mr. HAZEN:

1. When was D. A. Ross appointed transit control supervisor at Saint John, New Brunswick?

2. What was his occupation prior to his appointment?

3. What are his duties?
4. What is he paid?
5. Under the terms of his employment can he engage in buying and selling secondhand cars?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. October 17, 1942.

2. District sales manager, International Trucks, Saint John, N.B.

3. Mr. Ross functions as a transit supervisor for the area around Saint John and Moncton, N.B., under the direction of the regional transit controller for the Maritimes, Mr. A. C. Wagner. The duties in which he is engaged are connected with street car and bus services in municipalities, the control of taxi services, the application of the wartime industrial transit plan to essential industry, and the direction, together with the provincial authorities, of the interurban bus services.

4. $2,700 per annum.

5. Yes, in the same way as he may engage in any other occupation in his own time, and providing he "faithfully and honestly fulfils his duties" as an employee of the Department of Munitions and Supply (M. & S. form 392). Refer also to P.C. 128/7359, August 1942, regarding the status of government employees engaging in spare time work outside their regular hours of employment.

6. If so, what is the amount of his expenses from the date of appointment until December 31, 1943?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Yes.

2. (a) May 8, 1942.

(b) Major Campbell, in addition to his position as superintendent of rationing for Nova Scotia, is deputy director of rationing for the maritimes. He is responsible for the application of the machinery of rationing in the maritimes and his work embraces the supervision of rationing personnel and the local ration boards of that area.

(c) Matriculation from the Sandhurst Military Academy, England; eleven years of general business activity in the maritimes; one year with this board as local representative, Yarmouth, N.S., before assuming his present responsibilities. During that period he became familiar with all phases of the board's local work including the machinery of rationing.

(d) $3,000 plus $800 living allowance per annum.

3. Civil service commission.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Yes.

6. Expenses totalling $2,209.56 have been paid Major Campbell for the period May 8, 1942 to December 31, 1943.

SAINT JOHN, N.B., TAXI POOL

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Was the taxi pool at Saint John, New Brunswick, established by order in council?
2. If not, how was it established?
3. Is the pool liable for breaches of contract or torts committed, (a) by its officials and employees in the course of their employment; (b) by owners or drivers of taxi cabs that are in the pool while engaged in the work of the pool?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No.

2. The pool was not formed by order of the transit control. The pool was formed at the request of a large majority of taxi operators, was concurred in by the city-appointed wartime transit advisory committee, the city council, and the transit control supervisor of Saint John, N.B.

3. (a) and (b). The published announcement of the Saint John Wartime Transit association states that "The Association is absolutely a voluntary, non-profit organization to receive, sort and transmit calls for the public benefit. The association assumes no liability for the acts or omissions of the members or their employees."

2. If so, has he been replaced, and by whom?

3. Has a Mr. Ducharme Olivier been appointed principal clerk at the same post office to replace Mr. Trudeau?

4. Was Mr. Ducharme Olivier an employee of the government in the city delivery branch, Montreal post office, and if so, when was he so employed, and was he discharged from that position?

5. If he was discharged, what was the reason for such discharge?

6. Were civil service examinations held for the position vacated by Mr. Stanislas Trudeau?

7. If so, when and where were these examinations held?

8. Was the postmaster of the Montreal post office or his assistant the examining officer during such examinations?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Mr. Ducharme Olivier has been selected for the position by the Civil Service Commission as a result of a promotional competition usual in such cases and in accordance with section 49 of the Civil Service Act. His promotion has not yet been confirmed by civil service certificate.

4. Yes. From 8th January, 1913, to 15th June, 1929. He was relieved of the duties of the position and assigned to another position with a reduction in rank and salary.

5. He was relieved of the duties of the position as clerk in charge of the city delivery branch for failure to properly perform these duties. He has already been sufficiently penalized and has again won promotion on merit.

6. No, but the orthodox promotional procedure was followed. See answer to question 3.

7. See answer to No. 6.

8. See answer to No. 6.

MACHINERY SERVICE LIMITED

Mr. TUSTIN:

1. Is the Machinery Service Limited, Ville La Salle, with head office on Lafleur avenue, a company that is owned by the government of Canada?

2. Is the Machinery Service Limited operated under government supervision?

3. Is one Thomas Arnold in the employ of the government, and if so, in what capacity?

4. Did said Thomas Arnold supervise or direct, or participate in equipping the plant of Machinery Service Limited, and if so, by whose direction or authority did he act?

5. What has been the total cost to date of equipping and tooling this plant?

6. What is the number of employees engaged in the plant?

7. What number of internees brought to Canada from England are employed in the plant?

8. What is the present rate or rates of pay of the various classes of labour, skilled and unskilled, employed in Machinery Service Limited?

9. Was priority accorded to Machinery Service Limited in the procuring of equipment?

10. What class or classes of products or parts are made in this plant?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Thomas Arnold is Machine Tools Controller for Canada, President of Citadel Merchandising Co. Ltd., and President of Machinery Service Ltd. He acts in all these capacities without remuneration.

4. Mr. Arnold in conjunction with the former general manager and vice-president and the secretary of the company assisted in the equipping of the plant. The requirements at that time were left to the general manager, Captain F. F. Cowling, who was a mechanical administrator.

5. $370,000.

6. 54.

7. 43.

8. The rate of pay is the same as in standard machine shops and is under the supervision of the Department of Labour.

CANADIAN FORCES—PENSIONS

Mr. WHITE:

1. How many discharged men from the armed forces have been examined for pension from 1939 to date?

2. How many pensions have been awarded after, (a) first hearing; (b) after second hearing?

3. How many soldiers discharged after service overseas in category "E" have not been awarded a pension?

4. At what date was the present scale of pensions set up?

5. Has there been any increase since that date?

6. Is the scale of pensions awarded under section 11-3 of the Pensions Act on the same scale as pensions awarded to soldiers suffering a war disability in an actual theatre of war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Return as of December 31, 1943, in respect of former members of the forces of the present war:

1. The Canadian pension commission has examined and rendered a first hearing decision in the cases of 39,318 discharged men and women.

2. (a) Entitlement to pension was granted in 7,180 cases; (b) (i) entitlement to pension was granted on second hearing in 444 cases, (ii) entitlement to pension was granted on appeal board hearing in 359 cases.

3. Records do not reflect a break-down of the categories of soldiers who have not been awarded a pension. However, on first hearing, entitlement to pension was not granted in 3,258 cases of soldiers after service overseas.

4. June 27, 1925.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. Section 11 (3) of the Pension act provides that the commission may in its discretion award such pension, not exceeding the ordinary rates of pension prescribed by the act, as it may, from time to time, deem to be adequate in the circumstances.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTIES

Mr. WHITE:

What amounts have been collected, by provinces, under the Dominion Succession Duty Act to date?

Mr. GIBSON: To January 31, 1944, there has been collected since its inception under the Dominion Succession Duty Act a total of $31,907,535 divided as follows by provinces:

Prince Edward Island	$ 49,648
Nova Scotia	666,236
New Brunswick	488,062
Quebec	11,895,315
Ontario	15,547,825
Manitoba	649,750
Saskatchewan	326,185
Alberta	690,989
British Columbia	1,591,683
Yukon	1,842
Canada	$31,907,535

MUTUAL AID, 1943—CANADIAN EXPORTS

Mr. POULIOT:

What was the value of the Canadian exports to each one of the united nations by virtue of the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act, 1943?

Mr. CHEVRIER: A report to parliament will be made as provided by the Mutual Aid Act, Bill 76, 1943, clause 8:

As soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year, the board shall prepare and lay before parliament a report of operations under this Act: Provided that such report shall not contain any information the disclosure of which would, in the opinion of the governor in council, be prejudicial to the security of Canada or of any other united nation.

HEALTH CENTRES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has the government, through the Department of Pensions and National Health, authorized the establishment of five health centres at Ottawa, London, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver?

2. Are similar health centres being established in the maritime provinces? If so, state locations, size of site and the estimated completed cost.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. The government has authorized the establishment of one health and occupational centre, near Ottawa.

2. Consideration is being given by officers of the department to the advisability of establishing similar institutions at other sites.

WAR SERVICES DEPARTMENT—WAR CHARITIES DIVISION

Mr. FAIR:

1. How many, (a) men; (b) women, are employed in the war charities division?

2. What is the general purpose and work of this organization?

3. What is the monthly payroll of the division?

4. Are any of the employees military men?

5. If so, what are their names, rank and occupation prior to the war?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. (a) 10 men; (b) 13 women.

2. The general purpose and work of the division are defined by order in council P.C. 8488, October 31, 1941, as follows: "To administer 'The War Charities Act and the regulations made hereunder; to cooperate with all organizations registered under the War Charities Act including such organizations as are or may become subject to the supervision of the national war services funds advisory board, and generally, to promote, organize and coordinate different forms of voluntary assistance, with a view to the most effective use of personal service or material contributions for the prosecution of the war and the welfare of the nation'."

3. The February 1944 payroll is $3,093, plus cost of living bonus $165.

4 and 5. Yes. Angus Mowat, major, inspector of libraries, province of Ontario; James M. Humphrey, major, general insurance; and Malcolm J. MacLeod, major, chartered accountant. (All on temporary loan from Department of National Defence, Army.)

NATIONAL DEFENCE (AIR)—COST-OF-LIVING BONUS

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Is the Department of National Defence for Air paying its civilian employees the full cost-of-living bonus?

2. If not, what bonus per week are they being paid?

3. Is this in line with the cost-of-living bonus being paid other government employees?

Mr. POWER:

1 and 2. Civilian employees of the Department of National Defence for Air are paid cost-of-living bonus under order in council P.C. 6702 and regulations provided in accordance with the terms of that order in council.

3. Yes.

WAR VETERANS' WIDOWS—HOSPITALIZATION

Mr. KNOWLES:

When war veterans' widows in receipt of special widows' allowances are hospitalized, (a) what amount of their allowance is paid to the hospital for their maintenance; (b) what amount is paid to the widow; (c) what amount, if any, is suspended during the period of hospitalization?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): When information as to hospitalization comes to the attention of the War Veterans' Allowance board, (a) a maximum of $15 per month if amount of allowance permits; (b) balance of allowance; (c) none in any case so far dealt with.

AID TO RUSSIA

Mr. CHOQUETTE:

What aid has Canada furnished to Russia to the present date, (a) in money; (b) munitions; (c) food; (d) clothing, etc., giving the details and figures for each category and the amount in each case?

Mr. CHEVRIER: A report to parliament will be made as provided by the Mutual Aid Act, bill 76, 1943, clause 8:

"As soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year, the board shall prepare and lay before parliament a report of operations under this act: provided that such report shall not contain any information the disclosure of which would, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, be prejudicial to the security of Canada or of any other united nation."

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—VICTOR T. GOGGIN

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What salary was Mr. Victor T. Goggin paid when made general manager of Wartime Housing Limited?

2. What salary was he receiving at the time of his resignation?

3. What is the total amount paid to Mr. Victor T. Goggin by the Wartime Housing Limited for, (a) salary; (b) travelling expenses; (c) allowances?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. $10,000 par annum.

2. $12,000 per annum.

3. (a) $33,047.80; (b) $9,537.58; (c) None.

The above amounts are as of February 28th, 1944.

OLD AGE AND BLIND PENSIONERS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Is consideration being given to increasing the maximum payable to old age and blind pensioners beyond the amount provided by order in council P.C. 6367 of August 10, 1943?

2. Is consideration being given to raising the ceiling on the income of pensioners beyond that provided in section 8 (f) of the Old Age Pension Act, 1927?

Mr. ABBOTT: These questions relate to matters of policy and it is not the practice of the government to disclose matters of policy in giving answers to questions.

*R.C.A.F.—H. M. (MARLOWE) KENNEDY

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Is one H. M. (Marlowe) Kennedy, formerly of Winnipeg and now of Ottawa, serving in Ottawa as a member of the Royal Canadian Air Force with the rank of wing commander?

2. If so, is dependents' allowance being paid on his account, and what is the relationship of the recipient or recipients to the said Kennedy?

3. What post does he now occupy in Ottawa, and when was he named to such post?

4. Were any recommendations or references as to his qualifications or character obtained by the department from any civilian source prior to his appointment to his present post?

Mr. POWER: I should like to answer this question orally, as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Dependents' allowance is being paid on his account to Mrs. N. A. Kennedy, Barbara Joan and Charles W. Kennedy, wife and children of Wing Commander H. M. Kennedy.

3. Wing Commander Kennedy is assistant director of Air Transport Command and was posted to R.C.A.F. headquarters on 5th October, 1943.

4. The appointment of Wing Commander Kennedy to his present post was made in full accordance with the promotion policy of the R.C.A.F. and on merit. Civilian sources are not consulted by the R.C.A.F. with regard to postings and promotions within its rank.

I answer this question orally because I would wish, Mr. Speaker, to draw your attention to the kind of question which has been asked. I have no desire to restrain hon. members from asking questions; on the contrary, I think that they should have full privilege to ask any questions they desire and place them on the order paper. But I do seriously doubt the propriety of placing on the order paper such questions as this. Any one of us, any member of this house and any member of the services, might have some skeleton in his family closet which would be disclosed or to which attention could be drawn by questions of this kind. Personally I think it is not a good practice, and I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that through the Clerk we could find some means whereby at least, when questions of this kind are to be placed on the order paper, the minister and the department concerned would be advised. It so happens in this case that Wing Commander Kennedy is one of the best officers in our service, so that I have no objection to answering the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I, in the absence of the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) who is at the moment out of the chamber, in whose name the question appears on the order paper, say to the minister that while he has made some reference to the kind of question this is, he himself could very readily have spoken to the hon. member and have avoided unnecessary publicity in connection with it.

Mr. POWER: I am not the guardian of an hon. member's sense of what is good taste and what is decent. I simply point out that I think the question should have been submitted to me before it was placed on the order paper and a doubt cast on the integrity of one of the ablest and most conscientious men in our service.

SELECTIVE SERVICE AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE OFFICES, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many selective service and unemployment insurance offices are there in New Brunswick?

2. Where are they located?

3. What is the grade of each of these offices?

4. What are the names, positions and home addresses of each of the employees of each of these offices?

5. What are the salaries and other remuneration of each of these employees?

6. How many of these employees are returned soldiers?

7. Were all of these employees appointed by the civil service?

8. If not, how were they appointed?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Twelve.

*FLAGS ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS—NATIONAL FLAG

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Who is the superintendent of dominion government buildings in charge of the distribution of flags which fly over public buildings?

2. Has this officer a sufficient number of "union jack" flags for public buildings?

3. When his supply is deficient, does he distribute in lieu thereof "Canadian red ensign" flags?

4. Has he received an order providing for the replacement of such "Canadian red ensign" flags by "union jack" flags as soon as the stocks of "union jack" flags on order have arrived, with the further instructions that, in the future, only "union jack" flags must fly over public buildings, and that "Canadian red ensign" flags must be used solely for special decoration purposes?

5. Has the government at last decided to endow Canada with a distinctive national flag so as to replace definitively the "union jack" flag which now flies over all our public buildings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I had better answer this question orally. Section 5 of the question is:

Has the government at last decided to endow Canada with a distinctive national flag so as to replace definitively the "union jack" flag which now flies over all our public buildings?

I would say first of all that the question as worded is neither direct nor straightforward. However the purpose of it is clear enough: it is one which brings up the advisability or inadvisability of creating a flag controversy at a time of war. The question is similar to one which was asked on two occasions, at the last session of parliament by the same hon. member. At that time I replied to his question in the following words, on June 21, 1943, as reported in Hansard, pages 3823 and 3824:

A national flag is one which normally is used by a single nation only, and which is used to distinguish that nation from others at international gatherings, and to serve as a symbol of it. The red ensign, with the union jack in the first quarter next to the staff, and the Canadian coat of arms in the fly has for over seventy years been very generally used in situations where a flag specially distinctive of Canada was essential. It was first authorized by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald shortly after confederation for use on Canadian merchant vessels. Its use as a distinctive emblem on all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situated outside Canada was authorized by order in council on January 26, 1924. It has been popularly accepted as a flag distinctive of Canada.

The union jack, while not a flag distinctive of Canada, may correctly be flown on land in any part of His Majesty's domains.

I question whether this would be a suitable time at which to have parliament determine which particular flag—the union jack, the red ensign, or some other flag to be specially designed—should be declared to be the national flag of Canada.

I have nothing to add to what has been said by the ministry at previous sessions on this matter of a national flag. I should like however to avail myself of this opportunity to point out that the conference at Quebec in August last presented an occasion on which it was desirable, indeed essential, that a flag specifically distinctive of Canada should be flown. The use of the red ensign flown at the citadel throughout the proceedings of the conference as a symbol of Canada, at the side of the union jack and the stars and stripes, was widely and most favourably commented upon.

The other parts of the hon. member's question are matters of departmental detail which have little or no significance, unless discussion is to be raised on section 5 of the question as asked, and I would request therefore that what I have said be taken as a reply in full.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PORK PRODUCTS—PRICES PAID TO PACKERS BY RETAILERS

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

For a copy of the report of enumerators who tabulated prices paid to packers by retailers for pork products during the month of May, 1942, and referred to in the annual report of the Minister of Agriculture for the year ending March 31, 1943, on page 124.

Return tabled.

ARMY BOOTS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters, communications, reports or other documents dated between October 2, 1939, and August 6, 1943, wherein one James Clark, of Toronto, formerly an inspector of or in the employ of the Department of National Defence, and/or the inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada, alleged or complained that army boots of inferior quality or manufacture were being manufactured for or supplied to the government by the firms named by him, together with a copy of all letters received by the Minister of National Defence, or the acting minister from the said James Clark, and/or anyone on his behalf, relative to his complaints with regard thereto or requesting an investigation thereof, and the replies made thereto since August 6, 1943, to date hereof.

Mr. RALSTON: I explained to the house the other night, when the matter came up, that the inspections referred to are done by the joint inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada, and that the British government have a substantial interest in the operations of the board because of the fact that only approximately thirty per cent of the inspections are done for the Canadian government. The board reports through me so far as Canada is concerned and through the high commissioner for the United Kingdom so far as the United Kingdom is concerned. I mention this because I have some doubt whether or not reports of this kind, by a board which is conducted as an inspection board and simply as an administrative body set up in this way, should be brought down in this house. I have consulted the high commissioner for the United Kingdom, Mr. MacDonald, and he agrees with me in having no objection in this particular case, save in one respect, and I mention it because it has to do with a general rule that exists in the house. I would not consider it in the public interest to bring down reports made by inspectors to their superiors in connection with this, or any other matter, with which the inspection board is concerned. The house will understand that the inspectors are carrying out inspection duties in connection with from 10,000 to 20,000 different items, from boots to guns, radio equipment and so on, and it would be totally irregular and highly prejudicial for the reports of the inspectors to be brought down in connection with these matters. They come within the rule mentioned by the Prime Minister the other day with reference to reports by officers of a department on matters having to do with the department and submitted to a superior officer. Mr. MacDonald and I have no objection to bringing down the correspondence mentioned, that is, the correspondence with the minister but which has not to do with reports made by Mr. Clark at the time he was an employee of the board and acting in his official position as an inspector, these reports being made to his superiors.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the minister.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

WINDSOR, N.S., TRANSIT AND EMBARKATION DEPOT

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence since April 1, 1942, between the Departments of National Defence, Munitions and Supply, Public Works, and Finance, and property holders, contractors and suppliers of equipment and material, in connection with the acquiring of property, construction of buildings and extensions or other works and improvements at the transit and embarkation depot at Windsor, Nova Scotia.

2. Which of the said vessels, if any, were requisitioned, (a) for use by the government of Canada, or any board or crown company under authority of the government of Canada; what compensation was paid and to whom, for same, per diem, per month or otherwise; (b) by the Canadian shipping board acting as agents for other than Canadian authorities?

3. Which of the said vessels were purchased by the government of Canada, and what amounts were paid or contracted to be paid for each vessel, showing date of purchase or acquisition, and date or terms of payment, and under what act or statute the said vessels were requisitioned or purchased?

DOMINION BOND ISSUES, HOLDINGS BY CHARTERED BANKS, ETC.

Mr. QUELCH:

For a return showing 1. A list of the Dominion of Canada bond issues since outbreak of the present war, (a) public issues; (b) issues sold to chartered banks; (c) issues sold to Bank of Canada, showing issue dates and maturity, rate of interest and amount of issue.

2. A list of Dominion of Canada bond redemptions since the outbreak of war.

3. The holdings of dominion bonds by the chartered banks as at August 31, 1939, and December 31, 1943.

4. The holdings of dominion bonds by the Bank of Canada on August 31, 1939, and December 31, 1943.

5. Canadian deposits in chartered banks as at August 31, 1939, and December 31, 1943.

6. Cash reserves of chartered banks as at August 31, 1939, and December 31, 1943.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—ED. ZAHORSKI

Mr. DOUGLAS Weyburn):

For a copy of all expense accounts, vouchers, receipts and forms A-101 submitted by Ed. Zahorski, employed by the Department of Agriculture under the P.F.A.A., from June 15 to August 15, 1943, inclusive.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH QUEBEC PROVINCE AS TO EMPLOYMENT OF WORKERS

Mr. RAYMOND:

For a copy of all communications or correspondence exchanged between the dominion Department of Labour and the Department of Labour of the province of Quebec since 1939 in connection with the employment of workers and the salaries paid to them.

Mr. MITCHELL: As a matter of courtesy we shall ask the provincial government at Quebec whether we may table this correspondence, and if we receive an affirmative reply it will be tabled.

ADAMO D'AGOSTINO

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all memoranda, communications, agreements, orders in council and other documents from September 7, 1939, to the present, relating to the retirement or dismissal of Mr. Adamo D'Agostino from his position as an employee of the Post Office Department at Niagara Falls, Ontario.

WAR LABOUR BOARD—BURMIS LUMBER COMPANY

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of a letter from R. B. Richardson, and others, dated January 27, 1943, at Burmis, Alberta, to the national war labour board, and a copy of the reply thereto, dated February 2, 1943; also copy of a letter from the said R. B. Richardson, dated December 16, 1942, to the national war labour board, and the reply thereto, dated January 7, 1943; also copies of any letters, telegrams or other correspondence passing between Burmis Lumber Company, of Burmis, Alberta, and the national war labour board, or any of its officials during the years 1941, 1942 and 1943; also copies of reports of any inspectors or officials of the national war labour board relating to the foregoing case.

CANADIAN ACTIVE SERVICE FORCE ASSOCIATION

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of a letter dated November 6, 1943, and a letter dated December 15, 1943, addressed to the Hon. the Minister of Labour and the Hon. the Minister of National Defence from the Canadian Active Service Force Association, Post 1, Toronto, together with copies of the replies thereto.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—WARTIME BUREAU OF TECHNICAL PERSONNEL

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all correspondence and memoranda, dated since January 1, 1943, exchanged between national selective service and the wartime bureau of technical personnel, also between each of these bodies and the national research council, relating to the retaining and/or employing of personnel by the national research council.

LOAN OF $1,000,000,000

TO MEET LOANS OR OBLIGATIONS, TO PURCHASE UNMATURED SECURITIES, AND FOR PUBLIC WORKS AND GENERAL PURPOSES

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of one thousand million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada and also for purchasing unmatured securities of Canada and for public works and general purposes.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

VICTORY LOANS

INQUIRY AS TO DATE AND AMOUNT OF NEXT LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, of which I have sent him a copy by way of notice. Is he in a position to indicate to the house when the next victory loan appeal will be made?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I am not in a position to give a definite date. It will be the latter part of April. I hope to be in a position to make a statement as to the definite date within a few days.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the parliamentary assistant in a position to give an indication as to the amount that will be asked for?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

CANADIAN FORCES

DECORATIONS FOR GALLANTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to make a request of the Minister of National Defence (Army) and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. On February 24 the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air placed on the pages of Hansard a list of members of the R.C.A.F. and R.A.F. who have been decorated for gallantry in this war. I am sure that hon. members read this list, as I did, with deep interest, and it has occurred to me that a list should also be placed upon Hansard of Canadians in the navy and army who have received similar recognition. I should like the two ministers to give this matter their consideration, for the names on these lists of awards are those of Canadian citizens who have made and are making for us a contribution which none of us will be able adequately to repay.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): As a matter of fact the list has not been published because we have been waiting for the gazetting of a number of recent operational awards. The list cannot be made up until they are gazetted. I anticipate that the gazette will be published very shortly. As soon as that is done a list showing the names of those gallant and devoted men and women of the Canadian army will be tabled.

Mr. GRAYDON: I knew that later on the minister would be tabling the list, but the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Macmillan) did not table the former list; he placed it on Hansard. It is so important and interesting that I think the minister should do that, if he would.

Mr. RALSTON: That will be done, of course.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of National Defence and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services intend to table, when they are ready, lists of decorations awarded to the gallant men of the army and navy. Without derogating in any way from the gallantry of these men and women, it should be observed that a large number of civilians have been decorated in this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not for gallantry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know when that list and the list of citations that must have accompanied the recommendations will be available to members of parliament. It is important to have the list of decorations and the reasons for which they were given. I add that none of these individuals are members of parliament.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR OPPORTUNITY TO DISCUSS ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 9384

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Having reference to the statement of the Prime Minister on Thursday, February 10, as appearing on page 321 of Hansard, to the effect that "it is the intention of the government to make certain amendments" to wartime wages control order, 1943, P.C. 9384, and to the Prime Minister's request that the matter be allowed to rest until after the government had heard the representations of labour organizations, which has since been done, is the government prepared to lay before the house its proposed amendments, and will the government provide an opportunity for discussion of the amendments?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend's question might stand as a notice.

RADIO BROADCASTING

ADDRESS OF MR. PHILPOTT—NEWS COMMENTATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National War Services in regard to a matter that was brought up on Friday with reference to the broadcast made over the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by Mr. Philpott, of Vancouver. In the press of to-day there is a resume of what Mr. Philpott said on that occasion. I am not going to refer to what he said other than to point out that in dealing with the return to Canada of Lieutenant-General Andrew McNaughton, he said:

> I have not had secondhand access to the papers the Prime Minister showed the leaders in parliament, but I have received reliable information on this case, which shows that it raises some issues of deep national concern.

He goes on to say:

> Whatever may be the constitutional theory, the fact is that we are still in double colonial status—not just to Britain as formerly, but now also to our good neighbour the United States.

The representative of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at the coast, Mr. Ira Dilworth, said:

> We don't act as a censorship body of news. There are certain limits placed on commentators, but they do not constitute exactly censorship.

What are the limitations short of censorship placed on the commentators who use the services of the national network? I request also that the script be tabled.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): I am sorry, but I cannot answer the question at the moment. May it stand as a notice?

CLOTHING

RESTRICTIONS ON THE MAKING OF SUITS

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): May I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) a question in connection with wartime prices and trade board regulations? In Toronto on Saturday a prominent leader of the suit industry of Canada pointed out that on January 28, the president of the board of trade was asked a question in the British House of Commons as to when restrictions were to be removed in connection with the making of suits in the United Kingdom. He replied that following what had taken place in the United States he had issued orders that on and after March 1 all restrictions on the making of suits in the United Kingdom would be removed. Unless the wartime prices and trade board in Canada issues similar orders, our manufacturers will be at a great disadvantage.

Mr. SPEAKER: This question also will stand as a notice.

VEGETABLES

INQUIRY AS TO SUBSIDIES ON CORN, BEANS AND PEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Would the Minister of Agriculture state when the subsidies on corn, beans and peas will be announced?

Mr. SPEAKER: This will have to stand as a notice, also.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: With all deference to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I have received several telegrams in regard to this matter, and it is urgent.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will have to stand as a notice.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then if I may direct another question to the Minister of Agriculture, I am informed that the British government is very anxious to obtain corn, beans and peas in connection with the war effort. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. SPEAKER: This question will have to stand as a notice.

BORDER CROSSINGS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO SITUATION IN NIAGARA DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): An acute situation having arisen at border points in my part of the country, and the Minister of Labour having been advised of the situation, according to press reports, would he make a statement at an early day indicating just what will be the position, particularly in respect to workers who have to cross the international line?

Mr. SPEAKER: That will have to stand as a notice also.

Mr. LOCKHART: The situation is acute, Mr. Speaker, because working men are being refused permission to cross the international border, and I think the matter is important.

Mr. SPEAKER: I presume it is also important that the minister should have an opportunity to make an adequate reply to the question asked by the hon. member, so that I think he should be given notice.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am quite willing to have this serve as a notice, then, but I should like the minister to make a reply as soon as possible.

SUPPLY

WAR LOANS—STATEMENT OF MR. WRIGHT ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Before we go into committee of supply, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter I wish to bring to the attention of the house, arising out of the question asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) with respect to the floating of a new war loan.

Since the beginning of the war we have raised sums of money beyond anything we dreamed possible before this war started, and that money has been raised through borrowing and taxation. Approximately fifty per cent of the money we have required has been secured through borrowing. I have before me the public accounts for the year 1943, and at page lvii I find these words:

> Furthermore, it should be noted that the second victory loan campaign had closed as late as March 7, 1942, hardly more than three weeks before the beginning of the fiscal year 1942-43, and the fourth victory loan drive opened on April 26, 1943, or less than four weeks after the close of the fiscal year. Thus, although only $991·4 million appears as receipts from victory loans during the year ended March 31, 1943, nevertheless in the fifteen months from February 16, 1942, to May 15, 1943, over $3,143 million in cash was subscribed by the general public in three loan campaigns.

And a little later:

> In order to assess the results of the borrowing programme properly, it is necessary to consider the period from the start of the war to the close of the fiscal year 1942-43, so that accidental factors like the timing of loan campaigns and other transactions will be less important. This is done in table XXIII, which shows that from September 1, 1939, to March 31, 1943, $3,266·8 million out of total new borrowings (that is, excluding the conversion or renewal of previous issues) amounting to $5,124·6 million were subscribed by the general public, or 63·7 per cent.

Since then we have had two more victory loans, the fourth loan for approximately $1,200 million and the fifth loan for something like $1,300 million. So that when you make allowance for the amounts subscribed by the banks, the large insurance companies and various other institutions in Canada, you find that the general public have contributed something over $2,500 million through small individual subscriptions to loans since the beginning of the war.

I should like to see the government give these small investors, who have come forward so willingly, some guarantee that these bonds will not be allowed to fall below par. The large companies, the insurance companies, banks and other institutions holding large blocks of these loans, are quite able to carry them to maturity, when they will receive the par value. The government should give the small investors a guarantee that they also will be able to get par for their bonds.

Mr. GRAYDON: What about the policyholders?

Mr. WRIGHT: The insurance companies are quite prepared to carry these bonds to maturity, when they will get 100 cents on the dollar, so that the policyholders are protected. I am speaking in behalf of the thousands of small investors who are to be found in the army, in factories and on farms throughout the country, who have invested in these loans in order to build up savings which may be used for purposes of reestablishment when the war is over.

We all know what took place after the last war. I have a neighbour who served in the army for four years during that war and whose people purchased a $500 war bond for him. In 1920, when he needed money, he sold his bond, but received for it only $450. On the other hand those who were able to carry their bonds to maturity were paid 100 cents on the dollar, with interest not on $450 but on the full face value of their bonds. I have in my hand the quarterly listings on the Toronto and Montreal stock exchanges for the third victory loan, 5½ per cent bonds issued October 27, 1919 and due November 1, 1934, giving the low and high for each quarter. It will be seen that in the quarter ending March 31, 1920, these bonds sold at $97. In December of the same year they sold at a low of 88¼ and a high of 94. In March, 1921, the low was 92 and the high 96¾. In December, 1921, the low was 94½ and the high 99½. In 1922 they reached par, and from then until maturity they remained at or above par. As a matter of fact, in March, 1924, the low was 102½ and the high 103½, and they went as high as 105¾ in December of 1927.

Thousands of our soldiers who are overseas are sending home their deferred pay to be put into victory bonds. Thousands of girls in the air force, thousands of workers in factories and thousands of men on the land have subscribed to these bonds. Many of these people will want their money in the period immediately following the war, in order to reestablish themselves, and before another victory loan is floated I think the government should give some assurance that these bonds will be held at par.

I have before me the particulars of the second and third victory loan campaigns in Saskatchewan, and they show that the average subscription was approximately $168 per loan. This indicates that the bonds were bought chiefly by people in the lower income groups. The people who are selling these bonds are telling the farmers to defer their purchases of machinery until after the war and to invest their money in bonds so that when the war is over they will be able to buy the machinery they need. That is the consideration under which a great number of these bonds are being purchased, but unless some further guarantee is given we may again be in the position in which we found ourselves in 1920. At that time certain people in whose interest it was to see that these bonds came down in price were able to bring them down. We should see that that condition does not prevail again and that no profits are made out of the savings of the small purchaser of victory bonds.

It is not enough for the government to say that things are different now, that we have a Bank of Canada which we did not have in 1919 and 1920. It is true that we have a Bank of Canada and that the government have more control over the financial structure of this country than they had at that time, but having that control I think they should give some assurance to the public that they will use it to see that these bonds remain at par. They are the ones who can do this. The people of Canada are willing to contribute and they will contribute if they are given some assurance.

I have a letter from a man who is at present in a sanatorium. He had sold his farm and wished to invest his money in bonds. He called in a bond salesman and asked if he could guarantee that when, as he anticipated, he left the sanatorium in the course of a couple of years, he would get one hundred cents on the dollar. He was told that if the war continued for two or three years he would get one hundred cents on the dollar, but if the war should end and the old law of supply and demand should again operate and people in the small income groups should sell their bonds in order to reestablish themselves, inevitably the bonds would go below par. As a result, this man did not invest his money in bonds.

I am sure that if the government would come out with a definite statement that these bonds are not to be allowed to go below par, they would find it much easier to float another war loan. I urge upon them that they take this action immediately.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to endorse everything the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) has said, particularly in view of the fact that an insidious campaign is going on in some parts of this country to the effect that should there be a change in government these bonds will not be worth anything. I agree that this government might be changed for a still more reactionary one and then the bonds would be worth much less when the war is over than they are now. That is what will happen if the present economic system remains undirected and uncontrolled in every particular when the war is over.

It seems to me that it would be in the interests of the nation if when we ask for support for the victory loan, particularly from the smaller investors, we make provision for the handling of victory bonds during the first two or three years after the war in such a way that the smaller investor who wants to realize on them to build a home or buy furniture, machinery and so on, will be assured of geting one hundred cents on the dollar. The men and women of Canada who have invested in bonds are entitled to such an assurance. Whenever I have appealed to the people of Canada to put their money into bonds—I shall be glad to do this again as a public duty —I have said to them, and I repeat it to-day, that when they are asked to relinquish their savings for this purpose, especially those who have saved and planned in order to buy bonds because they consider it a patriotic duty, they deserve the guarantee that they will receive one hundred cents on the dollar when they cash them in. I appeal to the Prime Minister and the government to give consideration to this plea.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said that there is an insidious campaign going on in some parts of the country. May I say to him that in the district from which I come people have been disposing of their bonds, not because there is an insidious campaign by anyone but because of the propaganda of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that they would take over everything and are against profits. The best guarantee that the people of this country can get that their bonds will be good is to reelect the present government.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am not able on this most unusual occasion to agree with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). The solution he has in mind is to choose between two evils, and perhaps he regards my hon. friends to the left as the lesser of the two evils.

With regard to the speech just given by my hon. friend to my left, may I say that I regard it as being in the nature of propaganda which has been abroad for some considerable time. What I desire to say to my hon. friends is not by way of supporting the government but rather to refer to a situation which I think ought to be shown up to the people of Canada. The best guarantee we can have that the bonds of Canada will be good after the war is over is to see that we have full employment and maximum production and that the full resources of Canada are put to work. I think it is generally agreed in Canada that that must be done when this war is over. When we have accomplished that—it can be done and it will be done—we shall have answered my hon. friends to my left who are taking the usual defeatist attitude with respect to the whole problem which faces us after the war is over. They talk about rationing scarcity and guaranteeing minimums, but our job is to see that maximums are provided for the people of Canada. If the proper course is followed, not only will the bondholders be guaranteed a minimum of one dollar for each dollar invested, but I am hopeful that with the increase of opportunities and prosperity in Canada the men and women who hold these bonds will receive a premium on every one of them. We have no right as Canadian citizens to think that any other condition will exist when this war is over.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) has made out a good case for the point he raised. We have had a nice propagandist speech by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). It is always said that this group is carrying on propaganda, but during the present session the leader of the opposition has never risen in his place without making a propagandist speech. I wish to say to him that there is no use in telling the people of Canada what is going to happen when this war is over.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The C.C.F. has been doing it right along.

Mr. MacINNIS: Wait until I finish. The people of Canada know what you did after the last war. The people of Canada know the promise made in 1930 by the leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are promising now.

Mr. MacINNIS: Wait a minute. He said: We will end unemployment or perish in the attempt. They perished. They perished because they tried to end unemployment under the system that created unemployment. Because they were going to end unemployment in that way, they perished. We are making no bones about it. We are learning that unemployment cannot be ended under the present system. The only way you can end unemployment under capitalism is by making a war. You ended unemployment between 1914 and 1918, but you had unemployment again as soon as the war was over and you had it almost continuously from then on until the present war began.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh no.

Mr. MacINNIS: The facts are against my hon. friend. Possibly he was not unemployed. But was there not unemployment between 1929 and 1939?

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes, but was there not unemployment between 1922 and 1929?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, lots of it. Ask those who were in office at the time. Perhaps my hon. friend has never heard about the famous five-cent piece speech.

Mr. HOMUTH: We heard about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: That incident arose at a time when the provinces needed assistance because of unemployment and other conditions and the federal government of the day was not prepared to give it to them.

The question the member for Melfort raised is this. We are asking the people of this country to invest their savings in bonds—invest, remember. It may be that we shall be met within a short time with the conditions that prevailed in the thirties, or yes, in the twenties. The price of bonds may fall and as prices fall people will rush to dispose of their bonds. What we are asking is this: since the government will pay one hundred cents on the dollar on these bonds at maturity, there is no reason in the world why they should not give the assurance now that they will protect the small investor by paying one hundred cents on the dollar if he has to dispose of his bonds at any time before maturity. It would not cost the government of this country anything, because when the bonds mature they will pay them off at one hundred cents on the dollar anyway. I am satisfied that the member for Melfort has raised a pertinent and important question, not one that should be met with sneers and hilarity in this house. People who have at heart the interests of the working man and the working woman—small investors—should realize that once they lose their jobs they are only two or three weeks away from the breadline. These are the people we should protect.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member has no monopoly of interest in the working man to make him his champion.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I believe the raising of this question in the house is timely. It is fitting that we should call on the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) to tell the house at the earliest opportunity how the Progressive Conservatives, if they came into power, would maintain total use and total employment. In the light of the tragic failure of the Conservatives between 1930 and 1935, they need to show just in what respects they have changed their policy to guarantee total use and total employment. It is utter nonsense talking about what they are going to do unless they show how that intention is to be realized.

Mr. HOMUTH: We have not the same winter as we had last year, have we?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, but you have a whole lot of the same brains in the Conservative party, and thus far I have not seen any evidence of any different brains or of any different use of the old brains. I think the real problem which the Liberals have is to show the house and the people that they really do know how to manage the economy of this country so that they can maintain the value of its bonds at par. The problem which faces the C.C.F. is not so much to raise questions like this as it is to show the country that they know how to manage the economy of the country. We hear much talk about its being necessary only to change the system in order to achieve total employment and total use. I agree with that. But the change must be the correct change. When the C.C.F. succeed in showing us how merely changing to government ownership of industry is going to guarantee the total use of Canada's natural resources and the total employment of Canada's people, that party will be in a far stronger position.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), with whom I have no particular quarrel, has asserted that so long as capitalism continues it will be impossible to achieve total use and total employment. I point out that the all-important thing is to provide markets internally. If purchasing power can be supplied to the people to enable them to buy a sufficient amount of the products that industry stands ready to turn out, we shall be able to employ at home, our full resources, both human and material. Until that is done, it will matter not who owns the industries. I do believe it would be an excellent thing for this house to take a few hours off, several times before the end of this session, to canvass with the greatest of care and examine with the most minute scrupulousness just exactly what we need to do to be able to guarantee security after the war is over.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I think the best guarantee we can have that the country's bonds will maintain their value is a guarantee that the national income will be maintained at its present level. When that is done there will be no need for people to sell their bonds because then they will be receiving wages to enable them to maintain a decent standard of living. If it is the intention of the government that the national income shall be maintained at its present level, I do not think anybody would suggest that it is not within the power of the government to secure that. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), on the declaration of war, said that no financial restrictions would be allowed to impede the war effort. Is the Prime Minister prepared to make a declaration that no financial restrictions will be allowed to impede our peace-time effort, and that the only limits to the national income will be the ability of the people to produce in order to maintain the national income? I think it would be a very good thing for the country at large if at this time the Prime Minister in no uncertain way would declare that no financial restrictions are to be allowed to impede the success of the post war era; that whatever money is required to maintain the fullest development of our resources will be forthcoming.

There is a reason why there is fear in people's minds, and it is this. When Doctor James was speaking before the senate he said that after the war we would have to adopt a new budget philosophy. He said we might have to be prepared to increase the national debt every year for the next hundred years. The only exception I take to that statement is this: why say a hundred years? Why not be frank and say that as long as we are operating under this system the national debt will have to increase for ever?

On the other hand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has taken a different stand. He brought in a return last year in which he stated that the national debt could be paid off, and that the government would probably introduce a scientific scheme under which the national debt would be paid. What does that mean? If we are going to introduce a scientific scheme to pay off the national debt, you must have not only a balanced budget but a budget with a surplus in order to pay off the debt. There you have the adviser on reconstruction saying that you are going to increase your national debt every year for a hundred years, while on the other hand the Minister of Finance is saying that you are not going to increase your national debt, but that you are going to have a budget surplus and pay off your national debt.

I think we all realize that if we are to have again a period similar to that from 1935 to 1939, when we had a minister of finance who deliberately set himself to curtail expenses in order to have a balanced budget, very soon after the war we shall go back into the depths of depression, destroy the confidence of the people, and have unemployment increasing. If unemployment increases, people who hold small bonds will start to cash them, and the minute they begin to do so the value will depreciate. It is high time that we had a declaration from the Prime Minister assuring this country that whatever money is necessary to develop to the fullest extent the resources of this country after the war will be forthcoming.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I had thought during the period since war was declared, those in a minority like myself who hold strong views on certain reforms would be well advised to defer the pushing of them forward until the greater and more immediate task of defeating the enemy should be accomplished. I have been accused on a good many occasions of failing to follow the course of reform which started before the banking and commerce committee of 1934, and which at times I am afraid I followed a little too vigorously, until the Bank of Canada became a publicly owned, nationally administered institution. That was a great step towards finding solutions of all of our supply problems, but I still believe that we have to go much farther and nationalize the policy of the Bank of Canada; change it from a filling station to the chartered banks into an institution of national service that will truly accomplish the purpose of issuing national currency and national credit in terms of public need and not in terms of private gain.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, solely for the purpose of drawing to the attention of my colleagues in this house a document which I believe is probably the most significant and far-reaching that has been published in Canada this year. It is the report for 1943 of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I believe it is important because, if you will take the time to read the preamble of the Bank of Canada Act, you will find that it is established as a public utility charged with the responsibility of sustaining and advancing and expanding and regulating the economic life of the government and the people of this nation. Now, what Mr. Towers has to say, from the position which he holds and the access which he alone has to the information available, should make any pronouncement by him one of the utmost importance not only to parliament but to everyone in the dominion. Let me deal with just one or two of these statements.

At page 5 you will find a statement of the change in our national debt situation. He points out that our national debt from August 31, 1939, has risen from $4,693,000,000 to $11,302,000,000 on December 1, 1943. That is the federal debt only. It shows an increase of $6,609,000,000, and carries with it an increase in interest charges from $169,000,000 to $304,000,000 a year. Later in the report Mr. Towers attempts to sweeten that interest charge of $304,000,000 by pointing out that we might consider it reduced by offsetting the earnings of the foreign exchange control board, earnings of the Bank of Canada, and earnings of such institutions as our national harbours. But no matter what you set off against it, the fact is that the interest charge has been increased to $304,000,000 a year, which means that over the next decade the taxpayers including the men who are fighting and the men who are working to win this war and the youth of to-day must find $3,040,000,000 for interest charges alone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McGEER: In a decade, I said. Yes, if people would think in terms of tens of years when they think of interest they would probably be more concerned about its ultimate consequences.

[Mr. McGeer.]

What does Mr. Towers say about that debt situation? On page 11 of the report he says:

> I do not wish to suggest that public debt could be increased at the present rate for an indefinite period without placing intolerable strain on our economy. I do feel, however, that the war debt, and the increases which will inevitably take place for a time after the war ends, can be handled without serious embarrassment.

Neither Mr. Towers nor any other man alive to-day can tell when this war is going to end or what the ultimate cost may be. I believe we have every reason to be confident that victory is certain. Certainly the war power of Germany is declining, while the war power of the united nations is steadily advancing. But no one can be certain as to when Germany can be brought to unconditional surrender, if this war is to be prosecuted with a due regard for the unnecessary sacrifice of the lives and the suffering of the men in our own fighting forces. I believe that in the Pacific the Americans are successfully achieving what the Germans hoped and failed to do to the British isles. I believe that slowly but surely the American fleet and air power of the Pacific are destroying the lines of sea transport of the Japanese people, without which the Japanese cannot survive. But again no one can tell how soon or at what cost that end can be finally achieved. Certainly as we look at the future we know that this war is not going to end with an armistice and treaties of peace. On the contrary, it is going to end with armies of occupation. Reparations are not in the offing. The reestablishment and maintenance of order and the reconstruction of a world that has been bathed in the flames of devastation are to be a part of the cost of victory. How then can the governor of the Bank of Canada give any assurance that a debt unknown can be carried without embarrassment? Already the debt load of this war is placing an intolerable strain upon the economy of the nation.

There is one other feature in connection with that phase of our reconstruction that we all should keep in mind, and that is that during the last war there were accumulations of cash reserve. We have imposed a policy of taxation during this war deliberately designed to take away from the people, from business organizations, all forms of profit. That too will place a heavier strain upon the exchequer of national, provincial and municipal governments in the reconstruction period.

In addition to that, our municipalities and provinces, with their limited revenues, although they have some reserves accumulated from deferred maintenance and income from war expenditures, are not in as good a position to expand their debts as they were after the last war ended. What does Mr. Towers say about all this? He reviews, as every man who thinks on the subject at all must do, the problems of demobilization and reconstruction. The men and the women to be demobilized from our fighting forces are not of the same type that came back from the last war. Our air force is made up very largely, if not almost entirely, in the flying forces, of men of the officer and non-commissioned officer class, and the ground forces are men who are highly-trained and highly-skilled artisans and mechanics. In our navy the same problem, probably not so intense, is to be found, while our armed forces are men largely trained in the skill of operating highly mechanized organizations. All these forces have had their standards of living in the service greatly raised above what they were during the last war. It is not going to be as easy to find the kind of employment that will be acceptable to them as it was at the end of the last war, and the problem is infinitely greater.

We have also the problem of an industrial army who have found the highest standards of pay and the best working conditions in the most modern factories. Hundreds of thousands of them will not only be looking for employment of a similar kind but will be unhappy if they have to move down into some category of employment that is inferior. Therefore when Mr. Towers says that we can look forward to carrying our war debt and the post-war costs and costs of reconstruction without embarrassment and without placing an intolerable strain upon the economy of our nation, he is moving in the realm not of factual statement but of purely theoretical speculation. Mr. Towers, however, takes that situation and leaves it upon the doorstep of the government, upon the doorstep of parliament, because in his conclusion this is what he says:

> The adjustments required will clearly be of unprecedented magnitude, and bold planning on the part of labour, farm and business organizations as well as the governments is urgently needed.

Now when the governor of the Bank of Canada tells this government and this parliament and the people of the Dominion of Canada that they face adjustments of unprecedented magnitude and that bold planning is urgently required, he makes a statement which I believe we in this House of Commons cannot ignore and should not delay in acting upon.

I do not want to be a defeatist, although I may say that I do heartily subscribe to the proposition that a fair price of our bonds should be fixed and that Canadians, many of whom, out of a pure spirit of patriotism, accumulated their savings in the form of bonds, should not be the victims of the discount market when the war ends. If the government can limit the ceiling of a man's wages the government ought to be able to guarantee him against a loss of his investment in our national securities.

There is one other thing to which I would call the attention of members of the house and of my colleagues, and that is the method of financing which we have developed, because I believe that, in owning the Bank of Canada, we have demonstrated that we have an institution of inestimable value, already proven, and one which can prove of even greater value in the difficult days that lie ahead. Yes, there are difficult days ahead, not impossible, but they are going to require the best of economic understanding, good judgment and statesmanship to see us through.

Mr. Towers at page 6 says that during 1943, Canadian deposit liabilities of the chartered banks increased by $748,000,000. That was new money created by the chartered banks by merely writing up bank deposit entries in their books and exchanging them for interest-bearing bonds. Now he says:

> Total active note circulation, including Bank of Canada notes, rose by $161,000,000, making the total expansion in the volume of money, therefore, $909,000,000.

And he goes on to review some of the things the banks have acquired in the way of government securities, but he does not give us a clear statement of what has been purchased by the chartered banks of Canada. However, he comes along with this statement:

> "Cash reserves of the chartered banks rose $82,000,000 during the year, as shown in the table on page 1. Most of the expansion was necessary in order to maintain the cash ratio position of the chartered banks in view of the $748,000,000 increase in their Canadian deposit liabilities referred to above."

What does that mean? I believe it means that the Bank of Canada has issued into circulation, which circulation eventually came into the possession of the chartered banks, $82,000,000 of Bank of Canada legal tender bills. With that $82,000,000 the banks were able to increase their deposits up to $820,000,000 and did increase them up to $748,000,000. You see what is happening. Here we have a national banking institution owned by the people of Canada, issuing Canadian legal tender as a cold subsidy to our chartered banks, and with that subsidy of cash, which is the biggest subsidy any monopoly ever received, they are manufacturing in their own books the means of buying Canadian government interest bearing bonds. Was there ever such a device and system devised and sustained by sane men for the wreck of government and the benefit of private enterprise? There you have the meaning—at least what I always thought was the meaning—of issuing currency and credit in terms of private gain. That is the fundamental basis of our whole banking system that must be changed before government, which has the constitutional right and power and responsibility of issuing currency, can move along the fields of solvency and away from the bankruptcy that this false debt claim system will continue to impose upon us.

We have seen the tragedy in the republic to the south of us in the last few days. We have seen a president guided by the experts of the treasury board finding upon his hands at this critical period the greatest revolt of the Congress of the United States against bureaucracy and against oligarchy that has ever been recorded. President Roosevelt is the victim of the same bad advice, the same unfortunate advice, that brought Winston Churchill to disaster when he was Chancellor of the British Exchequer from 1925 to 1929. Standing on the floor of the House of Commons in 1932 and 1936, he pointed out that he took full responsibility for the tragedies that had occurred during that period; but he said that he had acted upon the advice of the monetary experts of England, who had assured him that in the policies they proposed they were returning to reality and stability. Yes, Churchill, in his happy ability to acknowledge an error when he makes it, said: "I made a mistake. I was the last of the orthodox chancellors of the exchequer. Look upon me as the last of the Mohicans." When that kind of thing goes on disaster is certain to follow, and if we as a Liberal government find ourselves out of tune with the people of Canada to-day, it is the encroachment of financial authority over administrative responsibility that is shaking the confidence of the people not in our ability to win the war, but in our ability to sustain full employment at any other time than when we are fighting a war.

I hope this document, of the Bank of Canada report, will be considered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) as a document that should go at once to the banking and commerce committee; because if the governor of the Bank of Canada can warn the government of Canada, the Canadian parliament and the people of Canada that he finds that adjustments of unprecedented magnitude are required and that bold planning is urgently needed, we should have at the service of this parliament and the government all the information that Mr. Towers has to justify that statement.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Let me say to you that all the good work the committee on war expenditures is doing—it is saving a few million dollars—comes to naught when you remember that all the while the whole nation is engaged in war this false system is mulcting the nation not in millions, but in billions of dollars. No government can survive, no minister of finance can carry on under this system, and the sooner we come to a realization of what we meant in 1935 when we said we would establish a Bank of Canada and give it power, and see that the powers were enforced, to issue currency and credit in terms of public need, the better. I believe that we are close to the day when that will come about; when instead of lending our medium of exchange through the debt claim system, we shall be spending the medium of exchange required to sustain the economy of the nation in balanced proportions, free from the debt system. Then, Mr. Speaker, we shall find that debt, unpayable debt, will cease to bind the health and the freedom of the people.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): I have just two points to lay before the house in the discussion now proceeding. My first point is that I wish to inform the leader of His Majesty's opposition (Mr. Graydon) that the polite exchanges as to what occurred from 1930 to 1935 and down to the present time, do not change the fact that the Bennett administration established not a national bank of Canada but a hybrid, half-baked bank, of which private enterprise controlled one-half of the shares and stock. The leader of the opposition very properly from his point of view desired to take credit for the fact that the Bennett administration established that bank.

An hon. MEMBER: Private enterprise owned all of the shares.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend reminds me that private enterprise owned all of the shares. When the Liberal party fought the election of 1935 they fought it in part at least upon the declaration of the principle which my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) enunciated in his address this afternoon.

Mr. HOMUTH: Now he says it is no good.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend could not have been listening.

Mr. HOMUTH: I was very attentive.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend cannot misinterpret the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard to say that the establishment of the Bank of Canada as a wholly-owned national institution was no good, because that hon. member made it very clear that it was the proper type of Bank of Canada that we should possess.

I remind the leader of the opposition that his colleagues of that day—I do not recall whether he was in the house or not—

Mr. GRAYDON: You and I came in together.

Mr. SLAGHT: We came in together. His colleagues of that day and his leader of that day fought the Liberal party on the question of a wholly nationalized Bank of Canada. When we came into power in 1935 my hon. friend will recall that one of the earliest acts of the government was to see to it that the bank was taken over as a wholly-owned government bank.

Mr. GRAYDON: It did not do very much good.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend does not think it did much good. I suppose he would rather have it return to the old system of a privately owned, so-called, national bank of Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: But you people are trying an altogether new system now.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me tell my hon. friend that it has done an immense amount of good. It has gone very far in economic reform, and it can go a step further according to my philosophy of banking. I support the request of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, which I feel sure will be granted, that this splendid report of Mr. Graham Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada, dated February 10, 1944, be forthwith referred to the banking and commerce committee, so that all parties may participate in that committee and endeavour to make provision, as Mr. Towers asks us to do, for the adjustment required which will "clearly be of unprecedented magnitude and bold planning." No one can begin to plan for the future until after making adjustments which have to do with economic policy. Everyone can see that our bold planning for the future, no matter by what party it may be done nor on what particular lines it may be advocated, in the last analysis depends upon the economic system which is the foundation of our ability to employ people and to create trade relations which will deal with our surpluses, and which in fact is at the very root of our national welfare. If that be so, Mr. Speaker, let us get to work on this important problem with as little delay as possible.

I should like to deal with one other point. Let me say at once that I am wholly in favour of the suggestion that the government should guarantee the outstanding bonds at par, so that investors may not suffer loss as a result of their patriotic and saving-minded purchases of these bonds, at the instance of all of us. But let me address a word to the complaint which the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) put on record in his opening remarks. If I understood him aright he voiced the complaint that there were invidious rumours afloat—

Mr. COLDWELL: "Insidious" was the word I used.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, perhaps "invidious" will pretty well describe the idea he wanted to convey to the people of Canada. He said there were invidious rumours afloat as to what would occur if the C.C.F. party took office. By that I suppose he meant rumours which cast doubt upon the ability of his administration, if he ever got to the point of forming one, and upon the value of our good Canadian bonds outstanding, now totalling about $8,000 million, if his party came to power. Let me make clear to him that the unrest growing in a great many quarters, not only in this country but also in the United States, as to the possibility of his party gaining power in this country, is due in large part, in my judgment, to the hon. member having gone to the United States and there making a speech or speeches which received a good deal of publicity. I am not sure whether the speech was broadcast, but I think it was delivered in New York or Washington, or perhaps in both cities. At any rate he assured the 130,000,000 people of that great republic that he thought he saw the rising of the sun and believed there was a prospect of his party taking over the government of the Dominion of Canada in the near future, or something to that effect; I hope I have paraphrased with reasonable accuracy the statement made by my hon. friend. He also told his audience, in part at least, that the first thing his party would do when they came to power would be to nationalize the banks of Canada. To nationalize the banks means to politicalize them; that is, the ten commercial banks doing business with the public in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: How about the Bank of Canada? Is it politicalized?

Mr. SLAGHT: The Bank of Canada is a national bank in the true sense; as my hon. friend well knows, it is without power or authority to lend money to him or to his colleagues or to any other individual or corporation in this country. So that if my hon. friend suggests that the Bank of Canada has power, as a commercial banking institution, to lend money to him or to any of his C.C.F. friends, it would indicate that he has not studied the banking system of Canada.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The Bank of Canada lends money to the private banks, and the private banks lend it to us.

Mr. SLAGHT: All right; the private banks lend it to individuals. By his timely interruption the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has emphasized the very point I am going to make. I said that the C.C.F. policy of nationalizing the private commercial banks of the country means to politicalize them; and to politicalize them as understood by my hon. friends—the hon. member for York South is very keen about it—means to "C.C.F-erize" them, nothing more or less. Let us try to visualize the picture my hon. friend painted to the people of the United States. If by chance he should come to power in Canada his first act—I think it has been placed first and foremost—would be to lock the doors of the ten chartered banks of Canada. Probably then we would find standing outside the door of one of our banks, in blue uniforms with brass buttons, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and his absent colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr Gillis), saying, "How do you do, Mr. Customer; come in. How much would you like? What can we lend you to-day?" Oh, what a picture! A modest fellow, perhaps from up my way, would come along and say, "I am one of a group of eight or ten. We have got $10,000 together and we would like another $10,000 with which to set up a plant to cut pulpwood to be sold to the railway." I can visualize one of these two hon. gentlemen, resplendent in his uniform, saying, "Well, that is very nice of you. We want to encourage enterprise, but do you belong to the C.C.F.?" Rather shamefacedly the gentleman from my part of the country would have to say, "No; I am sorry, but I am a—"

An hon. MEMBER: Progressive Conservative.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, a Progressive Conservative. Probably he would be told, "That is even worse than if you were a Liberal," but in any event our astute hon. friends would not, I hope, be too raw about it. They would suggest, "Just down on Sparks street is the headquarters of the C.C.F. If you have time, drop in and listen to our secretary, because he has some wonderful ideas. Then come back to-morrow and bring your membership card, and we shall be very happy indeed to reconsider your application for a loan of $10,000 to open up Canadian industry."

Mr. MacINNIS They do that in connection with the roads now; so why not in connection with the banks? You cannot get a job on the roads in British Columbia without a membership card in the Liberal party.

Mr. SLAGHT: If it were not unparliamentary to say so, I would tell my hon. friend that he has made a statement which is untrue. But since it would be unparliamentary to say that, I will tell him that he has made a statement which I do not believe.

Mr. MacINNIS: You never looked for a job.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. members who are trying to work that out will doubtless come to an agreement before sunset.

Let me finish if I may what I am pointing out to the house. Whether the rumours are insidious or invidious, they are well founded. The programme as announced by the hon. member in the United States is that after getting the banks under their control they are going to take over the mines of Canada. They are going to C.C.F.-erize the mines and run them. They are going to take over the Canadian Pacific Railway company and C.C.F.-erize it along with the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. HOMUTH: And run them separately.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend says, "run them separately". The railway men of Canada are laughing that one off. If my hon. friend wants to know what the railway men in the great brotherhoods of Canada think about his suggestion of C.C.F.-erizing the C.P.R., all he has to do is to ask them.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What about the provincial elections in Ontario?

Mr. SLAGHT: Here is a man who is disappointed because he is not able to lock the bank door and go in and borrow $10,000 tomorrow morning. The railway men of Canada do not want that to happen. They believe in the competition of these great railroads. If I have understood Liberal policy in the past it has been—I do not speak for my leader—that they do not propose in the present time of great disturbances to take over and nationalize the great Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): "Competition ever, amalgamation never."

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend has reminded me of a phrase. I do not know just who is the author of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): R. B. Bennett.

Mr. SLAGHT: We all know what happened after the great 1930-35 debacle. I was just going down the line of what was to be C.C.F.-erized. There were the banks, the gold mines, the base metal mines, the forests—

Mr. REID: What about the House of Commons?

Mr. SLAGHT: The House of Commons will be here long after the doctrine of the leader of the C.C.F. party is forgotten. They intend to control all bonds and all insurance companies with their millions of policyholders. Who are these God-given economists and industrialists in the C.C.F. party on the other side who are to be placed in charge of these great and important assets of this young country? What records have they? They may be estimable men in their own callings, but are they to replace the boards of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the ten chartered banks of Canada? Are they to take over our great forests and pulpmills? Are they to develop and run these great industries from the top? Nothing could be as disastrous to this young country as having any such a possibility happen to us.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: There is still the genius of the hon. member for Parry Sound.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend is still smarting under the disappointment of not being able to get into that bank. Imagine what a pot of gold the C.C.F. would have with which to run their elections! The hon. member for York South would say, "I have a large constituency, boys; I have to have twice as much as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar." These are the men who are proposing to run our banks and railways. It is not a matter for levity and the people of Canada do not propose to laugh it off.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have been enjoying it.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend has been enjoying it because he knows the truth is always enjoyable. My hon. friend goes into the United States and announces that they intend to take over the great banking system of this country, practically all industry and the insurance companies in which there are millions, yes, more than a billion dollars invested by the people of the United States. He goes over there and tells them, "I will lock the doors of the banks, of the gold mines, of the industries in which your money is invested the minute we get into power, and I come here to tell you to-night that I think we shall get there fairly soon."

Mr. GRAYDON: How long ago was that?

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend will tell you that it was within three months.

Mr. GRAYDON: Quite a change since then.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not recognize that speech at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: He had a bad dream.

Mr. SLAGHT: Even if my hon. friend went back on his announced policy; even if he saw the error of his ways—this is all hypothecated upon a dream because they are never going to be in power; I accept my hon. friend's suggestion and regard the possibility of their being in power as a dream—nevertheless the fact remains that the people of the United States have taken his bold assertion rather seriously. I want to tell my hon. friend that when he speaks of insidious or invidious rumours nobody has done as much harm to future investments in this country by our friends in the United States than has the leader of the C.C.F. party by going into that republic and laying bare the possibility of Canada being turned over to an inexperienced group of socialists.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was not at all surprised when the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) rose upon the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that the house go into the committee of supply and raised the question that he did, because during the latter part of last summer, when I was travelling through the northern part of Saskatchewan, I heard one of these insidious rumours which the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party has mentioned. The rumour was to the effect that those who were selling victory bonds in that part of the country were experiencing considerable difficulty in making sales because the people there had become convinced that the C.C.F. party was going to come into power. So I said, "What difference should that make? I do not know of anything that the C.C.F. party have said," I said, "which would warrant anyone in not buying government bonds because they are convinced that the C.C.F. party may at some time come into power. As a matter of fact I have not been invited to speak on behalf of the sale of victory bonds, but the leader of the C.C.F. has, and he has been out speaking on behalf of those who were trying to sell 'C.C.F. bonds—victory bonds', I mean."

Mr. GRAYDON: You would need a floor under C.C.F. bonds.

Mr. GARDINER: Judging from some of the speeches that were made, I am not at all sure that they did not even sell a few C.C.F. bonds too.

I began to inquire where that rumour started, that people were convinced that if the C.C.F. party attained power in Canada they would not acknowledge victory bonds at their full value, and I had presented to me from an individual in that section of the country a pamphlet issued some years ago by the C.C.F. party.

An hon. MEMBER: C.C.F.?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. There was "C.C.F." at the top of it and "Farmer-Labour" underneath. Farmer-Labour being the provincial and C.C.F. being the federal party. This pamphlet was issued following conferences held by the party in Saskatoon and Regina in 1933 for the organization of the C.C.F. Here in the pamphlet is the item that was referred to a few moments ago by my hon. friend the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), and it is headed "Socialization of the banking, credit and financial system of the country, together with the social ownership, development, operation and control of utilities and natural resources." Then there follows a questionnaire with regard to that policy, and one of the questions asked is this:

Will interest be charged by a socialized bank?

The answer to that is:

There may be a service charge as it is obvious that all services of the state must be paid for.

The next question is:

What about victory bonds?

Mr. COLDWELL: Victory bonds?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. My hon. friend had something to do with the drafting of this document and he ought to know something of its contents. That was victory bonds of the last war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Issued at 5½ per cent, income tax free.

Mr. GARDINER: The question here is:

What about victory bonds?

And the answer is:

When we set up new currency we will immediately take in the old currency and give out new currency for old. Bonds will be taken in at face value and will be discounted. As the amount of the bond increases the discount increases.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what I found to be the source of these insidious rumours that were going about the country. It was not anything that the opponents of the C.C.F. had said, but something that had been written right into the official document of the party itself.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In what year was that?

Mr. GARDINER: In 1933, the year in which my hon. friends of the C.C.F. boast that their party came into existence. These rumours were going about the country, and, as my hon. friend the member for Parry Sound showed a few moments ago, statements that had been made in the United States and in this country have given emphasis to the rumours. I agree with the statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) a few minutes ago, that the only way we can assure the hon. member for Melfort that victory bonds sold in this war will have their full value at any time, without any discount in proportion to the size of the bond, is to make absolutely certain that there never is a C.C.F. government in this country. I have not any doubt that the people of the Dominion of Canada have made up their minds on that now, and because they have made up their minds on that, I think the hon. member for Melfort can be assured that bonds sold to the people of this country during this war will be redeemed at their par value by a government in Canada that does not believe in the national socialization of everything—and I use that term advisedly.

We have had a great deal of discussion whether national socialism is the proper term to apply to that organization. If my hon. friends of the C.C.F. do not like that name, I am not going to quarrel with them, but I would remind them of this. Only yesterday I had the privilege of reading an article in Liberty based upon a question and answer interview with the leader of the C.C.F., and the last statement in it, if I remember correctly is to the effect that what we are going to have when they get into power is "democratic socialism." Well, that is not so far removed from national socialism. That, too, had its birth in the same country. That, too, preceded national socialism in Germany.

Mr. COLDWELL: In Great Britain?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not Great Britain. There is not a man in the Dominion of Canada who has condemned more often in my hearing and in meetings in western Canada the government of Ramsay MacDonald than the present leader of the C.C.F. party. One can go through the press of western Canada and find time after time—

Mr. COLDWELL: All owned by the Liberal party.

Mr. GARDINER: Not owned by the Liberal party. But the owners of the newspapers did not write the speeches of the leader of the C.C.F. party, and the record of those speeches was handed to the press by the leader of the C.C.F. party. He gloated over the fact that he did not believe in the socialism of the Ramsay MacDonald party in Great Britain because after they came into power they did not do the things he wants to do in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have never suggested that.

Mr. GARDINER: I am saying it because I have read the hon. member's speeches.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not like Ramsay MacDonald's union government.

Mr. GARDINER: No, because my hon. friend did not believe in his first government.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I did.

Mr. GARDINER: Nor in his second government. Which one did he agree with?

Mr. COLDWELL: I disagreed with his union government, when he formed a national government in Great Britain.

Mr. GARDINER: He formed two governments in Great Britain. My hon. friend did not agree with his first one; he did not agree with his second one, and on a future occasion I shall have the clippings here to show that. He condemned that party. Why? Because they did not nationally socialize the industry of Great Britain while they were in office. There is no doubt about that in the minds of anyone who listened to the hon. member's speeches outside this house in the years up to 1935. That was his position at that time.

But what I wish to emphasize is this. One does not need to search outside the pamphlets of the C.C.F. for the source of the rumours that have been going about western Canada to the effect that if the C.C.F. party got into power in this country they would see to it that the victory bonds—and the greater the bond the greater the discount—would be discounted. So that it seems to me that if the people of this country want their l onds valued at their real face value, plus interest, they should see to it that the C.C.F. is never put into power in this country.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY: (York South): Mr. Speaker, we have gone a considerable distance from the original speech which opened this debate. Mention has been made of rumours, many of them. I cannot understand why either the Liberals or the Progressive Conservatives should be so much concerned about the C.C.F. when both those parties are so cocksure of victory at the next federal election. If the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is all that those hon. gentlemen say it is, why do they waste the time of this house decrying the C.C.F.? Surely they can leave that question to the intelligence of the Canadian people.

Mr. HOMUTH: And how!

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: We are quite willing, Mr. Speaker, that it should be left to the intelligence of the Canadian people. If in their collective wisdom they choose the C.C.F. government or a Liberal or a Progressive Conservative government, that is their business. Tens of thousands of people in this country who have bought victory bonds are far more concerned about knowing whether under a Liberal or under a Progressive Conservative government they will get par value for those bonds if they are forced to sell them, when they are forced to sell them to carry out the purpose for which they bought them, the purpose for which they have been encouraged to buy them. Neither the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) nor the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has indicated in any way that a government by either party is prepared to give those buyers of bonds a guarantee that they will not be forced to sell them below par The question is not whether a C.C.F. government is to be elected or what government is to be elected. These people want to know what they will get for the bonds they are buying to-day and will be asked to buy in the next victory loan. I ask the speakers for the government or the speakers for the opposition to face that question and tell us exactly where their parties stand on that issue.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): How much would they get under the C.C.F.?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Par value.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They would not, because the C.C.F. would consider them capitalistic and take the bonds away.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Like the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), who has just preceded me, I should like to make a few comments on the matter which was originally raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). Since that hon. member spoke the discussion has become quite political, and we are led to believe that there is going to be much of this kind of thing during the present session. On future and perhaps more appropriate occasions there are statements by leaders of the present government which it might also be well to place upon the record, particularly in view of the fondness of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for collecting C.C.F. literature.

I was interested a while ago in listening to the emphatic speech by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). I was reminded of speeches he made last July in this house and also outside it during the latter part of the month and early in August. His speeches at that time were made with similar vigour. They seemed calculated to slay the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, which was engaged at the time in a provincial election campaign, but apparently the slaying technique came home to roost. One wonders just what his vigour at this time will produce.

However, I should like to point out that particularly the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), in speaking on this matter, have side-stepped the essential issue which the hon. member for Melfort raised. The leader of the opposition suggested that we should not be talking about a possible decline in the value of victory bonds after the war but rather we should be expressing confidence that when these bonds mature they will be worth more than 100 per cent.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was going further than you people were; that is all.

Mr. KNOWLES: We would say "hear, hear" to that. But the leader of the opposition still failed to say whether or not he would support the idea of putting in the meantime a guarantee under these bonds that their value would not be allowed to drop below par.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I answer my hon. friend?

Mr. KNOWLES: I would be very glad if the hon. gentleman would.

Mr. GRAYDON: I say to my hon. friend that I refuse to admit that the economy we have after this war is over will—

Mr. COLDWELL: If the present government is in power?

Mr. GRAYDON: I cannot speak for them, because nobody in Canada supposes that either the hon. member's party or the Liberals are going to have anything to do with the government of this country after the war is over.

Mr. COLDWELL: But "if"?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I answer my hon. friend? I should like to do so, and to say this, that in so far as we are concerned our objection to the proposal of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) is that it presupposes that there is going to be a need for some floor under bonds. We refuse to admit such a thing. Our position is this, that we want every holder of bonds, including every "little man" in Canada, to have a premium on his bonds. We want to go further than the C.C.F.

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it that that is the answer of the leader of the opposition, and if so, I observe that he still refuses to commit himself as to being prepared to guarantee the value of the bonds in the meantime.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to my hon. friend that if a C.C.F. government ever should come into power so that the bonds do go down, such a floor should be put under them.

Mr. KNOWLES I say further to the leader of the opposition that, if we have this confidence that the level of production will be maintained and that there is no need for the value of bonds to drop, certainly there is no loss to be incurred by making the commitment for which we are asking. Further, we feel that to make this definite guarantee at this time would not only encourage people in the purchasing of victory bonds but would help to convince them that we in this house are sure there will be maintenance of full employment after the war is over. On the other hand, in view of the experience of the period after the last war, when war bonds went down in value with the result that financial and investment houses profited from the situation, people cannot help feeling that the refusal to make such a commitment at the present time is simply a case of leaving the door open for the same thing to happen again if the value of these bonds does go down.

I come back to the statement I made a moment ago, that if the leader of the opposition and if the Minister of Agriculture and other members of the government are so confident that our economy will be at a high level after the war, no loss will be involved in making this commitment and we feel definitely that it should be made. We urge that not only because there will be no loss, but because of the assurance that it would give to our people. I would point out that the Minister of Agriculture—again in a vigorous and interesting speech—wandered all over the field but did not deal with the specific request which the hon. member for Melfort has brought to the attention of this house. I hope that some other minister speaking on behalf of the government will even yet rise and give this assurance to the house and to the country. The matter was raised quite sincerely and in a straightforward manner by the hon. member for Melfort. We feel that this is something concerning which the people of Canada deserve to be given assurance, and we deplore the way in which the issue has been side-tracked, the way in which many hon. members have wandered all over the field, the way in which no real answer has been given to this question.

I should like to say a word about the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture in connection with certain literature which he had in his hand a moment ago. I do not happen to have a copy before me, but I should like to point out that we are proposing that steps should be taken now, so as to avoid the necessity of doing what in 1933 our people in Saskatchewan felt it was necessary to do. What happened then was that victory bonds from the last war had got out of the hands of the small holders; they had taken a loss, and the bonds were now in the hands of a few holders. The C.C.F. people, or our predecessors, whoever drafted the material which the Minister of Agriculture has in his hands, felt that it was high time that the profits which a few people had made at that time should be brought to a halt; and it is our contention that we should avoid that kind of a situation arising again, by making it clear now that the victory bonds which people are purchasing in this war will not deteriorate in value so far as the small purchasers are concerned. It has already been pointed out that since the government guarantees the value of these bonds at maturity, and we emphasize that point, there is no loss to be incurred by the government in guaranteeing the value of the bonds at all times. That may raise in someone's mind the obvious question: if there is no loss to the government, why is there so much opposition to our request? The answer is that if the stand we are asking for is taken by the government it will shut the door to many financial and investment houses, against the making of huge profits from the buying of these bonds if they depreciate in value after the war. We feel that this is a step that should be taken. After all, these are the savings of the people, given for the specific purpose of victory, given also with the suggestion that they might have this money on hand for rehabilitation purposes after the war. We feel, therefore, that our people should not be exploited by leaving the door open in this way to financial and investment houses.

I have done what I could to bring the discussion back to the request which the hon. member for Melfort submitted to the house, which we feel is a reasonable one and which we know is of concern to thousands of workers, farmers and soldiers throughout the country. I hope that even yet a minister or a parliamentary assistant, speaking on behalf of the government, will give us the assurance for which we ask.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I regret the unavoidable absence at the moment of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and on his behalf I should like to make a few observations. The question raised by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) is not a new question. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) raised it last year and the minister answered him fully at that time. I have no doubt the question will come up again.

What we should bear in mind is this. The hon. member for Melfort asks that the government should guarantee every holder of a victory bond that he will be able at any time to sell that bond for 100 cents on the dollar. I suggest that we should remember what the government does when it issues bonds. It is issuing bonds for five, ten and fifteen years, paying a certain rate of interest in consideration of the fact that the money is lent for that term. It guarantees that at maturity of that term the holder will receive 100 cents on the dollar.

I do not intend to go into the pros and cons of the hon. gentleman's suggestion except to say that if that suggestion were accepted it would mean that there would be no difference between the rate of interest which the government would pay for thirty days or sixty days and the rate on money which it might borrow for ten, fifteen or twenty years.

As I say, this question has been fully discussed before. The Minister of Finance gave a full explanation as to why the government could not agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Yorkton last year, and I would not think his views would have changed in the meantime.

So much for the suggestion that the government should now guarantee the holder of every bond 100 cents on the dollar at any time. Perhaps we are taking too much for granted in assuming that the holder will not get it. A good many of these bonds now sell at a premium. They are widely distributed among a large number of small holders, far more than ever before, and I believe that the very fact of that wide distribution will make for stability in the price of these bonds on the open market during and after the war.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It did not help the last time.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a long time ago and a different government was in power.

Mr. GRAYDON: You should find a better reason than that.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member ranged far afield. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), in his usual forceful and eloquent manner, has put forward his well-known views on monetary policy. I do not think the house will expect me now to discuss those views. He says that the government is in receipt of bad advice and operates under a bad system. I have no doubt full opportunity will be afforded for discussing his particular views on financial matters, both in other debates in this house and before the banking and commerce committee.

I do not know that there is anything else that I have to add. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) suggests that no doubt Mr. Graham Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada, will be before the banking and commerce committee, and that reminds me of one point which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard made. If I understood him correctly he rather criticized Mr. Towers for referring, in the annual report of the bank, to the fact that adjustments of unprecedented magnitude will have to be made after the war. That would not cause me much surprise.

Almost any of us would agree that that was a fair statement of what will have to be done. I cannot see that Mr. Towers or anybody else should be severely criticized for such a statement in a bank report.

Mr. MacNICOL: How does my hon. friend account for the fact that the fourth and fifth victory loan bonds were selling on the Toronto stock exchange on Saturday below par?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not aware of the fact that they were, but I venture to say it must have been a very small fraction below par.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a small fraction. The bid on the fourth victory loan was 99¾ and the bid on the fifth victory loan was 99¼.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the ordinary fluctuation from day to day, supply and demand. I would not think that was a permanent condition.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Service—

242. Departmental administration, $699,070.

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to make a statement in regard to mail to troops overseas.

During the past six or eight weeks I have received a number of letters complaining of delay and non-delivery of mails to and from members of the Canadian armed forces overseas. Items and editorials have also appeared in the daily press.

In dealing with this matter, I can assure you that I have a sympathetic appreciation and understanding of the anxiety of parents, relatives and friends, in this country when they fail to receive news from overseas or when they hear that the letters and parcels which they have sent overseas have not arrived.

Knowing how important the receipt of mail is from a standpoint of morale, I can assure you that, despite delays which have occurred, advantage has been, and will be taken, of every means at our disposal to improve the service.

That there have been delays there is no doubt, but not delays which could be avoided. The time taken, which to anxious relatives and friends may seem unreasonable, is due to three more or less unavoidable causes:—

(1) the lack of transport, both air and surface, on account of the imperative and incessant requirements for vital operations,

(2) adverse transatlantic weather usually prevalent in the winter months,

(3) the necessary movement of personnel from unit to unit and location to location to meet the exigencies of active operations.

Last fall there were indications that shipping space for the transportation of mails overseas was becoming more difficult to obtain as some of the larger ships which had been used were being moved from the Canadian route for other purposes.

We had counted on being able to overtake this difficulty by the transmission of a large portion of the letter mails from Canada to the United Kingdom by air. Unfortunately, the aircraft which we had hoped would be available did not materialize due to the prior demands of machines for combat purposes.

On October 7 a meeting took place between the Minister of National Defence, the minister for air and myself, together with representatives of the Post Office Department and the Canadian armed forces postal services.

As a result of personal representations made by the Minister of National Defence for Air, six Fortress aircraft were obtained from the United States to be utilized for the transportation of mails for the forces. These machines were not new but had been used in varying degrees for operation and training purposes.

A Royal Canadian Air Force squadron was created to operate the mail service from Canada to the United Kingdom and on to the Mediterranean area, and return.

I should like to make it clear at this point that this service was supplementary to the facilities which existed, and despite delays which have occurred the fact emerges that this Canadian air service has carried to the United Kingdom and the Mediterranean theatre, and return, thousands of pounds of letters which would otherwise have been dispatched by surface ships.

An air service of this nature would ordinarily not have been inaugurated without an extended period of experimental flights to seek out the handicaps and difficulties and apply the remedies before the actual service flights commenced.

In our desire to take advantage of every possible means of expediting delivery, it was decided to commence the service without these usual tests and to iron out the difficulties as we went along. This we have done. Difficulties have been encountered, many of them, but I believe that I can confidently say that most of these difficulties are now behind us and that, with a reasonable break in the weather, noticeable improvements will be effected.

It must, however, be borne in mind that war-time transport cannot be compared with that enjoyed in peace times. The handicaps and the obstacles are many. Delays will occur, due chiefly to the exigencies of war. We shall, however, continue, as we have in the past, to overlook no opportunity and to take advantage of every facility to improve the service to the men and women serving overseas.

So that you will have some idea of the reasons for the delays which have occurred and the average times which it takes to handle and transport mails from Canada to the overseas forces under present conditions, I am going to place on record data taken from actual mail service operations from Canada to the United Kingdom and the Mediterranean theatre. Similar times and conditions also apply to mails moving westbound.

Airgraphs and Armed Forces Air Letters
Canada to United Kingdom

Eastbound—Carried by Royal Air Force Transport Command.

Average time from point of mailing in Canada to delivery in England—

Army	10 days
R.C.A.F.	13 days

Date of mailing	1st day
Air transport to base post office	2nd day
Handling and sortation into unit packages at base P.O.	3rd day
Transit to airport and awaiting take off (average 2 days)	5th day
Air transit Canada to United Kingdom	6th day
Rail transport from airport in U.K. to Canadian overseas postal depot	7th day
Sorting into bags and dispatch to railhead serving unit	8th day
Unloading at railhead, transport to supply point, thence to unit	9th day
Arrival at unit for delivery	10th day
Letters for personnel in the R.C.A.F., especially those at R.A.F. stations, take on an average 3 days longer as items are routed through the postal directory for location and delivery is effected through United Kingdom civilian postal channels	13th day

Airgraphs and armed forces air letters are for the present carried eastbound by the planes of the R.A.F. transport command. In a westerly direction they are carried by the Trans-Canada Air Lines or by the aircraft of the R.C.A.F. transport command. Occasionally these items have been carried for us by planes of the United States transport command.

An idea of the frequency of this service eastbound can be gathered from the fact that twelve crossings were made in November, nine in December and ten in January, which averages a crossing every three days.

The transit time from the base post office until the mails arrive in the United Kingdom varies from three to ten days. Generally speaking, an armed forces air letter mailed in Canada is delivered to the addressee in the United Kingdom in anywhere between six to fifteen days after posting. There have been occasions when letters have been delivered in a shorter time. There are also cases where they have taken longer, but this is usually due to the fact that the items had to be redirected before delivery could be effected.

The number of armed forces air letters carried across the Atlantic has now reached one and a half million per month.

Airgraphs normally take four or five days longer due to photographing in Canada before dispatch and the reproduction of the message in the United Kingdom on arrival. Occasionally the time taken is longer when the arrival in the United Kingdom coincides with a heavy volume of airgraphs received from the British forces overseas which occasionally number several million.

Letters for personnel in the R.C.A.F. cannot be delivered to units in the same way as letters for army units. This is due to the frequent changes in location of squadrons and individuals. It has been found by experience that in most cases delays are reduced if items are first passed through the R.C.A.F. postal records.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the airgraph system save much space?

Mr. MULOCK: Oh, yes, a great deal of space.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It takes eight days longer for delivery.

Mr. MULOCK: It takes time to have them photographed in the first place. They formerly had to be sent to the United States to be produced, but they are now photographed in Toronto.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some are difficult to read. I have one in front of me now.

Mr. MULOCK: That is one you received?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Have there been any losses of airgraphs in transit in recent months?

Mr. MULOCK: Not between here and the United Kingdom.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But between here and the Mediterranean?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Mr. MULOCK: Yes. The next one I should like to deal with is airgraphs and armed forces air letters—Canada to Mediterranean.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before the minister leaves the first item, I have been keeping rather careful track of the blue letters I have been receiving, and quite often they have taken three weeks or a month and sometimes longer.

Mr. MULOCK: From England?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. MULOCK: That is quite possible on the westbound trip. They have run into some very bad delays on account of weather.

Mr. COLDWELL: That has been the case in December, January and this month. I received one to-day which took sixteen days; that was the quickest of all.

Mr. MULOCK: Flying conditions have been very bad.

I wish to deal now, as I said, with airgraphs and armed forces air letters to the Mediterranean. Eastbound they are dispatched by R.A.F. transport command aircraft to the United Kingdom, thence by the Royal Canadian Air Force, the Royal Air Force or United States aircraft, or any other on which space to the Mediterranean theatre can be obtained. The average time of an air letter from Canada to the airport in the United Kingdom is seven days. The average wait for aircraft space in the United Kingdom is eight days, bringing us to the fifteenth day. Delays on account of weather have averaged four days, making it the nineteenth day. Transit time from the United Kingdom to the Mediterranean theatre average two days, making it the twenty-first day. Arrival at airport, sortation and road transport to base takes two days, bringing it to the twenty-third day. Air transport to formation postal unit and arrival at unit for delivery brings it to the twenty-fourth day. Airgraphs would take approximately four to six days longer, on account of the processing at both ends of the journey, which would make it the thirtieth day.

Air letters and airgraphs from the United Kingdom to the Mediterranean theatre were formerly carried on any aircraft on which there was available space. Usually the planes of the R.A.F. transport command and the United States transport command were used. Recently the mails have been carried by the R.C.A.F. transport command, and nine round trips have been made since the first trip which left the United Kingdom on Christmas Day, 1943. As a result of the experience gained through the initial trips it was decided, in addition to the present equipment, to base a lighter type of transport aircraft at a western Mediterranean airport. This will permit a round trip service to the Mediterranean circuit every five days and oftener if the quantity of mail justifies. It is confidently expected that this will reduce the elapsed time by several days. The first of these planes has already arrived at the airport and the improved service will go into operation in the very near future. With the advent of improved weather the delays will be further reduced by possibly two or three days and, as the lighter aircraft will be able to land closer to the point where the postal base is located, time now taken up by extended road transport will be eliminated.

Changes of this kind, however, are not effected overnight. They are the result of many negotiations and preliminaries. First, planes must be obtained, having regard to the needs of combat operations and, further, aircraft cannot go rushing into zones of operations without previous measures being taken in regard to control, security and navigation. That this improved service is now ready to operate speaks for itself. I conservatively estimate that in a short while it will effect a saving in time of up to ten days between Canada and the Mediterranean theatre, weather permitting.

The average times which I have just read to you are for mails addressed to a definite unit address. When mails are addressed to reinforcement units and have to pass through the directory service the time taken is longer, as letters have to be routed through the postal tracing section for direction, sometimes on several occasions, and this all takes time.

As regards airgraphs for Italy, at the present time the original messages have to be sent to North Africa to be processed. Whenever possible the messages are sent by air but occasionally it happens that there is no air lift available and thus extra time is taken due to the four or five days which are consumed by surface transport. Consideration is being given to the establishment of a processing station on the Italian mainland and this will be done as soon as circumstances permit. It will result in a reduction in the time required for the transmission of this class of correspondence.

Next I should like to deal with surface letters to the Canadian armed forces in the United Kingdom. The average transit time is as follows:

Example—Letter mailed in central Canada to member of Canadian armed forces in United Kingdom.

Letter posted and sorted in local post office and despatched by rail to base post office	1st day
Arrival at base post office, Ottawa	4th day
Sorted and prepared for dispatch	5th day
Average time waiting for space on transport (five days)	10th day
Railway transport to port of loading (two days)	12th day
Loading on steamer and awaiting departure (three days)	15th day
Transatlantic crossing, fast ship—no convoy, or fast convoy (average ten days)	25th day
Docking, unloading and loading in mail cars at port in United Kingdom (two days)	27th day
Rail transit to Canadian Postal Corps railhead, sortation and dispatch	28th day
To Unit railhead, thence to unit supply point	29th day
Arrival at unit for delivery	30th day

During the calendar year 1943, 661,904 pounds of letters were dispatched overseas. This amounts to approximately 31,500,000 items. With a few exceptions, due to causes beyond our control, practically all of these letters have been delivered to the addressees. True, delays have occurred. Time has been taken up by redirections, and no doubt occasional errors have been made in individual cases but the percentage of correspondence undeliverable is a very small portion of 1 per cent.

Most of the surface letters have been transported by surface ships but 39,000 pounds of surface letters have been carried by planes operated by the R.C.A.F. or Trans-Canada Air Lines. This has expedited delivery by anywhere from two or three days to two weeks. These letters have been carried by air although prepaid for surface transport.

The transit times which I gave are for normal crossings. Occasions have arisen when ships have had to put back to port. Sometimes the same ship has returned more than once and the time required is increased accordingly. For example, right at the present moment there is one ship which was loaded with mails in the first days of January. It had to put back to port and has not yet reached the United Kingdom. This is not an isolated instance. I might say that the 39,000 pounds I mentioned as having been carried by air amounts to approximately 1,560,000 letters.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MULOCK: Mr. Chairman, the next matter I should like to deal with is the surface letters to Canadian forces overseas in the Mediterranean area. The example is as follows:

Average transit time

Example—Letter mailed in central Canada addressed to member of unit of Canadian forces in Mediterranean theatre.

Time elapsed between posting in Canada and arrival at Canadian postal corps railhead in United Kingdom—28 days	28th day
Checking, sortation and rebagging at Canadian overseas postal depot	29th day
Waiting space on steamer to Mediterranean area (five days)	34th day
Despatch to port in United Kingdom, loading on steamer (two days)	36th day
Ship awaiting make-up of convoy for Mediterranean (six days)	42nd day
Average time fast convoy to Mediterranean area (ten days)	52nd day
Waiting at port of arrival and unloading (three days)	55th day
From port to Canadian base post office serving units (two days)	57th day
Road transport to formation postal unit	58th day
Arrival at unit for delivery	59th day

Up to the inauguration of the mail service operated by the R.C.A.F. transport command, practically all surface letters were sent by surface transport.

During the eight weeks since the R.C.A.F. service has been in operation, 45,619 pounds of mail, approximately two and a quarter million letters, have been carried by air from England to the Mediterranean theatre. This has reduced the time of delivery in some cases by almost two weeks.

Times given are for normal items addressed to definite units. The time is appreciably increased when the mail is intended for reinforcement units or for personnel who have been routed through reinforcement depots to definite units. In such cases, the mail has to pass through the postal tracing section, sometimes on two or three different occasions, and the time required is increased accordingly.

It happens from time to time that when these mails are dispatched by surface ships the ships are re-routed to a different port from that originally intended. This further complicates the mail handling and increases the time for delivery. In addition, several incidents have occurred when ships have been damaged and have had to put back to port. On other occasions they have had to enter a port en route for repairs.

At the time of the first expedition of Canadian forces to the Mediterranean area mails were frozen in the United Kingdom until the troops were well on their way to destination. This action was taken by the security authorities in the interests of the safety of the convoy. Unfortunately when the mails were eventually dispatched one of the ships carrying them was damaged by enemy action which necessitated it putting into port for repairs. This took a considerable time and created still further delay.

The next item I should like to deal with is parcels to Canadian forces overseas in transit from Canada to the United Kingdom. The example I would give covers a cigarette parcel where the order has been placed in Ontario and it is as follows:

Order sent to tobacco company for cigarettes	1st day
Order received at tobacco company	2nd day
Average time taken by tobacco company to fill order and transfer to postal corps (two weeks)	16th day
Parcels sorted by C.P.C. tobacco unit into unit bags individually listed	17th day
Loaded in cars and dispatched, including transit to seaport (three days)	20th day
Unloaded and stored awaiting space on steamers (seven days)	27th day
Ship awaiting make-up of convoy and transit time in slow convoy to United Kingdom (average twenty-six days)	53rd day
Waiting for berth on arrival, unloading and waiting railway transportation (four days)	57th day
Railway to Canadian postal corps railhead	58th day
From C.P.C. to unit railhead	59th day
Arrival at unit for delivery	60th day
Ordinary parcels (not tobacco parcels) would take approximately fourteen days less, i.e.,	46 days

During the year 1943, twenty-seven and a half million pounds of parcel post were dispatched overseas from Canada. This represents 6,930,835 parcels. Of this number 3,008,969 were tobacco parcels which are each individually listed by the Canadian postal corps before dispatch.

As far as possible parcels are shipped in direct unit bags, which means that the bag containing the parcels and the corresponding list is sealed at the base post office, Canada, and the seals are intact when delivered to the post orderly of the unit overseas. When it is not practical to sort tobacco parcels into unit bags, the consolidation takes place at the Canadian overseas postal depot in the United Kingdom where the individual tobacco parcels are checked in and again listed on being dispatched to the units.

During 1943 losses by enemy action decreased sharply, and it is estimated that losses from all causes are only slightly more than 1 per cent while the mails are in the custody of the Canadian armed forces postal service. Losses do occur when parcels are in custody of the British postal service or after delivery to the units. The Canadian postal corps endeavours to reduce these losses as far as possible by inspection of the unit mail rooms. There is, however, a limit as to what can be done in this connection.

In most cases of complaints concerning cigarette parcels cognizance is not taken of the time actually required for a parcel to reach its destination even under favourable conditions. Representations of non-delivery are made before the parcel has had time to reach its destination. Time and again investigation has shown that the parcels complained about were delivered in the normal course of time.

It should be borne in mind that delays also occur between the time an order is placed at the corner tobacconist and the time it is received by the tobacco company, also between the time the order is received by the tobacco company and the date it is delivered to the Canadian postal corps for handling and dispatch.

Many parcels are received which are inadequately addressed. This is sometimes due to misreading of the written address when the address label is typed. Search after search is made through records in an endeavour to locate the correct addressee.

When a parcel finally fails of delivery it is turned over to the auxiliary services of the Canadian armed forces for distribution generally to Canadian armed forces personnel. In all cases where this action is taken a letter is sent to the sender advising him of the treatment given to the parcel.

A number of societies and auxiliaries in Canada are using obsolete lists. These lists contain names of men who have never left Canada. This creates avoidable searches through records and indirectly delays the handling of parcels to persons who are overseas.

In this connection I wish to thank the various persons and organizations who have given their time and talents to bring about improvements in the addressing of mail and the preparation of parcels. I might mention specially Mrs. Weeks, whose husband, Brigadier E. G. Weeks, is at C.M.H.Q. overseas. She has particularly helped in this work.

The next item I should like to deal with is parcels to Canadian forces in the Mediterranean area.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much more is there of this essay? We can all read it if the minister would put it on Hansard.

Mr. MULOCK: There are some other things in which the hon. member might be interested.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am interested in it all.

Mr. MULOCK: Perhaps some other hon. members are interested.

Mr. RALSTON: If other hon. members are not interested, the troops are interested.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We can read it all in Hansard if it is put on the record.

Mr. MULOCK: Certainly they can read it. I will give another example of the average transit time.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister will be coming back to mail to Italy?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes. The example I wish to put on Hansard follows:

Parcels to Canadian Forces Overseas—Canada to Mediterranean

Parcels travel via United Kingdom, are resorted at Canadian overseas postal depot, England (except unit bags) and are then dispatched from United Kingdom to Mediterranean ports.

Average transit time
Parcel mailed in central Canada	1st day
Rail transit to base post office, Ottawa, arriving on	4th day
Sorted and dispatched from base post office	5th day
Arriving at port of dispatch on	7th day
Unloaded and stored awaiting space on steamers (average seven days)	14th day
Ship awaiting make-up of convoy (average ten days) and slow convoy to United Kingdom (average sixteen days)—twenty-six days	40th day
Waiting at port of arrival and unloading (average four days)	44th day
Loaded in cars and dispatched to Canadian overseas postal depot	45th day
Mails checked and resorted for Mediterranean area	47th day
Waiting space on ships to Mediterranean area (average five days)	52nd day
Dispatch to United Kingdom port and loading on steamer	54th day
Ship awaiting make-up of convoy to Mediterranean (average six days)	60th day
Average time slow convoy to Italian ports—twenty days	80th day
Waiting at port of arrival and unloading (average five days)	85th day
From port to Canadian base post office serving units (average two days)	87th day
By road transport to formation postal unit	88th day
Arrival at unit for delivery	90th day

The transit times which I have just read cover an ordinary parcel. If the parcel in question had been a tobacco parcel it would have taken approximately fourteen days longer, which is the average time taken by the tobacco company to fill orders.

Furthermore, had the parcel arrived in the United Kingdom during the Christmas rush period, it would have taken a further ten days to handle on account of the congestion at the docks, lack of rolling stock, overloaded facilities and additional time waiting for steamers and convoys.

During the months of November, December and January 621,440 parcels were dispatched from the United Kingdom to the central Mediterranean.

The majority of these were Christmas parcels from Canada, and it is estimated that the bulk would reach Italy some time during January.

All parcel mails do not travel from Canada to the Mediterranean via the United Kingdom. Arrangements were made in the fall of the year with the United States army postal authorities whereby Canadian mails could be dispatched through United States ports. It was provided by the United States authorities, however, that this arrangement could only take effect after their Christmas bulk had been cleared.

A number of dispatches have already been made via United States ports and it is estimated that the average transit time from the base post office in Canada to Italy is approximately fifty days. Occasionally, however, these steamers are diverted to a port other than the original destination. This generally delays eventual arrival at destination as exceptional arrangements have to be made for the onward transmission from the point of diversion.

Our chief concern in connection with mails to Italy centres in items addressed to the personnel of reinforcement units. The difficulty eases once they have been posted to definite units, but while the men are moving from a reinforcement unit in England to a reinforcement group and depots in Italy and from one reinforcement battalion to another reinforcement battalion and then eventually to a definite unit, the possibility of expeditious handling is remote.

Items have to be routed through the records several times before the addressee is located, and often by the time the parcel reaches that location he has moved on to some other point. This difficulty is not peculiar to the Canadian army. It is met with in all forces.

Eventually the mail catches up with the addressee, and two incidents have very recently come to my attention where men had moved from one unit to another or from one location to another. One man received 107 items at one time, and another seventy-eight.

In an endeavour to give a picture of this situation I propose to read a statement of the channels through which the mails would pass in connection with reinforcement units. In case the impression might prevail that this is a hypothetical statement, I am taking the liberty of reading a letter which I have just received:

February 21, 1944.

The Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

I wish to bring to your attention a situation which, if possible, should be remedied.

My son was wounded on December 19, while serving with the West Nova Scotia regiment. His Christmas parcels were mailed before November 1, securely packed and tied and properly addressed. These parcels were addressed to him at 7 C.I.R.U. England, but he had moved to the 1st Battalion 1 C.B.R.D. in North Africa. Later he moved to the 4th Battalion 1 C.B.R.D. which station, I believe, is in Italy.

The young man wrote me under date of January 29 that he had not received a letter or a parcel since the middle of October. Since November, the family have sent him several parcels and letters, some addressed to North Africa and the balance to the 4th Battalion 1 C.B.R.D.

I know you will appreciate that it is discouraging to both the young man and his family, that his parcels and letters are not being received.

Yours very truly,

.....

[Mr. Mulock.]

Perhaps I might be allowed to put on Hansard, as it covers two-and-a-half typewritten pages, a description of the travel of a letter addressed to a member of a reinforcement unit recently arrived in the United Kingdom who is included in a draft for the Mediterranean theatre. If any hon. member has any suggestion to improve the service, it will be gratefully received. The description is as follows:

Brief description of the travel of a letter addressed to a member of a reinforcement unit recently arrived in the United Kingdom who is included in a draft for the Mediterranean theatre.

Letter is forwarded from Canada in the usual way, addressed to a reinforcement unit in England. Time required, air mail approximately ten days, surface mail approximately thirty days.

Letter arrived in the United Kingdom but there is yet no record at the reinforcement unit of the addressee.

Letter is then forwarded to the Canadian records in England and search made for the addressee's correct address.

Often there is no trace in records as the information is not yet complete concerning the unit to which the addressee has been posted.

The letter is held for a week and then put through Canadian records again.

If records contain information of unit to which the addressee is posted, letter is endorsed accordingly.

If there is still no record of addressee, the letter is held another week and is put through the Canadian records again at regular intervals until he is found.

The redirected letter is forwarded to the Canadian overseas postal depot, England, for sortation and dispatch.

The letter arrives at the reinforcement unit in England to which the addressee has been posted. It is sorted to the respective company by the unit mail orderly.

Letter is delivered to the addressee if he is still in the United Kingdom.

If the addressee has been included in a reinforcement draft for the Mediterranean theatre the letter is so endorsed by the unit mail orderly.

Letter is forwarded from the reinforcement unit in the United Kingdom to the Canadian overseas postal depot for sortation and dispatch to the Mediterranean theatre.

Letter is forwarded to the reinforcement depot, central Mediterranean force, time required approximately thirty days by surface, six to sixteen days by air.

Letter arrives at base post office, Mediterranean theatre, and dispatched to the postal tracing section, Canadian 2nd echelon.

Letter put through the postal tracing section to ascertain to which depot and to which battalion within the depot the addressee has been posted.

If tracing section records contain information of unit to which addressee is posted letter endorsed accordingly.

If postal tracing section records have no information letter is held and again put through the records at regular intervals.

Redirected letter forwarded to appropriate reinforcement battalion.

Battalion mail orderly sorts into companies and delivers to the addressee if he is still with the battalion.

If addressee has been posted to an advance reinforcement battalion letter is again redirected by the mail orderly.

Letter sorted by Canadian postal unit and forwarded to the advance battalion for delivery.

If addressee has been posted from advance battalion letter is put through the records to ascertain new address.

Letter redirected according to new address and transferred to Canadian postal unit for sortation and dispatch.

Letter despatched to Canadian postal unit serving the new address.

Letter dispatched by Canadian postal corps to the addressee's new unit where it is delivered by unit post orderly if the addressee is still with the unit.

If addressee has become a casualty the letter is so endorsed by competent authority.

Letter returned to the postal tracing section at Canadian 2nd echelon.

Letter put through tracing section records to ascertain where the addressee is now located.

If the records have received information letter is again redirected.

If there is no information letter is put through postal tracing section records at regular intervals until the new location is recorded, when the letter is readdressed.

After redirection letter is forwarded to the C.P.C. postal unit.

Canadian postal corps unit sorts the letter according to the new address, usually a hospital, and forwards it to the nearest Canadian or British postal unit for delivery.

It often happens that the wounded man is moved from a British to a Canadian hospital. Letter is then redirected to the new hospital by the hospital mail orderly.

Letter is forwarded through tracing section where the new address is recorded and the letter immediately sent on for delivery.

Letter is forwarded by Canadian postal unit to new hospital address.

On arrival of the letter at hospital it is delivered to the addressee if he is still in the hospital. If he has left the hospital the same procedure as outlined above is followed ad lib until the letter eventually reaches the addressee.

It will be noted that I concluded the statement just read at the point where we deal with mail for a soldier who is a casualty and in hospital.

Let me now place on record action which has been taken to improve the service to these men by short-cutting the time required for delivery.

Use of Casualty Air Mail Postcard.—To expedite mail to soldiers in hospital a special card has been introduced with the approval of the Department of National Defence.

Normally, as hon. members are aware, mail travels to the unit of address and is redirected by the mail orderly of that unit to the latest known address. This procedure is followed until the mail is delivered to the addressee. The procedure involves many handlings and frequent searches through records before it reaches a soldier in hospital.

Now, on entry to hospital if the case so warrants—if he is going to be in hospital some considerable time—a special card is filled in either by the soldier or on his behalf asking relatives and friends when writing to him to add the words "in hospital" to the unit address which they usually use.

This card after being filled in is given priority treatment throughout the whole of its transmission to the addressee in Canada. Wherever possible, delivery is expedited by air transport without charge.

Letters mailed in Canada bearing the indication "in hospital," instead of being forwarded to the man's unit, are routed direct to the records in the United Kingdom or with the central Mediterranean Force, as the case may be.

At these points the letter is endorsed with the latest known address of the soldier and it is sent to destination by the quickest possible means.

Letters bearing the words "in hospital" are given priority treatment at the base post office and are given preference in the matter of transport according to the rate paid, air or surface.

This procedure short-cuts the normal practice of delivery to the unit and the tracing through the various steps from unit to unit and eventually to hospital.

Some of the complainants have intimated that the department has endeavoured to make financial gain out of the present situation by collecting airmail fees and sending mails by surface.

Naturally I can only speak for the mail posted in Canada to which Canadian postage is affixed. Westbound mail to Canada is the responsibility of the administration in whose jurisdiction it is mailed, but I cannot imagine any postal administration endeavouring to exploit the present situation for financial gain.

Priority is unquestionably given to mail prepaid for air transport. It does happen, however, occasionally that meteorological forecasts indicate bad flying weather for several days ahead, or possibly mechanical difficulties will delay the take off for several days and there is no alternative aircraft available. In such cases, if there is a fast surface outlet and the possibilities are that the mails will reach destination earlier, the air mails are transferred from the plane to the surface ship. The determining factor is to secure the earliest possible delivery to the addressee.

Further, complaints are made that letters posted a number of days apart arrive at the same time. I am sure that hon. members will find this easily understandable from the information I have already given.

Planes loaded at different dates are held for weather. When the weather breaks the planes take off, arriving at destination at approximately the same time.

In this connection I should like to put on record extracts from the log of two aircraft engaged in the carriage of mails to and from the armed forces. With the approval of the committee, I would put them on record rather than read them, because they are rather long.

The CHAIRMAN: With the approval of the committee.

Mr. MULOCK: The extracts follow:

The extracts follow:

Extract from Postal Log (A)

29 December—expected to leave Dorval 1st January
31 December—scheduled to leave Dorval 3rd January
5 January—due out of Dorval
5 January—left at night carrying 6,207½ lbs. of mail, but had to return on account of weather
7 January—still held at Dorval—snow on runways and bad weather
8 January—left Dorval; got as far as Labrador, but returned to Dorval as the weather over the Atlantic was unfavourable
10 January—due to leave Dorval
11 January—expected to leave Dorval. Left Dorval 10.05 p.m.
12 January—arrived in United Kingdom 9.21 a.m.
17 January—scheduled to leave United Kingdom for Canada
18 January—held in United Kingdom on account of bad weather
19 January—scheduled to leave for Canada via Iceland. Plane started on its flight but had to return

11 January—arrived in United Kingdom. Unserviceable until 14 January
14 January—repairs not completed
16 January—scheduled to leave for Canada
17 January—held in United Kingdom on account of weather
18 January—scheduled to leave 10.00 p.m.
19 January—scheduled to leave via Iceland 7.00 a.m.
20 January—departure further delayed on account of bad weather until 10.00 p.m.
21 January—still held up by weather
22 January—plane moved to airport in south of United Kingdom in an endeavour to make trip via the Azores
24 January—still at airport in south of England held up by weather
26 January—still further delayed by weather
27 January—expected to leave 8.00 a.m. 28 January
29 January—returned to airport in north to endeavour to make trip via Iceland
30 January—left northern airport in United Kingdom, forced to return on account of weather
31 January—left for Iceland with 6,467 lbs. letters
2 February—still in Iceland held on account of weather
3 February—still in Iceland held on account of weather
5 February—still in Iceland delayed on account of weather—departure indefinite
6 February—left Iceland
7 February—arrived Labrador 12.39 p.m.
8 February—left Labrador 11.29 a.m. Arrived Rockcliffe 4.55 p.m. with 6,467 lbs. of mail.

Such delays will occur as long as we are dependent on weather and machines.

As to the personnel angle, I have nothing but the highest of praise for the courage, devotion and determination of the crews of the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Trans-Canada Air Lines, who fly these aircraft in all weathers and who are subject to all kinds of hazards and dangers.

I have purposely gone to some length in dealing with the subject of mail to and from the Canadian armed forces as I desire to place before the committee and before the public the complete picture as clearly as circumstances permit.

As I have mentioned, I have every sympathy with the anxiety of those persons who are complaining of the delay or non-delivery of letters to and from their sons, daughters, husbands and friends. I appreciate just how they feel.

The majority of complainants, as hon. members will have gathered from the particulars of the actual elapsed times required for the various classes of mail, have not allowed sufficient time for their letters or parcels to be delivered and for an acknowledgment to be received.

The postal service, civil and military, has nothing to hide. We have no reason to seek excuses. There is no cause for blame. We have unfailingly striven to give the best possible service with the facilities at our disposal We have continuously striven to improve these facilities and to overcome obstacles and handicaps, always, however, with an abiding appreciation of the grim necessity of priority being given to vital supplies of men and materials necessary for the welfare and success of our arms.

In closing, I wish to pay tribute to the members of the civil postal service and the Canadian postal corps who have not spared themselves in their efforts to safeguard the mails and to expedite delivery.

The esprit de corps of the armed forces postal service is second to none. Every individual, whether in a postal unit operating near the front lines or in the base at home, is imbued with one dominant idea, that of service.

I ask every member of this house, if they have complaints which they wish investigated, to forward them, and I can assure them that such complaints will be given careful consideration, a thorough investigation, and that they will receive a report as to the results.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to thank the minister for his comprehensive statement. Perhaps most hon. members will feel that it is so comprehensive and so far-reaching in its details that some time will be required to digest all the points which it raises.

It is not my purpose to deal at length with the statement, but rather to ask the minister one or two questions which have been concerning me for some time in connection with the mails. I believe that most of us who have a heavy overseas correspondence have observed considerable irregularity from time to time in the mail service. Some letters come very quickly from far-away places, but at times the delays are very great. Perhaps I shall find when I have digested the minister's statement that this point is cleared up.

One matter of complaint by our Canadian boys, of which the Minister of National Defence may have heard something when he was overseas a short time ago, is their belief that the United States mail and postal services are much more expeditious than our own. Whether that is the fact I am not in a position to say, but the statement is made repeatedly, and I think we should have some information to show whether it is unfounded or whether there is some basis for it in fact.

Another point is this. I understand that our boys are not required to pay postage on ordinary mail coming this way, but they are charged for letters they send by air mail. I have none with me at the moment, but I received two or three such letters to-day, both from the scene of military operations and from England. Apparently the soldier has to pay airmail postage. I wish the minister would give some consideration to this matter. It seems to me that we owe it to our troops to enable them to send their letters, no matter how they are sent, without payment of any postal charges. I would not have brought this up except that I have just had one or two complaints from overseas with respect to it. It is true they were only mild complaints; nevertheless I think the matter is sufficiently important for the minsiter to deal with it.

On some subsequent occasion the minister might give us some idea of the yearly movement of tobacco from Canada to the troops overseas. I ask this question because it may be the foundation of something else which I shall want to say later on. I am not so sure that all our troops get all the tobacco that they should from Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: And cigarettes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes. When I said "tobacco" I used that as a comprehensive term, including cigarettes. There may be some reason to the contrary, but I do not know why the government should not provide our boys overseas with tobacco and cigarettes.

Mr. RALSTON: There is a small issue.

Mr. GRAYDON: I realize that. I wish the government would take the matter under favourable consideration. As most hon. members know, some men overseas get a lot of tobacco and cigarettes. I know that a new system has been instituted whereby at a certain stage a distribution is made more equitably throughout the units. Nevertheless I think the government might give consideration to a ration issue of tobacco and cigarettes to our men. It would be a small thing from the point of view of money but a big thing so far as our troops are concerned. Both the government and civilians should be extremely generous in these matters. To some civilians they may seem little things, but to the men overseas they are greatly magnified. I should like to think that we here are doing all we can for the men in this regard, and I include cigarettes and tobacco and such other comforts as may be needed. I do not think it is always equitable, nor is it always just, that the men overseas should have to rely for these little additional comforts on their friends over here, because, as the minister knows, some of them have more friends here than others. I leave this suggestion with him, and when we have digested the lengthy report he has given, we shall be more competent to deal with some of the details contained therein.

Mr. MULOCK: May I reply to one or two questions asked by the leader of the opposition. As I understand the United States parcel system, the soldier must write and ask for articles to be sent him before they are sent. They have not been accorded the same facilities in the receiving of parcels that our troops enjoy. In regard to tobacco parcels, I might give the figures. There are 3,869,000 parcels averaging, as closely as we can tell, between 500 and 600 cigarettes to the parcel.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the first question the minister has answered, I do not think he quite understood my reference to United States mail. I was not referring to parcels. The complaints I have had are with respect to letters, not parcels.

Mr. MULOCK: We will let the item stand.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to say a few words on the subject of airmail service to the forces. Not only have I sent mail to the forces, but, like the hon. and gallant member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers), I have received a fair amount overseas. I compliment the minister upon the steady improvement in the postal service to the army, the air force and the navy overseas in the last two years. Actually, the provision of a quick mail service to the men in combatant zones is not quite so easy as some armchair critics in Canada think it is.

I have one or two little suggestions to offer the minister, first of all, about airmail letter cards, which are the most effective way of getting mail to the troops. My first objection to the Canadian form is the awkward way in which it is prepared as far as writing is concerned, because of the manner in which it is folded. One writes a little bit here, a little bit somewhere else and a little bit over on the back. The British, who started the system, have an easier way. They make one fold in the paper; it is the same sized paper, and one writes as one would an ordinary letter. The second suggestion is that the minister should revise the rates for sending these things. The leader of the opposition has suggested that perhaps all soldiers' mail should go free airmail. That is an admirable suggestion, but I do not think it is a practical one. If you saw the amount of mail coming back you would realize that we would have to divert half the bomber group overseas to carry mail back. I think, however, that all Canadian service men overseas should have an opportunity of sending at the British overseas rate. The British man outside the country can send one of these things to Britain for threepence and the civilian in Britain sends one back for sixpence, just as we pay ten cents. A great number of Canadian soldiers in Britain must pay the sixpenny rate. In the far east and middle east we pay threepence to send one of these to Canada and from Great Britain sixpence. I suggest to the minister that he make an investigation to see whether the Canadian troops overseas could not send these airmail letter cards to Canada for threepence.

Mr. MULOCK: May I say to the hon. member for Vancouver North that I shall be glad to go into the matter of the form with him and also to take it up with the officials of the department to see whether the other form would not be better. In regard to the difference between the threepenny and the sixpenny rate, I would advise him that we have already done so. As he probably knows, westbound items are prepaid by British postage and not Canadian; therefore any change in rates is a matter for the decision of the British postal authorities. Representations have been made, and I am very hopeful that we shall be able to have a reduction to the threepenny rate. It is thought that the British authorities will favourably entertain the suggestion, notwithstanding the fact that it will mean a loss of approximately £7,500, or $37,500 a month to the British treasury. That is all the information I can give at the moment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is no rationing of these cards to civilians either in Canada or in Great Britain, but our Canadians in the middle east and the far east get a ration of only one a week. I suggest that there should be no ration. As hon. members know, the mothers and sweethearts in this country are sending bundles to Canadians to supplement the ration. I urge that there should be no ration to the men in the middle east and the far east.

May I refer to the cigarette situation. When I was first overseas there were many complaints about cigarettes, and there was undoubtedly a considerable loss both on convoy and by pilfering not only in the regular but in the army post office. I commend the minister for the way in which he cleared up that situation. Every cigarette package now coming is registered, and when it is opened by the orderly in the unit a check-up is made. Recently there has been little loss in cigarettes delivered overseas. There is considerable delay, but, after all, parcel post going forward is not nearly as important as the letters themselves. I was interested in what the leader of the opposition said regarding the scarcity of cigarettes. It is true that some men are more fortunate than others in having more friends to send cigarettes to them, but I wish to pay a tribute to the service clubs, labour unions and various other organizations throughout the country who have contributed so heavily to provide cigarettes free for almost every Canadian overseas. If I may refer to my own experience with the Windsor City squadron, the city took such good care of us that I suggest to the minister that one of the problems which will have to be faced in connection with rehabilitation when the war is over is that of teaching our chaps to buy their own cigarettes again after getting cigarettes free for so long.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it open to ask the Postmaster General to-night, under this item, questions that are not akin to the immediate subject-matter of his discussion? It is not intended to carry on this discussion generally of the Post Office Department?

Mr. MULOCK: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This occasion, then, has been accorded in order to enable the Postmaster General to make this statement. Is that the idea?

Mr. MULOCK: I will answer that question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that is so, I will not upset the equilibrium of the sitting, although I notice some nice teamwork going on; but I give notice—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the matter? I wish to give the minister notice that I propose to ask him to make a statement at a future date convenient to himself with respect to the policy of the government and of his department relating to those members of the public service belonging to the railway mail clerks' association who did not, for reasons which seemed good to them at the time, back in 1924, 1925, 1926 and 1927, take up the offer of the government of the day regarding the superannuation fund, and who are now seeking, because of a reduction of interest rates allowed on the payments they make into the retirement fund, to have a further extension of time given for their benefit, feeling otherwise that they are being discriminated against. I am giving that as a notice of motion to the Postmaster General.

Mr. MULOCK: May I tell the hon. member for York-Sunbury that this is a matter regarding which he should give notice to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is up to you. I think you ought to answer it. I am going to depend upon you for an answer.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The question that I desire to put to the minister deals with mail received by the ranks of service men in Italy. The reports I have are to the effect that men have gone as long as three weeks without any mail being received by their units. Can the minister give us, from his records, the longest period of time since December in which the men in Italy have not received mail?

Mr. MULOCK: Is the hon. member referring to air mail?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mail of any kind; the men have not received mail of any kind.

Mr. MULOCK: In Italy?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. MULOCK: Could the hon. member tell me whether the people involved were in a reinforcement unit or a definite unit?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They were in a reinforcement unit.

Mr. MULOCK: On this occasion I suggest that the hon. member read the statement which I have put on Hansard. If he does so, he will see some of the difficulties in the reinforcement units. When this department comes back into supply on the estimates, I suggest that he bring up the matter again. I think it would be well for him to go over my statement in the meantime. I shall be glad to get the information for him. It is not available here.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is true there have been some losses, of a definite nature, of mail going to Italy?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like the minister to give the committee assurance that the mail is now being resumed and is being received at the present time.

Mr. MULOCK: Oh, yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: I suppose at some later date the minister will enlarge on one or two points in particular. I took down the sequence of dates when the minister was making a statement and I gathered that ordinarily mail takes about twenty-eight to thirty days to be delivered. I followed the mail step by step as it progresses through Canada to destination, and I find that it gets up as high as ninety days and with some slight additions it may reach a hundred days; but I would think the average would be twenty-eight to thirty days.

Mr. MULOCK: I was referring to parcels.

Mr. LOCKHART: I took a note of the statement the minister placed on Hansard, and I notice that it keeps running up until it reaches ninety days. That cannot be the regular sequence of things when the average runs to about twenty-five days or thereabouts.

Mr. MULOCK: I put these different figures on the statement to show what happens with regard to parcels. Parcels are treated differently from letters. I would suggest that the hon. member look over each of the different tables. What he says about the mails is approximately correct. The parcels may not go in the same convoy or in the same ship with letters.

Mr. LOCKHART: Parcels are just the same. I have acknowledgments of many parcels and they ran around twenty days, and while there is a build-up here of ninety days I am trying to coordinate one statement with the actual experience.

Mr. MULOCK: I should like to ask the hon. member one question. Is he speaking about parcels to the United Kingdom or to the Mediterranean?

Mr. LOCKHART: I am speaking of parcels to the United Kingdom.

Mr. MULOCK: The statement with regard to ninety days applies to the Mediterranean.

Mr. LOCKHART Those run from ten to twelve days longer. May I refer to the mails coming this way, the air mail, for which a soldier has to pay. The leader of the opposition referred to that. During the past week I received four letters, two by air mail and two by regular mail. The two letters by regular mail arrived ahead of the air mail. If that is going to be the situation, I suggest either making it free to the men or cut it out altogether.

Mr. MULOCK: Just on that subject, I might have mentioned that where we have space available when we are carrying air mail we bring surface mail although airmail rates have not been paid on them. We are going to carry all the mail we can, even if it is surface mail.

Mr. CHAMBERS: I can give the minister an example. I received a letter from Victoria, delivered right on the battlefield, which had taken only six days. I received a cable delivered in England which had taken eleven weeks. Therefore, you can take your pick.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 24, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

5. Personnel supplies and services: food, medical and dental stores, clothing and personal equipment, $159,566,238.

Mr. STIRLING: I wish to bring a matter to the attention of the minister and ask whether he will give consideration to an improvement in the methods under which apples are being bought for the army. There used to be a ceiling imposed on prices by the Department of National Defence, which made sure that apples should not cost more than $1.65 a bushel. For purposes of this discussion we can take a box to be the equivalent of a bushel. They used to be $1.65 a bushel or a box, with the consequence that outside a certain radius from the production point it was impossible for a camp or an army establishment to purchase apples because the freight mounted up too high.

Mr. RALSTON: Local purchase?

Mr. STIRLING: In Canada, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I mean, it was local purchase, it was not for Munitions and Supply under contract?

Mr. STIRLING: I cannot follow the minister through that because the exact method which is adopted is not clear to me. As I understand it, the restriction was put on by the Department of National Defence. As the weeks went by, storage charges, of course, mounted on those apples, and by the time they reached the point of consumption the radius was drawn back and back by the extra cost of the bushel or the box until toward the end of the season the apples were not getting outside British Columbia. I am speaking, of course, of British Columbia production. They were reaching only those camps which were west of the Rocky mountains. When the wartime prices and trade board put on their ceiling last year the Department of National Defence ceiling was dropped to substitute for it. The restriction then was that nothing of a higher grade than grade C was to be bought for the troops. That is the third grade of apples. If there was a restriction by grade in the purchase of other foodstuffs the producer of apples would, of course, have little grievance; but that is not the situation.

When beef is purchased for the troops Blue Label is purchased. When potatoes are purchased, the highest grade of potatoes, No. 1, is purchased. It is the same with onions; No. 1 are purchased, and with oranges nothing below fancy may be bought. In connection with apples, however, the third grade is considered good enough for the troops. The United States do not look upon this matter in that way at all; they purchase the best grade of apples for their troops. Last year when, because for export difficulties, some two hundred thousand boxes were released for export to the United States, they were commandeered by the army commissary department as soon as they arrived in that country, and moreover a commissary officer was sent to British Columbia to see to it that nothing but the highest grades and the most desirable export varieties were sent. So that the United States take, shall I say, greater care of the requirements of their men in apples than we do.

Then in the United States and the United Kingdom there is a far more definite recognition of the nutritional value of apples than there is in Canada. In this country there was very little obtainable in the way of statistical information two or three years ago, but I am informed that some valuable work in nutrition has been carried on by experimental farms throughout Canada, particularly the one at Summerland, British Columbia. Officials who formerly were rather skeptical of the value of apples in regard to nutrition are now in agreement that they have a value for which nothing else can be substituted. It seems to me that an attempt should be made to place the purchase of apples on a different basis. The latest arrangement, I believe, I find in a letter sent last month by the deputy minister of national defence to British Columbia Tree Fruits Limited, in which he says:

> . . . the matter has been receiving careful consideration and it has been decided that, until the next apple crop is harvested, this department will purchase a proportion of the higher grades of apples in both western and eastern Canada.

I cannot help thinking that this decision has been induced by the shortness of the 1943 crop, which was below average; now that we are along toward the end of February it may very well be that inconsiderable quantities of apples are available for purchase.

I am bringing this matter to the minister's attention in the very great hope that this method will not be adopted in the coming year. We are heading for an enormous crop, as we think, and it seems most desirable that our men should have the greatest possible opportunity to obtain a good and plentiful supply of apples. I do not know if the minister has received complaints from the troops, as many hon. members have, and also from the parents and relatives of men in camp in Canada. They do not see why they cannot obtain a respectable apple to eat, so that I would suggest to the minister that this matter be reconsidered. It is just too bad that only the poorer grades of apples, if they are obtainable at all, should be placed before these men. I suggest that consideration should be given to allowing greater latitude on the part of the quartermaster who purchases them. He is given a certain amount of discretion in buying his beef, his potatoes, his onions, his oranges and, for aught I know, other foods, and it seems to me that it would be quite reasonable to allow him some latitude in the purchase of apples. These C grade apples are excellent apples of their sort, but for many years the Department of Agriculture has advocated buying by grade, and if you do buy by grade you get what you pay for. These C grade apples are admirable for apple pie and applesauce, but when it comes to eating apples it is much better to pay the extra money and enable the men to have at least fancy apples, which is the next grade above C.

Of course, coming from British Columbia, I am looking at this matter from the point of view of that province, but it applies also to the other two producing centres in Canada. When there is a fixed price the radius becomes so small that those outside that radius do not get their apples; and if there is the further restriction that only the third grade may be purchased, then even if the men get apples at all they do not get a palatable fruit. Would the minister give consideration to this?

Mr. RALSTON: Knowing where I come from, my hon. friend can, I think, be sure that I shall do so. The hon. gentleman has caught me quite off base; I do not know anything at all about this. I notice that he has correspondence with the deputy minister, but it has not been brought to my attention.

Mr. STIRLING: This was not a letter to me but to British Columbia Tree Fruits Limited, which was handed to me.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall look into the matter at once. I am quite satisfied that the quartermaster-general does have the discretion, but he may not have considered it necessary to exercise it. My only thought is that the C grade British Columbia apple may be as good as the first grade United States apple; that is the only suggestion I have to offer, though I hardly suppose a Nova Scotian would admit that. I have just received a note from one hon. member who tells me that the matter was taken up with my department and that just lately he was advised that the best grade is now issued to the troops. I have not personal knowledge of it, but I shall look into the matter and let the committee know. Being an inveterate apple eater myself, I thoroughly agree that the best is none too good, and agree with my hon. friend as to not only the nutritious but also the delicious qualities of an apple.

Mr. BENCE: Could the minister give the committee some information in connection with the matter of reporting casualties? I have no knowledge of the difficulties with which the army is faced in reporting casualties to the director of records, but in a number of instances with which I am familiar the bare report has come from overseas that So-and-so has been wounded in action. The message that is sent out by the director of records is to the effect that this man has been reported wounded, but the extent of the injuries is not known at the time, and it is a matter of perhaps ten days or possibly three or four weeks in some instances before any further information is obtained. Could the minister not do something to obtain more details when these first casualty reports come in from the front? In one case I have in mind the man did not even have to retire from his position; he suffered merely a superficial wound, but his next-of-kin were greatly concerned when they received a message from the director of records stating that this man was wounded. As far as they knew he might have been seriously wounded. Could the minister enlighten us on that point?

Mr. RALSTON: Naturally this matter has given me a great deal of concern, not only in connection with the time at which the wound is reported but also in connection with the report of the nature of the wound itself. I think I have gone into it all the way up and all the way down the line. It is regarded as most essential that information be sent to the next-of-kin at the earliest possible moment as to the fact of the casualty having occurred. A suggestion was made to me the other day by a father, who said, "I have a suggestion which sounds very simple, and I wonder that you have not accepted it long ago. That is, do not send your information with regard to the casualty until you are able to tell us the nature of the wound." I said, "My dear friends I know what would happen; within ten days somebody would wire or radio home with regard to that particular case and information would be given as to his wound before the Department of National Defence would have reported it."

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that has happened in one or two cases.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid it has happened in more than one or two cases. There was a case of four officers that gave me a great deal of concern last October. The nature of the wound is reported just as soon as the man is brought to a centre from which a report can be sent. As my hon. friend knows, these men are out in battle. They are wounded and a stretcher-bearer comes to attend them. The stretcher-bearer takes the name and makes a note of the wound, and that is sent back as soon as possible by runner or otherwise. Battalion headquarters are notified that Smith is wounded. However, I think the medical men will agree that it would be a dangerous procedure to adopt to have the stretcher-bearer attempt a diagnosis. It could happen that he would give the impression there was only a slight wound when the soldier might be suffering from something that would result seriously.

Immediately the man gets back to the dressing-station or the regimental aid post—I forget the names, but it used to be the regimental aid post in the last war—the diagnosis is made by a medical man. It may happen that the man is tagged "DNK", which means "diagnosis not known". Every effort is made then to see that the man is sent back to a hospital or a casualty clearing station where a more definite examination can be made.

That is the reason for the difference in time between reporting the actual casualty and the nature of the wound. I am gratified to be able to say that these reports as to the nature of the wound have been coming through more promptly. The practice has been and still is where a wound is superficial not to load the communication circuits with information of that kind. My hon. friends will understand that the load on the transmission circuits and the wireless with regard to operations and things of that sort is almost impossible to handle, and to load them with casualty messages would be perhaps more than the circuits could stand. As a matter of fact, we put in a special circuit from Italy to Canadian military headquarters in England to carry these particular messages.

If my hon. friends have any cases in mind—and I am not sure that they have—they would help the service if they would refer them to me. Coming back to what my hon. friend has asked about, I do not think there is anything that can be done to make the notification of the nature of the wound concurrent with the notification of the casualty. Our effort is to report promptly any casualty, and we report the nature of the wound just as soon thereafter as we can get a diagnosis that can be reasonably relied upon.

Mr. BENCE: If the wound is obviously a superficial wound, would that fact be advised in the first communication sent?

Mr. RALSTON: They use the words "slightly wounded" sometimes, but that is as far as they go. I suppose the stretcher-bearer might be justified in making that statement. That is the only indication I have seen of anything attempted which was not a medical description of a wound.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When air force men in Great Britain need more clothes they are provided by the British government. Does the same apply to the army?

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend mean when clothes are lost?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When clothes wear out the British government look after the replacements.

Mr. RALSTON: The policy is the same. If my hon. friend knows of a case where it has not been done, it is in error and it should be rectified.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Some of the men in the air force are complaining that the uniforms they get are much coarser than those they got from the Canadian government and I was wondering if the same applied to the army. Will the minister tell the committee what the limit is in connection with dental supplies. I am referring to porcelain inlays for teeth. Are the men as well as the officers allowed porcelain inlays, or is there a limit according to rank?

Mr. RALSTON: If there is a limit, the limit is the same for officers as for men. The director general of dental services is not here and the director-general of medical services is giving me this information, but he is quite satisfied it is correct.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What is the limit on that?

Mr. CHAMBERS: It is the same whether you are a soldier or an officer; you get your teeth fixed in the same way.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am asking with regard to porcelain inlays.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend whether porcelain inlays are denied to officers. If they are, they are denied to the men. If they are denied to the men, they are denied to the officers.

Mr. BENCE: Can the minister give us any information as to whether the situation in regard to sending parcels to prisoners of war has improved within the last year and whether there has been any increase in the number of vouchers or special tags that are available periodically?

Mr. RALSTON: I just have the information which comes from the Dieppe prisoners who were repatriated. They expressed appreciation of the service given by the Red Cross in connection with sending parcels. From the information I received the general impression seems to be that there has been a distinct improvement. Considering all the difficulties I think the service has been extremely good. I spoke with one officer who had been a prisoner of war and had been repatriated. I cannot give my hon. friend the number of tags or whether it has been increased. As my hon. friend knows, the number will be increased as the prisoners of war increase in number.

Mr. BENCE: I understand that the situation as far as Red Cross parcels are concerned has improved materially, but I was thinking of next-of-kin parcels and whether, now that shipping has improved, an increase will be permitted. I sincerely hope that this will be done as soon as possible.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member means to increase the number of parcels which may be sent? It is a question of transport.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the word "medical" in this vote refer to the medical inspection of recruits going into the army?

Mr. RALSTON: It does.

Mr. MacNICOL I have had many cases of men who have been in the army for one or two years and then been discharged. I myself have written about a number of them to the department. The wonder to me is how they ever got past the medical inspection in the first place. Some had flat feet; one had a broken foot, and there were many other cases which made it seem as if the army were taken in the halt, the lame and the blind. They would be kept in the army for a considerable length of time, at great expense to the country, and then be discharged. I should like to find out how they could ever have been passed in the first place if there were any medical examination whatever.

Mr. RALSTON: After my hon. friend cites a case like that, it is difficult for me to tell him what I was intending to tell him. There are very many men who are passed, and properly passed, at the time of enlistment by the medical boards, but who simply cannot take the change from a sedentary life to the activities of army life. I say this, too, in the presence of members of the air force. There are some features of army life which, as far as physical strain is concerned, are very much tougher on the man than the air force, outside of the aircrew, and some men gradually break down under the constant wear and tear of army life and of the training. That is one reason why there are many more discharges from the army than from the other services.

A second reason—and I say this advisedly—is that the requirement of physical fitness on enlistment in the army has not been so high as in the other services, particularly the air force.

The third reason—and the cases my hon. friend has in mind I think would come in here—is, as I explained to the house two years ago, that in the earlier days we had a great many civilian medical practitioners on the boards. They were doing the best they could with regard to examinations, but they were not in the army and had not had the benefit of army training, and the knowledge of army requirements. We found that a great many men who had been passed by these boards simply did not stand up, and that there were some cases such as my hon. friend speaks of who, if they had been examined by any army board such as we have to-day, would not have been passed in the first place.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), with whom I am not always in agreement, I feel that the item we are now discussing should be divided at least in two sections. One might include whatever relates to the medical corps and the drugs needed by the army, food being also covered by that first section, and the other might include clothing and personal articles.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Referring first to food, I must say to the honourable the minister of national defence (Mr. Ralston) that it happens but too often that soldiers are poorly fed in some camps. As regards the Quebec district especially, I must tell him that complaints are often whispered—because those who make them do not want to run foul of their officers, and some soldiers are timorous—concerning the more or less cleanly and sometimes terrible conditions obtaining in some kitchens where the odours develop anything but appetite, where the colour of the tables is too often on a par with that of the floor and where the sunshine wages a merciless but often vain struggle against the altogether too numerous microbes they harbour. As I have had an opportunity, while a member of the medical corps, to examine the rations, I have always been surprised to notice how first class food would, through the process of cooking, be transformed into some kind of stew not unlike the black broth of the Spartans. The best foods, if carelessly prepared, can give a very poor reputation to the cooks and their helpers without forgetting the contractors who are all no doubt anxious to supply at the lowest cost the best possible products. I have mostly heard complaints about the food at Valcartier camp, where some of the men claim that they have to rely on the canteen to fill up a stomach which, otherwise, might incur the rebellion of an ill-fed body. There is undoubtedly a lack of watchfulness somewhere, an unpardonable carelessness, or an inefficiency to which military authorities should put a stop. Soldiers are not all given to complaining; while in the army I have met very few men who did that and the reason why I consider nearly all of them reasonable is that I was making it a point to listen to what they had to say and to pay attention to their complaints.

Still, it would be interesting to hear from the minister whether among the contractors who supplied food to the Valcartier camp there was a concern by the name of Wesiberg which derived its fame from its sausage. It would also be quite interesting to know whether the wartime prices and trade board, which had something to do with that famous investigation which fizzled out, intends to punish the guilty and to cooperate with the health department, the mayor and the aldermen of the city of Quebec. While I have heard complaints about the food at Valcartier camp, on the other hand the news from the Montmagny camp are by far the best. The soldiers who have spent a fairly long time at those two camps have had an opportuntiy to notice the very great difference between them, despite the fact that both are in the same district. Obviously the trouble lies in the preparation of the food, and therefore in the efficiency of the cooks. The officers of the Department of National Defence should exercise strict supervision over the manner in which kitchens are kept and over the competence displayed in preparing food. Good food brings good discipline, goes the proverb held in high honour by schoolboys. The same maxim applies equally well to the army. I recall the tour made by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) at the beginning of the war in several camps of the Quebec district and the feeling of satisfaction evinced by servicemen when they heard that delicious pork and beans cooked in molasses would stand high on the food list. Since that time, things have inevitably relaxed, and I would ask the minister to make sure, by stern means if necessary, that our soldiers are always given the food they need.

I now come to the medical and health aspects. I do not intend to quote statistics on venereal disease or to delay the sailing of a corvette, even if it should sail from Quebec. According to an official report, Montreal and Quebec are more badly hit by the venereal evil than any other city in the dominion. This same report ascribes as principle cause of the trouble the commercialization of prostitution. I believe the report is incomplete; it should have mentioned the fact that people from all over the dominion have thronged to these two cities since the outbreak of the war. Units on their way overseas, whether they come from the neighbouring province or from the western provinces do not simply pass through; they often put in quite a stay; the findings of a report cannot be established without mention of this fact. In a gathering of men hailing from the four corners of the country and often from overseas, for Canada is very hospitable, we inevitably find different temperaments, different mentalities, ways of life which do not tally with one another, all of which clash to result in an unfortunate relaxation of behaviour favoured by the traditional bottle of beer.

On this point, opinions differ as to the best means that can be used to reduce the dangers of contamination, as far as service men are concerned. Is the lack of supervision on the part of municipal authorities in cities visited by our soldiers responsible for all the misfortunes and disasters which the medical corps, whatever its reputation, never fails to discover in military hospitals where preventive and curative means outdo each other in efficiency? Or are we to infer that the numerous means of prevention and protection with which our soldiers are provided by the army medical authorities have caused a feeling of overconfidence bringing about hasty verdicts in the case of the most dangerous diseases developed by contact? I do not wish to venture on ground which lies outside the political sphere, as I do not care to state an opinion which is based on insufficient information. Over and over again, however, experience has taught me that, in the treatment of venereal disease, the army needs specialists; they should be found among medical officers, and if there are not enough of them in the army, the authorities should retain them as civilian physiciains. If the propagation of venereal disease has reached such an alarming point, I am not ready to declare that lack of moral sense among our soldiers is the main cause of that condition. There has frequently been a lack of the necessary qualifications. Indeed, all the medical men in the armed forces cannot be expected to be specialists in this particular type of treatments. The blame must not be laid upon the shoulders of the more or less competent medical officer, but upon the senior offiicers who have placed them in a service for which they were not fully qualified.

In so far as the medical officers of training centres or companies are concerned, they are frequently over-worked either by the hospital service or by what is commonly called in the army the sick parade. It is unavoidable that out of thousands of men some may have an absolute need for medicine; they are only human, and any practitioner knows that it is not necessary to be a soldier to have such a mentality. I firmly believe, however, that they are not more numerous in the army than in civil life, and too frequently soldiers are sent back to training after being prescribed pill no. 8, 9 or 10. Too frequently, men are labelled hypochondriacs, loafers, or in common parlance, malingerers. Too frequently, the medical personnel being inadequate, those who have to bear the burden cannot take the time necessary to examine thoroughly each and everyone of these cases. As a result, the old routine practice which professional men must always guard against, takes hold of these officers and they are inclined to label in advance such or such soldier according to the frequency of his appearances at the sick parade. If, in order to build up a strong army, healthy men are required, it is necessary to start by supplying the army with a personnel which is adequate, well-supervised and as well-qualified as possible. I understand that, at the beginning of the war, physicians were twitted with not enlisting in sufficient numbers. But since the government compels students to volunteer, I believe that this argument no longer applies.

Those who know something of the history of medicine are aware that another difficulty faces the medical officer who is intelligent and anxious to do his duty. At La Salpêtrière, famous French hospital, I remember the lengthy studies which we were required to make in regard to malingerers. It is hard for a layman to believe that human beings can earn their livelihood by simulating fits of epilepsy, hysteria, appendicitis, etc.; they become experts and they offer very interesting subjects to students attending that institution. It happens in the army that service men—they are few, it is true, but there are some—simulate with much less skill certain diseases which might cause their rejection. I have seen some who complained of violent pains in the region of the appendix; others complained of constant rheumatic pains in the lower limbs; still others complained of continuous stomach troubles. The experienced medical officer eventually finds out the truth. However such cases are frequently the cause of men who are really ill, being labelled as malingerers after a cursory examination. Unforgivable errors have been committed by officers possessed of a mentality which is hard to explain. If an incomplete examination does not immediately reveal a serious trouble, the man concerned is regarded as a "faker", a malingerer, and he is sent back amongst his fellow soldiers to endure his pain in silence. If he returns too frequently, C.B. is his lot.

I recall a very special case. A man who had been called up, returned home after a month's training. Engaged in wood cutting, he sprained his ankle and painfully returned to his family home. As he had neglected to report to the army authorities, military police arrested him and, in spite of his protests, took him away. For eleven days, he was taken from one medical centre to another and finally arrived in Quebec City, handcuffed, where he was given a so-called severe examination, and classed as a malingerer and sent to us to be declared perfectly fit for military service. I had refused to consider him as a malingerer, especially after the medical officer who was chairman of the board on which I was a member and myself had noticed a large ecchymosis on his external left ankle. This man was on the way to developing a chronic ailment that would have put him in category "E". The examination had evidently not been thorough or serious. Possibly one of the doctors or so-called specialists who had examined him had had to deal with a malingerer on the same day and had reasons to see a second one in this man. Another rather plausible reason of that fact was that the interested party had failed to report or was late in reporting to the army. Then it may have been thought that he was simulating a sprained ankle, a rather difficult thing to do, as it is difficult to stand the pain caused by a real sprain accompanied by ecchymosis. The next day an argument arose in the presence of a superior medical officer and a specialist in surgery. Finally, the man was placed in category "E", not on account of his bad foot, but as unfit for military service on grounds of mental deficiency. Here is a case of a man tagged as a malingerer due to a faulty examination and the obstinacy of a medical officer who would see malingerers everywhere. I do not claim that cases like these occur in all medical boards, but they are too frequent. It may very well be that soldiers too often simulate diseases to be rejected from the army, but, just the same, this is no reason to see malingerers in everyone.

I am trying to be as constructive as possible in my remarks, but I have to state that some medical men who have been failures in civil practice—and this is not in the nature of a criticism, I am simply stating a plain fact—have become all-powerful, through intrigue, on some army medical boards.

Speaking of intrigue, Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask you how it is that medical officers who are veterans of the first great war, and have endured years of bombing in England in the present conflict, must, to get a promotion, risk their life anew overseas, while others who are strutting with their very superior officer epaulettes are waging their second war on Canadian territory? If the minister wishes I can supply the names. This is a case of lack of elementary fairness. However, this is not the first time justice has been encroached upon. For my part, I have been arrested on the charge of having accepted money from a man to place him in category "E". But I happen to have the file of that man, who was examined by somebody else, not even in the same office, and who has been again placed in category "E" by a revising board of specialists. However, I had to spend forty-four days in gaol. That was when medical officers had been charged with selling blue slips and when the announcers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were bandying our names in the whole country. They have not been so energetic in the matter of the Toronto registrar.

True, some specialists were making great strides on the road to promotions. There was one who, having spent fifteen years in the lumber business, took a trip to Europe and returned a specialist; another one had been hardly a year out of the university. These remarks are not in the nature of complaints; they are a simple statement of facts.

Unfortunately, as in other professions, it happens that one or two incompetent schemers bring all the other members into disrepute and cause them all to be placed in the same class by a public disposed to be too hasty and too inclusive in their judgments. It must, however, be acknowledged that changes must be brought about so that matters may improve sufficiently to meet the approval of both military and civilian populations. For this purpose, schemers should be replaced by efficient men. No medical man who has had to get out of uniform should be found, a few days later, working as a civilian physician on a medical board of revision. What can be the reason of such a situation, if not intrigue or political influence?

I have been asked during the summer why I had not more frequently pleaded in this house for soldiers or conscripted men which the army was holding in spite of their poor health. I shall answer now by saying that I do not like noisy publicity and that I have taken up with the Department of National Defence, either verbally or by correspondence, those cases which have been brought to my attention since my return to civilian life, and I must say that I have very seldom had to complain from a lack of consideration on the part of the minister himself. The cases which I had reported to him have always been thoroughly investigated and most of the time the wrongs have been redressed. If 245 members were to bring to the attention of the house all the cases reported to them, 365 days of session each year would not be sufficient. I recognize that it is well for a member to do so now and then in order to rouse public opinion but every one must admit that those who do their work unobtrusively should not be made a target for rebukes or innuendoes. I have the satisfaction to say that when I venture in the medical field I am indeed at home.

As I said, I agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata when he complains about the difficulty of obtaining old military clothing, for our needy or our settlers without having to go to second-hand dealers who seem to enjoy a monopoly in that trade. Inevitably, those who could secure them at a reasonable price have to pay a profit to the middleman. This monopoly is not limited to the sale of used clothing. It was on the point of establishing itself in Quebec in connection with new clothing, and it has spread to other fields. I do not intend to turn the spotlight on the sausage trust, but the citizens of Quebec and the surrounding country are inclined to wonder when they hear that the calls to military service, issued by the registrar of district No. 5, come from offices located in the Pollack building. The X-ray department is headed by the son of this liberal organizer; however, his qualifications cannot be denied in view of the thorough studies he has made in surgery and his stay of many months in England during the present war. Remunerative contracts have been granted, on tenders no doubt, to this selfsame liberal organizer, who happens to be the supplier of battledress and greatcoats worn by the men who are declared fit for military service.

So true is it that there are all sorts of ways to contribute to the war effort!

I claim that, when it comes to selling used clothing, welfare, colonization or other organizations, should have preference over profiteers.

Such are, Mr. Chairman, the few remarks I wished to make on item No. 5 of these estimates.

Mr. RALSTON: There are two or three points brought up by the hon. member to which I wish to reply. The first point was the matter of messing and cooking. He spoke generally about messing and cooking in the camps and indicated that while the food was good the preparation was not all that it should be, and he spoke of Valcartier, which he said was not as good as Montmagny. I do not know the date to which my hon. friend is referring, but perhaps he means at the time he was in the service.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I am speaking of what one hears from soldiers one meets on the street.

Mr. RALSTON: I visited Valcartier last summer or fall and saw the kitchens, and I really thought a good job was being done. My hon. friend knows we are taking a particular interest in the preparation of food as well as in the quality. As he knows, we have cooking schools at Borden, and every district has an opportunity to send and does send cooks there. I do not know of any place where there could be better cooks than in Quebec where we get the benefit of the services of many cooks who have been in the lumber camps. We also have a system of messing officers in the units and not simply at headquarters, and I am disappointed to hear my hon. friend's view about Valcartier. I shall certainly look into the matter. I had an idea that under the commandant, Colonel Gaudreau, the administration was pretty good. Since cooking is a very important part of administration I shall look into the matter. I thank the hon. member for having brought it to my attention because that is the only way of knowing about it.

Mr. GAUTHIER: The complaint was not from officers but from privates.

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about the men's mess. I did not have the privilege of a meal in the officer's mess there.

My hon. friend referred to venereal disease and correctly pointed out that there is a considerable additional load on Quebec and particularly Montreal, because of the tremendous transient population going through there. He realizes, as we all do, that it is a civilian problem and has to be dealt with, no matter where the population may come from. All I say to him is that it does put on these communities an additional responsibility. The services are endeavouring to do all they can to help in the way of tracing down sources of infection and giving information to the civilian authorities, and real progress is being made. I am speaking of Montreal particularly; I have not as much information about the city of Quebec. The manner in which the Montreal authorities took over the matter when it was brought to their attention by Major-General Renaud gives me hope that there will be substantial improvement there.

My hon. friend spoke of precautions taken and treatment given in the army as creating a feeling of confidence. It is not intended to do that. At the same time the services cannot neglect these precautions, and the result my hon. friend speaks of is perhaps a psychological result. Certainly we shall see to it that warnings are given. These are only precautions; that is all they are, and certain risks are run.

The hon. member spoke also of military medical officers not having experience in the treatment of venereal disease. It is true that up to six months ago upon the subject of venereal diseases the army itself did not give military medical officers any special instructions. They had only such knowledge as the medical profession and schools give in the treatment of that disease; but since Colonel Williams has been in charge of the matter we have had a venereal control officer in every district and his job is to instruct the medical officers with regard to treatment. My hon. friend knows far more about the treatment of those diseases than I possibly can, but I am instructed that under the regime that has been inaugurated the treatment is very much more simple than before. The suggestion my hon. friend made, that officers did not have a long enough time to treat a patient, seems to me hardly to hold, at least in connection with V.D.G., because as I understand it that treatment is not given in hospital. A man is not taken off parade but is treated by the use of sulpha drugs and tablets and things of that sort, and there does not have to be constant attention by a medical officer.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Mr. GAUTHIER: It is all right to take pills, but direct control under a medical officer is important.

Mr. RALSTON: I am pointing out that the need for constant treatment and attention does not exist to the same degree as if a man were in hospital or in a sick bay. May I say this, and I think it is something concerning which we can take satisfaction, if one can take any satisfaction in this very serious matter. We find this record, that whereas in 1940—I am speaking now of the army—the number of infections in Canada was sixty-two out of every one thousand; in 1943 that number was brought down to thirty-two out of every thousand. Therefore, distinct progress has been made. With regard to the treatment of syphilis the treatment that is given depends, as I understand it, altogether on the particular case. One cannot lay down any rule about it. As I understand it, the treatment is intermittent and there does not necessarily have to be the constant attention of the medical officer. Many of these cases are treated in hospital where, of course, the man has constant attention.

My hon. friend spoke of malingerers. I agree with him in regard to the difficulty of telling a malingerer from a genuinely sick man. There again we have tried to do something to meet the situation. As I said the other night the term "psychiatrist" was a fearsome one. I really did not understand fully what it meant, and I was a little doubtful of introducing anybody in the profession of that name into the army. These men have come into the army. We have sixty-three of them in the army at the present time. My hon. friend is a medical doctor, and he will know better than I do whether or not they are useful. I wish to say this exactly as I understand it. In a case where the psychiatrist is called in, the medical officer examines the man who complains of a disability of some kind. The medical officer can find no reason for that disability; that is to say, by all the tests he makes he can find no reason for disability. He then has an opportunity to call in a psychiatrist. I would think the practice would be for the medical officer to consult the psychiatrist to find out whether or not in his opinion the man was a malingerer or whether it was a genuine case of disability.

My hon. friend speaks of the fact that there is danger in our assuming that men are simulating disease, are malingering, when they are really sick. He picked out the defaulter and said that the defaulter may have something wrong with him and therefore may not get a square deal. We try to eliminate that in every way possible, by examining him mentally and psychologically, as well as physically.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Even if he is a defaulter he is entitled to the same kind of treatment as the other.

Mr. RALSTON: I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. GAUTHIER: That is why I submit to the minister, it is a dangerous thing in the medical profession.

Mr. RALSTON: I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend. I said my hon. friend picked out the worst case, not the best case. But I agree with my hon. friend that the defaulter is entitled to as good a medical examination as anybody else.

My hon. friend spoke of promotions overseas and of the fact that they are not made as rapidly as he would like.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Promotions in Canada, not overseas.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought my hon. friend said that promotions were not made very fast overseas, whereas at the same time promotions were being made of men in Canada who were veterans of two wars and have never been overseas. I should like my hon. friend to bring that to my attention. I do not mind his naming individuals, if he would like to name them. I know of no case of that kind, where a man is medically fit and is a veteran of two wars and has not been overseas, unless he is a specialist or something of that kind and it has been necessary to keep him here. I should like to know of such cases.

Mr. GAUTHIER: What I wish to know is why a man who is a veteran of two wars and who has been overseas twice cannot get the promotion he deserves when he is absolutely medically fit, absolutely bilingual and has the experience.

Mr. RALSTON: I got my hon. friend completely wrong. My hon. friend has put up a very good case now. My only answer to him can be that the officers under whom the man works either have not considered that he was qualified for promotion or have considered that there was someone who could better fill the job even though he had not had the same experience. The fact that a man is a veteran of two wars does not necessarily qualify him for promotion if the job can be better filled by somebody else.

If my hon. friend has a case in mind I should appreciate it very much if he would bring it to my attention, because I should like to look into it personally. I have dealt generally with most of the points my hon. friend has raised.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has the Canadian army set up a typhus commission in Italy similar to the one set up by the United States government, in order to combat typhus in the country they are occupying?

Mr. POULIOT: Before the minister answers, may I say a word? I am delighted that the hon. member for Portneuf has awakened. It is quite a miracle, because he has been sound asleep for two years with regard to the medical officer business in Quebec.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I thank the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: I need no thanks.

Mr. GAUTHIER: He is very intelligent, polite and delicate.

Mr. POULIOT: It is the law of nature.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Oh, yes, but you have some nature.

Mr. RALSTON: I undertsand that there is no typhus commission as such. There is a special branch of preventive medicine under the director-general of medical services, and typhus comes under that branch. Of course, my hon. friend understands that there are other diseases of a similar nature to those which are dealt with by that same branch.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does that branch treat the civilians as well as the men in the army?

Mr. RALSTON: In an area like Italy?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes. The United States commission went into Naples and they treated 1,300,000 people.

Mr. RALSTON: The answer is in the negative.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What is going to happen in the territory that the Canadian army occupies if the civilians are not looked after? I say that because I have had half a dozen letters from Italy from different men, two of them officers, and they claim that life in some sections is almost unbearable owing to the fact that the lice which carry the typhus fever are there.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any further information at this stage. I have in mind—and remember that I am only surmising this from what I saw there—that the civil government control, which is established, might be administering that particular operation of the medical services, and that service may come under that department. In that connection we have certain of our officers there, but they are in the civilian government administration, the allied military government of occupied territory. There are certain Canadian officers who come under that body, and I would think that probably that commission handled preventive services and that as far as civilians were concerned they would come under that administration. I am going to find out something about it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does the army set up in Italy fumigation services similar to that which they have in some of the training camps in order to take care of the men's clothes?

Mr. RALSTON: The answer is yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Disinfectants?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister any information available as to cures of venereal disease by fever-therapy? Has he any idea of the percentage that can be treated and the results?

Mr. RALSTON: We can get statistics on that. I know of cases. I have in mind a man in regard to that matter. That treatment is given sometimes under certain circumstances. If my hon. friend wants statistics I think I can get them.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to know whether it can be made a universal treatment? I do not believe it can. What percentage of venereal diseases has been treated in the army by the fever-therapy method, and what results have been obtained?

Mr. RALSTON: I think we can give my hon. friend that. I cannot give it now.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think it would be of interest to the committee if we could get that information.

There is one thing more I should like to ask in connection with the induction centres at the district depots, with regard to the psychiatric examination of the incoming personnel. Could the minister say what percentage are rejected for psychiatric reasons? I refer specifically to what are termed morons, men in low mental categories. Are figures available in that connection?

Mr. RALSTON: There are figures which I should like to look up and check. I gave some figures to the committee last year. The reason for my hesitation is that I do not think it would be correct to class those who happen to be rejected as morons.

Mr. ADAMSON: I agree entirely, but I believe there is a special classification for those below a certain mental age, and I think "moron" is the official term used.

Mr. RALSTON: I will get the information.

Mr. GLADSTONE: In the case of soldiers being invalided home, is any advance notice given to the relatives where the injuries are of a very serious nature, such as multiple amputations, facial deformities and so on? I am told that some men have been met at the station by their relatives and that sometimes the meetings have had disastrous effects. Might it not be advisable in some instances to have the first meeting take place after the soldier is comfortably in hospital?

Mr. RALSTON: I am glad that question is asked, because yesterday I was chasing down a rumour that I heard, and I shall tell the committee what it was. It was stated that at a certain station here, and the station was named, a man who had both arms and both legs amputated was carried off the train, and that his relatives had not been advised of it.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I heard the same report.

Mr. RALSTON: I tried to run down that rumour, and the director-general of medical services has looked into it also. We can find no such case. I will tell the committee of what may be the case which gave rise to this rumour. That was the case of a man who lost both his arms while on manoeuvres in England; he pulled the pin of a hand grenade and it blew off both arms. I saw that man in England myself. When I came home I wrote his wife about him, and I know she was aware of the extent of his injuries. I took a personal interest in that case, with particular reference to the possibility of getting appliances for that man before he came home. If my hon. friend can give me any information that will enable me to track down that report I should be very grateful, because I do not believe such a case exists.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Of course the point is that if there should be such a case, could not precautions be taken to lessen the effect upon the relatives?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly they could. The committee will understand that the relatives would be advised in the regular course of hospital reports just what the accident or disability was. I felt very badly about this man coming home without appliances. The provision at that time was that appliances were not issued on the other side because they wanted them fitted here; but I cabled over and and made special arrangements so that he had the appliances and used them on the boat before he arrived here. As a matter of fact, I had exactly the same case in my own battalion in the last war. Hon. members of the committee may know that to-day this young man is secretary of the Saskatchewan law association, having put himself through college even with that disability. I felt sure I could give some comfort to the wife of this man if I called that fact to her attention.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to ask the minister a question in regard to the matter of services. There is in Toronto a voluntary organization that meets casualty trains as they come in, bringing the relatives of the men on board. Sometimes it is three or four o'clock in the morning when the train comes in, but they bring the wives and children of the men to meet them. Of course there is only one way to take care of them, namely, to drive them to the station and then drive them home.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the wives and children?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes. Some time ago I had some correspondence with the minister about the matter. I know the service the members of this organization are performing, and I want to pay a tribute to them for it. I was wondering if satisfactory arrangements had been made in connection with getting gasoline to carry on this work, because, after all, many of these people only have "A" ration books, and when they have to go twenty or thirty miles out into the country to get these people and take them home it means quite a lot. Has any arrangement been made so that the members of this organization may be able to carry on their work?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend whether any arrangement has been made, but I shall see whether that is possible. I agree with him that a very worth-while work is being done by the Red Cross, the women's voluntary organizations and other organizations, depending, of course, upon which organization is functioning in a particular locality. I have particular knowledge of the work being done in Halifax when these men are brought off the boats. Just the other night I had a report from the district officer commanding in connection with the arrival of the last hospital ship, and certainly everything that could be done to give care and comfort to those men was done by these loyal people who saw these casualties of ours on board the hospital trains. However, I shall look into the matter of gasoline.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is included in the expression, "personal equipment"?

Mr. RALSTON: That is the actual personal equipment of a man. It is the steel helmet, the web equipment, the ground sheets and the anti-gas equipment.

Mr. MacNICOL: It has nothing to do with rifles, for instance?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to inquire a little further about this psychiatry business; it rather intrigues me. The minister stated that there were sixty-three psychiatrists in the service. How many of them are in Canada, and how many are overseas? When is the psychiatrist called in, and is that done on the advice of the medical authorities? As I understand it, a psychiatrist is not one who prescribes medicine.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, yes, he does. They are qualified medical practitioners.

Mr. GILLIS: No doubt that is so, but they specialize in mental disease; that is their particular line in the service. What I am trying to get at is when it is considered necessary to call in a psychiatrist, and whether it is done solely on the recommendation of the medical officer who is charged with the exclusive responsibility of looking after the medical end of it. I am trying to find out just what purpose this particular officer serves. I have in mind one of the first psychiatrists to practise in Canada, Doctor Cathcart. He was brought here from England in 1920 and attached to the Canadian pension commission; and our experiences with that gentleman were not altogether happy. When the pension committee sat in 1940 this subject was thoroughly discussed, as to the application of that particular branch of medicine in connection with the determination of pensions. I think it was almost unanimously agreed by that committee that this line of service was being dispensed with because the particular clause in the act had been removed under which the psychiatrists had operated in the past. Some qualified medical men appeared before the committee and expressed the opinion that in the past it had not been a very satisfactory service. There are sixty-three of these men in the Canadian service—I assume there are not any on the other side because, if a man is mentally and physically equipped to cross the water, he should be all right. What I am trying to determine is what makes it necessary for the medical authority in a unit or a camp to send a man to a psychiatrist. What conditions must prevail? When the psychiatrist makes a decision, to whom does he report? Who is the judge as to whether the particular examination is the last word? I know back in 1920 and 1921 many of the pensions which had been given for nervous disabilities were discontinued in a sweeping manner, but they were restored later on by the medical authorities in the different military districts. I am simply trying to determine the mechanics in connection with this. I know I am not qualified to pass judgment, but I should like to know something about it.

Mr. RALSTON: That is something of a technical nature, and it has developed, I do not know just how recently. I know Doctor Cathcart to whom my hon. friend has referred. This has developed just as personnel selection has developed, and it is an important development. It is something like the personnel manager in business who did not exist twenty years ago but who exists to-day. These men are referred to the psychiatrists as specialists, just as men are referred to chest or eye specialists. When a medical officer fears that a man may have difficulty in making a mental adjustment to life in the army he is referred to a psychiatrist.

Mr. GILLIS: He determines his mental condition.

Mr. RALSTON: Not his mental condition, his emotional outlook.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): His state of mind.

Mr. RALSTON: His state of mind and the possibility of his adjusting himself. I have not been examined myself, but the director-general of medical services is on the floor and I am sure he is listening to this discussion. He belongs to this profession as well as being a medical officer. I believe I have described correctly the use which is made of the psychiatrist, particularly in the army. I am advised by prominent medical men who are not psychiatrists that these men have performed a very useful function and that they have saved us from having a good many men discharged because of mental conditions, particularly nervous conditions. I believe Doctor Cathcart's full title is neuropsychiatrist, or something of that kind, which would indicate that he deals with nervous as well as mental conditions.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. ADAMSON: Would the minister describe hypertension?

Item agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: Hypertension is high blood pressure, and hypotension is low blood pressure.

6. Signal and wireless equipment, line construction, etc., $23,599,633.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is radar being used by the army at all, and has it been found satisfactory?

Mr. RALSTON: It is used extensively.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I understood that it had not been found as useful in the army as on the sea.

Mr. RALSTON: I am using the word in the generic sense of referring to the various radio equipment used for purposes of detection. It is used extensively in connection with anti-aircraft. As my hon. friend probably knows, a great number of equipment installations have been turned out in Canada at a place not far from where he lives.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this item cover equipment for use in Canada for training purposes, or does it just cover equipment being used in Europe?

Mr. RALSTON: Both in Canada and Europe and in Italy. It covers all signalling and wireless stores, including searchlights, cable layers, fullerphones, telephone sets, switchboards, charging sets, generators, reception sets, wireless sets, wireless stations, wavemeters, radio direction finding equipment, and so on.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have many pieces of intercommunication equipment been purchased? I refer to the equipment by which an officer can talk back and forth with the field.

Mr. RALSTON: That is known as C-58. I cannot tell my friend how many.

Mr. MacNICOL: They do not need wires?

Mr. RALSTON: "Walkie-talkie" is the slang term.

Mr. McGARRY: Can the minister say whether or not his department assisted in the construction of the telephone line for Cheticamp to Pleasant Bay in Inverness?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. McGARRY: Does the minister have the figures?

Mr. RALSTON: I thought it was $5,000, but the officer here tells me he thinks it was $3,000. This was to assist in the construction of a telephone line as part of the aircraft defence corps operations in that particular part of the province.

Item agreed to.

7. Ammunition and bombs, $182,194,664.

Mr. ADAMSON: Could the minister give a break-down of this item?

Mr. RALSTON: This includes small arms and other ammunition. The round figures are as follows:

Small arms	$48,000,000
Gun ammunition	86,000,000
Miscellaneous ammunition	46,000,000

The last item includes dummy bombs, grenades, demolition bombs, guncotton, ammunition instruments and gauges.

Mr. STIRLING: How does the minister explain the large reduction this year?

Mr. RALSTON: Because of the tremendous stocks we have on hand which have not been used.

Mr. STIRLING: Overseas and here?

Mr. RALSTON: Overseas and here in Canada. Perhaps I had better not use the word "tremendous." We have large stocks.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was just going to ask a question along the lines of that asked by the hon. member for Yale. When I was home I met a number of folk who had been employed in an ammunition plant. If the minister thinks he should not answer the question I am going to ask, it will be all right. They told me they had been laid off. I asked why, and the reply was that apparently there is sufficient ammunition on hand to fight a war for ten years more. I have been wondering if that reply given to me is right, and whether this reduction of $91,000,000 is an indication of what is happening in so many plants that heretofore have been engaged in making ammunition of one kind or another. I find that the same thing is taking place in other plants making machine-guns and equipment of that kind, in which there seems to be a general reduction in production, and the reduction in the vote would seem to indicate that. Will there be a continuous reduction in production?

Mr. RALSTON: Production in 1943-44 was so heavy as to cover, I think, practically all the initial requirements; that is, there is a very large stock per gun as an initial provision, and in addition there is provision for reserve and wastage. In 1943-44 we have, to some extent, produced reserves of some types of ammunition, and the production now is for reserve and wastage.

Item agreed to.

8. Armament, including rifles, machine guns, mortars and guns of all descriptions, $104,819,202.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a question to ask on that, but I do not want the minister to answer if he thinks he should not. In Toronto a plant has been manufacturing a very large number of machine guns and other equipment of that nature. It has been rumoured—I am not able to say if it is so—that there has been a large reduction in employment at this plant, which again would indicate that a surplus has been built up and that there may be a continuous reduction in production in the goods covered by this item. Is that correct?

Mr. RALSTON: There has been a reduction in some items but not in others.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would indicate that the information given me was correct.

Mr. RALSTON: The largest reduction is in the larger guns, 25-pounders, howitzers, and so on. There is a considerable increase—I am not giving the committee the amount—in the production of machine-guns. A very large order was placed for a certain type of machine gun. I am not so sure, having regard to recent word that I have received, that that order will be filled, but provision is made for it in case the equipment is needed. As a matter of fact, I think a substitution is being made for guns already on hand. In small arms there is a very slight reduction in rifles, for instance.

Mr. ADAMSON: Can the minister, without any breach of security, give us a rough break-down of small arms production?

Mr. RALSTON: Small arms include pistols, rifles, smoke generators, anti-tank rifles, signal pistols and Piats. Does my hon. friend agree with that pronunciation?

Mr. ADAMSON: I thought the Piats were included in the mortar category.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has there been a steady reduction in the manufacture of machine-guns?

Mr. RALSTON: The provision here is for a considerable increase in the manufacture of one type of machine-gun, a large type. I was saying a moment ago that there is another of that same type of gun on hand, but word which has been received recently makes me think that possibly the amount provided here for the manufacture of a certain number of these guns will be very considerably reduced because of lessened production.

Mr. ADAMSON: What I was wanting to get was an approximate break-down of guns and mortars, two-inch mortars, and so on.

Mr. RALSTON: The small arms are pistols, rifles, smoke generators, anti-tank rifles, signal pistols, Piats. The machine-guns include, light, medium and heavy guns and machine carbines. The light machine-gun is in the general classification of machine-gun, not in the small arms, as I may have said inadvertently. Guns, howitzers and mortars include all types of guns, howitzers and mortars, with or without mountings, and bomb-throwers, predictors—the latter being used in anti-aircraft work.

Item agreed to.

9. M.T. vehicles: trucks, tractors, trailers, tanks, A.F.Vs., and repair parts, $274,068,547.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this item include the vehicular equipment that is piled up and has been piled up in boxes for quite a long time on practically all the sidings all across this province?

Mr. RALSTON: This does not cover those vehicles. Those vehicles are on British order and constitute a reserve which is awaiting shipment. The British keep a very large backlog. I could give my hon. friend the number of motor vehicles at present awaiting shipment on sidings. What I said about a heavy British backlog applies also to their spare parts. We have literally acres of space which are filled with boxes of spare parts which could be used over a period of two years. They are awaiting shipment and will be shipped in due course.

Mr. MacNICOL: Apparently they are motorcars of one kind or another.

Mr. RALSTON: That is right; trucks, and so forth.

Mr. MacNICOL: All that is British equipment?

Mr. RALSTON: What is stored and awaiting shipment is practically all British. I am advised that the proportion of Canadian equipment is extremely small as compared with the British. I understand that they are awaiting special ships to take that particular kind of cargo across.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is the backlog of Canadian vehicular equipment stored?

Mr. RALSTON: We have reserves in England, and, as I say, a small proportion of what my hon. friend sees in the different locations is part of the Canadian backlog. As my hon. friend knows, a very large proportion—I would not say a majority but a substantial proportion—of British units are equipped with Canadian vehicles.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do the words "repair parts" appearing in the item, refer to repair parts in repair plants like the large plant at East London and plants in other parts of the province?

Mr. RALSTON: Is the question whether those spare parts are for use, in those plants?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: As my hon. friend probably knows, there are two classes of spare parts. One is the box or boxes of first year's spares, accompanying the vehicle; the other is the second year's spares, which are stored separately. Those are the spares to which I referred a minute ago when I said we had literally acres of buildings filled with these spares, for the British backlog.

Mr. MacNICOL: By this time next year, if the war continues, they will be very greatly reduced?

Mr. RALSTON: It depends. Do I understand that my hon. friend asks whether or not we can expect that this year the item might be substantially reduced?

Mr. MacNICOL: No. It is reduced this year. The next year.

Mr. RALSTON: It is reduced this year because we did not use, as we expected to do, the initial equipment which was made up. Of course a certain amount of it has been used in manoeuvres and in general training, but I would anticipate that the wastage which we planned for will take place and that next year we shall have to fill in as we did this year, and replace the wastage out of reserve.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Department of National Defence send their orders to the Department of Munitions and Supply, do they not?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As regards obsolescence of equipment, an order goes in and Munitions and Supply issue instructions for a certain quantity; it is being manufactured, but things are moving quite a bit these days, so what happens in order to prevent overproduction of obsolete stuff? What is the procedure?

Mr. RALSTON: That is, if there has been a change of design in the course of manufacture?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Either a change of design or something goes out of use. It is a question of preventing waste.

Mr. RALSTON: We simply have to stop that. If a change of design comes into effect suddenly, what is done is to try to make plans for a change-over to the new design as of a certain date. We did that in connection with tanks, as a matter of fact. So many tanks were to be made of an existing pattern. In the meantime provision was made for the tooling up for a new pattern; that is, for the changes in order to turn out the new pattern; and as of a certain date we started the manufacture of the new type. My hon. friend will understand that when I say "a new type" it does not mean a brand-new turret; but if the ring was larger or the stowage space was changed or the signal equipment was changed, there might also have to be a different foot-plate. In large changes, changes which would be very difficult to make in the course of running a certain number of turrets or a certain number of tanks, it is better to have certainty and run so many rather than to change over all at once.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What I have in mind is this. If an article becomes obsolete, does the department say to Munitions and Supply, "we don't want it any more"? Do you cancel it right away, or what?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think the word "obsolete" is quite a fair term to use in connection with most articles of military equipment which are actually in process of being turned out. There are improvements like the rifle, Marks I, II and III; there are improvements in tanks like Marks I, II and III, but Mark III is not obsolete because of the fact that Mark IV is being turned out; Mark III can be used and is being used; and not only would it be bad economics, but the troops might be left without equipment if we said, "all Mark III is out; start manufacturing Mark IV". There has to be a gradual transition from one to the other.

Mr. ADAMSON: I do not want to hold the committee up unnecessarily, but this is an item of considerably over a quarter of a billion dollars. Could the minister give some idea of the percentage of this that goes in, say, armoured fighting vehicles such as carriers, tanks, and artillery vehicles, dragons, and ordinary M.T.? If the figures are available I think the committee would be interested, provided that the information does not transgress any security regulation.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is asking about armoured vehicles vis-a-vis the ordinary commercial vehicles?

Mr. ADAMSON: Track vehicles and fighting vehicles and purely M.T.

Mr. RALSTON: I would say that the percentage is as three to two—A.F.Vs. three and commercial vehicles, two. When I say commercial vehicles I mean load-carrying vehicles.

Mr. ADAMSON: What the Americans call prime movers and ordinary wheeled vehicles.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not familiar with that term, but load-carrying vehicles vis-a-vis A.F.V. are two to three.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would you call the dragon or the artillery carrier an A.F.V.?

Mr. RALSTON: It is a "B" vehicle in the load-carrying vehicle class, not in the A.F.V.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been in a number of plants lately in which I have seen considerable quantities of valuable and expensive material which now, apparently, is not to be used, and I have been wondering how in the world all this stuff was ordered. Presumably a requisition comes in to somebody in the department who in turn issues an order. On what basis does the man who issues the requisition issue it? From whom does he get the order to issue it? Are his requisitions checked? If so, how do these considerable quantities of material accumulate in plants? I have lately been in a number of plants, and from every plant in Canada, I assume, material is being turned over to this new crown company to sell. Private business could not very well pile up material like that—material which is not going to be used—and remain in business.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me say that generally changes of that kind are due to changes in war conditions which have necessitated changes in the war establishments of equipment. I will give my hon. friend one instance: I dealt with it the other night after I left the house. We had ordered 2,400 of a certain kind of gun. Requisitions were put in and material assembled, and I have no doubt that some machining was done on it. Suddenly we got a wire that a change in war establishment called for something like 366 instead of 2,400. This resulted from conditions which I could explain to my hon. friend and which would be understood readily by him and by the rest of the committee, conditions which had not been foreseen. The war has improved in that particular sphere, and as a result a change has been made. Consequently there has been a cancellatic ., which means, of course, that there will be some wastage in machining and things of that kind. The instance I mention will not be the only one. There are on my desk all the time cancellations which involve changes of this kind. The war was going a certain way, and when certain activities were anticipated, orders were put; otherwise I would have been "on the mat" for not having the equipment. The situation has changed and, as a result, the necessity for equipment, and cancellations have been made. I would like to know that plant. Is my hon. friend sure in that case that the material is not going to be used?

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not care to give the name of the plant because all the information was given me in confidence, and I am not finding fault with it, having had a lot to do with business, so that I appreciate the fact that there will be many changes in design. It would mean, however, that much material purchased would be left lying there. The information given me is that when the new crown company is set up to sell the material—I do not know whether it has been announced in the house that it will be set up—

Mr. RALSTON: The War Assets Corporation?

Mr. MacNICOL: Has it been set up in the house?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think it has.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is going to be, because there was something in the newspaper about it this morning. I presume that company will endeavour to sell this material. From what I saw of this material lying around, when this new company is set up it should at once get possession of warehouses somewhere, so that this material, which is first class, can be stored and sold at some future time.

Mr. RALSTON: What was set up was Crown Assets Allocation Committee, and the handling is done by War Assets Corporation, which is now being set up. That has to do not simply with equipment of properties and things of that kind, and I know that the services are busy dealing with the items referred to by the hon. member for St. Paul's, which can be regarded as completely obsolete. Those are the only items which the services feel justified in discussing with the Crown Assets Allocation Committee at the present time, because we do not know how long the war will last and we do not propose to hand over to War Assets Corporation any of that material until we know that it is obsolete.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does the army buy the planes or gliders that carry paratroopers, or are they controlled by the air force? They are called Hannibals.

Mr. GRAYDON: Referring to the disposal of crown assets by War Assets Corporation, or whatever body will have the disposition of these assets when the war is over, or while it is on, I had two suggestions during the past month from men overseas at the front who are anxious that all the jeeps should not be disposed of before they come back. Apparently there is a considerable demand, which has gone through the forces to a great extent, because if I have had two requests I am sure that members from all parts of Canada must have been showered with similar suggestions. I think the minister ought to give consideration to this particular suggestion, because, after all, there is really nothing too good for those who have been fighting for us, and if they have a desire for some of the equipment we ought, in our arrangements for its disposal, to consider their wishes.

Mr. RALSTON: I will take a note of it.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the same anxiety exhibited by those who want tommyguns?

Item agreed to.

10. Operating cost of mechanical transport: Fuel, maintenance, etc. (not including repair parts), $30,044,487.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to ask a question with reference to gasoline. In visiting camps and plants of one kind or another I have observed what appears to be great wastage in the use of gasoline. For instance, if an officer or a manufacturer wants to get information in Ottawa he jumps into a plane and flies to Ottawa, and that takes a considerable quantity of gasoline. His errand might or might not be of any great importance, necessitating his coming at that speed. He might have taken a train to come here. When you take the aggregate, according to the information given me, the wastage in gasoline is terrific, through the use of aeroplanes going back and forth on journeys that may or may not be of particular consequence.

Mr. RALSTON: Heaven forbid that I should criticize the air force with regard to the use of planes—

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not speaking of the air force but of military officers.

Mr. RALSTON: The air force have been more than considerate to the army and to the minister particularly in connection with the use of planes. I do not know of any cases and I should like to look into the matter, but I may say to my hon. friend that the instructions are definite to officers not to use planes or cars if trains can be used, unless time can be saved which it is necessary to save. I do not know what case my hon. friend refers to, but I do not think they jump into planes every time they want to go anywhere. As I understand it, flying in planes must receive the approval of national defence headquarters except in the case of the minister, who gives his own approval. This is a new one. I expected my hon. friend to complain of the use of military cars, because I hear that all the time; but I did not know that military officers were using planes excessively.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not mean an officer on active service, but an officer stationed at some plant—

Mr. RALSTON: Speaking at some plant?

Mr. MacNICOL: Stationed at some plant. I am not referring to the fighting service.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. Does he mean a civilian officer?

Mr. MacNICOL: I would not know whether he was a civilian or not, but an officer associated with the government in some way in a plant that has to do with the making of planes. He might be an inspector.

Mr. RALSTON: He uses a plane to go from there to somewhere else?

Mr. MacNICOL: He flies here or elsewhere, wherever he may wish to go.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not my family; that is all I can say.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister come to any set routine about accidents between military and civilian vehicles? There used to be a great deal of trouble. Has any formula been worked out? At one time the crown assumed no obligation for an accident. I do not know whether fiat had to be obtained to sue the crown. Has this matter been settled, and, if so, what is the formula?

Mr. RALSTON: Either by passing an order under the War Measures act, or by statute, I do not remember which, that situation was altered last year and provision was made so that action can be brought, as I remember, as if the soldier were the employee of a private corporation. That is the effect of it, but I shall have to look up the act. I am sure, however, the change has been made and we have had the greatest success in the settlement of claims. We have a procedure which is working well whereby meritorious claims are settled without action at all. In England we have a claims commission; in the United States we settle in a similar way, and they have been successful from the point of view both of the claimant and of the department.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask what part of item No. 10 is gasoline?

Mr. RALSTON: It is all gasoline, oil, grease, anti-freeze. That includes not only load-carrying vehicles, but tanks and other armoured fighting vehicles as well. As my hon. friend sees, there is a decrease of about $5,000,000; that is attributable to reduction in the number of vehicles in the home war establishment, and a reduction in operating cost.

Mr. GRAYDON: As I understand it, there is nothing in this item which has to do with overseas operations?

Mr. RALSTON: Eighty per cent is for overseas.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the entire vote for fuel and mechanical transport cost, operating cost, maintenance, et cetera, not including repair parts.

Mr. RALSTON: It includes overseas and all theatres of operation.

Mr. GRAYDON: In that amount how much is for fuel?

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister mentioned water transport. Does he mean assault landing craft and tank landing craft?

Mr. RALSTON: I mean the little boats for water transport. We have one of them at least in Halifax harbour, I think.

Mr. ADAMSON: There was a mail service in Nova Scotia as well?

Mr. RALSTON: There is a boat up the British Columbia coast from Vancouver, too.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes; it does not include the tank landing craft and the assault landing craft?

Mr. RALSTON: It will include that, I think, yes. As a matter of fact, about eighty per cent of this item is for overseas. I would think it would include that.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister said that he would get me some information.

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend ask another question?

Mr. GRAYDON: I asked what part of item No. 10 was fuel?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the information at the moment. As a matter of fact, the gasoline, oil, grease and anti-freeze for overseas are all under a capitation rate with the British government; that is to say, it is all paid on a per diem basis. The cost of fuel gasoline in Canada is something like $4,000,000. Part of the oil is for fuel and part is for lubricating, but I cannot break it down.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not anxious to have any special break-down, but I should like to have some idea as to how much fuel is being used, perhaps for other reasons, as the discussion progresses.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot give my hon. friend what proportion of that big item for overseas is fuel as compared with the other. It is all lumped together.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister has given me sufficient information now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did I understand the minister to say that the amount of fuel, gasoline, is only $4,000,000?

Mr. RALSTON: In Canada, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is not for outside Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: I said the item was $30,000,000 altogether; of that, $24,000,0000 represents estimated overseas expenditures. I cannot break that down for the committee into oil, gasoline and anti-freeze, because that $24,000,000 is based on what we call a capitation rate, which we pay the British government for servicing our troops at so much a day. They provide the oil, lubricants, and everything else. They do not measure out the gallons. They say, "We will provide you with oil, lubricant, anti-freeze and so on at a per diem rate." I have here the amount for gasoline in Canada. It is $4,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, you are getting along very nicely. We have voted almost $1,500,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I am doing the best I can. I do not want to urge the committee in any way, shape or form. However, when I think the time is ripe to call an item I call it.

Mr. MacNICOL: We are doing our best to help you. It struck me that the amount of $4,000,000 was a very small amount if it includes the fighting equipment in Italy and the ships at sea everywhere.

Mr. RALSTON: Not ships.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not the ships; but it includes all the theatres in which our men are fighting?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: It includes the fighting material.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does?

Mr. RALSTON: It is a capitation method.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought it would have been very much more; we have so many troops there.

Mr. RALSTON: The amount of $24,000,000 is all that is chargeable under this head by the British government.

Mr. MacNICOL: That covers the whole business?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: So far as gasoline and oil is concerned with respect to Canada's war effort in the old country and in Europe?

Mr. RALSTON: I have the exact rate and the number of days. It is all charged on a capitation rate.

Item agreed to.

11. Sundries, including printing, stationery, telephones, telegrams and other costs not included in above items, $24,246,593.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have a question I should like to ask and I do not see any other item on which to ask it. What has been the actual cost of recruiting for the army? If we have the actual cost for the army we might break it down per capita. I do not know whether it is figured out on that basis or not. I had in mind recruiting officers, their offices and staffs. I think the whole business has been rather costly to this country for the results obtained. I have in mind recruiting parties that go through the country. They have an officer, an N.C.O. and in some cases two or three C.W.A.C.s. They come into a community and operate dances in it. They hire a hall and pay for an orchestra. In some instances they do not get any recruits. These are actual facts. That, coupled with the coloured posters and the printing, I am sure, costs this country quite an item. I believe there should be a different system worked out, a system which would not be nearly so costly in man or woman hours or dollars and cents per recruit obtained. I should like to have those figures.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the figures of the number of men who are involved. But I wish to say to the committee and to my hon. friend that I do not agree with him for a single instant. I say that it costs this country two or three million dollars every time there is a loan to influence and to persuade the people of Canada to subscribe their money to the loan. I suggest that if it costs $1,500,000 to get 48,000 or 50,000 men to volunteer who may be called upon to give their lives for this country it is worth it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: I say to my hon. friend that I do not think it lies in the mouths of any one of us to say it is too much. It seems to me that we underrate the value of recruiting and the value of volunteering. If we had half the effort put into recruiting that is put into those war loans to get people to subscribe their money for a perfectly good bond, we would have a good deal more recruiting than we have. When I see what is done in the way of war loans—and I do not deprecate it in the slightest, for it is a fine thing to have us stir up the enthusiasm of our people—I do not think too much is done for recruiting. In war loans we lend our army equipment; we do everything we possibly can. What for? In order to influence our citizens to subscribe for a perfectly good bond with the promise of the Dominion of Canada to pay it back in twelve or fifteen years. If we do a little of that sort of thing in order to persuade men to enlist in the army, to give their lives for their country, I do not think parliament should be at all niggardly in the way of voting that money.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What did the minister say the cost was?

Mr. RALSTON: I thought the figure just included the posters, and that sort of thing, but it includes the personnel as well, and the cost in 1942-43 was $1,290,000 in round figures. The cost for the first nine months of the current fiscal year, as it has been figured out here, including personnel, was $1,138,000. That is about half the cost of one war loan.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How many recruits were obtained?

Mr. RALSTON: About forty-eight thousand.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would the minister say why this item is up $10,000,000 this year?

Mr. RALSTON: The increase in the cost of printing and stationery is due to higher per man cost overseas; special training equipment has been increased, and there is a large increase in sundries, due principally to an increase of $6,500,000 for telephone and wireless construction and maintenance, which was formerly included under operating expenses of property. That $6,500,000 is the big item in the increase of $10,000,000.

Mr. LOCKHART: Are these elaborate recruiting huts which are stationed all over the country still in use? There is one near the cenotaph in Ottawa, and I wondered if they were all still in use.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that the one in Ottawa to which my hon. friend refers is the recruiting hut for the C.W.A.C.

Mr. LOCKHART: That has been changed over, has it?

Mr. RALSTON: It has been used for that purpose for the best part of a year, at least.

Mr. LOCKHART: Are they being used for that purpose all over the country?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know; I have not seen any others.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister has not a break-down of the cost of operating those huts?

Mr. RALSTON: No, but I think the cost would come under this item.

Item agreed to.

Sundry services, $22,315,827.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to know from the minister and the committee whether the sub-item should be considered individually, or whether the items will be taken together.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly. There is an experimental station at Suffield, for which $1,916,810 is provided. Internment operations will cost $3,730,717; the inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada, $10,589,000; departmental administration, $1,774,000; dependents' allowance board, $805,300 and dependents' supplementary grants fund—that is, the dependents' board of trustees—$3,500,000. The total is practically the same as last year. It is pointed out to me that these figures are not strictly comparable, due to changes in accounting procedures resulting in different groupings of expenditures in the various years, and this really applies to all the items with which we have deen dealing.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is the experimental station new this year?

Mr. RALSTON: No; that was bought two years ago. This is the operating cost.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This is the first time it has been shown in the item.

Mr. RALSTON: It was included last year in part A—army services.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to ask a few questions with regard to the Suffield experimental station. In the first place, it is presumed to be a permanent station, and the question of building a few cottages as homes for the officers has come up from time to time, but nothing has been done. Then there is a rather more serious problem, in that the block takes in quite an area where the grass is fairly good, while the grass outside that area has been eaten off. A large part of this area is not being used for experimental purposes, according to my information, and those on the borders of the block who are so short of grass find it very exasperating, when they cannot get grass, to see that the grass within this field is not being used. There is also a more serious problem agitating the minds of the people of that locality, that is, the two prairie fires which were started within the area and which spread far beyond it. I personally saw a fire over a distance of forty miles, at least twelve to fifteen miles deep, which burned a lot of valuable grass. These people feel that they should be compensated for the loss of this grass, but month after month goes by and no compensation is given. I should like the minister to offer some indication as to whether their case is in good standing and whether they can hope to get any compensation for their loss.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has spoken of two things. I shall look into the matter of cottages. In point of fact I have not been near Suffield for nearly nine months at least, perhaps longer, but I shall look into that question. When he speaks of compensation on account of fire I presume he means fire which started within the area?

Mr. GERSHAW: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: That matter has not been brought to my attention previously. Certainly it sounds as if it had some merit, but I do not want to say anything definite. I shall look into it personally.

Mr. GERSHAW: It has been before the officers of the department.

Mr. RALSTON: There must be some "catch" in it that I do not know about, but I shall look into it personally.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What would be covered in the last item of $3,500,000 for the dependents' supplementary grant fund?

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

The CHAIRMAN: I asked the minister and the committee whether these subdivisions of the last item should be discussed separately or all together.

Mr. RALSTON: I have read all the items and, as I understand it, hon. members are asking questions about them. I am perfectly satisfied with that procedure. The item of $3,500,000 is to provide for the amounts to be paid out by the dependents' board of trustees by way of supplementary grants. As I said, this is a round figure. The amount paid out last year was $1,285,000.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I just wondered if it came under the trustees.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Under what section could I discuss the matter of proving ranges? I have been trying to find the appropriate item, though I suppose I could have asked the question at almost any time.

Mr. RALSTON: I think that would come under the inspection board, which is included in this item.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then what will be done in cases where damage is being done to property in close proximity to these ranges? Has any policy been laid down? There is a matter I want to take up seriously in that connection, and I should like a little guidance on it.

Mr. RALSTON: Another hon. member asked me the same thing. Is my hon. friend talking about the proving range near Hamilton?

Mr. LOCKHART: No, it is near St. Catharines.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will take it up with me I shall be very glad to look into it. As a matter of fact, I have not dealt with any of these cases at all; they have been dealt with by the inspection board. Any case that is thought necessary to be referred to the department comes to the deputy minister, but I shall look into anything my hon. friend cares to take up with me. Damage has been done by what; by concussion?

Mr. LOCKHART: Yes, damage to nearby property by the concussion.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall look into it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister will agree that we have made pretty good progress on his estimates to-night. A number of questions may arise to-morrow, as we finish with his department, but I should like to make a suggestion which may facilitate the discussion and bring it to an end more quickly. Would he mind giving a statement in a simplified form as to how many N.R.M.A. men there are in the Canadian army. I have listened to my hon. friend give details of the duties performed by these men, but I am not just clear as to the actual total.

Mr. RALSTON: I will make a guess now which I will confirm later. There are between 70,000 and 73,000; I think I said over 70,000 before, but I will confirm that. The committee does not want to pass this item to-night?

Mr. GRAYDON: I think not. We have made pretty good progress. Do not kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE PRIME MINISTER AND THE PREMIER OF ONTARIO

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I notice that Premier Drew has tabled certain correspondence which has taken place between himself and myself respecting the wartime alcoholic beverages order. I should like to table the correspondence in this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is right?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know that there is any difference between us in the correspondence.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

SOCIAL SECURITY—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Queens) moved:

That the first report of the special committee on social security, presented to the house on the 24th instant, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

WAR EXPENDITURES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton) moved:

That the first report of the special committee on war expenditures, presented to the house on the 24th instant, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHWEST STAGING ROUTE

EDMONTON TO ALASKA—AERODROMES AND INTERMEDIARY FIELDS—PERMANENT FACILITIES OR IMPROVEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement regarding that series of airports from Edmonton to Alaska known as the northwest staging route.

One of Canada's most important airways is the northwest staging route, composed of a chain of main aerodromes, with intermediary fields, extending from Edmonton to Alaska. Pioneering for this airway was carried out by Canadian bush pilots, who first operated in that area, in seaplanes, in the early twenties.

In 1935, a survey of several alternate routes to the Yukon and Alaska was made by the Department of Transport of Canada, and the route from Edmonton via Fort Nelson and Whitehorse was chosen as the most favourable. Detailed engineering work was authorized in 1939 for aerodromes at Grande Prairie, Fort St. John, Fort Nelson, Watson Lake and Whitehorse.

The initial development called for landing strips 3,000 feet in length by 500 feet in width, with provision for suitable future extension for a full size modern airport. Radio range stations were also located, to provide a radio beam, which is an essential part of any modern airway. Survey parties were still in the field at the outbreak of war, and some consideration was given to abandoning the project, but the government decided to expedite its completion, a decision which has been fully justified by subsequent events.

Thus Canada was able to provide the United States, when that country entered the war in December, 1941, with an airway to Alaska removed from the Pacific coast, relatively free from danger of enemy attack, and connected with air and ground communication networks at Edmonton and Vancouver.

The Canada-United States permanent joint board on defence, meeting in Victoria, B.C., on November 13, 1940, decided to recommend to its respective governments that the air route from Edmonton to Fairbanks, Alaska, be developed on the basis of the plans then being carried out by the Canadian government. A month later, funds were released for the completed project, the Canadian government undertaking the work at its sole expense. Firm orders for necessary equipment, and contracts for the work itself, were placed without delay.

The rapid construction of facilities at Fort Nelson and Watson Lake involved movements of supplies and equipment for both airports through very difficult country, a distance of hundreds of miles. By the beginning of September, 1941, seven months after contracts were authorized, and three months before the United States entered the war, the airway from Edmonton to Whitehorse was usable by daylight. By the end of 1941, radio range stations had been built, and the radio beam was in operation from Edmonton to the Alaska boundary.

Later, the United States decided to build the Alaska highway, following the general route of the airway, and connecting the main landing fields along the airway. The fact that the airway was then operating greatly facilitated the construction of the highway, and, similarly, the existence of the highway has greatly aided the operation of the airway. The two projects, one being carried out by Canada, and the other by the United States, are complementary to each other.

While the Canadian airway facilities were in operation at the time of Pearl Harbor, it soon became apparent that war traffic would necessitate substantial additions to the original programme, involving longer landing strips, improved hangar facilities, and extensive living and office accommodation. The need for the larger project arose almost entirely out of the requirements of the United States military forces.

When the United States proposals for more extensive facilities were under discussion in the early months of 1942, the Canadian government informed the United States government that it felt Canada should properly pay for the construction of new landing strips, or other permanent works of continuing value to the airway, and that the United States should pay for such additional facilities as were required by the United States forces, over and above Canadian standards and requirements.

Recently, the Canadian government has reviewed the probable future requirements of air transport in this area, and has come to the conclusion that the standards required for a permanent installation are very substantially above those first considered necessary. In consequence the Canadian government has recently informed the United States government that it will not expect payment from the United States government for the construction of any permanent facilities or improvements, which have been carried out by the Canadian government at the request of the government of the United States, and for the account of the latter government. Further it has been decided that the Canadian government will reimburse the United States government for its expenditures on construction of a permanent nature, carried out and paid for by the United States government, on air routes in this area.

This decision applies to all air fields on the northwest staging route, including work in the 1943 construction programme undertaken by the United States government, using its own contractors and its own labour. Early in 1943, it was decided that to complete the project in a manner that would satisfy United States requirements, both equipment and labour from the United States would be needed.

The decision to pay the United States for all permanent improvements built by that government also applies to the fields and landing strips on the Mackenzie River route, and all other airfields, landing strips, and permanent air route facilities constructed by the United States government in northwest Canada, in accordance with arrangements made from time to time, between the two governments, for the joint defence of this continent.

The total cost to the Canadian government of the staging route from Edmonton to Alaska will be about forty-six million dollars. In addition, other war-time development for aerodromes in the Canadian northwest cost about eight million dollars, of which six million dollars covers the cost of flight strips along the Alaska highway, and two million dollars covers the cost of flight strips along the Mackenzie River route. Canada has also spent about four and a half million dollars, during the past two years, on improvements to aerodromes and airways from the United States border to Edmonton; this on three airways, one passing through Kamloops and Prince George, another through Lethbridge, and a third through Regina.

In September, 1942, control of the aerodromes along the northwest staging route was transferred from the Department of Transport to the R.C.A.F., and the latter now operates the chain of airports, from the headquarters of the northwest staging route at Edmonton. The Department of Transport continues to provide meteorological services, and operates and maintains the radio range stations and certain communication facilities. The Department of Transport engineers also coordinate any new work, and for this purpose continue to be stationed at each aerodrome along the route. The control towers of the airway are staffed by R.C.A.F., which force is responsible for maintenance and repair work at all aerodromes, including snow removal. The R.C.A.F. is solely responsible for security, and operates a system of airway traffic control for all aircraft using this route.

In brief, the northwest staging route is Canadian property, owned and operated by the Canadian government. It was built and developed by Canada, with the cooperation of the United States army engineers and workmen. The cost of the project is to be borne wholly by the government of Canada. The total cost of the northwest staging route alone up to the end of 1943, will be about forty-six million dollars, while the total cost of war-time development of the airways of the Canadian northwest will be about $58,500,000.

The route is the main artery for air traffic between the United States and Alaska, and beyond Alaska to northeastern Asia. Its aerodromes, hangars and communications facilities are suitable to accommodate the maximum amount of traffic that can be foreseen at this time. The route is one of the most important in the world, both in relation to the war against Japan and, subsequently, as part of an international air route.

In arranging for the post-war use of the northwest staging route, the government of Canada will pursue a liberal policy of cooperation with other nations. We hope that the right to use the route will become part of a general scheme of international cooperation in air transport matters, which will provide greater freedom of movement of aircraft, and of air traffic, within a suitable international framework.

It is my intention to give hon. members a statement of Canadian policy with regard to such an international development, and this at an early date.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, February 28, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Sundry services, $22,315,827.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few cases to bring to the attention of the committee and of the minister. If he can answer now, I shall be thankful to him; if he cannot answer me now, I hope that he will do so at the earliest possible opportunity.

I have the case of a young man from the military district of Toronto; the Toronto file is T-30-S-521 (Res.) It is the case of a young artist who joined the militia before the war and got his commission by working his way up from the ranks. He offered his services in the active army in September 1939, being then under thirty years of age. He was not needed then; he was told that he would be called when needed. He was called in 1943, being then thirty-two. After being wrongly drafted as a private he protested, in order to be given his rank as an officer, under king's regulations; he was discharged as a veteran after ten days of active service. He bought his uniform and incurred other expenses. He was ordered to Three Rivers to follow an officers' course, and then was ordered back to his military district for disposal because he was then considered too old for overseas duty as an officer. He was then redrafted for service overseas as a private. I would ask the minister to look into this case and decide whether Major General Potts has been fair to this man.

There is another case that will perhaps surprise the minister; I refer to G-49086, who is in the "clink" at Petawawa. He deserted the first time and was sentenced to eight months, and that was the knowledge he had of the army; it is far from surprising that he jumped again, to use the language of the camp, for twenty-six days, whereupon he was sentenced to two years in the "clink". This again seems to me an exaggerated punishment. What is the use of keeping a man for two years in the "clink" for jumping only twenty-six days? Here is the case of another fellow who is now at Longueuil. He is in the "clink" too. He complains of bad treatment and the answer that is given to the department in the matter is that everything is rose-pink. He is not well. He underwent a medical examination. His number is D-635718. I was told by someone in the department that unless authority were given by that man it would not be possible to have a copy of the medical report that was made in his case. I prepared a draft letter which I sent to his brother to be signed by him, the soldier. The brother went to the place of detention but was not admitted to see him. This is a case where we should have a copy of that medical examination with the signature of the man concerned, but the brother cannot reach him to get that signature. This again I bring to the attention of the minister as an instance of abuse.

There are men in the ordnance corps who are qualified mechanics and who receive supplementary pay of 25, 50 and 75 cents. They work at their own trade and are therefore helpful in repairing trucks and all that. But in Newfoundland, and I presume it is the same in other places, the practice has started of pushing aside the older men who have done their work for years and who are skilled. They know their trade well and are thoroughly experienced but they have to give way to new men and they are returned to the ranks. If the army has too many mechanics, let the minister say so. They are needed everywhere. They are needed in the making of munitions and arms in civilian life, and there is plenty of room for them.

Here again it is wrong to keep in the army as a foot private a man who is skilled and who can render service to the army, but who is unable to do so because of some decision made by the commanding officer.

With regard to the guards at Valcartier and St. Malo, there are guard rooms at the arsenals, and those are the only two places in the whole country which are not heated. The winter is not over yet and I would ask the minister to be kind enough to look into this matter. He will appreciate the grounds of my complaint.

Hon. gentlemen who are listening to me now probably know that the regulations of the civil service do not apply to the army and what was said by the Minister of Labour concerning the draftees who have not undergone any training yet, the number, and so on, does not apply to the draftees who had some previous training even for a month, and if the number of experienced men in the forest is not large enough I could give the Minister of Labour quite a number of names of good lumberjacks who are retained in the army and are not working in the forest.

You know very well, Mr. Chairman, that our task here is not always pleasant. It was far from pleasant for me to rise in my place to-day and speak of these cases, but if we want reform we must facilitate the work of the government by pointing out what is wrong so that there may be redress. There are two schools of thought in this country, one of them comprising absentee voters and the knights of silence, and for those people silence is golden. So far as they are concerned, members of parliament should not have the right to voice the grievances either of their constituents or of any citizen who may come to them in all confidence seeking the redress of any wrong. That is one point of view.

The other point of view is that of other members of parliament, who are listening to their electors, to the difficulties that they have, who observe the effect of the application of the wrong, and who do their best to improve the condition of everyone as much as it is humanly possible to do. We are rewarded. I hold in my hand the file of P-100585, H-25405, F-2505. This is the file of a young man who suffered from sinus trouble. He was classified category "A" before leaving for England. When his father wrote to me about him I told him to obtain sworn certificates from the specialists who had examined him. He obtained three certificates from specialists attached to the Quebec hospital. I sent them to the Department of National Defence. The certificates were sent to England and the man has come back. I do not complain to the minister about that. The right thing has been done, but I do complain about the carelessness of the medical doctors who classified that man as category "A" when he should have been category "E". It is clear the country has paid for the trip of that man overseas, for his return, for his care in the hospitals there. We need reform. When I ask for reform it is not a matter of personal votes; it is not a matter of being in the limelight; it is not a matter of having a grudge against anybody. It is a question of fulfilling a sacred duty, not only to my constituents but to any citizen of this country who comes for help.

Having said that I shall add some more. Here is the case of a young man—I have not his regimental number, but I have his registry number F-144428. He is a fine looking fellow but is in delicate health. The army doctors did not pay any attention to the medical certificates of the family doctors. He went to the army, contracted pneumonia, was looked after in a civilian hospital and then returned to the camp. He remained in cold quarters, was very ill and finally he was discharged. I hope the minister will see to it that definite instructions are given to the army doctors to pay some attention to the certificates, especially when they are sworn certificates, from family doctors. Those certificates should be and must be most valuable to the army medical corps as far as the medical history of any recruit is concerned.

I was greatly surprised this morning to read in Hansard what the hon. member for Port-neuf (Mr. Gauthier) said about his humility. I wonder about his humility, when I consider that he did nothing for the recruits while he was in the army. If I judge correctly what he said, after he resigned as captain a little more than a year ago he started to look after cases of a type similar to those that I have already mentioned in the house. If his efforts were rewarded by the Department of National Defence, was it not precisely on account of what members other than those of his group had done to help the physically unfit in the army? While they were busy collecting funds for the Bloc Populaire on St. James street, we were doing our duty here as members of parliament, and we were fighting the cause of the privates in the army. While they were getting funds to pay for blackmail that was coming from a rascal who is their mouthpiece and their loud speaker,—a man whom I kicked out of my office and who is practising blackmail to a high degree in their paper, who was so bad that once he was banging the door of my office in the house, so much so that I had to call a constable of the house to take him to the press gallery—we were doing our duty towards the privates in the army. That is the kind of man who teaches the people how to behave, who passes judgment on the members of parliament. It is time that the readers of Le Devoir knew who is the parliamentary correspondent of that paper, and that I kicked him out of my office for cause. I tell you, sir, that there is no inducement, no blackmail, no brutal force which will persuade me to change the kind of work that I am doing for the underdog in this house.

Mr. RALSTON: In the first place may I point out to the committee that I thought when the hon. member rose he was speaking of cases under the item which we are considering here, such as the dependents' allowance item. The cases he has referred to are all medical cases which come under item 5. In view of the fact that the hon. member had started on them I did not interrupt. I am as anxious as anybody to get on with the business, but I am just as anxious to see to it that the reform which my hon. friend suggests is effected, if reform is needed. He spoke of the case of an artist. I have no particulars with regard to that, but I shall look into it. He spoke of a man in Petawawa who had been a deserter, a man who was first sentenced to eight months and afterwards to two years. He suggested that the punishment was too heavy. I say to him in the first place that the sentence is not determined with regard to the individual alone. Punishment has to be exemplary as well as disciplinary. According to the hon. member's statement, that man was guilty of two instances of desertion. Petawawa camp contains thousands of men, and it is necessary that substantial punishment be meted out. That does not mean that there is no opportunity for remission of the punishment in the case of good behaviour.

The hon. member referred to the case of the brother of a man in Longueuil. He said the brother was refused admission to secure the signature to a letter authorizing the hon. member to get access to medical documents. I say to the hon. member that rules with regard to detention camps are necessary, and provision is made as to when visitors are allowed. We do not allow anyone to go and see those who are in detention, whenever they like. That is so even in institutions of a very much gentler type such as hospitals; it is the same, and enforced much more rigorously, in regard to those who are under detention. If the hon. member desires to have any communication sent to this man, or to arrange that the brother may see him, I shall certainly see that the opportunity is afforded.

The hon. member spoke of the case of a man who was a qualified mechanic and who, he said, was returned to the ranks. I take it that the man was in the ranks from the start, and that my hon. friend was referring to the fact that he was getting a mechanic's pay for a while, and was then cut off the mechanic's pay because there was no employment for him as such. May I tell the hon. member that we pay mechanic's pay to the full number of mechanics allowed for in the establishment. In addition there is a quota for mechanics, even though they are not provided for in the establishment, under which so many men may be paid mechanic's pay, in order to encourage men to keep up their training in mechanical work, as the hon. member suggests. I presume the suggestion of the hon. member is that this man should have been returned to civil life the moment he could no longer be employed as a mechanic. That is not the practice. He may be needed as a mechanic at any time, and when he is so needed he will be put at the work of a mechanic and given the pay of a mechanic; and if he comes within the quota he can be given a mechanic's pay even though there is no room in the establishment for him.

Then the hon. member spoke of a man with sinus trouble who was sent overseas. I am not a medical man; I do not know anything about sinus or these other diseases. I understand that this boy was sent overseas, that later representations were made as to his sinus trouble, and according to the hon. member he was sent back. Whether he came back as a result of the sinus trouble I do not know, but I understand that it is quite possible for a man with sinus trouble to have it apparently completely cured so that he may be placed in category "A" and considered fit for overseas service, and that later a situation may arise in which the sinus trouble flares up again, in which event he may be considered unfit for service and returned to Canada. That may be the explanation in the case mentioned by the hon. member. I have not been given the number of that man, but I shall get it from the hon. gentleman and look up the case.

Then the hon. member said no attention was paid to the certificates of civilian doctors. I say to him that the army doctors do examine the certificates of civilian doctors, but after all, the army doctors are responsible for the examination and it would not do for them to say, "We took the certificate of a civilian doctor." They are there to conduct these examinations; and in carrying out their responsibility I take it that they accepted this man who later was discharged, as the hon. member says, after he contracted a cold while at camp.

I think those are the cases to which the hon. gentleman referred. In this same connection, since he discussed medical matters, I want to deal with just one other matter he mentioned a day or two ago. He made what I considered to be an entirely unjustified attack on a very efficient officer and on the officers of this department as well, when he referred to the medical officer of military district No. 5 and suggested that he was kept there because of political considerations. The service of the officer in question dates from November 1, 1920, when he was appointed a provisional lieutenant. He became a lieutenant on December 1, 1922, a captain on May 1, 1925, and a major on October 18, 1935. In August, 1938, five years ago and a year before the war, he was recommended by the district officer commanding military district No. 5 for appointment as deputy district medical officer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was he a permanent officer?

Mr. RALSTON: No; he was in the militia at the time, I understand. The report on him reads:

> Major J. Mercier is an active officer, popular with all the other medical officers. He takes a keen interest in the training of the non-permanent active militia and has a valuable experience in administrative work in military hospitals, having been employed as acting officer in command, Quebec military hospital, for six months in 1937-38. His service during the present war dates from the 2nd September, 1939.

[Mr. Ralston.]

In December, 1939, it was recommended that he be appointed district medical officer, effective 8th January, 1940. The report I have on him is that he is spoken of very highly by the district officer commanding district No. 5. There is no suggestion anywhere that his appointment was influenced in any way, or that his retention in his position is influenced in any way by political considerations of any kind, nor is there any suggestion that his work has been affected by political considerations. I may add that the director general of medical services has always held a high opinion of the services of this officer. I happen to know the officer in question, as a matter of fact; I met him on one or two occasions while on inspection trips to Quebec, and I want to pay tribute to Lieutenant-Colonel Mercier as a conscientious, efficient and loyal officer, absolutely detached in his work and doing everything possible for the good of the services, with no other motive whatever in mind.

There is another matter on which I may speak, since I am dealing with the remarks of the hon. member. The other day he asked me to give him the reference to the Army Act which was included in order in council P.C. 9372 of December 7, 1943, and any other amendments to the order in council. The part of the Army Act to which he refers is section 176, which lists all persons subject to military law as soldiers and to whom the Army Act applies. Among those persons described in subsection 10 of the order in council are the following:

> All persons not otherwise subject to military law who are followers or accompany His Majesty's troops, or any portion thereof, when employed on active service; subject to this qualification that, where any such persons are employed by or are followers of, or accompany any portion of, His Majesty's forces, consisting partly of His Majesty's Indian forces subject to Burma military law, and such persons are native of India or, as the case may be, natives of Burma, they shall be subject to Indian military law or, as the case may be, to Burma military law.

The reference to that section is for the purpose of indicating that persons who are called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act and have not yet been enlisted are, for the time being, subject to military law; and particularly included as persons not otherwise subject to military law are followers of or those accompanying His Majesty's troops. The hon. member asked the effect of this amendment. I endeavoured to point out while he was speaking—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister say something more about that? I found it very difficult to follow. What is the subject matter?

Mr. RALSTON: The subject matter is the National Resources Mobilization Act and regulations, and the question is: what do you do with a man, and under whose jurisdiction is he, when he has reported for training but has not been actually sworn in. For the time being he is made subject to military law by this section, by the incorporation of a reference to the Army Act. The effect of the amendment to which the hon. member referred is very slight, as I endeavoured to point out. It is merely to delete the word "training" in two places in section 26 of order in council P.C. 7989, so that the references therein to training centres are made to apply to centres generally. The inclusion of that paragraph gives the army control of the individual during the time he is at a military establishment pending enrolment or rejection.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, I should like to put on record the answers to some inquiries which have been made, and which I think should be answered before we conclude the discussion of these estimates. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) asked that we put on record a table similar to the one put on record last year, showing the rates of pay in the corresponding ranks of the army, navy and air force. I have had a copy prepared and, with the consent of the committee, I would ask that it be placed on Hansard. It is useful for the purpose of reference, because there are changes from year to year.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee it may be placed on the record.

The statement follows:

DEPENDENTS' ALLOWANCE

Dependents' Allowance for the three Services is the same. Payable on a monthly basis the allowance to wife of a W.O.I and similar rank in the Navy is $42.20 per month. From W.O.II to Private, and corresponding ranks in the Navy and Air Force, the allowance is $37.20 per month. Allowances for children is the same for all three Services—First child $13.92 per month, 2nd child $12.00 per month, 3rd child $10.00 per month, 4th, 5th and 6th child $8.00 each per month.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does that take in members of the C.W.A.C.?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think it does, but I can have that information looked up. As the hon. member knows, they receive eighty per cent of the pay received by the men.

A question was asked by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) as to the facilities for military hospitals in Canada. He asked how many cases are being dealt with under the army system, and the facilities for increase. If the committee will permit, I shall file a list of the military hospitals in Canada. I am not filing a list of the individual bed capacity. I am saying to the committee however that the aggregate bed capacity is about 12,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a ratio of about five per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: About six per cent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is exclusive of the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. This paragraph will be noted:

Recent surveys of several camps and training centres in Canada have been undertaken to find where hospital bed space could most satisfactorily be provided in case the existing resources should become overtaxed. The five casualty retraining centres presently being developed can quickly and easily be taken into hospital accommodation if that should become necessary and the soldiers under casualty retraining moved to other quarters which can be made available. Sufficient hospital facilities can be made available for any likely need.

The detailed answer to the question of the hon. member for Yorkton, which with unanimous consent will be placed on Hansard, is as follows:

GS-SD3-258
29 Feb. 44

Of course that is hospital accommodation for those in the army. The accommodation for those discharged is provided by the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I thank the minister for his answer.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Yorkton referred to another matter, and I mention it now only because it occasioned some public interest, and I do not wish the record to remain as it is without indicating what the facts were. This referred to a man who had been prosecuted in Montreal for appearing in uniform.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was a case of the kind in Halifax, was there not?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall not go into the matter extensively, except to say that the record shows the man enlisted a first time and, upon discharge, received the $35 clothing allowance for which provision was then made. He enlisted again, and had sixteen months' overseas service. He was discharged again and received $65 clothing allowance. When discharged in January, 1944, he was wearing civilian clothes and had actually turned in his uniform. When arrested he was wearing army battle dress, which had been made for him by some local firm and decorated with R.A.F. wings, cadet shoulder badges, and signal corps overseas patches. So that there was not much he had missed. He had represented himself as being overseas for four years, and being in Canada to take an officer's training course. Actually he had been overseas sixteen months, and of course he was not in Canada to take a course. He is reported to have been charged by the military authorities on two different occasions with the impersonation of warrant officers, while in civilian clothes, and several other minor charges were laid against him. This, of course, was a civilian case. The hon. member for Yorkton was attracted by the newspaper publicity which was given, in which it was suggested that this was a case in which a man who had been a soldier was being persecuted by the civilian authorities. Of course the prosecution was not brought by the army at all; it was brought by the civilian authorities.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to a man in Camp Borden whose case was being dealt with by the provincial police. I believe the hon. member felt that the soldier in question was being harshly treated. I suggested at the time that it sounded to me as if the charge would be one of theft under the criminal code. I find that that is so. The charge was that he did on or about January 14, 1944, steal one 38-calibre Smith and Wesson revolver, the property of the Department of National Defence. The case was investigated and the charge was laid by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. A military charge by court-martial might have been made against him. But when a case is referred to the R.C.M.P. and they intimate a desire to prosecute, it is customary to leave it to them if the offence is civil. That principle is recognized in the manual of military law. I believe I gave the committee my judgment with regard to that principle the other night.

The paragraph in the manual of military law is:

> But in the United Kingdom, in the dominions, and in most of the colonies, where there are regular civil courts close by, it is, as a general rule, desirable to try by a civil court a civil offence committed by a person subject to military law if the offence is one which relates to the property or person of a civilian, or if the civil authorities intimate a desire to bring the case before a civil court.

In this case, as a matter of fact, the R.C.M.P. did not refer the case to the military authorities. If they had done so, and intimated the desire to bring the case before the civil courts, the suggestion would have been concurred in, because the investigation had been handled by the R.C.M.P. and they had obtained the evidence. The case had a definite civil aspect. On the hearing of this charge, as on the hearing of any other criminal charge, the witnesses, whether they be civilian or members of the armed forces, are represented to the civil authorities, and attend and give evidence, and can be compelled to do so.

In this instance the hon. member indicated he did not see any officer present. My information is that the officer of Corporal Pavlov namely, Lieutenant J. A. McPhail, did attend at the trial. Under the provisions of K.R. & O. 484, it is provided that in case of a civil offence, where a trial takes place anywhere in the vicinity of where a man's unit is situated, the commanding officer shall detail an officer to attend. The officer does not attend for the purpose of defending the man, but rather attends for the purpose of giving the court all possible information. I believe the practice is that officers who attend help to see to it that the man is informed of what his rights are. I know the provisions of K.R. & O. are such that an officer is forbidden, for instance, to give any information with regard to minor offences which an accused might have committed, because such information might prejudice his case. That information is regarded as privileged.

It is not the policy to employ civil counsel at the expense of the public for a soldier charged with committing a civil offence, but my information is that this corporal was defended by a civilian lawyer whom he himself employed. No request was made by him for assistance from his commanding officer to obtain counsel.

The hon. member for Yale asked with regard to men who had taken an army course, and who had either been selected or not been selected as potential officer material. I indicated to him that men who were not selected as potential officer material were informed of the fact, but were considered for technical or specialist training, and would be given the opportunity to take that training if possible. I said I did not find in the regulations the same provision with respect to those who were selected. I find that the regulation has been amended. I cannot tell my hon. friend whether I was reading the amended regulation or not. In the statement that was given me I find that that phrase was omitted. It is the fact that those who are selected may be considered for technical or specialist training in such work as surveys, radio direction finding, signals, et cetera, and they will be given the opportunity, if selected, of commencing or continuing such training. I said that I did not find that in the statement I read to my hon. friend, but it is there.

Mr. STIRLING: That covers army training courses Nos. 1 and 2?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) also asked for a breakdown by districts of deserters. I will put it on the record:

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked me with regard to the Edmundston training centre. I told him I did not think it had been closed, and I was correct in that. It was reduced from a two-company training centre, with a capacity of 500, to a one-company with a capacity of 250 in October, 1943, as part of the general reorganization.

Somebody asked last night in regard to dental treatment accorded to officers vis-à-vis other ranks. The particular question was whether porcelain inlays were provided. My information is that where porcelain inlays are indicated the standard treatment in the army is to use synthetic porcelain, which is what is generally used in civilian practice. I also confirm what I said last night, that there is no difference between the treatment given to officers and to other ranks. In certain cases alternative treatment is obtainable, but that is open to all ranks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up much time on these estimates and I do not intend to do so at this stage, but there are a few inquiries I want to make. First, what steps are being taken by the medical services of the army to see that such an occurrence as took place last autumn in the city of Fredericton is not repeated? I do not intend to go over that particular case again. The damage has been done; the man is dead; he left no dependents, and it would not do any good to rake up the situation to-day. It would only harrow the feelings of his relatives. But if nothing better comes out of it than that there has been a reorganization of the medical services in connection with the induction of volunteers and draftees into the army at Fredericton, I shall have been at least in some degree rewarded for the trouble I took in connection with this matter. The fact of the matter is, I think, that there were not sufficient medical men on duty, and I have grave doubts as to the calibre of some of those who were there. I should like the minister to tell me whether the position has been corrected so that there is no possibility whatever of any repetition of what I consider—I was going to say gross negligence, but I will not use that term; I will say negligence in connection with the reception of men into the army at Fredericton. If the minister is not able to answer to-day he can do so at a later stage.

The second inquiry I desire to make of the minister is in connection with Camp Sussex. This is an old military camp in New Brunswick. It has been in the ownership and operation of the department for annual drill and that sort of thing since the days of Sir George Foster, which go back prior to 1896. Sir George Foster was member for Kings when the camp was established. When this war came on, Camp Sussex, of course, was greatly extended and over a period of time a large number of troops were stationed there. It was used as a depot, I suppose, for the eastern command, where the men would be readily available to be sent here, there and everywhere in case of invasion, and also could be used as an embarkation point for overseas. It served a useful purpose. In recent months the army has been pretty well evacuated from Sussex; I understand that there have been very few troops there. My attention was called to an article in a Saint John morning paper of yesterday in which it is stated that the army is starting up a new officers' school at Camp Sussex. I thought we had a great many of these schools all over the country and that some of them were being closed. It is information I am seeking. It may be of interest to hon. members to know that the newspaper in question states that Brigadier Gregg, sergeant-at-arms of this house, is to be the commander of that school, which so far as I am concerned is quite all right.

The third question I desire to ask, and I am curious that it has not been asked before, arises out of the enlistment of so many women in the armed forces, in the army, the navy and the air force. It seems to me that the custom has grown up, in Ottawa at all events and in other centres, of buying at the public expense some of the largest and most expensive residences in the city for barracks for these young ladies, on the theory, I suppose, that nothing is too good for the Waacs or the Wrens or the Waves or the Spars, or whatever they may be called. But it is a curious policy, it seems to me, for the government to make capital expenditures of that kind on buildings which cannot possibly be of any great benefit to the country in the post-war period. My suggestion to the minister is that if these quarters are required, and I quite agree that quarters, and respectable quarters are required, they should be taken over under the authority of the government for the duration only, and compensation paid. The country should not have loaded on it these expensive homes at high prices. That is a policy that has always struck me as being, shall I say, extravagant. We have had the spectacle of the winter club at Winnipeg being taken over by one branch of the service. We had the spectacle of a life insurance company in Montreal being bailed out in connection with the Winter club there when the government took over a bankrupt institution and saved the bondholders from loss, when all the government had to do was to say they wanted the Winter club in Montreal and take it over, pay compensation for it and hand it back to the owners when the war was over. That, it seems to me, would have been business, but instead of that we have these expensive buildings on Peel street, Montreal, for instance. I might tell the minister that a very prominent business man and, I think a friend of his, was shocked about that transaction.

I can name a number of others of the same kind. There is an ancient place of residence in Halifax that the minister and I and his associates know well, which forty odd years ago was a boarding house called Hillside Hall. It must be at least a hundred years old. It was taken over by one of the army services. If it was necessary to have that building, why was it purchased? Why was it not just rented for the duration, and then handed back? But now we are to have Hillside Hall off the assessment rolls of Halifax, just as is happening with properties here at Ottawa and elsewhere that have been taken over by the government. That policy is bad policy, I suggest to the minister, and there ought to be some explanation of why such a policy is pursued. I am not suggesting that these young women, many of whom, indeed all of whom, come from good homes, do not need good barrack room and living conditions. But I might contrast what is being done for them with what I understand is the plight of thirty young men, every one of whom is a potential flying officer now under training in this city at either Rockcliffe or Uplands—I am not sure which—for whom no barrack room has been provided. This is not in the minister's department but in that of his colleague.

Mr. RALSTON: I have got 900 of them in Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For whom no barrack room is provided?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is a sad situation. I do not know what the minister is going to do about it. These young men should not be brought here if you have not proper living accommodation for them.

Mr. RALSTON: We have to have them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will tell the minister what happens in this case. These young men, all of whom of course are volunteers, get the per diem allowance which every enlisted man receives. There is no place for them to eat or sleep, as there should be under the regulations and in accordance with what this country is supposed to provide, but they have a sustenance allowance of $1.25. How can any respectable young man live in Ottawa and pay for a room and three square meals a day on $1.25? It just cannot be done. What is the result? One of these lads told me personally that the allowance is so small that for the last four days in the month they have one meal a day, and they double up, perhaps treble up, in their rooms. I do not think that that is creditable—really I don't.

Mr. RALSTON: This is the air force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the air force; but I am satisfied from what the minister said that there must be conditions of the kind in the army.

Mr. RALSTON: None of my officers has told me that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps the minister will find out if he makes inquiries. This may have a reecho from some person who is in that condition. I am not apologizing for bringing the matter forward, because I was shocked to find that a fine young man, a potential flying officer, one who will probably do a grand job, who perhaps is going to give his life for this country, is asked to live on $1.25 a day and find board and lodging in Ottawa. It just cannot be done. I verified the facts through the minister himself, and he did not offer any explanation. I am going to call public attention to these conditions; for I know that the people of Canada, who give so willingly in taxation and in loans, do not want this sort of thing to happen. I am not finding fault, but somebody is responsible. I do not suggest for a minute that the minister is; probably he did not hear of it until I called his attention to it, but somebody down below knew about it and has not corrected it. I think I know what the answer is, that this is the standard allowance for the living out ration—I do not know whether I am using the right term—

Mr. RALSTON: Subsistence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The subsistence allowance for living out. A boy might, although I doubt it, get along on $1.25 a day in a country town, but he could not get along on it in Fredericton or in Ottawa and live respectably. That is that; I am not going to say any more about it.

The other matter I have is a case which has puzzled me in connection with the dependents' allowance, and I am not sure that I should take up time to deal with an individual case; it might be better for me to go to the dependents' allowance board, as has been my practice. In this case I cannot identify the soldier by his number. I have here a letter from a woman who lives in the small town of Devon, opposite Fredericton. She represents that she was the daughter of an Indian squaw by a white father. I knew the father. They resided on the reserve, but under the Indian Act she is not an Indian—I believe that is correct. If the father is an Indian and the mother is white, she would be an Indian, but under the law she is not an Indian; she married an Indian, but he was not on the reserve; he was an Indian from the United States. She has an illegitimate child. I am putting this on record so that it may be understood. It is the most complex situation I have yet run up against in connection with dependent's allowance, and when I get through you will see that it will take more than the proverbial Philadelphia lawyer to unravel it. The woman had an illegitimate child a year prior to her marriage—I am not sure whether it was by the man she married or by somebody else. But when the husband married her, he, she says, legally adopted this child and the appropriate regulations were complied with. I am sending the minister a copy of the letter so that he can hand it over to his officials. The child is adopted. But she cannot get dependent's allowance. She is ill; she cannot get medical attendance from the Indian department because technically she is not an Indian although her mother was an Indian and she is married to an Indian and her child, surely, is an Indian.

What are we going to do about this case? Surely it calls for the exercise of common sense. Her husband is a signaller and is about to proceed overseas. If the facts are as I have stated them—as yet I have had no opportunity of verification, but they may easily be verified through the Indian agent or through the department—she is entitled to dependent's allowance for herself, also to medical treatment from the Indian department and anything else that this government may properly give her. That is all I have to say, and here is the letter.

Mr. RALSTON: I will deal with the different points which my hon. friend has made. First, with regard to the Fredericton case. I share fully the concern expressed by my hon. friend with regard to that case. I took a personal interest in it. I saw to it that the president of the court martial and at least two of the members were men who had nothing to do in any way with the district or with the administration of medical services. The president of the court was Colonel Gilbert S. Stairs, of Montreal, king's counsel, and formerly of the 87th battalion. One member of the court was Colonel C. M. Edwards, of Ottawa, formerly of the 38th, an Ottawa battalion; and another member, Colonel K. R. Marshall, was one of the staff officers of the 4th division in the last war. I think that is sufficient assurance to those who know these gentlemen that they brought to the trial of this case a detachment, a fairness and an unbiased judgment which would commend itself to everyone.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister answer one question?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly, if I can.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there any man on the court martial who ever tried a lawsuit in his life or knew anything about the law of evidence?

Mr. RALSTON: I think Colonel Stairs does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think he ever did try a lawsuit, and he would probably tell you so.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe Colonel Stairs has been practising law for thirty years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but I do not think he ever tried a lawsuit.

Mr. RALSTON: He has a very large practice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to reflect on him at all; he is a friend of mine. But what I could say about these courts martial would not be fit to print, and that is why I am refraining.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has said about all he can when he has said that. I do not think he has restrained himself very much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh well, I am restraining myself.

Mr. RALSTON: What I would say to my hon. friend about Colonel Stairs, and I say it in the presence of a good many barristers, is that no barrister in Canada stands higher at the bar in point of professional accomplishment or personal integrity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, I agree with that. But as to his experience in—

Mr. RALSTON: And I do not think there is any question in connection with those courts martial of the admission or non-admission of evidence. The matter was one of reasonable doubt which is to be given in these cases to the accused, and my hon. friend is not quite fair to the court, to the officers charged or to the administration of justice if he suggests anything else. These were cases of very grave concern to me and I myself directed the courts martial in all three instances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I asked the minister to do so.

Mr. RALSTON: That has been done. The court has been held and the verdict rendered. I wish that something more could be done. There was only one possible avenue of further activity on the part of the department and I am considering that now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not suggest that the minister can do anything more, except to correct the situation.

Mr. RALSTON: As regards the correction of the situation, all I can say is this. If there is anything that can be done by correction on the part of the administration, it is in the way of allocating as definitely as possible to each officer, in connection with the examination of men who are coming into the army, specific responsibility so that his particular job may be discharged and he may be chargeable if that job is not properly done.

Let me say to my hon. friend, that it is not the easiest thing in the world to get medical men to take on this job. Many of them come from exceedingly good practices, but they are doing the job in the interests of their country, and you cannot keep on attacking prominent men in the medical profession and expect the profession to stand for that sort of thing. It was done in Toronto, and there again I personally directed the court martial in connection with a case that was brought up against a medical officer. I believe the medical profession generally and some of the officers in the service felt that it was pretty harsh. As a matter of fact the medical officer was discharged in that case, and I felt it was absolutely necessary in order to promote confidence in our medical services that the public might realize that we were not attempting to hide anything in connection with the medical administration, so that it was gone through in the full light of day, with the floodlight of publicity and newspaper reporters present. That officer was also tried by a court which was eminently fair and the case was dismissed. The same is true in the Fredericton case. I have nothing more to say about it, except this. I hope that the house will temper its judgment with consideration for the fact that we have in this country a system of justice which has worked reasonably well in civilian cases and in the army as well. I know some medical men, prominent, reputable and skilled in their profession, who consider that these courts martial at Fredericton should not have been held; nevertheless they were brought because it was considered that the medical men engaged in that matter, the man having died, would have at least to be put on their trial so that all the facts might be investigated and justice done.

In the first place, steps have been taken to see that the responsibility of every man who has anything to do with the examination of men on admission to the army is distinctly and clearly defined. I may say to my hon. friend further that we have officers travelling continually from headquarters meeting with the officers on the boards and instructing them with regard to their responsibilities and with regard to the requirements of the army as well as regarding the care, skill and thoroughness they must exercise in the examination of these individuals. My hon. friend says he thinks there should have been more men.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): More medical men.

Mr. RALSTON: From my examination of the case I do not think I agree with him. That is only an opinion—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all mine is.

Mr. RALSTON: —and probably the medical officers will agree with him. But it seems to me there were enough medical officers there at that time to look after that case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister have to confirm the findings and did he agree with the finding in this court martial?

Mr. RALSTON: You do not confirm the finding of not guilty, but where the finding is "guilty" that finding and the sentence have to be confirmed on the recommendation of the minister by the governor in council.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I observe that I never thought there was the slightest negligence on the part of the commanding officer of the hospital, and I was astonished when I learned that he was charged. I want to have it quite clear that in my opinion there was no justification for the charge against him, except possibly in the minds of the administrators of the department, that, as the head of the hospital, he may have had some responsibility for treatment. But I never for a moment visualized negligence on his part.

Mr. RALSTON: Summaries of evidence were taken in every case, as is the practice in a civil case where evidence is taken on preliminary examination. The accused had the opportunity to be present at the taking of the summaries of evidence. These summaries were very carefully considered, and it was on these summaries that the charges were formulated on which the three officers were charged and later found not guilty.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When the men are checked up on going into the army is there just one test, a urine test, or is a blood test taken also to determine diabetes?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend asked me that question before.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes; I believe I did ask that question before.

Mr. RALSTON: I have here a note:

1. All G.S. recruits, as well as N.R.M.A., have urinalysis performed before enlistment or enrolment. The test used is that which is tendered in all up-to-date hospitals and medical centres. If the test is positive for sugar, it is repeated with a view to determining whether the case is one of true diabetes, or is the result of overindulgence in sugar, or due to some other extraneous factor. If it is felt after recheck to be a case of true diabetes the recruit is rejected and advised to see his family physician.

2. In case of doubt, a specimen is submitted to the nearest provincial laboratory for confirmation.

3. If the cause of the presence of sugar in the urine cannot be determined, the recruit is advised to consult his family physician, and is asked to return at a later date for reexamination.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But no blood test is taken for sugar in the blood?

Mr. RALSTON: Not for sugar—does the hon. member mean a blood test for sugar?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: No. The hon. member for York-Sunbury referred to Camp Sussex. Camp Sussex is being used at the present time and the establishment is being opened for the purpose not of a general officers' training centre, but of giving a refresher course to officers who volunteer under the officer loan system which I announced in the house a short time ago—that is, officers on loan to the British army. There is a course of four weeks and they are reporting in quotas from different districts. My hon. friend is correct that the services of Brigadier Gregg, who was in charge of the Canadian school of infantry at Vernon, are used at that centre for that special purpose.

My hon. friend referred to the purchase at public expense of residences for the C.W.A.C.'s. He is a business man and I want to put to him this situation, as it has been put to me by the real estate adviser and by the deputy minister. Is it better to expropriate the use of property of that kind during a time of war, to make all the capital expenditures necessary on that account; to pay not only rent but also loss of profits and everything which may go with it, included in the expropriation, for a limited period, and then lose entirely the benefit of the capital expenditures? Or, where you have a property like a residence, which has real salvage value, is it better to purchase the property outright and have the benefit of your capital expenditure? That has been discussed time and time again, and the real estate adviser to the department, Colonel Gibson, who has had a long experience with contracts and agreements in connection with matters of the kind and the terms on which limited lease arrangements can be made, is distinctly of the opinion that it is better to purchase a property like that than to take a limited interest and lose all the capital expenditure which you make.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose that is a matter of mathematical calculation; but let me tell the minister what they do in the United States. This came under my observation. In the city of St. Petersburg, which is a resort city, there are a large number of hotels. After Pearl Harbor they got rolling down there, so to speak. They commandeered the leading hotels. The same thing happened elsewhere. They did not make any great capital expenditure. They walked in and used the hotels.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They walked in and used them.

Mr. RALSTON: That is very different.

Mr. McCANN: Hotels are different.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree they are somewhat different, but the principle is the same.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I saw one hotel used as a bakery and cooking school. They had all the equipment in that hotel for the purpose. They made no capital expenditure. I went through the place. They used the hotel rooms for dormitories and the dining-room for eating purposes. Another hotel was used for dormitory and living accommodation for merchant seamen in training. They did not need any capital expenditure. The hotel I lived in was used largely as a dining-room. When the army moved out the proprietor took it over and all he had to do was redecorate the place. There were no capital changes at all. What I am afraid of now is this—and I leave this with the minister; I am not going to labour the question at all—that some people—and Ottawa is one place where they do it as well as any place I know—will take advantage of the opportunity offered to unload on the government property that is no longer required for their own personal purposes. That is an old game in Ottawa. I know I shall get whacked on the shoulders for saying that, but I know there is more truth than untruth in the statement. People buy property to unload on the country sooner or later. I have watched it for twenty years. They hope to unload it on the government. I see the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) laughing; he knows there is a large element of truth in what I have said. I think the policy of buying these houses is wrong. I may be wrong. It is a matter of judgment. That is all I have to say about it at the moment. I suppose the minister takes the advice of his expert adviser, and that is his justification. I cannot prove he is wrong. I am giving an expression of my own opinion. I have to go to a committee and therefore must leave.

Mr. RALSTON: I put the situation to the committee. I shall take the city of Halifax. In the city of Halifax we purchased the Hillside hotel.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And how many more?

Mr. RALSTON: Let us stick to the Hillside hotel for the moment, because that is the one my hon. friend spoke of. In the city of Halifax we purchased the Hillside hotel and we leased the Waverley hotel.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You bought the—

Mr. RALSTON: I am advised that the use of the Waverley hotel will cost us much more than we shall ever lose in connection with the Hillside hotel.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You bought the Halifax hotel, one of the worst things that ever was done.

Mr. RALSTON: I know we bought the Halifax hotel, but I had nothing to do with it. I want to say to my hon. friend—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have to go; I am sorry.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think the dying declaration of my hon. friend as he leaves the chamber is quite fair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I could come back and discuss the Halifax hotel. Let me tell the minister this: the people of Halifax know about that deal and they do not approve of it.

Mr. RALSTON: The person who took the Halifax hotel will discuss it. This is something new. We have the committee addressed from the back benches by an hon. member on his way out of the chamber. In the case of the Waverley hotel there were very strong representations from the city of Halifax. They did not want it taken off the tax roll. The result was—and I say it frankly—what may prove to be an improvident bargain made in connection with the Waverley hotel, not because of the amount paid, but I believe it was the wrong way to take it. At the same time so many representations were made on the part of the city of Halifax that it was felt by the department in this case they should lease the hotel and attempt to try out the two methods side by side. One method was to purchase the Hillside hotel, and the other was the leasing or taking the possession and the use of the Waverley hotel.

The hon. member mentioned the city of Montreal. I say to him that I think the crown will come out well in connection with the investment he mentioned in the city of Montreal. The investment in the city of Montreal was in connection with a house for the C.W.A.C.'s I would very much rather take that house under the terms under which we have it, the terms of purchase, than under a lease to use it and then have to return it at the end of the war, and to pay claims which would be made in the exchequer court for the use of the property, plus the cost of the capital expenditures necessary in order to make it livable for the purposes for which we want to use it.

My hon. friend mentioned subsistence allowance. May I say that the subsistence allowance was increased from $1 to $1.25 for other ranks not very long ago. The officers' allowance was $1.50 or $1.55. It was increased to $1.70. The hon. member was speaking of the officers of the air force. The army has a large number of young officers here. Some of these young officers are finding it hard to make ends meet so far as their subsistence is concerned. They are probably contributing something out of their pay in order to provide board for themselves. The situation is that in Ottawa it has been impossible to provide barracks for officers. It is a temporary situation. There will not always be that number of officers in Ottawa. The question was what was the best way to meet the situation as far as subsistence is concerned? I have had under consideration representations which have been made for an officers' mess. As a matter of fact active attention is being given to that matter at the moment. It was hoped that the situation would right itself but it has not happened. When we bring a young officer here we feel that something should be done. To provide barracks means capital expenditure and the purchase of a building or the erecting of one. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) complained about it; but we have to do either one thing or the other. I say to my hon. friend that I am just as fully alive to the difficulties of the younger officers as he is, particularly with regard to the subsistence allowance and to the fact that very often they have to go into their pockets to a certain extent. That applies to the C.W.A.C.'s who do not get as much pay as the men do.

With regard to the grotesque cases that my hon. friend has referred to in connection with dependents' allowances, I shall be glad to look into them. He has just touched the fringe of the many grotesque cases which the dependents' allowance board has. There are generally reasons or circumstances which members may not know and which explain the decision given. Let me say that these men on the board who are dealing with these matters all the time are men who have had experience, and men who have judgment. They are men who try to give consideration not simply to the letter of the law but to the merits of the case as well; and in instances where the allowance is not sufficient there is always the dependents' board of trustees to go to. I shall, of course, look into this case to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury has referred, and I shall bring it to the attention of the dependents' allowance board.

Mr. LACOMBE: I wish to make a few remarks concerning the second item.

(Translation): I notice that the estimates covering the operations of internment camps are $4,700,178 less than those of last year. Such a decrease is no doubt due to the fact that a considerable number of interned people have been released since last year. It may not be the only reason, but it is certainly one of the reasons. However, one man is still the victim of a deliberate persecution which is tantamount to a scandal. That man has had a hearing before an advisory committee in Fredericton. During the last session I requested the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to table all documents pertaining to that hearing. My request was turned down. Mr. Camillien Houde has asked the department of justice for a typewritten copy of the evidence he gave at that hearing.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend is speaking of a matter which does not come under this item at all. He is speaking with regard to the rights and wrongs of the internment of an individual who happens to be in an internment camp, which is a matter that does not come within my jurisdiction. All that is covered by this item is the guarding of those in these camps. The Department of National Defence has nothing to do with the question of the merits or the reasons for internment. My department provides the buildings, the establishment, the administration and the guards, and I think my hon. friend is out of order in discussing that matter on this item.

Mr. LACOMBE: I submit respectfully that I am discussing internment operations, and that I am in order in doing so.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has raised a proper objection. We are dealing with internment operations, and this item has nothing to do with the Department of National Defence. What I have heard discussed so far by the hon. member is a matter which pertains to the Department of Justice, so that I would ask him to abstain from discussing that subject under this item.

Mr. LACOMBE: I respect your decision, Mr. Chairman, and I shall have occasion to speak of this question later.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. The only reason why I mention it in the committee is that it involves a principle and I should like to know what is being done about it. This is the case of an officer and his wife who have rented a house in the city of Toronto for nine and a half years. The owner of the house died, the property was sold by a trust company and later resold to a woman whose husband is living. She is the owner of the house, though her husband actually put up the money. This officer is in the 48th Highlanders. He joined in January, 1940, and went overseas in August of that year. He was wounded and invalided to Malta but is back with his unit again in Italy. As I say, these two people have lived in this house for nine and a half years. It is their home; it is what he is fighting for. He wants to come back to that home, and if he is lucky he will do so, but now his wife has been given notice to vacate.

The man who brought this matter to my attention has spoken to the husband of the owner, but this man has shown no sympathy whatever. Quite frankly he said that they had bought the place so that they would have a more comfortable home in which to live. When it was pointed out that there was a certain amount of uncertainty in connection with the service of this officer he simply replied that this woman was quite capable of buying a home of her own, which is not the case, and he further went on to say, "Well, he might be killed by an automobile any day." This man and his wife have bought this house in order that they may be a little more comfortable, and for that reason are going to turn out this soldier's wife who has made her home there for the past nine and a half years.

There must be some process that can be followed which would give protection to our soldiers who are overseas, and I would ask the minister if something cannot be done in cases of this kind. Surely there should be some protection for that woman whose husband is overseas fighting for us, fighting for the man who bought that house, the man who is going to take possession of the house because he and his wife want to be a little more comfortable. There must be some appeal from the rental control regulations of the wartime prices and trade board. I shall be glad to give the minister the particulars of this case; I do not want to read the letter because I do not desire to bring personalities into the discussion, but surely something can be done to protect that home.

Mr. RALSTON: On a number of occasions, in dealing with the matter of housing for soldiers, I have indicated that the dependents' allowance is paid for the purpose of putting the wife and family in funds to pay rent or meet any other expenses.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just a moment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to finish. I have indicated that the department and indeed the federal government have not undertaken to provide housing. I have indicated more than once that this is considered to be a municipal and provincial responsibility, and my hon. friend's appeal would be more properly directed to those authorities. The hon. gentleman asks whether something can be done, but this is a matter concerning local rental laws. Let me say to the hon. member, as I have said to this committee on more than one occasion, that notwithstanding the fact that this is a matter of municipal and provincial responsibility, as the Minister of Finance indicated to the city of Hamilton and the city of Windsor, and as has been indicated to the city of St. Catharines, houses have been placed at the disposal of these cities from time to time in order that they might be used for the purpose of housing dependents of soldiers until other accommodation could be found. That is as far as the federal government has gone in that connection. It is all very well for my hon. friend to talk about this matter here, to ask if something cannot be done, and to speak of the plight of these worthy people, I am quite ready to take my share and more than my share of responsibility to help as far as I possibly can, but I do submit that there is some responsibility on my hon. friend, on the provincial government and on the municipal authorities. I do not think it should be all simply brought in here and put on the desk, and for us to be told that something should be done about it, regardless of the circumstances. We are doing something about it and have done something about it in a great many cases. Just here I should like to pay tribute to the community organizations in various cities which have done their level best to assist in finding housing accommodation for soldiers' dependents in these times when housing is so short. The attention, the thoroughness, the generous-heartedness with which they have gone into those cases have been remarkable, and I wonder if my hon. friend has referred this case to any of these organizations.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): For the benefit of the minister I may say that this has gone all through the process. It is not a question of getting another place in which to live; it is a question of breaking up a home which this man and his wife have had for nine and a half years. That is the situation.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I am just as sympathetic and just as open to any suggestions for assistance to a soldier or a soldier's dependents as my hon. friend is. He does not suggest that there should be a law under which a soldier's dependents would be entitled to keep the same house all the time. Surely that is not his suggestion?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We have at the present time a rental control order. Why can it not be extended to the soldiers?

Mr. RALSTON: Because, as I understand it, the rental control order provides for one exception, namely the case where the owner desires to use the house. Of course if there is any fraud or evasion of the act or the regulations, it may be dealt with. But it would be dealt with in any event—not only in the case of a soldier, but in those of others as well. It is a matter of general regulation; it does not apply only to dependents of soldiers.

Mr. BENCE: The observations a short time ago of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and the answers given by the minister were of much interest to me. I am referring particularly to those which had to do with accommodation in Ottawa, and the lack of accommodation for air force recruits.

I would take this opportunity to reiterate the stand I have taken in the past, and would request the minister now before the committee and other ministers concerned with the housing of service men, and the providing of training facilities and that kind of thing, to see that they effect more decentralization than obtains at the present time. Answering me last year on a similar question, the minister stated that it is all very well to make a suggestion of this kind. He pointed out that each department agrees with the principle of decentralization, but that he has found it difficult to have any of them agree that a particular department is the one which should be removed.

In Canada to-day we find ourselves in a position of cutting down in matters of training and administration. It seems to me, however, that as far as Ottawa is concerned there is a tendency to bring into this already overbulging city more and more men for training and for purposes of administration. An example was given by the hon. member for York-Sunbury with respect to air force men who could not go into barracks, but who are in training for pilots. While this may not come within the minister's department, the same principle applies.

In other parts of Canada, and I refer particularly to Saskatchewan, steps are being taken to cut down training, and to cut down the number of training centres. In the same way, a decrease is being made in the number of training centres over which the minister now before us has supervision. For example, in Saskatchewan the training centre at Maple Creek has been cut out. My information is that the number of recruits at the basic training centre at Prince Albert, which at one time handled large numbers, has been cut down so much that there are practically no recruits there at all.

In connection with the matter of cutting down training centres in Saskatchewan I should like to ask the minister one or two questions, and to give consideration to a point which

I believe to be of the utmost importance. As I said before, the training centre at Maple Creek has been closed down, and the one at Prince Albert is not being used to any great extent. At the same time the suggestion has been made that the vocational training centre in Saskatoon should be moved to Prince Albert. I would ask the minister to give this matter careful consideration before this step is finally taken. I would ask, too, that not only questions of cost and efficiency be considered, although I agree that if cost is very much different, and if efficiency could be greatly improved the possibility of changing would have to be considered.

I would ask the minister, however, to consider the matter from this point of view. It is all very well to close down some of these centres, but I do not think this should be done if there are other types of work which could be done at those points. If the minister takes a vocational centre from one city and moves it to another, there will be a great deal of consternation among the people in the locality from which the training centre is being moved. I know that, because I feel this matter personally. As soon as a move like this is noised around, immediately the civilians in the particular locality have the impression —and I am not saying they are justified— that there is something more than military expediency behind such a move. I have heard the rumour, and understand there is substantial belief as to its accuracy, that a move is contemplated. I suggest that the minister and his department should consider the matter carefully, when it comes to cutting out a training centre in any particular locality, and moving it to another.

Mr. RALSTON: Was the hon. member referring to Calgary?

Mr. BENCE: No; Saskatoon. I am talking about the suggested move of the vocational training centre from Saskatoon to Prince Albert. I will be frank to say, as I have said to the minister privately, that this affects me. It is suggested that the training centre be moved from Saskatoon, represented in the house by a member in the opposition, to a constituency represented by a member of the government—in this particular instance by the leader of the government. The feeling develops in the constituency that there is some reason other than that of military expediency, and it is suggested that the situation should be examined very carefully before any move is made. It is pointed out that if a move must be made because of military necessities it should be made clear what the reasons are.

Would the minister give the committee a statement covering the set-up of these training centres across Canada, and the policy that is to be laid down with respect to the matter of closing them down, and switching them from one city, or from one particular part of Canada to another, and particularly in connection with the matter of recruiting in various parts of Canada?

It does seem to me that we should consider the methods that must necessarily be used in the building of civilian morale, not only for the purpose of raising funds necessary to carry on the war, but also for the purpose of obtaining the necessary recruits.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not before me the information with respect to the three locations to which my hon. friend has referred. I would refer him only to this, that basic training centres have been closed at thirteen different locations in Canada. Naturally someone's constituency has to be hit—and I say that seriously. I know of one hon. member in whose constituency there were two training centres, both of which have been closed.

No decision has been arrived at with respect to the training centres to which my hon. friend has referred. Possibly I am remiss in my duty, but I had not heard, until my hon. friend brought it to my attention, of the suggestion of moving the vocational training centre from Saskatoon. I know that the Prince Albert and Maple Creek training centres were established at the time of a peak load. A good many men have gone through those centres, and as a result of a reduction in intake there is less need for training centre capacity in Saskatchewan. As my hon. friend knows, the centre at Regina was closed some time ago. At Regina they had a training establishment and a district depot.

As I said, there have been thirteen cases in which training centres have been closed. Some of them are used for other purposes. In addition to that, there are eleven cases in which training centre capacity has been reduced. All I can say to my hon. friend is that the matter will be studied. I am just as aware as he is of the suggestion which would be made if a training centre were changed from Saskatoon to Prince Albert. Someone would suggest that it was done for other than military purposes. Although my hon. friend may not believe it, that would make the departmental officers concerned lean back in their efforts to avoid a move of that kind. However, I think military considerations must dominate, regardless of the effect in any particular constituency.

My hon. friend will understand exactly what will happen when air training centres are closed down, and we shall have to proceed with army training centres as well. All I can say to my hon. friend is that I will take his very reasonable, and—if I may say so—very moderate, representations into consideration when coming to any decision with respect to these particular army establishments.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under this omnibus item, there is a matter on which I should like to secure information. It has to do with the political activities and candidature for parliament or legislative assemblies of members of the armed forces. The reason why I bring this up at this time is that last evening the press carried an item to the effect that new regulations had been passed with regard to the candidature of members of the armed forces for municipal office.

Mr. RALSTON: That was municipal?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. Under P.C. 3205 of May 31, 1943, certain provisions were made whereby members of the armed forces could secure leave for the purpose either of attending nominating conventions and being nominated or of participating in election campaigns. The specific sections dealing with the matter state that a member of the armed forces may:

> . . . subject to the exigencies of the service, be granted leave of absence by the appropriate service authorities for a period not exceeding one month preceding the election.

Leave is also granted for the purpose of attending conventions and the like. Up until the time that order in council was passed, if I understand the law correctly, no man in the armed forces was permitted to secure leave to be a candidate for parliament or a legislature. In Great Britain to-day provision is still made under the war service regulations that while members of parliament may address public meetings in their own constituencies, they are not allowed to speak outside their own constituencies during an election campaign. I can very well understand that when an election, either provincial or federal, occurs, quite a number of men and women serving in the armed forces may be desirous of knowing their rights and what opportunities will be accorded them to attend nominating conventions and to be nominated. I have no doubt that there will be members of the armed forces overseas who will be desirous of returning to Canada to participate in election campaigns should they receive the nomination in a constituency.

The questions I would ask in regard to this order in council are these: Is provision made whereby application for leave by a man in the armed forces and desirous of becoming a candidate for parliament is entirely restricted to application through the regular military authorities, or will the minister himself exercise a supervisory position in regard to such applications for leave to participate as a candidate in an election campaign?

Second, have any applications as yet been made by members of the armed forces overseas for leave to return to Canada to participate in an election, and have any members of the armed forces been returned to Canada to permit them to participate in an election as candidates?

Finally, what is the attitude of the government in regard to the rights of members of parliament who are in uniform and in the service to address public meetings outside their own constituencies?

This order in council provides an opportunity which I think should be provided for men in the armed forces to serve not only in the armed forces but also in the parliament and legislatures of the country. It is a matter of interest to know that in this parliament there is a greater number of ex-service men, according to the information I have, than in any other parliament since the last war, and I know there are numbers of men overseas who might very well be expected to become candidates if the regulations were clarified. According to the order in council as it now stands, leave can only be granted depending upon the exigencies of the service. Some provision should be made whereby a man in the service who is nominated for parliament should have an opportunity to participate in an election campaign, with the procedure being an appeal direct to the minister himself. I would ask the minister to make a statement in regard to this order in council and to answer the questions I have asked.

Mr. RALSTON: In reply to the first question, as to whether provision for application for leave is restricted to the military authorities or whether the minister exercises a supervisory jurisdiction, no ruling has been given in that connection. As the order in council stands, the application would come in the regular way to the military authorities. If the case is of some importance I would think it quite possible that it would be referred to national defence headquarters, and quite possibly to the minister. I would not want to give an undertaking at this stage that the minister would exercise any greater supervisory jurisdiction in this matter than over any other. I would want to consult my colleagues, the heads of the other armed services, because it affects them all, and endeavour to see that some uniform practice was observed.

My hon. friend asked if any applications had so far been made. So far as I know, no applications have been made, but that does not necessarily mean there have not been any. I have none in mind, and I do not remember any coming to my attention. I have not in mind anyone who has been returned from overseas under leave of this kind. If my hon. friend has any case in mind and wishes to bring it up, I shall be glad to hear of it.

With regard to the right to address meetings outside the constituency, the order in council provides that leave may be granted for the specific purpose of campaigning as a candidate. I take it that that would limit the candidate to campaigning in his own constituency.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. RALSTON: I am just reading the order in council. I never believe in offering a judicial opinion on the interpretation of a legal document without having it carefully examined, but those words strike me at the moment, as I read the order in council—and I do not pretend that it is my conclusion of the matter—that the leave intended here is for the purpose of campaigning as a candidate in his own riding.

Mr. ROWE: It does not say that, does it?

Mr. RALSTON: Campaigning as a candidate must be in his own riding, I would think. It could not be anywhere else.

Mr. ROWE: The minister was a candidate campaigning in other places.

Mr. RALSTON: Not as a candidate in the other places. I endeavoured to support a candidate, and I think my hon. friend did, too, from the same platform.

Mr. ROWE: The minister had been nominated.

Mr. RALSTON: I endeavoured to support a candidate, and I remember my hon. friend did the same, and on the same platform, too. He was supporting another candidate, I might say—lest there be any doubt. I think those words would rather indicate a restriction to campaigning in a candidate's own constituency. I will take that up and see if any clarification is needed; if so, I shall be glad to give it attention. I take it that my hon. friend is really making a representation that it should be extended beyond the bounds of a candidate's constituency.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What I am doing is endeavouring to have the minister give publicity to this order so that it will be known to the services overseas. I have had a number of letters asking what the regulations are, and while an order in council was passed many months ago, very few of the men overseas, apparently, understand the contents of the regulations as they are now.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure that the regulations have been published in orders. Of course my hon. friend knows that we do not always read orders and sometimes when we have read them we forget them.

Mr. STIRLING: And do not understand them, too.

Mr. RALSTON: And do not understand them; but certainly the regulations will be given appropriate publicity in every way possible.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to suggest, following what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, that not only should the minister give some publicity to the regulations but the statement ought to be clarified so that men in the service may know exactly what they ought to do. I know that the position, for instance, with reference to provincial elections is one which bristles with difficulties. At the present time the group with which I am associated has two members of the Saskatchewan legislature on active service overseas. The space of time between the writs for the election being issued and the polling day is, I believe, only twenty-three days. It is manifestly impossible for these men to be brought back from overseas in that time unless some special arrangements are made to fly them back.

Mr. RALSTON: Many candidates, as my hon. friend knows, do not come back.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I know that, but there ought to be some understanding that if some are allowed to come back all should be permitted to do so. The minister is going to face quite a problem if some are brought back and special arrangements are not made to bring others back. I think the situation should be faced now instead of waiting until it happens and having the minister bombarded with wires and cablegrams asking that this man or that man be brought back. I believe that if arrangements can be made—and not many men will be affected—they ought to be brought back.

I have in mind another candidate for the provincial legislature of Saskatchewan who is stationed on the Pacific coast and who wrote me wanting information just exactly along the same lines. As he understands it, he must make application to his commanding officer. If the commanding officer does not feel that he can release him, or if the application lies around, or has to go to military district headquarters and then to national defence headquarters, there will not be many of the twenty-three days left by the time he gets to his rural constituency, and a very large rural constituency at that. I think the minister ought to make very clear what the exact modus operandi is to be. Will the man make application to his commanding officer; will it go straight to national defence headquarters, and can it be dealt with immediately? Or, will the political party concerned make application on behalf of the man as soon as writs are issued? It would be preferable, I think, that each political party should notify national defence headquarters of the men who are candidates, and national defence headquarters would decide whether these men could be released and arrange the releases right away. Otherwise, as the minister knows, considerable delay could occur between the time a man makes application to his officer commanding, with all the channels and red tape through which it may have to go, before he is finally released.

I think the minister ought also to clarify the position of a man seeking election as a candidate. That raises the question whether or not he can speak on the radio. When he speaks on the radio, not only the people in his own constituency hear him but the people within the entire area covered by that particular radio station may hear him. Does that preclude him from speaking on the radio? I think the minister ought to make that very clear, because that question will come up, and it is better to clarify it now than to wait until some situation arises when the minister or anybody else may be accused of partisanship or of showing favour to one candidate as against the other.

Early in the discussion of the minister's estimates I raised the question of the regulation which forbade men in the armed services writing to the newspapers, and pointed out to the minister the case of a member of the legislature of the province from which I come being forbidden to address a forum. The minister said that the regulation was under consideration with a view to modifying it. I wonder whether sometime before this discussion closes the minister could let us know if the department in the past two weeks have agreed as to what the regulation will be.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

I also asked the minister earlier in this discussion if he could give us information with regard to the various camps across Canada and the various military districts and set out the number of men in the A. and T. staffs as against the number of men who are being trained as students or recruits, because I am even more disturbed about the matter now than when I rose to discuss it a couple of weeks ago. Wherever I have gone; wherever I have met men from various parts of Canada in the armed services, they kept stressing to me the fact that so many of them, as they claim, are sitting around without enough work to do, that they are in some cases overstaffed, that there seems to be a tremendously large home war establishment, out of all proportion to the number of recruits to be trained and the amount of work to be done. I do not think the solution is to do what I heard was suggested in one place. They telephoned one office and said, "You will cut your staff twenty-five per cent." Later on it did not materialize, but that was the order. I do not think you can do it in that way. There may be some places where the staff is not twenty-five per cent too large; there may be others where it is half as large again as is needed. I believe the paring-knife should be used—if my information is not entirely incorrect—on this very large home war establishment which was built up at a time when many more recruits were being trained than there are at the present time.

I asked the minister some time ago—he may have answered it, and if he did I will not pursue the matter further—with reference to the question of venereal disease. I was very glad to hear the minister say that the Wassermann test is now being made compulsory. I ask the minister if his department would give some consideration to the matter of periodic Wassermann tests. It seems to me that the danger of a man becoming infected is as great or greater after he is in the services than before, and that it would not be a difficult or cumbersome job to have a Wassermann test taken once every six months, or once every year, for the protection of the men; it is merely a matter of lining them up and taking a little blood out of each man's arm. If these tests were made I think the proceeding would pay for itself in the protection which these men would have in the years that lie ahead.

Would the minister give the committee some information regarding the dependents' allowance board and the other item, the dependents' supplementary grants fund? I take it for granted, with regard to these last two items, that the dependents' allowance board item is the expenses of operating the board, and that the dependents' supplementary grants fund item is the money expended by that board. Is that correct?

Mr. RALSTON: The last item represents the estimate of the money to be paid out plus cost of administration of the dependents' board of trustees. In the item covering the dependents' allowance board it is cost of administration only.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister give the committee a break-down in regard to the dependents' board of trustees? How much money has been spent by the dependents' board of trustees in each province or by military districts, whichever way the minister has it, the number of cases handled in each province or military district, and how was this money, spent for the dependents' board of trustees last year, divided as between administration and the amount spent in giving some benefit to the dependents of the men in the services? I should be glad to have that information.

Mr. RALSTON: First, with regard to the matter of participation in elections, I can only say that I will discuss that with my colleagues, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Service (Mr. Macdonald). I will take up with them the points the hon. member has brought up with regard to procedure, and if clarification can be given, or further details furnished, we shall be glad to give the information, because we are endeavouring to make the order in council effective and useful.

The hon. member suggested that we should face up now to what will be before us when these applications come in. He knows there is one thing to which we cannot face up, and that is the exigencies of the service. They will depend upon conditions at the time which we cannot foresee. I believe, however, that what the hon. member is asking is that as far as possible the exigencies be determined by someone who really knows what they are, instead of being left to the discretion of some junior officer to be dealt with.

In reference to the regulation about which he spoke, with respect to writing articles, that regulation has been repealed and the provisions of King's Regulations and Orders, which already exist, have been substituted. The objectionable words in that regulation with regard to prohibited articles were, "on military subjects or otherwise". Those words "or otherwise", are repealed.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is still a ban on writing military articles.

Mr. RALSTON: The ban is contained in King's Regulations and Orders and nothing more.

As regards the proportions of A. and T. staff, I am almost prepared to offer my hon. friend a reward for information which he can give me as to anyone in training centres who says that they are overstaffed, because that is what this committee, about which I have spoken so often, is checking. It is travelling across Canada to find these cases and it cannot get anyone to give evidence to that effect. The members of the committee have to dig the evidence out for themselves.

I thought I had information with regard to the exact proportion of A. and T. staff, but I may be able to give it before the committee rises. There are training centres where there is a low population at the moment, and any of these training centres may be closed and the A. and T. staff reduced or the training centre amalgamated with some other centre. Hon. members will understand that the lower the capacity of the training centre, the higher the percentage of the A. and T. staff. It is necessary, for example, to have one commanding officer, one chief instructor, and one quartermaster. I can only say what I have said time and again, that literally ruthless steps are being taken to cut down staffs wherever possible.

My hon. friend complained of the idea of cutting off a certain percentage. I agree, generally speaking, with that view, but sometimes you have to do that in order to bring home to those who are administering a particular establishment the fact that a reduction is required. What is much more desirable, of course, is to do it in a much more logical and business like way, and that is to have a committee go on the ground and find out what each man is doing and endeavour to cut the cloth according to the necessities of the particular case.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is the Whitelaw committee.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, In reference to the dependents' board of trustees, I have a long table here which I think is probably the most informative that I could file. The columns show expenditure from January 1, 1942, to November 31, 1943, and regional dependents committees, with locations. The different committees are given at their different locations, beginning with Charlottetown and ending with Victoria. There are twenty-one different committees shown. Administration expenses are shown and single grants are given, divided between the three services—army, navy and air force; the total grants appear, with the combined total of administration costs and total grants for each committee. The total expenditures are given in the right hand column. Then there is shown the total of recurring grants, that is to say, grants which have been authorized, in the same manner as pensions for definite periods at the rate of so much a month. That total is shown for the dominion as a whole. The total of the recurring grants is $131,000.

If the committee is satisfied I will file this statement, which will give the information needed. To give an idea of what has been disbursed in grants, the amount from January 1, 1942 to November 31, 1943, is $2,054,920.38. The total expenditure for that same period, including administration expenses as well, is $2,548,707.36. That is for two years less one month. It includes only cases actually settled or, as the chairman says, put through the books; but it does not include the many cases in transit which are being dealt with currently, or the grants paid locally and not yet recorded at headquarters. The table follows:

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is any further consideration being given the matter of a periodic Wassermann?

Mr. RALSTON: I will take it up with the director general of medical services. I believe the medical opinion is that there is not very much benefit to be derived from that. At least that is the view held at the moment. That is to say, that the disease will manifest itself, if it exists. The periodical testing of an army of between 400,000 and 500,000 men is no light task, as my hon. friend knows. That applies not only to the men themselves, but to the laboratory equipment and services which are required in connection with it. The provincial laboratories of this country are assisting very materially. As a matter of fact, they are providing most of the facilities.

Mr. ADAMSON: I asked the minister a question last night about fever-therapy in connection with venereal diseases. I should like to know if it is satisfactory and what the results have been. I asked a question also about psychiatric reports at the induction centres. The minister said he would get the information.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the last question?

Mr. ADAMSON: What percentage of the men rejected on psychiatric tests were classed as of low mentality? I think the term "moron" was used.

Mr. RALSTON: The information I have with reference to fever-therapy is as follows:

1. Fever-therapy has been used chiefly in the treatment of sulfa-resistant gonorrhoea patients.

2. An analysis of 500 case records, of patients suffering from gonorrhoea, revealed that approximately nine per cent require fever-therapy.

3. The results of this treatment are not available at the present time as this treatment is carried out in DP & NH hospitals. Consultation with doctors in charge of this therapy indicates that it is very effective treatment.

4. In the treatment of syphilitic infections, fever-therapy is used principally in the treatment of central nervous system complications. Soldiers suffering from this complication are discharged from the army to DP & NH hospitals.

For the benefit of the unlearned of the committee may I say that fever therapy simply means that a man's temperature is raised to a very high point with the intended effect, as I understand it, of destroying the germ. That is a very crude explanation of it, but perhaps it will do.

The figures that I have with reference to rejections on account of psychiatric conditions are based on a very small cross-section. The figure is 12·4 per cent.

Mr. ADAMSON: Of the total?

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, that is of the total.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is that a recent sampling?

Mr. RALSTON: For the month of January.

Mr. ADAMSON: Twelve point four per cent were rejected for psychiatric reasons.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: A short time ago a situation was brought to my attention in Toronto by a relation of a service man recently returned from overseas. I thought I should bring it to the attention of the committee and the minister. It may be one case of many others. The young man to whom I have reference was highly educated. He had successfully passed his matriculation examinations and had passed through his air force training as a pilot. In due course he was sent overseas. Apparently, while flying over there something happened to him and he was taken out of his flying position. He was then trained as an observer. Altogether he trained overseas for three years. He was then sent home. I do not know what happened to him as an observer, but apparently he was not fit for the air. Recently he was sent to barracks in Toronto to join the army.

Mr. RALSTON: Called up?

Mr. MacNICOL: Called up, yes. He was thrown out of the air force and sent to the army. He is a highly educated man. According to what his relations tell me his training has cost the country many thousands of dollars. I was told it was $27,000, but I do not know whether that is right or wrong. However, he was in training for three years, and now he has been sent to the barracks in Toronto and given the job of scrubbing floors just as if he had not had any training whatever. It does not seem sensible to me for anyone who has been training for three years in the air force to be given that position. Could he not be put in some other position in the air force on the ground where the air force could make use of his training instead of sending him to the army? What is going to happen to him in the army?

Mr. RALSTON: All I can say to my hon. friend is that he is discussing a case that does not happen very often. However, there are cases of that kind. I am not making any reflection on this particular young man because I do not know anything about him. There are cases of men who are what are called waverers, and who are not suitable for air training. There are cases of men who do not try too hard in the air force, having enlisted there, with the result that they are discharged. Obviously that does not exempt them from being called up for army service.

With regard to the matter of scrubbing floors, I suppose that some of us black our own boots and do odd things like that. I do not suppose it is regarded as menial. If this is a serious case I shall look into it at once, but I would think that quite possibly there is a fatigue to be done or something of that kind, and since this chap is able-bodied and it was his day for the fatigue, that is why he scrubbed the floors. Floors have to be scrubbed by somebody.

Mr. MacNICOL: He likely went through that three years ago.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, I know. If he had stuck with the air force he would not have to go through it again. Would my hon. friend give me the name?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. I shall first ask permission from his people, and if I get it I shall give the minister the name.

Mr. POULIOT: These are cases of fatigue duty or K.P. duty. That is the title of those who do the work of scrubbing floors and washing dishes. That is all right, but it is unfortunate that in many places many of the boys who have completed their classical courses have to do that work all the time because they are supposed not to know English.

Before the minister replies to the hon. member for Davenport, I should like to ask him several questions about the pulhems system. In the first place I am sure hon. members know that "P" is for physical ability, "U" for upper limbs, arms, "L" for lower limbs, "H" for hearing, "E" for eyesight, "M" for mentality and "S" for stability. The matter of emotional stability was discussed at great length last year. Each one of those seven divisions is subdivided into classifications numbered from 1 to 5, except division "M", or the mentality test, which does not include classification 3, and division "S" which does not have classification 2. That information was given to me some time ago and I wonder if it is up to date.

I should like to ask the minister a question in this connection. If he cannot answer me today I shall be satisfied to receive the answer to-morrow. My first question is, what is each one of those classifications and each one of the seven divisions; second, why does not division "M" include classification 3; third, why does not division "S" include classification 2? My fourth question is, what is the third classification under "M" and the second classification under "S", if any? It seems there is only one classification under "S" for stability. There should be only one classification for mentality, because one is either mentally fit or mentally unfit; one is normal or not. There are no degrees of abnormality or mental unfitness; surely one cannot be partly mentally unfit. I hear that in the holy city of Toronto many boys were found mentally unfit because of the answers they gave to certain questions. I was told that they were shown a picture of an automobile with flat tires, and were told to say quickly what was wrong with the car. Instead of "flat tires" one boy said "no gas", and he was declared mentally unfit. Another question was, "What is a pudding made of?" When a boy answered, "Salt and pepper" he was declared mentally unfit. It is all very childish; they are shown pictures and asked questions. The results do not reflect upon the intelligence of the boys who have been found mentally unfit in Toronto, though the number who have failed in these tests is quite astonishing.

As my fifth question I will ask the minister to tell the committee, first, the number of officers and, second, the number of non-commissioned officers and men who have been found mentally unfit under the pulhems test, in each military district, and I would ask also for a list of the questions that are asked in order to ascertain the mental fitness of these men.

I have another series of questions. Under the pulhems system recruits are supposed to be examined by six specialists. First, there is a specialist in internal medicine; second, a specialist in the chest; third, a surgeon; fourth, a psychiatrist; fifth, a specialist in the eyes, ears, nose and throat, and, sixth, an army examiner. In each division recruits are supposed to be classified by a specialist, but the number of specialists does not equal the seven letters of the word "pulhems"; there are seven letters and six specialists. I should like to know what specialists are supposed to pass judgment in each of the seven divisions. My next questions are as follows: first, who is the specialist, already mentioned, who classifies a recruit in each division, "P," "U," "L," "H," "E," "M," "S"; second, how many pulhems boards are there in the country, and where are they located; third, who are the specialists on each board; fourth, what are the qualifications of each specialist? I will ask the minister also to be kind enough to summarize for the committee all orders, instructions and regulations concerning the "M" test.

Then we come to the "S," which means stability of the mind or of the body. Stability must be defined, since there is a test for it. We have stability of the mind and we have stability of the body, which sometimes is acrobatics. We need more information about mental stability. Here we have a fellow who is all right; all the doctors except the psychiatrist find him in good condition. We do not know much about pulhems; it is something that has been imported into this country, but everyone should know what it is. Last year

I complained that there were not enough able-bodied men for the defence of the country, and the minister was very indignant. He said my statement was unwarranted and unfair and unjust and untrue. Well, the idea behind pulhems is that they are keeping in the army men who are not physically fit, but who could do much more for the war effort if they were not in the army. So that I hope the minister will be kind enough to give us the information for which I have asked, as he has answered questions asked by other hon. members since his estimates came under discussion, and I hope he will let us know what is behind the whole thing.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to deal only with one or two of the hon. member's questions which I think can be answered quickly. Of course the hon. member is not serious when he says there are no degrees of abnormality. I have heard of people being half-crazy or half-witted, and have always thought there were different degrees of mental disability just as there are different degrees of physical disability. Then the hon. member asks what are the five divisions for each of the classifications into which a pulhems examination falls. They simply represent the rating given to the particular candidate in the particular realm indicated by the letter. For instance, "P" or physical is divided into five classes; 1 means perfect; 2 means fit for overseas service; 3 means fit for base service; 4 means fit for service in Canada, and 5 means that the man should be discharged. It is simply a question of degree. The same would apply to a disability of the upper limbs; 1 means perfect, 2 means fit for service overseas, and so on. The same applies to a disability of the lower limbs, to a heart disability, to an eye disability, and so on.

Then the hon. gentleman asks why division 3 is left out under classification "M". This is because a classification of fit for base service, as far as mental capacity is concerned, is too fine a distinction to make when you are measuring a man's mental capacity. The figure 2 means that the man is fit for overseas service, while the figure 4 means that he is fit for service in Canada. It is too fine a distinction to attempt to put another division in between and call it 3, when you are discussing this mental classification. The hon. member asks also why division 2 is left out in reference to stability. That is because the stability required for base service and for service in Canada is regarded as practically equal to the stability required for service overseas. There is no mystery about this matter at all, and there is no doubt about the different divisions. They refer to the different classes of service for which a man may be regarded as fit or otherwise.

Then the hon. member asked for the number of men in each district rejected as mentally unfit. If the hon. member will put that on the order paper, or I will take it now as a notice, I shall deal with it in the regular way. He will understand that it might be three or four weeks before I could bring down that information. The same will apply to a number of other questions he asked. I shall look over them and advise him; and if the questions cannot be answered I shall tell him so.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister, but I would ask him to be kind enough to tell us what is meant by "stability".

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid the hon. member will have to refer to the Oxford dictionary. There is a very good classification there.

Mr. POULIOT: They give special meaning to words, and when I look at the dictionary it is not the meaning they have in the army.

Mr. RALSTON: I will answer the hon. member's next question, where he asked about army doctors. He said there are only three specialists, and yet there are seven divisions. I can tell him that the physician examines with regard to physique, which is "P." The surgeon examines with regard to upper and lower limbs, which are "U" and "L," and the specialists—there may be one or two specialists, as the case may be—examine with regard to "H" and "E," which have to do with the eye, ear, nose and throat. The army examiner examines with respect to mental capacity, and the psychiatrist examines with respect to stability.

Then, with regard to the hon. member's further question respecting the classification of stability, my reply is that it simply means a man's ability to adjust himself satisfactorily to the life of a soldier.

Mr. POULIOT: Now, here is the point: It is exactly the same thing in the civil service examinations. There were points allowed for personality. When I asked Mr. Bland, the chairman of the civil service commission, and the chief examiner, and all other witnesses, what was meant by personality, or how they defined it, they were unable to do so. But the examiner was allowed to give marks to the person examined, just for personality.

Here we have "mentality." It is the army examiner who decides upon mentality. Who is that army examiner† There is mystery in that, just as there was in the civil service examinations. We fought against it, and all hon. members complained about it. Members of the committee, who now sit on the treasury benches, were one with us in complaining about it. It was just a catch for the examiners to do what they pleased with the candidate, through examination. Imagine that! We were discussing those matters. The matter came before the committee. There was not a single member of the twenty-five who did not protest against that "personality" business. Personality and appearance—imagine! If a man was to the liking of the examiner, he got all his marks for personality. But if the examiner had something against him, he got no marks at all. They were asked what it was, but no one could answer. A reference to a dictionary is no answer, either. We should know more about it.

Hon. members will be surprised by that. In the first place when I fought for the common civil servant in Ottawa, I was not alone. I was with the other members of the committee. But what trouble did I have at first to open the eyes of the House of Commons to what was going on in the civil service commission! We did not have much success in our recommendations. However, at least we opened the eyes of some of our colleagues as to what was going on around there.

Before we undertook that work no one had mentioned the word "bureaucracy." Now it is in the programme of one of the major parties, namely, the correcting of bureaucracy. Whether they will do it or not, I do not know. But there is bureaucracy in the army, as there is in the civil service. That is the kind of reform we want to have. To members of parliament nothing of that kind should be secret. We should be informed about it. We should be informed, so that we might prevent injustices being done. The minister renders no service to the army and renders no service to the personnel to his department by covering up what is done there, and by saying that everything is right.

It is hard at times to rise and protest, and always be told that we are wrong, and always that the other fellow is right. The minister praises the district medical officer of Quebec. Was he not a son-in-law of the former mayor of Quebec, who was under the mobilization board? And the old man was unjust to the draftees, just to boost his son-in-law. Everybody knows it in Quebec. The minister does not know the politics of Quebec city. Let me tell him that the old father-in-law was a key man in Quebec East, and he was appointed there at a time when the present minister was not minister. But he was a key man there. And now—now the boss of the board in Quebec city is precisely the daughter of one of the key men of the political clubs of Quebec East. When I speak of political strings I know of what I speak. I know that one has to make obeisance to that person in order to have service from her.

May I submit more than that, that even when the national selective service headquarters in Ottawa wrote to the chairman of the board in Quebec city, he did not answer. I had to direct their attention to the fact that Quebec did not answer when an answer was requested by Ottawa.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the hon. member permit me—

Mr. POULIOT: It is not the same thing; I am not blaming the minister for it; but I am informing the committee of the many reasons I have to say that there were political strings; and even if the minister canonizes them I will so express myself.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the hon. member charging that the medical board at Quebec is bossed by some young lady?

Mr. POULIOT: No, I did not say that. And I am not talking of flirtations, but of office routine.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member cannot laugh that off. I want to know whether or not he is charging the medical board in Quebec with being bossed by a certain young lady, of whom I have never heard at all? It is gross calumny, if he is suggesting any such thing.

Mr. POULIOT: Once again the minister does not understand what I say, or know that the person is secretary to one of the members of the mobilization board in Quebec. There is no love affair between them. It is not that I insinuated, at all.

Mr. RALSTON: No one suggested it.

Mr. POULIOT: If no one suggested it, so much the better. But what I say is that when we have a man in charge, he should be running the business, and the business should not be run by a secretary.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the hon. member charge that the medical officer is run by his secretary?

Mr. POULIOT: No, not a bit of it.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I suggest to the hon. member he should stick to the item, instead of talking of national selective service.

Mr. POULIOT: I told the minister five minutes ago I was not speaking of his department, but by way of comparison.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; surely we cannot have a discussion of that matter before the committee. If so, we shall never finish.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRUCE: I have a certain amount of sympathy for the minister who has been under questioning for so long, and I would not intervene at this moment except to clear up if possible, the confusion which seems to exist in the minds of many people, even among members of this house, as to the real situation in regard to our armed forces, their dispositions, and the available reinforcements which will be very much needed as soon as we open a western front.

There has been a certain amount of discrepancy between the figures given out by the minister and by the wartime information board. The minister stated in September last that the intake of the draft boards between January 1 and September 30, 1943, totalled 30,796. But according to the wartime information board's release, the total number of men obtained during that period by conscription was only 17,264, or 13,332 short of the minister's claim.

Mr. RALSTON: What were the dates?

Mr. BRUCE: I have the statement made by the minister in September, 1943, and those were his figures. In other words, only about fifty-seven per cent of the number claimed by the minister were taken in by draft. I have a good many other figures here which show a similar discrepancy, but I do not intend to take up the time of the committee in referring to them because they will be found in the records of Hansard and the press.

I was under the impression that, to maintain an army overseas, eight divisions will be necessary. I think three divisions have already been broken up. Have the men so released been used as reinforcements overseas?

The minister stated a little time ago that there was a shortage of tradesmen in the army. If this is so, does it not stem back to the shortage of man-power? If there were sufficient man-power it would not be difficult to train tradesmen.

The idea of Canada being able to create and maintain an army overseas without conscription will prove to be a fantasy. It is difficult to understand how a government which would not countenance conscription would make commitments which it should have known it could not fulfil without conscription.

The situation briefly would seem to be that many of these young fit men called up under the N.R.M.A.—and I understood the minister to say last night that there were 73,000 of them in Canada—are holding non-active jobs which could equally well be filled by returned men now being boarded out. I wonder why the minister does not use these returned men to replace the fit ones now holding non-active jobs, and send the latter overseas where they will soon be needed urgently for reinforcements.

Again I would ask, what about the men who are being freed from industry? I understand that these men are under call, and therefore that is another source for reinforcements for overseas.

The minister stated the other evening that if the time arrives when it will be necessary to bring into force the conscription act by removing its restricting clauses, he would do so. I would ask him if he thinks he is justified in waiting until reinforcements are urgently needed before taking the preliminary steps to make it possible to secure them. It does not require expert army staff officers to tell us that an assault against a highly fortified position such as our troops will have to face on the western front, a position prepared over a period of three years by a resourceful enemy and fortified, I understand, for many miles in depth, will be very costly in casualties. Have we not had sufficient information of the cost in casualties that our troops have already experienced at Dieppe, at Salerno and at the present moment are experiencing at the Anzio bridgehead. Surely, therefore, we should realize what will happen when the second front is opened in western Europe. An officer of experience told me recently that in his opinion the casualties within the first two weeks of the opening of the second front will amount to fifty per cent of those engaged, and that within another two weeks the rest of our troops might have to be replaced. This would necessitate a very large number of reinforcements being available in a position from which they could easily get to the front.

I asked the hon. minister the other evening if he thought he had sufficient reinforcements in the pool in England to take care of the situation. I ask him again if, after further consideration, he thinks that reinforcement pool will be amply sufficient. If not, will it not be imperatively necessary to take steps at the earliest possible moment to have the restricting clauses in the National Resources Mobilization Act removed so that this idle draftee army of some 73,000 men may be available for reinforcements overseas. It has been estimated that these men are costing the country $2,000 a year each, which would mean a total of $146,000,000. I presume that is a fair estimate. I believe that the minister will be recreant to the trust that is now reposed in him if he does not take immediate steps to provide the necessary reinforcements by the only possible method, the one to which I have just referred.

Mr. LECLERC: Is the hon. member favouring conscription?

Mr. BRUCE: We already have a conscription act on the statute books. I am favouring the removal of the ham-stringing clauses of that act.

Mr. LECLERC: Is the hon. member speaking for his party or for himself?

Mr. CASSELMAN: Where does the hon. member stand?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We all know where he stands.

Mr. McCANN: At six o'clock the matter under discussion had to do with the pulhems system of examination of recruits and draftees coming into the army. I think it is generally conceded that the system in vogue is the best one that has been devised with reference to examinations. However, it has one shortcoming which I should like to point out to the minister, namely, that it is based entirely upon any objective symptoms which the draftee may exhibit. I understand that the directions to medical officers consider only those objective symptoms. Another type of symptom which may arise with reference to any abnormal condition which a draftee may have, is what is known as the subjective symptoms, and known, perhaps, only to the man who is being examined.

Take, for instance, the case in point which was referred to by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, of the man who was a diabetic and who, upon his own statement, so stated. All the evidence was there that he was a diabetic, but his word was not taken by the examining officers, and they gave no consideration as to whether or not what he said was the truth.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were put on notice.

Mr. McCANN: Exactly, but they did not pay any attention to it. I submit that, in examining, a medical man can tell almost by intuition whether or not the truth is being told. More consideration ought to be given to the statements of the man who is being examined than is given at the present time. I have in mind a young fellow who was admitted to the army, and his examination put him in as A-1 and he served a month in one of the training camps. He was called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. That man was what is commonly known as a "bleeder", a haemophiliac, and there was no way of testing him. At the present time he is absent upon deferment because he is doing farm work, but he has received notice that he will be expected to return on the 1st of May. It is absolute nonsense to take back into the army a man of that type because, should any accident, even of a minor nature, happen to him, it is probable that it would be fatal. In addition to that, if he were there for six months or a year, and at a very considerable cost to the country, he would probably have to be discharged from the army, and it is quite probable that if he met with some accident while on duty he would be a pensioner, and this country would pay a pension for the rest of his life to a man who should never have been admitted to the army.

I should also like to ask the minister if further consideration has been given to the suggestion which was made in this house some time ago with reference to the amalgamation of the medical services in the armed forces; whether or not we are to continue to have three different groups of medical men, one in each branch of the armed service, or whether government policy in that regard has been changed. I would ask the minister, too, if the report of the assignment and procurement board has been given to the government and whether it is his intention to table it, and I invite him to make any comments which he may see fit at the present time with reference to whether he thinks that report should be acted upon, or whether, if that were done, it would be to the detriment of the service.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does the minister want to answer those questions now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister on February 14 made some statements which are worthy of considerable attention. May I read brief records from Hansard, at page 442? First, speaking of the soldiers:

> They do not want charity, but they want to know how they are to be assisted and how they are to be recognized, having regard to the fact that they have been away from employment conditions in this country for a number of years.

And again, speaking of the three defence services:

> . . . all three services intend to take and are now taking a definite and positive interest in the prospective rehabliitation of soldiers, sailors and airmen.

And again:

. . . but the services want to determine what shall be a fair method of rehabilitation and demobilization; to help the men who remain in the service for a considerable time due to military duties, but duties which may not be as pressing as the duties we see before us this year; to help these men to prepare themselves, looking forward to the time when they will be discharged and return to civilian life.

And again, speaking of the men whom he proposes to put in charge of the affairs of the returned men:

. . . men who will understand the problems, the aspirations, the needs and the ambitions of these boys.

These remarks touch a responsive chord in all hearts of soldiers and soldiers' friends everywhere. The question everyone is asking is, what chance will the soldier have after the war? Will he be able to get a job? Will he be able to live in comfort if there are too few jobs to go around; that is, if he cannot get a job? Will he be able to go into production as farmer, manufacturer, businessman, and sell his product at prices covering cost of production plus enough remuneration to enable him to live and to support a family? The minister has been too vague in his expressions. Soldiers of the last war had plenty of promises—in general. They were to have "homes for heroes", and the like. Soldiers of this war ought to have commitments more specific than those. Let the minister be more specific.

Let me ask him several questions. Let him answer those questions straightforwardly, painstakingly, and precisely, as he has done the numerous other questions already asked of him.

As a plain common man, father of soldiers, and representing fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, friends and sweethearts of soldiers, I desire to put these questions to the minister and to ask that he shall answer them in this parliament before this debate is finished.

As long as the minister may be charged with ministerial responsibility in this or in succeeding governments, first, will he here and now pledge himself to insist that his colleagues adopt such measures for stimulating and distributing production of Canadian goods and services as will guarantee, first, that every member of the armed forces of Canada shall have a job; or, being denied a job, shall have freedom from want and fear; second, that every returned man or woman, having a job, shall have a stable income, ample to provide for abundant living; third, that every producer shall be able to sell his goods at stable and equitable prices such as will render readily available to that producer prosperity and security with freedom; fourth, that Canada's national income be maintained at not less than $8,500,000,000 after the war; fifth, that these desirable results shall be achieved without additional taxes or public debt?

Again, will the minister, for the sake of those who have given their lives and those who now risk their all for freedom, pledge himself to insist that Canada, to the extent found needful to attain the desired objectives I have mentioned, shall use debt-free money, money that can be spent, not lent into circulation, debt-free money by spending which the Canadian government can, first, establish and maintain stable and equitable price and wage structures; second, stimulate production; and, third, provide adequate markets to consume Canadian production?

Will the minister pledge himself to the use of such debt-free money? I maintain that if the minister does not dare or does not feel himself free to rise in his place in this house and answer yes to every one of these questions, then he is not prepared to make good the promises which he implied in the fine passages which I quoted at the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. POULIOT: At six o'clock we were speaking of the mobilization board. It comes under this item because, very often, matters are submitted by the army to the mobilization board which are under the Minister of Labour, and the mobilization board makes a ruling which is asked for by the army, so that the board is used as an army board. Of course, there are cases of recruits sent by the district magistrate to the camp, and their case is not settled by the mobilization board. But if the recruit, the N.R.M.A. soldier, puts his application before the board for a postponement and the board declines it, he then goes to the camp and asks his commanding officer for leave, and the commanding officer may say, "We will refer the matter to the board," so that the board is the appeal court with respect to its own decisions. That is not sense.

I have received letters from headquarters in which it is stated that if farmers and lumbermen are denied leave from the army it is because the mobilization board has refused to give it. I would prefer the decision to be made by the commanding officer and the matter not submitted to the board only pro forma when the army is not bound to follow the recommendation of the board, as it was before. It is only a farce. It is better for the army to take its own responsibility, and then the matter would be divided between two classes of recruits, those who have already been doing some training in the camp, and those who had no training.

That being said, I come to conscription as it is understood by different people. By the word "conscription" some people understand conscription for overseas only, while others understand conscription for overseas and for the home front, and still others—those who believe that Elliott Little was right—understand by conscription national selective service which has been established in virtue of our mobilization act.

Conscription cannot be one-sided, and the hon. member for Parkdale has been persistent in this matter. We need reinforcements for the army. Undoubtedly the more exposed the army is, the more reinforcements will be asked for. But that is not all. The idea of national selective service is this—and I am the more at ease in speaking of it because many hon. members have indulged in great praise of Mr. Little. The understanding of Mr. Little is that the war effort to be complete should be well balanced; and if it is one-sided, if conscription is only for the army, it will always be one-sided and will never be well balanced.

It is very simple; it is elementary. Many people have played on words and left others under a false impression, and that is why I have asked a question which is quite clear. Indeed, I am much surprised that it was not answered at once yesterday, because, although it seemed lengthy, all the information that was asked for in that question should have been given to each member of parliament at the beginning of each session, in order that we might have been in a position to understand the working of national selective service.

Although I have many friends in the army and some relatives, too, and I try to do the best I can for them while they are there, I have the deep conviction that national selective service is doomed unless all draftees, N.R.M.A. soldiers, whether they have had previous training or not, should be put under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. And unless the Minister of Labour is the big boss of the whole show and is in a position to tell the farmer, the fisherman or the railwayman, and all others in essential industry, "You are called by the army, but you shall not go because you are required where you are now"; if conscription had been explained in that way to the Canadian people there would have been no friction or national disunity; we would have had unity.

The people are not afraid to work; they are willing to work. But they do best in jobs in which they are experienced, and when you take them away from essential war-time jobs, where they are rendering good service to the state, and put them in the army to drill the whole day, they do not give the same service.

This is the point I make, and I hope the hon. member for Parkdale, who is a leading citizen of this province, will understand our point of view in that regard. I say the same thing to hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house who are not affected by prejudice, who are open-minded enough to consider the best interests of this country. That is why I insist once more to-day that all men who have some practical experience in any essential industry, and who are not needed in a technical capacity in the army, be put under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour as a judge to put them wherever they will serve the country the better. Otherwise national selective service would be a farce. Would it be impossible to have useful reinforcements for the army overseas?

With regard to the reinforcements for the army overseas, what is the eighth army? It is made up of Canadians and Hindus. What is the fifth army? It is made up of Canadians and Americans. It is time that the English people brought reinforcements to the Canadian forces who are fighting overseas. I do not want to scandalize anybody, but I ask you, Mr. Chairman, how is it that Canada has to do the whole thing and the other people look from their ivory tower upon us?

Mr. ROWE: That is laughable.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend laughs.

Mr. ROWE: Who would not laugh at that?

Mr. POULIOT: That shows how biased and how prejudiced the hon. member is; how blind he is, and how it is impossible for him to understand matters as they should be understood. I remember what he said about farmers. He said that farmers should be exempted, yes. He has spoken exactly as I have done in a speech he made in this house. He has spoken a lot for the farmers; but when there was a demand to act, shoo, he was voting against the farmer, and the same applies to all hon. members who have declared themselves as true friends of the farmers. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and the others were all for the farmer in words when they were speaking in this committee, just the same as they have been for the farmers before; but when there was a vote on an amendment that I moved along with an hon. friend of mine; when the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains brought in an amendment supported by another hon. member, and when the hon. member for Gaspé brought in an amendment, they all voted against it. They were all for the plebiscite, all for the mobilization act. They were afraid to act and vote for the defence of the farmer, for the defence of everybody who is engaged in an essential industry. That is why the people of this country will not believe in Bracken. They will say: "If his promises are no better than what is done by his supporters in the house, what can we expect of him? We will drop him as we have dropped Bennett, Meighen and all the others." But I want my party to do better than that. I want my party to understand the troubles of the farmers and to do something for them. That is why I make an earnest appeal to the government. If the Minister of National Defence does not accept my views now, I hope there will be a majority of the members of the cabinet who will do so in due course and, it is to be hoped, in the near future.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the minister a question. I have just opened a letter which I received this afternoon and which is addressed to myself and dated February 26, 1944. It reads as follows:

Dear sir,

At the meeting of the Peterborough active army auxiliary, Thursday of this week, one of the members brought to the attention of those present the fact that the wounded in hospital in Italy and in England were not receiving their mail or parcels from home until they were discharged from hospital and had rejoined their unit. This was confirmed by other members in attendance and it was put in the form of a motion that a letter be written to you asking if you would be kind enough to bring this matter of the distribution or delivery of mail to the boys in hospital in Italy and England to the proper authorities in the hope that something could be worked out to improve this situation. The members felt that their sons and husbands had greater need of cheerful letters and consoling parcels when they were confined in hospital than when they were with their companions in camp. It was with this in mind that I was authorized to write this letter to you.

E. Alda Ovens,
Corresponding secretary of the Peterborough Active Army Auxiliary.

I know the Postmaster General spoke on matters of this kind yesterday, but I do not think he mentioned letters going into hospitals. I wondered if it was a fact that the mail was held up and kept in the unit until the man returned. Will the minister answer that?

With regard to internment operations, last year the expenditures were about $8,430,000. This year the estimate is about $3,730,000. There is a difference there of over $4,000,000. Will the minister tell us why there is that difference and if it is caused partly by the fact that some of those prisoners are working in different camps and projects throughout this country?

The next item has to do with the inspection board of United Kingdom and Canada. Last year the amount was $10,600,000. This year it is reduced by only $11,000. I understand that production has been cut considerably in the plants. Why is the figure held as high this year?

There is another item further down that has to do with the dependents' allowance board. I know of a soldier overseas who married a woman a few years ago. This woman had a daughter by a husband who had died. At the time of the woman's second marriage her daughter was four years old. The woman is receiving assigned pay from her husband and dependents' allowance for herself. She is not allowed anything for her daughter. The dependents' allowance board say it is not the soldier's daughter, but the wife's daughter. They will not allow anything for that child. Can anything be done in a case like that?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall take my hon. friend's questions in reverse order. With regard to dependents' allowance, as I understand the regulation the board are authorized to award an allowance in the case of a child—in this case it is the daughter of the wife—if the husband has been supporting the child or has adopted the child. If I remember correctly, it is in the discretion of the board. Apparently they have exercised their discretion and for some reason they have not granted dependents' allowance on account of this child. If my hon. friend will give me the case I shall look into it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The soldier is overseas. It would be pretty hard for him to adopt the child now, although he has been supporting the child for eight years or more.

Mr. RALSTON: Section 97 (e) is the governing section:

. . . and shall, at the discretion of the board, include a child, even though not legally adopted, providing a married applicant has assumed in his own home the care and maintenance of said child for a reasonable period prior to his appointment or enlistment, during which period he has continuously wholly maintained such child and was so maintaining such child at the date of his appointment or enlistment, and continues to do so after his appointment or enlistment.

The discretion is there. If my hon. friend will send me the details of the case I shall look into it.

My hon. friend asked a question with regard to the inspection board and pointed out that there is no real reduction in the estimates of the inspection board, notwithstanding the fact that, as he suggests, production is down.

The estimate has been made at approximately the same figure as last year. That is simply precautionary. It is quite true that production will be down, although my hon. friend will understand that a great many things which are produced in this fiscal year will be inspected in the next fiscal year. All I can say to my hon. friend is that it is simply for the purpose of making ample allowance for the board.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then there is a chance that the expenditure will be considerably less than this?

Mr. RALSTON: There is a chance that it may be less. Then the reason for the reduction in the estimate for internment operations and refugee camps is the fact that pay and allowances, amounting to something like $3,000,000, for the camp staff are included this year under section A, army services, under the pay and allowances item, and the further fact that the number of civilian and Japanese internees is considerably reduced this year.

My hon. friend asked with regard to letters to soldiers in hospitals. I can tell him that the practice is not to retain letters in the unit when it is possible to find the address of the soldier. The committee will understand that the soldier may be wounded and evacuated either to a British hospital or perhaps eventually to a Canadian hospital. Returns are made from that hospital first to the second echelon and then back to the unit, and it takes some time for them to get to the unit. I do not know how long this boy was in hospital; but it may be quite possible that he would not get his mail until he came out, subject to this, that if the relatives had followed the instructions which are given in the casualty telegram which is sent out, and had marked the letters to the soldier "in hospital", the mail would not go to the unit but would go direct to the second echelon or to the records office, where it would be readdressed immediately to the hospital. In any event I can assure my hon. friend that it is not the practice to hold mail in the unit.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the case suggested yesterday by the Postmaster General some mail took ninety days to get to the soldiers in Italy. That mail would have left here before the casualty occurred, and the persons sending it could not be guided by the casualty telegram. What would happen to that mail; would it be held in the unit?

Mr. RALSTON: No. After the man has become a casualty the unit immediately forwards the mail to the second echelon, or at least to the central record office, where they would find out where the soldier is actually situated. The Postmaster General mentioned ninety days, but he was illustrating the possibility of mail taking that long when it proceeded by slow convoy from here to the United Kingdom and from the United Kingdom to the Mediterranean. I would hope there were not very many cases of that kind.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I believe that included parcels also.

Mr. RALSTON: That would be so in the case of parcels.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister look into the matter further and see that there is no undue delay in having the mail forwarded to these boys?

Mr. RALSTON: I certainly will keep after it. Last night the Postmaster General mentioned that preference is given, as my hon. friend knows, to casualties in hospitals, but of course he was referring, as my hon. friend points out, to mail actually marked "in hospital"; otherwise it would go to the unit.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I was informed by Colonel Underwood, who has the responsibility for overseas mail, that it is necessary for the service man when he is transferred from one camp to another to sign a card stating where his mail is to be forwarded; perhaps that had special reference to air force personnel. If that applies to the air force, however, I presume it would apply also to the army; and if a man fails to do that, the mail continues to pile up at his last designated address. It seems to me that the service, the air force or the army if this applies there, should assume responsibility with respect to every individual at a particular address, to see that the mail is forwarded to the new address. The members of the air force are not allowed to tell their families their new addresses; they are prohibited from giving the address of the station at which they are located, let alone giving any advance notice as to where they are to be transferred. According to my information the whole responsibility rests upon the individual service man to state where he is to be moved and where his mail is to be readdressed.

Mr. RALSTON I shall leave my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air to deal with the air force regulations, because I know nothing about them. As far as the army is concerned, as my hon. friend knows a man is entitled to give his relatives his new address, that is to say the name of the new unit to which he is going, so that that situation does not apply. Further than that, the postal corps attached to that unit will forward the mail if they find that the man has moved, so that the mail will chase the man around until it finally reaches him. It does not pile up in the unit to which he was attached.

There are perhaps one or two other points I should mention while I am dealing with these matters. I would refer to only one point in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata. I do not want this house or this country to get any idea that Canadians form the majority or any large part of the fifth army. There are a certain number of Canadians attached to the fifth army, but that army is composed of British and United States soldiers, while the eighth army is composed of British and Canadian soldiers. I think the remarks of the hon. member, which would suggest that the British are not in this war in Italy, do a grievous wrong to a people who have been in this war from the very beginning, a country which has given more than any other country, I think, to help make success possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are there no Canadians in the fifth army?

Mr. RALSTON: A few; one unit. At a time when Britain was short of everything she sent her men and her equipment to different fronts, though she could ill afford to do so. We Canadians are proud of the fact that the first Canadian division was in Britain and was the key of the force which was holding that citadel; but that citadel was not held simply by the Canadian forces alone. It was held because of the stout-heartedness and fortitude of the British people at that time, because of their willingness to run risks in order to see to it that the enemy was not allowed to come closer but was kept at bay on different fronts; I am thinking particularly of the Mediterranean fronts, in Greece, in Crete and in North Africa.

Then the hon. member for Lethbridge put certain questions which he wanted me to answer specifically and categorically. I only wish to say that in the first place I think the hon. member knows that the questions with which he was dealing were not germane to the items before the committee. There will be a time to discuss rehabilitation. In the remarks I made the other afternoon I was dealing with the effort which the forces themselves were putting forward in order to see to it that while men were in the army they were made as fit as possible to take up civilian avocations, and I was indicating the kind of machinery, the committees and the sort of administration being set up by the forces for that purpose. I only say to my hon. friend that if he will read the speech from the throne he will find indicated there the scope of the measures which the government intend to bring down in connection with the matter of rehabilitation. As I said the other night, I am not in a position, nor do I propose to make any announcement with regard to the extent of that policy, but the measures will speak for themselves when they are before the house.

The hon. member for Renfrew South spoke of the pulhems system. I know what he said, and when he speaks in connection with a matter of this kind I regard what he says as being entitled to special attention. He said that more consideration should be given to the man's statement. As a physician of very long standing himself, I am sure that that advice comes from his own experience in diagnosing the condition of patients. I know nothing about it, but it sounds like common sense that attention should be given to the history given by the patient. I will also agree that that history has to be checked up, having regard to the clinical treatment.

The hon. member asked whether consideration had been given to an amalgamation of the medical services of the armed forces. Further consideration is not being given to it. It has been considered many times, and it is considered that that action would not contribute to efficiency or economy in personnel. Consideration might be given to a revision of the organization of all federal medical services when the war is over. But the special needs of the three armed services make it essential that the medical officers be trained in methods of examinations and treatment peculiar to the disabilities and personalities to be served.

Another point which the committee must consider is the geographical consideration contributing to the need for a separate type of service. For instance, air force personnel are widely scattered from military camps. You cannot make a combination of those services, because it is simply geographically and physically impossible to do so. In the field of hospitalization, and the common use of medical services, the duplication of services—and I think my hon. friend will agree in this—has to a large extent been successfully avoided by means of the wartime hospitalization committee. My hon. friend knows consultant and specialist services are used in common by all four medical services.

Then, he asked with regard to the report of the medical assignment and procurement board. There is a misapprehension with regard to that matter. The report which has been handed to the government, and to me, because I happen to be the minister through whom the board reports, is not a report of the medical assignment and procurement board, but is, as my hon. friend probably knows, a report of regional committees, appointed to make surveys on different subjects. That is, they are committees of physicians throughout the dominion.

In the document which was handed in there is no report of the board, as a board. This report consists of surveys which contain a very great deal of valuable information, and consists of a great number of recommendations which have been made by the various subcommittees or regional committees appointed to deal with each particular subject. There is a committee, I think, on nursing, a committee on hospitalization, a committee on war-time manpower and so on.

Mr. McCANN: Were those reports of the different regional committees coordinated?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know just what my hon. friend means by "coordinated."

Mr. McCANN: Integrated.

Mr. RALSTON: The central board itself has never had each of those reports and said, "We approve this, and we do not approve that." They are all separate reports. The question as to whether they shall be tabled is under consideration. I am strongly disposed to have them tabled, because I think they contain information which will be of general value not only to the services, but also to the medical profession which has contributed in their preparation, and in gathering the data. They would also have a great value to the public.

As a matter of fact, I can tell the committee that I asked the secretary of the board if he would have prepared for the board a summary of these reports in order that they might be in readable form, with the idea that, after consideration was given, and if the decision was made to table the reports, they could be tabled in full. The summaries would be there for people to read, for the use of the press, or for anyone who cared to read them. That matter is under consideration, and I expect it will be determined shortly.

The hon. member for Parkdale spoke with regard to reinforcements. I do not think I can add anything to what I said as reported at pages 440 and 441 of Hansard. We have long since gone past those items. My hon. friend has brought it up to-night. I say to him I have nothing to add and nothing to take back from the information I gave the committee at that time. I shall not take the time of the committee to read what I said, but I put it as succinctly as I possibly could. It is plain, and I think it is clear. I think the only doubt my hon. friend has is as to whether or not sufficient provision has been made for casualties. On that I can only refer him to what I have already said, namely, that after consultation with those who, I think, know best, and having regard to the circumstances which are likely to arise, it is thought that the provision for casualties is sufficient. I have told him, as I told the committee, that at the present time the pool in the United Kingdom is well up to the plan, to full strength, and that that pool will be reduced as casualties unfortunately occur. In order to maintain that pool, or to replenish it, we are budgeting for 4,000 men a month during the year, and if those 4,000 men a month are realized it will mean that at the end of the year after casualties have been incurred—if they are casualties of not more than the scale which has been laid down—the pool overseas will be maintained at adequate strength, and the number in Canada will remain practically undiminished.

There is a number in Canada, as I have told the committee, of some 60,000 general service personnel suitable for overseas service, in training centres and in units as at the end of March this year. That is our estimate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are those volunteers?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, those are volunteers. Then, as I say, those men will be withdrawn and gradually sent overseas at the rate of approximately 4,000 a month. We are budgeting for an intake of something like a similar amount. If that intake is realized it will mean that the pool overseas—if the estimate of casualties is not exceeded—will remain, and the number in Canada will remain exactly the same. If that intake goes down, that is to say if there is a falling off toward the end of the year, it will mean that toward the end of the year that pool overseas will be maintained but the pool in Canada will be reduced by the deficiency. I think that is as frank as I can be with regard to that.

I also add that there still remain in Canada about 50,000 N.R.M.A. personnel who would be available for reinforcements, provided the emergency arose, and the necessary action were taken. The hon. member's quarrel was that action was not taken immediately, and of course that is where he differs from some of the rest of us.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask one question? The minister said in connection with a question I raised last night almost at the conclusion of the sitting that there were 73,000 of N.R.M.A. men in Canada. He now says there are 60,000. I presume there is an explanation for the difference between the two figures?

Mr. RALSTON: There is, I said 60,000, and that is a low figure. I should have said that in mentioning the number which might be available to send overseas I was counting only 50,000 of them.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is, 50,000 of the 73,000?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, 50,000 of the 73,000. My hon. friend asked about the 73,000, and I have the figures here to give him. About mid-January there were practically 73,000 N.R.M.A. personnel on strength. Of that number forty-seven per cent were in operational troops in Canada; fifteen per cent were in non-operational troops, twenty per cent in training, eight per cent in depot reselection and disposal units and seven per cent on leave. That means that they are on extended leave, in connection with forestry, mining and so on. That seven per cent is about 5,000, so that the net number in Canada apart from those on leave is something like 68,000. Of these 68,000 I am suggesting that about 50,000 would be medically fit for overseas service.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not all of the 73,000 are A-1.

Mr. RALSTON: I should have said also, and I am now reminded that this number of which I am speaking is not simply in Canada alone. It is in the north American area, in the western hemisphere. There are some in Labrador, some in the Caribbean, some in Newfoundland and a few in Alaska.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has mentioned troops in other parts of the world, and in that connection there is a matter I wish to bring up before his appropriations are passed. In the newspapers of Canada this morning the Associated Press carried an interview with an army intelligence officer of the United States, on which the minister may have some information. The news item is as follows:

> A United States army intelligence officer said to-night loose talk, mostly radiating from Seattle, enabled the Japanese to withdraw thousands of men and vast quantities of material out of Kiska last August to leave invading United States and Canadian forces "with a hollow victory tantamount to defeat."

He went on to say:

> Common was the knowledge in Seattle that we planned to attack Kiska and, prior to the invasion, unauthorized persons, both military and civilian, openly disclosed the date, August 15.
> As a result the Japs got out, voluntarily. Not one remained on the island when our troops arrived at three o'clock in the morning. Some scattered machine-gun fire the day before, reported by our reconnaissance fliers, indicated presence of hostile troops then. Even these were gone when we got there.
> They knew we were coming—and when. So accurately and so far in advance were the Japs tipped off that, had they chosen to implement their forces, they might have annihilated us.

I raise the question at this time because it is apropos of this appropriation, though I was particularly pleased to note that no reference was made to any leaks as far as our Canadian people are concerned. Leaks are a matter of great concern; and I would ask the minister if he has any comment to make in connection with this dispatch, because it does seem to me that this is a good time for the minister and the government to caution the Canadian people on this particular point which is perhaps more important at the present time than any other because, not so much on account of what we are saying in Canada, but because of incorrect statements made by people in high positions outside Canada that this war will be over in 1944 so far as Germany is concerned, it is important that the Canadian people should realize that we are a long way yet from winning this war, and therefore we should as a people realize that loose talk cannot be tolerated now any more than it could be tolerated two or three years ago. I am not so sure but that people in this country are a little prone to treat the whole question of the war a little more lightly now than we as the Canadian people should. Here is a case in point of what loose talk can do. I can quite understand that loose talk may be just thoughtlessness. Nevertheless, whether it be merely thoughtlessness or by design, loose talk has the same result, and I was astounded to realize that because of loose talk in another country we might have had a very serious situation facing the Kiska expedition.

I shall have accomplished my purpose in rising to-night if I can bring to the attention of the government and of the house and of the Canadian people the importance of seeing to it that we maintain our war fervour, if you like, at this particular time because I realize, as I think hon. members and the government and the people generally do, that we are a long way from the end, and that this is no time for us to relax in our efforts. I think it is time the people of Canada recognize our responsibility in the matter of loose talk, and I should like to hear from the minister on that because I think it is important from the point of view of our morale and from the point of view of our national security as well, because the more optimistic our people become, and perhaps without proper justification, it is only natural that the looser their talk, the more careless their utterance tends to become.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend and I very often do not agree, but I should like to go on record now as supporting everything he has just said.

In the first place, with regard to the dispatch which he has read, while I do not wish that we should pat ourselves on the back, I think we have done a particularly good job, and here I am speaking not only for the army, but for all the staffs and for the Canadian people generally, and particularly the people of western Canada, when I say that I do not think security was ever more loyally observed than it was in connection with the Kiska operation. I mean that the people who saw the boats being loaded and knew that troops were being withdrawn and who were bound to get some idea of the direction in which those troops were going, kept their mouths shut. At least it never got to the ears of our intelligence branches that there had been any leaks in connection with that expedition. That went for the relatives of the boys who missed their mail and knew that something must be doing, and for the boys themselves who loyally observed security regulations. I do think that Kiska was an example of staff work and team work by the army, the navy and the air force, because they were all in it, and civilians, too, which could well be emulated in operations of the future.

With regard to my hon. friend's other point, I endeavoured when I was making my opening statement to the committee to emphasize as strongly as I could my own conviction that the idea that the war is over is perhaps the one factor that will be the strongest in lengthening the war of any factor of which one can conceive. When people get the idea that the war is over, there is sure to be, as my hon. friend says, a relaxation, a feeling that we do not need to work quite as hard to win. That is exactly what our enemies are working for and playing for, to get us in a state of complacency or to get us tired out and tired of it all, which might give them an opportunity to force or exact or obtain some better terms than the terms now facing them of unconditional surrender. As I said at the opening of the last war loan, if I were giving a motto to the people of Canada for 1944—there used to be a preacher in our church who gave his people a text for the year on New Year's day—my text to the people of Canada in the year 1944 would be: Don't let up. I agree with my hon. friend that we can only keep up the pressure in connection with men, equipment, and money if we don't let up, and if we restrain ourselves in the matters we would like to talk about, restrain ourselves from giving any inside information that we may have and would like to communicate to somebody else to convince them that we are in on the know. We should endeavour at all times to restrain ourselves from indulging in that very agreeable form of self-exultation, and just keep any information we have to ourselves until this show is over. I do not think there is any time in history when coming events have been foreshadowed in the headlines the way they have been in this war. Sometimes I feel like deploring the amount of publicity which is given to what are regarded as future events. Of course it is so, in these days of rapid communication, and when so many people have to be "in on it", that a great many people do know, and a democratic people, particularly, demand information and consider that they ought to be "let in" as far as their leaders can let them in. I only hope that the desire to satisfy that legitimate longing to have information in a war in which people have everything invested, not only their money but their men as well, will not lead anybody to go too far and endanger lives and the success of operations by giving more information than is absolutely necessary to accomplish the purpose which I have suggested.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There are two matters which I should like to place before the committee and, perhaps, have a statement with regard to them from the minister. The first has to do with a man in my constituency of Cumberland who was called up and placed in C category; who lived on the farm with his brother, his father being dead; who had a postponement, and who worked in the woods cutting wood and getting some logs, which he was anxious to have hauled out while the snow was still on the ground. He was called to Halifax, and it would now appear, under another number and in the name of another person. He was accepted by the army and placed in the service under the name of Harry Blake Fraser, number G15883, his real name being Harry Brenton Fraser and his number G15419. He is now in the army under this other name, although he had exemption as a farmer and, as I said, was working in the woods getting out logs and lumber. The question is whether he is under military authority, whether he must remain there or whether he can go home. His mother writes me a pitiful letter; she herself is in ill health; there are two other brothers in the services; he has been retained in Halifax for some weeks and, as far as I know, is still there.

The other matter to which I wish to refer is that of hotel accommodation in Halifax. I have information that the Hillside hotel, which was mentioned this afternoon by the minister and the hon. member for York-Sunbury, has been vacated by the Canadian Women's Army Corps and is just barely occupied at the present time. In view of the scarcity of hotels and stopping places in Halifax, and the fact that the Halifax hotel and the Waverley hotel have also been taken over and that the King Edward hotel is used for military purposes, could not Hillside Hall be made available for the use of the public and transients, to accommodate private citizens? People who have business in Halifax, people who are going to Halifax to see members of their family sail, have no place to stay. Many of them have to stay up all night, and some are ordered not even to come to Halifax. If the facts are as represented to me, this Hillside hotel was taken over by the department at an initial cost of $50,000, plus additional expenditures bringing the total at the present time up to $89,868.63; and as I said, the information I have is that it has been practically vacated as regards the purpose for which it was first secured.

Mr. RALSTON: In reference to the case to which my hon. friend has referred, I would think that the only thing the young man can do is to make application in the regular way. It happens to be a different name, but it is the same individual.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): No; another individual and another number.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not catch it, then.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): His real number is G15419, and the number under which he is being held is G15883.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understood the matter, it was the same individual.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I assume it is two men. He has his own number. He is not in the army with a uniform. The man is being held under another name and another number.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will send me particulars of the case I shall look into it.

With regard to Hillside Hall, I do not know how many people it accommodates; I would think perhaps fifty at the outside.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think it accommodates more than that.

Mr. RALSTON: One hundred, say?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): My return says, ten officers and 200 C.W.A.C.

Mr. RALSTON: It would not accommodate 200 civilians. I can say to my hon. friend that I do not think there is the slightest chance in the world of the department being able to give up that property. We have searched the city and done everything we possibly could in order to get accommodation for the personnel which is required there. We had a great many protests at the time this was done, but the war was on and the accommodation was needed, so that we just had to take it. My hon. friend knows we built on the cathedral grounds huts to accommodate personnel, rather than take more property of that kind. I generally try to hold out hope of consideration, but I am afraid I would not be justified in raising hopes in this case.

Mr. ADAMSON: The question came up just now about complacency. I think that is the term for it. We had a statement this afternoon in this chamber that thirteen basic training centres had been closed. Yet we are told by the Prime Minister, who goes into histrionics about it, that the war is certainly a long way from being won. I am prepared to agree, certainly, that most of the fighting is yet to come, but the statement that thirteen basic training centres have been closed simply defies analysis if we are yet to have our greatest number of casualties. It seems to me that some further statement as to the reason for the closing of these basic training centres is needed. Presumably we are to attack the fortress of Europe. This will be tough, tougher than we probably imagine at the present time. Yet we have decreased our recruiting in, I think, all three services. I am not sure about the navy, but certainly the air force has stopped recruiting aircrew. And we have closed thirteen basic training centres. It seems to me that there must be a further explanation of this very important point.

With reference to the question of internment operations, which comes under this item, the minister has given an explanation as to why we have a reduction in costs. The cost of operations is reduced five million dollars. Actually it is not reduced five million dollars, but the item is reduced by that amount because of the transfer of salaries. Are prisoners of war paid—the ones working in the lumber camps and those engaged in manufacturing operations? There are several plants in my riding—I am thinking of one in particular—where prisoners of war are actually working in industry. What base rates are they being paid, and what regulations under the Geneva convention does this come under?

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking of pay and allowances of guards.

Mr. ADAMSON: I know; that is why this item is reduced. I realize that. I know, however, these men are working in industry and presumably receiving civilian rates of pay. I came across a case the other day where prisoners of war actually had to pay dues to a union because they were working in civilian occupations. This is a United States item and it is reported in a New York paper. I quote from an editorial:

> Almost anybody would at first give way to the impulse to condemn such a situation as that in Bridgetown, New Jersey, where German prisoners are expected to pay dues to an A.F. of L. local of amalgamated meat cutters and butchers' workmen. On second thought, however, that policy has bright possibilities.

I will not read the rest of the story, but here we have a situation where German prisoners of war are actually paying dues.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not in Canada?

Mr. ADAMSON: No.

Mr. MITCHELL: Stay back home.

Mr. ADAMSON: Nevertheless I think we should have some clarification of the method of paying prisoners of war in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: I would ask my hon. friend, as I did the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, to be good enough to defer these questions until the Department of Labour appropriation comes up. This has nothing to do with the item before us. This item has to do with the administration of the camps. It has no reference to employment of prisoners of war, nor has it anything to do with the policy as to why they are there. It is not under the Department of National Defence at all.

Mr. ADAMSON: The prisoners I speak of are actually in an internment camp.

Mr. RALSTON: All we are interested in is supplying the guards. The internees are sent out under order in council, and the Minister of Labour is making the necessary arrangements with regard to the matter. I only ask the committee to keep to the subject.

Mr. ADAMSON: But does that apply to men in special camps cutting wood—the forestry camps? There are special forestry camps, I understand.

Mr. RALSTON: I think so.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do they come under the Minister of Labour or under the Department of National Defence?

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. RALSTON: If they are receiving pay they come under the Minister of Labour; that is to say, the rate of pay comes under him. I believe my colleague will remember some discussions with regard to this matter, which has to do with external affairs and the Department of Labour.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am glad it has been brought up because we at least have that clarification of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are to my knowledge no prisoners of war in Canada paying dues into any union. The secretary of labour in the United States will take the onus for that situation. When this item comes under my estimates I shall be glad to satisfy my hon. friend with reference to the work done by prisoners of war in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the question of the cost of these prisoners of war camps a matter altogether under external affairs?

Mr. RALSTON: As a matter of fact, the arrangement is made through external affairs with the British government. The actual money spent for the building of the camps was spent by my department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the manning of the camps?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: One more question. This was discussed at some length this afternoon. I refer to the question of clothing allowance for the soldier, sailor or airman leaving the service. I was in receipt to-day of a communication from the Toronto rehabilitation committee giving what they considered the cost of adequate clothing for a soldier leaving the army, and I think it would be interesting to the committee to have that information now. One paragraph of the letter reads:

> As to clothing, you will notice the committee recommend $35 for men with less than six months' service—

Mr. RALSTON: I hate to interrupt my hon. friend again because he generally sticks closely to the text, but this has nothing to do with dependents' allowance. It is a clothing allowance.

Mr. ADAMSON: But the clothing allowance was brought up this afternoon.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not hear it brought up.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes; it was discussed at some length.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is mistaken. I was filing an answer to one hon. member with regard to a case in Montreal, the complaint being that the man had been arrested and was being persecuted by the civil police. But there was no discussion of clothing allowance.

Mr. ADAMSON: I will bring this up under the estimates of the Minister of Pensions and National Health. There is, however, one further thing I would suggest to the minister. It directly affects both ministers, and it is so important I feel it should be taken up on the estimates of the Minister of National Defence. A man in Italy is permanently wounded; he loses a foot. He is taken into a military hospital in Italy until he is well enough to travel. He is then put on a hospital ship and brought back to military hospital in Canada, and all that time he is receiving the pay and allowance of his rank. Then, after a certain period, he is boarded out of the army and sent to a Department of Pensions and National Health hospital where he is put on hospital allowance. The air force does not do that. When he is put on hospital allowance—

Mr. RALSTON: The air force has nothing to do with it.

Mr. ADAMSON: What happens is this. While still incapacitated, while still in hospital, the man is transferred to the Department of Pensions and National Health hospital and his pay is drastically reduced, particularly if he is an officer. I submit that a man, no matter how long he is in hospital, should be paid the full pay of his rank until such time as he is discharged as a walking case. You treat a man as a hero when he is overseas and when he is in a Department of National Defence hospital, but when you send him to the Department of Pensions and National Health hospital you cut his pay. If you are going to cut his pay when he is sent to that hospital it is logical that it should be stopped immediately he is wounded. I make this plea to the minister, and I make it seriously, until the man is completely discharged, well and able to enter into civilian life, keep him on the pay and allowances of his rank. Do not cut him off when you transfer him from—

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend suggesting he be kept on the strength of the army?

Mr. ADAMSON: No; I suggest his pay should be continued.

Mr. RALSTON: That is quite a different matter. My hon. friend, I am sure, admits he should be struck off the strength of the army.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: May I remind my hon. friend that he was mistaken when he made a statement the other night on this subject, having overlooked the change which had been made in the hospital allowances given to a man hospitalized after he is discharged. I read those rates into the record at that time. I think most of the committee feels that the subject has been pretty well discussed under this item, even though it does not fall under my department. I would ask my hon. friend for the sake of regularizing the proceedings to bring this matter up under the appropriate item in the Department of Pensions and National Health estimates.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to say this as a final word. I feel that it is the function of the Department of National Defence to see to it that until the man is completely discharged to civilian life he should not be penalized after he has passed out of their hands into the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. KNOWLES: Apropos of the well deserved compliment which the minister paid a few minutes ago to the men in the Kiska forces, I should like to take just a few minutes to ask a question. If the minister will recall my remarks of some time ago he will remember that on February 17 I discussed with him the matter of income tax deductions from these men. I was grateful for the studied hearing he gave to our representation at that time. Since I discussed the matter in the committee I have made additional representations to the minister by letter. I have also been in touch with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue. My question is: have developments in this matter reached such a stage that the minister can tell us whether the men to whom I refer will have their full exemption in regard to income tax while they were in Kiska?

Mr. RALSTON: I repeat to my hon. friend what I said the other night, when the matter was under discussion, that full attention and full consideration was being given to the matter. When it has been decided upon, an announcement will be made. I do not think it will be very long before the announcement is made.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Early in the discussion I asked a question about the cost of clothing for soldiers. I thought the minister was going to bring down the answer. I think the cost of clothing a soldier when he joins the army should be figured out.

After the lengthy discussion on this department I am still very much confused about our man-power problem. I read in the press to-day that our friends to the south the United States of America are talking of drafting another million men, fathers and married men up to quite an age. I also read that a great many more women in Britain were to be called up. With what I have been learning here of Canada it just does not add up. Our armed services are going to reduce recruiting.

Last evening the minister rather took me to task when I asked what recruiting cost annually in this country. I would remind you, Mr. Chairman, that we have a dual system for our armed services. Along with recruiting that costs $1,500,000 a year we have the draft system. I think that draft system is on the down grade at the present time. In 1942-43 we enrolled 60,000 men under that system. That dropped to 25,000 in the following year, and for the first nine months of this year it is some 19,000. Of that number about 3,000 have gone active; another 6,500 have been discharged, and there are about 5,300 N.R.M.A. men who are out on extended leave. This, along with the advice that goes out that recruiting will not be so active in future, certainly instils in the minds of the Canadian people a state of complacency; that the war is about won. I agree that the minister does not think that is so. But I say that impression is created throughout Canada. You cannot get away from it.

While I am speaking about complacency may I refer to an incident that happened when I was at home last fall? I came in from the farm one day and was informed that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had just announced that an item had come from the office of the Prime Minister to the effect that they were going to ask Canadians to take an hour or two to celebrate the victory in Italy and Sicily. I must confess that I had a cold chill when I was told that. In fact I said, "I cannot believe it."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They cancelled it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I said, "You know what I think about our—"

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was a faux pas.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): "—Prime Minister as a war leader. I cannot credit that statement." I am happy to think that before very long another message came over the air which was —as a result of a statement from Washington that President Roosevelt had said that this was certainly no time for celebration—to the effect that the celebration was off. I am happy to think that occurred before we, as Canadians, had been humiliated.

I think it is the duty of every public official in this country, and especially those in the government, to avail themselves of every opportunity to impress upon our citizens that this war is far from won, as the minister has himself said. I feel rather frustrated about the whole situation, as I must confess. I cannot see the end of this war in sight in the near future. I think it is bad that our people are led to believe that it is nearly over. As I stated, we must keep before our people that we have a long, dark, hard pull ahead of us. I hate to think of the heartaches that I fear will take place in this country as a result of great casualties if we win this war as we should. I think that should be impressed upon the public.

As I say, the man-power situation, the recruitment for the various armed services and the draft system do not portray the seriousness of the situation. I am not able to get to the bottom of it. I am more befuddled, after listening to the remarks of the Minister of National Defence, than I was before I started, and I certainly was in a deep mystery then.

An hon. MEMBER: You always are.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That may be. I do not profess to be an armchair strategist or anything of that kind. But I have had a little experience in war, and I am prepared to take up arms again if the opportunity should arise. But I say I am quite confused. I say we are not impressing the seriousness of this whole business on the people of Canada as we should.

An hon. MEMBER: John Bracken is.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I trust that we shall not need any further recruitment, either by the draft system or voluntarily. But, as I say, it does not add up, as far as I am concerned. Along with what has been said by the minister, the leader of the opposition, and others on various occasions, I want to impress upon the people that we have a very serious task ahead of us. I am afraid it will cost this country a lot in lives. We should be impressing that seriously upon the people. I repeat, what we have learned here in the last few weeks has not borne that out.

Mr. LOCKHART: I was out of the house for a few minutes. Did the minister take cognizance of the note I sent him across the floor, and will he let me have the information about the proving ranges?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is quite a lot of damage being done.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the minister tell the committee how many officers have graduated from the allied military school at Kingston, how many are being trained there at the present time, what the purpose of it is, and where these officers are to be sent afterwards?

Mr. RALSTON: The school is being conducted in collaboration with the British war office. I think there have been three classes so far. I am speaking from memory. As I indicated to the committee the other night I think there were twenty-four in the first class. The purpose of the training of these officers is in connection with the occupation of enemy countries. I know of some officers who are already engaged in connection with that work in Italy, and who were in Sicily. My hon. friend wants to know the type of officers. I can tell him generally speaking they are of the sort who would have some knowledge of municipal government or the management of municipal public utilities. They are men who would be engineers, people of that class. Linguistic requirements are not so much a necessity. There are also some teachers, as I understand it, in connection with some special lines. Their use, generally speaking, is in connection with occupied territories.

Mr. JACKMAN: How many officers does the minister intend to train in that school altogether?

Mr. RALSTON: I was in error a moment ago in my reference to these classes; the first group has just graduated and the second is just going in now.

Mr. JACKMAN: How large is the scheme intended to be?

Mr. RALSTON: There is a school in England, a school in Canada and a school in the United States.

Mr. JACKMAN: But how many men does the minister intend to put through this school?

Mr. RALSTON: It depends upon the supply in England. Our officers are going from the Canadian army in England to the school over there, and it will depend upon how many are required altogether. We are collaborating with the British in that respect. I cannot tell my hon. friend; it may be that this school will not continue. It just depends upon how many are needed, for all we know the school in England can take all that we have available.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the length of the course?

Mr. RALSTON: Two months.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Chairman, I propose to-night to give perhaps a more detailed and comprehensive statement of the affairs of the Royal Canadian Air Force than has been my custom in past years. That is for two reasons. We have reached a phase in our war-time existence, as far as the air force is concerned, which marks the end of one part, and an important part, of our work, namely the air training, and we are on the threshold of beginning the more important part of the work, the fruition, the fulfilment of what has been going on for the past three years, namely the well prepared attempt—and I am almost sure the successful attempt—finally to wrest air supremacy over Europe from our enemies.

I have certain financial statements here. I do not wish to trouble the committee by reading them; if I have consent I will place them on Hansard and see to it that the members of the groups opposite receive copies at once. The first statement deals with the cash estimates for 1944-45, and shows that the total cash requirement of the Royal Canadian Air Force for the fiscal year 1944-45 is $1,090,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it broken down?

Mr. POWER: Yes, very much. The statement is as follows:

Royal Canadian Air Force

Cash Estimates 1944-1945

1. Total Requirements.—Total estimated cash requirements of the Royal Canadian Air Force for the fiscal year 1944-1945, is: $1,090,000,000.

2. Probable expenditure for the fiscal year 1943-1944 is: $1,189,402,327.

3. Detailed requirements for 1944-1945, compared with probable expenditure for 1943-1944, are:

	1943-1944	1944-1945	Increase or Decrease	Percent
British commonwealth air training plan	$ 474,200,502	$ 387,937,507	($86,262,995)	(18·14)
Western hemisphere operations	309,900,000	238,905,351	(70,994,649)	(22·9)
Overseas	405,301,825	463,157,142	57,855,317	(14·32)
Totals	$1,189,402,327	$1,090,000,000	($99,402,327)

It will be noted from the above that, notwithstanding an expected increase in overseas expenditures of approximately $58,000,000, there is an over-all reduction of approximately $99,000,000. This means that the British commonwealth air training plan and western hemisphere operations will require approximately $157,000,000 less than in the previous year.

I also have a statement indicating the man-power strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force each year since the beginning of the war, as follows:

Man-power Strength

Strength

Royal Canadian Air Force strength for each of the following years on the dates stated, were,—

31st August, 1939	4,061
2nd April, 1940	10,598
31st March, 1941	47,920
31st March, 1942	112,759
2nd April, 1943	170,366
18th February, 1944	206,548

Man-power requirements for the next year, that is April 1, 1944, to March 31, 1945, are 26,000.

This reduction from requirements of previous years, is largely due to the fact that groundcrew requirements have been stabilized and we have again this year, owing largely to the intensive recruiting campaign of last October, a substantial aircrew reserve in hand. In addition remustering to aircrew trades from groundcrew will yield a considerable number of aircrew. Last year 6,192 groundcrew were remustered to aircrew. This, together with the fact that there will be a reduction during the course of the year of entrants into training, lowers our aircrew requirements for the year.

Now I propose to divide this review of last year's operations into three parts:

Part 1. British commonwealth joint air training plan,

Part 2. Western hemisphere operations,

Part 3. Overseas operations.

With regard to the British commonwealth air training plan, the cash expenditures from inception are:

Fiscal year 1939-1940	$ 3,298,747
Fiscal year 1940-1941	124,354,624
Fiscal year 1941-1942	244,060,067
Fiscal year 1942-1943	401,556,818
(9 months) Fiscal year 1943-1944	339,521,105
Total for above period	$1,112,791,361
Estimated additional to March 31, 1944	134,679,397
Total estimated expenditure from inception to March 31, 1944	1,247,470,758
Estimated cash 1944-1945	387,937,507
Total estimated expenditure from inception to March 31, 1945	$1,635,408,265

These figures represent the cash which has been found and estimated still to be found by the Canadian government and are additional to contributions in kind by the United Kingdom government.

The decrease in estimated cash requirements during 1944-45, for the British commonwealth air training plan from the anticipated 1943-44 expenditures amounting to approximately $86,000,000, is chiefly attributable to reductions in capital expenditures and pay and allowances. The plan has now passed its ultimate and capital expenditures have been reduced to the practical minimum.

Certain reductions in the scope of the training organization were anticipated and these estimates give effect to these reductions. Since preparation of the estimates, however, decisions have been made which will ultimately reduce the plan still further. These further reductions cannot have an early effect on recurring expenditure as training establishments must keep in operation for the completion of the training of aircrew and groundcrew now in training. It may be noted that most aircrew courses are of approximately twelve months' duration and it is obvious that the better part of the fiscal year 1944-45 will elapse before curtailment to any worthwhile extent can be accomplished in the operation of advanced schools, which, besides being the most numerous, are also the most costly to operate.

The British commonwealth air training plan has this year reached the zenith of its development, and its effect has been felt around the world. Wherever our allied airmen fly, will be found graduates of this plan: from the antipodes to the bleak wastes of Greenland, from India to Alaska, our Canadian-trained aviators perform their daily tasks as they were so well taught to do by the thousands of men in the instructional, technical and administrative staffs of our training plan.

The spectacular and more publicized part of this plan, the production of our fighting aircrew, has continued at full flow. No demands for men of the various flying categories have been unheeded, and the continuous development of this plan has kept abreast of the requirements of the fighting fronts.

The original agreement for the British commonwealth joint air training plan entered into December 13, 1939, has been amended by supplementary agreements in June, 1942, and April, 1943. A further change was made in the agreement in December, 1943, and again in February, 1944. These changes were announced to the house in a statement made on February 16, appearing at page 535 of Hansard. I quote:

At the present time we have the capital and the necessary immediate replacements.

Our long-term war plans entail certain reductions in the numbers of entrants to aircrew training.

Consequent upon the reduction in intake of trainees, there will be a gradual and progressive closing of a certain number of training units, and schools in Canada, beginning with the Royal Air Force transferred schools. The process will be deliberate and extended over many months, and the reduction of training facilities will be geared to the requisite flow of pupils through the plan.

These changes indicate that we have reached the end of our air training expansion.

To quote General George Marshall, chief of staff of the United States army, in his report to the secretary of war, in his explanation of somewhat similar changes made in the United States army organization—

> Another factor is now operating to our advantage. We are reaching the end of the expansion; already it has been possible to reduce many training installations to a purely maintenance basis to furnish replacements for the present strength of the army. It also has been practicable, and it is highly desirable to lengthen the basic training period for soldiers and to extend the period of training for officer candidates; and most important of all, it is no longer necessary to drain units of their best officers and men to furnish trained cadres for new organizations or students for the officer candidates and technical schools.

This quotation refers to the United States army generally, but perhaps more particularly to the United States army air force, which has only recently closed seventy air training establishments.

The partners in the joint air training plan have agreed to modify our training programme so as to bring the greatest possible weight of air strength to bear on the German enemy during the critical year of the war.

Let it be well understood the expansion of training has been completed, but the expansion of the forces on the fighting fronts is still going on. That expansion will be provided for by the thousands now in the training scheme, the reduced training capacity being amply sufficient to look after the replacements when the front line cadre is filled.

We are not proposing a winding-up of the air training plan, even progressively, on the contrary we are providing, and have agreed with the United Kingdom for a continuation of the plan after March, 1945, the date on which the 1942 agreement expires, but a continuation with a reduced output, which reduced output will not be noticeable or in effect before eighteen months hence.

We are rolling up our training forces as we would a carpet. By this process of rolling from the rear, personnel will be automatically massed forward to increase the striking power of the fighting front.

Now, I certainly will be asked as to what schools will be closed and when. I have already stated that the Royal Air Force transferred schools will be the first to close, beginning about midsummer and running well into next year. With respect to others, there are many factors to be taken into consideration. Whether the property is leased or owned. Whether it is required for civilian purposes. A school in Quebec city, located in a leased property, for instance, will be closed this month. Another school located in an institution kindly placed at our disposal by the government of Ontario, and now required for agricultural purposes, will be returned as soon as possible.

Other factors to be considered will be travelling expense between types of schools; costs of operation, disturbance to civilian economy, geographical location; air training conditions, fog area or obscure visibility, air congestion, etc.

There are two methods which might be followed in bringing about this reduction. We might reduce our production by simply cutting down the number of trainees in each school and so keeping them all or nearly all open. On the other hand we might close and place on a care and maintenance basis a certain number of schools. The first course only brings about a postponement and besides is far more costly and less effective in our war effort. It keeps up overhead, staff, instructors, travelling expenses, etc., and holds people in Canada who would be better employed overseas. We have chosen the second alternative as being honest and efficient, even if, for the moment, less popular.

As to the use to which these can be put in the future, four government agencies are interested,—

(1) The post-war civil aviation committee, and from the standpoint of the public it is the most interested because the first question to be asked will be what use can be made of these expensive facilities in the development of post-war civil aviation. This committee, under the cabinet war committee, has already been charged with the study of possible post-war civilian utilization of aerodromes constructed for service purposes, when they are no longer required by the service.

(2) The second government agency is the Department of Labour, which has on several occasions written to ask that it be notified when any schools or institutions become vacant so that it may plan their use for vocational training and accommodation of trainees, and other purposes.

(3) Then there is the Department of Pensions and National Health, which may require accommodation for vocational training and perhaps for convalescent homes or rehabilitation purposes generally.

(4) Further, there is the crown assets allocation committee and the War Assets Corporation, Limited, charged with the disposal of assets, including lands and buildings no longer required by the services. As soon as a decision is reached as to the closing of individual schools, these various agencies will be notified.

During the past year, and since I made my last report to this house concerning these matters, a considerable change has taken place in the requirements of the flying services at the fighting fronts. We have now achieved a position of air superiority in men and machines, and are carrying the war to the enemy by way of our heavy bombers. This has caused the Germans to emphasize the defensive, and accordingly our ratio of losses in the lighter aircraft categories such as fighters, fighter-bombers, and medium bombers, has dropped. This has reflected itself in a change in the requirements for the production of different types of aircrew, in that an increasing proportion of our aircrew is now being diverted into the heavier types of aircraft, where they will make their blows on Hitler's Europe felt in the most effective way.

Last year, when making my report, I told you that we had already trained over 50,000 aircrew in Canada. I can tell you now that this number has risen to over 86,000. Similarly, the number trained in ground trades is now above 114,000 men and we have practically reached saturation in our requirements for ground trades, both for training establishments and for operational requirements in the western hemisphere of operations. In addition to the men required by the Royal Canadian Air Force, we have enlisted and trained over 15,000 in the women's division. Here again we have reached our peak and no further personnel are needed to bring our establishments to full strength beyond what have already been enlisted and are awaiting training, and accordingly, enlistment for the women's division of the Royal Canadian Air Force has been curtailed to the comparatively small numbers required for replacements.

We have had less trouble in the past year obtaining training aircraft than in any time in the past. In elementary trainers we have all we need and the same applies for the training aircraft used in our service schools. Operational aircraft used in training, are still in relatively scarce supply due to the requirements of the various operational theatres of war and the demands from our ever-increasing overseas participation.

There has been a practical completion of all construction necessary for the continuance of the plan, and from now on, relatively little in the way of further construction is to be expected. The requirements for repair and storage continue to increase and as the aircraft get larger, these requirements will continue to grow. This tells the story of the point the air training plan has reached to-day.

Now that the air training plan has reached its peak, I think I should say a word of thanks to all those who have contributed to its undoubted success. To officer and airman, to staff and trainees, to service and civilian personnel, and to the people of Canada who supported it. It was a truly national effort. Its fulfilment was the expression of the nation's will.

I now come to another phase of our operations, namely, western hemisphere operations; and again I ask consent of the committee to lay on the table of the house a statement of cash expenditures on western hemisphere operations since the outbreak of the war, indicating that the total estimated expenditures from September, 1939, to March 31, 1945, will be $963,053,377, and I would also explain how the reduction in expenditures of $71,000,000 this year as compared with last year is being brought about. The table and the explanation are as follows:

Western Hemisphere Operations

Cash expenditures from the outbreak of war are,
Fiscal year 1939-1940	$ 28,554,447
Fiscal year 1940-1941	50,172,423
Fiscal year 1941-1942	108,694,025
Fiscal year 1942-1943	226,827,131
(9 months) Fiscal year 1943-1944	241,614,736
Total for above period	$655,862,762
Estimated additional to March 31, 1944	68,285,264
Total estimated expenditure from September, 1939, to March 31, 1944	$724,148,026
Estimated cash 1944-1945	238,905,351
Total estimated expenditure September, 1939 to March 31, 1945.	$963,053,377

This decrease in estimated cash requirements for 1944-1945 for western hemisphere operations from anticipated expenditures for 1943-1944 amounting to approximately $71,000,000, is also mainly due to reductions in capital expenditures. The improved strategic situation has already permitted the transfer overseas of operational squadrons previously considered an essential part of the air defence of Canada. Furthermore, all major construction projects have been reviewed and, where economically feasible, they have been reduced or brought to a halt. Also, where operational possibilities warrant, certain units have been placed on a care and maintenance basis. Such curtailment in operations will eventually release man-power for overseas operations, either direct or through the training facilities of the British commonwealth air training plan.

Since I last reported to the house in May of last year the situation with respect to western hemisphere air operations have undergone considerable change. The enemy has been driven, or has been forced to withdraw his forces, to a more comfortable distance from our shores. The Japanese have been chased out of the Aleutian islands on our western flank, and a greater concentration of naval and air strength, together with new and improved weapons have forced the withdrawal of German submarine raiders to a considerable distance from our Atlantic coast line and from the gulf of St. Lawrence.

I have already explained on various occasions that the Royal Canadian Air Force engaged actively in operations against the enemy in the western hemisphere theatre is a complete and separate entity distinct from the Royal Canadian Air Force overseas and the British commonwealth air training plan.

It is history now that Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons composed of British commonwealth air training plan graduates and commanded by air veterans of the battle of Britain and the battle of Europe, operated under American command in the Aleutians coastal shipping and watching for Japanese foothold on our Pacific approaches. Blinded by the eternal fog and buffeted by the fierce and whimsical gales of that bleak corner of the continent, Royal Canadian Air Force fighter bomber pilots, with their American air comrades, developed new technique in blasting the Japanese on Attu and Kiska so that United States and Canadian naval and ground forces could move in and take over those barren bits of rock away out in the Pacific.

The successful air operation in the Aleutians was pressed to a conclusion in the face of great difficulties, not only of weather but of supply and communication. Living conditions were, of necessity rather primitive and our boys suffered at times, considerable physical discomfort. A point which is not generally realized is that the personnel of our Aleutians squadrons, were more than 2,000 miles from their home bases, in other words as far from home as if they had been serving in the European or Mediterranean theatre, and the facilities of communication and supply were nothing like those connecting the home front with the latter theatre of war.

The units in the Aleutians were the only ones in the western air command who were fortunate enough to get in their own personal punch at the Japanese but there were thousands backing them up in less glamourous activities. There were squadrons patrolling the sea lanes of the Pacific coast protecting coastal shipping and watching for Japanese raiders. There were fighter squadrons poised to repel air attacks. There was a vast construction organization, very often composed exclusively of service personnel, engaged in building new air bases in British Columbia and in the Yukon. Behind this again was a vastly improved communication and administration organization. Land line and radio communications were installed on a large scale. The Royal Canadian Air Force took over the control of all flying, civil as well as military, in the entire western region as well as throughout the busy northwest staging route north and west from Edmonton to Canol and on to Whitehorse and Alaska.

Probably hon. members and the public are more familiar with our Atlantic operations, particularly those concerned with the protection of troops and supplies moving to European theatres of war and with the unrelenting hunt for enemy submarines.

From the first Royal Canadian Air Force attack on a U-boat in October of 1941 up to the end of the calendar year, 1943, Royal Canadian Air Force operational aircraft have made a total of sixty-three attacks on enemy submarines in the Atlantic including one machine gun attack by a fighter aircraft. Of the sixty-three attacks, one half were made in 1943.

Through the acquisition of 4-engine Liberator long-range bombers, we have been able to extend the radius of air-cover from Canadian bases by something more than 200 miles. Of course, it will be understood that the primary purpose of our long-range squadrons in eastern air command is to protect the valuable convoys traversing the Atlantic.

The monotony of flying protection for convoys and hunting for submarines is indicated by some figures compiled by our research office. They tell us that late in 1942 the average flying time productive of a U-boat sighting was 840 hours and that our aircrew sighted a submarine on an average of once in 140 sorties. In the first half of 1943 the average remained about the same but in the last six months of the year it took an average of 1,700 hours of flying time for a U-boat sighted or an average of 230 sorties per sighting. Of course, the U-boats may still be there, but at least they keep submerged and thereby reducing their effectiveness.

Our increasing success on the anti-U-boat campaign is due in part to improved weapons, more modern aircraft and the greater experience of our aircrews. We are constantly improving our aircraft. For instance we have now the 4-engine Liberator and we have quite a number of Vega Ventura reconnaissance bombers which the United States Navy call the PVI. Then there are of course, the Catalinas and Canso long range flying boats and still a few of the old faithful and almost obsolescent Lockheed Hudsons.

All in all, we had engaged in western hemisphere operations almost as many squadrons as we have Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons overseas. The departure of the Japanese from the Aleutians and the improvement in the U-boat war situation in the Atlantic have so improved the general situation that we have been able to release a number of western hemisphere operations squadrons for service overseas. On the west and east coasts our western hemisphere operational squadrons, during 1942 flew 62,500 operational hours compared with 86,000 hours in 1943. This flying time is equivalent to something like 7,500,000 nautical miles in 1942, compared with 10,000,000 nautical miles in 1943. In 1942 our aircraft flew 3,579 sorties escorting shipping compared with 2,097 sorties in 1943, but of course the aircraft range was greater. In addition to this, there were 9,649 miscellaneous sorties in 1942, such as sub hunts, reconnaissance, etcetera, as compared with 21,874 miscellaneous sorties in 1943.

In order to round out still more our Atlantic coverage, one of our anti-submarine patrol squadrons has been detached from the east coast and is now operating from a base in Iceland. It can be recalled should the enemy return to his attacks on shipping or close proximity to our coasts. Whilst we rejoice in the fact that no enemy submarine was sighted from our coast line during 1943, and no attacks were made in Canadian territorial waters, we do not propose to neglect our defences. The submarines may find it more profitable to return to narrow waters, there may be a recurrence of the intensive activity near our coasts as in 1942, when they attacked convoys leaving our shores rather than in mid-Atlantic, as they did in 1943. For that reason we cannot afford to denude ourselves of convoy protection and anti-submarine patrols in home waters. Our job is to hunt submarines wherever they are to be found, and we will hunt them, whether close in shore or far out to sea.

I now come to a discussion of the overseas operations of the Royal Canadian Air Force units, and again I would ask the consent of the committee to place on Hansard a statement of the expenditure since the outbreak of the war on overseas operations. The total estimated expenditure September, 1939, to March 31, 1945, is $910,819,643. There is also an explanation attached to the statement showing how there has been a substantial increase in the expenditure overseas as compared with last year's expenditure. The statement is as follows:

Overseas Operations

Overseas War Establishment:
Cash expenditures from the outbreak of war, are:
Fiscal year 1939-1940.....	Nil
Fiscal year 1940-1941.....	$ 4,995,360
Fiscal year 1941-1942.....	13,699,336
Fiscal year 1942-1943.....	23,665,980
(9 months) Fiscal year 1943-1944	252,351,727
Total for above period.....	$294,712,403
Estimated additional to March 31, 1944	152,950,098
Total estimated expenditure, September, 1939, to March 31, 1944.	$447,662,501
Estimated cash 1944-1945.....	463,157,142
Total estimated expenditure, September, 1939, to March 31, 1945.	$910,819,643

The increase in estimated overseas cash requirements for 1944-1945 over estimated expenditures for 1943-1944 of approximately $58,000,000 is attributable to the increase in maintenance of overseas squadrons and increased personnel costs. Capital expenditure for overseas squadrons will continue as our squadrons are reequipped and rearmed with more up-to-date and more costly equipment. Provision has been made for the maintenance of forty-four Canadian squadrons overseas as against thirty-eight in the previous year.

The continued posting of aircrew and ground-crew graduates overseas, together with promotions, will continue to reflect increases in overseas pay and allowances and this item alone accounts for approximately $39,000,000 of the increase over 1943-1944.

Overseas Operations. Before speaking of the record of the Royal Canadian Air Force overseas, I shall endeavour to make a clear distinction between the various classes of Canadian air representations overseas. There has, I find, been a great deal of confusion in the minds not only of Canadians generally but also of members of this house as to just what classes of Canadians come under the jurisdiction of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

First in chronological order, though small in numerical importance, are Canadian nationals who are members of the Royal Air Force. There are men and some few women who joined the Royal Air Force in the years before the war, or in the months immediately after the outbreak of the war. Most of them were enlisted in England. A few are Canadians who have remained with the Royal Air Force in the years since the last war. None of these men whose numbers are not available but who at a rough guess might be about 2,000 have any connection with the Royal Canadian Air Force. We exercise no authority over them, we do not pay them. They are not identified in any way as Canadians. They belong to a different service from the Royal Canadian Air Force.

It is in connection with these personnel that there has been a demand that they be permitted to transfer to the Royal Canadian Air Force. I promised last year to take it up with the air ministry, and after long negotiations, air ministry has consented to the transfer to our forces if these men and women so desire. Instructions have recently been issued by us covering such transfers.

Since they are not identified with the Royal Canadian Air Force, I do not refer to them when reviewing our overseas operations.

Another and the most important class from the standpoint of numbers, and from the standpoint of Canada generally, are the thousands of Canadians, mostly aircrew, but with a goodly number of radio mechanics who were enlisted, trained and are paid by Canada, but are now on loan to the Royal Air Force and are serving with Royal Air Force units or formations.

Let me make myself perfectly clear. These personnel to whom I referred a moment ago joined the Royal Canadian Air Force in Canada, were trained by us and are entirely paid for by us. They still retain their Canadian identity. They wear Canadian shoulder badges, and as I said before, are paid by Canada. Their welfare, promotion, repatriation, and their interests are our duty and responsibility for they are only temporarily attached to Royal Air Force. They are located all over the world. They are not in Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons because with respect to radio mechanics they are specialists and do not by the nature of their occupation readily form themselves into units of any size. These radio mechanics are spread all over southeastern Asia, Africa and the United Kingdom individually or in small detachments. My information is that they compose 45 per cent of the strength of the Royal Air Force mechanics establishment.

With respect to the other category of Royal Canadian Air Force airmen attached to the Royal Air Force, namely aircrew, they are not in Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons because there are not now, nor likely ever will be, enough Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons to fit them into. These aircrew, flying men, are widely dispersed throughout Royal Air Force squadrons. It is because they are so widely scattered, in so many different units, that we meet with some difficulty in carrying out our responsibilities and duties towards them. Nevertheless by means of liaison officers, and during the past year through pay officers, through more elaborate records, even though in some cases it means duplicating Royal Air Force records, through Royal Canadian Air Force sub-headquarters in various sections of the United Kingdom, in Italy, and in the middle east, and in India, we endeavour to keep in touch and to the best of our ability to keep track of their commissioning, rights to repatriation, and tours of duty.

The recent agreements, and better understandings with the air ministry, and more particularly with the more subordinate officers of the Royal Air Force, will go a long way to improving the situation of both aircrew and ground radio mechanics.

I believe it is better understood now that we undertake our responsibilities to these men, not with any desire to interfere with Royal Air Force organization, but because the parents of these boys, and the people of Canada generally, expect us to do so. Canadian parents have neither the channels open, nor the desire to approach the Royal Air Force and air ministry, with respect to the matters in which their boys are interested. Canadian people look to the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force must be organized to meet their demands.

Thirdly, and finally, we come to our own men in our own Canadian Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons. Originally there were three Canadian squadrons which went overseas as units. The number has now risen to forty-two in actual operations overseas. There are bomber squadrons, fighter squadrons, reconnaissance squadrons, coastal command squadrons, night fighter and intruder squadrons. In these forty-two squadrons identified as Canadian squadrons nearly all the aircrew are Canadian, the commanding officers are Canadian, the groundcrew are Canadian. The entire cost of the squadrons, including aeroplanes is borne by Canada, and their upkeep as Canadian units makes up a goodly part of our overseas expenditure. There are not nearly so many Canadian aircrew in Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons as there are scattered throughout the Royal Air Force. I have been asked many times why all Canadians are not in Canadian squadrons. The answer is that if all Canadian flying men were in Canadian squadrons we would require not thousands, as we have, but well over a hundred thousand groundcrew for the maintenance and service of these squadrons and their equipment. You cannot properly call a squadron a Canadian squadron, even though the majority of the aircrew were Canadians, if the ground-crew necessary to care for, repair and maintain the aircraft were other than Canadians, for normally these groundcrew number many times more than the aircrew who actually fly the machines.

There is a story told by a newspaper correspondent of having visited a Royal Air Force squadron in Africa, and on entering the officers' mess he found a placard posted up with these words, "Canadian spoken here; English understood."

Besides, the joint air training plan was intended only for the purpose of producing aircrew. It was never intended under the original agreement that we should send any groundcrew over to the United Kingdom. It was considered that if Canada set up the ground establishment in Canada to train flyers, and that meant employment of over 150,000 people on the ground, it would have done its share in the air war effort by sending the trained flying personnel overseas to fight as member of the commonwealth air forces in any of the commonwealth units anywhere. But, because we desired further identification of our forces, and because we had some of the best mechanics and groundcrews in the world, eager and ready to proceed overseas, we set up these overseas air squadrons, and personally I am exceedingly proud of the action we did take.

To judge by the paucity of public information carried in the British and American press, and in official statements and communiques with respect to the thousands of our men in the Royal Air Force, I should judge that if we had not had these squadrons of our own, even the people of Canada, not to speak of our allies and partners, would have been almost totally ignorant of the large and important part Canada is playing in the air war and the defeat of Germany.

I am often asked, when I speak of Canadians in the Royal Air Force, what proportion of our men compose the Royal Air Force strength. In groundcrew our proportion is small since we have only supplied groundcrew for our own squadrons, the remainder of Canadian groundcrew being kept in Canada for the purposes of the joint air training plan which trains flyers for all the allies and the commonwealth forces.

With regard to aircrew, that is men who fly, the situation is different, and our proportionate strength to that of the Royal Air Force is very much higher. I have not the exact figures for overseas. I know, however, that Canada is now, and has been for many months, the largest and principal producer of aircrew for all the commonwealth forces. I know that, of the aircrew of all the partners produced in Canada, Royal Canadian Air Force graduates make up considerably more than one-half of the total. All others combined, including Australian, New Zealand and British, and all the peoples who make up the Royal Air Force quota of trainees, make up less than half the graduates.

I know how many thousands of pilots, observers bombaimers, wireless operators and air gunners we have overseas. I am fully informed as to the number of such aircrew there are at any given moment in Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons. I have not figures of the numbers of these graduates in Royal Air Force squadrons at any given time. They vary with commands, with postings, with casualties, with sickness, with leave and numerous other factors.

But with the best information I can obtain, I should say that from 22 per cent to 25 per cent of all the aircrew in the European and Mediterranean areas under British tactical command—and this includes British, New Zealanders, Australians, Poles, Czechs, Norwegians, Belgians and Free French—are Canadian boys, enlisted in Canada, trained in Canada, paid for by Canadians. That proportion will tend to increase rather than decrease as the men whom we have overseas proceed through their final courses to the operational squadrons, until Canadians comprise about one-third of the total content of these British-Dominion-allied aircrew strength.

I have deliberately omitted reference to the Indian theatre of operations; I know how many Canadians are there, but I do not know their relative strength compared to other allied forces. I have also omitted reference to the south Pacific where we have practically no representation, but where Australia and New Zealand, with very little publicity on this continent, are heroically bearing the burden on land, sea and air, along with United States forces.

Necessarily I have not the details of the operations to which Canadians loaned to Royal Air Force squadrons took part. Suffice to say that they are in almost every formation of the Royal Air Force and have been in every sortie, every raid, every operation undertaken by the Royal Air Force. I have, however, the details of the work of our men who are grouped together in Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons and this work I now propose to review.

Operations of Royal Canadian Air Force units overseas. The Royal Canadian Air Force entered the year 1944 with forty-two squadrons overseas, operating under the direction of the Royal Air Force bomber command, coastal command, fighter command, allied expeditionary air force, Mediterranean command and India command. During the year 1943 we grouped these squadrons together within each command as far as their operational role permitted. As a result of this move we have a bomber group, fighter wings, reconnaissance wing, and a number of auxiliary units.

The following statistics will give you a general idea of the Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons' participation overseas in the war against the enemy during 1943 and to the middle of February, 1944:

Sorties flown	38,544
Operational hours flown	129,461
Tons of bombs dropped	21,990
Enemy aircraft destroyed	208
Enemy aircraft probably destroyed and damaged	162
Locomotives destroyed	150

To which must be added enemy U-boats, merchant vessels, tugs, barges, military installations, motor vehicles, transports of all kinds, et cetera.

A very large number of operational sorties were flown and a large tonnage of bombs dropped, bearing in mind that seventeen squadrons were converted from obsolescent to modern aircraft during the year, during which period they were of necessity out of the line. For example, at the beginning of 1943 the majority of our bomber squadrons were equipped with two-engined medium bombers of the Wellington class and before the end of the year had been converted to heavy four-engine aircraft. You will readily appreciate that it is a considerable undertaking to convert a squadron from Wellington to Halifaxes or Lancasters, involving as it does additional crew members and the necessity of making old crews conversant with and competent on the new equipment. Due to these conversions to larger aircraft a substantial increase in the tonnage dropped was shown during the later months of 1943. An increase which is each month being exceeded as the Royal Canadian Air Force's participation with the Royal Air Force in the round the clock attack on Germany is speeded up.

Fighter squadrons. Our day fighter and fighter reconnaissance squadrons, operating from bases in the United Kingdom under the command of the allied expeditionary air force and fighter command, are grouped together into Royal Canadian Air Force fighter wings and a Royal Canadian Air Force reconnaissance wing.

These wings are employed on offensive sweeps over the continent against the enemy. They provide protection to bombers of the air forces of the British empire and of the United States army air force on daylight attacks against continental targets. They also undertake close escort duties, convoy patrols, air-sea rescue flights, interception patrols and general reconnaissance flights.

During the period 1st January, 1943, to 11th February, 1944, these wings and squadrons flew 21,965 operational sorties, destroyed 158 enemy aircraft and probably destroyed or damaged 135 others. In addition to these successful attacks on enemy aircraft, many locomotives, railway yards, enemy ships, motor vehicles, military installations, trains, et cetera, were damaged.

Intruder and night fighter squadrons. Royal Canadian Air Force intruder and night fighter squadrons are operating under the operational control of the Royal Air Force fighter command. These squadrons are employed on offensive duties against enemy targets on the Continent and on the defensive protection of Great Britain against enemy day and night raiders.

These squadrons have carried out 2,056 operational sorties, during which they have destroyed forty-two enemy aircraft and probably destroyed or damaged twenty-four others, to say nothing of some eighty-one locomotives.

Bomber squadrons. At 0001 hours, 1st January, 1943, the Royal Canadian Air Force assumed responsibility for a bomber group within the Royal Air Force bomber command. As I have already mentioned, the majority of these squadrons were equipped with medium twin-engined aircraft at this time, and during the year converted to and are now operating on heavy four-engined aircraft.

Shortly after the formation of the Royal Air Force pathfinder force, the Royal Canadian Air Force assumed its share of responsibility in this group. The purpose of the pathfinders, is to mark the route of the main body and then to indicate the target with special flares to enable the main force to drop its bombs in the correct spot. This particular work is highly specialized and the Royal Canadian Air Force is making a name for itself in this field.

Some idea of the extent to which the Royal Canadian Air Force bomber group has participated in bomber command's devastating offensive against the enemy's vital centres of war industry may be gathered from a list of the main targets attacked during the first thirteen months of the group's existence. The effect of the high explosive and incendiary loads released by its aircraft was felt by more than forty important manufacturing and communications centres, seaports, shipbuilding yards, submarine bases, et cetera, in Germany, Italy and occupied France.

The list is of considerable length. I cannot pronounce the names and so I will place it on Hansard:

Aachen	Leipzig
Berlin	Leverkusen
Bochum	Magdeburg
Brunswick	Mannheim-Ludwigshaven
Cologne	Mulheim
Dortmund	Munchen-Gladbach
Duisburg	Munich
Dusseldorf	Norden (N.W. Germany)
Esens (N.W. Germany)	Nuremberg
	Oldenburg
Essen	Peenemunde
Frankfurt	Pilsen (Czechoslovakia)
Gelsenkirchen	Remscheid
Hamburg	Stettin
Hanover	Stuttgart
Kassel	Wilhelmshaven
Kiel	Wuppertal
Krefeld

France
- Cannes (marshalling yards)
- Foret de Raismes (ammunition dump)
- Le Creusot (Schneider armament works)
- Lorient (sub. base)
- Modane (marshalling yards)
- Montlucon (tire factory)
- St. Nazaire (sub. base)

Italy
- Milan
- Turin

The list itself does not tell the complete story, for many of the targets—especially the more important and most heavily defended—were attacked not once but many times. For example, Berlin was visited eighteen times. The persistent heavy attacks on the Ruhr and Rhineland will be recalled, as well as those against the enemy submarine base of Lorient a year ago, when maximum efforts were being made to cope with the then menacing U-boat situation. In carrying out these operations, the Royal Canadian Air Force bomber squadrons flew 11,199 operational sorties, dropping 22,000 tons of bombs, of which 14,000 tons were concentrated on targets in Germany, the remainder on targets in Italy and enemy occupied countries. In addition they carried out a large number of sea mining operations.

Last spring it was deemed expedient to reinforce the bomber force in the Mediterranean theatre. The Royal Canadian Air Force was called upon and cooperated by the formation of a Royal Canadian Air Force bomber wing made up of certain squadrons in the Royal Canadian Air Force bomber group. These squadrons flew their aircraft to the new theatre, selected their airfields and set up operations in a remarkably short time. From these bases they operated under the most trying conditions. In heat and sandstorm they put up an operational effort that is surpassed by none. I should like to read a signal received from their commander-in-chief, Air Chief Marshal Tedder:

> This wing has done an exceptionally good job of work ever since it arrived and has undoubtedly contributed appreciably to our offensive. The scale of effort, in relation to the size of the force, has probably been higher than has ever been achieved anywhere in the past and included operations on 78 out of 80 successive nights.

Coastal squadrons. The Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons operating with coastal command and India command have carried out offensive operations extending over the north and northeast Atlantic, the North sea, the bay of Biscay and the Indian ocean.

Their duties include searching out and attacking enemy surface vessels, anti-submarine patrols, escorts for allied merchant shipping, naval escorts, and fighter and general reconnaissance patrols.

These coastal squadrons are equipped with Sunderland and Catalina flying boats, Wellington, Beaufighter and Albacore land planes, and in the course of their operations during the period under review flew 25,487 hours.

At this point I should like to say a word of praise for the efforts and patience of our aircrews who are operating for long hours over the sea, keeping a zealous eye for enemy submarines. You must appreciate that the maintenance of the required alertness on these patrols of twelve and fifteen hours and sometimes longer is a very great test of endurance.

The exploits I have just mentioned are indicative of the operational effort of our Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons under the direction of the Royal Air Force, as far as I am able to disclose. But I should like to impress upon you that this effort was carried out by only those Royal Canadian Air Force aircrew who are localized into Canadian units. The exploits of the other Royal Canadian Air Force aircrew who are loaned to the Royal Air Force are part, and a considerable part, of the history of the Royal Air Force.

Decorations. A return brought down in the house last week shows that nearly 1,200 of our young men have been decorated for gallantry in action.

Casualties.—The figures which I now produce indicate the cost in casualties. All told, Royal Canadian Air Force casualties have been, up to February 18, 1944, as follows:—

Dead and presumed dead	7,958
Missing, prisoners of war, and interned	3,384
	11,342

Of which 9,667 were overseas.

Eleven thousand does not seem so very great a number in a war which has engulfed so many million lives. Nevertheless every single one of these gallant lads taken away by the grisly mechanism of war was the pride and hope of some Canadian family. Every single life sacrificed represents an irreparable loss to the Canadian nation. Those boys came from families in every walk of life, from rich and poor alike, from those in high placed and those in low, from the farm, from the city, from high school and college and university. We ourselves in this house have not been immune, six of our members have lost their dearest and best. They were a cross section of the youth of a democracy. The least professional of soldiers, the most gallant of citizens. Living their young lives under varying conditions, in different atmospheres in this Canada of such divergent views and interests. They yet found a common patriotism and a common purpose.

They, on the threshold of their manhood, developed a magnanimity of soul and a lofty and heroic love of country. Looking at the future as they did, with the wisdom of ages peering out of boyish eyes, they counted the cost, they calculated the risk, yet remained through it all serene and undaunted. Let their selfless endeavour, their common patriotism, their unswerving purpose be an example to us in our Canadian task.

Now I have already said we have reached the peak of our expansion but let it not be understood that we have reached anything near the peak of our deployment against the enemy. Not all of the thousands of men we have overseas have as yet been in action, in fact many thousands are still awaiting their turn to meet the enemy in operational squadrons or immediately behind in operational training squadrons, in conversion squadrons or in finished schools or reception depots. Many, many thousands more are going through the plan, or as instructors. Our front line strength will rise higher and higher for months to come even in spite of the heavy casualties which we are bound to incur.

It is far from my wish to make any boastful statement about the part which Canada is playing in the war. It has, however, been borne upon me that the interests of the alliance as a whole may be prejudiced if its other members are left in ignorance of the Canadian share in the great events which are unfolding.

The United Kingdom government and our American allies also have the right to know that Canada is playing her part.

It is for that reason that I should like before resuming my seat to give a summary of Canada's part in the air war.

The air training plan was conceived, set up, organized, and is being carried on with one object in view, to obtain and maintain air superiority over the enemy. We have that thanks largely to commonwealth efforts and those of our allies the United States and Russia.

The next step, and I believe the allies are close to it, is complete, final, conclusive and lasting air supremacy in every theatre of war, so that our planes will flash through the skies of any part of Europe unharmed and unmolested. This seemingly unattainable goal seems now to be almost within our reach. The next few months should settle that issue. The immediate cost may be heavy, I fear it will be, but it will bring immeasurably nearer that final and ultimate goal, victory.

We Canadians have, starting from 4,000 men, raised an air force of over 200,000. We have in the midst of the throes of rapid expansion, trained 114,000 men in ground work, as instructors, staff men, mechanics, engineers and in fifty different trades. We have graduated from our flying schools, 86,000 men to fly and fight the planes of the commonwealth and the R.A.F.; more than half the total graduates in the empire forces. Of these 86,000, 48,000 were our own Canadians recruited, enlisted and trained by us.

We have managed and administered this vast enterprise with our own Canadian men and women. We have staffed it largely with our own forces, service and civilian. We have paid for a large part of this enterprise out of our own funds. We have equipped it largely with our own material, the product of our own factories, and all the while we were building in this country and in the neighbouring islands and territories defensive installations and aerodromes, and organizing an air defence system both on the ground and in the sky, in conjunction with our partner in defence of this north American continent. When this hemisphere was threatened by the advance of the yellow barbarians to American territory in the Aleutians, we were in a position in those anxious days after Pearl Harbor to offer and render assistance to our immeasurably more powerful neighbour. By our pre-Pearl Harbor activities in the construction of the northwest air staging route and the coastal chain of aerodromes, we prepared the way for his rapid transit to Alaska of troops, of munitions, of planes and materials of war.

On the east coast, we early saw the advantages for transport of aircraft to Europe and defence purposes of Newfoundland and Labrador, and the liability too if left undefended. From bases in the maritimes, Labrador and Newfoundland, we gave air coverage to convoys and we hunted the submarine. We have stretched our coverage far beyond our own shores, and in conjunction with our Canadian navy have assumed responsibility for the northwest Atlantic. Our land planes and amphibians and flying boats sweep the north Atlantic from Labrador to Greenland and beyond. And lastly, farther overseas we have contributed thousands of our men to the global war. We are in Iceland. We are in the Hebrides. We are in Burma. We are in India. We are in Egypt. We are in Italy. We are nightly over Europe. We are attacking and beating Germany in the very heart of nazi might. This is what Canada is doing in the air war.

Canada is doing her share equal to that of any nation of the commonwealth, and in proportion to its population, equal to that of any of its allies.

That is what the world should realize.

That is what the people of Canada should know.

Canada has a right to be proud of its air war.

MEAT

SUSPENSION OF RATIONING—STATEMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANT TO THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to make a statement with respect to meat rationing.

Three weeks ago the question of the need for continuing meat rationing was raised in the House of Commons and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stated that the whole question would be reviewed in the light of current conditions.

The basic reasons for meat rationing in Canada should be clearly understood. Our production of meat has always been ample for our domestic requirements. The reasons for meat rationing were to create an increased exportable surplus to meet the urgent and essential requirements of the United Kingdom and to ensure equitable distribution of the supplies remaining in Canada. May I point out that our purpose is not only to help to feed the population of the United Kingdom but also the total armed forces supplied through the United Kingdom which include all the Canadian forces overseas. We intend to continue to meet these urgent and essential requirements.

[Mr. Power.]

During recent weeks, however, unusually large surpluses of meat have been developing in Canada. The mere existence of such surpluses would not be a good reason for suspending rationing provided that such surpluses could be moved to seaboard and overseas.

A careful review of the present position has satisfied the government that for the time being the excess supply of meat coming to market, over and above the amount needed to meet domestic requirements at the present rate of consumption, is in excess of our physical capacity to move it into export channels, and that the sensible and proper course to take is temporarily to suspend meat rationing.

The facts can be summarized briefly, as follows:

1. There have been unusually heavy marketings of all types of live stock during recent months, and it is expected that heavy marketings will continue for the next two or three months. During the first eight weeks of 1944 the inspected packing plants in Canada have slaughtered 780,000 more hogs, 50,000 more cattle, 10,000 more calves and 30,000 more sheep and lambs than in the corresponding weeks of 1943. These figures represent an increase over 1943 of eighty per cent in hogs, fifty per cent in cattle, twenty per cent in calves and thirty-five per cent in sheep and lambs. It has been only with the greatest difficulty that the packing plants have been able physically to handle this great increase in volume.

2. As a result of these very heavy runs of live stock the storage and transportation facilities have become acutely congested. The latest available statistics indicate that there are over 102,000,000 pounds of meat in cold storage which is nearly twice as much as at this time a year ago and 65 per cent greater than is normal at this time of year. In addition to meat storage we have to provide for the cold storage of other important products. There is at present no reserve of cold storage space to take care of any unforeseen backing up due to unpreventable delays in shipping.

3. Not only are we having a continuance of heavy live stock marketings and an acute congestion of storage space, but we are also faced with limitations on our physical capacity to move meat to seaboard and overseas. During the past eight weeks we have moved record quantities overseas—more than we have ever moved in a similar two-month period. If everything moved with clock-like precision we believe we might just be able to handle the present volume of product, but with no reserve of storage space and with a continued heavy flow of marketings we are in a position where any serious accident or delay whether caused by weather or by the exigencies of war would put us in a very difficult position. The shipping authorities have been able to schedule sufficient tonnage to move the present supplies, but there is always the risk of accidents or other delays upsetting these schedules. But even if sufficient tonnage is put into our ports, there are physical and human limitations on the rate of loading at these ports and there is a very definite limitation on the total available supply of refrigerator cars.

Three weeks ago the whole situation was difficult and congested. Every department of this government and of other governments concerned have done their utmost to improve the position but, while not seriously worse, the position is definitely not improved and there are very real dangers of a backing up of supplies and movement to a point where actual spoilage of meat might occur.

For these reasons it has been decided to suspend meat rationing, including meatless Tuesdays, until the congestion in both storage and transportation is cleared up. However, the government is fully determined that to the extent of our ability the essential requirements of the United Kingdom and our overseas forces shall be met and it is, therefore, intended that meat rationing be resumed as soon as such a course will be helpful. I want to make it perfectly clear that meat rationing is being suspended, not abandoned.

In this connection I should emphasize that in order to facilitate the resumption of meat rationing the system of slaughter permits and the requirement that all carcasses be stamped with the permit holder's licence number will remain in full effect. It is proposed, however, for the duration of the suspension of rationing to permit individual farmers to slaughter their own live stock for sale directly to consumers without the necessity of their getting a permit or stamping the meat so sold.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may ask one question, having in mind the information which must be available to the government alone, has the parliamentary assistant any idea as to how long we may expect this suspension to continue in operation?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I am afraid I cannot give any indication as to how long it may be. That will depend upon any changes in the conditions which I indicated in my statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask if the present price structure is to remain?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no change in the price ceiling.

SUPPLY

LABOUR CONDITIONS—UNEMPLOYMENT IN ALBERTA COAL MINING AREAS—STATEMENT OF HON. MEMBER FOR BOW RIVER

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter I should like to bring to the attention of the government, having to do with a situation which exists in my part of the country, especially in the Drumheller valley. I have received several telegrams and a number of air mail letters in the last day or so, most of which I think are copies of originals which were sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The situation is that in the Drumheller valley and other mining areas of Alberta more than half the miners have been unemployed since February 1. The people are becoming very much disturbed, and I have been asked to bring this matter to the attention of the government as quickly as possible.

It seems amazing that at this time, when we are making great proposals for post-war reconstruction, when the Prime Minister has promised that after the war everyone who can work and is willing to work will have a job, we should have a large number of men who are physically fit and anxious to carry on their work, in order to help an all-out war effort, forced out of their jobs. It is estimated that in the district to which I am referring some seven hundred miners have applied for unemployment insurance, and that a number of them are now receiving that assistance. Not long ago we asked all soldiers who had been miners to go back to the mines, promising them full employment. At that time a great many men were released from the armed forces to dig coal in the mines, but now these very men are walking the streets of the Drumheller district looking for jobs. I am informed that between eight hundred and a thousand of these men received postponement from military service in order that they might dig coal; yet now they, together with others, are thrown out of employment. Is it any wonder that the people in that district are becoming greatly perturbed? These men have no prospects even for the future. If that is the best we have to offer them, when we are supposed to be carrying on an all-out war effort, what sort of morale is that going to build up in this country? Supposing that next winter we have to appeal to these men again to go out and dig coal in order to keep the rest of Canada warm; what sort of response shall we get? If we should appeal for a greater war effort, Mr. Speaker, do you not think people will view any such appeal with a little doubt?

I think this matter should have been attended to long ago. It has been pointed out to me that these men have no hope of relief unless something drastic is done immediately. Not only will these men be out of work, but during that period of time even those who are now working will not be employed full time. Some of the provincial governments are doing what they can to assist in this crisis. For instance, I am informed that the government of Alberta has ceased operating its strip mines and has been buying coal from the Drumheller valley in order to provide jobs for these men. There is also another angle which is exceedingly disturbing. These men who have come back from the army or who have left their farms to dig coal, following the appeal of the government, are now walking the streets looking for jobs. When they endeavour to leave the Drumheller valley to search for employment elsewhere I am told that they cannot obtain releases from selective service. That makes the situation even more difficult. If that is true, as I am informed, we have these men forcibly put out of their jobs, with the selective service refusing to give them permission to leave that area. How are these men to maintain themselves?

I believe the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) should look into this situation immediately. The astonishing thing about it is that while this condition exists in western Canada it is still the policy of this government to import a great tonnage of coal from the United States. Speaking from memory, I would say that our imports are about 30,000,000 tons a year, and we are producing about 20,000,000 tons. While we are importing a tremendous amount of fuel from the United States, and miners in the United States are working six or seven days a week, here we have forced our men out of employment. That does not look good, so far as the government's policy is concerned, and it certainly will not build up the morale of our Canadian citizens. It is time the government began to establish a national fuel policy for Canada.

We are going to have conditions like this, not only now but to a greater extent as summer approaches, unless the government adopts a proper fuel policy. This is the situation to which I say the government should give immediate and serious attention, so that the men in the area to which I have referred may have some relief.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, coming from a constituency in which there is a good deal of coal mining, I wish to support the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) in what he has said. For the most part, however, my constituency is engaged in mining bituminous coal, and perhaps the situation there is not as acute as it is in the Drumheller mines. Nevertheless in certain parts of my territory we find mines producing domestic coal. It has been brought to my knowledge that many of those local mines have closed down, and the miners have either moved away or had to seek some other type of employment.

I know the problem is not an easy one, particularly when the weather has a habit of playing pranks on us. But the fact that we have had a mild winter does not make any difference to the situation described by the hon. member for Bow River. The fact is that conditions are such, for one reason and, I believe, one reason only, namely, that the government have not yet determined on an adequate and proper national fuel policy. They never have had one; they have never seemed to be trying to get one, and I do not know that there is much hope of the present government ever getting one.

We have unemployment in a time of war. The telegrams referred to by the hon. member reminded me of depression days. That was the kind of telegrams we used to get in those days, and it seems strange that in a time of war, when industry should be working at full capacity, there should be such unemployment in those industries. I support the hon. member, and I say the time is long past due when the government should have announced something of a permanent nature in respect of a fuel policy for Canada.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.
