That is the procedure laid down by the rules of this house. I have thought for some time that the procedure we have followed and apparently are to follow again this year is irregular; it does not conform with the rules. I would not object to irregularity where it served a useful purpose, but in regard to these large expenditures, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) said a few moments ago, we should exercise care, scrutinize every expenditure, and adequately protect this nation. Consequently it seems to me that what we should be doing this afternoon is saying to the minister: Yes; we approve the principle of the resolution; let us pass it into committee and recommend its adoption as quickly as possible, so that we may examine the bill to be founded upon it. In short, we should discuss in detail the bill, not the resolution. That has been the procedure of this parliament from time immemorial. We should not be discussing the resolution for days or weeks; we should be discussing the bill and the schedules attached thereto. If the present procedure is allowed to remain as a precedent, it will be a very bad one. I raise the question this afternoon in the hope that the various groups in the house will be able to agree with the Minister of Finance that we dispose quickly of the resolution stage and get down to the actual consideration of the war appropriation estimates when the bill is before us. Let us follow the proper parliamentary procedure and ask the government to bring down a bill at the earliest convenience, say on Monday next.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I believe that every hon. member looked back with a measure of regret on our performance last year with respect to the war appropriation bill. We spent far too long in more or less rambling and aimless discussions of questions upon the various items which were listed for us in the break-down of the appropriations to the various ministers. In my view that waste of time, or shall I say unwise expenditure of time, resulted largely from the way in which we went about the whole thing. I believe that if the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) were adopted, we would save a great deal of time and be much better satisfied after the whole thing was over.

I believe that all hon. members, and I am sure all hon. members of my group, are fully in accord with winning this war and fully prepared to support the minister to any extent that he deems advisable in carrying on the war. If three and one-half billion dollars are sufficient for him, good; if he asked for more we would support him for that higher figure. I do wish therefore that we could get the resolution off our hands and have the bill before us so that we could discuss the whole matter with much more accuracy and effectiveness.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): I agree with what the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) said with regard to bringing in a bill at once and not having a double-barrelled or futile discussion of the resolution itself.

Bearing upon the answer which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) gave to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) with regard to the amount of Mutual Aid to be brought down this year, and apropos of his statement that the matter was still under review, that it would not exceed the allowance of last year, but had yet to be determined, if I am in order in so doing I would offer for the consideration of the Minister of Finance and his colleagues the suggestion that we should entirely eliminate an allowance by way of mutual aid this year. No other of the commonwealth nations makes any such allowance. Our own contribution in maintaining our own armed forces and our other obligations is heavy indeed. We can be proud of that, aside from an additional mutual aid allowance. There are many reasons, in my view, to support that suggestion, but now is not the proper time to give them to the house.

I desire to be understood as not including in my objection a special allowance which Canada will be asked to make this year to the organization known as UNNRA, or a contribution with our other allies to feed the starving conquered nations. I think that is an obligation, and that we must make an appropriate contribution; but, except for that, I desire with the greatest respect to suggest to the minister the entire elimination of an allowance for mutual aid.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): A year ago, when I spoke in the house on a similar occasion, I talked about preparation of the army. I now can speak of accomplishments. When I spoke last year the clearing of North Africa had just been completed. I said that the year ahead looked like a year of action, and that if it was the Canadians would be in the thick of events for which plans and preparations had been under way. I said that they were on a front which would in all likelihood prove to be the decisive front of the war. I said that they might fight on that front or on some other; that they might fight as an army or in separate formations; that wherever they were they would be a power to be reckoned with just as Canadians were twenty-five years ago.

To-day the army overseas finds itself on two fronts and I want to speak very briefly first of the troops in the Mediterranean area and of the visit which I made there in November and December. I have made no report to anybody with regard to it except to my colleagues in the government; but I think it is due our soldiers themselves and perhaps due the house that I say just a few words regarding what I saw. I spent three weeks there. I think I saw something of everything. I wished I could have seen everybody. It is not possible to take the house on a day-to-day tour, but I want to do a little more than generalize. I am afraid that half-and-half narrative may prove a dull resume of what was a trip with not a dull moment in it.

I saw the troops in three areas: North Africa, Sicily and Italy. I was in North Africa first and then in Italy, then back to Sicily, then back to Italy again, then back to Sicily and then to North Africa. The troops at that time were distributed, with reinforcements in North Africa and a hospital there. The corps troops were in Sicily with another hospital there, and two divisions were in Italy with hospitals there. I have described the terrain to the people of Canada in something said over the radio from Campobasso. I can only repeat that it is terrain such as I never saw before, and I do not think many of us who were in the last war have seen battle conditions such as I saw in Italy. There were hills in ceaseless succession, longitudinal roads few and far between, narrow winding roads up hills toward the towns on top which had to be taken, and a wonderful opportunity of which full advantage was taken by the enemy in the use of mines on the hair-pin turns and for demolition of bridges.

As I say, I saw first the reinforcements in North Africa. I was there just two days. The troops in North Africa felt they were a long distance away from the war and their one idea and eagerness was to get further forward. They have been moved since then. I saw their hospital under field conditions. It is a hospital with over eleven hundred patients under canvas, operating under what were truly battle conditions without any actual fighting. It was on a hillside. The canvas had been blown down repeatedly. Cooking had to be done on the top of the hill and food carried something like a quarter of a mile in containers to the patients who were in marquees. I found that the hospital had been operating at that time for nearly five months with the highest morale, the greatest energy and the finest efficiency that one could imagine.

Then I went to Italy and saw the forward troops first. I saw the armoured troops disposed on each side of the road, some in billets, but many of them sleeping out in pup tents. I talked to these men as I went along. I remember the first headquarters I visited and the first group to which I spoke. At that time a lump came into my throat as I realized what those men had gone through, because I knew that particular formation and how all the way from Pachino up they had shown their worth.

There I learned what we have to learn in this war, that operations are conducted to no small extent by means of task forces. By that I mean forces which are not necessarily homogeneous in the matter of the particular country from which the troops come or homogeneous in the particular arm of the service to which they happen to belong. The forces are put together because of the teamwork which the various arms of the services can do, and which various men from various countries can do in a combined operations to deal with a particular situation, having regard to the disposition of the enemy, the communications, the terrain, and the ultimate objective. They do not use an armoured brigade when they can use a battalion; they detach the battalion if necessary for that purpose to make up the force which does the job. That, after all, is what counts. That is happening in the Mediterranean area constantly and is happening more in this war than ever before—the combination of troops from various countries and the combination of various arms of the services in task forces rather than in more normal organization of divisions, corps and armies. That armoured formation of ours had been in all sorts of operations as sometimes doing a task with the British and sometimes with our own division.

When I saw the armoured corps one battalion was not there, and I saw it afterwards, a battalion which had made a magnificent reputation for itself. After seeing the armoured corps I saw the forward troops. I was at one battalion headquarters where they had had a pretty tough time a couple of nights before. They had lost some men. They had sent a detachment to capture a strong feature in front of an important town. They had had to retire and to reorganize. They had sent in another detachment and captured and held the position, and were just as proud as if they had taken Rome itself. They were living under conditions which were pretty grim. There were no funkholes, no trenches and no dug-outs such as veterans of the last war know. They were out in the open under the cold Italian stars with nothing but the groundsheet between them and the cold earth.

I was thrilled by my visit with them. There I learned the fluidity of the so-called line and the fluid and constantly moving nature of the operations. No over-the-top attack at dawn by a line of soldiers getting out of a trench, but fighting done by patrols fighting forward, capturing a post, moving in, then another patrol coming up and capturing another post and so on, zigzagging back and forth, finally getting toward the objective until the time comes when the guns put on the intensive bombardment, and then the assault. On that front that was going on constantly. One could not tell really just where the front was, made up as it was by patrols and by posts.

Then I saw the rear division, first the infantry brigade and later the armoured brigade, keen, anxious, alert, wanting very much to get forward, wondering how long it would be before they would be in the battle area. I knew some of the units, and I was impressed more than I can say with the sturdiness, with the appearance of good health, and with their evident determination to do their part and to keep up the fine record which our first division had established.

I visited the reinforcements in Italy, in perhaps the most attractive town I saw there. It was a touch of home to see, up on one of Mussolini's recreation centres, the sign "Maple Leaf Gardens." The streets of that town are given Canadian names. I visited another town where divisional headquarters was located at that time, where they had the Beaver club and where, by the way—and this is not intended to advertise the Canadian Pacific railway—they also had the Royal York hotel. That was a regular Canadian town. On the streets were hundreds of Canadian soldiers from the support brigades billeted in the nearby villages. They came in for a show and a day off after a strenuous tour up front. I visited, in that one day, I think ten units of the two support brigades, and had an opportunity of saying a word to them, bringing them greetings from Canada, and of bringing messages back from them. I want to say to hon. members that I have never had a more inspiring or more exhilarating or more stimulating experience. They were well turned out, clear eyed, earnest, sure of themselves because they had "been there." I saw the corps troops; they were in Sicily. The second morning before I left the word was going round over the "clothes-line" telegraph that Hitler had capitulated. Everybody was sore; they said this was a phoney war, that they had been sent to Italy when we knew there was no action going on there. That was the story, and they did not like it a bit. I am only sorry to say that since then many of those boys have learned the lesson that many of us in Canada have to learn; that is, that the war is not over and that Hitler has not capitulated. Many stern battles have been fought by those men since I saw them.

I saw another hospital in Sicily, excellently located. They had made a name for themselves in the early days of the fighting. They had lost all their equipment, but with captured German hospital equipment they had set up their establishment and, although they only had about 300 beds, they cleared something like 3,300 patients in sixteen days.

I should have said that I saw in Italy other hospitals, one of which had arrived at its location only the day before, had established itself in a practically new Italian hospital, and had already opened one wing with over 50 patients.

The nurses, medical officers, and personnel of another hospital I visited had been through a trying experience. Their ship was torpedoed and, although fortunately there was not a single casualty, they had lost everything in the way of personal belongings. However by a stroke of luck their hospital equipment was on another ship, and they expected to be in a position to take 200 patients within two days after I was there.

Finally I visited the assembly place of the dead who fell in Sicily, the cemetery near Agira, looking up at that town which one Canadian brigade captured with such marvellous courage and such dauntlessness in an operation that had been delayed a day behind schedule because of the terrific hun resistance, but which was carried through after the divisional commander himself came up to attend conferences to help replan the operation which carried the town. Not far away were Assaro, Leonforte, Castlenuova, Regalbuto and Adrano, all places where the Canadians had made their mark and their name. I went over the ground with one of the officers who had been in the operation at Agira, and he showed me the method of operating and the difficulties which they had encountered and overcome. That assembly place, I can assure the house and the people of Canada, is a dignified and a worthy resting place for those who gave their lives in Sicily. There, in after years, friends can go from Canada and pay tribute to the men who are gathered there, who sleep a warrior's sleep after having truly fought a warrior's fight.

That is the briefest sort of report on my trip. I saw the commanders, General Eisenhower, General Alexander and General Montgomery; I had an opportunity of talking with them, and I want to say that the cordiality, the informative way they received and talked with me, and the receptive attitude which they displayed, were things for which I was gratified and for which I thanked them on behalf of Canada. We talked straight from the shoulder. They held nothing back. They told me their plans and I told them ours. I cannot tell them here, but I mention this to remind the committee that of course there must be some things that we who have the responsibility for these operations would know and would learn, that would influence decisions, which cannot be explained at the present time. So one has to ask the public to withhold conclusions until all the facts are known. I was tremendously thrilled, of course—and perhaps this was the highlight of the trip outside the visit to the troops—to hear the unanimous, enthusiastic and I may say unsolicited testimony which all three of these high-ranking and experienced officers gave with regard to Canadians and their magnificent work as part of their formations. They were unqualified in their welcome to the Canadians and in praise of their work; if I remember correctly, General Montgomery's tribute was that there were no better troops in any army anywhere.

[Mr. Ralston.]

I have not said anything about the discussions at our forward headquarters in Italy. I visited those headquarters twice, where I had many discussions with regard to administrative matters. There they handle matters affecting our troops right on the ground. Matters concerning personnel, casualties, promotions, supplies and the administrative services are dealt with on the spot. It gave me an opportunity of seeing a well functioning, as I thought, and a well organized headquarters, going concern, in the field of operations.

Among the many things I had to deal with there were three affecting the troops that I might mention. One was mail. Generals may be important; ministers may have some little importance sometimes, but generally speaking the most important man in the unit is the corporal with the mail, and that was impressed upon me time and time again. I want to say to the people of Canada, through this house, that nothing can help keep up the morale of our troops like having mail get to them just as frequently and as quickly as possible. The mail service was not good at the time I was there, far from it; and I want to pay tribute to the Royal Canadian Air Force and to Trans-Canada Air Lines for the work they have done in endeavouring to put on a Canadian service to the Mediterranean. I know it has not worked perfectly, but that has not been the fault of either the Royal Canadian Air Force or Trans-Canada Air Lines. The route they have to fly has its difficulties, its accidents and its contingencies of weather which of course interfere with uniform and regular deliveries. Mail is all-important, and I do not mean mail telling of troubles at home; I mean mail which makes the boys realize that we are behind them, which tells the boys the bright side of life here, because believe me they have enough of the drab side in service out there.

Films were another matter—old films. They complained bitterly about their films being out of date. That condition has been very much improved since then.

The next thing was a paper for the troops. The Maple Leaf was established on January 14. It is a newspaper published in Naples, and goes to all the troops in that area now. It is edited by the services themselves. I have seen the troops and—as I told the newsmen at Algiers—after having seen them, and after knowing something at least of what they have gone through and what they had accomplished, the ground over which they had fought and the successes they had won, I never was as proud of being a Canadian as I was that night.

Just one more thing—and it has to do with the sombre side of warfare. Speaking of Agira, and the bit of hallowed ground there, the assembling place for our heroic dead, may I humbly put on record the casualties up to January 8. Up to that date casualties in Sicily and Italy totalled: killed in action, 1,079; died of wounds, 272; unclassified deaths, 3, giving a total of 1,354 deaths. Missing were 299; prisoners of war, 86, and wounded, 4,655. Those figures, of course, have grown since January 8.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has spoken of the enormous sum of around three billions of dollars called for by him in the resolution. I think the hearts of Canadians everywhere go out to those homes of which the minister spoke—the thousands of homes in Canada represented in these casualty lists. It is those homes which know the real cost of the war. It is not in dollars and cents. The contribution they make is not found in an income tax schedule. Their gift is of the priceless lives and war wounds of those who, to them, were the dearest on earth.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a brief report of the visit to the troops in Italy. I came back more determined than ever to do my best to see to it that they are well served. Anything one can do, any opportunity one has to be associated with men of that kind is a privilege, and something for which I, speaking for myself, thank God.

Let me speak now of the troops in Canada and deal, if I may, with the question asked the other day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). There has been a good deal of discussion with regard to the number of troops in Canada. I wish to make it clear, to put on the record and tell the committee what the situation is in that respect. As I explained last year, our troops are divided into operational troops, non-operational troops, troops in training—and now we have made a fourth division, namely disposal and selection centres, where for the time being men are at depots for the purpose of being discharged or of being posted to other tasks.

Included in those operational troops were the 6th, 7th and 8th divisions, to which I referred last year. The leader of the opposition has asked this question: Why were the 7th and 8th divisions disbanded? And this question: If they were disbanded, why were they ever formed? May I say to him and to the house that I said last year that I hoped we would have a reduction in the number of troops in Canada. In connection with operational troops, at that time we had about 80,000. We had assessed the situation with respect to possible scales of attack which might be expected, and those scales of attack had been appraised, along with our friends in the United States who had the same problem there.

Having assessed those scales of attack, the Department of National Defence, and I as minister of that department recommended to the government that we could disband the 7th and 8th divisions, and reorganize the 6th division, because the strategic situation had changed things due to the occupation of the Aleutians.

I think there has been more misrepresentation about the disbanding of the 7th and 8th divisions than perhaps in connection with anything else which has taken place concerning the army. The 7th and 8th divisions were disbanded because it was felt they were not needed longer as operational troops. That is the simple reason. And in disbanding them it was not intended to nor did we discharge physically fit men. The divisions, as divisions, were disbanded, but the men who were in the division either went to other units, to fill them up, or went to the training stream to train and to be fitted for overseas service. N.R.M.A. men in these divisions were sent to other units to relieve general service personnel. Some low-category men were discharged from the service in order that they might fill civilian occupations, and supply civilian needs. It seems to me that was a simple and sensible operation, but it certainly has been misrepresented in this country, and at first at least it was misunderstood in the United States.

I wish to emphasize just that one point, that no man physically fit for overseas service, other than in most exceptional cases, has been discharged, unless on compassionate grounds. The result has been to release more men for overseas service and to raise the average standard of physical fitness in the operational units. That is why the 7th and 8th divisions were disbanded.

Why were they formed? Some hon. members have, I think, very short memories. I want to recall this, that when war broke out with Japan, immediate steps were taken to strengthen the Pacific coast defences. We rushed troops there in the form of extra battalions and thickened our coastal artillery defences. As the Japanese success proceeded—with, I may say, pretty disastrous and alarming rapidity—pressure was increased from all sides to add to those defences in the Pacific coast area.

Pearl Harbor was in December, 1941. In April, 1942, the mobilization of the 7th and 8th divisions was authorized, in addition to the 6th division, and money was subsequently voted in this house. And there was not a single voice raised against the authorization for the formation of those two divisions. Two months later the Japanese attacked in the Aleutians. And then the possibility of a direct attack on Canada reached what might be called its zenith. Japanese forces were everywhere in the ascendancy.

In the Aleutians they had established an advance base. That meant an advance base in North America. Then it was not a question of whether those divisions should be mobilized, but how quickly we could get them out there. The pressure of that summer was something which I shall not soon forget. And it was not only the army which was built up to resist that attack, because there was heavy pressure from all sides on the navy and the air force. I remember very well that increased air protection was urged, and a very large expansion of the air force on the Pacific coast was made.

That is why the 7th and 8th divisions were formed, and I have just told the committee why they were disbanded. I said that the strategic position had changed. By the end of 1942 the pendulum had swung the other way, and with the reoccupation of the Aleutians in August, 1943—remember the date—it was felt that the scale of attack could be changed. We did not lose any time about it. In September we authorized the disbanding of the 7th and 8th divisions. I do not want to make comparisons with other countries, but I do think we as Canadians can feel that we were at least as forward in that as our good neighbours to the south. It was some time after that before the announcement was made by them with regard to a change in their dispositions. Their desire was the same as ours, to release more men for overseas service. That is the situation and that is the answer to my hon. friend.

To-day in Canada we have three brigade groups. One of them consists of the brigade group which was at Kiska. Somebody will say, "What do you want them for?" I can only say that we want them because we are advised that there are certain scales of attack which are still a possibility. It is all very well just to say, "Let us put the guns in grease and close up on the two coasts", but I want to tell this committee that on Christmas day there was an alarm on the east coast and everybody was standing by. Shortly after that there was an alarm on the west coast and everybody was standing by. I can imagine what the condemnation would have been had there been nobody at those posts to stand at the alert.

[Mr. Ralston.]

We have a training brigade in the east and we have a few infantry battalions. We have troops in Labrador, Newfoundland, in the Caribbean and in the West Indies, all of which are included with the strength of troops in Canada. It is not as though those operational troops were there for just one purpose. The endeavour has been to make them as flexible as we possibly could, and that flexibility is demonstrated by the fact that they are trained for the defence of Canada, as I have indicated, as well as to provide reinforcements if they are needed overseas. They are trained also—and this applies particularly to the Kiska force—for special duties in the Pacific should action make that necessary and should the decision be made to send them there. I think we have a rather tidy situation. I think we have made the best of what we have. We are still at war and we do not know what the future may hold. I contend that it is good insurance to have these troops trained for whatever role they may be called upon to fill.

I have mentioned Kiska. Fortunately Kiska was an operation which resulted successfully without the firing of a shot as far as the enemy were concerned. But I want to say this for the Kiska force and for the organization of it. No better found, no better trained, no more alert a force ever left Canada than that force which went to Kiska. I want to pay a tribute to the organization of the Pacific command and to headquarters for the way in which that force was organized in a comparatively short time and made ready to go. I want to repeat here the thanks which I expressed to the Hon. Mr. Stimson, United States secretary of state for war, when I wrote to him and expressed our appreciation for the magnificent cooperation which was received in that operation from the officers and men of the United States navy and army. It was a perfect example of team work. The fact that we were able to disband the 7th and 8th divisions was due to the reoccupation of Kiska. We are proud that it was reoccupied by the joint forces of the United States and Canada.

I want now to say a word with regard to non-operational troops in Canada. These are the troops which serve the different establishments which we have in this country. These are the troops which provide the service with respect to ordnance and supplies going overseas. These are the troops which supply the training staffs for the centres for training reinforcements for overseas. They comprise a good many different groups and a great many different arms of the service. I shall not trouble to put them on record at this time, but I ask the committee to think, for instance, of ordnance, army service corps, medical corps, provost corps, veterans' guard, staff clerks. There are many places outside of district headquarters and national defence headquarters where these troops are required. They include the depot at Longue Pointe which is operated principally not only for storage but for the concentration and shipment of supplies to the United Kingdom government. Over three thousand men are employed at this depot. Men of these non-operational troops are employed in ordnance and ammunition service for other countries. There are dental units to service the navy and the air force, as well as service corps and postal corps for the air force. That gives the committee some idea of the activities of these non-operational troops.

I wish we could cut them down. No one more than the minister would like to see them reduced. We have put a ceiling on them and we are below that ceiling now, but not a great deal. We were able to make a reduction of something like three thousand troops in these non-operational units. That does not sound like a large reduction, but it must be remembered that it was made notwithstanding the fact that we have provided certain new units which had not been required before. I refer to the training brigade on the east coast which is doing such a splendid job in training reinforcements, and certain other units which have been formed for the purpose of doing civilian rather than military work, such as port companies and wood-cutting detachments. There have been increases in certain units which were serving other governments and the navy and air force.

I want to stress the fact that the non-operational troops in Canada, and the whole army in Canada as far as that goes, perform a vital service as a base for both equipment and the providing and training of troops for overseas, as well as the provision of administrative services for both the United Kingdom and the Mediterranean areas. When we talk about the size of our army we must look at our army as a whole. We must remember that it is one army, one organization, and that a major task for these troops in Canada is to see to it that the men in the line are properly served.

Now I wish to speak of our overseas army in England and perhaps this would be the appropriate time for me to say something regarding the leave of absence which was granted to General McNaughton and which has been the subject of a good deal of comment. On December 27, I issued a statement to the press with regard to General McNaughton as follows:

The Minister of National Defence announced to-day that following the recent illness of Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton, medical authorities have advised that he has developed a physical condition which will necessitate freedom from all military responsibility for an extended period.

General McNaughton has advised the government of his inability physically to carry on and has asked to be relieved as soon as possible.

In these circumstances and in view also of the requirements of impending operations, the minister stated that the Canadian government, with great regret, had decided to grant General McNaughton several months' leave of absence from service and to relieve him of command of the First Canadian Army. The minister paid tribute to General McNaughton's outstanding service to Canada and hoped that after a period of rest and recuperation his unusual talents would be available to serve his country in some capacity less exacting than in command of an army in the field.

Lieutenant-General K. Stuart, present chief of the general staff, has been appointed chief of staff at Canadian military headquarters, London, and Major-General P. J. Montague will continue as Major-General in charge of administration at Canadian military headquarters, London, taking that title and as judge advocate general, Canadian army overseas. Pending the appointment of a successor to General McNaughton, Lieutenant-General Stuart has been appointed to the acting command of the First Canadian Army.

The minister stated further that Canadian troops in the Mediterranean had been increased to constitute a Canadian corps under Lieutenant-General H. D. G. Crerar.

The important points were that medical authorities had advised that the general had developed a physical condition which would necessitate freedom from all military responsibility for an extended period and that General McNaughton had advised the government of his inability physically to carry on and had asked to be relieved as soon as possible, and that the government had decided to grant General McNaughton several months leave of absence from service and to relieve him of command of the First Canadian Army.

The advice of the medical authorities was contained in two reports which were transmitted to the Prime Minister on General McNaughton's direction and were also given to me.

The first report came to me about November 29 when I was in the Mediterranean area, and the second when I returned to England about December 10. The reports were as follows:

Department of National Defence
Army
26th November, 1943.

To D.M.S., C.M.H.Q.
Re Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton, D.S.O., M.C.

The above noted officer was first examined by me during the winter 1941-42. At that time he had an area of localized pneumonia at the base of his left lung. He was also in a state of fatigue.

He was again examined by me in the spring of 1943 for an acute respiratory infection. At this time it was also noted that this officer was suffering from fatigue. On both occasions he showed a persistent hypotension.

For the past week he has been under supervision for a recurrence of his respiratory tract infection and has again shown evidence of being definitely below par.

To-day, Lieutenant-Colonel G. C. Ferguson and I have examined General McNaughton. We are both agreed that he is below par and would strongly recommend that he be given leave of absence, and freed from all military responsibility for three months; at which time he should be reexamined.

Provided he is not exposed to undue hardships it is our opinion that General McNaughton could carry on his present duties for a limited period.

The other is dated December 11, 1943, and reads as follows:

Examination of Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O.

Lt.-Col. Ferguson and I have again examined Lt.-General A. G. L. McNaughton, this date, and agree that he still shows definite signs of exhaustion.

We recommend that he be relieved of all military responsibilities as soon as possible.

We also recommend that this period of rest be for not less than three months.

Mr. GRAYDON: At whose request was this last examination made?

Mr. RALSTON: All I know is that this report was transmitted by General McNaughton's direction to the Prime Minister by cable. I was not in London at that time, if I remember correctly. I may have arrived there on the 10th or 11th but I am not too sure about that date. I know nothing of the request. As I say, this was transmitted to the Prime Minister by cable by direction of General McNaughton.

Mr. GRAYDON: Were any of these examinations suggested by the government?

Mr. RALSTON: Not that I know of.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are you sure?

Mr. RALSTON: They were not instigated or suggested by me in any way. All I know is that these were transmitted by General McNaughton's own direction to the Prime Minister.

About the time I received the second report I received a message from General McNaughton through Major-General Montague, Senior Officer at Canadian Military Headquarters, dated December 7, when I was still in the Mediterranean area, or on the way, which was as follows:

Dear Price,

That is Major-General Montague.

Dear Price,

This is just a note to say that the experience of the past few days has shown me conclusively that I have not the strength left to look after the Army properly, and to do, with the required effect, the many things that need to be done from day to day.

Will you please give this message to Mr. Ralston for me, when he arrives, and say that I think the general interest requires that someone else should now take charge, and that I must and will accept the situation with the best grace I can muster.

Ever yours,

A. McNaughton.

Major-General P. J. Montague, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., M.C., V.D.,
The Senior Officer,
Canadian Military Headquarters,
2 Cockspur street,
London, S.W.1.

I immediately set about making arrangements in order that the general might go on leave as early as possible.

The result was that Lieutenant-General Stuart, Chief of the General Staff, who was being appointed Chief of Staff at Canadian Military Headquarters, was also appointed acting in command of the Canadian Army pending the time when a successor to General McNaughton would be appointed.

I saw General McNaughton personally on the 14th and again on the 21st of December.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that the first time the minister saw him when the minister was over there?

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, no, I had seen him two or three times before I went to Africa.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did you discuss his health with him at that time?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: He did not mention his health to you?

Mr. RALSTON: No. I think he spoke of the strain he was under at that time. On the 21st I gave him a copy of the press announcement which, with a slight change not relating to him, was published on December 27 and which had had the approval of my colleagues. I advised him that General Stuart would go to see him almost at once about taking over and to arrange for the beginning of his leave as of December 27. I wrote him on December 22 confirming this, and enclosing a copy of the press statement which I have quoted.

The Prime Minister in a statement issued on December 27 fittingly expressed the regret of us all and paid the tribute due regarding the outstanding service which the general in his high posts has rendered.

I feel that the house and the country would like to have that statement on Hansard. It was as follows:

The word that General McNaughton has found it necessary to relinquish the command of the First Canadian Army will be received throughout Canada with feelings of the deepest regret. Especially will this be the case because of the present condition of his health.

General McNaughton's exceptional abilities as a scientist, coupled with his record as a soldier, marked him out as one particularly suited to plan a modern mechanized military force. With this part of Canada's war effort, he has been most intimately connected from day to day through the whole course of the war.

All Canada will recall the confidence which General McNaughton helped to inspire in the dark days of 1940. After the withdrawal from Dunkirk, the First Canadian Division was one of the few formations available in Britain equipped with weapons to fight. As General McNaughton's division grew to a corps, and then to an army of two corps, he accepted the growing responsibilities and faced the new problems with the utmost skill and devotion.

Weeks and months and years of waiting made heavy demands upon all the Canadian forces in Britain. They made especially heavy the burden of responsibility upon the army commander. Until now few will have realized the great strain under which General McNaughton has worked through years of unremitting tension. It is a strain which has been the greater for him through the loss in action of a gallant son.

During General McNaughton's command, the training and organization of Canada's army overseas has been brought to a very high level. The Canadian units who went into action with the Eighth Army in Sicily last July, and who are to-day fighting with such determination in Italy, have won the highest praise for gallantry in action and for stubborn courage and resolution under fire. Some of this praise belongs to General McNaughton. It reflects the fighting spirit which will always be associated with him as commander of Canada's army overseas.

General McNaughton's health has prevented him from carrying on, as he would have wished, until the end of the war. He has, however, the satisfaction of knowing that his work has been a large factor in contributing to the successes thus far achieved by Canada's army, and that it will have its part in the supreme effort needed to attain ultimate victory.

All Canada will wish for General McNaughton a speedy restoration of his health, and that his exceptional abilities and wide experience may long continue to be at the service of our country.

General McNaughton is now on leave, as recommended by the medical authorities. We are all glad to know that he is making good improvement, and I repeat most sincerely what I said to him in my letter of December 22, that the only thing for him to do now is to devote all his endeavours to getting well.

I am sure that the house and the country will join in wishing for Mrs. McNaughton and for him, as well as for ourselves, that he may have a speedy and complete recovery and many years of usefulness in the service of Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that with the rumours and so-called "inside", "off the record" reports which are current, there might be a desire on the part of members of the house and others to make inquiries here or elsewhere as to the truth or otherwise of these rumours and reports. We could go into all of this as well as any other matters relating to the subject. I would prefer not to do so because such discussions can, to say the least, do no possible good, especially at times like these.

If you ask me whether General McNaughton and the government were always in absolute agreement in everything, I would undoubtedly answer "no." General McNaughton is a man of strong character and strong opinions. He is no "yes-man". The government is the representative of the people of Canada and charged with the responsibility of administering Canada's war effort and the affairs of Canada's army. From what I hear at times, the minister apparently is not a "yes-man" either. That there should be at times divergence of views between the military and the government is inevitable. But I can say that those differences of opinion have not interfered in any way with the loyal carrying out of plans when a decision has been reached. I can say, too, that those differences of opinion have never altered in any way the high regard in which the government holds General McNaughton both as a man and as a soldier.

I can only hope that General McNaughton will be allowed to get the rest and recuperation which he is seeking, free from the worry which a controversy would entail. I hope also that the house and the country will recognize that the important thing at this time is to carry on with the pressing activities of the war and to give wholehearted support to those who are now and who may be charged with the responsibility of leading the Canadian forces in the battle theatres.

Before I deal further with the army overseas—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister one question?

Mr. RALSTON: Well, I wonder if my hon. friend would allow me to go on.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a pretty pertinent one.

Mr. RALSTON: I know, but there will be plenty of time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If the minister would rather not have any questions asked about General McNaughton's retirement until he completes his statement—

Mr. RALSTON: I have completed my statement as to General McNaughton.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Then this is the logical time.

Mr. RALSTON: With deference, I do not think it is. I am endeavouring to make a connected statement.

Now with regard to the army overseas—

Mr. GRAYDON: I was just endeavouring to help the minister clear up the whole situation. I was going to ask him one question by which I think we can entirely clear the air.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend would permit me—

Mr. GRAYDON: It is for the minister to say, but I think it would be preferable if he would permit the question now.

Mr. RALSTON: Now with regard to the army overseas, in England the work and preparation go on. We have there an army headquarters, army troops and a corps. I want the committee to realize, if I can bring it home to them, just what that means—an army headquarters, army troops and a corps. A corps consists normally of two or three divisions. Then there are corps and divisional troops. We have over there reinforcements, the hospitals, the forestry corps, base installations, ordnance workshops and depots, the Canadian Women's Army Corps, and administrative services. They all have their tasks and they are training to fit into the plan of operations. I had an opportunity, both before I went to North Africa and the Mediterranean area and after I came back, particularly the latter to visit quite a number of units and formations which form the Canadian army overseas in England. I cannot tell this committee how keen they are or how hard they are working to put their years of training and preparation to the test. The waiting time for them is past. At last they can see ahead the prospect of striking the blow which will tell to shorten the war and hasten the day of return.

There is a lot written and a lot said about the army, and with all due respect I am not sure that even this committee understands just what is the composition of our forces overseas. I should like to put on record a very brief explanation of what constitutes that army, so that there will not be the apparent misunderstanding and, I submit, sometimes misrepresentation with regard to that organization.

In the first place—I am dealing with an editorial which I saw the other day—the army overseas does not consist of six or seven divisions. Some editor said that just the other day. Second, the army in Italy does not consist of three divisions. The army that is in England and in Italy consists of one army headquarters, that is officers and other ranks, signallers and so on, having to do with the operational and administrative services and the necessary troops in order to carry on those services. In addition to army headquarters, there are army troops—I will explain that in a moment—two corps headquarters, corps troops, and five divisions. That is the army overseas, both in England and in Italy. I want to make it quite clear that while for organizational purposes we divide the troops into groups, and have troops known as divisional and corps and army and line of communication and G.H.Q. troops, it does not necessarily follow that units included in those groups fight with and serve only the units within that particular group.

Whenever formations are organized, and particularly the larger formations of divisions and corps, it is always necessary to provide, with the units of the division or of the divisions forming the corps, a certain proportion of units which are required to support those formations.

What is a corps? A corps consists of a headquarters, certain corps troops, and two or more divisions. The corps headquarters is so organized that it can direct and administer two or more divisions. Corps troops are provided on the basis of a certain proportion for each division allotted to the corps. Quite often the division itself throws off a certain number of troops of certain units and hands them over to the corps commander in order that he may use them to serve either one division or the other, or both perhaps if they happen to be in the line. It may be signals, it may be artillery, it may be line of communication troops, contributed by the two divisions to the corps headquarters to serve the divisions which are in the line, and if one is in a tough spot, extra corps artillery may be put behind them.

As I have said, we have two corps, each with a headquarters. We have allotted two divisions to one of these corps, the one in Italy, and three to the other. One corps with its two divisions and an armoured formation and an appropriate proportion of army troops is in Italy under the command of Lieutenant-

General Crerar. The other corps with its three divisions and another armoured formation is in the United Kingdom.

But we have something more in the United Kingdom. This is what seems to confuse people. We have the First Canadian Army headquarters and the remainder of the army troops which have not been allotted to the corps in Italy.

What is an army? I have said that a corps is an organization which administers, supports and directs two or more divisions. An army is an organization consisting of a headquarters, and army troops supporting, servicing, directing two or more corps. The army headquarters and the army troops in England at the present time—let the committee not forget this—were authorized and organized two years ago when we expected major activities across the channel. And there was not a single objection to it at that time. Then what happened?

Until the middle of 1943 the army stayed as a whole in England, because it was represented to us that that was where the job was. Some people said it was because the government were afraid of having the army do any fighting. Other people suggested that it was because the army commander wanted to keep it together. The truth is that the Canadian army overseas was there to be used, in whole or in part, as would best serve the allied cause. As has been said again and again, the army overseas was kept in England because we were given to understand that that was where it could serve the best in those lean days when Britain had to stand on the defensive. But if we kept these troops in England until the time came to strike across the channel it meant that the whole Canadian contribution in land forces overseas would be thrown into battle without any of them ever having any experience under battle conditions or having heard a shot fired in anger, except the very few who might be attached for short periods to British formations in other theatres. That was the situation which we had to face in the early days because the allies were on the defensive, but it was a situation we could cure when the allies assumed the offensive and we took steps to do it.

In November, 1942, the North African show came along. Canadians were not in it. I was in England at the time and went immediately to inquire why, and was given, as I have already stated in the house, what I considered were good and sufficient reasons for not adding a Canadian component to the British and American forces at that time. Once more I underline the flexibility of our organization, and that our willingness to serve did not mean "all or nothing"; that it meant "in whole or in part."

In the spring the Sicilian operation was planned and the government learned of it in due course. The Canadian government suggested that Canadian troops be employed as part of the force and eventually a request was received for a division. The division went. It joined the redoubtable Eighth Army. The story of thirty-nine days' fighting in Sicily and six months in Italy is a golden page in Canada's war history.

After prospects faded for activity across the channel in 1943, we sought opportunity to give battle experience to more of our officers and men, not only to another division but to a corps headquarters, corps troops and army troops as well. It would be, we thought, a direct contribution to victory in driving out the enemy, but as well, it would give the Canadian army battle-trained officers and men to be available to be drawn on to help season and steady and inspire our troops in England when their job came.

We pressed for the inclusion of another division and of a corps headquarters in Italy. The arrangement was made. Another division was sent. The corps headquarters was sent, corps and army troops were sent, and to-day we have a self-contained formation on that front as part of the Eighth Army. In England we have the other corps headquarters, corps troops, three divisions and the remainder of the army troops.

As I have said, we have in England army troops and an army headquarters. What do we do with them when we have only one corps remaining in England? The answer is that those who are conducting operations are extremely glad indeed to have that army headquarters there with those army troops in order that they may direct and administer and support the Canadian corps along with other formations of British or other allied troops which may be put into the same army organization.

What were the alternatives? Well, there were two. One was to disband the army headquarters and the remainder of the army troops. If we did that it simply meant throwing away the benefit of long training of a highly efficient team at army headquarters and putting our corps in England under some new headquarters completely strange to our personnel and conditions. The disbandment of Canadian army headquarters would simply leave a vacancy in the order of battle of the combined armies, and would require replacement by another headquarters drawn from British or allied sources. It would do no good to our common cause to disband a headquarters, which through long training with our troops had become a well coordinated and highly efficient team. By the disbandment of the remainder of the army troops we would to that extent be injuring the common cause, by dispersing trained and hardened fighting and administrative troops, and, at the same time, we would be creating a fresh demand upon the already heavily burdened British or allied forces for exactly the same units which must come from some other source, in order to support our forward formations of corps and divisions.

The other alternative—the first, as I have mentioned, would be to disband the army headquarters and troops—would be to hand this headquarters organization and these army troops over to the allies and let them officer it to suit themselves. We have chosen neither of these alternatives. We propose to keep our army headquarters and our army troops to serve our own Canadian corps in the United Kingdom, and whatever formations of our allies are included with ours. It follows that any allied formations placed under the control of our army headquarters would bring with them the appropriate proportion of corps and army troops for their support.

In a word, we have an army headquarters to control and administer, and army troops to support our corps, and we have the reinforcements for them. We are going to use that army headquarters and these army troops as a Canadian organization to add to our contribution to victory and to provide the world with further demonstration that Canada is "all-out" in her war effort.

I believe that Canadians will feel that Canada is hitting on all six cylinders with a self-contained corps in Italy with autonomy and self-dependence equivalent to the Canadian corps in the last war. In England we have another corps with its proportion of army troops, and in addition to that we have an army headquarters which we expect will have the distinction of having under its control, not only our own corps and army troops but such other formations and units of the allied countries as may be allotted to it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, in rising to a point of order I think it is only fair that I should give notice of the question that I intended to ask the minister who did not seem to want to answer it this afternoon. My question is whether or not any factors, other than that which he mentioned of ill-health, entered into the resignation of General McNaughton?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: I shall deal with that.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Mr. ILSLEY: Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Chairman, I think I should say something about the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and concurred in by the hon. member for Lethbridge, namely, that we should change our procedure this year and by general consent conclude the discussion on the resolution at an early stage.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the minister the unanimous consent to continue?

Mr. ILSLEY: Do I need unanimous consent to continue?

Mr. GRAYDON: If you do, you have it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; I think that we are prepared to agree with the suggestion, but I am just a little doubtful whether the discussion would cease as early as it is hoped that it would. However, I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that discussion on the resolution should be short.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are you prepared to bring down the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not been able to get the house to agree. I have tried to get resolutions out of committee by saying, "Let us talk about this on the bill." Now that someone else proposes it I agree with the proposal, but I have never been able to get the house to agree with me. When we get to the bill we shall do on one section of the bill exactly what for the last three or four years we have done on the resolution; that is, the departments would have to be taken up one by one in order and fully discussed, which, I think, might have the effect of doing away with some duplication, if we can get the resolution reported.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister include the estimates in a schedule to the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that is the point I want to make clear.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is not much use in making a change unless you do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: That cannot be done because there must be elasticity in the expenditure of these funds. In a war you cannot say how much you need for one purpose rather than another purpose. These are estimates at the present time. There must be transfers from one item to another, from one department to another, in a great many cases.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that not answer the whole thing? If you are not going to add a schedule, why change the arrangement?

Mr. ILSLEY: To get rid of some duplication. I suggest to the leader of the opposition that he think about the matter between now and Monday. It depends very much on what he says about it. I am just going along the way I did last year and the year before because the house would not vote the money, they would not pass the resolution giving us billions of dollars unless they had an account of our expenditures of the year before. They never would do it. If they will do this year I shall be very happy.

Mr. GRAYDON: You would be the first one to ask the same questions if you were leader of the opposition.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know if I would or not.

Mr. GRAYDON: If you did not you would not be a very good leader of the opposition.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not disagreeing with anybody. I am just saying, if you do agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I am agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I think it depends upon the addition of the schedule.

Mr. GRAYDON: Everything depends upon that.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what I had in mind, anyhow.

Mr. GRAYDON: If you are not going to have the schedule let us go on as we were. I think the decision can be made now.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6.12 p.m.

Monday, February 14, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WARTIME WAGES CONTROL ORDER P.C. 9384—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave under standing order 31 to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the urgent need for postponement of the application of the wartime wages control order, 1943, P.C. 9384, which order otherwise becomes effective February 15, 1944, which is to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: A copy of this motion was given to me just before I entered the house. The question of the adjournment of the house must depend upon the urgency of the matter involved. I am not in a position to be fully aware of that urgency, so I would ask the hon. member to let me know the degree of urgency upon which he would base such a motion.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Under the terms of the order in council to which this motion refers, Mr. Speaker, it becomes effective February 15, which is to-morrow. The matter is urgent, because if the application of the order is not postponed it will become effective to-morrow, with its many objectionable features, without members of parliament having an opportunity to discuss it. Therefore I consider it most urgent that the application of the order be postponed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that the order has been in force since December 9, 1943. I have in my hand a copy of the wartime wages control order, 1943, P.C. 9384, dated at Government House, Ottawa, Thursday, December 9, 1943. It was approved at that time. There is one clause in the order which does not become effective until the 15th of this month; that is, a provision giving employees certain advantages through having the cost of living bonus embedded in the wage rate, and having wage scales based on that basic rate. The effect of the postponement of that particular clause, as requested by my hon. friend, would be simply to deprive labour of at least one provision in the order which I think labour would very much wish to have retained. At any rate the order is in force at the present time, and my hon. friend's motion is not a correct statement of fact.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say something with respect to the matter now before the house. When the Prime Minister speaks of the order in council having been effective or in force since December, the date of the order, he must remember that one of the major provisions of the order will become effective to-morrow. So important does labour regard this, that during the last few days there have been protests from one end of the country to the other. And when the Prime Minister talks about taking away something from labour by not having this order applied to-morrow, I suggest that he should not be so far out of tune with labour sentiment. Only yesterday in this city there was a largely-attended labour meeting which asked not only for the postponement but for the rescinding of this whole order in council. The fact that the hon. member for Cumberland has brought this matter before the house is only a reflection of the views of labour from one end of Canada to the other. I am convinced, despite what the Prime Minister says, that this is the last day before the order in council comes into full force and effect, and therefore urgency is a prime factor in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this is not the time to debate the question of the order. It is a matter of stating, with respect to a motion which is before the house, whether what is set forth in the motion is or is not correct. The fact that there have been a number of meetings held—and we all know how these are arranged—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How are they arranged?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, my hon. friend, I suppose, has as much knowledge of those matters as I have.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know what the Prime Minister means by that, but if he is insinuating that there is someone behind the scenes arranging meetings of labour, then I say that is not correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the point is one which needs to be discussed. What I was going to say about these meetings is that they reveal the extent to which representations have been made with respect to the order, not only in the house but throughout Canada, which are not correct. The people have been led to believe that the order was not to come into force until a certain time, namely, the 15th of this month. As a matter of fact the order has been in force for over two months, since December 5 in fact. And so far as I can see no one has suffered by it. Indeed, we are now being told that it should not be put into force to-morrow, lest once in force somebody might perchance suffer from the consequences of it.

The clause which was not to come into effect until to-morrow is No. 16, as follows:

16. No employer shall, except in accordance with a written direction of the National Board in any payroll period commencing on or after February 15, 1944, pay wages to an employee in an occupational classification for which he is required to establish a single rate or range under section 15 of this order, at a rate other than a single rate or a rate within a range established in the manner therein prescribed for such classification.

The manner prescribed is to see that that basic rate contains not only the former rate, but also an amount calculated by way of bonus, embedded in it as part of the rate. The fact the hon. member and others have been under the impression that the order has not been in force up to the present time shows that there has been a good deal of misleading information and some misleading expressions with regard to it. However, I made clear a day or so ago that the government has under consideration certain amendments. Representations have been made by hon. members and representatives of labour and others, and I have stated that very shortly we expected to have certain amendments made to the order. I therefore cannot see why there is any urgency with respect to the order being discontinued at this time.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on this matter, and particularly as to the urgency of it. I believe the point raised by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) is a good one. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, the order has been operative, with the exception of its financial aspects, since December.

I am always afraid of how legislation of this kind may be administered. As I view it, the postponement of the order now will not cause labour to suffer the loss of any benefits which might accrue to them because of the application of the order with respect to the bonus. They are now being paid the bonus; they are receiving that money now. It is merely a matter of changing it from a bonus arrangement to basic rates. What I am afraid of if the order becomes operative to-morrow is that the minimum of thirty-five cents an hour, which the order sets out as being grossly unjustifiable, will be applied by the national war labour board. There are many organizations now negotiating agreements with employers across Canada who have not that particular angle to contend with. If the board is permitted to apply the financial aspects of the present order, in my opinion it is going to militate against organizations now in the process of wage negotiations. That is what I am afraid of—that the board will take as its only latitude in permitting increases the basis now set out in the order, "gross inequalities" meaning thirty-five cents an hour. Consequently it will interfere with the functioning of regional boards, which are now making examination of the wages in different places and with different organizations. They have some latitude, and can make decisions. Under the new order they are not permitted to make any decisions unless they are ratified by the national board. The only scope the national board will have in making adjustments in wages is in respect of the financial aspect of the order to be declared operative to-morrow. I cannot agree with the Prime Minister when he says that labour would receive any benefit from the bringing into effect of the provisions of the order which are not at present operative.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not wish to prevent my hon. friend from speaking, but there is a time when this matter can be debated. I might point out that it has already been debated in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Then there is a bill on the order paper with respect to the wages control order that would make the discussion of the wages control order at this time out of order. Moreover I have given the house the assurance that the matter of amending the order will be discussed again before very long. What we have before us is a motion which states as a fact something which is not a fact; and, not being a matter of fact, the grounds upon which it is suggested action should be taken fall completely. I submit it is for Your Honour to say whether this is the time to discuss this particular question, and more particularly on a motion which does not set forth the facts.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have listened to the submissions by hon. members with regard to the urgency of the matter. Citation 176 in Beauchesne, third edition, states:

> The "definite matter of urgent public importance" for the discussion of which the adjournment of the house may be moved under standing order No. 31, must be so pressing that public interest will suffer if it is not given immediate attention.
> On the 2nd of November, 1932, a member asked leave to make this motion for the purpose of discussing the necessity of immediate action being taken by the house to investigate the financial position of a certain life insurance company and the conduct of its senior officers, as disclosed by a recent police court investigation in Chicago. The Speaker ruled that the motion should not be allowed, because he did not think the matter mentioned in the member's statement was of recent occurrence nor so urgent that the proceedings of the house should be halted so that it may be discussed. There must be a prima facie case of urgency.

On page 741 is to be found a ruling given by the Hon. Mr. Rhodes, then Speaker of the house. It reads:

> (b) "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate" as the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

The right hon. Prime Minister has stated what I had noted, that the motion concerned the urgent need for the postponing of the application of the wartime wages control order, 1943, being P.C. 9384. This order otherwise becomes effective on February 15, 1944. The facts as stated by the right hon. Prime Minister are that the order in council in question is now in effect and therefore it does not come within the last sentence which states that it becomes effective on February 15, 1944. It is very difficult for the Chair not to accede to a request by an hon. member to adjourn the house to discuss a matter which is evidently much in the minds of hon. members, but the Chair must be satisfied that there is that degree of urgency which would make it absolutely necessary that it be discussed in order that no injustice should be done either to hon. members of the house or to the people of Canada. In the circumstances as I now have them I must come to the conclusion that there is not that urgency which would justify me in allowing this motion to be put before the house.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest respect for your position and I have the highest regard for Your Honour—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland). —because of your fairness, dignity and ability to discharge your duties as Speaker, but in view of the urgency of this matter, and in view of the protests that have been made by all parts of Canada, I desire with the greatest courtesy to appeal from your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not deciding a point of order. Standing order 12 reads:

> Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate. In explaining a point of order or practice, he shall state the rule or authority applicable to the case.

I am not dealing with a question of order. I am dealing with a question of the opinion of the Chair, and I take it that my opinion is not appealable by the house.

Mr. NEILL: The Prime Minister raised a point of order and you gave a decision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister raised a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not raise the question. May I say that in regard to matters of urgency the practice is for the hon. member to confer with the Chair in advance and obtain the agreement of the Chair that it is a matter of urgency.

Mr. GRAYDON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I submit respectfully to Your Honour that you gave a decision on a point of order and therefore this motion is either in order or out of order. Whatever you may conclude, that is your decision, that is the judgment of this court on a question of order, and certainly it is appealable.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 31, subsection 3, states with reference to the member who desires to make the motion:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

I take from that the decision rests entirely with the Chair. The Chair must decide whether it is in order. In this case I was not required to decide a point of order. What I did say to the hon. member for Cumberland was that I wished him to give reasons to support his claim of urgency in the matter. I repeat the standing order:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

I did not think it in order; therefore the hon. member has not the leave of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I respectfully point out to Your Honour that the custody of the rights of this parliament rests with the members of parliament themselves. When a question arises as to whether or not the ruling of Your Honour is a proper ruling, surely there does not arise, as Your Honour would suggest in this instance, the right of the Speaker to make a decision quite apart from reference to the house itself. This would be particularly so when a part of the house has asked that the opinion of the house be tested on this point. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) now asks that the opinion of the house be tested, and we are prepared to rise in sufficient numbers in order that the opinion of the house shall be tested now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just referred to the custody of the rights and privileges of hon. members of the house. These are in the care of His Honour the Speaker. My hon. friend well knows that at Westminster, from which we take our example in these matters, it is not only the tradition, it is the custom and the practice of the house, to obey the Speaker in his rulings as largely as possible and to have very serious grounds before taking exception. I do submit that if this house is to get on with its business in the way in which it should, it is important that we should not be indifferent to the opinions expressed by the Speaker and begin a practice of appealing from the Speaker's rulings time after time without number. A lot of time of the house has been wasted in that way in previous sessions, and I do submit that the decorum and business of the house will both be furthered by hon. members accepting the rulings of the Speaker unless there are the strongest of reasons to the contrary.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would refer hon. members to page 747 of Beauchesne, third edition, on which is reported a decision by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black), who was then Speaker of the house. I quote:

The Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision that it is not urgent to adjourn the house for the purpose of discussing an urgent matter of public importance being appealed from was confirmed by the house.

Leave had been asked under standing order 31 to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, which was stated to be:

The recent dismissal of between 200 and 300 officers and men of the Royal Canadian Air Force without regard to their families, their overseas service or their period of enlistment or service, and the embarrassing situation which may arise if they were forced by the necessity for employment to accept service with another nation.

Mr. Speaker ruled that the statement was not in order and that the matter was not one of urgent public importance and moreover that there was no appeal from his decision.

Mr. Ralston appealed from the Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision.

And the question being put by Mr. Speaker: Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained; it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not quite hear one part of that quotation. Was it the present Minister of National Defence who made the appeal at that time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why not? It killed the air force.

Mr. POWER: Sabotage of the air force by the government of the day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You began the sabotage back in 1923.

Mr. SPEAKER: The appeal was made by the present Minister of National Defence.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GARDINER—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. COLDWELL IN DEBATE ON FEBRUARY 10 AND EDITORIAL IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

On the order for motions:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I wish to make a statement with reference to a charge made when I was out of the house on Thursday last, which was commented on by the Ottawa Citizen in an editorial this morning, February 14, and which concerns my actions as a member of this house. The first reference is to my not having been in the house at the time this matter was discussed. At page 337 of Hansard of February 10, 1944, the following is recorded:

Mr. Coldwell: Page the Minister of Agriculture, somebody says. I should say so.

Some hon. Members: Where is he?

Mr. Douglas (Weyburn): Probably scared.

My answer is that on Thursday last I entered the house and checked the speaker's list to see if anyone from the C.C.F. group was listed to speak, as I expected a reply to what I had said the day before. There was no member of the C.C.F. listed to speak. I remained in the house until the member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall) took the floor and then went to my office to fulfil other engagements. I am informed that after I left the house the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) arranged to take the time previously allotted to the leader of the Bloc Populaire and answered in my absence what I had stated the previous day. If his name had been on the list I certainly should not have left the house and would not have needed paging.

While I was absent he made this statement, as reported in Hansard at page 334,

And let me say that there has been no more devastating machine in the democratic world than that organized by the Minister of Agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan. Let me say to the house that employees of the federal government were there in force with cars belonging to the Dominion of Canada. We made a check of them. I have before me only a partial list of some of the cars that were present during the time I myself was in that constituency. I saw some of them there parked outside the hotel where I was staying, which also happened to be the headquarters of the Liberal party. We took a number of car numbers; all Saskatchewan licence numbers of the dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A. Regina.

No. 20475	No. 20444
No. 20471	No. 20452
No. 20474	No. 20458
No. 20456

Mr. Graydon: They must have been a fleet of jeeps.

Mr. Coldwell: No. They were not jeeps. Some were fine modern cars, including one fine maroon car which I am told the minister himself drove on one occasion to attend a political appointment. Who paid for the gas and upkeep of the cars? The people of Canada. But the political machine is so brazen in the province of Saskatchewan that it dared to do this sort of thing in the midst of a by-election. And so, when the minister talks about regimentation, let me remind the house that no other province in this dominion, at any time, has been regimented in poverty by a political machine to the extent that Saskatchewan was regimented during the depression years. Unless you were a member of the Liberal party or had a recommendation from that party you found it difficult to get relief work.

There are certain statements in the Hansard report to which I wish to refer because they reflect upon my activities as a member of this house and of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not minister yet.

Mr. GRAYDON: Keep the record straight on that.

Mr. GARDINER: He just missed being a minister by two years—a minister of the church. The member for Rosetown-Biggar stated at page 334:

Let me say to the house that employees of the federal government were there in force with cars belonging to the Dominion of Canada.

Answer: There was not a single federal government employee who had a car belonging to the Dominion of Canada which was being used for political purposes in the constituency of Humboldt during the by-election to my knowledge.

Again at page 334 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar states:

We made a check of them. I have before me only a partial list of some of the cars that were present during the time I myself was in that constituency. I saw some of them there parked outside the hotel where I was staying, which also happened to be the headquarters of the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER: What was he doing there?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not assume my hon. friend is suggesting that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was staying at the headquarters of the Liberal party. He happened to be in the same building.

Answer: Mr. Speaker, I have before me the full list that was taken down by the C.C.F., not only the 7 numbers quoted in Hansard but the full list of cars, the numbers of which were taken down by the C.C.F. and referred to the licence office at Regina for check, and this will provide a sufficient answer to that statement. The cars are as follows—this list is rather long, containing 29 car numbers and names of owners, and I will put them on Hansard unless it is the wish of the house that I read them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read them.

Mr. COLDWELL: Read them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is this our war effort?

Mr. GARDINER: If it is the wish of the house I will read them. The numbers are as follows:

21025 Department of Natural Resources, Federal Government, Regina.
20458 Dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A., 910 McCallum Hill Building, Regina.

Mr. GRAYDON: Put them on Hansard without reading them. We could not discuss labour matters just now, which is a much more important matter than Saskatchewan elections.

Mr. GARDINER: I am quite sure that if I did not answer the charge that has been made it would take more time to do it in the country than to deal with labour, when my hon. friends opposite get out there. Then, if it is the wish of the house, I will put the remainder of the list on Hansard. It is as follows:

20067 Arnold W. Loehr, farmer and provincial civil servant, Muenster.
20533 Saskatchewan Pool Elevators, Limited, Humboldt.
8147 John Deere Plow Company, Saskatoon.
765 Waldemir Yanchinski, farmer, Yellow Creek.
5493 Senhouse D. Noble, farmer, Colonsay.
2202 Lake of the Woods Company, Limited, 34 Cambridge Court, Saskatoon.
25357 William L. Dutton, farmer, Govan.
25983 William S. Nobbs, farmer, Portreeve.
20452 Dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A., 910 McCallum Hill Building, Regina.
20444 Dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A., 910 McCallum Hill Building, Regina.
20639 Archibald McCallum, 2910 Angus street, Regina, organizer.
2022 Ryan Brothers, Limited, James street, Winnipeg.
20456 Dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A., 910 McCallum Hill Building, Regina.
20474 Dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A., 910 McCallum Hill Building, Regina.
2914 T. M. Ball Lumber Company, Limited, 614-9th Street, Saskatoon.
21843 August J. Kruse, Humboldt, farmer.
20471 Dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A., 910 McCallum Hill Building, Regina.
21322 John F. Anderson, organizer, 7 Banner Block, Regina.
79938 August Kachur, farmer, Lanigan.
75069 Mrs. Elsie Tallentire, housewife, Whitewood.
58315 William Bernesky, farmer, Connel Creek.
57166 August Delke, farmer, Jansen.
4080 Russel William Ley, Viscount, farmer.
20475 Dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A., 910 McCallum Hill Building, Regina.
20731 Francis L. Brennan, salesman, 2530-11th avenue, Regina.
2812 The Wadena Nurseries, Canada Building, Saskatoon.
5737 Massey Harris Company, Limited, 1st avenue, Saskatoon.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

It will be noted that in that list there is one federal car not mentioned by the member for Rosetown-Biggar, namely the first, and three operated by officials of the provincial governments, who, I presume, cover the territory in their ordinary work. What does this list together with the list placed on Hansard by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, indicate? It indicates first that what the C.C.F. did was to take the number of the cars standing outside the hotel in Humboldt at which the member for Rosetown-Biggar was a guest, send the entire list to Regina to be checked, take from the list cars which were registered as the property of the Department of Agriculture of the federal government; and then, without any further check, the member for Rosetown-Biggar makes a charge against me as a member of this government on the ground that because the Liberal headquarters were in the hotel the cars must have been used by employees of the federal Department of Agriculture for political purposes.

In the first place the member could not have stopped in the room in which he did in that hotel without knowing that the engineers of P.F.R.A. had a drafting room on the second floor of the hotel, which was occupied by them throughout the summer, before, during and after this election campaign, until the construction of the dam was agreed to.

The member for Rosetown-Biggar further states:

We took a number of car numbers; all Saskatchewan licence numbers of the dominion Department of Agriculture, P.F.R.A., Regina.

The list above shows they took a number of car numbers and selected a group of seven which they found to be P.F.R.A. cars registered at Regina. The list and the work being done by those operating these cars is as follows:

20458. This car is operated by M. B. J. Brockman, who has been stationed at Humboldt for several years on small water development. His car is always stationed at Humboldt, but my information is that it was not used in the election.

20474. This car is operated by Mr. Ed. Hogan, who resides just outside the Humboldt seat but who did some inspection work in the constituency during the election while Mr. Brockman was on annual vacation leave.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, is this a matter of urgent public importance?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is all out of order. There is no question of privilege here.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I ask for a ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to whether the statement read by the Minister of Agriculture is of urgent public importance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is a question of privilege.

Mr. GARDINER: The statement was made that I as a member of the government ordered and directed the use of cars owned by the government for political purposes during an election campaign; and as a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have the right to reply to that statement, made not only in this house but outside.

Car No. 20452. This car is operated by Mr. L. D. McMillan, district engineer in that district, who is in charge of the investigation work on the proposed water supply dam in Wolverine creek. He was also in charge of the drafting room in the hotel. Mr. McMillan is an engineer who comes from the province of Manitoba and about whose politics I know nothing.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. the minister is going through a list of cars. I do not know just what his object is, but in so far as he is identified with any of the cars—

Mr. GARDINER: They all come under my administration.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Engaged to win the Saskatchewan election.

Mr. GARDINER: A statement was made that I was using these cars in an election campaign in the province of Saskatchewan, utilizing public funds to purchase gasoline in order to operate the cars, and I am stating who was using them and for what purpose, to refute the statement just repeated.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the minister should be allowed to make his statement of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Let us quit the war and have an election.

Mr. GARDINER: Car No. 20475. This car is operated by R. Peterson, engineer who was making soil tests in connection with the foundations necessary for the construction of the Wolverine water project.

Car No. 20444. This car is operated by Peter Hyndman, agricultural supervisor under P.F.R.A., who made a survey and report on the agricultural benefits of the Wolverine water project.

I am positive that none of these last three men who were working on the project throughout the summer of 1943 took any part whatsoever in the by-election. Any part which the other two might have taken would only be what any citizen resident in the area is free to take under our democratic institutions; but they did not use federal government cars for political purposes during the election.

Car No. 20471. The information I have is that this car was operated in Manitoba early in the season but was turned over to Saskatchewan during the season, but that it at no time during the election was in or near Humboldt.

This leaves the car which is at headquarters in Regina, No. 20456, and which is placed at my disposal when I am in the province. I drove this car to the constituency, used it on certain occasions while there and drove it back to Regina later. I paid for my own gasoline while it was out, as I always do. The government did not pay for any gasoline in any car used for political purposes during that election, and no one of the cars listed above excepting 20456 was used for political purposes to my knowledge. To the extent that I drove the car in and out of the constituency and on a few occasions while I was in there it may be said that car was used for political purposes.

The Ottawa Citizen comments in these words on the last paragraph of the quotation from the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, which I have given:

> It is not a pretty picture that Mr. Coldwell draws. No doubt Mr. Gardiner will enter a trenchant rejoinder. But how does Mr. King feel about it? He is perhaps obligated to Mr. Gardiner to some extent for election in Prince Albert.

There are two objections that I raise with regard to that comment as being unbecoming of a newspaper when referring to a member of parliament. The first is that it suggests that Mr. Coldwell's inferences are based upon facts, without any further examination of the records. The records indicate they are not. Second, it suggests that what Mr. Coldwell infers was done in Humboldt—namely that government officials driving government cars operated on government gasoline, were directed by the Liberal organization under Mr. Gardiner—was no doubt done in the past to elect Mr. King in Prince Albert. I only wish to state that Mr. King has been elected five times in Prince Albert, the first time in spite of a campaign put on by an eastern newspaper which sent to Prince Albert the Stevens charges of 1926 just off the press and Mr. J. J. Maloney.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. King at no time—

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order. I want the hon. minister to sit down until I get through with my point of order. After all I think I have the right to rise to a point of order.

Mr. GARDINER: But I have the floor. I have the right to sit down before you get so angry about your rights.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not going to argue the matter with the minister. I do not mind going a certain distance on this matter of privilege, but when it comes to reading into the record a whole lot of political propaganda, directed, I presume, at some other party now in the house—I have no idea to whom the minister is referring—I object to his bringing in these extraneous matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is replying to an attack in the press.

Mr. GRAYDON: You sit down, too.

Mr. GARDINER: The Prime Minister has won each election on that record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Sit down; Mr. Speaker has not ruled.

Mr. SPEAKER: I gathered from the statement made by the minister that he was referring to matters which came within the question of privilege, but he must show that the latter part of his remarks also comes within the confines of a question of privilege so far as he is concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: I could read the Citizen; I have it here. It suggests—

Mr. SPEAKER: The question of privilege refers in part to the Prime Minister, not the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Prime Minister can speak for himself.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the editorial here. After giving what they call the picture of the organization in Saskatchewan they suggest that I used the same methods in Saskatchewan in order to elect the Prime Minister. I am giving the house the answer to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): An attack upon you.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. King at no time has suggested, nor would he agree, that anyone should conduct a campaign in his interest on anything but his record and policies. He has won each election on that record and those policies. The only person who has ever approached me to manipulate the organization of a Saskatchewan constituency to get a seat without opposition for anyone is Mr. Bowman of the Citizen. When I told him I had no such power or authority he refused to believe me. If he wishes to discuss that further I am prepared to discuss it with him, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COLDWELL: On a question of privilege, the minister in the course of his remarks left the inference that I had deliberately avoided making a speech in his presence. May I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that on the afternoon in question I saw the Deputy Speaker as soon as I was able to do so, which was quite early. He told me that Mr. Raymond was ill and that if I saw the chief whip of the Liberal party I might be able to follow Mr. Perley, who was speaking second.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did you have to get their consent?

Mr. COLDWELL: There was a speakers' list. I want it clearly understood the inference that there was some understanding between Mr. Raymond and myself is utterly without foundation. At no time did I speak to anyone other than the Deputy Speaker and the chief whip of the Liberal party. I want to make that very clear.

BORDER CROSSINGS

SURRENDER BY CANADIAN CITIZENS OF REGISTRATION CERTIFICATES ON ENTERING THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege; since we are having a field day, I have one of my own. On the first day of December last, as a law-abiding citizen of Canada I had occasion to go to the United States. I had diligently prepared myself with a passport and a permit from the foreign exchange control board. I carried in my pocket, as I have since August, 1940, my national registration certificate. At the border a very courteous young customs officer, whom I know very well and whom I am glad to call my friend, approached me, asked me for the paper given to me by the foreign exchange control board, and demanded my registration certificate. I asked him under what authority he acted. He said he did not know, but those were his instructions. Not wishing to have an altercation with him I gave it to him. It has never been returned to me. I am now a law-breaker in this country and liable to be taken at any time by the mounted police and run into the calaboose on Nicholas street by reason of some order of this government over here, which so regiments our lives as to make us lawbreakers willy-nilly. When am I going to get back my national registration certificate?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on February 9—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want an answer. I want to know from the responsible officer of this government when I am going to be put in order as a law-abiding citizen. I want to know what right there was to take away from me my national registration certificate and make me willy-nilly a lawbreaker. I have been going around the country in fear and trembling lest some mounted policeman take me by the neck and demand my registration certificate or in default put me in gaol. I want an answer from the government.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I am not certain whether the complaint that the hon. member has made is against an official of the Department of Mines and Resources or against an official of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): National Revenue.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is not rum-running.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It must be War Services.

Mr. CRERAR: To that extent the department I represent is in the clear, and I suggest to my hon. friend that if he goes to the Minister of National Revenue and gives the date and the name of the polite customs officer who kept his registration certificate, the Minister of National Revenue will endeavour to get it back, and if in the meantime it should have been lost, I am sure there will be some way of getting the necessary authority to issue my hon. friend a new national registration certificate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should I have to do anything?

Mr. CRERAR: I quite agree.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are in agreement. Then send it back.

Mr. CRERAR: Has my hon. friend brought it to the notice of the Minister of National Revenue?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not. It is not my business to do so. It is their business. Send it back. That is the attitude I take; and I will not ask for it, either.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, the Minister of National Revenue is not a mind-reader, and neither he nor any other member of the government knew about my hon. friend's certificate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But you are responsible for the officers of your department.

Mr. CRERAR: We will try to get it cleared up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Send me back my certificate.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There was a government notice in the newspapers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West). —that everyone crossing the border had to give up his registration certificate—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You can make all the noise you like; it does not bother me. If a member of parliament does not get back his registration certificate, what about the public, who do not know how to get theirs back? The hon. member's certificate has not been returned, and there was this notice in the newspapers that anyone crossing the border had to give up his registration certificate. If the hon. gentleman does not get back his certificate, what about other people? I think it is up to the government to give an answer to this at once.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before this matter is decided, I want to raise a point. We have not received an answer from the government to this very important question. What the hon. member for Peterborough West says is pertinent; it is germane to the whole issue, because there must be thousands of people—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am going to ask the government this question, which is a supplementary one, and I demand an answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): How is this in order under "motions"? If the hon. member got up on a question of privilege, he was entitled to do so, but this other discussion is out of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a question of privilege myself on behalf of thousands of people, not just one person. Is this policy still in effect?

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): As far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned, the hon.

member has stated that his certificate was taken from him by a customs official. I shall be glad to look into the matter and find out if one of our officials has it. If so, it will be returned to the hon. member.

Mr. GRAYDON: You had better reverse the policy.

Mr. LOCKHART: Also on a question of privilege, will the minister be good enough to inquire about certificates taken away at the Niagara Falls port of entry and get them back?

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City) moved:

That the first report of the special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, presented to the house on the 10th instant, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN ARMY—TOTAL STRENGTH, DISCHARGES, ETC.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What was the total strength of the Canadian army overseas as at December 31, 1943?
2. What was the total strength of the home defence army in Canada as at that date?
3. During the year 1943, how many men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act have gone active and are now available for service anywhere?
4. During the year 1943, how many men and officers were discharged from the Canadian army overseas, (a) on account of service disabilities; and (b) for other reasons?
5. During the year 1943, how many men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act serving in Canada have been discharged, and for what reasons were they so discharged?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Assuming that by "overseas" is meant in the "European zone" the strength of the Canadian Army Overseas at 31st December, 1943, was over 240,000 including over 700 members of the C.W.A.C.

2. Assuming that by "home defence Army" is meant all troops in the North American zone including those in operational units, non-operational units, training stream and district depots, the strength at 31st December, 1943, was over 235,000 including over 12,000 members of the C.W.A.C. In addition, there were over 7,500 men on long term leave granted in order that they might engage in agriculture, logging, mining, etc.

3. Of men actually enrolled in the Canadian Army, the following number have enlisted for general service anywhere during the year 1943 according to documents received at National Defence Headquarters to 31st December, 1943:

General Service Army	5,616
R.C.A.F.	114
R.C.N.	43
Other Military Forces	5

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WAR EXPENDITURES AND RADIO BROADCASTING COMMITTEES

On the order, Government Notices of Motion:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): At this point may I say a word about the appointment of committees. As hon. members know, the government is anxious to have all these committees constituted at as early a date as possible. I think only two special committees still have to be appointed, the one having to do with radio broadcasting and the other with war expenditures. I am quite prepared to hand to the Clerk of the House a similar motion to that which appeared last year and the year before with respect to the war expenditures committee, just as soon as I can secure the names of hon. gentlemen opposite who are to be members of that committee. I understand that some names will be given to-day or to-morrow; at any rate what I wish to make clear at the moment is that the government would have placed a motion on the order paper before this had it not been that up to the present we have not been able to get all the names of hon. gentlemen opposite who are to be members of the committee.

Earlier in the session it was mentioned from the other side of the house that there was a desire to debate the report which was tabled by the war expenditures committee at the close of last session. I was asked if I would give an undertaking that this might be done when the war expenditures committee was being set up this year. At the time I mentioned that it was the custom to allow the reports of one session to end with that session. However, since I understand hon. gentlemen opposite wish to debate the last report made by the committee on war expenditures, I have handed to the Clerk notice of a resolution which will permit that course to be taken. I am only too happy to have this done if it will expedite the appointment of the war expenditures committee for this session.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I think I asked the Prime Minister if something of that sort could be done. If it could, I think it would expedite the setting up of the committee this year. I should be glad to discuss that report either by itself or when the motion appointing the committee this year is before the house. I might also tell the Prime Minister that we gave the name of the proposed member of the committee from this group to the proper authority I think the day the house opened, or the day after. We were all prepared with our nominee.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister has gone to some pains to indicate that one of the reasons the war expenditures committee has not been set up is that the names of the members of this party who are to serve on it have not been handed in to the whip. I did not intend to raise this question at this time, but since the Prime Minister has been good enough to bring it up I want to tell him that one contributing factor which has made it difficult to hand in those names is the spirit of frustration felt by many of our members because of the fact that government members of the committee, being in the majority, have consistently closed the doors of the committee to the public and have kept the proceedings of the committee secret. It is a difficult position for us to be in. If the Prime Minister will rise in his place now and say that, so far as the government members are concerned, these committee meetings will be open to the public we can hand in the names this afternoon; but it is very difficult for us to get people to serve on a committee where the blinds are pulled down, the shutters closed and the doors locked. That is the story.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Each committee of this house manages its own business, and the government does not interfere.

Mr. GRAYDON: The business is managed by the majority of the committee, who are Liberals.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend seems to think the government has no obligation in the matter of carrying on the business of the country except what is granted to it by the opposition. May I say to my hon. friend, and this is important, that the government has been sent here to carry on the business of the country at a time of war, and it is our duty to adopt the methods that we believe will achieve that end most effectively.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do you think that is the best way to carry on the war effort, to close the sessions of that committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment; I shall answer my hon. friend immediately and effectively. No parliament on earth has more experience in matters having to do with war expenditures than the parliament at Westminster, and I am prepared to say that this government will follow with respect to war expenditures exactly the procedure followed by the parliament at Westminster. My hon. friend knows very well that the reason the parliament at Westminster has not opened the doors, put up the blinds and done the other things suggested by my hon. friend is that it regards the war as far too serious a matter to permit a lot of unnecessary discussion to take place in the nature of political controversy.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know whether the Prime Minister is or is not serious in what he says.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is not only serious, but he would add that another reason is that the government does not wish to have any information given to the enemy —which, apparently, my hon. friend is quite prepared to risk.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the point raised by the Prime Minister: Imagine his talking about comfort to the enemy over a question of wartime housing!

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this matter may I point out that I resent the leader of the opposition saying to the Prime Minister what he should undertake regarding the views, information and the stand taken by members in that committee. I as a member of the committee went there without dictation from anyone—and I refuse to take it from anyone, even from the Prime Minister. I decide myself what stand I shall take.

Mr. GRAYDON: Open the door and we will think more of you.

RECONSTITUTION OF COMMITTEE ON DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the statement the Prime Minister has just made respecting other committees, would he tell the house whether the proposal to reconstitute the committee on the defence of Canada regulations has been forgotten?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Up to the present time no request has been made for the constitution this year of that committee. If, however my hon. friend thinks it desirable to have a committee on the defence of Canada regulations constituted at this session, the government will be prepared to consider the suggestion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Our names for that committee have been in for some considerable time just so that there may be no doubt about the matter.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

BLACK MARKET IN SUPPLIES TO AIRPORT IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence for Air based on an article in the Gazette of Glace Bay, of February 8. This article says that there has been a black market in supplies to the airport in that area. Has the minister been advised of the charges appearing in that newspaper article? If so, can he assure the house that the proper machinery of his department will be used to conduct a thorough investigation into the alleged charges?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): My hon. friend gave notice of this question. He asked first: "Has the article mentioned been brought to the attention of the minister?" The answer to that is yes. His second question is: "If so, is the matter under investigation?" The answer is yes.

His third question is: "Will the investigation be followed through to its logical conclusion and appropriate action taken to assure the public that the taxes they are paying for military purposes are being protected by those responsible for the administration of military affairs in Canada?" The answer to that is yes. And the article bears on its face the assertion that appropriate action is being taken, in that a number were arrested, and are now in gaol.

Mr. GILLIS: But action was instituted by the civil authorities.

Mr. POWER: Action is being taken. I would say to my hon. friend that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police act in most cases on behalf of the military services.

Mr. GILLIS: The city police were the first to act in this instance.

FLAXSEED

INCREASE IN PRICE TO CANADIAN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, based on an article from the Canadian Press appearing in the Ottawa Citizen under a Winnipeg dateline of February 12. The article reads:

> The Winnipeg Tribune said to-day it had learned that the price of flax seed to Canadian farmers would be increased from $2.50 a bushel to probably $3.

Is this true?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to get to my feet to make a statement on this matter. For the purpose of informing flaxseed growers in order that they may make their seeding plans accordingly, I wish to announce that it is the government's intention to pay a fixed price of $2.75 per bushel for No. 1 Canada western flaxseed, basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur, and for No. 1 Canada eastern flaxseed, basis in store Montreal, during the 1944-45 crop year. The present fixed price of $2.50 per bushel will continue in force until July 31, 1944, and the $2.75 price will take effect on August 1.

WHEAT

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on February 9 the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) asked me if I would make a statement regarding sales of wheat to the United States.

In reply to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I wish to inform the house that the United States war food administration, through the commodity credit corporation, is making tentative plans to import 175,000,000 bushels of wheat from Canada during 1944. Of this total, 40,000,000 bushels are intended to be moved by rail direct in United States cars from western country points, 30,000,000 bushels by vessel from Vancouver and other Pacific ports, and 105,000,000 bushels by lake during the 1944 season of navigation.

I wish to emphasize that this is a tentative programme and subject to change in the light of transportation developments and war food administration needs. Purchases by the commodity credit corporation are being made from time to time in amounts broadly corresponding to the quantities for which firm transportation commitments can be made.

With respect to the rail movement, between the dates December 13, 1943, and February 10, 1944, inclusive, the Canadian Wheat Board has sold 10,269 cars (approximately 18,000,000 bushels) of wheat for shipment all rail from country elevators in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to destinations in the United States. Of this total, 9,419 cars have been or will be shipped from country elevators in Manitoba and Saskatchewan and 850 cars from country elevators in Alberta.

Since December 13, 1943, United States railways have delivered to Canadian railways a total of 5,561 freight cars owned by the United States railways for the transportation of this wheat. Additional United States cars are being delivered daily at border points to the Canadian lines by United States railways. The volume of future all rail sales to the United States will be largely governed by the number of additional United States cars delivered.

Prices asked for such wheat by the Canadian Wheat Board from December 13, 1943, to February 10, 1944, have ranged between low points for the grades of one, two and three northern of $1.41, $1.38 and $1.36 per bushel, respectively, and high points of $1.47, $1.44 and $1.42 for the same grades, all basis in store Fort William Port Arthur. These sales have been made from day to day and have been within these prices ranges, net to the Canadian Wheat Board basis in store Fort William.

Sales have been confined almost exclusively to the grades of two and three northern.

Since the importer and buyer of this wheat in the United States is the commodity credit corporation, a United States government agency, the question of duty does not arise.

All freight charges apart from those from the country shipping point to Fort William are absorbed by the buyer.

Here follows a list of exporting firms which have made the sales to the commodity credit corporation:

Alberta Pacific Grain Company Limited.
Bunge North American Grain Corporation, Canadian Agency, Limited.
Cargill Grain Company, Limited.
Continental Grain Company, Limited.
Hallet and Carey, Limited.
Kerr-Gifford and Company
Leval and Company, Incorporated.
McCabe Brothers Grain Company Limited.
National Grain Company Limited.
Norris Grain Company Limited.
Reliance Grain Company Limited.
James Richardson & Sons Limited.
Saskatchewan Pool Elevators Limited.
Searle Grain Company Limited.
K. B. Stoddart & Company Limited.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the wheat to be sold to the commodity credit corporation of the United States in this crop year or calendar year, or has a definite period been set?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think a definite period is stipulated in the negotiations; but it is anticipated that it will be during this crop year.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

MAJOR-GENERAL CHISHOLM

REFERENCE TO ADDRESS TO ROTARY CLUB AND TORONTO WELFARE COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the appropriate minister. Did Major-General G. Brook Chisholm, director general of army medical services for Canada, speak with the authority of the government in a public address delivered to the Rotary club and the annual meeting of the welfare council of Toronto last Friday, February 11? Was he reflecting the views of the government when he is reported to have said:

To adjust recruits properly to army life, that "the influence of mothers" has to be weakened. He felt that women "are not oriented toward society, they are oriented toward men." In times of stress, such as war, women become a liability.

Is that a correct statement?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I shall inquire into the matter, and take what the hon. member has said as a notice of question.

CHRISTIE STREET HOSPITAL

INQUIRY RESPECTING ALLOWANCES TO MEN ON DISCHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, based on information to the effect that amendments are to be made in connection with hospital allowances to men discharged from Christie street hospital. It is my understanding that there is some revision in prospect. Would the minister give, if not to-day perhaps at an early day, a statement indicating the extent to which these provisions will be amended and whether they will be made applicable to men who have been discharged three, four or five months ago?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I shall be glad to look at my hon. friend's question and answer it later.

SUGAR

PRODUCTION OF BEET SUGAR IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw to your attention a situation which I believe requires consideration. On Friday I asked three questions regarding the sugar situation in Canada and

Your Honour advised me to put those questions on the order paper, which I did. They appeared on the order paper to-day and I was told that they will be answered in the form of a return, which means a good deal of delay. I should like to point out two or three factors which bring about a certain degree of urgency in this matter.

Let it be borne in mind that the cost of producing beet sugar has increased considerably of late and that the number of crops which compete with sugar beets on irrigated land have increased, mostly because of the war. May I draw to your attention the fact that Canada is facing a sugar shortage and no one knows just what is going to happen with respect to sugar. There is every reason why we should do everything in our power to stimulate the production of sugar. Not very long ago a committee representing the Canadian beet growers waited upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and asked him if he would give a further rebate of a half cent per pound of the excise on sugar. It seems to me that some statement should be made to let the country know whether the minister is prepared to do anything in this regard or whether this matter of sugar is going to be left to pure chance.

Let us bear in mind that men are signing contracts right now for the production of sugar and if this matter is not attended to within a short time it will be too late.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question on the order paper is one which concerns two if not three departments. Because it concerns two or three departments it will be necessary to have a consultation about it, and for that reason it is passed as an order for return.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the minister give us an assurance that we will have a reply within the next two or three days?

Mr. GARDINER: A reply will be given as soon as possible.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There were just three simple questions asked, it should be possible to give the answers in ten minutes.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, February 11, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I should like to finish my review of the activities of the department and my reference to the army in Canada and the various groups into which that army is divided. On Friday I gave particulars of the operational troops and mentioned that they had been considerably reduced as a result of the changed strategic situation and the disbandment of the seventh and eighth divisions.

I also gave the committee some details of the non-operational troops, which are the servicing units and the servicing personnel, not only for Canada but for overseas. There are two further groups I should speak of. One is the training stream, which is tremendously important, and the other is the reselective and disposal stream, or depots as we call them. In the training stream, as of only a few days ago, we had something over 75,000 personnel, of which a little over 15,000—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is meant by training stream?

Mr. RALSTON: That is a stream or group into which men go for training in progressive sequence. They go first to basic training, then to advanced training, then to special arm training, then to the training brigade and then overseas. In personnel, those not actually attached to units, we have something over 75,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not all are in that stream; some do not go overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: A little over 15,000 are N.R.M.A. personnel. Regarding the depots or disposal and reselective stream, I am sorry to have to say that the number in these depots has increased. I do not know of any group which is more difficult to regulate than the group in the depots. To the depots come those who are on their way out for discharge, those who have been in a unit which has been disbanded and who have not yet been posted to some other unit, those who come from a unit or a training centre, posted for the time being to the depots until they go to a new job. Generally speaking these depots perform the function of employment agencies for soldiers who are temporarily not posted, either because of unfitness for the job they have had or for which they have been training, or because their unit has been disbanded.

Another function of the depots is the documenting and medical examination and taking care of soldiers who are being discharged.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it fair to say that it is a distribution centre?

Mr. RALSTON: I should think so. It is a distribution centre. I suggested that it was more or less a transient hotel for soldiers, but the department sat down on that title definitely. They said it was no such thing, that it is a place where men are actually posted to different units, where training is done and where every endeavour is made to make the stay at that particular place just as short as possible.

Mr. LOCKHART: Has there been any change in the functioning of the depots since the war started?

Mr. RALSTON: There has been a great deal more in the way of employment activity. More attention is being paid to selecting men for particular jobs, especially in the last year. As a matter of fact, we have at the depots placement officers similar to those of the Department of Labour. These men are there for the purpose of finding out the jobs in the different districts for which men are wanted, and also looking for men who can best fill those jobs.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is that the only reason for the increase in the numbers at the depots?

Mr. RALSTON: No; the increase in numbers is due to no small extent to the disbandment of the seventh and eighth divisions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And men returning from overseas, like the forestry corps?

Mr. RALSTON: And men returning from overseas. They have to be discharged and the depots have been under additional pressure this year. I am convinced that generally speaking there has been an extra effort put forward to deal with these cases just as fast as possible. There may be some exceptions, but speaking generally those in charge of the depots are never satisfied with the progress being made. I know they are seeking honestly and sincerely for improvement in administration. We endeavour to terminate as speedily as possible the uncertainty which faces a man when he goes to the depot.

I have referred to the placement officers and stated that they fulfil the same function as the placement officers of the Department of Labour in the employment offices. Arrangements have been made to have representatives of the Department of Pensions and National Health at the depots to look after men for whom rehabilitation treatment is needed. That is to say, in connection with men on the way out an endeavour is being made to integrate the services rendered by the Department of Pensions and National Health with the services rendered by the Department of National Defence. I am sure that hon. members have in their minds cases—there may have been a number of them—in which men seem to get out of the army and not into the Department of Pensions and National Health as promptly as possible. I can only say that both the Minister of Pensions and National Health and I have been constantly at work on that. We have tried to impress our officers with the importance of setting up a system whereby the men will be informed not only by the department of pensions but also by the army of what their rights are; and vice versa. The department of pensions will give to the man who is in the army, even though he has not been discharged, such information as can be given with regard to his rights eventually when he comes to be discharged. That is not merely his right as to pension but as to treatment, vocational allowance, unemployment allowance and all the different benefits provided under the department of pensions. Those depots will become more important as the war goes on and demobilization increases, because the problems of the post-war employment of soldiers will be first encountered and dealt with there. The depots will be the focal point.

Speaking generally with regard to the army in Canada, everybody wants to see it reduced and wonders why it is so large. I wish to speak of two or three features of administration of the army in Canada. We have endeavoured to make some genuine effort to reduce it. In this I point out, if it is any comfort to us, that we are at least as far advanced in this matter as our good neighbours to the south, and in some instances that I know of we took the steps considerably earlier than they did.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What is the total number as of this date?

Mr. RALSTON: The total number of what?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Of the home army.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to summarize just as soon as I get through with these reductions. Hon. Mr. Stimson, Secretary of State for War in the United States, only a few days ago issued a statement in which he forecast what he called a drastic shake-up in the army in the United States. He spoke of comb-outs that were being made, of discharges and replacements of physically fit men by men less physically fit. I read his statement with a great deal of interest, and I think I can say that the policies which Mr. Stimson announced are along the line of the policies which have been in force in the Canadian army for some time.

Mr. GRAYDON: The cases are scarcely parallel.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, they are. Let me give one or two examples. Our neighbours to the south are replacing physically fit men by members of the Women's Army Corps, soldiers unfit for service overseas, new recruits physically handicapped and short-term enlisted men. Canada releases her physically fit men by utilizing general service personnel returned from overseas, general service personnel unfit for operational duties, the Canadian Women's Army Corps and N.R.M.A. personnel who cannot be absorbed in operational units. That was the great objective—to release men for operational service.

Mr. Stimson mentioned also that they were releasing overhead personnel, which I take to be those in the non-operational units, which I spoke of the other day as servicing units. In Canada we have been doing exactly the same thing. We have been combing out general service personnel, physically fit. I stated last year that in Canada over sixty per cent of the general service personnel in the non-operational units were men who were below category "A" or over thirty-five years of age. That meant that a comb-out had already taken place. To-day this figure is close to seventy per cent.

Our drive was also to release general service men from operational units in two ways, by comb-out and by disbandment, with the result that during the present fiscal year, ending March 31, 1944, we shall have released probably 15,000 general service personnel from operational units, a large number of whom will be for overseas service.

Mr. Stimson mentioned another feature of the drastic shake-up in the United States, and that was the reverting to inactive status of thousands of commissioned officers over thirty-eight years of age for whom no suitable assignments were available. In that case also we can say that Canada is, to say the least, not behind the United States. Since last September we have had released numbers of officers who could not be suitably employed. We have not fixed a definite age limit in this respect. We have said that they shall be reverted to reserve status if they cannot be advantageously employed in the service in their present rank, and that is regardless of age, whereas in the United States apparently the general policy is limited to deal with officers who are over thirty-eight years of age.

In addition, the Canadian army some months ago inaugurated the retirement age limit; the retirement of officers who it is found cannot be advantageously employed as well as those who have reached the age ceiling is not a particularly agreeable task. Those who have given good service are naturally anxious to see the war through; but it is obvious, when the peak of expansion is passed, that it is unwise in the interests of both the officer and the service, as well as in the interests of national economy, to continue in active status officers for whom no suitable employment is available or who have reached the age limit fixed. We have thought and still think—and it is working out that way—that it affords to the officer an opportunity to reestablish himself in civil life before the rush of demobilization comes. It also gives the younger officer a chance to make his mark in this war. The Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) expressed the same idea in announcing a somewhat similar policy for the air force a few days ago—that it would make the air force more dynamic, vital and virile. That is exactly what it does in the army, under the policies which we inaugurated some time ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is experience no factor?

Mr. RALSTON: I want the committee to follow along with me, if members will permit me to proceed; but I am glad that my hon. friend interrupted with that particular question. I can say to my hon. friend that there is just one exception with regard to the retirement of officers of sixty years and over. The officer must be retired unless the adjutant-general certifies that no other suitable officer is available to take the job he is holding, and in that case there may be an extension for one year.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister the figures on retirements?

Mr. RALSTON: I am reaching in the air for this figure. They have not been completed but I think we have in prospect something like 700. I am not saying 700 over age, but either over age or not advantageously employable in their present rank.

The third advantage is that it promotes efficiency in the service by increasing interest and enthusiasm by the enlargement of opportunity to the younger officers. The fourth advantage is that it releases for civilian occupation men who have had an established place in civil life and who can contribute much toward reconstruction in the transition period. I want to record here what I have already said publicly, namely the appreciation of the department of the services of those older officers and particularly those who served in the last war, who have relinquished their civilian occupations without thought of personal sacrifice, and made a fine contribution in this war to help build up the Canadian army of to-day. Those men have done their bit and have now left the army better for their work. Their service is appreciated and they now are giving younger men whom they have helped to train an opportunity to advance.

Mr. Stimson announced also the putting of training camps, stations and other installations on a stand-by basis. We have done the same thing in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York Sunbury): What do you mean by that?

Mr. RALSTON: Closing training centres, due to the fact that the peak of expansion was past and that the development of the armed forces was on a maintenance rather than on a capital basis. It is just the same as in connection with our munitions production. That was driven to a peak in order to get production and initial equipment for the formations. That equipment is now in very many cases being produced on a maintenance basis; that is, on a replacement or reinforcement basis. It has not to be furnished initially for further capital formations. We in Canada announced the same policy. That policy applied to both officers' training centres and to other ranks' training centres as well. Last spring I announced the closing down of officers' training centres at Gordon Head and Three Rivers, with the concentration of training at the officers' training centre at Brockville. That reduced overhead and output. We had put forth an aggressive effort to build up the officer strength of the army, which during the days of 1942 was considered very necessary, and was demanded to meet the emergency that developed as a result of events following Pearl Harbor. Our officer strength was built up just as fast as it could be. We have now a reserve. There were two major factors which contributed to that; first, the improvement of conditions which warranted the disbandment of the seventh and eighth divisions making those officers available for other duties; second, the fact that operations in 1943 were not of the degree of intensity for which provision was made. The fact that we are in this comfortable position of having a reserve to meet officer requirements does not mean that officer training has ceased, or that those now serving in the ranks will have no opportunity for commissions. But the general policy is that recommendations for commissions will be made after a man has an opportunity of proving himself overseas rather than in Canada.

[Mr. Ralston.]

We have this reserve of officers, and we are utilizing it by making good use of the time and facilities which we have to broaden and to intensify their training; in other words, adding to their qualifications by giving to them refresher and advanced training to make them just that much more fit to undertake the responsibilities which devolve upon commissioned officers. As I say, we have those facilities, and we are taking advantage of them to give these young officers training far in advance of what would have been possible in the last war.

Mr. Stimson did not speak particularly of officer training alone. He spoke of training camps, stations and other facilities, which would be placed on a stand-by basis. We have done the same thing with regard to our basic training centres.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask one question? Have you brought instructors back from the fighting fronts, such as Sicily, Italy and North Africa, to the officer training centres?

Mr. RALSTON: From time to time, yes. I cannot recall names at the moment; we are bringing them back from time to time. My hon. friend probably heard an officer by the name of Lieutenant Colonel Garneau on the radio last night. Lieutenant Colonel Garneau had been at Sicily and Dieppe and is in Canada now in connection with training.

So far I have spoken about officer training centres. I shall now speak about training camps and other ranks. This is another policy which we have had in force for a considerable time. I have not the date, but as I remember it, it was sometime last summer that I announced the policy of closing several of the training centres and the inauguration of a plan for linking up the basic training with the advanced so that men in a certain basic training centre would know they would be going to the advanced training centre and would not be distributed all over Canada. This made for liaison between centres. The officers in these linked centres knew what the conditions were in the centres with which they were associated and the proficiency which had been arrived at, and the general scope and quality of the training. That is to say, the advanced training centre would know all about the basic training centre, and therefore would be able to pick the man up in his training from where he had left off. It made for more speed and more efficiency than would be the case if the man had come from some basic training centre which the advanced centre did not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why was there such a wide distribution in the early days?

Mr. RALSTON: Simply because they had to be put wherever they could be accommodated. The purpose of reducing the basic training centres and providing the link with the advanced training centre was to reduce overhead and to integrate basic and advanced training.

Since that time thirteen basic training centres have been discontinued and the capacity of eleven more has been reduced. This has permitted a reduction of staff. Some of the closed centres are in use for other purposes and others are on a stand-by basis so that the original capacity can easily be utilized if occasion should arise. In the meantime we have ample basic training capacity for the number of men we assume we estimate we shall require. The closing of the centres where only small numbers were in attendance, and the concentration in fewer establishments has helped the staffs in the training centres to do better work, and the staffs at the districts and at headquarters to give closer and more helpful supervision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The training centre at Edmundston is very small; has it been closed?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know; I am not quite sure; I do not think it has.

I should now like to answer the question of the hon. member from Cumberland (Mr. Black), with regard to the army in Canada. Last year I said there would be a definite reduction in the number of troops in Canada. I said that would be largely effected by the dispatch overseas of units already earmarked for overseas service, and of some required for administrative service; that is to say, there would be a reduction by taking units which were in Canada and sending them overseas. The number in Canada earmarked for overseas at that time was about 11,000. As a matter of fact I said that the minimum reduction would be 15,000, I think. I also said that the strength as of March 31st would likely be about 235,000. I am glad to say, on the record we have, that I believe we have done very much better than that. We estimate that the army in Canada will be something over 215,000, as against 235,000 which I predicted last year; that is the active effective strength. We estimate that the reduction, instead of being about 15,000, will be nearer 35,000. Indeed, in the reduction are some 8,000 granted long-term-leave in agriculture, mining and industry who ought not to be charged to the army, since they are only nominally soldiers and have been on leave for months and months. We cannot treat them as soldiers and at the same time have them used in the national economy for something other than military service. It might be said that we had men on leave last year, but we had very few last year as compared with this year.

Mr. GREEN: Are they included in the 215,000?

Mr. RALSTON: I think the 8,000 are included in the 35,000 reduction. I should say also the C.W.A.C.'s were not included last year and were not included this year either, but there has been an increase of between three and four thousand in the Canadian Women's Army Corps this year. That increase is not counted in estimating the reduction. To me, the most satisfactory feature of the reduction is that in the process over 70,000 men will have been sent overseas by March 31 of this year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about those who have come back and are at the dispersal centres? I refer to the 2,000 foresters. Where do you put these; they are in Canada but are not being used.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall give my hon. friend the distribution of the 2,000 foresters. I have not it here. They are being used. Some of them are still at the depots, and if they are there—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is so small, it is ridiculous.

Mr. RALSTON: No, my hon. friend is wrong. There were something like 2,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A good many of them have been disbanded.

Mr. RALSTON: I will give the distribution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the greatest fiasco of the whole thing.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister break down those figures?

Mr. RALSTON: Under the uncertainties that have existed and the administrative difficulties involved in reorganization, that record of reduction is one in which the department has a right to take some satisfaction. I would remind the committee that included in these figures for Canada are forces maintained by us on the outposts of the continent, in Newfoundland and Labrador, and in the Caribbean. Included in the figures are the 5,000 sent to Kiska. The break-down as at March 31, 1944, shows that we estimate the operational troops will be over 55,000, the non-operational troops something over 75,000, and those in training and awaiting disposal, something over 75,000. The total will be over 215,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the minister say that the non-operational troops exceed the operational?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Comb them out; that is all I have to say.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend does not appreciate what the non-operational troops are. They are, for instance, the veterans' guard at internment camps; I have mentioned 3,000 at Longue Pointe depot working for the British government, and there are the men in the units in the dental and service corps, working for the navy and the air force, and the staffs of the training camps. There are the Army Service Corps personnel, the ordnance personnel, the medical units and all these service units, which are not simply for the purpose of servicing the army of Canada in Canada, but for the purpose of providing a base for equipment and reinforcements for overseas.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Where is the classification with regard to the reserve army for home training, with no intention of going into combat overseas? They are known as the reserve army.

Mr. RALSTON: I was going to deal with the reserve army. In reference to the matter of reinforcements—

Mr. GREEN: Before the minister leaves that point, how many of these men are N.R.M.A. men?

Mr. RALSTON: Some 70,000.

Mr. GREEN: How are they divided?

Mr. RALSTON: Forty-seven per cent of the N.R.M.A. are in operational troops; fifteen per cent are non-operational troops; twenty per cent are in the training stream; eight per cent in the depot reselection and disposal wings and seven per cent are on leave.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is the total number?

Mr. RALSTON: I believe it is 70,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that include those absent without leave, deserters?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We ought to know about that.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot make a complete and comprehensive statement now. Perhaps the hon. member will allow me to continue and he can ask questions afterwards.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You know and we do not. We will ask questions.

Mr. RALSTON: I will find out for my hon. friend. With regard to reinforcements, I have a very brief statement which will put the matter clearly. I am glad to be able to say that notwithstanding the fact that a part of the army has been fighting since July, the reinforcement pool overseas is well up to the planned original full strength. This pool was that which was estimated to be adequate to meet battle casualties, and the supply can and will continue to be replenished by the dispatch of further reinforcements from Canada as required.

There is one qualification to be made. It is very difficult to match supply with requirements of all the different types of tradesmen. Thirty-five per cent of the army to-day are in the different trades, of which there are over 200, many of which are highly specialized. It is a constant battle to get from the population of this country, or for that matter of any country, so large a percentage of skilled men, particularly bearing in mind the needs of war industry. The adaptability of young men is such, and the presence of tradesmen throughout the army is so general that I think we can be confident we shall always be able in time of emergency to meet the need.

We have ample trade training facilities and we try well ahead to allocate men during training to meet the requirements which we forecast from the demands that come periodically from overseas. That reinforcement pool overseas will be drawn on as casualties occur; but we estimate that by sending 48,000 men overseas during the fiscal year, 1944-45, we would, on the basis of estimated casualties before us, still end the year with a pool sufficient to maintain the army at the height of its fighting efficiency. To provide that 4,000 a month, we estimate that we shall have 60,000 general service personnel suitable for overseas service in training centres and in units in Canada at the end of March of this year. These, less certain wastage which always occurs from training, will be sent overseas as they complete training or as they are made available by orderly withdrawal from units. That will deplete the number in the training stream. Therefore, to safeguard the future, we are budgeting for an intake of 48,000 general service plus 12,000 N.R.M.A. personnel to release general service personnel, or a total of 60,000 from the total Canadian manpower pool for 1944-45. If we achieved this intake of an average of 4,000 general service men per month it would see us at the end of the fiscal year with reinforcement pool overseas maintained at adequate strength, and it would see us with sufficient men in training centres to fight on during 1945.

In the last three months our intake of general service men averaged a little over 3,700. For January it was almost 4,000. What the future will be I do not know, but certainly efforts will be steadily put forth to maintain this January rate. If recruiting should materially fall off it will begin to affect the numbers dispatched overseas in the later months of the fiscal year 1944-45, and should find us at the end of March, 1945, with the pool maintained overseas, but with the number of general service men in Canada reduced approximately by the amount of deficiency in that intake. As a further backlog we have in Canada well over 60,000 N.R.M.A. personnel, of which number perhaps 50,000 could be made available for overseas service if emergency arose and necessary action were taken.

Mr. GREEN: Has there been any increase in that number since last year?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I have not the exact figure. I gave the percentages a few minutes ago. In answer to somebody I said 70,000. I do not think it can be 70,000. I fancy the explanation is that the 70,000 is the number projected as of March 31 while the 60,000 is the number now.

Mr. GREEN: What has been the intake of N.R.M.A. recruits in the same time?

Mr. RALSTON: There will be plenty of opportunity to give those figures later and I shall have someone furnish them.

Mr. GREEN: You should have them in the general service statement.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will permit me to make my statement; I cannot have everything at once. I do not think he quite means what he says, when he suggests what I should have and what I should not have. The reinforcement position always depends, of course, on the accuracy of forecast as to casualties and our officers have made a careful study of this factor. I think we have made ample provision in this respect, and therefore, I think I can say to the committee with considerable confidence that our reinforcement position for the fiscal year before us will be well provided for.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister say that he makes that statement with full confidence?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot say with full confidence; I do not know what the casualties will be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of reinforcements, will the minister say, in the event of a second front in Europe, on the western front, whether we have adequate reinforcements.

Mr. RALSTON: I will say exactly what I have said here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not say anything.

Mr. RALSTON: I am saying what anybody would say who had any sense of responsibility.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have a sense of responsibility, and I resent that.

Mr. RALSTON: I have a sense of my responsibility, too; and I say to my hon. friend and to the committee that the casualties have been estimated on the basis of the best information that can be obtained in conjunction with the war office, having regard to the operations which will be carried on, and that is the situation if those casualties are realized. I have said to the committee already that the casualties we have suffered in Italy were somewhat less than those that had been budgeted for.

Mr. GREEN: Are the divisions overseas—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The minister has expressed the desire to make his statement first, and then he will answer questions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are in committee.

The CHAIRMAN: We are just dealing with the resolution itself; there is no special item before the committee.

Mr. LOCKHART: Can we not interrogate the minister at all as we go along?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South will recall that last year the practice was to allow the minister to make his statement; then there were at least four or five or six quite lengthy speeches, one of which was made by my hon. friend, before there was any thought of asking questions of anybody or getting down to business. I am glad we are getting down to business earlier this session.

There is another matter to which I wanted to refer; it is just in passing, but at the same time I feel that the armed services should indicate to the committee that they have not lost sight of it. I must say that I have hesitated to talk very much about rehabilitation or demobilization. Sometimes I have been a little concerned at people going overseas to talk to our men about rehabilitation and demobilization, knowing as I do and as the country knows what is before us this year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That the war is not won.

Mr. RALSTON: That the war is not won. I felt that it might give the boys an entirely wrong impression, that it might turn their minds from the job they have in hand or perhaps indicate that our minds were being turned from the job which is in hand. At the same time I know enough, from my experience in the Mediterranean area and in England, to realize that naturally the boys are thinking about these things. They are young men who are looking forward to coming back some day, and they want to know what is to be done for them. They do not want charity, but they want to know how they are to be assisted and how they are to be recognized, having regard to the fact that they have been away from employment conditions in this country for a number of years. Of course this is not the particular province of the three armed services; but I wish to say—and in this I am inspired by, and want to give credit to, my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air—that quite regardless of the fact that pensions and national health, or the veterans' welfare department, or whatever it may be, eventually will take care of the matter, all three services intend to take and are now taking a definite and positive interest in the prospective rehabilitation of soldiers, sailors and airmen. It is not intended that the services should do this by way of providing rehabilitation grants, because those will come after demobilization; it is to be done by looking forward to the time when demobilization may come, endeavouring to plan the relative priorities of the various men who are now in the service, whether it be by length of service, by occupation or what-not. I would not want the committee to take it from anything I say that any policy has been decided upon—but the services want to determine what shall be a fair method of rehabilitation and demobilization; to help the men who remain in the service for a considerable time due to military duties, but duties which may not be as pressing as the duties we see before us this year; to help these men to prepare themselves, looking forward to the time when they will be discharged and return to civilian life.

So each of the three services is setting up a special directorate to deal with demobilization. I do not mean that each directorate is to deal only with the machinery, to decide where the medical examinations shall take place, what forms will be signed, where men should be sent for the purposes of demobilization and discharge, and things of that kind, but it is also to consider and work out what can be done while the men are still in the army, the navy or the air force, to assist in preparing them for their return to civil life. It may be the matter of vocational training, which is being talked about so much; it may be vocational guidance; it may be more education; it may be advice; it may be assistance in some other way to prepare them to return to their rightful place, the place they want in society. These directorates will be headed by men who have had experience in this war, and, I hope, in the last war; men who will understand the problems, the aspirations, the needs and the ambitions of these boys. The directorates will be coordinated by means of an interservice council, so that as nearly as possible we may have the same degree of assistance in the three services by way of vocational training and preparation for civil life, having regard to the facilities provided and the opportunities that present themselves in the service in which the men are engaged now. Further than that, we shall have an interdepartmental council composed of representatives not of the three services alone but of the three services, pensions and national health, labour, and reconstruction, when that department is established. I only mention this to indicate that the services themselves realize their responsibility to those who are still in the service, so that such spare time as these men may have when the active part of the war is over, if they are still retained for military service, shall be utilized in the best possible way, having in mind the desirability of assisting these men in order that they may be prepared to resume the functions of citizens.

Someone asked me about the reserve army. Just a day or two ago a statement was published in this regard, and I should like to give the committee the substance of it. First I want to say that the Canadian army can never acknowledge in too generous terms the work of the reserve army, or the non-permanent active militia as we knew it, and all it has meant in laying the foundation of the Canadian army as it exists to-day. Nearly every unit of our army is founded upon a former militia unit. The names may have been changed, but the personnel, the structure, has remained, and the foundations and traditions are there. If the non-permanent active militia had done nothing more than furnish that foundation it would have performed not only a creditable but a vastly important service in connection with the great war of 1939.

Mr. STIRLING: That was the original scheme of the non-permanent active militia?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: They do not always get the credit that is due them, and for that reason I am glad to hear the minister make this statement.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no doubt about that. More than that, the non-permanent active militia not only furnished units and helped to mobilize them; it furnished officers as well to take posts not necessarily in their own units but elsewhere, particularly staff officers in the beginning of the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: And the people in the non-permanent active militia went to a tremendous amount of trouble and expense.

Mr. RALSTON: Not having been a militia man myself, perhaps I can express appreciation more freely than others. I have had occasion to marvel at the time, the energy and the money, as my hon. friend says, that commanding officers particularly, and other officers as well, have put into this work of keeping up the morale of the regiment, making it attractive for men to come in, giving what is perhaps more valuable than money to busy men, namely their time and interest, in order that these young men might have associations with the army, and the benefit of the riper experience of the older ones.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): In that case services have been voluntary.

Mr. RALSTON: The service was voluntary, originally, but that could not be expected to continue forever. I think the country was asking too much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The greatest asset was leadership.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, there is no doubt about that. We did, as a matter of fact, provide for what we called small administrative and training staffs, for which we paid.

Mr. GRAYDON: We would have been in a bad fix when war broke out, if we had not had them.

Mr. RALSTON: We would not have had an organization at all. The reserve army carried on and furnished these units for the active army.

There came a time when I had to come to the house—two years ago I believe it was—and make a statement. I was asked to say what defence plans we had for Canada, and how we were going to meet the situation on the west and east coasts. I had to speak at that time about the organization of reserve brigade groups, in which reserve units were brigaded for purposes of preparing for actual defence, if defence should be necessary.

At that time, as everybody knows, there was a tremendous upswing in the reserve army, provided by way of additional training equipment, pay and allowances, and by way of extra facilities provided for these units. I think they tided us over, and saw us through at a time which was indeed a very difficult one, before we were able to get going completely with the active army, in full strength.

I believe I have had the opportunity of meeting the officers commanding in almost all districts in Canada. I have been impressed with the interest, zeal, enthusiasm and self-denial those men have shown in their desire to help, and in their eagerness to have young men join in order that they might train themselves for whatever task they might have to fulfil in the armed forces.

At that time the reserve army had four roles. One role was a basis of expansion for the active army, in the event of further mobilization. Another was the operational role in the defence of Canada. Another was that of continuing reinforcements to the active army, and the fourth was the duty to aid the civil power.

With that activity there has been strenuous and exacting work done by officers and men, including the older men and the boys. Night after night in different armouries they trained in order to see to it that they could do their part, or that they would be ready to do their part in case the need should arise. I know that from different reserve units I have had the request that they might be stationed at some point on the east coast or on the west coast to do their share of duty, as it were. Of course that meant a tremendous amount of dislocation in the work of businessmen and others who were members of the reserve units. It would have meant that for the time being the men in those units would have had to sever their connections with the ordinary enterprises in which they were engaged.

Fortunately the situation was such that we did not actually have to use those units for defence. Now, with their background of two years of intensive training and a general increase in efficiency, they are asking, "What will we do now?" It is possible to reassess the demands which we make on the reserve army during this year. It is of course a bulwark against any possible deterioration in the military situation.

Its role during the coming year is summarized in this way—and I put this first point very high. At the same time it may sound perhaps more psychological than military. The role I mention is that of maintaining throughout the country continued interest in the Canadian Army and its activities, and to set to all citizens an example of preparedness at all times. That is what they have done right through, and I do not think it was needed at any time more than it is now. Many of these men are perhaps working at work benches during the day in munitions factories or in stores or offices or on the farm, but in the evenings they give their time to training, and to fitting themselves for a possible emergency, should the time come. They serve in two ways. I do not know of any better example of "preparedness" than is found in the reserve army.

A second role is that of providing a continuing flow of reinforcements for the forces overseas, by training young men of pre-enlistment age. Another is to back up the civil authority responsible for the enforcement of law and order. Another is that it shall stand as a trained reserve to support the active forces available for the defence of Canada if the military situation should deteriorate, and the last is that it shall be a basis for expansion of the active army, should the necessity arise.

The reserve army is insurance against the uncertainties of war. It represents a substantial investment in time, effort and military knowledge on the part of its members. It is sound common sense to maintain that insurance while the risk continues to exist.

While the necessity for the reserve army remains unchanged, it is possible, in view of the improvement in the military situation and the increased efficiency that has been achieved, to decrease the intensity of its training during the coming year. It is therefore proposed: first, to reduce the period of training from forty to thirty days. This will permit a 15-day summer camp, with the remaining fifteen days training carried out at local headquarters, either as forty-five training evenings, or partly evening training and partly week-end exercises.

In addition, provision will continue to be made for the further training of officers, non-commissioned officers and specialists.

Since the reserve army has been operating with a liberal scale of full-time administrative and training staffs for some eighteen months, it is considered that units have now progressed to a stage where their officers and non-commisioned officers are sufficiently qualified to carry out their training without the same degree of assistance. There will therefore be some reduction in the number employed on full-time training duty.

While no general change in the structure of the reserve army is contemplated, it is proposed that some measure of stream-lining will take place to ensure that all units maintain a satisfactory standard of efficiency. Units unable to maintain a satisfactory strength and efficiency will become dormant for the duration of the war.

In other words, the answer to the reserve army is this: "We want you to carry on, and we believe you are doing a service to Canada in the training which you have undertaken, not only in the record you have made, but because of the interest which you maintain in a community, and through your example of "preparedness." The reserve army assists the young men of sixteen, seventeen or eighteen years who spend their evenings in training with the older men. They are there for the purpose of providing a flow of reinforcements, and that flow has been a most generous one. It will stand back of the civil authority and act with the active force, if necessary. It will be a basis for expansion of the active army, should the necessity arise. We say to them, "You do not need to train quite as intensively as you have done. We have cut the training down by twenty-five per cent from forty to thirty days. We continue to make provision for the training of officers, non-commissioned officers and specialists. We ask you to carry on more of your training yourselves than you have done. And we say, in connection with those units which have become more or less dormant, those which are unable to maintain a satisfactory degree of efficiency, 'we will let them lie dormant for the present time'."

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there a very large percentage which would fall into that class?

Mr. RALSTON: I am told there is not.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Why do they become dormant?

Mr. RALSTON: I presume it is because of their location, more than anything else. They would be in the more scattered communities.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Might it not be that all eligible men have gone from that district?

Mr. RALSTON: Well, as the hon. member knows, the members are men of thirty-five years and over, and boys under age.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would the minister give the number in the reserve army?

Mr. RALSTON: Although I have not the exact figure, I think it is around 100,000.

It is felt that these changes will give fresh incentive to all ranks of the reserve army to maintain the efficiency that has resulted from the past two years of intensive training. The continued support of employers in encouraging their employees to attend annual camps will be of the greatest assistance in carrying out this objective. I wish to say a word of appreciation to employers who have planned so as to allow men to attend these camps.

Mr. GRAYDON: At great inconvenience to both the men and the employers, sometimes.

Mr. RALSTON: A greater measure of responsibility will be placed upon those who have benefited from this training, and the shorter periods of duty will require that all ranks take full advantage of the available training time to maintain the high standard necessary to fulfil the roles allotted to the reserve army. Modern equipment and the latest methods of training will continue to be made available for its use. At the same time appreciable economies will be effected in its cost to the public. Let me emphasize again that the voluntary contribution of time and effort on the part of all ranks in the reserve army is deeply appreciated and recognized, and it is the purpose of the department to ensure that the demands made upon the reserve army are matched to the changing requirements of the military situation. The standard of training already achieved and the improved strategic situation justify a reduction in the training time required during the coming year, provided full advantage is taken of the reduced period to maintain efficiency.

There is just one last item I wish to put on record before I conclude. I am not going to give any figures now, but I should like to say a word with regard to the Canadian Women's Army Corps. There has been an increase of about 3,000 in the corps this year.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the total now?

Mr. RALSTON: I think it is about 14,000. Of the many endeavours which have been put forward to provide agencies to assist in the war none has been more successful, so far as the Canadian army is concerned, than the C.W.A.C. I want to voice the wholehearted and unreserved appreciation of the department for their work and the pride we have in their accomplishments. These young women are serving not only in Canada but in Washington and in the United Kingdom and they would like to serve in other places overseas as well. Where they replace men they are doing their jobs as well as the men, and sometimes better. I think the men will permit me to say that.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is nothing surprising about that.

Mr. RALSTON: They are more nimble-fingered and perhaps even more nimble-witted than the men. They have proved a credit to themselves, a credit to the army and a credit to Canada. I am sure that the committee must take pride in them, seeing them at their work, and on the street. I am sure that hon. members would have got a tremendous thrill to have seen the parade I did in London when I attended the service at St. Martin's in the Fields, just before I came back from overseas. They are a great corps and they are doing a magnificent work.

In conclusion, I just want to sound one note of warning. I only wish I could make it reverberate across this dominion from Sydney to Vancouver. People are being led to believe or they are leading themselves to believe that we have got on so well in winning the war that the collapse of Hitler's Germany is just around the corner. When I was in England there was some talk of the war being over by Christmas; now there is talk of finishing it this year. I hope we do, because every day by which it can be shortened will mean a saving, not just in dollars, but in precious lives and in distress in the homes of Canada and in every other country allied with us.

It is true that we have taken Italy's colonies in North Africa. It is true that we have captured Sicily and about one-third of Italy. It is true that a small portion of the territory held by the Japanese in the southwest Pacific has been rescued from them. It is a fact that the Russians in their amazing fighting have retaken a lot of the territory which Germany had overrun. But it is also a fact that more than half of the territory taken by the axis forces in their drives of the last three years is still conquered territory. It is a fact that there is not much evidence that German military power has decreased and there is no sign that the Japanese troops have lost any of their willingness to fight and die to hold the outposts which protect their home base.

In both Europe and Asia great forces of well-trained enemy troops, well led and well equipped, are ready to fight—and they do fight. Germany dominates Europe. She controls a population of some 325 million. She draws on practically the whole of Europe's industries and economic resources. She has more than 300 well-trained divisions. She has millions of foreign workers in her war industries. It is true that if all the resources of the united nations were pooled we would have an advantage over Germany in the European theatre. But if it were not for the enormous sacrifices of our Russian ally, who pays the price for magnificent victories, the odds would be roughly four or five to one against us, and these odds would be more unfavourable because of the network of fortifications which the Germans have prepared.

Let us face the facts. The two major reasons for our optimism for the future—there are others of course—are, first, the ability of our Russian ally to keep nearly three-quarters of the German army occupied in the east and, second, the ability of British, Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and United States aviators to keep up their tremendous raids on Germany's European fortress. Germany has shown herself able to stand prodigious losses. At Stalingrad last winter she lost some twenty divisions. Every one of these has been replaced by a new division, well trained and equipped with the latest and best types of weapons. The Germans lost eight divisions in North Africa. Those eight divisions have been replaced with new divisions armed with the most modern equipment. Even last year the Germans reformed, reequipped and raised more than sixty new divisions, each of which had approximately 600 machine-guns and 300 heavier weapons. Included in the armament of these divisions are new models of tanks, self-propelled guns, rocket-guns and other latest type equipment, which in some cases is equal to and in some cases better than anything the allies have.

I am not a pessimist, far from it, but I am a realist. I hope I can make this country realize just what we have ahead of us. It is true that good news has been coming, but remember that if that good news is to continue it can only be by continuous contribution of the matchless price which the men and women of the forces and the homes they come from pay, and only if we are willing to make our contribution in self-discipline and self-denial worthy of theirs.

Let us take a look back and a look ahead. It took three and a half years to clear the enemy out of North Africa. The war has been going on for four and a half years and it is only in the last six months that we have been able to overrun Sicily. The successes we are now having in Italy are just on the fringe of Europe. So far as our land forces there are concerned, we are nearly eight hundred miles from Germany with plenty of formidable opposition and tough ground on our way. The continent of Europe still has to be retaken. The superb fighting in Russia has still to be matched. China must be liberated and Hong Kong avenged. Burma, the Malay peninsula, Singapore and the Philippines must be regained and the southwest Pacific cleared. These enemies of mankind must be forced to unconditional surrender.

Canadians in that tough and heroic fight at Dieppe marked the first turn of the tide toward the land offensive in northwestern Europe. Canadians in Sicily and Italy helped to mark the first turn of the tide toward the land offensive in southern Europe; Agira and Ortona, to mention only two of many, were epic battles in Canada's war story. But some of the greatest battles of the war are still to be fought, and Canada will be in the thick of it, on sea, on land and in the air.

The message from our troops in Italy and from our troops in England is, "Don't get the idea because good news is coming that the war is about won and that we can slacken a bit." If we were with them in either Italy or England we would not have any delusion that the war is nearly over. We would realize that there is a long way to go yet and that the going will be hard and rough. The way Canadians at home can help to shorten that road is, not by slowing up, but by trying to match the resolution and drive of our soldiers who are fighting Canada's battle in Italy at this very moment and who are at this instant preparing in England for the great offensive.

Their message is, "We are going to stick it; we are going to see it through, but we expect the folks at home to keep up the pressure, not to relax, not to let up." Not long ago we heard the story of the long, grim, stubborn, victorious fight for Ortona. Wounded men refused to be evacuated. Troops asked not to be relieved. They fought on. They won. We at home have to match their fighting spirit with our work, with our determination, with our self-denial, and with our endurance, to back these men of ours to the limit.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked me on Friday, with regard to General McNaughton, at whose instance the medical examinations were made. I told him that I knew the report was transmitted by General McNaughton's direction to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) by cable, and that I was not in London at that time, if I remember correctly what I said. I find that the first report, dated November 26, was procured by General McNaughton at his instance and was sent by him to the Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: At his instance only?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. I said with regard to the other one that I did not remember just when I received it. I said that I got it—

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the report of December 11.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes—just after I got back to England on December 10. I find on looking over my letters that the same day, December 10, I wrote to General McNaughton this letter:

My dear General McNaughton:

As soon as I got in, General Montague—

Mr. GRAYDON: This is with reference to the first examination?

Mr. RALSTON:

—gave me your message. As man to man I want to say that I am deeply sorry to find that the situation regarding your health has grown more acute since General Stuart reported to me in Sicily.

That refers to the first medical report. I received that in Italy.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the November 26 one?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. The letter went on:

I do hope and believe that relief from work and rest and change will bring recovery and I shall help all possible to ensure prompt action to facilitate this. I take it that you will be sending me a note so that the matter can be dealt with expeditiously. I understand that apart from Mrs. McNaughton and the doctors, General Montague is the only one who is seeing you but whenever the ban is lifted and you can have it I should be glad to come to visit you at your convenience.

With sincere regret and my remembrances to Mrs. McNaughton and with every good wish to both of you.

Yours very truly,
J. L. Ralston.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is meant by "when the ban is removed?"

Mr. RALSTON: I was told by General Montague that no one was allowed to see General McNaughton on business except the medical men.

Mr. GRAYDON: How long did that ban extend?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell you. I had just got back.

Mr. GRAYDON: You had seen General McNaughton in November.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, in November? General McNaughton was not in bed when I saw him at army headquarters. On the 11th of December I got this letter from General McNaughton, dated December 10:

Dear Colonel Ralston:

General Montague has just given me your note of yesterday's date, and I do most sincerely appreciate your kindly consideration of the difficulties in regard to the exercise of the command of the Canadian army in which I am placed by reason of my health. I have spoken to our medical authorities, and it has been arranged that they will make a further examination this afternoon. I will ask that they furnish you with a copy of their report immediately thereafter; also that the text be cabled to the Prime Minister.

My wife very much appreciates your kind message to her, and she and I will be very happy indeed to see you personally at any time, for I think the doctors are now inclined to let up a bit on the restrictions which they had placed on me.

Very sincerly yours,
A. G. L. McNaughton.

That gives my hon. friend the information with regard to the second medical report which I read to the house the other day.

Mr. COLDWELL: Were there any other examinations besides these made of the general's condition, on his own initiative, by civilian doctors or anything of that sort?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can the minister recall what was the last date he saw General McNaughton before he went to the North African area?

Mr. RALSTON: It was a Sunday. I have this year's calendar in my pocket, not last year's. I think it was Sunday, November the 14th or the 7th; it was a Sunday in any event.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister was good enough to volunteer the information on Friday that when he saw General McNaughton at that time no question of the general's ill health was mentioned between the two of them.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; the only thing at that time was that I recall General McNaughton speaking of the great strain he was under. I think I have mentioned that to the house already. That was the last time I saw him before I went to Italy.

Mr. GRAYDON: The matter of his health was not an acute subject between you at that time?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not going to answer a question of that kind. He spoke of the very great strain which had been on him with regard to some matters—

Mr. STIRLING: When did the minister reach London?

Mr. RALSTON: Coming back?

Mr. STIRLING: The minister said on Friday that he met General McNaughton on several occasions before the minister went to North Africa. He has told us that the last time was Sunday the 7th or the 14th.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not my diary here.

Mr. STIRLING: Had the minister been in London for a week or a fortnight then? He saw the general on several occasions.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I had been there altogether about eight or nine days. I saw him soon after I got there.

Mr. GRAYDON: What the minister says now is that the entire conversation that took place between him and General McNaughton with respect to his health was prior to the minister's having gone to North Africa?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not recall now. I have not attempted to go into detail as to what the general said then. I had a conference with him of an hour or more on that particular Sunday morning. I do not recall speaking of health in the conversations we had prior to that, after I had landed in London and before I went to Africa.

My hon. friend asked another question to which I wish to refer. He said:

> My question is whether or not any factors other than that which he mentioned of ill health entered into the resignation of General McNaughton?

I deliberately confined my statement of Friday to the matter of the general's ill health and his own request for his being given leave of absence and relieved of the command of the army, and I said that I could discuss all other matters connected with the subject but I preferred not to do so because it could do no possible good, particularly at a time like this.

Mr. GRAYDON: But you did not confine yourself to his ill health, and that is the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what my hon. friend means.

Mr. GRAYDON: You did not confine yourself entirely to ill health as the reason for General McNaughton's leave of absence. The minister immediately launched into a question which, I think, raised a doubt in the minds of everyone in the house that ill health was the only factor. The minister spoke about the strong wills of himself and General McNaughton.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. I was dealing with the matter of leave of absence entirely and the contribution that ill health made to it. I do not follow what my hon. friend means at all. I mentioned, of course, strong wills. I said, "if anybody asked me if we always agreed I would say, 'no'".

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the general impression was there was some possibility of disagreement. I just want to know whether or not that was a factor.

Mr. RALSTON: What is that?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I explain what I mean? When the minister spoke he said he had confined himself entirely to the matter of ill health. I then rose in my place to explain that he had not confined himself entirely to the matter of ill health but in making his explanation had gone on to refer to the strong wills of himself and General McNaughton. This left the impression, if I may say so, on most members of the house that there was a possibility of disagreement between the government, the minister and General McNaughton. On the basis of that possibility I asked a question as to whether or not there were factors other than ill health which entered into the leave of absence granted to General McNaughton.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I can say to my hon. friend that if it had not been for General McNaughton's ill health, leave of absence would not have been granted at the time it was. He would not have been relieved of the command of the Canadian army at the time unless he had requested it. In other words, ill health was the proximate cause.

Mr. GRAYDON: Ill health was the proximate cause?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has not answered the question.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to deal with that question if my hon. friend will permit me.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want the minister to become angry about it.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not angry.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am trying to get some information. Let us deal with this thing reasonably.

Mr. RALSTON: I intimated that there were all sorts of rumours floating about. I said I could go into all of them but that I did not consider it opportune. I preferred not to do it, because it could, to say the least, do no possible good, particularly at times like these. I suggested to the committee, and I suggest to my hon. friend, that when we have a situation which is clearly set forth in the documents which I have read, there can be no question in the mind of anybody that leave of absence was necessary and was requested by the general on the ground of ill health. Therefore, is not the supreme question whether General McNaughton was able to carry on at that time, and has anybody any doubt of his inability to do so after reading the documents to which I have referred? I suggest to my hon. friend that makes any other factor simply academic and not applicable to the case. In addition to that practical situation I ask my hon. friend in all sincerity, as I ask myself and the committee, do they think the morale of the Canadian people and the morale of the troops in the field would be promoted by discussions of factors which at the moment and in the circumstances can have no application? Would it not be bound to deserve the rebuke of the men who are in the battle lines at this very instant, or who are preparing to go into battle, if we were to use our time and our energy on a controversy over what might have been, instead of considering how we can train, supply, equip and reinforce these men?

I have already made a statement about our army in Canada and overseas, and the reasons for the dispositions. I ask, is that no more important than the hypothetical question as to whether, although General McNaughton was physically unfit to carry on, there might have been other factors which did not apply? In times like these does the committee think we should spend our time in that way? As I said before, I would prefer not to discuss any other factors. I think the one of health is sufficient. I say to my hon. friend that I am not refusing to do so. I am expressing this view because that is how I feel. I have some personal reasons why it would be far easier for me to go into a discussion of all sorts of things, but I suggest that in the circumstances no good purposes could be served, and I leave it to my hon. friend to decide whether or not he presses that question.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, the subject that is before the committee at the moment is the minister's statement with respect to the whole problem of the armed forces. At the last session this subject was proceeded with in a certain very definite way. After the minister had given his statement, item number one on the army war appropriations estimate was called and on that a general discussion took place. I take it that the government is prepared at this time to follow the same procedure.

This afternoon I wish to avail myself of the privilege that has been accorded in the past and follow the same procedure. I refer the minister to certain questions which I asked on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Some of those questions have not been answered. Some of them have been answered to the satisfaction of the minister, but not entirely to the satisfaction, if I may say so, of the committee as a whole. One of the questions asked at that time will be found at page 19 of Hansard of January 31, and is as follows: "What is being done with our big home defence army?" As the minister has indicated, that is an army comprising some 70,000 people. The minister now shakes his head. The figures I jotted down are, "70,000 in the home defence army."

Mr. RALSTON: No. If my hon. friend will permit me, the operational troops number something like 55,000. These people are distributed, as I indicated, in the home defence army. They are distributed on different jobs. The home defence army, so called, or the operational troops in Canada number about 55,000. I think I said forty-seven per cent of the N.R.M.A. were in these units.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that pretty well illustrates another point which I intend to bring up, namely, that in the discussion which occurs from time to time in connection with the armed forces, the average layman is confused by the conflict of terms of a military nature which he does not always understand.

Mr. RALSTON: You invented that term; I did not.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I did. I may invent some more during the discussion which I hope will be applicable to the situation. What the public wants to know is how many men are in uniform in Canada who are not available for overseas service or, in other words, fall into the category of those called under the National Resources Mobilization Act who have not volunteered for service outside Canada. My understanding is that that number is something like 70,000 men. If that is so, I should like the minister to take note of these supplementary questions. I should like him to answer the question I asked on January 31, which was, has the government given consideration to whether or not these men are going overseas or whether or not the personnel is to be directed back to civilian activities in Canada, or what actually is to be the final disposition of those 70,000 men? I think the minister ought to give us all the information in regard to the cost of these 70,000. I should like to know the yearly cost of maintaining that army of 70,000, because the question becomes very important from another angle.

Since Kiska the whole question of the army of 70,000 has been altered to some extent. In addition to that, the government has seen fit pretty well to withdraw and to abandon in many sections the whole A.R.P. activity, which would indicate clearly that the government is of the opinion that the whole question of the invasion of Canada and, in consequence, the whole question of the defence of Canada has undergone a major change. I wish the minister would give these figures when he speaks again in the debate.

The minister has referred to General McNaughton. I approach the whole question with regard to General McNaughton with as serious a sense of responsibility as anyone in public life could have. I agree with the minister that the name of a great Canadian, the name of one who has achieved great things with Canada's army, should not unnecessarily form the subject of a mere political discussion in this parliament during the war.

I think all members of the committee will feel as I do this afternoon when I say that personally I have not made a sufficient contribution in the war to be able to say very much about those in our armed services who have done so much more. In the early stages of the war many of us did apply for enlistment in the armed services, and some of us have tried, as far as it lay in our power to do so, to serve our country; but I am frank to say that I have always felt that my contribution is rather puny, measured by any yardstick, when contrasted with what has been done by those who are in far more dangerous fields of activity than we are.

From that point of view, I am very conscious of the whole situation with regard to General McNaughton. I think we ought to look at the government's problem, and the problem of those men and women who are in the armed services overseas and in Canada, with a mind bent upon doing the best we can for them and for the country at this time. Whatever may be the responsibility —and the minister assesses some responsibility to the opposition in this regard—I would point out to him that it was not the opposition or members of this house who created the situation upon which the public has been demanding so much enlightenment, particularly in the past few days. I would have felt a rather heavy responsibility if that situation had been created by us; nevertheless, as the Prime Minister very properly pointed out a few days ago, the opposition in parliament has an obligation to the people. Therefore, subject to security reasons and the whole question of the national interest, and subject further, if I may say so, to the desire that the names of those men who have done so much to preserve and maintain this country during this time of war, and who are in our armed services, should not be made a matter of mere political discussion, it seems that the minister also has a heavy responsibility in denying to the country at this time as much information as he is actually withholding at this moment.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not denied it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I asked the minister at the end of the sitting on Friday a question which was not designed to throw this problem into the arena of parliament; rather, I was hoping that he would then, by a simple answer, be able to clear up the whole situation. I tried to interrupt him on one occasion in order that he might have that opportunity in an early part of the debate, and I put the question again at the end, so that he would have notice of it for to-day. The question was a very simple one which the minister could have answered readily, but he has not answered it this afternoon. The question is this: Were there other factors, other than ill health, which entered into the whole problem of the resignation or leave of absence of General McNaughton?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the leader of the opposition presses his question further, I desire to say that while I know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is prepared to answer the question immediately, as Prime Minister I have very grave doubts whether it is not against public policy to discuss further at this time the matter which is raised by the question which the hon. gentleman has asked. I believe I am familiar with all the relevant facts and circumstances, and I should be pleased to meet with and to show the correspondence to the leader of the opposition and to the leaders of the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties. Indeed, I have come to the conclusion that it is my duty to show it to them. Until these leaders have been afforded this opportunity, I hope that no hon. member will press the matter further. Sitting opposite me, in the person of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), I see one who has been a former Minister of National Defence in a Conservative administration, and I would extend to him an invitation to accompany the three leaders, when I hope to have an opportunity of placing all the correspondence before them.

Mr. GRAYDON: I gladly accept the Prime Minister's invitation to read the correspondence and discuss the matter with him. I wish to say that it seems rather strange that only at this stage should a question so serious finally be discussed by members of the House of Commons. Never since parliament rose on July 24 last has the Prime Minister asked me, as leader of the official opposition, for a consultation on the matter of General McNaughton or any other matter; I do not know what he has done in connection with the other parties. I want to point this out to the country and to parliament now. This is a very late invitation, but one which I feel should be accepted in the public interest. Perhaps it will provide some explanation as to why we who are completely in the dark in connection with these matters have asked for the information we have requested during this debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I have not asked my hon. friend to come and discuss this matter with me privately, it has been out of deference to what I thought would be his own feelings, in not wishing to discuss the matter with me privately until there had been some open discussion of the situation in parliament. I preferred to extend my invitation to him in the House of Commons at the time I thought it might become necessary. That is the sole reason I have not conferred with my hon. friend on this point.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee met at eight o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I had not quite concluded the observations I intended to make in connection with this part of the discussion on the war appropriation measure. I should like in my remarks this evening to refer to one or two matters mentioned by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) on Friday and again this afternoon.

I refer first to a matter which perhaps some who are not too familiar with the situation might regard as of minor importance, compared with other matters which were the subject of discussion. Nevertheless it seems to me that the matter to which I am about to refer is one of great significance and one which has assumed great importance. The fact that the Minister of National Defence returning from theatres of war overseas saw fit to use the House of Commons as a venue for the giving of information, to give a lead to the people of Canada, indicates the importance of the matter to which I now refer, namely, the delivery of mail to our men and women in the armed services.

I regard with some pride the fact that I have a heavy overseas correspondence. My experience indicates there is scarcely anything more valuable to our overseas troops than the maintenance of a regular mail service. Whatever we in parliament can do to arouse the people of our country to a point where they will keep closely in contact with those who have left our midst might be regarded as a signal service to Canada, and to those who serve overseas.

I am not sure whether it was the Minister of National Defence or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who said that in some instances men have spent their fifth Christmas away from home. I believe it was the Prime Minister who said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just think of that! The fact of the matter is that because of the trend of the war our troops have been left for a long period of time without action. That fact has, in my view, made it even more essential for our people to assume the responsibility of seeing to it that our men and women in the armed forces are not disregarded, so far as keeping in close touch with them is concerned.

I said something this afternoon about the contrast between the contribution made by those of us in civilian life and that made by the forces in the armed services. Sometimes we are apt to put too much stress on what is done on the home front. The home front is important; and those connected with it have done a great job. But let us not in the same breath mention the service, the contribution and the sacrifice of those who are on active fronts, protecting us in the theatre of war. That being so, surely those of us in the civilian population can make sure that those boys and girls who have gone from our midst are assured, by communications from time to time, that they are still part and parcel of the Canadian people. I make these observations to-night to emphasize a matter which, to my mind, is of greater importance than it may appear to be at first glance.

I was pleased, too, to hear the minister make reference to the work of the Canadian Women's Army Corps, and I join with him in paying a well-deserved tribute to that branch of the service. I would couple with that observation a similar expression with respect to the women in the other two branches, namely the air force and the navy. No reflection is intended upon other branches of the service when I mention these three services specially. The reputation the womenfolk in the armed services have gained, and the splendid work they have performed should not go unnoticed by a grateful country and parliament.

Then the minister touched upon, but did not discuss at length, the rehabilitation of the men and women in the services. I would agree with the minister, and I believe most people would agree with him when he says that the main emphasis must be placed upon matters more urgent and more acute than those connected with demobilization. I agree with him when he says that the winning of the war must come before demobilization. The seriousness of the job was impressed upon us this afternoon, when the minister pointed out that the war has not yet been won, and that we may be some considerable distance from that result. So that the whole problem of rehabilitation and demobilization must come in its turn.

However, while that may be, the government must be prepared for the possibility of a speedy ending, and it must not be caught unprepared for the peace. The fact that we were not prepared for the eventualities of war cost us a great deal in life, limb, property and finance. Let us make sure that when peace comes upon us we shall not be unprepared.

This brings up the whole question of the rehabilitation of our men and women in the services. While I take my position with the minister in his statement as to the relative importance of rehabilitation compared with the immediate problems of the war, nevertheless I think he will agree when I say that we must not disregard the problems connected with demobilization. This has been the subject of many conversations. Much has been said about what is to be done for the man who comes back from the war by way of placing him in a peace-time pursuit. I pass on to the minister—and also to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who might lend an ear to this—what has been told to me by men who have returned from overseas. It is all very well to speak about putting our soldiers, sailors and airmen on the land. In itself, however, that is not sufficient. It is all very well to talk about giving them education. But again, that in itself is not enough. Our men and women who will return must not be placed in a position where they will feel that those civilians who have been able to save victory bonds, war savings certificates and the like are placed in a better position, in respect of ready cash and security, than those who have done the fighting. The whole problem of gratuities, the whole problem of providing for the men and women of our armed forces something in the nature of ready cash, if you want to put it that way, when they come back and when they take up their jobs must be considered so that they will not be penalized in favour of those who stay at home for various reasons or were unfit to go, but shall be placed, not only on an equal footing with our civilians but, if I may say so, on a preferred footing. That must be the position of the men and women of our armed forces in any demobilization and rehabilitation scheme. I want to caution the government to see that these plans have been completely worked out by the time they are to be put into use.

I have no intention to-night of taking up any undue time of the committee because when the resolution was originally moved into committee I indicated that it was the intention of our party to make a close scrutiny, investigation and audit of the expenditures of the government when we were in committee. I have simply outlined one or two points which I thought were of salient interest and importance to the public and to parliament. I hope that as the discussion progresses we shall be furnished with as full and complete answers to the questions that have been asked as is possible to give in order that we may have the information to which the public is entitled.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not propose to speak at any length to-night because last Friday I expressed the opinion that we should be discussing the details of these estimates when the bill was before us. I still feel that the time spent in two debates, one on the resolution and one on the bill, is time that is—I shall not say wasted, but duplicated. I should like to see the house proceed with the bill.

However, there is one thing I wish to say to the Prime Minister. Just before we rose for dinner to-night he suggested that in view of the interest shown in and the questions asked about the retirement of Lieutenant-General McNaughton he would be very glad to have the leader of the opposition, the leader of the Social Credit group and myself meet him in the near future, to-morrow morning I believe, for the purpose of seeing the correspondence. I am glad to accept that invitation, but I have a suggestion to make. It is that we should have this meeting and invite Lieutenant-General McNaughton to be present. Very often official documents and correspondence, because of their nature, need to be supplemented by personal explanations. I think in viewing this correspondence we could gauge the situation much more intelligently if Lieutenant-General McNaughton were present.

I do not know whether it would be possible to have him present to-morrow morning, but I think the meeting should be held at once and I am using the term "at once" to mean as soon as possible. In the interests of the government and of those who have to read this correspondence and come to some decision in order that they may advise their colleagues I urge the Prime Minister to take steps to see that Lieutenant-General McNaughton is present when this correspondence is examined.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the first meeting should be between the leaders of the different parties of this house and myself. When we come together and discuss the matter we can then consider the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question since I was not present just before the dinner recess. If there is any correspondence in existence which has not yet been revealed and made public and which it is now proposed to make public to the leaders of the respective parties and I believe to my colleague, the hon. member for Yale, should that correspondence be kept private or are these gentlemen to be at liberty to divulge to their followers the contents of the correspondence? If that be so, is there any good reason why the correspondence should not be tabled? Why the secrecy about the matter? If the Prime Minister will say on his responsibility, not that it is not in the public interest, because that is the stock phrase, but that for reasons of security, having regard to the times in which we are living or for some other reason similar to that, it should not be made public, then I shall be content.

I know nothing about the matter, but the public mind has been raised to the point where they desire to know more about it. If the truth bears heavily upon someone, and I do not know whom, then the truth will not hurt anyone. I invite the Prime Minister to take us into his confidence. If he will say that because of national security or for some other good reason it is not wise that this correspondence should be made public, then I shall not question his decision. I do not rise in my place to make an issue because I do not know anything about this matter.

I have a sincere regard for General McNaughton. I was associated with him for a brief period some years ago. I thought then he was a man's man, and I still think so. The government selected him to lead the Canadian troops overseas in November, 1939, and the whole country applauded that action and supported the government in its selection. May I pause here to express my personal sympathy with General McNaughton if after four years or more of very strenuous life he finds himself in perhaps not as healthy a condition as he ought to be. I think every one of us will be sympathetic, but I am inquiring now if there is any good reason why the public should not know the truth about this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all, may I answer my hon. friend's question with regard to security. I am glad that he has raised the point. As he will be the first to know, telegrams come in cipher code and I have to consider the responsibility, and the government has to consider the responsibility of making public, telegrams or correspondence in the terms in which they come to the government and thus divulge what may lead to the government's code being deciphered and use being made of it by the enemy. That of itself is a clear reason why correspondence which has come in cipher code and which has been deciphered should not be made public, certainly not in the exact terms in which it appears. That is one real embarrassment and handicap the government is under in this matter. It has no desire to keep secret information the public ought to have, but it does desire to safeguard in every possible way great public considerations of which full account has to be taken. There is the further fact to be considered. Whatever is disclosed in connection with this subject cannot be other than of great concern, not only to the people of Canada but to the government of the United Kingdom, the government of the United States, and indeed to the governments of all the united nations. I am perfectly sure that when the hon. leaders of the different parties learn at first hand of the matters on which they wish to be informed, they will find little difficulty in agreeing with the government as to the best course which should then be pursued.

As to placing any obligation on the leaders of the parties who may see the correspondence or be advised of it, I need not say that all three leaders are honourable gentlemen and I place no restrictions on them whatsoever as to what they may wish to say or do as to informing or advising the members of their respective parties. I do not wish to impose any restrictions upon them, beyond those imposed upon each by his own conscience.

The government's action in this matter, as I have already said, is entirely begotten of a desire to protect the war effort not only of this country but of the united nations to the fullest extent possible and to protect all parties concerned therewith.

May I say to my hon. friend who has spoken of his admiration for Lieutenant-General McNaughton that I am one of those who had to do with the appointment of General McNaughton, and I have always held him in the highest possible esteem. I would be the last to wish to have any step of mine in any way embarrass General McNaughton or deprive him of any privilege that he may wish to have. I cannot, however, see that in taking the course which I am now suggesting of having the leaders of the different parties come together and consider all that may be before them, I shall be taking any step that will be prejudicial to anyone, let alone to General McNaughton.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, one word more. I had intended to make reference to the proposal of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that General McNaughton should be invited to meet this committee. May I say that, at first blush at all events, I deprecate that suggestion for this reason: it would simply be an invitation to cross-examine General McNaughton. I do not think the stage has been set for that or anything like that, and I hope that will not happen.

Mr. COLDWELL: The purpose of my suggestion was not to cross-examine General McNaughton but rather because I know from experience extending over some years that public documents do not always contain all that there is to know, and to complete the picture one sometimes needs public documents to be supplemented by those who are involved in matters which public documents discuss. I think every member of this House of Commons knows the nature of official documents. Otherwise it seems to me that what we would be actually doing would be hearing one side of the story if we merely see the correspondence, and I do not think it is quite fair—if I may put it this way— to leave the party leaders to make a decision as to whether their colleagues in the house should be advised of all the circumstances or not. I do not think that is placing us in a proper position with regard to our colleagues or with regard to the house and the country. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that he will be at the meeting in the morning and I shall be very happy if he will see that his interest is protected in every particular.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to my attitude toward General McNaughton at this time or in regard to the matters we are discussing, may I give to the committee immediately the telegram I sent to General McNaughton at the time he relinquished the command of the Canadian army. This was not in code. It was sent to the high commissioner to transmit to General McNaughton.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the Prime Minister give the date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is dated Ottawa, December 26, 1943, and reads:

Dear General McNaughton:

As you relinquish your command of the Canadian army I desire, on behalf of the government and people of Canada, to thank you for the great service you have rendered our country and other of the united nations from the beginning of the war. I sincerely trust that, freed from the very heavy responsibilities which have been yours over the past four years, your health and strength may speedily be restored.

The word that you have had to relinquish command of the army will be received throughout Canada with feelings of deepest regret. May it not be long before our country may again have the full benefit of your wide experience and exceptional abilities.

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I misunderstood the admonition of the Prime Minister at six o'clock, but as I understand him, his desire was that this whole question of General McNaughton and his resignation should be a closed book until such time as the leaders of the different parties had an opportunity to discuss it. But now, first of all, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar interjects with new suggestions, and then the Prime Minister comes along and reads a telegram. If we are to heed the Prime Minister's admonition I think we had better end further debate on this matter at this time. I am quite surprised that the Prime Minister should have introduced that telegram; and if this keeps up I do not know where we are going to end. I have been trying to carry out the Prime Minister's wishes because I thought it was in the national interest not to prolong this debate now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend heard what his colleague the hon. member for York-Sunbury suggested, he would see it was a statement that seemed to me to necessitate or render advisable by giving to the committee the telegram I had sent in the open to General McNaughton at the time.

Mr. GRAYDON: It did not strike me in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope there is nothing in the message which anyone in the house will take exception to one way or the other at this time. I am only too ready to say nothing further about this matter at all until hon. gentlemen opposite have made their wishes known.

Mr. STIRLING: It seems to me without doubt advisable that nothing more be said at this stage on this matter until the meeting takes place, and I thank the right hon. gentleman for his courtesy in asking me to join with the three leaders. He does so, I know, because for a year or so I occupied the position of Minister of National Defence, and during that time Lieutenant-General McNaughton was Chief of the General Staff. I never can forget the admiration in which I held General McNaughton, the assistance that he was, the ability that he showed and the experience which he had, and it is a matter of no little sorrow to me that General McNaughton's health at the moment is not such as to enable him to carry on the arduous duties for which he was responsible.

I cannot find myself in agreement with the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, reiterated again to-day, that we should do well to cut short all debate in the committee stage on this resolution and that the debate should take place on the bill. I think he was in error the last time he referred to it when he stated that the bill would have the schedules attached and that they would come before the Chair item by item. That is not the case. War appropriation bills of recent years have had no schedules attached. I have always understood that one of the reasons for making it a different bill from the ordinary money bill was that the government sees fit—perhaps quite rightly so—to keep a certain amount of flexibility within its grasp with regard to these expenditures. The fact remains that on a bill such as this there is no schedule attached, and it appears to me that it does not make very much difference from the point of view of saving time or wasting it whether the discussion takes place at this stage or at that. There is a reason why I prefer that it should take place at this stage. In matters as complicated as this one, subjects frequently arise which have to do with not one minister or two but perhaps three; and when such matter is discussed we may, after hearing the first minister and his views thereon, have an opportunity of hearing a second minister, and it may cover the doings of three departments. It may very well be that after the discussion has taken place questions arise on which clarification is required. When the bill comes up in the committee stage for second reading we have an additional opportunity to obtain more information if we so desire. To my mind that is the reason why it is well to have the discussion take place at this stage; and we are able to go back again to the bill if it is necessary. Last year it was not necessary. Hon. members will remember that the war appropriation bill was completed only two days before prorogation, and appears in a short paragraph in Hansard. The introduction of the bill, first reading, second reading, committee stage and third reading all took place in that short space of time. No advantage was taken of the opportunity to discuss the bill at that time. But if I remember rightly, in the year before when the war appropriation bill was brought down such discussion was of great value when the bill came up the second time. Therefore I prefer the method which we have found our way into in this war for dealing with discussion on these estimates. The government shows it is fully inclined to give us all the information in detail. The first sheet is before us. We can open it up for discussion, and I have no doubt there will be no impediment placed in our way in our endeavour to obtain the information we require.

There is a matter that I want the Minister of National Defence to refer to again in clearer terms than he did, because I am in just as much of a fog as I ever was with regard to this army in Canada, which some people call a home army and some call the defence army. I remember the minister said last session that there was no such thing as a defence army. I do not know what it is called to-day, but the description which the minister gave this afternoon has left me as much befogged as I ever was, and lest it be thought it is merely my dullness of mind, may I say that I find a considerable number of my fellow members are also quite befogged as to what this army consists of and what it is doing.

It is not easy, without Hansard of this afternoon before us, to follow the minister's description. The picture that I have is that in Canada there is a training stream which amounts to 70,000 men and which is looked upon in the main as the reinforcements which in due course will find their way overseas. These reinforcements, plus such reinforcements as exist in the holding units overseas are, in the minister's opinion, sufficient to meet the estimate of casualties for five divisions overseas at the present time. At the other end of the scale, if I may so describe it, we find the reserve army. The reserve army consists of the units that were known as the non-permanent active militia. I am very glad the minister took the opportunity to pay tribute to the officers and men of the non-permanent active militia. It was set up twenty or more years ago. It was a skeleton force in my day and amounted to 55,000 men. It was to be the nucleus capable of being expanded into the necessary armed forces when war came. These officers and men stayed loyally with the reserve army, doing the drudgery through the years of depression and years of peace. I do not think too high praise can be given them. I have known them in the units in my particular neighbourhood. I have known them in other units, and I have always felt great appreciation for what these men gave up to keep their unit of the reserve army in something like its proper shape. The minister did not praise them any too highly and I know his words will be appreciated by many who have come in contact with them. That reserve army, he tells us, amounts to about 100,000; and it is in between these two extremes of the military forces that I want clarification.

Excluding the reserve forces, I understand that the remainder of the soldiery here or overseas, compose the active army. Certain of them, for reasons well known, will not under present regulations leave this country. They will be used in defence. Did I understand him to say that in the active army in Canada there were 55,000 operational troops and 75,000 troops rendering service to the operational troops and that it covered the veterans' guard, training establishments and the great number of incidental units? What I do not understand is, will those 55,000 men be available for the training stream if and when need arises? That is one of my difficulties.

Another of my difficulties is to follow him in his description of how the national resources mobilization men compose forty-seven per cent of the operational troops here, and if that is so how can they be considered a part of that stream which may eventually be trained for overseas? To my mind there is considerable confusion with regard to those who are not reserve, those who are not in the training stream, those who are at the present time in Canada preparatory to defence, shall I say? Included in that is the contingent that went to Kiska and came back. What is happening to them? Are those units being broken up now that they are being distributed through the Canadian active army in Canada, or are they finding their way into the training stream?

It is commonly said that in a good many parts of Canada—I shall mention Petawawa for one—there are a very large number of men with their complement of officers, with their necessary supporting supply forces, and there are unattached officers by the dozen. I do not know if that is an accurate statement, but the minister will be able to inform us. It is commonly believed that, scattered across Canada, there are a very considerable number of officers who do not appear to be attached to any unit at the moment and who are marking time or doing something or another or doing nothing at all. It is all these matters which I think the minister will do well to explain to us and through us to the people of Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: First, with regard to troops in Canada, I find it a little difficult to follow my hon. friend. He speaks of the number of N.R.M.A. personnel in Canada and talks about the home defence army. I have endeavoured to make it clear that there is no such thing as a home defence army. There is a Canadian active army, and in units of that army, in detachments of it, there are men who are N.R.M.A. personnel who at the present time are not liable without further action to service overseas. But they are serving in the Canadian active army; they are not hived or segregated. They are filling a place which is necessary at the present time in Canada, doing a job that somebody else would have to do if they were not there. That applies in connection with operational troops of whom 34,950 are N.R.M.A. personnel.

Mr. STIRLING: That is, of the 55,000?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. In the non-operational troops the proportion is very much lower, about 11,000, and in the training stream there are 15,000 out of approximately 75,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Have they volunteered for overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. STIRLING: Then how can they be in the training stream heading for overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: The training stream is heading both for overseas and for service in Canada. When you call a man up you have to train him whether he is to serve in Canada or overseas. In the depot, reselection and disposal units there are 6,400, and on extended leave, about 5,300. So that these men are scattered all through the services in Canada, and it is quite true that they are not available for overseas service until further action is taken. But there seems to be an idea that these men are sitting down doing nothing because they are not for overseas service at the present time. If you did not have them, however, you would have to have some other men in their place.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why does the minister say that? There is no danger of invasion.

Mr. RALSTON: I have heard that so often.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will bear repetition.

Mr. RALSTON: I heard it from this part of the house when I was minister in 1926-30; "What are you preparing for? There is no war." I maintain that we do not have these operational troops just for fun. They are on the east coast and on the west coast, in coast defence batteries, in close support battalions, searchlight companies and in all the posts which are necessary for the purpose of taking care of the scale of attack which has been agreed to, not simply by our own chiefs of staff but by the United States chiefs of staff as well, and the 55,000 form a comparatively small number. That is what these troops are for.

The hon. member for Yale asks with regard to troops going overseas, and reinforcements. He wants to know what the situation is. I said that the reinforcement pool overseas is well up to the planned strength; that is to say, it is a pool over there to be drawn on as casualties occur, and as that pool goes down it is refilled by men sent from here. If the casualties are heavy at a particular time the pool will go down considerably, but the general dispatch is more or less in regular monthly shipments, with the result that at the end of the year you will have averaged up and the pool will be back to what it was at the beginning, provided the casualties have not exceeded the rate at which the reinforcement pool was at first built up.

Mr. STIRLING: And that pool overseas amounts to the estimate of the casualties that may be anticipated for the five divisions overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: For a certain period, based on a certain number of months intense activity and a certain number of months of operations of varying degrees of intensity, as is figured out, having regard to the operations which are visualized.

There has been some statement about divisions sent to Italy in order to avoid or to lessen the necessity for reinforcements. There has not been a single change of any kind in the scales of casualties for which we have estimated, owing to the fact that we sent divisions to the Mediterranean—no change whatever.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never heard that, but you have reinforcements there, I hope.

Mr. RALSTON: It has been said. The suggestion was that the corps was sent to Italy because the government had not reinforcements sufficient to keep them up at the rate which was estimated, taking cross-channel operations into account. The estimate of casualties has been based on the most careful computation possible in view of the experience our men have had, and the figures I gave out this afternoon are figures in which my officers believe. They have been overseas themselves consulting with the authorities, and they anticipate that if these estimates are based on sound grounds, which they have every reason to believe is the case, the reinforcement situation will be as I have stated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister did not give the figures on reinforcements.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; my hon. friend did not hear me.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What is considered an adequate reinforcement pool in percentage in relation to the active army overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: Of course I cannot give that information. I have been asked for it before. It is regarded as one of the most secret pieces of information from the point of view of security, but I assure my hon. friend that it is based not simply on a Canadian estimate but on a British estimate as well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the estimate based on—on the history of casualties in this war? If that is so, it is very small for Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: I can only say to my hon. friend that it is based on what competent officers think is a scale which is not likely to be exceeded in connection with the sort of operations they visualize, and that applies not simply to the Canadians but to the British as well. I have already explained that that reinforcement pool is there, and as it is lowered by casualties it is filled by troops sent over. These troops are in the training stream at the present time, being trained, they are also in operational units. We are withdrawing these men from operational units from time to time, retraining them when necessary, and sending them overseas, replacing them with N.R.M.A. personnel. That in short is the situation. I was frank with the committee and pointed out that if recruiting went down perceptibly, if it did not keep up, it would mean that at the end of the fiscal year, 1944-45, towards the end, the pool in Canada would drop, although the pool overseas would have been kept up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has not that contingency arisen now—that recruiting has dropped and dropped materially, and that an effort is being made now, through the draft boards, according to recent instructions, to increase the number of men to be taken in?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to. All I have to say is that I believe the number being requested from the draft board has remained constant for the last six months, at least, and I am sure there has been no effort as far as the Department of National Defence is concerned to have any increased number called.

The CHAIRMAN: Before we proceed further I would suggest, not for my own sake but for the sake of preserving order, that hon. members address their remarks to the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: I have a suggestion to make, if it is agreeable to the committee. We have here the statement and the various headings under which these expenditures are being considered by the committee. Would it not help us all; would it not enable us to formulate our questions better and perhaps let us make better preparation to answer them, if we did as we do with ordinary estimates, that is, proceed with the items as they are set out here, in the order in which they appear? I may say to anyone who is interested in the mobilization act, for instance, that this matter can be taken up very easily under pay and allowances, which includes national resources mobilization personnel. The first item on the list is civil salaries and wages. I am in the hands of the committee, but I think this procedure is generally understood to be the best to follow, and perhaps we might make better progress; I might be more informative, and perhaps be a little more ready to answer, if we proceeded in that way.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): While we are discussing this question of organization and this reinforcement pool, I should like to ask the minister whether these divisions—I think he referred to three in Britain and, I suppose, the two that are in Italy—are up to war strength now. Are all these divisions fully manned and up to war strength at the present time?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: From what the minister said I gathered that the training stream, or whatever term he applied, included the men who are in the defence army of Canada, so called by the public, the men staying in Canada—

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is starting his question with an assumption which is not correct. I understood him to say that he gathered that the training stream consisted of the defence army in Canada. The training stream consists of all the men who are in training either for overseas or for Canadian service.

Mr. LOCKHART: I think in the minister's statement he said that training stream numbered about 50,000; I believe that was the figure used.

Mr. RALSTON: It is about 75,000 altogether.

Mr. LOCKHART: That included others as well, but we will use the figures, fifty to seventy-five thousand. Does the minister feel that this is the number that will be maintained as a training stream or whatever he wishes to call it? Does he feel that this will be the approximate number that will be held here in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: No. As I was saying, the training stream is drawn upon from time to time as dispatches are made overseas; and as recruiting is carried on the training stream is refilled. I said that if recruiting went down in July or August, for instance, it would mean that the output of the training stream perhaps next January or February would be lower, due to the fact that fewer men had gone in.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister misunderstood me. Do I understand, then, that in practice, according to the minister's ideas, that number of fifty to seventy-five thousand must be maintained in order to carry out the policy which has been adopted by the department; in other words, that this many men will still remain inactive in Canada, in a sense, possibly in preparation for going overseas if they ever go overseas? It keeps fifty to seventy-five thousand men static in Canada; that is what I mean.

Mr. RALSTON: They are not static.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well, that is what it amounts to.

Mr. RALSTON: They are not static; they are being trained.

Mr. LOCKHART: Trained for what purpose?

Mr. RALSTON: Trained for overseas.

Mr. LOCKHART: But fifty thousand or more of them are not going overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: I interrupted my hon. friend to tell him that I thought he was labouring under a misapprehension. In the training stream at the training centres there are about fifteen thousand who are National Resources Mobilization Act personnel. At the present time these men are not going overseas, but they are being trained for the purpose of taking the place of general service personnel in units, to release those men so that they may go overseas. But those units have to be kept up. I have explained some of the functions of the operational units, and I have gone into the functions of the non-operational units as well. These units have to be kept up in order to supply the ordnance and so on, and to supply the personnel to do all the work of a base for the provision of our army overseas.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then are we to have only fifteen thousand men in Canada who are not going overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: No. We have 15,000 in the training centres; we have 34,000 in the operational units, and we have 11,000 in the non-operational units.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is 50,000 or more.

Mr. RALSTON: Altogether it comes to over 70,000 men. Included in that number are 5,300 who are on extended leave, that is to say farm leave, mining leave, forestry leave and so on. They are all included in that number.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister give the committee a statement of the number of men in Canada, in all capacities, drawn to the colours under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, at present in the training stream or in units, operational or otherwise? How many of these draftees have we on the payroll in Canada to-day, where are they and what are they doing?

Mr. RALSTON: This is the third time I have given that information, but I will give it half a dozen times if the committee wants it. In operational troops, that is in units, there are roughly 34,000. In non-operational troops there are roughly 11,000.

Mr. TUSTIN: What are the duties of those 11,000 men?

Mr. RALSTON: I have explained that the non-operational troops are in the training centres as administrative staff, and so on. There are something like 22,000 of them there, though not all called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Some of those men are in the training centres as clerks, cooks and all that sort of thing. There must be thousands of them in ordnance, in the depots all over the country. I am thinking of—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is that?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend asked for the information; surely he will give me an opportunity to furnish it. These men are in ordnance depots. I think of the central mechanization depot at London; I think of the Longue Point depot; I think of the training centre at Barriefield; I think of hospitals all over the country; I think of district headquarters; I think of camp staffs; I think of army service corps. All these men are non-operational troops. In the training stream there are 15,000 being trained.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is 60,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Then in the depot, the re-selection wing I spoke of, where they are being moved from one place to another, posted to a new place and so on, there are 6,400; and on extended leave there are 5,300.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is approximately 70,000, all told.

Mr. RALSTON: And as I pointed out to the committee, if they were not there somebody else would have to be there, drawing the same money.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We heard all that. These 70,000 men are all in good military categories, capable of fighting?

Mr. RALSTON: No, they are not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What categories are they in, then?

Mr. RALSTON: They are category "A", category "B", and some as low as category "C".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many in category "A"?

Mr. RALSTON: I could not tell my hon. friend; I could only make a rough estimation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps my hon. friend can give that later on.

Mr. RALSTON: At a rough guess I would say probably 50,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I may as well tell the minister now that the public want to know how many men there are among these zombies, as they are commonly called, who are in category "A", the highest category, and who are not fighting, who are not intended to fight and who do not intend to fight.

Mr. RALSTON: Like the Kiska troops, for example?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I expect they are part of it.

Mr. RALSTON: They were part of it. They seemed to have some intention of fighting.

Mr. WHITE: In the break-down the minister has given he has placed the number of recruits called under the National Resources Mobilization Act at around 70,000. I should like to draw his attention to the table which appears in the January, 1944, issue of Canada at War, at page 22. It shows the total number called as 125,640, from which number there is subtracted the number of men who transferred to the other various forces, numbering 37,930. That leaves a remainder of 87,710, as of September 30, 1943. Since that time no doubt many thousands of others have been called, which brings the number up to around 100,000. Would the minister explain where these 30,000 men are, between the 70,000 he has given, and the total to date of 100,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend has the explanation right in that book. I think the footnote in the book will tell him that. I have not the book in front of me, but I think it is the case that the figures he has given are intake, and they have made no allowance for discharges. The difference lies in those who have been discharged. I think if my hon. friend would read the note he would see if it is not what I say it is.

Mr. WHITE: Which note?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the book here. Is not the first note one which says that certain figures are not included?

Mr. WHITE: It says:

> Figures of intake do not represent actual strength of the armed services, as they do not take into consideration men discharged for medical or other reasons.

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about actual strength. My hon. friend is talking about gross intake.

Mr. WHITE: But I would point out to the minister that if these men are called up and enrolled under the National Resources Mobilization Act, it is doubtful that there would be any number up in the thousands discharged.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry if my hon. friend is doubtful, but I am giving him what the strength is. And there are discharges. I think if my hon. friend has the figures he will see these enrolments began in 1941.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. WHITE: It is up to September 30, 1943.

Mr. RALSTON: Those are enrolments since the beginning of the war?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: And there have been those discharges.

Mr. WHITE: Well, then, would the minister be good enough to complete this statement, and show us the number of discharges?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot give it in that way. The only way to do is to give my hon. friend the strength. I have given that to him. My hon. friend is doing what others are doing who take the total enrolments in the last war and treat that as the strength of the army.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The last war?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, the last war. They are comparing this war and the last war, and saying there were 619,000 in the last war, when it was 619,000 men enlisted and conscripted. It was not 619,000 on the strength of the army.

Mr. WHITE: Is it correct to say that of these 125,000 called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act there have been some 30,000 discharged?

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member is correct in assuming that the difference between the strength I give him now and the total or net figure that he has there are discharges or are transferred, or have been struck off strength for some other reason.

Mr. WHITE: When it says in the book that men are called up and enrolled, that actually means that those men are enlisted and attested on the army's strength.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my. hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. WHITE: This list which shows enrolments of men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act actually means that these men have been called and have passed the medical examination, and later have been discharged for some reason.

Mr. RALSTON: Not all those have been discharged.

Mr. WHITE: The number who are here.

Mr. RALSTON: The numbers have not been discharged. That shows the number who have actually been enrolled.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said this afternoon, if I understood him correctly, that there are about 50,000 men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, commonly known as home defence troops—I understand that they are known as such erroneously—that there are that many men called up under the act who are of a category such that they could be sent overseas, from either coast, to take part in the fighting. In other words, there is an army in Canada of 50,000 of these men who, under the present policy of the government, will never fight unless that fighting takes place on the shores of Canada. This is a question on which there is a very wide difference of opinion between the government and the members of the official opposition. I say that because we believe that these men should be available for fighting wherever they are required. What happened to the Kiska force brings out the point very well. Here we had a force of approximately 5,000 men who were practically all called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Those men were sent to Kiska. They went there to fight. Everyone has agreed that they carried on in a splendid fashion, and made a very good name for themselves. Of course, there was no actual fighting.

Now, these men have come back to Canada. Kiska has been occupied and these Canadian troops have come back to Canada. I understand they are still on the Pacific coast. Besides that task force there are one or two other similar task forces on the coast. All of those troops have been trained for jungle fighting, or in other words, to fight the Japanese. They are thoroughly qualified. I believe some inquiries were made among the units as to whether or not the men were willing voluntarily to go to fight the Japanese, as distinguished from fighting in Europe, and that the majority of men agreed to do so, and said they would be perfectly happy to fight the Japanese. The minister can correct me in that if I am wrong.

But there is the position. Why is it that those men cannot be sent to fight the Japanese? Why do they have to remain in Canada, while the Americans, Australians and New Zealanders are doing the fighting in the Pacific area, and Canada is not represented at all? That seems to me a very unwise position for this nation to be put in. Apparently we are in that position because of the policy of the government in refusing to send any of these men abroad to fight.

The minister said on Friday, referring to the Kiska force, that these men were trained not only for home defence, but for special duty in the Pacific, should action make that necessary and should the decision be made to send them there. Will the minister explain the position with respect to forces such as the Kiska force? Why cannot that force be sent to fight the Japanese? Why must it stay at home in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if my hon. friend will permit me to get an understanding of his policy. Supposing the Kiska force were to-day general service personnel; would my hon. friend advocate sending them to fight the Japanese?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: You would?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Even with the man-power situation as we have it in Canada, you would advocate that?

Mr. GREEN: Well—

Mr. RALSTON: Just a moment.

Mr. GREEN: You have asked me a question.

Mr. RALSTON: You would advocate fighting a third front—Canada fighting the Japanese, too?

Mr. GREEN: The minister cannot evade the question in that way.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not evading it.

Mr. GREEN: If the policy of this government were a proper one, and all these 50,000 men were available for fighting, there would be men to send to the Pacific and to Europe. The objection is that you have 50,000 men you cannot send anywhere under your foolish policy.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is generally pretty clear, but I think if I may say so he is not thinking very clearly in this instance. In the first place, at the present time I do not see this parliament authorizing the sending of a force to Japan—

Mr. GREEN: Not to Japan.

Mr. RALSTON: To fight the Japanese. The first person to object to it would be the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that.

Mr. RALSTON: Or his leaders, who may be keener than my hon. friend about reinforcements. That is one thing they are always talking about, that if these men are there we should leave them for reinforcements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister does not know what is in my mind, at all.

Mr. RALSTON: All right. My hon. friend may contradict it if he wishes. These men at the present time are, as I have indicated before, a second line of reinforcements. I do not think my hon. friend would be standing on his feet for a single moment advocating the sending of a force just at the moment from Canada to fight the Japanese.

Mr. GREEN: Why did the minister send them to Kiska, then, if they were not to fight?

Mr. RALSTON: That was simply a brigade, and that was before we sent our second division to Italy. That was at a time when there was no such activity on the western front such as there is to-day. They were sent there because there was an opportunity to send them to do a job and we did it. My hon. friend seems to think that there are strings on the 50,000 men who are in Canada, that they cannot fight outside Canada. They are trained; they are fit for reinforcement purposes, and they can be sent if the action is taken. They are to-day a potential force for reinforcements as well as for the defence of Canada or for operations on the Pacific.

Mr. GREEN: Why cannot the Kiska force be sent to Europe if the minister does not want to send them to fight the Japanese?

Mr. RALSTON: Canada has reached the peak so far as the sending of new capital units overseas is concerned. A year ago we took that stand, and that policy was endorsed by this house. The suggestion has been made to me that I am simply crazy to build up the army, that the army overseas is big enough now. My friend now suggests that we send another brigade in the shape of the Kiska force.

Mr. GREEN: Why cannot they be sent to Europe as reinforcements?

Mr. RALSTON: If there is any necessity of sending them overseas, they can be sent if the proper action is taken. I pointed out that at the present time there are in Canada about 60,000 men who will provide feeders for the reinforcement pool overseas. That pool will be filled up again by recruiting. If recruiting does not go on fast enough, then the pool in Canada will be down and we shall have to consider what to do. There is nothing lost through the fact that at the moment these men do not happen to be subject to overseas service.

Mr. GREEN: The plan is to keep these 50,000 fighting men in Canada who have not volunteered for service anywhere, and if next year more men will be required, others will be sent and these 50,000 will remain here doing nothing.

Mr. RALSTON: We must have some men in Canada. These men are serving in Canada and are doing the jobs I have spoken of. If a man wants to volunteer to go overseas, I would rather have him. If we can get it, I would rather have a volunteer army. If the time comes when it is necessary to do something else, then, as I have said to this house before, as far as I am concerned I shall be ready to make the recommendation. In the meantime these men are trained and they can be used for service in Canada. They are available as a second line if action is taken for reinforcements, should the occasion arise.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister wants volunteers to go to Europe and these Kiska men have volunteered to fight the Japanese, why cannot they go to fight the Japanese?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is talking about these men wanting to fight the Japanese, about our sending a certain force to fight the Japanese. I do not know what my hon. friend is talking about, but I am delighted to hear that the Kiska men are prepared to volunteer for general service.

Mr. GREEN: To fight the Japanese.

Mr. RALSTON: I understood that they volunteered if they were sent as a unit. My hon. friend asks why they are not sent overseas as reinforcements. They have an opportunity to volunteer and I am sure that some of them are volunteering. As they volunteer they are sent into training.

Mr. GREEN: What does it cost to keep these 50,000 men?

The CHAIRMAN: I think we should have a certain amount of decorum and all remarks should be addressed to the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: It costs exactly what it would cost for any 50,000 men who were needed for service in Canada. For approximately 70,000 men I think the figure would be $100,000,000 a year. That would have to be spent whether it was national resources mobilization personnel or general service personnel so long as the job had to be done here.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has emphasized the necessity of keeping the units overseas reinforced, and with that I heartily agree. Apparently he is quite satisfied that there are sufficient reinforcements available. Have the five divisions overseas been kept up to strength? I ask that question because on November 25 the following appeared in the Vancouver press:

Indications are that the following changes are being made in the reorganization—

Referring to the army overseas.

1. Withdrawal of troops from the second division to meet requirements in other divisions, thus eliminating that division as a combat force.

It has been reported that some second division units are now classed as training battalions with the task of supplying reinforcements to units on the fighting fronts.

I hope that report is incorrect. The second division fought the battle of Dieppe, and this report is to the effect that they are not now at full strength as a division and have never been since the battle of Dieppe. Will the minister tell us whether or not that is the situation?

Mr. RALSTON: No, it is not true. I heard of that report when I was in England. The second division has a definite task to do in connection with certain operations, and I have no knowledge whatsoever of the second division not being up to strength or not operating as a division. I am sure they are operating as a division.

Mr. GREEN: Just the same as the other divisions?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not wish to press the point unduly, but there is something I should like to draw to the minister's attention. He has said that this force of upwards of 70,000 men must be retained to keep the training stream flowing. There has been some criticism of this action in my area and I should like to give the minister an illustration or two. Some young men have bought what have been classed as non-essential businesses such as shoe stores. I know of one case in a town of two thousand where a man bought a business and carried the only up-to-date stock in the community to take care of the farming population. This man was to be forced out of business, and there are other cases I could give the minister. This particular man developed a physical weakness of which no one knew anything, but he received his notice and transportation and had to go to Toronto. He was to be forced to sell his business. The feeling is growing about these cases. People think there could be some reduction in these men who are being retained in the defence army described by the minister. Surely it is not necessary for a married man with three children to have to sell his business which was bought three years before the war started. As I say, there are other cases of which I can give the minister particulars. Apparently if the war goes on one or two more years this force will still be maintained.

Mr. RALSTON: The Department of National Defence does not call up those men; it simply makes a requisition on the Department of Labour, and national selective service decides whether or not a man is eligible for exemption or deferment. The case cited by my hon. friend does sound like an appealing one, but it is something the army cannot do much about.

Mr. LOCKHART: Just so that the minister may have a clear picture, I may say that the young man went to Toronto to the selective service office and explained the circumstances. His whole savings were at stake, but by the time he got back home his notice to report was in the mail and within four days he was to report for service in the army. By a stroke of good luck or otherwise he happened to have some physical defect which he had never known of, and that was all that saved him. He had told the selective service office the position he was in but got nowhere. I give that as one case. You are maintaining a large group, some 70,000 men, in a more or less static state—I know the minister disagrees with that—and when these men plead their case and explain what they are up against to the selective service officers it seems to make no difference. They are called into the army in spite of everything.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Am I to understand from the minister that these men are afraid to go overseas? You can call them by any name you please, but that is what it really amounts to, and they are not from British Columbia. Yet some of these men who are afraid to go overseas are acting as non-commissioned officers instructing active service men who have volunteered to go overseas.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know of any of them instructing in the training centres.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not care where they are instructing. I know that in British Columbia we have men from the province from which the hon. member for York-Sunbury comes, men who have not done an honest day's work in the last six months, who are telling active service men in British Columbia who have volunteered for active service overseas to pick up a cigarette off the sidewalk, or some other order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The men from my county all went active.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Right in British Columbia we have men from your province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Name them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think it is a disgrace that an active service man who has volunteered to go overseas should have one of these men who have not volunteered for service overseas but have two or three stripes telling him what to do. I know what would have happened in my battalion if anything of that sort had occurred. If the minister wants instances, I can give them.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to have them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The minister says that these men are taken into the stream. If they are in a stream, all I can say is that they are trying to run uphill. These men from eastern Canada are not getting infantry training in British Columbia. There are active service men from British Columbia who are building roads and these other men are doing nothing but lying around camps. Some of them could not dig a post-hole in three days. If that is what he calls a streamlined service, I do not know where the minister gets his advice. The minister cannot keep track of all this, I know, but some steps should be taken to see that these men from eastern Canada who have not volunteered for active service are not put in a position to order a volunteer from British Columbia to pick up a cigarette from the playground. Yet there they are, sitting around the sidewalk in North Vancouver, and it is a disgrace that these men from eastern Canada are not doing a type of work or undergoing a type of training that would be to the good of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I take objection to any suggestion that these men come from my riding.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think there is a lot to be said about the home defence army. It is most unsatisfactory. I should like to get a broader picture of the general situation. The minister tells us that we have 240,000 troops overseas, and he has said that we are to maintain our army headquarters staff. To most of us this is something new. We do not know what establishment is necessary for an army headquarters staff and all the necessary ancillary troops. Could the minister give us an estimate of the numbers necessary for the present army headquarters staff and ancillary troops? We know how many are required in a division, and I understand that for a corps the numbers are almost double those required for the two divisions contained therein. I should like to know the extra percentage required for army headquarters staff and the necessary ancillary troops. I think that has a distinct bearing all the way through on our reinforcement pool and home defence army.

Mr. RALSTON: I explained on Friday to my hon. friend that it is difficult to say how many troops you need when you have an army headquarters, because the corps does provide a proportion of army troops to go to whatever army headquarters are supervising and directing that particular corps. I have not any figures here to-night, but I remember tabling a return showing the number of officers at army headquarters and the number of other ranks required. I do not recall the number of officers, but if I remember correctly the number of additional ranks was shown as something like 7,000 men. I would have to look up the return to be sure of that, but that is my best recollection. The army troops, generally speaking, are provided in large measure by the corps which the army is supervising. The corps provide the army troops for whatever army they may happen to be directing.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Out of present personnel?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. The army headquarters has no method of recruiting or organizing a unit. It gets its men from a corps and they become army troops and are always under army command.

Mr. WRIGHT: There are approximately 100,000 men called up under the N.R.M.A., and the present strength is approximately 71,000, which would indicate that about 29,000 have been discharged or transferred or died.

Mr. RALSTON: Or enlisted, or become general service men.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the present policy with respect to discharging men in low medical category who have been called up under the N.R.M.A.?

Mr. RALSTON: They are discharged when they can be spared. We are endeavouring to have as large a percentage as possible of "A" category men in the army, whether N.R.M.A. or general service.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is any different policy followed with respect to the discharge of those called up under the N.R.M.A. if they are in a low medical category?

Mr. RALSTON: If it is a matter of requesting a discharge, certainly the general service man would get the preference. That is, where a man would like to get out and is in a low medical category and can be spared the general service man would get the opportunity first. But if it is a case of a man wanting to stay in, the N.R.M.A. man of low medical category would be discharged first.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the minister state whether our estimate for necessary reinforcements is at a higher or lower rate than in the last war? In the last war we had a considerable amount of difficulty in maintaining a sufficient flow of reinforcements, and our units were usually below strength. The strength of five battalions would pass as reinforcements through one battalion. Naturally, people are puzzled. They wonder how we are going to maintain a sufficient volume of reinforcements when we have so many men in the armed forces, in the navy, army and air force, and at the same time so many more on the production line.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg your pardon.

Mr. QUELCH: On the production line. Just exactly how many men have we available for reinforcements in Canada, England, Italy and Egypt? What is the total number, or do you not care to give that information?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry, I could not give that.

Mr. QUELCH: Can you tell us how the estimates compare with the estimates of the last war? Is it higher or lower? It seems to me it must be very much lower than the estimate we had in the last war.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think any comparison can be made. I do not know what the basis was in the last war, but obviously the composition and employment of the forces are entirely different in this war. The forces are entirely different. I do not think any useful or intelligent comparison could be made.

Mr. QUELCH: On the other hand, you would not say that the casualties will be lower, surely. You would expect the casualties to be higher, if anything, if we are to have many more Dieppe raids, for instance.

Mr. RALSTON: I hope we shall not have any more Dieppe raids.

Mr. QUELCH: We have to be prepared, nevertheless. Could the minister say what the policy is in regard to the appointment of officers in the filling of vacancies in the field? Have the commanders the right to fill vacancies of officers in the field by appointing men from the ranks, as they did in the last war? At that time men were taken from the ranks and given a commission on the field.

Mr. RALSTON: I can say to my hon. friend that is a matter which is under discussion at the present moment. There is some discussion as to what is best to do; that is to say, whether an officer who has had officer training should be used when there is a surplus of officers, or whether the appointments should be made directly on the field without further training. The matter is under discussion now, as a matter of fact, with Canadian military headquarters. Obviously there are many advantages in having a man who is battle-trained. He has been a non-commissioned officer, he knows conditions; at the same time there are certain qualifications which are required by commissioned officers which can, I think, best be obtained by long-term training which we endeavour to give them. There is something to be said for using officers when you have them rather than making ad hoc appointments on the field. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister knows that a lot of hard feeling was caused in the last war by sending green officers over to take charge of men who had had two, three or four years service. I think it took a lot of pressure on the part of the commander in the field before they were given the right to make these appointments on the field. I think further consideration should be given to that.

Mr. RALSTON: I happened to be a commander myself on the field in the last war. I remember one or two circumstances at that time, but I always did this. I do not think I ever appointed a man on the field; I recommended him to go back to England and take an officers' training course, if he had all the qualifications and all the equipment that a man should have in order to take that position.

Mr. QUELCH: In the early stages of the war there may be men appointed on the field who were not given the chance of officers training.

Mr. RALSTON: I know that.

Mr. MUTCH: May I suggest to the minister that it might be advantageous and help to clear the picture if he explained briefly to the committee the practice of selecting men to be trained as officers. Only those men who have had a very considerable amount of experience in Canada, or in field units overseas are selected as officers. I have had an opportunity in recent months of seeing a considerable number of those who are passing through the officer training period in England, and I do not know of anyone—I may be open to correction in this—who has come to the officer training centres from the field forces in England in recent months who has not had field experience. They are not building up their reserves any more with inexperienced people from civilian life. They are building them up from men who have been in the service a minimum length of time under the regulations and who have complete training or experience overseas. They are men who have trained in the arm of the unit from which they come.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Go to a barber college and get a commission.

Mr. BRUCE: I have one or two questions to ask the minister with respect to reinforcements. He stated on Friday that although we were maintaining our army headquarters we had only one corps, and that the other corps would be supplied by Britain. My first question is, if our three divisions are in action I presume that the Canadian pool to which he referred would supply the reinforcements for our own divisions.

Mr. RALSTON: Correct.

Mr. BRUCE: Second, in the event of an invasion of the continent, can the minister give us any estimate of the percentage of reinforcements that might be necessary within the first two weeks?

Mr. RALSTON: I would not attempt to give any estimate of that kind. I say to my hon. friend that provision has been made for reinforcements on a scale which is regarded as adequate. We had exactly the same situation in Sicily. This is not the first time, you know. We had an invasion in Sicily and we sent reinforcements which were regarded as adequate for the first two weeks, and much longer than that.

Mr. BRUCE: We have been told that there is a reinforcement pool in Canada and a pool in England, and if the pool runs out in England it will be reinforced from the pool in Canada. It would take a considerable time to move these troops from Canada to England, and if we have very heavy casualties in the first two weeks or month of the invasion, then I think the people of this country would like to be assured that we have sufficient reinforcements available immediately to take care of the situation. I should like to ask the minister if he can give that assurance.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I can.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The criticisms that I have heard wherever I have gone regarding the home defence army is that we are sending men overseas with considerably short periods of training, and we shall probably be sending others if the emergency arises, with still shorter periods of training, while we have in the home defence army men who have had much longer years of service and more years of training. That is the chief criticism that I have heard regarding the home defence army in my ramblings around the country. The minister has indicated that the government does not think it advisable at the present time to have Canadians engaged in war with Japan but that our forces should be concentrated in the war in Europe. I think it is generally understood that the war with Japan will continue possibly for some years after we hope the war in Europe will have finished. Has the government formulated any plans regarding the use of Canadians against the Japanese when the war in Europe has been completed. That requires, I am told, a large number of attendants, men who know Japanese, know Japanese customs, men who have worked with the army. I understand the Americans are doing a great deal in the way of training men for that work. Is anything of that kind being contemplated in Canada at the present time?

Mr. RALSTON: In the first place, what I said with regard to Japan or what I wanted to say was, that no commitments have been made at the present time as to the nature or extent of Canada's participation in the war against Japan. At the same time I wish to say, as I said last year, that the army recognizes fully that we are at war with Japan and we are making plans accordingly. I cannot give my hon. friend any statement with regard to policy.

Mr. ROSE: I believe there is a good deal of uneasiness among certain people with regard to the army's role in strikes. I was in Shawinigan Falls at the time of the strike, having been invited by the unions to go and speak, and while there I found quite a number of soldiers who had been sent from Farnham. They were French-Canadian soldiers, it is true, but they were parading the streets intimidating the workers and they did not create the best impression upon the people. I do not think it is the best thing for the morale of the soldiers, who believe there is a greater enemy for them to fight than their fellow Canadians at Shawinigan Falls. Who ordered the soldiers there? In the Montreal strike of policemen and firemen there were, I understand, one thousand men sent from Farnham.

It is true they were not paraded but were kept in barracks, but here again they were men who had been sent for the purpose of dealing with the strike. Many of these men expressed regret at being used for that purpose. The reserve army is another organization that was ready for action in connection with the Montreal strike. A colonel—I cannot say what his name is—said after the strike that he was sorry he did not get the chance to come to grips with the strikers. The reserve army officers, especially some of the older men are through and through reactionary. They still think of the good old days. I would suggest that some of the older officers of perhaps thirty-five or forty released from active service, be placed in the reserve army instead of having men of between fifty and sixty, old men, who as I said before still think of the good old days. They are jingoes; they do not understand the new spirit of Canada and of the world. There have been a number of occasions when men in the reserve army have been told, "It is true the danger of attack is over, but after the war we may have to be used in case of emergency." What emergency is contemplated? We are not planning for trouble. If we mean to plan for a peaceful post-war there is no necessity to arouse people who join the reserve army by telling them that they may be used in case of emergency.

Mr. WHITE: Are all officers liable for overseas service, or is it necessary for an officer to volunteer for overseas service? Are officers still trained for the reserve army?

Mr. RALSTON: All officers are liable for overseas service. Do I understand the hon. member to ask whether officers are still being trained for the overseas army? Does he mean, are reserve army officers being trained at Brockville?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot be sure, but I think that is so. I have not inquired in the last month. There is a very small number.

Mr. GILLIS: The question I have to ask is along the line of that asked by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White). What is the policy with respect to non-commissioned officers and commissioned serving in Canada who desire to proceed overseas? Is it necessary, in order to proceed overseas, to revert to the rank of non-commissioned officer or to take a lower rank if one is a commissioned officer? Second, with respect to N.R.M.A. forces, is it not true that whole units of these forces have volunteered their services generally, provided the unit be not split up, and that if it was necessary to send them to any theatre of war, provided they could be sent as a unit, they were prepared to proceed on that basis? I think myself, that, with respect to the N.R.M.A. forces, they are receiving a good deal of abuse which they do not deserve. We must remember that when the war broke out the great majority of these boys were young fellows who were roaming the streets, who had very little to fight for, and with absolutely no knowledge of the military set-up. But they were called up to report for military duty, and in many cases they were sent to camps where, after considerable training received since going into the services, they have had names hurled at them and everything done to discourage them, though they might have tended otherwise to take their place in the legitimate army and proceed overseas. I find no fault with them.

The Minister of National Defence, in summing up the general situation at the time he began his report to the house at this session, made it quite clear that it was necessary to maintain in Canada an army for emergency purposes, that it was necessary to fortify our coasts at both ends of the country, and many of the men of that army who get such a ribbing have been doing duty in outlying sections of the country and have undergone considerable hardship. They have been posted out there and have had to stick to their posts, and they have done a very useful service. There is no doubt about that. At the last session I said, and I say it again, that anyone who takes the position in this house that every man in uniform in Canada during the past three years should have been routed overseas is taking a very unrealistic position.

The main difficulty we have had to contend with in the past two and a half years has been to get something overseas for those who were already there. Shipping has been our difficulty. And what was the soldier in Britain doing during the past two and a half years which the soldier in Canada was not doing? He was kicking his heels waiting for action. One of the main difficulties facing those charged with the responsibility of maintaining the morale of the troops over there was to keep them busy doing nothing until such time as there was somewhere to send them into action. I hate to sit back listening to armchair generals who are quite comfortably seated in Canada, prepared to carry on the war until the last worker is killed. I am not interested in that line of argument. I think these men are badly abused. They were boys picked up on the street who knew nothing but starvation under the regime of those who now take the position that they should all be prepared to die for a country that disinherited them while those persons were themselves in power. I think these boys have performed a useful service and do not deserve the names that have been hurled at them and the abuse they have received during the time they have been doing a very valuable job in Canada, standing, on guard on all our coasts, while at the same time unit after unit have been volunteering, provided they could go overseas as a unit. The position taken by many in the house is completely unjustified, and I am certain of this, because these boys, by and large, are the brothers or sons of men who to-night are in Sicily doing the fighting. If the time comes when they need reinforcements over there, when our army is in action, there will not be found any difficulty getting most of them to volunteer to go there.

I think national defence has been well advised, although I do not agree with them in every thing, in maintaining that army on that basis until such time as it is needed over there. To suggest that this force should have been sent to Britain during the past two years, to load upon the British government the burden of feeding and looking after them, was a completely unrealistic position to take. I have sufficient confidence in those boys as Canadians to believe that when the time comes they will make their contribution where it is most needed.

I did not intend to speak at any length at this time. There are many things that could be said with respect to the army overseas, but I do not think this is the time to say them. However, I should like the minister to answer the question with respect to officers and non-commissioned officers who desire to proceed overseas, as to whether or not they are compelled to relinquish their rank. I know there are officers in Canada who are anxious to get over, who have volunteered from the army to the air force, from the army to the paratroops and so on, in an attempt to get a shift out of Canada, but they have been held here, I do not know for what reason.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the necessity for a non-commissioned officer or an officer to revert in order to go overseas, there is an agreement with Canadian military headquarters and with the army that a certain proportion—it is a small proportion—of reinforcement troops can be particular ranks; I think there are some sergeants and even some as high as warrant officers class 2, but not a great many. To answer my hon. friend's question directly, it is not an absolute rule that every non-commissioned officer has to take off his stripes before he goes overseas; it all depends on the need for non-commissioned officers over there and of course to some extent on the qualifications of the man here. With regard to officers, captains have been taken as such, though not a great many. Generally speaking, we would very much prefer to have subalterns there, in order that they might work up, but occasionally captains are taken.

With regard to N.R.M.A. personnel volunteering as units, that is a very attractive proposition for the recruiting officer; it means that he fills up his month's quota pretty quickly if he can get a whole battalion to volunteer, but I may say it is a headache for the administrative officers because it means arranging to have that unit go overseas as a unit. The formations overseas are already constituted, and in order to keep faith the unit volunteering it might be necessary to break up another unit which has been overseas for a good while. That has never been done, although offers of that kind have been made. Generally speaking, the matter is explained to the men in the unit. We endeavour to keep them together as much as possible, and we have had arrangements under which platoons and even larger subunits of the unit have gone over together. We endeavour to keep them together in the reinforcement centre, but I do not know of any case in which an entire unit composed of N.R.M.A. personnel has ever volunteered and gone over as a unit. As my hon. friend can see, it would mean adding to the capital overseas, which in turn would mean adding to the reinforcement liability here, and putting an extra unit on a formation that is already complete.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the minister. I was not arguing the merits or demerits of the scheme; I was trying to correct the impression created by some hon. members and others that the N.R.M.A. men in Canada were slackers, that they wore the uniform but did not want to fight. That impression has been created, and I agree that the mechanics of the situation as outlined by the minister are such that it is not possible to do these things. It is only natural that after serving for two or three years most of these boys should want to go overseas. They are not all slackers.

Mr. ISNOR: I want to support the thought that has been expressed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Coming as we do from the Atlantic coast, he and I have had an opportunity of coming in contact with the men who have been serving in the coastal defence units. This question has been raised on more than one occasion, and some criticism has been offered in regard to the so-called home service men. The same criticism was expressed during the last war when, as now, men were obliged to carry out duties which were considered necessary on both the eastern and western coasts. I am glad to join with the hon. member for Cape Breton South in voicing my objection to the opinion so often expressed by unthinking members of this house as well as by citizens at large, that the man serving in the home forces is not performing a necessary duty. On more than one occasion the minister has expressed his appreciation of these men on the floor of this chamber. Last year he stated that the men on home service were absolutely necessary; and we all know, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, that for the past three or four years they have been receiving training. Perhaps it has not been as extensive as the training given those who were proceeding overseas, but very important training has been given our home service men to prepare them to take their place either overseas or in defence of the shores of our country, if that should be necessary. I thought I should like to add my word of commendation for those who are obliged, quite often against their own wish and desire, to serve on our eastern and western shores.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If the hon. member would permit a question, why are they obliged to serve in Canada?

Mr. ISNOR: That is a question that perhaps neither the hon. member nor I can answer. I leave that to those with more experience in these matters.

Mr. STIRLING: I wonder if the minister would deal with the matter I brought up, concerning the statement which has been made to me not once but many times, that scattered across Canada—I mentioned Petawawa as an instance—there are said to be a very considerable number of officers who apparently are not attached to units or taking courses; perhaps "unattached" is the proper term to use, but they are officers who do not appear to have any definite work to do. They are to be seen not only at Petawawa but at Vancouver and various other places in Canada. To what extent is that an accurate statement?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend to what extent it is an accurate statement. I did say that we had a reserve of officers, so that we are pretty comfortably off. As a matter of fact, at the present moment an arrangement is under consideration for the employment of quite a large number of officers, which will reduce that surplus very considerably. I am surprised to hear my hon. friend suggesting that these officers are simply in camps, unemployed. I had understood that they were taking these advanced courses and refresher courses, not only at Brockville but at the schools of instruction being held at the advanced training centres as well. I can only say to my hon. friend that I shall inquire about the matter at once and shall be glad to give the committee the information. I know what my hon. friend wants is action, not information, but I shall try to give the information and get the action as well.

Mr. STIRLING: Then has the minister any information to give the committee with regard to deserters, how many there are, how many are being pursued, and how many he anticipates will be apprehended?

Mr. RALSTON: Could I make a note of that and give the information to my hon. friend to-morrow? I have in mind that there is pretty nearly a constant number. There are recaptures; then somebody else deserts, and so on. I cannot tell my hon. friend the rate of inflow or output.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister deal with it as far as possible, so far as their origins are concerned? That is to say, would he tell us from what part of the Canadian active army they come?

Mr. RALSTON: According to districts?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: While we are under this heading I would draw to the attention of the minister the case I took up with him some little time ago. I am quite satisfied with the action in that part of it in which the minister interested himself, but I must point out that if this case is typical and if the information I have is correct, then there would appear to be many men in the home defence army—if I am using the correct term—who are receiving very little military training, and most of whose time is taken up in working for private employers.

I have a letter from the parents of a young boy who was inducted into the army on March 8, 1943. He was taken first to Little Mountain barracks, and was there for only a short time when he was sent to Victoria. He then went to Alberni where he worked for three months in the bush. His parents state that while there he was pulling telephone poles through the bush with ropes, for a private contractor. That lasted for three months. The rather peculiar circumstance in this instance is that the parents of the boy say that an army officer had said he was not strong enough for ordinary military training.

Mr. RALSTON: Is this the boy who went to the hospital in Vancouver?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, he went to hospital, mentally deranged. Further, after working at Alberni for three months he came back to Victoria, and from there went to Patricia Bay, where he had about a week's training. Then he came home to Vancouver for a week's leave, I believe. From there he was sent to Port Hardy, where he was handed a pick and shovel and started to work at digging ditches. Whether this was for a private contractor or for the army I cannot say, nor could his parents.

He worked there for a while ,and then was sent to Vernon, staying there for a little more than a week. From there he was sent to work for the Canadian National Railways at Blue River. For a person who is not physically strong, track maintenance work is one of the heaviest types of work a person could do, and is particularly hard for a person who is not used to that type of work. He was there for a short time when his parents were notified that he was back again at Little Mountain barracks, mentally deranged.

How many of the men in the home defence army are doing work for private employers such as the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway, or other employers of that type? During the three months the boy was at Port Alberni was he doing army work, or working for a private employer? These are questions to which the fathers and mothers of young lads in the army would like to receive answers.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend how many are detailed. It is some time since I looked at the order in council. There was an order in council providing that personnel under the National Resources Mobilization Act could be detailed in units or subunits for civilian work. Then there was a provision under which they could be given leave and could go to a private employer. I am sorry I cannot tell my hon. friend as to how many are in each class, but I shall have the information to-morrow.

Although my hon. friend did mention that feature of the matter in his letter, I must say that I do not think I dealt with it, because I was more concerned with the boy's health, and as to whether he was going to get along all right. I do not think I dealt with that matter, did I?

Mr. MacINNIS: No; the minister dealt very quickly with the matter of the boy's health, and the other feature was not mentioned in the correspondence which passed between us. Had it been explained to my satisfaction I would not have bothered mentioning it to-night, because I discuss in the house only those questions which I cannot settle in another way.

Mr. RALSTON: Did the hon. member give me the boy's name?

Mr. MacINNIS: I have given the name to the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: What we wish to do is find out the circumstances under which he did that particular job, and also the number of men in that class.

Mr. MacINNIS: I want to know if this boy was working for a private contractor for three months when he was at Port Alberni, and how this affects other men in the army.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe there was an order in council authorizing the detailing of men to do railway work at a time when the railways were short of help. I believe that would be the class in which he would come, but I shall look into the matter.

Mr. WRIGHT: Under what arrangements do men work for private employers? Are they paid by the army or by the employers?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I have not the order in council with me. However, if it is the same as the regulation with respect to work on farms, it will be recalled that they were paid a flat rate per day, depending on the zone in which the work was done. However, I shall find out about this particular man, because he will be representative of the class.

Mr. GILLIS: The matter is not confined to that order in council. Just a few days ago I received a letter from London, Ontario, protesting—

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has extended his constituency.

Mr. GILLIS: I think I am elected to represent Canada as a whole, with the exception of the constituency of the Minister of Pensions and National Health. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) looks after that.

In this particular case a charge was made that through some arrangement with the authorities in that area carpenters were released and were employed on jobs, thereby displacing regular carpenters.

Mr. RALSTON: Where did this happen?

Mr. GILLIS: London, Ontario. There was considerable controversy with selective service in the matter. No progress was made, and it was suggested I should take it up in the house. I have written the department, but have not yet received a reply. That seems to be a pretty general thing all the way through.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Supplementary to the question raised by the hon. member for Yale with respect to surplus officers throughout the country, I understand the minister's department conducted a survey during the past months to see how many such officers were in Canada who were not now rendering useful service. When the minister brings down his answer, would he give us the number of these officers, and also the number who have been discharged? I know several officers who have been notified of their discharges without any reasons being given. No doubt some of them had passed the age limit, but the newspapers have carried articles about this.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend refers to officers being discharged without any reasons being given. I am very particular about that, and if he knows of any case I wish he would bring it to my attention. There is a most strict procedure laid down. I try to see the files myself. I would be disappointed to know if there were such cases. If there are any I should like to know of them for administrative purposes. An officer who has served and served well is certainly entitled to know the reason why he is being reverted to reserve status.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): One man showed me his papers from the department and they did not give any reason. I know this man personally and I believe he is over age, but I shall let the minister have his name.

Mr. EDWARDS: I appreciate that there are officers who are over age and are being retired, and there are others who cannot be usefully employed, but I wonder whether the department has considered the advisability of an opportunity to resign being given to some officers who are now usefully employed. Perhaps it could be intimated to these men that their resignations would meet with approval. There are three or four cases that come to my mind at this time. These men held good positions or conducted businesses before they entered the army three or four years ago. They have done an excellent and worth-while job in Canada in training men for overseas. In each case the man is a veteran of the last war in which he served with distinction. I believe they would all be glad to return to civilian life and make way for other men less fortunate or for men who are coming back from overseas. They hesitate to take the step because of the reflection that might be cast upon their devotion to duty. I feel sure these men would be glad to tender their resignations if it were indicated to them that that would be agreeable and acceptable to the government and that there would be no question of their patriotism.

There is another matter concerning the treatment given to officers who are retired because they have reached the age limit—I understand the principle is that these men must be retired unless a certificate is made to the adjutant-general that another suitable man is not available—and to officers who are asked to retire for other reasons. In the first case the officer is given a gratuity on retirement of one day's pay for every twelve days of service, or one month's pay for each year of service, whereas the officer who is asked to retire receives only the bare gratuity of one month's pay. I consider that this is an injustice.

An officer may be a veteran of the last war, he may have served Canada for three years, but when he is retired he is given a gratuity of one month's pay. A brother officer may be retired because of age, and if he has served the same time he will receive a gratuity of three months' pay. If I have not a true appreciation of the facts perhaps the minister will correct me, but if I am correct then I think this matter should be reconsidered. Personally I do not think it is fair to have a man serve two or three years and then be told that he is out on thirty days' notice and will receive only one month's gratuity.

Mr. RALSTON: The first point raised by my hon. friend was with regard to permission being given to officers to resign. I have no doubt that the officer in question would prefer to revert to reserve status because, if he resigned, he would have to resign his commission, whereas if he reverts he could go back on the active list again if the occasion arose. I am sure that the boards which discuss these matters would consider that point in those cases where officers cannot be advantageously employed. I shall see that the idea is transmitted to the boards.

The other point raised by my hon. friend was with regard to the apparent discrepancy between the case of the man who had reached sixty years of age and was being retired and the case of the man who had not reached that age and was being retired because he was not advantageously employable. There is a difference between those two cases which may sound technical. The man who has reached sixty years of age has a job and most likely he is fit to fill that job. The job is there for him but suddenly because of age he is out. That regulation was not in force at the time he entered the service and it was thought that he should have some compensation. The other man had held his position subject to his being retired if he could not be advantageously employed. That situation came about and he was paid a gratuity. As I say, the distinction may be somewhat technical, but there is a real distinction between the two. However, the matter is under active consideration, and I shall take note of what my hon. friend has said with regard to it.

Mr. EDWARDS: The Minister of National Defence for Air made the statement the other day that negotiations were going on between the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F. with a view to allowing Canadians who had enlisted in the R.A.F. since the beginning of the war to transfer to the R.C.A.F., and I was wondering whether similar discussions might be going on with respect to Canadians who had enlisted in the British army at the outbreak of the war and might want to transfer to the Canadian army. The two men that I have particularly in mind enlisted in the British army in a specialist capacity on the understanding that when the Canadians came over they would be transferred to the Canadian army; but from that day to this, despite their best efforts, they have never been permitted to transfer to Canadian forces, despite the fact that they are Canadians. Are similar negotiations going on with respect to the army such as the minister for air indicated were going on as between the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. RALSTON: Very recently there arose a case of one particular officer, and there was a discussion then on general principles. I shall make inquiries and see how far those discussions went. The British pay us a compliment in wanting to keep Canadian officers when they get them, and they do not meet with any great enthusiasm the suggestion that they transfer. I will see how far the discussions have progressed.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): A soldier in the Canadian army on discharge receives $65 as clothing allowance. I understand that in the United States on discharge the soldier receives from $100 to $300. Has this government any intention of increasing our allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend is mixing up two things. The $100 to $300 in the United States is what they call mustering-out pay, a sort of war service gratuity.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is the same thing.

Mr. RALSTON: No; the $65 clothing allowance is paid to enable a man on discharge to get a civilian outfit. I presume the United States also have a clothing allowance for their army.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And the Canadian soldier gets one month's pay as well.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. The United States army, I presume, has also a clothing allowance, but what it amounts to I do not know.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Can the minister tell us how many recruits have enlisted voluntarily month by month during the past year? There is no doubt that immediately after the passing of the National Resources Mobilization Act, recruiting for the air force and navy speeded up; I do not know how it affected recruiting for the army. But the government have now got a tiger by the tail, and do not know what to do with it.

I have another question to ask while the minister is looking up those figures. I have no doubt that to-morrow he will answer my question on the orders of the day in connection with the speech made by Major-General Chisholm in Toronto from which I quoted. There are one or two other quotations I should like to give now from that same speech. He is reported to have said:

> Too many women are bringing up too many boys on women's values, without relation to their obligation to the community. The result is that the army has to do a lot of unnecessary "growing up" of recruits.

I think that is a terrible castigation of our womenfolk. I do not blame the women for that at all. I do blame one woman who used to be a member of this House of Commons and used to rise in this house and ask for the cadet corps to be wiped out, and who now belongs to the national socialist party, and who was always asking in this house to have the defence estimates reduced to one dollar, and so on. But there were also many other gentlemen now sitting on the opposite side who in years gone by refused to have the defence estimates raised. It was that sort of thing, the education given by such people—and I include some of our friends on the opposite side—that is responsible for what Major-General Chisholm complains of. Then they were for no commitments; there was no danger at all; they were isolationists, and so on. So I say you cannot blame the women of Canada for the consequences.

This national selective service is now a half idea; it is neither fish nor fowl. As I say, the government have a tiger by the tail and do not know what to do with it. Just imagine trying to put 75,000 of these zombies on a boat going overseas. What good would they do? And would you ever get them there?

Major-General Chisholm makes another pertinent statement. He says:

> The Canadian army has had to reject large numbers of men, and the British, United States and Canadian armies have found it expensive to train men who find it difficult to reorient themselves from a position of thinking of the privilege of the individual to the general security of the group.

Do they discharge them for that reason or just let them sit here at home? Is there any educational process being applied in that situation? What are we going to do with these people? It is all very well to continue to talk about having these people, but something should be done about it.

I see recruiting posters all around the country addressed to the women, and by the way these are the women of whom Major-General Chisholm says:

> In times of stress, such as war, women became a liability.

As I say, these posters are appealing to the women of the country to join up and release men for active service. It is true that we want more women to release men for overseas service. But I ask, why should we appeal to women to release men for overseas service when we have so many men here who are doing nothing at all? The minister said that they are on non-operational duty. The hon. member for Fraser Valley told us what these men are doing in British Columbia. I am glad that there are none from my riding among those he spoke of in British Columbia. But that is a situation that has been brought about by the National Resources Mobilization Act. It is simply ridiculous. The enforcement of the act is all crazy. I know a number of men in the army who would have been far more useful in Canada, and we have people taking their place here who would be far more useful in the army. I know of many instances like that. We have no national mobilization or selective service in Canada at all. We have the National Resources Mobilization Act which is neither one thing nor the other. A little while ago there was a certain amount of pressure brought to bear on these people to have them go active, but you cannot get them to go active any more. What we have to do now is to depend on recruits. Suppose you need these people and you have to bring in an act to make them go active so that they may be sent to any place in the world. That will be all right, but what good are they going to be? That is the situation. I have finished my statement and I hope the minister will answer the other question to-morrow.

Mr. RALSTON: In reference to Major-General Chisholm's speech I have told my hon. friend I would reply to-morrow. I do not think I can add anything to what I have already said other than to correct my hon. friend once more with regard to the employment of these men in Canada. My hon. friend says they are doing nothing. I told him what they are doing as reported to me. I get these reports from the district officers commanding. The hon. member for Fraser Valley seems to have a situation in his part of the country which needs to be corrected. I am going to have somebody on the job and if he will give me some information about it we shall see that it is cleaned up. These men are not loafing by any means. The work is there for them to do and they are doing it. I am glad to have this opportunity to endeavour at least to dispel in the minds of those who will listen and who will accept the fact as it is given to me, the idea that these men are doing nothing, because my information is that as operational troops and as non-operational troops in these two service units they are doing work that has to be done by somebody, and would have to be done by general service personnel if these men were not available.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to ask this question: Have we in Canada men who are being discharged all the time, as Major-General Chisholm says here, because they cannot reorient themselves from the possibility of thinking of the privilege of the individual rather than the general security of the group? He says they are being discharged, and I am perfectly sure that I could give instances.

Mr. RALSTON: They are going back to civil life. My hon. friend says they are needed there. The country is not going to lose them because they are being discharged from the army.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are they useful, and could they take the place of some of these fellows who are doing service in Canada who might very well do service in other places? That work could very well be done by men in category "E."

Mr. RALSTON: What do you suggest, keep the men—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I finish before the minister replies? We have men being discharged from the army for mental reasons. The minister is laughing. I will take the laugh off his face in a minute. Men are being discharged from the army for mental reasons. They have been taken into the army as category "A." They are then examined by psychiatrists and are then discharged for emotional instability, constitutional inadequacies, as psychopaths and mental defectives. They are placed in category "E" and are not pensionable. They could be doing useful work. Are they to be a charge on the community for the rest of their lives? They have that stigma attached to their names for the rest of their lives. Could they not be kept in the army to take the place of some other men in category "A" who are doing work that these discharged men could do? One does not need very much intelligence or be very bright to do some of these jobs. I think these men could very well be used for that purpose. You are going to have a lot of these men on your hands, and something should be done about the matter. I do not think the thing is very well run at all.

Mr. RALSTON: I can say to my hon. friend that I have seen quite a number of these men that he speaks of and who he says do not have to be very bright. I am thinking of the Longue Point depot, for instance. I think some of these men and women would qualify as members of parliament. I do not think they are devoid of grey matter.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We have been talking all around item number one. Last year the item amounted to $8,832,000. This year it is $16,000,000. I should like to ask the minister why the item is almost double this year and just what it covers.

Mr. RALSTON: The increase is due to the fact that we have very much increased the number of civilian employees as we have decreased the service personnel. The total increase, as my hon. friend will see, amounts to about $7,000,000. Soldiers were replaced by civilians, and that accounts for about $2,000,000. Included in that also are the hourly paid employees who were included elsewhere in 1943 and 1944. That amounts to $3,000,000. In other words, that $3,000,000 is taken from another place and is cut off another item.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Do the people who are employed wear uniforms?

Mr. RALSTON: No. I inquired about this item. I said, how is it we increased the pay and allowances of the civilian employees, and increased the pay and allowances of the army and still, at the same time, were reducing the army? As a matter of fact, I found the actual decrease in the pay and allowances of other ranks is $17,000,000 as compared with 1943-44, but various increases total $24,000,000 altogether in pay and allowances. Of this, $17,000,000 is accounted for by the decrease in pay of other ranks, while the increase in the pay of civilians is about $7,000,000. Therefore, on this basis, you will see there is a saving of about $10,000,000. There is one more item, reclassification of positions, $552,000, which is another part of the $7,000,000. The growth of army administration shows an increase of $2,000,000, due to increased number of employees.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is that a reclassification of civilian positions?

Mr. RALSTON: Civil Service reclassification. Reclassifications are taking effect now, a certain number every year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They did not get the cost-of-living bonus.

Mr. RALSTON: That is a reclassification of twenty-three hundred positions since the 1943-44 estimates were prepared. The total is $552,000 altogether.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister give the committee some information with regard to the organization that is being set up to take over administrative duties in reoccupied countries? I have had several inquiries made by officers who are at the present time in the army in Canada. Some of these men, it would seem to me, are well suited by their experience for such work. Is it an international organization that is being set up, of which Canada supplies so much, or is Canada setting up an organization of her own for that purpose? Can the minister give the committee some information with regard to that organization?

Mr. RALSTON: I have a memorandum here, but I shall not read it all. The situation in North Africa was the first immediate situation which required attention in the way of civil administration. The necessity for some measure of temporary jurisdiction being established by the military over the large number of civilians in territories freed from enemy control was indicated. The commanders in chief first appointed officers for that purpose. These were known as civil administrators or military governors, as the case might be, and the work was carried on by military personnel. The civil affairs officers were employed, first, on staffs of formations and, second, as civil affairs detachments. I remember, if I may interject the observation, that a member of the tariff board of Canada, Major Hebert, is a member of the civil affairs administration in Italy at the present time. During an advance the formation staffs tackle the problems as they arise, and detachments are established when important towns or centres are taken. The detachment then guards every town or centre under direction from formation headquarters and in cooperation with the local authorities if available.

Following on the opening of civil affairs schools in Britain and the United States it was decided to conduct a two-months' course along similar lines in Canada and we have established a course at the Royal Military college. The first group of twenty-four officers graduated recently. That is a joint undertaking covering the three services, the Department of External Affairs acting in an advisory capacity. A number of Canadian officers overseas have attended the civil affairs school in England and a few have taken the course in the United States. Our people who have established the school at the Royal Military college and are in charge of it have been at the school in England and also at the school in the United States to make themselves familiar with the syllabus provided and to ascertain the different kinds of training given in Britain and America. Canadian officers will be available for the staffs of Canadian formations for work at various times in which there is intermixture of British and American. The civil affairs administration is a temporary measure to be maintained in any locality only so long as it is required.

My hon. friend has inquired with regard to an officer friend, and I may tell him that commanding officers were asked to make recommendations of those who had qualifications, who had some knowledge of municipal affairs, town planning or general administration, or public utilities, water works, light systems and matters of that kind. Linguists are also useful, though not unless they have some training or experience in connection with civil administration. As my hon. friend quite understands, there is very little in the way of military training given, because it is a military officer who is being dealt with. If anyone in whom my hon. friend is interested wishes to do so, anyone who might be qualified for this work, he ought to apply to his D.O.C. and have his name sent in.

Mr. STIRLING: What numbers does the minister expect to obtain—scores or hundreds?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know how long we shall maintain the school here. There is also a school in England. I expect there will be two or three more courses, and the number may be a hundred or more.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will the minister give those figures about which I inquired?

Mr. CHURCH: Last session the Minister of National Defence for the army laid before the house a schedule recording pay and allowances for all ranks. It would surprise members to know of the different inequalities that exist, starting with lieutenant-colonel and major right down to private. The return showed a rate per day of $1.30 and in some cases $1.50, and it went straight across the blueprint, giving the total for the year. There were a great many inequalities in that schedule of the lower-paid men, and I should like to find out what is being done to remove them. The minister for the navy and the minister for air followed and gave a similar statement, a blueprint which was published in Hansard. It caused a great deal of dissatisfaction among the returned men and those overseas, because some received certain allowances, while others did not get anything. It may not be altogether in the minister's department, but I think some explanation ought to be given while the minister's estimates are before us, because the same thing applies throughout. Young men have joined up from the high schools of the country. The high schools of Toronto alone have given 600 men in casualties to the air force. I suggest, therefore, that the inequalities that appear in the schedule should be removed.

In the matter of allowances, some receive them and others do not. Section 11, subsection 3, of the Pension Act applies to the army, and last week a deputation appeared before the board of control in connection with this matter. One section relates to the necessitous circumstances of soldiers coming home. They do not get a grant at all and some are practically on the street. That section as applied to the army means simply charity. As I say, a deputation appeared before the board of control of Toronto last Thursday, and I will send the information to the minister. As regards clothing allowances, the $65 for a returned man should be marked up. The officers have been marked up and I do not see why the privates and non-commissioned officers should be forgotten. They are largely doing good work in the camps. I receive many letters from the returned men. There are many in my constituency and throughout Toronto. I do not like to bother the minister, but I hope that something will be done to remove the inequalities between the private soldier and the non-commissioned officers as compared with the men at the top of the ladder. There should be an announcement, and I hope it will come shortly, with regard to this whole matter, which will give to these people who are coming home some additional allowance for clothing and so on. The minister gave an elaborate statement last year about the matters to which I have referred, and I should like to find out if anything additional in allowance is to be done about the large number of men who are coming back from the front.

Mr. RALSTON: What I shall try to do is to get the statement made last year and make a comparison to see how much ironing out there has been of the inconsistencies in the different classes. I believe a substantial change has been effected since that schedule was filed. I should like to see what it looks like this year. We might prepare a new schedule and see how it compares with the old. With regard to the other matter, rehabilitation and the announcement of a policy with respect to what assistance is to be given, that announcement will be made in due course. I will take note of what my hon. friend says and see if we cannot get a new statement to see how it compares with the old, and what suggestion my hon. friend has to make.

Mr. CHURCH: Regarding pay and allowances, there is a good deal of complaint in the camps about leave, and the amount of money the soldier must pay to get home over the week-end. This applies to Camp Borden and many other camps, but little is done about it. The other day in Toronto we had an announcement by Major-General Chisholm which has caused a great deal of dissension and dissatisfaction in the Toronto district among women whose men are at the front or at the camps. Something should be done to find out from the railway companies what they intend to do with regard to a reduction of fares at week-ends for men at the camps. As you know, Mr. Chairman, down to the end of 1940 the railways had made more money than during the entire four and a half years of the last war. Surely something should be done by the government and the minister to see that these men are allowed cheaper fares to get home.

Apparently there is a rule now in force that the men are not allowed to write letters to the newspapers about these matters. If that rule applies to privates and non-commissioned officers it should apply also to Major-General Chisholm, who in his talk has caused a great deal of disunity among the families of our soldiers. If it were not for the women who are doing such magnificent work at home, I doubt if we would have had such success as we have had in connection with recruiting. I hope the rule will apply to Major-General Chisholm and the rest of those at the top who are spreading these rumours about leaves and doing a great deal to hurt recruiting.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for St. Paul's asked for the enlistments in 1943. The figures are as follows:

January	12,366
February	8,890
March	8,231
April	6,650
May	6,609
June	5,485
July	4,805
August	4,884
September	5,029
October	4,306
November	3,565
December (estimated)	3,500

This book is a little old, and I have just obtained an estimate for the month of December from the officer who is before me. This makes an approximate total of 74,000 for the year.

Mr. McNIVEN: Are these voluntary enlistments?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not want to hold up this resolution, but I should like an answer from the minister with respect to the low-category men who are discharged after having been called up under the mobilization act, or who have returned from overseas as casualties. I do not know whether the information is correct, but I have had at least two letters from military district No. 6, written by men who recently returned from overseas. They complain that the camp is literally blocked with category "C2" men, who are performing no useful service in the camp.

Mr. RALSTON: Is this depot at Halifax?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. I have received complaints from men who feel that perhaps they could make a better contribution outside, since they are not fit for regular military duties. That complaint also has come from other places, but the two specific complaints I have had came from military district No. 6. I should like to find out from the minister just what is the policy of the department when a man is boarded, his catgeory is lowered and he is classified as unfit for regular military service. What is he assigned to do in the military district; what duties is he required to carry out, or what service does he perform when he is kept in the army? Would it not be better to discharge that man and send him out so that he might be able to make a useful contribution in some civilian capacity? I think it would be good business if men like that were routed back to civilian life and given an opportunity to rehabilitate themselves now, before we have the general demobilization. I think it is a mistake to keep any large number of men of this kind in any camp.

Mr. RALSTON: I must confess that I agree with my hon. friend. Of course there are some jobs, such as orderlies and things of that kind, in which low-category men can be usefully employed, but generally speaking I see no point at all in keeping a man of that kind in the army, unless he is absolutely essential and no one else can be obtained to do the work. I indicated that our depots are very full at the present time, though the number of men in them is going down quite rapidly. However, in talking with my colleague, the Minister of Pensions and National Health, I have inquired into the matter pretty carefully, and I may tell my hon. friend that one reason which is given to me is that the procedure followed this time in connection with the discharge of a man is really terrific, in the number of forms that have to be filled out and the examinations that have to be gone through. You may ask why. Well, it is for the purpose of seeing to it that pensionability or otherwise is established at the start, instead of having a man come in two or three years from now saying, "Such and such a thing happened. I was stripped to the waist and examined; out I went, and nobody looked at me to make any notes of how I was." The examination does take a considerably longer time than formerly; they have specialists and so on, as my hon. friend knows.

In my judgment, however, there is no reason for these men being kept at our depots for any long time, except that of course medical officers are none too plentiful, and they tell me that a board can only handle properly something like fifteen men a day. So that it takes a number of boards if you have to deal with three, four, five or six hundred men, or perhaps a thousand or more as they may have at Halifax. It does take time to get them out, but I really think that is principally due to the necessity of taking time in order to see that the examination is properly carried out. As a matter of fact, we are putting someone in charge of all these depots, having him go around to see if he cannot smarten up the procedure. I know one depot in particular which is extremely efficient. We have had officers in command of other depots visit this one to see how it is run, and they have worked out something in the nature of a belt-line procedure.

There is another thought that has just come to me. We had an investigation made of our examination system, our reception system and our discharge system by officers of the United States army, and I must say that the result put our people very much on their toes. Perhaps they became a bit complacent following the compliments they received from these visiting officers because of the care that was taken in connection with the discharge of personnel. I remember writing a memorandum at the time congratulating them on the record they had made, but adding that I hoped this would not lead to complacency. Coming back to my hon. friend's statement, I say that by all means these men ought to be out of the army. We try to work just as hard as we can, in order to get them out just as quickly as we can, and the procedure is being improved just as much as it possible can, always having in mind the examinations which are required in order that pension cases may not arise in the future, and that men may not be deprived of evidence which they would have had if they had undergone a proper examination.

Mr. QUELCH: Recently I have had brought to my attention several cases similar to those referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. The complaint I hear is that these men get tired of hanging around and apply for their discharge. Invariably the discharge is given, but then these men are barred from receiving the one month's pay and the clothing allowance. For instance, I have before me a letter from the Edmonton branch of the legion—

Mr. RALSTON: Was the man discharged to accept civilian employment?

Mr. QUELCH: Let me read part of the letter:

> I think this is one of the grievances that certainly should be rectified, as men who have been overseas and are returned to this country certainly get fed up hanging around not doing anything, and they naturally after a time make application for discharge, which is inevitably granted.

Then, due to the fact that the discharge was granted at his own request, the man is refused his one month's pay and the clothing allowance. I have referred these cases to the department but so far have received no reply. It does seem to me that when a man has been overseas for two or three years and returns to this country he should be granted a discharge and should be eligible to receive the one month's pay and the clothing allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend mind giving me one name?

Mr. QUELCH: I am referring to the case of Corporal J. R. Wallace, and also the case of Private Jossul. I believe in the latter case, however, the allowance has been granted, though at the time the letter was written it had not. Of the four cases referred to in this letter, the allowance was granted in only one.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the second name?

Mr. QUELCH: The first case is that of Corporal J. R. Wallace, No. R-93837. The second case is that of Private Jossul, but in that case I believe the allowance has been granted, because there is a postscript to the letter which reads:

I am very pleased to let you know that I have been successful in having Jossul's rehabilitation granted, so maybe the others will come through.

Apparently Jossul's case was an exception to the rule.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has sent a copy of the letter to the department?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, I have written the department.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 15, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

WARTIME WAGES CONTROL

PROPOSED REVOCATION OF ORDER IN COUNCIL OF DECEMBER, 1943

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 5, to revoke the wartime wages control order, 1943.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a second time?

Mr. CHURCH: By leave of the house I would ask for second reading now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That cannot be granted.

Mr. CHURCH: By leave of the house I would ask for second reading.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is opposition to it. Standing order 73 provides that two readings cannot take place on the same day.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. CHURCH: I would ask for leave of the house. When five members rise the question of leave must be put to the house. Five members must rise.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who invented that rule?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no motion before the Chair. First reading is passed in the ordinary way, and second reading takes place at the next sitting of the house. When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. CHURCH: I would ask for a recorded division.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): A recorded division on what?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no motion before the house. Second reading at the next sitting of the house.

CHRISTIE STREET HOSPITAL

ANSWER TO QUESTION RESPECTING ALLOWANCES TO MEN ON DISCHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Yesterday the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) asked a question of me in connection with veterans' treatment allowances. I find I tabled P.C. 1/602 on February 1 of this year, and I have had the pleasure of sending a copy of that order in council to my hon. friend, with an attached memorandum. The order is not retroactive, and is effective from February 1, 1944.

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT TO BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF C.B.C.—GENERAL MANAGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I was not able to give notice to the Minister of National War Services of the question I am about to ask, but it is the kind of question, as I think will be indicated, of which notice is really not necessary. When may we expect to have an announcement respecting the other appointment to the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? A vacancy has existed there since last November. At the same time will the minister tell the house when we may expect an announcement in connection with the appointment of a general manager for the corporation? I do not like to raise these questions so often, but this broadcasting corporation is getting into a terrible state because of the delays.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, while I welcome the first question, I do not like what was added at the end of the second one, because what was said was quite unfair.

Mr. HOMUTH: No one thought the minister would.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is too bad if the minister does not like it.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Each one speaks for himself in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is right.

Mr. LaFLECHE: In regard to the question respecting the vacancy on the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I cannot say just when an announcement as to the appointment will be made. I assure the house that very careful attention is being given to the matter, and my hope is the same as that entertained by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I can answer only that it will be done as soon as possible. With respect to the appointment of a general manager, I have not yet received a recommendation from the board of governors. I know they are giving the matter careful consideration, and I hope very soon to have the recommendation in this respect.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the failure of the government to appoint a full board of governors held up the appointment of a general manager?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I cannot see that that could possibly be so.

BORDER CROSSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) felt that he was a lawbreaker because he did not have his national registration certificate. I am glad to return to my hon. friend his certificate, thus putting him in good standing in the eyes of the law and allaying any fears that he may have about being picked up by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am sure that none of us would want that to be done.

I should like to explain to the house, if I may, that an arrangement was made in June, 1943, whereby customs officers at all boundary points and Royal Canadian Mounted Police security officers at seaports collect the registration certificates of persons who are leaving Canada permanently or for more than thirty days. However, the customs officer or whoever picks up the certificate is supposed to give the person a receipt for the certificate, a sample of which I have in my hand. On the back of this receipt appear the following instructions:

> Upon returning to Canada the registrant should immediately mail this receipt to the chief registrar for Canada, national registration, Department of Labour, Ottawa, and request delivery or his or her certificate. When writing to the chief registrar please state clearly the address to which the certificate is to be sent.

In addition the traveller is given with his passport a notice explaining why the certificate is being lifted, and I hold in my hand a sample of that notice. The same information as appears on the notice given to the traveller appears on this card which is posted in the border offices. I have in my hand a copy of the card.

Mr. REID: What are the reasons for lifting the certificate?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall come to that in a minute. The notice to each traveller instructs him—I speak now of those leaving the country temporarily—to make application for the return of his certificate to the chief registrar under the national registration regulations, 1940, upon his return to Canada. All certificates are sent to the office of this official in Ottawa, and it was in that official's office that I obtained the hon. gentleman's certificate this morning.

Hon. members will understand that the collection of certificates of persons leaving Canada permanently is done as a safety measure and because such persons naturally would be in possession of better personal identification. The authority for picking up certificates of persons leaving Canada for thirty days or longer is contained in section 28 of the national registration regulations, 1940, which reads as follows:

> For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of these regulations or supplying any deficiency therein, the minister may issue such directions not inconsistent therewith as may be deemed necessary to give effect to these regulations according to their true intent and purpose and any such direction shall have the same force and effect as if enacted in these regulations.

The main reason for requesting that direction was a growing epidemic of loss of certificates by registrants and theft of certificates from them when outside of Canada, particularly Canadians visiting in the United States and merchant seamen in foreign ports, both of which are definitely dangerous in war time. Each postmaster in Canada has been notified of this arrangement and instructed to issue a temporary fourteen-day certificate to any returned registrant who applies through his office for the return of his or her certificate. From June, 1943, to date, many thousands of certificates have been picked up and returned under this procedure, with a surprisingly low minimum of complaints or trouble.

Special forms of certificates bearing a full physical description of the registrants are issued to a few officials and others whose duties may require them to leave and return to Canada several times a year. This saves them the necessity of surrendering and obtaining return of their original certificate on each such occasion. I may say that the necessity for this safety measure was thoroughly discussed by my predecessor in office and the legal assistant of the branch with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the foreign exchange control board, the chief passport officer and others before being decided upon and put into effect.

I now table the form of receipt for the certificate, the notice given to the traveller, the card posted in border point offices, and a copy of the national registration regulations of 1940, as amended to December 31, 1943.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): First of all, I should like to thank my hon. friend for the celerity with which he moved to get back my certificate. I should like to say alsc that it takes a jab in the back to get this government to move in connection with anything. I should like to make another observation. I would not like the young officer at the border to get into any trouble, but no receipt was given to me for my certificate and none of the formulae which the minister has indicated was gone through with. I doubt if the young man had been supplied with the necessary forms, but of course that is pure conjecture on my part.

This whole thing has served a useful purpose, not only for me personally but in drawing the attention of the public to the situation. I do not share the view that any great national emergency would arise through the loss of my registration certificate should it be taken into the United States. I think this is another case of over-regimentation of the civilian population of Canada by this government.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I direct a brief question to the Minister of Labour to clear up one point in connection with this matter of permits for leaving Canada? I understand the minister to say that the permits to which he refers are for thirty days and more. Will he be good enough to make sure that no officials are taking up permits for those who are leaving, perhaps just for overnight and coming back the next day? Therein lies confusion, because I have been informed that such things have happened.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to look into that.

MAJOR-GENERAL CHISHOLM

REFERENCE TO ADDRESS TO ROTARY CLUB AND TORONTO WELFARE COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) referred to a press report of a statement or an address which had been delivered in Toronto by Major-General Chisholm, director general of medical services. I regret to say that the report would seem to indicate that there was some reflection upon Canadian women in connection with the war. I took the matter up immediately with the director general of medical services and I have his statement which I should like to read to the house. It is as follows:

I regret that the remarks which I made to the Rotary Club in Toronto in a professional address last week—and representing only my own personal views—were misinterpreted as a reflection on the women of Canada.

My theme was the emotional adjustment involved in the transition from civilian to military life and vice versa. I endeavoured to trace these emotional relationships from tribal stages to modern times. It is unfortunate that certain remarks, removed from their context, conveyed impressions which would not have been conveyed had the full text of my address been quoted.

For example, the statement that "in times of stress, such as war, women became a liability" had no reference to the present situation or to the present war, but referred definitely to the women of developing tribes who were unable to fight along with their men when the tribe was threatened. This obviously has no reference to modern times wherein—in warfare as in peace—women generally are an enormous asset to society.

In so far as references to the present day are concerned, my address was an interpretation of professional findings to an intelligent lay audience. In our professional research we make careful studies and statistical records of cases investigated representing a cross section of the population. Among these are found certain abnormalities, some of which I referred to and described.

It is regretted that the specific cases referred to were given general application to all women in the published report of my address.

I was deeply concerned about this matter when it came to my attention, and I hope that this statement by General Chisholm will be accepted with the genuine regret which I know he feels that any words of his should be construed as a reflection upon our women folk.

It almost seems to be emphasizing the obvious to try to stress the value of the contribution which the women of Canada make in war, as well as in peace. But in my department we are so conscious of the devotion and the Spartan courage which the women of this country are showing in this time of stress and anxiety that this incident impels me to add a word of my own. Nobody could administer the affairs of the army without knowing that our war activities would have small chance of success if it were not for the fortitude and consecration with which the mothers and wives and sisters and sweethearts of this country encourage their men in the forces and in other tasks of war. Here is an extract from a letter written by a mother who acknowledges with thanks the Memorial Cross, which, as she says:

—I received on the anniversary of my son's death. The just pride one feels in being a Silver Cross mother does in some small measure ease the feeling of irreparable loss. David, who won the D.F.M. in November 1942, and his commission, was one of three brothers in the air force and one with the navy. One boy has been in Africa since May 1942. A daughter is with No. 15 Hospital in Africa and lately moved on. One boy is in Iceland with a coastal patrol, and one at Victoria. We are the parents of to-day who are looking to a future Canada that will justify the sacrifices being made.

The members of this house know, I am sure, that the spirit of that letter is multiplied in hundreds of thousands of cases across Canada, and I know that they will join me in this simple tribute of grateful appreciation to these noble women of ours whose inspiration challenges every man of us.

DOUKHOBORS

REQUEST FOR DEPORTATION OF SONS OF FREEDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, so that I shall not trespass on the rules of the house I wonder if I may have the consent of hon. members to preface a question to the Prime Minister with a very short statement of facts. On Sunday last, as hon. members may have noticed by the press, more than 400 Doukhobors from my district of West Kootenay staged a nude parade. Last Friday they burned a school. Two months ago they burned over $100,000 worth of government buildings. It is a way they have of emphasizing their defiance of Canadian law. Most of the older people, the men and the women, dominate and inspire and influence the younger generation to follow the traditions of this religious sect. Ever since they came to Canada in 1898, every federal government has been unable, and has had to admit the humiliation of being unable, to cope with these Doukhobors. All under forty-five years of age are Canadian citizens. Those over forty-five years of age, with the exception of a few who have been naturalized, have no claim to Canadian citizenship.

My question is this: Will the Prime Minister, through the hon. Mr. Tounkin, the Soviet ambassador to this country, endeavour to arrange with the Soviet government for participation in the deportation and settlement of these Doukhobors—that is to say, of all members of what is known as the Sons of Freedom, and of all other Doukhobors who violate Canadian laws; and will the government negotiate for the settlement of these people in any portion of the Soviet or in any one of the Soviet republics?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has just indicated, Doukhobors who are not citizens of Canada are nationals of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He has suggested that by conference with the Charge d'Affairs of the U.S.S.R. to Canada I might seek to arrange to have these nationals of the U.S.S.R. deported or repatriated to Russia. May I say to my hon. friend that the question is one of what is practicable. To-day it would not be possible to secure the means of transportation or the means of entry into Russia of Russian nationals who are residing in Canada at the present time. Some other means will have to be adopted of controlling them at least until the war is over.

COAL

REFERENCE TO PROSECUTION OF ORANGEVILLE DEALERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance based on an article appearing in the Orangeville Banner of February 10. The article states that proceedings have been taken by the Guelph branch of the wartime prices and trade board against the firm of R. D. Bryan & Co., Orangeville fuel dealers, for selling coal above the ceiling price. I quote from the article:

The evidence disclosed that the ceiling price had been broken only when the Toronto suppliers boosted their price 75 cents a ton. When this was done the Bryan Company raised its prices 50 cents a ton, thereby undertaking to absorb one-third of the price increase on its own account, but passing the other 25 cents on to its customers.

The evidence showed that as the Bryans were not importing directly, they were not receiving the dominion coal subsidy of $1.40 a ton, which would have enabled the firm to keep within the ceiling price.

It has been rumoured that the wartime prices and trade board will investigate this case. In the meantime this company, which supply sixty-five per cent of the coal used by the citizens of Orangeville, cannot operate except at a loss, and they have notified their customers and the citizens that they are forced to discontinue business. I would ask the Minister of Finance to investigate this matter immediately and avoid a possible crisis in the fuel supply of Orangeville district.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter. I am not just sure what the hon. gentleman wants done. Does he want an increase in price authorized for this company?

Mr. ROWE: The company has already been fined $50 for exceeding the ceiling selling price of coal, and without the permission of the board they cannot raise their prices. If they cannot raise their prices they cannot continue in business, which leaves the citizens of Orangeville faced with a serious fuel situation. The coal comes by truck from Toronto.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will bring the matter to the attention of the board.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I add that this is a matter of great concern to the citizens of Orangeville, and I think an investigation should be made immediately.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

INQUIRY CONCERNING THE INTERNMENT OF MR. CAMILLIEN HOUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two-Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). Has the Department of Justice received a letter, dated January 26, 1944, in which Mr. Camillien Houde requested to be released by order in council from an internment camp, in view of the fact that his internment was carried out by means of an order in council?

[Mr. Rowe.]

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the internment of Mr. Camillien Houde was not carried out by means of an order in council. I shall look over the file, in order to see whether we have received from him a letter containing such a statement, and I shall then reply to the hon. member.

WESTERN STOCK FEEDERS

QUESTION OF PRICE OFFERED TO PRODUCERS BY PACKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture relating to the present emergency with respect to fed cattle at Lethbridge which are now ready for market. What steps are being taken to prevent the producer from being compelled to sacrifice these cattle at the "below floor" price at present offered by the packers?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the provision that is made for the handling of beef cattle was arranged about a year ago. That provision is that there is a floor price under beef and a ceiling price on beef—not on cattle. The ceiling price on beef is set at one level throughout the year. The floor price varies from 2¼ cents below the ceiling price in the fall to one-quarter of a cent below in the summer. I think the variation at the present time is about three-quarters of a cent. When beef gets down to that price, the board representative of the government purchases the beef and puts it in freezers, freezes it for export to Britain. That is the present arrangement to take care of floor prices in connection with beef. Then there are certain prices which bear a proper relationship, for cattle, to that floor price of beef. My understanding is that in Alberta for about a month's time there has been difficulty in marketing one kind of fed cattle, that is cows; and my information is that there has been considerable improvement in that position recently. The immediate action taken was to examine all the cold storages across Canada that are in proper relationship to killing plants—vegetables, fruits and other commodities have been moved out of storages to take care of some millions of pounds of beef which could be put into those storages—in some of them, now, and in others, very shortly. This arrangement is intended to take care of the situation until such time as sufficient shipping can be secured with which to ship out the meat which has been accumulating in Canada. That is the provision made up to date.

SEED GRAIN

PRESS REPORT OF PROVINCIAL ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO INDEBTEDNESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture based on an announcement made in the legislature of Saskatchewan by the premier of that province. By the way, that legislature met a week ago to-day. The premier announced that the seed grain debt of the farmers in Saskatchewan in respect of grain supplied in 1938 would be reduced to the extent of forty cents per bushel, and that the debt for seed oats would be reduced by eighteen cents per bushel. He also made the statement that this was being done with the approval of the dominion government, and that any farmers who had paid for their seed grain would receive rebates on the basis of forty cents for wheat and eighteen cents for oats. I see that the Minister of Agriculture is pointing his finger at the Minister of Finance; will the Minister of Finance state what portion of this amount will be absorbed by the federal government and what part by the provincial government?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The federal government is not assuming any part of that reduction. I have not seen the statement of the Premier of Saskatchewan, and I do not know, therefore, what he said; but if there is to be a reduction, it is a reduction by the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: The premier stated definitely that the dominion government was a party to the arrangement and was assuming part of the cost. The report appears in the Regina Leader Post, which is in the reading room. I will send it to the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: He could not have said that.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, February 14, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The CHAIRMAN: Item 2, pay and allowances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We did not pass No. 1.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought there would be a misunderstanding about this. When the committee rose last night, you, Mr. Chairman, stated that the item would be carried. One of the members of our party made it very clear that we were not allowing that item to carry, and then you called it eleven o'clock. I think we had better have this matter cleared up, because there has been far too much of this "carried" business on the part of the Chair. As soon as anybody sits down, or a moment of silence intervenes, the chairman always calls "carried". It must surely be reasonable to assume that these items require a lot of discussion. My only reason for referring to this is to see if things cannot be made a little easier for the Chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The understanding is that No. 1 is not carried.

Mr. GRAYDON: No; No. 1 is not carried.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I believe I was on my feet last night at eleven o'clock when progress was reported. I was seeking an answer to a question which, I assume, I can ask to-day.

The CHAIRMAN: While I have no objection to dealing further with item No. 1, I should point out to the committee that I thought the item was carried and that the committee would agree to avoiding the repetition of the general discussion we have had. I believe even the leader of the opposition will agree with me on that score.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is on the first item that the general discussion must take place, and that general discussion is not yet completed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I call attention to the fact that only under item 1 can there be general discussion, and it is open to hon. members to ask any questions and make any speeches under this heading. When we leave No. 1 we are pinned down by the rules to concentrated discussion of the particular item. I think it is well to allow latitude on the first item.

Mr. RALSTON: I want my hon. friend to be sure about that. I think he will find that there is a place for everything, and I am sure that "civil salaries and wages" was not intended as a catch-all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That question was asked yesterday, and I understood the minister's reply was that this would be the proper item under which there would be a general discussion. I think I can find it in Hansard.

Mr. RALSTON: No, there was no suggestion of that. I did call the committee's attention to the fact that we were proceeding item by item, but that we were wandering all over the lot, on the matter of the so-called home defence army, on questions of medical treatment, and other irrelevant matters, all under this item "civil salaries and wages," although the discussion did not belong there at all. I suggest to the committee that if possible discussion be confined as much as may be to the item of "civil salaries and wages." "Pay and allowances" is the widest term, or at least as wide as any, under which almost anything can be discussed provided it has to do with the army—I mean the uniformed men.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I understood the minister to say yesterday.

Mr. RALSTON: I think "civil salaries and wages" is a limited item. One hon. member, I believe it was the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), asked why there was an increase in this item of civil salaries and wages, and I was giving an explanation about the time the committee rose.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just as we rose last evening I think the matter of depots was being discussed and the difficulties which had arisen there. I should like to ask the minister —for although it really comes under selective service it does affect the man-power of the army in the call-up under national mobilization—whether, as I understand it, men below "A" category are still being called. If those regulations are still in existence they are not in the best interests of our war effort. I know of young men who in the last two months have been called from essential occupations in production, under the National Resources Mobilization Act. If those regulations are still in effect and these call-ups are continuing, steps should be taken, if these people are in a useful occupation, to have them left there, provided they are below "A" category and cannot join active service. I would hope the practice has been discontinued, but I know it did prevail during the past few months.

While I am on my feet, I would also ask the minister what is the number of deserters from our army in Canada during the past year; also the number of draft evaders—that is, how many persons have not answered their call under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Rumcur has it that there are many thousands of men in different sections of the country who have not answered the call. I trust the minister can tell us exactly how many men there are in the different districts, or anywhere in Canada, not of "A" category, who are still being called from essential occupations to join the armed services, in which they are not rendering as important a service as they would be back on the farms or in other occupations essential to the war effort.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the first question, whether or not men in "A" category as my hon. friend calls it, are being called, I would point out that there is a difference between being called, that is to say, notified for medical examination, and being enrolled in the army. Requisitions on the Department of Labour by the Department of National Defence are for men of what would be called, under the old classification, "A" category. It may be quite possible that registrars are sending notices to men who are below that category, because they cannot of course determine the category until they come in and are medically examined; but in no cases are we accepting anyone below the equivalent of "B-1" category, which, as my hon. friend knows, is a very high physical category.

With regard to deserters, there are at the present time about 11,000 altogether. I have not the record by districts, but we are getting it. However, there seems to be about an even flow out and in in the months. For instance, in May, 1943 there were 8,958. In June there were 619 who deserted and 560 apprehended; July, 769 deserted and 546 apprehended; August, 822 deserted, 475 apprehended; September, 1,008 deserted, 699 apprehended; October, 716 deserted, and 444 apprehended; November, 913 deserted, 800 apprehended; December, 801 deserted, 316 apprehended; January, 635 deserted, 307 apprehended.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are getting ahead of you pretty fast.

Mr. RALSTON: From May there is a gain of 2,000.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Were those all in Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: They would include a few overseas. I wish to give a statement on procedure with reference to absentees and deserters:

On the eighth day of absence the officer commanding the unit issues a descriptive report, showing all details of the man, his physical description, information regarding his home address and places he is likely to visit, etc. This is circulated immediately to:

(2) Provincial and municipal police in the immediate vicinity of the soldier's unit.

(3) Active units, depots, which might be able to assist in locating the man.

(4) Civil police in the area to which the soldier may have proceeded.

(5) In the event of its being thought that he may have gone to the U.S.A., to the Military Attache Washington, D.C., who attends to circulation through the F.B.I.

(6) Provost Marshal, District Headquarters.

The return is also circulated to all district and command headquarters in Canada.

Steps Towards Apprehension

(1) Inquiries are made locally in areas to which it is thought the deserter may have proceeded.

(2) Provost personnel work in close co-operation with provincial and municipal police and the R.C.M.P.

(3) Provost companies have special apprehension squads to apprehend absentees and deserters.

(4) Provost personnel may be granted permission to wear plain clothes for the purpose of pursuing their inquiries.

(5) Where considered desirable the next-of-kin are communicated with and are informed of the consequences of continued absence, and that it will ultimately result in the stoppage of dependents' allowance and assigned pay.

Inquiry sometimes shows that a man has re-enlisted in another force, in which case consideration is given to the question of which force he shall continue to serve in.

It is impossible to detail the steps taken in each individual case, since each case presents to some extent a special problem and the answer to which is dependent on the extent to which the community can be expected to assist. The methods used in one case will not produce results in another case, and methods used in one district will not produce results in another district.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the number of absentees?

Mr. RALSTON: After eight days they are all deserters.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I asked the minister about those who had not answered the draft call. It would not include those.

Mr. RALSTON: That has nothing to do with my department.

Mr. CHURCH: There are one or two matters I want to discuss with the minister; they relate to several questions that were brought up last year. One of them has to do with the first and second items regarding pay and allowances and administration. May I refer the minister to a certain matter that came up in the British House of Commons on December 14 last, when Mr. Anthony Eden, speaking for the government on the Cairo conference, made a statement regarding the commitments of Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the United States in the Pacific in connection with Japan. He said in that debate that while the Pacific being looked upon somewhat as the territory of the United States, which had been looking after that particular work with some assistance, the Cairo conference had been attended only by Mr. Churchill, Mr. Roosevelt, and the representative of China. He emphasized that the fight with Japan was a fight to the bitter end, whatever the cost might be and however long it might take. I wonder if the people of Canada and of Great Britain and of all America are aware of what that will entail in the future, seeing that Russia is not at war with Japan and was not represented at Cairo. That is one matter which I think we should make clear to the people. We should let them know what our commitments will be as to Japan, because even if the war with Germany came to an end, there is no doubt that this other struggle will continue for a considerable time, and we are committed to it on the principle that when Britain is at war Canada is at war; and also we have separately declared war on Japan. We are therefore a belligerent so far as Japan is concerned.

Another question regarding which I should like to get some information from the minister is the matter of embarkation leave, cheaper fares and cheaper meals and berths on trains, better transportation facilities, week-ends in the camps, and the question of bonus, equality of treatment for all ranks and dependents not as a matter of charity.

With regard to the chaplain service, the Lord Archbishop of Huron, who was elected metropolitan of Ontario yesterday, Doctor Seager, made a sensible suggestion recently. At the exhibition camp in Toronto the different branches of the armed services have separate chaplains, and he suggested, as something that would make for economy, that in the larger cities the soldiers should be allowed time off on Sunday morning to attend the church of their own choice instead of one to which they are compelled to go every Sunday. Not only would it be economical but it would be satisfactory to the men themselves. I think that this suggestion should be taken into consideration in revising the regulations with regard to the chaplain service. So far as civilian status goes, the soldier loses all his rights as a citizen once he enlists in the forces. There is no doubt about that. If a soldier is killed the civil authorities cannot hold an inquest. It is prohibited. The soldier cannot even write a letter now. He has to be a major-general to write a letter or make a speech, as was shown yesterday. There seems to be one law for the private and the non-commissioned officer and another law for the other ranks. I am not criticizing the fine officer to whom I referred last night. I was not able to be here yesterday until very late and did not want to hold up the item. I wish to see the item carry. I do not desire to cast any reflection on General Chisholm. He has given his view on leave for soldiers, but he also gave his views last Christmas. He said, in the language of the children, "there ain't no Santa Claus." If he had waited two months and heard the speech from the throne he would have found there was a Santa Claus for every day of the year. I do not believe though that there should be one law for the privates and another law for the other ranks.

I believe there should be better and more holiday leaves and week-end leaves, and there should be no deduction for the time taken travelling from the training centre to the homes of the soldiers. Women are charged $2.05 to go up to Camp Borden and if they have two or three children it takes all the money that the soldier makes in a week to pay the fare. There should be some revision. The railways are making fabulous sums out of this war, and for that reason there should be some reduction in the fares charged the men. When one takes into consideration all the money they are making out of the government surely they can do something to help the soldiers in the camps across Canada. In addition to that, hospital services should be improved and better housing provided.

Mr. Morgenthau, the able treasurer of the United States, went over to Italy last month. When he came back he told a committee of congress what he found there. He said that the soldiers asked him if they were to do the fighting over there in Italy and pay for the war when they came back. He struck out a great many items for home defence. I was surprised to read in the December issue of the report of the National City bank about the huge reduction in the United States in the home defence items. Hundreds of millions of dollars were cut out of some items. Millions of dollars that appeared in the past fiscal year have not yet been spent and they have been reduced 50 per cent. I appreciate that a home defence army is sometimes necessary, but the camps are filled all over Canada. They are talking about curtailing leave, but some of them from the city of Toronto cannot get home at all as they are in camps all over Canada. A great many in the home defence army could be better employed in industry under selective service, because they are not going overseas. Most of them are unfit to go overseas. I believe there should be some reduction.

I am surprised something has not been done about the inequalities in pay. It costs a private just as much for rent, board and food as it does a junior commissioned officer or a senior officer getting $15 or $20 a day. I should think there should be some revision in so far as selective service is concerned. Nearly three years ago I sent the ministers a copy of the Sparkman bill which was introduced in Washington. My friend from Vancouver South referred to it several times last session, and has taken a great interest in it. I can find no relief along that line at all. Some of the service men will find themselves turned out of their homes on May 1, and they will not be able to get a house anywhere. I should like to see something done in regard to the housing situation in the city of Toronto. They have been successful to a certain extent in getting some of these large places converted into apartments for the Wrens and others. I see no reason therefore why the soldiers should be living under such awful conditions as those that exist there at the present time. Counsel should be provided in the law courts for those who get into trouble. I read in the press that soldiers are appearing in police courts all over the country. Nobody appears for them. An officer may say he has been a good soldier. Without hearing him at all the accused is sent down. Some of these men are in gaols in the province of Ontario that have been condemned as unfit for civilians. Why should they be used for soldiers.

I have pressed now for four years or more the matter of a national system of insurance for soldiers. If it was successful in the United States in the last war, I am sure it would be successful in Canada. If it were not for the opposition of the insurance companies I believe we would long ago have had a national system of insurance which would take care of unemployment after the war and provide some remuneration for the soldier. I brought this matter up three years ago and it was frowned on by the Minister of Finance. I have also referred to the matter of a records office. I think it is too bad that we cannot obtain from the records office the number of men who have enlisted from the different municipalities in Canada. The municipalities will require that to deal with unemployment after the war. The victory loan people can tell you how much money has been contributed daily by every municipality in Canada. Why can we not cooperate with them and have a similar system of records? I admit the minister has done some good work, but it is almost an impossible task to do it all. I admit he has made some improvement. It is too bad we cannot get this information. Soldiers from all over Canada are enlisting in the city of Toronto. When the war is over they will head for Toronto. Our military district gets no credit for it in the records. The municipal authorities are entitled to know what men have enlisted and their place of abode. How can they get that if there is no records office? There is no doubt about the contribution of Canada to the war effort, but I should like to point out that last June I asked the minister if he would give some explanation why, when General Montgomery marched across the desert to meet the American forces, there were no Canadians along with him. The minister was going to reply when the Speaker interrupted him on the orders of the day, saying that it should be put on the order paper, and it was never answered. I believe the people of Canada are entitled to have some information about the Cairo conference. This committee does not know one thing about what happened at Cairo; neither does anyone else in Canada.

Mr. Churchill made changes in British generals in the darkest hour of the war in Africa. General Wavell was transferred, General Auchinlech and General Ritchie were removed, and Generals Montgomery and Alexander were put in charge and then marched nearly 3,000 miles across the desert. There were no Canadians with him. I asked the minister where they were. Were they tied up in the old country? I do not wish to criticize the minister; far from it. I know he is a hard-working minister. I do not wish to bring into the debate anything that is not regular. I believe the people of Canada should know something about it. After all, who is paying for the war? It is the people of Canada. Why should this information be kept in the secret office of some minister and some deputy minister and not given to parliament, as in England?

I have read the debates of the British House of Commons. Last year I sent a copy of the British Hansard to the minister. Major-General Markland, V.C., had returned from the front. He criticized the government of which he is a supporter. Mr. Churchill replied the next day in the house giving a full statement of the facts. I urge the minister to take note of these matters and make a statement on them before the resolution passes. In these days the rights and privileges of the private members are curtailed, so much so that if, under the political system we have in this country, a member rises and criticizes the government, he has not much chance. He is a marked man, if he criticizes it at all, and in so far as any promotion is concerned, it is easier for a camel to get through the eye of a needle than for him to look for any relief or get any information in the house.

The minister, as I have said, is a hard-working man. I hope he will give some attention to the matters I have raised. I trust that he will give relief such as that prvoided by the Sparkman Act, which I proposed three years ago. I sent a copy of that act to the minister, and my friend from Vancouver South gave an elaborate explanation of it to the house last year.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall take into consideration what my hon. friend has said on a number of subjects. I promised him last night that I would see if I could not get him a new comparative statement with regard to pay and allowances and benefits, similar to the one which was furnished last year. I think when I do that, the matter of inequalities in pay, and some other matters to which he has referred, will perhaps appear in a form which would render discussion of them somewhat easier. We will see if inequalities still exist. I am referring my hon. friend, for the purposes of the record, to a return made to an order of the House of Commons, No. 151, dated March 26, 1942, and I would ask him if that is the form in which he wishes to have a further return and a further comparison and compilation.

My hon. friend, too, has discussed very often the matter of leave. There was one matter I promised last session to take into consideration. I have in mind the suggestion made by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) with regard to reductions in railway fares. A suggestion was made that there should be some sort of ceiling on these fares. What the hon. member probably had in mind was a zone system under which anyone moving in any part of a certain zone would pay a certain flat rate. That did not commend itself to those who were discussing the matter, because it meant that one soldier would really be paying for another soldier's fare. Perhaps I might have misunderstood her suggestion, but arising out of her representation, we have been working with the railway companies—and I cannot say more than that—on a variation of the same idea, to see if there is any possibility of establishing a ceiling for these one-third fare leaves, that is, a maximum above which no soldier would have to pay, regardless of distance. This would mean a contribution by either the railway company or the government toward making up the deficiency created by such underpayment. I say that matter is under discussion, and I may add for the benefit of the hon. member who has just spoken that that is the only thing now under discussion in connection with a reduction in railway fares.

As a matter of fact, as my hon. friend probably knows, in the United States fares are paid by the soldier. There is no contribution made by the government in respect of fares on leave warrants. We are considerably ahead of that in Canada, and I think generally speaking the system we have has worked well.

If I understood correctly my hon. friend's suggestion in respect of chaplain services, it was to the effect that instead of there being compulsory church parades the men should be allowed to attend the churches of their choice. Speaking for myself, and having regard to my experience in the last war, I am not so sure whether I would have attended church very often if left to my own volition. As a matter of fact I thought church parade was a pretty good sort of moral and disciplinary measure. At the same time I would say to him that in Toronto, and other places where there are many churches, I am sure a man would have the right to go to any church he might select, and that compulsory church parades in depots or establishments where there were large numbers of men might be held at certain stated periods. That is so in Ottawa, and I believe it is so in Toronto. Where there are church parades they are generally just Protestant or Roman Catholic parades. The different Protestant denominations do not divide up and have different parades.

The matter of housing is a bit out of my bailiwick, but I am tremendously interested in housing for soldiers' dependents. My hon. friend pointed out that the navy had such housing accommodation in Toronto. I think he must have meant the barracks on the lake shore front. In that respect the army has exactly the same sort of provision in its establishment at the Exhibition grounds, Toronto. Regarding houses for soldiers' dependents, in every case where it has been brought to the attention of the government I have endeavoured to take an interest, and I have been able to get from the wartime housing commission a certain number of houses for the use of municipalities. I refer, of course, to municipalities where wartime housing is taking place. That is the sort of municipality in which there is likely to be a scarcity of houses. We have been able to get from the commission a certain number of houses for the use of such municipalities in order that they may be put at the disposal of soldiers' dependents.

The matter of legal aid has been mentioned. May I at this point express a word of appreciation to the Canadian Bar Association for a very forward and useful step they have taken in providing legal aid for soldiers. Committees have been appointed in the larger towns, and a routine has been established whereby if a man wishes legal assistance he speaks to his commanding officer, or the officer next in charge, and the matter is looked into. Immediately he is put in touch with some member of the Canadian Bar Association who has volunteered to do that kind of work. It is something the same as legal aid which is provided in the United Kingdom.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And a very commendable step on the part of the bar association.

Mr. RALSTON: I might say—and perhaps this is an advance announcement; it has just been authorized, although I do not think it is yet in orders—that the Canadian Bar Association have offered to go further and provide legal aid for dependents as well. That offer has been accepted by the department. I would expect it to be ratified and the arrangements completed at a meeting to be held shortly by the Canadian Bar Association representatives.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister might also add, for the benefit of the public, that this is a gratuitous service offered by a profession which is often accused of being very mercenary.

Mr. RALSTON: I am glad, on behalf of my hon. friend's profession and mine, to add that word. Of course, if a millionaire were to come along and ask for legal aid, I would imagine that in such circumstances an honorarium, let us say, would be accepted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a good term.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is quite right when he says that this is a gratuitous service furnished for those who are not in a position to provide legal aid for themselves, or who do not have the money necessary for that purpose. This is done by men of standing in the profession, who give exactly the same service in these cases as they would give to their regular clients. As I say, they have been expanding, rather than contracting, in this very worthy and helpful service to men and women of the armed forces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is correct.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the soldier who is brought before a civil court have to request the military authorities for legal assistance, or is that provided under K.R. & O?

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend referring to a criminal case?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes, where a soldier gets into trouble, and is apprehended by the civil authorities.

Mr. RALSTON: The bar association provision does not deal with criminal cases.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If the soldier makes a request for legal aid, does he get it?

Mr. RALSTON: Well, I cannot tell my hon. friend there is a system in that respect. I know that in serious cases that is so. If my hon. friend is referring to the ordinary police court case, then I am not in a position to say what the situation is. I can say however that he would be provided with a soldiers' friend in the person of a member of the service who is a barrister. He would not be provided with a civilian lawyer at the expense of the government.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does he have to request that?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. In some way information would have to be given to the commanding officer that the assistance is required.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I might add a word, because in my own office I have made arrangements for assistance to soldiers in connection with court martials and charges laid in the civil courts. I understand arrangements are being completed whereby a man who needs legal assistance will get it. I refer, of course, to a man who cannot pay. I am glad to add my word of commendation to the legal profession. Many of the members of the bar who are offering their services are veterans of the last war and understand the situation very well. Although they may be busy men, they are glad to assist.

I had intended to take some part in the discussion on this resolution from the general point of view, but I regret to tell the committee that I do not feel physically capable of entering upon any extended remarks. However, there are a few specific subject matters which I wish to call to the attention of the minister and headquarters. They may require some explanation and perhaps some remedial measures or changes in the future.

There is one matter which I should like to deal with at some length if I were capable, but I just cannot do it. I refer to certain courts martial which were held in my city a few weeks ago. The minister was good enough to order that investigation at my request, but I must express surprise at the outcome. I would point out to the minister that some change is necessary in the methods adopted for the examination of men, similar to the one known to us. I am not going to mention the name of the man or of the officers or of anybody else. The fact would appear to be that there were not enough officers to go round, that the panel of doctors operating at the military district depot in question was small in number, and under the system in vogue, I believe it is called the Pulhems system, there were not enough doctors to do the necessary work.

I am afraid that in a desire to get in recruits there was not sufficient attention given to all the medical aspects of this man who had been drafted into the army. The result in the particular case was certainly disastrous. I am not going to attempt to allocate the blame, because I could not possibly read all the evidence. The sad part is that the man left no dependents, and there is no remedy in civil law, because there is no one living who sustained any damage. I suggest that if the authorities have not changed the practice and system, it should be done at once. I understand from a newspaper report that because of the incidence of the case in question the practice has been changed, and I shall look for specific improvement. This man was inducted into the army and he notified the officer he was diabetic. The officer disregarded the warning and this man was dead within thirty hours. The officer was acquitted. I am not going to refer to this again; I am not asking the minister to do anything, I am only hoping that his officers may draw a lesson from what has happened.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer briefly, and that is the withdrawal from the Canadian army overseas of some 2,000 foresters who were volunteers. The alacrity with which the young men of New Brunswick who were experienced woodsmen acceded to the call of the government to join the forestry corps reflects nothing but credit upon them. I assume that the purpose of this corps was a useful one, that they did useful work overseas and that as the war is not yet won there will be necessity still for cutting timber. This would seem to be so because a large number are still being retained on the other side at that work. I do not think we can make any other assumption.

One day last autumn the men in certain camps in Scotland were paraded—I cannot vouch for the truth of the report, but I think there is a large element of truth in it—and 2,000 of them were told they would have to come back to Canada. As I understand it, not one man wished to return to this country. However, the 2,000 men were brought to Canada in the fall of 1943 along with their full complement of officers. I suggest to the minister that no matter how meritorious or good the object of this move may have been, it has failed. There has been a useless expenditure of the taxpayers' money, and there is great dissatisfaction over what happened among the personnel. They cannot understand why 2,000 of them have been withdrawn from overseas service. They feel that if they were not required in forestry work in Scotland they could have done useful work as auxiliary troops, thus avoiding the necessity of transporting men and women from this side to do that sort of work overseas. That is one of their complaints. However, their main complaint is the manner in which they were used after they came to this country. I want to be frank with the minister and the committee and say that I have not been able to obtain corroborative evidence to support the statements contained in a communication which I received from a non-commissioned officer and from which I intend to quote. This man came back to Canada against his will. I understand he asked for and received his discharge and is now in civilian life. Unfortunately his communication came to me while I was absent from home and I did not see it until the end of January. On December 27 he wrote me, approaching me as the representative of the constituency of York-Sunbury; I received his communication in that capacity and I now present his position to the committee. This is what he said in the opening paragraph:

As the representative for York-Sunbury I would like to draw to your attention some of the salient facts re the return of a part of the Canadian forestry corps to Canada. To my mind, and I have every reason to believe that this is the opinion of a great majority of the men, we have been given a deal since returning to Canada that the citizens of this country should know about, so that in future men returning to Canada will be used as men who volunteered and went overseas to do their humble part have the right to expect, and which we are sure the vast majority of our citizens expect them to have.

I approach the consideration of this matter on the basis of this man's declaration that they had not been used properly on their return to this country. I continue:

We landed in Canada in October after a good trip, with good food, and so forth, aboard ship. We were entrained for Debert camp. We arrived there around six thirty in the evening to find cold huts, no hot water in the huts and no rations drawn. Mind you, sir, this is a body of nearly two thousand men without rations.

Just imagine that situation!

After a time blankets were drawn and men were detailed—

Mind you, this zombie army in Canada was detailed to have this camp ready for these hungry men coming from an eastern Canadian port late in the day, and when the men came in to the camp they found it cold and empty.

After a time blankets were drawn; men detailed to get fires going. About nine o'clock we were told supper was ready. Personally I did not go to the mess hall, as like many more the inner man called long before this and I had gone to the war services canteen and had a good lunch. I might just mention here that officers had to eat there as well as on the first night.

Of course I do not think that hurt the officers a bit.

We had been split up in strange companies overseas and were more or less unacquainted with the personnel of our company.

He just mentions that in passing.

We were there from Tuesday until Saturday night. During Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday it was as near a mob as one could ever hope to see.

I can visualize the situation of these men, and I call the minister's attention to this:

First you would be called for a parade. No sooner on parade than ordered to return to your huts for further orders. And so it continued the whole time. They were at that time trying to get us broken down from companies to our military district depots. As an example, No. 7 district depot was called to parade at 7 a.m. in the drill hall with our blankets to turn in. We were then very much in the way of the various district depots west of military district No. 7. However, by moving us from one corner to another many times the other districts got formed up and moved out; this was around 12.00 noon. We were told then to break off and return at 1 p.m., which we did. From 1 p.m. till 3.30 p.m. we did get our blankets turned in and formed up in formation. We were to move off that evening.

I suggest that there was very bad management on the part of those administering this dispersal.

I have cited this one instance, which is true and can be verified by any man there, as an example of the start we made in Canada. Also to just let you think how the men were feeling after four days of absolute inefficiency from start to finish.

That is the charge of this non-commissioned officer.

Through it all the men were remarkably well behaved and they had far more than their share of grievances.

And now for a brighter side of the picture. We left Debert on Saturday night between 8 and 9 o'clock after four hungry days. We left, I might add, with no regrets, and with a feeling of being badly let down by the powers that be.

We arrived in Fredericton the next morning, and this was a treat; for we were taken right to the depot, given a good breakfast, and by 8.30 a.m. they had us on first parade. From that until 3.30 p.m. we went through the various branches, medical, pay, quartermaster, etc., were given our fourteen day leave and any that could got to their homes that day. Personally my pride returned a good deal to see at least our own depot handled in such a highly efficient manner.

I pause here to say to the minister that I believe the administration officer at No. 7 depot, Fredericton, is a first-class administration officer. I have heard no complaints about him. I believe he endeavours to do his level best under circumstances that at times may be very difficult and trying, and I have never heard any complaint against him. I am glad to pay him that tribute.

On our return from leave, we were in Fredericton a week and each day made us forget Debert and appreciate district depot No. 7. We were informed we were going to Sussex, which we did on November 15.

I suppose this is all military routine, but just mark this. In order to get to Fredericton they would have to go through Sussex. Now if they were going to Sussex for dispersal, one would think the business-like thing to do would be to stop at Sussex instead of going on through Sussex to Fredericton and then being brought back to Sussex again. That would have meant a considerable saving of money. He goes on; speaking of the camp at Sussex:

The camp was ready and rations drawn. But imagine our surprise to find not only the maritime and Quebec men there but some from as far west as Winnipeg. Altogether there were between 700 and 800 men.

I call the minister's particular attention to this next statement:

The next morning we were called together and an unsigned document was read to us. I enclose this unsigned document minus paragraphs 6 and 7.

My curiosity is piqued as to what paragraphs 6 and 7 were. I have before me a copy of this unsigned document. It is headed "General Information," and reads:

You have been returned to Canada to assist in increasing the production and export to the United Kingdom of vitally needed lumber.

2. It is the belief of the government departments concerned that you can probably make the best contribution by returning to lumbering operations, with civilian firms.

Very good. If the conditions were right, that was a proper objective, assuming that the men were needed in Canada.

3. You may apply for and receive leave of absence without pay—to be known as "forestry leave." If you do this you will have to proceed to such lumbering operations as national selective service officials may direct. National selective service will explain conditions of pay and employment to you and will give consideration to placing you with your former employer, if you so desire, or in the locality for which you express a preference. You will understand that this will not be possible in every case. They will endeavour to secure the most favourable conditions of employment for you.

4. If you accept forestry leave you remain on the strength of the army but return to work on a temporary civilian basis, taking your own chances in regard to earnings.

Note that, please.

You will be given an initial free outfit of outer clothing and footwear as required by your employment. You will, while on such leave cease to draw any army pay and allowances (including dependents' allowance).

Note that. These men are still in the army, but at the same time they are not in the army. They must take their chances. They are brought back to help the war effort as soldiers. That is my appreciation of the situation, and if I am wrong the minister will correct me. I am simply giving my own interpretation of the position. They are brought back as soldiers, as enlisted volunteers—not draftees, remember—to assist in a vital war effort. But then the army tells them: While you are in the army you will return to work on a temporary civilian basis, taking your own chances in regard to earnings, and you will be given thus and so.

Mr. RALSTON: If you ask for leave.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what it says in the "General Information."

Mr. RALSTON: I know, but you are not in the army if you ask for leave out of the army and you get civilian pay.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But they were brought back to produce lumber as part of the war effort. This is one of the things they complain of. They say this was done under false pretences.

Mr. LOCKHART: How does the man's family live until he draws his first civilian pay?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know. I do not want to get into a row about this thing, and I do not want to be too harsh or rough in my judgment. I am going to leave it to the minister to straighten it out. It goes on:

You will while on such leave cease to draw any army pay and allowances (including dependents' allowance). You will not be eligible for army medical or dental treatment. You will not be eligible for any army pension if killed or incapacitated. You will, however, be subject to the provisions of any provincial compensation act which may apply to your employment.

No thanks to the army for that, because the civilian laws provide for it.

You will have the right to apply for cancellation of your forestry leave to return to army employment.

That, of course, is quite proper.

If you take this you will be placed on such duties as your commanding officer may order.

I ask the minister if that statement which this man says was read to them was put out by the army and under army orders. Then I ask him to read to the committee, or hand to me to be read, sections 6 and 7, which this unsigned document contained but which my correspondent did not enclose to me. I have no doubt what was in it.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the date of the circular?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no date on it; but it was read to them. What I have is a mimeographed copy of a typewritten document, with no date on it, headed "General Information," read to these men on parade at camp Sussex the morning after they arrived, which, I gathered from this letter would be November 16. This is his observation with regard to paragraphs 6 and 7:

It appears that paragraphs 6 and 7 must have been too unwholesome even for an unsigned document.

Well, that is his observation.

Mr. RALSTON: Your correspondent is saying that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Well, we went to the selective service men. They were only interested in the lumbering industry and of course had no instructions at that time to handle other occupations. Of course, all forestry leave forms and conditions will be procurable for you if you wish to look into the matter.

I have not had an opportunity to do that, and I have not done it.

Things went on like this for several days, with men applying for leave and getting it for lumbering. There were many who wanted to get back to other lines of work—mining, fishing, farming, railroading, etc.

I believe this man is a railroad man.

After a time selective service was allowed to place miners and farmers. Then along came our army examiners for our "M" test and interview—

I believe that is an intelligence test, is it not?

—which many of us had in Scotland. The examiner told us the papers had been lost, so our intelligence was to be tested again. They worked hard and rushed us through, gave us all a very cheerful story and led us to believe we would soon be placed where we wanted to go and were needed the worst. As the returns came back, drafts started moving to their various depots. Hopes were high that we would all be in our depots before Christmas, so as to have Christmas or New Year's at home.

Some of these men have been overseas since the very start of the forestry corps, which, I believe was early in 1940, or perhaps before.

When we were reduced to a mere handful of men—

This is still at camp Sussex.

—we were told some had to remain and furnish a guard for the camp during the holiday season. Two N.C.O.'s and twenty-four other ranks were attached to No. 6 employment company for this purpose.

I call attention to the next paragraph:

We all agree and know that duties must continue at all times. What we cannot understand is why we are chosen on our return—

And I interpolate this—after four years overseas—

—for this, as there is a battalion of trainees here, namely the Edmonton Fusiliers.

These men, I understand, were trainees called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and were not going overseas unless they volunteered.

The men think, and not without good reasons, that it is a rank bit of discrimination as between the volunteers returning and the men drafted for home service only.

These men were obliged to perform in the holiday season the camp duty, and there was a battalion of draftees in the same camp.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Had they had a leave home by that time?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, they got their first fourteen days. But this was the Christmas holiday. These men were waiting to be placed by national selective service or to be allowed to withdraw from the army, get their discharges and go to their civilian occupations. I suppose that that was the worst insult of all. I really think that that was the greatest degradation to which these men felt that they could be submitted, that they would have to do fatigue duty—if that is the right term—in that camp, of which these draftees, who were going to do nothing but train, train, train, were relieved. I realize this is a very touchy subject, but it has been hidden all too long and might just as well be cleared up now. It shows the temper of these men who are volunteers with respect to those who are not, and I believe the minister should take note of that. Then I call his attention to the next paragraph:

For as sure as the sun rises, on the ending of this war and the return of our fighters from the various services, it has got to be faced. . . . I realize that some of the complaints may seem trivial to a civilian, but a continuous stream of these small things day after day soon builds up to things which are far from trivial. There are instances, sir, by the score I could cite you. However, I hope to be able to call on you before you go to Ottawa, if you care to have any more details.

I did not get this in time to see the writer. I knew him in civilian life before he enlisted.

He realizes that he may be assuming some responsibility in making the statements contained in this letter. In the latter part of it he says:

> I fully realize I am leaving myself open in writing you this, but if it is necessary to tell your source of information I am perfectly willing that you use my name, if in doing so it will clear up what will soon be a very serious situation.

And he signs his name.

Mr. RALSTON: He is a non-commissioned officer, not an officer?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was a non-commissioned officer. I understand he got his discharge subsequently and is now back in civilian service. I hope he is immune to the wrath of the powers that be, because if he is still in the army he might still have cause to fear it.

Mr. RALSTON: Their wrath is not half as great as the wrath of my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will say that it is simulated to quite a large extent. I am going to hand this letter to the minister. It will have served a good purpose if I have called his attention to the serious implications underlying it as to the treatment of returned men by his department, and in particular, the treatment of this large group of returned men who did not want to come back at all. I think the minister knows that; if he does not he is hearing it now.

A delegation consisting of a number of officers from this group came to see me. They are still kicking their heels around the district depot. They are all young men. One of them is a civil engineer, and I am in high hopes that he will be transferred to the pioneers, because he is capable and he certainly would be an efficient young officer in the engineers. If there are to be promotions I suggest to headquarters that they could usefully employ him because he has had experience. Other fellows are waiting to be placed and have not been placed. At any rate, the rank and file of these men think they have a grievance and many of them have. The worst thing, I think, was the failure of the administrative authorities in military district No. 6 to provide for their reception at Debert. It seems to me that is inexcusable. There may be an answer; I do not know. You ask men to come home—what a homecoming for 2,000 men. They come ashore looking forward to some days' leave and are put in a cold camp without rations or blankets for four days. They got the blankets and rations, of course, but there was, as he said, the best exhibition of a mob for four days.

Somebody is to blame. I do not say it is the minister; not at all. He is only the spokesman for the department and the person to whom I am making these representations in the hope that the administrative staff in Halifax will be put on the carpet for this. They are the people I am gunning for, if I may put it that way. I do not know who they are and I do not care.

The minister ought to have occasional shake-ups in the administrative staffs, and I would like to be taken as saying that I do not think that applies to our district depot; for I have given myself a certificate of character. And Colonel MacDougall, by the way, is not a supporter of mine.

Mr. BRUCE: In spite of that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In spite of that. There are some good ones, you know. He is a very decent man, I think, and has had wide administrative experience both in the last war and in this. I hope I have not been too severe in putting forward this case, but I know this man. I have faith that he is telling the truth. I have not had the privilege of an interview with him since this letter came, and I am going to send the letter to the minister and ask him to do what he has been good enough to do for me on more than one occasion—to have an investigation made into such complaints in the hope that there will be no repetition of this sort of thing, in the hope that those who are responsible for inefficiency are dealt with. I was going to say brass hats, but I will not say that. You know, it is fashionable to throw mud at the general staff, but I do not believe in that. They are doing the duty that is assigned to them and many of them are very efficient. I must pay a tribute to the courtesy with which they have always received me on any occasion I had to go to them, not for my own purposes, but on behalf of anyone who has written to me. I am not throwing mud at the general staff, but I think there are occasions when it would be well for the minister to know that there are charges of inefficiency in the administration of his far-flung department, and in his heart I know he would be glad to have representations made to him if based on proper evidence or allegations, so that he can shake up the administration.

Whatever you may say about the Hong Kong investigation, I notice that the minister did shake up some of these departments, and there were people who took their departure from headquarters. Perhaps there are others who should do likewise in consequence of the same thing. That was one thing that came out of the Hong Kong investigation.

The minister said his department was never static. I hope that has been true at all times, but I notice that they move more quickly when something happens to arouse their attention. That may be a blessing in disguise. I make this submission to the minister, and I do not think he should be called upon to reply now, but I would ask him to investigate the matter. I do not want to give it further publicity but I ought to call attention to it. I think the state of inefficiency that is exhibited there is inexcusable, and the manner in which the men were handled when they got to Sussex is more or less inexcusable.

I would like to know what the attitude of the department was towards bringing these men back to Canada. For, believe me, not one of them wanted to come back to Canada. Whether they were right in that point of view I do not know. They were soldiers and had to obey orders. I believe they were represented as volunteering to come home; I understand they were asked if they would like to come. I tell you that there was nothing voluntary about it. They were paraded and they had to come home even under the guise of volunteering. That is what has been reported to me, and I do not want anyone from headquarters to say that these men all voluntarily came home, because I think that is far from the truth.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend was good enough to say that I could leave the matter until after making further investigation—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely.

Mr. RALSTON:—and I shall have to do that in connection with two or three matters, particularly of administration. I do want to tell the committee, however, what the situation was with respect to the return of that corps and its employment here. The return of approximately 2,000 men of the Canadian Forestry Corps in the fall of 1943 was the result of communications between the ministry of supply in Great Britain and the ministry of munitions and supply here and the Department of National Defence. The question was where the most timber could be produced. Up to the early summer of 1943 the situation had been that it was better to produce timber in the United Kingdom even though it could not be produced at the same rate, since the stands were very much smaller there than in Canada, particularly on our west coast. It was felt better to produce the timber there and save the shipping that would be required in taking Canadian timber over. It was realized, however, that the operation was not altogether, shall I say, commercially and economically sound because of the small size of the timber there and the smaller number of superficial feet which were produced per head under those conditions. Munitions and Supply here considered that the timber supply in Canada required a substantially increased output and they asked that the members of the Canadian Forestry Corps be returned for that purpose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was Munitions and Supply?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. The matter was taken up with the appropriate authorities in the United Kingdom, the department of supply there, and it was agreed that this could be done on the condition of fixing a certain number of tons. The timber was counted in tons, as members of the committee know, and it was agreed that a certain number of tons per year should be fixed as the minimum which they hoped Canada could produce. It was under those circumstances that the Department of National Defence expressed willingness to bring back 2,000 men of the Canadian Forestry Corps for the purpose of cutting timber here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I admit that no complaint could be found with that. I admit that right off.

Mr. RALSTON: We realized from the start that there would be difficulty in connection with employing these men and we tried to give them notice well ahead. I am interested in what my hon. friend says with regard to the men being paraded overseas. I know exactly where they were. Several hon. members have visited them over there, and I must confess that I do not think I would like to leave that particular spot myself, because it is a very attractive place.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister say whether bushmen were picked out?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is anticipating me; however, I can answer the question now. As my hon. friend knows, in these forestry companies there is a considerable percentage of tradesmen, mechanics. These men are used for the purpose of handling not only the saws and machinery but the mechanized transport. I have seen them in the lumbering operations in the United Kingdom. They were employing what, in the presence of some hon. members from British Columbia, I would call the high-line system of lumbering. We do not know very much about that in the east. It is used particularly in connection with larger timber. They had the very best equipment possible. There were a certain number of tradesmen among the men who came here; whether they volunteered to come, as my hon. friend points out, or whether they were ordered, I am not able to say at the moment. A large percentage of the men who came here were general duty personnel.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): General duty men.

Mr. RALSTON: General duty men who were not tradesmen in the sense in which one refers to a motor mechanic or a sawyer, for instance, as a tradesman. There was a larger percentage of general duty men than of tradesmen. I do not know whether these men were asked to volunteer to come or not. There was no reason under the terms of their service to ask them to volunteer to come home any more than there would be a reason for asking the men in England to volunteer to go to Italy; that is to say, an order would be issued stating that this was the place to go. They enlisted in the Canadian army for general service. They were put in the forestry corps because they were especially useful there. I cannot tell the committee at this stage whether or not the order was given that they come or whatever attention was paid to the desire of the particular individual. I have an idea that probably an attempt was made to find out whether the men wanted to go or not, and to let those go who would like to go, but I would not want to take issue with a member of the contingent. I would expect there would be a certain number in the group who would welcome the opportunity to come back to Canada. That was the situation, and that was the purpose for which they came.

With regard to the reception at Debert, all I can say to my hon. friend at this stage is—and I do not want this to be understood as the last word—that what he says sounds to me like bad staff work. There is usually something to be said on the other side. I happen to know the commanding officer of that particular camp, and I would want to reserve judgment until I had an investigation made, which I assure my hon. friend will be made very quickly. I have the documents before me. These men arrived on October 19, and the next morning at least this attention was paid to them. They had not just simply a camp staff there. They had a fairly sizable staff. The director of administration there, also, was Major D. Drummond; Major C. L. Code, of the directorate of organization; Mr. E. K. Marsh, of the Department of Labour; Mr. F. E. Hall, of the Department of Munitions and Supply, with ten trained civilian interviewers assisted by unit officers who interviewed all the men there before they were dispatched to the depots for disembarkation leave. That sounds as if some attention was paid to the welfare of these men and that a businesslike attempt was made to find out where they fitted into Canada's lumbering economy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the point at issue. The point at issue is their physical comfort.

Mr. RALSTON: I say that was the next morning. Whether or not they had blankets as soon as they arrived or whether they had to get them, I do not know; whether rations were drawn or not is another question. I can hardly credit the statement which is made that rations were not drawn for these men because they would be at Halifax and notice would be given by M.D. No. 6, to the army service corps, and rations should have been drawn for them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They should have been ready.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall reserve judgment on that. Next morning, as I say, these men were brought in for the purpose of interview. The gentleman who writes the letter speaks of there being a mob. There again I cannot conceive of Brigadier Colquhoun, who was in charge of the camp there, permitting any kind of mob.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He says it was as near to a mob as one could ever hope to see.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot conceive Brigadier Colquhoun permitting any sort of mob in the camp. I know Brigadier Colquhoun quite well. He has had service overseas in this war as well as in the last. Brigadier Colquhoun is in charge of the training brigade at the present time and was previously in charge of a brigade out west. I am not going to say that it did not take place. As I say, I reserve judgment. Then the men received disembarkation leave; that is to say, every man from Debert went to his depot, that is, the depot in his home district from which he took leave. That was the reason why the New Brunswick boys would go to Fredericton and go out from the depot there. Their leave would be properly noted on their documents there and the railway warrants would be given them to go to their homes, wherever they may be. They received fourteen days' leave and then they came back. The New Brunswick boys would go to Sussex. The other boys would go to their own particular concentration centres. As I remember it, the arrangement was that there were two concentrations. There was one at Sussex for the men from the east, and one at Camrose, Alberta, for the men from the west. Here is where the trouble arose.

The Canadian army could detail these men for lumbering by companies just as it did in the United Kingdom. They could form any special units they desired. The Canadian army took that authority under an order in council which was passed for that purpose. As a matter of fact, they did not need any order in council at all. What was wanted by the operators in the west, and the eastern operators fell in with them, was that these men would go to them as civilians, work at the same job they had worked at before and be paid civilian pay.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister a question right there. Was it not first suggested by the lumber operators in eastern Canada that they should take these men as army men and pay all that the army had paid them and all the collateral benefits, and that they refused? They simply would not take them under these circumstances.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall come to that. That was the net result in the east and the west, as a matter of fact. The army was prepared to detail these men to go into these different companies and operate in the woods. The instructions to the district were prepared by the Department of National Defence providing for the detailing of soldiers on forestry duty. The plan was not put into effect because of objections raised by the Department of Labour and the British Columbia operators. Representatives of the British Columbia operators informed the interdepartmental committee, that is a committee consisting of Labour, National Defence and Munitions and Supply and a representative of the timber controller—that union activities in British Columbia logging camps made it impossible for them to accept soldiers detailed as such for duty in British Columbia. The only way they could accept soldiers was by their applying for and being granted leave of absence without pay and allowances, the soldiers to receive the same rate of wages as civilians.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister interpret that to mean that the unions refused to work with men in uniform?

Mr. RALSTON: I am reading what I have here. As a matter of fact, I was overseas at the time this took place. I understand that it does not mean that the unions refused to work with men in uniform but that the unions were complaining that men in uniform were receiving pay for certain work at a different rate of pay compared with the rates being paid to the civilian operator. The Department of Labour concurred in this view. It was pointed out by the representatives of the Department of Labour that to detail soldiers for duty in eastern Canada on soldiers' pay and allowances would probably cause dissatisfaction among civilian woods workers because the earnings of civilian workers, generally speaking, were, it was said, less than the pay and allowances of a soldier.

The timber controller expressed himself on various occasions as being in favour of employing forestry corps personnel only on a leave without pay and allowances basis, employed as individuals in existing logging camps, and paid by the operators at the same rate as civilians.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister a question right there. Why were these things not all threshed out before the country went to the expense of bringing these men out?

Mr. RALSTON: Because of the fact—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They did not give any consideration to that situation at all?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, consideration was given—there were communications between the departments, and it was expected that this could be arranged so that these men could be detailed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not with the operators, anyway.

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking now of the timber controller of the Department of Munitions and Supply. I am not blaming them but we all assumed it could be worked out. The result was, as I say, that it meant that the way to employ these men was by giving them leave.

My hon. friend suggests that these men were hurt. A lot of men wanted to do things other than taking leave for the purpose of working in the woods.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true, and they did not like the conditions.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. These were the alternatives for the men:

(a) Forestry leave for all wishing same;
(b) Men of suitable rank, age and Pulhems profile for overseas service in another arm to be given opportunity to transfer;
(c) Veterans of 1914-18 to have the privilege of transferring to veterans' guard of Canada;
(d) Coal-mining leave under existing regulations to those eligible;
(e) Compassionate farm leave under R.O. 3456 to those eligible;
(f) Any other type of leave without pay and allowances to those eligible, under existing regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does that include? Does that allow a man to go back to his former civilian occupation?

Mr. RALSTON: No; that refers to compassionate leave. But sometimes there are special types. There was some leave for mining.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And railways.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, and for railways. Then it continues:

(g) Opportunity for trades training to those suitable and selected and transfer to appropriate corps;

(h) Authority for discharge of personnel whose Pulhems profile was lower than 2 and who were not specially required in the army by reason of technical military or trades qualifications;

(i) Personnel returning from forestry leave eligible to take advantage of alternatives (a) to (h).

Those were the instructions given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The instructions from headquarters?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was that read to the men on parade?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure that it was told to them, and that the men were given that option.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, what about this thing I have here?

Mr. BOUCHER: What is the number of discharges?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall give the disposition of the whole force. The movement of personnel from Camrose to Vancouver commenced. The above alternatives were also extended to permit transfer to vacancies in operational units or home war establishments, provided an equivalent number are thereby released to the reinforcement stream. The total of other ranks returned to Canada was 1,905. Those who took the leave to go into a civilian occupation under the terms set out in the general instruction which my hon. friend read numbered 558.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): About 25 per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. Those who were granted forestry leave numbered 558, and those granted compassionate farm leave numbered 6. The complete table showing the disposal made is as follows:

Total other ranks returned to Canada...	1,905
Granted forestry leave.....	558
Granted compassionate farm leave.....	6
Granted coal-mining leave.....	1
Transferred to other arms as reinforcements	233
Transferred to veterans' guard of Canada	14
Transferred to district depots—
Pulhems 1 and 2 for absorption with operational units or H.W.E.'s.....	255
Pulhems 3 and 4 for employment if available; otherwise discharge.....	692
Pulhems 5 for discharge.....	31
Retained at depots following disembarkation leave for medical and other reasons and not dispatched to concentration points	115

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many went into the bush?

Mr. RALSTON: There were 558.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Twenty-five per cent out of the total achieved the objective.

Mr. RALSTON: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is pretty small.

Mr. RALSTON: They were granted forestry leave. I am saying to my hon. friend only this, that that is not the fault of the army. It is the fault of the civilian situation, whereby these men were not allowed to work in forestry corps units.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will say it is a combination of circumstances.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, it is a combination of circumstances.

Mr. WHITE: How many of these men have since returned to the army and are no longer in the bush?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot say.

Mr. WHITE: Does the minister not know how many of them have returned to the army?

Mr. RALSTON: No, I do not know that.

Mr. GILLIS: Was not the fact that most of these men did not go into the bush the result of financial considerations?

Mr. RALSTON: What was the hon. member's question?

Mr. GILLIS: I remember reading a press dispatch only a few days ago to the effect that members of the forestry corps returning to western Canada refused to go into the bush at $5.50 a day, because they considered they were better off financially.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They might be.

Mr. GILLIS: With their pay and allowances, and so on. I believe most of the friction developed along those lines. However, I would ask the minister to comment on that situation. What actually happened in British Columbia when the forestry corps refused to go into the woods was that they were lowering their income. Is that true, or is it not?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what the reason was. I was not here, and I have not heard the reasons. All I can say to my hon. friend is that if they stayed in the army they could not be used as forestry corps in Canada under the labour conditions I have spoken of which existed in the camps in British Columbia and eastern Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: As I understand it, taking their discharge from the army, and going into the woods—

Mr. RALSTON: They did not take their discharge; they got leave.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is correct; they just got leave.

Mr. GILLIS: Coming within the tax structure, and so on, meant that even when receiving $5.50 a day, that amount when compared with their army pay worked out to a point where it was indicated that they were worse off than they would be in the armed service. I understand that was the basis of the friction in British Columbia.

Mr. RALSTON: There was no friction in British Columbia so far as the men in the army were concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not blaming these men for not going into a civilian occupation. The army was giving them the opportunity, and that was all there was to it. The army expected they would be used as they had been used in England, as a forestry corps. Conditions in the camps on the Pacific coast and the eastern coast prevented that.

Mr. ROWE: They were all working in the bush in the old country?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. They were all in the forestry corps. Of course when my hon. friend refers to the bush, I must explain that some were in mills and some were in other operations connected with lumbering.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. ROWE: But they were all producing timber in the old country?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Was that situation not investigated before they were brought back?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure it was investigated by the timber controller, and by the Department of Labour. They had from us the information as to what would be done with them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And their objective failed

Mr. NICHOLSON: Was consideration given to having the men work in the bush on army pay, as in the old country? What consideration was given to that?

Mr. RALSTON: Full consideration. As I have said, the Department of National Defence were not only willing, but were really in favour of doing it. However, that was prevented because in the camps in the west and in the east the operators found they could not allow army personnel to take employment side by side with civilian personnel. As a matter of fact, I think the suggestion was made that they should use some of the camps exclusively for army personnel. Apparently that was not practical or possible.

Mr. ROWE: The final result, then, is that we actually lost about seventy-five per cent of the efficiency of that group of men, so far as the main purpose of increasing empire timber production was concerned.

Mr. RALSTON: No; there were 558 on forestry leave, 233 were reinforcements and sixty-nine who may be employed in forestry, if we have a place to employ them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be interesting to know how many of those 558 are still in the bush. I bet more than half of them are out of the bush.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not betting, or taking bets, because I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Neither am I, but I make a wager once in a while.

Mr. RALSTON: These are the figures given me. Let us understand that these men are not lost to the man-power of Canada because they do not happen to be working in forestry.

Mr. ROWE: But they are lost to forestry production, and that was the main purpose of the change. And we have no assurance that the 558 are still in the bush.

Mr. RALSTON: I have no such assurance. But do not blame me, because it is not my fault.

Mr. ROWE: I am not blaming the minister. But the plan fell down, in the production of empire forest products, products which were so necessary for an all-out war effort. It was so important that the 2,000 had to be brought back from the old country. We now find that only a quarter of them went into the bush, and the rumour that is current in forestry circles is that only about a quarter of that quarter is still in the bush.

Mr. RALSTON: They are there for the operators to take, if they wish to take them.

Mr. ROWE: The operators have refused.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not the army's fault that they were not in the woods, if the operators will not take them. The army will produce them, but the operators will not take them. They will take them only in civilian clothes, but they will not take them as the army details them.

Mr. ROWE: They have been offered?

Mr. RALSTON: The army has offered to detail these men to timbering operations, but the operators have refused them unless they are civilians.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The argument advanced by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) expresses the opinion of some of the forestry men from my area who have returned. It seems to me that if the shortage of lumber was so serious in Canada to warrant bringing two thousand men back, plans should have been made to see that those two thousand men would go into the production of lumber under army pay and instructions. It seems a pity that only 525 are now engaged in the work for which these men volunteered and that seventy-five per cent of them are not doing the work they wanted to do when they volunteered for service.

Mr. RALSTON: It certainly is a pity, but if they will not let them work it out, that blocks the use of them.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is the minister telling us that the lumber operators rather than the government determine where the soldiers shall be used?

Mr. RALSTON: Not at all.

An hon. MEMBER: Labour unions.

Mr. WHITE: Has the minister any knowledge or record of the rates or scale of wages paid to these men, on either the east or west coast? A number went to the Timagami district in Ontario.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not that information.

Mr. WHITE: Can the minister get the information so that the committee may know the approximate pay that these men receive?

Mr. RALSTON: I will get it from the Department of Labour because that is not in my department. These men are on leave and are working for civilian pay. I say with great respect that I do not think I should be asked to go around to all the lumber camps to get these rates of pay.

Mr. WHITE: I understand that a number of these men went to the Timagami district and were given the opportunity to return to the army. A large number have returned. Perhaps the minister can tell us how many of these 558 men have returned to the army.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend asked that some time ago and I made a note of it.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister would help us a great deal if he would give us more details about the plan by which men can leave the army, apparently on indefinite leave, in order to work in industry. There are not only the men in the lumbering industry, there are men who have gone into mining, and I have also heard of men from the forces who have gone into the shipyards. Apparently men are going from both the Canadian active army and the group of men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Would the minister give us the number from each of these two armies and also in what industries these men are working? What arrangements are made for getting them back, or are they to remain there permanently?

Mr. RALSTON: The order in council is P.C. 8197, which I have not with me. This authorizes personnel to be detailed for duty or granted forestry leave. I shall have to get the other orders in council with regard to coal-mining leave and other leaves. Perhaps I can give my hon. friend the general details with regard to forestry leave.

Provision is made for grant of leave to personnel of the Canadian forestry corps returned from overseas to return to the lumbering industry for the purpose of increasing the production of Canadian lumber for export to the United Kingdom. The officer commanding No. 1 district headquarters, Canadian forestry corps, and the district officers commanding were authorized to grant such leave for a period not exceeding six months. The same officers may renew such leave for further periods of six months. Leave granted is without pay and allowances of any kind or medical treatment at public expense.

With regard to coal-mining leave, leave may be granted to coal miners for the purpose of resuming employment in the coal-mining industry. Personnel granted leave must be employed in the actual production of coal; that is, from face to pithead. Leave may be granted for a period of six months and is renewable for such periods of three months as may be considered advisable. This leave is granted on the authority of national defence headquarters and is without pay and allowances of any kind or medical treatment at public expense.

Provision is made under another order for the return of men to the lumbering industry. Soldiers who are skilled loggers and have had experience in the province of British Columbia may be given leave of absence to return to the lumbering industry in British Columbia. This leave is without pay and allowances of any kind or medical treatment at public expense and is granted on the authority of the general officer commanding in chief or the district officer commanding. Leave may be granted for a period of six months and may be renewed for such periods not exceeding six months as may be considered advisable.

Then there is another provision with regard to leave for the purpose of returning to industry. Application for return of a soldier to war industry must be originated by the employer, who will submit application to the officer commanding the unit in which the soldier is serving. The officer commanding the unit will forward application, together with his recommendation, to the general officer commanding in chief or the district officer commanding, who will submit same to national selective service mobilization board with such recommendations or representations as they may consider necessary. When the board recommends that leave be granted, the general officer commanding in chief or the district officer commanding may grant leave.

In the event that the general officer commanding in chief or the district officer commanding does not concur in the recommendation of the board, the application will be referred to national defence headquarters for decision. Leave granted is without pay and allowances of any kind or medical treatment at public expense and will in no case exceed six months. Renewal may be granted by the general officer commanding in chief or the district officer commanding after the case has been reviewed by the board.

As my hon. friend knows, the other leaves are compassionate farm leave, compassionate leave without pay, compassionate leave with pay, disembarkation leave, embarkation leave and ordinary leave and furlough. I have not given my hon. friend the number on leave, but I shall endeavour to get that.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. GREEN: Do those rules apply both to men in the active army and men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

Mr. RALSTON: I think there is some provision with regard to detailing men for farm leave that provides that only men under the N.R.M.A. may be so detailed.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any provision whereby a man in eastern Canada who is called up under the N.R.M.A. can be sent to the Pacific coast to work in the shipyards? I believe that has been done.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot remember because there are so many regulations. I do know that there is a provision for detailing men for railway work and perhaps there is a similar provision for war industry. I shall have that looked up. That is not leave really; it is detailed for duty.

Mr. GREEN: What is the provision in connection with the men who work on the railways?

Mr. RALSTON: They are detailed for duty; it is not leave. I am sorry I have not the order in council if there is one under which provision is made for detailing men to the shipyards. I shall have that looked up to see just what the provision is. The aggregate number of these extended leaves, as I indicated yesterday, is something like 8,000.

Mr. GREEN: How many are N.R.M.A. men?

Mr. RALSTON: About 5,000 out of the 8,000.

Mr. GREEN: Where a man is detailed for work on the railway or work in a shipyard, who pays his wages?

Mr. RALSTON: The employer.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does he work as a soldier or as a civilian.

Mr. RALSTON: He is detailed for that work and is required to stay on that work, as I understand it, under the military regulations, but the actual remuneration is paid by the employer. What I have in mind at the moment is that he gets either the civilian rate or the soldier's rate of pay and allowances, whichever is higher, and the employer reimburses the government. Here is a memorandum on the order in council relating to railway duty:

Under authority of order in council P.C. No. 8217, dated 26th October, 1943, N.R.M.A. soldiers having a medical grading lower than Pulhems profile 2222222 as might be spared from their military duties for limited periods may be detailed to perform railway duty. Personnel detailed for railway duty shall continue to be credited with their military pay and allowances, including trades pay and dependents' allowances. If the amount payable by the railway companies in respect of the service performed by the soldiers exceeds the amount of the military pay and allowances, the amount of such excess shall be payable to such soldier. This excess will be credited through the paymaster's accounts of the soldier concerned.

The soldiers were detailed as individuals and worked in groups or individually as required by the railway companies.

497 were employed on railway duty as at 22nd December, 1943.

No soldiers are on railway duty at the present time, all personnel having been recalled under instructions.

Mr. GREEN: That really amounts to providing forced labour for the railway companies.

Mr. RALSTON: I am putting no construction on it at all. I say that there is power under the order in council to detail men for railway duty.

Mr. GREEN: These men have to work for the railway. They have no option.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not giving any legal construction to it at all. A soldier having the medical grading may be spared and detailed to perform railway duty.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to follow up the questions a little further. I understand that when these men were performing railway duty in British Columbia they were working under the direction of an army officer, and as the hon. member for Vancouver South suggests, it was in effect forced labour because these men are under army discipline and they cannot refuse to take this kind of work. Furthermore, I am told that they were working longer hours than worked by the ordinary railway employee, that they were working 10 hours a day when in British Columbia at least, the ordinary day is 8 hours. I may not be correct in that, but that is the information I have.

Mr. RALSTON: Were they getting higher pay than the railway men?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, I understand they were getting the pay of the railway man or soldier's pay whichever was the higher.

Mr. RALSTON: Was the pay of the soldier including dependents' allowance higher than the pay of the railway man?

Mr. MacINNIS: I gather it would be.

Mr. RALSTON: Then perhaps they could afford to work a little longer.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister give the committee a comparison of the wages paid? Where there was a difference between the pay of the soldier and railway pay, was the difference paid by the employer or by the government? In other words, would the soldier's pay be higher when he was drawing soldier's pay than the railway workers' civilian rate? I think we should have that information.

Mr. RALSTON: It would depend on what soldier you took. A soldier with four children and drawing dependents' allowance would probably be getting a higher rate of pay than the railway man working beside him. You will have to give me a particular case. I cannot give any general rule.

Mr. MacINNIS: The department must have figures on that because a certain amount of bookkeeping would have to be done and the bookkeeping would reveal the facts. I remember that a few years ago in this house—I have not heard so much of it lately since most of the members have taken a great interest in labour—when we spoke of low wages the reply was: What about the soldier drawing $1.30 a day? We pointed out then that the soldier at $1.30 a day was getting more than many men in civilian work, and the statement made by the minister just now bears that out. I think we should be given the rates that were paid to soldiers working on the railways.

Mr. RALSTON: I have nothing here whereby I could give the comparison my hon. friend asks for, but if I can find any case where we have a statement showing the payroll of the soldier, and what he would get if working on the same job at civilian rates, I shall be glad to give it.

Mr. GREEN: Is it a fact that the position is that some men are given indefinite leave from the army in order to get jobs in the woods?

Mr. RALSTON: We were talking about the railways a minute ago. Are we talking about the woods now?

Mr. GREEN: Wait until I finish my question.

Mr. RALSTON: I am interrupting to see if my hon. friend is really referring to woods work.

Mr. GREEN: I am going to refer to both.

Mr. RALSTON: There are two sets of orders in council relating to woods work, one applying to the Canadian Forestry Corps and the other applying to logging.

Mr. GREEN: Some of the loggers are given indefinite leave from the army.

Mr. RALSTON: Not indefinitely.

Mr. GREEN: Six months leave, and it can be renewed for another six months and so on. And they work like the ordinary logger would work, at his rate of pay and under the same conditions. Another group of men were apparently detailed for work on the railways and in shipbuilding yards, and they were not given leave under the same conditions but were told by the army: You have to go there and work for such and such company. I should like to know why such a difference is made between these different classes of work. I must say that I think the government is treading on very dangerous ground and establishing a dangerous precedent when it supplies forced labour for the railways or shipbuilding companies or for any other private employer. It is coming close to slave labour.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is advocating the conscripting of men to be sent overseas to take part in a war. I suppose he will say that that is forced labour.

Mr. GREEN: That is entirely different.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. The government has under the National Resources Mobilization Act the power to direct the employment of every individual in Canada, including my hon. friend. The government finds a situation on the railways where labour is needed. Men have been called up under the N.R.M.A., and the government has power to detail men to take part in that work, which is after all a war job. That is all. The government is not treading on dangerous ground.

Mr. GREEN: Why are they not given leave like the men who go logging.

Mr. RALSTON: Because they would not go on leave perhaps. That may be the reason. One is a privilege and the other is an obligation. That is the difference.

Mr. BOUCHER: Does the minister mean to say that some of these soldiers have been given leave of absence and detailed to do work in industry, forestry work and so on, and that the government has no record of the hours of work and the pay they receive?

Mr. RALSTON: We have been talking about detailing men for railway work. We have not been talking about men working in the woods, as to which there is a special order in council. I have already said to the hon. member for Vancouver East that I shall see if we have in the department any record of comparative wages, showing the pay these men would have received if they were getting civilian pay in that enterprise as compared with the pay and allowances they would receive in the army.

Mr. BOUCHER: The point I am trying to make is that it does not seem to me that it is quite playing ball with the men in the forestry corps if any of them are directed to go to an industry on terms as to wages, hours of labour and so on, of which the government has not full and specific knowledge; and I wonder why we cannot get that information.

Mr. RALSTON: If the government detail them, they detail them to go to work under regulations which the government themselves make, just as they detail them to go and train on a parade ground, or go on manœuvres, or anything of that kind. They go to work as soldiers, and the government, of course, takes care of the situation as regards how many hours they shall work, and that sort of thing, guarantees them at least the pay and allowances of a soldier, and says that if anybody in that enterprise doing equivalent work is getting more than that, it will see that these men get that additional pay.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Could the minister give the approximate number of soldiers detailed to industry, and the various industries to which they have been detailed?

Mr. RALSTON: The last figures I have show that for farm duty there were detailed, at the end of December, 166, the number having gone down from 1,700 on September 30. Of course the work is seasonal and the number required would diminish as winter approached. There were 487 detailed on railway duty as of December 22, but, as I indicated, all those had been recalled on December 29, so that apparently there is none now. I have no figures as to any being detailed for forestry duty.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Were there any other industries to which men were detailed?

Mr. RALSTON: No, no others for which they are detailed under order in council.

Mr. GREEN: What about shipbuilding?

Mr. RALSTON: I stated to my hon. friend that I would look up the particulars regarding shipbuilding, that I have no information here about that.

Mr. TUCKER: While the minister is getting a statement as to the various jobs to which soldiers are detailed I would like to say a few words. I would not like it to be supposed that I am in agreement with the remarks of an hon. member suggesting that only recently have members of the house other than those connected with the C.C.F. party become interested in the problems of labour. I do not think the suggestion is called for. Nor is the suggestion that the average soldier is getting more than the average man engaged in industry. If the hon. member who made that statement was really interested and took the trouble to find out what the average soldier gets he would not be so ready to rise in his place pretend that that is the actual state of facts. He would know that a private soldier in the army without dependents receives $1.50 a day, his clothing and his food. It is true that he may also receive a pension if something happens to him. But I suggest that this is very inadequate compensation for the extra risks he takes as a fighting man as compared with men engaged in industry, and I would like to protest against any suggestion that the average fighting man who goes into the army without wife, family or dependents, is being better paid than a similar man in industry. That has been suggested before by the hon. member for Vancouver East, and I protest against it because it is not correct.

Mr. MacINNIS: The member for Vancouver East did not suggest any of the things which the hon. member for Rosthern has just mentioned. What the member for Vancouver East said, and it is borne out by the statement made in this chamber a moment ago by the Minister of National Defence, is that if these men were detailed to do railway work, they would not do it, because the railways would not pay them enough wages. That is what I said.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not what I said.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think that is what the minister said.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg the hon. member's pardon. I said, perhaps they would not work on the railways, but I did not give any reason, as to whether the railways would pay them more or less; I do not know.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is right. They would work on the railways if the railways would pay them a living wage. Not only that, but to-day, if these railway workers go on strike to get better wages, they find themselves in gaol, and under the order in council they are guilty of an offence unless they can prove their innocence. These are facts, and the facts are proved by the order in council which has just been read by the minister.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister say what disposition has been made of the young men who composed university training course No. 1; also, why university course No. 2 is being continued at the present time?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall have to look that up.

Mr. GILLIS: Evidently many hon. members are very touchy along political lines. The hon. member for Vancouver East, when he made his observation with respect to the item under discussion, was absolutely correct in the assumption that the difficulty experienced by the Department of National Defence with respect to detailing men to certain industries in Canada from the services was connected with financial considerations. That is not anyone's imagination; it follows from an analysis which anyone who is reasonable and fair will have to make after listening to the minister's presentation of that question. The men refused to go on the railroad because they would thereby lower their incomes. On the front page of the Ottawa Journal last week it was definitely stated that men detailed from the forestry corps refused to go in the bush at $5.50 a day because it lowered their income in contrast with what they were receiving in the service. Those are not the statements of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

I rise at this time because I note that some hon. members on both sides of this chamber are endeavouring to drive a wedge between the armed services and the industrial workers on the basis of the question we are now discussing, and I believe that action of that kind is a disservice not only to men in the service but to the war effort generally.

At the time the matter was first raised, after listening two or three times to the discussion and having some fair conception of the reasons behind it, members of this group took it upon themselves to make an examination of the question. You cannot examine it by merely picking out the single man who goes in the service or the single man who is employed in industry. Wage rates in this country are computed on the basis of the average income over a given industry, and in many cases this method is not fair, because it includes men in receipt of high salaries as well as those who are drawing $4 a day, and that boosts the average. I believe that anyone who examines the question fairly cannot but arrive at the conclusion that, no matter what industry he investigates, with the present tax structure, what you have left to maintain your family on does not compare very favourably with what those in the service are receiving. No one here has ever intimated that those in the service are getting too much.

Mr. McLARTY: Generally, would the hon. member agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosthern?

Mr. GILLIS: No, I would not because it is not a fair premise.

Mr. McLARTY: You do not think it is correct?

Mr. GILLIS: No. You cannot take the case of a single man and make your analysis on that basis. You have to take an average family. You are getting concrete evidence this afternoon. When you brought the forestry corps back from England you attempted to detail them to do certain work that is now being done by civilians in the country, and when the men in the service stopped to make an analysis of their position after tax deduction at the end of the month they found they would not have as much in cash as they would have in the service without such deduction. The same thing applies to the railways.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not the reason why they are not in the woods.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the reason the Ottawa Journal gave a few nights ago as coming from those who were being detailed for that work. The same is true of the mining industry. Hundreds of miners have gone back from the service into that industry because an emergency in fuel was declared. But talk to many of the men who have gone back and they will tell you that after tax deductions they find that they were better off in the service, though they feel they are making the best contribution they can to the country.

I do not approach this question from political reasons. I am concerned about having a fair understanding of the position of the taxpayers of Canada who are footing the bill and also making sacrifices. I suggest that it is a wrong attitude for any member to take, to try to play the public against those who are in the service, on the basis of sacrifices. When a man lays down his life for his country he does something that cannot be computed in financial terms. You cannot compensate a man for that; the only compensation in that case is to take care of his dependents properly if they are unfortunate enough to be left without a bread-winner.

Listening to the discussion I am convinced that there should be a revision of the wage rates in the industries affected, where you are trying to detail men back to work. Either that, or the taxing arrangements should be revised to enable the men to maintain the income they had by virtue of the service they were in.

[Mr. Gillis.]

May I inquire of the minister with regard to another category that is out of the services and into essential industries. I refer to the men who have gone back to the mining industry. Three months' leave was given and that was extended to six months if they applied. The question is this. Some of these men, since going out of the service into the industry, have developed disabilities that render them unfit to work underground. I know of one man who has found it difficult to get back to the service, the reason given being that he is unfit. He is not fit for that occupation and he is also unfit for the service, and a decision has been pending for some time. Is there any understanding in that regard?

Mr. RALSTON: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that the man contracted some disability after leaving the service and going back into industry?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: No; there is no provision.

Mr. GILLIS: He develops a bronchial condition, for example, and he is not fit for the army nor is he fit for that particular occupation. Where does he fit in?

Mr. RALSTON: Pensions and national health would determine whether or not the disability is attributable to service. It may be a service disability, or it may have had its cause there.

Mr. GILLIS: But pensions will not take him until he is back in the service or is discharged.

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. TUCKER: I am interested to hear the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) giving me a lecture on splitting up the Canadian people. Let me read what the hon. member said last night:

> I hate to sit back listening to armchair generals who are quite comfortably seated in Canada, prepared to carry on the war until the last worker is killed.

Who is trying to set class against class, and person against person? The hon. member suggests that there are people who are ready to sit back here and carry on the war until the last worker is killed. Is he suggesting that other people are not fighting the war as well as the workers and that certain people are ready to take advantage of the workers? Who is trying to create class hatred?

Mr. GILLIS: I am prepared to repeat that statement. Since coming into the house I have heard men, on this side particularly, whose only desire was to see everyone in Canada that could be picked up sent overseas with a gun in his hand to do the fighting. Most of these fellows have done little fighting during their lifetime, and when you boil it down, who do the actual fighting, the slugging and shooting, in wars? Ninety-five per cent of them are workers or the sons of workers. I never heard anyone suggest from this side of the house, dealing with the question of conscription, that the bankers and industrialists and people in that category should be conscripted. Certainly I repeat that statement. I am not going to ask someone to go out and commit suicide unless I am prepared to do the same myself, and I am not going to ask the government of this country to go out and requisition boys and girls unless I am prepared to be requisitioned myself. This is an entirely different matter.

Mr. TUCKER: It is raising the question of class—class hatred because of discrimination against a certain class.

Mr. GILLIS: When you take the wage rates of the country and juggle them as between the army and those who are in Canada, and classify as saboteurs the working people of the country, who by and large are creating the machinery necessary to carry on the war—when you classify them as saboteurs and traitors because they try to lift the wage standards of the country against the time when civilians now in uniform will return, what are you doing? After all, they are civilians in uniform. That is what the Canadian army is, a body of sensible men, civilians who are overseas to-day because of the failure of those who had the direction of affairs of the nations in their hands during the last twenty-five years. They are civilians who will come back to Canada as civilians, and the standards of living being advocated and fought for by their civilian brothers at home will be the standards that will be available for them when they come back. That is the point with which I am concerned. The point raised by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) is entirely different. Requisitioning men without giving them an opportunity to say whether they are satisfied to follow that road or not is a serious question. Last night I said I agreed with the government in maintaining that army at home in order to perform essential services. Now that the danger of invasion is over, other arrangements will have to be made, and the policy carried out in the past on that question is one with which I am satisfied. I will not ask someone to do something that I do not do myself.

Mr. RALSTON: A question was asked with regard to the personnel of No. 1 Canadian army university course. I have a brief statement as follows:

The course was conducted at university of Toronto from October, 1942, to May, 1943.

(a) 158 candidates were enrolled.

(b) Disposal of candidates was as follows:

Graduates	133
Unsuccessful	25
	158

After appraisals by army examiners, successful candidates were allocated to various arms and carried out training as follows:

Canadian Armoured Corps	18
Canadian Armoured Corps (Reconnaissance)	16
Royal Canadian Artillery (Field)	28
Royal Canadian Artillery (Medium Anti-Aircraft)	4
Royal Canadian Artillery (Medium)	1
Royal Canadian Artillery (Coastal Defence)	1
Royal Canadian Artillery (Survey)	11
Royal Canadian Corps of Signals	25
Royal Canadian Engineers	6
Canadian Infantry Corps	6
Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps	5
Total	121
Transferred to Royal Canadian Air Force	12
Total	133

The instructions have been issued that this personnel will proceed to officer selection and appraisal centre, Brockville, Ontario, under special quota on 11th February, 1944, for appraisal by officer selection and appraisal board, and for disposal as follows:

(a) Personnel selected as officer material will be given the opportunity of proceeding to officers training centre under special quota upon completion of corps training.

By "corps training" I mean training in the particular arm to which he has been allotted.

They will be fully informed at officer selection and appraisal centre of the time element involved in completing officer training and subsequent dispatch overseas.

(b) Selected candidates, who because of the time element involved in the attainment of a commission, might be deterred from going to officers training centre will be allowed the option of proceeding in reinforcement stream as other ranks rather than to officer training, and to proceed overseas as early as possible upon completion of corps training. They will not be held in Canada as assistant instructors. In each case, their documents showing that they had so elected will be clearly marked at officer selection and appraisal centre.

That is to say there will be some credit given to them for the fact that they have elected.

Mr. JACKMAN: How long is the corps training?

Mr. RALSTON: I think probably two months, or something like that.

(c) Personnel not selected as officer material will be considered for technical or specialist training (i.e. survey, radio direction finding, signals, etc.), and be given the opportunity, if selected, of commencing such specialist training forthwith.

(d) Personnel considered to be unsuitable or not electing under any of the foregoing sub-paragraphs will be immediately returned to the reinforcement stream and dispatched overseas on completion of corps training. They will not be held in Canada as assistant instructors during progress of training.

(e) Documents of all personnel who successfully completed the academic portion of No. 1 Canadian army university course will be clearly marked to that effect.

That applies to the No. 1 course. No. 2 course, as my hon. friend knows, is on at the present time. There was a quota of 1,270 established and 1,270 were enrolled. I can give the universities, but perhaps that is not necessary. There were certain casualties in the 1,270, so that the total still on the course as of January 26, 1944, is 1,145.

6. Subject to the exigencies of the service and the requirements for reinforcement officers at the time, all candidates of No. 2 Canadian army university course will be given an opportunity of appearing before the officer selection and appraisal board provided:

(a) that they have successfully completed the academic portion of the course.

(b) that they have completed the required military training, basic and advanced of the corps to which they have been allocated.

7. A directive dated January 25, 1944, has been sent to all districts and commands advising them of this decision and instructing that universities concerned and personnel of No. 2 Canadian army university course be also informed. At the same time it is to be made clear to all concerned that these candidates are not being promised commissions in the army.

Mr. PURDY: I do not think the statement made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South to the effect that young men in our banks and similar institutions are not pulling their full weight in this war should be allowed to go unchallenged. If he followed the statements of our chartered banks he would see that up to fifty per cent of the memberships of their staffs are on active service. The suggestion that these young men are not doing their part in this war is not fair.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I know it is difficult to follow these questions in sequence, but in answer to a question this afternoon the minister said there were some 1,100 deserters from the Canadian army, most of whom are in Canada. While the minister has the facts and information before him, would he give us a break-down, if possible, by military districts?

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, I told my hon. friend we were endeavouring to get that. I said last night I would try to get it. It takes quite a while to get the information, and I thought I would give the committee the information I have here. I will get the information.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We should be able to get the information by military districts as to how many are N.R.M.A. men.

Mr. RALSTON: We shall do that if we can.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister a question before he leaves the arena. I should like the minister to tell us how many of the 588 men volunteered for bush duty, how many are still in the bush and how many have been returned.

Mr. RALSTON: All right.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I dislike rising again, but if the few remarks that I made regarding the question of conscripts did not register with the hon. member for Colchester, that is not my responsibility. I did not say what he said I said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It sounded like that.

Mr. GILLIS: I have not heard anyone in this house suggest the conscription of the bankers and industrialists of this country. The employees of the banks are workers, and are not in the category to which I refer. They have made their contribution one hundred per cent.

Mr. PURDY: I am glad the hon. member apologizes to them.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not apologizing to them. It is a misunderstanding of terms.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. GREEN: No. The minister said yesterday there were about 5,300 N.R.M.A. men out on extended leave. To-day he has mentioned more N.R.M.A. men who are detailed for duty with different industries. Would he tell us how many there are in the latter class, and how many under each of the headings? Are they operational troops or non-operational troops? Under which heading do they come?

Mr. RALSTON: They are not included in the non-operational troops or in the operational troops. My hon. friend was out when I gave the figures with regard to the troops. I said that the number of soldiers detailed to farm duty on December 1, 1943, was 166. I said that I had no figures of any troops being detailed on forestry duty and that in connection with railway duty as of December 22, there were 497 employed, but on December 29 all personnel had been recalled; therefore, the number detailed is very small.

Mr. GREEN: There are some in other industries.

Mr. RALSTON: This seems to be exhaustive of those classes in which detailing for duty is provided by order in council—railway, forestry and farming.

Mr. GREEN: Are the N.R.M.A. men on extended leave in the overseas category?

Mr. RALSTON: Some are and some are not.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister figures to show how many are and how many are not?

Mr. RALSTON: No, I have not.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to ask the minister if the same opportunity will be given the men to go to the farms this year as was given last year to take part in seeding and harvesting operations.

Mr. RALSTON: All I can say to my hon. friend is I do not know of any more acute subject being under consideration by the department. Fortunately it is only February, and I hope that I shall not have to give consideration to it too soon. Let us get the estimates through first. I assure my hon. friend we always have it in mind and we endeavour to make the best arrangement we can, subject to that old and well-worn phrase which goes something like this, "subject to the exigencies of the service".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not like this item to carry now because it is six o'clock and some hon. members might wish to say something further in connection with it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, as a medical man I should like to say a word on behalf of a distinguished member of my profession, whose statement in a recent speech in Toronto seems to have been misunderstood. I thought I might say this in addition to what the minister said this afternoon. As I have been accustomed to reading and listening to scientific addresses I may say that the speech of the director general of medical services did not perturb me. If he had made this speech before a scientific body, such as a medical society, it would have been regarded as a valuable scientific contribution to our knowledge of the many problems with which medical officers have had to deal when working among our soldiers in this war, into which certain psychological factors have entered. I feel quite sure the director general did not intend to make any reflection upon the mothers who have given their sons, or upon that great body of women who have done and are doing such a splendid and patriotic work.

In view of the many statements which have been made in respect of the maintenance of the morale of our forces overseas, over this long period of battle inactivity, may I say that not a little credit for the favourable situation which obtains was due to our high commissioner for Canada in London, the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, who has just arrived back in Canada. I wish to bid him welcome to his native land, and to pay tribute to the splendid work he has done and is doing as our representative in England. Among his many activities are soldiers' clubs, in London, and an officers' convalescent home which he established at his own expense in Gloucestershire. I am quite sure hon. members would like to associate themselves with me in an expression of appreciation of his and his wife's many and continuing acts of kindness to our forces overseas, which have gone a long way toward relieving them of the nostalgia inevitably felt after years of separation from loved ones at home.

Mr. RALSTON: I thank the hon. member for Parkdale for his reference to Major-General Chisholm, and the speech he made. It is difficult for a layman—and my hon. friend appreciates this better than I—to understand the full significance of what is being discussed in a scientific discussion of that kind. I say to my hon. friend and the committee, as I tried to say this afternoon, that I know the last thing Major-General Chisholm would think of doing would be to cast the slightest reflection, or to do otherwise than give the greatest credit to the women of our country in the great work they are doing during this time of war.

It was most gracious on the part of the hon. member to refer to the advent of the Right Hon. Vincent Massey. As one who has seen at first hand some of the work Mr. and Mrs. Massey are doing, I wish to join with the hon. member in his expression of appreciation to them, and to say to hon. members and the country generally that I do not think Canada can ever fully realize or recognize not only the fine service these two gracious people are rendering, but the devotion and the genuine consecration they have shown in their heavy task for Canada, which, because of the activities of this war, has increased tenfold.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I was glad to hear the minister say this afternoon that the matter of the transportation of the armed forces is under consideration, and I hope that the suggestions made may be carried out.

I should like also to thank the minister for the observations and appreciation he has recorded respecting women in uniform. I believe people throughout Canada would subscribe to what he has said. So far as I have talked to members of different units, and to civilians in our different cities, I have gained the impression that the opinion respecting women in uniform is very high indeed.

Has the minister considered the suggestion that women should have representation on the committees being set up for the reestablishment of troops returning from overseas? I suggest that women should be on such committees which would deal with the reestablishment of women who have been in the services. And I do not think it would be a bad idea to have a woman or two on the general reestablishment committee for all troops, men and women combined.

I was pleased to hear the explanation made respecting Major-General Chisholm's address. I knew it was not meant the way a reading of it might indicate, and I was convinced that there must have been some misinterpretation; because everyone knows that, although there are a few who might be emotionally too sensitive and therefore might upset the boys returning home, the fact remains that the great majority of women have added to the morale of our troops, in every respect. The minister himself expressed his realization of that fact when he referred to the letters received by the men overseas. I am sure a great percentage of that mail comes from the women of our land. The minister referred to that mail as a morale builder for our troops overseas. I am sure that the women of Canada are glad to have heard the explanation, and that they will continue to play their part, one which in some respects is very difficult, during this time of war.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the membership on the rehabilitation committee, to which the hon. member has referred, possibly she knows that in the Department of Pensions and National Health, over which my colleague presides, there has been set up a special rehabilitation committee to deal with the rehabilitation of women in the services. In addition to that, I am informed by my colleague it is anticipated that there will be appointed, near the fountainhead of the administration, an executive assistant in the person of a woman, who will work with the assistant deputy minister who is also the director of rehabilitation in the Department of Pensions and National Health. So that I am sure women will be fully represented. The hon. member has a right to ask whether the same thing will apply in respect of these committees about which I have spoken. I can say to her that so far as the army is concerned—and I have not consulted my colleagues in the navy and air force—arrangements will be made so that representation will be given on the administrative body we are setting up for that purpose.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said yesterday there was to be some reduction in the paid personnel of the reserve army. I understand there are a certain number of men in each unit who are on a full-time basis. Did that recommendation for a reduction in paid personnel come from the units themselves, or is it just a move by headquarters? I am asking that because, particularly in coastal brigades, which are the most likely to see active service, it would seem to be a mistake to cut down on their paid personnel. Has any consideration been given to having the reserve army take over some of the functions of the other troops—perhaps some operational role, such as anti-aircraft protection. There may be other work which they could do, and in this way they would enable the minister to reduce the number of men in Canada of the active force.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the first question, I am sorry I cannot tell my hon. friend whether or not the recommendation came direct from the units. I refer to the change-over whereby more responsibility for training will be put upon officers of the reserve units, and less by way of paid personnel. The recommendation was made in conjunction with the director general of the reserve army. I know that he has travelled from coast to coast, and back again as far as that goes, consulting those who have to do with the reserve army units. That recommendation is the result of that trip and of the consideration which Major-General Phelan, the director general of the reserve army, has given to the matter.

The point is, as I endeavoured to point out on Friday, that with these two years of intensive training—I really think the reserve units will agree with this—it is felt that the officers and non-commissioned officers have become sufficiently trained to take on a greater responsibility for the training of the units. I have not said that the staffs would be cut out completely, but they certainly will be reduced. I think there is a justification for that, and it will give them a little more in the way of self-dependence, in the way of running their own show, which will be all for the good of the service.

The other question was in connection with having them take over some of the work of the active units. That has been under consideration, and it is simply a case of the difficulty of making practical arrangements. Obviously you cannot send a reserve unit from Toronto or Winnipeg to the coast; you could use only a unit located in the area which is represented by my hon. friend and in which he lives. There have been discussions with regard to this. As a matter of fact, I did say last year that I anticipated there would be some taking over of anti-aircraft work by some of the reserve units. That has not been carried out to any extent because it means you would have personnel in your anti-aircraft unit who were working in the day time. In these days it is sometimes difficult for businessmen to make arrangements to undertake, say a three months' tour of duty in order to serve on special coast defence duty. The men are prepared to do so if the necessity arises, but to have a unit serve as a whole could not be done advantageously without great sacrifice which perhaps is not required.

Mr. GREEN: What are the plans for the Pacific coast militia rangers? Units of this corps have been established mainly in the smaller centres and they have done excellent work. I think they would be of great use even in peace time. A few months ago there was some talk about the number of men and the number of units being reduced, and I should like the minister to tell us what he has in mind.

Mr. RALSTON: I had a memorandum the other day with regard to the Pacific coast rangers. There is no intention of disbanding them. There has been a certain curtailment, not so much in connection with their activities as in connection with their spheres of activities. As my hon. friend knows, they were perhaps one of the most rapidly growing and vigorous military organizations that we have had in Canada. As my hon. friend says, they have done grand work and they are entitled to full credit. At the same time they did overlap to some extent with the reserve army.

Mr. GREEN: Only in a few places.

Mr. RALSTON: I said to some extent. Of course it is desirable to prevent that overlapping and to decrease, at least to that degree. I cannot give my hon. friend any particulars at the moment with regard to localities, units or what reductions there will be, but the force will be maintained as a force.

Mr. GREEN: I believe they have only partial equipment at the present time, and I should like to know if they are to be provided with more equipment.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I cannot speak with any degree of certainty with regard to that. The clothing and equipment provided consists of a steel helmet, waterproof jacket and trousers, arm band, a ·3030 Winchester rifle or a ·303 Ross rifle, Sten guns and pistols for the officers. We are not providing transport or other equipment.

Mr. GREEN: Are they provided with boots?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GREEN: Why not?

Mr. RALSTON: We may as well go through all the lists of clothing. They are not supplied with a number of things provided for the regular troops. The jackets and trousers were an extra issue, and the steel helmet was an extra issue. Some arms were not provided, but we have gone a long distance in this respect. I presume that the reason more equipment is not considered essential is due to the fact that they have combined some of the work being done on the Pacific coast with their civilian work. The strength as of December 31, 1943, was over 12,000. The reduction we are planning, which my hon. friend will see is a small one, will bring the strength down to something like 10,000. That reduction will be effective in the same way as the reduction of the reserve army, that is by stream-lining or cutting out the dormant units but not by disbandment.

Mr. GREEN: I think it would be helpful if these men were able to get more gasoline for their transportation. I believe their efficiency would be increased.

Mr. RALSTON: We endeavoured to get more gasoline for the motor-boat squadrons at Vancouver and Victoria, but we were not so successful. I do not want to hold out too much hope.

Mr. STIRLING: I was interested in what the minister said this afternoon about the No. 1 army course. May I take it that it is the intention now to permit those who pass this course successfully to proceed along the lines of the technical training they have received. The minister may remember that in November of last year I took up the case of two brothers, I believe their name was Saunders, and referred to the representations they had made to me. When they went into this course they understood from the minister himself that they would be potential officers when the course was over. However, when they finished they were told that they could not proceed to O.T.C. training, that they would be retained in the one unit in the east for further consideration. One of these men found himself in a unit for a considerable time and could see no opportunity of getting any further along the lines for which he had trained. He endeavoured to transfer to the air force and was told he could not do that. I am told that an officer commanding a certain unit knew something of some of these lads and applied for their transfer to his unit, but he was told that this could not be done, that it was contrary to the then arrangement that these lads were to be kept together in the east for further consideration.

There has been a good deal of feeling among the successful candidates who were unquestionably disappointed. I realize that into the picture came the decision to curtail the number of officers, but I am now asking the minister whether those who were successful at the end of the No. 1 army course—this was before the No. 2 course was set up—are now being taken care of and given the opportunity for advancement which they had been led to expect at the beginning of the course.

Mr. RALSTON: I admit to my hon. friend that the statement I put on record this afternoon is a little involved. I mean, one must read it quite carefully. The first thing, as I understand it, is that all the successful candidates will be permitted to proceed to the officers' selection and appraisal centre at Brockville, under special quota for appraisal by that board. That board decides who are likely to make potential officers, and the personnel selected as officer material will be given an opportunity of proceeding to O.T.C. upon completion of their corps training. This corps training would take probably two months at least. They will be fully informed at the officer selection and appraisal centre of the time element involved in completing officer training and subsequent dispatch overseas. That perhaps is somewhat of a deterrent to them, the fact that if they take the officer training course it may be some time before they get overseas. Selected candidates who, because of the time element involved in the attainment of a commission, might not want to wait will be allowed the option of entering the reinforcement stream as other ranks and of proceeding overseas as early as possible upon completion of corps training. They will not be retained in Canada as assistant instructors. Their documents showing that they had so elected will be clearly marked at officer selection and appraisal centre. My hon. friend's question I think would come in there, and the answer is not given in that paragraph which I have just summarized. He was asking if they would be retained for specialist work for which they had been particularly trained in the course. The answer to that does not appear plainly in that paragraph. But the next paragraph of this memorandum does indicate that personnel not selected as officer material will be considered for technical or specialist training such as survey, radio direction finding, signals, and so forth, and be given an opportunity, if selected, of commencing such specialist training forthwith.

Personnel considered to be unsuitable will be immediately returned to the reinforcement stream and dispatched overseas upon completion of corps training. They will not be held as assistant instructors during the progress of training. I should like to have a little more information on one point, whether selected candidates who decide not to wait for the Brockville training but want to go overseas have any preemption on technical or specialist units. I shall get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to make a few observations with reference to the resolution now before the committee. I should like first of all to say how glad I am that the minister made the remarks he did yesterday, addressed to the Canadian people, warning them that the war is not yet finished by a long way and that a difficult and bloody path lies ahead. It seems to me that the whole psychology of the allied governments has to some extent been at fault in this regard. By that I mean such things as the optimistic statements made around the New Year to the effect that 1944 might see the end of the war in Europe. A number of other circumstances arising about the same time all helped to give the feeling not only among civilians but even among service personnel that we are now coasting into the home stretch. There were, for instance, the announcement that the reserve army was going to cut down the number of days training, the announcement that the air force would no longer accept recruits for the women's division, the fact that in some training centres across Canada the number of persons to be trained is to be greatly reduced, the number of officers who are being dismissed from the service—I know men who have come to me during the last three months, men in the armed services, who are already making plans for going back to civilian life because of the impression that seems to have been created that it is now a matter of months before the war is over—all these things have tended to give that impression. I think that is bad psychology.

I think the speech from the throne—I am not going to discuss it now, Mr. Chairman—after a merely cursory statement that the winning of the war is the first objective, failed to set out a single particular in which we could improve our war effort or step it up. That also helped to give the impression that we are now passed the peak and are coasting to the home base. The result is that we are psychologically unprepared, I think, for the terrific sacrifices and terrific casualties that may suddenly be catapulted on the Canadian people.

I wish to commend the minister for the very frank statement he made yesterday. I think also that anybody who listened to his statement of last Friday regarding his visit to the troops must have been touched not only by his evident sincerity but by the inspiration he gained from visiting the men engaged in actual combat.

I should like to say something about the large body of non-operational troops in Canada. There are in Canada some 75,000 non-operational troops, if I remember the minister's figures; that is, men who are mostly on administrative or training staffs. It seems to me that this is a very high figure. Last year, if I remember correctly we had about 86,000 in A. and T. staffs, while this year it is from 70,000 to 75,000. But 75,000 seems to be a very large percentage of administrative and training personnel to carry. Can the minister in the course of this discussion tell us whether the time has not come to reduce the large administrative and training staffs?

I should also like him to tell the committee how many men are going through these training centres. If I am not incorrectly informed, in some training centres the number of men carrying on administrative work and training actually exceeds the number of men being trained in the camp.

Mr. RALSTON: There are about 23,000 men carrying on administration and training for about 75,000 personnel in the training stream.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did not mean in toto but was speaking of particular camps. I should like to know how many men are going through each of these camps each month. In the province of Saskatchewan—

Mr. RALSTON: Maple Creek, for instance?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): At Maple Creek in January the number of men who came in to be trained was so small that I would hesitate to quote it.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is right about that. I was speaking about the camps as a whole.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am wondering how many other camps are similar to Maple Creek and whether the large non-operational staff could not be reduced and these men used to better advantage elsewhere.

I wish to say a word about the large operational personnel. I agree with my desk-mate the hon. member for Cape Breton South, in what he said last night, that last year and the year before there was a demand among the members of this house that the government should do something to protect our coasts and that therefore the government is not to be blamed for having a large body of men occupied in doing just that. But it may be that the time has come when we no longer need from 60,000 to 70,000 men in the classification of N.R.M.A. personnel, and that something else may have to be done with them. The minister has stated that they will be available for reinforcements. That is true. In the meantime I think the government has to decide whether there is not some better use that can be made of them until they are required as second-line reinforcements; that is, if the government is not anxious to use them in actual combat. It seems to me that many of these men who have been already trained might be returned to farms; some of them might be returned to coal mining and forestry. All these trained men could very easily be brought back into units if the government decided that they were going to make some use of them. The time has come when the question of the disposal of these sixty thousand or seventy thousand non-operational personnel should be reconsidered by the government with a view to deciding whether they are making the best possible use of these men. I do not feel at all satisfied with the minister's statement this afternoon.

As to seeding leave for the men of the National Resources Mobilization Act personnel, I do not know whether the minister realizes how serious the situation is. On the prairies there are thousands of farms where the only persons operating a farm are an elderly man and his wife. These people are four years older than they were when the war started. Many of them will not be able to put in a crop this spring unless some member of the family now in the armed forces comes home and helps them, or unless they can hire help, which at the present time is virtually impossible. I think the government will have to give some thought to this matter, and not leave it until April and then make some hastily-concocted scheme. They ought to be giving some consideration now to two things: first, to make it possible for the men who are from farms to return to them in the spring to help put in the crop; and, second, to assist men who are in the National Resources Mobilization Act personnel to be placed on farms so as to assist farmers in putting in a crop this coming spring. I ask the minister to give some thought to that and to be prepared to have a discussion in the house, not at the end of March or April, when the men should already be on the farms, but sometime during the present month of February.

I should like to ask the minister about the order in council which forbids men in the armed forces taking any part in public discussions, which forbids them writing letters to the newspapers, which forbids them speaking at any kind of public meeting. I think we have gone a long way in this country when a member of the provincial legislature who is a member of His Majesty's forces is forbidden to speak on a Sunday afternoon to an open forum, where he was asked to go and speak on post-war reconstruction, a subject in which I think most hon. members, and many men who are in the armed forces, are interested. Here is a man who receives such an invitation, accepts it, and then finds the day before that he cannot go and take part in this discussion because, in order to do so, he must submit the manuscript to a national defence headquarters here in Ottawa.

In this country we have never believed in a professional army. Our armed forces have been civilian armies, and we have tried to make them as democratic as possible; we have tried to encourage the fostering of discussion and the exchange of points of view; and I do not think the Canadian people, and least of all the men in the services, take very kindly to the proposition that because a man is now a member of His Majesty's forces he is not to be allowed to write a letter to the paper, or to go to a public meeting and there express whatever point of view he may have on any subject under discussion. I should like to have the minister in the course of his discussion tell us the terms of that order in council and the exact reason why the government thought it necessary to pass it.

I wish also to say a word about the fact that men who joined the Canadian army from the reserve army and were brought in under general order 139 are not being paid a clothing allowance. There was a reason for that when that regulation was originally passed. If a man came into the army through the reserve under general order 139, it was understood that he would be in for only a short time, probably to do some temporary task, so that when he was let out of the army his clothes would still fit him and still be in a fairly good state of repair, and he would need no clothing allowance. But the men who have gone into the army through general order 139 and who are now being discharged are men who have been in the army in some cases for three or four years, and when these men are discharged without a clothing allowance they are under serious hardship.

When I was in the city of Prince Albert, represented by the Prime Minister, a number of men, thirteen, I believe, came to my hotel room. All of them were being discharged on the following Monday. Most of them, I think, had joined up at Yorkton. They did not know anything about recruiting stations, in the early days of the war. They had gone to reserve army headquarters, and reserve army headquarters made arrangements for them to be taken in and sent them straight to Dundurn, and actually, although they had not been members of the reserve force, they came in through the reserve force under general order 139, I do not know why. That is the modus operandi. What is the result? These men have been cooks and batmen and working in training centres. Now, nearly four years later, when they are discharged, they find that there is to be no clothing allowance. They do not know where their clothes are. These men now have to go out and spend sixty, seventy or one hundred dollars to buy clothing so that they can return home. I do not suppose that this incident is typical of the cases of large numbers of men, but it is a serious hardship to the men who are affected.

I should like to make another suggestion to the minister, although I am not sure whether his department or the department of pensions is the more vitally concerned. The department ought to give some thought not only to the question of demobilization of the men coming back, but to the question of the soldiers' wives and the whole matter of the psychological adjustment of men returning after the war. A number of soldiers' wives have spoken to me about it. They point out that when their men come back after being away three, four or five years, many of them come back changed. They have been through a variety of experiences, have come back tired, moody and nervous. Many of these men were married probably only a matter of months prior to going overseas. In cases where the wives are young they are at a complete loss to understand the change of attitude and the change of personality that have resulted from years of service. I believe great work could be undertaken by one of the departments of government putting out literature, particularly to soldiers' wives, to make them aware of the fact that any man who has spent some time overseas in service will come back a different person to some extent, and that there is need of a period of psychological readjustment if we are not to have matrimonial wrecks all over this country in the post-war period.

There is one other question which I wish to ask the minister. Will he elaborate to the committee some of the reasons for breaking up the Canadian army? I believe there was a strong feeling throughout the country, and certainly there was a strong feeling in some parts of this house, expressed repeatedly during the past two or three years, that the Canadian army should be retained as a unit. Those who have read the memoirs of David Lloyd George or of Sir Robert Borden, who was Prime Minister of Canada during the last war, will remember the tremendous pressure which was brought to bear upon the Canadian government and the Canadian military authorities to break up the Canadian army of 1914-18, a pressure which Sir Arthur Currie resisted so strongly, and which was resisted by Sir Sam Hughes and Sir Robert Borden. Most historians who have studied the history of the last war have generally agreed that these men were right in resisting the pressure of the British government and the British general staff and in refusing to break up the Canadian army during the last war. That does not mean that it is right not to break it up during this war.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend elaborate that? There was no Canadian army in the last war, but a Canadian corps.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Does he mean pressure to break up the Canadian corps?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In the last war, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I know the fifth division was broken up.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister will remember that there was terrific pressure, according to the memoirs to which I have referred, in the early stages of the last war to split up the Canadian corps and to use one battalion in one division and another battalion elsewhere throughout the British army as shock troops, and he will remember the fight which Sir Arthur Currie and the Canadian government—

Mr. RALSTON: The Canadian corps was formed when there were two divisions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes; but the fact is that pressure was brought to bear to break it up so that it would not operate as a corps but that the respective battalions would operate as parts of the British army to be used as shock troops under the British command. The Canadian government and the Canadian military authorities at that time strongly resisted that pressure, and we have felt during this war that there was a strong demand in this country, and a strong feeling in the army itself, that the Canadian army be allowed to do the better job it could do if it were possible to retain it as a unit operating under a Canadian commander in the field. The government, for some reason or other, has decided to accede to the request that it be broken up. One corps will be sent to Italy; the other corps will remain in England with an army headquarters, and I imagine a British corps or some other corps will operate with that corps under Canadian army headquarters.

Mr. RALSTON: Whose request was it that the Canadian army be broken up? The hon. member said that the government had decided to accede to the request that the Canadian army be broken up.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I take it for granted that it was the request of the British government.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend can take it for granted it was nothing of the kind. I have said, in my statement to the house, that the government itself of its own initiative asked for a division to go to Italy, and then pressed for another division to go. There was no request of any kind or description by the British that the two divisions should go to Italy. I have said all that. I went into the details of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I heard the minister's speech.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend did not listen, I am afraid.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I hear the minister again?

Mr. RALSTON: I say I am afraid my hon. friend did not listen, if he makes the statement that we acceded to a request and says that the request was that of the British government.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I hardly take it from the minister that the Canadian government decided to send a division without any prior consultation with the British government.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly we had prior consultation with the British government, but we had no request from the British government. It was on our initiative and not on theirs.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Then the responsibility lies squarely with the Canadian government?

Mr. RALSTON: Absolutely.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Canadian government decided that the Canadian army, instead of operating as a unit, first of all a division and now a corps, would be sent to Italy and that corps would operate under a British army commander and that the other corps would remain in Great Britain under Canadian army headquarters, to which will probably be added a British corps or some other corps to complete that army operating under Canadian army headquarters.

I do not wish to discuss the question of General McNaughton, in view of what the Prime Minister said yesterday, but I think it was a mistake that the announcement regarding the break-up of the Canadian army as a unit coincided closely with the announcement of General McNaughton's resignation. Also it reminded many people of the fact that after Dunkirk, General McNaughton was quoted by some United States papers as saying that after what he had seen in France he would be opposed to having the Canadian army broken up. I do not mean that that is still his point of view; I do not know. But the inference drawn by a great many people, both inside and outside the armed forces, was that there had been here a distinct cleavage of opinion as to whether the Canadian forces should go into action as a unit or should be broken up and operated on several fronts as different army corps. After listening carefully to the minister on Friday last, the only reason I could gather for the advantage of breaking up the Canadian army was to gain battle experience. There is a great deal of merit in that argument. I can see the difficulty in keeping a large body of men in England, the danger of men going stale, and the desire on the part of highly trained men to acquire some battle experience. The minister has not explained why it was not possible to use the entire Canadian army in Italy so as to enable them to remain as a unit. There may be strategic reasons which he cannot give, but I think the minister will have to remember that there are many people in this country who were naturally anxious that the Canadian army should have been kept as a unit and who will want some further explanation as to why it has not been kept together.

Everyone I believe recognizes that in a unified united nations' strategy all the different countries participating will have to fit into a general plan. That is inevitable, and neither Canada nor any other country can have sole control of the military strategy that will dominate the war effort of the united nations. At the same time the Canadian people have placed hundreds of thousands of their sons in the care of the government and particularly of the Minister of National Defence, and they will want to know just to what extent the strategy and the battle operations to be followed are in any way influenced or affected by the Canadian general staff and by the Canadian government.

I know there are limitations; I know the larger picture will have to dominate. But I say frankly to the minister that there is a strong feeling in some quarters, which may be justifiable—in fact it is there—that the control has been going increasingly into the hands of professional soldiers; that the R.M.C. men particularly, and naturally, since they are the trained men, have been given positions of responsibility; that civilian soldiers have been to some extent pushed aside; that the entire control of the strategy is increasingly in the hands of the British general staff and British generals; and that less and less of the say as to what will be done with the Canadian forces is being left in the hands of the Canadian command and the Canadian authorities. I think the minister could do a great deal to alleviate some of that feeling by giving to this committee, if not now, whenever he can, a picture as to just how the Canadian corps will integrate into the picture in Italy, how the Canadian corps and army headquarters will integrate into the picture in Europe and what consultation there will be with Canadian military authorities.

For instance, the Canadian people have not forgotten that on several occasions in the last war, if the histories that have been written are correct, Sir Arthur Currie insisted before certain battle operations took place that certain artillery support and certain conditions must obtain before Canadians would take part in the operations that were proposed. I think the Canadian people in the final analysis would be glad to know that the control and the decisions affecting the lives of the men they have sent overseas will be safeguarded and protected not only by the Canadian government but by Canadian commanders responsible to the Canadian government.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I might as well deal now with what my hon. friend has said. I have already spoken with regard to some of these matters, and I do not want to indicate that I have any hesitation whatever about discussing the question. My hon. friend has spoken of several comparatively minor matters to which I shall refer only briefly. I have already given the committee a very full statement with regard to the employment of non-operational troops and their different roles. I can give the committee a full schedule of all the different groups of units which are involved, but at the moment I do not think it is necessary to load up Hansard. Suffice it to say we have a committee, and it is a hard-boiled committee. It is a committee that those connected with the various units in the non-operational group consider pretty tough. They are travelling back and forth in this country all the time examining into the establishments at the different centres, and at the different headquarters as well, in an endeavour to check and see whether a man can be spared here or there. A great many war establishments have been cut down as a result of the action of that committee—not always; sometimes they have been increased. But I wish to assure this committee that there has been and there is vigilance in connection with the matter of the conservation of man-power and every effort is made to prevent them from getting into the backwater of non-operational troops unless they are doing an actual job.

I have already made reference to operational troops and indicated the cut which was made. Sometimes I feel that perhaps there is nothing which the department can do which is right. Last September I really thought I was doing something which everybody would applaud when the seventh and eighth divisions were disbanded. I heard nothing but criticism from one end of the country to the other. It has been talked about as a muddle; it has been said that the statement which was made was rotten. As a matter of fact, I penned the announcement myself and take full blame for it. I thought that I had made a statement which the public would understand and that we were really doing a job in cutting down operational troops. Nevertheless the storm came just the same. In spite of that, we are still studying the possibility of disbanding other units, and we are going to keep on with it regardless of what people may say and whether people give us credit for it or not.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the minister be able to give us now or later comparative figures of A. and T. personnel in these camps as against the number of men being trained in the camps?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly. With regard to seeding leave I took note of what my hon. friend has said and will endeavour to see to it that early attention is given to the matter in order to ascertain whether any changes can be made which may further the objectives which he has in mind. With regard to the order in council forbidding writing to newspapers, it is not an order in council; it is Canadian army routine order, and as a matter of fact it is under consideration at this minute. With regard to the clothing allowance under general order 139—

Mr. GRAYDON: From the tone of the minister's reply in connection with that one order or regulation may one take it that the government is taking some steps to review and perhaps alter it?

Mr. RALSTON: The three services are taking steps to review it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that also refer to their taking part in public activities?

Mr. RALSTON: It was passed when I was away. I did not know the contents of it until I had it looked up here to-night. It does not refer to public activities. As I understand it, this order prohibits men writing any articles at all whether they happen to be military or otherwise. Is that what my hon. friend has reference to?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the one under review by the three services now.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the minister makes some change because it is pretty drastic.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does that routine order also forbid the men writing to members of parliament?

Mr. RALSTON: No; K.R. and O. does that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that anybody in the armed forces cannot write to members of parliament?

Mr. RALSTON: On military matters.

Mr. STIRLING: Who is to tell?

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely that should be clarified. I should not like to be a party to breaking some of the K.R. and O., but I get letters from various sources.

Mr. RALSTON: I had the sad experience in my own constituency of a constituent writing to me. I think it is a fact that K.R. and O., as it stands now—

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely that is pretty drastic.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not dealing with that because I want to get on with other matters. My hon. friend referred to general order 139. The clothing allowance provision has been made to apply to those who were discharged under general order 139, and it has been in force since November 1.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And made retroactive.

Mr. RALSTON: No. With regard to soldiers' wives, my hon. friend simply referred to it as a possible activity of the department. We do want to take in all the scope possible in connection with the men who are considered the wards of the department, but I think probably that is going a little far afield. However, I shall certainly bring what my hon. friend says to the attention of the committee which has this whole matter of rehabilitation in hand. I thought my hon. friend was referring first to soldiers' brides. This is a subject which has had some attention in publications in Canada. I say in that respect that the department feels we have a responsibility there and is joining with the Department of National War Services, the Red Cross and other agencies in order to endeavour as far as possible to see to it that these girls who are coming home, some with children and some with none, are received and looked after as befits the wives of men who are fighting the battles of Canada overseas.

Mr. GRAYDON: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Weyburn said something about the breaking up of the Canadian army. I have already dealt with that. It is not a long story and it is not a very complicated one. I am not saying this sarcastically, but I never realized how the policy of having a Canadian army had taken on in Canada until the events of the last six months occurred. When the formation of the army was announced two years ago, I did not hear much applause for it anywhere. As a matter of fact, I heard a good deal of criticism in newspapers about the fact that we were aspiring to have a Canadian army. The suggestion was that we were building a structure of gingerbread, and that it was something that we were putting on to our organization by way of a frill. There was a good deal of newspaper criticism of that kind.

[Mr. Graydon.]

I find now it was regarded as a constructive step, and I am glad of that. But even a year ago I had to take notice of the criticism and to call the attention of the house to the fact that the house had approved of the organization of a Canadian army, and that I did not think it was up to the people generally, or to the house particularly, to criticize that organization which had been approved without a dissenting voice. But there was a good deal of talk—perhaps not so much in Hansard—but certainly the suggestion that we had bitten off too much, and that this idea of a Canadian army was just a little bit of frosting which could have been omitted, and that we would have been just as well off without it. The idea suggested was that it was for the purpose of making more generals, and of building up an organization which, although it did not mean much, sounded big.

That was the attitude of a good many people in Canada. But, strangely enough, just now it seems that they had real, genuine, sincere admiration and affection for that particular organization. The situation was that two years ago the Canadian army was formed. We set out to build that Canadian army, and we expected, as everybody knows, that there would have been activity on the continent of Europe at least in 1943. There was no opportunity whatsoever to give to units of the Canadian army battle experience, in view of the job which they had been given, namely the defence of Britain. The first Canadian division, then the Canadian corps and then the Canadian army itself had a key position in the defence of Britain during those years of 1940, 1941 and 1942, when the danger of invasion was imminent. That threat of invasion diminished as 1942 ran on.

The time came, in the fall of 1942, when I hoped that an opportunity might be made for the use of at least part of the Canadian army elsewhere than in Britain. I had heard a great deal of discussion and much criticism of the fact that the Canadian army was standing idle over there. I had had some questions put to me in the House of Commons by hon. members, by members of His Majesty's loyal opposition, asking what the Canadian army was doing, and why it was not in the fighting which was then going on in North Africa.

I found out that an operation was imminent, and I immediately went to the chief of the imperial general staff with regard to the matter of possible participation of some Canadian forces in that operation. I went to the secretary of state for war. I talked the matter over thoroughly with those gentlemen, and they gave me, as I have said to the house, what I considered good and sufficient reasons why at that time they could not consider the inclusion of a Canadian component with the United States and British components of the forces which were intended to land, and which did later land in North Africa.

Well, the Canadian army still stayed in Britain. We still heard a good deal on this side and a good deal on the other side to the effect that the Canadian army was not doing very much. As a matter of fact, a leading Canadian in Britain at a public function on one occasion even referred to the "Canadian home guard" of the British isles. That was the attitude taken by some people. So far as I was concerned I felt we were right in respect of the attitude we had taken. I felt an opportunity would come, if some operation did not take place on the continent in the spring of 1943. If it did take place in the spring of 1943, it meant, as I said the other day, that Canada's whole investment—by that I mean an investment in lives, not dollars—of ground forces overseas would be put to the hazard in one gigantic operation across the channel, without any of them, practically, having had an opportunity of hearing a shot fired in anger. Of course, that was a situation which would have to be faced, if necessary; because, as I have said, there has to be a baptism of fire; at some time men have to hear the first shot fired. But it did seem to involve at least some responsibility, to see if it were not possible that there might be some battle experience given at least to part of the Canadian forces, if that could be done.

The opportunity came. The operation did not come off in the spring of 1943; at least the plans did not materialize. In lieu thereof there was the operation which was to take place in Sicily. An approach was made immediately to the United Kingdom authorities to suggest that there ought to be a Canadian component in the forces which were going to Sicily. Those representations were accepted, although I shall not go into detail respecting the discussions. The first Canadian division and an armoured formation were sent, and the committee knows the record made by that division and those armoured troops in Sicily and in Italy under Major-General Simmonds.

Those who talk about breaking up the Canadian army ought to think of where Canada would stand at the present time in the eyes of the world and in the eyes of her own soldiers and in the eyes of her own people, if we had not had that opportunity last July to show to the world that, notwithstanding the fact that they had not been permitted to fight for three years, Canadian soldiers were not stale, that they could fight as did their fathers twenty-five years before them, and give a good account of themselves.

When one hears talk about breaking up the Canadian army, one asks himself: What would be the alternative? Just here let me interject that to speak of breaking up the Canadian army is not a correct description of what we are doing. We are, on the contrary, maintaining the army organization and using it as a Canadian contribution along with the corps in the United Kingdom. The alternative was, of course, to keep them all in England, to keep them all for the day when they might all launch one great attack.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I suggest to the minister another alternative: Would it not have been possible to have gone as an army?

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend please permit me to finish what I am saying. We felt that if we could have an opportunity to give battle training to at least a part of the army, not only the non-commissioned officers and men, but the officers themselves and the staffs, they might be available to come back to the United Kingdom—for that was to be where the main thrust was to take place. And I wish to tell the committee that for a good while nobody knew where the main thrust was going to be. As a matter of fact, it was not decided and announced until the Teheran conference. Our idea was that we would have men who would have acquired experience, and who could come back to help lead the forces who had not then had that training, in the great offensive across the channel.

That was done; the first division and an armoured formation were sent, and, as I say, a proud record for Canada was made in July and August of 1943. That involved, I suppose my hon. friend would say, the breaking up of the Canadian army, in that it involved taking one division from that army and leaving only four.

It appeared in the summer of 1943 that nobody knew what was going to happen next. There was talk, as a matter of fact, about collapse by Christmas, and that the war might be over. There was talk, on the other hand, that nobody knew when an operation might take place on the continent, and we faced the situation again of people saying, "Yes, Canada has one division out of five in the war. The other four are safely tucked away in England, and some day those four divisions will have to be thrown into battle without any battle experience." I talked the matter over with the chief of the general staff and my officers at national headquarters. I talked it over with General McNaughton and I decided—I take full responsibility—upon the advice of the chief of the general staff, that for the sake of the morale of the troops in England, for the sake of the morale of the people in Canada, but much more for the sake of the training and the experience which would be obtained and which would be for the benefit of the war effort, because of the preparation we would have and the greater pool on which we could draw for the purpose of the invasion or the offensive in which we might later take part, that the thing to do was to see to it not only that non-commissioned officers and men were given an opportunity to become battle trained and battle experienced, but that our staffs, our divisional staffs and our corps staff were given an opportunity for operating in a battle theatre so that they might know at first hand the handling, not simply in manœuvres, but the tactical handling and administration of units and formations and divisions and corps under actual battle conditions. That was decided upon deliberately.

Representations were made again to those who had the strategic direction of the war in charge, and the result is that to-night Canada has a corps in Italy operating as a self-contained corps with just as much autonomy as the Canadian corps had under Sir Arthur Currie in 1914-18. To-night that corps is contributing many officers to the organization which is going on in the United Kingdom in order that Canada may take part in the great offensive, whenever that time may come. I shall have some announcements to make later on which will indicate that, but I cannot make them to-night. Had this action not been taken, men and senior officers would not have had this experience. The people of Canada now may know that many of the men who will lead their boys into battle will be men who have been under fire in Italy, men who have had opportunity to handle formations, men who have acted on divisional staffs under actual war conditions.

That decision was made by the Canadian government. That decision was made in respect of the Canadian army. The decision was to use the Canadian army where and how it could best be used. I say to my hon. friend that I do not for one instance make any apologies. Perhaps I am saying that a little defiantly, but I do not mean it in that way. I make that statement because of the solemn and serious responsibility which has been upon my shoulders and upon the shoulders of the government. I wish to say earnestly and from the bottom of my heart that I believe that was the decision that ought to have been made. That decision was made soundly in the interests of the Canadian army and in the interests of the cause which the Canadian army is supporting.

My hon. friend asks why we did not take the whole army to Italy. The same argument applies. If you had taken them all to Italy at one time; if you had sent them all into battle at one time, you would not have had the benefit of a proportion of experienced battle-trained officers; you would not have been able to get them under war conditions by degrees. And as a matter of practice, under the situation as we found it, I do not believe there would have been any possibility of sending the whole Canadian army to Italy under the conditions which existed when the division and the corps were sent.

I believe the people of Canada would have been very much concerned if we had sent the whole Canadian force to Italy, if they were in Italy to-night, instead of the one corps that is in Italy taking its place on the right flank of the battle that is going on, with another corps in Great Britain under Canadian army headquarters. That Canadian army headquarters is in a position to direct and support and supervise any corps which our allies decide to entrust to that army. I think it is a compliment to Canadians that we are able to feel that we have an organization, that we have an army headquarters which is so organized that, when the time comes, it will be able to take on the direction and support and carry out those functions which must be exercised by an army headquarters. Under this headquarters will be a Canadian corps and whatever corps of allied troops may be associated with them. I think this is a compliment also to General McNaughton, and I say that quite frankly.

That is the story of the breaking up, so-called, of the Canadian army. I hope it will approve itself to the people of Canada. I know there will be great disappointment that all Canadians are not together. I said to this house the other day, and I emphasize and underline it to-night, that the whole course of this war, the whole fashion of formations and of battle lines to-day is in the form of task forces. There is an integration of forces of different countries. We have the special service force which has been spoken of which is made up partly of United States and partly of Canadian troops. One of the things I learned when I was in Italy was that we do not necessarily have a division fighting as a whole. We may be fighting two brigades of a division, and we may have an armoured brigade from somewhere else put along with it in order that a particular task may be done. In this war Canada will be fighting side by side with the British and United States troops. There are other divisions of active armies that I know about which I cannot disclose and alongside which Canada is fighting at the present time. We cannot manage to have complete homogeneity, but at the same time we can see to it that our men are trained, that our men are fit, that our men get the best experience and are led by officers who have had experience under the actual conditions of war.

I have no doubt there will be many other questions asked in connection with this matter, but I welcome this opportunity to speak, perhaps a little at length, because I believe that when the Canadian people realize just what has happened, and why, when they know that there has been considered and deliberate judgment about this thing, they will accept the decision which has been made, believing that it is for the good of the common cause which, after all, is all that counts.

Mr. DUROCHER: Is the increase in item 1 due solely to additional personnel, or is it due to increases in salaries and wages of men already in the service? I notice that item 2 covers officers and men, but this item 1, apparently covers civil salaries and wages.

Mr. RALSTON: The portion of the increase of $7,000,000 which is due to increases in pay is $552,000. This is due to the reclassification of the positions of something like 2,300 employees. The remainder is due to, first, the growth of army administration; second, the replacement of soldiers by civilians and, third, the inclusion of certain employees who previously were included under another item and who will now be deducted from that item.

Mr. QUELCH: It is not very often that I rise to support the government, but I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister and those who are responsible for the decision to send a Canadian division to Sicily and Italy. I know I was thrilled, and the people with whom I spoke were thrilled when they heard that Canadians were going into action as part of the eighth army, an army that had built up for itself in this war a reputation second to none. It must have been tremendously stimulating to our troops, who were green troops, to know that they were to be under the supreme command of a man who had shown that he would not start an action until he was ready, and then when he did start it, make sure that he was going places. Therefore I think we can feel gratified that our troops were sent forward under that type of leadership, and I hope that when the second corps goes into action it will be under the same kind of leadership. Personally I would have been very uneasy if the Canadian army had gone into action as an army, with the men all green, the commanders all green and no man having proven what he could do. In a war of this kind it has been shown that with a pincers' movement it is quite easy to lose a division and even an army in a short space of time, and I congratulate the minister and his officials upon sending Canadian divisions into Sicily and Italy in the way they did.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to refer for a moment to one of the matters which the minister described as one of the minor matters that had been raised.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps it was not.

Mr. COLDWELL: I want to refer to the order which the minister said was under reconsideration dealing with the writing of letters to the press by soldiers. I have on my desk beside me at the moment a letter from a member of the veterans' guard in which he tells me that in December he wrote a letter to the Saint John Telegraph-Journal. He is not a member of this party, but the letter dealt with some editorials and articles that were appearing in the Saint John newspaper. The letter was not published. But a week or so later, when this man was on duty one night, he was called into the orderly room and given a severe reprimand for having written a letter to this newspaper. As I say, the letter had not been published. The man thought he was entitled to express his views on matters that were of interest to him. He was a veteran of the last war with three and a half years' war service, and was discharged with wounds. He has two sons serving in the Royal Canadian Air Force in this war, one of them operating a Spitfire.

I appeal to the minister to rescind this order. After all, what are we fighting for? We are fighting for democracy, we are told. Are all the people of this country to be allowed to express themselves except the very men who are actually engaged in fighting for our right to express ourselves?

A few days ago I was reading a book written by a prominent man in Great Britain, dealing with public affairs, and in the preface to it he said that very largely the material in the book had been discussed as he was discussing it there because of the numerous political questions that had been asked him when he was addressing meetings in army camps, barracks and aerodromes in Great Britain. Only a short time ago I read an article in which it was said that one thing the British were achieving in this war that our friends in the United States were not achieving was that, like Cromwell's army, the British army was becoming a thinking army, knowing exactly for what it fought, and why.

Consequently I ask the minister to consider rescinding this order. It is anti-democratic in a war of this kind when we are fighting for the principles of democracy—the right to freedom of thought, freedom of speech and freedom of association. Surely the man who is fighting for these ideals ought to be permitted to exercise some freedom in that regard. I rose to underline one of the points made by the hon. member for Weyburn and to appeal to the minister to consider doing away with this order.

So far as writing to members of parliament is concerned, if that is covered by the king's regulations and orders, I think we should not slavishly follow K.R. and O. of the imperial army. As my hon. friend pointed out, we have a civilian army; we represent the people of Canada in their capacity as civilians, and the men in the armed forces should, I think, have the right to write to their member and bring to his attention, not matters connected with details of military administration or anything of that sort, but matters that fall within their orbit very often, sometimes dealing with their families. May I just say, since I have been critical, that I have appreciated the manner in which the minister has himself dealt with letters of that kind having to do with matters of family need at home, and so on. Invariably the minister has given the kindliest consideration to that kind of approach, made through a member of parliament sometimes, and I wish to thank him for it. But I would suggest that he go beyond that and remove the ban on men in the armed forces writing to the press and writing to their members of parliament.

Mr. RALSTON: I will read the memorandum so that hon. members will understand that the matter is being given serious consideration:

> Objections have been taken to this order on the grounds that it prohibits publication, without permission, of articles or material not of a military character. This order has recently been reconsidered by representatives of the three services.

So that the order has been reconsidered and certain recommendations are being made. I think the words "or otherwise" are the words that were objected to.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has the Canadian army in Italy any veterinary service? I understand that the United States army has a veterinary service which looks after meat and dairy products for the army, and meat and dairy hygiene generally. It also looks after the water supply, perishable foods and things of that sort. Has the Canadian army a similar service in Italy?

Mr. RALSTON: I did not see anything of the veterinary service. A member of this house, the hon. member for London, is one of the officers in charge of the Canadian Army Service Corps on the supply side. For a considerable time—this is another side of veterinary activities—mule and pack trains had to be used. But if my hon. friend is speaking of the inspection end of the veterinary service, I have not personal knowledge of it. I shall be glad to inquire and find out.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has Canada any war dogs at the front like other armies have, the United States army, for instance?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not in a position to speak of that. I cannot say yes or no.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am in the same position. I was asked the question and was not able to answer it.

Mr. TUCKER: Both yesterday, and time and time again to-day we have heard a lot of members suggest that many of the non-operational troops in Canada were not doing anything. I have served almost from one end of Canada to the other with operational and non-operational troops. I am, for example, at present with 1 training brigade. Some members seem to think that all that an army organization has to do to get a plethora of unnecessary people is to ask for them. Let me say that we started out with an organization in 1 training brigade that was so short of help that training cadre, cooks, clerks, officers and everybody connected with the establishment had to work Saturdays, Sundays and at nights to get the work done. I do not think I ever worked so hard in all my life before as I did on the headquarters of 1 training brigade. We were going night and day, and sometimes in a climate which is not so pleasant—Nova Scotia in the fall. Perhaps if hon. members from Nova Scotia had to be out at night in the pouring rain, they would not appreciate conditions around there so much as when they are inside their own houses. In any event, I can say that the attempts to get an adequate number of people to do the work which is supposed to be done, and the fight with the committee in charge, reminded me very much of the fights which I understand take place to get certain matters past the treasury board. Indeed, it would seem to me harder to persuade the committee to supply an adequate staff for this work than to get authorizations from the treasury board. I speak only of things which I know. Certainly everybody connected with the so-called non-operational group was working very hard and it was extremely difficult to persuade the committee to provide extra assistance.

That raises the question of whether people of low categories should be employed in this non-operational work. Remember that we were attempting to train young fellows, to prepare them, perhaps, to go right into action. They were young men in category "A" who had already gone through the basic, advanced and special to arms training centres. They were in the pink of condition, and the idea was to give them a last month of training before they might have to go into action. It was found that many of the people over age or of low category could not keep up with these young fellows—they could not train them; they could not lead them; they could not do their job adequately at times. When you suggest that none but low category people be assigned to non-operational work, you are simply proposing to train the finest men in Canada with people who are over age and of low category, and it just cannot be done.

On another matter, I was very glad that the hon. member for Acadia, a returned soldier from the last war, agreed with the government, as I believe every old soldier will agree, that no matter how much you try to train people and prepare them for actual fighting, you learn to fight only by fighting. You can learn more in regard to how to handle yourself under combat conditions by one day's experience under fire that you will probably learn in a month under similar conditions of training. I know that a real attempt has been made to simulate war conditions in the training given our troops. But, like the hon. member for Acadia, I believe that practically everybody who thought of the possibility of the whole Canadian army going into action together, without some prior experience by various units, was very much worried; and conversely, when it was learned that our troops would be sent into action piecemeal, getting their baptism of fire without the risks which would result from the entire force being thrown in at once, with the possibility of something terrible happening to them, everybody was relieved and shared the views of the hon. member for Acadia.

In the last war the Canadian corps was built up gradually to the pitch at which it finally arrived; first a battalion, then a division, and so on; they gradually became accustomed to the work they had to do. I do not move in exalted military circles or have the chance of consulting with the "brass hats". But, like the hon. member for Weyburn, I do read a bit, and I am sure that every person who reflected seriously on the subject felt that the action which had been taken was much the wiser course, and I think the Minister of National Defence should be told that in no uncertain terms by this committee.

A word as to the question of suggesting to the troops that, every time anyone is not satisfied with something which happens to him—such as this afternoon, when we heard of somebody's complaint that he did not get his supper on time or something of that sort—he should be encouraged to write to his member of parliament or to the newspapers. I wonder how many people who have had service in the army would expect much discipline or morale in the forces if that sort of thing were encouraged. Regular channels of communication are provided whereby a soldier is absolutely guaranteed that, if he has a legitimate grievance, it will be looked into. He has the right to appeal, and if he is not listened to he can take his grievance step by step to a higher authority. That means that it goes to the people who can look into it and investigate it. If he goes over the heads of those who know all about it and writes to his member of parliament, what will happen? If one person does it, the whole army is entitled to do it.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar just mentioned something of that kind. My attitude regarding complaints made to me as a member of parliament is to say, "The law of the land has laid down full protection for you as a soldier, and you should avail yourself of the regular channels of communication. So that I as a member encourage these people to use those channels of communication. But every once in a while, someone ignores the law and writes to a member like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and gets consideration of the complaint, as he says, from the minister; and what does it lead to? The soldiers were told by members who encouraged their correspondents to abide by the laws of the land are bound to feel that they have some grievance. They see that so-and-so wrote to another member, and he went over the heads of everybody else and dealt with the minister, and got things adjusted, and they conclude that if one can do it, all can do it. What would then happen to the discipline of the army?

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggests that we should not pay much attention to what is laid down in K.R. and O. of the British army. I do not say we should follow it slavishly, but I suggest that the regulations contained in K.R. and O. of the British army are there as the result of generations upon generations of experience in handling a fighting force. I also suggest to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar two things: one, that no troops are better looked after by their officers or were better looked after in every way in past generations as compared with other fighting troops the world over than British troops; second, that because of, or perhaps the hon. member may say, in spite of these conditions in the past from time to time in various wars there was built up, in the British army, a body of fighting men not excelled by any equivalent force of fighting men anywhere else in the world. The history of what they have done on various battle fields for the last several hundred years is enough to establish that. Nobody can suggest that they, individually or as an army, suffered unduly by virtue of these regulations. In other words, you cannot run an army like you run the houses of parliament or—

Some hon. MEMBERS: The C.C.F.

Mr. TUCKER: —or like you can run—

Some hon. MEMBERS: The C.C.F.

Mr. TUCKER: No: I say that the C.C.F. do not run their party like that, either. I venture to say that there is pretty stringent discipline in their party.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is democracy in our party.

Mr. TUCKER: I think, for example, of the hon. member for North Battleford, who did not agree with the leaders of the party, and was thrown out because she persisted in disagreeing with them, and does not sit with them to-day. But I do not know of anybody in the Liberal party who was thrown out of our party because they did not agree with it in all matters—and there have been lots of chances of throwing people out.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is Mr. Hepburn in or out?

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Hepburn was not thrown out. He took himself out.

Mr. GRAYDON: And took the Liberal party with him.

Mr. TUCKER: Coming back to the matter I was discussing, I agree it might be possible to consider these regulations in the light of changed conditions and that this should be done; but having had something to do with the army in the last war as a private, and something to do with the army in this war, I would say that the first place that a soldier should be encouraged to go if he has any difficulties at all is to the officer who is in immediate charge of him, who is told over and over again that his duty is to encourage his men to come to him with their most intimate problems; and who should feel that it is his duty to convince his men that they can come to him and confide in him. There should be a feeling of real comradeship. If the man feels he is not getting a square deal from the officer immediately in charge of him, he has the right to go to the officer who is next higher in rank; and if he is still not satisfied that he is receiving fair treatment, it is his right to go higher and higher and higher. But by making it necessary for that soldier to go in the first instance to the officer, the officer will probably be able to clear up the difficulty there and then. There is, however, something more important than that. If the soldier is taught to use, and if he tries to use that means of obtaining redress, he will find nine times out of ten that the difficulty under which he is suffering will be cleared up by his own officer. This would lead to greater mutual confidence and it would enable them to learn to get together and to trust one another. But if you encourage every soldier to believe that if he has some sort of grievance against his officer he can write to his member of parliament, and the member of parliament can go after the officer commanding that battalion and get that officer into trouble, what sort of army will you have very shortly?

There is another matter that I would call to the minister's attention, and I think he will agree that it is most important. I understand that in the beginning applications for farm leave and postponement of service were sent by the district officers commanding to national defence headquarters and were then referred back to the national selective boards. That meant presumably that troops, no matter from what part of Canada they came, received the same consideration. The decision has now been made, embodied in a routine order, that applications for farm leave shall be dealt with by district officers commanding. That may have been necessary at a time when there was, for example, real danger of attack on the Pacific coast, leaving it to the district officer commanding there, or the G.O.C., Pacific command, to say whether the exigencies of the service would permit him to allow anyone to go on farming leave or to have postponement of service by reason of the fact that he was needed at home on the farm. But the effect of that has been this. There were, I understand, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 6,000 people who were granted extended leave.

If so, it would appear to me that there has been a good deal more generosity in the granting of such leave in other places than to men in the troops in the Pacific command. I do not think there is any doubt about it. That may have been justified when the exigencies of the service were different from what they are to-day; but I would urge the minister to see to it that applications for postponement, or for seeding leave, or harvest leave, or leave on compassionate grounds, be dealt with in some uniform manner throughout Canada, so that it would not be possible for one D.O.C. to turn down all applications almost en masse, while another D.O.C., who is more favourably inclined to or more impressed with the needs of the farming industry, grants far more applications than are granted elsewhere.

I do not know the figures; but if there has been granted the number that the minister says, then my experience leads me to say that if other constituencies had the same experience in getting farm leave granted, the number would not be 6,000 but more like 1,000. That is probably due to the fact that such a large proportion of troops called up from my constituency and in Saskatchewan have been serving in the Pacific command.

I do not ask for special consideration. I simply suggest that the same attitude be taken toward the troops everywhere, no matter where they may be in Canada, and that there should be some supervision over the decisions of the district officers commanding. That is possible now because the danger of invasion and the exigencies of the service are such that perhaps conditions are pretty much the same throughout Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not catch the suggestion as to who the supervising authority should be. Did the hon. member mean that it should come back to headquarters?

Mr. TUCKER: I think it is better that it should come back to headquarters in Ottawa and they can see that similar treatment is given to the people in all military districts.

Mr. MUTCH: I rather think that if the members of the house generally are labouring under the impression that a large number of those in the forces are desirous of writing directly to members of parliament, they might be shocked in some instances to know the reaction of large numbers of the forces to that somewhat unique animal the member of parliament-in-general. Individually, I suppose, the average member is as well regarded by those persons whom he knows in the forces as any other member of society; but as a group, it is very revealing and produces a good deal of thought to sit by, and I will not say in disguise but at least unknown, and listen sometimes to the comments which one hears with respect to the activities of those of us who occupy seats in this house.

I should say at once that I welcome the suggestion of the minister to-night that the objectionable words in the regulations quoted, with respect to the publishing of letters sent home and to private individuals by persons in the forces, are likely to be altered, because under the strict conditions of censorship which now exist, it suggests rather too much that the forces themselves are not sufficiently security-minded and not sufficiently patriotically-minded to be able to exercise that type of discretion which would make it possible for the letter which is written to the home town to receive that degree of publicity which the family of the man or the man himself might welcome.

This brings me to another consideration which I think is of importance, and that is the general method or lack of method in keeping the personnel serving in the active forces informed as to what is going on at home, and particularly with respect to Canada's war effort as a whole and in some degree of things political. I am not one of those persons who ever felt, even in times of peace, that there was either sense or justification in the virtual disenfranchisement of those persons who served in the active forces, and if I was not sympathetic with it in times of peace, I am even less sympathetic in time of war.

I am not aware that soldiers of modern nations in this war such as Russia fight any less well because they are active members of a political organization—I said a political organization in that particular case, but I think it would apply where there is more choice. I do not think soldiers fight any better for a society which they hope will come in some nebulous time in the future than they will fight for a state of society which they help to create and in which they have a vital interest.

As I went among the overseas forces in the United Kingdom in the last few months I had an opportunity of sitting in at a considerable number of discussion groups. The discussion groups to which I refer that are held in the Canadian army are known as leaderless-situation groups. Half a dozen men are put in a room and examined by people trained to make such examinations, in order to see which one of these groups under certain circumstances will assert himself as a natural leader, and which of the men will fail to measure up to these tests. One of the tests frequently used, not only in our army but in other armies, is that of the leaderless-discussion group. A half dozen men would be put in a room for about thirty-five minutes and told that they could talk about anything they liked, but that they must express opinions on the subject chosen. They are told also that they are being observed. If they were not observed they would not be there.

If I can trust my memory I attended twelve or thirteen such groups. Those groups were composed of young chaps who had been overseas anywhere from two and a half to four years. Without exception one of the subjects which was nominated by someone was the question of reestablishment and rehabilitation after the war. That subject was not always discussed. They get very much interested in subjects like whether we can defeat the hun by air power without an attack on the continent. There were a variety of subjects, but I want to point out that that particular one was always mentioned and very often discussed.

If I may say so, I was shocked to hear these men talking about the days after the war in the exact terms of the days before the war which we remember rather sadly. I sometimes had an opportunity to hear some extreme statement from these boys. They would urge that we must attempt to do something which I knew that the people of Canada have already done, perhaps two or three years ago, for example, in connection with the expansion of industry. I would ask the question, "Do you know So-and-so", and they would almost invariably say, "no". I might then give them a word of explanation, perhaps in the discussion period, and they would say, "You have been in Canada recently; what about this and that?" Their curiosity was insatiable. Their interests tended always to the future days rather than to what had gone before. I found very little recrimination among any of the boys against society as a whole, for the experience through which many of them had gone. I found an appalling lack of knowledge of what was going on. And when I drew attention to that they would say, "Why don't they send somebody over to tell us?" Well, you know in a democracy who "they" are. There is only one "they" who can do anything under a democratic governmental system.

When discussions were over somebody would say, "Don't you think there is something in it. Someone should be sent to tell them." I would answer, "Canada has only been able to do what she has done by virtue of the fact that every man and woman in the country has supported the authorities there." It is not the government that has done the job, but the Canadian people; the direction and executive part of it has been done by the government, but if we are going to tell the story of what has been done we must tell the story of what has been accomplished by the executive action of the government. Suppose some one was sent to tell that story. Suppose, even that, some of my hon. friends to the left or I should attempt to write that story to these men. The cry would go up from different sections of this country that the Canadian army was developing a system of political commissars with all its implications. Therefore I do say that it is perhaps impractical to do that. However, I think every possible means should be taken to put the story before these boys. A large percentage of them have no real assurance of coming back. The war has scarcely started for them. In spite of that they are thinking in terms of the future, and to those who come back and to their children it is of vital interest. They should have the information; they should be encouraged to discuss it, to think about it and to talk about it. That is a little different from saying they should be encouraged to write to the newspapers or members of parliament about personal and individual grievances. I know something of the problems of discipline in the army. I have had some opportunities to study some of the disciplinary actions in the army and at a later date I shall probably have something to say about that.

We ought to cultivate the idea of getting to these men, somehow, more of the details of the nation's affairs. These men have a bigger stake in the future of this country than any of us. We cannot get this information out to them by radio because the majority of them who are situated in England have no access to it. We are not getting it to them, unfortunately, to the extent that they desire, in the way of pamphlets or general information. It is important to the morale of the army in much the same way as is the mail which was referred to by the minister and the leader of the opposition. I do not need to stress that because enough has been said about it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are they getting a good supply of newspapers over there?

Mr. MUTCH: Newspapers do not go across. The trouble with newspapers is that by the time they reach them they are so old and remote from the troop's knowledge and experience that they are scarcely news. I saw this experiment made: papers of Ottawa and Montreal were laid on the table in an officers' mess within thirty hours of the time they came from the presses. They were placed in a conspicuous pile. One young man who had been over there for two or three years came in and glanced at them. His face lit up. It was something from home. He looked at them, sort of glanced through them casually and then went over and read the British paper which he was accustomed to reading, because there was nothing in his recent experience and understanding that attracted him to the Canadian papers. The headlines did not relate to anything in his daily experience. Four years is a long time, and unfortunately for us in this house and, to a certain degree the people of Canada as a whole, too much of the information that reaches the men about what is going on here is of the sensational type and, I am sorry to say, not always in a reliable form. You cannot be surprised if they write and request news and information, if they wish to be informed on current opinion. We should not be surprised if they feel the responsibility of citizenship in this country. We should be glad. I have come back with it firmly fixed in my mind that everything should be done to make these men and women feel that they are fully enfranchised citizens of Canada. I am firmly of the opinion that they must have a full understanding of what is going on at home.

Before I sit down I should like to mention one more experience I had. Not very long ago I sat in the mess of a bomber command. A visitor in the mess was a chap who had just come back from the near east. I never heard a man get a better hearing than he received when he bragged, frankly, bragged, a Canadian among Canadians, about what it felt like as a Canadian to land in a port in the near east, or at a station somewhere in Africa and walk up from the landing-strip, or from the docks, between crates piled on either side like an avenue on which were letters four or five inches high saying, "made in Canada". That sort of thing got a reaction which would be soul-warming to those people who produced the goods that were there. The discussions with respect to those people who sometimes through mistaken or selfish ideas have stopped for a while producing these goods, would be shocking if heard.

Mr. PERLEY: I wish to say a brief word on this item. I listened carefully to the minister when he made his first statement yesterday and I have also listened to him to-day. The more we listen, the more information we get. I think the minister made a frank and proper statement in reply to the hon. member for Weyburn. It was informative, and I believe it would have been well if he had made it a little earlier rather than have it prompted by the hon. member. I certainly appreciate, and I think we all do, the difficulty the minister and the government have in carrying on the war. The minister has the first responsibility. He has to organize the Canadian army and keep it supplied with reinforcements, the stream-line training he speaks about. That has to be ready and he does not know the minute he will be called on. I think it was very fine that he set out in an instructive way to give us the information which he did. We have heard a good deal with respect to soldiers, or other men in the armed forces writing to members of the House of Commons, or taking their difficulties to district officers commanding. The minister has said that teamwork is necessary, and I think hon. members ought to be patriotic enough to display a desire for teamwork.

May I tell the committee how I have dealt with many of these men who have come to me—and I have no doubt other hon. members are approached in the same way. All of us receive many letters. I have three on my desk which came yesterday. I have not yet received my western mail for to-day because the train is late, but I suppose there will be more when that mail arrives. To be quite frank, I reply to these men or, if they come to my office—and a great many of them have come—I listen to their stories. Some of them think they have grievances. I say to them, "Well, you may have a grievance", if I think they have one. I tell them how to go about obtaining redress, and point out to them that the first thing for them to do is to discuss the matter with their district officer commanding.

That is what I tell them because, as I have said on many occasions, if the Minister of National Defence were to listen to me or to any other member of parliament, would not this whole thing be a farce? There have to be rules and regulations, and the minister is familiar with them. It is the duty of hon. members to tell these men just how to go about obtaining redress for their grievances. While I have had cases brought to my attention where I did not believe they had received a square deal after the matter had been taken up with the district officer commanding, yet on the other hand I believe many of them have received just treatment.

I was pleased to hear the minister say that some action will be taken with respect to having men return on leave to take part in seeding operations. This afternoon we heard a long discussion in connection with the forestry corps, some of whom were turned over to do farming operations. I make an appeal to the minister to have the information sent out in plenty of time so that the farmers will receive a square deal in getting assistance from some of the non-operational troops we now have in Canada.

I could go into detail by pointing out that in my opinion some of the boys overseas, who have been there for three or four years, should be returned to Canada. In some instances fathers may have died, or something of that kind happened, and where fathers have died widows would be left on farms. In those circumstances it is, of course, difficult to carry on.

I make a further appeal to the minister. Yesterday he said he proposed to enlist 60,000 men this year. I trust, when that is done, the call-up will be carried on in a manner which will not bring about the discrimination and unfairness which obtained in respect of the call-up made last year. At page 190 of Hansard are to be found figures showing the call-up in the thirteen military districts. My observations apply more particularly to the western provinces. We find according to those figures that in a western district with only one-third of the population of districts in certain parts of eastern Canada the percentage at Regina was 8, whereas in the east it was only 5·7. Those are percentages taken for 100 troops called up.

Possibly the minister will recall the statement made by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and he might follow the suggestions made by that hon. member. When this year's call-up is made I wish to see a fair and equitable call in all military districts. I make that appeal to the minister, and trust he will take into consideration what I have said.

Mr. RALSTON: On the last point, I do not wish to pass the buck, but I must say that those call-ups are made by means of requisitions on the Minister of Labour by the Department of National Defence. It is the Department of Labour and national selective service which actually carry on the call-up in any particular district. So that I am afraid all the army can do is to ask for so many men to report at a certain centre at a certain time—and that might be at Vancouver, or anywhere else. National selective service calls them up from any part of Canada. We do not regulate where they are to come from. We only specify where we went them to report. However, I shall pass on to the Minister of Labour what my hon. friend has said. There is nothing I can do further than that.

I have already made a statement with respect to seeding leave. That will be taken into consideration almost at once, and I think the farmers, who were getting a pretty square deal from the army—and I hope my hon. friend does not think they are not—will be treated fairly—

Mr. PERLEY: I did not say that.

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. RALSTON: —particularly having regard to the fact that there is very liberal, shall I say—if my hon. friend does not mind that term—

Mr. PERLEY: Progressive, probably.

Mr. RALSTON: —a very liberal exemption or deferment for men who are engaged in farming. However, the point has been raised to-night, and I shall endeavour to look into it and give it the best possible consideration.

I am obliged to the hon. member for Rosthern, the hon. member for Winnipeg South and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle for their remarks respecting representations made to members of parliament. As I said to the leader of the opposition a little while ago, I wish to call to the attention of the committee a paragraph in K. R. and O. to which I believe some hon. members have been referring. I would point out that the provision is not against the writing of letters to members of parliament. I refer to section 423 (b) which states that attempts to obtain favourable consideration of any application by the use of outside influence are forbidden, and, if resorted to, will be regarded as an admission on the part of the applicant that the case is not good on its merits, and that it will be dealt with accordingly. That is the section under which men offend if they write to members of parliament, or others outside the service, if thereby they seek, in the words of the regulation "to obtain favourable consideration", a promotion, a transfer, or something of that kind.

I have had experience in my own constituency; do not let hon. members think I do not understand this matter. I appeal to members of parliament to have these young men realize that this thing called "pull"—and that is what they call it—does not exist. As sure as the world, when you find a young man who goes to a member of parliament, or writes to the minister, and as a result thereof some favourable consideration ensues, just as sure as the world he tells someone else the result, and the story goes that Bill has got something by way of "pull." It does not matter how regular the procedure may have been. The suggestion arises because the action was taken by a member of parliament or someone outside the service.

I have received representations from time to time from members and I do endeavour to deal with them. I do not for a moment question the right of hon. members to write me with respect to these young men, but I do believe the teamwork mentioned by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle could help us all so that these young men might not be encouraged to write to members of parliament respecting matters having to do with their positions in the army—and particularly those communications dealing with promotions or for special consideration of some sort.

I say in that connection—and this is almost a humiliating confession—that we almost have to apologize to Canadian military headquarters in England when we make an inquiry about any individual, for fear someone will think that influence is being used within the meaning of section 423(b). I know that should not be so; but the less there is of that sort of thing, the easier it will be to run the army. It would mean that everyone would feel they were being dealt with on exactly the same basis.

I had an instance—a very sorry one—in my own experience, in which I was written to by an individual. I did not see the letter. It was passed to the branch concerned. Next thing I found out was that the man had forfeited fourteen days' pay for having written to his member of parliament. That was serious for him, particularly in view of the fact that his member of parliament happened to be the Minister of National Defence. He is still out the fourteen days' pay. He said he thought he was writing to the Minister of National Defence—and so he was; but the letter got into a groove, and reached someone who was pretty tough on the regulations, with the result that a forfeiture of pay was imposed. I think it would do us all good; I think it would do the army good if we endeavoured to teach the provisions of this section 423(b) to the soldiers in our constituencies. We should ask them, not to not write to us, but not to write to ask for favourable consideration in connection with army matters, not to make representations outside.

As the hon. member for Rosthern says, there is a plain line of procedure laid down. It is pretty old, but it is pretty sound. It promotes confidence between the man and his officer, and puts the officer in the position of being a trustee and a guardian for the man. He is his adviser and friend. Generally a man's complaint is considered and he gets satisfaction. I know that sometimes a man must be persistent. He may have a platoon officer who is not very sympathetic and he may have to go to his company officer, but in the end he gets through and the grievance is redressed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wish to support what the hon. member for Winnipeg South has said about getting information to the men in our armed forces. I understand there is a department known as the department of public relations. I should like a statement from the minister about what is being done and whether every use possible is being made of this department to get information to the armed forces in the different fields. The longer this war lasts, the more important this will be.

Another matter I wished to take up concerns increases in pay. An increase was announced last year, but this was contingent upon the officer commanding making a recommendation. I understand in some cases the increase was ten cents a day after three months' service, and in other cases after six months' service. I should like to have an assurance from the minister that this increase is now in general effect throughout the service, both in the army and the N.R.M.A. forces.

In connection with writing to members of parliament my experience has been that the men who write to me are ignorant of the machinery which they could use to approach their officers. The hon. member for Rosthern has said that the men are told what to do, but I have found that many of them do not know what to do. They thought they were supposed to go to the sergeant-major or the sergeant, and they got told in sergeant-major language what they can do with their letters. It seems to me that in many of the camps there has not been sufficient instruction given to the men and they are entirely at a loss to know what the procedure is. If the men were given more instructions; if they knew what their rights and privileges were and that there would be redress for a particular situation, then when letters come to members of parliament they could advise the men to take up their case in the proper way. I tell men who write to me that if they cannot get access to the officials in that way I shall be glad to take up the matter. I find that in most cases when they try the proper procedure they get fairly quick action.

I should like to support what has been said this evening with regard to compassionate leave. There seems to be considerable difference in the action taken by various commands in connection with men applying for leave on compassionate grounds, or for spring and harvest leave. I would support any move that might be made to make this procedure more uniform, either by having these applications go through headquarters or by giving definite instructions to the units with regard to the action that should be taken.

Several demands have been made in this house—I made one myself in 1940—for free transportation for our soldiers when on leave or furlough. Surely these men and women who are offering everything should be granted free transportation on our railroads.

Mr. MUTCH: Would you apply that to N.R.M.A.?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Embarkation leave.

Mr. MUTCH: You referred to the men and women who were offering everything and I was wondering if you would include them both.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The N.R.M.A. men are to be sent overseas if they are required. Canada is a country of great distances and some of these men are being discriminated against. It seems to me that the least we can do for these people is to grant them free transportation. Thousands of our men have been lost in the last year, and I hate to think that some of them were denied the privilege of seeing their loved ones before they went overseas because the cost of transportation was too great. The minister stated this afternoon that the matter was under consideration, but it has been under consideration for over a year. Nothing has been done about it. Some reduction was made in 1941, but I think we should go a little further. It may be said that we should not encourage increased travel in these days, but I am sure the civilian population would be ready to step aside if necessary so that these men might go home on their last leave or furlough.

The last thing I wish to refer to is something disgraceful that occurred recently in a Montreal court. Last week a discharged soldier was sent to gaol for two months for wearing a uniform illegally. No doubt he was wearing the uniform illegally because he had been discharged two weeks previously. When this particular soldier was demobilized the winter clothing allowance was only $35, but I understand it has been raised to $65. When a man is discharged in Canada in the winter time $35 is not sufficient to buy his civilian outfit. Surely such a thing should not happen in this land of ours. The regulations should be changed so that this thing cannot occur again. I understand that some action is being taken. The Minister of Justice should be notified of this and if the sentence cannot be remitted, I think some other action should be taken so that the men in our fighting forces will know that such a thing cannot happen again.

Mr. RALSTON: Did the hon. member bring that to our attention before?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No. There was an editorial in the Montreal Star of February 5. I have not the name of the soldier.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is only a report by a newspaper. The hon. member should read the judgment and the circumstances.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I read the judgment.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. WRIGHT: A short time ago the minister stated that his department would requisition the number of men required in each district from the selective service. I should like to know upon what the requisition is based. Does it take into consideration the number of voluntary enlistments in the military district, or is it based upon the population in the district? What is the basis of these requisitions? It seems to me that requisitions are made against certain districts where there has been a large voluntary enlistment. They naturally feel that they must fill the requisition. I think there should be a different basis for making the requisitions from the various military districts.

I wish to say something about agricultural leave. Last year, as I understand it, the person who made application for agricultural leave applied to the officer commanding. In many cases the officer commanding flatly refused to consider the application and it never reached the district officer commanding. I agree with the hon. member for Rosthern that a different method should be used this year to bring about more uniform procedure in the granting of agricultural leave. I had several cases brought to my notice last year of men being granted agricultural leave to work on a farm where there were only thirty to forty acres under cultivation, while in other cases applications were refused when the men wanted agricultural leave to work on farms where their fathers had a section or a section and a half under cultivation; yet they received no consideration. I would urge again that a more uniform method be used in the granting of agricultural leave whereby the needs of each particular case might be given consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the requisitions, I want the committee to understand that all that the Department of National Defence does in the matter is to say that we want so many men at a certain training centre. The national selective service directorate decide where to get these men. They may not get them from that particular district at all. The Department of National Defence has nothing to do with designating the district from which the men shall be drawn. It simply says: We want so many men at a certain training centre.

With regard to having a more uniform system for considering applications for agricultural leave, I have the point made by the hon. member for Rosthern and the hon. member for Melfort, and I will look into that and have it brought before the officers who will be dealing with the matter very shortly.

The hon. member for Yorkton asked in regard to increased pay, and I might as well put that on the record now. He asked as to the percentage of men overseas and in Canada who are receiving the increased rates of pay provided under the order of last year. The survey is not complete, but it gives a fair cross-section which enables us to tell pretty well what the whole situation is.

Overseas, the number in receipt of the basic rate of $1.50 is 90·5 per cent; the number in receipt of $1.40 is 4·5 per cent; the number in receipt of $1.30 is 5 per cent. In the C.W.A.C. the number in receipt of $1.25 is 50 per cent; the number in receipt of $1.10 is 7·1 per cent; the number in receipt of $1.05 is 42·9 per cent. To get this C.W.A.C. figure, for the purpose of getting these results they took about half the personnel over there. It may not be quite an accurate cross-section, but it would be pretty nearly so.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why are the women not paid on an equal footing with the men in the army?

Mr. RALSTON: As I have explained before, a quick answer would be that it is not the practice in connection with other women's corps. It is the same with the ATS and the Wrens. The theory was, in plain English, that women were not adaptable to all forms of service. While they did exceedingly well the jobs that they could do, they were not as versatile, if I may put it in that way, as the men, having regard to the different forms of heavy service that the men have to do. That is the only answer I know. I have made the same answer to the hon. member for North Battleford and to the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any difference between the pay of the Wrens, the women's division of the air force and the C.W.A.C. for equal ranks?

Mr. RALSTON: No, none; they are on an even basis. My hon. friend will remember that they were all increased last year. They were receiving 66⅔ per cent of the men's pay and that was increased to 80 per cent. Tradeswomen get the same trades pay as the tradesmen.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the government under consideration raising the pay of the women generally to that of the men?

Mr. RALSTON: No. Their basic pay is 80 per cent of a man's pay.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope that answer is a little more elastic than it sounds.

Mr. RALSTON: Things are always under consideration, I suppose.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is active and passive consideration, and quite a difference between them.

Mr. RALSTON: In Canada the number in receipt of the basic rate of $1.50 is 65·7 per cent; the number in receipt of $1.40, 9·1 per cent; the number in receipt of $1.30, 25·2 per cent.

In Canada the women's army corps has 60·1 per cent in receipt of $1.20; 11·5 per cent in receipt of $1.10; and 28·4 per cent in receipt of $1.05.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There seems to be quite a difference in the pay of the C.W.A.C. overseas and those in Canada. There is a larger percentage on the lower rate of pay overseas. Is there any explanation for that?

Mr. RALSTON: Overseas 50 per cent were in receipt of the top rate, as compared with 60 per cent in Canada. Perhaps it was because there were more tradeswomen in Canada. But when I think of it, that, of course, does not apply with regard to the basic rate. I cannot give the explanation of that offhand, but I shall make inquiries.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do the C.W.A.C. get a clothing allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: They get a cash allowance for clothing.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have their uniforms to last for the duration of the war?

Mr. RALSTON: No; the uniform lasts as long as it lasts. When the inspecting officer decides that it is no longer serviceable, they get another.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the government give them another uniform when that is warranted?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: You should not ask ladies to put up with a uniform until it is worn out.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, no, I do not say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has any consideration been given to granting an allowance in respect of girls with dependent mothers?

Mr. RALSTON: On July 1, 1943, provision was put into effect bringing dependent mothers within the meaning of dependents under the regulations.

The hon. member for Yorkton asked in regard to the steps taken to get the news to the troops. The Canadian Press bulletin, as the committee knows, is cabled overseas to Canadian troops. It is published twice a week; I am not sure but that it is oftener than that. It has a very wide circulation among all three services, particularly the army, because they are more concentrated. The air force find it more difficult to get it when they are serving with R.A.F. squadrons. The bulletin is greatly appreciated by the troops and has done a genuine service.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many copies are printed?

Mr. RALSTON: I think probably there is one copy for every four or five men.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it printed overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: The news is assembled here and sent overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would it be possible to have a copy of the news which is sent overseas circulated to the members of this house, in order that we may see what it contains?

Mr. RALSTON: I will try to do better still. My hon. friend has put the idea in my mind. We can get a few copies of the bulletins sent over in a bomber. I should like hon. members to see the bulletin. I take a little credit for this Canadian Press bulletin. I was over in 1940 and I was shocked and ashamed to be asked in November by some of our boys who were guarding an aerodrome, "Who won the world series?" I decided that if the Canadian troops were that badly informed, we had better get a newspaper and get it quickly.

Mr. COLDWELL: They did not ask who had won the election in 1940?

Mr. MARTIN: Who did win the world series?

Mr. RALSTON: It was in 1940.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Did the minister know who won the world series?

Mr. RALSTON: I could tell them then, yes. Hon. members may be interested in a publication which has been going for some months overseas, "Canadian Affairs", which seems to have been of considerable interest to the troops. It is published under the auspices of the wartime information. Perhaps members of the committee have seen it. The second issue of the home edition is just out. It deals with articles which perhaps are more for study groups, as has been suggested, but it has a good deal of factual information as well.

Mr. MUTCH: Is any arrangement being made for that pamphlet, "Canadian Affairs," to be distributed to the troops overseas in the same fashion as the news sheet is?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: As the Canadian Press bulletin is?

Mr. MUTCH: Yes, in the same generous measure.

Mr. RALSTON: I am assuming that it will be.

Mr. MUTCH: As a matter of fact, at the moment it is not.

Mr. RALSTON: As a matter of fact, the distribution so far has been mostly to officers, has it not?

Mr. MUTCH: Yes, to officers, by whom the reading is casual; but every copy that gets to the troops is "read to pieces", because in it they get some elements of opinion as well as news.

Mr. RALSTON: I am glad to get that testimonial to it, and consideration will be given to sending it out on a larger scale. As a matter of fact, we have only just commenced using it in Canada. The first issue of the home edition, dated January 15, is in my hands now.

In Italy the only really Canadian paper there was the Red Patch, a little paper published in Naples. It was gotten out by the first division and was most creditable as a purely house organ. In addition to that they had the Eighth Army News. It had a small box section for Canadian news, but that was pretty small. There has now been established the Maple Leaf, and the first copy was issued on January 14. It is published at Naples and is serviced by Canadian Press with home news; it will also be a house organ; that is, it will have some news of the units at the same time. It is more along the lines of the United States Stars and Stripes, which is published for the American army.

I think that answers the question as to the way in which news is being gotten to the troops. In addition, broadcasts are being made from England from time to time, but often these are not heard by the troops unless they are out of the line, whereas the Maple Leaf and the Red Patch get up the line to the troops, and are eagerly read. I found in North Africa, when I was in the reinforcement camps, a great shortage of reading matter in the form of magazines like the Reader's Digest and other like and light literature. Everything hon. members can do to assist in getting more of that sort of thing to the troops will be, I am sure, of genuine assistance to morale.

My hon. friend mentioned the matter of fares. I have nothing more to say about that, but it has been under consideration. The consideration which was given reduced the cost to the soldier to one-third of a single fare for a return journey, and that was regarded as a pretty substantial measure of assistance to the troops. Take, for example, Camp Borden to Vancouver; the return coach fare is $87.55; the soldier obtains return accommodation for $15.95. Then from Halifax to Vancouver the ordinary return fare is $131; for the soldier it is $25.10. The same transportation concession as is allowed when proceeding on annual leave and furlough is granted when the individual is given embarkation leave. The only phase of the matter I mentioned this afternoon that we had under further consideration was the possibility that the ceiling of the contribution a soldier makes might be fixed at some definite amount. We have that under consideration now and under discussion with the railway companies.

I have made a note of the case of which my hon. friend spoke, of a man in Montreal who had been wearing a uniform illegally, and will inquire into it at once.

Mr. GRAYDON: Regarding the point which the minister has just brought up, concerning lower fares for soldiers on furlough or otherwise, a good many of us through the years have attempted to persuade the government to grant free transportation under certain circumstances to the troops. The government has, of course, conceded something on this point, and we are always glad to acknowledge any movement in that direction. There may be reasons, although I have never been convinced they are very good, why free transportation should not be given to the troops at all times, but I think the minister might, even at this late date, reconsider the provision of free transportation on the railways on the six months' furlough and the embarkation leave. I reiterate this appeal because there is a feeling abroad that some of the little things which do not cost the country very much, but mean so much to the troops in Canada before they leave, are not being taken care of. Sometimes we are penny-wise and, perhaps, pound-foolish. It would be well to disregard the little extra money it would take and make this gesture, even though it be nothing more than a gesture, to the troops in Canada before they leave. It would show that our government and our people are making a move in recognition of the sacrifices which these young men are prepared to make on behalf of all of us.

Then there is a feeling, to which I have heard expression given, as no doubt the minister has on many occasions, that the armed forces of our friends to the south are being serviced by the government and the people of the United States on what is sometimes regarded as a higher standard than our own. I do not wish to make any comparisons or cast any reflections on the manner in which our own troops are being used, but I suggest that Canada cannot afford to use her troops, while they are here or on the scene of actual operations in accordance with any lower standard than that of any other country. It may be that my information on these points is wrong, but I have heard it voiced by the troops themselves, and that is why I put it before the minister. Last evening I brought up a matter which, though perhaps not of large importance, was sufficiently so for the minister to mention it, and seemed to me sufficiently important to emphasize, namely, that the public should see to it that our people overseas get plenty of mail and are kept in frequent contact with the community in which they lived.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is quite right; it is not a little thing.

Mr. GRAYDON: To some people it may seem a small thing, but it is of tremendous importance; and so are such matters as transportation. These are things that may not mean in the aggregate a great deal of money, but I think they would pay great dividends in the future from the point of view of our forces. The minister is in a better position than I am to know that the troops look at these little things as an evidence of what the government thinks of their services and of the appreciation of the country. It shows how the country recognizes the sacrifices they are prepared to make, and I feel keenly in the matter. With the expenditure of a little more money a great deal could be done to enhance the prestige of our people at home, and also of the government, with our troops. We should see to it that all these little differences that sometimes naturally crop up in the minds of the troops are eradicated. As you ride on the trains and talk to the troops you get to know what they are thinking. You do not have to raise the question; it is brought up time and again.

Some years ago I raised the question, as I have done on many other occasions, with reference to free transportation. Dozens of soldiers on the trains find out who you are and they say that this is something that should be taken into consideration. It is something that has caught on with the troops. They have never been able to see why, when we are able to spend so much money on so many things, some little conveniences of this sort are not provided for them. I concur in this idea and I should like to see Canada stand high at home with the troops overseas. I am not suggesting that this is not the case, but there are many little things that we could have done and can still do to improve our position at home, and the esteem in which we are held by our fighting men. I am sure the minister will be sympathetic, but I should like him to give the matter more than passive consideration, because frankly, in view of the fact that the United States has the reputation of doing these things in a big way, I think we in Canada must measure up to the standard set by other countries. In fact, I should like to see this country do a little better than the rest.

Mr. RALSTON: As a matter of fact, in this regard the United States is behind us. They charge full fare.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not thinking of railway transportation particularly, but of servicing overseas.

Mr. RALSTON: I should have said they charge three-quarters fare. My hon. friend is quite right. There are some things which the United States certainly does in a big way; but without casting any reflection upon them, or preening ourselves on being a little more modest in our appropriations, I would suggest that there are directions in which I do not think I would go as far as the United States—for instance, provision with regard to hostels and things of that kind. They are extremely comfortable, but we have got along with less of that sort of thing, and have got along very well indeed. I do not take second place to anyone, not even to my hon. friend, in the desire to see the best possible done for the troops, consistent with this idea, that we want them to realize that this is a war and this is a war service we are providing, that these things are temporary, and that soldiers as well as civilians do help the country not only by fighting but by saving, provided reasonable comfort is obtained.

In the matter of fares, I feel that we have gone a long distance, having regard to what the United States has done; of course in Britain, there are free fares as in the last war. Our system in Canada is a sort of half-way house that would seem to be reasonable. I have heard what my hon. friend has had to say and have heard similar representations before, and these matters are always under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister referred to mothers' allowances paid in respect of persons serving overseas. I should like to have a little more information in regard to mothers' allowances paid to mothers of men in the armed forces abroad. As I understand it, a mother whose son is serving overseas cannot receive mother's allowance unless the father is totally incapacitated. That places the family in an extremely bad position. I am thinking of a particular case. The father of this family is a janitor who is receiving a very small amount for his services in a schoolhouse. The mother has applied for mother's allowance. In this case there is a portion of assigned pay, but I am informed that the regulation is such that no mother's allowance can be given unless the father is totally incapacitated from earning a livelihood. If that is true, that is a terrible position for these people to be placed in. Is it understood that assigned pay in a case such as I have indicated is to be used by the mother as a means of livelihood? I understand that the assigned pay is not necessarily used for that purpose. If it is, however, then certainly the government cannot expect that soldier will have saved up for him two or three or four hundred dollars to enable him to take up a farm when he comes home under the arrangements now proposed. Will the minister give some information along that line?

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the hon. member is dealing with the case of a soldier's mother whose husband is alive but is totally incapacitated from earning a living. Is he criticizing the provision with regard to total incapacitation, or has he in mind that it must be shown that the soldier is not her sole support?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Not necessarily her sole support. I believe the regulation reads that before the mother can receive mother's allowance the father must be totally incapacitated from earning a living.

Mr. RALSTON: That is correct. It is section 101. What my hon. friend is asking is that the regulation be changed?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, definitely so, because the father may be earning a small amount, $5 a month, and yet the mother is barred entirely from receiving mother's allowance and that might be her only source of income. I have such a case in mind and that is why I mentioned it.

Mr. RALSTON: The section is a familiar one. The same thing appears in the Pension Act, where there is a requirement to show that the husband is totally incapacitated, but I cannot speak to it with any degree of certainty to-night. I will take it under consideration and consult the dependents' allowance board.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about a deserted mother? I fancy that was altered.

Mr. RALSTON: The mother whose husband has deserted her and who has not been supporting her for a considerable length of time, where the officer or soldier is her sole or partial support? That is taken care of. Because she is deserted she is not getting any support at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would the minister explain the point I brought up in connection with that. Is it expected that the mother would use the assigned pay of the son who is on active service overseas to maintain herself?

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend say, is it the intention? The assigned pay which is the basis of the allowance would be available for her to use.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Must she use it?

Mr. RALSTON: If she does not need it, I suppose not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Take the case of a father receiving only $5 and the son assigning $20 or $25 of his pay. Would it be necessary for the mother to use that $25 for her keep?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not understand what my hon. friend means when he says, "Would it be necessary." If she had no other money, of course it would be necessary.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is exactly the point. I imagine the dependents' allowance board would take this view: If the father is earning $5 or $20 a month as janitor and the mother is getting $25 assigned pay, that amounts to $45 a month and she does not need any more. What I want to know is, would they be expected to use that assigned pay in order to maintain them? Would it be counted as income, or should they rightfully be entitled to consideration for mothers' allowances?

Mr. RALSTON: I understand from the chairman of the dependents' board of trustees that she is allowed $40 a month as income excluding assigned pay, without affecting her right to dependents' allowances.

Mr. QUELCH: The ruling I got from the allowance board was this: Where assigned pay is paid with dependents' allowance, the assigned pay is counted as income. When assigned pay is paid without an allowance, then it is not. I had in mind this case. The father is getting old age pension. They have three sons in the army. Each of the sons is assigning $20 a month. One of the sons gets dependents' allowance for his mother. That gives her a total income, assigned pay of one soldier plus dependent's allowance of $540. She is allowed only $365; therefore, the old age pension is reduced by the difference between $365 and $540. That is different from the attitude taken in the War Veterans' Allowance Act. Under that act the board do not take into consideration assigned pay. This woman is investing the total amount of the assigned pay in bonds in the names of her sons, so that they will have that money on their return. I think in that case the assigned pay should not be taken into consideration at all. The dependents' allowance only should be taken into consideration; then there would be no need to reduce the amount of the old age pension. I do not think the assigned pay should be taken into consideration when it is being invested in bonds for the sons on their return.

Mr. RALSTON: I note what my hon. friend has said and we shall deal with it to-morrow. If the committee is agreeable I should like to move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration, $130,406.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry.

Mr. CRERAR: No; let the item stand. I presume the committee will wish to discuss it somewhat more fully.

Item stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

(Other than War Appropriations)

Normal services—

176. Grants to military associations and institutes as detailed in the estimates, $10,575.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CRERAR: To-morrow we shall continue with the discussion of the war appropriations. Before adjournment to-morrow we shall probably ask to be allowed to put in two additional departments.

Mr. COLDWELL: Wait a minute.

Mr. CRERAR: Post Office and Pensions.

Mr. GRAYDON: What do you want two more for now?

Mr. CRERAR: In case some minister may not be present.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have two departments in to-night in the last five minutes. After all, members of the house have few opportunities of raising matters concerning their constituencies, and it seems to me to get the departments in, in this way, as was done last year, and then call the remainder in the last few days of the session, is unfair to the members, and I object to putting too many departments in supply at this stage. We have two in now and that should be sufficient to give us work on Fridays.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the Prime Minister indicated this afternoon that we hope to get the estimates discussed on Fridays.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. CRERAR: We have only two departments in. It might happen that the ministers of these departments could not be present. I do not think we are infringing on the good nature of the house by asking to be allowed to put in two additional departments to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. COLDWELL: If that is the case these departments should not be brought in during the last two or three minutes at night, but early in the day; otherwise we shall be compelled to raise some matter and block the going into supply of so many of the departments.

Mr. CRERAR: That is a matter which my hon. friend can bring up to-morrow if he wishes. This is the procedure which has been followed in the past, and I draw the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that there is still a very considerable number of departments to be brought in, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. COLDWELL: We were told that last year, and at the end of the session all of the departments went in at once and we had not an opportunity to do the things we wanted to do. Moreover, we have no private members' days this year.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 16, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING PLAN—GENERAL POLICIES—DEMOBILIZATION PROBLEMS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, as promised last week, I have a statement to make regarding the discussions which have taken place in connection with the British commonwealth air training.

Representatives of the Canadian and United Kingdom governments have been discussing matters of common interest to the R.C.A.F. and the R.A.F. in their overseas relations, and in connection with the British commonwealth air training plan.

The United Kingdom was represented by Captain the Right Hon. Harold H. Balfour, Under-Secretary of State for Air, and Air Marshal Sir Peter Drummond. Canada was represented by myself, Air Marshal Robert Leckie and staff officers.

Members of the R.C.A.F. are not only serving in Britain and elsewhere in Canadian squadrons, but also in their thousands are attached temporarily to the R.A.F. squadrons, detachments, units and formations, widely dispersed throughout the world.

It is inevitable that innumerable questions arise concerning the welfare, careers and conditions of service of these Canadians attached to another force and for the time being serving under commanders other than Canadians. The R.C.A.F., which recruited and trained them, is responsible at all times to the people of Canada for their welfare and future prospects.

Such matters as length of service with R.A.F., commissions, promotions, operational and non-operational tours, and leave to Canada, vitally concern not only these boys, but also their parents, dependents and friends in Canada.

From time to time adjustments must be made, and the Department of National Defence for Air, either directly or through the Canadian air officer commanding-in-chief, overseas, in conjunction with the United Kingdom air ministry, discusses and formulates the general policies which are to be followed by both forces in dealing with these important and sometimes difficult problems.

The basic agreements made between the two governments in 1939 and 1942 have been modified and amended where necessary and certain understandings have been reached which confer on us a larger measure of responsibility for our own personnel.

The policies laid down in the agreement of June 1942 have not been materially altered, but there has been clarification on some points, as well as modification of administrative procedure. The amendments to the agreements of June 1942 are tabled herewith.

Long and tough fighting lies ahead before the war is won. But we must be ready with plans for demobilization, repatriation and rehabilitation well in advance. Our problems in this connection are greatly accentuated because by far the largest numbers of our aircrews are serving with the R.A.F. in distant and varied theatres of war. It must be and is a matter of primary concern to the government to ensure that these men are not placed in an unfavourable position by reason of their service in the R.A.F., or in any way handicapped as compared with men in the other Canadian services, or with their air force comrades at home. All our men must be given the same opportunities with regard to priorities in demobilization, repatriation and rehabilitation, and whilst demobilization procedure and related questions must fundamentally be the problem of each country to be dealt with in the light of the interests of its own economy and its own nationals, it is essential that our plans be closely correlated with those of the United Kingdom in order to give these benefits and advantages to our personnel when their service abroad is no longer required. To this end, it has been agreed that a joint committee of air force representatives of both countries will be established with headquarters in London, to discuss these problems, to exchange views and to advise their ministers. It has already been agreed that arrangements which have been made either by the United Kingdom or Canada for pre-demobilization, educational and vocational training shall be available to the nationals of both countries on a reciprocal basis.

Finally, a matter which, though not connected with the air training plan or its graduates but which is of considerable interest to Canadians, was also considered—that of the transfer from the R.A.F. of certain Canadian nationals who had joined that service prior to and during the early stages of the war. In this connection it has been agreed with the United Kingdom representatives that such officers and men may apply for transfer to the R.C.A.F. Certain Canadian-born women not normally domiciled in the United Kingdom who joined the Women's Auxiliary Air Force of the R.A.F. will also be eligible to apply for transfer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask a question at that point? Take the case of young officers in the R.A.F.—

Mr. POWER: I would prefer to complete my statement first.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry that I have to leave the house in a moment. Will these officers be transferred on the same basis as their present status?

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend will have to wait until the regulations with respect to transfer are issued.

Besides these personnel matters, consideration was given to the overall capacity of the training organization in Canada which is administered by Canada on behalf of the partners of the British Commonwealth air training plan. The air training plan will continue as long as the war lasts.

During the three years which followed the signing of the plan agreement in 1939, the principal preoccupation of Canada and the other partners was to create a training organization on which could be built fighting air forces equal in size and superior in quality to those of the enemy. Today, in the beginning of 1944, it can be said that this objective has been reached, and we have increasing air superiority over the enemy in every theatre of war. This superiority is evident in the sky-fronts of the operational theatres over land and sea. Not so evident, but behind the front line squadrons, there are thousands of aircrew being put through operational training units and conversion units, and farther back again there are tens of thousands of young aircrew going through the training schools of the British Commonwealth air training plan in Canada and in similar schools in other parts of the world.

In other words, the personnel necessary to fill squadrons, units and formations planned for the front line are already in the pipeline feeding the air forces of the United Kingdom, the commonwealth and the allies serving under the strategic direction and tactical command of the Royal Air Force. At the present time we have the capital and the necessary immediate replacements.

Our long-term war plans entail certain reductions in the numbers of entrants to aircrew training. The current entrants into training will not in fact engage the enemy for a comparatively long time. This is largely because of the increased complexity of modern aircraft requiring lengthy training over an ever widening range of subjects. The young man who fights in the air in the future will not do so until he has had more flying hours during training than ever before. In a sentence, the standards of skill required and the opportunities for obtaining experience have progressively increased since the beginning of the war.

Consequent upon the reduction in intake of trainees, there will be a gradual and progressive closing of a certain number of training units, and schools in Canada, beginning with the R.A.F. transferred schools. The process will be deliberate and extended over many months, and the reduction of training facilities will be geared to the requisite flow of pupils through the plan.

One important objective will be to utilize to the greatest possible extent the resources in skilled personnel in our training organization as they become available, for reinforcing and enlarging the operational units. As the R.A.F. schools in Canada close, the personnel will be transferred to the operational theatre in England to increase the number of skilled men available for the continued expansion of the front line of the Royal Air Force.

Numbers of R.C.A.F. air and ground crew personnel, besides the graduates, will be made available for overseas duties owing to the reduction of training capacity in Canada and also to the curtailment of western hemisphere operations due to the more favourable war situation on our coasts.

This concentration of man-power in the United Kingdom will provide close to the front line more backing to the squadrons now actively engaged or required for forthcoming operations and renders more effective the impact of both the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F. on the enemy during this critical year of the war.

WAR EXPENDITURES

MOTION FOR CONSIDERATION THIS SESSION OF THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the third report of the special committee on war expenditures, presented to the house on the 26th of January, 1944, be considered by the house during the present session of parliament.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Does that include reports of all the subcommittees?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The third report.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION—RYE AND GRASS CLAIMS

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. What is the total amount paid on 1943 rye and grass claims under W.A.R.A., as at January 1, 1944?
2. How many claims have been paid?
3. What is the amount paid by provinces?
4. How many claims have been paid by provinces, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta?
5. When will the balance of claims be paid?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The amount paid on 1943 rye and grass claims is not segregated from the amount paid on other crops or summerfallow. The total amount paid as at January 1, 1944, was $21,160,192.89.

2. 34,163 claims containing grass and rye acreages.

3. Payments on grass and rye not segregated. Total payments by provinces were: Alberta, $6,373,220.87; Saskatchewan, $11,116,650.28; Manitoba, $3,670,321.74.

4. Claims containing grass and rye acreages: Manitoba, 7,514; Saskatchewan, 19,669; Alberta, 6,980.

5. By March 15, 1944.

CANADIAN ARMY—PAY TO THE RANKS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Are all troopers, gunners, sappers, privates, etc., in the Canadian army, now receiving $1.50 per diem?
2. If not, on what basis are any of the above receiving less than $1.50 per diem?
3. If all troopers, gunners, sappers, privates, etc., in the Canadian army, are not receiving $1.50 per diem, what percentages are receiving lesser amounts?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. No.

2. In order to qualify for the first increase to $1.40 per diem a soldier must have completed four months' continuous service, provided that during the period in question:

Efficiency

(a) (i) He has reached a state of efficiency which might reasonably be expected in conformity with opportunities for training available to him, has performed his duties satisfactorily, and the officer commanding his unit certifies that these conditions have been met.

Conduct

(ii) He has not forfeited pay and allowances under articles 85(2) or 149 of F.R. & I. (Canada) in excess of an amount equal to three days' pay, or

(iii) He has not been awarded fines which in the aggregate exceed an amount equal to three days' pay, or

(iv) The total of forfeitures and fines under (ii) and (iii) above is not in excess of an amount equal to three days' pay.

A soldier will be eligible for the second increase to $1.50 per diem after six months' continuous service provided:

Proficiency

(b) (i) He has attained a degree of proficiency in training applicable to his arm or corps which ought to be reached two months after receipt of the first increase and the officer commanding his unit certifies that this condition has been met.

Conduct

(ii) He fulfils the conditions as defined in sub-para. (a) (ii) (iii) or (iv) above, during the two months' period following the first increase.

3. The following are the percentages of troopers, gunners, privates, etc., who are receiving lesser amount than $1.50 per diem—as of 1st February, 1944:

	Canadian Army in Canada	Overseas
Number in receipt of $1.40 per diem	9·1%	4·5%
Number in receipt of $1.30 per diem	25·2%	5·0%

SUGAR IN STORAGE

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What is the quantity of refined sugar stored in the city of Saint John, New Brunswick?

2. Of the above, what quantity is stored in the Crosby warehouse; what quantity in the Belgian warehouse?

3. How long has the sugar been in storage?

4. Has any of the sugar been lost or damaged?

5. If so, how much was lost or damaged, and why?

6. What is the quantity of refined sugar stored in other warehouses in Canada?

7. What is the quantity of raw sugar stored in warehouses in Saint John, New Brunswick?

8. What is the quantity of raw sugar stored in warehouses in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1, 6, 7 and 8. There are no stocks of sugar owned by the government stored in Saint John, New Brunswick, or in any other warehouses in Canada.

2, 3, 4 and 5. The sugar administrator purchases and arranges transportation for all sugar imported and sells it to refiners on arrival. Whereas he does obtain regular reports regarding refiners' holdings of raw and refined sugar, he has no information regarding wholesalers' and retailers' stocks.

For security reasons, it is not considered in the public interest to publish information regarding stocks of an imported commodity like sugar, on the basis of which it might be possible for the enemy to draw inferences regarding the movement of ships on the high seas. Stocks vary considerably from day to day, and release of the figures for any particular date might also lead to unwarranted and undesirable speculation as to changes in consumer rations.

STORAGE OF GRAIN

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What is the total amount paid by the Canadian wheat board for storage on grain, (a) in interior elevators; (b) in terminal elevators, for the crop year 1942-1943 and 1943-1944, to date?

2. How much was paid to each company or firm?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Total amount paid and accrued for storage on grain in terminal elevators for season 1942-43—$6,233,418.30. (Figures showing split of this total between interior terminal elevators and other terminals are not available.)

Terminal storage paid to 31st January, 1944, for season 1943-44—$627,480.81. (This figure does not contain any accrued storage and split between interior terminal elevators and other terminals is not available.)

2. The amounts paid to each company or firm are not readily available. No useful purpose would be served, as far as the wheat board is concerned, by keeping this information by companies. To obtain the required data would necessitate an exhaustive reanalysis of the year's operations. The comptroller's department is already overburdened in its endeavour to issue the participation certificates as soon as possible.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many are at present employed in the Canadian wheat board offices in Winnipeg, Manitoba?

2. How many outside inspectors or field-men are employed?

3. What is the present salary of each of these inspectors or field-men, and what was the former occupation of each?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. 392.

2. 14.

3. $175 per month plus cost of living bonus. Former occupations—country elevator operators, travellers and accountants, with one exception who was employed in the Manitoba forestry branch, and as farm supervisor.

PERSONNEL RECRUITED IN ONTARIO FOR QUEBEC REGIMENT SENT TO HONG KONG

Mr. WHITE:

How many recruits, if any, were recruited in Ontario for the Quebec Regiment, sent to Quebec, and later sent to Hong Kong?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): No recruits were recruited in Ontario for the Quebec Regiment (Royal Rifles of Canada), sent to Quebec and later sent to Hong Kong. However, 50 men from the Midland Regiment, Ontario, and 104 men from Camp Borden, Ontario, were transferred to the Royal Rifles of Canada. These men were not sent to Quebec but joined the Royal Rifles of Canada on its way to Hong Kong at North Bay, Ontario.

KINGSBURY-RICHMOND, QUE., POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. What is the name of the person who holds the contract for the delivery of mail from Kingsbury post office, Quebec, to Richmond, Quebec?
2. How long has the present holder been in possession of this contract?
3. Were tenders called for before this contract was awarded to its present holder? If not, why were they not called for?
4. Has the price for the contract been increased during the term of office of the present holder?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Eric Malboeuf.
2. Since the 1st September, 1942.
3. No. Eric Malboeuf secured the contract through a regular transfer from Emile Felix Malboeuf, the latter having obtained the contract, dating from the 1st November, 1940, following the invitation of public tenders.
4. No.

RATIONING—MAPLE SUGAR AND MAPLE SYRUP

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is the government giving consideration to allowing a ration free distribution of maple sugar and maple syrup?
2. If not, what provision is being made to keep the farmers in maple sugar and maple syrup production?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. No.

2. As a result of numerous discussions with representatives of the maple sugar and maple syrup producers, the following arrangements have been made with a view to keeping the farmers in production.

(a) Effective February 3, the coupon value of maple sugar was raised from one-half pound to 2 pounds, this coupon value to be effective throughout the year;

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

(b) During the period February 3 to May 31, 1944, one preserves coupon will purchase 40 fluid ounces of maple syrup, the coupon value reverting to 24 fluid ounces beginning June 1.

The increased coupon value for maple syrup during the period February to May is designed to result in as little interference as possible with producers' normal marketing methods during the period in which the majority of direct producer-consumer sales takes place. Producers will still be able to sell to consumers in gallon containers (1 gallon will cost only 4 coupons), and this type of sale has been further facilitated by advancing the validity date of "D" coupon 16 from March 30 to March 2, so that three "D" coupons will become valid on March 2. In addition, special arrangements have been made under the ration programme for mail order sales, which account for an important part of the production of many producers

GRANITE BAY, B.C., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. STOKES:

1. Who is the present postmaster at Granite Bay, British Columbia?
2. When was he appointed to that position?
3. Who held the position just prior to the present postmaster?
4. Why were his services dispensed with?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Henry John Bull.
2. 24th March, 1930.
3. Mrs. Florence Bull.
4. Resignation of Mrs. Bull.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—ALBERTA

Mr. SHAW:

1. Have any veterans or discharged men been settled under the Veterans' Land Act in the province of Alberta?
2. Has any land been purchased in Alberta to be used for the settlement of veterans under the Veterans' Land Act?
3. Is it the intention of the government to purchase large farms and place more than one settler on each such farm?
4. Have any purchases for the purpose of the type of settlement referred to in question three been made to date?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. No.
4. No.

MEAT BOARD

Mr. SENN:

1. Is the meat board set up under the provisions of order in council P.C. 4187 still in existence?

2. If so, who are its members?

3. Does the board exercise the power conferred upon it by section 4, subsection 1-C of the above mentioned order in council "to determine the prices which shall be paid to packers or other persons for meat delivered for export"?

4. Does the board exercise the power conferred upon it by section 4, subsection 1-E of the above mentioned order in council "to fix the minimum price to be paid by packers or other persons for live stock"?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. Hon. J. G. Taggart, Minister of Agriculture, Saskatchewan, Chairman; S. E. Todd, Managing Director, Industrial and Development Council of Canadian Meat Packers; A. Morin, Associate Deputy Minister, Department of Agriculture, Quebec; L. C. McOuat, General Agricultural Agent, Canadian Pacific Railway.

3. Yes, for the various classes and grades of meat within the agreements entered into by the governments.

4. The meat board have never yet deemed it advisable to fix minimum prices for live stock. The board has, however, considered it a primary responsibility to ensure that prices paid to farmers for livestock have been at least equivalent to the prices received by the packers for export product.

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Who are the members of the meat board?

2. To what minister are they responsible?

3. Is it a responsibility of the meat board to purchase from the beef producers the surpluses of beef which might threaten to depress beef prices to the producers?

4. If so, what classes or grades of beef were purchased by the meat board during the months of December, 1943, and January, 1944, and how much of each grade in each month?

5. What grades of beef were not purchased by the said board during each of those two months, and why?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Hon. J. G. Taggart, Minister of Agriculture, Saskatchewan, Chairman; S. E. Todd, Managing Director, Industrial and Development Council of Canadian Meat Packers; A. Morin, Associate Deputy Minister, Department of Agriculture, Quebec; L. C. McOuat, General Agricultural Agent, Canadian Pacific Railway.

2. The Minister of Agriculture.

3. The meat board stands ready to buy surplus beef at the equivalent of floor prices when it is processed and shipped in accordance with specifications for export.

4. During December, 1943, 459,466 pounds of cow quality carcass beef were delivered to the meat board. During January, 1944, 2,048,543 pounds of cow quality carcass beef were delivered to the meat board.

5. No qualities other than "cow" were purchased by the board, this being all the beef offered to the board in exportable form for shipment during those months.

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. ESLING:

1. What was the total amount of the funded debt of Canada and the unmatured treasury bills as at March 31, 1943?

2. What was the net amount added to this by the two victory loans in 1943 and by new treasury bills?

3. What is the total amount of the public debt of the nine provinces of Canada?

4. What is the total amount of the debts owing to the public by Canadian municipalities?

5. What proportion of the public debt of each—federal, provincial and municipal—is owing in Canada and what proportion abroad?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Unmatured funded debt and treasury bills of the Dominion of Canada at March 31, 1943—$7,893,478,422.96.

2. Cash subscriptions—

Fourth victory loan	$1,308,716,650
Fifth victory loan (preliminary)	$1,383,300,000
Increase in amount of treasury bills outstanding	$ 30,000,000
Decrease in amount of deposit certificates outstanding	$ 105,000,000

3. The Bank of Canada Statistical Summary estimated that the direct debt (less sinking funds) of the provinces for the fiscal year-ends nearest to December 31, 1942, was $1,892,400,000.

4. The Bank of Canada Statistical Summary estimated that the total outstanding bonded debt and bank loans of Canadian municipalities for the fiscal year-ends nearest to December 31, 1942, was $989,800,000.

5. Due to the fact that a great part of these securities is in bearer form, it is not possible to state acurately what proportion of the public debt is held in Canada and what proportion is held abroad.

CIVIL AVIATION POLICY—EMPIRE CONFERENCE

Mr. ESLING:

In view of the Prime Minister's announcement that the air policy of Canada was government control of international and transcontinental air lines, has the government considered any change of such policy as a result of the empire conference on air policy as participated in by Hon. C. D. Howe, and the president of the T.C.A.?

Mr. HOWE: No.

EMBARGO ON IMPORTATION OF MATERIALS CONTAINING RUBBER

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Did the government place an embargo on the importation from the United Kingdom of all marine packing, jointing and insulations containing rubber used by war industries and ships?

2. Are goods of this kind manufactured in Canada of a sufficiently high standard to meet marine requirements?

3. Have manufacturers in the United Kingdom of these materials stocks available for shipment to Canada?

4. If such embargo was imposed, why was it imposed?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No.

2. Yes.

3. No information.

4. Answered by No. 1.

RADIO STATION CFAR, FLIN FLON

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Arctic Radio Corporation, Ltd.

2. President, Geo. W. Bridgman, lumber merchant, Craigflower Auto Court, Victoria, B.C.

Secretary, Joseph R. Cousineau, mechanic, McLeod, Alta.

Directors, Geo. W. Bridgman, Victoria, B.C.; Lily Bridgman (occupation and address not given); J. M. Bridgman, radio engineer, Flin Flon, Man.

SELECTIVE SERVICE AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—TORONTO OFFICES

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. How many local selective service and unemployment insurance offices are there in the city of Toronto?

2. Where are they located?

3. What is the grade of each of these offices?

4. What are the names, positions and home addresses of each of the employees of each of these offices?

5. What are the salaries and other remuneration of each of these employees?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. One.

2. Three branches of the local office: (a) men's division, 174 Spadina Ave.; (b) women's division, 832 Bay St.; (c) sub-office, 2854 Dundas St. W.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN ARMY—OFFICERS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. (a) How many members of the Canadian army, permanent force, enlisted prior to August 31, 1939, have been commisisoned as officers;

(b) Of those commissioned, how many now hold the ranks, acting or confirmed, of (1) captain, (2) major, (3) lt.-colonel, and (4) colonel;

(c) How many of these are serving in Canada at National Defence headquarters, district camp commands, training centres, and/or other home war establishments;

(d) How many of these are graded for pay as classified in F.R. & I. as staff or specialist officers?

2. (a) How many members of the permanent force, not holding commissions, prior to August 31, 1939, have been retired on pension as officers;

(b) How many permanent force officers commissioned since August 31, 1939, who are below medical category to proceed overseas, have been retained in the service, and why are they retained;

(c) How many in a medical category qualifying them for overseas service have been retained in Canada, and why?

3. (a) How many such officers, commisisoned as quartermasters or specialists without passing any examinations, have been granted the rank of major or higher, and on what grounds;

(b) Is it compulsory for officers in the permanent force to undergo regular medical examinations if they have less than fifteen years' service;

(c) Have any been kept in the permanent force without regular medical examinations, and if so, what number?

GENERAL ELECTION 1940—RED DEER CONSTITUENCY

Mr. SHAW:

1. Who was the returning officer for the electoral district of Red Deer at the time of the general election of 1940?

2. What firm or individual was given the contract for the printing of the voters' lists, ballots, etc., in connection with the above electoral district in 1940?

3. Did the firm or individual referred to in question two have the facilities necessary for doing all the work in connection with the said printing? If not, what part of the work was done by another firm or individual?

4. Did any firm or individual located outside the electoral district of Red Deer do part of the work in connection with the printing referred to above?

5. If so, what are their names, and what was the reason for part of the printing being done outside of the electoral district of Red Deer?

6. Is it the policy of the government to have all the printing of voters' lists, ballots, etc., done within the electoral district concerned provided facilities are available within the district for the handling of such work?

BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS

Mr. ESLING:

1. How many boards and commissions have been appointed by each department of the government since Canada entered the war?

2. How many employees are on the payroll of each board and commission?

3. What is the total payroll of each board and commission?

CANADIAN FORCES—UNIFORMS

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. What is the cost of a walking out uniform for other ranks in the army and air force, (a) tunic; (b) trousers; (c) shirt; (d) tie; (e) shoes; (f) cap?

2. How many of each are issued, and at what intervals?

3. What clothing is issued to a soldier on his discharge?

4. What is the cost of clothing per annum for each inmate of the penitentiaries?

5. What clothing items are issued to each convict per year?

6. What clothing is issued per annum to A.R.P. wardens; what is the cost of each article?

CANADIAN FORCES—SENIOR OFFICERS IN CANADA

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. How many members of the armed forces are serving in Canada in the following ranks: brigadier, major-general, lieutenant-general, and what is the rate of pay and allowance in each case?

2. How many members of the armed forces are serving in Canada in the following ranks: air commodore, air vice-marshal, air marshal, air chief marshal, and what is the rate of pay for each?

[Mr. Shaw.]

CANADIAN FORCES—CLOTHING ALLOWANCES

Mr. SINCLAIR:

What clothing allowance, if any, is granted to officers of the armed services ,(a) on retirement; (b) on resignation of their commissions?

EMBARGO ON IMPORTATION OF ASBESTOS PRODUCTS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Did the government place an embargo on the importation of asbestos cloth and any other asbestos products from the United Kingdom?

2. If so, when was it imposed, and why?

3. Was a survey made to determine what stocks of asbestos cloth and asbestos material were available in Canada for ship repairs and ship construction prior to the embargo being imposed?

4. What quantity of asbestos cloth and other asbestos materials was there on hand in Canada at the time the embargo was imposed?

5. Is such an embargo now in force?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DAFOE, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. BURTON:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, recommendations, applications and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department in connection with the appointment of a postmaster at Dafoe, Saskatchewan, during the past six months.

Mr. MULOCK: Subject to the usual reservation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister what are "the usual reservations"?

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to ask the same thing.

Mr. MULOCK: So far as this motion is concerned, the reservation is that the reports of officials in the department are confidential and need not be produced unless it is considered in the public interest to do so. That is a matter which has been discussed many times in the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is only confidential as between the official and the minister, is it not—not between official and official? We would like to have all these documents brought down.

Mr. MULOCK: No. That would defeat the very object of the reservation.

Mr. HOMUTH: It certainly would.

Mr. MULOCK: An official in a district reports to the district director, who in turn reports to the assistant deputy minister or the deputy minister in Ottawa, after which these papers are submitted to the minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is something new, Mr. Speaker; I never before heard that proviso made to a motion of this kind. The Prime Minister will be able to tell us if it is the practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One of the oldest rules of parliament is that correspondence between a minister and officials of his department, or between officials of departments on departmental matters, are confidential and need not be brought down by the minister unless he feels it is in the public interest to have them brought down. I was going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we might assume that all orders which are passed are passed subject to that reservation without any specific announcement being made to that effect.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know whether I am in entire agreement with the Prime Minister on that last statement. Very often ministers say, in assenting to these motions, "subject to the usual reservation," and this question has to be asked. Is there a regulation or rule which applies as the Prime Minister suggests? If there is, I am quite in agreement with him that there is not much use in wasting words in these various discussions and saying "with the usual reservations". I have heard it so often when anybody asks a question.

Motion agreed to.

ARMY BOOTS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters, communications, reports or other documents dated between October 2, 1939, and August 6, 1943, wherein one James Clark, of Toronto, formerly an inspector of or in the employ of the Department of National Defence, and/or the inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada, alleged or complained that army boots of inferior quality or manufacture were being manufactured for or supplied to the government by the firms named by him, together with a copy of all letters received by the Minister of National Defence, or the acting minister, from the said James Clark, and/or anyone on his behalf, relative to his complaints with regard thereto or requesting an investigation thereof, and the replies made thereto since August 6, 1943, to date hereof.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Stand.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, why should a motion like this stand? It is perfectly obvious what it means. There has been publicity in the papers about it. I do not know why it should be asked that a motion like this should stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

Mr. HOMUTH: Of course we have no rights.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL AUTHORIZING CONSTRUCTION OF ALL-WEATHER ROADS IN ONTARIO

Mr. MARSHALL:

For 1. a copy of order in council P.C. 10145, dated November 10, 1942, authorizing the payment to the province of Ontario of a grant for the construction of an all-weather road from, (a) Ramsay, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, to the property of the Jerome Gold Mines Limited; (b) Missanabie, to the property of the Renabie Mines Limited.

2. Copy of P.C. 3197, dated April 19, 1943, authorizing the payment to the province of Ontario for the construction of an all-weather road from Savant Lake Station to the property of the St. Anthony Gold Mines Limited.

POTATOES

DISTRIBUTION IN THE MARITIMES—PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I am getting complaints from Nova Scotia that potatoes in the larger centres are in short supply, and I should like to ask the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture whether steps are being taken to see that the larger centres in Nova Scotia have an adequate supply or a fairer distribution of potatoes. There was a short crop in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island last year, and it is reported that this crop—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): —has been largely controlled and held in storage or diverted to central Canada, with rumours of a black market, with the result that centres in Nova Scotia are not getting an adequate supply.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am only right in directing the attention of the house to the fact that a practice is growing up which has not prevailed in the past, I will not say, in the very recent past, but which certainly did not prevail in previous parliaments, of hon. members taking advantage of the opportunity there is on the orders of the day to ask a question, to make a speech of considerable length at the time of so doing. That is not in accordance with the rules of the house and should not be permitted, and if His Honour the Speaker rules that a question should be regarded as a notice of a question to be placed on the order paper or should be asked by itself to the exclusion of all else, His Honour should be supported by the house in asserting the rule; otherwise the business of the house is going to be delayed, and what is worse, a state of confusion arise from day to day in the minds of hon. members before we get on with the real business of the house, later in the afternoon. I would ask of hon. members that any questions they wish to ask should as far as possible be handed in to the Clerk and placed on the order paper. Now and then emergencies may arise where obviously there is necessity for an immediate answer to some question, and with the permission of the house the government would in such cases be only too ready to give an answer if it is possible to do so, but advantage must not be taken of the rules of the house to permit of hon. members raising a discussion even before the minister has had an opportunity of knowing what the question is which is going to be discussed, nor should hon. members take advantage of a rule unduly to prolong the business of the house.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me; I wish to respect the rules of the house, but this is a very important matter from the standpoint of consumers, distributors and suppliers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I made a very short explanation of the question which I was asking, and I sent a copy of it to the Minister of Finance as he took his seat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let it stand as a notice of the question to be answered at another time.

Mr. SPEAKER: In connection with these oral questions, I would observe that during the past two weeks the rule has been abused to a certain extent. Hon. members asking a question must realize that the question which they are asking should be of immediate importance, to which an answer is required immediately, and is asked orally only because, if it were put on the order paper, the opportunity of applying a remedy in respect of the subject matter might in the meanwhile be gone. In Beauchesne, third edition, paragraph 297, it is stated:

A certain number of oral questions are permitted in practice by members, without notice, before the orders of the day are called; but these are merely allowed by courtesy in connection with the business of the house or with very urgent and important matters of public concern. They are always brief, no debate being permitted, and the replies are as concise as possible. The minister interrogated may reply at once or may direct that the usual notice be given. Such questions are governed by the same rules of order as questions of which notice has been given.

And again:

Questions asked orally on the orders of the day being called must not be prefaced by the reading of letters, telegrams, newspaper extracts or preambles of any kind. When a member, on the 18th February, 1936, said: "I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue based upon a circular letter which was sent out by the . . . company to its dealers in my constituency. This letter is dated at Saskatchewan and reads: x x x." Mr. Speaker said:—"I do not think the hon. gentleman should read the letter; he should put his question directly." The member: "I must read the letter in order to make my question intelligible. This is a very short letter." The Speaker: "I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to read the letter. He should put his question directly, as to what government intends to do." (The letter was not read.)

If any hon. member regards a particular matter of such importance as to justify an immediate answer, and wishes to put to the government a question based upon a newspaper article, he should not read the article but should simply use it as the basis of his question. Moreover, he should put his question as concisely as possible. The minister then, if he is in a position to answer the question, may do so; if not, he may take it as a notice. This point has been brought to the attention of the house on several occasions by myself, and though I dislike very much interfering with the freedom of hon. members in asking questions that are of some degree of urgency, I must nevertheless insist upon the observance of the rule.

Mr. HOMUTH: Before the orders of the day are called—I trust I shall be in order—may I ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the shortage of potatoes in the larger centres of Nova Scotia, the government will see to it that there is a fair distribution?

Mr. ISNOR: If the hon. gentleman who has just spoken can make reference to this subject—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ISNOR: —I think I should have the same privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ISNOR: I brought this same matter before the government weeks ago and it received immediate attention so far as Halifax is concerned.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is prefaced by a statement of fact which may or may not be correct. I do not think it is a matter of such urgency as to require an immediate answer and it should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. GILLIS: May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the wartime prices and trade board contemplating any action to relieve the shortage of potatoes in Nova Scotia? This situation has existed for two years and it is serious right now.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the same question that was put before.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question has been repeated in different forms. It should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that order No. 3 had already been called; the Clerk Assistant had begun to read that order. We had commenced a specific order. These questions are therefore completely out of order if we are to abide by the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman rose to ask the question when the Clerk Assistant had read the order. I would not deprive an hon. member of his opportunity on that ground.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let us not be too technical.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 15, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war —Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. GRAYDON: Yesterday at the request of the Prime Minister, I, with three other members of this house, met him and the three defence ministers, as well as the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, in a private conference. At this interview the Prime Minister read to us what we understood to be the essential parts of the recent correspondence and other documents bearing upon the McNaughton situation.

As leader of the opposition I have certain responsibilities and obligations to this house and to the nation, and I conceive it to be my duty to make my position perfectly clear at this time. The background relevant to this picture extends over more than four years of war. Obviously a review of the more recent events could not place us in complete possession of the facts. We were told enough, however, for me to form the opinion that the Minister of National Defence in the present debate has not told the whole story. In saying that to the members of this committee and to the people of Canada I feel that I am discharging any obligations which I as leader of the opposition may have in this instance.

The responsibility now passes back to and remains with the government as to whether they will disclose the whole story fully to parliament and to the people. They and they alone are fully possessed of the background and facts. The responsibility is theirs and theirs alone. No one can share it with them. I invite the Prime Minister to make known his government's decision on this matter now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend, I am only too happy to reply to his request to make known immediately the government's position on what he has described as the "McNaughton situation" or "this matter". The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), speaking on Friday, February 11, read to the house a statement which had been issued to the press on December 27 with regard to General McNaughton. I am going to read this statement in a moment, but first I wish to say that the statement was authorized by the government, by myself and my colleagues. It was known to the government before the minister gave the statement to the press. The statement, as reported at page 411, was in the following words:

> The Minister of National Defence announced to-day that following the recent illness of Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton, medical authorities have advised that he has developed a physical condition which will necessitate freedom from all military responsibility for an extended period.
> General McNaughton has advised the government of his inability physically to carry on and has asked to be relieved as soon as possible.
> In these circumstances and in view also of the requirements of impending operations, the minister stated that the Canadian government, with great regret, had decided to grant General McNaughton several months' leave of absence from service and to relieve him of command of the First Canadian Army. The minister paid tribute to General McNaughton's outstanding service to Canada and hoped that after a period of rest and recuperation his unusual talents would be available to serve his country in some capacity less exacting than in command of an army in the field.

There is another paragraph but it is immaterial. The minister, at the time he read to the house this press release which had been issued on December 27, continuing to speak in the debate on Friday last, said:

The important points were that medical authorities had advised that the general had developed a physical condition which would necessitate freedom from all military responsibility for an extended period and that General McNaughton had advised the government of his inability physically to carry on and had asked to be relieved as soon as possible, and that the government had decided to grant General McNaughton several months leave of absence from service and to relieve him of command of the First Canadian Army.

The minister went on to say:

The advice of the medical authorities was contained in two reports which were transmitted to the Prime Minister on General McNaughton's direction and were also given to me.

There was also included General McNaughton's letter to Major-General Montague. Having these medical reports before the minister and myself and some of our colleagues, knowing that these reports would be presented to the house and made public, the government felt that it would not be advisable to go behind what was stated in the reports, to bring up other matters which might relate themselves to General McNaughton's relinquishment of command of the Canadian army. What was stated in the reports of the medical officers is perfectly clear, and it was not felt by the government, unless it was obvious that by going into other matters some useful public purpose would be served, that any statement should be made other than the one that was made up to that point.

May I say quite frankly that the Minister of National Defence himself would greatly prefer to discuss all phases of this matter to the satisfaction of every hon. member in the house. Personally, so far as he is concerned he would welcome it, and as I stated the other day he was ready at that time to give an immediate answer. My hon. friend had his immediate answer in his hand, and it was known to me what he had in mind to say. Knowing what might come to be discussed at that time, or what might arise out of the discussion, I felt it was necessary for me to say that I did not believe public policy made it advisable to say anything further at this time with respect to what has been since referred to as the McNaughton situation. And I gave my reasons for that. May I quote them from Hansard. So that I may make the statement as comprehensive and as completely non-evasive as possible, I shall begin with the question which was put by the hon. leader of the opposition and which appears at page 450 of Hansard of Monday, February 14:

The question is this: Were there other factors, other than ill health, which entered into the whole problem of the resignation or leave of absence of General McNaughton?

Mr. Mackenzie King: Before the leader of the opposition presses his question further, I desire to say that while I know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is prepared to answer the question immediately, as Prime Minister I have very grave doubts whether it is not against public policy to discuss further at this time the matter which is raised by the question which the hon. gentleman has asked.

I gave my reasons for that, and they were set out in the course of the discussion. I shall quote one paragraph which appears on page 453 of Hansard. I said:

The government's action in this matter, as I have already said, is entirely begotten of a desire to protect the war effort not only of this country but of the united nations to the fullest extent possible and to protect all parties concerned therewith.

I felt it was owing to this house and to the country that so far as the correspondence was concerned the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other two parties whom I invited should come and see the correspondence and read it with me. I also invited a former minister of national defence in a previous administration, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) to accompany them. I placed the correspondence, or rather read, as the leader of the opposition has just said, the essential parts of the correspondence to them. I have left it to these hon. gentlemen to act in this matter as their own consciences may dictate. I have placed no restriction upon them with respect to the information they gained at that interview, which lasted for three hours, and in which all that is really essential in what has been described as the McNaughton situation was gone into very fully.

I want to repeat at this moment what I said the other day in replying to the leader of the opposition:

Before the leader of the opposition presses his question further, I desire to say that while I know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is prepared to answer the question immediately, as Prime Minister I have very grave doubts whether it is not against public policy to discuss further at this time the matter which is raised by the question which the hon. gentleman has asked.

Hon. members of this house know that at the present time preparations are being made on a vast scale for the invasion of Europe. The question that I have to ask myself is this: Is any further discussion of what has been referred to as the McNaughton situation likely to have a good or an adverse effect on the war effort of Canada, of Great Britain, of the United States and of other of the united nations. I believe that the morale, not only of the people in the countries I have mentioned but more particularly of the armies not of Canada alone but of the other countries might be very seriously affected were there to be at this time a discussion which went into a number of matters that have taken place in the past. Such a discussion might provoke a very serious condition of affairs if begun at this time.

I want to make it perfectly clear the government has nothing to hide or conceal in this matter. The minister wishes to conceal nothing. Indeed he would prefer, for his own feelings and for personal reasons, to have without reservation matters disclosed which were disclosed to the leaders yesterday; but as Prime Minister I have a great responsibility to safeguard the war effort of all the united nations; and I repeat, I doubt very, very much if it would not be against public policy to discuss the matter further at this time. So far as the government is concerned I intend not to discuss it or have it discussed unless some hon. gentlemen opposite or others outside should, by statements that may be made, render it necessary for the government to make disclosures which up to the present time have not been made.

Mr. COLDWELL: As one of those present at yesterday morning's meeting I should like to say that I came away with the impression that it would not be in the public interest at this time to discuss this matter more fully than it has been discussed. I must say this, however, that the discussion this afternoon by the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister is bound to arouse in the public mind a good many questions. If those questions arise it seems to me there are two things to be considered. First there is the matter of the public interest, and in that I am in agreement with the Prime Minister. Then there is the viewpoint of the other party concerned, namely Lieutenant General McNaughton himself, a man who has served this country well, whose great talents in organizing the Canadian army I think are recognized by everyone in the house. In view of the fact that General McNaughton has submitted a letter in which he gave as the reason for his request the fact that his health was poor, as apparently it was, it seems to me that we should take into consideration General McNaughton's great service to this country; and if we wish to pursue this matter further, in my opinion a committee of the house should meet General McNaughton and discuss matters with him.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just one word. I do not know of anyone who is more sensitive, and perhaps wrongly so, to any suggestion of lack of frankness or candour than I am. I have spoken to this committee twice concerning this matter, and in the statements I made I think I endeavoured to state clearly that I was not saying everything there was to be said in connection with this regrettable episode but that I was dealing with the particular matter which counted, namely the question of the granting of leave of absence to General McNaughton and the reasons for it.

It does cut just a little for my hon. friend to proclaim this afternoon, in one short sentence, that he has come to the conclusion that the Minister of National Defence has not told the whole story. I can see that in headlines across Canada. The Minister of National Defence has made it clear to this committee that he has not told the whole story of the McNaughton situation.

The question is whether or not the Minister of National Defence has anything to hide. That is the important thing. My hon. friend has not suggested that there is anything of that kind, and he has had the opportunity to become acquainted with the communications in connection with this matter. Perhaps my hon. friend did not mean anything by it, but to have that statement made as it was does not help, when at page 413 of Hansard of February 11 I said we could go into all these matters, mentioning the rumours, the press reports, the off the record statements, and so on, and then said:

> We could go into all of this as well as any other matters relating to the subject. I would prefer not to do so because such discussions can, to say the least, do no possible good, especially at times like these.

Again at page 449 of Hansard I said I did not think the morale of the Canadian people or the morale of the troops in the field would be promoted by the discussion of factors which at the moment and in the circumstances can have no application. A little later I repeated that I would prefer not to discuss any other factors. I only want to say to the committee that if my hon. friend has any suggestion to make that the portion of the story I have not told, and which I indicated I had not told, contains anything which he thinks I desire to hide, I want him to say so now. I would have preferred, as the Prime Minister has said, to go into this matter from stem to gudgeon, for the simple reason that it would have prevented any possible suspicion or suggestion that I or the government had anything to hide. I assented to the course which the Prime Minister has indicated this afternoon for the reasons he gave, namely in the public interest, which was concurred in by the leader of the C.C.F. party. The leader of the opposition has made no expression on that point.

I am gratified by the fact that although there has not been a disclosure to the house of the whole situation, the government has indicated that it has no desire whatever to keep the communications within the confines of governmental privacy but has made them available to three hon. members of this house, with no strings of any kind attached except the dictates of their own conscience. Under those circumstances I do submit that it was hardly fair—I do not generally criticize him for this, and I repeat that he may not have intended it in this way—for my hon. friend to say that he had come to the conclusion, as if it were something he had only discovered after seeing these communications, that the Minister of National Defence had not told the whole story. I have said I have not told the whole story; I said that to the committee on two occasions. The purpose of the conference with these hon. gentlemen was to let them know the whole story. I do ask my hon. friend, if he thinks there is anything I have to hide in connection with this matter, to indicate that fact; or if he did not intend the reflection which I feel he cast upon my statement, I ask him to say so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I had no idea that the minister was reading into my remarks something which I think upon reflection he will see is not there.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to hon. gentlemen to my right that I heard several remarks from that corner imputing motives of one kind or another to the leader of the opposition. I think most hon. members of this house know of my desire to be fair to the government and everyone else. No one understands that better than the minister, I am sure; otherwise perhaps I should be in some state of heated anger over this matter. Instead of that I am trying to discuss it reasonably, and I hope the minister and the committee will understand that. If the minister will accept my statement in the reasonable way in which it was made, I simply said that we were told enough for me to come to the conclusion that in the present debate the Minister of National Defence has not told the whole story. It may be that the minister and I are looking at these words and their context in entirely different ways, but I want to tell the minister that what I wanted to convey, and what I think is conveyed as clearly as that could be done, is that after having gone over certain of the correspondence and other documents which were shown to us I came to the conclusion that the whole story had not been told.

Mr. RALSTON: That was already clear.

Mr. GRAYDON: I quite understand that, but I do not understand why the minister makes an issue of this. Both my hon. friend and the Prime Minister made the point clear, when the debate was halted last Monday evening, that there were some facts which the government felt should not be disclosed to the house and the country because of the public interest. All right. Surely it is not wrong for me, after having seen the documents, to come to a conclusion, as I did; and if that conclusion was the same as that reached by the minister, so much the better.

Mr. RALSTON: There is just one point between us; that is, that my hon. friend's statement suggested that he had to see the documents before coming to the conclusion that the minister had not told the whole story. My point is that the minister himself indicated to the committee on at least two occasions that he was not disclosing all the circumstances, and that it did not require the conference, which is the suggestion contained in my hon. friend's statement, in order to give him the information from which he could conclude that the minister had not disclosed everything.

Mr. GRAYDON: My statement was simply an attempt to tell the committee what were my conclusions after having the correspondence read to me. The minister had told us that the full story was not being disclosed, but after all it seemed necessary, the evidence having been presented to me, to form my own conclusions, and that is exactly what I did. I do not want the minister to take umbrage. Perhaps he is a little bit touchy, and perhaps I would be if I were in his position. I do not want him to go away with the idea, and I do not want any one in the house to think that I had some ulterior motive in formulating that sentence. I tried to make it just as fair as I could.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the committee wants to see this matter thoroughly discussed, although it may not be properly before the committee. Therefore it would be in order for hon. members to rise now and speak on what we are discussing at the present time before taking another subject.

Mr. RAYMOND: A moment ago the Prime Minister referred to the discussion which took place last Monday in connection with the resignation of or leave of absence granted to General McNaughton. That discussion had taken place because of the following question put to the Minister of National Defence by the leader of the opposition:

> My question is whether or not any factors, other than that which he mentioned of ill-health, entered into the resignation of General McNaughton.

The Prime Minister intervened in the debate in order to put an end to the discussion, and he said:

> I should be pleased to meet with and to show the correspondence to the leader of the opposition and to the leaders of the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties.

He also added the hon. member for Yale to that group. The Prime Minister completely ignored another group in this house, the Bloc Populaire of Canada. He knows of the existence of this group at least since the by-elections at Stanstead and Cartier. If any group in this house is entitled to information, then all groups should be entitled to the same information. If any member is entitled to any information, then all members should be entitled to the same information. What right has one group to get information which another group cannot get? What right has the hon. member for Yale to get information which other hon. members of this house cannot get? Have we any rights in this parliament? Is this a democratic parliament? Are we not entitled as members of parliament to all information?

If there is some secret about the matter, then close the doors like we have done in the past. I do not want any secrets to be revealed to the enemy, but I think it is unfair when the Prime Minister takes it upon himself to call in the leaders of certain groups and another member who is not a leader of any group in order to give out information and ignore the others. That is my view, and because that is my view I put this question to the Minister of National Defence. Were there other factors other than ill health which entered into the whole problem of the resignation or leave of absence of General McNaughton?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not sorry my hon. friend has raised the point as to why hon. gentlemen besides those whom I named the other day were not included in a meeting to discuss a confidential matter with myself as the leader of the government. That brings me back to procedure under the British parliamentary system. That system recognizes the government, recognizes it as the body which has been entrusted by the people to carry on the business of the country, and it recognizes the opposition. The position of the opposition has been recognized by our House of Commons in the enactment, of a statute which gives an official position to the leader of the opposition. The government and the opposition are the two elements of parliament which under the British system are presumed to be the ones to be considered, in the main may I put it, in carrying on the business of the country.

At the time I extended the invitation I did, I asked myself whether I should not confine to the leader of the opposition the invitation I was extending to discuss privately a matter of great public importance. I would have been taking a proper position if I had so confined my invitation. The leader of the opposition himself took exception to the fact that I had not conferred with him earlier. He recognized that he had certain rights as the leader of the opposition to know some matters which were of great public importance but which necessarily had to be kept secret. I gave him the reason why I had not asked him earlier to confer with me. I knew very well that if he had been given certain information in a private way before there was any discussion in parliament he might have felt himself precluded from debating as freely as he otherwise might have wished to do and from giving information to the members of his party.

The reason I extended an invitation to the leaders of the C.C.F. and the Social Credit party is that throughout this entire parliament there has been a recognition that at the time of the last general election those parties were returned in the numbers in which they were. Their leaders in this house have been granted, not as a matter of right but as a matter of courtesy, a certain recognition by the government. It seemed to me that the present was an occasion where it was desirable to invite those hon. gentlemen to a conference. The reason for inviting the hon. member for Yale must be obvious to all members of the house. The hon. member for Yale is a member of the privy council of Canada and has served in the position of minister of national defence under a Conservative administration. I felt that it would help to give confidence to hon. members of the house and to the public if the hon. member for Yale were present at that interview.

But for my hon. friend to say that because a new party has come into existence since a by-election, the leader of that party should have the same courtesy extended to him, is I think to take a position that is perfectly ridiculous. If that procedure is to be followed we may expect that any number of hon. gentlemen may suddenly become leaders of parties, whether small in number or not, and claim special rights and privileges in this house. I would have felt that I was making a very great departure from the proper procedure in parliament if I had gone any further in recognizing groups as a part of the opposition than I did.

May I say that I intend as far as it lies within my power to see that the business of this House of Commons is discussed as between the government and the opposition. If the opposition wish to be divided into groups, that of course is their own affair. I would draw attention to this fact. They are rapidly heading toward the system which developed in France where there was a large number of parties and where the business of the country got into such a state that there was no stability. I think quite sincerely that that condition had a good deal to do with the fate of the world as it is to-day. I do not believe the people of Canada wish to see a lot of parties in this country and I as Prime Minister am not going to do anything to further that trend.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before proceeding to say what I had intended to say, I should like to say just one word to the Prime Minister with respect to the formation of parties. The fundamental reason why new parties form is that the men in power signally fail, and the people, feeling absolute frustration because of their inability to get what they want from those in power, form new parties. I tell the Prime Minister that just as long as he fails to give the people of Canada what they want in the way of distribution of goods so that they can enjoy a standard of living commensurate with what their productive power justifies, he must expect to see new parties form ad infinitum in this country, and the one who will be to blame will be the Prime Minister himself. He cannot escape responsibility by rising and giving eloquent discourses and reading lectures to us every once in a while.

The Prime Minister speaks as though Canada were the only country in which more than two parties were recognized in parliament. If I am correctly informed, in England at the present time the Liberal party forms the third party and receives recognition. Also, if I am correctly informed, for a time in the mother of parliaments the Irish party formed the third party and was freely granted recognition. Consequently the Prime Minister is not breaking altogether new ground, although we recognize that he has endeavoured to be fair and just in his treatment of the minorities in parliament since he has been leading the government.

With respect to the McNaughton case, I had the impression before it was ever discussed in parliament that it was one which it would be altogether in the public interest for us to leave pretty much alone, leaving it to the government in power which is in a position to know all the details; and my experience yesterday in the meeting to which the Prime Minister referred confirmed me in that belief. I would say now that if we would discharge our responsibility as members of this house we would discontinue the discussion of this McNaughton affair and allow it to work its own way out in time.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few words to say. As a private member I cannot understand the distinction that is made with respect to matters which can be told to the leader of the opposition and the leaders of certain groups in this house but which cannot be told to private members. The Prime Minister was right when he said that in England there is only one leader of the opposition officially recognized by the government. Then he added that he had extended the courtesy to the leaders of two other groups, the C.C.F. group and the New Democracy group, of calling them into his confidence. But if the practice in England is to be followed, the government shall consider only the leader of the official opposition; but if similar courtesies are extended to the leaders of two other groups, that same courtesy should be extended to all members. I do not see why the leaders of the C.C.F. and New Democracy groups should receive better treatment than my hon. friend the member for Laval-Two Mountains, the leader of the Canadian party, or the leader of the Bloc Populaire, or the member for North Battleford, or the new member for Cartier. They should all be extended the same courtesy as is already extended to two leaders of political groups.

What are the matters that can be told only to the leaders and not to the rank and file? How is it that the rank and file cannot get certain information and that they are not trusted? Last year or the year before I suggested that we should have secret sittings of the house regularly once a week, when the government should take the members into their confidence and tell them matters that would not be discussed in public. There is news appearing in the press which has a much more disturbing effect on the morale of the Canadian people than the McNaughton case, especially the bombing of those seventeen allied ships at Bari in Italy by German aeroplanes, with no counter-attack from the allies. Those ships were not protected. That story appeared in the press, in every paper. Is not a thing of that kind disturbing to the morale of the Canadian people? Does it not give them the impression that there is something wrong? Those shiploads of ammunition and supplies were for the 8th Army and the 5th Army. Who was punished for allowing the ships to be sunk? Nobody was. Eisenhower was sent to England, and Montgomery had his picture taken with the Minister of National Defence. Nobody was punished. Seventeen allied ships loaded with ammunition bombed at an Italian port by the Germans without retaliation, it must have a disturbing effect on the morale of the Canadian people and of all the allied nations.

When there is something wrong in the Department of National Defence it is often said that the facts cannot be told because it is a military secret. Last year when I fought for the health of those in the Canadian army and wanted to see that the boys who were unfit were discharged because they were a burden to the army as well as to the taxpayers of this country, I was jeered by some members who said they were bored in listening to the dialogue carried on about it between the Minister of National Defence and myself. Here I must mention that one of our colleagues who deserves special praise is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Halifax, who has seen that many grievances were redressed.

Another case that is very sad is that of a boy who was unfit for the army. He suffered from angina pectoris. He was first classified "C-2" by his doctor. Then he went to the army and was classified "B." He was called up again and was classified "A." He drilled for a day, fell sick and called for a doctor. That was refused. They found the boy dead the morning after and later on he was buried in my constituency, where he was born. When a man dies under such circumstances the case deserves consideration, and deserves what else? It deserves reform. It is time for reform. We are here to talk about public business, and this is public business.

There is also a man in the camp at Barriefield who has to follow a special diet of veal liver and things like that, a regimen recommended by a specialist who knows his case, and he has to go to the restaurant to buy this special food out of his meagre pay. He has fallen off in weight from 142 to 108 pounds, and he is very sick. But he is kept there. He cannot follow the regimen prescribed in camp, but he is kept there just the same. There are many cases like that, and I feel that it is time to consider the health of the men in the army. We should see that the boys in every branch of the army are kept in good health. These are matters that should be discussed.

Why did not the leader of the opposition, the leader of the C.C.F., the leader of the New Democracy group, the leader of the Bloc Populaire and the leaders of all other groups ask the government to explain what happened at Bari and who was responsible there? Was it Montgomery? Was it Eisenhower? Who was responsible for not protecting those seventeen ships loaded with ammunition and food for the 8th Army along the Adriatic coast? Perhaps the reason why the allied advance is so slow in Italy is that those boys did not have the ammunition. It is time to ask the government about it. Is it not much more important than McNaughton's resignation?

Mr. LACOMBE: (Translation) Mr. Speaker, the first part of the resolution at present under consideration reads as follows:

1. That sums not exceeding $3,650,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1945, for

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

I shall confine my remarks mainly to paragraph (a) of the resolution at present under consideration: "the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada". Here are words which are frequently misused. The government is asking this house to vote $3,650,000,000 to ensure the realization of security, defence, peace, order and welfare, but is it taking the necessary action to achieve this purpose? We shall see. Strikes are breaking out everywhere. Dissatisfaction is rife. Unemployment is increasing, and trouble makers are taking advantage of this deplorable situation which borders upon disorder. Since the mobilization of all our resources for the prosecution of an exaggerated war effort, similar appropriations have been requested each year from parliament for a similar purpose. But, are we not standing still? Nay, we are going backwards. Never has the national debt reached such a high level. Never have taxes weighed so heavily upon the taxpayer. The public must put up with restrictions of all kinds. The Canadian family is dealt a heavy blow by the absence of the mother working in war plants. Add to this the insidious propaganda broadcast over the radio in such terms as these: "The woman of the day is the woman in uniform." In spite of the feeling of admiration I have for our women soldiers, I believe, as many others do, that the woman of the day is still the mother, who is especially revered because of the lives she has given and still gives to the nation. Notwithstanding all the sacrifices and the nobleness of the woman in uniform, I prefer to see the woman in her splendid role of guardian of the home, or preparing herself to fulfil such an admirable task.

Where did the popularity of feminine enlistments originate? If I am not mistaken, it started in totalitarian countries, in Soviet Russia, especially. Although such a statement may seem paradoxical, I am not a supporter of order within disorder nor of disorder within order. And what is the worst disorder, if not the breaking up of the family, which is the very foundation of society? I will not support this measure, not only for the reasons I have just indicated, but also because a revolution is in process of preparation in Canada. The government seems to do nothing to prevent its blazing out sooner or later, even before the end of this conflict. Is any evidence required? Only yesterday a party which has assumed a new name held a congress. That party has always been considered as banned in this country.

Mr. GAUTHIER: They changed their name.

Mr. LACOMBE: I agree with my hon. friend from Portneuf. Because that party has assumed a new name while holding the same doctrine, the government adopts toward it a laisser faire policy. Only a few days ago, prominent members of the clergy gave to the authorities of the city of Montreal a solemn warning about playgrounds where communistic propaganda is at work among our young people. They have furnished so much evidence in support of their claims that aldermen of the city of Montreal have asked for an inquiry into the matter. The pursuit of a policy of laisser-faire has brought us to such a pass. Moreover, after this frightful war, which is engulfing the economy of the nation has come to an end, who will be the cat's-paw? Who will hold sway over all of central Europe? And what will Canada have to offer her sons and daughters whose careers, shattered or in such a state that they must be built up again from scratch, will be to them an even heavier burden that the wounds they suffered on the battle-fields? Let us first look after our own. Our freedom and our rights as Canadian citizens come first. Away with agitators, with propaganda agents of subversive ideas.

Since the government asks for this sum of $3,650,000,000 to ensure the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada, it is my right and duty to ask that it safeguard without delay our threatened peace, security and social order. Since the government intends to bleed white the Canadian taxpayer in order to defend Christianity, freedom, justice and right, I would ask, in the name of every sacred principle, that it put a stop before it is too late to the insults and mud hurled every day at Christianity and His Holiness the Pope by the advocates of communism and by the sheet called "The Gospel Witness". On page fifteen of its issue dated February 10, this paper ran the following monstrosity:

(Text)

More About Russia and the Vatican

Last week we quoted an article from Izvestia, Soviet newspaper, which asserted that "servility of the Vatican towards fascism has not been confined to Italy," etc. Izvestia's article is criticized by the New York Times as being "unjust and intemperate." The press dispatch was as follows:

"New York, Feb. 4.—The attack on the Vatican by the Soviet government newspaper Izvestia is denounced to-day by the New York Times as 'unjust and intemperate.'

" 'Of all the incendiary literary bombs manufactured in Moscow since the Teheran conference and thrown with such light-hearted recklessness into the unity of the allied nations, none is likely to do greater damage,' the Times says. It adds that the 'palpable insincerity' of Izvestia's charges may be judged by the character of one of them.

"The Times asserts that Russia's allies, Britain and the United States, 'have no doubt where the real sympathy of the Vatican lies in this struggle.'

" 'They recognize the inescapable neutrality of the Pope's position,' it says, 'but they have had no difficulty in finding in his eloquent declarations clear evidence of his detestation for those who have violated the rights of little nations, who have committed bestial acts from one end of Europe to the other and who have attempted to elevate the dogma of totalitarianism to the dignity of a new religion.'

"The Times' defence of the Roman Catholic church should not be taken seriously, as it has long been evident that on many matters it takes its orders from the Roman hierarchy in the United States. Like other daily papers, it probably has one or more Romanist editorial writers, and one of them in all probability is responsible for this. Nothing escapes the eye of the propaganda department of the Roman Catholic church. It makes use of the radio and the public press for the dissemination of its views. The Roman serpent is a hydra-headed monster; and every head has a thousand tongues speaking lies and blasphemy.

(Translation) Neither communism nor this nameless sheet take into account the fact that millions of Roman Catholics and Christians of various denominations fight in the ranks of the united nations. Unless the government stop this propaganda at its very origin, Canada is in for a dismal future. These people will avail themselves of the deep post-war reactions to overwhelm established authorities both religious and civil. Demobilization in the army and the industries will afford them a fertile field for the dissemination of the most subversive doctrines. On the heels of destitution and unemployment the conflagration will spread to every part of the country. That is why I urge the government to take every necessary step to safeguard security, peace and order in Canada.

After the filthy extract written by a coward, I wish to read a touching description from the pen of a soldier-priest who, among thousands, has fallen a victim to German bullets on the blessed soil of Belgium. This extract is taken from Nouvelles catholiques, issued by the Wartime Information Board, on February 1, 1944:

While Awaiting the Firing Squad

While awaiting to be shot by a German firing squad, Father Joseph Peters, rector of Comblain-au-Pont, Liege diocese, wrote the following letter to his parishioners—a last message from "Your pastor who loves you and will continue to do so in heaven."

Father Peters recalls that every day he has offered the following prayer to Almighty God: "From this day, I accept with all my heart and with perfect joy, any kind of death that it might please Thee to choose for me, with all its difficulties, anguish and sufferings." The letter adds: "The time has come to realize this promise. When you receive this letter, I shall have fallen a victim to German bullets for having served my country as a priest and a soldier.

"I have no time to relate to you how and why I have acted but I shall say that I have no regret for what I have done and would do it again if I could.

"I face death without fear or blame, relying on Almighty God's infinite mercifulness and convinced that He will welcome me to heaven, where I hope to meet my dear parents, my brothers and sisters who have preceded me in the eternal world to come.

"Is it not true that you must know how much I loved you without distinction of age, rank or party, and I have felt, especially from the time of my incarceration, that you loved me as a father. . . .

"Before being called to face my supreme judge, I wish to beg forgiveness from anyone whom I may have offended in any way or toward whom I may have neglected to do any good deed which it was in my power to do. . . .

"My dear brethren, I must leave you in the act of blessing you for the last time . . . and, for the last time, I shout: 'All for Almighty God and the Blessed Virgin Mary! Long live the Catholic Church! Long live Belgium! Long live Comblain-au-Pont'."

(The Universe, December 17.)

How many times have I urged the government to ban the newspaper The Gospel Witness, sower of hatred and national disunity. This accursed sheet spreads falsehood, calumny and abuse even against the united nations and slings mud at their noblest characters. And the Post Office department welcomes its anti-national undertakings by accepting its infamous propaganda for distribution all through the country. That is the pass to which things have come. We are fighting for the triumph of christianity, freedom, justice and human rights, while in Canada there are two kinds of justice, one for the reviler of Christianity and the heroes of this war, and the other for the man who for a period of nearly four years has languished in an internment camp and was denied a trial. If it is for such a justice that we are sacrificing all our resources and that we are asked to vote again $3,650,000,000, I say that it is indeed not worth while. Therefore, we call upon the government to stop persecuting that outstanding citizen who has been and still is, whatever anyone may think, the former mayor of Montreal and member for St. Mary in the Quebec legislature.

I shall make one further remark before I conclude. The statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) gives little encouragement, as regards our reserve army and the men who have been mobilized. I am very much afraid that conscription for service anywhere and on any war theatre, although now an accomplished fact, will be enforced even more sternly. No one has opposed more than I such a policy. Therefore, I bring once again to the attention of the government the difficulties they will face in the dangerous course they have long since taken. I repeat that I have never approved of that policy, that I condemn it more than ever as forcibly as I can.

Mr. CHURCH: I am not a leader of a group like the last speaker, therefore I have no speech to read; but I wish to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the government, certain facts about the question which, fortunately or unfortunately, has been raised in this house this afternoon. After all is said and done, we are in the fifth year of the war. I think this country has done splendidly on the land and sea and in the air, starting as it did from scratch. I wish to say to the noble seven who sit down in the left-hand corner that their province was one of the most exposed of all. In all our eastern provinces as well we were very fortunate that we did not have an invasion with the gestapo, the trampling feet, the loud speaker, the whip, the concentration camps and the deportation of large numbers of the civiliain population to Germany and other places. We were spared all these cruelties and dangers which might have happened to this country.

I believe it is the opinion of the private members and of people outside the house that the country has responded nobly in this emergency. I am not here to criticize anybody, but I wish to say that the public are paying for the war, and they are entitled to know the facts. I am speaking only as a private member. I do not know anything about it. I was not told anything, and I do not want to be told anything, because I have already heard a great deal of the story from those who have come home from the front. I repeat that when the war broke out the government were confronted, as in the last war, with an emergency because we had thrown away our land, sea and air forces and our friends as well. We had simply disbanded our army, navy and air force. The permanent force was laughed at. Look at the men who are leading the armies on the front to-day. Many of them were then in the permanent force. I remember many of them. When they walked down the streets of the cities they were looked upon by pacifists with derision and it was said that they should be out of the profession altogether. These men saved us and have done nobly.

I desire to say a word about what was done by the British government in a case like this. As you all know, away back in January last year the war was not going very well in Africa. Mr. Churchill, the Prime Minister, went over to Africa. General Wavell, General Auchinlech and General Ritchie were transferred, and the march across the desert was placed in charge of General Alexander and General Montgomery. They marched right across the desert, and after Casablanca they met the army coming from America. In the British House of Commons private members rose—some of them just back from the front—and criticized. At the time I gave a copy of the British Hansard to the Minister of National Defence (Army) and it showed that private members in the British House of Commons, many of them generals, many of them from the army, the navy and other places, had criticized the conduct of the war. Mistakes will always be made in war; but the mistakes which the British have made are as nothing compared with the mistakes which Germany made and the mistake she made by forcing Japan to attack Pearl Harbor, forcing the United States into the war.

It is all very well for our friends down in the left-hand corner to talk about small nations. We have seen what happened to small nations in Europe. We would have had the same thing happen here if it were not for the mother country and the stand taken by the people of Canada and the government in raising such a noble army, navy and air force. The people want to know the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth about this matter. It was discussed after Africa in the British House of Commons and Mr. Churchill told the house the truth. I should like to point out also what they did in Germany and in Russia regarding a similar situation. At Stalingrad the Germans and the Russians brought in numbers of new generals. They removed a great many generals. Both the Russians and the Germans brought in managers of departmental stores and others who were civilians. They had learned to drill in two years or less. The new generals did a magnificent job. The Russians under new generals started their march at Stalingrad and they have defeated the Germans all along the line. I point these things out to the committee because it is not an involved question at all. I pointed out yesterday that the commitments which are being made are so vast and the world war is so widespread that it is hard for the average citizen, unless he follows the thing and has been following military matters many years, to know very much about it.

We are a nation and there is no intention on the part of the British government to interfere with our status, our sovereignty or our autonomy. We entered this war voluntarily by a resolution of the house which, with one or two exceptions, had the full support of the members. That resolution told the government to give the full strength and the full power of the nation to the conduct of the war. It was well that Canada decided to do so because she had to start from scratch, and as I say, our forces have done splendid work on the land and sea and in the air.

It do not believe it is the duty of the opposition, as their leader has said, to decide this matter of policy. The onus is on the government of the day as long as they are the government of the day to conduct a total war in a manner that will satisfy the people who are paying the taxes. This war was forced upon the British empire. Nobody wanted it. The empire went to the limit to have peace. It disarmed, threw away all its defences in 1922, 1923 and 1924. It had nothing left when the war broke out. In the period of twenty years between the two wars, the most fatal in the history of civilization, we thought we could do without armies, navies and air forces and depend on notes and the result was the British empire was left by the pacifists in a helpless condition. If the people are not allowed to know the facts, if they are allowed to know just what their rulers decide, then we are embarking on a very dangerous course.

Yesterday I referred to what Mr. Eden said in the British House of Commons on December 7, and on December 14, Mr. Churchill having taken sick, he referred to the commitments which had been made at Cairo between Great Britain, United States and China. These nations were represented by Mr. Churchill, Mr. Roosevelt and Chiang Kai-shek. They came to certain conclusions which bound Canada. These conclusions were that in the Pacific so far as the war against Japan was concerned everything that Japan gained at Pearl Harbor in December 1941 would be taken from her; that Japan would also have to give back everything she had acquired in the Pacific in the last two generations. Nobody knows when the war with Germany is going to end. I believe the full facts should be given this afternoon to the people of Canada. We should know the ins and outs of this case. I read in the house last year a statement of Major Markland, V.C., who is serving in this war. He is a member of the British House of Commons. There are forty-six members of the British House of Commons who have lost their lives in this war and all but one or two are Conservatives. Major Markland, V.C., rose and criticized the conduct of the war in North Africa, whereupon Mr. Churchill gave a full statement to the house, and to the public later on the radio, with regard to the transfer of generals and all that kind of thing. The conduct of the war for Canada is the responsibility of the government and the officers on the field and no one else. I do not want to say anything to interfere with the progress of the war or in any way to impede the work of the government or the minister in that connection; because I think the opposition as a whole has so far given the government splendid support. To ask us to throw out the life-line as to what should be done on government policy now is another matter, when we have nothing to do with it. I am not speaking for any party in this house. I have been nothing but a consistent follower of one party all my life. I have never claimed to be anything else. I have been a supporter of rearmament all along the line, in season and out of season. I was a voice crying in the wilderness in the period between the two wars, when I said we should not leave the defence of civilization to notes, pacifist doctrines, the Monroe doctrine, and all that kind of thing. I supported, to the best of my ability, the expenditure of money on our defences, and in 1935, when I was sitting on the other side of the house, I opposed the reduction in the defence estimates that was made by my own government before the election of that year.

I regret the stand that the government has taken regarding a great "soldier, statesman and patriot" whom I have known since he was a student at McGill university. I do not know anything about the conduct of the war in Italy except what I have heard, though I believe there is one matter which might well be mentioned here. In this world war there has been too much dependence upon those who have graduated from staff colleges. I understand some of the best men in the field in this war are men who have been connected with the militia all their lives, men who have gone up the ladder from the bottom to the top, and in connection with our army, navy and air force I think it might have been better if that principle had been followed in this war a little more liberally than has been the case so far.

That is about all I have to say. I believe this is a matter for the government to decide, and I am sorry it has gone as far as it has because I believe the people are entitled to know the truth. Mistakes will always be made during a war. Mistakes have been made in connection with the Germans all down through history, and mistakes will be made in the future. Many more mistakes will be made before the end of this war unless this House of Commons reasserts itself. Talk about parliamentary control over the war! The private members of this house might just as well pack up and go home if we are just to take somebody's say-so in connection with the conduct of the war. I am strongly opposed to the stand taken by the Prime Minister and the government in this matter. I believe the people are entitled to all the facts. All the cards should be laid on the table; if that is done we will strengthen the morale of the people of Canada and of the troops at the front, who cannot say anything because they have lost their civilian status. They can say nothing at all; their civilian rights have been taken away, and it is up to us to protect our men in the field and the people at home. After all, wars are won by soldiers, sailors and airmen at the front, and not by home defence. I suggest to the noble seven down at the far end of the chamber that there is no such thing as home defence, as the small nations of Europe found out to their sorrow. The mechanized hordes rolled right over the small nations. Canada has to stand with the mother country in this fight; we have to hang together or we shall hang separately, because none of the dominions is able to go it alone.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the minister a question on the first item in his estimates, if am in order now. If my question is not in order I shall not expect the minister to answer it now. Yesterday in Toronto I found a good deal of excitement being caused by the calling up for service of eighteen year old lads going to high schools and collegiates. A man whom I know very well, who has one son nineteen years of age now in the air force and another lad nearly seventeen, called me up in reference to his neighbour's son. This boy is just past eighteen, and a day or two ago he received a call to report to military headquarters. My question is this. Has it come to that stage, that lads in Toronto and perhaps elsewhere, eighteen years of age, are being called to report to military headquarters, to be taken into the service?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has me at the moment; I did not know they were being called up at that age. I am afraid I have not the informations here just now, but I will have it within twenty minutes and will tell my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the Minister of National War Services had been in when the house opened I would have asked him the question on the orders of the day.

Mr. RALSTON: The case my hon. friend refers to was a call for military service?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, for army service.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I should like to bring two matters to the attention of the minister. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has drawn attention to the calling up of eighteen year old boys. Could the minister tell us just what the policy of the government is with regard to the calling of conscientious objectors. I know these people are not very popular in the country and one does not court popularity by speaking in their behalf, but it appears that the government is intent upon calling every conscientious objector of military age, regardless of his occupation or of how essential he may be in agriculture or some other industry.

I was surprised yesterday when the minister informed us that men have been detailed from the army back to agriculture and other industries, while at the same time these conscientious objectors, who because of their religious scruples simply will not fight, are constantly being taken out of agriculture and industry, where they are doing a good job of production; and when they refuse to go to labour camps they are even sent to gaol, where they produce nothing but are an expense and liability to the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: And their wives and children are the sufferers.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That is correct. I have two instances that came to my attention last week, both of which I have brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour, under whom the selective service operates. Apparently nothing can be done, however, to prevent these people from being sent to gaol.

Mr. RALSTON: To prevent what?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Apparently nothing can be done to prevent their being sent to gaol. In the first instance this man tells me he is employed in a shoe factory. His employer asked for his postponement, stating that it would be impossible to replace him and that production would suffer if he were called. Notwithstanding that, the man was instructed to go either into the army or into a labour camp. He refused to do either, and apparently he must go to gaol. The second case is that of a man who farms 150 acres of land, with 23 head of cattle, 35 hogs and 6 horses. I have verified these facts. He also has a tractor, which he uses in work for other farmers as well. His father is sixty years of age, and will be unable to carry on the farm if his son is taken away. Yet that man was haled into the army and, since he was a conscientious objector, was offered the opportunity of going into a labour camp, which he refused. I am told that his case was adjourned for a week to give him a chance to change his mind, but when he still refused to do so he was sent to gaol.

The point is that these people object to paying for the war under compulsion. One of these men tells me that if he had consented to pay $2 a week to the Red Cross he could have avoided going to gaol or going into the army. I have his statement here to the effect that he was offered the choice of paying $2 into the Red Cross or going into the army. I should like to know the government's position on that matter. On the surface it looks as though there is a prejudice against these men because of their religion. That religion may seem peculiar to some of us, but there would seem to be that prejudice.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There is no reflection upon the Red Cross?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: No, not in the slightest. It was simply that the officers were trying to offer this man an easy way out.

Mr. WOOD: In what district was it that this man who had 150 acres and 23 cows was refused postponement?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Around Brampton.

Mr. WOOD: That would be the Toronto district?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: No. I am doubtful if this man would have been called from the farm had he not been a conscientious objector. I have been given the particulars of many farmers who were granted leave to remain on their farms and who to all intents and purposes were no more needed than this man. The second matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is the one we were discussing when the committee rose last night at eleven o'clock, the matter of dependent mothers.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to appeal to the committee in connection with this discussion. I have pointed out to the committee that we have been over two days on item 1 and I do not think ten per cent of the discussion has related to that item. However, I felt that this was the time to permit hon. members to deal with the special things they had in mind or with general topics in connection with the department. My hon. friend has dealt with conscientious objectors. May I say to him with all respect that that matter does not come under the army at all. It has to do with the Department of Labour and national selective service. The next matter he proposes to take up is dependents' allowances which comes under item 2. I wonder if the committee would be prepared to pass item 1, or else confine the discussion to that item so that we may make at least that much progress. The next item will call for a long discussion since it covers pay and allowances which take in a good deal.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I brought this up because it was under discussion last night, but I am quite prepared to wait.

Mr. RALSTON: I am trying to get the procedure in the groove, as it were. Does the hon. member for Yale, who is representing the leader of the opposition, think there should be any more discussion on this item?

Mr. STIRLING: I think the difficulty arises from the fact that we have adapted ourselves to a course of action which is not strictly in accordance with the rules. We have chosen to adopt this method of clarifying the situation and permitting a great latitude of discussion, but the fact remains that these items have not been committed to the committee. We are scarcely within the rules as we would be if it were a matter of the estimates.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the Minister of Finance put them on Hansard when he made his speech.

Mr. STIRLING: But they have not been committed to the committee in the same way as the items of a money bill would be. We have had to devise our own methods of handling this matter, and I am sure the opposition will be ready to accommodate itself to whatever method of conduct may be adopted with the consent of the committee. Considerable discussion has taken place on item 1, but I think a certain amount of latitude was agreed to. I should imagine that most of the questions hon. members would want to ask would fall within the succeeding items.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I be permitted to bring a matter to the attention of the minister?

Mr. RALSTON: Is it under 1?

Mr. LOCKHART: I have given consideration to what the minister said about item 1 and perhaps item 2. I am referring to a situation which has developed within the last few days. It has to do with the housing of the wives of soldiers and their dependents. I cannot find any item in the list which would cover this except item 4, which covers construction, and that certainly is not the matter with which I wish to deal. I shall not hold up the committee any longer than possible, but what I have to say is supported by a strong resolution, copies of which I believe have reached the hands of the Minister of Munitions and Supply and will probably work back into the Department of National Defence.

I intend to deal with the matter of housing as it affects the families and dependents of soldiers who have gone overseas, as well as soldiers who have returned and their dependents. Many of these are unable to work and they require housing. I ask the minister or his assistant to take note of one or two things. When the wartime housing scheme was first started the Minister of Munitions and Supply did his best to provide housing for soldiers and their dependents by making available in some centres a small number of houses which had been built by Wartime Housing Limited. However, when the pressure of production increased, the minister had some difficulty in meeting the demands made upon him.

I think the situation has changed to some extent, if not in all areas at least in my own constituency. I know of one plant the production of which has been reduced to the minimum. Hundreds of men have been laid off in other plants. As the minister has described it, it is now a case of maintenance rather than production. Soldiers and their dependents in this highly industrialized area have suffered considerably. Now that the pendulum is swinging back, the council of my city has taken the matter definitely in hand. As I say, I wish to bring two points to the minister's attention.

I ask him to be good enough to confer with the Minister of Munitions and Supply in an endeavour to have more latitude given to these dependents, and more particularly to those men who are coming back bruised and battered, both mentally and physically, by the war. In order to make my position clear I intend to refer to a resolution passed on Monday night by the council of my city. I shall not attempt to spread the whole text of this resolution upon the record, but I shall read just enough to give the minister the position. Will he just give me his attention? It was moved and seconded:

Whereas this council is definitely of the opinion that members of the armed forces, who have returned from overseas service or from active service in Canada and who have received their discharge papers, should have the opportunity of securing housing accommodation for themselves and their families, by means of rental of wartime housing dwellings.

I repeat, the peak of production in that area has been reached; the pendulum seems to be swinging back so that it is now more or less of a maintenance proposition. The council in its resolution goes on to point out that the dwellings erected by Wartime Housing Limited were put up originally to take care of an emergency situation and that they are not available for members of the armed forces who have been discharged from military service. The resolution goes on to say:

Now therefore this council hereby resolves that the dominion government be petitioned to amend the present regulations governing Wartime Housing Limited dwellings and to provide that members of the armed forces who have returned from duty overseas, or who have been honourably discharged from military service, should be eligible to secure Wartime Housing dwellings for themselves and their families; and that those whose families have been residing in Wartime Housing Limited dwellings during the period of their absence on military service be permitted to continue their occupation of these dwellings.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

There is also a reference to unpaid rent accounts. I have searched the records in vain to find anything covering that point; accordingly, I telegraphed to the corporation for instructions, and I received in reply this telegram:

St. Catharines, Ont.

N. J. M. Lockhart, M.P.

St. Catharines paid to Wartime Housing Limited three accounts for rentals unpaid by occupants amounting to a total of $118.12, and has also paid water rates $8.65 and electric light account $6.29.

Herbert H. Smith,
City Clerk.

I can find nothing in the law or regulations that gives Wartime Housing Limited the right to demand a guarantee from a municipality for the payment of rent for a soldier and his dependents. I think it is an unfair imposition to kick that back on to the municipality, because this housing accommodation is being used in some cases for the protection of the wives and families of soldiers who have gone overseas and returned. I suggest that in this matter the minister ask the cooperation of his colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply to see if something cannot be done to rectify the present situation. In that area there are some 800 houses put up by Wartime Housing and there are many soldier families who have not been able to get decent housing accommodation. Some of them are living in hovels. Surely we can do something for the wives and dependents of soldiers who have returned to that area.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the quickest way for me to deal with the matter would be to get the letter which was written by the Minister of Finance to the mayors of Windsor and Hamilton, I think it was, setting out the whole arrangement. I shall then give the particulars to my hon. friend. At the moment I would say that what is done is to call to the attention of the municipalities that the matter of housing is not a federal responsibility but a municipal and community responsibility. Notwithstanding that, Wartime Housing Limited has given to the municipalities the use of a certain number of houses which they may want particularly for soldiers' dependents, to be used until other housing is obtainable, and the municipalities looking after the collecting of the rents. The soldier and his dependents are receiving pay and allowances for the purpose of paying rent. This is just a temporary arrangement which was made at the request of the municipalities in order to assist them in carrying out the usual obligations of municipalities in helping to provide housing for their citizens. In Windsor and Hamilton, particularly, the community associations are very active in looking up housing accommodation for soldiers' dependents and in indicating or requesting, if necessary, housing of this kind from Wartime Housing Limited. Wartime Housing Limited has put at the disposal of different municipalities a certain number of houses. I have given this information to my hon. friend in advance. I will give him to-morrow the letter written by the Minister of Finance to the municipalities.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I add in all fairness to the Minister of Munitions and Supply that there is an acute housing situation in that area, which is probably the most highly industrialized in Ontario.

Mr. RALSTON: That is St. Catharines?

Mr. LOCKHART: Yes, including Merritton.

Mr. RALSTON: Hamilton too.

Mr. LOCKHART: Hamilton is also highly industrialized. There was a time when I felt extremely sympathetic toward the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I know that he simply could not give houses that just were not there, and the demand for munitions at that time was so great that munitions had to come first. But now the peak of production has passed in that area. I was in the national selective service office last Saturday morning and I saw at least seventy-five persons arranging for their transportation out of the city. Hundreds have already gone, and I know of several married couples who are planning on moving out because they see production tapering off.

Mr. RALSTON: Moving out of Wartime Housing?

Mr. LOCKHART: Yes, I know of three or four cases personally. The resolution passed by the city council of St. Catharines does not give specific cases. It deals with the problem generally. I could give the minister specific cases of men who have come back from overseas broken down in health who are now on hospital leave from Christie Street hospital and who just cannot get accommodation for themselves and their families in the St. Catharines area. There is a number of such cases. I am asking the minister to cooperate with the Minister of Munitions and Supply in relieving the housing shortage in that area for members of the armed forces who have returned from overseas and their dependents. I draw to the attention of the minister the situation of the returned men in that area. The city council has been doing its best to search all over for housing for a returned soldier who is mentally unbalanced on account of his war service. Here is an opportunity for Wartime Housing Limited to give returned men and their dependents some little preference in its housing accommodation.

Mr. GREEN: Yesterday the minister promised to give certain information. He said he would tell us, for example, how many men had been detailed for work in shipbuilding yards and other industries. When he is giving us that information, he could perhaps give us further details of the plans with regard to the men called up under N.R.M.A. Just two days ago the minister said that there were about 70,000 men in Canada who had been called into the army under the N.R.M.A. and that of that number 50,000 could be sent abroad to fight; in other words, there were 50,000 fighting men. That same figure of 50,000 fighting men was given also about a year ago by the minister, on May 14, to be exact. At that time he said that there were 50,000 men called up under the N.R.M.A. who could, if the government chose, be sent abroad to fight. A year has passed; 25,000 more men have been called up under the N.R.M.A., and yet to-day we have only 50,000 men, the minister says, fit to fight. I would ask the minister why it is that with this additional 25,000 called up there has been no increase in the number of those who can be sent abroad to fight. The plans for the coming year are that another 12,000 shall be called up. I should like to know whether it is the intention to have any larger number available for fighting, or whether these 12,000 who are to be called this year are simply to be replacements, so that a year from now we shall find, again, that we have only 50,000 N.R.M.A. men who are in a category such that they can do any fighting.

Mr. RALSTON: First, with regard to the matter of the men for the shipyards, no soldiers have been detailed for duty with the shipyards. At the request of the Department of Munitions and Supply, in November, commands and military districts were authorized to grant six months' leave without pay and allowances to sixty soldiers who were qualified electricians and who volunteered for employment with the Burrard Dry Dock Company, Limited, Vancouver, on electrical work in connection with the conversion of certain vessels into aircraft carriers. Is that what my hon. friend is referring to?

Mr. GREEN: Yes. Where did these men come from?

Mr. RALSTON: Soldiers granted this leave were issued with a free transportation warrant to Vancouver, British Columbia. This expenditure is recoverable by the Department of National Defence from the Department of Munitions and Supply, who in turn will recover it from the Burrard Dry Dock company. Transportation on termination of employment is issued under the same conditions. Sixty soldiers volunteered and were released for this employment, reporting to Austin C. Taylor, Wartime Merchant Shipping, Limited, Vancouver, for interview and placement with Burrard. The report shows that recently fifty-seven of these men are still employed, three having terminated their employment due to ill health or other reasons.

I have not information here as to the districts they come from. My hon. friend will notice that commands and districts were authorized to grant six months' leave. They were specially trained electricians, and probably would come from quite a number of districts. I will find out.

Mr. GREEN: Were these men N.R.M.A. men?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell. I will find out.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister find out where they were sent from?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that some, at least, were sent from eastern Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend understands they were volunteers for the work and were given leave.

Mr. GREEN: Is it possible, then, for a soldier, if he wishes to go into a shipyard, to get leave and go away from the army for an indefinite time?

Mr. RALSTON: This was a special case, a special request from the Department of Munitions and Supply to see if we could find them sixty electricians for special work, and we made an order authorizing the districts and commands to give leave to not more than sixty men in the aggregate for the purpose of taking on this work. And they got sixty men.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any similar provision to allow men to go away on leave to work in other industries, war industries or otherwise?

Mr. RALSTON: No. Yesterday I read to my hon. friend all the leaves that I know about: coal mining, railways—no, I think it was, detailed for duties on railways—farming, lumbering. I do not know of any others.

With regard to the N.R.M.A. personnel strength, the strength as of March 31, 1943, as given to me, was approximately 65,000 enrolled in that time. My hon. friend said 30,000, did he not? Nineteen thousand is what I have here.

Mr. GREEN: What year is that?

Mr. RALSTON: I beg pardon—enrolled during nine months up to December 31, 1943, 19,000; making 84,000.

Mr. GREEN: Of course the minister cannot state the figures for the full year.

Mr. RALSTON: No, I cannot tell my hon. friend yet. Then, to general service, 3,000; that is to say, men who enrolled and afterwards enlisted for general service; discharges, desertions, deaths, 8,000; making 11,000; leaving the strength as of 31st December, 1944, 73,000, and on leave under these different leaves, about 5,000; leaving the effective strength 68,000. It is estimated that about 50,000 of these are of a category suitable for overseas. At that rate, taking in the 12,000 planned for this year, I would not think there would be very much increase in the number eligible for overseas; there might be some by taking in the 12,000. The wastage here was 11,000 for the year; at least, the reductions from N.R.M.A.: 3,000 men enlisted and there were 8,000 desertions, discharges, deaths.

Mr. GREEN: How many were discharges and how many desertions?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell.

Mr. GREEN: Can that information be obtained?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Mr. GREEN: Then the policy is that the number of real fighting men in Canada called up under the N.R.M.A. will not be increased?

Mr. RALSTON: What I said was that our provision this year is intended for maintenance. The strength may be increased; that is, if casualties are not in accordance with calculations; if they are, less; or it may be reduced if there are more casualties or if there are some other wastages that we do not know about. But the policy is—and that is what my hon. friend wants—to provide men on a maintenance basis for the present strength.

Mr. GREEN: There is one other question on which I should like the minister to give further information. It has to do with the retirement of officers; he has mentioned it once or twice already in the course of discussion but not in any detail. I think it is a very, very serious question, and I realize that it is a very difficult question. Apparently a large number of officers who have served, many of them since the beginning of the war, and some of them overseas, with distinction, and have done good work, are now either being retired or being kept around the depots, told to report back once a week or just keep in touch, not knowing what is going to happen to them, not knowing whether they will be able to do anything further in the army, not knowing whether they should be getting busy about finding some place to earn their living in civilian life; and I think there should be a clear-cut announcement by the minister with regard to these men. It seems to me a tragedy that men can be brought along over this period of time, given many courses, trained until they are efficient officers, and now find that there is no use for them at the present time.

It is true that Canada has not done a great deal of fighting, and casualties—fortunately—have not been very heavy. Probably it will only be a short time until we are having heavy casualties and shall need some of these men. I think the policy regarding them should be given further consideration by the minister. Sometimes I wonder whether the department has not gone too far in the direction of arbitrarily ruling men out at a certain age. Personally I know of many cases where men have gone into the army at great sacrifice and done a good job and now are just hanging around, not knowing what is going to happen to them, becoming disgruntled, and, I think, being treated unfairly. I know the minister would not do that intentionally, but that is the result. These men feel that they are being treated unfairly. Is there not a place for some of them, at any rate, in the administration of the conquered countries, the countries which have been overrun? I believe that we have a course in which Canadian officers are trained for administration work in the overrun countries. Is there not scope here for some of these men? The situation is very serious, and the minister should give further consideration to it, not just say, "Oh, we are modernizing our army and these men have to get out; we thank them for what they have done, but they had better get busy and return to civilian life." That may have to be the answer, but it just does not seem good enough to me under present conditions, in the state of the war at the present time. If this is to be the policy in training these men there is a great deal of money as well as experience being wasted, and I doubt whether the governmental policy at the present time is a wise one. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me give the figures with regard to the break-down of the 8,000: 6,500 were discharged, 1,500 deserted.

Mr. GREEN: That is, 1,500 N.R.M.A. deserted in the nine months of the present fiscal year?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Are these 1,500 still missing?

Mr. RALSTON: They may be missing and other men may be picked up. There has been a more or less even flow in the last three months.

Mr. GREEN: That is a very high percentage of desertions.

Mr. RALSTON: There have been 11,000 in the four and a half years of war—a net loss of 11,000. In reference to officers, my hon. friend has spoken on a subject regarding which he is quite right in assuming that I have a very particular interest. I appreciate all that he has said and I considered all that before the present policy was put into effect. The situation is this. We must be realistic and face the hard fact that there are many officers who, as compared with other officers, are not advantageously employable; that is to say, there are officers who can better do the job and whose services are available. What is being done, therefore, is to have these boards sort out the officers, appraise their qualifications, and endeavour to find the best men for the job. That means that there is a substantial reduction in officers, and will be.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister mean that there are younger officers?

Mr. RALSTON: There are some younger officers too. In the last week I have signed ten retirements for officers from twenty-one to thirty. The term "not advantageously employable" was used, but it meant that those particular officers simply could not do the job and it was felt that they ought to serve somewhere else.

Mr. GREEN: In most cases it is a matter of age.

Mr. RALSTON: It is a matter of age and also a matter of the job being abolished. The majority of cases are those of age. Here is the number, and perhaps this will contradict what I said. In the three months from October to January 26, 1,077 officers have been retired, and of that number 212 were recommended for retirement for reasons of age. Of the others, the 800, many were probably seniors—not senior officers but senior in point of age.

Mr. GREEN: Replaced by younger men?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: How many retired at their own request?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not that statement at the moment. I do not want to refer to what anyone else is doing, or to give that as an excuse for what we are doing, but I have heard no statement which the Minister of National Defence for Air has made this year which has been received with as much applause as the statement he made with regard to the reduction in the number of officers.

Mr. GREEN: You cannot judge policies by applause in this house.

Mr. RALSTON: Nevertheless I thought it rather indicated that the policy was a sound one. Someone said to me, "Does that affect you?" I said, "It affects me to this extent that the army started ten months ago"—

Mr. GREEN: Do not pay too much attention to applause.

Mr. RALSTON: —and I was told that it was a good example to follow. The same situation exists in the United States. They announced a surplus of 65,000 officers and subsequently, through reorganization, the number has been reduced by about half. That is the situation. It is the same in munitions plants, and with executives who have been helping in the war effort. The time has come when we are on a maintenance rather than on a capital basis and the result is a distinct lowering in the number of jobs available. The system we have may not work perfectly, but I do take some pride in it. These officers have personal interviews, and the officers at the depots are in most cases men to whom it could be said at once, "out". At the same time, however, these boards are doing their level best to be sure that there is no job for these men before they are allowed to go. Men come to me frequently and say, "I want an answer yes or no"; but they do not want no. It is the same with these officers. Each individual case is considered by the board and passed on by the adjutant general and by the military secretary, whom I regard as the officer's friend. He goes over the cases himself, and it is only after all that is done that the retirements take place. There is a regular procedure and a notice is sent to the officer. Only this morning I gave instructions to see if we could not make that notice a little more human.

Mr. GREEN: It is not very human now.

Mr. RALSTON: It is a mimeographed notice that goes to the officer, and after he has held a post for some time it is not a particularly welcome document. We want to make it as human as we possibly can. The notice is given and the man has an opportunity of making a complaint or a protest or pointing out where he might be used. That is considered by the board, and they make a recommendation as to whether or not the representation shall be entertained, or whether that particular occupation or post which the man suggests might be made available to him. It is only after all that is done that the discharge is made. I take a view opposite to that of my hon. friend. I think officers ought to be discharged faster than they are.

Mr. GREEN: Ought to be what?

Mr. RALSTON: I say there should be more speed in connection with the discharge of officers, and I am afraid that the slowness is due to the fact that the board is working at what is an impossible task, namely, that of finding employment for all these men. The point is that these men are much better off going back to civil life now than when the rush comes. This is an opportunity for them to go back, and what is detaining them is the pride which they feel in the fact that they have worn the uniform during the war, have helped to build up the army, and have trained men, and feel, therefore, that there should be some place in the army for them while the war lasts.

There was a man of forty-nine in my office the day before yesterday. He has two boys overseas with good service in this war, and he was overseas himself; yet we sent one of these notices to him. The notice took a somewhat more human and intimate form than is usual, but he made an appeal to the minister, as it is his right to do under section 42. I am sending him a letter, as I am bound to, to tell him that I cannot find employment for him. These are tough cases—this is a particularly tough one because there are many that have not nearly the merit it has. I should like to be able to tell the committee that I will try to reconsider the policy, but I cannot reconsider it if administration is to be carried on. It would mean that we would be loaded up with a lot of officers on the payroll, and they would be at least lulled into the security of thinking there is a job for them, only to find, some day, sooner or later, that they have to be cut off. There will have to be many more retirements yet, as there have been in the United States. As regards age, in the United States they are retiring them if over thirty-eight and putting them on the inactive list. We are retiring them at sixty; that is the automatic retirement. I do not say that in the United States they automatically retire those over thirty-eight, but those are the only ones taken into account. They look over the men of thirty-eight and see how many can be retired. We are taking them much lower than that, from between thirty and thirty-five. There are not many of these, though there are some.

That is the policy with regard to officers and it is working. That is the machinery we have set up. We have not just one board for Canada but four boards. These boards have gone out and got acquainted with these officers intimately in order to assess their qualifications and at the same time to be in touch with the districts to find out what posts there are into which they may be fitted.

Mr. GREEN: About how many officers are facing retirement? How many will have to be retired?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend, for this reason: You take officers in the bulk. We might have what may be regarded as a reserve—this figure is a rough one—of six thousand or something like that in other words, subalterns, a great many officers who have been recently commissioned. It includes older officers as well. You have to keep a substantial reserve, and I cannot say how many of these would be facing retirement. I am not going to make any guess at the moment. Speaking of officers, I should like to make an announcement to the committee before it is made to the press. This is an announcement which will take up the slack in connection with a number of these junior officers, the men who have just graduated or who are in training centres. We are making an arrangement with the British to lend them a certain number—I am not going to say the number, but it is a substantial number—

Mr. GREEN. Junior officers?

Mr. RALSTON: Junior officers, yes. Under the plan a large number of junior officers, largely of the infantry corps, the Canadian army, are to be lent on a voluntary basis to the British army for service in the European and Mediterranean theatres of war. The plan will permit many captains and lieutenants trained in infantry for overseas duty and physically fit, who otherwise would be unlikely soon to see service abroad, to gain further valuable experience with the British army. The plan is to go into effect immediately. For security reasons the number of officers permitted to go into action with British units under this agreement cannot be disclosed, but a definite limit will be placed on the number to be accepted. The great strength in reinforcement officers which has gradually been built up in Canada since the outbreak of war makes it improbable that all officers eligible for overseas service will see early action with the Canadian army overseas. The loan plan offers an opportunity to serve with the British forces in the field. Junior officers of the Canadian army in order to take advantage of this plan must, of course, volunteer for this service; that is to say, officers will be given the option of volunteering to go to the British under this plan. They will be on loan for a minimum period of three months. However, their recall has been provided for as and when it is desirable; that is to say, recall by the Canadian government.

One effect of that scheme will be to create for the Canadian army a pool of experienced and, in many cases, battle-trained platoon and company commanders and potential junior staff officers. The Canadian officers who volunteer for service with the British army will continue to receive their pay and allowances from the Canadian government and at regular Canadian rates, as in the case of the Royal Canadian Air Force crew serving with the Royal Air Force. They will also continue to wear "Canada" badges on their shoulders while serving with the British army. It is pointed out that by volunteering under this plan, Canadian junior officers do not forego opportunities for normal promotion, but while on loan their promotion will be subject to British recommendation and confirmation by Canadian authorities. During the last war many Canadians served as officers in British units in a number of theatres of active operation. The contacts made between the Canadian officers volunteering for this service and the British army should prove invaluable in cementing the cordial relations and understanding already existing between the Canadian and British armies. The loan plan was termed by a senior British officer—that is, in correspondence with the department—as a great contribution to the united war effort.

I am afraid there is not very much more I can give in the way of details of the plan. I have already said that they are volunteers. With regard to the ranks of officers we are lending, they are ready to take one captain for each eight lieutenants. They can be recalled at any time. They are to be kept for a minimum of three months. We are asking the officers to agree not to ask for a return to Canada for at least three months. There will be special cases, of course—

Mr. GREEN: Are they going from England or from Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: Practically all from Canada. Pay, allowances and pensions will be paid by Canada. In reference to discipline, we want to be particular about that. All adverse reports will be submitted to Canadian military headquarters in London before action is instituted thereon; that is to say, Canada feels that we should keep our hand on that particular feature of the service, particularly since they are on loan. They are subject, of course, to British military law, but in case of a court martial—and I hope there will not be any—sentence must be confirmed by Canadian authorities. We are planning to have a liaison officer at the war office to do nothing but look after postings of these officers and generally watch their interest and the Canadian interest in connection with this plan. I mentioned promotion. It will be to acting rank on recommendation of the British. Normally these would be confirmed by Canadian military headquarters after six months.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this open to officers of all infantry units in the Canadian active army in Canada at the present time?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know. The adjutant general is working on it to-day. I do not know exactly whether he is making it to apply to other than those who are actually at corps training centres or at Brockville taking advanced refresher courses, or in camps. I rather think it might be made pretty generally open unless it is a case where in the exigencies of the service a man cannot be spared. My own feeling would be—I was talking to the adjutant general this morning—to give a chance to all junior officers who can be spared. If a man wants to volunteer let him go and substitute for somebody who does not. I may say also I do not think there is any objection in the way of security to saying this. The understanding is that the service is to be restricted to the European and Mediterranean theatres in order to facilitate return in case we should want to recall them.

This is a plan which I think bids fair to provide some outlet for the energies of a number of junior officers who at the present time are viewing with some concern the prospects of getting overseas soon, and at the same time it provides them with training.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be wise to make the same provision for some of our officers to be trained with the Australians in the Pacific area? Sooner or later Canada will be fighting the Japanese. It is vital that there should be trained men in that type of warfare. Why are we not giving our men an opportunity to get that training?

Mr. RALSTON: Do not let my hon. friend assume we are not. I am not making any statement in regard to that at the moment. There are some arrangements along that line in hand.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a minute ago, the hon. member for Vancouver South, who asked a few questions, mentioned N.R.M.A. soldiers. I have in my hand the Canada Gazette of October 30, which contains the National Resources Mobilization Act, army regulations 1943. It is National Resources Mobilization Act army. By virtue of the mobilization act there are two kinds of regulations, those enforced by the Department of Labour and those enforced by the Department of National Defence proper. These regulations are something like a schedule to an act, and there is a paragraph which I intend to read to show the importance of the regulations and to show also that by virtue thereof the Department of National Defence has a priority over all essential industry. This means, therefore, that national selective service is the bunk. Here is the paragraph which is of the utmost importance; listen to this:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of these regulations and the provisions of any other statute or any orders or regulations made thereunder, the provisions of these regulations shall govern.

This is contained in order in council P.C. 7898, which was passed on October 14, 1943, and it means that the regulations established under the order in council for the Department of National Defence have priority over the regulations, also passed by order in council, administered by the Minister of Labour. This has been drafted in an ingenious way. A volunteer is no longer a volunteer according to these regulations; he is a G.S. soldier, under subparagraph (c) of paragraph 6 of the appendix to the order in council I have just mentioned. One would wonder just what is a G.S. soldier; no one ever heard of him before, but it means "general service." The provision reads:

> A "G.S. soldier" is a soldier who has voluntarily enlisted for general service during the continuation of the state of war now existing and for the period of demobilization thereafter and who has been taken on the strength of the Canadian army (active) and appointed to a corps placed on active service under section 64 of the Militia Act.

That is the act by virtue of which we have conscription for overseas, but this is the definition of a volunteer; a volunteer is a G.S. soldier. Now, what is a N.R.M.A. soldier? That means nothing. He is a draftee, a conscript or a recruit, who has not volunteered as yet. The regulation reads:

A "N.R.M.A. soldier" is a soldier who has been enrolled and who is undergoing training or performing service or duty under the N.R.M.A. or regulations passed pursuant thereto.

So that a N.R.M.A. soldier is one who has been called by virtue of the regulations giving authority to the Department of Labour. Then amendments were made to this order, but I have only the French copy of the war orders of December 20, 1943, containing the amendments to the army regulations, which were published in the Canada Gazette. I would ask the minister to be kind enough to complete the amendments made by order in council P.C. 9372 of December 7, 1943. I hope that to-morrow he will be able to give us a summary of the amendments to those regulations, which are of the utmost importance.

What I find wrong in this amendment is that it refers to the Army Act, which is not included in the Revised Statutes of Canada but is published in another book. It seems to me that the proper way to legislate is to pass amendments which are complete in themselves, and for the understanding of which it is not necessary to go through the whole library. This amendment contains the definition of a man who reports to a training centre following receipt of an order under the authority of national selective service, and it includes also the definition of a person. Then there is a reference to paragraph 10 of section 176 of the Army Act, and further on there is another reference to the Army Act. May I suggest that the minister tell the office of the judge advocate general that the sections of other acts referred to should be included in amendments affecting any of these orders in council. We have these war orders and regulations, but they mean nothing if each amendment or each order is not complete in itself. I am a layman; I cannot understand the meaning and purpose of that amendment of December 7, and there may be others. It seems only right that members of parliament should be familiar with the regulations affecting the boys in the army or those who may be called by the registrars, and the effect of the call. At the present time it is impossible to inform anyone; we have to write to the department, disturbing the minister or his parliamentary assistant or the other officials, to secure the information we are entitled to have at hand all the time.

Mr. RALSTON: I can give my hon. friend the information. That particular amendment just strikes out two words in section 26, if he and I are looking at the same thing.

Mr. POULIOT: If the minister will pardon me, I am referring to order in council P.C. 9372 of December 7, 1943; it is one of the first orders in council contained in the war orders which were published on December 20 last. It takes thirteen and a half lines in French.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought my hon. friend was asking me what was the effect of P.C. 9372.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, and I should like to know what is the definition of a person according to the Army Act, as well as the meaning of the two references to the Army Act in that order in council.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I can give my hon. friend the effect of order in council P.C. 9372 on what I have marked here as order in council P.C. 7989 and the regulations attached thereto. Is that what my hon. friend is dealing with?

Mr. POULIOT: No; what I am asking for is the text of the references to the Army Act which are included in order in council P.C. 9372 and other amendments, if any, to order in council P.C. 7989.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 17, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE (ARMED SERVICES)

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina) presented the second report of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, (armed services), and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SUGAR

PRODUCTION OF SUGAR BEETS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave under standing order 31 to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the urgent need for government financial measures to stimulate greater production of sugar beets and beet sugar in Canada during the year 1944.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. gentleman let me see his statement?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Lethbridge has asked for leave to move the adjournment of the house for several reasons, chief among which might be mentioned: (1) the fact that last week, sugar controller S. R. Noble announced that there was real danger of a greater shortage of sugar in Canada during 1944 and 1945; (2) that costs of producing beets in Canada have risen during the war by reason of a rise in the wages of labour and an increase in charges for trucking and other services; (3) that Canadian sugar beet growers have recently asked the Canadian government for a rebate of one-half cent per pound of the excise tax now levied upon beet sugar refined in Canada; (4) the contracts for growing beets are generally signed by farmers during the months of January and February; (5) that war-time conditions are making it more profitable to produce on beet land other crops to the displacement of sugar beets; (6) and the consequent fact that unless the prices for beets are rendered stimulating, much less sugar for Canada may result.

I may say that the hon. member communicated to me the contents of the statements which I have just read, and I have indicated to him, as I now indicate. that this is not a matter which is sufficiently urgent, and so needing immediate reply, as to justify my putting it to the house for leave to move the adjournment for the purpose of discussing it.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

TEA IN STORAGE

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What is the quantity of tea stored in Saint John, New Brunswick?

2. What is the quantity of tea stored in Halifax?

Mr. ABBOTT: For security reasons it is not considered in the public interest to publish information regarding stocks of an imported commodity like tea, on the basis of which it might be possible for the enemy to draw inferences regarding the movement of ships on the high seas. Stocks vary considerably from day to day, and release of the figures for any particular date might also lead to unwarranted and undesirable speculation as to changes in consumer rations.

CARS OF GRAIN ON TRACKS AT FORT WILLIAM TERMINAL

Mr. BENCE:

How many cars full of grain were on the tracks in both the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railway terminals at Fort William on February 1, 1944?

Mr. MICHAUD: On the tracks of the Canadian Pacific Railway: For unloading, 561 cars; for movement east, 165 cars; total, 726 cars.

On the tracks of the Canadian National Railways: For unloading, 192 cars; for movement east, 143 cars; total, 335 cars.

DOMINION PUBLIC BUILDINGS, OTTAWA—WINDOW-CLEANING

Mr. STOKES:

1. Is the cleaning of windows in public buildings in Ottawa done by contract?

2. If so, what is the name of the contractor, were tenders called for, and what is the contract price or cost, (a) per window; (b) in total?

3. What was the total cost of window-cleaning of public buildings in Ottawa when done by day-labour?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. The cleaning of windows is done partly by contract and partly by day labour.

2. The Elgin Window Cleaners were the contractors for 1943, spring and fall cleaning. Tenders were called for in each case. (a) No cost per window was furnished in tenders as windows vary in size. (b) For the year 1943 spring and fall cleaning, the cost of work by contract was $16,160.05 and by day labour $17,065.10.

3. The total cost of window cleaning in 1938 when the windows in all government buildings in Ottawa, with the exception of the national research building, were cleaned by day labour was $15,229. The cost of cleaning windows in the national research building was $200 done by contract. The number of public buildings in Ottawa requiring window cleaning has been greatly increased since 1938, due to the number of large temporary buildings constructed as well as other buildings acquired for war purposes.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—RED DEER CONSTITUENCY

Mr. SHAW:

1. How many soldier settlers under contract to the soldier settlement board of Canada were there in the federal constituency of Red Deer as at September 1, 1939?

2. How many such settlers were there in the same area as at January 1, 1944?

3. How many of those soldier settlers who were located upon soldier settlement farms in the Red Deer federal constituency on September

1, 1939, (a) have since that date completed payment for the farms and now hold title; (b) had their contracts cancelled by the board; (c) surrendered their contracts and left the farms?

4. How many of those soldier settlers in that area who are still under contract to the board are in good standing in that all payments have been made up to date under the terms of the contract?

Mr. CRERAR: I desire to say a word on this question. To get the information asked for in the question would take weeks, if not months, of searching through the individual files of the soldier settlers in the province of Alberta. These records are not kept by constituencies. I therefore must say that the question is not one which I think should be asked in this form. If my hon. friend is interested in any particular case I should be very glad to see him and give him the information. I suggest that the question be dropped, and perhaps he could have a word with me about it and see if we cannot meet his wishes in some other way.

Mr. SHAW: May the question be permitted to stand, and I can consult with the minister?

Mr. CRERAR: Well, the question may stand, but I can only reiterate that it would take weeks if not months to get the information.

Mr. SHAW: I desire, Mr. Speaker, to redraft the question. I would not want to see it dropped, unless the minister insists.

Mr. CRERAR: May I suggest to my hon. friend that he drop it and redraft it, and perhaps he would be good enough to have a word with me. There is no desire to withhold any information.

Question dropped.

R.C.A.F.—CONTRACTS WITH NORTHERN PETROLEUM COMPANY

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the Northern Petroleum Company of Kamsack, Saskatchewan, any contract with the air force?

2. If so, what is the nature and date thereof?

3. What payments have been made to the said company to date thereunder?

Mr. MACMILLAN:

1. Yes. Two contracts.

2. (a) To purchase used aero engine oil and used cleaners fluid accumulating at the various units of Nos. 2 and 4 training commands and southern units of western air command, arranged by the salvage officer. (b) The Department of Munitions and Supply have arranged contracts on behalf of the R.C.A.F. for the purchase of re-refined aero engine oil for use in M.T. vehicles.

3. Payments to date, according to chief treasury officer (air), amounted to $14,337.83.

MERCHANT SHIP "PORT ROYAL PARK"

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Where was the merchant ship Port Royal Park built?

2. Who built it?

3. What did it cost?

4. When was it chartered, and who was it chartered to?

5. Were repairs or replacements made to it at the port of Saint John in 1943, and if so, what repairs or replacements were made, who made them, and how much was paid each person or corporation for such repairs or replacements?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Sorel, P.Q.

2. Marine Industries Limited.

3. The final cost has not been finally determined and will not be until the renegotiation proceedings now in progress have been completed.

4. The ship was delivered to Elder-Dempster Lines Limited in November, 1942, to operate on behalf of Park Steamship Company Limited under the usual management agreement.

5. The Port Royal Park was repaired in Saint John at the works of the St. John Iron Works Limited during the period from September 1 to October 31, 1943. The repairs were as follows: (a) repairs to boilers because of leaky tubes; (b) cleaning boilers; (c) supplying and installing fresh water pump; (d) constructing store room in engine room; (e) repairs to winches; (f) repairs to lifeboats; (g) constructing new life raft.

The cost of these repairs was $42,217.32. The superintendent-engineer of Park Steamship Company Limited, after reviewing the whole job, decided that the builders were liable for a total of $16,091.80 which leaves a net repair bill to Park Steamship Company Limited of $26,125.52.

CANADIAN AIRMEN IN BRITAIN—UNIFORMS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Does the Canadian government supply the uniforms for the Canadian airmen in Great Britain?

2. If not, by whom are they supplied?

3. Is the quality of the cloth in these uniforms as good as the quality of the cloth supplied for the uniforms in Canada?

Mr. MACMILLAN:

1. No, with the exception of raincoats, cap badges and buttons.

2. With the exception of the items mentioned in No. 1 above, all clothing required by R.C.A.F. airmen in Great Britain and in other overseas theatres of war, is supplied by the R.A.F. and is paid for by annual capitation payment from R.C.A.F. funds.

3. No official comparison or test has been made.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED COLD STORAGE PLANT, QUEBEC CITY

Mr. SENN:

1. Is there a government-owned cold-storage plant and warehouse located in Quebec city or adjacent thereto?

2. If so, how long has this plant been in operation under government ownership?

3. What are the names of the several managers who have been in charge of this plant since its inception; giving dates of appointment and release?

4. What is the name of the manager in charge during the months of January and February, 1944?

5. When was he appointed, what are his qualifications, what was his previous experience, and what is his present salary?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes, the national harbours board plant.

2. From 1924 to 1936 operated by Quebec Harbour Commission—1936 to date by National Harbours Board.

3. Name—title—appointment—release:

Arthur H. DeRome, supt., Oct. 1, 1924–March 27, 1931.

J. Herve Baribeau, supt., May 1, 1931–Dec. 2, 1935.

Alex. Chaumette, acting supt., Dec. 3, 1935.

Alex. Chaumette, supt., March 1, 1937–March 15, 1943.

J. E. Lafrance, supt., March 1, 1943.

4. J. E. Lafrance, superintendent.

5. Employed since 1925 in various capacities at Quebec harbour and promoted to superintendent, cold storage warehouse, March 1, 1943, at salary of $2,700 per annum; education commercial course and normal school, Laval university and employed as teacher prior to employment in 1925.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED COLD STORAGE PLANT, QUEBEC CITY—BEEF

Mr. SENN:

1. Was a large quantity of fresh beef stored in the government cold-storage plant at Quebec withheld from public sale?

2. Was this done on instructions of the health authorities?

3. What is the total quantity involved?

4. Was this beef owned by the government or by private firms or persons?

5. If by private parties, is the government liable for any losses?

6. Was a portion of this beef stored in a cooling warehouse commonly used to store fruit?

7. At what temperature was this cold-storage warehouse kept while the beef was in storage?

[Mr. Macmillan.]

Mr. MICHAUD: These answers are furnished by the National Harbours Board.

1, 2 and 3. 64,118 pounds of beef were withheld from public sale by Quebec city health authorities pending inspection by them and treatment if ordered.

4. Private firms or persons.

5. Conditions under which goods are accepted for storage, as set forth in warehouse receipt are as follows:—

All goods stored are held by this board as warehousemen and are stored subject to the rules and regulations of the corporation's tariff governing cold and general merchandise storage, handling and distribution, and further, are at the owner's or depositor's risk of loss or damage caused by water, heat, frost, damp, rust, dust, moths, rats, mice, vermin, leakage, odour, taste, etc. Depreciation from time or intrinsic defects, or from want of any special care or precaution or stoppage of machinery, from fire, strikes or collapse of building, by enemies of the King or irresistible force, inevitable accident, or from any cause beyond the control of the board. Quality contents and value unknown and weights or tally except as herein specified. The owners of merchandise stored with this board must pay the full storage and other charges accrued on all goods damaged or destroyed by such causes. Perishable goods or others susceptible to damage through changes of temperature or other causes incidental to ordinary storage will be accepted by this board only at owner's risk. All charges are due monthly and before delivery, and payment thereof guaranteed by the several owners or assigns. The acceptance of this receipt constitutes an agreement to all terms and conditions mentioned and referred to hereon.

6 and 7. In August and September, 1943, national harbours board cold storage warehouse in Quebec had to refuse meat and butter for storage as all the freezer rooms were filled and there was anxiety on the part of all concerned due to a lack of space in the freezer rooms. Certain investigations were made concerning a rearrangement of space to make available the use of cooler room 11-A for storing meat that already was or would be frozen prior to storage in this room. The proposed arrangement was discussed with the principal owners concerned, including representatives of a large meat packing company who were pressing for arrangements to be made by which more fresh meat could be received from them for freezing, and who in fact were the owners of the larger part of the meat eventually stored in the room. It was recognized that a temperature of 15° F. was preferable, but, in the circumstances, the principal owners considered that the temperature of 20-22° F., the lowest that could be maintained in the room referred to, would be safe and satisfactory to them. The temperature of room 11-A was therefore lowered from 30-32° F. to 20-22° F. and on September 15 last the warehouse started to store therein meats that had been received frozen, or that had been received unfrozen and were frozen in the freezing rooms.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. Under the Veterans' Land Act, has the government appointed to any board, any members of returned soldiers' organizations, and if so, how many such appointments have been made, and on whose recommendation were such appointments made?

2. Has the advisory board, provided for in section 16 of the Veterans' Land Act, any power to prevent recession or resale of property acquired under the act by any veteran?

3. Has an advisory committee appointed under section 34 of the Veterans' Land Act any power to reverse or otherwise control a decision of the director?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. No boards have yet been appointed under section 16 of the act. Twenty-five regional advisory committees have been appointed under section 34 of the act. The committee personnel total 107 members, 72 of whom are returned soldiers. It is not known how many of these returned soldier committee members are members of returned soldier organizations. Appointments were made on the recommendation of the director, the Veterans' Land Act.

2. Yes.

3. No. In actual operations under the act advisory committees are required to consider and render written opinion in respect to the qualifications of veterans, the selection of lands and generally in respect to such other matters as may be referred to them by the director.

PRODUCTION AND MARKETING OF CATTLE

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. How many cattle, (a) beef; (b) dairy, were produced in Canada in each year, 1939-1943 inclusive?

2. How many cattle were marketed through the stockyards in Canada in each year 1939-1943 inclusive?

3. How many cattle were delivered directly to packers' yards in Canada in each year, 1939-1943 inclusive?

4. How many cattle, (a) beef; (b) dairy, were shipped to the United States in each year, 1939-1943 inclusive?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Cattle Population

	Beef	Dairy
1939	4,601,100	3,873,500
1940	4,670,600	3,894,700

FIFTH VICTORY LOAN

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. What is the cost to the government of raising the fifth victory loan for, (a) publicity; (b) canvassers; (c) banks and investment dealers, commissions, etc. (d) other expenses?

2. What was the total amount subscribed?

3. What was the total number of subscriptions?

4. What was the amount subscribed and the number of subscribers in each denomination in which subscriptions were received?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Mr. Speaker, I understand that some of this information is not yet available, and would suggest that the question be dropped for the time being.

Question dropped.

SHIPMENTS OF CANADIAN BEER

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How much Canadian beer was shipped to the United States in 1943?

2. How much of this beer was shipped in bond for transhipment overseas?

3. How much Canadian beer was shipped to Egypt in 1943?

4. How much of the beer was received by Canadian units operating in Egypt and the western desert?

5. How much Canadian beer was shipped to Ceylon in 1943?

6. How much of this beer was received by Canadian units operating in Ceylon?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

2, 4 and 6. No information.

1, 3 and 5. Canadian exports of "ale, beer and porter" to the United States, Egypt and Ceylon, during the calendar year 1943.

Country	Gal.	Value
United States	2,322,108	$2,038,226
Egypt	1,058,610	922,176
Ceylon	229,160	198,920

It is understood that the greater proportion of the beer shipped to the United States is transhipped elsewhere for the use of the fighting forces.

CHARTERED BANKS—PAYMENTS FOR HANDLING VICTORY LOANS, ETC.

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How much has been paid to the chartered banks of Canada since September, 1939, (a) in connection with ration coupon banking; (b) in connection with the sale and handling of victory bonds, war savings certificates and stamps?

2. What was the total amount of victory bonds purchased by the chartered banks of Canada during the victory loan campaigns since September, 1939?

3. What is the total value of victory bonds owned by the chartered banks as at January 1, 1944?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. (a) In the period from September 1939 to February 16, 1944, $460,618.51 has been paid by the wartime prices and trade board to the chartered banks of Canada for their services in connection with ration coupon banking for the period March 1, 1943 to November 30, 1943.

(b) Commissions and service fees paid to chartered banks of Canada and banks incorporated under Quebec Savings Banks Act in connection with the issue and sale of war loans and victory loans, amounted to $10,197,745.88 (service fees for fifth victory loan not yet paid). No remuneration paid to banks in connection with sale of war savings stamps and certificates.

2. Cash subscriptions

First war loan	$2,300,000*
Second war loan	741,000*
First victory loan	6,740,000
Second victory loan	Nil
Third victory loan	500,000
Fourth victory loan	500,000
Fifth victory loan	Nil

*Estimated.

3. No information. The monthly returns of liabilities and assets of the chartered banks of Canada show total amount of dominion and provincial direct and guaranteed securities held by each bank.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What was the total net debt incurred by the dominion government as at, (a) March 31, 1943; (b) March 31, 1939; (c) March 31, 1919; (d) March 31, 1914?

2. What was the total interest payable by the dominion government for each of the above years?

3. What was the per capita, (a) debt; (b) interest payment for each of the above years?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. (a) March 31, 1943—$6,182,849,101.10
(b) March 31, 1939—$3,152,559,314.48
(c) March 31, 1919—$1,574,531,032.44

C. H. CAHAN, JR.

Mr. KNOWLES:

Have any steps been taken by the Minister of Justice to order a new trial in the case of C. H. Cahan, Jr., now of Agassiz, British Columbia?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was decided, after this case had been fully considered, not to order a new trial.

INTERNMENTS—RELEASE OF AMIGHETI

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has a non-naturalized Italian named Amigheti been discharged from an internment camp?

2. Was Amigheti interned pursuant to section 25 of the defence of Canada regulations as an enemy alien?

3. If not, under what section of the regulations was he interned?

4. If Amigheti has been discharged, who recommended and ordered his discharge?

5. At what date was he interned and at what date was he discharged?

6. Was Amigheti represented by solicitor or did any person intervene in favour of his discharge?

7. If so, what are the names of such persons?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.

2. He was originally detained pursuant to regulation 21, and subsequently, 9th October, 1941, it having been definitely established that he was an enemy alien, he was held pursuant to regulation 25 of the defence of Canada regulations.

3. See answer to question 2.

4. The registrar general of enemy aliens and the Minister of Justice, respectively.

5. 10th June, 1940, and 20th March, 1942, respectively.

6. He was represented at his hearing before an advisory committee in September 1940, by his solicitor, Joseph Jean, K.C.

7. See answer to question 6.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

EWOLD FRIGDRICK

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Has the attention of the government been drawn to the case of one Ewold Frigdrick, age 30, residing at 39 East Fiftieth street, Vancouver?

2. Is the said Frigdrick of German origin?

3. Was he naturalized, and if so, when?

4. Was said Frigdrick convicted and sentenced to jail? If so, will his naturalization be cancelled?

5. Is it the intention of the government to deport persons of alien enemy origin who, though naturalized, refused to serve Canada when called to do so under the laws of Canada?

Mr. GIBSON: Return tabled.

EMERALD MINE—SALMO, B.C.

Mr. ESLING:

1. Has the government, through the Wartime Metals Corporation or any other department or agency, acquired the Emerald mine at Salmo, B.C. ?

2. If so, what price was paid for the property?

3. In whose name does the title at present rest?

4. Has the original owner been fully paid?

5. What sum has been spent in development?

6. How many tons of concentrate have been produced since the opening of the property?

7. To whom have these concentrates been sold?

8. What sum has been realized from their sale?

9. Has this tonnage been shipped or is it still stored at the mine?

10. When did this property cease to operate?

11. How many employees were on the payroll at that time?

12. For how many of these were new positions found?

SHORTAGE OF NURSES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is there a shortage of nurses in Canada?

2. If so, what is the government doing to overcome the shortage?

3. Is the government offering any inducement to women to enter the nursing profession?

4. Has the government any plan to build up a nursing service for the post-war period?

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD

Mr. WHITE:

1. As of the 31st of January, 1944, what are the names of the employees of the wartime information board?

2. What are the salaries paid to each?

3. What allowances and expenses are paid to each?

4. How many of these are full-time employees?

5. How many of these are part-time employees or special writers?

6. How are the part-time employees or special writers paid?

MOOSE JAW, SASK., AIRPORT

Mr. STOKES:

1. What firm or firms had the contract for construction of, (a) buildings; (b) runways, at the airport at Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan?

2. What was the name of the superintendent on the job?

3. Was Verne Crocket appointed as a foreman, and if so, (a) what is his age; (b) what pay did he receive; (c) what were his qualifications?

4. Was Sidney Tuff appointed as a foreman, and if so, (a) what is his age; (b) what pay did he receive; (c) what were his qualifications?

5. Was George Denny appointed as a foreman, and if so, (a) what is his age; (b) what pay did he receive; (c) what were his qualifications?

6. Did the three men named in questions three, four and five work directly under the authority of the superintendent?

7. Was Albert B. Wyley a foreman on this work, and if so, (a) what pay did he receive; (b) what were his qualifications?

8. How many men were on the payroll under the foremanship of Mr. Wyley during July and August, 1940?

9. How many additional men were placed on the payroll under Wyley during September, October and November, 1940?

SUBSIDIES TO PRODUCERS OF FOOD PRODUCTS

Mr. SENN:

1. What amount was paid out in subsidies to producers of food products during each of the fiscal years, 1941-1942, 1942-1943, and the present fiscal year to date?

2. On what food products were subsidies paid in each year as above?

3. How much was paid on each particular product in each year as above?

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—BUILDINGS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. In what places in Canada have buildings been erected for the use of wartime prices and trade board?

2. What is the completed cost of such buildings and property?

3. At what points in Canada have premises been leased for the use of wartime prices and trade board?

4. What are the rental charges for each such property, stating period and date of expiration of leases?

5. What has been the cost of alterations and improvements to each such rented premises?

6. What has been the cost of furnishings and equipment supplied in, (a) special constructed premises; (b) each of the leased premises?

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What were the total expenditures for the national research council for each of the fiscal years ending March 31, (a) 1933; (b) 1938; (c) 1943?

2. What percentage of the total governmental expenditures for each of these three years, namely 1933, 1938 and 1943, do the amounts spent for the national research council represent?

CANADIAN FORCES—PROHIBITION OF LETTERS TO NEWSPAPERS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has an order been issued by the government or any member thereof, to the military forces, prohibiting members thereof writing letters to newspapers or giving any information or criticism of any conditions arising in the forces or camps within Canada?

2. If so, by whom, and to whom does it apply, and is it limited to within Canada?

3. On whose recommendation was it issued in the three forces?

4. Does it cover numerous speeches across Canada by headquarters and other officers?

CANADIAN FORCES—CHAPLAINS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many chaplains have been appointed in each of His Majesty's forces since the war began, by provinces or military districts?

2. On what basis are they appointed; what is the unit of soldier population for each denomination per chaplain per unit; who authorized it, and what is their pay and all other allowances or emoluments?

3. Is each chaplain who enlists required to go overseas later, and what military experience is required before their appointment?

4. Are there senior or chief, or head chaplains in each military district; what are such officers' rank, pay and other emoluments, and are they required to go overseas by rotation after a certain period?

5. Are all these chaplains required in the various services for home training purposes, where in cities there are so many clergy not of the enlisted forces, who are willing to help in chaplain work in their denominations?

[Mr. Senn.]

CANADIAN FORCES—HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is the hospital accommodation for Canada's military forces adequate in the various military districts of Canada for those in training, or is there a shortage of accommodation?

2. At what distance from the various camps established under the present system, are there civilian hospitals, and have they all adequate equipment to take care of any cases that occur that cannot be dealt with at the various camps?

3. What hospital accommodation in the various military districts of Canada has been or is to be established by the government to take care of those now overseas, if sick or wounded when they return to Canada?

4. Has any hospital accommodation survey been made since the survey dated December 5, 1940? If so, what survey?

5. What has been done to go ahead with the new hospital at Sunnybrook (Toronto), since last November 11, and when will any units thereof be started or constructed?

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT TO BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF C.B.C.—GENERAL MANAGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): On Tuesday last the Minister of National War Services, in answer to a question of the leader of the opposition as to when the vacancy on the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would be filled, was somewhat indefinite. Can the minister give any definite information as to when we may expect the announcement of this appointment?

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): May I express appreciation for the advance notice kindly sent me by the hon. member for St. Paul's? The other day I spoke as definitely as it was possible for me to do. I hope to be able to give the news of an appointment before long, and as soon as I can I shall inform the hon. member and this honourable house.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

MINE PROP INDUSTRY IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, or, in his absence, to his parliamentary assistant. I may say that notice has been given. Have steps been taken to prevent the threatened collapse of the mine prop industry in Alberta, a condition brought about by the recent cancellation of the subsidy on mine props and government sale of props produced by prisoners of war at Banff and Kanaskis to the mines below the figure at which they can be produced and sold by private industry?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question must be placed on the order paper.

Mr. SHAW: May I say that this is of urgent importance to the industry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understood the hon. member's question, it is one which has to do with the policy of the government, and in the circumstances might not be answered to-day. Even if the minister were willing to reply I would say he was not entitled to do so, because it is a question dealing with government policy. In view of what I said yesterday I think the hon. gentleman will have to place it on the order paper.

PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —regarding a telegram I have received—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —about the concern that is felt over the delay in sending corvettes out of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not hear the question.

Mr. BRUCE: It is a very simple question.

Mr. SPEAKER: But I did not hear it.

Mr. BRUCE: The question is this: Will the minister say whether corvettes have been delayed in their departure from Quebec because of the prevalence of venereal disease?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will have to place that question on the order paper.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 16, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering item 1.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the minister tell us the bearing of the amendments to the order in council referred to yesterday?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not had an opportunity to look that up. I will have it put in hand to be looked up.

Mr. POULIOT: What I complain of is that the amendments to the army regulations, by virtue of the mobilization act, are not, I would say, self-supporting. They refer to other pieces of legislation which are not included in the draft of these amendments. I have one here, P.C. 9372 of December 7, amending P.C. 7989 of October 14, 1943. It refers to the N.S.S. mobilization act regulations and changes section 26. What I complain of further is the drafting of section 26 in the original order in council, P.C. 7989. It reads:

A man reporting at a centre in consequence of an order–military training or who has been taken thereto in consequence of an order made pursuant to section 28 (1) N.S.S. mobilization regulations shall, until such time as he is enrolled or shall have been dispatched to his destination be deemed to be a person as is mentioned in subsection 10 of section 176 of the Army Act, not otherwise subject to military law, who is a follower of or accompanies His Majesty's troops or any portion thereof when employed on active service. The Army Act, to the extent that it forms part of the law of Canada, shall apply to such a man, and he shall be subject to military law accordingly. Such a man shall be deemed to be under the command of the officer commanding the centre, provided always, however, that, notwithstanding the provisions of subsection 2 of section 184 of the said Army Act, such a man may be punished by such commanding officer in like manner and to the same extent as if he were a private soldier serving on active service under the command of that officer.

It is dated December 7 of last year. Who understands a word of it? No one. Here is the Army Act referred to in that order in council. Let me quote two sections of it. The minister knows better than anyone else that the Army Act is a piece of English legislation that dates back more than half a century. The first reference is to subsection 10, the definition of "person". Subsection 10 of section 176 reads:

All persons not otherwise subject to military law who are followers of or accompany His Majesty's troops or any portion thereof, when employed on active service, subject to this qualification, that, where any such persons are employed by or are followers of or accompany any portion of His Majesty's forces, consisting partly of His Majesty's Indian forces subject to Indian military law, or consisting partly of His Majesty's Burma forces subject to Burma military law, and such persons are natives of India, or as the case may be, natives of Burma they shall be subject to the Indian military law or, as the case may be, to Burma military law.

In the amendment it is specified that that section applies to the Canadian order in council in so far as it is possible. It would be absurd to suggest that our men should be subject to the Indian law or the Burma law.

Here is subsection 2 of section 184 of the Army Act, which in my opinion is very bad drafting:

Any person subject to military law who does not belong to His Majesty's forces shall, for the purposes of this act relating to offences, be deemed to be under the command of the commanding officer of the corps or portion of a corps (if any) to which he is attached, and if he is not attached to any corps or a portion of a corps under the command of any officer who may for the time being be named as his commanding officer, by the general or other officer commanding the force with which such person may for the time being be, or of any other prescribed officer, or, if no such officer is named or prescribed, under the command of the said general or other officer commanding, but such person shall not be liable to be punished by a commanding officer: provided that a general or other officer commanding shall not place a person under the command of an officer of rank inferior to the official rank of such person is there is present, at the place where such person is, any officer of higher rank under whose command he can be placed.

If anyone understands that, he deserves a reward. Let me summarize my point in this way. This is very bad legislation, very bad drafting, but it will be accepted by the Tory party at once. A very clever man once told me it is sufficient to say that it comes from the British war office and the Tories will adopt it at once. They will adopt it without question provided it comes from the B.W.O. It was ever thus. How is it that the bright brains of the judge advocate general's branch cannot draft legislation for this country without reference to such legal instruments? That kind of legislation has a purpose. It is similar to the plebiscite question, a question that was understood by none and which could be interpreted in many ways. It is nebulous. It is purposely foggy and nebulous. I want something clear. It seems to me it is reasonable to press for clear legislation, legislation that is complete and understandable. One should not have to go over all the shelves of the library to find out the meaning.

Now sir, there are some points that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee. It is impossible to carry on an orderly discussion without clear legislation; but I try to speak in the plainest possible English in order to be understood by all. Hon.

members have the right to agree or disagree with me, but I want my colleagues at least to understand the point I am trying to make. I said yesterday that if the army is given priority over essential industry, national selective service is through. We have heard a lot about essential industry. Some time ago, last year or the year before, the Minister of National Defence said that he tried to urge the employer to replace men in essential industry by men who are unfit, and even by women, to release men for the army. I deny that the army is the only essential industry. I am not opposed to the army. There is no one who tries to do more to help the returned man, to help those who are in the army, who looks after them, who listens to them, who has the honour of their confidence when they come to him, than I. It is precisely for the underdog, for the one who has not the right to call upon his superior officer to speak about his grievances, that I act now. I do it in order that we may have a well-balanced war effort in this country. The idea of the imperialist Tories is to see a soldier without uniform, without shoes, without food, without weapons and without ammunition, who would swim across the Atlantic and then find some Irish confetti on Irish soil to fight the enemy. There would be no clothes for him, no transportation, no food, no arms and no ammunition for him. That is the ideal state of the soldier as seen by the Simon-pure imperialist Tories. Is it not absurd?

There has been a decrease of thirteen billion dollars in the estimates of the United States army. We have a reduction of about two hundred million. But there are very strange things happening. If anyone happens to go to the central station of the Canadain National Railways in Montreal he will see a plate inscribed with the number 17,035. That is the number of men connected with the railway, who have enlisted—men from an essential industry, carrying passengers, military and civil, food and ammunition throughout the country; and I am informed the number now is 21,000; twenty-one thousand experienced men who have been taken from an essential industry and placed in the army, and the army is not yet satisfied. What has been done? I want to have complete information, not only from the Minister of National Defence, but also from the Minister of Labour, as to the understanding that has taken place between the army and the Canadian National Railways regarding the appointment of a man named Edge, who was promoted from superintendent of personnel to the fat job of director of labour relations, and without whose signature a man who has not had ten or more years' experience has to join the colours if he has been in a training camp for a month. What happened? To my personal knowledge officials of the railway who are right there on the spot in the division, who know the work of all the men in key positions of the railway, on the trains as operators, certify that the men are essential to the railway; but this man in Montreal, who does not answer any letters, keeps all these recommendations from responsible officials on his desk. Because he does so, because that single man, who is well paid for it, does not return the application for an extension of leave for the men to military headquarters, it is said that the men have filed no application for extension of leave and therefore they have to join the army. There is another man who does the same job on the Canadian Pacific Railway. If we are to have total war as preached by the jingoes and as preached by some other people, I will agree with them, provided that the war effort is well balanced, and provided that the soldier can rely upon the help of essential industry and of men who have particular experience in certain key positions in essential industry. I do not take this stand because we are against the war effort; not at all. I take the stand because we want the war effort to be well balanced. We want everybody to do his very best in the successful prosecution of the war. My contention is that a man with years of experience on the railway is doing more for the war effort by continuing to work on the railway than he would by going into the army, for which he has no technical experience. The man at the throttle of his locomotive, the fireman, the brakeman or the conductor, can better help his country along the road to victory by continuing in that work than by going into the army as a private, a non-commissioned officer or an officer. That is my point. I have some cases to bring to the attention of the minister. I shall not mention them now, because it would take too long, but I shall write his parliamentary assistant and give each case.

I want this system changed; I want a decentralization of this control in connection with the railways. Is not the local superintendent in each part of the country, each division, in a better position than one man in Montreal to say that Tom or Joe or Jim is essential to the railway business? The understanding between the army and the railways has gone so far that the divisional superintendents have been notified by Mr. Edge in Montreal that in future they are not to recommend anyone for postponement, that all men who have had a month's training, whatever may have been their experience on the railway, were bound to go back to the army and become soldiers. Why speak of selective service after that? If that is not disguised conscription, if it is not sabotage of our war effort, what is it? It is just as clear as spring water that it is going to have a disastrous effect. These men who are in good health, and who have had enough experience to hold these responsible positions, cannot be replaced on the railways by new men unfit for military service.

Last year, in the Hong Kong debate, thirty-four hon. members voted for reform in the Department of National Defence, while ten others who were paired said that if they had voted they would have supported the motion, meaning that in their opinion reform was needed in the department. It is all right to allow the department the number of men that essential industry can dispense with, but on the other hand it would prove most disastrous to this country if essential industry were disorganized in order to have more men in the army. I hope that in the course of this discussion the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Labour will give a full explanation as to the understanding that has been arrived at between the army and our two great railways, and also as to what has been done by selective service in regard to the appointment of Mr. Edge and the gentleman who occupies the same position with the Canadian Pacific Railway company.

That having been said, and my time being short, I cannot allow to pass unnoticed the dispatch that appeared in today's newspapers from the pen of Mr. Shapiro. Yesterday I said I could not understand why just a few hon. members had been called in by the government to be informed as to the correspondence exchanged in regard to the resignation of Lieutenant-General McNaughton. I will ask the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services to speak behind the curtain if they are not interested in what is being said in the house. Frequently at the opening of the house, on the order for motions or on the orders of the day, a minister makes a reservation in connection with the adoption of a motion for papers by a private member. Every time that happens, some hon. members opposite, particularly the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other groups, protest and ask how it is that the minister should be able to make his own reservations, since we are entitled to know everything. That is a democratic stand. But how can they say they are being logical with themselves—and I speak of all of them now—when they meet together to discuss matters in which we are all interested, and as to which we might be all informed in a secret sitting? And how is it that we cannot be told here in Ottawa what is published in London and the press of this continent? It could not be told to members of parliament yesterday. It appeared this morning in all the Canadian papers. Is it not an anomaly?

There is more to it than that. If something secret comes up at a meeting of cabinet council in the east block, it must be for the members of the cabinet alone; if I am well informed they take an oath to keep all matters secret, in regard to what happens behind those doors. Then how is it that the leader of the official opposition should be called in by the government, to be told in confidence things that cannot be told to other hon. members?

An hon. MEMBER: Union government.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, union government. How is it that the union government goes further, and that the leaders of two other groups are called in to be told things they are not supposed to repeat to other members? It seems to me if those gentlemen were imbued with a real democratic spirit, if they had not the soul of Mrs. Lot, who was the victim of her curiosity and was changed into a pillar of salt, they would have told the government: This is public business, and we alone shall not be told what it is; every member of the house has the same right as we have to be told the whole thing, and we invite you to have a secret sitting for general information of members of parliament.

If the hon. member who now leads the opposition, who represents the county of Peel, and who, outside of politics, is a personal friend of mine, sits in the house, it is not at all in the capacity of leader of the oppsition, because the leader of the opposition is an absentee; he is not a member of the house. If the hon. member who leads the opposition in the house has a right to use his desk, or to write a note, it is because he has been elected by the constituents of the county of Peel, as I have been elected by the people of Temiscouata, and all other hon. members who sit in this exclusive gathering have been elected by their own constituents. Therefore it is only in his capacity as a member of parliament that the government can call upon the leader of the opposition to inform him about secret matters. Yet the Prime Minister invites him, to the exclusion of all of us; and I may add that two other group leaders are enjoying favours from the government. I am reminded of Kemal Pasha who, in Turkey, chose his own leader of the opposition; and he was considered a very great man—both of them. Is it not a humiliation for the leader of the official opposition, and for the leaders of the C.C.F. and New Democracy groups to be considered by the government as pets who can be trusted when no other members can be trusted? I regret that my hon. friends, those leaders, have not shown a spirit sufficiently democratic to tell the government that all the members of the house should be informed about what has been going on overseas.

What about the Canadian Army? It is a very great thing. If Lieutenant-General McNaughton retired from the army because of his personal illness only, it is a very sad event, but it is the departure of one man only. But if he resigned on a question of principle, then we have a right to know.

Last year I spoke about a man who had sold the same coat three times. Nobody was scandalized; it was considered very smart. Then, what about the disaster at Bari? We have to know about that. We have to know who was responsible for the lack of protection for a convoy of allied ships carrying supplies essential to the 8th army and 5th army. Who was responsible for that? Nobody cares to know. I said that at five o'clock yesterday afternoon, but no one supported me. No one seems to be interested in that disaster, one which is probably responsible for the slow advance of our troops on Italian soil. I have revealed no secret, but I have tried to help hon. members not to forget certain essential matters.

I had occasion to discuss Lieutenant-General McNaughton at a time when as a civilian he was head of the national research council. But as soon as he took command of the army, as a loyal Canadian citizen I did my best to give my support to him, so far as I could. Last year when I asked why he had not been promoted to the rank of full general, I was told, in parliamentary language, to mind my own business. What is the use of having insignia for full generals or field marshals when they are not used? Whatever may be the disagreement between the Minister of National Defence and Lieutenant-General McNaughton in respect of military tactics, I express the feelings of many people, if not of many members of the House of Commons, when I suggest to the government that at last it should give him his full generalship, something he deserves, for the work he has done in creating an army now being dismantled.

I do not wish to quote the minister incorrectly, but if the British authorities did not ask Canada to send part of our troops to Italy, and if he undertook upon his own responsibility to send them there, against the advice of the commander in chief of Canadian forces overseas, then it was a tremendous responsibility. It will be up to him to explain to us why our troops should suffer from the destruction of a whole convoy in an Italian port.

I leave the matter there. I do not wish to monopolize the time of the house, and I shall give hon. members the opportunity to say all they may wish to say. But in these matters let them understand well that they cannot complain about the government, and then make themselves the instruments of the Department of National Defence as it is now. There will be no reform unless they come out of the abstract and point their fingers to the reforms that are necessary. That is something which has not yet been done. I hope their remarks will be constructive and that they will tell, if not the government, then the committee where the reform of a bureaucracy shall begin. I am sick of the pronunciamentos of the Tory leader, who is stating his policy everywhere—"We will do this; we will do that." How will he do it? What will be the work of his party in the House of Commons to improve the Department of National Defence? If someone is to be fired, who is he? Let them say that, or not speak about reform at all. How often, when I complained of certain people, did I see the previous leader of the opposition rise in his place and complain that I was attacking faithful civil servants. He was speaking the same language as the minister. I want reform. But I cannot bring it about alone. I need some help, and there are other members who need some help. If hon. gentlemen opposite have not the support of the leader of the opposition, let them rise and make their suggestions just as I do, and then we shall get somewhere. I do not say that in any unfriendly way. I say it for the good of the country; I say it for the protection of the soldiers, and I say it for the winning of the war.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the minister now answer the question I asked yesterday with reference to the calling up of boys of eighteen from the schools of Toronto for active service?

Mr. RALSTON: I have looked up the order in council, and the proclamation under which the age class in fixed designates:

> . . . every man who was born in the year 1925 . . . and all such men are required to submit themselves for medical examination and report at a military training centre or district depot to undergo and perform such military training, service or duty . . . but men born in the year 1925 shall not be served with orders-medical examination until they reach the age of eighteen years and six months.

This is an order in council that was passed on the recommendation not of the Minister of National Defence but of the Minister of Labour. In a word, they are required to submit themselves for medical examination and report at a military training centre, but until they reach eighteen years and six months they cannot be served with orders-medical examination. In the case my hon. friend mentioned was the boy under eighteen years and a half?

Mr. MacNICOL: Eighteen years and two months.

Mr. RALSTON: Under the order in council they were not required to serve him with an order for medical examination.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand that boys just over eighteen are subject to call for examination?

Mr. RALSTON: No; they are not subject until they reach eighteen years and six months. The proclamation designates those born in the year 1925, some of whom might be just eighteen years of age, but then it limits it by saying that no one shall be served with an order for medical examination unless he is eighteen years and six months of age.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is a boy who comes within that age class and is attending a collegiate institute or university allowed any exemption to continue his educational course?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, but he is liable to call at eighteen years and six months unless he comes within certain provisions of the national selective service regulations with respect to education. I have not those before me, and I cannot give my hon. friend the exceptions or the privileges which are permitted to boys who are continuing their education. I could bring them down here, or I could get them and send them to my hon. friend.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to support the hon. member for Davenport in this matter. I have frequently during the past two years raised this question of calling up boys of sixteen, seventeen and eighteen who are attending school. The time has come to call a halt on this practice, because it is disorganizing the whole school system of the province of Ontario. I do not say that the matter is altogether in the hands of the Minister of National Defence. He seems to be answering on his estimates questions which belong to selective service, the navy, and the air force, as well as to the army. But as a humble representative of the city of Toronto, on whose school board I served, I must say that school principals have spoken to me of the disorganizing effect which the call-up is having on the schools and educational systems of the city of Toronto. We used to have a cadet corps there, up to 1936, but unfortunately our board of education all went pacifist; there was to be no more war but a land of milk and honey—paradise. So they abolished the cadet corps, which had been the backbone of the militia in the city of Toronto and the county of York, and the same all over Ontario, ever since confederation. The school board had control of the cadet system. Then you went to work and created cadet committees. I saw an announcement not long ago that these cadet committees were responsible for putting from thirty to forty thousand cadets in uniform in this war. It is the school boards and the boards of education that deserve credit for that through the work that had been done in the past by the cadet corps system in the public and high schools of the city and province, where there were trained cadet officers in every school. This practice of calling up youths from school should be stopped, because it is disorganizing the whole educational work of public, secondary and high schools, so much so that the teachers do not know where they are at. If you need men, get men; but these who are being called up are, comparatively speaking, children, many of them with fathers and brothers who are already serving overseas.

Some of the students go on from the collegiate institutes to the university of Toronto. Last fall I was at a collegiate institute in my riding, perhaps the largest in the city of Toronto, and I know that 76 from one school, Danforth Technical, have made the supreme sacrifice in this war. A week ago last Saturday a list was published in the Toronto city papers showing that 596 pupils from the secondary schools, giving each school's list, had made the supreme sacrifice in this war. Some of these young people are not getting a fair show; they are not getting an education. I know four or five who have gone on to the university of Toronto, one or two from collegiate institutes in my riding. They proceed to enter their first year at the university, and then what do they do? They drill all summer, all fall and winter. As members of the C.O.T.C. they cannot even attend a rugby game in the fall. I was at a game between Winnipeg and the R.C.A.F., attended by 20,000 people; these young boys at the university were not allowed to attend the game, but almost every Saturday had to march around the streets for six or seven miles while the game was going on, and also drill every day. Then they have classes in the summer at Niagara-on-the-Lake for three or four weeks, and some had to go to Three Rivers. Then they have to go up to Petawawa in the heat of the summer. And after all this training they are told there is no place for them now as officers. They are just a lot of forgotten orphans because the army cannot find a place for them and no place can be found for them at Brockville.

Surely such a condition of affairs should not be allowed to continue. It is wasting their time and the time of the instructors, and wasting money. I do not blame the Minister of National Defence for this; far from it. He has done something to try to regulate this thing. There were too many officers, no doubt, and changes had to be made in the regulations to reduce the establishments. But surely there should be some remedy, some change made in the system of calling up these young boys from our collegiates and universities. One principal told me that it would be making communists and that sort of thing out of these young men to waste their time this way, and there is a great deal in that. I know of cases myself of hardship, and I have written to the department about this matter. The Minister of Labour is not in the house at the moment. He has a very able assistant in Mr. MacNamara; nevertheless a notice was sent by the department to students of the university of Toronto who were within one month of their examinations in arts, medicine and other subjects. The date fixed for Easter is April 9. They are going to hold examinations a month ahead. They are turning out two classes in medicine; there is a scarcity of doctors and nurses. As regards first and second year arts, law, medicine, and other faculties, not only in this university but in other universities from coast to coast, what is the position? We are notified that, after all this drilling during the fall and attendance at camps in the summer, and so forth, only fifty per cent of the class, who pass at the top and get first-class honours, will be permitted to continue; the others will have to return, like lost orphans, to the ranks. A number of them do not want to be officers. A great many would go overseas immediately if they could. This system is disorganizing the classes of the university of Toronto, so much so that the registrar announced in the press yesterday that he does not know where he is at, because there is a different type of organization in the university to-day as regards examination tests.

All I ask is a fair show and fair play for these young men. I admit that the minister has made some changes, but as I see it we are going to wind up at the end of this war with practically no qualified men in medicine and a number of other professions. It is not so bad in the legal profession; as we know, every lawyer in the United States is called a judge when he graduates, because if he is not a judge to-day he hopes to be a judge to-morrow. It may not apply to the profession of which the minister is a member. Some of these young people cannot get to Brockville to qualify. They have worked hard for one or two years; they have done their marching and drilling each summer, and they do not think they are getting fair play.

I do hope that the Minister of Labour or the Minister of National Defence—the two seem to have concurrent and joint jurisdiction—will do something to straighten this matter out with the university before the examinations come on. I trust that, in view of an intimation we had yesterday, something will be done to put back the cadet services under the boards of education and the school boards of Canada, whose responsibility they have been since confederation. It is disrupting the classes. I see numbers of these young folk passing my house. Some of them are getting out of school; some cadet corps are outside the schools altogether, and the teachers are not able to control the situation. We are told that it is intended to reduce the establishments in the various branches of the service, especially the air. Well, there is a good deal of competition at the present time between the three services; we find recruiting officers going around the schools trying to get students to join the navy, the army, or the air force. At least from what I have seen, and I have seen a good deal of it in the schools of Toronto, my impression is that there is considerable competition amongst the services.

This matter of the universities should be straightened out, because it is not fair to the young people. In the secondary schools the fathers and brothers of many of the pupils are overseas. I know one family with three or four brothers in Italy. The youngest boy went to one of the collegiates and is now a supernumerary officer at Camp Borden. He trained at Brockville and got a commission. His two brothers are in the air in Italy and they want him to join the air force. The commanding officer at Camp Borden and other officers gave him a very fine recommendation, and the present minister arranged that there should be a transfer from the army to the air force, but now he cannot get in the air force, because, they say, there are no vacancies. That sort of thing should not happen, because he is just wasting his time where he is. One of the teachers spoke to me about the case, and that is why I mention it. I believe there should be give and take regarding these things. The graduates of the university, especially the great university of Toronto, are heavily represented in all faculties both in enlistments and in casualties, in both the last war and the present one; many of them have made the supreme sacrifice in this war; not a few are wounded and in the hospitals. So I ask that consideration be given to the universities and also, and especially, to the secondary schools in the direction I have indicated.

Mr. FACTOR: I should like to make a few remarks with reference to the observations of the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Davenport. I assume that this discussion is really not in order, because it relates rather to national selective service regulations than to the Department of National Defence. I think I know the situation in Toronto pretty well, and I am astonished that the hon. member for Broadview is concerned about a disruption of the educational system in Toronto. He cited the leading public schools there as being affected. I know of no eighteen or eighteen and one-half year olds that are in the public schools unless they are mentally defective. The public schools are not affected at all by the order which calls for men of eighteen years subject to the draft. They are not called until they are eighteen years and six months old.

So far as the situation of the university of Toronto is concerned, I have studied it very carefully, and I want to congratulate the government upon the system which prevailed up to this year. All faculties except arts trained in the Canadian Officers' Training Corps, the university training companies. The engineering faculty is not subject to the draft. They take their basic training in the university companies but they cannot enlist without consent. So far as the medical profession is concerned, the hon. member for Parkdale knows the system which prevails under the medical procurement and assignment board, whereunder students are very grateful to this university for the opportunity extended to them of joining the army medical corps while they are taking their medical training at the university. They are getting paid around, I believe $75 or $80 a month, which enables them to pursue their studies, and immediately after their interneships are enlisted in the army medical corps. I want to congratulate the government upon the arrangement which was made.

So far as the arts course is concerned the system prevailing is this, that all the students take their basic training in the university training companies. Those who are successful in their examinations are permitted to complete their full arts course, that is three years pass course or four years as an honour course in political science. Those who fail in the commencement examinations have their names submitted to the mobilization board and they are called up for service. Could there be any fairer system? In other words, what earthly use is there to permit a student who is a complete failure at the examination to go on at the university, perhaps to fail again the next year? I think he could do his duty far better in some branch of the services.

The hon. member for Broadview talks about competition at the universities. So far as the training companies are concerned, there is no competition at all at the university of Toronto. We have a Royal Canadian Air Force training company, an army training company, and a naval company. The students are given the option of joining any of the services. For instance, my boy, who is in his third year at the university of Toronto, has joined the Royal Canadian Air Force company and is taking his training, which will enable him to gain sufficient knowledge to expedite his initial training at the school.

In my opinion the statements on this matter made by the hon. member for Broadview are very much exaggerated. I have heard of no complaints. There may be the odd pupil in the high school who is somewhat backward at eighteen and one-half, who is still in the high school and is subject to the call; but so far as my experience in the city of Toronto is concerned the system which prevails was one of the best.

I want to say a word about the new regulations. I have seen them only in the press, but I have heard some objections to the regulation which lays down that fifty per cent, I think, of the successful pupils may continue their courses. It is said that the university authorities are going to have great difficulty in administering that regulation. I suggest to the government that this phase of the problem be reviewed.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. gentleman is altogether wrong in his statement as to what I said. I did not refer to those of eighteen years in the public schools. I myself went to the public schools long before he lived in the city. What I said was that the public schools had cadet corps which had existed since confederation. The hon. member knows that; for he was on the board himself, and he knows that in the riding of ward 4 there used to be a parade of public school cadets, several thousand of them, down University avenue on Empire day. But unfortunately the cadet services were abolished about 1937 when the pacifists got control of the board. The hon. member has been in the air force and may be out of touch with local school matters as they are to-day, but I may tell him that there are many young people getting into the secondary schools at fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, seventeen and eighteen. This is true of the collegiates in his own riding and of many other schools in the district where he lives.

What I object to is this. The cadet services were under the board of education in former years; they were there from confederation until 1937. In 1942, however, there began a duplicate practice of outside cadet corps, to which I strongly objected, as did some of the trustees. These new cadet corps officers were forming separate corps in the schools with drill after school and week-ends, and parades on Sundays, usurping the usual work of the school, physical and military. These children were taken out and put into an organization to which the government contributes $25,000, a private cadet organization, the government supplying the uniform and paying for these young people for two weeks at summer camp. All this has been done over the head of the board of education and over the school board. I object further to this duplication of services. We should leave the schools alone. Hands off the public schools and the secondary schools in the province, and the same goes for the separate schools. De La Salle has one of the finest cadet corps in Canada. Why not leave them to fulfil their own functions? Some amendment should be made to take care of these young people of fifteen, sixteen, seventeen and eighteen who belong to school cadet corps and are getting physical drill, sports and military training in the high and public schools. We should leave that work where it belongs. There are too many recruiting officers for the 'teen age students. Mr. Busybody and Mr. Highbrow have been urging these new cadet services. It is a pity they go into the schools and interfere with the young people, getting them into the air force or the army or navy too early to play on sporting teams, and I have heard complaints about this matter.

I do not need any lectures from the hon. member for Spadina. Thank goodness for that. Far from it; I was here before he was and I shall be here long after he has gone. I do not say that in criticism of the hon. member because he and I have been friends for years, but he has been away at camp, where he has done good work, and has missed some of what has been going on in respect to education in Toronto. Evidently he does not know much about the duplication of the service and the interference in education to which I refer. At any rate, he does not know as much as he used to know, because I used to see him once in a while at the parades on University avenue when he was on the board. In the old days, at the time of the South African war and again in the great war, these young school cadets were the backbone of the militia in Toronto, and we would not have had the trouble we have to-day if the cadet movement to which they belonged had been fostered.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are two matters to which I wish to call the attention of the Minister of National Defence. The first is with reference to the 13th Canadian Infantry Brigade, particularly in relation to the expedition last summer to Kiska. Before dealing with the matter that is on my mind, may I say in passing that we in Winnipeg are very proud of the part played in that expedition by the reconstituted 1st battalion of the Winnipeg Grenadiers, which was part of that brigade. As the minister knows, a great many of those included in the brigade were home defence or N.R.M.A. personnel. Credit should be given to them—and this is a chance of offsetting some of the remarks made in this house—by reference to their part in a dangerous expedition which might have resulted in serious losses if the Japanese had not left just before these men arrived. It should not be forgotten that even though the Japanese had left, owing to mines that were left behind there were casualties in the landing, and there were also casualties because of the kind of landing that was made in view of the expectation that it was a real invasion that was being effected. The point I wish to discuss relates to something which it might be said concerns another department, but I am told that this matter has been passed back and forth from one department to another, and I feel that it is the concern of the Department of National Defence to protect the interests of the men. I refer to the income tax deductions from the men in the 13th Canadian Infantry Brigade during the time they were in Kiska.

I asked certain questions on the order paper the other day and they were answered in Hansard of February 11, 1944, on pages 399-400. These answers simply confirmed the information which had already been communicated to me, namely, that these men while in Kiska were taxed under the terms of a rule that is to be found on page 75 of the 1943 office consolidation of the Income War Tax Act. On page 75 one will find, under schedule 1, section 3, rule 3, provision for exempting service personnel fifty per cent of their tax when serving in places in the western hemisphere other than in Canada. It is under this rule that these men were taxed while in Kiska. My contention is that they should have been taxed under the provision found on page 12 of this office consolidation. As I see it, the appropriate section on that page would be section 4 (t) (i), which is supposed to grant full exemption to personnel on the strength of overseas units outside the western hemisphere. I would point out first of all the geographical fact that Kiska is outside the western hemisphere. When I asked that question on the order paper the other day, whether Kiska is outside the western hemisphere, the official government answer was no; but according to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, Kiska lies between 177 and 178 degrees east longitude—in other words, two or three degrees beyond the line that geographically divides the western from the eastern hemisphere.

Mr. RALSTON: My information is that the answer to that question was based on the fact that there was a jog in the international dateline, and Kiska is in the western hemisphere.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was pointing out to the minister that geographically it seems to me there was no argument.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what the hon. member means by "geographically". It is quite true it is over a continuous line of longitude, but that does not necessarily make it in the western hemisphere.

Mr. KNOWLES: My understanding is this. The western hemisphere can be looked at two ways, geographically and politically. Geographically the logical thing would be to take a line of longitude around the globe and regard that as dividing east from west, but governments have their own way of arbitrarily doing things. I understand that the Canadian government is following the United States government in this matter.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think so in the Atlantic.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I proceed for a moment? I understand the Canadian government, following the United States government, which has ruled arbitrarily that because Kiska is a possession of the United States it is regarded as in the western hemisphere—

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Was that ruling made before the present war began?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry; I do not know. A moment ago when I made the point that Kiska is two or three degrees beyond the line which I say geographically separates the hemispheres, I was conscious of the fact that some might say that was a very short distance; that one should not try to make too much of a case out of that. However, I would point out not only is it a matter of Kiska being two or three degrees beyond the 180th degree of longitude; it is a considerable distance from Canada. If hon. members will look at a globe they will discover the distance from the Pacific coast to Kiska is greater than the distance from our Atlantic coast to Britain; and as the minister knows better than I do, it was a hazardous voyage that these men had to make. When they came home it was emphasized that the distance from Kiska to Victoria was such that it took a very great length of time to traverse it. I am emphasizing the fact that not only is Kiska beyond the western hemisphere, as I see it, but it is a great distance from Canada, definitely outside of Canada, and that these men were not only going into a theatre of war but embarked on an expedition that did involve casualties and might have involved much more serious loss. It also involved their living under very great hardships during the time they were there. I understand that—

Mr. EVANS: Did the hon. member not want them to go to Kiska?

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I did not say anything of the kind. I am discussing one matter related to the expedition to Kiska, namely, what I regard as unfairness to the men in not giving them the full exemption of income tax as specified in rule 3 on page 12 of the office consolidation to which I have referred, and I was about to point out that the answers which had been communicated to the men as to the reasons why they were treated in this way are, first of all, that politically the United States government does not regard Kiska as outside the western hemisphere. It seems to me that is an arbitrary decision, and that in dealing fairly with the men, the government ought not stand on an arbitrary technicality.

Another argument that has come back to the men is that the Income War Tax Act in its legal terminology makes no reference to a theatre of war as having any bearing on income tax exemptions. In that connection I should like to read a few sentences from the speech of the Minister of Finance delivered when he brought down the budget on March 2, 1943. It will be found in volume 1, page 858, of Hansard for 1943. He was discussing the changes that he was proposing in the income tax regulations with respect to service personnel. One sentence will make my point clear. This is what he said:

> Because of the way in which the war has developed I think it is reasonable to make a distinction between those who are in the United Kingdom or elsewhere across the ocean and those who are in Newfoundland, the West Indies, Labrador or Alaska.

The point the minister was making at that time was that some consideration should be given in the light of the circumstances, the dangers and the conditions under which the men were living or fighting at the time. He was trying to keep away from previous distinctions which did not seem fair. The spirit of the exemption provisions in the Income War Tax Act should certainly apply to men who went as far as these men went, who ran the risk of suffering casualties, as they did, and of enduring hardships, as they did. The spirit of this provision should be made to apply in this case, and I have already tried to point out to the minister it seems to me a case could be made for giving them full exemption even under the letter of the Income War Tax Act as it stands at the present time; because the Income War Tax Act, when it speaks of the western hemisphere, makes no reference to a definition of the eastern or western hemisphere. Apparently that had to be found afterwards. I repeat, the intent of the act was surely to provide special consideration in income tax matters to men who went overseas to Britain, Europe, Italy, et cetera, and it should apply to the men who went an equal distance the other way in the war against Japan.

The fact that these men were sent out of Canada is underlined by the necessity of the special order in council P.C. 5011, dated June 18, 1943, which provided for authority to the Minister of National Defence to dispatch N.R.M.A. personnel not only to the territory of Alaska but to the Aleutian islands as well and other United States islands adjacent thereto. The provisions of the N.R.M.A. were such that in order to send home defence personnel to Kiska a special order in council had to be passed. I can assure my hon. friend across the way that I am not complaining about the passing of this order in council. I feel that complaints can scarcely be registered even with regard to the passing of the order in council after the men were away from British Columbia. I have heard protests registered in that regard. But after all, as the order in council itself says, such a decision could not be made public; for if such had been done it would have given information to the enemy. But I am quoting the order in council to emphasize the fact that these men were sent beyond the shores of Canada, for the defence of Canada. I repeat, they went a considerable distance; they suffered casualties; they endured very great hardships during the months they were there, and it is only fair that they should be given the full exemption. I hope the minister will make a further effort on behalf of the men to see what can be done in this connection.

There are other islands beyond Kiska. One never knows what plans may be arranged, or what they may call for in the way of further expeditions to the next island or to islands farther on. Just where is the line to be drawn between the men who get fifty per cent exemption and the men who get one hundred per cent? It seems to me to be quite a question. I feel that it is perfectly in order, both in the spirit and in the letter of the Income War Tax Act, that these men who went to Kiska should be regarded as having gone over the line into the eastern hemisphere.

I said there were two matters that I wished to draw to the attention of the Minister. I should like to say a word or two about the second one. It relates to the problem that arises when men are discharged from the services at their own request on compassionate grounds and find that they are some considerable distance from their home or wherever they may have to go. I have in my hand correspondence relating to a particular case, that of a naval rating, which I took up with the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, who of course pointed out to me that the regulations affecting naval ratings were the same as those affecting men in the other services, so that I feel it only right I should raise the question now, while we are discussing general matters relating to national defence. I would point out to the minister also that the case I have before me was brought to my attention by a former solicitor of the city of Winnipeg who is now living in retirement in Victoria, but who is doing voluntary work for the Navy League of Canada. It was in connection with his work out there that this case was brought to his attention. He wrote me about it, feeling that while this man had been looked after on a charitable basis some effort should be made to change the regulations so that this sort of thing would not happen again. In this case it became necessary for this rating, because of the condition of his wife's health, to return home to London, Ontario; but when he was discharged at Victoria he was given only $59.11, of which $35 was the allowance for clothing, leaving him $24.11, which was all the money he had to get back to London. This man was looked after through the kindness of the Navy League of Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: Did he have a clothing allowance?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, of $35; this was before the allowance was increased, and he was instructed that this money should be spent for clothing.

Mr. RALSTON: He was discharged where?

Mr. KNOWLES: He was discharged at Victoria on his own request, because of the condition of his wife's health. She was in London, Ontario. As I say, this case was taken care of charitably, but that is hardly a desirable situation. I know other hon. members have drawn similar cases to the attention of the minister, and I repeat that I took up this matter with the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, who pointed out that to make any change in his department would require that a change be made in all three services, and he went on to mention our good friends of the treasury board. So I bring this matter to the attention of the minister in the hope that he may give some consideration to an endeavour to change the regulations so that this sort of thing may not happen again. When it is said that men are discharged at their own request, sometimes that language implies that the onus rests entirely upon the man; yet the very fact that, as in this case, the navy agreed to the request for discharge indicates that in their opinion it was justified and in fact necessary. In such cases it does seem to me that a man should not be left stranded, as this rating would have been in Victoria but for the kindness of the Navy League of Canada. I would appreciate it if the minister would say something in reference to the two matters I have drawn to his attention.

Mr. RALSTON: Taking the last case first, I do not think it has been brought to my personal attention before, but I am instructed that whatever the regulations were they have been amended, and provision has been made that a man is discharged from the depot at which he enlisted. I do not know whether or not there is any catch in that, but I assume that the man to whom my hon. friend refers would not have enlisted in Victoria.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is exactly the point; this man enlisted in London and was discharged at Victoria.

Mr. RALSTON: This will not be of much comfort to him, but if he were to be discharged under the present regulations he would receive transportation to London.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I may just press the point a little further, the letter I received from the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services was dated February 7.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg pardon; I am talking about the army.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the minister's colleague tells me that the same regulations apply in the navy.

Mr. RALSTON: I am told not. Here is a copy of a memorandum on the regulations which states that an officer or soldier of the Canadian army on discharge therefrom is entitled to transportation and travelling allowances as shown hereunder, except as provided in paragraph 2. If he was residing in Canada immediately prior to becoming a member of the forces, he is entitled to transportation and travelling allowances to the place in Canada where he was residing immediately prior to his appointment or enlistment. I cannot tell my hon. friend how long that has been in force.

Mr. KNOWLES: In case I did not get it straight, may I ask the minister if this applies when a man is discharged at his own request?

Mr. RALSTON: I just looked to see, but I understand it applies whether or not he was discharged at his own request; there is no limitation in the regulations I have before me.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the date of that new order?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is talking about a man in the navy, and telling me that the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services said the rule in the navy was the same as in the army. I do not like to give evidence which is not in line with that of my colleague, but the information I am given is that in the army the man is discharged at the depot at which he enlisted; in other words that he is given transportation home.

Mr. KNOWLES: That being so I shall bring this case to the attention of the minister by correspondence, and we will see if we cannot get the naval department in line with the army.

Mr. RALSTON: That is a change in the army regulations; it has not been so always. Now with regard to the matter of income tax for the Kiska force. I must say to my hon. friend that I have been impressed by the same considerations he has urged, and at present the matter is under serious, active consideration, meaning that it is not settled by any means at the present moment. I think my hon. friend has put the case correctly; that is, whatever authorities there are on these matters suggest that geographically Kiska is outside the western hemisphere, but, as my hon. friend says, politically it is within the western hemisphere. By that they mean that Kiska is a possession of the United States; the United States says the island is in the western hemisphere, and we think we ought to take the statement of the country which owns the island as to what hemisphere it is in, since there is no overriding authority in the world, that I know of to argue that it is not. That is the reason for the ruling that has been given. That is in reply to my hon. friend's argument, which he has put very clearly, with regard to the question of whether or not Kiska is in the western hemisphere.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister will recall, of course, that I pointed out that the Income War Tax Act gives no definition of eastern or western hemisphere. Surely, the United States government notwithstanding, our income tax authorities have a right to decide what constitutes the western and eastern hemispheres.

Mr. RALSTON: They have the right to decide, but I think it is fairly good practice to take the evidence of the country which owns the island, and which says it is in the western hemisphere. So far as I know there is no one who should know better, unless it is some resident of Mars who is altogether outside the discussion.

Mr. KNOWLES: The boys who have been there know.

Mr. RALSTON: And of course a resident of Mars would be a very appropriate person to decide this case. The point that impressed me was the point which has also impressed my hon. friend; that is, the matter of the engagement of this force in active operations. In addition one must consider whatever weight may be gained from the fact that it was a very long distance from home, even though politically it may have been in the western hemisphere. Do not let my hon. friend misunderstand me by thinking that I am making any pledge or promise that any exception will be made to the present ruling. What I am indicating to my hon. friend is that for some time I have been interested in the same thing. Notwithstanding the fact that it is not my department, as I said yesterday I regard these men as being to some degree wards of the Department of National Defence, and that we certainly ought to do whatever we can to see that they are dealt with justly in a matter of this kind. I have not done with it by any means.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Mr. Chairman, I have two or three questions I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence:

1. What counties in the province of Quebec are comprised within military district No. 3, with headquarters at Kingston, Ontario?

2. What number of men in these counties have enlisted for service overseas?

3. Are those men reported officially as having been recruited in Quebec?

Mr. RALSTON: The answer to the first question is that the counties in Quebec which are included in military district No. 3 are Hull, Gatineau, Pontiac, and Temiscamingue.

I am sorry I cannot give an answer to the second question, and I do not know whether it can be compiled. However, I shall see if it can be.

The hon. member asks the number of men from those counties who have enlisted for overseas service. He will know that a request for that information is made often. The hon. member for Broadview has asked for it repeatedly, as it applies to Toronto, and I do not think that information has been given. The compilation of the numbers of men from any particular counties would require an enormous amount of work. However, I have made a note of the question.

The third question was as to whether the figures for enlistments from those counties are included in the report of recruitment for Quebec. The answer is no; the figures are not compiled by provinces, but rather by military districts. These men are shown as being recorded in military district No. 3.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): I thank the minister for his answers. My questions have been prompted by the fact that certain hon. members on the opposition side of the house are making it a point to use what they call official figures in an attempt to prove that Quebec has fallen behind in enlistments. As the representative of Pontiac I am in the unfortunate position to-day of not being able to stand in my place and say that so many thousands have been recruited from that county. But I can say, officially or unofficially, that in proportion to the enrolable population of men in my county, enlistments have been in as great numbers as in any other county in Canada.

Figures can be used for any purpose. If the background is not given they can be most deceiving. I recall that during the last war a certain parliamentary correspondent put a question to a gentleman who was then much in the public eye. He asked for a direct yes or no, because, he said, "Figures lie, and liars figure." In the present instance, if the figures are accepted as official they are not in accordance with the facts.

I do not wish to impute motives to anyone, but to me it is a source of deep regret that the people of Pontiac and of other adjoining counties in Quebec should be described here as having sent practically no recruits. This argument is directed particularly against French-Canadians. I represent a county which is seventy-five per cent French-Canadian; and again, having regard to the enrolable population I have no hesitation in saying that those French-Canadians have done their full duty so far as enlistments are concerned. It must not be forgotten that in Quebec we have many families in which there are great numbers of children. If I may refer to myself as an example, I am the father of ten children. Of these only one is of military age, and I am proud to state here—and I am not boasting—that he is overseas doing his duty. There are hundreds, maybe thousands of families in my county in which there are from ten to fifteen children. In many of those families none are of military age, and in others only females who are not supposed to enlist have reached that age.

When it is said that French-Canadians do not enlist I know that such is not the case. I hold in my hand a picture of six young men of a family of nine sons. Their father, Mr. Guertin, is a messenger in this building, and those boys are all serving overseas—French-Canadians, all of them. The last to enlist was only eighteen years of age, and enlistment in the navy had been previously refused him. As a member for the county of Pontiac I feel it my duty to state in this chamber, publicly, so that statement may be placed on the record, that the men enlisting from those counties of Quebec, comprised within military district No. 3 with headquarters at Kingston, Ontario, are not so officially reported. Nevertheless the young men from those counties have done their full duty.

About Christmas time the sad news reached a mother in my home village that her son had been killed in Italy. Four of the five boys in that family are now overseas. Yet there are hon. members in the house and others outside who try to make people believe that the French-Canadians in Quebec are not doing their duty.

I have before me an article which only recently I clipped from a newspaper, headed with these words, "Last Letter of French-Canadian Soldier Hero". This article is from Arthabaska, the representative of which constituency is not in the house this afternoon, and is as follows:

Arthabaska, Que., Jan. 31.—A farewell message from their son, received several months after he had been presumed killed in a flight over Italy, is cherished by Sheriff and Mrs. Maurice Maheu of this town. It is a simple but feeling story of courage, loyalty and patriotism.

The letter is from Sergeant Francois Gabriel Maheu, a member of the French-Canadian Alouette Squadron of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

On June 28, 1943, on his thirteenth raid over Italy he failed to return and in due course was officially presumed dead. Sergeant Maheu was twenty years of age.

Some months later his farewell message was received by his parents.

"When you receive this letter," he wrote, "do not grieve over my fate. I shall already have given my life for all of you whom I love so much and for my country."

I would ask the members of the Bloc Populaire to take particular note of this, that the only thought of this young French Canadian serving in the air force was to give his life for his country. I continue the quotation.

"You will have nothing but pride and honour that one of your sons has died for the shielding of his country.

"I offer my life and my sufferings to God to make up for all the trouble I may have caused you. I have made mistakes in the past, but I repent with all my heart. Rest assured that my thought has always been with you and that it will be with you until the last moment, because from day to day I have thought of what you have been to me, and never will I be able to prove all of my affection for you. The sacrifice of my life alone, in order to assure your freedom, will be the price of what you have done for me.

"I have no money to leave you. My bequest is faithfulness to duty."

Mr. GREEN: With regard to the income tax levy against the men in the Kiska force, there is this further feature, that the United States declared Kiska a combat zone, and also that these men went there to fight, and not to act as garrison troops. There is considerable concern about the matter on the Pacific coast. The ruling already made is based on a technicality, as to which there is much doubt, and I suggest that the troops be given the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. RALSTON: That was really the point that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made, I think, that it was a theatre of war and a combat zone, and I myself have taken that fully into consideration. But it did not need to be declared a combat zone. I think it was one without any question at all.

Mr. GILLIS: There is a matter on which I should like some clarification from the minister. I refer to order in council No. 5830, passed in August, 1941, and conferring certain wide powers on the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) with respect to the use of troops, militia and so forth in a given situation such as strikes, lock-outs, and so on. The order in council is lengthy and I shall not read it. It puts the Minister of Munitions and Supply in a position where, if he anticipates any disturbance, he may requisition troops from the Minister of National Defence merely by asking for them.

Mr. RALSTON: Having first exhausted the possibilities of using the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. GILLIS: The order in council does not state that. It states that they may be utilized too.

In addition, I notice that the Winnipeg Free Press of February 10 has an article headed "Stream-lining policy adopted for the Reserve Army" and it sets out five or six points, the third point of which refers to supporting the civil authority responsible for law and order, if required.

What I want the minister to clarify is this. I have seen considerable of this kind of action in the past, where the civic authorities lost control of the enforcement of law and order in a given area and requisitioned troops in the regular way, and the community or province that asked for the aid of the troops to maintain law and order had to pay the cost of the maintenance of the troops.

Mr. RALSTON: You mean, the bill was rendered.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. There were, I agree, times when it was not paid. What I want to know is just where the Department of National Defence fit into that picture. You might have a jittery kind of chap as Minister of Munitions and Supply; it may not be the present minister. The civic authorities somewhere may wire him, "We anticipate trouble here"; then without any consultation or investigation he may, under that order in council, requisition troops from the Department of National Defence, and according to my interpretation the Minister of National Defence has no alternative but must give him the troops required. I want to find out how much control the Minister of National Defence has under that order in council with respect to the sending of troops, and in the event of troops being sent into an area for the purposes stated in the order in council, who pays the cost of maintenance of the troops in that area?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the order in council before me. It was passed in July, 1941. I am surprised to hear my hon. friend say that the order in council does not contain a provision with regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I thought it did.

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: The order in council was passed for the purpose of preventing the possibility of destruction of our war effort, particularly in respect of the production of armament and munitions. My hon. friend will remember that a very serious situation did arise with respect to the production of aluminum, at a time when that material was exceedingly scarce, exceedingly valuable and very much needed in the allied war effort, and it took some weeks to repair the damage that was done. It was felt that this was not a situation which could be imposed upon the attorney general of the province, who would not have the same information as the federal authorities would have with regard to war necessities and any emergency which arose. Obviously, the Minister of National Defence would not be fully acquainted with the conditions of production and the effect which any disturbance might have on that production. It was therefore considered that the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who, under the Munitions and Supply Act, is responsible not only for the actual production but for the planning and the maintenance of that production, was the one in the best position to assess the situation and determine whether or not it was necessary to have the assistance of troops in order to prevent a disturbance.

I am still wondering whether my hon. friend has read the order in council carefully; I am sure he generally does read things carefully. At all events the practice is that the Minister of Munitions and Supply, finding a situation which is getting out of hand and which requires assistance in preserving order which cannot be furnished by the local authorities, applies to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is only after the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police indicates that they are not in a position to supply the necessary constables or officers to take care of the situation that the Minister of Munitions and Supply has the right to call on the Minister of National Defence to furnish troops for that purpose; and that is the authority of the Minister of National Defence to send troops to the particular area.

Answering my hon. friend's question, the Minister of National Defence himself under the order in council is not, perhaps, called on to exercise any discretion in connection with the matter. If he refused he would assume a very grave responsibility, in view of the fact that the governor in council has placed upon the shoulders of the Minister of Munitions and Supply that responsibility. At the same time, I know the committee will believe that the Minister of National Defence, by consultation and such examination or such verification as he can make without in any way questioning the authority of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, endeavours to assure himself as far as he can that the step which is being taken is a right one and is necessary under the circumstances.

My hon. friend referred to the militia and to the announcement which had been made as to the role of the reserve army. The role of the reserve army, as my hon. friend knows, is as old as the reserve army of the N.P.A.M. They have always been subject to be called in aid of the civil power, and that is exactly what the paragraph which my hon. friend read means. There is no addition there at all. That is what it is intended for. I suppose there might be a case when the reserve army itself would be called out under this order in council to which he has referred, with respect to the production of munitions. That has not been used, as far as I remember, in connection with the reserve army.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not quarrelling with the purpose for which the order was intended when it was passed in 1941; in that particular situation perhaps it was necessary. But I am rather loath to approve an order in council that gives to one minister the amount of power and latitude, with respect to the use of troops as police, that this order places in the hands of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I think the time has come when there should be a re-examination of that order, because if it is maintained in its present form in the future it can be used for other purposes than those for which it was intended. My object in bringing the matter up is to focus the attention of the Minister of National Defence upon it so that there may be reconsideration of the desirability of maintaining it in its present form in the future.

Mr. RALSTON: I will take note of my hon. friend's remarks, as a member of the government rather than as Minister of National Defence, because as Minister of National Defence I must recognize that the order in council is there. As I say, it was passed for a particular purpose, and having regard to the possibility of situations arising which are contemplated in the recital. With deference to my hon. friend, I feel that the Minister of Munitions and Supply is the one in the government who is best qualified, and perhaps the only one qualified, to speak of the seriousness and the extremity of the emergency which calls for the exercise of these powers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): May I again refer to the question of payment of income tax by the troops who served in Kiska? I am inclined to agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I thought he presented his case fairly and logically and with due emphasis. From the remarks of the minister I take it that he had been giving this matter consideration even before the question was raised in the house. When the amendment to the Income War Tax Act was passed providing that men who served outside Canada but in the western hemisphere should pay only half the income tax, I do not think it was ever contemplated that men who were going into a battle zone should pay half; I think at that time it was contemplated that any man going into a battle zone would pay no income tax. My recollection is that when that section was added to the Income War Tax Act, places such as Newfoundland and Bermuda were in the minds of those responsible. For instance, soldiers in those places are beyond the borders of Canada and in some places, particularly in Newfoundland, they are under greater hardships than in Canada itself. I think it was in those places, Newfoundland and Bermuda particularly, that it was contemplated that soldiers would pay half income tax.

With regard to Kiska, it was always my understanding that Kiska is not in the western hemisphere. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated that geographically it was not considered to be in the western hemisphere, but politically it was.

Mr. KNOWLES: By the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): By the United States, he said. He did not know and I did not know when it was declared by the United States to be in the western hemisphere. That declaration may have been made since this war started. I do not think this government should be bound by a declaration of the United States which had been made for political purposes as to the location of Kiska.

Mr. RALSTON: High political purposes!

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I said, "political". I did not intend to say "political 'purposes'". I do not think the word "political" has anything to do with party; I think "political" is used to distinguish from "geographical".

In my view the government should take into consideration only the fact that these men were expected to go into a battle zone, and they should be given the same consideration as any men who are going into a battle zone in any part of the world. I trust the government will see fit to give them full exemption from income tax payment. The payment of income tax for the year 1943 has not been finally adjusted. No doubt a certain percentage of their pay was deducted, but the final return has not been put in, and I suggest to the government that it be made abundantly clear that when they put in their return for the year 1943 they will be allowed full tax exemption.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to refer for a moment to the question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and to ask the minister if this order has been invoked at any time since it was passed. The date, I believe, is July 9, 1941. Has the Minister of Munitions and Supply requested that troops be sent into any place where there was trouble, or anticipated trouble; have troops been sent into such location; on how many occasions, and to what places?

Mr. RALSTON: I have in mind that on one occasion a requisition was made, but I do not think the troops were moved at that time. I have not the record here, but I believe that is the only occasion.

For the benefit of the hon. member for Cape Breton South I think it is well to put this order on the record. My hon. friend missed something in the order. It is numbered 5830 and dated July 29, 1941: I will not read the heading, if my hon. friend will permit Hansard to include it:

At the Government House at Ottawa
Tuesday, the 29th day of July, 1941.
Present:
His Excellency the Governor General in Council

Whereas the Minister of Justice reports that in order to insure without interruption the flow of supplies and munitions of war and the construction of all defence projects it may in some circumstances become necessary to authorize the Minister of National Defence to call out and employ the Active Militia to prevent or suppress riots, disturbances of the peace or other actions likely to impede or obstruct the production or delivery of munitions of war or supplies or the construction of defence projects;

Therefore, as a measure for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada, His Excellency the Governor General in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice—

Hon. members will recall that the Minister of Justice has jurisdiction over the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

—and under and by virtue of the powers conferred by the War Measures Act, chapter 206, R.S.C. 1927, is pleased to amend the Defence of Canada Regulations (consolidation) 1941, established by order in council P.C. 5295, dated 15th July, 1941, and they are hereby amended as follows:

1. By adding the following to subsection 1 of section 2:

(ii) "strike" means a lawful strike.

2. By inserting immediately after regulation number 51 the following:

51A (1) The active militia or any corps thereof shall be liable for service as hereinafter in this regulation provided.

(2) In any case where a riot or disturbance of the peace or without limitation by the foregoing any other action whatsoever occurs or is anticipated as likely to occur which in the opinion of the Minister of Munitions and Supply threatens to obstruct or delay the production, transportation, storage or delivery of munitions of war or supplies or the construction, remodelling, repair or demolition of a defence project, the minister may request—

I call this to the attention of the committee.

—the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to take such measures as in the opinion of the said commissioner are necessary to prevent, suppress or terminate such riot, disturbance or other action as aforesaid, actual or anticipated, and the commissioner shall take such measures accordingly.

(3) If the municipal and provincial police forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police available for the purpose are, in the opinion of the commissioner—

Not the minister.

—inadequate or ineffectual to prevent, suppress or terminate such riot, disturbance or other action as aforesaid, the commissioner shall immediately notify the Minister of Munitions and Supply accordingly.

(4) Thereupon the Minister of Munitions and Supply may notify the Minister of National Defence of the circumstances aforesaid and the Minister of National Defence shall thereupon issue a direction that the active militia take such measures as may be necessary to prevent, suppress or terminate such riot, disturbance or other action as aforesaid and the active militia shall take such measures accordingly.

(5) The officers and men of such active militia when so employed, shall, without any further authority or appointment, and without taking oath of office, be held to have and may exercise, in addition to their military powers and duties, all the powers and duties of special constables, so long as they remain so employed, but they shall act only as a military body, and shall be individually liable to obey the orders of their military superior officer.

(6) Every officer and man of the active militia, at all times and while so employed, shall obey the orders of his military superior officer.

(7) A strike or the peaceful persuasion of a person by another to take part in a strike shall not be an action to be prevented or suppressed under this regulation.

There is a penal provision having to do with those who attempt to obstruct or delay the transportation, storage or delivery of munitions and supply. Then there is the proviso:

Provided, however, that, a person shall not be guilty of an offence under this regulation by reason only of his taking part in or peacefully persuading any other person to take part in, a strike.

Mr. BRUCE: I wish to refer for a moment to a subject which I raised earlier in the afternoon. It intimately affects the welfare of our armed forces and might therefore, I believe, be appropriately dealt with for a moment at this time. I refer to the subject of venereal disease. In order to indicate at the outset that, in asking the question, I had no desire to cast reflection upon any particular location in Canada, I would simply say that the whole subject was raised at a conference in Montreal in the early part of this week, as reported in the Montreal Star of Tuesday, in which Major-General Renaud, the officer commanding military district No. 4, made a statement with reference to the seriousness of venereal disease which was affecting the forces stationed in or around Montreal or who were passing through Montreal. I am aware that the defence department established, a little over a year ago, I believe, a venereal disease control department which since then has been doing excellent work under the direction of Lieutenant-Colonel D. H. Williams. I understand that the other services have each an officer associated with Colonel Williams to take care of the work in their respective fields. Since that time there has been a great improvement in the incidence of venereal disease in the three defence services. On the other hand, there has been a steady rise in the incidence of venereal disease among the civilian population, and it will be quite clear to everyone that this must also be controlled or the efforts of the army will be unavailing, because obviously the source of disease is in the communities in which the soldiers reside.

I had intended asking the minister if he would make a statement, but he has indicated his intention of doing so later on with regard to the whole venereal situation as it affects the army. I think it very desirable to call public attention to the situation that prevails throughout Canada in many communities, because it is only in this way that any cleaning-up will take place.

After I received to-day the telegram to which I referred earlier in the session, I telephoned to the chief venereal disease officer, Colonel Williams, and asked him about the situation in the city of Quebec, and he gave me this interesting information, that the municipal authorities there had recently closed the various bawdy houses and that five days after that action had been taken there was a reduction of fifty per cent in the incidence of venereal disease in the forces in that area. Therefore Quebec may very well be an example for other communities in Canada to follow.

An hon. MEMBER: Toronto.

Mr. BRUCE: I mean Quebec city, in this respect, at any rate. I am sure the members for Quebec city will be pleased to have me make this statement.

Mr. POWER: All these stories are not about Quebec city; they are about Montreal. The hon. member read the wrong paper.

Mr. BRUCE: About what city? The stories I referred to a moment ago in the early part of my remarks were about Montreal.

Mr. POWER: I beg your pardon.

Mr. BRUCE: My statement referred to the holding up of corvettes because of the prevalence of venereal disease. Perhaps the minister did not hear that statement made earlier in the day. I made an inquiry in regard to that situation and the chief venereal officer gave me the reply which I gave a moment ago.

Mr. POWER: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does the telegram infer that venereal disease is among civilians or workers on these corvettes or among members of the navy who would be taking the corvettes out to sea?

Mr. BRUCE: If I may, I shall read the telegram:

> Monday's papers state service civilian conference reveals corvettes delayed sailing Quebec through prevalence venereal disease my son volunteer for navy goes there Sunday imagine our and other parents' feelings. What is being done re situation.

Mr. POWER: Vessels could not leave Quebec in the winter anyway. We do claim there is winter navigation out of Quebec, but I think it is only theoretical; therefore I hardly think the vessels would be leaving Quebec. In any event I think the ice probably had more to do with it than the disease.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not want to interrupt the hon. member for Parkdale, but I believe that this discussion should take place under item 5:

> 5. Personnel. Supplies and services: food, medical and dental stores, clothing and personal equipment.

Yesterday the Minister of National Defence and the acting leader of the opposition mentioned the fact that it was difficult to keep the members of the committee in order on the general discussion. I want to follow implicitly the lead the committee will give me with regard to discussion under this item. We have had a general discussion for pretty nearly a week, and I believe the temper of the committee would be to pass item 1 in order to proceed with the other items. I do not want to curtail discussion in any way, but I should like to make the position clear.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Chairman, you say that this discussion could very well take place under item 5. Item 5 deals with medical and dental stores, it is true, but it does not say anything about medicine, disease or anything else. It is difficult for the committee to know just what item the different matters should come under.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not blame my hon. friend for finding it difficult. I must confess to the committee that if this item is taken in the broadest sense almost anything in the Department of National Defence could be discussed thereunder, because there must be civil salaries or wages paid to clerks in connection with this matter as in others. To this I have no objection whatever, Mr. Chairman. In the first place let me say I appreciate your difficulty in endeavouring to keep the committee in line in questions and discussion on the various items. The hon. member for Parkdale began this discussion, and I for one am only too pleased to have him continue it. I intend to say something about the subject this evening, if I may, because it seems to me there are many things important in the army and in the armed services, and this is one of the most important. With your consent, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the hon. member for Parkdale continue.

The CHAIRMAN: Just one moment. I wish to make the position very clear. I followed quite closely the remarks of the leader of the opposition yesterday afternoon. As the committee knows, this is really not an itemized summary, but it was accepted last year. I know you will appreciate my difficulty in trying to synchronize items and so on. It is not my desire to stop discussion.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As a member in uniform I think I should intrude on this discussion. I had not intended saying anything on the minister's estimates, but the hon. member rises in his place and makes a statement which may be used by Lord Haw Haw and Doctor Goebbels in German propaganda that the Canadian navy could not put to sea out of Quebec because it was riddled with venereal disease. I say that is a shameful thing. If it is true, the hon. member should have gone to the minister and given him that information rather than alleging all across the country that the Canadian navy could not put to sea because of venereal disease. It is a shameful thing.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. I think this is a public question and one that could very well be ventilated here.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This is the proper place to ventilate it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Get the real facts.

Mr. TUCKER: An allegation is made that may not be borne out at all.

Mr. BRUCE: We shall know what the facts are very soon, when the minister for the navy replies to my question.

Mr. TUCKER: Why put it on the records of parliament until you know?

Mr. BRUCE: The fact remains, Mr. Chairman, that the country is very much disturbed about the increase in the incidence of venereal disease.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is a very different matter.

Mr. BRUCE: Therefore I think it is a very proper matter to call to the attention of the committee at this time, because it may seriously interfere with the efficiency of our armed forces. If allowed to become rampant, it certainly will interfere with their efficiency. If the excellent work that is being done by the venereal disease control department is to be a hundred per cent effective, or nearly so, then it is necessary for the various communities throughout Canada to do their part by closing bawdy houses, as I believe has been done in Montreal and Quebec. I await with interest the report of the minister on this subject, but should like to call the attention of the committee to the way venereal disease has been handled in other countries, particularly in the Scandinavian countries. The incidence of syphilis in Denmark has been reduced to ·2 per thousand and in Sweden to ·07 per thousand.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is Sweden doing in this war?

Mr. BRUCE: That is to say, one Dane in five thousand suffers from this disease and one Swede in 14,000. In twenty years they have been able to cut down venereal disease in these countries to the status of a rare disease. I believe that this should stimulate our people to greater activity in the hope that we may be able to stamp out this serious disease in this country to a very large extent.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not intend to occupy very much time. I also like to get the facts. I did not want to take up the time to put the order in council on record, but I do not interpret it as the minister does. In the first place, this order in council states that some strikes are legal. The minister will remember that under P.C. 9384, the last wage order, no strikes are legal. Therefore this order conflicts with the other.

Mr. RALSTON: You are not complaining about that.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not. Secondly, the authority to decide whether a community has lost control of the administration of law and order is placed exclusively in the hands of the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Surely that is usurping the powers of the civic governments.

Mr. RALSTON: No. It has the authority to state not that they have lost control, but that the police forces are not efficient.

Mr. GILLIS: That is interfering with the powers which are vested in the municipalities, towns and cities. The mayor or council decided whether that situation prevailed.

Mr. RALSTON: I take issue with my hon. friend there. I know they have the right to decide it, they control the forces; but at the same time, where there is a federal interest, and when the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who ought to know something about the strength of the measures which must be taken to deal with a particular situation, is given that responsibility, it seems to me that my hon. friend cannot say that control is taken away from the municipal authorities. The commissioner simply appraises the ability of the municipal police force to handle the situation as it affects the federal project.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no objection to the commissioner doing that when he is utilizing his own forces, but I definitely do not see the matter as the minister sees it with respect to the use of troops. It is an entirely new departure; otherwise this order would not have been necessary. If in a given area, the city of Toronto, for example, or in Montreal or anywhere else, troops are necessary, it was and should be the prerogative of the city council to call them in. I think the minister will remember the last time troops were used in Nova Scotia. The town of Glace Bay refused to do what many of the other cities and municipalities did; that is, it refused to requisition the troops, and as a result they were not brought to our town. Our mayor refused to sign the requisition, and as a result they were not called in. I think this matter requires an examination. The order may have been necessary when it was passed, but it contains unlimited powers which override civic powers in the matter of the use of troops. I know the minister cannot deal with the point to-day, but I merely want to focus attention upon it because it conflicts with the existing set-up. There are no more legal strikes, but under this regulation if the commissioner or the person responsible in a particular district desires to utilize the troops instead of his own forces he is at liberty to do so. Personally I am skeptical about a number of the people who are administering the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, when it comes to the question of deciding whether or not troops should be used under this order. I am not satisfied to leave that decision with them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was interested in the discussion that took place between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the minister with regard to an individual who was discharged from the navy at Victoria and was faced with the difficulty of securing transportation home. The minister dealt with that case as far as his department is concerned, but it happens that I, together with a group of my colleagues on this side of the house, have been attempting to study these matters in order to enlighten our own minds as to what is actually being done with regard to the demobilization and rehabilitation of the men and women in our armed services. Accordingly I thought it might be profitable to give hon. members the information we have been able to obtain in regard to such cases. I think hon. members and the people of Canada generally will be very much interested in securing full information as to the policy of the government in this regard, and it is our duty to give those who are interested all the information we can. So, that, if the minister will correct me in the event that I am wrong, I propose to put on record just what is done now with regard to a person who is discharged from any of our armed services. He is given a clothing allowance of $65, which is a decided improvement over the amount mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in connection with the individual he was discussing. In addition, the man is allowed to retain certain articles such as underwear, shoes et cetera. He is also entitled to a rehabilitation grant consisting of one month's pay, with the dependents' allowance continued for that period, and finally he is provided with transportation and travelling expenses—

Mr. GRAYDON: That is on discharge?

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Only one month's pay.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, one month.

Mr. GRAYDON: No matter how long he has served.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, of course I am dealing with what the defence department is doing. The man will be entitled to certain other things when he comes under the new department of veterans' affairs. I am speaking now of what happens at the time of discharge.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not enough.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Does that apply to those who are discharged at their own request?

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister dealt with that, and I noticed he said that in his department it applies to those discharged at their own request; at least that was what I understood.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: I should correct my hon. friend there. I was referring to transportation home, which is granted to those discharged at their own request.

Mr. GRAHAM: One of the reasons that moved me to speak was the fact that the regulation is a little more generous than even the minister gave himself credit for.

Mr. WRIGHT: How long must a man serve in the forces before he receives the grant of one month's pay?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not been informed as to the limitation of time.

Mr. RALSTON: He must serve six months, or 183 days.

Mr. WRIGHT: My hon. friend should put all the information on record if he is going to give any of it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not occupied very much of the time of this house so far this session, but I propose to place this information on record and if my hon. friend wishes more he can secure it or I can secure it for him. As I was saying, the department is a little more generous than the minister indicated. Not only is the discharged man entitled to transportation and expenses to the point of enlistment; at his own choice he is provided with transportation to the place of bona fide residence or to any other point in Canada that can be reached without additional expenditure. That is a rather important provision, because we all know that the point of enlistment may not be the point of residence, or where the man really wants to go. Through marriage, or for some other reason, his place of residence may have been changed during his period of enlistment. So that I am delighted to learn that the department has taken that possibility into account and has provided a choice as to the place to which the discharged man may be given transportation.

Mr. QUELCH: Only if it is without additional expenditure.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the hon. member explain what is really meant by those words, "without additional expenditure"?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the statement I made is easily understandable. The discharged man can choose transportation to the point of enlistment, or to a place of bona fide residence which may be farther away than the point of enlistment, or to any other point in Canada, provided that it does not entail greater expense than transportation to his bona fide residence.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: But if that point is farther away it will entail greater expense.

Mr. GRAHAM: I placed this information on record because I thought it might be of some assistance to those hon. members who are interested in these matters rather than in the mere political value they see in criticizing the attitude of the government. That was the sole purpose I had in mind, to give certain information not only to hon. members but also to Canadians generally who are very much interested in the welfare of the men and women enlisted in our armed forces.

Mr. McIVOR: I do not like to change the subject, but when I think of the work our doctors are doing at the head of the lakes, which includes Fort William, Port Arthur and the surrounding district; when I think of the work of Doctor Walter Hogarth, who has said that these diseases are definitely on the decrease, I think it is my duty to rise in my place and say that the doctors, both military and civilian, who are attending the air force in Fort William, the navy in Port Arthur and the soldiers in both cities, have been doing a dandy job in keeping these men clean and fit.

Mr. RAYMOND: I wish to get some information from the Minister of National Defence, and at the same time register a protest against the attitude of the Department of National Defence in calling up farmers for a second medical examination. In view of the shortage of labour in the farming communities, is it the intention of the minister to continue to call up farmers for a second medical examination, particularly when they have been classified in category "E"?

I should like to cite an example. Last September I learned about a farmer who owned 160 acres of land. This man was married, but had to look after his farm by himself. He was called to Montreal for a second medical examination. Although he had been very busy at his farm work, he had to leave his farm and go to Montreal. It is true that the trip had been made at the expense of the government, but they were useless expenses. This man had been classified in category "E".

What is the purpose of calling farmers when we need them so badly? This man was alone, and had to look after 160 acres; yet he was called for a second medical examination, despite his classification. Does the minister intend to continue this practice?

Mr. RALSTON: Once more I must explain that I do not call the farmers. I have no more to do with calling farmers than I have with calling men engaged in any other occupations. I ask my colleague the Minister of Labour, through national selective service, for so many men. National selective service provides the machinery under which those men are called up. A provision was made, one which I believe has been pretty well eliminated now, whereby men could be examined by civilian practitioners. I do not know the case to which my hon. friend refers, but I shall be glad to refer to my colleague, the Minister of Labour, what has been said, if the hon. member will give me the information. We may then ascertain if we have a record of what has been done. I do not know whether the man in question was examined by a civilian practitioner.

However, it was found—and it was bound to be so—that there is a difference among doctors as to whether a man is or is not fit, and as to what degree of disability he may have from a symptom he exhibits. The result was that a board of revision was constituted. This board consisted of doctors who had a knowledge of army requirements. They have worked under national selective service and, although I cannot give the exact title of the director, I can say that a medical officer from national selective service has in each district gone over examinations made by civilian doctors. A doctor will see what a layman would not see, and in this, that or the other case he might find it questionable whether a man should have been placed in category "E", or whether he might not have been placed in a category eligible for military service. In those instances the director issued an instruction that such men be called in again, a procedure which was carried out in every province, irrespective of where it might be.

In one province I have in mind—and it was not Quebec—I saw figures which showed that of 2,100 men turned down and found physically unfit, medical revision disclosed that 700 were eligible for military service. I am not casting any reflection upon members of the medical profession; I am simply stating a fact. It is quite possible that these examinations have been made when there was not the same general knowledge of army requirements.

If a man were called, whether or not he was a farmer, and was entitled to exemption under the act, then of course he should not have been called for an examination. On the other hand, if he was not entitled to exemption he would have to be called for his first examination. The medical director or registrar—I am not sure as to what his correct title is—who conducted the revision might quite possibly consider that the man in question had not been thoroughly examined, and might direct that he be called up for examination by the board of revision. That is all I can say to my hon. friend on the matter, except to emphasize once more that it has been found that this screening process, in which a reexamination is conducted, has disclosed cases on both sides of the line. Sometimes men who were overseas and who had been placed in category "A" upon entering the army, have been discharged. On the other hand many more were found who, in the first instance, had been turned down by a civilian practitioner, but who later were found to be medically eligible.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In what province was that?

Mr. RALSTON: It was in Manitoba. However, I am not picking it out particularly. I might have chosen Ontario, Prince Edward Island or any other province, because it was the same in all.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It would appear that under this item we are to be allowed to ask questions respecting medical subjects. Can the minister tell us how many psychiatrists are engaged in the army. I am asking the question because I know of some who have been checked by psychiatrists, and as a result have received satisfactory treatment.

I have, however, a complaint to make. In my view too many are shoved through the offices in a short space of time. The examinations are made too hurriedly. I understand there is an allotted time for each man, and I do not think that is a proper procedure. I do not know whether the minister agrees with me or not, but I believe the army would have fewer desertions if the psychiatrists had a better chance to check up on some of these men. I say that because many men in the army do not know where they are going, or what it is all about. In many cases they feel that it is not worth while, at all.

I shall not give any specific cases, but I do know of instances where psychiatrists have put these men on their feet, when a check was made, and it was learned what was required. In such instances good advice has been given. It is my opinion that psychiatrists should have more time to make their checks on the boys in the army.

I should like to know how many of those psychiatrists there are, and the length of time given to check each case. In many instances I understand the check is not made until it is almost too late. In my view it should be made when they come in or shortly thereafter.

Mr. RALSTON: I know there is a psychiatrist at each reception centre, and I shall get the exact number for the hon. member. The time taken by the psychiatrist when checking each man is supposed to be the amount of time required to enable the doctor to form an opinion. I agree with the hon. member that when there are such large numbers to be examined it is possible mistakes might be made and examinations might have to be curtailed to some extent. However, while we must not preen ourselves too much, we received a distinct indication from people who visited us not long ago that our examination set-up was satisfactory, and we were congratulated upon the fact that we had not reached the assembly-line stage in connection with the entrance of men to the army.

This applies not only to men who are coming into the army, but also to those who are already in. This is a process of keeping an eye on them, and following them through. That is particularly so when men are found not adapted to some particular occupation or arm of the service. The psychiatrist or the personel selection officer is there, and he endeavours to get the man started off on the right road again. As a matter of fact we have made a great advance in this respect overseas as well. We have sent teams overseas, not for the purpose of tearing up units, but more for the purpose of seeing with respect to the reinforcement units that the men there may be picked out and tagged for jobs so that they will not get into the wrong places where their abilities will be misplaced.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This afternoon the minister was going to let us know about the number of psychiatrists in the army.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry that I have been busy since I left here at six o'clock, and I have not been able to get the figures. I shall have them to-morrow .

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Another matter respecting the health of men in the army about which I should like to speak is the service of chiropodists. I understand that the air force is recognizing these people and they are doing good work, and I wondered what the army was doing to provide for chiropodists to look after the feet of the men. I understand that the army is trying to create chiropodists by a three or four weeks' course of their own, and that, of course, is causing dissatisfaction among the registered chiropodists in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend at this stage much information. From what I know from personal knowledge, the army has chiropodists; I know some who were practising in Ottawa who are in the army, and their services are regarded as not only useful but necessary. They are not taken in as officers; they are taken in as non-commissioned officers, and the men get the benefit of their services. Is there any particular question which my hon. friend has in mind?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Just the two matters I mentioned. The subject of diabetes has been referred to before, but could the minister tell us the different tests which the men have to go through for diabetes when they are taken into the army? Is there just one test, or are they given a blood test also?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend now. I might point out to the committee that this is where difficulty arises in endeavouring to cover all subjects under one item. I expect to have the medical officers here when the medical item comes up, but one can see that there are a good many ramifications in the organization and one cannot have all these people here at one time. I shall have that information. I just have now the statement that there are sixty-three psychiatrists in the Canadian army in Canada and overseas.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does the minister think that number is sufficient? Is there any chance of getting any more?

Mr. RALSTON: All I know is this, that in addition to his qualifications as a medical practitioner, the director-general of medical services is himself a psychiatrist.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know that.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think there is anybody who recognizes more the usefulness of psychiatrists in connection with army work, particularly personnel selection. As probably the hon. member knows, Major-General Chisholm was in charge of personnel selection before he was appointed director-general of medical services. We were fortunate in that, so fortunate that although sometimes personnel selection is in some way an entirely different branch, we felt that personnel selection should be taken over by the medical services, and it is one of the branches of the director-general's functions. I am sure that if more psychiatrists are needed and are obtainable, Major-General Chisholm will be the first one to see that they are employed.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The reason I asked if we have enough is that I understand, whatever is the case now, that some few months ago a psychiatrist would go into one training camp, stay there perhaps a day or two days, then proceed to some other place, and then on to another point, but never at any time did he stay long enough in one place to do a job thoroughly. He did not have time to check on these men thoroughly. Perhaps he would see a man in the training camp to-day, a man who might be moved out of there in a week's time, before the phychiatrist got back. That was not fair to the psychiatrist or to the man. Perhaps if that man had had a little more attention from a psychiatrist he would make a better soldier. All these men in the army have good stuff in them, and it is up to the psychiatrist to try to bring out the good in the men, and they are doing it. I think this is a matter which should be looked into.

Mr. RALSTON: My principal satisfaction is that not only the officers and other ranks but the minister himself are getting in a state of mind where they are not afraid of psychiatrists.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There is a lot in that.

Mr. RALSTON: It was regarded for a while as a rather fearsome profession with a fearsome name. I did not like the sound of psychiatric tests, myself; but we seem to have advanced considerably in science in this particular war, and I have found, as my hon. friend suggests, that the services of psychiatrists have been highly useful, not simply from a professional and scientific, but also from a practical point of view. Regarding what my hon. friend has said, I am thinking now of a reception centre where there is not a psychiatrist all the time; in that particular province he does have to move around; and I quite agree with my hon. friend that if we were able to have the personnel selection officer and a psychiatrist constantly there to consult—not in every case, because you do not need a psychiatrist in every case—it would be an advantage. I will make a note of the matter and see whether the D.G.M.S. thinks there is a possibility of increasing the number of psychiatrists. I would agree with my hon. friend. I know the work they are doing and the size of the job, and I think that more psychiatrists would be useful.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I was glad to hear the minister say that we are not afraid of the name "psychiatrist."

Mr. RALSTON: I was—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We all were perhaps at one time.

Mr. RALSTON: —but I am getting over it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The psychiatrists really take the place of mother and father of the men in the army because they are there to listen to the troubles of these men, and also of the girls, because they need such advice as well as the men.

Mr. GREEN: In the course of the discussion on this resolution the minister made significant statements on two questions which I think are of great importance, not only to this house but also to the Canadian people. First is the man-power policy of the government, having reference more particularly to the call-up system under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and, secondly, the policy of the government in the war with Japan.

To deal first with the call-up system, it would appear from the statements the minister has made that that system is being allowed to die out. For example, the minister has shown that the numbers called up have dropped from 60,000 in the fiscal year 1942-43 to 25,000 in the fiscal year 1943-44, and in fact in the present year there have been only 19,000 called in the first nine months.

Mr. RALSTON: Enrolled, not called.

Mr. GREEN: I am dealing throughout with enrolment figures. That was to the end of December, 1943, and as against that enrolment about 3,000 have gone active, 6,500 have been discharged, which by the way seems a very high percentage, and I would ask the minister to explain the reasons for which they were discharged; then there have been 1,500 deserters in the first nine months of the present fiscal year. That is a total wastage of 11,000. The minister announced that for the coming fiscal year 1944-45 there would be only 12,000 enrolled under the National Resources Mobilization Act; in other words, less than half of the number asked for in the present fiscal year.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the last word? My hon. friend said, "in other words".

Mr. GREEN: In other words, less than half the number that the government required during the fiscal year 1943-44. The minister told us last year that he was asking for 25,000 under the National Resources Mobilization Act and 75,000 for general service. Then he said yesterday that the N.R.M.A. army is now on a maintenance basis, that there will be no increase in the numbers in that army; that there will be about 50,000 fighting men fit to be sent overseans to fight, and that was the same figure he gave last year and the year before. As I say, he admitted yesterday that the N.R.M.A. army is now purely on a maintenance basis.

In the course of his statements on this resolution he has said further that there is an extensive feeding out from the N.R.M.A. army to different industries, agriculture, forestry, and so on, the total at present being about 5,300, which is done by a system of extended leave. Men are given six months' leave with the option of renewing it for a further six months and so on, which really amounts to indefinite leave.

Mr. RALSTON: That does not apply to the N.R.M.A. alone.

Mr. GREEN: No; that is quite true. But the minister said that there are 5,300 N.R.M.A. men out on extended leave—8,000 altogether of whom 5,300 are N.R.M.A. men. If I am incorrect I would ask the minister to correct me. He said also that some men have been detailed for work in industry; in other words, they are not on leave—they had not that privilege—but have been detailed to go and work in an industry. I suggest to him that there will be more and more a demand from industry for these men in the N.R.M.A. army, particularly if those troops are not fighting and there appears to be little prospect that they will be doing any fighting. I think it is a reasonable forecast that a year from now there will be a force of fewer than 50,000 of these men who are fit for fighting. This means that the N.R.M.A. army is gradually dropping out of sight and that eventually we shall reach the position where we have no effective N.R.M.A. army at all. This means further that Canada is getting back to a purely voluntary basis for raising troops, which means, of course, that we are getting back to all the inequalities which a voluntary system entails.

I suggest to the minister that there should be a clear-cut statement of policy on the part of the government with regard to this call-up system, telling us just what the intention is and where we are heading. It is one of the most important questions in the whole of our war effort and we should have a more clear-cut statement from him.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what my hon. friend means by a clear-cut statement. We are calling up men for the needs we have. What more does my hon. friend want? Will he particularize?

Mr. GREEN: I am suggesting that the government policy as it has been enunciated by the minister during the last few days shows that the call-up system is gradually being allowed to die out and that we shall be back on a purely voluntary basis.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend wants me to correct him. I will do so now. I will record here that I have not said anything that I know of which justifies that statement.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to have a clear-cut announcement from the minister so that the Canadian people will know what the government has in mind.

Mr. RALSTON: I have been as clear-cut as possible.

Mr. GREEN: The call-up system has a direct bearing on the second question, which is this: what is Canada's policy in the war against Japan? That is another question which needs clarification by the government. The two questions are related because the bulk of the N.R.M.A. army has been on the Pacific coast from the start and these N.R.M.A. men comprise the bulk of the Canadian forces out there. They were sent to replace active service men, who in turn were sent to Europe as reinforcements. This has gone so far that units which were raised originally in British Columbia have now been depleted of British Columbia men and the replacements are practically all from other parts of Canada. Eventually some of these N.R.M.A. men on the Pacific coast got to Kiska in a task force brigade, a special task force which went there with the Americans and which by the way made a very good name for itself. They are now back on the Pacific coast along with two other brigades organized in the form of task forces, the three of them making up the sixth division. In the meantime, according to the United States press, some of the American troops who took part in the occupation of Kiska have been fighting in the Marshall islands, and have been partly responsible for the victories there. As I pointed out, Canadian troops are back in Canada.

The minister said on February 14, as reported in Hansard at page 466, the policy of the government in regard to the war against Japan is:

> . . . that no commitments have been made at the present time as to the nature or extent of Canada's participation in the war against Japan.

He went on to say that the army recognized that there is a war on with Japan, and he made much the same statement last year. Here we have the policy of the government duly announced that Canada has no commitments whatever with regard to the war against Japan.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not say that.

Mr. GREEN: I shall read it again:

> . . . that no commitments have been made at the present time as to the nature or extent of Canada's participation in the war against Japan.

Mr. RALSTON: "As to the nature and extent". I want my hon. friend to realize what I am saying. I said, "as to the nature and extent". My hon. friend in the statement he made before he read the passage the second time said, "no commitments had been made with regard to the war against Japan". I said that was incorrect. I said, "that no commitments have been made at the present time as to the nature and extent of our participation".

Mr. GREEN: I do not want to be unfair to the minister; I admit that he said that.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not care about my hon. friend being unfair. I want him at least to be direct.

Mr. GREEN: Well, the minister seemed to be caring a whole lot; I do not know what is the matter with him. At any rate we can all agree on this one fact, that sooner or later Canadians will be fighting in the Pacific. There should be a clear-cut policy on this question and it should be announced by the government. We should not be stood off with a statement that we have no commitments at the moment as to just how, when and where we are going to fight the Japanese. There are certain features with regard to Canada's position in the Pacific which should be considered very carefully by the government. First of all there is this fact that steadily the united nations are closing in on Japan. For example, it has been announced in the press that British troops either are now in Australia or will be there shortly. Canada, of course, has her own job of work to do in the Pacific war. I think it should be borne in mind that Canada cannot wait until the war in Europe is over before she does anything about the war against the Japanese. Take, for example, the question of what troops are to be used against the Japanese. I suggest to the committee that it is unfair to expect our men to come back after fighting and defeating Germany and then go out to fight the Japanese. After all, our army is a citizen army. When the men come back to Canada they will not be very keen about being rushed right to the other end of the country and sent to fight the Japanese. Furthermore, they are not trained for that type of warfare; they are not trained for jungle fighting or the type of fighting they would face in that part of the world.

Another side of the picture is that this N.R.M.A. army is available here in Canada. Certainly the units on the Pacific coast are trained and equipped for fighting the Japanese. Actually, as the minister admitted the other day, some of the units there have volunteered to fight the Japanese, although under present government policy they cannot be sent abroad to fight either the Germans or the Japanese. If some of these troops were sent out across the Pacific there are ample reinforcements among the N.R.M.A. troops to keep the units up to strength.

Another feature is this: the minister made quite a play the other night about not wanting to send to Great Britain any troops who were not volunteers. He did not want to mix the volunteers and the N.R.M.A. men. If the government persists in that policy it means that none of these N.R.M.A. men will ever go to Europe. On the other hand, if they are sent to the Pacific there need be no reason to mix the two forces. I realize, and the other members of the committee realize that for the government to send the N.R.M.A. forces to the Pacific it would be necesasry first of all for the government to decide to do this, and then under the present policy to ask parliament for approval of such action. I believe that N.R.M.A. men should be made available for service anywhere in the world; that is my personal belief, but I suggest that the government should give further consideration, at least, to making these men available for fighting against the Japanese. These are the two questions on which I should like to have some further information from the minister. They are of vital importance. They go to the root of our whole war effort in the coming year, and I would ask him to give us a clear-cut announcement as to what the government has in mind on these two questions.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the last question my hon. friend referred to, namely, Canada's participation in the war against Japan, I repeat, what I said before, that Canada as a Pacific power will remain in the war until Japan is subjugated. My hon. friend knows perfectly well, and the committee knows, that we cannot make any statement to him as to the nature and extent of Canada's participation of air forces, navy and army. I am not making any statement about that; my hon. friend would not expect it. I really do not see just what he is driving at. The point is that three brigades are on the west coast, as my hon. friend says. There, they have alternative roles; one role is to train for any necessity which may arise in connection with the Pacific situation; another role is to be, as I mentioned the other night, a backlog for reinforcements for overseas should the necessity arise and action be taken. Another role is—and it is a lesser role, it is true, just now, but a role which my hon. friend himself was most vociferous in advocating only one and a half years ago—for the defence of the Pacific coast.

Mr. GREEN: That was quite right. I do not think the minister would question the wisdom of that.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has a very short memory. Now he says that these people are absolutely useless.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say they are absolutely useless.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has suggested it—

Mr. GREEN: I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no question of privilege at all. My hon. friend was suggesting that they were absolutely useless and that they ought to be sent somewhere.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a questior of privilege.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The minister has the floor and it is up to him to—

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has not the floor when a question of privilege is raised.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. GRAYDON: A question of privilege has precedence over everything else.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member explain his question of privilege?

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member rose to a question of privilege.

Mr. GREEN: The question of privilege is this. The minister says that in the course of my remarks I said that these N.R.M.A. men were useless. I did not say that at all; I said just the opposite. I said that they had made a name for themselves at Kiska and I advocated the government changing its policy so that these men could be sent to fight against the Japanese. The minister has no right whatever to say that I stated they were useless.

Mr. RALSTON: I had a right to say what the effect of my hon. friend's statement was, namely, that out there they were useless. My hon. friend wanted them sent either against Japan or overseas. That was the effect of what my hon. friend said. I am calling his attention to the fact that they are on the Pacific coast, the place where he was so anxious to have twice as many troops or three times as many troops a short time ago.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say they were useless there.

Mr. RALSTON: That was the effect of it; that we had better send them somewhere. I say they have that possible role of activities in the Pacific. They also have another role, as I said the other night, of constituting a backlog for the purpose of reinforcing the troops overseas should the occasion arise and the necessary action be taken.

Mr. GREEN: And should the government change its policy.

Mr. RALSTON: They have a third role; that is, the defence of the Pacific coast, and a fourth, which is always possible for troops in Canada, namely, in aid to the civil power. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that these men are training to be used wherever they may be needed.

Mr. GREEN: They are trained already.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend seems to know a great deal more about the army than I do. I know about their training; I have reports from the general officer commanding-in-chief of the Pacific command in regard to it. If my hon. friend knew anything about soldiering, as I think he does, he would realize perfectly well that a man is never fully trained, that in soldiering you go on and on, and that if a man does not keep on training, in a very short time he can become stale and require a good while to get into shape for soldiering again.

That is all I have to say about the Japanese situation. With regard to the N.R.M.A., my hon. friend rose to correct me when I said that in effect his statement was that these troops on the Pacific were useless. I did not rise to correct him when he made the statement that I had admitted the other night that the N.R.M.A. army would gradually go out of sight. I never said anything of the kind. I do not look for the N.R.M.A. men in the army to "die out" as he put it. I said yesterday that at the end of this year we shall still have about as many men as we have at the present time, which is between sixty and seventy thousand. That is a fairly sizable lot of men. It certainly does not show much shrinkage.

Mr. GREEN: Does that include—

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to finish. As I say, that is not a very great shrinkage. And I said with regard to them, as I said with regard to the general service men in Canada, that our army in Canada is on a maintenance basis, just as the munitions and supply programme is on a maintenance basis both here and in the United States. That is what is happening all over; we have built up our capital commitments; we have formed our units; we have provided our initial equipment; from now on the maintenance is what is necessary, and by "maintenance" I mean taking care of reinforcements and wastage. I have not any clear-cut statement to make with regard to the N.R.M.A. beyond what I have already said. That is to say, we expect to get about twelve thousand men this year for the purpose of relieving general service personnel in order that they may be released to go overseas, if required, as reinforcements; and the N.R.M.A. personnel in Canada will be used for the duties we have for them here and any other duties for which they are trained and which it may be decided to assign to them. So far as I know there is nothing more to be said in that connection.

My hon. friend said something else that I did not quite understand. He spoke of N.R.M.A. men being released or discharged to industry, and he said the minister knew there would be more and more demand from industry for these men. My own idea is that probably there will be less demand from industry this year than previously. From what I hear, industry is not going so full out as it was, by any means, and it is quite possible that men may be released from industry instead of more men being taken on. I did not quite follow my hon. friend's meaning when he made that statement.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to mention another fact which was brought out by the hon. member for Vancouver South and which I find very hard to understand; perhaps he can explain it or perhaps the minister will clarify the situation. The hon. member said that the N.R.M.A. men on the west coast are willing to go to Europe but are prevented from doing so because they belong to that portion of our army which is made up of those recruits. I understood the hon. member to say that the government is preventing these men from going to Europe. I always understood that a recruit who belonged to the N.R.M.A. was at liberty to sign for overseas, and that as soon as he did so he became part of the active army and no one could prevent him from going overseas. I should like to be clear as to that.

Mr. GREEN: I am afraid the hon. member misunderstood me. I said that at least some of the N.R.M.A. units—I think those that went to Kiska—have volunteered to go and fight in the Pacific. They did not volunteer to fight in Europe, but were willing to fight in the Pacific; but that because they would not volunteer to go and fight in Europe, therefore they could not be sent to the Pacific unless the government changed its present policy, under which these N.R.M.A. men cannot be sent abroad without the formal approval of this house. Now does the hon. member understand?

Mr. DUPUIS: I do not understand why these men could not be sent anywhere in the world if they signed for service in the active army.

Mr. KNOWLES: This afternoon the minister and I were discussing, among other things, the question of transportation to the place of residence in the case of men discharged at their own request. It seemed to me that considerable confusion developed and that, as the record now stands, that confusion might go beyond this house. I feel that I should place on the record a portion of the letter I referred to this afternoon, which came to me from the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, who is now in his place, and perchance we can see whether or not there is any difference in the regulations as among the three services.

Mr. RALSTON: I would appreciate that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I quote from the letter I received from the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services under date of February 7 of this year:

> . . . I may say that our Canadian naval regulations provide that when a rating or officer is discharged for reasons other than "at his own request" he may be granted transportation and subsistence to the place at which he was living in Canada at the time of entry, or to his intended place of residence in Canada, if the conveyance thereto costs no more.
> However, when an officer or rating is discharged "at his own request" no transportation is granted.

I call attention to this sentence:

> Similar regulations apply in the other two services.

I quote further:

> In addition to this he also receives a clothing allowance to provide him with civilian clothing. The amount of this allowance was formerly $35 but was raised to $65 by a naval order passed on the 25th of December, 1943. A rehabilitation grant, amounting to one month's pay and allowances, is also provided on discharge, except in cases where the discharge is made at the rating's own request. All these regulations are general in the three services.

I call attention to the next paragraph:

> I do not think treasury board would approve of a change in the regulations to provide for the paying of transportation in cases where the application for discharge was made by the rating himself.

That is signed by the minister. As I understood the Minister of National Defence this afternoon, however, he said that, under a recent regulation affecting the army, transportation is provided to the original place of residence, or in some cases to a newly chosen place of residence, even for men discharged at their own request. I should like some reconciliation between the statement that this has been done in the case of the army, and the statement by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services doubting whether treasury board would agree to such a request. I hope the Minister of National Defence was correct in what he told me this afternoon and, that being so, that the same regulation will be made to apply in the other two services.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I can only say to my hon. friend that, as to the army regulations on this or on any other point, what I say cannot be taken as against the view of the minister of that department. My impression was that the three services had the same regulation with regard to men discharged at their own request, and that transportation was not provided in such cases. But if the Minister of National Defence now says that the army does provide transportation in those cases, then that settles the matter so far as the army is concerned, and I was in error in my statement of what was army practice.

Mr. KNOWLES: When those regulations were changed with respect to the army, since we are dealing in general terms with national defence, may I ask whether the regulations were also changed with respect to the navy and the air force, and, if not, why not?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall have to answer that, because we have a solemn agreement between the three services that none of us shall put forward any recommendation for a change in pay and allowances, or benefits of that kind, without consulting the other.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would expect that.

Mr. RALSTON: And if it was not done in this case, then it must be the fault of the army. This change is made effective on January 26, 1944, and appears in section 210 of financial regulations and instructions. It provides what I read to my hon. friend this afternoon, namely:

210 (1) An officer or soldier, other than one who is a member of the permanent active militia and in respect of whom provision is made by article 208 of these regulations shall, on ceasing to serve with the force or on being discharged therefrom be entitled to transportation and travelling expenses, except as provided in paragraph (2) below.

(a) If residing in Canada immediately prior to becoming a member of the force.

(i) To the place in Canada where he was residing immediately prior to his appointment or enlistment, or

(ii) To any other place in Canada if the cost of the journey does not exceed the expenses authorized in (a) (i).

It will be noted that it states "except as provided" in paragraph 2. Paragraph 2 says:

(2) An officer or soldier who leaves the force for the purpose of joining any other of His Majesty's forces or an allied force shall not be entitled to transportation or travelling expenses.

So that exception does not cover the case of a man who was discharged at his own request.

Mr. KNOWLES: So far as the army is concerned it is perfectly clear that the man discharged at his own request is covered.

Mr. RALSTON: He is not excepted, to put it in another way.

Mr. KNOWLES: And did that request receive the approval of the treasury board?

Mr. RALSTON: Of the privy council, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I take the opportunity at this time of calling it to the attention of the other two defence ministers.

Mr. POWER: In all probability it went into effect for the air force when it did for the army, unless we had some particular or very special reason against it. The Minister of National Defence has said there is a sort of agreement among the ministers that no service will give greater advantage by way of pay and allowances to its personnel. Then there is an inter-service committee. It is a very complicated matter. This inter-service committee is sitting almost constantly, and all those things must go to the committee of the three services. Normally there is a joint submission made to council and treasury board by the three services.

I cannot say off hand whether we have adopted that regulation, which the army seems to have put into effect on January 26. But I would be very much surprised if we have not. And if we have not there must be a very good reason for our not doing it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister look into it?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I should like to make a short statement concerning a matter raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Parkdale. Let me say first of all that the hon. member endeavoured to raise this question before the orders of the day were called. Mr. Speaker, however, ruled that he would have to place his question on the order paper, and I assumed he would follow Mr. Speaker's direction and place his question on either the order paper for tomorrow, or that of some subsequent day.

I was not in the house this afternoon at the time the hon. member returned to the question he had attempted to raise earlier in the afternoon. He returned to it while the estimates of the Minister of National Defence were under discussion, and read a telegram to the effect that corvettes were delayed in sailing from Quebec, on account of the prevalence of venereal disease. I doubt if my hon. friend was in order in bringing up the matter under army estimates, and I doubt if, strictly speaking, I am in order now in making reply to it. But I do feel that the suggestion the hon. member has made should be corrected, at least so far as the navy is concerned.

From the fact that the question was adressed to me I should gather the suggestion to be that corvettes could not sail because of the prevalence of venereal disease among members of the naval service. If that is the suggestion I should like to say I have been in touch in the last hour or two with those in the naval department who are in charge of operations, who direct the operations of our ships, and I found that the last corvette sailing from Quebec sailed on December 26, or nearly two months ago. I also asked the operations branch whether they had any knowledge of any corvettes being delayed at any time at Quebec for the cause mentioned by the hon. member for Parkdale, and I was informed definitely that no delay at Quebec could be attributed to this cause.

But, in order to make assurance doubly sure I instructed the operations branch to go further and to communicate by telephone with Surgeon-Lieut-Commander C. M. Kirk, who is senior medical officer at Quebec. Doctor Kirk is a medical man of mature years, a man of wide experience and, I think, of very great ability. He has been at Quebec since January 15, 1943—now more than thirteen months. Therefore he must be taken to be fully familiar with medical conditions among navy personnel at that point, at least for the last thirteen months.

The direct question was put to Doctor Kirk, the Surgeon-Lieutenant-Commander, in these words: "Were any ships delayed at Quebec because of venereal disease?" To this question Doctor Kirk replied categorically, "No".

I hope that this disposes of the suggestion, one which in a certain measure I regard as reflecting upon the navy personnel at Quebec. If that was the suggestion, I hope it is disposed of now. I wish to say that, so far as I know, neither at Quebec nor elsewhere has any ship at any time had to delay its sailing for the reason referred to in the telegram read to the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, may I thank the minister for his statement, which I am pleased he has been able to give, in which he denies the newspaper report that evidently inspired the telegram to which I referred in the house. This newspaper report will be found in the Montreal Star of February 15, and it occured to me that I was doing a distinct service in giving the minister an opportunity of replying to this at the earliest possible moment, instead of allowing it to stand for a couple more days.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let him finish his statement; he has the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Are you running this house?

Mr. GRAYDON: No, but you are not going to run it either. No more interruptions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You started the interruptions.

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

Mr. POWER: Why should we not interrupt? My hon. friend does not rise from his seat.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He never gets up when he interrupts. If he wants it, he can have it.

Mr. GRAYDON: That goes double, for over here.

Mr. ROWE: The government must be getting pretty jittery when two ministers have to keep bobbing up and down.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask that the hon. member be allowed to make his statement.

Mr. BRUCE: I quote:

Lengthy reports—

Mr. GOLDING: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. There is a rule of this house which prevents the reading of articles from newspapers, and I want to read to you what happened—

Mr. ROWE: What is the point of order?

Mr. GOLDING: I want to read what happened—

Mr. GRAYDON: The member has a right to raise a point of order, but he must state what the point of order is.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has raised a point of order.

Mr. GOLDING: The ruling was given in a debate in this house on March 17, 1933. Mr. Woodsworth had read an article from the Montreal Herald of January 19, 1933, and also an article from the Montreal Gazette of the same date. Mr. Bennett took exception to the reading of such articles from the press, and in his argument Mr. Bennett, at page 3105 of Hansard, contended that there were 245 members of the house and that by the reading of articles from magazines and newspapers an attempt was made to introduce the 246th member, and this voice had no place in this assembly.

Mr. POWER: Cheers for Bennett.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My Lord!

Mr. GOLDING: After a full discussion, the Speaker ruled it was not permissible to read articles from newspapers and magazines.

Mr. ROWE: Your leader has been reading speeches ever since.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, as I understand the statement made by the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), the ruling had reference to something that occurred on the orders of the day. The hon. member for Parkdale to-night was asked to give the source of his information, which he has a right to do.

Mr. FACTOR: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. As the minister for naval services indicated, the hon. member for Parkdale is utterly out of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. FACTOR: Just a minute. Since he has become a big shot the leader of the opposition does not want anyone else to speak.

Mr. GRAYDON: Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. FACTOR: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that a discussion of naval affairs is entirely out of order in this debate, but the hon. member for Parkdale made a statement dragging in the navy. The minister has replied, and I submit that no further discussion of that matter should be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, the committee realizes that we are dealing with matters having to do with this war. All I have before me is the resolution covering the activities of the army, navy and air force. It was decided that wide discussion should be allowed. I have, however, on various occasions tried to confine the discussion to what is before the chair, but it has been difficult because evidently it was the committee's wish to have a general discussion.

Mr. BRUCE: I continue to quote:

> Lengthy reports, including statistics, were submitted by representatives of the navy, army and air force, naval representatives on two occasions referring to the fact that infection of naval personnel in Quebec city twice had resulted in preventing corvettes going to sea to take their places in convoys sailing from Halifax.

Mr. QUELCH: May I ask the Minister of National Defence if any steps have been taken to establish convalescent homes in western Canada? I ask because I understand that the government of Alberta offered the use of government house free of charge for the duration of the war and six months afterwards to the Department of Pensions and National Health as a convalescent home. I understand that the Department of Pensions and National Health referred the matter to the Department of National Defence. Has the minister any information on that?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know that the name makes any difference, but we endeavour to give a name that comes more closely to describing the functions of these establishments. The army has established a casualty retraining centre, which is in the nature of a convalescent home, in British Columbia. The army has no other retraining centre that I remember until we get down to the one at Oakville, Ontario. The army has found it quite impracticable to establish convalescent homes in each province. It is felt that these retraining centres must be able to give an opportunity not only for treatment but for training as well, and it is not only much more economical but much better, from an administrative and training point of view, as well as from the point of view of morale, to have large concentrations in a few places rather than a number of small, scattered convalescent homes. The rule we have made is that there should be no fewer than two hundred at any retraining centre.

I want to say here that the department appreciates very much indeed quite a number of offers which have been made by private citizens to place their homes at the disposal of the department for use as convalescent homes. These offers have not been accepted for the reason that we believe, because of the overhead and lack of training facilities, greater efficiency is obtained by concentrating more patients at one point, that that is much more desirable from the point of view of the service itself and the morale of these men.

Mr. QUELCH: What is the size of the home in British Columbia?

Mr. RALSTON: It has over two hundred. It is the Harrison Hot Springs hotel.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In the last two years some questions have been asked, when the minister's estimates were before the house, with reference to the Wassermann test. The minister said that this was under consideration. First, is the test being given to men entering the army? Second, is it being given periodically to men after they enter the army—every six months, or every year? Third, can the minister give the rate per thousand men, or on whatever basis the army keep their statistics, of venereal disease in Canada and in Great Britain? The reason why I particularly ask the question is that I was somewhat perturbed in reading British medical journals to see that there is concern in Great Britain about the increase in venereal disease. I should like to know if that has affected the rate as regards Canadian troops in Britain; if so, what steps are being taken to combat it; and are Wassermann tests being given to men in Great Britain?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the figures for Great Britain. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Parkdale asked me with regard to the steps which were being taken in the army to combat venereal disease, and I said that I would make a statement. I only had an opportunity for a very few minutes before I came into the house to get together a few facts. I am not giving them to the committee as at all complete, but perhaps the committee would be interested in the activities in which we have engaged. I am giving figures only as far as the army is concerned, but I believe that very shortly statistics will be available for all the three services.

May I say at the beginning that the three armed services are determined in every way possible, if not to stamp out, at least to minimize the incidence of this disease. It certainly causes more loss in man-days than any other one cause in the armed forces, and a determined attempt has been made, particularly during the last year, and I am speaking of the whole of last year, to deal with this matter. The lid is off. We use films with the troops, and I will indicate to the committee some other steps which we take in this regard.

I wish to preface what I say with the remark that the most important factor in connection with combatting this disease is, as hon. members understand, getting at the source of infection in civilian communities. It is of no use for the army alone to take preventive or curative measures; the point is that we have to obtain the cooperation of the civilian authorities; and, as indicated in this report, there has been a marked improvement this year in that respect.

The army took the matter up in a special way—I mean, made it a separate study altogether—in December, 1942. We then procured the services of Lieutenant-Colonel D. H. Williams, whom we appointed army venereal disease control officer. Colonel Williams had organized a very successful four-year campaign in British Columbia against venereal diseases. An officer trained in this particular branch of medicine was placed in each military district with a sub-staff of other ranks who were trained specially for the organization. That is to say, it was not left solely to the regular medical staff, but Colonel Williams had divisional officers in each district with a sub-staff for the purpose of dealing with this matter. They gave attention to setting up a basic policy of treatment. Colonel Williams consulted with the national research council of the United States, with the American army, and a specialist at Johns Hopkins university, to set up standards of treatment for the Canadian army. The ordinary treatment was too cumbersome to fit in with army activities.

For instance, the standard time for the treatment of syphilis had been eighteen months. A system of intensified treatment was instituted, which could be completed in one-third of that time. Before this programme, all gonorrhea patients had been going into hospital with a tremendous loss of duty time and cost of hospitalization. Under the new programme all patients are initially treated while on duty; they continue on duty training and, speaking generally, excellent results are obtained. There are, of course, a certain proportion of patients who do not respond to this type of treatment and who require hospital treatment and attention, and this is being provided to all who need it.

Until the system was revised, there was always the possibility of a V.D.S. patient, that is a syphilis patient, missing his treatment on account of being transferred or moved from one post to another, with the result of delaying the cure and prolonging the disability, with the consequent loss of time, and, what was much more important, the possibility of a permanent disability being incurred.

Under the revised system a rigid control was put into force by a system of records and supervision, so that, wherever the man went, the venereal disease control officer at that station had notice of his arrival and of his condition, and the system of treatment was continued without interruption there.

Previously—and this answers my hon. friend's first question—as I have indicated to the committee before, a blood test on entering the army was not mandatory. That was changed and every man entering the army is now given a blood test immediately after enlistment. This afforded a means for detecting infected cases immediately and instituting the regular regime of treatment.

The result of these tests has been perhaps more gratifying than would be expected. It has shown—and I may say that the mandatory test has not been in effect very long, because we had to make arrangements with all the provincial laboratories to cooperate with us before this could be done—that less than one per cent of the number that have been tested are suffering from V.D.S. when entering the army.

What I have said indicates very sketchily some of the measures taken to improve conditions. The results are already evident. The rate of venereal disease for the army as a whole during 1942 was 38 per 1,000. For the whole year 1943 it was reduced to 32 per 1,000. This may not sound to the public like a very striking decrease, but I am advised by the officers concerned that it is in their opinion extremely significant; it is a reduction of about sixteen per cent, and marks a genuine improvement in conditions.

So far I have spoken of the activities in the army. The committee will realize, however, that the real work has to be done among the civilian population, since that is the source of infection.

Steps were taken to investigate in every case the source of infection and to turn over immediately to the civilian health department the information obtained, for action by them. Obviously the problem could not be solved by the armed services alone. It was a joint task of civilian authorities and of the armed forces.

As part of the programme, close liaison has been established among the armed services, the Department of Pensions and National Health and the provincial health departments; and each of the three services and these federal and provincial health departments is pooling its resources and experience to put into effect and carry out measures worked out in collaboration to deal with the disease in the communities where it has its source.

Obviously, the major target against which this campaign was directed was the brothels and other unsavoury community conditions. There is no doubt that there has been a marked increase in the attention given to this matter by the civilian authorities, and it is hoped and believed that the records and information which the armed services have been able to furnish have given stimulus to their efforts and helped them to focus attention on the conditions which were perpetuating the scourge among the civilian population.

I have spoken here only of the activities of the army, of the one service, but I can say that the resources of all three services have been put forward as a team, with what I regard as very gratifying success.

My hon. friend asked me as to whether the Wasserman test is given again. I cannot give my hon. friend that information at the moment.

The third question which I think he asked was, what were the figures in Great Britain? I shall have to get that for my hon. friend, and I shall do so.

Mr. ADAMSON: For a few minutes I wish to discuss casualties other than venereal. The annual army debate centres on two fundamental issues: first, our reinforcements, and, second, the use of the N.R.M.A. army, The minister has stated, and the committee will accept the statement, that the reinforcement situation is satisfactory, and that the use of the N.R.M.A. army is also satisfactory so far as he is concerned. All I can say is that I trust his hope is justified. The casualties for the campaign in Italy came out tonight, 36,626 British and 28,741 Americans, or a total of approximately 65,400 in five and a half months. That just about equals the total casualties the British army suffered the first day of the Somme.

The point I want to make is this. We must be prepared to find the attack on the western defences of Germany a great deal tougher than anything we have yet experienced, and we must also be prepared to find that the core of German resistance will be considerably toughened. It is extremely dangerous not to be prepared for these casualties, and I hope that the minister, when he says that the reinforcement situation is satisfactory, has really given great thought to this matter. I hope that he has not glossed over the most serious part of the task ahead of us.

There are two or three things which I think should be brought up at this time. The first is the immediate problem of the district depots, the demobilization and repatriation of the troops in the disposal wings of the district depots. It is one of the most serious problems facing the country to-day. There is no place where the soul of a man decays as much as where he is waiting around a district depot with nothing to do awaiting discharge. There develops a condition of anhedonia where every fatigue becomes a burden and every parade is an irritation. Furthermore, if these men are not put to work reasonably soon we shall be faced with a problem where a great many of them will not work again. I am not alone in that statement. That is the opinion of a great many people who have made a study of this very question.

I suggest to the minister that some immediate thought should be given to the establishment, possibly at one of the R.A.F. centres which will be closed, of a civilian training centre so that, instead of keeping these men in the district depot, they be sent where there will be an opportunity for them to study a civilian trade. And that should be done at once. We are up against it. This is a very serious matter, particularly in No. 2 district depot. This is one of the things that should be done immediately.

Next the minister brought up the case of a number of surplus officers. Admittedly there are a number of surplus officers. I do not know whether it is true, but I have heard that there are 700 spare majors around Canada. That is the common story. If you have no use for an officer it is unfair to keep him with nothing to do. I believe these extra officers should be given an opportunity now—I do not suggest that this should be retroactive—so that those who are willing to leave the army should not be penalized by being disallowed their bonus or army-leaving grant. That is an essential matter at this time.

There is much opposition from officers in the army who are thinking of getting out because they feel there is nothing for them to do. They do not want to leave because, if they leave on their own request, they do not come in for the bonus payment which is given to the man who is normally retired. I suggest that the minister should consider that point. That is my second point.

I would ask the minister a question with regard to the function of certain parts of the army overseas. We have a corps with headquarters in Italy; we have a corps with headquarters in England; we have an army headquarters in England. But besides that we have a Canadian military headquarters in England. In other words, we have three headquarters in England. I do not know whether it is possible, but it would seem to me that if there is any possibility of reuniting the two corps of the Canadian army, an army set-up will be needed. If there is a chance of reuniting them, then the Canadian military headquarters in London is the fifth wheel to the coach. We could deal through national defence headquarters direct with the army and C.M.H.Q. would become for a great many purposes redundant and merely an extra establishment in connection with the overseas army set-up. A great deal of money could be saved by dealing directly with the army, because after all Great Britain is an operational field still, and if the two corps are not united we could deal directly with them. That is a suggestion regarding which I would ask the minister for his opinion.

There is a third question which concerns a matter that I have brought to his attention. Perhaps it should be taken up under pay and allowances, but I bring it up here because I think it should be aired in the house. If a soldier of the Canadian army personnel is undergoing detention, after a period of six months the dependents' allowance is cut off from his dependents. We are unique in Canada in this respect. No matter how long a man is in detention in Great Britain, Australia or New Zealand, dependents' allowances continue to be paid. The situation in Canada is one of the greatest hardships that the dependents can possibly face. Through no fault of theirs the man is kept in the army gaol and their whole source of sustenance is cut off. I have seen a number of cases. I have one in my hand now and it is one of the most tragic cases I have known. The entire family has been forced virtually to go on relief because of a misdemeanour of the husband. It was a simple act of striking a military policeman, which, of course, must be punished, but the consequent hardship imposed on the family constitutes one of the greatest injustices Canadians are suffering under the present act. I ask the minister to consider amending the regulations so that the penalty imposed on men justifiably, because of some crime they have committed, will not reflect itself on their dependents. It is extremely bad for the morale of the people at home as well as the soldiers overseas.

I had intended to bring up the question of hospital allowances, but I shall wait until the next item comes up because it is rather long and involved.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. GILLIS: No. I shall not take more than a minute. Last evening someone discussed with the minister the fact that in most of the depots there is an accumulation of men awaiting discharge. May I make a suggestion to the minister? My information is that it is not national defence that is at fault in discharging men. The trouble is with pensions and national health. That department is understaffed. National defence is handling the men satisfactorily, but because pensions and national health are not able to take them as they are boarded out through the depots there is a backlog piling up. Is there a possibility of using in the Department of Pensions and National Health some of the examining personnel in the Department of National Defence in order to break the jam that apparently is developing in some of the depots. That would partly solve the problem that the member for York West raised, that there is a large number of officers in the depots with apparently nothing to do, who are considering the possibility of getting out. It seems to me that is one place where the minister might be able to use them to advantage by lending them to the Department of Pensions and National Health in the meantime. I merely offer that as a suggestion.

Item agreed to.

2. Pay and allowances, $547,256,061.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to mention a matter that has been mentioned before. I feel very strongly about this. I refer to the fact that when men are away without leave in Canada as well as overseas their wives have been getting along with the pay and allowances and have made certain commitments, and all of a sudden, without any notice whatever, the allowance is cut off. It means that their children have to go without clothes and without food. If it had not been for the children's aid societies throughout Canada many of these children would have suffered and some would have starved. These people hesitate to go on relief because they feel it is a disgrace to have perhaps a husband or a son absent without leave. Some of these cases run for months. In fact, I know of one that is over a year old. That family is still being taken care of by the children's aid society. I believe that when men are away without leave some means should be found for looking after the family, giving them something to carry on with.

Mr. RALSTON: Does that mean, absent without leave.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, absent without leave. There are many such cases, as the minister knows. Dependents' allowances are immediately cut off. There are also cases where a husband is overseas and there is a child born in the family here. The allowance is then cut off and the other children naturally suffer. There should be some adjustment there. At the present time the mother's allowance is cut off immediately.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not follow my hon. friend. I thought he was speaking of cases of dependents' allowances paid to dependents of those who were A.W.O.L.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend knows what the practice is. I discussed it last year. The practice is that if a man goes absent without leave, dependents' allowance, plus the assigned pay, is continued for twenty-one days. If the soldier was in Canada payment then ceased. My hon. friend is right about that. Overseas the dependents' allowance board have taken advantage of a pretty general sort of section and they have felt that they could do more than that. What they do is this. When a man overseas is absent without leave they give dependents' allowance for three months. Then they make inquiries, but three months is the limit. Overseas they give dependents' allowance for three months in the case of a man absent without leave. If he goes absent without leave longer than that, dependents' allowance ceases to be paid.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What I am getting at is this. The wife at home does not know anything about the husband being absent without leave. She continues to get her cheque, but perhaps does not hear from her husband and suddenly the cheque is cut off. There should be some way of notifying the wife. I know it is an awfully ticklish job and something that is pretty hard to do. But the wife should be notified that her allowance will be cut off unless the husband is found, or the son in the case of a mother. I know it is something that the minister hesitates about. I do not know how it could be worked out, but there should be something there to look after the family. Does the minister understand what I mean?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, it is a case of the humanities. One would not want to notify her at once because of the hope that he might turn up, or for fear she might get the idea that something had gone wrong domestically, or something of that sort, but I agree with my hon. friend that there must come a time, and not too late, when she should have some warning of the fact that this allowance is not going to continue forever. I am told that the dependents' allowance board does make an effort. I shall inquire into it; I think it is just a human touch that might be carried out. I am not quite sure how it could be done; I think it would have to be done differently in individual cases.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes; each case would have to be handled separately. Then how about the illegitimate child; how about the dependents' allowance in that case, where the husband is overseas and there is an illegitimate child born to the wife? The allowance is cut off.

Mr. RALSTON: No; there is no allowance granted if the husband is overseas.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is cut off.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not given. I understand my hon. friend to refer to an illegitimate child born while the husband is overseas?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes. In that case the mother's allowance is cut off.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not automatic; there is always an inquiry into the case. I just happen to remember that, because I had a case on my desk the other day in which the dependents' allowance board wanted to find out about the mother's reputation in the community. Representations were made by responsible citizens that the time had come when they thought the allowance should be paid, and finally the allowance was paid.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is that done in every case now?

Mr. RALSTON: The investigation is made in every case. I am informed also that the husband is consulted; that is, if he knows about it and condones the situation, of course that is an important contributing factor.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In some cases naturally the husband overseas objects, and then I understand the mother does not get the allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I cannot say what the board does in circumstances of that kind. I know it investigates the merits of the case, not only from the point of view of morals but from the point of view of the need, and that in a number of cases payments are made.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In some cases there are other children in the family and it works a hardship on them. The children get their allowance, of course, but the mother does not get hers.

Mr. RALSTON: The children, of course, do get the allowance.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Their allowance keeps on, but the mother's $35 is immediately cut off.

Mr. RALSTON: The other children get the allowance; that is to say the children who were in the home when the husband went away, and some increase is made in their allowance.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Not in all cases.

Mr. RALSTON: In some cases. It may be done; the board has discretion.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But the minister will look into the question of men overseas who are away without leave?

Mr. RALSTON: A note has been made of that.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I do not altogether agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough West. In the case of a woman whose husband overseas is absent without leave it seems to me a most unfair proposition that the woman who is left in Canada should be told after a while that her cheque will not be forthcoming any more. After all is said and done, if that man had not had to go to war perhaps he and his wife would have lived together in this country for many years, in fact all their lives. Many of our men who have had to live in England for two or three years now may find themselves in the position that they are seeking other companionship, and it is a terrible situation for all concerned.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

But I do not see why the woman left in this country should be penalized on that account. In my opinion any woman whose husband is in that position should at least receive her cheque until the war is over and her husband is brought back again, when the army authorities can find out what relationship is to be maintained in the future. It may be that these men will resume living with their wives in this country. They may not, but in the interval those women are certainly entitled to protection because this country needs their men somewhere else, in England or some other theatre of war, and they should have their cheques until the war is over.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I agree with what the hon. member has just said: I think it would be wonderful if the dependents' allowance board would do that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): But she does not agree with you.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know that; some ladies do not agree with me. My idea was that if the dependents' allowance were not going to be continued, they should let the wife know some time before the cheque was to be stopped, and I think the hon. member will agree with that.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Quite so.

Mr. RALSTON: She does not want that time to come, though.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member is quite right; I agree that the dependents' allowance board would be doing a wonderful thing if they would continue the payment of those allowances until the end of the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: When I made way for the hon. member for North Battleford I realized that she would make a much more eloquent appeal in this matter than I could, but I think we should lend whatever emphasis we can to the plea made by the hon. member and supported by the hon. member for Peterborough West. I think this is a matter to which the minister should give attention as soon as possible. I have never been able to see why, because a soldier or a sailor or an airman is absent without leave, the wife at home should have to suffer. It is not her fault; it cannot be traced in any way, directly or indirectly, to her. In our regulations with respect to dependents' allowances we recognize that while a man is away from home in the forces, this country has an obligation to look after his wife and family, meagre though that assistance may be in some instances. The principle has been adopted under which she is taken care of financially to a certain extent. Surely that principle is not interfered with because of something the husband does. I could readily understand that something the wife might do would interfere with her allowance being granted, but surely we could not argue that something the wife did here should interfere with the pay of the man overseas. If that be a sound argument, then of course we ought to apply it in reverse as well. Therefore I am going to ask the minister if he will not give consideration to some change in the regulations so that the wives of those men who have gone absent without leave may have their allowances continued until the end of the war, as suggested by the hon. member for North Battleford. I cannot make that plea too emphatic at this time. I think most hon. members have had some distressing cases brought to their attention in this regard, and I should be surprised if most hon. members would not lend their support to this suggestion. I do not wish to labour the point at the moment, but I should like to impress upon the minister as strongly as possible that this is one change in the regulations to which the government ought to give immediate consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to be on the defensive in connection with this matter but, as is usual in cases of this kind, it is not quite as obvious as it may appear. I have been affected in the same way as my hon. friend has by the apparent merit of a case of this kind, and it has merit. It is an appealing case; there is no doubt about that. In the first place, however, we have to come back to the theory of dependents' allowances. Dependents' allowance is not granted as compensation to a wife because she has lost the comfort of or association with her husband. It is paid to the wife in order to promote the well-being of the service, and to relieve the anxiety which husbands overseas would have, if such payment were not being made. Instead of the payment being made to him over there, he knows it is getting to her, and the provisions in the dependents' allowance regulations sets that out. It states:

> A dependents' allowance may not be claimed as a right. The allowance is for the purpose of promoting the well-being and efficiency of the military forces of Canada by providing a means to alleviate the financial anxieties of temporarily enrolled members with respect to the domestic welfare of dependents while they are in the service of His Majesty.

That is the first point. The second point that the committee does have to remember is that if a man can just go absent without leave, not having any worries at all about his family, then certainly there is no disciplinary effect whatsoever. He just simply goes. There must be some deterrent effect, encouraging his staying, or causing him to stay, in the service if he knows his family will suffer if he goes out. If a man could simply walk out and say, "Oh, I know the government will take care of my family anyway, notwithstanding the fact that I am not serving", he is no good to the service. He will take dependents' allowance, go absent without leave, avoid the provost corps, and his family be looked after, and he will think, "Well, I am all right."

Mr. GRAYDON: If we take the principle the minister has now stated, are we not really using the condition in which a wife may find herself as a means of disciplining a man in the armed forces?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: Actually there are penalties and regulations within the armed forces to take care of the very situation, without penalizing the wife and children at home.

Mr. RALSTON: No, it is not that, at all. I am saying the argument the other way is that it makes the position entirely too easy for the man, and that is not quite fair to the service which, after all, is the thing of paramount importance. If the provision were that a man could simply go absent without leave and be assured that the dependents' allowance would nevertheless be kept on for his family, it would almost be putting a premium on delinquency or at least it removes a deterrent.

There is one other feature I am surprised someone has not mentioned. I noted it a year ago. Perhaps you may think I have not worked very hard at it, or I should have had something done about it. However, there is a certain inconsistency in this respect that I never could understand. I am saying this in the presence of the chairman of the dependents' board of trustees, namely, that the wife of a man who goes absent without leave will continue to get three months' dependents' allowance at the most, but the wife of the man who is in detention will continue to get the allowance for six months. I never could quite understand why there should be that difference. That caused me to look over United States regulations, and when I have looked at the regulations for that country and for Australia, I find there is a distinct difference in those cases. The theory may be that at least it is positive in the case of the man who is in detention, that the man will come back to the army some day, whereas in respect of the man who is absent without leave he may never turn up again.

I wish I could promise the committee favourable consideration, but I will say that I shall study it again. It might be pointed out, however, that we in the army are just a little bit careful in considering these provisions, particularly in a case of this kind, where a man is not serving, and where he has offended against regulations with the result that we have lost the benefit of his training, and everything else that has been done for him. There is a tendency to break down discipline if one were to act too leniently in these cases. This may sound hard-hearted, because it will be said that the wife is concerned. At the same time it is for the good of the service that we are acting, and it is not much encouragement to the good soldier to "stick it" when he knows that another man can quit and still have his dependents' allowance continued to his family. However, I shall look into the matter again, to see if anything further should be done about it.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would it not be possible for the minister to devise some way whereby the penalty would be imposed against the man?

Mr. RALSTON: If we could find him.

Mr. LOCKHART: There must be military discipline which would make him feel his obligations, rather than penalize those who are at home, who are totally innocent. I cannot see the argument which has been made.

Mr. RALSTON: We are not penalizing. We are not supporting them; that is all.

Mr. TUSTIN: May I add something to what has been said. I have one case in my own constituency concerning a man who has been overseas since 1939. Possibly a year or fifteen months ago he was supposed to be away without leave. His wife received dependents' allowance for ninety days. She has three small children, and since that time has had to depend upon relief payments from the municipality. That man has been absent for much more than a year. He has not yet been apprehended, and, as I have said, his family are now on relief. Surely he should have been apprehended in less than twelve or thirteen months. I point out to the minister that a case of that kind should receive favourable consideration, for the simple reason that this woman believes her husband may have been killed in the blitz over England, and that he has never been a deserter. Perhaps the minister might give consideration to a case of that kind.

Mr. SHAW: There are one or two matters I would draw to the attention of the committee, and in doing so I agree whole-heartedly with the hon. member who has just taken his seat. A couple of cases have been brought to my attention in which soldiers are presumed to have deserted in England. It becomes extremely difficult for one who is probably not personally familiar with the type of organization existing over there to prevent the landing of subversive aliens and to prevent sabotage, to understand how these desertions can continue for so long. We have always been led to believe it would be extremely difficult for a man to be at large in England for a period of eight or nine months or a year, and not be apprehended. I should say a good deal of responsibility must rest upon the military authorities for a man's not having been apprehended in less than ten or twelve months.

Several branches of the legion are keenly concerned about this matter. I would ask the minister to indicate to the committee the number of desertions presumed to have taken place in England, the number of such deserters who have been apprehended, the number who have not been accounted for, and the number who have been discovered dead either through suicide or, as another hon. member has suggested, through the blitz.

Two or three cases have come to my attention where a man, who married a widow with a family, has enlisted. For a period of two or three months that man has not been able to secure dependents' allowance. In each case he was told there was every possibility that those children were illegitimate. That is a most unfair suggestion. I am very much afraid my personal reaction would have been one leading to violence, under conditions of that kind. One soldier who came to me was extremely bitter, as a result of the officer telling him point-blank that there was every reason to believe the children were probably illegitimate. Three months elapsed before that case was cleared up.

Then the minister indicated that where the wife at home has probably not conducted herself as it is believed she should have, inquiries are made in the community. I do not know just what that implies, but I do know that in many instances it is virtually impossible for a soldier's wife to appear at a dance without having some of the community talking about it for a week afterwards. I am very much afraid that if you go into a community and try to secure an impression from some of the people there how a soldier's wife is conducting herself, you may in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred not get a very favourable impression.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not believe anything of the kind. I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. MUTCH: I would have moved if I lived in a community like that.

Mr. SHAW: I base myself on a case in the district of Red Deer.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend bases his statement about ninety-nine people on one particular case.

Mr. SHAW: That is not fair at all. I said to the minister that I would refer to one case that comes to my mind. I am not basing my assertion on the one case at all.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit me, I want to take issue with him at once when he states that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the reports given by neighbours about a soldier's wife would give an unfavourable impression.

Mr. MUTCH: This will make nice reading in England.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not believe anything of the kind. I think it is a slander on the wives of the soldiers.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: It is a slander on the whole community.

Mr. SHAW: I am not particularly impressed by the remarks which I am hearing because they are improperly interpreted. I was a bit concerned when the minister said that we can go into a community and make inquiries. Why should the minister not be more explicit? If I am wrong as to the type of inquiry that is made, I am the first one to admit it. But in cases of this kind where a wife is accused perhaps of not conducting herself as she probably should, I ask, what type of inquiry is made? Who carries on the investigations and what constitutes proof? If a soldier disclaims paternity of a child, do they accept that as evidence? I have a case where that was done. The soldier simply refused to claim the child and the mother has been deprived not only of an allowance for that child but of the separation allowance also. The soldier is stationed within approximately eighty miles of where the home is located. Would the minister comment on the situation with respect to desertions in England?

Mr. RALSTON I have not the figures here. I do not think I should give the figures with regard to desertions in England and the number apprehended; I do not think it would be in the interest of the state to give them. I am sure it is a very small number compared with the desertions in Canada, but I do not think it is a figure I should give in the house. I do not mind giving it to my hon. friend or to any other hon. member privately.

Mr. MUTCH: The whole question of pay and allowances for the forces overseas introduces one aspect about which I should like to say a few words, particularly since the question of soldiers serving detention is linked up with it.

I have had an opportunity to see and interview a considerable number of soldiers under sentence for military crimes, to some extent in this country, but more so on the other side. I wonder if the minister would not be inclined to agree that one of the strong contributing factors to habitual delinquency in the forces is the system of pay deductions, under financial regulations and instructions which have been adopted almost holus-bolus from the British army, and which, so far as I am able to discover, go back to pre-Wellington days in some respects at least, when soldiers were regarded hardly as citizens of the country but were pressed-men and, generally speaking, were less well regarded than they are to-day.

I am satisfied from what observations I have been able to make myself and from conversations with senior officers in the service, particularly in the army, that the problem of habitual delinquency in the army ties up with the system of pay deductions. It is possible for a soldier to go absent without leave, let us say for purposes of illustration, for fourteen days. When he is apprehended he loses his pay for those fourteen days. If he is sentenced by a court-martial, as he is likely to be, if his desertion takes place in the field, he may be fined some additional days pay as part of his punishment, and of course he loses his pay during all the time he is undergoing his court-martial sentence. I do not suggest for a moment that a soldier who, having made a contract with His Majesty to serve in the forces, deserts and fails to perform his duties should be paid for the days he is absent. I do not suggest that a soldier who is punished by undergoing detention, during which time he is unable to perform his military duties, should be paid during the period of his detention. But I do think that some more modern and equitable system could be worked out in the interests of the service itself than the present system under which the soldier, when he has served his sentence and expiated his crime in that manner, comes out of detention owing considerable sums of money so that when he begins to draw pay again he can draw, if he is in England, only thirty shillings a month, which is scarcely enough for cigarettes if the mail is held up, as it often is. And so, finding that he cannot hold up his end with his fellows he commits some army crime again, perhaps steals a pair of army boots or a tin of butter, knowing full well that he will get it in the neck if he is caught, as eventually he must be. I interviewed in England one man who lost 1,191 days' pay for army crimes, and he deserved it. This war will not last long enough for him ever to get what he owed paid off.

If a soldier commits a civilian crime to-day and he is apprehended by the civilian authorities—I know one man who served twelve months in Wormwood Scrubs, which is a rather unpleasant prison—when he comes out he may properly be charged with being absent without leave; being absent as a result of a felony; and, if he is sentenced to serve an additional ninety days by court-martial, that would cause him some further financial difficulties. So that the man who embarks on a career of army crimes is considerably handicapped in his chances of reform by the present archaic system of pay stoppages. I do not wish to labour that point. The minister and the department are fully aware that many highly placed personages in the army, who have never been in detention and are not likely to be, are not sympathetic to the present system and feel that a system more in the interests of the service itself could be devised.

There is another type of thing which I would mention, not as a criticism, but simply to bring it to the attention of the authorities with a view to a remedy being found which would be to the improvement of the service. I know a man personally who at the time he enlisted stated that his wife was his common-law wife and that he had lived with her and supported her for two years, and that as such she was entitled to separation allowance, and he also made over to her assigned pay. About the time I went to England last fall his legal wife, having discovered that he was in the service and that the government might be approached with a view to assisting her financially, did make such a request. I understand that the request was turned down; that she then attacked the arrangement with the common-law wife, on the basis that they had not lived together for the required period of time and that consequently, in this particular case, they had received the assigned pay and separation allowance fraudulently. An investigation was carried on—I am sorry I am not able to say by what agency it was carried on—but I understand that the approach as to whether or not this chap had lived with his common-law wife publicly as such, was made through the near relatives of the man himself, and if so, I am not surprised that they should deny the allegation, since he comes from an exceedingly good family who are very proud of their reputation and would not condone such a thing.

[Mr. Mutch.]

In any event, what I began to take exception to was that, when this sergeant was brought before his commanding officer, under instructions, he was informed that he, having received separation allowance for his common-law wife for a period of two years or thereabouts, obtained it fraudulently, and now owed thirteen hundred and some odd dollars which he would have to pay back out of his share of his pay. When I investigated this matter—(I can give my hon. friend the name and the particulars if he wishes, but I choose not to at the moment)—a little further, as to whether it would be possible to waive this sum already in excess of $1,300—I was told—not by a member of the government, for I have not brought it to the attention of the department, since at the moment I only want to use the episode to illustrate the inequities of the system—that it was no use, that nothing could be done about this because the government could not condone a fraud, and could not forgive the money he owed, so that consequently nothing could be done about it. And this, even though I pointed out that in 1936 it was established as government practice that with regard to a pension received fraudulently or in error, while it could be stopped, there could be no recovery. The man did what I think I would have done, although I think I would have done it better than he did. Under those circumstances, with a load like this around his neck, and reduced to the ranks, realizing that this war will not last long enough to enable him to pay back this money, and that he could not soldier on thirty shillings a month, he "went over the hill". He did not make a good enough job of it, because he was subsequently arrested, and at the time I last saw him was undergoing a sentence. When he comes out of detention he will have an additional load of financial debt, and his situation is increasingly hopeless. The man was an excellent sergeant. I am satisfied that he made the contract in good faith, and even if that could not be established, I think that a system of stoppages, which permits that type of penalty to be hung on that man, after a period of two years, a man who as a soldier must have cost the people of Canada $3,500 as an absolute minimum to train to be an efficient sergeant; a man who to-day is and for some months to come will be in detention and lost to the service, simply does not make sense.

While we are on this subject of detention and of people who are absent without leave, I might remark that there are people in England belonging to the Canadian army who have been absent without leave longer than twelve months, who have not been apprehended, who have not been blitzed, and who, indeed, have been occupied in lucrative positions in civilian life during that time. I know of one case which I may cite by way of illustration to allay the fears of my hon. friend here, of a young lad who "jumped ship" in the city of Halifax. He joined the Canadian army and was sent overseas shortly afterwards on a draft. When he got overseas with the draft they said to him, "You are too young to fight; you will have to wait—" I think it was a year at that time, or a year and one-half. He had been a sailor before; so he went to London and soon got a job on a merchant ship, and for thirteen months he plied the seas. He was at Dunkirk, and he was in and out of the Mediterranean a number of times during that period. He came back to England to visit his parents and they said to him, "You plan to go to Canada after the war. What kind of future will you have as a deserter? Give yourself up." He went to Canada House to give himself up. They said, "Go away; you are crazy"; they would not believe him. Finally he convinced them, went back to camp, asked to take some courses when in camp, but he could not get them, and decided that he might as well fight at sea until he was old enough to fight on land. So he went away for eleven months, and then again surrendered himself formally to Canada House, did his punishment for being absent without leave, and did it proudly, because he carries from the shipping authorities a very fine record of service at sea. He was, as I said, at Dunkirk, in the Mediterranean and to Russia; he has seen more war than most of our senior officers, or for that matter anybody else in any army. The last time I saw him he was waiting to get out of the "clink" to go to Italy, where I expect he is to-day. I hope he survives to come back to Canada, because he is the kind of man we need.

I have not said this to condone absence without leave but to illustrate the fact that it is not particularly difficult to get away and be away for long periods of time. The English people are very hospitable. They treat our boys very well. They treat them too well. You can live longer in England without money if you are absent without leave than anywhere I know of—and you do not have to swim the Irish channel to find security, as was suggested to us sometimes in the last war.

If we are concerned about the problem of army crime, and I think we are, we ought to adopt a system of pay stoppages a little more in line with the sort of equity we hand out in the courts in Canada and as they do in other countries. I suggest to the minister that if he wants anybody or anything to strengthen his hand when he puts this matter before the military council, I know where he can get somewhere between five and six hundred cases to establish for him the cumulative effect of pay stoppages as one of the great influences in making fellows into habitual army criminals.

On the subject of army criminals I have had some experience with cheeky young fellows who have had detention time after time. When I was engaged in the job of salvaging some of these fellows, most of whom are young lads, one of them remarked to me that he did not have any great consciousness of sin. I spoke to him firmly and inquiringly, with a straight face. I said, "What are your crimes?" He said, "They are all absence without leave." I spoke to him of the seriousness of that. He said, "I have a brother a little older than I am. He has been trying to get into the army for four years, but he was an automotive worker, and he cannot get into the army because they will not release him from the plant where he works in Canada. He is living comfortably at home, making good money. If he gets drunk on Sunday night and doesn't feel like working Monday and doesn't go back until Tuesday, the boys there simply say, 'I guess Bill is working out his income tax'. So there he is, nice and secure at home. I am a volunteer. It is not my fault that I was not killed or wounded three years ago. Yet if I take a day off I become a criminal." That argument does not make sense, and you cannot control an army on the basis of condoning that type of thing. But when you come to examine into why a lad like that takes months off and he feels he is not a criminal when he does that sort of thing, I think you will find, back of a great number of these so-called habitual cases, the fact that he went "on the loose" two or three times and came back in debt.

In the case of every man in detention whom I have had an opportunity to examine, I have demanded particulars, and got them from the commanding officers in every case. I have asked, "How much money will this man owe when he comes out of detention?" And the number of men whom I found that would not owe money—I am talking about married men—I believe I can count on my fingers. When a married man deserts and is caught and punished, not only the separation allowance but his own assigned pay are paid to his wife for a period not in excess of six months. We continue to pay $20 a month to his dependents in the case of a private. I differ a little from some of my friends, who see no reason why we should not continue to pay to the family even though the man has deserted. I conceive it to be the responsibility of the government, when it takes a man out of his job, away from his family and his environment, and puts him into the service, to look after his wife and children until such time as it is determined what has happened to him. But in my opinion that is not properly chargeable to the army. If a man has a job in civil life and he quits that job, or if he goes to gaol in consequence of a felony, his pay is stopped and any contribution he makes to his family is also stopped. If the cutting off of the allowance that is given in the army is to be made a deterrent, I suggest it would be a better deterrent if the man knew that, in the event of his quitting the army in this manner, the allowance to his family would be stopped. If it is intended to be a deterrent, let us make it a real deterrent and cut off his pay the day he quits. I would not relieve the Canadian people, through their institutions, of the responsibility of looking after a man's dependents until I knew whether or not something in the military history surrounding that man had contributed to his delinquency.

Sometimes, I think, we do contribute to such delinquency by this obsolete system of pay stoppages, and sometimes we contribute by bad man-management. I do not suggest for one moment that it is possible for the Canadian people, through the government, to escape some measure of responsibility for the man's family, but I would not pay a nickel of his straight army pay from the minute he was in detention or absent without leave. If the minister wants support for that view I am ready to give that as my opinion. I would not say that these people should not be subject to care and welfare, but that is not a charge which is properly chargeable to the army, when a man has ceased to function in the army, with which he has a contract, unless it can be shown that the army has contributed to his delinquency. Sometimes that can be shown. There are cases of men who were unsuited to the service through no fault of their own. They should not have been there. There are numerous situations that enter into this question, contributing to the desertion of many men. In such cases the family would not have been deserted if the soldier had not left home, and we should treat the man's wife and family just as if he were the good soldier he promised to be when he enlisted. We cannot escape responsibility for looking after these dependents until such time as we can find out the degree to which we have contributed to the man's delinquency through our institutions, selection and management.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Mr. RALSTON: I appreciate my hon. friend's contribution to the debate. He has first-hand knowledge of the subject, acquired both in Canada and in England. On the first point, there are at the present time before the department certain recommendations from Canadian military headquarters with regard to the cumulative effect of charging assigned pay in respect of a soldier who is in detention.

Mr. NEILL: I wish the minister could give me an explanation about the discrimination shown between the mothers of soldiers and their wives. I have no doubt the matter has often been brought to his attention, and I have applied to many officials for an explanation that would square not only with my sense of justice but with anyone else's, an explanation that one could fairly put up to the woman concerned. The soldier's wife gets $35 a month and an allowance is made for children. The soldier's mother who is a dependent gets at most $20.

Mr. RALSTON: $25.

Mr. NEILL: Call it $25. For a long time, three years at any rate, it was $20 as against $35. Various reasons have been given me by different officials. On one occasion I was told that the same thing was done in Britain. Well, in my opinion, that is a poor reason. Another time I was told that a man had a greater responsibility to his wife than to his children. I cannot see that. Another reason was given, namely, that the wife was looking after the children. Yes; but the wife is paid extra for looking after the children. They get the children's allowance.

Here is the point as people, as the women and as I see it. The soldier's wife is generally a young woman and she has around $70 in the way of ordinary allowances. She is able to do her own chores, her own housework, chop her own firewood perhaps, and keep a garden, and on occasion I have known them to work in plywood factories getting seventy cents an hour. But the mother is probably an old woman. She is not able to work and needs medicine, which is expensive. She needs doctoring, and that, too, is expensive. In my opinion she is in more need of support from the government than the wife, because she is less able to take care of herself.

As regards the argument that a man's responsibility is greater toward his wife than it is toward his children, the answer is this. It is not a question of responsibility; it is a question of dependency. If they are both dependent they are dependent to the same extent. You cannot make a distinction between the dependency of the one woman and the dependency of another, and in fact it takes more to keep a dependent mother than a wife. I have never been able to see any justification for the principle. I have been corrected; I have been told they are getting $25 but the mother cannot demand even $25. It is at the decision of the committee. Well, why was it made $25? That was done as a belated attempt to justify the low amount that was given before. The thing is either right or wrong and $25 is not enough as compared with $35, even if the amount has been raised from $20. I should like to have something that I can tell these people who want information on the subject. They ask this question: Why do I get $25 as compared with the soldier's wife who gets $35? I have never been able to obtain from any official or anyone else an answer that would jibe with anyone's common sense and sense of justice, and I would be very much obliged if the minister could give me something satisfactory that I could pass on to these women as fair and reasonable.

Mr. RALSTON: I have tried several times to tell my hon. friend all I know about this, and that does not take very long. The relationship is different legally as between the wife and the mother. As a matter of fact, we have said, and have stated in the house, that regardless of the fact that dependents' allowances are not payable as of right, we regard the dependent's allowance to the wife as being payable as of right to the full amount. The mother's allowance is based on dependency. That is why what is sometimes called the means test is applied. The mother is entitled to dependents allowance up to $25. In order to get that $25 the son has to assign fifteen days' pay to her which would amount to about $23. The two together come to $48.

Mr. NEILL: The mother is not entitled to demand even $25; it is only possible at the whim of a committee.

Mr. RALSTON: It is possible, but my point is this: if she does not establish her right or her need for $25, does my hon. friend suggest she ought to receive it. She must establish her need. She may get up to $25, but she only gets that provided the son assigns pay. There is one exception to that. I said the son assigns fifteen days' pay.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is it the same for the wife?

Mr. RALSTON: If the son has assigned fifteen days' pay to his wife, he must assign an additional five days' pay to his mother in order to qualify the mother to get dependents' allowance. The reason for the difference between wife and mother allowances is that there is a different relationship. I have mentioned that on previous occasions. Secondly, there is the fact that the mother is put in the dependent class. But she has to show dependency, whereas the wife normally receives the $35 allowance automatically. If she were a millionaire or had an income of her own, she would still get the $35 allowance. On the other hand the mother does not get any dependents' allowance unless she is in need of it. The third point which does not apply to dependents allowances only, but it applies to pensions under the Pension Act is that somehow or another our pension people from the very beginning have always made a distinction between the mother and the wife. Under the Pension Act dependency in the case of the mother has to be shown, as must be done in the case of any relative other than the wife. It may be that that rule is wrong too, that these acts are wrong. They have been revised in this house many times, but that provision has always stood, the provision for the mother being based on actual dependency and the provision for the wife being based on need. I do not think I can add anything more to what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): How many days' pay would a girl in the army have to assign to the mother?

Mr. RALSTON: It is on the same basis as for the men.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister indicate—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I ask one question?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Bow River has the floor.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to ask one question while it is fresh in my mind. Is the dependents' board of trustees entitled by regulation to deal with mothers?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, if the mothers are in receipt of dependents' allowance. The dependents' board of trustees, as the committee knows, is empowered to supplement allowances in meritorious cases, and the board is entitled to deal with mothers as dependents just the same as children or wives.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There are two things I should like to mention to the minister. I want to join with those who have already spoken with regard to wives of soldiers who are away without leave. A year ago I had occasion to have one of those cases brought to my attention. I brought it to the attention of the department, but was unable to have any satisfactory arrangement arrived at in regard to that particular case. I think it is very unjust that a wife, whose husband has served in the armed forces for probably a year or two and then deserts the army, is thrown absolutely on the mercy of charity. I believe the army or the government—I will put it in that way so that I shall not get at variance with the hon. member for Winnipeg South—should pay the allowance. I do not care who pays the allowance so long as somebody does. I think the government has the responsibility in a case like that. The case that was drawn to my attention in Calgary a year ago was that of a young girl only nineteen years of age. They both agreed that the husband should join the armed forces and do his share in the defence of this country. He did it and spent about a year and a half overseas in the armed forces. If my memory serves me aright he served for nearly a year in England on active service. Then for some unknown reason he went away without leave. He was never heard of by either the army or his wife. She was left absolutely on charity, on the hospitality of the Salvation Army. She had two little children. She arranged in some way or another to have those children taken care of by one of the neighbours and she went to work. Then the child welfare authorities came around and made her quit her job and go home to take care of her children. That woman was in a terrible position. I think the government has a definite responsibility. I do not think that woman should be allowed to depend on charity. That is only one case of many that hon. members have had brought to their attention in this house. I think it would be well worth the government's while, and the minister's as well, to give this some very, very serious consideration to see what could be done. I know the minister does not like to see these cases. I am quite convinced of that. The thing is to bring pressure to bear upon those who are responsible, to alter this regulation and see if some assistance cannot be given to those wives whose husbands are away without leave.

The other matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is that of dependent mothers. I brought this up the other day. The minister said he was going to make a statement about it, but he has not yet done so. According to regulation 101, section (c), subsection (iii):

> Mother or foster mother, whose husband is alive but totally incapacitated from earning a living if the officer or soldier is her "sole or partial support."

The case I brought to the government's attention just about a week ago has a direct bearing on this clause. Because of the wording of the clause the dependents' allowance board takes the stand, and rightly so, that the mother is not entitled to any dependents' allowance whatsoever unless the husband is totally incapacitated. The words "totally incapacitated" should be changed. If the father gets an amount as small as $5 a month the mother is not entitled to dependents' allowance because the father is not totally incapacitated. I do not think that was the intention of the government; nevertheless the regulation is there, and the dependents' allowance board, interpreting the regulations, must refuse the mother any assistance. I think that is wrong. I ask the minister if he will make a statement in regard to the assigned pay in a case like this. A soldier is on active service and assigning a portion of his pay to his mother or to his wife in the hope that when he comes back he will have sufficient laid aside for him to take advantage of the rehabilitation plan whereby he can take up a farm, if he has ten per cent of the cash value to put up. He hopes that his wife or mother will take this assigned pay and put it in the bank for him and not use it as a means of livelihood. But if that assigned pay were used it would make it decidedly unfair. I do not think the assigned pay should necessarily have to be used in order to keep the wife or mother. I think the dependents' allowance should take care of that. There should be a distinction as to whether or not the dependents' allowance must be classed as income. I do not think it is clear in the regulations, and certainly there should be some clarification of the regulations with regard to total incapacitation. The minister promised to make a statement on that matter, but I suppose it has slipped his mind.

Mr. RALSTON: The only statement I can make is that at the present moment we have under consideration an amendment making that definition of "totally incapacitated" less restrictive, and dealing also with the amount of income which the mother and father jointly may be permitted to receive.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think that is a good thing.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to support the remarks of the last speaker, and also those of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I think a widowed mother who has in the armed forces a son who has been her sole support should be entitled to the same amount of allowance that is given a wife. As one hon. member pointed out, in many cases the mother is not able to earn a living as easily as a wife without children might. I know of many such cases, and I trust that the minister will use his influence to have these allowances increased. When we discussed this matter last year the allowance was only $20; now it has been increased to $25, and I hope it may be increased still further. As I have said, many widowed mothers are in greater need of this allowance than are many young wives who are able to work and support themselves. I realize the force of the reasons given by the minister, but I hope he will use his influence to have the amount increased.

I should like also to support what has been said by other hon. members, that the state is responsible for the wife and children of a soldier who goes absent without leave. Certainly it is no fault of the wife and children, but in many cases a distinct hardship results, and I hope some changes will be made in that respect.

There is another question I should like to ask the minister, dealing with the case of a man who enlists at a time when there is some domestic or family trouble. His wife happens to be of a very independent nature, and he does not assign any pay or ask for the dependents' allowance for his wife and children. She goes on working for many months, but finally illness overtakes her and she is not able to keep on providing for herself and the children. Is there any means by which the dependents' allowance may be put through in such cases? I know of such instances, and at the present time these people are finding it very difficult to get along. I have one or two other questions to ask, but perhaps the minister would clear up these matters first.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, even though the man has not assigned his pay in the first place he may do so at any time. In addition, there is a provision under which the board in effect can bring about a compulsory assignment and give the wife the status of a dependent for the purpose of receiving the dependents' allowance.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is no time limit?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Could the minister tell us approximately what it costs to clothe an individual soldier? This has a bearing on the clothing allowance. If there is anything that has gone all out of kilter under the wartime prices and trade board set-up, it is the cost of clothing. I am sure no one would rise in his place in this house and say that to-day you can purchase clothing of the same quality or at the same price as when we entered this war. In order to give some comparison, I think the minister might tell us what it costs in dollars and cents to clothe a soldier to-day, because that has some bearing on the allowance given the soldier when he is discharged.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think that is quite relevant. My hon. friend does not want to find out the cost of military clothing; he wants to find out the cost of civilian clothing, and it seems to me he would know as much about that as I do. The fact that a man gets a uniform, an outfit and certain equipment in the army does not prove anything in regard to the cost of getting a civilian outfit.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think it would be well to have those figures anyway, because I have an article before me which states that clothing now costs 121 per cent of what it cost formerly, and I think the minister will agree that you cannot fit a man out for $65. A step has been taken in the right direction by increasing the clothing allowance, but it is still not nearly enough.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: There is one other point with regard to the mothers' allowance that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister, though probably it has been mentioned already. I refer to the ceiling that is placed upon the earnings of a dependent mother. I understand that a mother may receive up to $25, provided she is not earning more than $40 in addition.

Mr. RALSTON: That is $40 exclusive of the assigned pay.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Yes, so that the ceiling is $65.

Mr. RALSTON: Plus the assigned pay.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Yes, but that means she cannot work at a job paying more than $10 a week. If she is to receive the dependents' allowance she must earn less than $10 a week, which in most cases means that she cannot work at all.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, no; the $25 would be reduced, that is all.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: She would get $15, $10 or even $5, making $65 the maximum she may receive, with her allowance. There must be thousands of mothers across the country who are supporting younger children. The son in the army is perhaps the oldest, and she has come to depend almost entirely upon his income. I have personal knowledge of numbers of such cases, where the mother still has to support younger children. There is a feeling that there should be no ceiling, that the mother should be permitted to earn what she can and still receive her allowance. I am also told that the mother gets no cost-of-living bonus, which is paid to wives. I should like to know the basis for that discrimination. In the first place the mother gets an allowance of $10 less than the wife; in the second place there is a ceiling placed on her income, and in the third place the mother is not given the cost-of-living bonus. I think that is discrimination.

Mr. RALSTON: Of course the ceiling placed on earnings is because of the feature of dependency which is required to be shown in the case of a mother and which does not need to be shown in the case of a wife. The idea is that the country does not contribute if the mother is earning $65 a month; that means she is not in a dependent condition, and that is the reason. I tried to explain to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—I am afraid not very successfully—why there is a difference in principle between the allowance to the mother and the allowance to the wife. The one has what is not very popular, the means test, while the other has not. I think perhaps in that one sentence I have dealt with the question of the ceiling and the matter of dependency. What was the other distinction?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The cost of living bonus.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend why that is not given; I do not know.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do the wives of all members of the armed forces, except those who are also members of parliament, receive the dependents' allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; all wives whose husbands assign pay and who are living in the usual marital relations receive dependents' allowance.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I want to support what has just been said in regard to mothers' allowances. Although the minister has said something about it just now, I protested last year by stating that I never could quite see why a mother who is absolutely dependent upon her son, a mother perhaps with two or three children, did not come in the same category as a wife. However, I hope something may be worked out in that connection.

I should also like to support the hon. member for Souris and several other hon. members who have spoken respecting wives whose husbands have been absent without leave.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

There are one or two other questions I should like to ask the minister. The first refers to a man who has been discharged from the army, at his own request, because of sickness, or some other reason along those lines. Is such a man entitled to clothing allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: He is entitled to clothing allowance, but not to rehabilitation allowance.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That would seem unfair in some cases. I have in mind a man who was discharged because his wife was unable to take care of his family. Perhaps he should not have been in the army, to start with, but the fact is that he was in the army. I was wondering if those cases are reviewed, or if there is a hard-and-fast rule concerning it. Are they ever given an alternative?

Mr. RALSTON: No. My hon. friend will understand that the rehabilitation grant is exactly what it states, namely a grant for the purpose of refitting a man into civilian life. The assumption is that if he takes the option and requests a discharge, he has somewhere to go, some occupation at which he may be engaged. Otherwise he would not be asking for the discharge.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Under the circumstances, when he comes back he has to find somewhere to go. Is that a hard-and-fast rule, or would those cases be reviewed? In such cases I should think the few dollars he would get as rehabilitation allowance would be very acceptable to his family, in fact, would be a godsend.

Mr. RALSTON: Could he earn more money out of the army than in it?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He did not earn any money for a couple of months after he came back.

Mr. RALSTON: Why was he discharged, then? Was it just a matter of having to keep a house?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He had to come back to look after his family. His wife was suffering from a heart condition.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will understand that, generally speaking, a discharge at his own request is for the purpose of taking a job.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have another question respecting a man who is sick with an illness which may affect him for a long time. This man would go to Christie Street hospital. It seems to me that as soon as the authorities find out he suffers from an incurable disease he is discharged from the army. The man I have in mind was a major, and the result was that he had to live on $85 a month. It was his initial sickness; he is still in Christie Street hospital. As I understand it, under the amendment to the Pension Act he receives the pay and allowances of a lieutenant for some time, the length of which I do not know. How long would he be allowed to be there?

Mr. RALSTON: I think while he is hospitalized.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He would be there for a considerable time, perhaps extending into a year. It seems very unfair that a man coming from the army and hospitalized is discharged as soon as possible from the army when it is learned he cannot go back to the army because of a disability. True, he will receive a small pension, but it is pretty hard on his family. Certainly he should receive consideration during the time of his initial hospitalization.

While I am on my feet may I point out to the minister the difficulty we had in connection with those soldiers who were discharged after the last war, after having received wounds. They wanted to get out of the army as quickly as possible and in leaving the army they did not care about anything. They did not find out whether anything was physically wrong with them. After the expiration of some time difficulties would develop. I have no doubt all members of parliament have had many cases of that kind to take up with the pension authorities, and we have had much difficulty in such cases. We would receive the reply, "Disability not accounted for by active service."

To-day men are being discharged from the army every day because of disabilities. They do not know where to go or what to do, and are not familiar with their rights. They do not realize that at some time in the future they may be pensionable, and may need that pension. I am wondering if a full record of the reasons for discharge is made, or whether a history of each case is kept and given to them upon their discharge, so that they will know where they stand. I have in mind the case of a young man who was supposed to be in A-1 condition. Examinations, however, are not always correct because, while this man was entered in the army as A-1, it was found upon X-ray that he had a congenital deformity of the spine. This condition showed up on service.

In fairness to this man, and in view of the difficulties members of parliament have had in connection with pensionable cases, I say that the very fullest explanations of reasons for discharge should be given to each man who is discharged.

Mr. RALSTON: To the men themselves?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They should also receive histories of their cases, setting out the reasons for their disability, and the immediate cause of such disability. For instance, a man might be sent to perform duty in pouring rain, and following that might catch cold. Bronchitis, developing into a chronic bronchitis might be the result. If possible, there should be an attempt to pin it down to the reason for disability, thereby providing a full history of the man in question. Surely in fairness that is the least that could be done. I tell the minister that if such action were taken we would rid ourselves of endless troubles. Then, if a man were told that his discharge was for such and such a reason, and that he would probably be entitled to a pension, he could then be informed where to go, how to make his application, and be given all necessary details. The man would not be placed in the position where he would say, "Oh well, I will forget all about it." His disability may be a serious thing for him in future life, and it is not fair to neglect taking a full history.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member complains that in the cases to which he has referred discharges were made quickly. Then, in the last case he pointed out that sufficient information was not given at the time of discharge.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is right; it was not given to him.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that. May I repeat to the committee what I said last night, namely, that the hon. member has touched upon one of the most sensitive times in a man's army life, that is the time he is discharged. I have tried with all my power to impress that upon my officers. We have had liaison with the Department of Pensions and National Health, in an effort to have an officer from that department and one of our own officers at a hospital, or a board room, or wherever it may be, so that a soldier may be advised of his rights, and where he ought to go. This is most important. This is one of the many things the R.C.A.F. do particularly well, in connection with their repatriated men. When they bring them back, they try to look after them. Anything that I can do to meet that situation I assure my hon. friend will be done. A case occurred quite a while ago of an officer that I found in hospital who had been discharged and had not been told either by the army or by the Department of Pensions and National Health what his rights were.

The case was brought to my attention immediately, and I saw that everything was done in order to make up for what was, in my judgment, crass indifference. We are doing everything we can to tighten that up and see that the men are given information promptly, particularly as to what their rights are and where they can go. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that when a man gets out of the army he does not know where to go next. He expects somebody to send for him, and they are apt to send for him after the papers have been signed and he has gone away.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The reason why I brought the matter to the minister's attention is that I do not think as much care is taken as should be taken. I had a case within the last month.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend thinking of the case of an officer from Hamilton?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No; of two or three cases from Christie Street hospital, Toronto. I do not want to go into the details because it is not necessary. But I wish to impress upon the minister that greater care should be taken to inform the men what their rights are.

Mr. RALSTON The system is no good unless it works. I will look into it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have been in touch, as many of the Toronto members have, with the pension advocates in Toronto. I know them well and they are very good men. They have impressed upon me the necessity of getting all the information out to the soldier promptly so as to save a whole lot of trouble later on.

There was another case of a man at Christie Street hospital for observation. He really did not know why he was there until he was discharged. He never was told why he was there. He was discharged, and then he came back later on for a pension.

Mr. QUELCH: I wish to add my voice to those that have been raised in protest against the stoppage of pay and allowances. The minister did not, I think, make out a very good case in defence of the present practice. He may have so far as the army is concerned, but from the point of view of the people I do not think he did, because in reality what he was saying was that the army is holding the wives and children of the soldiers as hostages against the soldiers' good behaviour. In the case of a soldier serving a sentence for desertion, the practice is to stop the pay and allowance at the end of six months. I do not think the minister could possibly defend that, for this reason: The army has the body of the soldier, and as long as it has the body of the soldier it can get enough work out of him to pay for the dependents' allowance.

The argument has been made that it is no different from similar cases in civilian life, where a man is put in gaol, and his salary stopped. But industry has not the body of the soldier. The army has the body of the soldier, and the army can get enough work out of him to pay for the dependents' allowance, or wait until he is out of gaol and then take it out of his pay. At least in cases where the soldier has been captured and sentenced to gaol, the dependents' allowance should be paid continuously.

I want to refer to article 102 (d) of the financial regulations and instructions respecting dependents in T.B. sanatoria and mental institutions. This memorandum is marked "confidential" in big type. Am I at liberty to quote from it?

Mr. RALSTON: Is it from the department?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, a memorandum from the dependents' allowance board. It reads:

> Dependents in T.B. sanatoria and mental institutions
> 1. Article 102 (d) of financial regulations and instructions provides—"No allowance shall be granted to a person who is maintained in an institution at the expense of a public authority."
> 2. In order that dependents who become patients of these institutions may be eligible for dependents allowance the board has an arrangement with most of these institutions whereby they agreed to accept $20 per month for the maintenance of an adult dependent and $12 a month for the maintenance of a child of a member of the armed forces.

I have in mind the cases of several wives of soldiers who are in T.B. sanatoria in Alberta and $20 a month is being deducted from their dependents' allowance and paid to the T.B. institution. But in Alberta, T.B. treatment is free, and so the provincial government are prepared to return the $20 to the soldier's dependent. But if the provincial government returns that $20 to the dependent the Department of National Defence takes the stand that they would have to deduct another $20 from the dependent. Surely provision should be made whereby the provincial government is able to return that money, because otherwise you have this peculiar situation, that while T.B. treatment in Alberta is free to the people at large, the only one who has to pay for it is the wife of a soldier. For everybody else the treatment is free. That is a very undesirable situation. The dependents' allowance board have told me that the only way to get around it would be for the provincial government to pay the money to the dependent and not tell the dependents' allowance board that it had done so. I was not quite satisfied with that because I could not get it in writing. I then took it up with the Minister of Finance, and he referred me to the comptroller of the treasury. I wanted to know whether the government would guarantee, that in case the provincial government returned the money to the dependent, no inspector would be sent out to try to find out if the money had been repaid. The Minister of Finance said that the comptroller of the treasury was the only person who could guarantee that, and he would not do it. When you have an absurd situation of that kind the regulations should be amended. The minister must agree that it is a most undesirable situation when the soldier's wife is the only person in Alberta who cannot get free hospital treatment for the soldier patient.

Mr. RALSTON: Strangely enough, a case of that kind came to my attention last Sunday afternoon when I was clearing up a few matters. There was a letter from the Hon. Mr. Cross of Alberta, making the offer which my hon. friend has just mentioned. The solution appeared easy to the dependents' allowance board, namely, that the province would just pay back to the person in the institution the amount which had been paid to the province for maintenance. I must say that I generally try to cut red tape, but I saw a little difficulty in doing that under the regulations. I immediately inquired from the board if there were not some other way of working the thing out. I am thoroughly in accord with my hon. friend's objective that we must find a way of working it out. It is a case of the soldier's dependents being discriminated against to the extent that they do not get the benefit of the provincial contribution. I am trying to work it out and I think I can do it.

Mr. HANSELL: Will the minister make an announcement when he has worked it out? We have some cases pending.

Mr. RALSTON: I am in correspondence with the Hon. Mr. Cross and perhaps I should correspond with him first. I shall make an announcement to the committee as soon as possible.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 18 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

THE WAR

SINKING OF UNITED STATES TRANSPORT—MESSAGE OF SYMPATHY TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to read to the house a telegram which I sent this morning to the President of the United States, a message which, I believe, the house will very warmly approve:

The President,
The White House, Washington.

The people of Canada have learned with feelings of deepest regret of the loss, through enemy action in European waters, of a thousand American soldiers. The sinking of this transport comes all the more as a shock because of the rarity of such losses. The loss of these brave lives is one which has aroused a widespread feeling of sorrow, in which the government and people of Canada share. On behalf of the government, I should like to express to you, and to the people of the United States, our sympathy in this national loss. Linked with our expression of sympathy is an ever-deeper realization of our comradeship-in-arms in the unrelenting effort to save the world as largely as may be possible from the continued inhuman acts of barbarous enemies seeking to dominate the world.

W. L. Mackenzie King.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WAR EXPENDITURES AND DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS COMMITTEES—PROPOSAL THAT HOUSE SHALL NOT SIT WEDNESDAYS

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words to hon. members about the business of the house for to-day and for next week. It was announced last night that this afternoon we would take up the civil estimates of the Department of National Defence and later, the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. Also it was stated that the house would sit this evening.

There is on the order paper a notice of motion in the name of the Minister of Justice to constitute a select committee of the house to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations. There is another notice of motion in the name of the Minister of National War Services with respect to constituting a committee on radio broadcasting. Hon. members will see in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday that I gave notice last night to the Clerk of my intention to move for a committee on national war expenditures. Notice of this motion will appear on the order paper on Monday next.

The wish has been generally expressed that we should constitute all committees as rapidly as possible, and I believe it will further the wishes of hon. members if we do not delay any longer than is absolutely necessary in setting up these committees. The select committee on the defence of Canada regulations I would hope might be constituted this afternoon. I suggest that on Monday the house consider the war expenditures committee resolution, also the resolution regarding the committee on radio broadcasting. With respect to war expenditures a desire was expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite to be given an opportunity to debate the third report of the committee presented at the close of last session. Hon members will have noticed that I introduced the other day and the house approved a resolution permitting a discussion of that report. Concurrence in the report will have to be moved, and I should think the best way of proceeding would be to have concurrence moved on Monday and the debate on war expenditures take place on that resolution. I do not wish to restrict hon. members from debating the resolution to set up the committee if they so desire. It might be understood however that, on one or the other motion, whatever hon. members may wish to discuss could be discussed. In that way we would be expediting the business of the house.

Also on Monday the government would like to get one or two more departments into supply, to call an item, so that the estimates of those departments may be taken up on any day.

Hon. members have said that they thought, and I think rightly so, that the proceedings of the house might be expedited if more work were done by committees than has been the case in the past.

With that view the government is in accord. We believe that a good deal of discussion that takes place here in debate might be avoided if some matters were threshed out a little more fully in committees in the first instance. To help to meet that objective, I mentioned when speaking in the debate on the address that at a later stage in the session I would propose that the house do not sit on Wednesday afternoons but that Wednesday be kept free for members to give special attention to the work of committees.

The government proposes that from now on that the house should sit on Friday evenings unless it otherwise orders, so that in reality the time to be devoted to discussion in the house, if the procedure I have outlined is carried out, will be the equivalent week by week of what it was during the last session, the difference being that we shall be sitting on Friday evenings instead of on Wednesday afternoons. More should be accomplished as there would be more work done in committees than would otherwise be possible.

One objection that hon. members have to the committees meeting from day to day is the difficulty of their being in two places at the same time, especially in the early part of the session. Toward the end of the session permission has been given committees to sit while the house is sitting, but the proposed procedure will enable members for the most part to give their attention to the work in committees for an entire day in addition to whatever further time may be necessary, thereby obviating the necessity of their being absent from the house when important discussions are taking place.

There is a further reason which I mentioned. I should like to have the house approve the procedure I have referred to because it is absolutely necessary for the government, I mean the cabinet, and in particular the war committee of the cabinet, to have at this stage of the war more time to discuss and very carefully consider the weighty questions that are coming before us not only from week to week but from day to day. Hon. members will realize that at the present time scarcely a day passes that does not bring some unexpected subject for consideration by the government as a whole. Unless the government has opportunity to have unbroken sittings over a considerable length of time—we shall not be in a position to give to some of these measures the careful thought and attention they demand. Members of the government cannot do that in cabinet council and at the same time be present in the house to follow its proceedings. The procedure I have in mind has been framed so as to enable these two objectives to be met, and to be met in a way which will, in the end, I think, expedite the business of parliament and protect the interests of the public.

When the time occupied by sittings has come up before for discussion, reference has been made to the parliament at Westminster. I believe it has been said that in the United Kingdom the House of Commons sits for a much longer time. As a matter of fact, the parliament at Westminster until this year, while holding regular weekly sittings, has sat only three days in the week since the war began. The Prime Minister has announced at the close of the sittings of each week, which has been on a Thursday at 5.30 p.m., when the house will meet in the coming week and which has been usually on the following Tuesday, and has indicated some of the measures that would likely be brought forward in the following week. As I say, during most of the past four years the house has not met until Tuesday, and during that time it has been customary for the house to adjourn on Thursday. This year, I understand, because of special reasons, the house is meeting on Friday as well as on the other three days, but it does not meet until Tuesday.

Another matter I should mention in connection with the sittings at Westminster is that the House of Commons does not sit at night but adjourns at 5.30 p.m.; it has also morning sittings. It meets, I understand, at eleven o'clock in the morning, and adjourns at five-thirty in the afternoon. That has been because of the black-out. I doubt, however, whether hon. members realize that the whole business at Westminster has been carried on with sittings on an average of three days a week, and with only morning and afternoon sittings. I have a compilation of the days of sitting of our parliament and of the British parliament, and I think it will interest hon. members for me to give a tabular comparison of the length of time occupied in the sittings of the British and Canadian houses respectively:

Comparison of length of sitting of the British and Canadian parliaments in the period since the Canadian parliament met after the 1940 elections

	Sitting days
British parliament—
May 21, 1940–Nov. 20, 1940	62
Canadian parliament (complete session)—
May 16, 1940–Nov. 5, 1940	61
British parliament (complete session)—
Nov. 21, 1940–Nov. 11, 1941	113
Canadian parliament (complete session)—
Nov. 7, 1940–Jan. 21, 1942	105
British parliament—
Nov. 12, 1941–Nov. 10, 1942	116
Canadian parliament—
Jan. 22, 1942–Jan. 27, 1943	124
British parliament—
Nov. 11, 1942–Nov. 23, 1943	122
Canadian parliament—
Jan. 28, 1943–Jan. 26, 1944	120

It is an interesting fact that in this House of Commons we have actually occupied the same amount of time each year in our discussions over the last four years as the British parliament. Of course, the explanation in part is that at Westminster they have more frequent adjournments and sit fewer days in each week.

I had intended, with the permission of the house, to move this afternoon that when this house adjourns on Tuesday, the 22nd instant, it stand adjourned until Thursday, the 24th instant, and unless otherwise ordered, when the house adjourns on Tuesday evening it shall stand adjourned until the following Thursday, and that standing order 2 be suspended in relation thereto for the present session.

This is a motion that does not require notice and could be proceeded with at once, but I imagine hon. members may wish to give it a little consideration and I shall not press it today. I shall let it stand as a notice and will move it on Monday next. I do hope that hon. members will find it possible to comply with the wishes of the government in this matter, our wishes being based entirely upon what, after very careful thought, we believe to be advisable, for the reasons I have mentioned, at this stage of the war, and believe will prove to be of advantage in the expedition of business of this house, and equally of advantage to the country in the understanding of its business and the greater care which it will be possible to give to the all-important problems of our day.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the matter dealt with by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I should first of all like to say a word on the point he raised touching the war expenditures committee, and, coupled with that, the suggestion he made relating to the motion for concurrence in the three subcommittee reports of the committee, which I believe were contained in the final and third report which he mentioned a moment ago.

I think it would be preferable from every angle if matters relating to the war expenditure committee of last year and the setting up of the committee this year were dealt with in one debate. There is an objection to proceeding otherwise which I think will be sustained by most members of the house. I do not think we should have two debates on war expenditures; they might involve considerable repetition. I should like to point out, in connection with the procedure to be adopted in the setting up of the war expenditures committee and the motion for concurrence, that in order to regularize the proceedings the house might be agreeable to discussing first the motion for concurrence in the reports and agreeing that the debate thereon should be sufficiently wide to cover the setting up of the committee. This could be done immediately after discussion on the motion for concurrence is concluded.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was my suggestion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to make that clear. I believe the Prime Minister left it in such a position that either one or the other might be dealt with.

So far as the other matter dealt with by the Prime Minister is concerned, I am pleased that he did not insist on pressing his motion to-day. I thank him for that, because our party are desirous of giving more consideration to the point raised. I think we shall be in a position on Monday to deal with it. There are rather serious and momentous questions involved in connection with the motion proposed by the Prime Minister. I desire not to go farther than that at the moment, except to point out that we do want to give the matter every possible consideration and examine every angle. The proposal is perhaps more far-reaching than appears on the surface. It is our desire that whatever decision is arrived at, at least due consideration will have been given to the problem.

NAVAL SERVICES

TABLING OF CERTAIN NAVAL ORDERS

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I should like to table certain naval orders dated February 12, 1944. May I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the orders contain a provision with respect to transportation similar to that existing in the army orders. When I wrote my hon. friend on February 7 they had not been passed.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW REGULATIONS AND AMENDMENTS THERETO

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved:

That a select committee of this house, consisting of the following members:—Messrs. Bertrand (Laurier), Black (Yukon), Claxton, Dorion, Dupuis, Hazen, Hlynka, McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River), Martin, Maybank, McGeer, Noseworthy, Ross (Calgary), Slaght, Stirling, be appointed to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations (consolidation) 1942, and amendments thereto; with power to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses under oath; and to report their opinions and observations from time to time to the house.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, this motion gives the proposed committee power to deal with the defence of Canada regulations only. I suggest that it should be extended to give power to deal also with the questions of naturalization and deportation, which are related to the defence of Canada regulations. These regulations override naturalization in many respects, and they bring up the question whether or not the people who have been interned under them can be deported after the war.

This is the fifth year in which we have had a special committee of this type. In each of the other years, with the exception of 1942, the committee was given power to deal with naturalization and deportation in addition to the defence of Canada regulations. Last year, as hon. members will recall the motion as originally brought in was restricted, as it is this year, to the defence of Canada regulations. An amendment which was moved extending its scope to include naturalization and deportation was accepted by the government and duly passed. What happened after that was this: the committee did not deal with the defence of Canada regulations at all; it dealt only with the two questions of naturalization and deportation. It held seven meetings, and each one of those meetings was devoted to the two questions I have just mentioned. I hold in my hand the Votes and Proceedings of July 23, 1943, in which the hon. members will find the report of the committee. The last paragraph reads as follows:

Your committee is of the opinion that further study should be given to the whole subject of naturalization, deportation and admission to Canada with a view to the revision of the law relating thereto, and recommends, to that end, that a special committee of the house be appointed at the next session of parliament.

Therefore I intend to move that the motion be amended to extend the powers of the committee. In other years the meetings of the defence of Canada regulations committee have been held in camera. I suggest that this year consideration be given by the committee to throwing its sittings open to the press and to the public. It may be necessary to meet in camera when dealing with the regulations, but when dealing with the questions of naturalization and deportation I believe it would be advisable to throw open the doors. It may be advisable also to invite representations from certain of the naturalization judges in Canada. They have had very extensive experience in naturalization, and I think there is a good deal of discontent with the law as it stands at the present time. I believe many of the judges feel that some improvements should be made.

Representations should also be invited from clubs that are interested in the subject. Take, for example, the Canadian clubs of Canada. Two or three years ago they made representations to the committee which was considering the subject; they showed a great deal of interest in the matter, and they should be invited to send representatives.

Naturalization and deportation are of great importance. They become of greater importance as the end of the war draws nearer. I believe they are more important this year than the defence of Canada regulations. Hon. members will be interested to know that four or five times as many persons have been naturalized in Canada as in all of the other parts of the empire put together. Some steps have been taken to meet the situation. As an example, last year it was provided by order in council that an applicant for naturalization must give a year's notice of his intention to apply. It was also provided that the oath of allegiance must be taken in open court rather than before a notary public or a justice of the peace and then mailed to the Department of the Secretary of State. The effect of this change is, of course, to attach more solemnity to the actual giving of citizenship to the new Canadian.

There are further steps that might very well be taken. For example, it has been suggested that there should be naturalization schools, that applicants for citizenship should be given an opportunity to get instruction with regard to our history, our laws, our constitution and so on; that there should be a test to ascertain whether or not they have acquired sufficient knowledge of those subjects to entitle them to citizenship, and that some provision should be made for text books. Then the suggestion has been made that successful applicants should be given an official welcome into citizenship, and I think it would be very well worth while to provide that when our own young Canadians become twenty-one years of age they too should be welcomed into citizenship along with applicants for naturalization who have been granted certificates. Steps such as these would lead to the making of better Canadians, and that should be and I know is the objective of every hon. member of this house.

Another very practical question which arises is the question of dual citizenship, such as we have in the case of the Japanese in Canada. Many of them, we feel, are mentally citizens of both Japan and Canada, and that position should be remedied. When a person becomes a Canadian citizen he should drop his citizenship in any other nation. This present session is the time to bring our naturalization laws up to date. After all, the way a nation looks upon naturalization shows the value it places upon its own citizenship, and also shows the degree to which it will accept the new citizen. If very little importance is attached to naturalization —and I am afraid that has been the view of the average Canadian for many years— then citizenship means very little to the new citizen, and as a result he is perhaps never really accepted as a Canadian. That condition is entirely wrong. When a man becomes naturalized he should be accepted as a Canadian together with those of us who were born here and whose ancestors have resided here for generations.

So much for the naturalization law. The question of deportation of course has to do with the Immigration Act which, according to my understanding, provides that if a person has lived in Canada for five years and is considered to have Canadian domicile, to all intents and purposes he cannot be deported. We are in this position, that we have in Canada certain nazis whom we had to intern because they were a menace to the state. We also have certain Japanese who have been interned for the same reason; yet under our present immigration laws they cannot be deported after the war. I believe that after the last war an order in council was passed to deal with that situation, but so far nothing of the kind has been done in the present war. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Canada cannot get rid of these people too soon. There is no reason at all why they should be kept here a day longer than is absolutely necessary. The trouble is that once the war is over they will all choose to remain here. They will not want to go home; why should they? We should make up our minds that they are to go out at the first opportunity, and to do that, amendments must be made to the immigration laws. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black), that the motion be amended by adding after the word "thereto" in the sixth line, the following:

and the law relating to naturalization and to deportation.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, I shall not delay the house long, but I want to support the amendment; and in so doing I should like to direct attention to a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), that last year the committee concerned itself entirely not with the subject of the original motion but with the subject of this amendment. I would recall also that last year the committee recommended that a committee be set up this year for the purpose of giving further study to the questions of naturalization and deportation.

In supporting this amendment, however, I should like to remind hon. members of the fact that in the spring of 1942 a committee studying these matters made a report, which never came up for discussion in the house, in which attention was directed to the fact that at that time there were in this country certain organizations which had been declared illegal, and the committee recommended that this ban be lifted. Since that time much has been done in this direction by the government, through the Department of Justice, and I think this would be an appropriate occasion for the minister to tell us just which of those organizations which were formerly considered illegal have been legalized since that time. In the report to which I have referred reference was also made to the confiscation of the property of one of these organizations, the Ukrainian Farmer Labour Temple Association, and I understand that steps have been taken to return some or all of that property. I think this would be a suitable occasion for the house to be informed as to the steps that have been taken in this connection.

A third matter was referred to in that report; that is, the internment camps. From time to time questions were asked with regard to people interned in those camps, and I understand that many have been released in the interval. I have received notices from the department concerning some individual cases about which I have been writing, and I am informed that these internees have been released on certain conditions. I think we should know just what is the present situation in our internment camps and who have been released. Perhaps the minister would care to tell us in some detail just how many are still interned in these camps. Personally I should like to know under what conditions these people were released from the internment camps. These are matters of public concern, and this motion affords an opportunity for the government to give us a report on the steps taken in regard to the defence of Canada regulations up to the present time.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Yesterday, in reply to an inquiry I had made about the detention of Mr. Camillien Houde, the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) laid some documents on the table of the house. However, no mention is made in Hansard of any statement by the Minister of Justice or of the said documents.

Such an omission seems strange to me. Therefore, I request that the documents tabled by the Minister of Justice be recorded in the House of Commons Debates. The minister's reply was as follows:

The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains asked me on February 15 whether the Department of Justice had received a letter dated January 26, 1944, in which Mr. Camillien Houde requested his release, through an order in council, from an internment camp, and it was added in the question "in view of the fact that his internment was carried out by means of an order in council."

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

I have found, on looking up the file, that on January 26 Mr. Houde wrote to the deputy Minister of Justice a letter, copy of which I am tabling, and which contains this sentence:

That statement of Mr. Houde is not in accordance with the facts. The procedure followed when he was interned was not "through an order in council"; he was interned, as hundreds of other persons, through an order made by the then Minister of Justice under section 21 of the defence of Canada regulations. The matter of his release must be determined in accordance with the procedure laid down in the said regulations.

No case within the purview of the regulations has been dealt with through an order in council and the regulations do not involve such a procedure.

Mr. Speaker, in order that many points relating to this particular case and several others may be cleared up, I shall support the amendment moved by the hon. member.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the amendment is superfluous, but I am in favour of it. I cannot recall now whether we have before us the exact wording of the motion made last year when the committee was set up. I am informed by one of my colleagues the amendment is made so as to make the motion read in exactly the same terms as last year's motion. I am heartily in favour of that, because as a member of last year's committee I recall our work was not finished, so far as a discussion respecting naturalization, deportation and related matters was concerned. These are big subjects, and their consideration will require a lot of time. Not only are we concerned with our own laws, the subject is often complicated by corresponding laws in other countries.

We shall vote for this amendment. In my view we have reason at least to some extent to revise the naturalization regulations. I have in mind particularly the fact that naturalization has been refused on account of applicants not being able to read and write English. I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) respecting a school of preparation for those to be naturalized. In my view those who seek naturalization should be able to speak and write English, but there should be a dead-line set. I am under the impression there is no provision in the naturalization laws which compels one to be able to read or write English. It would appear that the judges who hear these cases use their own judgment, and that many applications have been refused on this ground. Years ago many persons came to Canada at our invitation and the invitation of those who were sponsoring great immigration movements, and among the number were mothers and fathers who brought their families. I am sure the older people found the learning of English a laborious task, and in many instances they have not continued their studies to the point where one could say that they can read, write and speak English. They have reared their families, and the members of their families have become good Canadians. Some of them are fighting in this war. Among these older people there are those who feel they would like to become naturalized, and they make their applications. Judges hear their cases, and simply because some of them cannot read or write, their applications are refused and they cannot become naturalized.

If this regulation is to be enforced we should tell people who are coming to this country that if they want to become naturalized they will have to be able to read and write and understand some of the principles of Canadian citizenship and nationhood. My observations this afternoon are more particularly on behalf of those who have been here for some years. Some of the older people who have raised their families and have contributed to the welfare of our country have applied for old age pensions, and because they have been good Canadians their applications should be granted. In the legal sense however they are not Canadians, with the result that without their naturalization certificates they cannot draw pensions. Their naturalization is not considered favourably because decisions are made against them on the ground that they cannot read and write. To many people this may not be a vital point, but it is vital to some who have been in this country for years and who now desire to become naturalized. If the amendment is accepted, and the committee pursues its work along the lines suggested, I would ask that this matter be considered.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) because I believe naturalization and deportation should have been included in the motion.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) touched on a matter I have discussed in the house on two earlier occasions, namely, the position of Canadians who have lived here for many years but, because they happen to live in groups and have not had an opportunity of learning either English or French, have been refused naturalization certificates. I represent a constituency in which are found many such pioneers. They are loyal citizens, many of them with sons in the armed forces of Canada. Quite often a son finds that he has to leave behind an unnaturalized mother or father who would like to apply for an old age pension. But these old people have not that privilege, because they do not understand the English language. The result is that they have to go on relief. Surely a condition of this kind should be remedied.

For a period of ten years, stretching from 1929 to 1939, the people of Canada suffered a depression. In those years many of our best citizens were unable to earn a living and were forced to accept relief. It so happens that the municipal, provincial and federal governments add up the amounts advanced to relief recipients and when any of these people apply for naturalization certificates they are refused on the ground that they are not good citizens because of certain amounts of debt outstanding against them. These people found themselves in that position through no fault of their own, but rather because of the faulty system under which they have had to exist.

Naturalization certificates should not be refused on this ground. I know of cases where men have been tracked by the police. Charges were laid against them because they had not admitted they had been on relief. They were made criminals and were refused naturalization certificates. All this results in a most unsatisfactory condition. Therefore I should like to support what the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Macleod have said.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am not unmindful, Mr. Speaker, of the remarks you made last year when a similar amendment was moved to a motion to set up a committee to inquire into the defence of Canada regulations. It seemed to me last year that it was the desire of the house that the jurisdiction should be extended to permit the examination of naturalization and deportation matters, and Your Honour agreed to permit the amendment to be put to the house. The situation this year appears to be the same. I did not include this particular matter in the motion because it is not something that comes within the scope of the Department of Justice, but my colleagues have no objection to its being included in the matters to be investigated by this committee. If Your Honour has no objection to allowing the amendment to be put, I have no objection to accepting it.

With respect to the matters that have been raised—

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister is speaking to the amendment now, but if he speaks to the main motion he will close the debate. With regard to the amendment, I wish to point out to the house what I stated last year when a similar amendment was moved to a similar motion. I pointed out that in the ordinary course the amendment could not be accepted by the Chair because it introduced a subject not relevant to the main motion. I stated then that I could not admit the amendment of my own volition, but the expression of opinion that came from all parts of the house appeared to be that it should be part of the original motion.

My fear then was, and it was exemplified in less than a month after that amendment had been agreed to, that this would be considered a precedent. At the moment I have not the particulars, but my recollection is that an amendment was moved which was foreign to the subject matter of a motion. It was then pointed out to me that I had agreed to an amendment of a similar character. I pointed out then, as I point out to-day, the danger of altering the rules of the house to permit of something foreign being introduced by way of amendment to the subject matter of a motion. I said then, as I say now, that if the house wished to have the amendment made a part of the main motion I would have no objection, but I now state that the house must not treat it as a precedent for any similar amendment in the future. In that latter instance I took the position that the amendment was not relevant to the main motion and therefore ruled it out of order. The house could pass the amendment at a later date as an instruction to the committee, but as the sense of the house seems to be that it should be passed now, I shall allow it now in order to save time.

If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have just a word or two to say before the minister closes the debate. I want to support what has been said with regard to the rigidity of our naturalization laws which result in excluding some worthy citizens from the possibility of having some comfort in their old age. As has been pointed out, people have come to many districts in western Canada and have worked hard, raised families and made a considerable contribution to the building of that section of the country. Many of these people did not think about being naturalized until this war commenced. Others did not think of it until hard times came along and in their old age they found they would have to apply for old age pensions.

Quite often these people were able to speak English, but when they came before the judge he would ask them, "You are pretty close to seventy years of age, are you not?" The answer would be "Yes." The next question would be, "When you get to that age you will probably apply for an old age pension?" Then the person being questioned would answer truthfully, "Yes," and his application for naturalization would be declined. There is no appeal from the decision of the judge. If a judge happens to be hostile to such people getting old age pensions; if he happens to be hostile to people of non-English speaking origin being naturalized at this time of war; if he feels he is called upon to protect the public purse or something of that nature, he can make a ruling by virtue of which the application is refused. The result is that a man who may have lived in Canada for most of his life, raised a splendid family and made other contributions to the country, will be deprived of the protection for which this parliament has provided in its old age pension legislation. Consideration should be given to changing the act in some way so that such people will not be absolutely debarred by decisions of the kind. During the last war many people came from countries which were under enemy control. They were unable to be naturalized, but in order to give them title to their homesteads they received a certificate which was known as form K. Many of them thought that that naturalized them and did not find out otherwise until they came to apply for old age pensions. Then the same question was put to them and they were refused naturalization and were thus unable to get old age pensions.

There are many cases of the kind, but I should like to give you another illustration, that of two old people, a husband and wife, who are both over seventy years of age. In spite of a real effort the husband has been unable to learn English, although the wife can speak it quite well. They are both good citizens and have made a real contribution by raising a splendid family. Because the husband cannot learn English this woman cannot get an old age pension or become naturalized, and that will be the state of affairs as long as her husband is alive.

I submit that this committee should consider cases like these and try to introduce a certain amount of flexibility to provide for such cases. When the granting of old age pensions is dependent upon the persons being naturalized, some provision should be made to take care of cases like these. In particular there should be some procedure under which the decision of the judge could be reviewed. I have known cases of naturalization having been refused in one district whereas I am quite certain it would have been granted in another district. A man living in one district is refused a naturalization certificate which he might have obtained if he had lived across the line in another judicial district. There should be some uniformity in regard to these matters.

Mr. DUPUIS: Just for the purpose of putting the record straight: the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) mentioned that one of the conditions of naturalization was the ability to read and write English. I am sure that he would be ready to rectify that and say, "English or French language."

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I must confess that I am not clear now as to where we stand with regard to this matter. I listened to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and, after expressing his opinion with regard to the introduction of a subject which fell not under his department but under another, he appeared to be ready to refrain from objecting to this amendment, and I took it that we had government consent to the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I then listened to Your Honour, and at the conclusion of your remarks I took it that you were ruling the amendment out of order, subject—

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh; the amendment then is now being debated? I merely wish to say that I am in support of it. The committee was called late in the session last year. It did not sit very often. Its entire time was taken up on this matter of naturalization, which I consider is linked with both the defence of Canada regulations and, in a sense, deportations, and I think the three can very well be discussed together. Furthermore, from all sides of Canada there was evidence that the public is deeply interested in this question, and I would say that there is a strong desire that a more uniform method should be adopted in considering whether naturalization should be granted, and the granting of naturalization. To ventilate the matter in this way before a committee of the house will serve a very useful purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER: Let me make it clear. No point of order has been raised by an hon. member with regard to the relevancy of the amendment. If that point of order were raised I would rule the amendment out of order. But the sense of the house seems to be that they wish it to be passed on the main motion, and I am agreeing to it, on the condition that the house must understand that I will not be bound by this act as a precedent when any similar amendment to a motion is brought before the house.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I wish to say just a few words in connection with this matter. I too have had experiences, similar to those who have spoken with regard to persons who have come to this country and tried to make their contribution. A great deal of misunderstanding has resulted from the lack of information; indeed, I feel that no proper effort has been made to enable these people, particularly the older ones, to realize to the full what the regulations require in making their citizenship. These people are from different parts of Europe. In my own constituency there are large numbers of Ukrainian people who have made valuable contributions to Canada. They have taken part in our democratic institutions; they led in respect of voluntary enlistments of Saskatchewan in the early years of the war. They have mixed their blood voluntarily with men of Canadian and British blood in the battle for freedom; they have taken over their duties and responsibilities in respect of municipal institutions, and their names are recorded among the members of the legislature and of this parliament. Many of these people who came to this country and took up homesteads believed, when they received title to their homesteads, that that granted them the right of citizenship. There are instances in which they have found that that is not so; after living for years under the illusion that they were Canadians they found that they were not entitled to all the rights of Canadian citizenship. When these people are making an effort to add their contribution to the rich mosaic which should be Canada, is it not time that we of this house passed legislation to make it possible for Canadian citizenship to be registered on the census records? Surely the time has come when we can be called Canadians, not "British Canadians" or Canadians of some other particular nationality or kind. The time is long past when we should have welcomed these people and assisted them in adding their contribution to this nation.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): May I add one other word in support of what has already been said? It seems to me there is need for the committee to discuss the question of making special provision for the naturalization of those who happen to suffer physical disabilities which make it almost impossible for them to comply with existing regulations. I have in mind a certain case up in my part of the country. In the year 1903 a man and his wife came to Canada from the Ukraine and brought with them the wife's sister. She was then a young girl, and she was deaf and dumb. In 1905 the man became naturalized, and so automatically his wife and children became naturalized, but the deaf and dumb sister was not included; she is not a naturalized citizen of Canada. To-day she is seventy-one years of age, and her brother-in-law wants to know if she is eligible for the old age pension. I found out that she had first to become naturalized, and I suggested that he go to the court in North Battleford to see about it. The judge made a ruling that this woman must learn to write. For a woman of seventy-one who has been deaf and dumb all her life to be told that she must learn to write before she can become naturalized seems an absurdity. It appears to me that in cases of physical disabilities of that kind special provision should be made, because in my opinion the contribution of a woman who has been in this country since 1903 gives her the right to the old age pension.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the minister speaks now he closes the debate.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I do not intend to discuss the many interesting questions which have been suggested as proper matters for the committee to look into. I understand they will be very carefully considered and, I hope, reported upon to this house by the committee.

There are one or two questions which were asked with respect to information that I can perhaps give the house at this time.

The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) referred to the fact that a statement I tabled yesterday in respect to the question he asked on February 15 did not appear in Hansard; but if the hon. member will look at page 99 of Votes and Proceedings he will find that the statement is there noted.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): The reply is not recorded in Hansard.

Mr. ST. LAURENT (Translation): The reply is recorded on page 99 of the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): I admit that the reply is recorded in the Vates and Proceedings, but that is not what I said, Mr. Speaker. I said that it was not recorded in Hansard.

(Text)

Mr. St. LAURENT: The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) inquired as to what organizations had been deleted from regulation 39C of the defence of Canada regulations. He will find them enumerated in the order in council of October 14, 1943, P.C. 8022, which has already been tabled in this house. They are: the Ukrainian Labour Farmer Temple Association, the Finnish Organization of Canada, the Finnish Society of Toronto, the Finnish Society, Technocracy Incorporated, Jehovah's Witnesses.

He also inquired as to what had been done about the property of these organizations which had come by virtue of the regulations under the control of the custodian of enemy property. By the same order in council it was provided that—

> . . . all property, rights and interests in Canada, or the proceeds thereof, vested in and subject to the control and management of the custodian pursuant to the provisions of paragraph (4) of regulation 39C of the defence of Canada regulations (consolidation) 1942, be released to the organization or person from whom it was received where the name of the organization has been deleted from subparagraph (a) of paragraph (1) of the said regulation 39C.

In order to bring that about in a manner that might be fair to each of these organizations, I understand that the Secretary of State as custodian set up an advisory committee similar to the committees that had been advising the Minister of Justice in respect of the application of the defence of Canada regulations, to assist him in making a proper return or accounting to the person or persons from whom property had been received by him.

The hon. member also inquired as to the number of persons who had been released or were still interned. I am sorry I have not the exact number here. Most of those who have been interned have now been released, and orders for release are constantly being made as the advisory committees make favourable recommendations to the Minister of Justice. Exact information can be prepared in tabulated form and made available to the committee, of which I am glad to note the hon. gentleman is himself to be a member.

PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

WIDOWS OF VETERANS OF FIRST WORLD WAR—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Will he tell the house whether it is intended, before the close of the present fiscal year, to introduce legislation providing a statutory basis for the payment of allowances to widows of veterans of the last war?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): No decision has yet been arrived at.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Normal services—

176. Grants to military associations and institutes as detailed in the estimates, $10,575.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know whether the minister had in mind making a special statement in connection with these estimates. If he has, I shall be glad to give way to him.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I had not intended making any statement. Each item and its purpose is quite familiar to the committee. These items cover the functions of the department in peace time, and the estimated expenditures, except in one case, are slightly below those of last year.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has there been any increase in this vote?

Mr. RALSTON: Some of the institutes have become dormant because of war conditions and we have found that there was no necessity for even providing for the grant. No payments have yet been made under the 1943-44 vote, although accounts are generally presented near the end of the fiscal year. Many of the associations have ceased activities entirely, and unless they can show activities that are regarded as substantially in the interests of the war effort, payments are not made.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose a large number of these people are overseas in the armed forces?

Mr. RALSTON: That is quite right.

Mr. STIRLING: Judging by the amount not required last year I take it that some of these are not continuing this year.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is quite right.

Item agreed to.

177. Miscellaneous maintenance and adjustments (war of 1914-1918), $22,770.

Mr. GRAYDON: What will be covered by temporary assistance, which will be found at page 129 in the details of services? I note that vote 177 covers temporary assistance amounting to $6,820; cost of living bonus and other pay-list items, $555; an item for the purchase and erection of headstones in Canada, $13,500, and sundries amounting to $1,895. Perhaps the minister will give us some additional information.

Mr. RALSTON: As its name indicates, this is a composite item. The principal activities under it are connected with war graves in Canada, to which are related the expenditures my hon. friend has mentioned in connection with headstones in Canada, the activities of the Canadian war museum, and payments for temporary assistance. The payments are to Mr. Reiffenstein, the secretary of the war museum, $2,400, and Mr. Salmon, handyman, $1,080. The payment to Colonel Osborne, secretary of the war graves commission, is $1,500. Provision is included this year for a museum assistant, the amount being $1,600. That makes $6,580, and there is an amount of $240 for casual labour. The additional museum assistant is necessary because of the considerable interest that is taken in the war museum. Something like 44,000 people saw the exhibit last year, and the secretary has been busy a good deal of the time taking visitors through the institution. It is thought therefore the expenditure for the assistant is justified.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the extent of the war graves commission's work so far as it affects the operations in this war?

Mr. RALSTON: There is no expenditure here in connection with operations in this war These headstones are all for burials in Canada. I think I am right in that. Deaths in England may be included—I am not sure about that—but I think it would be only deaths in Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: What about the attention being given to the cemeteries in Sicily, Italy and North Africa?

Mr. RALSTON: The cemeteries in Sicily and Italy are a purely service activity at the present time, and come under the department. The cemetery at Agira was built by the Royal Canadian Engineers and is being maintained by the army there. It will not be taken over by the imperial war graves commission until some time later, when activities cease there. As my hon. friend knows, the imperial war graves commission gets contributions from Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have we a representative on the imperial war graves commission?

Mr. RALSTON: Colonel Simson is on the imperial war graves commission, or is liaison officer with them. I should say also that Colonel H. C. Osborne, who is here, is secretary-general of the imperial war graves commission (Canada).

Mr. STIRLING: A little while ago I was approached by someone who asked me what steps should be taken with regard to a relative of his who had not received a medal to which he was alleged to be entitled. He did not know what he should do to get it. I told him to give me the information in detail and I would pass it on. In a case such as that, what steps are taken?

Mr. RALSTON: The application ought to be made direct to the department. The adjutant-general deals with it and passes it on to the records branch of the department. Is the hon. member referring to a medal of this war?

Mr. STIRLING: No. I take it it was the first great war.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will give me the name I shall see to it at once.

Item agreed to.

Normal services—
178. Battlefields memorials, $5,700.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice there are two small salaries here. What is being done with regard to these battlefields memorials? They are not accessible to us at the moment. Is a skeleton organization maintained?

Mr. RALSTON: The amount expended so far from the 1943-44 vote is $3,300, although the vote was $5,700. We make a contribution of $1,500 toward the salary of Colonel Osborne and $720 to his assistant. They keep in touch with the imperial war graves commission. We make provision for personnel in occupied countries to be paid when they can be paid. We have not been able to pay them this year, but we have paid out altogether $3,300.

Mr. COLDWELL: You will have some obligations to meet at the end of this war.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know the minister will be guarded in his reply to the question I am about to ask. Has the minister any information as to whether or not the Vimy memorial is still intact?

Mr. RALSTON: I have no official information about it, no. I have reason to think it is. The Vimy caretaking personnel is scattered in occupied countries. We know the caretaker and the assistant caretaker are in an internment camp. They have been in the employ of the commission for approximately twenty years. We are making provision here in case they should find their way to Great Britain in order that we may be able to look after them.

Mr. GRAYDON: You put aside their payments?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—
179. Civil pensions—Robert Allen, $269.52.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister tell the committee what protection there is for a member of the reserve army who is injured while carrying on his military duties? There seems to be some concern about that question. In these days men of the reserve army are getting far more training than they did before the war, and they are dealing with many types of weapons. In some cases they are getting battle training, and apparently there are many accidents. My understanding is that there must be a court of inquiry where a man is hurt. The report is referred to the brigade and eventually to Ottawa. In some cases men are not allowed any compensation at all. In all cases there is a long delay. I have been told that at best all they can get is hospital treatment and reserve army pay. The suggestion has been made to me that when they are in hospital or while they are laid up, the least they should get is active service pay and allowances for themselves and their dependents, or there should be some scheme similar to workmen's compensation to protect them. Will the minister tell us what the situation is in that respect?

Mr. RALSTON: I remember a case in New Brunswick. I am under the impression that such provision is made in these cases, and that the personnel are pensionable if the accident is attributable to service. I shall look into the matter. It really does not come under this item. My hon. friend may ask me about it later. I shall furnish the information to him. It really comes under the department of my colleague, the Minister of Pensions and National Health. I am quite satisfied they are provided for in case of accident occurring in training. I shall tell my hon. friend what are the provisions.

Mr. GRAYDON: The various items are composed of pensions which would not ordinarily go through, I presume, and for which some good reason has been advanced.

Mr. RALSTON: That is so. They are civilian employees.

Item agreed to.

184. Civil pensions—Mrs. Alice Smuck, $480.

Mr. GRAYDON: None of these are new items, are they? They were passed last year and are the same this year?

Mr. RALSTON: The first one relates to an accident which occurred in 1916. The pension has been paid ever since. The last one relates to an accident which occurred in 1935. They have all been voted for a number of years.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think these are old pensioners. Has anything been done to assist them?

Mr. RALSTON: No; these are civilian employees who were not pensioned.

Mr. COLDWELL: They are not pensioned employees, but they have had long service; is that right?

Mr. RALSTON: They have had long civilian service and are paid compensation on account of accidents.

Mr. COLDWELL: Compassionate?

Mr. RALSTON: As a matter of grace.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the increase in the cost of living, has any adjustment been made to assist them? These pensions are very small; two of them are less than what is paid under the Old Age Pension Act. I wondered if any consideration had been given to granting these old employees—I take it they are old employees—something to assist them in view of the increase in the cost of living.

Mr. RALSTON: No. Take, for instance, the Allen case. That accident occurred in 1916; the Pettipas accident in 1916. My hon. friend will realize that the dollar is worth more now than it was then. I do not think there is any doubt about that, as far as purchasing power is concerned. The Walker case occurred in 1927, the Townsend case in 1917, the Mountain case in 1926 and the Smuck case in 1935. To answer my hon. friend directly, no consideration has been given to making any change.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hoped we had reached a more generous spirit in this war than in the last.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has consideration been given by the treasury board to the question of cost-of-living bonuses for pensioners?

Mr. RALSTON: There has been consideration given; that is all I can say to my hon. friend. I do not like to speak for that august body.

Mr. GRAYDON: I fancy it is more popular not to be its champion. I understand that.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is the last item of these particular estimates, and I should like to ask the minister a question. I do not expect an answer now; it will take some time to get the information, but would he later on advise the committee where in the auditor general's report I can find the details as to the names and so on of the persons referred to in these various items, and the amount in each case?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall find that out.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to congratulate the government and the particular officials responsible for again giving the house such explicit reports as are now contained in the public accounts. I wish also to thank the hon. member for Temiscouata who first brought the matter up in this house and requested that greater information be given. I supported his request, and I believe the hon. member for York-Sunbury also asked that the information be full and complete. I just cannot see in the public accounts the exact details of these items, however, and I should like to have that later.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I notice that last year and again this year the contribution to cadet corps comes under the war appropriation. Will the minister tell the committee why that has been done?

Mr. RALSTON: Because that was regarded distinctly as a war activity.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was just wondering if it was considered that this grant would not be continued after the war. It seems to me it should be part of the civil estimates, and I do not quite understand why it should be dealt with in this way—

Mr. RALSTON: That is the answer.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): —unless it was very much enlarged.

Mr. RALSTON: By the same reasoning the fact that active army pay and allowances and engineering services were taken out of the civil estimates and put under the war appropriation might indicate to my hon. friend, if he were suspicious, that we were not going to have any active army or engineering services after the war, but that is not the case. I assure him that the cadet services have been put under the war appropriation in order that they might receive recognition as part of our war activities.

Perhaps the committee would permit me to refer to something I said yesterday which I should like to elaborate, because I am afraid the way Hansard has it—and I am sure Hansard has it the way I said it, because Hansard does not generally make mistakes—a wrong impression might be given. I was speaking in reply to the hon. member for St. Paul's, as to the activities we were carrying on to see that at the time of their discharge men were given information with regard to what were their rights. At page 624 of Hansard I said:

> My hon. friend is quite right in saying that when a man gets out of the army he does not know where to go next. He expects somebody to send for him, and they are apt to send for him after the papers have been signed and he has gone away.

I do not want that to be taken as a statement of the picture as we have it now. That is a statement of the situation we have done everything we can to cure. I want the committee to realize that my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health and I both feel that it just is not good enough to send for a man after his papers have been signed and he has gone away. What we want is to see that the officers of both departments try to give the man all the information in plenty of time, so that he may know exactly what are his rights, as far as we can help him to do so, and what are the possibilities of getting employment or getting pension or getting treatment, under the regulations.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I thank the minister for his statement. The reason I brought up the question was that I felt in the past there had not been sufficient contact between pensions and national health and national defence in regard to this matter, and I am glad to hear that this situation is being corrected.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can assure my hon. friend that we are working together closely now.

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of Pensions and National Health tells me that in addition to being interviewed each man is given by his paymaster a little slip which has been prepared, indicating the rehabilitation benefits for men of all three services. What I was trying to deal with, however, was what I regarded as the army's obligation not only to see that pensions and national health does what has been arranged, but also to see that we did our own job before the man went out of the army altogether.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—
1. Departmental administration, $130,406.

Mr. PERLEY: I think it is customary for the minister to make a general statement before any discussion takes place on his estimates. Is he going to follow that procedure to-day?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I had not intended to make any extensive statement, Mr. Chairman. I think it will be remembered that I did not do so (last year) and I do not recall what I did the year before. I should like to call attention to the fact, however, that the estimates for this year are almost identical with those of last year. They are some slight changes, but not to any great extent.

Mr. SENN: Except for one item.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume the one item to which my hon. friend refers is the wheat acreage reduction. Even last year the estimates did not show the amount to be paid out under wheat acreage reduction; that was provided in the legislation itself. I should like to say, however, that the decision has been reached this year not to continue wheat acreage reduction, so that while the amount is shown in the estimates in exactly the same way as it was shown last year, when we indicated that some $26,000,000 would be paid out for this purpose, this year I shall indicate to the committee that no amount beyond what is shown in these estimates is expected to be paid out under this item. In other words there are some payments that will have to be made after the end of this fiscal year, and they will come out of this amount.

In addition there are expenditures made by the department of Agriculture out of the war appropriation, which of course are not shown in these estimates. If at all possible I should like hon. members to confine their discussion to the estimates now before the committee. There may be overlapping in some cases, which may require that the same questions be answered twice, but I think we can give more intelligent answers if we stay pretty close to these estimates while we are discussing them. The other matters can be fully discussed when the other items are under consideration by the committee. Apart from this I have nothing in particular to say at this time.

Mr. SENN: I wish the minister would elaborate a little on the connection between the war estimates and these civil estimates. After all, under the war appropriation a number of boards have been set up which are connected closely with the department of Agriculture, and it is difficult to know exactly when we are referring to the one and when to the other. Could the minister let us know a little more definitely the relationship between these estimates? There are a number of these boards; it is not necessary for me to mention them. If the minister does not wish us to go into the war estimates at all, he might explain the situation a little more fully, so that we may know just where we stand.

Mr. GARDINER: One board which has been in existence ever since the war started is the agricultural supplies board. It is true that the officials of that board are officials of the Department of Agriculture. We shall be discussing personnel in connection with these estimates, and that personnel will be found on those boards, or connected with them. But the expenditures actually made in connection with the different agreements made with Britain are amounts provided under the War Measures Act, and I think we would discuss those at another time to better advantage than we can while these estimates are before the committee.

Under the agricultural supplies board comes the bacon board, now known as the meat board. For the first three years of the war it was known as the bacon board, but the name has since been changed. Then we have the dairy products board, and the special products board, all of which operate under the agricultural supplies board, and with funds provided out of the war vote. The only other board about which we might speak in that connection is the food board, which has as its chairman the Deputy Minister of Agriculture. The food board, however, carries on its activities with funds provided from other sources. The officials in the Department of Agriculture naturally have the information respecting these other matters. They may not have it with them when we are discussing these items, but to the extent that questions are asked, the answers to which may be necessary for a reasonable discussion of the estimates, we shall try to answer. I hope, however, that there will not be an extensive discussion on the other items until we reach them.

Mr. SENN: The minister of course in his department assumes responsibility for what is done by these different boards.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: And to a very great extent the Department of Agriculture is responsible for the information supplied to those boards, and upon which they render their decisions.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: So that I cannot understand how some overlapping could be avoided.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask a question with respect to the food board. The minister may decide that my question would more properly relate to the agricultural supplies board. I have in mind the conference held last fall, under the supervision of the agricultural supplies board, to decide upon the various amounts of agricultural productions for 1944. I believe it was decided at that conference that Canada in 1944 should not increase her wheat acreage production, but should endeavour to maintain the acreage she had in 1943. At the same time our neighbours to the south in the United States were asked to increase their wheat acreage production in 1944 by at least twenty-four per cent. When one considers that the four major wheat exporting countries, according to estimates published, used approximately 464,000,000 bushels of wheat for feeding live stock in 1942, on account of the shortage of usual feeding supplies, one wonders at this condition. I believe it is agreed among our experts that if we have a dry season in western Canada the best cereal crop is wheat, and that we would have much better success in attempting to grow wheat, even if used for feeding purposes, than in attempting to grow oats or barley.

Our own wheat storage has been greatly decreased. In fact, figures for the past year show that the decrease is approximately twenty-five per cent. While a year ago the wheat storage was more than 463,000,000 bushels, the present storage is only 348,000,000. At the same time our storage supplies of coarse grains have increased by twenty-three per cent from more than 61,000,000 bushels to 75,000,000. As I have pointed out, the United States have asked for an increase. On January 1, 1943, they had in storage about 268,000,000 bushels of wheat and on January 1 of this year that amount had been reduced to 92,000,000. Only a few days ago in the house the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced a sale of 175,000,000 bushels of wheat to the United States, for the current year 1944. It must be clear to anyone that there will be a very small carry-over of wheat this year, either in the United States or in Canada.

Moreover, the last issue of the Economic Annalist, published in February, 1944, and reaching my desk in to-day's mail, points out that—

> The conference of the united nation's relief and rehabilitation administration which took place at Atlantic city during the latter part of November, 1943, was the second important international gathering held in the United States during world war II. The first, the conference on food and agriculture had already established a working basis for close and continued collaboration among all the united nations. In setting up the UNRRA, the united nations agreed to bring relief to victims of war immediately upon liberation of the countries enslaved by the enemy. According to the estimates, total import requirements for Europe from all sources will amount to over 45 million tons of foodstuff, feeds, oils, fat, chemicals, fertilizers, rubber, wood, paper, hides, leather, clothing, coal, metals, minerals, machinery, vehicles, seeds, drugs and hospital supplies. One of Canada's major contributions will be food—especially wheat.

In the same issue Doctor Black summarizes his analysis of food production by saying that—

If labour is short as at present, we should get our calories so far as possible from cereals.

I do not like to take issue with the able experts on the board, or with the gentlemen before the minister to-day. It does seem to me however that in view of these facts, when our western wheat producers can produce wheat under natural land and climate condition much more easily than they can produce anything else, they should now be asked to increase their wheat acreage. In view of the weather conditions in these winter months it would not appear to me that we will have anything like as much precipitation or moisture in 1944 as we had in the last two years. I should like to have a more complete statement from the minister. I do not know what his personal views are about the present situation, but our producers are preparing for their spring operations, and any information they could get would be useful at this time. If the minister believes some change should be made, the producers should be told. If there is any reason why they should not increase their acreage, he should tell us why, because it must be apparent to all that the production could be used both for the winning of the war and for the feeding of people in the overrun countries immediately after the war.

My namesake, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, pointed out about a year ago that before the end of the next year we might easily have a shortage of cereals in North America. Judging from these figures I should think his prediction might not be far wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: The statement made respecting the facts related to the conference are pretty much as indicated by the hon. member. The acreage under wheat in 1943 was 17,488,000 acres. The objective for 1944 is 17,500,000, or 100 per cent of the 1943 figure. The production figure for 1943 is the actual acreage we had in that year. The figures for oats are 17,405,000 acres for 1943 and 16,377,000 for 1944. For barley the figure is approximately the same; the 1944 acreage is 101 per cent of the 1943. For mixed grains the figure is 120 per cent of the 1943 acreage; for rye, 87 per cent, and for corn, 153 per cent. For hay and clover we are asking the same, and also for alfalfa.

Those are the figures with regard to wheat and feed grains and forage crops. We are asking approximately the same for all important crops. Corn for husking is not a big crop in Canada. There were 257,000 acres in this crop in 1943 and we are asking for 393,000 acres in 1944. While that is up 53 per cent it does not represent a considerable acreage. In answering the question asked by the hon. member if I were confining my discussion of grains largely to the first three items, I think I shall have pretty well covered the picture. The wheat and oats and barley acreages will be approximately the same as far as this country is concerned. The wheat acreage will be 100 per cent of the 1943 acreage; the oat acreage, 106 per cent, and the barley, 101 per cent. Those are the main crops we utilize for feeding purposes.

The suggestion has been made that at a conference held in the United States certain decisions were reached. An agreement has been signed by the four exporting nations, namely, Australia, the Argentine, the United States and Canada together with Britain. That agreement was signed some time ago and was announced through the press. Under it certain provisions were made for the establishment of price levels toward the end of the war and as to acreages in the different countries. The most important feature of the acreage agreement is the one which relates to wheat acreage reduction. We were parties to that agreement; we signed it at the time.

Since that time there have developed some changes in Canada and the United States which have perhaps made it necessary in certain areas to depart from a strict interpretation of the terms of the agreement. It is possible that this is true in the United States. If I recall correctly, in the United States they asked their farmers to increase their acreage in wheat and feed grains by some 14,000,000 acres. In some places that has been interpreted as an expressed desire on the part of the United States government that the wheat acreage should be increased by 14,000,000. As I understand it, the intention in the United States was that 14,000,000 more acres of land should be seeded this year in order to provide feed for live stock. In so far as the growing of wheat to be used to provide food for human beings is concerned, I assume that they are following very much the idea contained in the agreement signed two or three years ago.

As the hon. member for Souris has stated, it is true in certain sections of western Canada that as many if not more pounds of feed can be grown in a dry area by seeding wheat rather than oats or barley. I think I can say that is true from experience. I do not think any objection would be taken—I suppose it would not make very much difference if we did take objection—to farmers seeding wheat.

Certainly no serious objection would be taken to the seeding of wheat as a substitute for barley for feeding purposes. That was the intention of the United States request to their farmers—to get more feed for live stock.

However, that is not what was in our minds when we discussed the matter in the conference. What was in our minds was whether we required more wheat for the purpose of providing flour with which to feed human beings. The hon. member for Souris has said that it is stated that the greatest contribution Canada is to make under U.N.R.R.A. is to supply wheat, but that contribution is to be only 25,000,000 bushels. Anyone looking at the figures of wheat supplies in Canada or wheat production will realize just what little effect one way or another the provision of 25,000,000 bushels of wheat would have upon our supply. At the time these discussions were being carried on we had 604,000,000 bushels carried over from preceding years. That represents about two years of average crops. At that time we had another crop which was being marketed and which is still being marketed. Therefore it was not considered wise when we had about three years' supply of wheat on hand to say to people this year that they should seed a greater acreage of wheat than they had last year. As a matter of fact, we asked them to seed the same acreage as they had last year. In so far as we have been able to study the statistics that come before us from time to time, we have not seen any reason up to date for changing that position. We thought it wise that our farmers should not seed more acreage this year for the production of wheat to be marketed for human consumption than they had seeded in 1943.

The question of feed is a different matter. We are asking our people to seed approximately a million more acres in oats, and we are asking them to seed approximately the same acreage in barley, or just a little more. We believe that with the carryover we have in the country at the present time our position will be well taken care of if our people follow these directions for 1944.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will there be a carryover if we supply the United States with what they require in feed and wheat?

Mr. GARDINER: The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that the United States were prepared to take 175,000,000 bushels of wheat if we could get the shipping facilities to take it to them. Up to date no transportation organization has been able to assure us that facilities can be supplied to handle 175,000,000 bushels. It will be apparent that 175,000,000 bushels, plus the 25,000,000 bushels spoken of a moment ago, total only 200,000,000 bushels, or one-third of what we carried into this crop year. Assuming that we have a poor crop next year—no one in the west ever assumes that until we actually have it; we always assume we are going to have a fair crop—the figures might look different next fall, but they certainly would not look sufficiently different to put us in the position of being short of feed in Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That carryover already has been greatly reduced.

Mr. GARDINER: It is being reduced by certain wheat that is being shipped out.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the European market be larger than it was?

Mr. GARDINER: We are hoping it will, but we are, of course, not the only suppliers of that market.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister give the committee any figures with regard to the world picture of production—stocks, and probable demand?

Mr. GARDINER: The best information which can be had under war conditions is that there is no indication from crop conditions throughout the world this year that there is any pending shortage of grain. Of course we all know that, with armies moving, weather is not the only thing which counts.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are now dealing with the first item, within the purview of which, naturally, may be discussed the general ramifications of the Department of Agriculture.

I have no desire at the moment to take the time of the committee with any general observations in connection with the matter. I rise for the single purpose of pointing out that during the last session of parliament, in the discussion of the agriculture estimates, there was brought to the minister's attention a matter which merits a little more consideration than the estimates would indicate it has received. I do not suppose that in many years as much interest has been shown in any suggestion respecting a vote in the house as there was in the suggestion last year that half a million dollars should be put aside for research laboratories and facilities for agricultural research in Canada. Many communications were received from agricultural sections regarding suggestions for the expenditure of this money in research for the benefit of agriculture. There is a feeling throughout the country that agriculture has not been able to keep abreast with other lines of industry in regard to improvements and development. It is all very well to say that urban industry looks after its own research. Industry is in a very much better position to look after its own research than agriculture is. First of all, manufacturing industry is much more concentrated. Then, much of the money expended for this purpose is set aside by large concerns having their own research facilities. Further, the advantages of this research are sooner or later extended to branches of industry which perhaps are less fortunately placed. So far as the farmer is concerned he is not organized to the same extent to do that. It may be that in the future there will be some organization of a nature which will enable the farmer to make his contribution in a collective way to the advancement of research facilities, but for the moment that does not seem possible, at any rate on a very large scale. So that it becomes pretty definitely the obligation of the government to see that research facilities, laboratories or whatever may be needed, are provided through government assistance.

I noticed that last year a good deal of interest was taken in, and much support given to, the suggestion that a sufficiently large sum of money be set aside for this purpose. In the debate, which took place much nearer the end of the session than the present debate, many hon. members representing agricultural constituencies rose to express approval of the suggestion which was made. But as I look through the items of the estimates, both in the war appropriation measure and in the civil estimates which are now before us, I have not been able to find anything of a satisfactory or comprehensive nature with respect to any advance so far as those science services are concerned under which, I assume, the vote would occur. I notice a paragraph in the speech from the throne which says that "provision will be made to expand research activities." I have not a great hope that the speech from the throne, when it is brought down to earth, will look quite as attractive as when it remained up in the skies, in the clouds. Nevertheless I urge the minister and the government not to let the session pass without a substantial amount of money being set aside for agricultural research purposes. We must not under any circumstances fly in the face of agricultural opinion, which is insisting, in a way that agriculture seldom insists, upon this action. I want to summon every bit of emphasis I can to impress upon the minister the importance of his dealing with this matter. There may be a ray of hope in the paragraph of the speech from the throne which calls for an expansion of research activities. If that expansion covers other lines of activity as well as agriculture, I think agriculture should be given the very top place.

I leave the matter with the minister this afternoon. I was unable to discover in the details of the estimates where this vote is to be found. For that reason I rise on the general item in order that the minister may be apprised of this urgent necessity. I do not think a day's delay should be countenanced in seeing to it that this most important contribution by the government to agriculture is made. It may be that the government does not want to go as far as was suggested in the session last year, but in my opinion not only is it justified in going that far but, if necessary, should go farther. The government must recognize that for many years the need has existed for this move to be made. It is strange that the governments of to-day and of yesterday have not recognized the urgent and essential nature of such provision for our agricultural populations. I am ready to lend every possible encouragement to the government in seeing to it that research for agriculture is not neglected, but that proper provision is made for it during this session.

Mr. GARDINER: The paragraph following item 32, namely, "appropriation not required for 1944-45, $200,000", is the item which was placed in the supplementary estimates last year to provide for certain research work and the putting in of pilot plants relative to research in connection with agriculture. That item was only partly spent last year. Provision was made for the expenditure of some of it, but the expenditure is not yet completed. It may be necessary to bring down supplementaries later on to cover the expenditures which will be made this year in that connection. But on page 44 of the estimates there appears, under "trade and commerce", item 358, "expanded research on the utilization of farm crops, $325,000", one of two items under "national research council". That $325,000, together with what is expended under the other item when we come to deal with it in supplementaries, will make up a total somewhere between $325,000 and the $500,000 which has been spoken of.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that the carrying out of the provision in the speech from the throne?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; that is the intention, and I will explain why it is found where it is. Some years ago—I have not the exact date, but it was long before my time in Ottawa—the research council was set up. The objective which I understand that those who set it up had in mind was to bring all research under one national research council. That organization was supposed to have taken over a great deal of the research work which previously had been carried on in the Department of Agriculture, and all research work generally that had been carried on by the different departments of government, and considerable new research work was added to its activities.

There has always been a certain amount of discussion as to whether agricultural research can be as successfully carried on in an organization of that kind as it would be under a purely agricultural set-up. I was not present in the committee last year when the matter was discussed and it was recommended that half a million dollars be expended on research in connection with agricultural products, and I am therefore not in a position to say what views hon. members expressed on that question. Finally, however, $200,000 was put in the agriculture estimates last year, and in the meantime a committee was appointed which was composed of persons right across Canada, under the chairmanship of the president of the university of Alberta, and of which the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) served as a member. They made certain recommendations as to how moneys voted for this purpose might be expended, or on what works they might be used.

Out of these discussions there has grown this vote which is placed in the Department of Trade and Commerce under national research council for the purpose of doing research work in connection with farm products to determine exactly what is stated here—"research on the utilization of farm crops." On the question whether there should be additional amounts in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to carry on some more practical work in connection with the development of ideas found by research, that is something which perhaps the members of the committee might wish to discuss, but any money voted for that particular purpose would have to be voted this session in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. GRAYDON: The reasons why I expected to find the vote in the estimates for agriculture were very well grounded, and that was the plan or scheme which was suggested by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, who brought up the question last year and was strongly supported by many members of the committee. The idea was to have a chain of laboratories across Canada for the purpose of doing this agricultural work. It had not occurred to me, but perhaps the minister, on consideration, may have felt that the vote could be more effectively spent by utilizing it through the research council.

I am not sure that the government's judgment on that point was very good. I am rather inclined to think that agriculture, at least as I understand from the general leanings, would like to have had, not only the amount here but whatever extended vote might be required, for work to be carried on through their own operations and within their own field. The minister will see why that should be, and I would point out that perhaps, in a reconsideration of the whole research field, that might be done.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There are a few general remarks I wish to make on agriculture. When the minister, with much gusto, proclaims that the farmer finds himself in a splendid position, and tries to create the impression that everything is well with agriculture, I think we should remember that it has only been in the fifth year of the war that the farmer's return for his labour has begun to show any proper relation to his cost of production.

The farmer in this country is to be complimented upon the work he has done. The production figures for Canada are figures to which we can point with pride and satisfaction, and the fact that labour shortages have existed only reveals the extent to which the older people have taken on the burden of producing food for our men as well as for the civilian population in this time of stress. If, however, we visited the farm homes across Canada we would find the people living in those homes not as well cared for as one would suppose they would be, looking over the slight increases in the farmer's income over the past year.

For twelve years, in most parts of Canada, this industry has suffered from a depression from which it will take years and years to recover. For the past twelve years there have existed in Canada conditions that should not exist in any country. In New Brunswick there are farmers who delivered barrels of potatoes containing over three bushels and sold them at twenty cents a barrel, and in many cases they could not sell their potatoes even at that price. Over long periods of depression agriculture finds itself in the position where it has constantly to meet debt costs, production costs and taxation, and these are not cancelled at the end of each year but are carried on indefinitely so that there has been irreparable loss which years of prices above parity will not offset.

The figures placed on the record the other evening by the hon. member for Melfort showed the extent to which farmers and farming communities have lost equity in their homes. Farm homes which were previously the property of the men who did the work have been taken over by the mortgage companies, and in far too many cases these people will continue renting from the mortgage companies and will remain from now on tenants on their land. These losses can never be restored.

We must remember that our prosperity to-day is the result of a world conflict. The prices which we receive now are due to the fact that in Canada we have a market and that there are unusual circumstances at the present time. This machinery of ours, the system under which we operate, works all right in war time, but we are paying the price to keep the machinery working. There is the blood of our young men, the flower of our youth, which is being sacrificed from day to day, and which makes possible war, and the prices received at this time.

Agricultural prosperity is the very basis of national prosperity. We have not recognized that in the past. The Canadian wheat market has lagged for some time far behind the markets of the world; it was only in the fall of 1943 that we saw the Canadian markets catching up with those in the United States, and then the government stepped in and by order in council closed the grain exchange on wheat and prevented the farmer from receiving the value he might have obtained from the sale of his product.

It seems to me what we need in this whole set-up of agriculture itself and all those industries which are dependent upon it, is a new outlook, a new purpose. The purpose has to be the welfare of the producers and consumers who make up the majority of the population of our country. The basis upon which we should judge the success of the Department of Agriculture should be the living conditions of those engaged in that industry. If we were to use that as the basis of our judgment of the Department of Agriculture there is no doubt as to the verdict. It has failed entirely. If it is to be judged by the standard of living of the operators of the grain exchanges, those who run and operate the packing houses, the millers, the finance and mortgage loan companies, the bank directors and machine companies, then we can say that the agricultural industry of Canada has been a great success. The farmer who produces the product has no control at all of the price at which it shall be sold. The grain exchange, which was permitted to operate for years in the city of Winnipeg, dictated to him the price he was to receive for his toil. The milling industries, closely interlocked with the banking and financial interests of this country through directorships, received the product of his toil, sold it to the consumers east and west, placed a price on bread to the baker, and the consumers paid their price for the farmer's product. The consumer and the producer should be working together in cooperative organizations, interlocked with wholesale cooperatives, to see that each got his proper share of the toil of the other, to exchange their toil on equitable terms and not allow those in the middle to clean up.

The farmer who raises stock must hand his product over to the packers and they control the prices. Recently a group of farmers in western Canada had a large quantity of feed cattle—cows in this case—ready for the market. They were told that there was no price on the market, no market there. The impression was created among those people that there was no room in the packing plants for those cattle. But we find that the packing companies were around offering seven and a half cents a pound for them. There must have been room somewhere. The packers tried to create the idea that there was a scarcity of room in the packing plants, or that there were no facilities for transportation, or something like that, but all the time there was a below-market price being offered by the packing companies. That seems to point to the fact that there is need of some control somewhere. Apparently they can create surpluses when they are required, and all kinds of excuses can be used.

The milk producers find themselves in the same position when they try to sell dairy products to the large private monopolistic organizations that handle dairy products in the cities. The fruit producers found, although they did organize a cooperative in the Okanagan valley, that when they came to sell their products there was only one avenue through which to sell them and at a low price, in most cases a price below the cost of production. When the consumer comes to buy that commodity in the market the price is at the top. The same thing applies to farm machinery. When the agricultural producer goes to buy anything in the way of farm machinery he finds that apparently there is an agreement between companies with regard to prices. These things should not be. When it comes to repairs the price continues to rise year after year. Apparently there is no control, no price ceiling. The farmers should have cooperative organizations whereby they could manufacture their own farm machinery and own their own factories. That seems to be about the only solution.

When the farmer requires financial aid he has to go to the bank or the mortgage company. When wheat is at $2 a bushel money is loose. The farmer may borrow a couple of thousand dollars and believes he will need only 1,000 bushels of wheat to pay off the debt.

But he finds when he comes to pay off the debt a few years later, that the price has gone away down. Instead of 1,000 bushels taking care of the debt he finds he has to grow 5,000, 6,000 or 8,000 bushels. Interest rates are away beyond what they should be. Mortgage and loan companies make him sign agreements containing clauses that are almost criminal. Legal fees are permitted which are disgraceful. The farmer finds himself constantly in debt. There are clauses in the agreement which make it almost impossible for him to meet his obligations, and foreclosure is usually the ultimate result.

When war broke out the government froze the price of commodities at one level and left the farmer's cost of production away higher than the price at which the commodity had to be sold. The farmer, realizing how he was the victim of so much exploitation, organized cooperatives in an attempt to solve the problem. Large groups organized cooperatively and said, we must enter into the purchasing field and control the sale of our commodities; we must have something to do with the sale of our products. The first thing they found was that it was opposed in almost every direction. The history of the Saskatchewan Cooperative Wheat Pool is a record of attempts by farmers to solve this problem in the marketing field in a cooperative way. They attempted to sell their products and return the actual sale of the products to those who produced them, so that all would share equally in the fruit of the toil. However, they found there were regulations set up against them. The grain board decided to step into the field. Storage facilities were required. Government regulations soon stepped in and prevented the farmer from delivering his grain to his own elevator at his own point. He was told there was a shortage of cars when he wanted to sell his grain to his own pool elevator. He was told: "You cannot sell your wheat to your own elevator. Since your elevator is filled you have to sell to those other line elevator companies. We will not permit you—"

Mr. GARDINER: He did not have to sell it at all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: "We will not permit you to sell it there because the elevator space is used up."

Mr. GARDINER: He did not have to sell it; the government took it over at an advance.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He still has to deliver the grain to the line elevators.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is there not a shortage of cars?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why should that distribution be used to militate against the farmers cooperative organization?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It has not.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why did they not allocate the cars in proportion to the business which these companies did in 1938, 1939 and 1940?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They received their fair share.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No, they did not. If you look over the records you will find that during the past year, instead of the cooperative business increasing as it should have year by year, and as it had done since 1935, the percentage of grain handled by the Saskatchewan pool elevator companies has gradually decreased. That decrease has taken place since the wheat board regulations came in, and the regulations with regard to the allotment of cars were put into force. Had the normal trend of business continued its upward graph their increase should have been almost sixty per cent of grain handled in 1943.

Mr. GARDINER: The distribution is based on 1938-39.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are they getting cars on that rating?

Mr. GARDINER: At the present time, yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No. That is what they were informed was going to happen last July, but suddenly an emergency situation developed. The government said: We must have six million bushels out right away, the railway companies will take it wherever they can; and the car allotment cycle was all broken up. Then they said they were going to use the 1938-39 basis, and apparently the allotment committee has ceased to function. They are permitting the railway officials at each point to distribute cars as they see fit. We are told that the thing is to be handled on a quota basis, and that the quota system has been put in operation. But, though they fixed quotas for various points throughout the west, we find that cars are not available at these points even to fill those quotas. However, I believe this comes under the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I can deal with it when his estimates are before the committee.

It seems to me that through government boards the advantage has always been given to the ordinary grain trade, to the line elevator companies and the milling companies which have their elevators buying grain at country points. It seems that assistance is always given to the operators of large businesses on the grain exchange. The same thing appears to be true in the packing industry. There is a floor placed under beef and pork, but there is no floor placed under cattle or hogs, which are what the farmer has to sell. If we could have an independent investigation of what has been happening in the meat packing industry in Canada; if we could ascertain the facts in regard to costs, processing, the returns to the packing firms—which in recent years have been amalgamating so that there are fewer and fewer companies in the business—and so on we would find out things that would shock every producer and consumer in this country. If the department and the government were operating in the interests of the producer and consumer they would curtail the activities of those who are exploiting the producers of this land. Apparently the government is not only condoning the actions of these people; in its legislation and regulations it appears to aid and abet and legalize their operations. The result has been quite a rapid deterioration of the rural areas across this dominion, these small rural places which were the centre of good living in this country. What is required is the establishment of parity prices, not only for the duration of the war and six months after, but for three or four years ahead at a time. There should be proper producer representation on the marketing boards. We should not have the government pick out some people they want to have representing the producers; we should have the producers themselves meet democratically and select from their own organizations those who would represent their point of view and their interests on these boards.

I think one of the most effective contributions that could be made by the government to assist agriculture at this time would be the setting up of government or cooperative abattoirs throughout the country, where large surpluses of meat could be properly processed and held in storage, so that a large bank of food might be built up for the years of world scarcity which must necessarily follow this war; for the longer the war lasts the greater will be the need for such relief.

We should have the establishment on a cooperative basis of credit corporations and marketing and processing plants for each branch of agriculture, and assistance should be given those farmers who have endeavoured to organize their own cooperative farm machinery plants.

Governmental machinery should be set up for the proper estimation of the world supply and the world production. We know that in Argentine and other parts of the world cattle production is being increased to an extent almost equal to the increase that has taken place in Canada. A long-range view must be taken of the possible world requirements and world production, in order to see what may be Canada's part in supplying the world with the food it is going to require.

I believe we should also take into consideration the nutritional standards and needs of this country of ours. Recent surveys made by service organizations and clubs throughout the country reveal some shocking conditions in regard to the nutrition of our people. Surely a country which can produce in one year ten times more wheat than it can eat should not be a land in which malnutrition and want prevail. What is wrong with this country of ours, when in almost every city we had thousands of people in need of food? Just before the war we found that in a place like Saint John, New Brunswick, there was considerable want and privation because the people were unable to obtain the food they required, while within a hundred miles of that city farmers growing potatoes could not get rid of them at fifteen or twenty cents for a three-bushel barrel. When we see things like that we realize that there must be something wrong with the distribution of foodstuffs in this country. There seems to be no purpose at all, no definite aim in connection with providing our people with the things they require. It seems to be a matter of enterprise, saying, "Well, let us get control of the food and we will deliver it if there is money in it. If we cannot get our price the people will not eat. If the people cannot pay for it or if we cannot get our profit from both the producer and the consumer, then they can do without".

In regard to the matter of research, government assistance in this connection is long overdue, but there is something more needed. For far too long the benefits of the work done by the research laboratories of this and other countries have not been made available to the people themselves. Some private concern gets hold of the patent rights to a particular process and holds it up, saying, "Well, if it is going to interfere with our own industry we shall not let it be used". In other words, if synthetic rubber is going to interfere with rubber business, stop it; if the making of alcohol is going to interfere with the oil business, do not make the process available except at our price. But there are countries that are making progress along this line, and Canada had better wake up. There are countries where the benefits of science and research are being made available to the people as a whole. There are countries that are beginning to use their natural resources for the benefit of all the people, where the concern of the department of agriculture and other government departments is the welfare of the people and not the profits of the few. We should be setting our house in order now.

The experience of those people who laboured so hard for so many years, only to see their homes deteriorating and their equities disappearing, has created bitterness and resentment against those who have been responsible for the policies of this dominion in the past. A few promises made at election time or a few increases in prices every four years are not going to allay their fears or restore their faith in those who have been responsible for the policies of this country for so many years. The agriculturists of Canada have lost faith. It is plain that there must be a new purpose and new concern on the part of those who govern. The interests and welfare of those who work on the land must be considered before the interests of a few privileged people.

Increased tenancy across this land must be stopped. The welfare of agriculture is too closely linked up with the economy, health and social welfare of the people of Canada to be longer neglected. We have to stop the exploitation of those who to-day, apparently assisted by government regulations, are able to make themselves affluent at the expense and the toil of the producers in agriculture across this land.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before we commence a detailed discussion of the items I should like to bring to the attention of the minister two telegrams received from my own constituency, because they indicate that out there conditions in respect to the marketing of live stock are far from satisfactory.

The first of these telegrams is dated at Lethbridge, Alberta, February 16, and states:

> Our information indicates could conservatively expect 1275 to 1375 for lambs f.o.b. Choice fed lambs selling St. Paul 16 cents less duty two fifty freight one dollar add exchange 125. Our price now eleven cents and orders light only a few ewes moving at five cents which is ruinous. Cow situation materially improved but offering price for top steers has slipped to 1150 on instructions from Toronto heavy steers very draggy. Feed grain situation deteriorating rapidly due to heavy movement east and United States will be shipping grain back here before fall or else live stock will be liquidated. Government meddling seems to have no end but chaos. If moisture conditions do not improve beyond reasonable hope western stock men face a major disaster as result of this grain policy.

This is signed by C. O. Asplund, for the Lethbridge stock feeders' association.

I have another telegram which reached me this morning. It is dated at Magrath, Alberta, February 17, and is as follows:

> Lambs selling two dollars hundred less than last year little demand approximately twenty five thousand Welling Magrath and Spring Coulee lambs heavy should have gone weeks ago no buyers for fat ewes at any price serious situation heavy steers wanted last year this year small cattle wanted choice steers difficult to sell at lower price demand for cows slightly improved no hay oats or barley obtainable wheat prices out of line with live stock prices.

This is signed by E. Pingarie Tanner and Mayor H. Tilston Jones, president of the board of trade.

I have had this matter of selling finished live stock before parliament now for several days. I believe I first mentioned it on February 7. A few days ago the minister dealt with the matter in a rather optimistic manner, indicating that all was well. I point out that if we are to maintain our food production at a standard which will provide plenty for our people, and enable us to contribute as we ought to the rehabilitation of the conquered countries, certainly we must have more intelligence prevailing in the Department of Agriculture than has prevailed thus far in connection with live stock.

I do not know just what is the matter. I hate to think there is neglect or stupidity. I hate to think there is lack of vision; but certainly there is something dreadfully wrong, when we realize that there are 25,000 lambs in Welling, Magrath and Spring Coulee, just three places in my constituency, and that those lambs cannot be moved, although they should have gone long ago. When one thinks of the loss occasioned to feeders who have to keep that live stock in their corrals, awaiting sales, one realizes the extent to which public confidence is being destroyed.

In Canada we have a strange situation. We have had meatless Tuesdays for I do not know how long. We have had meat rationing, and people have been led to believe that there is a shortage. Now look at this! What are we to gather from a situation of this kind? I find myself utterly at a loss to understand. I have not discussed the question of sheep sales on other occasions, but have confined my remarks to beef. It seems to me that these two telegrams indicate a serious situation.

Another condition has evidently developed in western Canada as a result of what appeared to be a wise provision, namely, that of sending a quantity of our surplus grain to the east. I presume, for reasons which no one would have been expected to foresee, shortages have developed. We find one telegram complaining that they are unable to buy hay, oats or barley, to keep their cattle in good condition. That telegram comes from an area in which vast quantities of oats, wheat and barley are produced. Yet the grain has been moved out to the extent that they are now unable to buy it, and a serious condition has developed.

Before taking my seat I wish to discuss one other question, namely, that related to the beet sugar industry in Canada. I find myself completely confounded by the lack of interest in the welfare of our country manifested by many people in high places, so far as sugar production is concerned. I pointed out in 1936, and again in 1937, 1938 and 1939 what ought to be done in Canada in connection with sugar. But there was a number of wise smart Alecks who thought they knew all about it, and would not listen to anyone, in the belief that we had plenty of sugar. Now we see the position we are in! Sugar rationed painfully! Only five or six days ago the sugar controller announced that we might expect a worse condition, so far as sugar supplies are concerned, in 1944 and 1945. How can men who will allow conditions like that lay claim to having ordinary intelligence?

On behalf of the beet growers in western Canada requests have been made for a rebate of part of the excise tax levied against them, so as to enable them to cover the additional labour costs, trucking and other expenses which have grown out of the war. Thus far we have not had a word from the government. The Minister of Agriculture has not condescended to give us any information in the matter, and the Minister of Finance maintains a strict silence.

Mr. GARDINER: The Minister of Finance had intended at the opening of to-day's sitting to make a statement with respect to sugar. However, other matters intervened. He had to leave the chamber, and upon leaving he asked me if I would stand aside at eight o'clock long enough to permit him to make that statement. He will be here at eight o'clock to make it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I certainly appreciate that, because I am disturbed with regard to this matter. In Canada we are able to produce sugar of a very high quality, and at a very low price. There is no reason in the world why the people of this country should be short of sugar or should have to pay a high price for it. As I pointed out to the house in 1941, in 1937 the Canadian sugar factory at Raymond received less than four cents a pound for its sugar, and at that price made substantial profits for itself and the farmers. When hon. members compare four cents a pound with the price we have been paying for sugar, not only in 1937 but in subsequent years, they will realize that something is terribly wrong. Somebody is mismanaging the whole show. I am glad the minister announced that something is going to be done and I hope the rebate is to be given.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say what was to be done; I said an announcement would be made.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hope the announcement will indicate that the people in charge of the sugar affairs of Canada do not intend to penalize the Canadian people and make them go short of sugar when we can produce it in great abundance. I wished to bring these two matters to the attention of the minister and let him comment upon them as he sees fit. I do not think I shall say anything more at the present time.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have one or two observations to make in connection with what was said a little while ago by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) about research. It is well understood that the prosperity of agriculture and of industry is dependent upon the prosperity of each other. One hundred years ago four-fifths of the products of the farm were used by man; at the present time I understand only about one-third of these products are consumed by the people. Perhaps that is one of our difficulties to-day. We must get more people back on the farms and consume more.

I should like to point out that the chemical industry of the United States invests between two and four per cent of its receipts from sales in research. Agriculture in that country invests only one-seventh of one per cent of its revenue. That is an interesting comparison. In 1938 an act of congress established four regional laboratories in the United States which were to consider the problem of the industrial utilization of agricultural surpluses, by-products and waste products. The discoveries were to become the property of the nation under the general service patent regulations. I mention that only to indicate that the amount of money proposed to be spent by the minister on research is quite small. The results of such research affect not only the farmer but also the industrial worker in the city.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I should like to refer to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden). As I remember, his first statement was that Canada had lagged far behind the rest of the world in the price of wheat.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I said that the Winnipeg grain exchange had lagged behind.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): At any rate, that our price of wheat had lagged behind the rest of the world. A moment later the hon. member mentioned the price of wheat in the United States. I admit that the price of wheat in Canada is lower than the price in the United States, but it has been higher than in any other country during all the time the hon. member was speaking of.

Mr. GARDINER: Except Great Britain.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Except in Great Britain where it has been subsidized quite heavily.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I suppose European conditions would be satisfactory to the hon. member? I was just talking about the western hemisphere.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No doubt the hon. member does not remember what I say in this house at times, but last year I endeavoured to set out what I thought was the position in regard to the world grain situation. One of my hon. friends across the floor of the house mentioned that to-day and said I was about right in what I said last year. I am a little more careful about statements I make in regard to grain and farming and I think I know a little more about those things than my hon. friend. He has made some of the wildest statements in regard to all these things. Many such statements are made from the other side, or at least from that corner. The other day the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as reported on page 302 of Hansard, of February 9. He said:

> I want to remind the Minister of Trade and Commerce that about fifty-four per cent of the 1942 crop was sold by the farmers on the open market, and that they will get no benefit out of the participation certificates, or any increased price for that wheat.

One would think the hon. member for Weyburn knew what he was talking about when he said that, but that is not the fact. I doubt if my hon. friend knows more about the actual figures than I do, but I should like to make a prediction and I think it will be as true as any I ever made. I would say that there was under forty per cent of the 1942 crop sold on the open market and over sixty per cent sold to the wheat board. The farmers will get participation certificates on that sixty per cent or more sold to the wheat board. That is considerably different from fifty-four per cent.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is the information the chairman of the wheat board gave the agriculture committee last year.. The hon. member was a member of that committee.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I do not remember the chairman of the wheat board giving any such information as my hon. friend says he did. I do not think anyone has given the information he is speaking of. The wheat was not delivered at that time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The 1942 crop.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The 1942-43 crop; that is the 1942 crop. Every time the minister's estimates come up we have criticism year after year by my hon. friends. They have always criticized the policies brought down by the Minister of Agriculture. If they will go back and consider the position of agriculture in years gone by when different policies were brought down by the then Minister of Agriculture they will find that the present minister has been dead right all the time. When he brought down his policy of subsidizing the growing of coarse grains in western Canada my hon. friend and others criticized him sharply, but where would this country have been if he had not brought down such a policy and emphasized the growing of coarse grains for the feeding of live stock?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Who criticized that?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Members on that side of the house; many of them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Just look at Hansard. The hon. member for Yorkton has criticized the wheat board, but let me say that that board has done a remarkable job in handling the wheat of this country. The same can be said for our railway companies.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A good job for the line elevator companies.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend does not know the difference between the line elevator companies and the Winnipeg grain exchange. A moment ago he said that the Winnipeg grain exchange set the price of wheat. The Winnipeg grain exchange is simply a trading place for traders to get together and it has nothing to do with setting the price of wheat. It is the traders who come there who set the price of wheat when they trade one against the other. No one can set the price of wheat in this country when there is an open market. If we get into the position where we have the policies in force which my hon. friends want to put into force, they will be able to set the price of wheat and then—I was going to say, "God help the farmer if they ever do."

At six oclock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Progress reported.

EXCESS PROFITS

MODIFICATION OF LIMITATION OF TAX ADVANTAGE IN RESPECT OF CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS BY BUSINESS CONCERNS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): There are two brief statements which I think I should make to the house. The first is in respect of charitable donations.

The house will recall that on January 31 I made a statement indicating the government's intention to introduce at the time of the budget a measure limiting the tax advantage which may be obtained by a business concern making contributions to charitable organizations. I announced at that time that in respect of contributions subscribed after January 31, 1944, the tax advantage obtainable by a business concerned, whether corporate or otherwise, should not be greater than that obtained by a comparable business not subject to tax at the 100 per cent rate.

In the meantime I have received many representations from various organizations asking for clarification and expressing great concern over the possible effect of this proposed amendment on their ability to secure the funds needed to carry on their activities. As a result of these representations, and the quite widespread comment on this subject in the press and elsewhere, I should like to make a further statement on the matter.

First of all I should like to explain more fully and restate to the house the facts of the present situation relating to tax deductions in respect of charitable contributions which, to the government, seemed clearly to call for some safeguarding measure.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this only in connection with excess profits tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not income tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, that is right; it only affects business concerns. I think I had better not interject anything; it is quite clear.

The present law allows a business concern as a deduction in computing profits subject to tax an amount not exceeding 5 per cent of its income which has been paid by way of donation within the tax year to any charitable organization in Canada operated exclusively as such and not for the benefit of private gain or profit of any person. As a result of allowing this deduction in computing profits for tax purposes, the government forgoes collecting tax which would otherwise be due. In effect, then, the government can be said to be subsidizing charitable activities. Before the war, when the corporation income tax rate was 15 per cent, the government relinquished 15 cents of tax revenue on every dollar contributed to charity by the ordinary industrial corporation. To-day, when the minimum tax payable by corporations is 40 per cent, the government gives up at least 40 cents in tax for every dollar of charitable contributions made by the corporations. The minimum tax advantage to-day in making contributions to charity is more than two and one-half times greater than it was pre-war. It can scarcely be argued, then, I think, that the government incentive towards charitable giving is ungenerous or that the importance of maintaining the flow of donations is overlooked. It is true, of course, that the heavy weight of taxation, both on business concerns and individuals, leaves fewer dollars to devote towards charity, but while the weight of taxation has increased the incentive towards giving has likewise increased.

I have just referred to the case where a company is paying a 40 per cent tax rate. No problem can be said to exist in this situation. In making a contribution towards charity of, say, $100, the company is parting with $60 of shareholder money. The situation which gives rise to the problem, however, is where the business concern is paying tax at the rate of 100 per cent on excess profits. In this situation a contribution to charity reduces the company's tax bill by exactly the same amount. Under these circumstances the company which ostensibly makes a donation to charity is doing so entirely at the expense of the treasury. The company, of course, loses its right to a subsequent 20 per cent refund on the amount contributed. In the light of this situation it is easy to understand the statement which I made in the house on January 31 that business concerns are being solicited on a wholesale scale to make unusually large contributions to various non-profit organizations.

I think I need do no more than mention this situation in order for the house to see the necessity for some safeguarding provision beyond that now obtaining in the law. Otherwise the way is open for an abuse of the privileges in the law which could result in a very serious diversion of public funds into channels which, while extremely desirable in themselves, can in the war period scarcely be regarded as of an urgency equal to that of finding funds to finance the war.

For the reasons I have just stated the government does not feel it can depart from the general principle of the proposed limitation on the tax advantage to be secured by business concerns in making charitable contributions. The government is willing, however, to make a modification which I think effectively removes any possible criticism of the proposed restriction. The modification is intended to enable business concerns to continue without loss of tax advantage, the level of charitable giving which they had established prior to the coming into force of the 100 per cent excess profits tax rate.

I wish, therefore, to announce that the limitation of tax advantage which I proposed on January 31, 1944, will not affect any business whose total contributions in any year are not above the average of its donations in its last two fiscal years ending before July 1, 1942, which was the date when the 100 per cent excess rate came into effect.

For example, if a company made charitable contributions totalling $8,000 in one of these two years and $12,000 in the other, its average annual contribution for the two years would be $10,000. It will then be allowed to continue to receive the full tax advantage on $10,000 of contributions in fiscal periods ending after January 31, 1944.

The proposed limitation which I announced on January 31 will apply, however, when contributions made are above the average established by the record of 1940 and 1941, as referred to in what I have said. That is, the limitation will apply to that portion of the amount of contributions not subscribed on or before January 31, 1944, which results in the total amount contributed in the tax year of the business being in excess of the average amount contributed in the last two fiscal years of the business concern ending before July 1, 1942.

The present five per cent limitation with respect to the total volume of deductions allowed will, of course, continue to operate.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words, this means, prior to the time the tax went on, you are taking the previous two fiscal years as your base?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: And upon that base you are making your average so far as charitable welfare donations are concerned?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, yes. It goes further than that, though. I do not want to muddy the waters by impromptu explanations of what I have said, because every word has to be weighed. That base is taken, and if the donation is kept within that base, the full tax advantage is obtained in respect of the donation, just as the law has been up to now; but for any excess, the tax advantage is limited to 40 per cent of the donation.

Mr. GRAYDON: The balance, then, comes under the same category as the minister's statement indicated to the house some weeks ago?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is difficult to assess the exact amount of the advantage or modification which the minister has mentioned. I should not like to express myself with respect to that at the moment. At any rate it is not debatable, and I have no intention of doing more than simply making an observation with respect to it. But I am glad he has made an announcement, for the sake of many of the institutions that have been in touch, I know, with the minister and with hon. members generally, and have felt pretty keenly and severely changes which were being made, because I fancy that, apart altogether from the position in which they found themselves, the fact that it came very quickly upon them involved them in a good deal of difficulty in making their adjustments. I am hopeful that, if the minister finds that this is not a sufficient amount by way of modification, he will not close the door entirely against any adjustment which might conceivably require to be made.

Mr. ILSLEY: I feel that this is the final notice of budget modifications in this regard. I think there has to be some finality about it, and I feel that this is the final notification.

SUGAR

PRODUCTION OF SUGAR BEETS—MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): There is one other matter. During the past few weeks the government has received representations from various parts of the country regarding sugar beets, and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has also drawn the matter to the attention of the house on several recent occasions. Sugar concerns both the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance, and I wish it to be understood that I am speaking also on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

The representations to the government have been along two lines. On the one hand there have been requests for additional dominion assistance. On the other hand the government has been asked to give, not additional assistance, but assurance that the present price structure will be maintained until the 1944 crop has been marketed.

It will be recalled that during the past two years substantial assistance has been given to the sugar beet industry by way of reductions in the excise tax. The first reduction of half a cent a pound was made in the budget of 1942, and a further reduction of half a cent by order in council, effective September, 1943. These reductions added directly to the price received by growers for their sugar beets, the increase in two years amounting to approximately twenty-five per cent.

In Alberta and Manitoba higher prices resulted in a substantial increase in acreage. In Alberta, plantings in 1943 were the largest on record, and there is every reason to believe that if weather conditions had been normal at harvest, the crop would have taxed the capacity of the two factories in that province. Unfortunately, there was considerable spoilage, the loss being estimated at around fifteen per cent. In Manitoba, acreage was slightly less than the year before, but in spite of some loss at harvest there was a record yield.

In Ontario, the situation was quite different. The increased price, which was supplemented by assistance from the Ontario government of fifty-five cents per ton, failed to stimulate plantings. Instead, acreage declined from over 20,000 acres in 1942 to less than 10,000 in 1943. Farmers preferred to raise other crops requiring less labour.

I am bringing these facts to the attention of the house because they illustrate some of the considerations which must weigh with the government in arriving at a decision in this matter. For some time the government has been encouraging the production of soy-beans and white beans, crops which are needed urgently, but which in Ontario compete with sugar beets. This is one of the reasons for the decline in sugar beet production in that province. The hon. member for Lethbridge also spoke of sugar beet growers turning to other crops in Alberta. The point I wish to make is that at this stage in our war effort a choice must be made between alternative uses of land and labour, taking into consideration the relative importance of the various products.

I might also add that even though, as some believe and as is probably true, the world outlook for sugar is less favourable now than a year ago, this does not necessarily mean that Canada should divert land and labour to the production of sugar beets in an effort to offset a possible decline in imported supplies if there are other equally or even more important uses to which these resources can be put.

The experience last year illustrates the variation between conditions in various parts of Canada. In the West, prices were sufficiently attractive to stimulate maximum plantings and should continue to be fairly satisfactory; in Ontario, the existing price level, plus the provincial subsidy, had little effect so far as can be ascertained.

After careful consideration the government has therefore come to the conclusion that it would be inadvisable to increase dominion assistance on beet sugar. Provincial governments have always taken a special interest in sugar beets, and of course I do not know whether they intend giving additional assistance to their growers.

As I said at the outset, some growers have asked for assurance that prices will not be lower during the 1944 crop year. In order to remove any fears that the government might reduce returns on sugar by altering the excise tax, I may say that the government does not intend to propose any increase in this particular tax in the forthcoming budget, nor does it intend revoking the order in council by which the latest half-cent reduction was effected, at least before the 1944 sugar beet crop has been marketed.

The dominion government, through the sugar administrator, controls the importation and sale of cane sugar, and, as additional assurance, I am in a position to say that on the basis of our present commitments and prospects there is no danger of a reduction in the price of sugar within the period during which the 1944 crop is being marketed.

I hope that this statement will provide the necessary degree of certainty as to price levels during the coming year.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Are steps being taken by the government to reopen the sugar factory at Halifax? The Acadia Sugar Company has been closed for two years. This matter has been brought up in the house from time to time by the member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), and it means a great deal to the province of Nova Scotia as well as to the sugar supply in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would not increase the supply of sugar in Canada by a pound. I am not aware of the authority under which the refinery at Halifax was closed or whether it was by governmental direction at all, but so far as I know no steps are being taken to open it. However, I will make inquiries and inform my hon. friend if I find that any change is planned.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the present subsidy on sugar in Ontario?

Mr. ILSLEY: Last year it was fifty-five cents a ton.

Mr. ADAMSON: And this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. ADAMSON: It has not come down yet?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): At six o'clock I was endeavouring to answer one or two remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) in the speech he made prior to my rising. He was speaking of the wheat board and the way they had handled the wheat crop of the western farmer. I said I thought, and I am sure I am right, that the wheat board had done an excellent job this year in handling Canada's wheat and also all grains for the farmers not only of western Canada but also of eastern Canada and far western Canada. It must be remembered that, following the policy laid down by the Minister of Agriculture of subsidizing the shipment of grain to eastern Canada and to British Columbia for the feeding of live stock a year ago, besides all exports to the old country and to the United States, the wheat board and the railway companies were able to move some fifty-eight million bushels of grain for feed to other parts of Canada from the west. This year, from the 1st of August, the start of the crop year, to the end of December there has been moved forty-five million bushels, or seventy-six per cent of the total movement of last year. When one considers that millions of bushels are being shipped to the United States, great credit is due not only to the wheat board but to the railway companies and the railwaymen for handling the grain in the way they have done throughout the past year or two. They have had to do this while moving thousands of troops from one end of the country to the other and thousands of civilian passengers besides millions of tons of freight needed for the war. The record made by the wheat board and the railways of this country has never been surpassed, and I think they should be given credit instead of being criticized by the hon. member and others.

The hon. gentleman spoke of the government taking over wheat and not allowing the price to go up. Surely he knows better than that; he knows that was not the case. He knows that when the government took over the wheat they first of all set a price of $1.23¼ a bushel for all wheat that was in the hands of the board from 1940, 1941 and 1942 crops, and intimated that a participation certificate would be paid on that basis, less cost of handling that grain. Up to the point of taking over at a price of $1.23¼ none of that wheat is to compete with wheat of successive years. That wheat goes as lend-lease or is sold for feed or shipped to some of our allies and does not compete in any way with the crop of 1943. The crop of 1943 was taken over at $1.25 a bushel advance price and a participation certificate to the farmer, so that when the wheat is finally sold, whatever price is received for it by the government will be returned to the farmer by the participation certificate, the difference between $1.25 and whatever price the government gets for that wheat.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why did you not do it four years ago?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): We have always done it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): You have never done it.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There was always a participation certificate, and we have always told the farmer that if he sold through the wheat board he would get the participation certificate. We have not done as my hon. friends have done—gone and told the farmers that they would never get anything for it. We told them they would get something for it and they are going to get something for it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why did you not close the grain exchange?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated in the house the other day that the wheat now being sold to the United States was being sold at an advance, and the figures he gave are equivalent to from sixteen to twenty-two cents a bushel over $1.25. These were the figures he gave, from $1.41 to $1.47 for No. 1 northern. Each year the policy of the Minister of Agriculture has been criticized in this house, but it has paid dividends to the allies in this war. Year by year he has arranged matters so that the farmers of Canada could produce more food, and that food could not only be sold to the people of Canada but be shipped overseas for the use of our allies. He asked for meats and dairy products mainly. He asked the western farmer to cut down the growing of wheat, to increase the growing of coarse grains in order that the western farmer and the eastern farmer could produce more meat and dairy products. How successful that policy has been is again shown by the very criticisms that come from hon. members of this house. That is why we are unable to handle all the cattle, hogs and sheep that are coming on the market. It is a physical impossibility to handle them unless you can get sufficient shipping to take the stuff out of the country as it passes through the packing plants.

I am a farmer, and I do not believe that anybody ought to rise in his place in this house and try to make out that the packers are nothing but robbers. The farmers have done a great job in producing live stock, and the packers and the men employed by the packers have done a great job in handling live stock during the war.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister said it was on account of the packing plants that they could not ship.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend is babbling away again. The hon. member for Yorkton then went on to try to prove that the farmer was paying excess prices for practically everything that he had to buy, and that his position was not getting better, as the Minister of Agriculture said it was.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I did not say that.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member intimated that. Let me say this: My hon. friend should have read the pamphlet that was quoted this afternoon by the hon. member from Souris, the Economic Annalist. The first paragraph reads:

> Preliminary figures make it possible to access the trends of prices and production in 1943. The index of wholesale prices advanced 4·3 points over that of 1942 or 4·5 per cent. The urban cost of living index was 1·6 points higher. The cost of farm family living rose 2·3 points. Wholesale prices of Canadian farm products averaged 13·4 points or 16·2 per cent higher than in 1942. The index of prices of field products was 15·1 points or 22·7 per cent higher and that of animal products was 8·0 points or 9·8 per cent higher than a year earlier. . . . The total index of Canadian farm product prices was 104·6 in December. It will be observed that this is 2·1 points above the index of wholesale prices of all commodities.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was it in June?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What was it ten years ago? What is the use of saying that?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was it in June?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): As a farmer I buy and sell.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What?

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I buy the things the farmer has to buy and I sell the things the farmer has to sell. Let me tell my hon. friend this, that there is nothing in the Dominion of Canada that has risen more in prices in the last two years than farm products.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Farm machinery has.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Farm machinery has not. Farm products have risen higher than anything during this war. When this war began I was producing hogs and getting seven cents a pound for them. Take a look at the figures to-day and see what you are getting. Take the figures for cattle and compare them with what they were at the beginning of the war. Take a look at the figures for grains, butter, cheese, every product that the farmer has to raise in this country. The price has gone up farther in comparison with that of anything else in this country, and it is to the credit of the Minister of Agriculture and this government that that has happened.

My hon. friends rise in their places in this house day after day and paint a picture of fear and trembling as to what will happen when this war is over. I am not a bit afraid of what is going to happen when the war is over; not a bit. People have short memories. Many of them think there was a great depression after the last war. There was no such thing. After the last war there were twelve years of the most prosperous times that the world has ever seen; twelve years, and most of it under a Liberal regime in this country.

Mr. GRAYDON: In spite of a Liberal regime.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Most of it under a Liberal regime. My hon. friend, if he were a farmer, would know that when a Liberal regime is in power he gets good prices for his products and the reverse is true when the Liberals are out of power.

Mr. GRAYDON: I live in a town just like my hon. friend.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There were reasons for that prosperity after the last war, and the same reasons will hold good after this one. The men who have gone from Canada to the army, navy and air force have received a much better education than any of us in this house ever received. They have been taught to take responsibility. They have seen much more of the world than most of us have seen, and they are coming back when this war is over to take charge of this country and run it as it should be run. I am not a bit afraid of our young people coming back here, and I hope they will take charge and run this dominion as it ought to be run. After the last war there was prosperity. Why? Because Great Britain and the United States made some billions of dollars available to the countries in Europe for the purchase of food products and raw material to rehabilitate themselves. That started the prosperity. Then during the last war many new processes and new inventions were developed which were put into commercial use after the war. These things in commercial use created more buying power, more distribution of wealth, and that prosperity continued for twelve years. We know now that when this war is over there will not be a few billions but hundreds of billions of dollars of credits made available by the united nations in ordered to rehabilitate the unfortunate countries of the world. We know also that science and invention have worked out new processes and inventions in this war a hundredfold compared with the last war. I am satisfied that when this war is over we shall have prosperity for at least twenty-five years. But you must have a policy to help it along.

After the last war we had trouble with wheat. We had been asked to place every available acre in wheat during the last war, and the farmers in western Canada based their economy on wheat. When the war was over there was apparently more wheat than could properly be handled in the world wheat trade at that time. After this war it is going to be not only wheat but cattle, hogs, sheep, butter, cheese, eggs and poultry, and practically every farm product that one can think of, barley, oats, rye, flax. We are going to have a surplus of every one of them in this country when the war is over, because we have all of these commodities at the peak of production. What are we going to do with them when the war is over? What is the solution? If this government and other governments do not agree to follow out the Atlantic charter, do not agree to drop tariffs altogether, and allow trade to flow freely from one country to another, then there will eventually be chaos and trouble in the world. But if we will follow sound Liberal policy when this war is over, then prosperity can continue throughout the world and everyone can have more of the world's goods.

The leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Peel, spoke of the discussion that took place last year in regard to research laboratories. I was very glad to note that everyone in the house agreed with the suggestion made at that time that we should go farther into agricultural research in this country, and I am pleased to see that this year the government has increased the amount of money available for that purpose. I agree with the hon. member for Peel, however, that this amount is not large enough even yet. After parliament adjourned I had an opportunity of going to the United States and being shown through one of the large laboratories set up by the government of that country. Of course it had to handle a great many more products than would be handled in any one of our regional laboratories.

Mr. GRAYDON: Might I ask where that was?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): This one was at Albany, California; and the hon. member will realize that with the varied production on the west coast of the United States, they have many more matters to deal with than we would have in any single section of Canada, since their products range all the way from practically tropical fruits to the things grown in the temperate zone. This laboratory cost something in the neighbourhood of a million dollars, while the equipment cost something like half a million dollars. Of course we would not have to expend that amount of money, but if we desired to put up a proper laboratory we would have to spend more than two or three hundred thousand dollars.

A great deal of this work in Canada has been done in the past by the research council, by universities throughout the country and by the Department of Agriculture at its experimental farms. A good deal of research work can be carried on in that way, but if you are really going to get down to the business of research in agricultural products you must locate one laboratory somewhere to get started with, and there is a very good reason for that. In this laboratory you will have different branches, with men working on different products. In order to run it economically and well you will require, above all these different departments, an analytical branch with highly trained men and very intricate machines which cost a great deal of money. Therefore, in order that all the different branches may get the benefit of these highly trained technical men and these machines, it is necessary that the work be carried on in one laboratory. That organization should not be part of the research council here; it should be separate and apart, for agricultural research. We must see to it that the newest types of machines are purchased for this laboratory, and I would suggest that before the remainder of the $200,000 runs out on March 31, the minister should see if he cannot purchase some of the machines that are needed, and at least we shall get that far along. Then we can use the money which is to be voted this year, and possibly more in the supplementary estimates, to carry research work farther.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these machines readily available?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am not so sure of that. I do not know. I should think some of them would be hard to get, but I am sure some machines and some equipment could be procured now. No doubt some of the more intricate machines will be very difficult to obtain until after the war.

Mr. SENN: May I ask the hon. member if he has any knowledge whatever of the workings of the National Chemurgic Society. Has he made any study of the work of that society?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I have read some of their pamphlets dealing with the set-up of the laboratories which have been established in Washington, but I have not attended any of the conventions of the National Chemurgic Society. The work of these laboratories has been considerably changed since the beginning of the war. When they were first started they were intended to work on agricultural products, to find new uses for them; but since the war a large part of their work has been in connection with the dehydration, freezing and packaging of goods in order that they may be used during the war.

Mr. WOOD: I should like to supplement the remarks of the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I wish to thank him for his most vigorous speech in defence of the cause of the farmer. I believe that if farming is to retain its rightful place in this country we need more people with faith in that branch of industry, rather than people who are always crying about it. After all, farming is not an easy job; it takes strong, virile men, men with ambition, men who are prepared to pit their physical energies against all the elements. Farming is only for capable people, so that we expect to have sharing in the joys of agriculture only those of our citizens who are ambitious and physically able to do a hard job.

However, this is not really what I intended to say. I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton, who complained because farm prices in the United States were so much higher than in Canada. Well, you know, it is only human to magnify fault and belittle virtue, and sometimes distant pastures seem green. Let us analyse the situation for a moment. Only about three weeks ago I happened to have a farmer from Michigan in my stable, looking at the hogs I was producing, and I asked what he was getting for hogs in his state. He told me he was being paid $13.90 at his farm, live weight. Well, I was getting close to $13 for my hogs, live weight, and he had to pay a good deal more for his feed than I did. We have had the advantage of the subsidy of $4.50 on freight from the west, and we have had the benefit of the price ceiling, which they do not have in the United States. This man was paying almost fifty per cent more for his feed than I was paying, so that when the hon. member for Yorkton makes a statement of the kind he did he should at least qualify it by pointing out the different conditions that exist. Farmers in the United States may be receiving more for some of their products, but it is costing them far more to produce those commodities than it costs in Canada, due to our price control policy.

There is another thing I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. In consequence of this unpopular control policy which was inflicted upon us, let us see what is happening. I notice a question was asked by the hon. member for Mackenzie as to the public debt of Canada. The farmers to some extent are responsible for the payment of that debt. The answer to the hon. member's question, as it appears at page 574 of Hansard, shows that on March 31, 1943 the per capita public debt of Canada was $523.44.

I hold in my hand a statement from the Herald Tribune of New York. This issue of February 14 sets out the gross public debt and guaranteed obligations in the United States. The figure is $183 billion, or a per capita debt of $1,410, when spread over their population of 130 million. That is their debt, compared with ours of only $523.44. Our debt will probably increase to some extent, but I am prepared to say that the per capita debt of the Canadian farmer, in so far as his contribution to the total amount is concerned, is only one-half the load carried by farmers in the United States.

Does that mean anything to the hon. member for Yorkton? I think he would show a great deal more wisdom if, when analysing these economic questions he would lay both sides of the question before the people, instead of trying to show only those things he wished to show, or attempting to have the people believe only those things he wishes them to believe.

In his analysis he leaves out important facts which have contributed to the general welfare of the people of Canada.

This evening I intend to discuss these estimates at somewhat greater length than I have in the past. First I would draw the attention of the committee to some newspaper clippings I sometimes tear out of a local newspaper, the Globe and Mail. I used to take it regularly, and even now I read it occasionally. I got a copy this morning before I had breakfast, because I do not like to read it after I have had a full meal.

Mr. GRAYDON: That shows the hon. member's poor judgment; do not blame the Globe and Mail.

Mr. WOOD: I will give my judgment of the hon. member in a moment or two. This Winnipeg dispatch states:

> Farm Mortgages being Cleared Up
> Prosperity among farmers is reflected in the number of mortgages, some of them of many years standing, that are being retired. . . . The Manitoba Farm Loans Association announces that farmers are clearing their holdings faster than ever before, and in this respect the record for the year was about fifty per cent better than for the previous year.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is where they have had good government for twenty years.

Mr. WOOD: Here is another newspaper clipping which is headed "Farm incomes at high level", and states that farm incomes in 1943 totalled $1,397 million, or almost double what it was at the beginning of the war. That is about five times as much as it was when the party of hon. members opposite had put us in the last depths of degradation and poverty in 1932, as a consequence of their judgment.

I have before me another short item bearing date of February 16, and headed "Farm income from milk up $28 million in 1943." I am not saying the farmers are getting too much, but I do share the view of the hon. member for Moose Jaw who has said that in consequence of policies in force to-day we are making rapid progress, and going ahead probably just as fast as any other country.

In 1932—and I hate to mention this, but I believe I must do so, following the interjection of the hon. member for Peel—I sold pork for $3.25 a hundredweight. To-day I can get as much for one pig as I got for six of them in those days. Of course we know that at that time prices were lower in Canada than they had ever been. One would have to go back to the time of Queen Elizabeth to find a parallel.

In 1930, when the Liberal government was turned out of office, our trade stood fifth among the nations of the world. That is, there were only four nations which had a greater volume of trade than did Canada. In 1932 we had gone down to seventh place, and we stayed there until 1935, when a Liberal government was returned to power. Some may say that that was a period of world depression. True, there was a world-wide depression; but it was only incidental that Canada belonged to that same world both before and during the depression, and that she was shoved down from fifth to seventh place in consequence of policies in force at that time?

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the hon. member sure of his facts?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; certainly he is.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would like to challenge that.

Mr. WOOD: The hon. member has the same source that I had from which to get his information.

In 1935 we stood seventh among the trading nations of the world. By the time war broke out in 1939 we were back to fifth place, and to-day we stand fourth.

Mr. GARDINER: Third.

Mr. SENN: First.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes; make it first.

Mr. GRAYDON: Be generous.

Mr. WOOD: There never was a time when the people of Canada exported as much as they did in 1943. The export trade for January is $64 million higher than it was in the preceding month. My only regret is that so much of that has had to be trading in weapons of destruction, and human slaughter machinery. We do not gloat over that kind of trade.

The fact remains, however, that in 1943 we shipped $775 million worth of agricultural products. That is, we are one of the nations which has been in a position to feed itself, and at the same time sell food products to the value I have mentioned. And on top of that, as Madame Chiang Kai-shek said, we have made the greatest contribution per capita in munitions that has been made by any of the united nations—as well as in our manpower. These things do not happen by accident.

Mr. GRAYDON: That was an afterthought.

Mr. WOOD: They result, of course, from some of the unfortunate regulations to which we have been committed. But we as Liberals believe we should share the happiness and enjoyments of our country in times of peace with the great masses of our people and by the same token, in time of distress, when 775,000 of our boys are regimented into fighting for your liberty and mine, we should share with them some of the burdens and hardships they are asked to bear.

Mr. BOUCHER: "Regimentation" is a good word to use.

Mr. WOOD: Exactly. When a soldier goes to war he expects regimentation. I think that we civilians should accept with better grace than some of the opposition have the restrictions that have been put upon us. I hope that six months after the war they will be as few as possible and we can get back again where under honest Liberal policies we can carry on with as little a measure of restriction as possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: You should not have sounded that last unhappy note. Otherwise your speech was pretty good.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not propose to make an omnibus speech at this time and try to cover the number of subjects hon. members who have preceded me have tried to cover. I was rather amazed to hear the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) try to explain that during the ten years before this war it was only the Progressive Conservative party that had created hard times. I think most of us who were farmers during the period between the two wars remember that there was a lot of hard times.

Before taking up the subject with which I wish to deal, I should like to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). I judged from his remarks that the prosperity the farmer is enjoying at the present time—he is enjoying a certain amount—a great deal more than he has done for a long time is due entirely to the Department of Agriculture and the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): A good part of it.

Mr. WRIGHT: I have an idea that there was a war on and that had considerable to do with the present position of agriculture. The same Minister of Agriculture was in power from 1935 to 1939, four years during which we did not have a war and during which, as I remember, agriculture was not too prosperous. The hon. member also stated that the twelve years after the last war were the most prosperous as far as agriculture was concerned.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): As far as the whole country was concerned.

Mr. WRIGHT: I served four years in the last war. I came back from overseas, took up land in western Canada and bought my seed wheat in 1920 for $2.60 a bushel, and in 1921 when the Liberal government were in power I got 67 cents a bushel for my wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: There was no Liberal government in power in 1921. Mr. Meighen was in power all through 1921.

Mr. WRIGHT: They were in power shortly after that and prices did not increase very much.

Mr. GARDINER: Prices went up.

Mr. WRIGHT: I sold my wheat at the same price in 1922 when they were in power.

The matter I wanted to discuss was in connection with the price of grass and clover seeds. This year the special products marketing board has taken over the complete marketing of grass and clover seeds, all domestic requirements being handled through that board. The result is not very satisfactory as far as the producers of clover seed is concerned. Last fall when the board took over the marketing of these seeds they intimated to the cooperatives and to the buyers of grass seed that they should give the farmers participation certificates. Some of the buyers complied with this request, but there were others who did not.

The price received by the growers of alfalfa seed—I am dealing with alfalfa seed more particularly, but I think my remarks apply equally well to red clover and alsike seed—last year in the district from which I come was thirty-eight cents a pound for No. 1 commercial seed, and forty cents a pound for No. 1 registered seed, when they were marketed through the cooperative. Last year the ceiling price on alfalfa seed was thirty-seven cents a pound, but there was no restriction as far as export was concerned. Out of a total crop of some 4,500,000 pounds of alfalfa seed, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 2,000,000 pounds were exported. The additional price received on export balanced the domestic price and gave to the producer approximately thirty-eight cents a pound for No. 1 commercial seed.

This year the government has taken over the export of seed and has established certain prices. According to a return tabled yesterday on the motion of the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor), the export price is 34½ cents a pound. According to information which I have, approximately ten per cent of the crop available in Canada this year will be exported. If these figures are correct, and I believe they are approximately correct, it means that this year the producer of alfalfa seed will receive at the farm only from thirty to thirty-one cents a pound for the grade of seed for which he received thirty-eight cents a pound last year.

I realize why the government has taken the step it has this year. Last year a large proportion of our seed was exported, and in the spring of the year we found that we did not have enough to meet our domestic requirements. The result was that we had to use a lot of second and third grade seed. I imagine that it was to prevent the same thing occurring this year that the government has taken over the whole crop and is controlling export. However, I do not see why the producer of alfalfa seed should bear the brunt of this action. He is facing a loss of from eight to ten cents a pound.

In almost every other case where the government have acted in a like manner a subsidy has been paid to the producer to give him something near the price he would receive had he been allowed to use the export market. I understand that the government are sending most of their exports to Great Britain. If they were using the United States market they could get a much better price than 34½ cents a pound. I have no objection to the government supplying the British market because I think that is as it should be, but I do not think the producers of alfalfa and clover seeds should be asked to take a rap of that kind. A subsidy should be paid to these growers which would give them a price which would approximate what they received last year for their seed.

The growing of alfalfa seed is a hazardous business because it is only once out of every three years that you get a reasonable crop, and sometimes not that. When one considers the hazards and cost of production a price of thirty-eight cents a pound is not unfair. If the figures which have been tabled are correct I would think that the prices received this year will not be such as to encourage men continuing in the production of seed. I happen to represent a district which produces probably more alfalfa seed than any other place in the Dominion of Canada, and I know that because of the cost of production and other hazards the acreage has been reduced during the last two or three years. Encouragement must be given to these people to continue in production because this seed is essential to agriculture in eastern Canada and in other parts of the world. There is a real demand for alfalfa seed outside Canada, one which we will be able to supply if we encourage our producers. I should like the minister to make a statement as to the situation with regard to clover seed and grass seed at the present time, and what the producer can likely expect to get as a return on his participation certificates if the prices are realized.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did not intend to make any extended remarks. I had one or two questions I wanted to ask the minister; but I do want to refer to one or two things said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). The hon. member for Moose Jaw takes the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) to task for referring to the Winnipeg grain exchange as setting prices. Well, the hon. member for Moose Jaw ought to know something about the grain exchange. I think he had a good deal to do with some of the grain brokerage firms in days gone by, and probably got to know something about the grain exchange.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely not!

Mr. MacNICOL: Was the hon. member for Moose Jaw a grain broker?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I believe so, although he always tells the committee he was a farmer.

Mr. MacNICOL: I always heard him say that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought he grew sunflower seeds.

An hon. MEMBER: Maybe he did more farming the farmer.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is mere talk without any knowledge. I was never a broker in my life. I was always a farmer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, the hon. member spent a lot of time in a grain brokerage office.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I may have done that, and the hon. member might have learned more about the business if he had.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I know a lot of farmers who were "broken" after coming in contact with the hon. member's brokerage office. One of the things that the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the Minister of Agriculture like to do when they rise in their places is to twit those of us who are not farmers with not being farmers, yet daring to discuss agriculture. I make no apology for not being a farmer. The committee may be interested to know that the Minister of Agriculture is not really a farmer either. He supports a farm; he does not make the farm support him.

Mr. GARDINER: The farm would support me better than anything you have ever done supports you.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He was a schoolteacher who got into politics and then decided he would do better if he had a farm, in order to be able to call himself a farmer. He has been able to support a farm as a very expensive hobby rather than make a living at it.

Mr. GARDINER: I got to be a schoolteacher by farming.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And he got to be a farmer like he is now by being a politician and a very good one.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member had better get a farm.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, I do not intend to try to "kid" the public that I am a farmer.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No; you would not get away with it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of Agriculture or the hon. member for Moose Jaw have not fooled very many people. The hon. member for Moose Jaw took exception to the statement which I made regarding the fact that about fifty-four per cent of the 1942 crop was sold by the farmers on the open market. I want to refer the hon. member to the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1941-42, the year which ended July 31, 1942.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is the 1941 crop.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): 1941-42.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The 1941 crop.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The crop year ended July 31, 1942. On page 4 I find this statement:

> Of the total marketings of 227·9 million bushels in the west during the crop year 1941-42, producers delivered 100 million bushels to the board, or about 44 per cent of their marketings. In the previous crop year producers delivered 395 million bushels to the wheat board out of total marketings of 456 million bushels.

Mr. BOUCHER: You were in the right church but the wrong pew.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In other words, the figure was actually lower, but I had in mind that the producer delivered forty-six per cent. As a matter of fact, he delivered only forty-four per cent to the wheat board that year.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is the 1941 crop. The hon. member said 1942.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I say that fifty-six per cent was sold in the open market for the crop year 1941-42.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, 1941.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Let the hon member hold his horses a minute.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Let the hon. member for Weyburn hold his horses for a minute.

Mr. BOUCHER: As I say, he was in the right church but the wrong pew.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The figures on page 4 show what the board price was during that year and what the cash price was on the Winnipeg exchange, and the fact that the market price was higher than the board price accounted, of course, for the fact that fifty-six per cent of the wheat that year was sold on the open market rather than to the board. The fact remains that, while we have not the figures for the 1943 crop, or the 1942-43 crop, the market price during a good part of that year was higher than the board price. The hon. member for Moose Jaw thinks it is probably sixty per cent. I imagine he will find that the figure is much lower.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the exact figures in my pocket, and they are more than sixty per cent.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the minister has the figures I should be very glad to have them.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not permitted to give the exact ones, but they are more than sixty per cent.

Mr. PERLEY: When are we to get the report?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It will be very late.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely; it is "not in the national interest".

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As I have said, in the 1941-42 crop year the farmers who sold fifty-six per cent of their wheat on the open market did not receive any participation certificates; and unless the government and the wheat board make some change in policy and revise their arrangements, those people will not get any of the benefit of the subsequent increase in price. Whatever the hon. member for Moose Jaw may argue about 1941 or 1942 does not alter the cogency of the argument that for all of that fifty-six per cent of the crop which was sold on the open market, the people who sold it will not get any of the benefit of the increase in price. The hon. member for Moose Jaw is entirely wrong when he says that the members of this group went out and told people they would not get anything on their participation certificates.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Did I say "the members" from that group? I said "your people."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, I do not know whom the hon. member means by "our people." I cannot tell what all "our people" said.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Your machine.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I can speak only for myself.

Mr. BOUCHER: There are just two machines in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: No, three. You people have one, too.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): At any rate, I never went travelling around the province with P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. inspectors accompanying me on my travels.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Neither did I. But I went around to see that the farmers in my district got a proper deal.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did not know that was your duty.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You will learn after you have been here for a while what a member should do for his constituency.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure the committee will be interested to know that a Liberal member of parliament considers that the inspectors hired by the Minister of Agriculture are so incompetent that they cannot give the farmers of his constituency a square deal unless he travels with them to see that they do give his farmers a square deal.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I never travelled with any inspector.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It certainly would be a new form of government.

I wish to support those who have suggested to the minister that there is need of a great deal more money being spent on research into the use of agricultural products for industrial purposes. All of us supported last year the hon. member for Moose Jaw, who, I think, did a real service to the house and to the country in bringing this matter to the attention of the house on many occasions, and, I think, has made a thorough study of the question.

I was surprised when I saw that, of the $200,000 that had been voted, not all had been spent. I imagine, of course, the minister will have the explanation—and I should think the explanation is reasonable—that it is very difficult to get machinery for pilot plants, and to procure the proper laboratory equipment. For this reason there can be no serious criticism, because in war time, naturally, war plants have priority. But I believe the government should, in the hope that they can get the equipment, make a much larger appropriation than is now proposed. The figures stated by the minister as being expenditures by his department and the Department of Trade and Commerce are somewhere between $400,000 and $500,000. It is a mere bagatelle compared with what has to be done. We are spending millions in other fields.

Mr. GARDINER: I should make myself clear on that point. No part of the $200,000 voted in these estimates is to be carried into the next year. If any amount is supplied it will have to be brought down as a supplementary estimate.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes. But I think the minister will agree, as most members of the committee will, that if the government were to bring down an estimate for ten times what is now provided it would not be a bit too much. From three to five million dollars is not a large amount of money considering the tremendous era that chemurgy and the use of synthetics open up for both farming and industry in western Canada. I am hoping therefore that, especially as we come closer to the end of the war, the government will be prepared either to vote large sums of money to go into research work itself or to make grants to the cooperatives, for instance, who would be only too anxious to take up research along these lines. I had the privilege of attending a meeting with the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) in Saskatoon a year ago last fall, called by the cooperative organizations in Saskatchewan. They were studying the feasibility of going into the making of synthetic alcohol from wheat, and had they been able to get a substantial grant from the government the cooperatives in Saskatchewan would have been prepared to invest considerable sums of money in research along the lines I have suggested. If the government itself does not feel like undertaking research on such a large scale, I suggest that it might be prepared to grant assistance to some of the cooperatives and the farmer organizations, who I am sure would be ready to do this work.

In regard to departmental administration, I notice in the auditor general's report, page A9, expenses of the Minister of Agriculture amounting to $2,661.42. I should like the minister to break that down and give us an idea as to how much is travelling expenses and so on. The reason why I ask this has no reference particularly to the Minister of Agriculture. I ask the question because there is a matter I have been wanting to raise for several years during the war, namely the fact that in every department there is a vote of $2,000 to every cabinet minister for a car. Originally, I understand, cars and chauffeurs were supplied to cabinet ministers, but that practice was discontinued, and in lieu of that the ministers were given $2,000. During this war time some of the ministers do not drive cars. Indeed, many of us have put our cars away, and so have some of the cabinet ministers. I doubt very much, therefore, whether that grant is still necessary. I have no objection if the government wants to add the $2,000 to a minister's salary because I am not suggesting that we should take anything away from them, but in my opinion a grant of $2,000 for a car is a rather unnecessary expenditure at a time when we are talking to people about economy.

The $2,000 for a car also raises a very delicate question which the minister himself placed before the house the other day when speaking on a question of privilege. As reported at page 423 of Hansard he said:

> This leaves the car which is at headquarters in Regina, No. 20456, and which is placed at my disposal when I am in the province. I drove this car to the constituency, used it on certain occasions while there and drove it back to Regina later. I paid for my own gasoline while it was out, as I always do. The government did not pay for any gasoline in any car used for political purposes during that election, and no one of the cars listed above excepting 20456 was used for political purposes to my knowledge.

It seems to me that to make a grant of $2,000 to cabinet ministers for a car, then place another car at the minister's disposal while he is in the province, and then have estimated expenses of $2,600, makes a considerable amount for travelling expenses at a time when we are talking about cutting down expenditures.

I wish the minister would enlarge on the statement he made with reference to grain crops during the coming crop year. I was not quick enough to catch the figures he gave, but he wanted the same amount of wheat acreage and 102 per cent of barley and 106 per cent of oats.

Mr. GARDINER: 101 per cent of barley and 106 per cent of oats.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How does he propose to get that acreage? What are his plans to get the farmers to sow approximately the acreage he wants? The reason why I put this matter before the minister is that my impression, after going over a considerable part of the province of Saskatchewan this fall, is that ever since we have had the announcement of the new price there is every indication that a good many farmers will go back to increased wheat production. I wondered what the minister had in mind in order to keep the farmers growing the amount of coarse grain he wants them to produce for the purpose of raising live stock and also supplying feed to eastern Canada where the farmers may raise the live stock which we have pledged ourselves to produce for Great Britain.

I noticed, in the brief which the federation of agriculture presented to the government a week or two ago, that one of the things they asked the government to do was to make a statement as early as possible with reference to the price which would be paid this fall for coarse grain. I think that is important. I do not believe that even the subsidy of fifteen cents a bushel on barley and ten cents on oats will be enough to persuade the farmer to sow coarse grains as against wheat, even with the delivery quota on wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: The ten cents on oats and fifteen cents on barley are not a subsidy. The plan by which that ten cents on oats and fifteen cents on barley is raised is this. We sell a certain proportion of oats and barley in the United States and a certain amount in the eastern part of Canada; the amount obtained for both lots of grain is pooled, so to speak, and we guarantee that there will be ten cents earned on what we sell to the United States in order to be spread over all oats sold. The same is true of barley. But at the same time a participation certificate is given which will net the farmer more if the grain is sold for more; that is to say, the price plus the ten cents and fifteen cents constitute the floor return, but any additional price for which it is sold the farmer will also get.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I understood that, but while I know that this has to do with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture is charged with production and with the task of getting the kind of production he thinks is most necessary for the war effort, it seems to me that the government ought to make some announcement in the not far distant future as to what prices will obtain for coarse grains; that is the initial price plus whatever price will come from this fund, and then of course the participation certificate. I think if the government would make an announcement of a floor price and what it is likely to be, whether it will be the same as last year or better, and make it before the farmer starts to seed, the minister is more likely to get the acreage announced this afternoon than he will otherwise.

There is one other point. The minister has made no announcement—at least not while I was here; I came in a moment or two late; I was called away while he was speaking—as to whether or not the wheat acreage bnous is to be dropped—

Mr. GARDINER: I announced it while the hon. member was out of the chamber.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If we may judge by the estimates it is to be dropped, which means a drop of about $28,000,000. The wheat acreage reduction bonus was paid to the farmer mainly to encourage him to go into the growing of coarse grains, and also to summer-fallow. But it was also paid in lieu of the fact that from that time on there was to be a restriction as to how much wheat he could sell. That is, he was to be allowed to sell only sixty-five per cent of his basic acreage. It was a compensation. It was not a bonus in the sense of a gift or a subsidy. It was a compensation to him because, instead of being able to sell all of his wheat, or even all of his basic acreage, he could now sell only sixty-five per cent of his basic acreage. It seems to me if the government are going to drop the wheat acreage reduction bonus and thereby reduce the agricultural income by roughly $28,000,000, they ought to give consideration to announcing to the farmer that they will take all of his basic acreage, that they will take all the full quota and that it will be based on his entire 1940 acreage or whatever the minister considers to be a fair basic acreage. It seems to me that to continue to take only sixty-five per cent of his basic acreage and to remove the wheat acreage reduction bonus looks very much as though the government have given the farmer a $1.25 price with one hand and have taken away the $28,000,000 compensation from him with the other hand. I ask the minister to give some thought to that.

Mr. WEIR: This general item gives one an opportunity to say a few words of a general nature with respect to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. From the observations made so far it is readily apparent that there is not the same degree of criticism from members of the house with respect to agriculture as has been the case on previous occasions. I believe that bears out the statement that has already been made in this debate to the effect that the policies of the Department of Agriculture, particularly during this period of war and leading up to it, have been sound. I believe that when the history of this period is written, so far as agriculture in this country is concerned, those who are fair-minded will admit that the minister's approach to the general agricultural problems from one end of the country to the other has been sound.

Mr. GRAYDON: That shows the influence of John Bracken.

Mr. WEIR: In every instance where it has been necessary to deal with specific problems and specific products these problems and products have been dealt with in a reasonable manner. May I point out that at the outbreak of the war all the facilities in this country were jammed full of wheat. Facilities were tied up; there was no apparent place to which to move the wheat, and at the time the sensible thing seemed to be to turn our production from wheat to some other form of production. A demand was undoubtedly coming for live stock products. The minister announced his policy in that regard. I recall that I looked up some figures at one time—I think it was three years ago—with respect to the general feed situation on the North American continent. I found that from the point of view of feeding units per animal unit on the north American continent the tendency was to show a lessening of feed supplies. Now, with the greatly increased live stock production on the north American continent that situation has developed to a much greater extent than any of us thought possible at that time. Therefore the development which has taken place in that regard and the policies carried out by the department have proven to be sound.

I wish to say a word with respect to a matter that is of particular interest at this time, namely research. I notice that my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, immediately jumped into the debate to make a speech on the necessity of agricultural research. That is all right; that is to be expected; but I am bound to say that I think all hon. members who have taken part in this debate to-night have failed to recognize the research activities that have been carried on by the Department of Agriculture over a long period of time. If they look at the estimates tabled they will find that we have experimental farms, which are largely research, one might say almost entirely so. Science services are largely research, and even under the prairie farm rehabilitation vote there is a great deal of research work undertaken.

That brings me to say one other word with respect to the prairie farm rehabilitation organization. I come back to the very fine speech made a few days ago by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) on reclamation policies for western Canada. I think he might have included in that address some of the wonderful work that has been done under our experimental farm system and under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I have before me a rough statement which indicates that the number of large projects undertaken in water conservation in the western provinces amount to 64; dug-outs, 14,108; irrigation projects, 785; or a total of all projects of 18,278. I asked the official who gave me this information particularly about the community pastures, and as to the number of live stock that might be provided for in those community pastures. The estimate given was fifty thousand head. I know that in the section of the country from which I come the live stock population would not have increased nearly to the extent it has had it not been for the work done in water conservation, and particularly the development of those small dug-outs on the various farms. I think that applies to a large part of Saskatchewan as well. It certainly applies to a large part of Manitoba. Therefore, hand in hand with the government's policy has been the work carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, particularly with respect to the development of water supplies.

May I return to the question of research? Last year officials of the Department of Agriculture appeared before the agriculture committee and outlined some of the research developments undertaken by the department. I am prepared to say here to-night that I do not think the officials of the Department of Agriculture have been given sufficient credit for the research activities they have carried on. Much of their activity has been linked in with the national research council, and I fear that some of the credit has gone there that more properly could have been directed to the Department of Agriculture. Be that as it may, it is all directed in the proper way. In addition to the matter of research, I do not think anyone connected with the government can start out a research policy and have it completely divorced from the research activities of other similar bodies under other institutes in different parts of the country. We have a vast variety of conditions throughout Canada. All of our agricultural colleges and universities are carrying on certain types of research work, particularly applicable to their own communities. That is research work. We hope it may be continued and linked together.

In the discussions taking place to-night it seems that most hon. members in speaking of research have in mind a vastly expanded programme, a programme that will undertake the processing of agricultural products for non-edible purposes and try to develop new uses for them, new methods of preserving them and taking care of them, and perhaps the introduction of new varieties and things of that kind. That is all to the good; and we hope that the minister's efforts in this regard may be fully carried out. I point out in passing that we have a very creditable system of agricultural research activities being carried on at the present time. I recall, looking back over the reports that were secured last year, some of the developments that have taken place during the period of war which, as in many other instances, has given an impetus to things of this kind.

I point particularly to the developments that have taken place in connection with the drying of eggs, a completely new operation which was not carried on in this country to any great extent before the demand of war forced it upon us. That is a brand new development which may completely revolutionize the poultry industry of Canada. The same can be said for the dehydration of fruits and vegetables, particularly potatoes and things of that kind, and the evaporation of milk. All these things mean increased use of agricultural products, and their wider distribution. If our activities can continue along these and other lines, I am sure Canada stands to gain much from research work of this sort.

I want to go on and say a word or two with regard to the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Yorkton. I do not know what impression he intended to leave with the committee, but I am bound to say that the impression I was given was one of absolute pessimism as far as agriculture in his part of the country was concerned, and I do not believe that is right. If that is the sort of argument he puts forward with respect to conditions in his part of the country, it is no wonder his people are dissatisfied and complaining about matters in general. I do not live so very far from his constituency, when one considers the country as a whole, and I am bound to say that the situation in Manitoba is not like that he pictured here this afternoon. In this connection may I refer for a moment to figures recently released showing the cash income of the farmers of Canada in 1943. The figure given is $1,396·6 million dollars, the highest on record as far as the agricultural income of this country is concerned. That income is given by provinces, but I shall not take time to place those figures upon record. That was the cash income of agriculture, without any of the bonuses that have been paid through government subsidies or otherwise. Just here I should like to ask the minister if he would be good enough to place on record the various bonuses that have been paid on agricultural products through the various government agencies, for any convenient period of time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the hon. member the percentage that represents of the total national income?

Mr. WEIR: No; I do not think that is relevant. Again, when the hon. member goes ahead to argue about parity prices in the same breath, I do not think it is fair to take individual items in an attempt to establish parity prices. I believe that when you take individual items you fail to recognize changed production conditions, the introduction of new varieties and things of that kind. But I point out that even in regard to that feature, and having regard to the argument of many hon. members that the parity period is the average for the period from 1926 to 1929, while unfortunately my figures only go up to 1942, still they show that receipts from the sale of farm products for that year, on an index basis, were 112·2. In Manitoba alone they were 124·2.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What was the cost of living index?

Mr. WEIR: I can say to my hon. friend that every major agricultural product with the single exception of wheat is at parity or better at the present time, and that the increase in the prices of agricultural commodities has been in advance of the increase in the cost of living.

I want to go one step farther, having particularly in mind the observations of the hon. member for Yorkton. I hold in my hand a statement, applicable to Manitoba only, dealing with the Winnipeg division of the Canadian farm loan board, showing that first mortgages in arrears on April 1, 1941, totalled $99,500; on the same date in 1943 such mortgages in arrears totalled only $43,200, while on February 1, 1944, that total had dropped to $14,300. Second mortgages in arrears on April 1, 1941, totalled $119,500; on April 1, 1943, they amounted to $30,100, and on February 1, 1944, they amounted to $8,500. Moreover, there were only ninety-seven first mortgages in arrears as at February 1, 1944, of which thirty-one were for less than $50, twenty-seven for between $50 and $100, and fifteen for more than $200. At the same date there were forty-four second mortgages in arrears, of which seven were for less than $50, ten for from $50 to $100 and twelve for more than $200. Between April 1, and December 1, 1943, 260 first mortgages had been fully repaid, and during the month of January alone there were two mortgages repaid in full for every day of the month including Sundays. I also looked at the record of the land titles offices. I am sorry that only goes up to 1942, but it shows a continuous improvement in the number of mortgages discharged through those offices in the province of Manitoba. These include mortgages on farms as well as on business and residential property, and the total number so discharged between 1939 and 1942 was 18,367. So that I cannot stand quietly by and ignore a speech such as that made this afternoon by the hon. member for Yorkton, leaving such an impression as he left, while I know the facts as they are shown in the statements I have presented this evening.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): For years they have had a different government in Manitoba from the one they have had in Saskatchewan.

Mr. WEIR: But you did not do very much toward helping that government in Manitoba.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Did you?

Mr. WEIR: Why not?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am always willing to reason it out.

Mr. WEIR: There is another feature which my hon. friends appear to like to play up. They try to make the people believe they are the sole supporters of the cooperative movement in this country. As I stand here to-night I take second place to no one in my sympathy for and interest in the cooperative movement. But I suggest to my hon. friends that this movement is not built on a dollars and cents policy alone, or on any advantages it may obtain from governments or otherwise as compared with other kinds of business. The cooperative movement is more than a business; it is a sentimental affiliation as well. There is an attachment to it; it is a mode of doing business which is entirely different from the ordinary method; but I point out that while hon. gentlemen in the far corner attempt to take credit for their interest in the cooperative movement, that movement has progressed in this country on a very sound and sensible basis, and has done so under the so-called capitalist party system of government. What more does the cooperative movement need in that regard? I look back to the time following 1921 when there was established in the Department of Agriculture here a cooperative branch. The men affiliated with that branch have constantly given encouragement and assistance to the cooperative movement, and have done much to help build it up to the point it has reached at the present time. So that I hope the time will soon come when our hon. friends will no longer attempt to say they are the only people interested in the cooperative movement.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the hon. member in favour of charging the cooperative movement income tax?

Mr. WEIR: That is not part of the discussion at the present time. Is my hon. friend in favour of that?

The hon. member for Yorkton referred to the farm implement business, and I thought he tried to make out that on account of the unduly high prices of farm implements the farmers of Canada were being exploited. He failed to say that the farm implement business, as does all business in Canada, operates under a price ceiling, and that there has been no increase in prices of agricultural implements during the time of war. I will go this far with my hon. friend and say to him that I believe there is a more economical method of retailing agricultural implements than now obtains. From that I hope the cooperative movement can develop something more economical in merchandising procedure.

Here again, however, I say to the hon. member for Yorkton that if he will go back to the report of the farm implements inquiry of 1936, he will find the record shows that the greatest reason for the increase in prices of farm implements was that of increased labour cost.

I want to go one step farther. The hon. member for Melfort by way of interjection referred to his coming back after the last war and buying wheat for seeding purposes. He said that at that time he paid something over $2 a bushel for it, but had to sell it for sixty cents. That just shows how loosely figures are handled. I am not saying he did not have some misfortune with his crop; probably it was frozen or damaged. But I have the fact noted here, and I am bound to say it, that I have before me the average prices by months, and by the year for both 1921, 1922 and other years. I find the lowest price of wheat in the 1922-23 crop year was 99·9 cents a bushel. I realize, of course, that that is basis Fort William—

An hon. MEMBER: And No. 1.

Mr. WEIR: No doubt the hon. member would be selling at a local point, and he may have had low-grade wheat. But I am saying to him that he left the impression, so far as the majority of members in the house were concerned, that the Fort William price of wheat for the year was sixty cents a bushel.

Mr. WRIGHT: No, no.

Mr. WEIR: I have the floor, and I am just saying what the impression would be to a man who did not know what it meant.

Mr. WRIGHT: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member has stated that I had quoted the Fort William price. I was quoting the price at my local point, with respect to wheat sold in the fall of 1920 at my own station. That price was $2.57 a bushel. The price of No. 3 wheat in the fall of 1921 was sixty-seven cents a bushel at that station.

Mr. WEIR: My hon. friend says it was sixty cents a bushel. I leave it to hon. members to figure out what they thought the price was set at. I admitted to my hon. friend that perhaps he was quoting the local price, but I am saying that the impression he left in the minds of the majority of members in the house was that he was talking about the Fort William price.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member cannot speak for the majority.

Mr. WRIGHT: And I did not say sixty cents; I said sixty-seven cents.

Mr. WEIR: Then my hearing is faulty, and I regret it. One could go on and say much more with respect to the policy of the Department of Agriculture, and at a later time I hope to have an opportunity to do so.

Before taking my seat, however, I should like to suggest to the minister some of the possibilities of recent new developments in the field of agriculture. Particularly in Manitoba we have seen a wide diversification in respect of such crops as black-eyed rape, soya beans, sunflowers and, of course, corn, which has been grown with considerable success in southern Manitoba for some time. I believe all those crops have a future, and I am hoping further attention will be given to them.

The main point, however, with respect to such crops as sunflowers and, to some extent, rape seed, is the development of what are known as expelling plants, so that the oil may be extracted more readily. These are bulky products, and it seems unfortunate they have to be moved to eastern Canada for further processing. Having regard to post-war development and to the need for such products, I suggest to the minister that there should be greater diversification in the form of local industries in western Canada, and that particular attention should be given to processing plants for these new crops. I think further that the present situation in respect of the meat and live stock industry affords opportunity for the establishing of a general policy which would have for its purpose the development of quick-freezing plants, and other improvements of that kind, so that our products could be utilized to greater extent locally, and further processed. I believe the west needs something of that kind as much as it needs anything, and I am hoping the minister will use his influence to see that in any research activities consideration might be given to offering further assistance in the development of local processing plants for specialized crops in western Canada.

Mr. PERLEY: Madam Chairman—

Mr. BRYCE: Madam Chairman—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mrs. Casselman): I saw the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. PERLEY: The ladies generally see me. To-day when the item was first called I suggested that the minister might facilitate matters by making a general statement covering most of the items in a general way. He did not see fit to do so, but I think he will now agree with me that it would have been better if that course had been followed—with the exception, of course, of those estimates contained in the war appropriation measure.

I would say the discussion has got almost out of bounds. We have heard members from different parts of Canada discussing almost everything one could imagine. One would have thought that part of the time we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, because we heard a great deal about wheat shipments, wheat prices, wheat board activities, participation certificates, the international food conference, and matters of that kind. One could have gained the impression that two or three departments were before the committee at one time. I will agree that there are some parts of the Department of Trade and Commerce which might better be handled by the Department of Agriculture—and in saying that I believe I am paying the Minister of Agriculture a compliment. I refer particularly to the production of grains, and their marketing on the domestic markets. Possibly some time in the not too distant future we shall see a consolidation of those two departments.

This evening we listened to one or two stirring speeches. The hon. member for Moose Jaw came to the rescue of the minister. He seems to be the pinch-hitter, so to speak, for the minister, and the Minister of Agriculture seems to be the pinch-hitter for the government. Whenever the government needs to have a speech of that kind delivered, he is generally the one called upon to make it. The hon. member for Moose Jaw, together with the hon. member for Macdonald came to the rescue of the minister, but there is not very much to reply to in what they said.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw referred to the fact that a price of $1.25 a bushel had been set in September. He said that that was a pretty good price, and I agree, but it might well have been set much earlier. That price could have been set in July. The government had all the information as to what was likely to happen, they knew they were going to do it, and they could have saved some of the discussion that has taken place to-night in connection with the farmer delivering to the open market had they set the price in July. If that had been done, all the 1943 crop would have gone to the wheat board. The hon. member for Moose Jaw came to the defence of the packing plants, and he tried to give credit to the Minister of Agriculture for the increase in prices. He said that these advances were due to the policies of the minister. However, I think he has been answered by some of the hon. members to my extreme right who mentioned the fact that the war had brought about this condition. No matter who was Minister of Agriculture, we would be getting better prices for our farm products to-day. I think the farmer should be given credit for the way in which he has changed his methods of production, his system of farming so to speak, in order to meet the need.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw was most encouraging when he forecast that there would be prosperity for the next twenty-five years. I hope he is right and perhaps he can see farther into the future than most of us. But if we have that prosperity I am afraid he will not be around to give credit to the present government. Before many years we shall have another government and, if we have the prosperity he forecasts, it will be some other government that will get the credit.

The hon. member for Macdonald made a very good speech, with much of which I agree. I do not take a back seat to anyone as far as farming experience is concerned. I started out in 1900, and in 1906 my brother and I produced 65,000 bushels of grain. We have not done that very often since, but that was a good production for that time. We were forced to build an elevator in order to accommodate our crop, and we got into that business. I learned a lot about the elevator business from 1906 on. I might say also that along with many other farmers in the west I made a few trades; I bought a few options. At times I traded in a certain office with which the hon. member for Moose Jaw was connected for a time. There were lots of brokers in those days and many farmers gained a lot of experience.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was the hon. member for Moose Jaw a broker?

Mr. PERLEY: I leave that for him to answer. The hon. member for Macdonald made some very sound statements. To-day the farmers in the west are better off financially than they were three or four years ago. I know that from my own experience. I am not a calamity howler; I do not believe in standing up and giving the people of Canada the impression that the farmers are all down and out. But our farmers should have had better prices years ago, better even than what has been received this last year. I have maintained right along that we should have a broader basis for all farm products. I do not want to repeat, but I do think the farmers are entitled to a better price.

The initial price of $1.25 a bushel could easily have been made $1.40. The hon. member for Moose Jaw referred to what has happened within the last three or four days. We understand that 175,000,000 bushels of wheat are going to the United States at a price considerably above the initial price. Then we know what the British farmer is receiving for his grain. So that I say that our farmers are justified in asking for a better price. All they want is a square deal. We should be getting a parity price. As the hon. member for Macdonald says, we are getting parity prices for everything but wheat. Give us a parity price and we shall be fairly well satisfied, but give us that price for a term of years, not just for one year.

Both hon. members referred to the benefits derived from the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I should like to ask who initiated that legislation, who made those benefits possible in Saskatchewan? The hon. member for Moose Jaw cannot recall, but I think the hon. member for Macdonald will because he was sitting back here somewhere when that act went through this house. The Minister of Pensions and National Health, the hon. member for Wood Mountain and other hon. members will recall the opposition there was at that time to the bill. That legislation was passed to create water storage and furnish supplies of water to parts of Saskatchewan which were what one might call deserts. I take considerable credit for the fact that that legislation was initiated by the government I had the honour to support from 1930 to 1935.

We are supposed to be discussing the minister's estimates in a general way, but we seem to have got far afield. I would not have been so far afield had it not been for the two or three speeches we have heard. I have been waiting to hear the minister give a reply to the one or two speeches which seem to have caused so much irritation on the part of the two hon. members. These estimates are practically the same as we had last year. There is a reduction of about $43,000 in the main estimates, and then when the specials come down there will be a reduction of $28,000,000. This reduction has been referred to already. The minister has stated that in the agriculture part of the war appropriation there is a provision which he does not want to have discussed while we are discussing the main estimates.

Later on, supplementary estimates will be brought down. It is possible the minister may be going out to Saskatchewan during the Easter recess, or he may have occasion to go a little sooner if certain developments out there require his presence. I understand that certain things have been suggested in the Saskatchewan legislature and that there is to be a rebate or write-off of the seed grain debts where they have been paid to the extent of $4,000,000. There will have to be supplementary estimates to take care of that, as well as other items about which we do not know.

The speech from the throne referred to certain measures that will be introduced in connection with floor prices. There is no question that the Minister of Agriculture will play a very important part in any legislation dealing with agricultural matters, and in this respect he can have a considerable say to ensure that justice is done as far as having a price somewhere near parity, or a just price, the floor price. There are 138,700 farmers in Saskatchewan—the third largest number of any province in the dominion. All our Saskatchewan farmers want, as I have said, is a square deal. They have not had their proper proportion of the national farm income. If they can be assured of it by the establishing of a floor price, and it is on a parity basis, I think it will be fairly well received, provided that it extends over a term of years so that they will have the assurance of some security.

Much has been said about cooperative organizations. The hon. member for Macdonald became quite heated in his remarks on this subject in reply to members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. I do not find any fault with them on this score; I think they are on sound ground when they plead for fair treatment of all cooperative organizations. We have some in Saskatchewan. I think all credit and assistance possible should be extended by the government to these organizations if they are properly operated. Having some knowledge of their accomplishments, I say that they have been marvellous, and any government should give them all possible assistance to carry on that sort of work. Nobody has more experience of the workings of this kind of organization as it pertains to agriculture than the farmers themselves, and on behalf of our 138,000 Saskatchewan producers, a great many of whom belong to cooperative organizations, I make a special plea that they be given every assistance possible, and hope that the minister will be just in that respect.

It is also my hope that the minister will give consideration to setting up a board of live stock commissioners. The time has arrived when such a body could do a lot of good. It should, of course, include proper representation of the producers, because no one knows better than they do what is just and proper in these matters. Such a board could do a lot for the marketing of live stock products at the present time. We need enlarged markets; we want to create a demand for agricultural products, including the expansion of the home market. I believe a live stock marketing board could do much in that direction.

I believe it was the hon. member for Macdonald who referred this evening to diversified farming. We have to consider some policy which will diversify farming operations in western Canada. There is great room for it. Many more people could be given employment and established on farms if the system were more diversified. I need only cite my own case. Last year we had only two men on our farm: a farmer and his son operating a combine harvesting fifteen or sixteen thousand bushels of grain. Do you not think that, by a system whereunder other products than grain were grown there, many more people could be employed, real farm homes established, and adequate facilities for farm life created, with lasting benefits to agriculture? It is something to keep in mind.

There are other matters which can be discussed later, item by item, but I have one short reference to make at this time. Last year—the hon. member for Macdonald might listen to this—the agriculture committee met long after the house opened; we heard from a good many chairmen of boards and officials of departments; and we western members were asked to give way to the eastern members. They said they had heard too much about the west, about wheat and other grain, and they blamed this condition on two or three C.C.F. members of the committee and myself in particular. They said "Forget about wheat and so on this year and let us have a chance." We did it, and did it gracefully, but I will say that we had to come to their rescue quite often to keep the thing going properly. With all due respect to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) who is sitting in front of me, we knew as much about eastern farmers' problems—producing the same products that they do in eastern Canada—as the eastern members themselves. However, we had a very interesting time, because we heard such a variety of witnesses and evidence. We drew a report on July 16, 19 and 20, and then we did not have the courage to rise and move its adoption, although we had advocated many of the things which have been advocated here to-night, such as research laboratories and so on.

Mr. WEIR: The minister must have read the report, then.

Mr. PERLEY: Maybe he did, but the chairman of the committee did not have the courage to rise in his place and move that it be adopted.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That was not the only report which was not moved.

Mr. PERLEY: That just shows you.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What is the point?

Mr. PERLEY: What is the use of members going to work for two or three months and drawing up a report, leaving it until the last day or two, and then not moving the adoption of the result of all that work? What is the use of taking up our time?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You learn something. You just admitted that you learned a lot.

Mr. PERLEY: The chairman did not even move the adoption of the recommendations. I have the report in my hand; it contains several sections. I myself moved three amendments of the report. Two of them were turned down and not put in the report, but the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have adopted them

Mr. GRAYDON: They knew a good thing when they saw it.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member knew what was coming up.

Mr. PERLEY: Therefore I hope the Minister of Agriculture will insist on this committee getting to work in good time. We can gather much more information similar to what we had last year, carry on from there, and do some useful work.

To get back to these estimates: the details of the items on page 4 are given on pages 54, 55 and 56 and pages following. I grant that there is not much change since last year except under "special"; but if you examine these pages you will see a large item, for travelling expenses, set out at the end of each section. For example, "publicity and extension, travelling expenses, $5,000"; "departmental administration, travelling expenses, $8,000"; "science service, travelling expenses, $900"; "animal and poultry pathology, travelling expenses, $4,000"; "bacteriology and dairy research, travelling expenses, $1,300"; "botany and plant pathology, travelling expenses, $15,500". In one division, namely entomology, travelling expenses are shown as over $39,000. I contend that in every branch the travelling expenses are absolutely out of all reason and could be curtailed to a very considerable extent.

I have the auditor general's report here and the figures with regard to the P.F.R.A. are illuminating. It gives the number of men employed, field men, and so on. In one branch there are 281 and in another branch 300, and the expenses run from $300 to $1,800, besides salaries.

Mr. McNIVEN: Many are part-time men.

Mr. PERLEY: Nevertheless they draw expenses running from $300 to $1,800 a year. I submit that that branch could be cut in two, especially when, as the minister says, they will not have the wheat acreage bonus this year.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon. member referring to the P.F.R.A. or the prairie farm assistance?

Mr. PERLEY: It gives P.F.R.A. and prairie farm assistance.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member gave the P.F.R.A. alone. The figures sound large for that particular activity.

Mr. PERLEY: I can get them in a minute.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it is about right for prairie farm assistance.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. PERLEY: That is the one with 281 and the expenses are given. Then there is the wheat acreage reduction outfit. They have a large expense account running from $300 to $2,000. In my opinion these are branches that could be considerably cut down in their expenses. That is one great saving the minister could make. I do not want to take up more time, but when the estimates are called item by item I shall have something to say. In the meantime I think the minister should answer some of the questions that have been put to him to-night.

Mr. BRYCE: I am not a parliamentarian but a dirt farmer. I am not familiar with the rules of the house and I want to take this opportunity, while the discussion is broad, to say what I have to say. Listening to some of the hon. gentlemen who have already spoken, I was reminded of the fact that I am an immigrant to this country. I read a book that brought me to this country, and when I heard the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) I thought he was the author. Then when I heard the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) I thought the book might have come from Ontario. But when my hon. friend the member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) rises in his place and says the same things, I know it was the Liberal party.

Mr. GARDINER: Are you sorry you are here?

Mr. WEIR: You didna go back.

Mr. BRYCE: I never made enough to go back.

I have tried many times to become better acquainted with the Minister of Agriculture, and in fact on one occasion I drove 200 miles to make his acquaintance and to ask him some questions, but I had to be satisfied with a shake of his hand. He expressed his sorrow that he could not spend any more time with me. In the house a few days ago the Minister of Agriculture talked about how well off we were in Canada—in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and other provinces engaged in mixed farming. I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to a few facts. I could take steers I sold in Winnipeg for 11¾ cents a pound and send them to St. Paul and make $35 dollars more on each of them. I could run steers to St. Paul for seventy cents a hundred and the exchange in my money would pay the duty.

Talking about cattle, I want to ask the minister why he always argues that I do not need a spread in feeding my steers. When I buy a steer I want a spread on it. I want a two cent spread to enable me to break even. To take simple figures, we will say that the feeder market is ten cents. If I buy a steer of 700 lbs. at ten cents, that is $70. I have to put 300 pounds on his back before I can put him back on the market, and that will take me 180 days. I do not know whether other farmers can do better than that, but that is the best I can do. That steer will eat two tons of hay which, at $7.50 a ton, means $15 added to the $70. When I take that animal home he will eat five pounds of chop a day, and when I put him away he will have increased that to fifteen pounds a day. However, suppose we strike a happy medium and say ten pounds a day; that means he will eat 1,800 pounds of chop. I can get $1.25 per 100 pounds for my grain at the elevator and another twenty-five cents to crush it and handle it. That comes to $1.50, so that you have to add another $27. To keep him in good shape and put a good shine on his coat I have to give him oil cake meal, and he will use fifty pounds in those 180 days. He will need bone-meal and salt. Put on $1 for that and the steer has cost me $114.25. If I sell him on a twelve cent market at Winnipeg I will get $120. I have only $5.75 left for transportation, commission, insurance, labour and depreciation on my buildings. I want to ask the minister how that can be done without a spread. I can buy cattle in the spring at ten cents and sell at ten cents and make more money feeding them grass, because I do not feed them inside. I want the minister to answer these questions.

I want to say something about hogs too. In the new regulations we are to get $27.45 for select hogs, $3 premium paid by the government. On a "B-1" hog we will get $26.45, a $2 premium. We are to get $23.45 for a "B-2" hog, which is a dollar reduction. I should like to know why there should be this dollar reduction. A "B-1" hog is a light hog, a hog that the packer is willing to pay more money for because when you go into a restaurant and ask for pork chops you do not get them off a 200-pound hog, you get them off a hog dressing around 120 to 135 pounds. If this is a penalty or a fine to the farmer for selling a light hog, why put it into the pocket of the packer? Why not give it to the Red Cross? A "B-2" hog will bring $23.45; a "C-1", $22.95; a "D-1", $22.45. These five grades can go into the export trade, or at least a part of them. There are eight different grades from the producer to the packer. There are twenty-four grades from the packer to the meat board, and from the meat board to the British food ministry there are two grades "A" and "B". If the hog that I produce is fit for export bacon I should get that export bacon price for it. The way it stands to-day it is to the advantage of the packer, not the farmer.

I should like to make another comparison. There is only an imaginary line between Manitoba and that portion of the United States situated to the south of it. The United States farmer raises hogs and sells them at from 200 to 300 weight. His hogs average 250 pounds. We have all these penalties on this side of the line. If I get a hog up to 200 pounds, I can put from two and a half to three pounds a day on him. He will make very rapid gains at this weight. The United States farmer is paid $26.90 for his hog, and he has the extra weight. If you follow this hog along you will find that it could go to the same packing company as the Canadian hog and they are both sold to the British market at the same price. Because of the way grading is set up now, only about thirty per cent are select hogs. This new grading puts a penalty on the average producer. I am not satisfied with the new system. The hon. minister knows that. I have made quite a study of this problem. The man who grades a hog has only six seconds in which to do it. He has to satisfy himself that it is twenty-nine inches from the hip bone to the shoulder bone, that there is no more than two inches of fat on the shoulder. There has to be no more than one and a half inches on the loin and a little less on the hips. These hogs pass steadily before the grader. I have timed them repeatedly and the time is six seconds. I claim that is one of the reasons why when I send a lot of hogs in and the returns come back I get nine or ten selects, and from the very same boar and the same brood sows I get only two the next time. There is something wrong with the system. I have spoken to one of the big packers about it. He says that if he cannot kill 500 hogs an hour he will shut down his plant. Let us get two graders in there and give the farmer a square deal.

Another serious grievance that I should like to mention is the price of grain. There is a subsidy on grain. When a man is feeding his own grain he does not get that. I should like the Minister of Agriculture to do something about that, because unless that position is cleared up there will be fewer hogs by October. I know throughout my own settlement people are not going to feed the grain. It is at a good price, and they will not feed it to the hogs when they can get the price for it. I know arrangements have been made whereby a man who is feeding hogs can go and get the bonus back, but the man who produces the grain is not getting the benefit of that.

The hon. member for Macdonald spoke about the experimental farms. I have received quite a lot of benefit from them, but there is one thing I should like to say here. If those experimental farms could be brought more in line with the conditions that the average farmer has to face in producing his hogs they would be more educational. Hogs are raised by the agricultural college in Winnipeg, but they are pampered hogs. You could not work in the field all day and give hogs care like that. If we had conditions on these experimental farms similar to those on the average farm a better comparison could be made. I had the pleasure of taking one of my constituents around the agricultural college. I said to him, "How would you like this, or what would you do with it?" He said: "The wife and I would move in right away." The conditions to which I have referred must be improved so that they will be of some benefit to the rank and file in the country.

I should like to say to the hon. members who have spoken that I have not been one of fortune's favoured few since I came to this country. I sold hogs in some of these good years for $2.65 a hundred. I sold steers for two and a half cents a hundred.

Mr. GRANT: The Tories were in then.

Mr. BRYCE: You are all tarred with the one brush. I sold butterfat for twelve cents a pound. If we wanted a packet of matches we sent two dozen eggs to the store. Do not forget that. We had twelve years of that.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I was very much interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Selkirk, a Scotsman with a Scotch tongue. I know he knows something about cattle, because I come from a Scotch constituency. These people came out from Scotland many years ago and settled in what I think is the best riding in Ontario, that of West Middlesex. There we have some of the best cattle feeders in the Dominion of Canada. In the little village of Ailsa Craig, near where I live, there were more cattle shipped out in the old days than anywhere else in Canada with the exception of the city of Calgary, Alberta. The coming of the trucks interfered with that shipment and we have not been able to keep up that record for that point. After listening to the remarks made by my hon. friend with respect to cattle and the feeding of cattle, I say in all sincerity that a Scotch farmer knows how to feed steers. I think the hon. member for Selkirk knows something about it. I agree with the hon. member that it is impossible for feeders to go out and buy cattle unless there is some spread, though the producer who fattens that steer is all right with the prices we are receiving to-day. In the district from which I come, however, where the producers depend upon the feeders to buy up these stockers in the fall, feed them during the winter and sell them in the spring or summer, we believe there must be a spread. At the present time the spread is not as great as it should be, but the feeders of cattle in my district are going ahead, believing that they will receive a good price for their product during the coming summer.

I must admit that there is a little consternation at the present time among the cattle feeders and those who have steers to sell, because the packing houses in Toronto, where we in western Ontario sell our steers, have sort of lain down and are not buying. The drovers who buy cattle from the farmers and ship to the Toronto market are having difficulty in selling their cattle; as one of the commission men claimed, if the offerings were light, say, only two hundred head of cattle, the prices would remain just the same. On that market there seems to be a tendency on the part of the packers—I may not be right in this, though I believe I am—to reduce the price of cattle. Hon. members may wonder why I say that. Well, the government has told us that if the packers reduce the price below the floor price, then the producer or feeder can send in his cattle to be slaughtered and the government will take care of it. I quote what the secretary of the meat board said last year to the committee on agriculture: "We are giving some consideration to one system which might be adopted, based upon the fact that on almost every main market there are public slaughter houses. If a producer of cattle felt that the prices offered by the packers were not fair, under this system we would be prepared to have these cattle slaughtered at these public slaughter houses." That is something we in western Ontario fear. We feel that the packer to-day is endeavouring to force the producer or feeder to send his cattle in so that they may be slaughtered on a rail-grading basis, and that is one thing we do not want. The cattlemen of my district, at any rate, will not stand for that. We will not have the rail-grading of cattle, and I hope and trust that at the proper time the government will step in and see that this is not made necessary. I have every faith that this will be done.

There is one thing in connection with the shipment of cattle to the stock yards that has often bothered me, and perhaps the minister can enlighten me in this regard. When a drover ships cattle there is condemnation insurance kept off the price. I think that insurance varies in different parts of Canada, but it runs into several hundred thousand dollars every year. The producers had nothing to say about that; the condemnation insurance is collected under an agreement between the packers and drovers which dates back to 1910 and which is still in effect. In Ontario the rate is twenty cents a head on steers and fifty cents on cows, while in the west it is one-half of one per cent. In the United States there is no condemnation insurance. I should like to know if the packers ever gave an accounting of that money, which came out of the drovers and producers in the first place. Perhaps the minister can explain that to me.

I am completely in agreement with what has been said regarding the movement of cattle across the line into the United States. No one could be more in favour of that than I am. I am a free trader; I believe in the free movement of goods from Canada to the United States and back again. I hope the day is not too far distant when our cattle may once more move across that line to the stockyards and packing-houses in Chicago, St. Paul, Buffalo and other cities.

Mr. WARD: And not only cattle.

Mr. McCUBBIN: No; at the moment I am only referring to cattle, but it applies to other products as well. At the present time, however, that may not be possible; if we need the meat in Canada, or if the mother country needs it, we are in duty bound to send it where it is needed. I think it is the feeling of all Canadian cattlemen that if Britain needs the meat they are willing to take their loss and send it over there. But again I express the hope that the day may not be too far distant when our cattle will move freely across the line once more.

One thing to which we in the eastern part of Canada object strenuously is the freight bonus paid to the packer on dressed meat coming from the west. We in Ontario feel very much incensed about this, when our own stockyards and packing houses are not able to take care of the cattle coming on to the markets here. We feel that this bonus should be removed. It was taken off once, but was restored later on. I believe that no class of people in this country have done a better job than has been done by the farmers. They are always willing to do their part. I will admit that in the early days of the war prices were not as good as they should have been, but now those prices have reached a level where I believe most of the people are satisfied. I realize that we are all human and that we like to get the highest possible prices for our farm products, but I feel that the majority of Canadian farmers are satisfied. There may be some inequalities, but they will be looked after.

In southwestern Ontario, from which I come, we are getting more and more into diversified farming, and there is one product on which we are now counting a great deal. I refer to the growing of turnips, which is being done by a great many farmers in that district. We are able to ship them under permit across the line, but I think a great deal could be done to increase the market in the United States. I believe an educational programme should be carried on throughout the length and breadth of both Canada and the United States to promote the consumption of turnips, because I feel that this product offers a great future for many Canadian farmers. The same may be said of beans and other products, of course; but if you go to the United States and ask some of the leading people there, they will tell you they have never tasted turnips. If you go to Philadelphia, Washington or New York you will find that turnips are not even on the menus of the leading hotels, so that I believe a great deal could be done by way of an educational programme in regard to certain of these farm products. I want to repeat in all sincerity that no group in Canada is more willing to do its part, under great difficulties through lack of help, than Canadian farmers, who will do everything possible to see that this war is brought to a successful conclusion.

Mr. GARDINER: A few moments ago the hon. member for Qu'Appelle made some reference to the expense accounts of officials of my department, and the hon. member for Weyburn made some references to my own expense account. I desire to give the same explanation in connection with the expense accounts of the minister and those of the inspectors and officials of the department. As hon. members know, this country extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and in each province there is a considerable agricultural area. As long as I could satisfy the Prime Minister of this country that I ought to remain as Minister of Agriculture I could hold down the position much more easily by remaining here and simply administering the department from my office. But I venture to say that while there has been criticism to-night of some things that have or have not been done in the department, if I had been in the Department of Agriculture—as I have been for eight years—and had never gone out through this country in order to learn at first hand what the problems of the farmers are, there would have been a great deal more criticism than there has been up to the present time. That is the only explanation I wish to make in connection with the expense accounts, so far as my own expense account is concerned. Incidentally, it has been throughout those whole eight years one of the highest expense accounts among ministers of the government, and I am rather proud of that fact. The nature of the department requires that from time to time I visit all of the activities which have been spoken about to-night, and concerning some of which some kind things have been said.

For example, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration is scattered throughout the southern part of the three prairie provinces. Many of the activities connected with fruit production are carried out in British Columbia, in the maritime provinces or in the southern part of Ontario. Activities in connection with stock raising, generally, are carried on throughout the whole length and breadth of the Dominion of Canada. Anyone who desires to become familiar at first hand with the problems of the farmers, and the people who deal with them, must of necessity from time to time and, indeed, quite often more than once in a year, visit the different parts of Canada to understand the problems confronting the farmers in the different seasons of the year. Therefore I make no apology whatsoever for having an expense account of $2,600 for 1942.

Having said that, may I add that there is no inspector in the Department of Agriculture who is inspecting agricultural activities throughout the rural areas who would be worth his salt if he did not have a high expense account. His work is to travel, and if he does not travel and see what is going on on the farms throughout the country, and make his inspections at first hand, then I say he is not doing the job for which he was employed. Generally speaking, a good man on the road spends at least as much on his expense account as he receives in salary—and quite often he is required to spend more than that. So that I make no apologies for the expense accounts found in the estimates for this year. I only compare them with what has been spent in preceding years under all governments, in provinces as well as in the dominion, and I suggest that our expense account will compare favourably with those for similar work, no matter where that work is carried on.

There has been some discussion to-night with regard to hogs. The hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Macdonald called attention to the fact that it is very easy to make statements respecting one's personal experiences, or based upon statements heard here and there throughout the country, and it is possible to make the complaints sound plausible. But when one gets down to actual statistics having to do with the matter under discussion he sometimes finds a picture very different from that which the general statement would lead one to believe.

For example, a few moments ago the hon. member for Selkirk left the impression that a great many hogs grading other than "A" and "B-1" entered into the export of bacon and hams from Canada. I have in my hand the last statement which came out dealing with the preceding week in connection with the marketing of hogs, and it is a statement which would be borne out by any week one might wish to choose throughout the year. This is what it says:

> Hog marketings eased off somewhat in the week ended February 12, showing a decrease of approximately 10,000 head below the previous week; nevertheless the increase over the same week last year was more than 125,000 head.

That is, we are down 10,000 in the week ending February 12, as compared with the previous week; but we are up 125,000 head as compared with the same week in the preceding year. The statistical statement continues:

> In the week ended February 12, exporting plants slaughtered 224,763 head—

And here are the important facts in that connection, as related to the statement made a few moments ago:

> (94·7 per cent of all inspected slaughterings.)

That is, this number slaughtered in exporting plants, namely, 224,763, is 94·7 per cent of all inspected slaughterings. The statement continues:

> —and included 215,151 regular hogs. Carcass gradings for the same week total 235,364, of which 26·5 per cent were grade "A", 47·3 per cent were "B-1".

That is, 73·8 per cent of all hogs taken into the plants during that week graded "A" or "B-1." The hon. member left the impression a few moments ago—if he was attempting to leave any impression whatsoever—that there was a very considerable number of hogs of the lower grades entering into these plants, which of necessity had to be taken into the export quantities, in order to make up the export going from this country. Let us look at the facts. This statement says that six per cent were "B-3" and 3·5 per cent were sows—which bears some relation to statements which have been made in the house since the opening of this session respecting the number of sows going on the market. It is shown here that 3·5 per cent of this very large total of more than 235,000 hogs graded that week—which, by the way, is about 11,000 more than were actually slaughtered during the week; some had been held in from the preceding week—were sows. Here we have this enormous total of somewhere between seventy per cent and seventy-five per cent of "A" and "B-1," carrying right through the year, and all slaughtered in the plants which kill hogs for export purposes. The statement continues:

> Warm dressed carcass weights—

And then it goes on to deal with the matter of weights, showing that these hogs were coming in at weights around 155 pounds. Following the statement as to weights the prices are given. And let me indicate to the committee that the price at Winnipeg, the market which was under discussion a few moments ago, for hogs on that particular week was $16.30. The price in the preceding week was $16.30. The price for the whole of January was $16.30. I repeat those prices in order to indicate that what members at every session of the house since the beginning of the war have been advocating, and have been saying this government should bring about, namely, that there should not be a great variation in prices from day to day and from week to week, has actually happened under the system now in effect in connection with the marketing and grading of hogs.

Therefore it is clear that since the beginning of this year and down to the present time the price has remained constant, despite the fact that 125,000 more hogs were inspected in those plants last week than were inspected in the same plants in the corresponding week one year ago. If that kind of thing had happened at any other time or under any other system than what we have in this country, every member of this committee knows what would have happened to the price of hogs. But the price of hogs remained constant throughout that period.

Let us look at the next fact with regard to export. During the week ended February 12, 20·3 million pounds of product were secured for export, including 19·6 million pounds of current put-down, 661,487 pounds of regular freezer and 50,000 pounds of blade-in Wiltshires. The total of 20·3 million pounds compares with 20·8 million pounds the previous week and 9·3 million pounds for the same week last year. That means twice as many animals are going through the plant now. If you take the figures with regard to quantities going through, what do you find? Export bacon secured in the week ended February 5 was equivalent to the yield of 170,000 carcasses, and that total of 20·8 million pounds is taken from those carcasses. When you look at the figures I gave a few moments ago you will see that there are more than 170,000 hogs that graded into those plants as "A's" and "B-1's". In other words, there were more hogs graded into those plants as "A's" and "B-1's" than were necessary to make up the total export to Great Britain. The capacity for storage regulated that; there could have been more put down for Britain if there had been more storage capacity.

I submit that it is not reasonable to suppose that these great quantities of low-grade hogs suggested by the hon. member are being put into bacon to be exported to Great Britain when the figures which I have just placed upon the record are the facts in connection with the situation. I think it is important when we are discussing questions of this kind that we get all the facts.

Mr. BRYCE: Is it not a fact that "B-3's" and "C-1's" can go into export bacon?

Mr. GARDINER: "B-3's" may, but not "C-1's". The fact that they can go in is not proving that they do go in.

Mr. BRYCE: Where do the hogs go?

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend will read the agreement which was made with Great Britain he will find that if "B-3's" do go in they do not bring the same price, either to the packer or to anyone else.

Mr. BRYCE: Is it not a fact that when a carload of hogs is graded at shipboard they pick out one or two bales and that satisfies the inspector that it is export bacon?

Mr. GARDINER: I have only five minutes and perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to answer the question. I have not the privilege of being a Scotsman although my ancestors came from Scotland, but I think any Scotsman coming from Scotland will know that no inspector is going to take every bale out of a shipload and make individual inspection. If he did that, the bacon would never get out of the country.

With regard to cattle, my hon. friend says that he needs a margin in order to produce steers during the winter time. I am not going to argue that question with him, but I should like to tell him that there is not ten per cent of the beef produced in this country that is produced in commercial feed lots or from cattle purchased from someone in the manner described by the hon. member for Selkirk and converted into beef.

Mr. BRYCE: Then I can sell my grain.

Mr. GARDINER: Ninety per cent of the beef produced in this country is produced by people who breed live stock, who raise their own grain to feed to that live stock. What I have said since the beginning of the war and what I continue to say is that we are not going to get a proper policy upon which to handle ninety per cent of the beef produced in this country if that policy is based upon the needs of the people who undertake the commercial feeding of cattle. My hon. friends across the way try to leave the impression that I am just a poor schoolteacher who never farmed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not a poor school teacher.

Mr. GARDINER: I can go into the Moose Jaw or Regina market and buy a steer in competition with any hon. member over there and pay at least one cent a pound more than he can afford to pay if he is a commercial feeder. I can take that steer to my farm and feed my own grain and make more money than he can. That is the reason why commercial feeders are not able to buy cattle on the market under the present condition. They are not able to get them because the farmer, the man who produces his own live stock, the man who produces his own grain, the man who carries the whole operation right through, can do the job at a lesser cost and make more money than the chap who goes into it in the other way. He can buy a few steers and put them in with his own and take the cattle away from the commercial feeder.

I know there are fellows who live outside large cities like Winnipeg who pride themselves upon being farmers, but they spend most of their time in Winnipeg sitting on boards of one kind or another. They boast considerably about what they are able to do. Probably they can go on to the market and buy some of the poorer fed cattle, cattle which are well bred but which were not fed before they were sent in; they can pick them up at a low price and freeze out the farmer in the country who sent them in and who did not know just exactly what he was doing. They can take them out, buy some grain, feed them, take them back in and make some profit. But one reason why that is becoming less possible is that we have our inspectors and our agronomists going around the country advising farmers how to finish their stock, how to feed them, how to put them on the market in the proper form.

Some of our hon. friends who are connected with farm organizations would be doing a better job for the farmer if they were to advocate the setting up of local markets into which a farmer could go to purchase cattle before they are put on trains and shipped hundreds of miles to a central market. After reaching the central market they are then shipped fifty, sixty or 100 miles to be finished, and the shipping costs and the cost of feeding are added before the cattle get back on the market again. Markets should be organized in different areas so that the farmer who has not sufficient grain to finish all the cattle he has can take them to that market in order that some neighbouring farmer who has the grain may buy them and feed them.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

The next time my estimates come up I am going to place on Hansard a letter written by a farmer in my constituency which I read in a newspaper a short time ago. I am not sure but that he was a Scotsman. He said that he could give some lessons on feeding to some farmers who talk like some hon. members in this house who talk about farming. He knew they would be very helpful. For instance, he said that he raised and fed two pigs for $25, and sold them for $25 each. Then he says that he takes steers, just the same as my hon. friend said he did, weighs them, weighs the feed, feeds them and puts 200 pounds on them in less than six months.

Mr. BRYCE: I said 300 pounds.

Mr. GARDINER: After he had fed the steers he made $1.25 a bushel on his oats. I would rather listen to stories of that kind than listen to the kind of stories we have heard to-night coming from men who claim they know all about feeding live stock, men who spend their time going around the country telling farmers how they ought to run their farms and how hard up all the farmers are. I would rather listen to farmers who are home farming. They have spent their time feeding cattle and feeding hogs and growing grain with which to feed them, and then they have seen to it that they are marketed at the proper time and thus have secured the highest possible returns for them.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 21, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT ON TUESDAYS UNTIL FOLLOWING THURSDAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when the house adjourns on Tuesday, the 22nd instant, it stand adjourned until Thursday, the 24th instant; and, unless otherwise ordered, when the house adjourns on Tuesday evenings, it stand adjourned until the following Thursday, and that standing order 2 be suspended in relation thereto for the present session.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): When the Prime Minister mentioned on Friday his intention of introducing this motion I was of the opinion that, under the rules of the house, the motion was one that required the usual notice, and subsequent inquiries, I think, have substantiated that view. The Prime Minister, however, was good enough in any event to allow the matter to stand over until to-day for discussion.

The question raised by this motion is one that goes perhaps a little farther than its phraseology would indicate. So far as our party is concerned, we are opposing the motion, and we do so after very careful consideration of its merits and demerits. May I indicate some of the reasons why we have arrived at that conclusion.

I think it will be readily apparent that there is need in this house for a better division of the average private member's time. If our party were of the opinion that this motion would in some way contribute to that end, we should be of course more inclined to give it favourable consideration; but when it is proposed that we should suspend sittings on Wednesday, many points naturally occur to one's mind as to the advisability of such a change. In the first place, I believe that Wednesday will be generally regarded by the members of the house, putting it on a comparative basis, as a particularly active parliamentary day. Coming in the middle of the week, it is a day on which the business of the house is usually given great care and attention, and that is not to reflect upon any other day on which we sit. It does seem to me that to take Wednesday out of the week, as this motion would do, even for the express purpose indicated by the Prime Minister, namely, to enable the committees to meet instead of the house, would be a backward rather than a forward step, if we have in mind the expedition of the work of the House of Commons.

In support of that contention, when we speak of the committees utilizing Wednesday for their sittings while the sittings of the house itself are suspended, I would point out that for years—I do not know whether there is any special reason for it—the committees in the main have not made use of their Mondays and Fridays to the full. While therefore that is the situation it does seem to me that there is a very strong argument against taking away one of the principal days of our sittings and utilizing it for committee work until at least the committees have found that the time allotted to their operations, from Monday until Friday night, has been entirely filled. That, I think, is one of the matters which the government ought to consider seriously before suspension of these sittings takes place.

There is another reason which must not be lost sight of, although I do not place special emphasis upon it. Since the government has asked private members to suspend the initiation of such matters as are normally introduced by them, it is not in the public interest to take away another three hours of an important day in the week when private members can have these deliberations.

Nor is it sufficient for the Prime Minister to indicate in introducing this motion that we are getting three hours on Friday evening. That is hardly in accordance with the fact, and although I know the Prime Minister was not making a special point of it, I want to clear it up in case it is in anybody's mind. There is no justification for our not sitting on Friday night, because that period is always available, according to the rules, for the house to sit. That is to say, we do not depart from any custom when we sit on Friday nights, and it should be our regular habit to do so, particularly in time of war. So that what we are really doing is taking three hours off our regular weekly sessions, at a time when, I believe, the public expect this parliament to give a full week's attention to a full week's job. For these reasons I trust the Prime Minister and the government will reconsider this proposal.

I now come to a consideration which is important from the point of view of the government, but not of parliament. We may as well face the fact that one of the main reasons why the suspension of Wednesday afternoon sittings is sponsored by the government is that the cabinet finds itself at certain times very much overworked. I am not going to dwell upon that, but I suggest, before the Prime Minister decides we should give up these important three hours, that he might well give thought to a reorganization of his ministry. I say this in the most kindly and friendly spirit. I notice two ministers applauding; I hope the Prime Minister does not see either of them, for I am bound to say that I do not think the work of the cabinet ministers is very equitably divided, if we on this side are in any position to judge. I am not reflecting on any cabinet minister, but there are some ministers who work very hard and others who do not have any more, to say the least, than enough work to do. That being the view, I believe, of parliament and the country, it seems to me that some way should be found whereby the cabinet's work could be so apportioned that it could spare enough men to handle Wednesday afternoon sittings to the satisfaction of the house, the government and the public.

Here is another strange thing. Last year seven parliamentary assistants were appointed, and we were asked to vote money for the purpose. My understanding was that this step was taken to relieve ministers in their parliamentary work. It was stated quite freely, I believe, in this chamber, that these men were not to be simply glorified deputy ministers, but were to be parliamentary assistants, as their title implies. Some very good men have been appointed, and I do not intend to criticize any of them. What I do criticize is the system under which they are operating. We have not noticed that to any great extent they have taken the places of ministers, except on very rare occasions, in debates in the house. Seldom does it happen that ministers are not here just as they were before, answering questions. It seems strange therefore that if pressure of work on the cabinet is the reason for suspending Wednesday afternoon sittings, the change was not proposed before these parliamentary assistants were appointed. On this point I come back to the question of distribution of work in the cabinet. I do not want to make any reflection on the Minister of Justice, or to contrast his work with that of the Minister of Agriculture. But it has always been an open question to us why, for instance, the Minister of Justice should have a parliamentary assistant. If he needs one I have no objection; both he and his parliamentary assistant are held in very high esteem and regard in this house. Anything I say is directed against the system rather than against those who hold the positions. But there does not seem to be much argument about this, that if the Minister of Justice needs a parliamentary assistant, the Minister of Agriculture, who has a tremendous burden to carry, should also have one. I mention this so that the whole problem of the distribution of government work may engage the attention of the Prime Minister from now on.

Further, if Wednesday is set aside as a day for committee meetings only, there arise such questions as provision of rooms and staff for the committees, and whether the committees will sit all through the week. More particularly this point must be in the minds of hon. members. Before the special committee on rules and procedure have held more than two sittings, this announcement is made. It seems to me that the government might have referred to that committee the question of Wednesday afternoon sittings in order that we might have expert advice as to how it would fit in with the general scheme of changes in rules and procedure which may be recommended to the house.

If a better system of expedition and dispatch in the work of the house can be devised, I am all in favour of it, and so is our party. We have called incessantly for a better system whereby the work of the chamber may be facilitated, but it does not seem to me that the taking away of some of the time of the house in the middle of the week is the right way to achieve this laudable object. And, having in mind that so far as the house is concerned Wednesday is one of our active days in legislation, I express my own views and the views of the party which I lead in this house as opposed to the adoption of the motion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, this is one occasion on which I am sorry I shall not be able to support the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). I am rather in favour of the motion. Personally I find, as I think every other hon. member finds, that if I do my work properly a parliamentary session is a tremendous grind. I have often told my constituents that if a member of parliament is to do his work as it should be done he can be the busiest man in the world; or, on the other hand, if he does not want to do his work properly he can be the laziest man in the world. I am under the impression that there should be a complete change in the hours of parliamentary sittings. Sometimes it is hard for us to break away from custom, but I should be delighted to learn that the committee being set up to consider the rules of procedure was to review the matter of the sitting hours, in order that we might facilitate the business of the house and also facilitate the work of members of parliament. We meet at three o'clock in the afternoon and sit until eleven o'clock at night. Some may regard that as a short day because it involves only six hours, but many of the provincial legislatures sit only in the afternoon. When I tell some of my people that we sit at night, they are quite surprised. When I tell them further that one gets down here at nine o'clock in the morning, or thereabouts, and looks after his correspondence, then goes into a committee at ten or eleven o'clock and stays there until one, then attends the sittings of the house beginning at three o'clock and again at eight o'clock, that seems like a pretty good day's work. Before I am here very long I begin to feel the effects of that work.

I do not believe we should have to sit so late at night in order that hon. members may properly represent their constituencies in this house. I am sure we all want to facilitate the business, but at the same time we want to retain our health, and there is something in that. I believe we should let up a little on these hours. Therefore I am in favour of the motion to do away with the Wednesday sitting. It does not necessarily follow that this will help us very much, because I know that the committees will sit that day, but they may meet in the morning and afternoon and still leave us Wednesday evening free.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, there are a good many reasons, I think, why the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should be supported by the house; most of them have been given already. We fear, however, that if we do not sit on Wednesday that day may not be utilized as well as it might be. At the present time Mondays and Fridays are off days; usually we try to avoid taking votes on those days, because many hon. members who live in the vicinity of Ottawa go home for the week-end. If we had another day, Wednesday, without a sitting of the house, my colleagues fear that we would be simply prolonging the session and not utilizing that day so as to get the most out of it. Personally I must confess that I would welcome being relieved of house duties on Wednesday. I agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) that those of us who have very heavy correspondence, who are trying to operate something of a major political movement, without facilities and from one small room under this roof, would from that point of view welcome an additional day.

With the position of the government I think every hon. member of this house must have a great deal of sympathy. I often wonder how the ministers manage to attend the meetings of cabinet council, which must be a great strain upon them, and at the same time attend in the house as frequently and as assiduously as they do. I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that hon. members who last year supported the proposal to appoint parliamentary assistants hoped that these assistants would relieve the ministers of constant attendance in the house, and would be able to speak for them on more occasions than they have in the past year.

Our fear, sir, is that this day may not be utilized in the manner in which it ought to be utilized, and for that reason some have grave doubts as to the wisdom of the proposal now made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to argue the wisdom of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), or to discuss the question of facilitating the work of the cabinet or of hon. members who are serving on committees. I should like to submit that if our sittings must be suspended one day during the week, it might be more practicable and more advantageous to hon. members if that day were Friday. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just pointed out, many hon. members go home on Friday for the week-end and, since half the membership of the house does not serve on committees, to suspend the sitting on Friday would give those hon. members a chance to go home and look after their business during the week-end. I submit that Friday would be a better day than Wednesday. I shall not move any amendment to the motion of the Prime Minister, but if my suggestion is approved by the house I hope the government will agree to it.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, on April 20, 1943, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) introduced his motion to appoint parliamentary assistants to the ministers, and I opposed that motion as best I could. I was satisfied at that time that I was right, and I am now doubly satisfied, because the Prime Minister has to come along with this motion notwithstanding the fact that, as my leader has said, we have appointed six parliamentary assistants. I do not want these parliamentary assistants to feel that anything I am about to say is intended as a reflection on them, for they were perhaps the best the Prime Minister could have selected from his side of the house, and my remarks have no reference to them or the work they have been doing. Personally I could not see why any red-blooded minister would want to be bothered with a parliamentary assistant. In this regard I am happy to hold up the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as a shining example to other members of the cabinet. Last year when the Prime Minister introduced his motion for appointment of parliamentary assistants he said, at page 2346 of Hansard of April 20 of that year:

> I need not elaborate upon the necessity of securing assistance for the ministers of the defence departments, of the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Department of Labour and the Department of Agriculture.

But the little Napoleon from the west does not need a parliamentary assistant, and I doubt if any minister in the cabinet has a more responsible or more difficult job to handle. I congratulate him upon his ability to handle his department. I have said that he is a little Napoleon; I might have said as well that he is a walking dynamo, and I congratulate the government upon having in the cabinet a man with the capacity of the Minister of Agriculture. I do not want anyone to think I am supporting what he does; I am speaking of his ability in handling his department.

I can picture a minister having a parliamentary assistant come to him for information. The minister will tell his assistant what to say in the house, and must take the responsibility for what is to be said. Naturally this takes the time of the minister. He would be much better occupied in attending to some other business. I never could see why, in this country of merely 12,000,000 people, and with its nineteen or twenty ministers—more I believe than we ever had before—parliamentary assistants were required. I was opposed to the whole business, because it was a useless expense to the country.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacNICOL: Order. Will the hon. member remain in his seat? I had begun to say that I was for many years a business man; I was connected with big business for many years, and I ought to know something about how to run a business. It would seem that the Prime Minister now finds he has to cut out Wednesday sittings. What will happen? Many members do not come to Ottawa until Tuesday night. Under the new arrangement there will be no necessity for them to come until Wednesday night. Then, many of them go back on Thursday, and the result will be that they will be in Ottawa one day in the week. If it is necessary that we have more time for committee work, why not take the whole of Wednesday night and Friday night for committees?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to work every night.

Mr. MacNICOL: I realize the Prime Minister wants to have more time. Those two nights are available, and I should think he could use them for committees.

What do we find? In the list before us are some fourteen parliamentary committees, and I think the country ought to know just what those committees are. First there is the committee on privileges and elections. Well, it may meet once in a session, but I doubt if it meets at all. The next is the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Railways are not being built any more, so that that committee is likely to sit only infrequently.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has not sat for several sessions.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for York-Sunbury says it has not sat for several sessions. That crosses that out, so far as work goes. The next is the committee on miscellaneous private bills. What time does that take which would interfere with the House of Commons?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is just a matter of considering divorce bills.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: And divorces are handled by the other house. The next is the committee on banking and commerce. This year that committee may have a good deal to do, because of the revision of the Bank Act. So far in the list that is the first committee which will have anything to do.

The next is the public accounts committee. I do not know whether that is the same as the committee of which the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) is chairman. If not, then the public accounts committee has nothing to do. I realize of course that the other committee about which I have spoken has much to do.

The committee on agriculture and colonization, next on the list, I presume has much work to do, although I do not know. The committee on standing orders would need to sit only about once a month. Then, what is done by the committee on marine and fisheries?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nothing.

Mr. MacNICOL: Surely the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bertrand) is capable of looking after that business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It should meet, but it never does.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then there is the committee on mines, forests and waters. Again these matters are under the control of a very able minister, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar)—and I pat him on the back as being one who does not require a parliamentary assistant.

The next is the committee on industrial and international relations; is it meeting any more? I have been in the house for years, and for a long time I have not noted any sittings of that committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Eight years ago.

Mr. MacNICOL: The committee on debates —has that anything to do? The committee on printing—well, what does the printing committee have to do? The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) smiles. I must tell him right now I was most surprised that he accepted a parliamentary assistant. I thought he was a big, strong, red-blooded man, and could quite easily take care of his department by himself. I am sorry I was disappointed.

The next is the committee on the library of parliament. Has it anything to do? Then, the committee on the restaurant. I do not suppose it has much to do. The committee on railways and shipping—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has a lot to do.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does not do much. Then the committee on the revision of standing orders. I presume that was the special committee appointed this year. Then the committee on The Dominion Elections Act. That committee has little to do; I hope our work will not take long.

The last on the list is the committee on reconstruction, which is now meeting. Out of that list of committees, how many are going to meet on Wednesdays, occupying the whole of that day?

I should like to support the Prime Minister, because he has a terrific job. I have no desire to add to his burdens; rather I would have them lessened. However I cannot see how the turning over of Wednesdays to the meeting of committees would relieve the congestion in parliament. I should like to see my own work lessened. I represent a large industrial riding, and I have a heavy correspondence. Rarely do I get away from these buildings until twelve o'clock at night. I am in my seat every sitting day, and I find that all my time is occupied. Certainly I should like to have more time to myself, but I am satisfied that the proposed arrangement for Wednesdays would not help me. In fact I would be afraid it would lengthen days which are now altogether too long.

The house knows where I stand, and I shall vote against the proposal.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I do not question the right of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) to speak; but from a sign I thought he gave me I concluded that he had finished his remarks. However, in that I was mistaken.

I do not agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) when he says Wednesday is the most important day in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not say that.

Mr. McIVOR: Perhaps I am wrong. To my mind Friday is the most important day, because, with the Tuesday-and-Thursday men at home, we get some business done. The leaving of Wednesdays for committees is a good suggestion, but to those in charge of making arrangements for committees I would say they should see to it that every hon. member is on a committee, so that no one may be idle. I believe the suggestion with regard to Wednesdays is wise, because no hon. member wishes to sit in committee when the house is sitting. Every hon. member who speaks in the house is worth hearing, no matter from which side he may speak. For these reasons I support the proposal.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I am opposed to this motion to suspend Wednesday sittings of the house for the present session. As has been so well pointed out, the passing of this motion would mean that there would be only two days in the week which would be available from the private members' point of view. As is known, many eastern members go home on Thursday evening or Friday morning and come back on Monday evening, and some understanding seems to have grown up in the house that important votes and important discussions will not take place except from Tuesday to Thursday inclusive of each week. If we do not sit on Wednesdays we shall have only two days for important matters.

The Prime Minister has pointed out that the sessions are strenuous for the cabinet ministers who must attend cabinet meetings and do their parliamentary work as well. I understand that when the parliamentary assistants were appointed a year ago it was done to relieve the ministers of much of their work in the house I agree with some of the remarks that have been made as to there being no necessity for some of these parliamentary assistants, although I think others of them were quite necessary.

I am convinced that this proposed arrangement will lengthen the session of parliament. I am one of the many who come from a considerable distance to attend the sessions. We are forced to stay in Ottawa over the long week-ends. We are faced with the expense of keeping up our homes in our constituencies. The cost of living in Ottawa is high, and we are not allowed to make deductions on our income tax returns for living expenses when we are away from home, as is permitted some of these dollar a year men who advise the government.

An hon. MEMBER: And the ministers.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Never mind the ministers just now. I think all in all that the motion of the Prime Minister is a most unfair one. Private members are just as anxious as the government that we get on with the business of the country, but we are faced with the fact that our rights as private members are being whittled down. We cannot challenge the answers given to questions asked on the orders of the day; we must accept those answers as given. The other day my namesake, the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross), a supporter of this government, was referring to the labour order, and is reported to have said at page 365 of Hansard:

> The government is run by a bureaucracy, the members are nothing and I frankly admit it. If the order had gone through the house, it would have been better prepared.

The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Corman) is reported on the same page to have said:

> The members of parliament are dead guinea pigs. I have never been consulted or called in on these matters. I admit there are powers behind the government. I think most of them are necessary, but I cannot see why the members should not be consulted.

Both those members are supporters of this government.

An hon. MEMBER: It is dead.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That may be. On many occasions the Prime Minister has set forth his great respect for parliamentary traditions. I am satisfied that the people of this country have great respect for the worth-while traditions of parliament, but I must confess that during the past few years under this regime parliament has fallen into disrepute in the minds of many of the people across this country. I think we should be careful not to allow further progress to be made in this respect. Just the other day the Prime Minister rose in his place and pointed out the trend that had taken place in connection with the formation of new groups. He stated that we were simply repeating what had happened in France. I would remind him that all this has taken place under his leadership and with so-called Canadian unity.

One hon. member pointed out this afternoon that he finds the long hours he has to put in on his parliamentary duties a strain on his health. I would point out that our men overseas must work much longer hours and under more difficult conditions than we do in this country. They should be considered when we think of ourselves in these times of stress and strain. In a period of war we must all make many sacrifices, but since coming here in 1940 it has become apparent to me that if present conditions continue we shall have a state of affairs in Canada under which only the very wealthy or those who have no substantial incomes or businesses will be able to come here as members of parliament. The average business man or farmer could not afford to make this sacrifice in ordinary times, but as I say we must all be prepared to sacrifice to the limit during war time.

I am opposed to the motion, because I do not think it is in the interests of the country. It will certainly lengthen the session and not help us with our legislative programme.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect I suggest that perhaps we are wasting the time of the house by continuing this debate. I think we would be very sensible to fall in with the idea suggested by the Prime Minister. We should support his motion and see how it works out. If after a time the committees should feel that their work was progressing satisfactorily, we could resume our sittings on Wednesdays.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the Prime Minister closes the debate I should like to ask him a question. Is it his hope that by taking Wednesdays he will be able to accomplish more on Fridays by retaining the membership of the house on those days? We might as well face the situation and admit that Friday is usually a lost day, except for the discussion of agriculture estimates. My observation over a long period of years is that all that takes place is a debate between the Minister of Agriculture and the western members opposing the administration, and it really is a lost day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nothing much is decided in those debates, and I have listened to them for twenty years. It is "wheat, wheat, wheat," and what the government did not do that they should have done; and for the most part I say it is a lost day. If the Prime Minister entertains that hope, then we may have some trading offset for the loss of Wednesdays, but I think it is a faint hope. I believe these week-enders will still go out on the four o'clock train on Fridays.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Thursdays.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us be fair. I sometimes have to go home myself, and that is what happens. If that could be remedied; if those members would remain here on Fridays and that day could be made a real parliamentary day, then there would be some offset for the loss of Wednesdays. Otherwise I fear the Prime Minister is going to defeat the object he has in mind; Wednesday afternoons will be a loss in the work of the session, and we shall not be any further ahead.

With reference to the cabinet ministers attending the house on Wednesdays, I should like to say that I have sat over here and watched the cabinet ministers. I do not want to say anything derogatory about them, but after the orders of the day are completed those gentlemen scurry out of the chamber like rabbits to their warrens. At times I have seen not more than two cabinet ministers in the two rows of front benches. There may be a good reason for this, but the fact is that cabinet ministers spend more time out of the chamber than they spend in it. I think this is against the Prime Minister's contention that he should have Wednesday afternoons for cabinet consultations.

The Prime Minister said that this will speed up committee meetings, but over a long period of years my observation is that the committees do a tremendous volume of work under high pressure and tension for a limited period of time, usually beginning about the middle of the session. During the early part of the session they do not meet. How many standing committees have already met this session? So far as I know, not one of them. Some of the special committees have met. The committee on the rules has had two meetings—very good meetings, I would say.

An hon. MEMBER: You were on that committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; perhaps that is why they were good. But none of the other committees has done any work yet, because there has been no work for them to do. Why have we not had the Bank Act before the banking and commerce committee? I suppose there is a good reason for that. I know that my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) is loaded with ammunition and is going gunning on that occasion. On the whole I think we are going to lose, on balance, by adopting this motion, and I should like the Prime Minister to give a better reason than he has given before I can convince myself that I should vote for the motion.

Mr. W. F. RICKARD (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should make my position clear on this motion. I am not particularly opposed to the motion, because I have every sympathy with the cabinet ministers in the work they are doing; but as has been already pointed out, parliamentary assistants have been appointed who we thought were going to take some of the burden from the shoulders of the cabinet ministers.

As far as the general committees are concerned, it has been the custom since I have been in the house for them not to begin to meet until the middle or latter part of the session. I understand that it is the special committees that will meet on Wednesdays, and anyone who looks over the membership of this house must know that a great many members are not members of any special committee. The brains of this house are not all concentrated in a few people. I think every hon. member has his part to play and something to contribute, and I do not see why every member of the house could not be put on one of the special committees. Take the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation. Probably no one is more interested in that committee than the farmer members, but there are only four farmers on that committee out of a membership of thirty-five. It seems to me that that is hardly a fair distribution.

Some of us who are not members of special committees will have nothing to do if the house does not sit on Wednesdays, except perhaps our ordinary work. We might of course devote the time to something of educative value, but so far as the work of this house is concerned we shall have nothing to do. If it were going to shorten the work of parliament I would be all in favour of the motion, but personally I cannot see it that way.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I agree that we are spending a little too much time in discussing the motion. I think it would be much better to take a vote now and let the members decide what they want. For myself I am not in favour of prolonging this debate. I wish to warn the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), however, that the adoption of the motion is not going to facilitate very much the work of the house, by having the committees sit on Wednesdays. What the Prime Minister needs to do is to appoint one of his ministers, who may not have so much to do as some of the others, to organize the work of the house and of the committees so that as many committees and as many private members as possible will be working every day. No one wants to be sitting around this house without something to do. Personally I have plenty to do whether the house or the committees are sitting or not, but I can understand that others may not have enough to do. The work of the session should be so arranged, and it should be someone's responsibility to so arrange it, that after a committee is appointed it should be set expeditiously to work and continue at its work until it has completed whatever piece of legislation is referred to it.

I support the motion and I hope that we can soon get on with the work of the house.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this motion will have the effect of either aiding the government or shortening the session. On the contrary I think it will tremendously increase the length of the sessions. I think it will do other things as well.

The three most important committees of this house, in view of the speech from the throne and the possibility of new legislation, are the social security committee, the reconstruction committee, and the banking and commerce committee. If we have all Wednesday for the social security committee to sit, I am quite certain that every individual in Canada with his own pet theory on health or security or social planning or some other panacea will wish to be heard before that committee, and a tremendous amount of irrelevant and extraneous information will be put before the committee, so that when the committee gets down to its work of making a report and perhaps helping to draft legislation, there will be such a volume of material before it, and so much of it, with all due respect, quite useless, that we shall not be serving the country as well. I believe that to get a committee functioning properly there should be a sense of urgency pervading it; but if this motion goes through we shall be inclined to sit back and say, "We have all Wednesday", and people will come before us and present everything. That is why I oppose this motion.

Last year the house spent over a month in the debate on the speech from the throne, and approximately a month on the budget. Fortunately this year the debate on the speech from the throne has ended. But I suggest that the government might limit the debates on the address and on the budget so that the house will retain its function as a deliberative and legislative assembly, and so that we shall not have members speaking for certain special and local interests in order to get their speeches on Hansard.

I think this motion will lengthen the sessions, will not make the committees more efficient, and will not assist the government in the efficient prosecution of this country's war effort.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this motion because, contrary to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) expects, I think its tendency, if adopted, will be to lengthen the session, and that has serious repercussions for those of us who live a long distance away from Ottawa. The other day the Prime Minister referred to the fact that in Great Britain parliament for a great part of the session sits from Tuesday to Thursday. But in Britain the distances are so short that a member can go home over the week-end and mingle with his constituents and come back on Tuesday with something of the point of view of the people he represents. We are in a totally different position because of the vast distances in Canada. We are here five or six months of the year, and those of us who live a long distance from our constituents seldom can get back home during the session and get their point of view and discuss their personal problems which they want us to bring before the House of Commons.

I do not think Wednesdays should be taken away. It is true the Prime Minister says that we have three hours on Friday night, but I think we should have that time anyway, and I think we should do committee work on Saturday, so as to allow members to get away by June or July. Last year it was the 2nd of August before I left the city, and many other members were a day or two later than that. That is a long time to be out of touch with the people whom one represents.

The second point is this. I have every sympathy with the main contention of the Prime Minister, that the cabinet ought to have more time. I agree with that, but some other arrangement could be made. I suggest that on one day of the week, either Thursday or Friday, or whatever days the government may choose, the war committee of the cabinet could meet, and that day could be devoted exclusively to estimates or other matters concerning departments whose ministers are not on the war committee of the cabinet; ministers who are on that committee could be represented by their parliamentary assistants. This would give one day of each week to the war committee of the cabinet for the discussion of matters which they are called upon to consider in carrying the great burden which each of us recognizes they are called upon to bear.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I am in accord with the views expressed by one or two hon. members who have spoken before me, especially those from the west. From my experience, a great deal of time is wasted, and it is a mistake to cut out Wednesdays. The last speaker referred to committees. If on Wednesday six or seven committees are meeting, you will have the whips running around and there will be great difficulty getting quorums together, because certain members are on two or three committees. Many of us are on two committees, and last year I found it difficult when attending one committee in which I was interested to find time to attend another committee meeting which I should like to have attended.

It is very unfair to members west of Fort William to ask us to forgo Wednesday sittings, because they never get a chance to go home. We used to sit on Friday nights, and as hon. members will recall, one or two ministers generally opened up their estimates earlier in the session than others and took advantage of that night. In that way we have accomplished a good deal. It would have been a good thing if many of the members who are present now had been in the house on Friday night last, because we had a very informative discussion and obtained much information which I am afraid half the members who were absent will not take the time to read. In my opinion it would prolong the session to adopt this motion and it is not fair to keep the western members here six and seven months. In the 1942 session we were here nearly seven months and last year about six months. From that point of view I am opposed to the motion.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): There are just two points I wish to discuss for a moment. First of all, I intend to follow the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) in this vote, and in view of the peculiar circumstances under which I was elected I should explain that statement. I am voting against this motion because, from my short experience in the house, during which time I have served on a number of committees, I am not satisfied that the work in any committee on which I have served warrants a suspension of the work of the house in favour of committees. Most of the reports of these committees are tabled in this house but few if any of them are ever brought to the house for consideration. If the estimates or other matters are passed on to committees, the majority of the members of the house will have no opportunity of discussing them.

The second point on which I wish to protest is this. Suggestions have been made in this house that members, particularly from the Toronto area, are accustomed to absenting themselves from the house on Mondays and Fridays. I would ask hon. members to look over the house this afternoon. If they do they will find that practically every member from Toronto and the Toronto area is in his place. I want that made quite clear. Because we come from Toronto or the Toronto area does not by any means indicate that we are not here in our places on Monday or Friday.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I am glad there is sufficient elbow room in this group to permit us to disagree with one another. Personally I am in favour of the motion presented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I do not think it is going to extend the session five minutes, for the simple reason that we have not been sitting on Wednesday nights, nor have we been sitting on Friday nights. The proposal before us definitely states that we shall sit on Friday nights.

The reason, however, why I am in favour of the motion is that I am anything but satisfied with the way the committee work is conducted, and I refer particularly to the special committees. We have the reconstruction committee, the social security committee, and the committee on war expenditures. The work being carried on by these committees is just as important as, if not more important than, the business of this house, because these committees are actually planning the future of Canada, giving the house guidance as to the legislation that will go through. My experience in the past two years, so far as committees are concerned, has been this. You leave a stenographer at eleven o'clock or at ten-thirty and rush to a committee with a file full of papers which you have not had a chance to read. Then you sit in and listen to a presentation from the manufacturers' association, the chamber of commerce or some other organization with a battery of experts, and the committee is doing nothing but listening. The chairman is watching the clock to see when twelve-thirty arrives so as to announce the adjournment of the committee and then you bundle your file under your arm and go back to your office and before you get a chance to read it you meet someone else. That is not satisfactory.

My conception of the motion which the Prime Minister proposes is that we shall set aside Wednesday specifically for that committee work, and then it will be the responsibility of the chairmen of committees to see that their work is so organized that these committees will meet from ten in the morning until any hour in the evening necessary for them to complete their business. If the time is utilized in that way I think it will be a step in the right direction. But the responsibility will rest on the government side of the house to see to it that the chairmen of the respective committees so organize the work as to give those on the committees an opportunity of properly preparing their case, analysing the evidence, and getting some understanding of the deliberations of the committees.

I am in favour of the motion on the understanding that that time be properly utilized and the committee work be properly organized so that the committees may be in a better position to advise the house with respect to the matters that they are called upon to consider.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I want to thank the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) for what he has said, and I also agree with some other hon. members who have spoken. There are one or two points I wish to put forward. If we sit from now on, through March, April, May and June, that will give us nineteen weeks, and if we have one meeting of a committee each week, that will be nineteen meetings. I do not know of any committee which has nineteen meetings. If we have two meetings a week, that provides thirty-eight mornings when these matters can be discussed. I think it would be a great mistake to cease to sit on Wednesdays. It is true that Wednesday evening is free, and this gives the private member a little time to do necessary work. I shall have to oppose the Prime Minister's motion.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): In opposing this motion I wish to point out that the debates on the speech from the throne and on the budget usually include a number of forty-minute speeches. These debates generally take place at the beginning of the session. The committees begin their sittings and occupy a good deal of the time of most hon. members in the latter part of the session. In July, when the estimates are brought down and discussed, the house finds it possible to sit in the mornings from eleven to one o'clock, in the afternoons from three to six o'clock, and frequently, towards the end of the session, as late as midnight or one o'clock in the morning. Thus far this session we have been sitting about twenty-four hours a week; last week we sat, I believe, twenty-seven hours. It seems to me that we should be able to sit now, at the very least, six hours a day for five days a week and three hours on Saturday, and try to get our work finished.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We used to sit all night. How about that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all, may I say to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that he was quite right when he directed the attention of the house to the fact that I was under the impression on Friday last that this motion, being one which related to the procedure of the house, did not require notice. The rule is that where the motion relates to the time of the sittings of the house it does not require any notice; but the interpretation of the word "time" is to hours rather than days, and, this motion having to do with day sittings, required notice in advance. I am sorry that I made the slip which I did at the time, but I am pleased my hon. friends have accepted my explanation with regard to it.

May I at once thank hon. members who have spoken in support of the motion. I am deeply appreciative of their having taken cognizance of the reasons which I gave when, on two previous occasions, I spoke of the desirability of this change; I am very grateful to them for their support.

I notice that I was supported in the matter by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), who is closely associated with the leader of the Social Credit party. I was a little surprised that the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), who followed him, should have taken occasion to bring him—of all members—to task on the score that at a time of war we should all be prepared to make an equal sacrifice. I assume my hon. friend was not aware that the hon. member for Macleod had lost a son in this war, and in that regard has suffered a greater sacrifice—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why bring that in?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—than many others. I have a right to speak, as well as hon. gentlemen opposite, and if one of their number undertakes to take an hon. member of this house to task on any score of war service, it is part of my duty to point out where it becomes necessary for purposes of the record that the hon. member referred to has suffered no light sacrifice in respect to the war.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the floor.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think the remarks of the Prime Minister are quite uncalled for. I had not the slightest thought of any personal attack on the hon. member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should certainly not have drawn the attention of the house to the fact if the hon. member had not made a specific reference in replying to the hon. member for Macleod, in respect to equality of sacrifice at this time of war. I wish to say to my hon. friend from Macleod, and to some four or five other hon. members who have also lost their sons in this war, that I desire to take advantage of this moment to extend to each and every one of them the sympathy of this house in the supreme sacrifices which have been made by a member of their respective families—a sacrifice which is very real to themselves. I hope that hereafter hon. members will not make references of the kind without fully considering their bearing.

To the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) I would say that I am glad to reply immediately to his question, whether I believe that more would be accomplished in the long run by the house sitting on Friday night and giving up the sitting on Wednesday afternoon and having the Wednesday free to be devoted entirely, if hon. members so desire, to the work of committees. I certainly do, and I made that statement previously when I spoke on this matter. I cannot see why this house should not accomplish more by having two sessions on Friday than by having one afternoon session on Wednesday and one afternoon session on Friday with all of Wednesdays left free for attendance by hon. members upon committees. The time, in hours of sitting, as has been pointed out, will be the equivalent, but I believe that more will be accomplished by virtue of the longer continuous sittings with extra time in addition for committees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had in mind the absence of so many on Fridays.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has touched a point which I am glad he brought up. He has in mind the absence at certain times of a number of members. I ask him what this house is here for, whether it is here to get through business or to accommodate members who wish to be absent one day and present another? I am not the keeper of the consciences of hon. gentlemen in this house. If a member is not sufficiently interested to attend the different sittings of the house, that is his affair and the concern of his constituents; it is not the affair of the government. The government's concern is to try to get through all the business we possibly can. To ask that we should consider arranging the business of the house so as to accommodate those who wish to be absent part of the time instead of being present all the time is to prefer a perfectly unreasonable request.

May I say again that I hope the public at least do not believe that the amount of work which is accomplished in this parliament is to be estimated by the amount of talk, the amount of discussion. As a matter of fact, one of the hopes I cherish is that, having Wednesdays free, some hon. members at least will take advantage of that day to prepare themselves for debates which they expect may follow later on and will thereby be able the better to express themselves in a few words, instead, as so often happens, of getting their first knowledge of a matter which is being discussed when it comes up upon the orders of the day.

If hon. members will stop for a moment to consider how the parliament at Westminster conducts its affairs, they will realize that it is an absurdity to talk about the work of this parliament being dependent upon the number of hon. members that are in the house from day to day. I take it that every hon. member knows that in the British House of Commons they have seating capacity for something like 400 members, and that there are 615 members returned to the House of Commons. It would be just as reasonable to suggest that no meeting of the British House of Commons should be held to discuss important matters until the whole 615 members could be brought into the chamber. But Britain has realized that what counts is not talk but argument and the importance and the weight of argument, and that the important thing to accomplish in parliament is the business of the country, and to expedite the business which parliament has been summoned to consider. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why this house on different occasions has got through so much business on a Friday evening —because there have not been present others than those who were really interested in the matters under discussion. I think that disposes sufficiently of the matter of attendance in the house.

As to committees, if there can be an organization of the committee work in a way which will make it more effective, the government will be only too happy to lend itself to further that particular end. I ask hon. members, has there been a session of this parliament at any time when the work has been better organized than it has been from the beginning of this session up to this moment, and when more has been accomplished in an equivalent period of time? I say there has not been; and I believe that if hon. members will cooperate with the government in its work, much more in the way of expedition can be attained.

Mr. GRAYDON: Better put in a good word for the opposition on that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am coming to the opposition in a moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: We will be ready for you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I tell my hon. friend right now that one of the questions I intend to ask him in a moment is whether or not his leader is a part of the opposition. I want him to answer that question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If you want cooperation from the opposition you had better drop that line.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may tell my hon. friend from York-Sunbury that I shall have a word to say about cooperation, too, before I am through. This house is not going to be run in the interests of opposing groups who wish to embarrass the government rather than cooperate with and help the government. It is not going to be carried on very long in that way; I can tell my hon. friend that right now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was your attitude from 1930 to 1935, wasn't it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is the real opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now just keep quiet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me come to the real question. I have spoken twice in the house on this matter; if that had not been the case, I would have taken a different attitude now. I have told hon. members quite frankly that at this time of war, with the great issues that are facing the government and the world and the tremendous responsibilities that are on the shoulders of the government in dealing from day to day with these vast problems, the government needs more time to devote to the careful study and consideration of war problems than it has when parliament is in session, with the sessions carried on as they have been in the past. I made that very clear both times I spoke, but I noticed that this afternoon most hon. gentlemen carefully avoided that side of the question. It was not the government that was being considered in any particular, though I would impress upon this house again that the government has the responsibility of carrying on the war effort of this country at this time. In turn each hon. member who has risen has for the most part spoken about what would suit his particular convenience. Well, it is very human for all of us to think about ourselves first, but I do submit that at a time of war such as this, when hon. members know the responsibility that is upon the government, it is very little to ask that when we are dealing with these questions the government should receive consideration, perhaps in the first instance, in the matter of the business of the house.

Perhaps I can say what I have to say pretty much in this word. Since the beginning of this war the prime minister of Britain has told the House of Commons what time he felt the government required to conduct the business of the country in a time of war, and he has arranged the sittings of the Commons accordingly. Mr. Chamberlain did that; Mr. Churchill has done it. Each of these prime ministers told the House of Commons in Britain that at a time of war the responsibility on the government was so great with regard to the questions which the government alone could consider if it was to deal with them properly in an executive way, or deal with them efficiently when coming before the House of Commons, that the government needed so much time; and, as I pointed out here, since the beginning of the war the House of Commons in Britain has sat an average of only three days a week. That is, the House of Commons in Britain has found it necessary to sit only three days a week, not that committees may sit or that others may do this or that, but that the prime minister and his colleagues and those who have to do with the executive part of the work of carrying on the war may have opportunity adequately to discuss the great questions that are before them, and have the necessary time for consultation. If the prime minister of Great Britain has found it necessary to say this to the Commons and the Commons has accepted his word, I think I might claim that, having undertaken to see if possible that this government will carry on until the end of the war, my colleagues and I are entitled to the consideration of this house in the matter of the conditions under which we are to carry on.

I do not want hon. members of this house to forget that, enjoying the confidence of this country as we do; having had it from all sides, from the opposition as well as from the press of this country practically with one voice, that we should continue to carry on until this war is over, I believe we are entitled to have our request immediately met when we say to hon. gentlemen opposite that we need an extra afternoon to confer on the great questions that are coming to us day by day. If we cannot get that cooperation, then we shall have to consider what our responsibility is. I must say that what has taken place this afternoon has not made me believe any more strongly than I did hitherto in the cooperation we can expect from hon. gentlemen opposite. I hope the citizens of this country will take today's Hansard and read the debate that has taken place this afternoon—

Mr. GRAYDON: So do we.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—and see how many hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken in terms of what is needed on account of the war effort of this country at this time, and how many have dealt with petty politics which they thought would be helpful to them and obstructive to the government.

There was some talk about parliamentary assistants. Again hon. gentlemen seem to take the point of view that the service of a parliamentary assistant is to be measured only by the number of times his voice is heard in the House of Commons. Well, it only shows how completely lacking is their appreciation of what the duties of a minister and his assistant are, even to assert anything of that kind. A parliamentary assistant is busy from morning to night dealing with matters with which the minister is concerned, just as are the officials of his department. To suggest that his service to the country is to be measured by the number of times he appears in the house, or to say that he must be here instead of the minister, is entirely to mistake the purposes for which he has been appointed. And may I add that instead of reducing the number of parliamentary assistants I am going to find it necessary very soon to add to the number, just because the work that is on the shoulders of some of the ministers is becoming so much heavier at this time than it has been heretofore. I think I am entitled to say to hon. members of this house that they must remember that we are now in the fifth year of war, and that those of us who compose the government, particularly those who are on the war committee of the cabinet, have had over four very heavy years in dealing with these questions. Our position is not made any easier or our burden any lighter by the fact we know of circumstances affecting the future now hanging over our heads and the heads of others in similar positions the like of which have never before hung over the heads of members of any ministries in the world.

These matters cannot be dealt with lightly. Take the position this very day, this very week; and when I speak of myself I speak for my colleagues as well. I began my work at nine o'clock this morning, trying to deal with some matters that are of immediate importance, trying to consult officials of the departments over which I preside, trying to make sure that at least some acknowledgment was made of some of the most important letters; I had to be in the cabinet council with my colleagues at twelve o'clock, and we were kept there until a quarter to three this afternoon. I had then to be in this house at three o'clock to debate the present motion. One of the questions we were discussing in cabinet council to-day was a question on which we are expected to give Great Britain an answer by Thursday of this week. It is a very, very important question, which we could not settle in the two and a half hours we met to-day, a large part of which time was devoted to a discussion of it. When I say that the government needs time to consider some of these matters, so that it can have an uninterrupted sitting of the necessary duration without feeling that its members must jump up in the next five minutes and rush off to be in the House of Commons to answer questions, I think I am entitled to have my word in that respect accepted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not dispense with parliament altogether? You have pretty nearly done it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I think parliament could very well dispense with my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury:) I venture to suggest to my right hon. friend that this country would not agree with him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is fond of talking about dispensing with many things, but I want to tell him that when he makes remarks of this kind he must expect to get back what is coming to him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not worrying about anything the Prime Minister may say. I leave it to the people of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I come back to the position of the British parliament. There the ministers have their parliamentary secretaries, their financial secretaries, and many more assistants than our ministers have. It is true that they have many more important matters with which to deal, but the decisions that have to be made there are not more important relatively. The weight of responsibility is not any less, and I wish to say now to the house as Prime Minister of this country that it is not possible for the government of Canada at this time of war; knowing what lies immediately before the Canadian people and our armies in the field, to give the time required to the consideration of those problems which are coming up before us, the time which they should have, and which the interests of the country and of the war demand, unless we find it possible to have more time for continuous consultation while parliament is in session. I can think of no way in which that end can be achieved which would be less of a handicap to anyone than that of taking Wednesday afternoons for that purpose, and resuming the practice of having sittings of the house on Friday nights.

When my hon. friend interrupted me, I was speaking on some of the matters which we have to consider and how time is taken up in unexpected ways. Something has been said in the house about the wages control order. On Wednesday of this week the government is to meet with representatives of some of the railway brotherhoods, and I understand is to hear their representations, on this and other matters. Can my colleagues be excused from that? If they are absent, then there is comment on the fact that the government is not as respectful as it should be to the railway brotherhoods.

On Friday of this week we have an engagement to meet with representatives of the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress. After that we have a meeting with representatives of the Catholic Syndicates, to discuss also with them matters pertaining to the wage order. I hope that all my colleagues will be present with me at both these meetings. This will take most of the entire morning, and past the hour at which the cabinet meets. This is all apart from ordinary business which we have to take up independently.

Reference has been made to the absence at times of ministers from the house. Hon. members when they look up and see a minister absent ask, "Why is he absent?" The likelihood is that he is meeting with a delegation which has been waiting for days to see him, or conferring with regard to some of these matters which have to be left to the government, and which the cabinet has to decide.

I repeat that we are asking this house to give the government what it feels is necessary by way of time to consider matters which relate to the war, and other important matters which are coming up. And I am quite prepared to have a vote taken, if hon. members feel after what I have already said that they wish to vote on the matter.

Now I come to what my hon. friend has said. At the beginning of his remarks—and I am referring to the leader of the opposition—he referred to "our party" as opposing this motion. "Our party is opposing the motion," he said. "Our party"—what I wish to know is, and what I want the house to know, and the country also to know, is whether his party means the Progressive Conservative party; and if it does mean the Progressive Conservative party whether Mr. John Bracken, as leader of the Progressive Conservative party, is taking the attitude that he will not cooperate with the leader of the government in helping to get the time necessary for the government to deal with matters pertaining to the war. I ask my hon. friend that question now. When he speaks about "our party" does he include in that statement Mr. Bracken, who is leader of the Progressive Conservative party?

Mr. GRAYDON: If the Prime Minister wishes me to make a speech, when he has finished I am going to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Answer yes or no to the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister has no right to ask a question about what I am going to reply to him when he finishes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You cannot. My hon. friend has spoken already and he has exhausted his right. He has not answered the question yet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let him answer now, whether when he speaks about "our party" he included Mr. Bracken?

Mr. GRAYDON: I object to being abused in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister has lost his temper this afternoon, and I wish him to calm down a bit before he loses it further. As to this question of asking me yes or no, I am not under cross-examination with respect to that matter and I do not propose to be put under cross-examination. More than that, the Prime Minister has raised one straw man after another to be knocked down this afternoon, and he cannot do it this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, all my hon. friend has said will be read with interest.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope it will be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I am very glad it is all on the record, because anyone looking at that record will see how the leader of the opposition sidestepped and carefully avoided answering the question as to whether Mr. Bracken and his party is attempting to cooperate in this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have not asked the question yourself yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This comes back to what I said at the opening of the session. We have to discover whether we are going to let hon. members opposite change the character of the parliamentary institutions in our country by having one office in the House of Commons for the leader of the opposition, and another for the leader of the party in opposition in some mysterious place far away. In this matter the country has a right to know where Mr. Bracken, as leader of the Progressive Conservative party, stands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is upstairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I wish to emphasize is this, and it should, I think, be remembered, that in stating that the government would seek to carry on until this war is over, the steps necessary to that end, I expected to take with the cooperation of leaders of all parties.

Mr. GRAYDON: You wish us to agree with everything?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I never expected that.

Mr. GRAYDON: We have facilitated the work of the house as it has never been facilitated in years before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend please sit down?

Mr. GRAYDON: Thank you!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And may I say to my hon. friend, as leader of the opposition, and certain of his followers, that he would be much better to address the Chair when he is speaking.

Mr. GRAYDON: You did not address the Chair yourself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When you put the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been addressing the Chair all along.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You did not address the Chair when you put the question—when you insulted me.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Coming back to what I said on the address, this procedure was first proposed in the debate on the speech from the throne. A few days ago I made a further reference to it at some considerable length. I showed hon. members, by statistics which are now recorded in Hansard, that the sittings of this house for the last four years had equalled in number the sittings of the British parliament. We had actually given as much time, given as many hours in the year, as the British parliament had given. I repeat, the British government has found it necessary, in the administration of the government of the country in a time of war, to shorten somewhat the proceedings of the House of Commons and parliament, and to be accorded by the house a longer time in which they might fulfil their great responsibilities. And so I appeal again this afternoon to the house to give this government that opportunity, and I leave it to the house to decide whether we shall be given it or not.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was agreed to on the following division:

WAR EXPENDITURES

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH AND FIFTH REPORTS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton) moved:

That the third report of the special committee on war expenditures, presented to the house on January 26, 1944, be now concurred in.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend whether the second and fourth reports are also to be included for concurrence?

Mr. CLEAVER: I was just going to ask, Mr. Speaker, before making any remarks in support of the motion that the scope of the present debate should be clarified. A discussion took place on Friday, and I understand that the intention was to ask for the leave of the house to discuss concurrence not only in the third report but in the other three reports which have been tabled, and discuss also at the same time the motion of the Prime Minister to set up the committee this year.

Mr. SPEAKER: That would require the leave of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: In order to clarify the matter, may I say that I think the Prime Minister and I are both somewhat responsible because I am quite sure that he did not understand when I raised the question the other day that the third report was only part of the report of the war expenditures committee. My understanding, and I take it that it would be his, was that the motion would include all the reports of all the subcommittees of the war expenditures committee, and my suggestion to him and to the hon. member for Halton was that concurrence be moved in all the reports brought down by the war expenditures committee, that we should discuss them first, that a debate with respect to the whole matter of war expenditures should come within the scope of the motion, and that, having dealt with that, we should then proceed to deal with the Prime Minister's motion to set up the war expenditures committee this year. My sole object was to avoid repetition and to save time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I had understood, when he asked about the third report, that the one report which hon. gentlemen opposite wished to discuss was the one which had to do with the Shipshaw development and power; that was the third report. However, I have since learned that there were other reports which were tabled at the same time. So far as the government are concerned we are perfectly willing to have all the reports discussed that were tabled on the last day of the last session.

Mr. GRAYDON: To regularize matters perhaps the hon. member would amend his motion.

Mr. COLDWELL: When I suggested originally that this report should be dealt with this session I had in mind that we would deal with the whole report of the war expenditures committee, and certainly not with only one part of that report. I must take my share of the responsibility for not being sufficiently alert when the motion was made and included only the third report. I think there was a misunderstanding. It is unusual to discuss just one subcommittee's report without discussing the whole report of the war expenditures committee.

Mr. CLEAVER: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, for leave of the house to amend the motion to include all the reports.

Mr. SPEAKER: The standing order requiring notice will also have to be suspended. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to amend his motion to read that the first, second, third, fourth and fifth reports of the special committee on war expenditures be concurred in?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to the fact that the first report was agreed to during the last session of parliament, on July 19, 1943. It simply asked that certain powers be conferred on the committee, to keep a record of its proceedings, and so forth.

Mr. SPEAKER: The third report was presented last session and the house resolved that it be considered this session. The proper procedure would be that the reports presented last session should now be presented to the house in order to take them out of the last session, and then concurrence moved. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member for Halton shall have leave to amend his motion accordingly, that the second, third, fourth and fifth reports of the special war expenditures committee be now concurred in?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): The committee on war expenditures, as the house will recall, was not set up until July 17 of last year. The committee was immediately convened. We held three meetings of the main committee between the 17th and the 24th of July when the house adjourned. The committee did not meet in August. Most members had been away from their ridings for many months and required to return to them. The committee, however, reconvened in September and worked continuously through the fall until the middle of November, and it reconvened again a week before the house opened, for the purpose of completing its reports. During this period the main committee and its various subcommittees held ninety-seven meetings at Ottawa in addition to many visits to war plants across Canada.

During the recess our meetings were exceptionally well attended this time, and I think it is only fitting that I should now pay a well-deserved tribute to the members of the committee and to the committee staff for the loyal and efficient way in which they carried on their duties and for the substantial results achieved.

Members of the house will have noticed from our reports that subcommittee No. 1 reported on shipbuilding, both as to cargo and the shipbuilding programme and as to naval vessels. Subcommittees Nos. 2 and 3 were grouped together for the aluminum inquiry. That was an exceptionally heavy inquiry and the committee thought it wise to assign that work jointly to those two subcommittees. Subcommittee No. 4 made the inquiry into the supply of agricultural implements and brought in a report with respect to that subject.

While the committee worked very diligently and lost no time, from the time it was appointed, and worked continuously throughout the fall, much of the work which we should have done has not yet been completed, and we are consequently much pleased that the house has taken notice of our fifth report, which was a recommendation that the committee this year should be set up as promptly as possible on the opening of the session.

Since most of our meetings have been in camera, the work of the committee has received little publicity, and I think it is only fair, only right that I should say that the war expenditures committee, much maligned as it is by some of our daily press, has saved many millions for Canada's war effort. This saving has been effected both directly and indirectly. A reference to the reports will disclose many of the direct savings that have been brought about, but in addition to the direct savings the indirect influence, I am convinced, is quite as important.

I believe it is commonly agreed now that the very fact that a war expenditure committee is sitting and is vigilantly watching government expenditures has a most salutary effect. While no major scandal has occurred in connection with Canada's war effort, and we are all very proud of that fact, yet many mistakes have been made—honest mistakes. War is wasteful. I will say this, however, that whenever mistakes have been made and whenever waste has occurred the mistakes have been remedied and the waste checked as soon as it was brought to the attention of the minister in question; and in the few instances where actual wrongdoing has occurred the wrongdoers have been punished.

Quite recently one of the Toronto dailies criticized the war expenditures committee for referring, through the minister, to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, criminal charges for investigation and for prosecution if prosecution proved to be justified. I was amazed to read that editorial because, speaking for myself and, I believe, for every member of the house, I do not know of any other way in which a crime, even though connected with the war effort, should be treated than by reference to the R.C.M.P. for investigation and to our criminal courts for punishment if crime actually was committed.

During the last year the committee followed its established practice of holding most of its meetings in camera. We have already had debates in three previous sessions of this house with reference to the practice of holding most of the meetings in camera, and the merits both for and against such meetings have been fully discussed in these debates. In Great Britain, as hon. members know, all meetings of the war expenditures committee are held in camera. In Great Britain also the subcommittees have not even the power to hold any of their meetings otherwise than in camera. In Canada, while the committee has full power to decide itself on the type of meetings to be held, our practice in the main has also been to hold most of our meetings in camera.

As to our subcommittees, we have not tied their hands, and every subcommittee that has been appointed by any war expenditures committee since 1941 has had the fullest power to decide whether its meetings shall be held publicly or in camera. In view of the fact that our Canadian practice as well as the British practice is so well established, I had hoped that there would be no further discussion about the matter. However, in listening to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) in his opening speech this session, I became fully aware of the fact that the point must be argued all over again.

May I call attention to the actual words used by the leader of the opposition. They are quite expressive though perhaps not too dignified, and I just wonder if, when the leader of the opposition uttered those words, he fully appreciated the fact that he was speaking to the British House of Commons in regard to their conduct of war expenditures—

Mr. HOMUTH: They are not running Canada.

Mr. CLEAVER: —and in an equal degree, speaking to our own House of Commons in regard to our own war expenditures.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, nonsense!

Mr. CLEAVER: Those are his words.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is not quite a difference, of course!

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member says, "Nonsense". That is the hon. member's own opinion. If he thinks it is nonsense I am very much encouraged to go on in the same train of thought. These are the words, Hansard, page 26:

> It is about time that the lid was blown off these in-camera sessions of the war expenditures committee. It is little short of a national disgrace that the people of Canada should not know something about the investigations of these contracts. I am opposed to the whole system of pulling down the blinds, closing the shutters and locking the doors when public contracts are being investigated.

You will notice that the leader of the opposition has accused the war expenditures committee of this House of Commons of acting in a manner which constitutes a national disgrace. These words demand a frank answer, and I welcome the opportunity of giving it. I say that no one knows better than the leader of the opposition, the Toronto Globe and Mail and the others who are carrying on this agitation against in-camera sessions of the war expenditures committee, the reasons why they are carrying on that agitation. They know there are good and sufficient reasons for the meetings being held in camera, and I shall be pleased to enumerate them a little later on.

I suggest that this whole campaign, led by the Toronto Globe and Mail, is politically inspired, is harmful to Canada's war morale, and is without any foundation in fact.

We are accused of having something to hide. That is assigned as the reasons for the in-camera hearings. We have nothing to hide, and what is more, we could not hide it if we wanted to. Every fact brought out in a meeting of the war expenditures committee is brought out with a member or two of the opposition sitting right there and listening to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And with his mouth sealed.

Mr. CLEAVER: Now, while it is true that the meetings are in camera, and while my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) says, "and with his mouth sealed", I would like to give you an illustration which perhaps answers that statement about the mouths being sealed. I say with every confidence that every word of evidence given in any sitting of a war expenditures committee is known within a few hours to the Tory board of strategy.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: A question of privilege.

Mr. HOMUTH: A question of privilege. I do not like taking privileges with him because I do not like his brand of politics anyway. But the hon. member has made an insinuation against the Conservative members of these committees, that they have broken confidences. Now the hon. member had better prove his statement or withdraw it. He is not going to get away with that.

Mr. CLEAVER: If my hon. friend had just been patient I was proceeding to prove my statement. I am prepared to prove it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): As a member of the war expenditures committee, I wish to take exception to the statement of the hon. member for Halton. I was opposed to these in camera sittings, but the majority of the members of the committee decided on in camera sittings, and I complied with their request. And no one, not even my colleagues, my associates in this house, has had access to the evidence as far as I am concerned, and no one outside the house has had access to it. I ask the hon. member to withdraw his accusation.

Mr. BOUCHER: I, too, rise to a point of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the same point of privilege?

Mr. BOUCHER: Yes. But I might base it on different facts. As a member of the war expenditures committee of last year I sat under similar circumstances when the committee was sitting in camera. I made the request that copies of the evidence taken from day to day be handed to hon. members, and that was declined. As a member of the committee I call it an infringement of my honour as a citizen of Canada to have it inferred that I, sitting in camera, would break a confidence and bring to a board of strategy of any party or even to my colleagues in the House of Commons anything that I am in honour bound to keep within the precincts of my own conscience. I do ask the hon. member for Halton immediately to retract the accusation he has made.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am obliged to the hon. member who has just taken his seat for joining the procession, but I would remind him of this one thing—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I ask the hon. member to withdraw without any qualifications whatever the statement he made. I ask it as my right as a member; not that it matters much, as far as his mentality is concerned.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was not in the chair, and did not hear the statement. I would be glad to know what the statement was.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In effect, he said, Mr. Speaker, that members of the committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I can inform Mr. Speaker of what took place—and I do not want any pack of wolves over there howling at me—may I direct to Your Honour's attention the allegation to which exception has been taken. It was to this effect: the hon. member for Halton has stated in express terms that all the evidence or most of the evidence taken before these committee meetings held in camera had been communicated by the members of the committee from this party to the board of strategy of the Tory party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what he said.

Mr. CLEAVER: If I may be permitted—I have the exact text of what I said and the proof of what I said. The hon. member for Carleton was one member who sat on our committee, and eventually the information reached the public accounts committee, and he was very active in prosecuting it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will you give me an idea what the statement was?

Mr. CLEAVER: Every fact brought out at war expenditures meetings can be known to the Tory board of strategy, and they are quick to take advantage of anything which they think should be publicized; and I am prepared to prove right now that they did take advantage—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member did not use those words. The hon. member made the statement that there were members of the opposition on those committees and that everything that was done at those committees was known within a few hours to the Tory board of strategy; and I want him to withdraw those insinuations. If he says those are not the words, let us read Hansard back.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the hon. member continue his speech. I shall see what Hansard has stated and I shall deal with it later.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not like to object to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but at the same time the hon. member did make his statement in very clear words. I think Hansard should read them, and I think they should be withdrawn at once.

Mr. SPEAKER: If I see the statement as it was given I shall be in a position then to say whether or not the statement was made as stated, but until I get the report of the exact word I cannot do so.

Mr. CLEAVER: With your permission, and so that there shall not be another fifteen-minute interruption—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do not cast any more slurs.

Mr. CLEAVER: —I should like to ask for the privilege of reading the next page or page and a half of my text.

Just a little over a year ago, subcommittee No. 1, when making an inspection at an aircraft plant in Montreal, unearthed an expenditure made by the company which the company obviously planned over the years to charge to excess profits, and wrongly so. The hon. member for Carleton was present at that meeting. The matter was referred to the commissioner of taxation and was caught in time to prevent loss to the treasury. The Conservative members of the subcommittee did not appreciate the fact that the matter was caught in time. The officials in question were by them called before the public accounts inquiry, and while our Conservative friends did not achieve the political advantage which they had hoped for out of the incident, yet it did serve this useful purpose: it proved beyond any doubt that evidence given before the committee, even though in camera, cannot be hidden, and that if anything occurs in the way of evidence of a questionable nature it can be and it has been brought before the public accounts committee.

Mr. BOUCHER: Again I rise to a point of privilege. The hon. member for Halton has stated what the Conservative members hoped for, which is far beyond his mental capacity to state, and I ask that he immediately withdraw it.

Mr. CLEAVER: The very fact that our hearings are held in camera and that the witnesses are not subjected to trial by press and press headlines leads to the greatest possible frankness and greatly assists the committee in pursuing its work. From the incident I have just related I can assure hon. members that if any evidence comes out in the war expenditures committee that is of particular interest, there is not the slightest danger of its being hidden. In the light of past experience we have nothing to fear from bashful reticence on the part of the opposition if anything comes up which they think will advance their political fortunes.

With apologies to the house I should like to outline briefly why the British war expenditures committee as well as our own committee have found that better work is done when the meetings are held in camera. In the first place there is much information brought out which, if disclosed, would give either aid or comfort to the enemy, and at the time you are taking evidence in regard to war contracts you never know when a witness is going to blurt out something which would have that result. In the second place we have found that witnesses, when giving evidence as to contentious matters or matters where honest mistakes have occurred, become very reticent and practically "freeze up" if the meetings are open to the public. They know in advance that the meeting is going to be in camera and that they are not going to be subjected to trial by the press, so they frankly tell the story. Some people may question that; some may say the witnesses should have more courage, and so on. However, we must face up to the fact that this state of affairs does exist; and if we want to do a thorough job as a war expenditures committee; if we want to acquire all the evidence we need as to contentious matters or matters in which mistakes have been made, we simply must hold our meetings in camera. In the third place—and this reason applies to all members of the house—in public meetings hon. members are prone to make speeches. When we are engaged in serious, hard work as a committee the same progress is not made if hon. members are making speeches in order to get in the headlines.

For these reasons we believe we achieve better results by having our meetings in camera. We know we get no publicity; we get nothing but hard work and results.

An hon. MEMBER: And abuse.

Mr. CLEAVER: Speaking of abuse, when we made that decision some three years ago we had two choices before us. We had to choose between doing a good job, knowing in advance that we would be criticized, or doing a mediocre job and escaping criticism. The great majority of the members of that committee, and they were not all Liberals, chose the hard road but the right road.

Mr. HOMUTH: And everyone else was wrong.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, I have not the confidence that my hon. friend has, but he has a right to his opinion. Just here I should like to remind hon. members once more why the war expenditures committee was set up in the first place. It was distinctly understood by all parties in this house that the committee was not to be a propaganda committee or a scandal-hunting committee, but that its sole duty would be to search for economies in order to help Canada's war effort.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one question I should like to ask the hon. member who has been on the committee for a long time and has acted as chairman for the last two years. Has that committee as it is now constituted any power to report such wrongdoing as may come to its notice to the membership of the House of Commons?

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, my hon. friend can read the order of reference as well as I can, but on several occasions I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicate that if the war expenditures committee found any wrongdoing we were at liberty, and it was our duty, to report the matter either to the House of Commons or to the public accounts committee. Last year we were given the further right to make confidential reports to the Prime Minister if any wrongdoing should be discovered which in the public interest should not be disclosed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has there been any change in the powers of the committee since it was first set up?

Mr. CLEAVER: I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this time will not be charged against me, but I believe I can find the reference for my hon. friend. The only change of which I am aware was the change requested in the report tabled on July 19, 1943, paragraph 5 of which reads as follows:

> In cases where consideration of national security precludes the publishing of certain recommendations and of the arguments upon which they are based, to address a memorandum to the Prime Minister for the consideration of the war cabinet, providing that the committee shall, whenever it has exercised such powers, report the fact as soon as possible to the house.

As I understand the British practice, it is this. If any matter arises which for reasons of security should not be tabled as a house report, a confidential report is made to the Prime Minister for consideration by the war cabinet. The war expenditures committee must notify the house, however, that it has made such confidential report, though not indicating the contents of it. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that in requesting this additional power the committee adopted exactly the wording that is contained in the reference to the British war expenditures committee.

When the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked this question I was about to say that another reason for setting up the committee on war expenditures was to permit private members of the House of Commons actively to take part in Canada's war effort, and to make a contribution to that effort. If hon. members will be good enough to read the debate which took place in the spring of 1941 I think they will find the answers to most of the charges—in my opinion unfair charges, though other hon. members may not agree with me—which are now being levelled by some of the daily newspapers and some members of the opposition with respect to the functioning of the war expenditures committee. I would suggest to my hon. friends of the opposition that if they want the lid blown off, as their leader mentioned the other day, or if they want fireworks, there is another committee to which they should go rather than the war expenditures committee. It is quite true that the fear of losing the war has passed, and that we can confidently look forward to final victory. But I suggest to yourself, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, that the need for economy in the war effort is just as great as it ever was, and that if there are any members who must indulge in fireworks, and who must regale themselves with charges about $400 rugs, which never did exist, and with other pieces of fiction, they can satisfy this desire for public stunting before the public accounts committee.

But why harm the war expenditures committee, a serious-minded committee which was set up for the express purpose of saving money in this country's war effort? Why attempt to hamper them in their work by putting on a demonstration of that kind?

Just to-day the Toronto Globe and Mail published a very misleading editorial in which they soundly criticize the committee upon its shipbuilding report. I should like to take the time of the house for a moment to refer briefly to our shipbuilding report. Late in 1940 Great Britain, on account of the submarine menace, needed cargo vessels very badly. Representatives from the British government came to this country and surveyed the possibility of building cargo vessels in Canada. For fifteen years prior to the war no steel cargo vessel had been built in this country, and we had little in the way of shipbuilding facilities.

As a result of that survey the British representatives found three firms in Canada with possibilities. Prices were negotiated with those firms. The final agreement was that $1,859,000 was to be spent for cargo vessels to be built on the Pacific coast, and $1,784,000 for cargo vessels to be built in the St. Lawrence. The shipping problem became progressively worse, and in April, 1941, an order in council was passed authorizing the incorporation of Wartime Merchant Shipping Limited. Canada then branched out on an aggressive policy of cargo shipbuilding. We had only three suitable yards. The industry was expanded to the greatest possible extent; new yards were built, and contracts were awarded to eleven shipyards in Canada. The prices in these yards were agreed upon as the prices which had been negotiated by the British representatives. The result was that by the end of 1943 Canada had built and delivered 232 cargo vessels, in addition to something over 400 naval ships.

In September, 1943, Sir Oliver Lyttelton, British Minister of Production, told a press conference that Canada was launching ships, exclusive of the larger types of war ships, to an extent equal to the volume of launchings by Great Britain. Ships were urgently needed. We had little in the way of shipbuilding facilities; we had little in the way of trained personnel, but we did produce the ships.

What about the cost? Some of the daily press and some of our hon. friends in the opposition are commencing entirely to forget the emergency, and to criticize the costs? Well, what about those costs? All of the original contracts were negotiated and signed at the price which had been arranged by the British delegation. That is the first item on cost.

Mr. McGREGOR: Was that carried out at the price the hon. member mentioned a few moments ago, both on the Pacific coast and on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. CLEAVER: The answer is yes. I will not get into an argument with my hon. friend.

Mr. McGREGOR: You bet you will not—but you will.

Mr. CLEAVER: The answer is yes.

Mr. McGREGOR: You will!

Mr. CLEAVER: These prices proved to be much too generous. Canadian shipbuilding firms and Canadian workmen apparently were more efficient and better producers than the British thought they could be. In the fall of 1942 subcommittee No. 1 visited a number of the shipbuilding yards, and checked production and production costs in those yards. We found that, in our opinion, their profits were too substantial.

Your committee on war expenditures made an interim report in that regard. I now read from page 94 of the minutes of proceedings of the committee on war expenditures. This is dated January 27, 1943, and dealing with 1942 states the following with respect to shipbuilding:

The subcommittee has heard the evidence of departmental officials and has visited many of the shipbuilding yards engaged in the construction of naval as well as cargo ships but has not completed its inquiry into this subject and consequently makes no general report at this time with respect to it.

Then follow the recommendations, and we did make a recommendation in a general way in regard to profits. Paragraph 3 at page 95 in the same report states:

As a result of its investigations to date the subcommittee makes the following recommendations. . . .

3. That as soon as company financial statements are available for the year 1942 a special study should be made of profits, accelerated depreciation and corporate taxation. The question of excess profits and accelerated depreciation has caused the subcommittee considerable concern.

That does not sound as if the committee is pulling its punches, as the Globe and Mail suggests. The recommendation goes on to say:

Very substantial profits are being earned in some instances far in excess of normal profits. . . .

Some months afterward—

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the minister continue reading that recommendation?

Mr. CLEAVER: My hon. friend may read the entire report, running into many pages, if he wishes to do so. I have read the part I require for the purpose of making my point. If my hon. friend wishes to add anything, he is within his rights in doing so.

Profits made by these companies were too high, and subsequently all the shipbuilding contracts with respect to cargo vessels were renegotiated. They were renegotiated back to the date of the first cargo vessel built in Canada, and at a saving of between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000 on the ships already built.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think the hon. member will agree we were not furnished with a full statement of accelerated depreciation with respect to cargo ships, at the time of our inquiry during the last year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has been interrupted considerably. If any questions are to be asked, his consent is necessary.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Mr. CLEAVER: Subcommittee No. 1 completed its investigation into the shipbuilding programme, and tabled its report on the 26th of last month. I refer hon. members to that report and ask them to read all of it. It is not long, and I should like to read into the record one paragraph with respect to cost to show that we did bring to the attention of the public in the fullest possible way exactly what had happened. I read from page 140 of the committee's minutes of proceedings as follows:

The original contracts for cargo ships were for a fixed price but when it was found that a ship could be built cheaper than anticipated renegotiation of contracts was undertaken. At the time renegotiation commenced about eighty ships had been delivered and about forty-five more were in various stages of construction. A flat fee of $50,000 for each North Sands ship was agreed upon and as to shipbuilding firms performing additional services, certain additional allowances were negotiated. This, it was reported to your committee, resulted in a reduction of approximately $300,000 per ship. These renegotiated contracts were made retroactive and were effective back to the date of the first ship, with a resulting reduction in cost of between thirty and forty million dollars.

It is all very well for my hon. friends of the opposition to say now that we were too generous in the prices allowed for these ships, but I would remind them that we had not yards, that we had not constructed a steel cargo vessel in the fifteen years prior to the outbreak of the war. We knew nothing of what it would cost to build these ships, but we did know one thing—we needed ships. What did this government do? Mr. H. R. MacMillan was appointed the head of the shipping company, and I challenge hon. members to give the name of any other man who would have done a better job of heading up this merchant shipbuilding company. He was an aggressive man, and he carried his aggressiveness and his insistence that we have ships almost to the point of ruthlessness. But we got the ships.

There are other points I should like to cover which were referred to inferentially in the editorial in the Globe and Mail. The suggestion was made in that editorial that we were trying to conceal facts, that we had not produced evidence in regard to the cost of some naval vessel and that we had not produced comparative costs as between the government-owned yard and a privately owned shipyard. I take it that the editorial refers to two motions moved by the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) in the subcommittee. They were negatived and I am told that only the hon. member voted for them. They were then brought before the main committee. The first motion appears on page 17 of the minutes of proceedings of the committee, and I quote:

Mr. McGregor moved in amendment to the report that schedules submitted as part of the evidence and relating to figures quoted in the report (para. (e) "cost") at the bottom of page 8, be incorporated in the report.

That motion was defeated by the committee. I am told that those figures were given to the committee in confidence. Many times the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has indicated to this house that it is not in the public interest to disclose contract prices with respect to ships. In order to leave the correct impression you must give considerable qualifying material because no two yards do the same amount of work on a ship and without the qualifying material a correct impression cannot be given. My first reason as to why the motion was defeated would be that the figures were given to us in confidence. The next objection to releasing the figures was that they had been compiled by company auditors and were not subject to an independent audit. We had no assurance that the two sets of figures were properly comparable because different firms of auditors have different methods of setting up head office costs, weighting overhead and the like. That was the second reason why the motion was defeated. I might state also that the hon. member's confrere on the subcommittee did not support his motion. The next amendment moved by the hon. member reads:

Mr. McGregor moved that paragraph 2 on page 13, entitled "Tribal class destroyer" be amended by adding further information including cost of construction in Canada as compared with cost in other countries.

This government has never to my knowledge given comparative costs in the countries of any of our allies, and certainly no war expenditures committee should hand out such costs even though they had them. Another objection to complying with that motion, which was defeated, was that Canada had not yet delivered one destroyer of the Tribal class. We had no costs of construction; all we had were estimates. There is another factor to be considered. It is most unfair to hand out costs of constructing the first ship or the first plane or the first intricate article of any description. Members of the house know that the first Hurricane plane built in Canada cost four times what the last one built in Canada did.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. COLDWELL: Go ahead and finish.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only with unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: Agreed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are the figures given by the hon. member with regard to aircraft correct, that is, that the last aircraft cost one-quarter what the first one did?

Mr. CLEAVER: That is common knowledge. I have seen a return tabled in this house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have not seen anything like that.

Mr. CLEAVER: I will say that it is substantially correct. I do not think I should give the house the actual figures, but I do say that the statement I have made that the first plane cost four times as much as the last one is correct within the matter of a few hundred dollars.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did the committee have evidence on that?

Mr. CLEAVER: No, that evidence was not before the committee.

I should like to conclude with just one thought. The work on the war expenditures committee was interesting, but it was hard. Members of the committee spent two or three or four months of their time between two long sessions and they made real personal sacrifices. I would hope that in this debate on the setting up of the committee we might lose perhaps a little of the spirit of the arena and retain more of the spirit of the workshop. With practically no exception every member of the committee cooperated to the fullest extent. I never asked any member of the committee, be he Conservative, Social Credit or Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, to perform a task which was not willingly and efficiently performed. I would ask hon. members, especially those who were not on the committee, to keep before them the reasons why the committee was set up. It was not a propaganda committee and it was never intended to be such. It was not a scandal-hunting committee. Our sole job was to look for economies and try to save money in carrying out this country's war effort.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have received a transcript of the statement made by the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Cleaver). It is as follows:

Now, while it is true that the meetings are in camera, and while my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) says, "and with his mouth sealed", I would like to give you an illustration which perhaps answers that statement about the mouths being sealed. I say with every confidence that every word of evidence given in any sitting of a war expenditures committee is known within a few hours to the Tory board of strategy.

The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) have denied that, as members of the committee. It seems to me an imputation against the honour of these gentlemen which I must ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, in so far as it may be construed as any imputation against any hon. member I unreservedly withdraw that statement. But I would like to state—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, his withdrawal should be without any qualification whatsoever.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am unduly encroaching on the time of the house. I would like to state that the reason I made the statement was—

Mr. HOMUTH: No, Mr. Speaker. All he has to do is withdraw what he said.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman should be allowed to finish his sentence.

Mr. CLEAVER: The only reason I made the reference I did was to assure the public of Canada that notwithstanding the fact that these meetings are in camera, if any wrongdoing is discovered it will be brought to light.

Mr. HOMUTH: I ask the hon. member to withdraw that last statement. He is imputing something against the honour of the members of that committee, and I ask him to withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member in the first instance made his withdrawal, and so far as any hon. member of the house is concerned, he withdrew his statement absolutely. I do not see any imputation in the latter part of his statement.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, for reasons that I shall give I want to oppose concurrence in the report of the war expenditures committee now before the house. I do this because the conclusions, at least in the matter of my criticisms of the aluminum agreements, are borne out neither by the evidence itself nor by the body of the report submitted to this house. The subcommittee dealing with the Aluminum Company of Canada finds that none of the allegations I made in this house is substantiated by the facts. I will endeavour to show, and I believe I can show, on the contrary, that the main allegations not only were substantiated by evidence placed before the subcommittee but are in fact in the main confirmed by the report itself.

To the extent that I erred, I erred in important respects in understating the case. Only in one particular would I modify what I said about the agreements last session, and that is when I said that the labour conditions in the plant were both scandalous and inhuman. What I would say now, after having seen the conditions in the plant, is that the labour relations of the corporation have been and are bad.

My allegations fall under several main headings. First, I stated that the aluminum group had, and continues to have, a monopoly in the production of this important metal in Canada. The New Oxford dictionary defines "monopoly" as "the exclusive possession of the trade in some commodity." Now for forty years the aluminum group has been the sole producer of raw aluminum in Canada, and it has had the exclusive possession of the trade in this commodity. There is no question then that my allegation, that the Aluminum Company of Canada was and is a monopoly, is proven conclusively.

The report takes refuge in the hope that there might be future competition in this metal in Canada. This is as improbable as it is irrelevant. The fact is that there is a monopoly and we ignore it at our peril. Yet the report says that none of my allegations is substantiated.

As to future competition, the huge tax and other concessions given the company during this period of war have enabled it to tighten its strangle-hold upon this vital metal. It has acquired, as the report clearly shows, vastly expanded modern plant and equipment, all fully paid for out of war production, and a power plant three-fifths paid for to enable it to produce the cheapest electrical power in North America. The report tries to minimize these advantages by suggesting future competition from plastics or from secondary aluminum. As to plastics, they will probably enter many fields; but without a knowledge of comparative costs and relative uses no intelligent appraisal can be made, and neither the evidence nor the report attempts any such appraisal.

As to the competition from secondary aluminum, raw aluminum must be made before scrap aluminum is possible. There is no secondary aluminum industry in Canada, and if they were, scrap aluminum, I am advised, could be used only for low-grade castings. It is therefore not a competitor with the virgin metal.

I said that restrictive clauses were included in the power contracts. The report confirms this, but explains that they had never been used. The fact is that they were there, and this, in my opinion, was a sufficient deterrent to any possible competitor, particularly in the earlier years of the company's history and development.

In the Shawinigan power contract, to which I specifically referred, the clause remained until December, 1943, after the subcommittee had adjourned; yet the report concludes that none of my allegations was substantiated.

I said last session that our minister at Washington had been counsel for the Aluminum Company of Canada up to the time the agreements between the governments and the company were made. That was admitted in this house. I said, too, that he was still vice-president and director of the parent company, Aluminium Limited. This was confirmed last session; yet the report declares that none of my allegations is substantiated.

I said, too, that the aluminum group had paid many millions for the water rights which had been alienated in the province of Quebec twenty-six years before for $40,000. The evidence and the report confirm it; yet the report states that none of my allegations is substantiated.

I said that Aluminium Limited, the parent or holding company, was an important member of an international cartel, the organization of which was arranged in Canada. I said that this cartel was formed to establish a production quota and to fix buying prices. This was amply confirmed by the evidence. I stated that Aluminium Limited was set up in 1928 and that the Aluminum Company of America transferred to the new Canadian company all its foreign holdings. I alleged that the share capital of the new company was distributed to the shareholders of the Aluminum Company of America as stock dividends. That was admitted in the evidence, which also shows that in 1939, the latest year for which we have records, the officers and directors and their immediate families, together with the important Mellon interests, held fifty-six per cent of the share capital of the United States company and over fifty-one per cent of the share capital of Aluminium Limited, the owner of the Aluminum Company of Canada. The president and five of the six directors are United States citizens; yet the report says that none of my allegations is substantiated.

As to the cartel itself, the Alliance Aluminum Company of Basle, Switzerland, the report now before this house confirms everything I said about it. Let the report now before the house speak for itself in this regard. This is what it says:

> An agreement was entered into to limit the production of the members of the group.

The group which form Alliance Limited, the cartel.

> In addition, an agreement was reached as to the price at which the group would purchase aluminum from its members; Aluminium Limited subscribed approximately 28 per cent of the total stock. The other members were the aluminum producers of Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy and Switzerland.

Later, the report now before the house adds that the Alliance corporation, the cartel, is still in existence. Aluminium Limited carries its shares in the cartel on its own books at the present time as an asset. The German nazi-controlled interest is still there and its shares are apparently unaffected. The report says, and the evidence amply confirms the statement, that this cartel set a world-buying price; yet the report draws the remarkable conclusion that prices were unaffected by this cartel and declares again that none of my allegations, including my charge that Aluminium Limited was a partner in a world cartel, was substantiated.

To-day at noon in the city of Toronto, speaking before the Canadian club, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) said this:

> International cartels which control markets and rob the people of legitimate benefits of inventions must be ruthlessly destroyed by government.

The same afternoon we are asked to concur in a report which attempts to whitewash one of the largest cartels in the world. Now, whatever miracles of production the aluminum group has accomplished, with united nations funds, since 1940, my statement that they jeopardized the war efforts of the united nations still stands. They restricted production before the war while Germany's domestic production greatly expanded. Under a cartel agreement the Aluminum Company of Canada supplied Japan with large quantities of metal, enabling her to destroy Chinese cities. In 1940 and 1941 our nations gathered aluminum pots and pans while our Chinese allies and our own kin paid with their blood the price of the cartel agreements. High prices and scarcity quotas are the ways of these irresponsible privately-owned cartels. They are above governments; they are above human suffering, and they conclude private treaties for their own advancement among their own members; and the Aluminum Company of Canada, through its parent company, Aluminium Limited, and the aluminum interests of nazi Germany are, as I said, at this moment fellow-members of the aluminum cartel. The report says so, and then, extraordinarily enough, goes on to declare that none of my allegations is substantiated.

Next, I said that the price of aluminum to the united nations is exorbitant and completely out of line with production costs. I alleged that in 1937 the cost was at least as low as 8·943 cents a pound. The report confirms this figure. The Price Waterhouse figures establish the cost in 1939 at 8·31 cents a pound. This was a figure which, I cannot understand quite why, was omitted from the report; and may I say that that figure is higher than one would have expected with the greatly increased output of the new and more modern facilities. But of course we had to accept Price Waterhouse figures throughout, in the absence of any other auditor. Let us remember that Price Waterhouse, an internationally famous auditing firm, has been declared guilty of gross negligence by a United States commission in connection with the auditing of the financial operations of another internationally known firm. I do not propose to elaborate this; but I have the data, the official report of the securities exchange commission, Washington, under my hand. I was not aware of this until recently, or I would have been still more insistent that the committee in its deliberations engage independent auditing advice. Be that as it may, the cost of producing aluminum at Arvida in 1939 was, according to Price Waterhouse, 8·31 cents a pound. The evidence shows that Great Britain that year paid twenty cents a pound for it. There were no advertising or selling costs to be added, so that the profit in that year was apparently 140 per cent of the cost price. Yet my allegation that prices were exorbitant is included among those declared to be entirely without foundation.

In the war contracts the company was protected against increases in costs by an escalator clause whereby the price rose in proportion to increased costs of transportation, labour and so on. In 1942, according to the auditors, the cost had risen to 11·56 cents a pound, with, as I said before, a vastly increased output of aluminum. The selling price that year was 21 cents a pound, a mark-up of 9·44 cents a pound.

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend quoting the findings of the committee?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quoting the findings of the committee.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. HOWE: I must say I do not know what the findings of the committee were, but I know that the cost of bauxite delivered at Arvida was about 8 cents, to begin with.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am talking of the costs which were given by Price Waterhouse and the witneses. The mark-up included 5·44 cents a pound special depreciation. The government allows this sum to be set aside from the profits to create the new facilities. Thus the company is given under the contracts, whether deliveries of aluminum are made or not—the cancellation clause in it—$164,000,000.

Mr. HOWE: Who gives them that?

Mr. COLDWELL: Just a moment. The minister will hear what I say about it in a moment. This, as I say, is profit; for it would have been taxable but for the order in council of December 31, 1942. Indeed, if it were not profit there could be no special depreciation. Yet, in spite of what I have called this great gift, through the rebate of taxation, of $164,000,000, and not $154,000,000 as I had stated last session, the report again declares that none of my allegations is substantiated.

Let us remember that in June, 1939, this house passed the Defence Purchases, Profits Control and Financing Act. True, certain manufacturers would have none of it and it has long since been repealed by order in council, but this house sought to limit war profits to five per cent of the capital employed. The capital employed in 1939 by the Aluminum Company of Canada was given in evidence as $26,000,000, and on that basis that year its net earnings would be fifty-seven per cent on the capital employed. It was given in evidence that in 1942, excluding profits rebated as special depreciation, these net profits amounted to 21·9 per cent of cost. This is enormous on an output of some 300,000 metric tons. Yet again it said in the report that none of my allegations is substantiated.

In the same break-down of ingot costs, given in the report for 1942 placed before the committee, the cost before interest and taxes, but including special depreciation, which, as I have stated, must be derived from additional profit, was given as 17 cents a pound. The average price to the United Kingdom was given as 21·01 cents a pound. The profit on the United Kingdom contracts before taxes, not already rebated under special depreciation clause, was 3·75 cents a pound. However, the profit on the United Kingdom contract was 2·75 cents a pound or sixteen per cent, after all taxes were paid and the special depreciation allowed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are these Price Waterhouse figures?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, the figure I have used was given by Price Waterhouse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not your interpretation of them?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I am taking these figures directly from the break-down which will be found as part of the committee's report, on page 112. On this basis the public pays for the plant extensions during the war—

An hon. MEMBER: What public?

Mr. COLDWELL: The public engaged in the war against the fascist and nazi aggressors and the Japanese imperialists; that is the public who pay for it. The public grant rebates, special depreciation and allow for income and all other taxes, and then the company makes for its owners a further profit of nearly sixteen per cent, or, to be exact, 15·93 per cent of the ingot cost. Even the attempt of witnesses to minimize the extent of the profits still showed an enormous return to the owners of the Aluminum Company of Canada; that is to its owner, the Aluminium Limited; yet the committee declares that none of my allegations is substantiated.

The prospectus of the company, placed in evidence and available to any member of the committee who wishes to obtain a copy, states that at the end of the war the company's new plant facilities will have no funded debt; all extensions will be paid for during the war, whether the governments take the amount of aluminum contracted for or not, and this was confirmed in the evidence and is confirmed by the report. I said last session that the company took no financial risk in regard to these new facilities. The evidence confirms this; yet the report charges that none of my allegations is substantiated.

In the report much is made of the cost of carrying Shipshaw and the Arvida facilities by the company, should we encounter a post-war depression, which I submit the committee report implies will be inevitable. But the company's own prospectus, placed in evidence, has this to say:

> Facilities being brought into production are financed partly out of earnings and partly out of the aid of various allied governments on the principle that such facilities should be substantially self-liquidating in the period of the war.

Later, the prospectus adds these words:

> Many unprejudiced authorities also believe that the age of light metals is just beginning. If it is not, we will have unneeded facilities which we can either demolish without loss or hold for eventualities, and a business of pre-war dimensions which always managed to earn a profit for its shareholders.

That is the opinion of the company itself. In other words, it is a case of "heads we win, tails you lose". The chairman of the war contracts depreciation board told us that there was very likely to be a post-war value in connection with Shipshaw as a power project, altogether aside from the production of aluminum. Yet the report, in order to defend the vast concessions made to the company, tries to say that they may have little or no value, and upon that assumption declares that another of my allegations is not substantiated.

As to Shipshaw, this power development was planned as long ago as 1925, when aluminum production was neither as important nor as voluminous as in recent years, particularly during this war period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where is the evidence of that? Was that before the committee?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, that was given in evidence; I was just going to say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then you are referring to the evidence which was given before the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I am.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can you do that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member can do it, everybody can.

Mr. HOWE: This was a private discussion between members of the committee. I do not know about it, and no one in the house other than members of the committee knows about it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the minister should know; and may I just say this to the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to address the Chair. I cannot hear what is being said when there is a general discussion going on.

Mr. COLDWELL: I submit that I have used the figures and the evidence given to the committee and quoted in the report before the house. I have also, in a very few particulars, referred to the evidence which was given in the committee. That evidence was given not in secret but in camera, and there is a very well defined rule that evidence given in camera is not given in secret, that a member has to be guided by his own conscience as to what he will subsequently divulge. I want that to be clearly understood, because that is the difference between secrecy and in camera.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, I would ask for a ruling of the Chair on that point. I recall that a year ago, and, I believe, prior to that, objection was taken to this being done, and I would ask for a ruling on the matter of evidence given in that committee being quoted in the house. As I recall them, the previous rulings were that the only evidence taken in camera which could be used in debate in this house was evidence which the committee had released and incorporated in its report. To the extent that the hon. member has referred to evidence released in the report, I would say he is quite within the rules; but in quoting from evidence taken in camera which has not been released by the committee, I submit he has gone beyond the rules.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think anyone in this house objects to the evidence being taken in camera, for reasons which I think are sound, but once all the evidence is in I see no great objection to discussing the evidence as a whole. However, I do think every hon. member should know what the evidence is.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is telling me of evidence given before the committee which seems to be incredible. That evidence may have been given; I have no way of knowing whether it was or was not. I can hardly credit it, but nevertheless I do think that if hon. members are to rise in their places in this house and quote evidence given to the committee, we should have an opportunity of checking that evidence.

Mr. GRAYDON: You think it should be tabled, in other words?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I think so; and I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that he move to have the evidence in this particular case tabled in the house.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have before me an amendment in the words which the minister has just used, that this evidence be tabled; and had I not given way to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), by this time that amendment would have been before the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I speak to the point of order?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has washed that out pretty well.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no, not yet. I am giving my understanding of the committee's work, and the evidence which was received.

Mr. HOWE: I think every man should have a chance. The hon. member has said he was quoting evidence; now he says he is giving his understanding of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Which is quite different.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say this, that we have a report before the house which is based on evidence taken before the committee. Am I to have my lips sealed, when the whole of that inquiry was directed against statements I made in the house? No, sir; I contend I have a perfect right to refer to this evidence as the committee in its report has done. I have referred to nothing that in any way will interfere with the security of Canada, nor have I referred to anything which would be of benefit to any enemy of our country or to any competitor of this company. I contend, as I am discussing a report based on certain evidence, that my lips cannot be sealed in this house in regard to evidence of the description to which I have been referring.

Mr. CLEAVER: If the hon. member is through with his remarks in regard to the point of order, I as chairman of the subcommittee should like to speak to it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member has already spoken to it.

Mr. CLEAVER: The point of order is raised by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did not raise a point of order.

Mr. CLEAVER: He suggested that the evidence taken in camera before the war expenditures committee should now be tabled. In the first place I suggest that every hon. member of the house knew, by notice on the order paper, that this report would be under debate, and I suggest that proper notice should have been given to the house, and that the house cannot entertain the motion as suggested by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, without proper notice.

Mr. GRAYDON: He did not make a motion; he just made a suggestion.

Mr. CLEAVER: I call to the attention of the minister one thing, that this evidence was taken before the war expenditures committee, and was given by the witnesses on the understanding that the evidence was being taken in camera.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But not in secret.

Mr. CLEAVER: And as chairman of the committee I cannot take the responsibility for saying that I will waive any in camera ruling, or waive the protection which we had. It should be dealt with by the house only, and only the house can deal with it. And it should not be dealt with, except by notice.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking, I was debating in my mind the position with respect to the remarks he was making concerning the evidence. I was deliberating whether I should call his attention to the fact that the evidence of the committee has not been tabled in the house. Therefore, when reference is made to evidence it should be made only in the proper way, namely, by a specific reference to that evidence—which, in this instance, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar could not do, because the evidence is not tabled.

The other question I was deliberating was as to the references he made respecting his information as to things which happened in the committee. That appeared to me to be relevant, but I would say that the hon. member cannot refer particularly to any particular item where evidence has been given in camera, with the distinction the hon. member has placed upon it. Yet the fact is that it was taken in camera, as suggested by the hon. member for Halton, simply because they could not get the evidence unless it was given in camera. Therefore consideration should be given to that.

But as I listened to the hon. member I was convinced he had transgressed paragraph 568 in the third edition of Beauchesne's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms", where it states:

> Until the report and evidence have been laid upon the table, it is irregular to refer to them in debate, or to put questions in reference to the proceedings of the committee.

Then it points out in paragraph 569:

> That when the evidence is before the house it may be debated at length, but members will not be permitted to discuss the conduct or language of members of the committee, except so far as it appears on the record.

My conclusion, therefore, is that as long as the hon. member is referring in general terms to his interpretation of the evidence given in committee, he is entitled to do so. But he is not entitled to discuss the evidence seriatim and in detail, as it was given before the committee, for the reason that it is not before the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I shall abide by your ruling, as I invariably do, and I shall refrain from referring specifically to the evidence. But may I say this, that the few pieces of evidence to which I have referred are not included in the report now before the house, and have been very carefully documented from public records. I know the pages from which every statement I have made comes, and each one of them can be documented and corroborated.

But I was going to say that in 1925—and this is a matter also of public record—the engineer employed by the company at that time, when transmission was far less efficient than now, said that power could be shipped to eastern Ontario and the United States economically from the Shipshaw falls. And Mr. Morris P. Davidson, the commissioner of the New York state power authority confirmed this with me in conversation that I had with him as lately as January 15 of this year, namely, that long-distance transmission of cheap power is economically feasible, as proven in our own country, so I am advised, where power is transmitted to Toronto from Montreal, via Hull, a distance of—I have not measured it—about some three hundred miles.

Mr. GRAHAM: Why did the hon. member not lay that evidence before the committee?

Mr. COLDWELL: I did lay it before the committee. I told the committee upon my return from New York, and I remember one of the members objecting to my having information that other members of the committee did not have. I said I had been so advised when I was there on January 15. And may I say that that power used in Toronto, and supplied from the source I have mentioned, gives Toronto to-day very cheap power indeed.

As to Shipshaw's creating new unusable power, may I point out that in 1939, when there were 400,000 workers unemployed in this country, a large number of whom were in Quebec, that province of Quebec had a surplus of power of only thirteen per cent. Yet the report bemoans the fact that we should have this great new source of power available, one which I contend ought to be used for rural electrification and for industry after the war, and again states that none of my allegations is substantiated.

In conclusion, I wish to make it abundantly clear, as I said at the outset of the inquiry before the subcommittee—if I may refer just this once to anything that happened there—my criticisms are not for one moment directed against the administrators, the technicians and the workers who planned and executed this marvellous project. This, though, in my opinion they could have done equally well for the people and for the government of Canada. On the contrary I have nothing but the highest praise for the industrial miracle they accomplished. And my high hope is that we may, as a Canadian people, through our democratic institutions and for our people devote equal energies and equal abilities to the development of our country in the post-war years.

My criticisms have been and are directed against the financial interests in the background who, as I said, were in a position to hold a pistol at the heads of the united nations in their extremity. I have been told, for example, that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) and the metals controller all wanted to see this project started early in the autumn of 1940, a year after the outbreak of war when Britain was being heavily bombarded from the air and needed aluminum to make planes. But the company refused a fifty per cent write-off offered on Shipshaw, so that it was not started until April, 1941.

The committee in some particulars relied upon and quoted extensively from a decision of a United States district court, as is indicated by the report. But that decision did not concern itself with economic realities but with definitions of company control embodied in existing United States law. The court failed to take into account several common holders of stock in both companies. Furthermore, the decision is under appeal and would have been decided by now but for the fact—this will appear curious to Canadians—that the supreme court of the United States cannot get a quorum together to hear the appeal. Why? Too many of the judges are disqualified because of their participation in earlier indictments of the Aluminum Company of America. Thus for this house to rely on this decision of a lower court in a foreign country, no matter how friendly the country may be, would be to say the least most remarkable.

I, therefore, say without reservation that all my major statements regarding this project were amply confirmed by the witnesses appearing on behalf of the company and the government. Indeed, I would say to hon. members of this house that if they will take the trouble to read the report now before the house they will find that it confirms those statements. Yet the same report says that none of my allegations is substantiated. To vote concurrence in a report so obviously designed to whitewash the deal and the company would be in my opinion to do violence to one's own intelligence. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this house dare not approve the report submitted to it on behalf of the war expenditures committee.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling):

That all the words in the said motion after the word "reports" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"Be not now concurred in but that the house instructs that the evidence upon which the said reports are founded be tabled and that consideration of the reports be postponed until the house has had sufficient opportunity to study the said evidence."

The situation which has arisen in the house to-night is of a kind that has arisen not only in this honourable chamber but in the main committee from its very inception and in the subcommittees from the time they convened. I expected that we would hear this afternoon from the chairman of the committee a resume of some of the work accomplished, but all we are asked for is concurrence in a report based upon evidence which I doubt one member out of three in this house has gone over or is in a position to cast an intelligent vote on. Hon. members are being asked to decide on a very serious matter, one of the most important matters that have come before this House of Commons by way of committee.

When we first thought of having a war expenditures committee each and every hon. member believed that he was going to have an opportunity to be of some service to his country and to help out with the war effort. How well I remember when three short years ago we were told before we went into the committee room that politics would be left right at the door, that they would not enter into the deliberations on war expenditures. How well I remember the same day after this profession of faith was made that hon. members voted down on a straight party basis one, two, three, four, five, six different motions that I had the pleasure of putting forward to the committee. The whole gamut of the evidence offered in those first few days was of a kind that would have given us a change to examine into war expenditures, but I think the resume of abuse, as I would call it, of the opposition groups that came from the chairman is an indication of how the committee conducted itself.

Why is it necessary to malign the members of the opposition who tried to do a job? Why is it necessary to put an interpretation on these in camera meetings which will not permit us to discuss even among our fellow members what occurred in the committee? The subcommittees themselves were quite free to decide whether or not they should sit in the open, but the subcommittees were constituted by the main committee in camera. After that they could get their own members to agree to sitting in open session, if that was possible. But what actually happened? Let me take some of the time of the house to read what happened when a subcommittee did resolve to sit in open session. I quote:

Thursday, August 7, 1941.

Members present: Messrs. Graham, Gladstone, Harris, Hansell, O'Neill, Picard, and Sissons—seven.

Mr. Harris read into the record a letter from the chairman, Mr. R. T. Graham, addressed to himself, and also expressed his disapproval of the committee sitting in camera.

The chairman replied to Mr. Harris, assuring him that he would, with the other members of the committee, consider the points raised by Mr. Harris. The chairman then invited all members of the committee individually to express their opinion on the question of open or in camera meetings. All members of the committee replied, expressing their views on the question raised by Mr. Harris.

Mr. Hansell moved, seconded by Mr. Harris —That this morning's sitting be regarded as open and that anything considered to be of a delicate character be kept off the record.

On the question being put, Mr. Harris asked for a recorded vote; the names being taken down were as follows: Yeas, Messrs. Gladstone, Harris, Hansell, and Picard—four; Naes, Messrs. O'Neill, and Sissons—two.

The motion passed in the affirmative.

Then the chairman adjourned the meeting forthwith. That motion passed at 12.02 p.m., and the chairman adjourned the committee at 12.05 p.m. He refused any discussion on the motion to adjourn, walked out and left the committee. When the committee next met we found ourselves again in camera. Is that any evidence that the members of the subcommittee were permitted to sit not in camera? It is just the reverse. Then I quote from the proceedings of the next meeting.

Mr. CLEAVER: May I have the page number?

Mr. HARRIS: Page 11.

Mr. HOWE: May I call attention to the fact that my hon. friend is reading, I understand, from the minutes of a committee meeting held in camera, minutes which have not been tabled.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): No.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has been tabled.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Let me make it abundantly clear that at no time did I serve on a committee sitting in camera. I attended no secret meetings, no camera meetings. Everything I have been able to do on behalf of the committee was done wide open, and without any cost whatsoever to the country, not even the per diem allowance or anything of that kind. It was done as a war service, and I was hoping that would be the attitude the others would take.

Again, two weeks later, on August 22, 1941, I moved that the evidence be printed so that we would have it on the table. That was ruled out of order.

Again, we thought that our subcommittee should have the selection of its chairman. That was ruled out, was defeated on a division, six for the motion and ten against—another party division.

We asked for an increase in the minority representation. That was defeated on a straight party vote of fourteen to four.

We had another situation where one hon. member supporting the government moved, on July 17, 1942, that we sit through with the same industry in 1942 as we had done in 1941. That carried, seven yeas, six nays. Yet in spite of that the committee adjourned until September 3.

Mr. CLEAVER: May I have the page number of your quotation, please?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): July 17, 1942, is the date. You will find the page number in the evidence.

Again, we had our friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asking that the committee be open unless otherwise ordered by the committee or by the subcommittee. That motion was negatived.

Throughout the entire proceedings of this war expenditures committee there has been a definite move to keep the evidence away from the members of this house. The only committee that was able to give to the members of this house any evidence of any consequence was subcommittee No. 2. The rest just consisted of reports which came down to this house, and the net result is that this chamber now finds itself in a position of having to vote on a motion by the chairman for concurrence, and the members do not know what they are voting on. Hon. gentlemen opposite will just answer to the whip's call, with the net result that the government will carry the motion for concurrence and some of their members will find themselves embarrassed by concurring in something which they know nought of.

What emphasizes the situation more is the fact that on page xiv of the proceedings of January there is a reference to certain irregularities alleged before this house in connection with No. 2 shell filling plant at Pickering. The chairman of the committee is here and I do not need to take time to read it. The chairman stated that the committee was recalled for the consideration of its reports to the house and so on and eventually he ruled that the matter be referred to the minister. So that in the light of that decision—

Mr. CLEAVER: On a point of order, the hon. member who has the floor has made a direct statement. He says that when the McGregor charges as to No. 2 shell filling plant at Pickering were brought up—then he mumbled some words and then—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member to withdraw the word "mumbled." I am not in the habit of mumbling in this chamber.

Mr. CLEAVER: I withdraw the word "mumbled" and I say that he used a few words I could not hear which were a jumble. My hearing is fairly good. He did not read what happened in the committee. He made the statement that the chairman had ruled that the Pickering matter could not be dealt with then. The chairman made no such ruling, and I would like to read to the committee just what happened.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have no right to do that.

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member made a statement which I say is entirely incorrect, and I ask the right to correct his statement.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You do not correct a point of order. You just state it.

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member stated that the chairman ruled that the matter could not then be considered. I say that I did not so rule, and the minutes of the committee bear that out.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that there is anything on which to rule. There is a difference of opinions on the facts. I understand that the hon. member was reading from the record, and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) says that his statement as quoted was not correct.

Mr. CLEAVER: It is only a deliberate misstatement of fact; that is all.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I ask that that statement be withdrawn.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member must withdraw the word "deliberate".

Mr. SPEAKER: I request that the hon. member withdraw that statement.

Mr. CLEAVER: I insist that he said that the chairman ruled that the Pickering charges could not then be considered, and I say that that is incorrect, and it was intentional or he would have read from the minutes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise to a point of order. No member can impute improper motives to another.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No member can misconstrue the evidence which is on the records of this house.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member ought to withdraw the statement that the hon. member for Danforth made a deliberate misstatement of facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The record speaks for itself.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Halton did say that the hon. member for Danforth had made a deliberate misstatement of facts. That is a statement which should be withdrawn.

Mr. CLEAVER: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word "deliberate" and anything else that offends the hon. member, but I will say this, that he did make a misstatement of facts.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am sorry to delay the house, Mr. Speaker, but I will put it on the record, word for word, the way it reads. I am quoting from page xiv of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 19, 1944:

> Mr. McGregor made a statement alleging certain irregularities in connection with the construction of No. 2 shell filling plant at Pickering, and submitted that the matter should be inquired into by this committee.
> The chairman stated that the committee had been recalled for the consideration of its reports to the house with the understanding that no further evidence would be taken at this time.

I pause to ask the house to put its own construction on that statement, that no further evidence would be taken at this time, and on the previous paragraph with regard to the McGregor allegation of irregularities.

> He invited Mr. McGregor to submit a memorandum to the chairman or clerk of the committee indicating the nature of the alleged irregularities in order that any action deemed necessary might be taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the minister like me to read that over? It states, with the understanding that no further evidence would be taken at this time. Say "hear, hear" to that.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, sure. Read slowly.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Then on page 15—I will try not to mumble my words—the chairman presented a report of the agenda subcommittee:

The subcommittee on agenda begs leave to present the following report:

That the text of press reports issued by Mr. McGregor stating that with respect to the construction of No. 2 shell-filling plant at Pickering, there has come to him evidence of serious allegations, of payroll padding and misuse of materials, be forwarded to the Minister of Munitions and Supply forthwith. In view of the fact that it would be a physical impossibility to make a complete investigation of the balance of Mr. McGregor's statement respecting "mismanagement" before Wednesday next, when the present session ends and the life of the present committee terminates, that the matter be given prompt consideration, when the war expenditures committee is appointed next session.

Now that is another example of what I was trying to convey to the members of this house, that we are not competent now to concur in this report because we as members of the house do not know enough about the evidence which is at present available although not tabled.

That, sir, is why I have the honour to move this amendment which asks that the evidence be tabled. It would have been a very happy situation had I been able to have the Minister of Munitions and Supply second my amendment. That would have cleared the air and we would have had the evidence on the table and would have proceeded in an orderly way with this responsibility which is ours in the conduct of this war expenditures committee and its great work.

On another occasion I shall have something else to say with regard to the general conduct of these committees. I will say this now, that I am of the opinion that this house is supreme over any committee, and even though the chairmen of days gone by have used the chairmanship perhaps to help some get judgeships and others a portfolio, I am afraid the hon. member who leads the committee now is using it as a stepping-stone to the basement in the way that he has conducted the affairs of that committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I regret that I was not present in the earlier part of the evening, but I have been trying to catch up on some engagements which it was impossible to meet earlier in the day. Discussion however, it is apparent, has arisen over the question whether or not evidence which is taken in camera by one of the select committees—the committee on war expenditures—may be disclosed and, in the words of the amendment, "be tabled."

This is the third or fourth session at which we have had occasion to appoint a war expenditures committee. On each occasion I have pointed out that it was necessary, as suggested at the outset, by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), I believe, to have a committee of this house to examine war expenditures for the purpose of guarding against extravagance, waste and any kind of fraud or wrongdoing. In speaking on the appointment of the committee I have on each occasion drawn attention to the fact that it was a very simple matter for this house to decide whether or not it would have such a committee and how the committee should function, because there was at Westminster, and had been not only throughout the present war but during the last war as well, a committee appointed at Westminster to deal with national war expenditures. I stated on each occasion that the motion which was being brought forward in this house was in identical terms with the motion which had been adopted in the house at Westminster. In a time of war there are a number of considerations many of which are not apparent on the surface, of which the government, the House of Commons and parliament must take very full account. In connection with the methods of procedure and the evidence taken before the committee on war expenditures, I submit that there must be the best of reasons for having sittings held in camera or the parliament at Westminster would not have followed that procedure in the last war and insisted upon it in this.

Hon. members last year had the opportunity of meeting with the chairman of the war expenditures committee of the British house. He was attending the British empire parliamentary association gathering and many hon. members questioned him as to procedure, why it was that the committee on war expenditures in the British house held their meetings in camera, and why it was that there was so little or nothing at all in the way of debate on its reports. The answer which was given has already been stated in this house and is to be found in Hansard of last session. It was to the effect that the committee exists not for the purpose of trying some case, or seeking out scandal or to prosecute someone for some wrongdoing, but rather that it is a committee appointed for the purpose of assisting the treasury at a time of war, in seeing that in war expenditures waste is avoided and that economies are effected wherever possible. In the course of its inquiries members may come across matters which are evidence of wrongdoing, and in such cases the procedure at Westminster is to have the committee report at once to the minister whose department is concerned. Without any attempt to do things in public which might divert the mind of the people from the major issue, namely, that of the prosecution of the war itself, the minister of the department concerned is given an opportunity to see that errors are immediately corrected. There is the further procedure, that if a matter serious enough comes to light and the committee feels that it should be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, this opportunity is afforded and indeed it is the committee's duty to bring the matter to the Prime Minister's attention so that the government itself may take it in hand immediately to ensure that nothing further is done which may be contrary to the public interest.

The reason why the committee holds its sessions in camera is first of all that the evidence itself can be so much more readily elicited than it could be if the proceedings were held in public. To further the efficiency of its work is one of the reasons why the committee proceeds in camera. I need not repeat what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), the mover of the resolution for concurrence, because all hon. members know that officials will not come forward and give evidence in public in the manner in which they are prepared to give it in private. The war expenditures committee is free to call anyone —experts, officials of departments, any person they please. Hon. members will also know that evidence which is disclosed in one direction may be of great assistance to competitors of the concerns affected, and that in a public hearing witnesses will refuse to disclose evidence which they know is going to be of advantage to a competitor.

A further consideration, and a very important one, applies directly to this particular industry which is being referred to at the present time. The expenditures being examined into frequently involve questions of contract with other governments. I am not at all sure that this particular industry has not contracts to which the governments of the United Kingdom, Australia, and the United States are parties, and I have reason to believe that some of these contracts might not have been made had these governments understood that their part in the matter, and the interests which they are seeking to conserve and to hold secret, at all events for the time being, would be disclosed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I suggest—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, my dear friend, I have never made a speech in this house which my hon. friend has not interrupted. I am going to ask him, please, once and for all, just—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The company itself disclosed these contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —to try to possess his soul in patience until I get through. He said this afternoon I was a little rough. I am trying to be smooth this time.

I come back again to what I was saying. In addition to the reasons for the in camera proceedings which I have presented, there is the further one of what may be given, wholly unexpectedly, in the nature of aid or comfort to the enemy. Witnesses cannot be examined in public without some of them saying something, quite innocently to them, seeming to have little or no significance, and yet, watched as proceedings are from every side by those who are seeking to further the interest of the enemy rather than the interest of the country, may lead to something being disclosed which may be at least a clue leading in directions very injurious to the war effort. These are all good, sound, substantial reasons.

There is no parliament more desirous of upholding its own supremacy than the parliament at Westminster. There is no parliament which has sought more eagerly than has the parliament at Westminster to preserve the utmost frankness and openness in all discussions. But when one looks through the list of the public men who have given their support to the present procedure at Westminster of the war expenditures committee and finds such names as those of all the prime ministers of Britain during the period of the last war and the present war, and all the leaders of the opposition in the last war and the present war, I feel that to oppose views which these gentlemen all agree must prevail in matters of this kind requires very substantial reasons.

One thing further. At Westminster, so carefully is the whole situation guarded that the reports themselves are never debated. I do not know whether hon. members are aware of that. I am perfectly sure that if some service was not thereby being rendered the country an attitude of that kind would not be taken by the British parliament. That has been its position from the beginning. The reports are tabled, and never once have they been a subject of debate since this war has commenced. That seems to be a surprise to some hon. members, but the reasons for it are apparent. It does not mean that those who are members of the committee may not come across evidences of wrongdoing which they think ought to be exposed, and which they might even feel it their duty to expose. Where there are cases of that kind, and an hon. member who is a member of a committee that has been holding its sittings in camera feels that a wrong has been done which the committee is unwilling to investigate, or that the government is seeking to conceal something because it is unwilling to make public proceedings held in camera, that hon. member may rise in his place and prefer a charge against the government, and the government thereupon appoints a committee of inquiry. There is in such a case some responsibility assumed with respect to the charge that is made. A member is not supposed to make a charge that is not capable of being substantiated; rather is he expected to be so sure of his ground that he is quite prepared to substantiate his charge. There were many times in the last war when the government of the day had to consider whether it was going to investigate rumours and accusations which might be put forward by its opponents, and the government of the day—quite rightly—took very strongly the position that it was not the business of the government to take up the time of the country and parliament in discussing rumours and running down this and that for the purpose of obtaining what little bit of political or party advantage might be gained by some party, but that if an hon. member rose in his place and seriously preferred a charge in the manner I have referred to, an inquiry would be granted.

Then there is always opportunity for hon. members to discuss matters before the public accounts committee if they have reason to believe that there are situations which should be discussed there. But I wish to make it clear that it would not be possible for the war expenditures committee to function as it was intended to function unless its sittings were held in camera; and being held in camera it is not proper that the proceedings should be made public.

I understand that my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) would welcome all the evidence being made public. His wishes in that particular are shared by every member of the government, but so far as the adoption of that course is concerned it would be a proceeding directly contrary to the procedure which has been laid down at the time previous committees were appointed, and on the basis of which this committee has been constituted.

Let me repeat that the committee, as the wording of the motion indicates here, is to—examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein.

In other words, this committee is viewed in Britain, and it should be so viewed here, as an adjunct to or ally of the treasury; it is to help the treasury of the country to see that public funds are protected. If there are to be inquiries on other matters, they ought to proceed in accordance with the procedure of this house in such matters.

Therefore I hope, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend opposite will not press his amendment, but if he does, I hope the house will support the government in opposing it.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): In view of my previous remarks perhaps I should explain the position. I was listening to my hon. friend the house leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) make statements as to the nature of the evidence taken before the committee. His statements were so contrary to the facts as I understand them and to the facts as I have stated them in this house that I felt I would like very much to see the evidence taken before the committee. Of course I have not seen it and have no idea what that evidence was. But I did not intend to have my remarks taken as meaning any more than that. I am quite aware that it would be a breach of confidence, and particularly a breach against myself, if that evidence were tabled.

The committee, in investigating all aspects of the aluminum situation, went very much outside its terms of reference. It investigated expenditures made by the British government in this country by direct negotiation, and investments made by the British government acting through myself as its agent. The terms on which I was appointed agent of the government of the United Kingdom for the transactions I entered into on their behalf were that such transactions would be entirely confidential as between myself and the British government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In that connection may I ask the minister one question? The Prime Minister objects, but I am sure the minister will not when he hears the question.

Mr. HOWE: Very well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a fact that in its prospectus concerning the sale of its preferred shares the company itself revealed, in a measure at least, the terms of the arrangement with the British government, and that this was the first the public knew about it?

Mr. HOWE: That may be so, but if so, the company acted on its own responsibility. Nevertheless I cannot do so; at least I feel that I cannot. The same applies to the Australian contract. Consideration had to be given to the investigation of the aluminum contracts in the light of our arrangements with the United Kingdom and with Australia. It was my desire that every aspect of the aluminum transactions should be examined; I was anxious that this should be the case, and to permit that to be done I took the responsibility of applying, through the high commissioner of the United Kingdom, for the consent of the British government to permit the details of that contract and of the negotiations leading up to it to be placed before the committee. The United Kingdom government was extremely reluctant to give that permission, but, after an exchange of several cables, permission was given with the definite understanding, so stated in the cable, that the hearings of the committee would be in camera and the evidence would not be made public. The consent of the government of Australia was given in exactly the same terms.

Let me point out that the war expenditures committee was appointed to examine into the expenditures of the Canadian treasury, and that the expenditures of the Canadian treasury for aluminum represent a very small percentage, certainly less than five per cent, of the expenditures that were examined. Had we not been able to get permission from the British and Australian governments, I would have had to ask my officers to reveal only the facts concerning purchases by the Canadian treasury, and in doing so I would have only asked the committee to keep within its terms of reference. However, the committee has examined the whole situation; the committee presented to the house a report that is unanimous, with the exception of one hon. member, and I think the house can feel safe in adopting that report without going back into the evidence, which is known to only a few hon. members of this house, and is completely unknown to members of the government and to by far the greater proportion of hon. members.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate for the purpose of considering, to at least some extent, some of the charges that have been repeated by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) as far as the Department of Munitions and Supply is concerned. During the discussion of the war appropriation resolution last year the hon. gentleman made certain charges. These charges were referred to the war expenditures committee and, as the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has just stated, in essence they were boiled down to some five charges. The hon. gentleman had an opportunity of giving or submitting evidence, since he was a member of the committee; but on none of the five charges has the committee found for him. On the contrary the committee has found against the charges, but that is not the purpose I have in mind in rising this evening; there are other members of the committee, I am sure, who will deal with the charges generally, as repeated this evening by the hon. member.

I should like to discuss two main issues, concerning which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar repeated his affirmations this evening. Those two issues concern the direct purchases of fabricated aluminum by the government, and the question of special depreciation on the Shipshaw power development. The Department of Munitions and Supply is not concerned with the British, American or Australian contracts, for the very good reason that it had absolutely nothing to do with them save and except as agent for those governments in the negotiation of one contract and in the finality, I believe, of the Australian contract. Neither did the department have anything to do with the plant expansions at Arvida, because these were brought about by the contracts to which I referred a moment ago.

Canada's purchases of aluminum, as everyone knows, in comparison with those of Britain and the United States were very small, and I hope to be able to establish that Canada's war administration certainly was not at fault in connection with any purchases of fabricated aluminum. I hope also to be able to show that the special depreciation which was granted at Shipshaw was the only logical thing to do at the time, and that had it not been done serious harm would have befallen the war effort.

Canada's purchases of aluminum have been entirely related to fabricated items, such as sheet, rod, tubing, bars, structural shapes, forgings and castings. Direct government purchases from the outbreak of war to August 20, 1943, total less than $900,000. Again I say that in comparison with the British and American purchases this amount was very small. These purchases were made for the government itself, either on behalf of crown companies or as requisitions were sent in by the service departments. There were other purchases made, of course, by contractors such as aeroplane manufacturers, which were of a far more important nature. In the two and a half years to June 30, 1943, total sales of fabricated items were $33,984,093, and on these sales Alcan made the modest profit of $714,569. This was made before taxes were computed, and the company made a loss of $1,482,180 after a pro rata share of income taxes had been applied. Again with reference to these purchases, it is difficult to see where and how Canada's war administration has been at fault with reference to purchases of fabricated aluminum.

With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on Hansard a condensation of sales for 1941, 1942, and the first half of 1943. This condensation may be taken as reliable. From this it will be seen that the profit of the Aluminum Company of Canada before charging off any interest or any taxes was 3·6 per cent on its cost of sales, and 3·4 per cent on its sales. Surely no one in this house can complain that in the purchases of aluminum by Canadians there has been any improvidence, there has been any gross profit, or there has been any carelessness in the negotiation of profit margins.

The next question which has to be decided—

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order, order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have a right to ask a question. Are those figures the hon. member was about to give in part of the evidence?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The figures I gave are to be found in an audited statement which I have before me, and which I shall be glad to send over to my hon. friend.

Mr. HOMUTH: Again I ask the hon. member: Was it not submitted to the committee as evidence?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was not a member of the committee, and I do not know what the evidence was. But I do know that the statements I hold in my hand are public property, and they are for anyone to see. They indicate exactly what I have said, namely a profit of 3·6 per cent and 3·4 per cent on sales. The next question—

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member leave to put the table on Hansard?

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask a question? put on Hansard, if it is part of the evidence —and I believe that it is.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, it is a public document. It is part of the file of the Department of Munitions and Supply. If it was put in evidence, it was probably put in by one of my officers.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why not put all the evidence, from your officers, on the record?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is there any objection to the placing of this document on Hansard? There being no objection, it is agreed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is the analysis of profit and loss accounts:

The next question which has to be decided is whether or not the transaction granting special depreciation was a provident one, and whether the government discharged its responsibilities to the people of Canada for the production of aluminum for war purposes with appropriate regard (1) for maximum output at maximum speed (2) economy in expenditure (3) equitable treatment and (4) long-term implications.

Aluminum, as the house knows, is in great demand for war purposes, chiefly in the manufacture of aeroplanes. It is estimated that from forty per cent to eighty per cent of an aeroplane is made of aluminum. Aluminum is made, as the house equally well knows, from bauxite, cryolite and fluorspar, and the resultant aluminum ingot is fabricated because of a tremendous amount of electrical energy which is put through these three commodities. Aluminum production requires three and one-third horse-power of electrical energy per metric ton of output. For each person employed in the production of aluminum over 100 horse-power is required, as compared with about one-half horse-power per person employed in the Bren gun plant of the John Inglis company at Toronto, and about one-eighth horse-power per person in the average of textile manufacture.

The capacity for production of the Aluminum Company of Canada at Arvida from the years 1927 to 1937 was 45,000 metric tons, and its actual production in those years ran as high as 42,600 tons in 1937 and as low as 15,000 tons in 1934, with an average of 28,200 tons, or an average production rate of 62·6 per cent. The normal place of aluminum in the world market ran usually fourth and fifth, and its production generally ran about 11 per cent of the total, with the United Kingdom by far the largest taker, Japan next at 20 per cent, then the United States, and small demands from twenty other nations.

In 1937 a world race for aluminum began to develop, as it now appears for war. Germany, Russia, Japan and Italy had led the way, with Germany reaching first place in the world by 1938. Influenced by these insistent demands Alcan laid plans to increase its capacity greatly, and in 1939 it turned out 75,200 metric tons, and in 1940, 99,000 tons, which was more than double its pre-war capacity, or over 260 per cent of its output in its best year, which was 1928, prior to the pre-war scramble for raw aluminum.

It should be pointed out that this expansion was initiated and financed by the company itself without any assistance from or intervention from the government.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Then there came three quick successions of contracts by the British government, one in February of 1940, a second in June of 1940 and a third in February of 1941. In these contracts the United Kingdom government contracted with the company to expand its production facilities very much more, and contracted to take the whole of the output of the new additions, plus all the output of the company's previous facilities, reserving only Canada's small demands, and thus until the year 1941 with provision for renewal of the arrangements if the emergency continued thereafter.

These contracts were financed by loans from the United Kingdom to Alcan totalling $55,600,000. They were 20-year three per cent loans. Again the Canadian government had absolutely nothing to do with any of these arrangements.

Next came a succession of four contracts with the United States, commencing with one for 170,000 metric tons, of May 2, 1941, and ending with one for 167,800 tons, of April 1, 1942. These contracts totalled 621,436 tons. The United States contracts called for four further plant extensions involving estimated deliveries when complete as follows:

Year	Tons
1942	94,474
1943	146,283
1944	326,216
1945	54,463

This makes a total United States expansion of 621,436 tons, or 1,370,000,000 pounds of aluminum. Again the Canadian government was not a party to these contracts, nor did it know their terms until after they were signed.

But after the first contract which was made with the United States government in 1941 it became quite evident that Alcan could not fulfil it without an arrangement with the Canadian government which would permit capital expenditures for plants being charged off as a production cost over the expected period of the war. Otherwise the Canadian government would be expropriating in taxes money provided by a friendly government without which that government's imperative needs of aluminum could not possibly be provided. The same was true with respect to the three succeeding United States contracts. Refusal to agree to this understanding would have been unthinkable, so far as the Canadian government was concerned. The first two United States contracts, totalling approximately $120,000,000 in United States funds, with $50,000,000 in immediate payments, came at a time when Canada's balance with the United States was very unfavourable.

Thus they were extremely welcome and clearly fell within the scope of the War Exchange Conservation Act, section 8 of which reads in part as follows:

The governor in council in order to increase Canada's supply of foreign exchange may, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, enter into agreements with individuals, partnerships or corporations to grant assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act and/or the Excess Profits Tax Act, if, in the opinion of the governor in council, such assistance is necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place or that the exports of any such individual, partnership or corporation may be maintained at levels higher than would otherwise obtain.

The proposal that the cost of the further plant additions should be charged to production costs was thus completely in keeping with the laws of Canada. This would have been equally true of the two subsequent United States contracts. In June, 1941, the United Kingdom government arranged with the Department of Munitions and Supply to take over the administration of its aluminum contracts. About the same time the government of Australia, which had already been negotiating a contract for a certain quantity of aluminum, arranged for that department to also take over the administration of its aluminum purchases.

As agent for the United Kingdom government the Department of Munitions and Supply subsequently negotiated for a further extension of Alcan plant facilities for the production of raw aluminum. Later the Minister of Munitions and Supply succeeded in reducing the average price for 1942 and 1943 of the British contracts to the same level as the base price of the United States contracts for 1942 and 1943. The successive two United States contracts, the Australian contract, and the last United Kingdom contract and the two final United States contracts, all calling for increased facilities, were superimposed one upon the other, before the previous plant expansion could be completed. Thus there never was a time at which a cut-off could be made, the plants being in a state of continuous expansion on an ever-increasing scale. Therefore it became impossible to segregate either the funds advanced by the various governments or the plants themselves.

The United Kingdom and the Australian contracts clearly could not come within the meaning of the War Exchange Conservation Act and, accordingly, it was decided, some months after the work had been under way and when very heavy commitments had been made by Alcan, that the matter should be dealt with by the war contracts depreciation board. This applied also to expenditures for completion of the Shipshaw power development with which I shall deal in a moment. So much for the facts.

I have dealt with this first in order to establish the tremendous expansion which took place almost overnight at Arvida. The plant at Arvida which had been producing at the rate of 62·6 per cent of its capacity had its production raised to 1,100 per cent over its pre-war capacity, an increase from a production capacity of 45,000 tons a year to 500,000 tons a year. This leads one naturally into a consideration of the Shipshaw power development project.

This was a purely Canadian matter. Neither the United States government nor the United Kingdom government had anything to do with it. The Shipshaw power project was not a new plant or a new project; it was the completion of one started in 1928 and held in suspense since 1931. It was forced on Alcan as a vital necessity to the means of fighting an air war. The down payments on account of the United States contracts referred to a moment ago were not sufficient to cover the full cost of the facilities for the production of the required additional raw aluminum, let alone provide anything for power development. The completion of the Shipshaw project was urged by the power controller as far back as 1940 in the clear vision that this was an air war, that there could not be enough aeroplanes without a greatly increased aluminum production and that such a production would imperatively demand a greatly increased power production as well. The construction of the Shipshaw canal and powerhouse in about eighteen months as compared with a normal construction rate of three years for such a work was an extraordinarily fine accomplishment. In the opinion of the power controller of Canada it was the greatest contribution made by this country to the war effort.

As the house knows, almost every war contract involves some additional capital expenditure, such as for new plant, new equipment, new buildings, new machine tools, jigs, fixtures, gauges and the like. It is a very rare exception for the Department of Munitions and Supply to find a contractor who has everything he needs with which to undertake a war contract. The required capital expenditure is usually put up to the department as something that it must find a way to take care of. There has developed over a period of time the following five methods, any one of which or any combination of which the department has to use.

1. By normal or accelerated depreciation granted to the contractor by his own expenditure in his own plant as a part of his production cost.

2. By special depreciation granted to the contractor through his own expenditure in his own plant under a ruling of the war contracts depreciation board, again as part of his production cost.

3. By capital assistance through government expenditure in the contractor's own plant.

4. By the government building an entirely new plant and appointing an entirely new organization to manage it for them, or setting up a crown company to manage it without fee or profit.

5. By the government purchasing or expropriating an existing plant, enlarging it to suit the requirements, and setting up its own management by way of a crown company or management fee arrangements.

These are the methods that have been used from time to time in the department. These, or a combination of these methods, are the only means by which the department can come to the assistance of a war contract.

The house will agree with me at once, I am sure, that because of the huge commitments required on the part of certain contractors it is impossible for the government to expect of them that they should, or could, finance their undertaking in all cases. Such certainly was the case with the aluminum company. The government of the United Kingdom realized it from the first when it made to the company the substantial loan of $55,600,000. If the company had not had this money to put up plant expansions, it could not have proceeded. Similarly, the government of the United States made down payments aggregating $75,350,000. The total cost of the whole undertaking, including plant expansions, and power developments, was roughly $250,000,000. When it is considered that the cost of the project was so huge, I think it will be admitted that the United Kingdom and the United States governments were well advised, as was the Canadian government, in coming to the assistance of the company as they did.

This leads me to a discussion of depreciation. Depreciation has, to my way of thinking, three meanings. First, there is the wear and tear of an asset or of an article, the common usage by hand or the use that is brought about by the elements; such, for instance, as the annual depreciation in a motor car. Depreciation has also another meaning called obsolescence; that is, the asset is losing its value in the industrial field because other assets are superseding it in the sense of greater production, greater utility at less cost. For example, should aluminum be displaced by magnesium after the war, aluminum will have depreciated because of obsolescence. There is the third phase that has crept into the law, namely, that the asset is entrusted to facilitate our war purposes under the apprehension that should the war suddenly cease—call it what you will—the asset as a value has depreciated to the owner and it becomes of no use in peace time.

Depreciation, therefore, can occur through wear and tear, obsolescence or disappearance of demand. If, for instance, the demand for aluminum after the war reverts to the position it occupied prior to the war, say, in 1937, depreciation of that plant will be great, because of obsolescence or disappearance of demand.

The principle of allowing depreciation as an item of cost is universally applied in every country which has an income tax act. It is so recognized in Great Britain, the United States, Australia and Canada.

Generally speaking, depreciation is threefold; that is, normal, accelerated, and special.

Normal depreciation is that which is granted to every citizen by virtue of the income tax laws. As an illustration, machinery is deemed to have a life of ten years, working one 8-hour shift a day, and usually gets ten per cent depreciation per annum, as an allowance which it may charge as an item of cost. This is normal depreciation. If, however, the machinery works twenty-four hours a day, the life of the machinery is deemed to be much shorter, and an increased rate is allowed by the Department of National Revenue, which is called accelerated depreciation. The usual rate allowed in such cases is twenty per cent per annum, as the maximum, even though the machinery may be working three shifts. At the rate of twenty per cent per annum, a perfectly new plant would be written off in five years. I should point out here that there are many expenditures on a plant which are handled under normal or accelerated depreciation, which are made without any reference to the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Special depreciation is that which is granted under the regulations of a board called the war contracts depreciation board. Where it appears that a manufacturer having a war contract or a subcontract is able to establish that part or all of his assets would have no post-war value, he may apply to the board for special depreciation, and if it is granted, that part which has no residual value may be written off. It is explicit that this privilege can be allowed only when the essentiality of the expenditures can be demonstrated, and then only to the extent to which the plant additions could be shown to have no reasonable post-war value.

In the case of Shipshaw, in the year 1925, the Aluminum Company of Canada filed with the Quebec government an application for authority to complete the Shipshaw power development. This application included the cost of a canal of much the same nature as that which now exists, sufficient to permit of the ultimate development of 800,000 horsepower years, at an estimated cost of $20,000,000 with only three 80,000 horsepower generators installed, out of an ultimate installation of ten such generators.

The company's plan was to instal these additional generators one by one over the years as and when the needs of its aluminum business so required. It estimated that each of these turbines installed would cost another $1,000,000, making the ultimate estimated cost $27,000,000.

The Canadian government, under the dire necessities of the war situation, compelled the company to complete this power development on the larger scale of 1,020,000 horsepower years. This it did under war-time conditions, with high wages and costs of every description greatly magnified, involving a total expenditure of over $70,000,000. How then, I ask, in equity could the Canadian government refuse to protect the company against a difference in cost between its normal expected expenditure of $27,000,000 and this extraordinary war-inflated expenditure of $70,000,000? That is all that the Canadian government did with reference to that project.

The impression has been created in the country that the whole of the power development was paid for by the Canadian government. This is not so. Actually it has cost the Aluminum Company of Canada every penny which it would have cost if it had been undertaken by the company in days of peace, namely $27,000,000 to $30,000,000.

As to the special depreciation on the facilities for the production of aluminum, the house should clearly bear in mind that not a single Canadian dollar went into the plants of Alcan. It all came from the United States, the United Kingdom and Australia—with the United States taking much the greatest share. The Canadian government had nothing to do with the way in which these governments chose to finance their needs of aluminum production. They alone decided the method which in their judgment could produce the aluminum they needed with the least loss of time and at the lowest price.

It is not for us Canadians, whose needs for aluminum were always more than adequately provided for, to criticize the decisions of these other nations. It was for the Canadian government to cooperate with these nations and to facilitate their decisions in every way possible. All that the Canadian government really did was to agree not to expropriate in taxes the funds provided by these allies in time of need, without which their needs could not be provided.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke of the great amount of power which would be created in that north country, and how that power would affect eastern Ontario. I say to him that experts who have studied this question say that it is impossible to transport power to Montreal from the Arvida area at a reasonable cost and that because of the distance, which is 340 miles, it is outside the limit of the economic transmission of power, and power at Beauharnois would compete so greatly with Shipshaw power that there would not be the slightest inducement to Alcan to transmit its power there.

It would have been unthinkable for the Canadian government to have expropriated in taxes the very funds expressly provided by the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and Australia for the erection of the plants, without which there was no possible way for these nations to get the aluminum they required when and as they required it.

I submit to the house that the Canadian government would have been recreant to its trust and false to its duty as a member of the united nations had it pursued any other course than that which it did with reference to the purchase of fabricated aluminum, with reference to the Shipshaw power development, and also with reference to the expansion of plant.

It will be apparent, too, to the house that the charges in connection with the Shipshaw development completely fail of substantiation. In the whole transaction the Canadian government moved quickly as regards production, and on a maximum scale. It moved economically for the completion of a half-developed plant, saving money as well as time. It allowed all that and no more than was equitable in the circumstances, and I submit with deference that no situation inimical to the Canadian position and long-term interests was created by these arrangements.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): In rising to support the amendment, may I say that all members of the house were in agreement with the general principles which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) outlined in 1940 when the first war expenditures committee was set up. No one in this house wanted to discover war-time scandals, and I think it was recognized that any individual or corporation who would profiteer during these dark days was undermining confidence not only in this administration but in our democratic institutions. The Prime Minister outlined then and he repeated to-night the advantages of having these committees sit in camera. All the opposition members of the house, I think, were opposed to having the committee sit in camera in previous sessions, unless it could be demonstrated that the evidence to be produced would give comfort to the enemy or would cripple our war effort. On all other occasions it was felt that the committee should sit openly and all information be made available to all members of the house and to the public.

The Prime Minister intimated to-night that if the committees sat in camera evidence would be elicited much more easily and that the members of the committee would be free to call anyone they chose. A year ago I sat with one of the subcommittees while the investigation was made in connection with the administration of wartime housing. Hon. members will recall that on various occasions I discussed the activities of wartime housing and advanced the general position that the taxpayers of the country were not receiving good value for the expenditures that were being made. I argued that the activities of wartime housing had been conducted in too many places in communities where there was a shortage of permanent houses.

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to a point of order. I believe it was distinctly understood, when the unanimous approval of the house was given this afternoon regarding the scope of this debate, that a debate would not take place on the reports tabled in 1941 and 1942. The hon. member is dealing with the report in regard to wartime housing which was tabled in 1942.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not referring to the report. I am reciting an incident which occurred in 1942 and I am doing so in support of my argument, which in turn is in support of the amendment of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). I submit, therefore, that I am in order. In my discussions in connection with wartime housing I felt that we should be willing to satisfy the taxpayers of the country that the houses being built would not become slums of to-morrow and that temporary houses would not be put up where permanent dwellings were needed.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, I ask for a ruling. My hon. friend is continuing to discuss the wartime housing report.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to bring his remarks to the point.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a result of the statements I made in the house on various occasions, which were supported by returns tabled by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, one of the subcommittees was instructed to investigate the whole business of wartime housing. In the discussion certain charges were made by an official of wartime housing regarding the administration of another department and—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. What the hon. member is now saying is not relevant.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw a conclusion. Not being a member of the subcommittee I was denied the right to have information placed before this subcommittee by another department of government even while we were sitting in camera.

Mr. CLEAVER: Did my hon. friend move for it? I say he did not.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was not a member of the committee, but through the courtesy of the chairman and all members of the committee, in view of the fact that I had spoken on wartime housing in the house, I was invited by the chairman and the members to appear. I was not permitted to make motions. We were not permitted to call a civil servant who was in a position to give information.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have given my ruling and I hope the hon. member will abide by it. The present discussion is not relevant.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me conclude by saying this. The purpose of meeting in camera was, in my opinion, defeated, and I think the public interest would be best served by having all the evidence made available to all members of the house and to the public except in cases where that evidence if produced would give comfort to the enemy or would cripple the war effort.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): As a member of one of the subcommittees that inquired into the aluminum contracts and the allegations made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), possibly I had better read from Hansard just what the hon. member said in those days. As reported in Hansard of June 14, 1943 at page 3619, the hon. member said:

I have placed the facts before the committee without invective, I am certain without exaggeration, and I know without misrepresentation. These are the facts as I have accumulated them. I have got them first hand from first-hand sources. I have no doubt that there are certain people who know the people I visited when I was in Washington and know the offices where I got my information. I assure the committee that my information is authentic and gathered from those who were able to give me the information.

All through the hearings of that committee, the chairman, I can say, was very fair. I believe that every member of the committee will say that. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had every opportunity to bring before the committee that evidence which he said he received at first hand. He did not bring in any of that evidence. He brought no evidence with the exception of one witness, and the committee waited two days after we were ready to rise in order to permit him to bring in that witness, a Mr. Lipkowitz. Mr. Lipkowitz did not give any evidence that in my judgment would support the allegation made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

The hon. member goes on to speak of cartels, monopolies and what-have-you. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the main idea in bringing these matters before this house was to create in the minds of the people the belief that because of the existence of cartels, monopolies, or what-have-you, the people of this country were being fleeced out of millions of dollars on the purchase of aluminum. To support that I read this in the paper:

> The peoples of the united nations are being sold down the Saguenay river, said Mr. M. J. Coldwell, leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

What paper? The C.C.F. News, of Vancouver, dated February 3, 1944. I do not think the C.C.F. News of Vancouver would misquote Mr. Coldwell. In the same paper Mr. Coldwell has this to say:

> The report of the special subcommittee on aluminum, composed wholly of Liberals and Progressive Conservatives except for myself, is a very obvious attempt to whitewash the whole affair.

We have heard a lot of things here about imputing motives and so forth; but I consider that a statement like that, from a man who holds the high position of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, is an insult to every member of that committee. He does not even give us the credit of being intelligent enough to get the point. He says that the committee was composed of Liberals and Conservatives and that a deliberate attempt was made to whitewash the evidence which was given before that committee. If ever there was an imputation of motives, I think this is one. It imputes the motive of dishonesty to the hon. members composing that committee, and as one of the members let me inform the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that I am not dishonest. I tried to view the evidence as it was submitted and to give my findings accordingly.

To support my statement that the intention was to create in the minds of the people that they were being fleeced, I will read a little more of what the hon. member said. He stated:

> Cheap labour, cheap power and high monopoly prices for their product have brought the aluminum interests untold wealth and economic power.

Then he went on to make some remarks with respect to labour. He has since said that he would like to retract the words he used on that occasion, that the treatment of the men at this plant was "scandalous" and "inhuman." But a great deal of publicity and a great deal of importance were attached to the statements the hon. member made at that time in this house; they have been echoed and reechoed over this country. I submit to you, sir, that in so doing a well-known method now used in Europe is being followed, the method of hammering and hammering and again hammering on a certain subject; it does not make any difference what the facts are, if you repeat a statement often enough, whether there is anything in it or not, the public will begin to believe it. But having said these things, the hon. member tonight said he would retract these expressions and would say that conditions were bad.

But he said a lot more than describing conditions as scandalous and inhuman. He said:

> Men in the pot-rooms rarely last long amidst the poisonous fumes, and the labour turnover in that part of the plant is appalling.

As regards the fumes, it is well known now that the company has done everything humanly possible in the way of modern appliances to correct that condition. It is also a well-known fact that years ago the work of the pot-room men was very severe and arduous and the fumes were terrific. But today, so far as I have been able to determine, there is no record of any occupational disease in that plant. That should be a fair indication of whether the fumes are there in sufficient quantities to injure health.

As for wages, I do not definitely know the rates, but I am told that the income of a pot-room man is around $2,000. But there are other conditions besides wages to be regarded. Everything is now being done to reduce the labour of these men. As an indication that conditions are not as outlined by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, when the strike took place last fall at Shawinigan Falls, there were, so far as I could find out through reading the papers, only two matters in dispute. One was, whether those men were to look after six pots or seven pots. They were supposed to look after one more pot in the winter time because the weather was cooler, than they had to do in the summer. One question in dispute was whether they should revert from six to seven pots in the winter time. The other point at issue was a jurisdictional dispute. They were not complaining about working conditions or about wages; what they were concerned about was whether they would have to look after six or seven pots, and whether one union or another union would attend to the interests of the workers.

A word as to housing. This committee visited Arvida and Shipshaw. The housing conditions there were very good. The company builds houses, which the men can either buy or rent, as they choose. They are very fine houses. They have good schools; they have hospitalization, and they have a retirement fund which, of course, is contributory. I found that the washrooms, lockers and such equipment are very much better than we have on the Canadian Pacific Railway. I worked for the C.P.R. for a long time and I know that conditions in this respect are not so good as those at the aluminum plants; yet as an old C.P.R. engineer I never considered that we were unfairly dealt with by that company.

It would appear from statements of the sort I have quoted that they may be inspired by another motive. I noticed that just after the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made his allegation last fall, this appeared in the Ottawa Citizen:

> Shipshaw is one of the most valuable pieces of ammunition for the C.C.F. in the forthcoming elections.

That was said by a prominent member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, now an M.L.A. in British Columbia.

An hon. MEMBER: Who was it?

Mr. O'NEILL: Mrs. Grace MacInnis, wife of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). As a further illustration of what is going on, I have in my hand the Kamloops, B.C. Sentinel, January 12, 1944.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must call the attention of the house to the fact that we have a motion before us along with an amendment. The discussion should really take place on the amendment; that is the subject matter we are discussing now. Also, the reading of excerpts from editorials is not in order.

Mr. O'NEILL: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and will refer to the amendment, which I believe is that the evidence should be tabled. As far as I am concerned I should like nothing better than to have tabled in this house the evidence submitted to the committee of which I was a member, because I believe it would completely vindicate the report brought in by that committee. When the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) was speaking he gave as one reason for asking that the evidence be tabled that it had reference to a certain meeting of the committee which took place some time before that. The hon. gentleman called attention to the fact that he had never attended a meeting of the committee which was held in camera. To the best of my knowledge and belief that is so; but I can say at once that I am sorry he did not, because he is an able man and if he had seen fit to sit with the committee he could have given it a great deal of help. However, he did not see fit to join us when the committee was sitting in camera.

Hon. gentlemen will realize that it is the business of the chairman of a committee of this kind to bring in the witnesses. Our chairman, a very able gentleman, arranged with a gentleman in another city to come here and give evidence. This was a man whom we could not bring here unless he came of his own free will. He was requested to attend and give certain evidence, and the chairman gave him the guarantee that his evidence would be given in camera. Then the hon. member for Danforth moved that the evidence be heard in public. Well, a discussion developed, and I voted against the motion.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): If the hon. member will permit an interruption, the discussion to which the hon. gentleman has referred occurred two meetings after the meeting to which I made reference. Will the hon. gentleman not verify that statement?

Mr. O'NEILL: The discussion to which I have reference occurred right at the meeting I am speaking of, and the man who was supposed to give evidence sat in the committee room for two hours while the discussion went on as to whether it should be in camera or in public.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): No.

Mr. O'NEILL: That is the way I remember it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The fact of the matter is that the meeting to which the hon. member refers was on August 8, and the meeting to which I referred was on August 7.

Mr. CLEAVER: At what page of the evidence is that?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Page 11.

Mr. O'NEILL: I have not the proceedings before me, but I recall the meeting vividly. If that is not the meeting to which the hon. member was referring I hope he will pardon me if I keep on with the meeting to which I am referring. The motion was made that the meeting be held in public, after this gentleman had been told that it would be held in camera. I voted against that motion, because quite obviously you cannot ask some gentleman to come to Ottawa and give evidence in camera, and then tell him the evidence is to be given in public. You would never get any evidence from him; he is a private citizen, and there is no way of making him come here and give evidence. The meeting was adjourned, for the reason that it was noon before we finished discussing the question of whether it should be held in camera or in public. We came back after lunch and the meeting was proceeded with in camera, as it was supposed to be. I see nothing wrong in that, and I have no apologies to make.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I think I am correct in saying that the afternoon session was held in public.

Mr. O'NEILL: I am speaking of my meeting, not the one about which the hon. gentleman is talking. The hon. member said he would not sit in camera at any time, and he did not; I do not recall seeing him in the committee at any time we were sitting in camera. The point is that we would not have been able to get that evidence at all unless we did sit in camera. You must hold your meetings in that way; you cannot do it otherwise.

Since you called me to order, Mr. Speaker, for having gone off the track, I do not think I have anything more to say at this time except to repeat that as far as I am concerned I would rather have that evidence tabled. In view of all the circumstances, however, I shall not vote in favour of the amendment, because there are other strings attached to it which make a proposal of that kind impossible.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I shall be very brief in my remarks, Mr. Speaker; I intend to speak only to the amendment and the tabling of the evidence heard by the war expenditures committee. I was a member of that committee when it was first organized in 1941, and I believe the policy of hearing evidence in camera was the proper policy to adopt, particularly at that time. I think there were many things in its favour then that could not be said in its favour now. Some matters might come out which would give comfort to the enemy and interfere with our prosecution of the war, and so on, so that at that time I was in agreement with the majority of the committee that the meetings should be held in camera. But I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the committee wishes to have its meetings held in camera it never should make a report such as was tabled in this house on January 26. The committee presumed to take the allegations or charges made by a certain individual and hold hearings on them; then it brought in a report, based on the evidence adduced before it, finding that the charges had not been substantiated in any degree whatever. When a report of that kind is brought in I submit that the evidence must be placed before this house, because there is no way in which hon. members can satisfy themselves as to the correctness of the report except by reviewing the evidence. Either that evidence should be tabled or the report should be withdrawn. We cannot have a report placed before us, the correctness of which is denied by one party—whether it be made up of one man or a dozen—and which is supported by others. There is no way in which members of this house can vote intelligently unless they have before them the evidence taken in that inquiry. Think of a judge being asked to pass sentence in a case where he did not hear the evidence, where the evidence had been taken in some other place, and when he did not hear it! Then think of his being asked to base a judgment upon such evidence! We are in an impossible position. Either, as I said before, that evidence must be placed upon the table of the house, or the report must be withdrawn.

Mr. R. H. McGREGOR (York East): Mr. Speaker, I think we have had enough aluminum for the time being, and that it would be a good time to go for a little boat ride. In the first place we have a report here, as submitted by this committee. I want to say to the house that this is not the evidence as submitted before the committee. And if I may be allowed the time I would prove that. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a little statement a while ago that anyone who wished to lay charges in the house could do so. I suppose he insinuated that the hon. member's seat would be at the peril of whether or not he could prove those charges. I say to the Prime Minister that I will make charges to-night, and if I cannot prove them in the very evidence we have received, then he can do as he wishes as to sending me home.

In the first place I wish to make a little comparison between the Toronto shipbuilding yard, which in the first place was known as the Dufferin Construction company, and the Port Arthur yard. And I might say, just before making that statement, that in the draft report which I have in my hand, in the first place that comparison was made. It was struck out of the final report because some said that the figures were not exactly right—or for some other reason; I do not know just what the reasons were.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend a question, before he gets into his speech? Do I understand that on his responsibility as a member of this house he is proposing to make certain charges against the government?

Mr. McGREGOR: I said I was going to make charges, as far as this boat work is concerned. Does the minister understand that? If he does not we will try to tell him what it is.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not understand it.

Mr. McGREGOR: The Dufferin Shipbuilding company, when the war started, began to build boats. They got a contract, and at the time they received the contract there were four other companies which received contracts for boats.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. You cannot discuss the evidence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I had to call attention of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) to the matter before the house, namely, that there is a motion and an amendment. The discussion must take place upon the amendment, not the motion. The motion cannot be discussed until the house decides whether the evidence shall be tabled or not.

In the third edition of Beauchesne's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms" I find this at page 769, as the ruling of the Hon. L. P. Brodeur, Speaker at that time:

When an amendment is proposed to a motion, the discussion should be strictly confined to the subject matter of the amendment.

This is the quotation:

Mr. Speaker: I would call the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Porter) to the fact that he is not discussing the question before the Chair. When an amendment has been moved to a motion for Committee of Supply, the discussion should be restricted to its subject-matter. That is a well established rule.

[Mr. McGregor.]

Mr. Porter: I was addressing myself to the question upon the subject of expenditure by the administration in connection with the Post Office Department.

Mr. Speaker: The question of that expenditure does not come within the scope of the motion now before the Chair, which is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) concerning the tariff and the preference with England. I read this passage from Bourinot, page 549:

"When an amendment has been moved to the question for the Speaker to leave the Chair, the discussion should be confined to its subject-matter."

Mr. Porter: I would draw the attention of the hon. members of the house to this ruling.

The fact is that now we have a motion and an amendment, and the discussion is on the amendment moved as follows:

That all the words in the said motion after the word "reports" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"Be not now concurred in but that the house instructs that the evidence upon which the said reports are founded be tabled and that consideration of the reports be postponed until the house has had sufficient opportunity to study the said evidence."

When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was speaking he was making reference to the evidence, and that was on the motion. I ruled then that I thought he was speaking relevantly to the motion before the house, but that he should not deal with the evidence submitted before the committee.

Now the question to which the hon. member must address himself is the amendment.

Mr. STIRLING: May I draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) in his speech which might have been conceived to be a reply for the government, covered a very great deal of territory with regard to the aluminum company and its subsidiaries. He did not deal with the amendment. He dealt with facts and figures, in a most interesting manner; and I submit to Your Honour that it will be your desire to give the same latitude to one side of the house as was given to the other.

At the present time the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) is explaining his position with respect to the subcommittee, of which he was a member, and which dealt with shipbuilding, leading up to the question: Shall the evidence in support of that contention be laid before the house?

Mr. HOMUTH: Speaking to the point of order, I say that the hon. member is perfectly in order, aside from what the hon. member for Stormont might have been allowed to do. The hon. member for York East is pointing out to the house that the only way he can discuss these matters is to have the amendment carried, so that the real evidence can be placed upon the table, due to the fact that the report of the committee does not bear out the evidence given. I say the point is well taken.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, before giving your ruling may I speak to the point of order by bringing again to the attention of the house what occurred on Friday. The Prime Minister used these words:

> Concurrence in the report will have to be moved, and I should think the best way of proceeding would be to have concurrence moved on Monday and the debate on war expenditures take place on that resolution. I do not wish to restrict hon. members from debating the resolution to set up the committee if they so desire.

I bring this to Your Honour's attention to show that it was the general feeling in the house when this debate commenced we should speak with respect to all phases of it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I have a word? I was out of the chamber when Your Honour intervened in this matter. I would point out, however, that I understood considerable latitude was to be given in this debate, the idea being that we would not debate the motion for concurrence and the motion to set up the committee on war expenditures on two different occasions. For that reason I think Your Honour will see at once the fairness of a decision which would allow the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) to continue. Surely the intervention of an amendment should not prevent an hon. member from discussing the whole matter. After all, it was not his amendment; it was the amendment of another hon. member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I am inclined to agree with the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. I believe it would be much better if Your Honour were to look upon this amendment in much the same way as we look upon an amendment to the budget, allowing all hon. members to have free discussion on the amendment, just as they would have on the main motion. I say this, having in mind particularly the points of disagreement which arose in the conduct of this committee. I think we would feel a lot better about it and get along much further if we permitted the discussion to go on quite freely.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) referred to what the Prime Minister stated as to the conduct of the committee. At that time the Prime Minister was dealing with the report, not knowing that there was going to be an amendment moved. As I take it, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) was speaking as to why it was not possible or feasible for the evidence which had been before that committee to be brought into the discussion in the house. I admit that he was permitted to deal with the matter with more latitude than perhaps I should have allowed him. No objection was taken, and I understood the basis of his remarks was that it was not possible for the government, in view of their commitments to governments of other countries, and others, to submit that evidence, and the house apparently desired to hear his statement. The question was raised when the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) was speaking. An amendment was moved and the house will recall that when the Prime Minister spoke to the amendment he confined his remarks absolutely to its subject matter. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) also addressed his remarks wholly to the amendment. It will be recalled that when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking his attention was drawn to the fact that he was then speaking on the main motion and I would not permit him to deal with the evidence. The rule is clear. When an amendment is before the house, the subject matter of the debate must be the subject matter of the amendment.

Mr. McGREGOR: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to infringe on the rules of the house, but I take it that the other hon. members who have spoken have spoken along lines similar to those I intend to follow. I do not see why I should be treated any differently from any one else. It is not very often that I take up the time of this house for the simple reason that I think this is the greatest hot-air joint I have seen for many years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member means that, and he must not use that language.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. McGREGOR: As I was saying before, I wish to make—

Mr. CRERAR: Do I understand that the hon. member has withdrawn that remark?

Mr. GRAYDON: He did not mean anything personal.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. gentleman that when the amendment is disposed of he will have the right to speak on the main motion and the latitude given to those who have spoken on the motion will be given to him. At the moment we are dealing only with the amendment.

Mr. McGREGOR: The other hon. members who have spoken have given reasons why it should or should not be tabled and I want to go on and try to prove to this house in my own humble way why this evidence should be tabled. It is not in the report. To do this I must quote some figures and make some comparisons of the cost of building ships in different yards. That cannot be done any other way.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask the hon. member if what he proposes to say concerns the evidence given before the committee?

Mr. McGREGOR: I understand that we cannot refer to the evidence given before the committee. Hon. gentlemen have spoken tonight who belong to the department and who have access to the files of the department. They have given speeches, and I venture to say that ninety per cent of the evidence they submitted to the house was given before the committee. They were not on the committee and they can rise in their places and say what they like, but a member who was on the committee cannot do that. Is that a fair deal?

Mr. CLEAVER: My hon. friend can move for the return of any of this material he wants which would bring it quite within the discussion of the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is what we are moving for.

Mr. McGREGOR: As far as I am concerned, I want this house and this country to have the material. I should like to have a ruling as to whether I am allowed to proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have intimated already to the hon. member that he is entitled to speak only on the subject matter of the amendment. After the amendment has been disposed of and the main motion is before the house, the hon. gentleman will then have the right to speak and will be granted more latitude than he is being given at the moment. Does the hon. gentleman understand that?

Mr. McGREGOR: I do not know whether I am allowed to speak or whether I am not.

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe the hon. gentleman has not heard what I said. I have ruled already that the subject matter of the amendment is the matter under discussion now by the house. The hon. gentleman is entitled to speak now on the subject matter of the amendment. If the hon. gentleman wishes to speak on the main motion after the amendment is disposed of he will have the right to do so with more latitude than he is given now.

Mr. ADAMSON: On the point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given a good deal of latitude to the opinion of hon. members, but I have ruled.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) finished?

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for York East feels that he cannot go any further. There is nothing left for him to do but to sit down.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I think I can confine myself to the rules of the house in respect to the present amendment. What I have to say will take only a few minutes and I shall be finished before eleven o'clock. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) when he says that the members of this house find themselves in a strange position. They are being asked to vote concurrence in a report or to vote against concurrence without having access to the evidence upon which the report is based. We cannot do that very well. Personally I find myself in a strange position.

A report has been presented to the house which I understand is unanimous, with the exception of one member of the committee. When the report was presented I was not in the house; I was on a train. I read a bit in the newspaper and, as I gathered from the newspaper report—and I suppose this would be the reaction of the public—the report had been presented but nothing had been said. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) gave a statement to the press to the effect that the report was a whitewash. My amazement was considerable. I wondered at the time why the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did not present to the house a minority report.

Mr. COLDWELL: The rules would not allow it.

Mr. HANSELL: I understand since coming here that the rules will not allow it. I think it is a strange rule because I believed at the time that the hon. member should have had an opportunity of presenting a minority report. Then it would have been all in the one report. The statement that it was a whitewash seemed at that time to be a bit of a reflection upon all the other members of the committee. What happened? The first opportunity which the hon. member had of bringing in what might have been tantamount to a minority report was to-day. The speech of the hon. member simply means, if we are to believe what he said, that his charges are correct and that the report was a whitewash. Therefore we have to decide whether to vote for or reject concurrence, and we have to do it on the basis of what we hear discussed in this house because we have not had the evidence presented to us. That is a strange position in which to place the members of this house.

I quite understand, on the other hand, for I have acted on the war expenditures committee in years gone by, that all the evidence submitted to the committee cannot be made public property. At least, if the evidence given before the committee on war expenditures last year is similar to some that was submitted in the year I was on the committee, I doubt whether it should be revealed because it would divulge certain matters in connection with our military operations, in Canada it is true, but which we could not possibly have divulged to the enemy. At the same time, however, when it comes to matters such as the charges which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has made, I cannot see that there could be anything in that evidence that would give comfort to the enemy. Surely it would give no comfort to the enemy to know whether we paid one million dollars for something or whether we paid ten cents for it. That has nothing to do with military operations or military strategy. On the other hand, the public has a right to know how we are spending public money, especially when it is spent for things that have nothing to do with actual military operations. Therefore, if the government refuses to place the evidence on the table for the scrutiny of members of parliament, and if the hon. member's charges are not refuted satisfactorily to my mind, I am afraid that I shall have to join with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and refuse to vote for concurrence in the committee's report. Although he has been wrong so many times, I am afraid this would have to be one time when I would have to agree with him. If the charges are not refuted, there is nothing else we can do. Personally I think that when the charges were made last year the whole matter should have been sent immediately to the public accounts committee, and not be made necessarily a part of the work of the war expenditures committee.

So as not to embarrass the government in respect of evidence being laid on the table which it may not be in the best interests of winning the war to table because it might reveal something of value to the enemy, I have a subamendment to move. I move, Mr. Speaker, that after the word "evidence" where it first occurs in the amendment, the following words be inserted:

respecting aluminum contracts and relative subjects thereto.

That would mean that the entire evidence taken by the committee would not have to be put on the table but simply the evidence relating to the charges which have been made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It seems to me that we have to make some distinction. I feel certain that if the evidence taken by this committee is like some of the evidence that was submitted to the war expenditures committee in years gone by it must contain some things that it would not be wise to reveal. But so far as aluminum contracts are concerned, that is a matter of dollars and cents, contracts, work done, and we have no reason to fear that that is going to give comfort to the enemy.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, how will the amendment read with the subamendment?

Mr. SPEAKER: It will read as follows:

That all the words in the said motion after the word "reports" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"Be not now concurred in but that the house instructs that the evidence respecting aluminum contracts and relative subjects thereto upon which the said reports are founded be tabled and that consideration of the reports be postponed until the house has had sufficient opportunity to study the said evidence."

As it reads with the subamendment, it says: "the evidence respecting aluminum contracts and relative subjects thereto upon which the said reports are founded." I would point out that the reports are not founded simply upon evidence dealing with aluminum contracts and relative subjects thereto. I am afraid that the subamendment is out of order. If it was adopted the main motion would not be intelligible or consistent with itself.

On motion of Mr. Jackman the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 22, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

GASOLINE RATIONING

STATEMENT AS TO STOCKS IN HAND AND POLICY FOR COMING FISCAL YEAR

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Some two weeks ago I was asked to make a statement on the gasoline and oil situation. As our rationing year ends on March 31, I will do so at this time rather than wait until the work of my department is subject to review under the war appropriation bill.

I have stated before, and now state again that rationing of gasoline in Canada is based wholly upon stocks of gasoline in hand and our estimate of the forward position. Our stocks in hand at this time are less than fifty per cent of normal. The forward position must depend on the tempo of the war, and there is every indication that the situation will not improve until the European war is ended. Whereas rationing was imposed as a result of sinkings by enemy submarines, rationing is still necessary due to the vastly increased requirements for aviation gasoline and motor gasoline in the combat areas. A further factor in the situation arises from the fact that supplies of crude oil in the United States are diminishing with the result that we must go farther and farther afield to obtain crude oil for our refineries. The crude oil now being obtained yields larger proportions of asphalt and heavy fuel oil with correspondingly smaller proportions of gasoline and domestic fuel oil. While we have obtained the assistance of United States owned tankers to meet our transportation requirements, and while we have built and are now operating a number of Canadian tankers, we have been unable to improve the position of the motorist.

Use of heavier crudes does permit relaxation in the use of heavy or bunker fuel oils and asphalt. Restrictions on the use of asphalt have been removed entirely. As regards the use of heavy or bunker fuel oil, in all provinces except British Columbia all users who converted from heavy fuel oils to substitute fuels may now return to using heavy fuel oil, the only restriction being that the consumer must obtain a permit from the office of the oil controller, this for the purpose of record. British Columbia cannot be permitted relaxation for the reason that demands for heavy fuel oil from the west coast for the fleets of the united nations require the full production of west coast refineries.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The plan to be followed in rationing gasoline for the year commencing April 1, 1944, will be practically the same as that now being followed. Each motor car registered for use in each province may, upon application, receive a category "AA" gasoline licence and ration coupon book containing forty units, which at the present value of a unit, namely three gallons, amounts to 120 gallons of gasoline. This "AA" gasoline licence and ration coupon book may be obtained from the issuer of motor licences at the time a provincial motor licence is obtained.

The special categories remain basically the same as established for this year. Each individual who, by reason of the essentiality of his vocation, believes that he is entitled to a special gasoline allowance must make a new application, upon forms provided for that purpose, to the regional office of the oil controller for his district. The rationing officials of the oil control office will then determine his special allotment, if any.

During the past year many of our motorists have looked upon their "AA" allotment as one for pleasure driving. It was not our intention last year, and certainly it is not our intention this year to provide gasoline for pleasure driving. The category "AA" is an allotment for emergency requirements. While we do not intend to define pleasure driving, I wish to make it clear that the man who uses his category "AA" for week-ends and other non-essential driving can expect no more should an emergency arise after his allotment is exhausted. By the same token, the motorist who receives a special category in addition to his "AA" book must consider the aggregate gallonage provided by the two categories as essential, and all that he can obtain throughout the year.

It is hoped that the few inequalities that occurred this year can be eliminated next year. With the information on record for nearly every car and information obtained through checks on highways and at summer resorts, this should be possible.

I cannot stress too strongly the need for conserving gasoline. Gasoline is an essential munition of war. It has been said "To that country which has the last barrel of petroleum will go the victory".

WAR EXPENDITURES

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH AND FIFTH REPORTS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the amendment, I wish to say first of all that I was happy to be associated with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in moving that the hearings of our subcommittee be held in open and not in camera. That of course was subject to the usual provision, that should any of the evidence touch upon matters which might give comfort to the enemy, then the committee should hold its sittings in camera. It may be of interest to this house to know that that motion was overwhelmingly defeated, that only three members supported it, namely the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) and myself, and that all government supporters were against it. However, the hearings were held in camera, and on the day when the committee published its report there appeared in the press at the same time a statement issued by the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. That statement said, among other things:

> The committee, in its attempt to whitewash the aluminum deal, succeeded only in making itself ridiculous.

Sir, I believe that that almost rises to a point of privilege on behalf of the members of that committee, apart from the hon. member who uttered the statement.

An hon. MEMBER: It certainly does.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe therefore that, in supporting the amendment, there is good reason to be advanced why the evidence should be tabled in order that the public of Canada should be able to say how the committee was conducted and how the individual members carried on. In the first place, perhaps as a sop or compromise, the committee voted unanimously to issue interim objective summaries of the evidence of various witnesses. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the vice-chairman of the committee and myself were appointed on that publicity subcommittee, and the evidence of the first witness, Mr. F. H. Brown, the financial adviser to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), was gone over and an objective summary was issued to the press. The next day the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that he could no longer serve on that publicity subcommittee because he had had several telephone calls which had proved embarrassing.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I said no such thing at any time.

Mr. JACKMAN: I have not checked the evidence, but my memory is indelible on the point and I shall have to accept if necessary the denial of the hon. member. However, the actions may indeed indicate whether or not what I said had the gist of truth or whether it was a fabrication of my faulty memory. The result was that the hon. member withdrew from that subcommittee, and yet he had no objection to the committee continuing to issue these reports from time to time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did object, as the evidence will show.

Mr. JACKMAN: I shall come to that point presently. The hon. member, if my memory serves me correctly, had no objection and in the best of good nature was quite agreeable to the committee continuing to function at that time. But what is to be the position of any party in this house, much less any prospective government, if we find that the leader of a party advocates and subscribes to a policy of publicity one day, or any policy, no matter what it may be, and yet for certain reasons finds that it is no longer comfortable to serve on that committee and wishes to withdraw from it and to reverse his policy? We wonder, if the Prime Minister is a little embarrassed because the official leader of the party to which I belong has some hand in the direction of the policy of my party. What his embarrassment must be if he knows that there are powers behind the official leader of the party to my left, which must be a very peculiar position—

Mr. COLDWELL: Explain that. That is a dirty innuendo.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He has not the courage to back it up by saying something.

Mr. JACKMAN: One thing I do not lack, I hope, is courage.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): You have demonstrated it.

Mr. JACKMAN: I have said exactly what to my memory went on in that committee. The hon. member refused and I asked other members of the committee to be with me or against me when I say that the member for Rosetown-Biggar refused to serve on that subcommittee one day longer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, no. The hon. member has made a reference to some leader other than the leader of this group dominating the policy of this group. That is an innuendo which ought to be either substantiated or withdrawn.

Mr. JACKMAN: Further witnesses—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I ask for a ruling on that point of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no point of order. The hon. member has made a statement which can be denied afterwards, but there is no point of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did not rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rose on a question of privilege. There is an imputation of motives which ought not to be permitted in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Any imputation of motives of course is not allowed in the house, but I did not understand that there was such an imputation in the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. JACKMAN: Further witnesses were called of whose evidence these objective summaries were issued. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar became, shall I say, increasingly hot under the collar because the evidence in all cases was not apparently satisfactory from his point of view.

Mr. COLDWELL: Statements or evidence?

Mr. JACKMAN: He then suggested, in fact he was very emphatic about it, that the proceedings of the committee—even though he and I had been associated together in demanding that these hearings should be in the open—should be either in camera or in open, and that this was a half measure that should not be permitted. In fact, he reminded one very much of his colleague in British Columbia, Mr. Harold Winch, who has no regard whatsoever for half way measures.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. It is true that I objected to having the meetings held in camera, and the issuing of public statements by the committee from those meetings, either in camera or in public. I wanted them in public, and I object to the innuendoes being cast by the hon. member's reflection upon me personally.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not easy for me to cast reflections, if they may be so called. I consider them a plain statement of fact in regard to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Nevertheless when he characterizes me, as he did the other members of the committee, in the press across this country, as having attempted to whitewash the aluminum deal, and having succeeded only in making itself—namely, the committee—ridiculous, then I think I am within my rights, in speaking to this amendment, to speak on a matter of privilege.

The next point had to do with the scope of the inquiry. The Prime Minister read to the house yesterday the terms of reference which had to do with war expenditures; and it was in connection with war expenditures that many of us volunteered to serve on the committee, at great cost to our time and to our pleasure, taking us away from our families, and so on. We did it because we thought we might in some small degree render a service to the war effort of this country and of the united nations. We did not wish therefore to be led far afield into matters which were not in the least relevant.

We know that at an early stage the matter of cartels, in particular the Alliance Corporation, was brought forth. It had nothing whatsoever, I submit, to do with war expenditures. The cartel, it is true, still exists to-day, but it has been inoperative for some years, and therefore it could not have had anything to do with war expenditures. Yet, what do we find? I read to the chairman the terms of reference, because I wished to keep the committee on a fairly straight track, so that we could get our work done, and not be as they were in the United States when these things came up. There the trial lasted two years. Evidence was taken much greater in extent than the material which fills the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and the judgment finally rendered by the court of appeal was such as to clear the Aluminum Company of America and also the Canadian company on all counts—

Mr. COLDWELL: In a lower court.

Mr. JACKMAN: —including the charge of being a monopoly, or infringing the anti-trust laws of the United States. So that the house may see just what fear was in the minds of some of us, if we were allowed to digress to something entirely outside the orbit of the terms of our reference. Yet when I made the suggestion that we should remain on the track the hon. member said—I have not looked up his words, but the gist of them was, "Well, if that is the case there is no further use in the committee sitting."

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say that.

Mr. JACKMAN: We members of the house have some regard for the rules under which our proceedings are constituted. Yet we find that unless some hon. members, particularly, can have their own way, they are not willing to abide by the rules.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is another statement; I would ask the hon. member to give me the reference. Give me the page of the evidence where I made any such statement as that.

Mr. GRAYDON: We cannot produce the evidence.

Mr. JACKMAN: The reason I am asking that the evidence of the committee be tabled is that all members may see for themselves whether or not the statements I make upon my responsibility as a member of the house are justified.

An hon. MEMBER: Give the page number.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Or whether your imagination is running wild.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not think my imagination is running wild.

Mr. DUPUIS: It is not running red, anyway.

Mr. JACKMAN: The next point indicating whether or not the whole committee or merely one member of it was ridiculous, is in regard to cost figures. When the statement was put in evidence by Price Waterhouse & Company as to the cost of producing a pound of aluminum, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, if my vision was any clear indication of what was going on, was taken aback by the figures which he thought, I believe, would be much more nearly in line with those he suggested, and which he stated without any qualification whatsoever—in fact he stated it with great emphasis in this house—were very much lower, or somewhere about six cents. When he found they were very much higher he was really in a state of consternation. What did he do? Although he may have been oblivious to his own actions, he alternately raised his hand up and down on the desk and said, "But they can't be right. They are not in accordance with the information I have." Naturally the rest of the committee felt—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Last night the objection was raised to my referring to the evidence. The hon. member is drawing upon his imagination. Not only is he speaking of evidence, but he is describing what he alleges to be certain actions on my part, after a period of four or five months. I submit that that kind of thing is neither evidence nor debatable, and transgresses the rules of order of the house.

Mr. ROWE: It has been going on here for twenty years.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. member that he is coming very close to the position I took last night with regard to the amendment before the house. No hon. member has the right to criticize the conduct of other members of the committee. In this instance reference is being made to the evidence, and it is not before the house. I wish hon. members who speak to-day would realize that the amendment is under discussion, and that they should address themselves to it only. Any reference to the evidence given before the committee would be irrelevant.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I rise to a question of privilege? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said that members of the committee succeeded in making it ridiculous. Surely an hon. member in the house has a right to bring forth evidence to show whether or not that is correct.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has made certain statements with regard to a statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The hon. member now denies that he was a party to the whitewashing of the committee in connection with the matter under discussion in the report.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not concerned with the whitewashing aspect of it. That stands on its own feet. But I am concerned with whether or not the committee acted ridiculously, and I should like to have Your Honour's ruling on that point.

Mr. SPEAKER: The statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar outside the house, which the hon. member has now quoted and which he repudiates is, I think, sufficient justification for the hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. JACKMAN: I left off by saying that according to my humble judgment of the proceedings the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was rather in a state of consternation that the published costs should be as high as they were shown to be in the certified statement of Price Waterhouse & Company.

Then, as I said, the rest of the committee felt that there was perhaps something in the nature of amusement in the way in which he took this statement, because there was a certain amount of mild laughter. The hon. member then said to the chairman that if there was any joke he wished to be let in on it. One of the members said, "What you say is the joke,"—whereupon the hon. member said, "If the committee thinks I am not asking intelligent questions" he had no further place there. And although the committee had been sitting only a short time that afternoon he picked up his books and hied himself away to his office—and the rest of the committee were left sitting there, like the chorus with the prima donna gone.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is quite a compliment.

Mr. JACKMAN: I wonder what would happen to the ship of state if every time it ran into a squall the skipper sought the seclusion of the cabin grand? However, next morning the prima donna was not nearly so highfalutin' and he came down and the work of the committee was proceeded with.

Mr. BURTON: I should like to raise a point of order. Are we to have the evidence tabled, or are we to have individual members giving a minority report?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. JACKMAN: The matter of the cost of producing a pound of aluminum was raised on numerous occasions during the proceedings of the committee. With many other members of the committee, I was concerned as to the real cost of producing a pound of aluminum. I think it was last June that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar stated that the cost was quite low, that he had information from first-hand sources. I shall read his words so that I shall not be accused of drawing upon my imagination. He said:

> These are the facts as I have accumulated them. I have got them first hand from first-hand sources. I have no doubt that there are certain people who know the people I visited when I was in Washington—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? Is he reading from something which was given in evidence?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am reading from Hansard, or rather from a pamphlet printed under the imprimatur of the House of Commons. It is entitled "Aluminum" and contains speeches on the Shipshaw power development and the Arvida expansion of the Aluminum Company of Canada by M. J. Coldwell, leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, Stanley H. Knowles, hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and J. W. Noseworthy, hon. member for York South, delivered in the House of Commons on June 14, 15 and 17, 1943. I take it that this is an official publication, and it is in handy form for my purposes as well as for those of other people

Mr. COLDWELL: And paid for by ourselves.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says "paid for by ourselves." I purchased this in the lobby of the Windsor hotel in Montreal some time during the summer for the sum of five cents, which price is marked on it. I suspect the document did not cost more than two cents at the government printing bureau, in which case the profit would be 150 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already directed the hon. member's attention to the fact that we have a motion and an amendment before the house. The amendment is with regard to the production of evidence, to the effect that until the evidence is produced the report should not be dealt with. Last evening I confined the speeches of hon. members to the terms of the amendment. If I allow the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) to continue I shall have to allow every hon. member who follows him to deal with matters which may be pertinent only to the motion. I presume that the hon. gentleman is laying a foundation for his contention that the evidence should be produced, but I ask him not to trespass too much in laying that foundation.

Mr. JACKMAN: It would grieve me to offend against the rules of the house, and particularly, sir, against your ruling, but I was only endeavouring to answer your question. I mentioned an official or semi-official document; Your Honour asked me if I was reading from the evidence of the committee, and I had to explain what I was reading from.

As I say, the matter of the cost of producing a pound of aluminum came up at various times. The members of the committee wanted to get the whole picture. We had heard in the house the original charges, and that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had first-hand information from first-hand sources. I began to get considerably worried about information being in the hands of one hon. member which was not available to all members of the committee; therefore I again asked the chairman if he would not insist on witnesses being called in order that we might have evidence which one member had and which was not available to the other members. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar then asked whom he could call. I am not quoting him exactly, but it is in my mind quite clearly. He suggested that he could not call the government, because his allegations were against the government. He said he could not call the officials of the Aluminum Company, because they were a party to it. He said he could not subpoena the officials of the United States government who might know something about aluminum matters. I suggested that if he wanted any witnesses he could get any number of the executives of the Reynolds Aluminum Company in the United States, who were known to be bitter enemies of the Aluminum Company of America and I suppose of the Canadian company. However, no witness was forthcoming.

Finally, after we had sat for several months —this will be in the record—and the other subcommittees were ready to depart for home —we ourselves had made transportation arrangements in advance, as we had to—the hon. member suggested to the chairman that he would be able to get a witness from the United States, a Mr. Irving Lipkowitz, who was formerly economic adviser to Mr. Thurman Arnold, who is now I believe a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, and who was at that time attorney general. Mr. Arnold had conducted the suit against the Aluminum Company of America, to which the Canadian company was a party. Mr. Lipkowitz is now labour relations adviser—this is rather important—to the office of war production in Washington.

I certainly am no supporter of the Liberal government of this country, although like all my colleagues I participate heartily in cooperating with them in furthering the war effort. I looked with suspicion, not to say chagrin, at the calling of an employee of a friendly power to come to our country to testify against our government. Of course he came in his unofficial capacity. This gentleman gave certain evidence which will be found on the typewritten pages numbered F-1, F-2 and F-3 of the evidence of November 9, 1943. I should read from that if I did not feel I might be transgressing the rules. So I turn to the original source, which is Business Week, a publication I suppose of some hundreds of thousands of circulation every week. We find there the type of evidence which this young man gave. He was saying what a great future there was for aluminum, the amount that would be used in motor cars, and so forth. I shall not take up the time of the house by reading it. I also have the original document in front of me, and on a subsequent page I find information which the witness did not give. It was to this effect. Steel, for example, has shown a tendency to counterattack in markets previously blitzed by the light metals. Steel streamliners were being sold before the war in direct competition with the shining new aluminum models, which first rolled out in 1933.

I would go on with this but I see you are doubting, Mr. Speaker, whether it is relevant to the question before the house. But the point I bring out is this, sir, that the evidence which we have, not only from this particular witness but from all the witnesses who appeared before the committee, was of such a nature that it was no more confidential, I think, than is the evidence that appeared in Business Week. However, this young man was a little bit loquacious, and, apropos of nothing at all, certainly of no leading question on our part, he put new ideas in our minds, when he quoted, for instance, from editorials in dailies in northern New York state that there was a feeling down there that the United States government had made possible the development of this great Shipshaw power enterprise in the Saguenay district when there were still undeveloped power resources in northern New York, and this was made a matter of political consequence. But even more important was the fact that on no less than three or four pages of evidence, F-1, B-7 and C-1, 2, 3 and 4—

Mr. SPEAKER: The evidence is not before the house and I have already ruled several times on that point. I have given considerable latitude to the hon. gentleman but I think he is exceeding reasonable latitude in the grounds upon which he bases his case. I must ask him to confine himself to the amendment.

Mr. JACKMAN: Sir, I will cut short immediately what I have to say about the conduct of the committee, although I do think it is very important that the people of Canada should know just what their members do when they sit in committee, and they are entitled to have this evidence. This young man went on to say that while he was labour relations officer to the office of war production in the United States, the C.I.O. aluminum workers of the Pacific northwest were very much concerned at the extent of the Arvida development, where the costs, and in particular the labour costs, were lower than they were in the Pacific northwest. I said to him—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. If we are to have the evidence tabled, and I should like to have it tabled, it will then be in order to refer to it, but this business of an hon. member of the house rising in his place and supposedly reciting directly from his memory of the evidence is not, I submit, within the rules. Last evening when I was called to order I was not even doing that. I obeyed your ruling immediately, although there were several other points I wished to make.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this is the fourth time I have had to rise in this connection. I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks solely to the amendment that is before the house. I cannot permit him to quote the evidence or even to refer to what witnesses may or may not have said.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was only endeavouring to show the importance of getting the evidence tabled.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have refused permission to other hon. members to make quotations from the evidence or deal with matters coming before the committee, on the ground that there is only one issue before the house at this moment, and that is the production or non-production of the evidence.

Mr. JACKMAN: Mr. Speaker, I shall not only cheerfully accept your ruling, as I always do, but rest happy in the expectation that the evidence will be tabled, so that the evidence in regard to C.I.O. workers in the United States as against our own people in the Arvida district will be known to the people of Canada.

Coming once again to the amendment, I take issue with the arguments advanced by the Prime Minister yesterday when he said not only that the hearings should be in camera but that the evidence in this particular case should not be tabled. At page 709 of Hansard he said:

> I submit that there must be the best of reasons for having sittings held in camera or the parliament at Westminster would not have followed that procedure in the last war and insisted upon it in this.

I believe that in Canada we are too prone to follow blindly the practice not only of Westminster but of the people of Great Britain. Certainly I take second place to no one in my admiration for the people of Great Britain. But I do think that faced with the same circumstances as those we have to consider here they would not do as they do now in the circumstances which prevail over there, and I think we must always bear that in mind. I have sufficient confidence in the ability not only of this government, if you like, but of the membership of this house, to make our own rules for our own conditions without borrowing too largely from across the water or across the line. There are differences between the situation here and the situation in Great Britain. There they have a national government; we have not a national government here. Furthermore, the division of the parties in the house is much more nearly equal there than it is here. Arising out of that fact is the constitution of this committee. Here we have six members belonging to the official opposition and the two groups to my left out of a total committee of twenty-four. That makes it impossible to carry on the work, because it is not possible to be present at the committee at all times.

My time is running short. I should like to have quoted the Prime Minister's own remarks regarding the suggested British commonwealth council when he said that he went over there alone and had to face all the cabinet ministers of Great Britain, with their secretariats, and so forth. It is a difficult position for members to be in when they are greatly out of balance, one way or the other, in membership on a committee. While I feel that the Prime Minister has adhered strictly and even generously to the parliamentary proportions in appointing members to the committees, nevertheless he might well feel, as I hope he will feel, that the interests of the country and the interests of the war will be better served if the opposition groups are given greater representation on committees.

There is, moreover, in Great Britain the closeness of the enemy. We here are removed by many thousands of miles from the enemy, and protected not only by our own navy but by the Royal Navy, the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F. But if we are to borrow our ideas from other places and not think them out for ourselves, as we are quite capable of doing, we might borrow from the Truman committee in the United States, which carries on like work in the open. Nothing is done there behind closed doors. The public may know for themselves exactly what goes on in that committee. The Prime Minister said further, yesterday—Hansard, page 710:

> I come back again to what I was saying. In addition to the reasons for the in camera proceedings which I have presented, there is the further one of what may be given, wholly unexpectedly, in the nature of aid or comfort to the enemy.

We have had the evidence taken in this aluminum subcommittee; we know what is in it. The Minister of Munitions and Supply yesterday said he was quite agreeable to tabling it; and I sometimes feel that if there were more business men and fewer politicians in this house we would get things done more effectively. I challenge the government and any member of the committee to put his finger on one iota of the evidence the disclosure of which is contrary to the public interest or would give any aid or comfort to the enemy.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I intend to be brief in my remarks, but I wish to say a few words, because it seems to me that hon. members are in a very difficult position. It is almost impossible to vote intelligently on this question. Personally I was not a member of the committee; I have not seen all the evidence; and after listening to a number of hon. members who were on the committee I find that there is wide disagreement among them as to exactly what the evidence was and what took place. The report states that none of the allegations of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was substantiated, and yet I must admit that yesterday, on the basis of the evidence which he referred to, he made a pretty strong case. Apparently the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) was astounded at some figures quoted by the hon. member, because this is what the minister stated in the house—Hansard, page 704:

My hon. friend is telling me of evidence given before the committee which seems to be incredible. That evidence may have been given; I have no way of knowing whether it was or was not. I can hardly credit it, but nevertheless I do think that if hon. members are to rise in their places in this house and quote evidence given to the committee, we should have an opportunity of checking that evidence.

Then the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) said:

You think it should be tabled, in other words?

The minister replied:

Yes, I think so; and I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that he move to have the evidence in this particular case tabled in the house.

Later on he changed his point of view, and I think gave as his reason that it would be a breach of faith towards some of the witnesses who were brought before the committee if that were done. Personally I doubt very much if anything could be gained by tabling the evidence. I understand it is voluminous, and if all hon. members wanted to see it, it would probably be three or four years before the last member had a chance to look at it. Therefore I doubt if very much could be gained by such a procedure. For that reason I should like to move the following subamendment, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston):

That all the words after "founded" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"be referred to the public accounts committee for examination and that consideration of the reports by the house be postponed until the public accounts committee reports back."

If that were done it would be possible for the committee to call before it the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and he has stated that he can give the pages upon which his statements are founded. The other speakers could also come before the committee and challenge his statements; and I think in that way and in that way only will it be possible to separate the false from the true in this matter. By the time the committee completed its investigation it should be in a sound position to report back to the house what the actual situation is.

I know that several hon. members have time and again stated that no substantial profits are being made in this war, and that even if profits are being made they are taxed away. Personally I think most of us to-day realize that substantial profits are still being made. I do not think there is any doubt about that. If anybody has any doubt about it, just let him read the reports of the victory loans. Take the third and fourth victory loans, and what do we find? That one-third of one per cent of the subscribers purchased sixty per cent of the total loans—an average of $60,000 per subscriber. Now, where does the money for these subscriptions come from? Some, true, from insurance companies. But there is no doubt that a very large amount of these purchases represents profits which are being made in this war, and I think we are all agreed that it is not a desirable state of affairs when large profits are made in the war whilst on the other hand our troops are sacrificing their lives. If we had adopted a pay-as-you-go policy it would not be quite as obnoxious, but unfortunately we have not done so, and as a result of these profits we were greatly expanding our debt. The national debt has expanded from 3½ billions to around 11 billions, and in reality that is nothing more or less than a misappropriation of funds of future generations.

I say again that I think it desirable that this evidence be placed before the public accounts committee. They may meet in camera. Let them call before them the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member who spoke the other night on the matter of shipbuilding. We shall be in a position to vote intelligently on this report after the public accounts committee has reported back to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The subamendment asks "that all the words after 'founded' in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor," so that the amendment would be amended to read:

be not now concurred in but that the house instructs that the evidence upon which the said reports are founded be referred to the public accounts committee for examination and that consideration of the reports by the house be postponed until the public accounts committee reports back.

The subamendment proposes that the evidence be referred to the public accounts committee for examination. But the evidence is not in the possession of the house, and the house cannot refer something to a committee which it has not got. The original amendment was that the evidence be tabled and that consideration of the reports be postponed until the house had had an opportunity to study it. The house cannot deal with the evidence until it has disposed of the amendment, which asks that the house shall have the evidence tabled. For that reason the subamendment would be inconsistent with the facts as we have them, that the house has not the right to refer to the public accounts committee evidence which is not in the possession of the house. I therefore rule the subamendment out of order.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): I want to say just a few words on the amendment, as a member of No. 1 subcommittee, which made a study of the shipbuilding and aeroplane industries in Canada. I wish to assure the members of this house that we did have witnesses before that committee who gave us evidence only after we had assured them that that evidence would be confidential. I am quite sure they would have not given it had they known or believed that it would be spread across the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Were they assured in writing or verbally in the evidence? Would that be shown in the evidence?

Mr. GOLDING: I may tell my hon. friend they were given that assurance by the chairman of the committee before they gave the evidence.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would that appear in the evidence?

Mr. GOLDING: I think some of it would. I am not quoting the evidence. In any event, I know there was evidence given by witnesses before that committee that would not have been given, as I said before, if they knew it would be spread across the country. One particular aspect of the matter is the disposition of the ships. It is very important that that be kept absolutely secret. I want to say further that in examining those contracts we were examining contracts for the British government, the United States government and the Canadian government. These contracts were filed. I sincerely hope that the members of this house will have enough confidence in the members of the committee to accept the report as we gave it, and will try to keep away from the evidence which I know should not be given to the public.

Further than that, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) made this statement when speaking last night as reported at page 712 of Hansard:

[Mr. Speaker.]

It was my desire that every aspect of the aluminum transaction should be examined; I was anxious that this should be the case, and to permit that to be done I took the responsibility of applying, through the high commissioner of the United Kingdom, for the consent of the British government to permit the details of that contract and of the negotiations leading up to it to be placed before the committee. The United Kingdom government was extremely reluctant to give that permission, but, after an exchange of several cables, permission was given with the definite understanding, so stated in the cable, that the hearings of the committee would be in camera and the evidence would not be made public. The consent of the government of Australia was given in exactly the same terms.

I ask any member of this house, if he wants to be fair to the Minister of Munitions and Supply who gave that assurance, if he thinks he is fair in asking that the evidence be now tabled. I feel as sure as I do that I am standing here that if the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) in the house were on this side of the house he would do exactly what we are doing with these war contracts that have to do with three countries.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think I could make a little improvement here and there.

Mr. GOLDING: I am satisfied you might do that, but I am satisfied also that you would do exactly as we have done in holding these meetings in camera.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think I would follow the Minister of Munitions and Supply and ask that the evidence be tabled.

Mr. GOLDING: The quotation I just read was taken from the remarks of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. My hon. friend can laugh at it if he likes. If he has no more regard than that for the word of the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the word of the chairman of the war expenditures committee, I can tell him that I have. I have regard also for the feelings of the British and Australian governments. These are serious matters. I hope that the members of this house are not going to ask us to betray the confidence of witnesses who gave their evidence. I am serious about it.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the amendment to the amendment presented by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) would be in order, but it has been ruled out of order; therefore we cannot consider it. To me it is amazing that this house cannot direct evidence taken in camera to be turned over to the public accounts committee. Our desire in asking that the evidence be turned over to the public accounts committee is based on the request of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to keep it secret. The mere fact that the evidence is now placed in such a position that it cannot be tabled, and cannot be placed before the public accounts committee, puts the members in an exceedingly embarrassing position. We have heard statements made by members on both sides of the house with regard to that evidence. For example, we had a statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). These statements were made directly from the evidence. He so stated in his speech. We then had contradictory statements made by the parliamentary assistant. The statements were so astounding that the members are in an impossible position.

I will not support the motion for concurrence in the report. I cannot possibly do it. How can I? I have not the slightest knowledge of what the evidence is. We have had one hon. member saying one thing and a member of the government saying another. Listen to what the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said. I am not going to read what the hon. member for Acadia said a moment ago in regard to the remarks of the Minister of Munitions and Supply on page 704, but on page 711 the minister, referring to the statements made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, used these words:

> His statements were so contrary to the facts as I understand them and to the facts as I have stated them in this house that I felt I would like very much to see the evidence taken before the committee. Of course I have not seen it and have no idea what that evidence was.

When the minister makes a statement such as this and says that the statements made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar are not in accordance with the facts, and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says he is stating evidence given before the committee, how in the world can you, Mr. Speaker, expect members of this house to vote intelligently? I recall that a year ago I spoke on the setting up of the war expenditures committee. I said at that time that I thought the representation on that committee was wrong. I pointed out that such parties as the Social Credit party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party had only one representative each on that committee. I remarked that when the committee met it was divided into subcommittees one, two and three, and if we as a Social Credit party had one member on that committee and that member was on subcommittee one, he could not possibly be on subcommittee two, which dealt with the question of aluminum. The member who was on the war expenditures committee, representing his group, is not in possession of the information. He could not possibly be. I am not going to be put in the position of voting for or against something of which I have no knowledge. I think it is an unfair position in which to be put by the government. The Minister of Munitions and Supply recognizes that fact, despite the fact that he changed his statement a little after the Prime Minister spoke.

I think there should be fairness in this thing, and that is why I advocated that the evidence be turned over to the public accounts committee. It was my hope that all parties would be satisfied; that we as members could get authentic information and vote intelligently on it after the public accounts committee had reported back to the house. Apparently that is not to be; therefore we shall vote for the amendment, and if the amendment carries, then I think we shall have to move that the evidence be turned over to the public accounts committee for examination. I do not see what other position we can take. I certainly am not going to put myself in the position of voting for something that I do not know anything about.

Mr. McNEVIN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. McNEVIN: My hon. friend referred to the desire to have the matter dealt with on a fair basis. Does he think it would be fair to a witness, who was properly before the committee and informed that he was giving his information in camera, later to divulge that information to the public?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That was exactly why we wanted this turned over to the public accounts committee. Talk about evidence being given before that committee! Let us not confuse the matter. That was not evidence in the ordinary accepted sense of that term. It was not evidence as given in a court of law. These men could get up and give opinions, and on many occasions something would be stated one day as a fact and another day it would be changed. I know that this was not the kind of evidence that is given before a court of justice. I know, and members who were on the committee know, that statements were made as so-called evidence and were taken back to the offices and revised before they were put on the official record. I repeat, it was not evidence as taken in a court of law. I was informed when I was on the committee that there was a distinct difference between meetings in camera and meetings in secret. It is certainly true that when you have a report tabled in the house it is based on evidence. They were violating the oath of secrecy if that is what it was. We have heard here on all sides that parts of the evidence were given from the committee's report and the rest of us did not know whether it was right or wrong.

I must say again that we shall have to vote for the amendment and against the motion, and then we will move to have the matter turned over to the public accounts committee.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Personally I intend to support the amendment. In my opinion no more important debate has taken place in the house, in this or in any previous session of this parliament, than the one in which we are engaged at the present time. My reason for that statement is that the trend during the last few years in this parliament is towards a gradual diminution of the rights of the membership of the house. While not entering into any controversy at the moment as to what the evidence may have been, or whether it supports or does not support the contention of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I suggest that we as members have the right to know the evidence upon which statements made by any member of this house, as a responsible member, have been found not to have been in accordance with the facts.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, do not intend to support any committee that will come before the house and submit findings so general and sweeping as were made in reference to committee No. 3. The words used were these:

> For the reasons set out in the foregoing report your subcommittee finds that none of the allegations is substantiated by the facts.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday said that this was the practice in Westminster, that the committee there met in camera. That is true. But there is a difference between the committee at Westminster and what this committee is endeavouring to do. The committee at Westminster does not move concurrence, nor does any member of that committee do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The moving of concurrence was to oblige hon. gentlemen opposite, so that they might have this opportunity of discussion. The government would not have moved concurrence but for that reason.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They were very anxious to move concurrence so far as No. 3 report was concerned. The only question that was raised by the opposition was this, that in moving concurrence in No. 3 report there should at the same time be brought in the other reports so as to enable hon. members to discuss them.

An hon. MEMBER: Even that was at the request—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I never interrupted the hon. member except to ask a couple of very simple questions. I wish he would be quiet until I get through with my argument and then he can make any speech he pleases.

Here we as members of the house are asked to find that a member made statements that were false, and we are so asked by a committee which does not bring before us the evidence that was taken before it. Instead it brings before us, and I ask hon. members to read the evidence of that committee, only such portions of the evidence as have been extracted and which point conclusively to the conclusions arrived at by the committee. Subject to the circumscription that is necessary by reason of public safety, we have the right to the evidence unexpurgated by any committee. For if we do not demand it in this case—and I am entering into no controversy as to the rights or wrongs of the matter—there is not a member of this house, making a statement in the house, who might not, if the government saw fit to submit the matter to a favourable committee, be found not to have stated the truth, or to have made false allegations. The independence of members of this House of Commons is at stake. We have lost many of our rights in recent years. There has been a diminution of those rights all along the line, and I know that when I take this stand the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as was the case yesterday, may suggest the possibility of an election unless we are servile and support what the government places before the country and the house, whether it meets with or without our approval. But, Mr. Speaker, we as members of this house, regardless of political considerations, must uphold the rights of other members no matter whether agreeing with those other members politically or not.

It is in that spirit that I approach the discussion of this matter to-day. I was one who believed in the constitution of this committee. I was one who supported this committee at its inception, and I was one to whom the former chairman, now a distinguished judge of the exchequer court, paid a tribute for the contribution I endeavoured to make.

I believed, Mr. Speaker, that economies could be effected, that economies could be maintained by continual watchfulness of expenditures. I believe, as was mentioned yesterday, that the committee should forget political considerations, should look, criticize and recommend. Now we find ourselves in this position. The chairman of the committee moves concurrence in the report. He says the report is based upon certain evidence. The committee quotes certain evidence—or at least a summary of it—and it asks me as a member of the house to find, with that committee, that statements made by a member of the house are not in accordance with the facts.

Much is made of the fact that the meetings of the committee were in camera. That is no excuse for the non-production of the evidence. Three years ago in the house the then chairman pointed out the difference between "in camera" and "in secret"—and there is a very great difference, one which has been pointed out on more than one occasion. "In camera" simply means not in open court; in a private room. "In secret" means—and this was not a secret committee; it was a committee in camera—"private, unrevealed, not to be known or exposed to view."

A moment ago the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) mentioned that there were certain witnesses who would not have given evidence if they had not been assured that their evidence would not be used. Committees of parliament, Mr. Speaker, have the power to subpoena witnesses and to enforce the giving of testimony. Just because in these particular cases certain witnesses were called without being subpoenaed is no justification for the stand taken by the hon. member that they would not have given evidence had they not received that protection.

Mr. GOLDING: Just speak for yourself; that is your opinion. It is not mine.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am supported by the rules in that connection. The committees set up in Great Britain in this as in the last war report, but their reports are merely laid on the table of the house; they are not debated. No member of the House of Commons in Great Britain can be convicted of a falsehood or fault found with him, without a trial, but that will result from this motion being passed, although the evidence is not before us, and without our being able to see for ourselves whether or not there was evidence upon which the conclusions in question could be made.

As a matter of fact it is impossible for us in this house to come to any conclusion without the evidence. Unless we have it we are dependent upon the conclusions arrived at by a committee of parliament. I am supported in that view by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), now the chairman of the committee, who when he spoke in this house in July of 1943, as reported at page 4990 of Hansard, used these words:

> It is obvious that the committee cannot intelligently debate a committee report founded on evidence taken in camera—evidence which is not before the house.

This is a statement made in the debate on a report by the hon. member who now, as chairman of the committee, asks the house to do what he said he could not have done less than eight months ago.

Mr. CLEAVER: Purely as a matter of courtesy to the opposition to permit discussion of the report.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am merely calling as a witness in support of my contention the hon. member who is now chairman of the committee, and who has moved concurrence in the report.

In addition to that, I asked him yesterday to say whether there was any reason why he might have changed his opinion, or whether there had been any change in recent months in regard to reports to be made by the committee. At page 696 of Hansard we find his reply in these words:

> Mr. Cleaver: Well, my hon. friend can read the order of reference as well as I can, but on several occasions I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicate that if the war expenditures committee found any wrongdoing we were at liberty, and it was our duty, to report the matter either to the House of Commons or to the public accounts committee. Last year we were given the further right to make confidential reports to the Prime Minister if any wrongdoing should be discovered which in the public interest should not be disclosed.
> Mr. Diefenbaker: Has there been any change in the powers of the committee since it was first set up?
>
> Mr. Cleaver: I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this time will not be charged against me, but I believe I can find the reference for my hon. friend. The only change of which I am aware was the change requested in the report tabled on July 19, 1943, paragraph 5 of which reads as follows:
> "In cases where consideration of national security precludes the publishing of certain recommendations and of the arguments upon which they are based, to address a memorandum to the Prime Minister for the consideration of the war cabinet, providing that the committee shall, whenever it has exercised such powers, report the fact as soon as possible to the house."

So that there has not been any change. To-day conditions are the same as they were in July, 1943, when the hon. member gave us the benefit of his views on the subject.

I pass now to a more serious objection, namely, that the committee has no power to report wrongdoing to the house or to the people of Canada. That is a very serious matter. To-day we have a high level of taxation, by which tremendous amounts are being raised, and we have a responsibility to assure the people that full value is being received for expenditures made in the conduct of our war effort. The people have a right to demand that wasteful and extravagant expenditures shall be investigated, and what is more important, reported upon. To-day, in the fifth year of the war, the committee has had four years of operation. There is no power in the war expenditures committee as yet to report wrongdoing or to report examples of extravagance, either to the people or to the house. What we did in the house in 1940 was to appoint a watchdog to guard the treasury and then muzzle him for the period of the war. That is exactly the position of the war expenditures committee. It is set up, leading the people to believe that extravagance and wrongdoing can be reported; then it is muzzled, and it is denied the right to report such wrongdoing as it may find.

This statement might appear to be contrary to the facts, but again I call as my witness the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Halton, who, following me in the debate on June 10, 1941, as reported at page 3753 of Hansard, said this:

> The next point covered by the hon. member for Lake Centre was that the committee had no power to report as to wrongdoing. Possibly that is right, but whether we had the right to do it or not I wish to inform the house that their subcommittee No. 1 headed into every complaint of wrongdoing of which we as a committee had notice.

It might have headed in, but the people of Canada demand more than heading in; they demand the revelation of wrongdoing if it is present, and the punishment of those who are guilty.

Mr. CLEAVER: Does my hon. friend suggest that any subcommittee of the war expenditures committee found any wrongdoing anywhere without reporting it promptly?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLEAVER: Because if he does, he is entirely in error.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend, being a lawyer, first asks a question and then answers it.

Mr. CLEAVER: Exactly what you were doing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But I was corroborated by the rules and regulations of this house. I remember well that in 1941 I ascertained a situation in regard to certain civilian flying schools and disclosed the fact that full value was not being received by the people of Canada from the operation of these schools.

Mr. CLEAVER: These remarks refer to our committee work in 1941. So long as I am in order in replying, I am quite content that my hon. friend should refer to it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I cannot hear my hon. friend; I do not know what he is saying. I do know that as a result of the facts I had obtained I personally brought before the House of Commons certain evidence on which I had secured corroboration. In the middle of May, 1942, during the debate on the air estimates, I brought out the fact that these civilian schools were making profits on their investment, as I remember now, of from 41 to 100 per cent. At that time the minister for air castigated me for having brought out that evidence; he could not believe it was possible; but the next day he got up in the house and said that things were going to change. The minister for air promised a change; he acted and the thing ended. But this action was not attained because of the activities of my hon. friend over there, who all through the piece endeavoured to convince the people of this country that all was well in connection with civilian schools and their operation.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must consent to the asking of a question.

Mr. CLEAVER: I was rather generous yesterday in connection with interruptions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. member may ask a question, but I do not want his argument along with it. What is the question?

Mr. CLEAVER: My hon. friend has stated that the subcommittee did not act. I know he does not want to make a misstatement, and I should like to refer him to the committee's report.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the question?

Mr. CLEAVER: I want to refer the hon. member to the report of the committee which dealt with the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Lake Centre has the floor.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLEAVER: Perhaps he will permit a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member does not wish to be interrupted, he should not be.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will the hon. member permit me?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am perfectly courteous at all times in debate.

An hon. MEMBER: Put your question on the order paper.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am willing at all times to answer questions, but I am not prepared to permit my hon. friend to produce self-serving statements instead of asking questions.

Mr. CLEAVER: In future we will make it mutual.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I pointed out the seriousness of the situation. If we accept concurrence in this report we shall be blindly and without knowledge making findings in this supreme court of parliament not based on any evidence. What we are being asked to do is to make a finding in regard to a member of this parliament. We shall be supporting the findings of a committee which are based upon evidence about which we know nothing and which we are denied the opportunity of seeing. We are being asked as the high court of parliament to agree to the findings of a committee, to come to the conclusion that those findings, which are based on secret evidence are correct, evidence about which we have no inkling and in respect to which there is no agreement among the participants on the committee.

This is a serious matter. I am not thinking for the moment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, with whom I do not often see eye to eye; what I am thinking of is how our rights have been diminished and how we are gradually being placed in the position where if we dare to speak out, if we show our independence and fail to display the necessary servility, we are faced with the threat that we are not cooperating in this war effort. We have rights as members of this house. I appeal to the members on all sides not to give approval to this motion of concurrence, which is just another step along the road to a denial to the members of this house of the right of independent speech.

I remember last summer when the hon. member for York-Sunbury, then the leader of the opposition, made certain statements in regard to a situation in the grain trade. They were brought before a committee, and, according to the report of the committee, which was founded entirely on political faith, he was found not to have been correct in his statements. I make an appeal to the Prime Minister which I have made before. Do not ask us to concur in a report that condemns a member of this house of having deceived the house and the country. I appeal to the Prime Minister to have the motion withdrawn, and not to ask the members of this house to line up blindly to support a motion which in effect says to the people of the country that an hon. member of this house has stated what is untrue. If an hon. member states what is untrue he deserves condemnation from every member of this house. But to condemn him without giving him the opportunity of having placed before this house the evidence upon which he is to be condemned is unfair, unjustifiable, un-British—yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a farcical position in which to place the parliament of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just before my hon. friend concludes, may I say that he has asked the government to withdraw this motion. The purpose of the government in bringing forward the motion was to meet the request of hon. gentlemen opposite. If the house will give its unanimous consent the government will withdraw the motion immediately.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, some clarification may be necessary in view of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has just said. It is all right for hon. members to indulge in hilarity, but this is not a subject for hilarious discussion. Moreover, what the Prime Minister has just said is apt to leave a wrong impression. I want to give a right impression to the Prime Minister and to the house, and it is this. Earlier in the debates of the house this session, the question of the time that would be taken in constituting the committees of the house was a subject of discussion between the Prime Minister and myself, and I am not so sure that other hon. members did not participate in the discussion. In any event, the Prime Minister and myself took part in a discussion, and at that time I mentioned why the setting up of the committees last year took so long. There were several committees which it took considerable time to set up. The social security committee took a day and a half, and the reconstruction committee took something like two or three days. At all events it was considerably longer than I or the Prime Minister himself had expected. One of the reasons I advanced at that time why it was taking so long to set up the committees was that there were so many matters dragging over from the previous session to be discussed. Then the whole question came up of the reports of committees of the previous session. The report of the war expenditures committee was one report which was tabled at the end of last session, on the 26th day of January. I pointed out to the Prime Minister at that time that when the war expenditures committee or any of these committees were being set up, one might normally look for an extension of the usual time of discussion because the reports of the previous session would naturally be discussed on the motion to appoint the committees.

The first intimation I had of a motion for concurrence in the report of the war expenditures committee was when its chairman, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), approached me with respect to the whole question of concurrence in its reports. If my memory is correct—it is only a recollection, and I do not want in any way to colour it—I am inclined to think that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was anxious that concurrence should be moved in at least the third report, which had to do with aluminum. That was the impression I got. I made it very clear that I would take up the matter of concurrence with members of our own party, and I think the hon. member for Halton will bear me out when I say I told him that so far as our party here was concerned we were not pressing for concurrence in these reports. I think that is a proper and correct account of what took place.

When the Prime Minister moved that the reports be considered at this session of the house, only the third report was mentioned by him, but as one report was to be concurred in, I suggested that there was no reason why all the reports should not be concurred in at the same time. That is the position so far as we are concerned, and we ought to have that put on the record. So far as the facts go, I do not think there is any real distinction between our positions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not see that what my hon. friend has just said matters very much one way or the other in regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) just before taking his seat. He then said, and it was to that suggestion I addressed myself, that he hoped the government would not ask the house to vote concurrence in these reports. I then rose and said that the only reason the government had permitted the resolution asking concurrence in the reports was that it was necessary to bring forward such a motion in order that the house might debate matters referred to in the committee's reports. Hon. gentlemen opposite had said that they wished to debate these reports. It was to oblige them that this resolution was introduced from the government side. It was impossible to debate these matters generally unless there was a motion to concur in the reports. I want to make it very clear that the reason the motion was brought forward to concur in the reports at the time it was, was to enable hon. gentlemen to discuss freely the whole question of matters affecting the war expenditures committee, to discuss what was in the report of last year and any other matters they might wish to discuss. My hon. friend himself was one who suggested that instead of having two discussions we have the whole discussion in the first instance, namely, on the reports, and that this discussion once concluded the war expenditures committee would be appointed at once.

I desired to have the committees, in accordance with the wish of the house, set up just as early in the session as possible. To permit of this was the reason for permitting the present discussion. It was necessary to precede the motion to set up the committee on war expenditures by this resolution to concur in the reports if we were to have that preliminary discussion in that way.

I repeat, if hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish to be asked to approve these reports, I am perfectly prepared and the government is prepared immediately to have the resolution withdrawn and end the discussion here and now. But my hon. friends cannot have it both ways. They cannot both ask that we should give them the opportunity to discuss indefinitely, and not be asked to approve the reports, and at the same time suggest that we should withdraw the resolution and not ask them to vote upon it. I say that I am quite prepared to have the resolution withdrawn at once, if that is the wish of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if, having regard to the necessary procedure, the house will give its unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say with respect to that, it was not entirely a matter of accommodation or convenience to us. That should be made clear at the outset. The Prime Minister knows that it was only by way of regularizing matters that the discussion was held on the motion for concurrence, so that it would not come upon the motion to set up the war expenditures committee. The government would have found itself in an awkward and embarrassing position if the discussion had come upon the motion to set up the committee. So that it was not a matter of accommodating us but of accommodating the house generally. Moreover, I would say to the Prime Minister that to withdraw his motion now would be tantamount to shutting off any discussion of the reports of the war expenditures committee. The opposition is anxious to have the evidence taken by the committee brought down. But the motion for concurrence has been made, and an amendment has been moved to it, and we at least have the right to discuss the question whether the evidence shall be tabled.

May I make it very clear to the Prime Minister that having listened to the statements that have been made by one member after another of the war expenditures committee I can see no reason of security or national interest which would prevent the tabling of the evidence. For that reason, and since I certainly am opposed to the government making any move now to discourage the discussion, I say this: when the discussion has taken place, let the government withdraw their motion. That is the proper way. The government must not ask that the debate should now cease.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is your suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that a discussion between the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and myself is out of order, but, Your Honour having permitted the leader of the opposition to speak as often as he has, I might be allowed one further word in reference to the matter we are discussing. I would remind my hon. friend and the house that the report was tabled at the close of last session. When this session began its proceedings I was asked whether the report would be discussed at this session, and I replied—and my words will be found on Hansard—that reports which were made in a previous session died, so to speak, with the session and that they were not to be taken up at a new session. That was the position which I took, and took rightly, on behalf of the government. Then it was that the request was made that there should be a chance to discuss some of these matters which were referred to in the report and which hon. gentlemen opposite wished to discuss. I was led to believe that if they were given that opportunity it would probably shorten discussion on the motion to establish a committee on war expenditure. It was then to oblige hon. gentlemen opposite the government took the only means possible to that end, namely to have a resolution brought in which would enable the report to be discussed at this session and later a motion for concurrence, and thereby allow this discussion to take place. Of course it requires the unanimous consent of the house to withdraw a motion, and the leader of the opposition evidently takes a different view of the matter from that taken by his distinguished follower from Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. GRAYDON: No, I did not. The Prime Minister cannot say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is obvious.

Mr. GRAYDON: It may be obvious to you, but—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just allow the record to speak for itself and leave it at that.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would like, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, if the record is going to speak for itself the record is going to be there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The record is there now.

Mr. GRAYDON: I just want to say this to the Prime Minister, that at a proper time in this debate, after the country has heard the pros and cons of this, we will consent, as my hon. friend suggested, to the government withdrawing the motion. But it is a question of time. There is no distinction or difference on this between the hon. member for Lake Centre and myself, although the Prime Minister now tries to put words into my mouth in order to show a difference between us.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GRAYDON: Just a minute. The hon. member was telling me yesterday that it is a bad thing to be interrupting. I want him to take his own advice. I say to the Prime Minister, let us get the record clear. If the government wants to withdraw this motion, when the debate is concluded, without a vote, I am quite agreeable, and that will also meet the wishes of the hon. member for Lake Centre; there is no difference between us.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Withdraw it after they have refused the evidence.

Mr. SPEAKER: This whole discussion, I need not point out to the house, is entirely out of order.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is interesting, though.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to draw the attention of the house, with reference to the discussion which has taken place, to citation 383 of Beauchesne:

> Where an amendment has been proposed to a question, the original motion cannot be withdrawn until the amendment has been first disposed of by being agreed to, withdrawn or negatived, as the question on the amendment stands before the original motion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then the Prime Minister is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So were you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In good working order!

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 53 provides that a member who has made a motion may withdraw same by leave of the house, such leave being granted without any negative voice.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): I desire to address myself briefly to the amendment before the house. I had not intended to speak on this motion at all, but I wish to call the attention of hon. members to what I regard as a very unfortunate position that we have drifted into by reason of the presentation of this amendment. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Sterling) asks that the evidence taken in camera be tabled. Let me say in passing that I have formed no opinion one way or the other on the merits of the real dispute here. I should hesitate, indeed, speaking for myself, to reach a conclusion that my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has deliberately made any misstatement to this house. I wish to record that. But I am impressed with this situation. The committee, sitting in camera by their own choice and motion, desired to have before them in evidence certain contracts, as is apparent from this debate and as all members of that committee—of which I was not a member—are aware. On their behalf, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), instead of wanting to hold back anything, took the course of asking the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Australia to permit the contracts made by them with the Aluminum Company, and the circumstances under which they were made, to be placed in evidence before the committee. Those governments at first declined, and upon being pressed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, reluctantly consented to these contracts being placed in evidence on the definite understanding and condition that they should be received by the committee in camera.

Mr. HOMUTH: There is no evidence of that.

An hon. MEMBER: It is all in the record.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is in the record in this debate. I do not know whether the hon. member was a member of the committee.

Mr. HOMUTH: I was.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will he rise in his place and say that they were not procured on that understanding?

Mr. HOMUTH: So far as I know, no.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SLAGHT: Then the hon. member must have been away. It is not permissible perhaps to read from a current debate, but the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated here yesterday definitely, in effect, that he procured these documents and this evidence for that committee on that understanding; they were placed before the committee on that understanding; no member of the committee in this house rose to question that statement, and I accept it as true in substance and in fact. I do not desire to be controversial in this matter; I repeat, I have formed no opinion on the merits of this question. But I do think we ought to have some regard in the parliament of Canada for the solemn undertakings of the government of Canada; and if the hon. member for Danforth, supported by the hon. member for Yale, and praised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—a member of my profession—and by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon)—a member of my profession—will pause for a moment to see the position in which they propose to place the Canadian government, if their amendment should carry, in the eyes of our mother country and our sister commonwealth nation of Australia, then it seems to me that they will take a grave responsibility so to act in the name of the Canadian parliament, and I shall oppose it as long as I am able to. Let there be no doubt about that. These documents were forthcoming, and the evidence surrounding them was given on the distinct pledge of that committee, given through the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who helped the committee to get them. The pledge was that the secrecy of in camera would be preserved with reference to them. Need a Canadian parliament go any farther? Personally I should like to have had all the evidence placed before this house. I should like to have read it and to have discussed it.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the hon. member permit a question at this time?

Mr. SLAGHT: When I am through, if my hon. friend will wait.

I say, therefore, that it would be a gross breach of an undertaking by Canada to the mother country and to Australia to give effect to the amendment now before the house and to table the contracts with the evidence surrounding them. My reason for saying that is that the committee received them on the understanding that they were to be received in camera. Now, what is your question?

Mr. BOUCHER: Would my hon. friend tell the house what "in camera" does mean, or if he agrees with the meaning put on it by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)?

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, I do, and it certainly means this: that the motherland and Australia provided, for their own protection and for their own purposes, with which we are not concerned, that the evidence and documents would not be tabled in the Canadian House of Commons and made available to Hansard and open for discussion and reading in this house. It certainly means that. Because of that I appeal to the mover of the amendment, the hon. member for Danforth, than whom no one in this house has a higher reputation in the industrial world for keeping his word, for refusing to breach an undertaking, and the hon. member for Yale, an outstanding member with the reputation of not going back on an undertaking to which he is a party. The same reference with regard to reputation applies to all hon. members who have spoken and who were members of that committee, including the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). If the house has a true realization of what we would place ourselves in were we to pass the amendment, let us drop this controversy. I appeal to the mover and the seconder to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity to receive an answer from the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in regard to a statement which he made respecting the work of subcommittee No. 1, during the year 1941 when it investigated the British commonwealth air training plan. I know that my hon. friend would want me to put the record straight. What I am about to say clearly illustrates once again that human memory is often frail. My hon. friend stated that civilian companies operating air observer schools were inquired into in 1941; that the committee was remiss in its duty in not taking steps to remedy some conditions which should not have existed at that time; that as a result the hon. member for Lake Centre felt impelled in 1942 to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) and that he did so during the session of 1942.

I hold in my hand the report of subcommittee No. 1, dated November 3, 1941. This report was tabled in the house on that date. I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact, first, that the report was tabled in the house the session preceding the one during which my hon. friend states he brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Defence for Air. I wish to thank my hon. friend for bringing up this point, because it clearly illustrates the manner in which the war expenditures committee functions, a helpful and vigilant manner, seeking to redress wrongs, seeking to find waste and to cure waste, seeking to do that without taking political advantage or do anything that would be harmful to the war effort. I am reading from page 556 of Votes and Proceedings, Monday, November 3, 1941:

> The subcommittee fully appreciates the fact that the air observer schools are being very efficiently managed and that these schools are performing an important war task. . . .

Mr. NICHOLSON: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member who is now speaking took exception last night to my making some comments regarding what had taken place at a previous session, and the Deputy Speaker, who was in the Chair, called me to order. I was not permitted to continue my speech. I see no reason why the hon. member for Halton should be permitted to discuss this question, particularly having regard to the rule that was drawn to my attention.

Mr. CLEAVER: I believe Your Honour was in the Chair when the hon. member for Lake Centre raised this point. I believe it was understood I would have an opportunity to answer it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Understood by whom?

Mr. SPEAKER: There was no understanding you have the right to reply to the hon. member, as far as I am concerned. The hon. member has the right to speak on the amendment because he has not spoken previously. I have been following the argument of the hon. member very carefully. I presume he is endeavouring to show to the house the reason for the actions of the committee with regard to the matters under consideration, and also the subject of the amendment, namely, the production of the evidence. He has not dealt with that, but I assumed he was leading up to that point, and I am bringing it to his attention.

Mr. CLEAVER: Let me continue the quotation from our report:

> The subcommittee fully appreciates the fact that the air observer schools are being very efficiently managed and that these schools are performing an important war task and also appreciates the fact that measures of economy should not be permitted to slow up our war effort but as the actual circumstances have altered sharply since the contract was first entered into the subcommittee decided that a conference should be called of executive officers representing all of the schools, that the facts should be frankly placed before them and their cooperation invited. The conference was held on June 4—

That is the June preceding the year 1942 to which my hon. friend referred.

—and as a result the operating companies have all voluntarily offered to agree to a reduction of what is described in the agreement as flying hour profits from $1 per flying hour to 35 cents per flying hour.

That was a reduction of sixty-five per cent in the profit to the air observer schools. And the contracts were re-negotiated and re-signed with the sixty-five per cent reduction. That was all done the year before my hon. friend raised the point in the House of Commons.

I do not intend to delay the house long, but since my name has been drawn into the discussion I should like to make a brief statement. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) mentioned my name in the statement which he made, and I should like to make it abundantly clear—I do not think he did, though I am not suggesting that he did it intentionally—that I never at any time suggested that a motion for concurrence in a war expenditures committee report should be voted upon.

The problem arose in the past. Your Honour had already ruled at previous sessions that a motion to set up a committee is a motion to set up a committee and that members cannot discuss, on a motion to set up a committee, anything that had to do with committee reports or other extraneous matters of that kind, that the debate was restricted purely to the motion before the house, namely, the motion to set up the committee. That had the effect of restraining members of the opposition who wished to criticize the work of the committee and its reports and preventing that criticism from taking place, and I well remember the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) wanting a year ago to discuss the report on a particular matter and the Chair ruled the discussion out of order on that ground.

Then we are faced with the other problem, that under the rules of the house the committee reports are dealt with in the session in which they are tabled, if at all. So that when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who was deeply interested in the aluminum report, mentioned in his first speech in this house at this session that he intended to discuss the aluminum report, or words to that effect, on the setting up of the committee, obviously if that debate were to take place something had to be done to regularize it. Then, too, later on there were some suggestions from members of the opposition that they wished to debate the aluminum report.

On one or two occasions I asked the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) if there were any other reports of the 1943 committee which the opposition wished to debate, because, while I have not receded at all from the position which I have always taken, that the house cannot intelligently debate a committee report based on evidence taken in camera, yet I do not wish to be accused for a moment of attempting to stifle or to prevent hon. members of any of the opposition parties from expressing themselves freely with respect to any work done by the war expenditures committee. The result of the entire problem was that, as it appeared, the only way we could regularize the debate with respect to the full work of the war expenditures committee was that a motion should be made that the reports tabled in the previous year should be considered at this session, and then bring on the actual debate on a motion for concurrence.

I do not think it was in anyone's mind that a vote would be taken and that the matter would be pressed to a vote on the motion for concurrence. Certainly it was not in my mind, and the sole purpose of the present motion is to permit hon. members of the opposition groups to make any and all and sundry complaints which they wished to make with respect to any part of the work of the war expenditures committee.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): The question before the house at the moment is simply whether the evidence should be tabled, and it is to that question I desire to direct my remarks. It seems to me that the argument that should impel our minds is a very simple one. I wish to join in the strongest possible terms with the forceful statements made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). The honour of the house is the highest argument that can be pleaded. My hon. friend has shown that to table this evidence would be to break faith with our sister parliaments in England and in Australia. That should be sufficient. But there is a further point, almost as forceful as that, which I should like to lay before the house.

It has been stated by hon. members who know the facts that witnesses have come before this committee and have been assured by the chairman that their remarks were in camera, and they were given to understand that their evidence was secret. It is not possible for any member of that committee to say that statements of the kind were on the responsibility of the chairman alone, and bound him only, because every member of that committee, no matter to which party he may belong, who sat and listened to the evidence given by the witnesses, as the result of and following the assurance given, bound himself by his silence to the undertaking given by the chairman. And for any hon. member of the house, I care not to which party he belongs, whether it be government or opposition, now to vote to break the pledge of the chairman, is to vote to break his own pledge, tacitly given to the witnesses.

I would not for one moment presume to teach ethics to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He is a member of the same high profession to which I belong. I would recall to his mind, however, that when we were students at school the consideration which we were told was the highest that could actuate the doings of a solicitor was that of keeping faith, being honourable and decent and proper in one's conduct. The hon. gentleman has said that this committee is a watchdog for the house. Well, a watchdog is a rather poor dog that is not an honest dog. I say that if this committee violates its pledge and its assurance to the witnesses it is not an honest committee. And any member who violates a pledge of that kind is not an honest member, or at least he is not dealing honestly with witnesses before the committee. I go one step farther. The members of this committee are representatives or I might say agents of this house. They are commissioned by this house to make the inquiry on our behalf, and so a pledge given by that committee is binding upon the house itself and, I submit, upon every hon. member of this house. For any hon. member to vote to violate a pledge of that kind—well, it is unthinkable. I am sure it will not be done by any hon. member of this house if he simply thinks about what he is doing.

I know it was arguable at one time whether or not evidence should be taken in secret or in camera. That is a subject which is open to argument. I am inclined to think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) put the argument so strongly that it should carry most minds. Still, the question as to whether the evidence should be taken in private or in public is a matter of argument. But once it has been taken in secret, it is no longer a matter of argument; it is beyond argument whether we should then later on make it public. I say, that is beyond argument.

They say that honesty is the best policy, the wisest course to pursue. I suppose that is open to argument, but I do not propose to argue it. I have been taught that and I accept it, that honesty is the best policy. Philosophically it may be different; I do not know, but I am not going to enter into that question. It may be possible for one to grow wealthy by being dishonest, but I for one am not in that business. I do not argue that question. I accept the principle of honesty. So, too, one may convenience himself, as it has been suggested we should do. I would like to see the evidence and read it. There may be other reasons as well why, as a matter of expediency rather than of principle, this evidence should be brought down.

But I come back to my principle, and I say that keeping good faith with those with whom one is associated is a far more important consideration than mere expediency or convenience. I say, therefore, the arguments I have heard in support of bringing down the evidence are aside from the point; they are futile. They should hardly be expressed. Our hands are bound, irrespective of our convenience or our expediency, as a matter of honour. I would like my constituents to know that I voted against this amendment, upon my honour as a member of this house.

Mr. M. J. EDWARDS (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that as one whose name is proposed to be added to the list which will constitute this committee at the next session, I have not been greatly exercised or greatly disturbed in my mind about the facts in connection with the case, but rather as to the modus operandi of our committee. The more so was my anxiety aroused by reason of the principle enunciated in the house last night by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, when he said, as reported at page 703 of Hansard:

> That evidence was given not in secret but in camera, and there is a very well defined rule that evidence given in camera is not given in secret, that a member has to be guided by his own conscience as to what he will subsequently divulge. I want that to be clearly understood, because that is the difference between secrecy and in camera.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is the case. Evidence which has been given secretly cannot be divulged.

I was greatly exercised to hear that principle announced as the one which should be followed, and I assume it is the one followed by the leader of the C.C.F. and that his followers feel they are entitled to follow. It is obvious, from what had preceded, in the discussion, that the chairman of the war expenditures committee did not put that interpretation upon the words "in camera". Hon. members will recall that when he chided some members of the committee for having divulged some of the evidence given before the committee in camera, all the members of the war expenditures committee from the official opposition, with one exception, were prompt to rise in their places and repudiate the suggestion that they had in any way broken this pledge, or the implied promise of secrecy involved in the fact that the meetings at which they sat were held in camera. No such protest was heard from the members of the C.C.F. That was hardly necessary because I understand the constitution of the committee was such that only one member of that party, the one who happens to be its leader, was at that time its member of the committee. He announced an entirely different principle, stating, "True, the meetings were held in camera, but that is different from being held in secret. And what I shall reveal or may say after the hearing would be entirely within my own discretion, or as my conscience dictates."

Is that the principle to be adopted? Is that the principle approved by the house in regard to the conduct of the proceedings in the house and in committee? If I am to sit on any war expenditures committee, or any other committee, I for one would like to know what is meant when it is said that we may hold or shall hold our meetings in camera. Does that mean that I may be the sole judge, according to the dictates of my conscience, of what I shall reveal to the outside world? Surely that is not the position? Surely that is not the principle to guide us in our deliberations in the house? If so, then I for one will not be a party to sitting in any committee held in camera.

I admire the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). He certainly had that idea, namely, that when he sat in a committee "in camera" he could not discuss or reveal any of the information he obtained therein. He said, in effect, "I will refuse to sit in the committee when it is sitting in camera, because my mouth would be sealed with regard to any information disclosed therein".

Mr. GOLDING: That was his opinion.

Mr. EDWARDS: The amendment proposes in effect and in fact that the house shall reverse the decision made by the committee itself, the committee to which it gave full judisdiction and control as to the method in which it would conduct its proceedings. I for one would disapprove, on principle, any such proceeding by the house, not alone for the very high ground taken by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), namely, that international relationships may be affected, but on what to my way of thinking is an equally high ground, namely, our own national security, and the honour and integrity of our own membership.

It does seem to me that if no rule is laid down we shall never get anywhere, in so far as having any effective work done by these committees is concerned. I suggest that this afternoon we have been more concerned with personalities and personal reputations than with the object for which these committees were set up. If we were to view the work of these committees objectively rather than subjectively, and not in so far as the reputation of individuals is concerned, I submit that there would be little or no discussion about the report. I for one deplore the fact that it was found necessary to move concurrence in these reports. I certainly would not have expected the leader of the C.C.F. group or any of his supporters to vote concurrence in that report. Why? Because the report refers specifically to charges made by him and his personal reputation for probity and maybe honesty is involved in this report.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a question of privilege. It has been said several times to-day that my personal integrity, my personal honour and my personal probity are involved in this report and that I am on trial. I was a member of that committee which inquired into aluminum, not into me personally. Had that happened, the investigation would have taken an entirely different line. While I am on my feet may I say that as far as the evidence is concerned I believe now that it has to be tabled. The speech I made last night was on the report, not on the evidence, as I can show by the documentation of everything I said.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I draw to the hon. member's attention the paragraph from which I quoted, to be found on page 703 of Hansard. The hon. member said:

> I submit that I have used the figures and the evidence given to the committee and quoted in the report before the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: And quoted in the report before the house.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, but I ask the hon. member to listen to his next statement:

> "I have also, in a very few particulars, referred to the evidence which was given in the committee."

Not in the report.

Mr. COLDWELL: But I did not quote it.

Mr. EDWARDS: You referred to it.

Mr. COLDWELL: You will find in the public records the statement I referred to last night.

Mr. EDWARDS: I leave it to any fair person to draw his own conclusion in regard to that. The third report, under the heading "Genesis of Inquiry" states:

> The necessity for the inquiry arose as a result of certain statements or allegations made in the House of Commons by Mr. M. J. Coldwell, M.P.—

Mr. COLDWELL: Was that in the order of reference?

Mr. EDWARDS: This is in the opening paragraph of the committee's report.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not in the terms of reference and I oppose that sentence.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am only stating what the report states.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is why I am opposing it.

Mr. EDWARDS: I continue:

—leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, and particularly on June 14, 1943.

Then the allegations are set out. The conclusions of the report contain the following paragraph:

For these reasons set out in the foregoing report your subcommittee finds that none of the allegations is substantiated by the facts.

I submit that the opening and the conclusion of that report are offensive to the hon. member, and they should be. I further submit that the committee did something that it should not have done. It dignified the hon. member's allegations and gave them prominence to which they were not entitled. If that practice is adopted every private member will be able to rise in his place and make some allegation, true or untrue, and perforce it will be sent to one or another of these committees for investigation and approval or disapproval of the allegation. That individual or the party to which he belongs would be the matter in issue rather than that which is the main function for which these committees were set up, namely, the investigation and report on what economies may be effected Surely these committees were not set up to vindicate or discredit an individual's reputation or allegations. As I conceived it, and as I believe was understood by all members of this house, and as is stated in the terms of reference, these committees were set up to examine expenditures defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services and for other services directly connected with the war. Their job was to report not what they found, but to report what, if any, economy could be effected. Their job was not to prove or disprove any charge made by a member of this house or by somebody outside or to justify or discredit the position taken by any individual or group.

A minister of the crown has given his solemn undertaking to Great Britain and Australia, and possibly to the United States, that this evidence would not be divulged to the public, and to take this action would be to accomplish a breach of his obligation. It would also be a breach of the undertaking expressed or implied to every man who appeared before the committee to give evidence.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Does the hon. member think the witnesses who appeared before the committee would not have told the truth if the sittings had been open sittings?

Mr. EDWARDS: That is a matter of opinion for my hon. friend to answer in his way and for me to answer in my way. If you will produce the witness and let me examine him I shall form an opinion. As I say, it is purely a matter of opinion whether certain individuals will tell the truth under a given set of circumstances.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I consider it to be a reflection upon the witnesses and I think it is also a reflection on our house and this parliament when it is said that we cannot get honest evidence from witnesses who appear before a committee set up by this parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS: No one even suggests that. Does the hon. member suggest that every witness who appeared before the committee told nothing but the truth and the whole truth?

Mr. GRAYDON: You have to assume that, do you not?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not think you have to assume that. None of them was sworn.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was none of the witnesses sworn?

Mr. EDWARDS: No; I have not heard of any.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Yes, they were sworn.

Mr. GRAYDON: If they were not, it would be a strange thing.

Mr. EDWARDS: I for one, Mr. Speaker, would be glad to have the direction of some wise person, from yourself, as to what the term "in camera" means as used in the records and proceedings of this house. I have found in the parliamentary debates of the British House of Commons, under date of May 21, 1941, that the very same question arose, and with your permission, sir, I should like to refer to page 1541 thereof, where before the house Sir H. Williams rose in his place and said:

On a point of order, I should like your guidance, sir, in a matter which affects myself incidentally, and a number of other members of the select committee on national expenditure.

The very same committee in the British house that we are now discussing in the Canadian house. He went on:

> There is to be a supply debate to-day in which I am hoping to take part. Our evidence is taken in secret and is not published. When a member of a select committee takes part in a debate, I assume that he should confine himself to matters on which reports have already been presented to parliament, and that it would be improper to deal with matters which have come before him in evidence on which a report has not been presented. It would be helpful to members of the select committee if you would give some guidance.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that that is the case here, namely, that evidence which has been given secretly cannot be divulged; and I submit that that is the rule which does and should apply in so far as this house and its committees are concerned with reference to proceedings in camera.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish for a few moments to refer to the text of the resolution setting up the war expenditures committee and to the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) to the motion for concurrence. When the hon. member for Danforth moved his amendment, as reported at page 707 of Hansard, on February 21, he referred to the appointment of the war expenditures committee in 1941, the first year it was appointed, and to its reappointment in 1942, when there was a long debate in the house on the text of the resolution setting up the committee. I objected at that time to the text of the resolution; for I felt, in view of the statements made in the house by the government, that the committee when appointed would have its hands tied behind its back, having being committed to the exact text of the resolution, which prevented the committee from deciding on questions of government policy such as those to which the hon. member for Danforth referred.

Talk about giving comfort to the enemy! Why, Mr. Speaker, the enemy knows all about it; there is no doubt about that. I read the record of the debates of congress at Washington which I receive almost every day, and there they have an extensive debate on the cost of power, the aluminum deal, the work of United States companies in Canada, the large capital expenditures made by these companies here in peace and war, the development of the national resources, and so forth. All these matters have been discussed publicly. Nobody wants to give comfort to the enemy. There is not a member on this side of the house who wants to do anything except help the government to carry on the war effort as long as it is doing so efficiently.

Addressing myself to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Danforth, I wish to quote what I said on March 5, 1941, as reported at page 1259 of Hansard when I predicted and objected to the very state of affairs that has come about in this war expenditure committee, which reminds me almost of the committee of one hundred. The committee seems to have turned itself into a Tower of Babel. It is purely a partisan committee. I predicted just what would happen in the remarks I made in the house on March 5, 1941, in view of the text of the resolution appointing the war expenditure committee of that year. I said then, as reported at page 1259 of Hansard:

> I have already expressed the hope in this house that this committee will not be in any sense a whitewashing committee but will deal thoroughly with Canada's war effort. I hope it will consider the whole war effort, not from any partisan point of view but for the purpose of letting the people know the real facts with regard to what Canada is doing, and be in effect a fact-finding committee. If the committee is intended to be a business committee, appointed to go over all expenditures incurred since the war—expenditures past and current—in connection with defence and all that sort of thing, very well and good. But I hope that the committee when appointed will cover all the ground and will see to it that the Canadian people are given the real facts about our war effort.

I added that I hoped the committee would see to it that the Canadian people would get value for their money. That has not been done. What happened at the first meeting of the committee? They passed a resolution that the committee had nothing to do with past war expenditures. In other words, as the mover of the amendment, the hon. member for Danforth, showed, and as I said in 1941, the committee just holds postmortems on war expenditures. That is all it does. It has nothing to do with government policy.

In further support of the amendment I wish to read one or two other paragraphs from the remarks I made when speaking of an appointment of the committee on war expenditures in 1941. I said, at page 1257 of Hansard of March 5, 1941:

> What is the object of having a select committee if it is going to have its hands tied behind its back through the failure of the government to give it the power which any committee should have in order to function properly regarding war expenditures, manpower, recruiting, munitions and overseas policies?
> I notice by the explanation which the Prime Minister gave of the resolution last night that the committee has no power to go into any question of government policy.

Then what is the use of the committee? I went on to say, at page 1258:

So far as this war is concerned the committee will have its hands tied behind its back because it has no power to deal with any question of government policy regarding the war. . . . My second point is this. The government has decided that it is to be the tutor, custodian and guardian of the committee.

And so the government is, when it refuses to allow the evidence to be produced upon which the committee's report is based. I continued:

The committee is not to be allowed to do anything but what the government allows it to do. The government will decide, so far as its war efforts is concerned what information shall be kept secret and what not.

I went on to object to the lack of parliamentary control.

The men who have been nominated to the committee are all good men. I have served on the committees with some of them, but they have failed to carry out their functions, the majority of them who are government members, because their hands have been tied by the government of the day so that they cannot decide questions of government policy.

The aluminum transaction in which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is particularly interested was investigated at Washington by a committee, and the newspapers of the United States were full of all the ins and outs of this particular deal. The enemy could have found out all about it from the newspapers of the United States. As I see it, Mr. Speaker, we owe a duty to our allies in this war in reference to these war contracts. Somebody will have to pay for them some time, and after the war there will be a demand for the payment of war debts by the various nations of the allies. There is no doubt that objection will then be raised to some of these contracts and accounts as excessive. For that reason I think it would be advisable to adopt the amendment of the hon. member for Danforth and table all the evidence. In this war so far we have made one fatal mistake. We have surrendered too much financial, political, military and economical control and initiative over these expenditures for war to Washington, and surrendered too much power and initiative in a military sense as well.

The people of Canada are paying for this war, and they should have something to say about it. Three hundred years ago a civil war was fought in England—for what? To gain control of expenditures. If this is the best we can do in the way of running a secret war expenditures committee, the sooner the committee is abolished the better. It would be preferable to appoint five business men. I do not criticize the members because I believe they are bound by the text of the resolution and it is very difficult for them to do their duty. But as Burke said long ago, when a man becomes a member of parliament he is not a member for his constituency, he is a member for the whole country. He should be here to protect the taxpayer, the man who to-day is groaning under the heavy debt of the war—a large part of which expenditure, as I observe in connection with the war appropriation bill, in fact about one-third, is really not for the war at all. Recently the chairman of the war expenditures committee of Great Britain spent about a week here. A number of hon. members saw and conferred with him, as I myself did. I read the British Hansard and know something of the reports of their expenditures committee since the war started. I find that they conduct their business in a wholly different way. Under our system, the auditor general has no control over the war appropriation bill. The government has appointed what they call a comptroller of the treasury, and as long as he finds that the accounts which this expenditures committee are investigating are within the four corners and the five subsections of that bill he has to put upon them the stamp of his approval. I contend that there is wide dissatisfaction through the country with the work that the war expenditures committee has done and left undone. That is the view of the business men to whom I have talked; they are asking why we stand for this thing; and history is going to condemn this parliament for the haphazard manner in which this three or four billion dollars a year is being spent and the dead hand of the treasury. I repeat that a good part of it has nothing to do with the war at all.

Hon. members who belong to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are trying to persuade the country that they are the only people who have supported the policy of protecting our natural resources in respect of light, power and transportation. In this they are not altogether correct, because those of us on this side of the house have supported in season and out of season the principle of developing our natural resources in light, heat and power for the benefit of the people.

Regarding other clauses of the agreement, I fail to see why any member of this house has a right to go to the United States and give an opinion on contracts of this kind, because after all the defence of Canada regulations apply to us as well as to our constituents. I have no objection at times to any member going over there. I believe, however, having looked into the agreement and the text of it, that some of the provisoes were improvident.

No doubt the agreement was entered into at an acute stage of the war, and of course Ottawa had nothing to do with the power angle and huge cost of it, which is controlled by Quebec, who had already arranged the terms and created a private monopoly in power.

I believe it would be better if the government disclosed all the evidence herein and the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth about what is in the evidence. I saw and read some of the testimony given in Washington, and I may say I could find nothing in it which would help the enemy, who knows it all anyway.

I believe the people want the facts. If we are to have a war expenditures committee, let us have one which will not do any whitewashing but will let the people know the whole truth about the conduct of the war. In this respect I believe the committee has failed. and I hope that before the house closes this year some other system will be adopted whereby war expenditures accounts will be looked into more carefully and under a really modern system, with a view to protecting the taxpayer. Let it never be forgotten that it is the taxpayer who is paying for the war.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the war expenditures committee I wish to say a word or two on the amendment at this stage of the discussion. It is not my purpose to deal at any great length with the amendment because I hope that I may have the privilege of speaking later on when the motion itself comes before the house. As a member of that committee, however, I am and have been, surprised at many of the speeches that were made in the house this afternoon. I cannot help coming to the conclusion that the amendment itself is somewhat beclouded. To my way of thinking there are in the amendment before the house two issues and they have caused different speeches to be given by various members, and particularly members on the opposition side.

There is a great deal of room for argument as to why the proceedings of the war expenditures committee should be in camera or in secret, and I shall have a word to say regarding the words "in camera" and "secret" in a moment or two. But surely after the war expenditures committee has, by deliberation, decided to hold its meetings in camera and after we have had the various officials and high authorities before us and they were told by the chairman of the committee, acquiesced in by every member of the committee, that they were speaking to us in secret and off the public record, I am just wondering how members of the opposition side who sat on that committee and gave that assurance to those officials can now support, tacitly at least if not openly, the demand that all the information and all the evidence be now tabled.

The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) dealt this afternoon with the tabling of evidence from the point of view of giving assurance to Great Britain, Australia and other countries that the evidence submitted to the committee would be in camera or in secret. I am speaking to-night as a member of the committee who gave his assurance and his word, tacitly it is true, to those witnesses that they were to speak to us in confidence and in secret. While I realize it is every man's right to settle what he himself will do—he is the keeper of his own conscience—yet I for one am not going to be a party to going back on my word. I want that known clearly and distinctly. I want no accusations made that I am doing it because I belong to the Liberal party. When I have an opportunity to speak on the main motion I intend to deal particularly with my own stand in regard to it and perhaps with the stand of other members, but at the moment I am speaking to the amendment.

This afternoon the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) challenged any member of the committee to rise in his place and say if the evidence were produced on the floor of the house or made available to the public it would injure our war effort. As hon. members know I was on subcommittee No. 1. That subcommittee dealt particularly with the building of ships, both naval and cargo. I, therefore, was not a member of the committee which deliberated on aluminum and I am not in a position to know all the evidence or the assurances given by the members who dealt with that subject. But I do know this, and so does every hon. member who sat on the subcommittee, that there was evidence given to that committee in secret, and I ask hon. members who were on the committee to put to themselves this question before they vote when they are speaking about tabling the evidence before the entire membership of the house, or making it available to the public by placing it before the public accounts committee. Evidence was given us as to the number of landing barges, the number of Algerines, the number of mine-sweepers and the number of other naval vessels. Admiral Stevens appeared before that committee, and no member of the committee, to my knowledge was interfered with in any way at that time. Everyone of us was permitted to ask of Admiral Stevens any question he liked. Are we going to ask now, Mr. Speaker, that all the evidence relating to naval ships, where they were built, the speed of them, the armament and all other matters pertaining to them, should be placed before the public accounts committee—and just on the eve of an invasion? Take the number of landing barges; that was given to us in secret. Is this House of Commons going to demand that the number of landing barges, the make, shape and size, cost and where built, be revealed to the country at large? I say to you, Mr. Speaker, if that situation applies you can rule me out of that committee. I will not sit on it any longer. I am not going to be a party to that; and I repeat I do not want any accusations made that I am doing so because I am a member of the Liberal party.

Then we had information given to us as to the number of Canadian merchant ships in existence compared with the number that Australia, New Zealand and South Africa had. Are we going to reveal that? Is that what the opposition wants? In addition to that we had a man come before us who is in charge of the Park Steamship company. Before he gave his evidence he asked us if it was in secret and he was told it was. Then he told us the number of ships at sea. He told us where those ships were going, the ports they sailed from. He told us the number that had been sunk. Are we going to place that before the public accounts committee? That is what the amendment means.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, it does.

Mr. REID: I am placing it squarely before the members of this house. Do not let us confuse the issue. If we are asking the committee to sit openly let us argue that way, but if we are arguing now that all of the evidence be made public after each and every member has given his word that it would be kept secret, then I for one will do the utmost I can to defeat the amendment.

Mr. B. M. HILL (Charlotte): As a member of subcommittee No. 1, the shipbuilding committee of the war expenditures committee, I wish to place before the house my views on the amendment. Some of the matters which I had intended to place before the house have already been dealt with by the previous speaker, and I agree with everything he has said. Forty-three witnesses were called before our committee. Each and every one of those witnesses, before he gave evidence, was assured that the evidence would be given in secret and that he could speak freely; that any evidence which was given would be used only in making a report to the government, and would not be given publicity. Each and every member of the committee gave his assent to that undertaking, and that the evidence should be given in that way. It has been said in this house that much of the evidence given would not give comfort to the enemy I agree with that. In fact the evidence given before our committee dealt largely with the marvellous production of naval ships and merchant ships by Canada in her war effort. That certainly would not give comfort to the enemy. As, however, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) said, there was a good deal of other evidence which would certainly give comfort to the enemy and might be detrimental to the war effort of this country. As he said, we were told where all these merchant ships were going, the ports between which they were plying, and practically the dates of sailing. We were told when they might sail. Could that evidence be given to the public and the press? Not at all.

I agree that if you wish to debate the question whether evidence should be given in secret or in camera that is a matter of argument, but we should abide by the decision of the house. And after the house has decided that evidence shall be given in camera, then I submit that hon. members have no right to demand that the evidence be tabled.

I am surprised that a member of the house should move such an amendment. I do not believe that the hon. member who moved it realized its implications. I would ask him to reconsider the amendment and to withdraw his motion. I am sure that if he carefully considers the implications of the amendment he will withdraw it and not ask for a vote on it.

When I pledged my word to these witnesses, that the evidence they were giving was being given in secret, I gave that word with the understanding that it would be honoured. I believe that a man's word is still of some value, and I say to hon. members who sat on the committee that each of them is in the same position. I do not believe that they can possibly vote for this amendment after having so pledged their word. I say further that the amendment implies that if the members of the house vote for it they are violating the moral obligation given by a committee set up by this honourable house and composed of honourable members of the house, and that to my mind is a very serious matter.

I call on the members of the house, if this question goes to a vote, to weigh it very carefully, realizing exactly what they are voting for. I ask them to realize that they are simply voting to violate a moral obligation given by an honourable committee of this house set up by this honourable assembly.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I did not intend to say anything on this amendment, but since the two previous speakers have addressed the house in the way they have done I cannot help taking part in the discussion. They have tried to tell the house that this amendment means that we are going to spoil the war effort. My hon. friend nods his head.

Mr. HILL: You are violating a moral obligation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member must know that the amendment simply means that evidence taken regarding expenditures that are out of proportion to anything reasonable should be tabled.

An hon. MEMBER: All the evidence.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Hon. members may say "all the evidence," but they know that everyone must use a little bit of discretion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no discretion in the amendment.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The government themselves have introduced motions that one could pick holes in, but I submit that this amendment is one that should be carried. I will tell the house why. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) said last night:

> My hon. friend can move for the return of any of this material he wants which would bring it quite within the discussion of the house.

I do not know whether he was speaking with authority; I doubt whether he was. But if he was, then I should like to read to the house a motion I had on the order paper of February 11, No. 4. It was an order of the house for a return showing cost of materials, cost of labour, amount of overhead cost, of each ship of 10,350-ton class and of the 4,700-ton class constructed since the beginning of the war in, first, the government-owned yards and secondly privately owned yards. This motion was dropped. I submit that the taxpayers are entitled to know where their money is going and I am sure that if the hon. members who have spoken were in our position instead of on the government side they would demand the same thing and hammer their desks, as they often do, in support of their claim.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Halton, who was chairman last year, speaks with authority, but he may, because I notice that the other night he evidently spoke for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I have here a clipping dated February 18, 1944, from the Toronto Telegram:

> M.P. promises sixty per cent tax cut as war ends. Sixty per cent reduction in taxation immediately after the war if the King government remains in power was pledged last night by Hughes Cleaver, M.P. for Halton and chairman of the House of Commons war expenditures committee.

The hon. member went on to say this:

> In spite of the fact that I represent the most unpopular government in the world, I am going to suggest some things that we plan to do.

I do not believe that the taxpayers of Canada know how the war expenditures committee was set up. The government members are trying to make it appear that there was an absolutely even distribution among the members of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Oh, yes, you are. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, it was absolutely lopsided, because the opposition had very few members on the committee—four out of twenty-four.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You did not elect enough.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is not a fair democratic thing to do.

Mr. HOMUTH: The distribution of ability was much more even.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When hon. members say that since it was in camera the evidence should not be brought forward, the amendment means that when expenditures are made and there are millions of dollars spent for ships—I am going to say for ships, because that is what we have been dealing with—we should know something about it. Millions more have been spent than should have been spent. One firm, I believe, spent six or seven hundred thousand dollars more than another firm. I know we had to have the ships, but I honestly think the people should know why one firm can get six or seven hundred thousand dollars more for building a ship than another firm, and for exactly the same type of ship. Why should wages be lumped, and material the same way, in the building of a ship? I do not think hon. members who talk about secrecy have put it before the house in just the way it should have been put.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am a very simple man—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ADAMSON: —but not as simple as the government thinks, and I represent about a hundred thousand similarly simple and direct-minded people. The charge has been made, as I see it, that the Aluminum Company of Canada produced aluminum for between eight and nine cents a pound, and sold it for twenty-one cents. That is the inescapable conclusion one can draw from what has been said. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has made these direct and specific charges. They have not been refuted by the government.

The government makes one charge and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar makes another. Unless the report and the evidence are tabled, we are going to have a continuation of this debate from now on. It is going to take place on every public platform in Canada from Halifax to Vancouver.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is that a threat?

Mr. ADAMSON: It has to be settled; either the government is right and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is wrong, or the government is whitewashing the aluminum company. I do not know; I am not on the committee. But it appears to me that in the argument of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon he was employing the holier-than-thou tactics he employed against Byng in 1926, where a report was coming up that was going to be unfavourable to the country, and he wanted to kill that report before it was given publicity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And the people backed him up.

Mr. HOMUTH: Backed who up?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Prime Minister.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, they have not had a chance yet.

Mr. ADAMSON: The same tactics were being employed this afternoon in the house. Apparently there is nothing in the evidence particularly secret or likely to give aid or comfort to the enemy, and furthermore I understand that the majority of the statements were sufficiently documented in the report itself. I wish to warn the people—and I am speaking directly to the amendment—that either we get the evidence in this case, or the government must stand accused, without answer, of whitewashing this company. I do not believe the government has done so, but unless we do get that evidence I shall be forced to accept that conclusion.

One thing more. Shortly we shall have a discussion as to the relative costs of the production of ships. What is correct I am unable to say, and the country is unable to say. The charge has been made that the cost of ships was away out of proportion in the government plant. We have to have the whole evidence on those cases. The people of Canada are not interested in tortuous legal arguments, or whether discussions were in camera or in secret. They want to know whether the money they are spending in taxation is properly spent. They want to know whether the arms, vehicles and equipment we are sending our troops are good arms, good vehicles and good equipment—and that is all they care.

The government has to make that point clear, and it cannot make it clear if the report is not tabled. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The report is tabled.

Mr. ADAMSON: The evidence, I should have said. This is one of the most serious charges which has been made. Either this committee is set up purely as a means of covering up, or it is a committee set up to serve the interests of the Canadian people. The government will have to make the decision and it will have to make that decision fairly soon.

PAIRS

(The list of pairs is furnished by the chief whips.)

Messrs:

Stirling	Ralston
Aylesworth	Howe

Mr. SENN: I was paired with the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. STIRLING: I was paired with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). Had I voted I would have supported the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Mr. R. H. McGREGOR (York East): Mr. Speaker, I was called to order last night for referring to the evidence, and I suppose I shall not be able to speak about the evidence to-night. My remarks will therefore be brief. I believe it will be quite in order for me to refer to what is in the report itself.

I wish to refer to a statement in the Globe and Mail of yesterday morning which the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), insinuated, as I understood it, had been given to that paper by a member of the committee. But what was contained in the Globe and Mail is contained in the report itself. So that I do not see how the hon. member could take it for granted that any member of the committee divulged the information to the Globe and Mail.

I asked the hon. gentleman yesterday, when he made the statement that it had been agreed upon by the British and Canadian governments that the price of 10,000-ton boats on the Pacific coast should be $1,825,000 and on the St. Lawrence $1,760,000, whether that had been carried out, and his answer was yes. I would ask the hon. gentleman what he has to say about the contract that was let to a contractor in the province of Quebec for $60,000 more than the $1,825,000 and $125,000 more than contracts were supposed to be let for on the St. Lawrence. That is one question he can answer.

It has been said that $300,000 per boat was the saving made when the contracts were cancelled and everything was put on a cost-plus basis. I should like to know how they figure that out. According to the report of the committee, the price of these boats was $2,046,000.

An hon. MEMBER: What boats?

Mr. McGREGOR: The 10,000-ton boats. The price of the boats built on the coast was $1,422,000. That is a difference of $624,000. If you allow the contractor $50,000 profit on the boat, the price was $574,000 higher than it should have been. Yet in spite of the fact that the contract was approximately $575,000 higher than it should have been, they say they saved $300,000 per boat.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is kind of backhanded figuring.

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member misquoted what he said yesterday and what I said yesterday in reply to him. I submit that I have the right to read the question and answer which appears at page 697 of Hansard.

Mr. McGREGOR: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will go ahead and quote what he said yesterday.

Mr. CLEAVER: Here is the question and answer:

Mr. McGregor: Was that carried out at the price the hon. member mentioned a few moments ago, both on the Pacific coast and on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. Cleaver: The answer is yes.

And, Mr. Speaker, the answer is still yes. The figures to which my hon. friend is referring—

Mr. HOMUTH: Order. The hon. member can make a speech another time.

Mr. ROWE: He can make his own speech later.

Mr. CLEAVER: The figures—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I must point out that he is merely making a contradiction, and I think that is all that is necessary.

Mr. CLEAVER: It is a misquotation of the report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It affects the privileges of this house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLEAVER: Your Honour, if I may, I have referred to the question of privilege and read from Hansard. I am now stating that the hon. member has misquoted the committee's report. The figures which the hon member has quoted are the actual cost figures, and in the one yard in question where the ships cost—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLEAVER: —$1,969,000, that yard made a loss.

Mr. ROWE: That is not a question of privilege; that is a speech, which you should make later.

Mr. CLEAVER: No; it is a misrepresentation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman states that he is raising a question of privilege. There is no privilege; it is a matter of fact; and in this connection I would read the following excerpt from Beauchesne, page 54:

111. If a member desires to ask a question during debate, he should first obtain the consent of the member who is speaking. If the latter ignores the request, the former cannot insist, even if he thinks he is being misrepresented. He cannot make a denial during the speech, but he must wait until the member has resumed his seat and then he may ask leave to make a statement, or he must wait until his turn comes, to address the house. Standing order 12 is compulsory. No one has a right to interrupt a member who is addressing the house, by putting a question to him or by making or demanding an explanation. A member may allow interruptions through a sense of courtesy, but it is entirely at his option to give way or not to an immediate explanation. The Speaker in the United Kingdom house has warned a member that if he continued disorderly interruptions, he would name him as disregarding the authority of the Chair. On the 24th May, 1881, a member persisting in disorderly interruptions was named by the Speaker, whereupon a motion was made that the member be suspended from the service of the house.

Mr. ROWE: He should have known that, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. With all due respect to Your Honour, you have absolutely misconstrued the entire suggestion by the hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I wish those howling dervishes of the Tory party would keep quiet while I state my point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: The Speaker has given his ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am rising to a new question.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not debatable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no Tory who ever lived will make me sit down.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Speaker's ruling is not debatable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not speaking to Mr. Speaker's ruling; I am speaking to a new point entirely.

Mr. ROWE: Is the minister taking exception to the ruling? It is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is rising to a point of order, and he is entitled to state his point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: Your ruling is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a question of the ruling. I want to hear the point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The position taken by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) was not a point of order; it was a question affecting the privilege of this parliament, and I so state now. I say that if any hon. member misquotes any report of this parliament or any report of a committee of this parliament, it is a matter affecting the privilege of every single member of parliament, and the hon. member has every right in the world to explain thoroughly the actual facts of the report. Hon. members know I am right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: Go into your foxhole.

Mr. ROWE: Nobody should know better than you.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has stated what he says is a point of order. I do not agree that it is a point of order. I repeat what I have already read:

If a member desires to ask a question during debate, he should first obtain the consent of the member who is speaking. If the latter ignores the request, the former cannot insist, even if he thinks he is being misrepresented. He cannot make a denial during the speech, but he must wait until the member has resumed his seat and then he may ask leave to make a statement, or he must wait until his turn comes, to address the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I say another word, Mr. Speaker? This is not a question of—

Mr. STIRLING: Order. Mr. Speaker is on his feet. Have you any manners?

Mr. ROWE: Out of order again!

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish the house would come to order. This is a serious matter. The hon. member stated that he rose on a question of privilege. I have not noticed, nor do I recognize that it was a question of privilege he was raising.

Mr. ROWE: Nobody thought so but himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: He has a right to make a correction in the manner I have stated. When the hon. member who is speaking resumes his seat, he may then ask leave to make a statement, or he must wait until his turn comes, to address the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I say another word?

Mr. SPEAKER: No. I have given my ruling.

Mr. ROWE: You are through.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) may continue his speech.

Mr. McGREGOR: I regret to have raised the temper of my hon. friend, but I just wish to clear up this point as to whether I was right or wrong. The hon. member for Halton said that that was the cost price of the boat. What I did say was that the cost price of that boat was, on the coast, $1,825,000.

Mr. CLEAVER: You said, the contract price.

Mr. McGREGOR: And I said that the contract price of the boats being built on the coast by the Burrard Dry Dock Company was four hundred thousand odd dollars.

Mr. GOLDING: No, a million.

Mr. McGREGOR: After giving them a fee of $50,000 on each boat. Then the difference on the boat was—I have it some place here—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McGREGOR: The difference was $574,000 on a boat. That is what I said. That is right, and I will defy the hon. gentleman to contradict it.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am prepared and will be pleased to contradict it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member, I submit in all charity, is hopelessly confused.

Mr. HOMUTH: We do not want any of your charity.

Mr. CLEAVER: There are two things involved in this report, and my hon. friend has simply confused them.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Surely the hon. member has no right to make a speech.

Mr. CLEAVER: I was asked to, and I will make it very short.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member was not asked to.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) who has just spoken made a statement and challenged the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) to contradict his statement.

Mr. CLEAVER: There are two factors. One is the contract price at which these ships were to be built, and the contract price on the west coast was fixed at some $1,800,000, and on the east coast at a little lower amount.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are just as confused as he is. You do not know the figures either.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Abide your answers.

Mr. CLEAVER: What has confused my hon. friend is this, that in the report the committee has indicated the actual cost to two shipbuilding firms of building these ships. The cost to one firm was $1,399,000. That firm made a very substantial profit, more than it should have made. The cost to the other firm, as mentioned in the report, was $1,969,000, and that firm made a loss. That is all there is to it.

Mr. McGREGOR: Of all the arguments that have ever been put forward in this house that is the stupidest. It is all right for the chairman of the committee to try to draw a red herring across the trail, but he is not going to get away with it. I spent a couple of months on this boat-building business. I want the hon. gentleman to understand that I know as much about these boats, or a little more than he does, and I still say that the difference between the high and low is $624,000. I defy him to contradict me, and he can get up on his feet again if he likes.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, I have tried my best to explain to my hon. friend so that he will understand it.

Mr. ROWE: You do not understand it yourself.

Mr. CLEAVER: Perhaps I ought to read to him paragraph 2 of the committee's report. It will be found on page 773, of Votes and Proceedings of January 26, 1944:

> The most nearly comparable costs your committee could get were those for a ship delivered in July/August 1942 from each of eight yards and these costs ran from a low of $1,399,000 to a high of $1,969,000.

That is not the contract price; that is the actual cost of the company building the ship. The second company, where the cost was $1,969,000, made a loss. It was higher than the contract price.

Mr. McGREGOR: Are you reading from page 773?

Mr. CLEAVER: Yes.

Mr. McGREGOR: Well, now, I shall read from page 773. The $1,422,000 is the low. If the hon. gentleman will look at the paragraph above the one he is reading he will find the following:

> . . . going all the way from $1,422,000 to $2,046,000 for the 10,350-ton ship. . . .

I come back again to the difference of $624,000 and, as I said before, give the people who built the boat a profit of $50,000 and the boat is still $574,000 too high. The hon. member had better sit down for a little while because I think his blood pressure is up a little. There is more than that to the matter. That is not the full cost of the boat. There is no depreciation in that. There are yards in this country building boats in which there should be $135,000 to $140,000 depreciation added to the cost of the boats. Then they tell you they are building boats at a reasonable price. I say there are some yards in this country that deserve credit for the work they have done, but no credit has been given to them. I think we should just go over the list now and tell the people and the hon. members of this house those who are building the boats at a reasonable price and those who are not.

Mr. CLEAVER: I object.

Mr. SPEAKER: Are the boats the hon. member is referring to contained in the report that is now before the house?

Mr. McGREGOR: I am afraid they are not, Mr. Speaker. We shall continue with something that is contained in the report. The report states that this committee went into costs comparable with those of the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. CLEAVER: Page, please?

Mr. ROWE: You do not need the page; read it to-morrow.

Mr. McGREGOR: It speaks of an agreement made and the price agreed on by the British government. That was, as I said before, $1,760,000 on the St. Lawrence and $1,825,000 on the coast. It was said that the cost in Britain was $1,100,000. As a matter of fact the Trueman report says the cost in Britain was $800,000.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, I understood your ruling was that the hon. member must confine his remarks within the four corners of the report, must confine himself to figures given in the report. I understand he is now quoting from some British figures.

Mr. ROWE: You made the same speech twice. Do not interrupt him again.

Mr. McGREGOR: I do not suppose we are going to get very many ships built to-night, and I shall not be able to quote any evidence. I wish to say to the house that shipbuilding in most of the privately owned yards is a credit to this country. But I say further that in regard to any yard that the government have anything to do with, in regard to any yard that the government control, I cannot find words to express myself; therefore, I will say it is bad, and they know it. In spite of that they draw a red herring across the trail. They say they do not want to table the report on the aluminum company. It is not the aluminum company. They know what it is; it is the shipbuilding company's report that they do not want to table. They know they dare not do it. I ask the house to investigate the Toronto Shipbuilding company. I ask the house to investigate Marine Industries. This company got a contract that was supposed to be for $1,760,000. In spite of the fact they say that the agreement was made between the British government and the Canadian company and that the price would be so much on the St. Lawrence and so much here, the price on the St. Lawrence was let to this particular firm for $60,000 more per boat than the price set by the government.

Mr. CLEAVER: Page?

Mr. McGREGOR: Let them investigate Burrard's. Burrard's have done wonderful work. At the start of the war the government laid down a policy—and I think a resolution was passed in the house—that no firm could make more than five per cent. Let them check into that. Let them tell the people that Burrard's made a profit of thirty-seven per cent on one batch of boats and twenty-three per cent profit on another. Let them tell the people something about the Yarrow's contract. We know it.

Mr. CLEAVER: Your Honour, once again the hon. member is deliberately transgressing your ruling. I do not want to weary the house by constantly objecting. He knows better than that.

Mr. McGREGOR: It must be worrying you.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The government must be proud of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member said that he would discuss only what was in the report, not the evidence. I do not find in the report any reference to what he is now stating.

Mr. CLEAVER: There is not any such evidence.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why worry about whether he is referring to evidence?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may continue, but he must deal, as he said, with what is contained in the report.

[Mr. McGregor.]

Mr. McGREGOR: Mr. Speaker, I have been called to order again. I do not see anything fair in this thing at all. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) spoke yesterday for forty minutes and, as I said yesterday, I venture to say that ninety per cent of the speech he made was taken from the evidence; yet I cannot say anything about the evidence. Probably I can say something about what I know. Everybody knows that they are building boats at the Yarrow yards in British Columbia. I should like the chairman of the committee to explain the contract with the Yarrow yard. I should like the chairman of the committee to explain the contract for the building of 4,700-ton boats in the Foundation Maritime Limited yard at Pictou.

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member has asked me to explain—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. ROWE: He did not ask you to do it right now. You have just made one speech.

Mr. CLEAVER: Does the hon. gentleman want the explanation now or not?

Mr. ROWE: Sit down until he is through.

Mr. McGREGOR: We know the hon. gentleman is probably heading for the senate if he makes good on this job and we congratulate him if he does. However, let us take the Yarrow yard where there was a contract for $1,280,000, and they were not supposed to get a fee on that unless they earned it by quick delivery and lower costs. Well, in spite of the fact that the contract is for $1,280,000, the first boat they built cost $1,600,000 and the next one cost $1,700,000.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Where did he get those figures?

Mr. McGREGOR: From documents from the minister's own department.

Mr. HOWE: Presented through—

Mr. McGREGOR: If the minister wants to see them I will show them.

Mr. HOWE: Presented from what source?

Mr. McGREGOR: From your genial friend Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. HOWE: Appearing before the committee?

Mr. McGREGOR: Trying to catch me again?

Mr. HOWE: I just asked you a question. Suppose you tell me. I ask you this question: how did you get that? From the committee?

Mr. McGREGOR: I am making the speech.

Mr. HOWE: I ask you a question.

Mr. McGREGOR: You sit down and I will answer the question.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that my hon. friend is using confidential figures given the committee sitting in camera.

Mr. McGREGOR: I should like to know, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLEAVER: I want a ruling on the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CLEAVER: That is all right; you will not make me sit down. The hon. member is using figures which for security reasons should not be disclosed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: Security for what—the Liberal party?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Tory tactics!

Mr. CLEAVER: On several occasions I have raised the same point. The hon. member, Mr. Speaker, deliberately violates your ruling and I submit it has gone far enough.

Mr. ROWE: Beginning to hurt, is it?

Mr. CLEAVER: Not a bit.

Mr. ROWE: I think so, a little bit.

Mr. McGREGOR: We will leave the Yarrow yard, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. An hon. member has raised the point of order that the hon. gentleman who is now speaking is dealing with matters which are not contained in the report. We are confined to the report and everything that the hon. member says must be within the four corners of the report. When he is dealing with figures regarding other matters I wish he would give me the quotation showing where, in the report, the matter which he is discussing is dealt with.

Mr. McGREGOR: I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, if all the speeches that have been made in this house yesterday and to-day are within the four corners of the report, because—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman yesterday was proposing to speak along the lines he is now discussing and I told him then that he could speak only to the amendment, and that he would have more latitude when the motion came before the house. I also indicated, however, that when the motion came before the house all that could be dealt with was what was contained in the report. The hon. gentleman recognized that at the beginning in that he indicated that he would refer only to matters within the report and not to the evidence. Apparently he is now referring to matters outside the report and from documents which are not a part of the report. I will therefore ask him, when referring to matters in the report, to give me the quotation, citing the page from which he is quoting.

Mr. McGREGOR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. But as I understood yesterday, the Speaker said that we would have much more latitude if we spoke at this time than on the other motion. Be that as it may, I suppose we can speak of things about which we know, whether they are in the report or not. I wonder, would the house like to have the story about the 4,700-ton boats built in Pictou and a comparison with those built in the Davies yard. I say that this is a real scandal, to have a 4,700-ton boat in one yard costing more than a 10,350-ton boat in another yard, just because one yard is operated by the government and another by a private concern.

I will say a word or two about destroyers as mentioned in the report and then I am through. It states in the report that we are building four destroyers in this country. I should like the chairman of the committee to tell the members of this house the cost of destroyers in Canada, the cost of destroyers in Britain, when this contract was let, and when the first one will be delivered. I venture to say, sir, that unless this war lasts until 1950 the destroyers will not be delivered.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I missed the greater part of the address given by my hon. friend, but I assume from the bit he gave yesterday and the bit I heard to-day that he has been comparing costs of ships in various yards. One remark that I heard him make to-day was that costs in government shipyards were very high and costs in private shipyards were reasonable. Let me tell him that the lowest-cost shipyard we have in Canada to-day is government owned and operated.

Mr. McGREGOR: Where?

Mr. HOWE: At Montreal, the United Shipyards.

Mr. McGREGOR: Will you let me tell the story on the government shipyards in Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will sit down I will continue. We are launching 10,000-ton ships from that yard at the lowest cost of any shipyard in Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is that in the report?

Mr. HOWE: Yesterday the hon. member was comparing the cost of ships from the Port Arthur shipbuilding yard and the cost of ships from the Toronto yard. He was rather complimentary to me, because I represent Port Arthur and he represents the constituency of Toronto—

Mr. McGREGOR: Oh, no.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. McGREGOR: York East.

Mr. ROWE: You got him wrong.

Mr. HOWE: It is very close to Toronto. I believe the Port Arthur Shipbuilding company is a very efficient yard and I believe that the costs there are the lowest costs of ships which are built on the great lakes, of the type of corvettes and mine-sweepers. I believe that the labour in the Port Arthur district is as efficient as any labour that can be found in Canada. In fact, I know of no better labour anywhere, and I know the management of that yard is excellent. I agree with everything he said about the Port Arthur yard. But when he gets nearer home, I hardly think he does his subject justice. There are harsh words said about the bird that fouls its own nest, and I am afraid he has been coming very close to doing that. I will tell the house something about the Port Arthur Shipbuilding company. The Port Arthur Shipbuilding conmpany was organized in 1909. It has a dry dock; one of the most expensive, and certainly the best dry dock on the Canadian great lakes. It has a machine shop capable of building any engine that goes into the ships and corvettes that are built at that yard. It has one of the best boiler plants in Canada, and builds its own boilers. It has been building ships since 1909, and—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the minister that I have endeavoured, as far as I can, to see that the debate is carried on within the four corners of the report, so that extraneous statements will not have to be replied to by others.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is a reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the minister is making reference to the report, I would be glad to have him speak. But I must know that the matters are dealt with in the report, the matters about which he is now speaking.

Mr. HOWE: The report certainly compares the cost of ships in various shipyards. It speaks of the cost of ships at Pictou and the cost of ships at Toronto, and it certainly drew to the attention of my department matters of comparative shipbuilding costs which we have been trying to correct. I believe I am certainly within the terms of the report, and certainly in the speech by the hon. member which I heard yesterday he compared Port Arthur costs with Toronto costs. I am finishing up the analysis.

Mr. SPEAKER: If, as the minister informs me, these are matters within the report, then I accept it, and he may continue.

Mr. HOWE: They are definitely matters within the report.

I am simply saying that in Port Arthur we have a long-established shipyard with the very finest facilities. We have there men who have been building ships for a good many years, a nucleus of trained shipbuilders. I would expect that yard to do well. I am delighted that it is the best yard; but certainly it should be as good as the best, because it has better equipment than any other shipyard on the great lakes, and it has a personnel which I think is fully the equal of any other.

What is the situation at Toronto? In Toronto the yard was started on a bit of waterfront wholly undeveloped for shipbuilding purposes. Berths were built there and sheds were put up in which certain steel work could be fabricated. The equipment of that yard is not a patch to the shipyard at Port Arthur—no boiler-making facilities, no engine-making facilities, and only the crudest type of steel fabricating facilities. There were few trained shipbuilders in Toronto.

Mr. McGREGOR: On a question of privilege—

Mr. HOWE: Sit down, sit down.

Mr. McGREGOR: On a question of privilege.

Mr. HOWE: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

Mr. McGREGOR: Mr. Speaker, I made an attempt yesterday to explain the Toronto yard, and I was not allowed. If the minister has that privilege, then surely I have it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The minister is speaking to the motion; the hon. member was speaking to the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yesterday the hon. member was speaking to the amendment.

An hon. MEMBER: He does not know the difference.

Mr. HOWE: As I say, this Toronto shipyard was carved out of nothing, in the progress of this war, and the men were collected from anywhere. The number of trained shipbuilders in the Toronto yard one could count on the fingers of his two hands. It is natural, I believe, that the costs in the Toronto yard should be high. There has been no neglect on the part of the government. We have made two changes in the management of that yard, and each time for the better. We had the original contractor who bid for the ships, just as any other contractor bid for them, and was awarded the ships on the basis of being the low tenderer. He did not do well. Then we formed a crown company and put in charge of it seven of the leading businessmen of Toronto, men who I believed had the necessary business experience to carry out successfully a project of that kind. Still our costs did not come down satisfactorily, and we made another change in that management. We now have an experienced builder in charge of the yard, and I may say that the costs of the last ships are vastly better than the costs of the earlier ships. But let us admit that the costs in the Toronto shipyard are higher than the costs at Port Arthur or Collingwood or Kingston, all of which were organized yards, with a background of experience, and with some adequate equipment. What does my hon. friend wish me to do? Does he wish me to close the Toronto yard? The Toronto yard is doing the best it can. We are giving it all the support we can, to bring it in line with established yards. But let me say this—the Toronto yard has turned out a number of corvettes and mine-sweepers. Had it not been for the Toronto yard those ships would not have been afloat, and our navy would not have had them. Those are factors that we must consider. If we are to close every yard that cannot do as well as every other yard, then it means that the production of that yard cannot take part in the war.

If my hon. friend says there has been anything improper, or anyone trying to do other than his best in any yard, then he has a case against my department. But he has not suggested that. He just says the yard has not done well. But the yard has done the best it could; it has turned out a very considerable number of ships, and it has turned them out in a time of great crisis.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that as late as last February I was called to a meeting in Washington, when the problem of that day was how to get sufficient escort ships to check the submarine menace in the north Atlantic. That was one year ago to-day. I came back to Canada determined I would get the last possible ship out of our Canadian shipyards. I did not think a difference in price should be sufficient to stop my using every facility in the Dominion of Canada for that purpose.

The same situation occurs at Pictou. The Pictou yard is a high-cost yard. Why? Because it was started with no background, no trained workmen and only very limited facilities. Prior to the war there was at Pictou only a small repair yard. When the need for merchant ships became tremendously urgent those in the department who were responsible in the matter surveyed all the locations in Canada which seemed to be suitable for the expansion of our merchant-shipbuilding programme. They chose Pictou because it had a favourable location, and because there was a nucleus of trained men at that point.

The facilities were provided. We built four berths there. Here again may I say we had no dry dock and none of the facilities which surround old-established shipyards. We simply went on the beach at Pictou and scratched together four building berths. We have changed the management at Pictou because we felt the management there was not doing all it could to build the ships in the time required, with the reduction in costs that we could expect even from a yard that was using wholly untrained personnel. There again, what would my hon. friend have us do? Would he have me close Pictou because it is a high-cost yard?

Mr. McGREGOR: I never suggested that.

Mr. HOWE: It has turned out a type of ship vitally important at this time; and I can say to the house that within the last three weeks we have had most urgent cables for help in delivering 4,700-ton ships to Great Britain, urgently needed for operations within the next three or four months. Pictou has turned out practically all of the 4,700-ton ships which have been built. I think two or three were built on the St. Lawrence, two or three at Saint John, and the rest at Pictou. But we were able to supply a considerable number of 4,700-ton ships to meet those very urgent demands from the United Kingdom, and I am glad we were able to do so. I am willing to take the full responsibility for having ships built in a high-cost yard at a time when they could not be built in any other yard in Canada. We have had to build where we could; we used the facilities that were available. We have had to move into second-grade facilities when first-grade facilities were not available. If there is any tapering off in the programme we shall be able to move from second-grade facilities into good facilities. That is what we will do in shipbuilding. As long as this urgent war-time demand continues I am going to build these ships anywhere I can, and pay whatever price I must.

My hon. friend has spoken of the condition when the committee's examination was made. That was at least six or seven months ago. I can tell him that the position has improved greatly since that examination was made. I invite the committee on war expenditures to return to the same shipyards it has criticized in its last report, and examine the situation anew. I know its members will be surprised at the improvements in cost that have been effected in these yards.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then the hon. member was right.

Mr. HOWE: What is my hon. friend suggesting now?

Mr. HOMUTH: I am saying the hon. member was right in the report of six months ago.

Mr. HOWE: Did I say that he was not right? Where did this argument start? It occurs to me to wonder what the people of Canada will think of this committee, which is supposed to safeguard the treasury in the expenditure of government moneys for war. My department is doing the same work as this committee. We have an investigation branch and we investigate anything that comes in, in the nature of a complaint or criticism. We even investigate anonymous letters. Several people are in gaol to-day because of the investigations that have been carried out by my department. We are investigating continuously. We have a staff not quite as large as the membership of the committee, but that staff is engaged continuously on investigations and have been for three years. I have expected a great deal of help from this committee, and it has been a help. The investigations of the committee have acted as a spur to our people toward making sure that the situation is in hand.

Let us examine this aluminum situation. The Canadian treasury is a buyer of fabricated aluminum. Less than one million dollars worth has been bought directly by the government, and indirectly through contractors about $40,000 worth of fabricated aluminum has been bought. My officers tell me that in 1941 the results to the aluminum company showed a net profit of 3·7 per cent on sales to the dominion government and its contractors, while in 1942 there was a substantial loss on the books of the aluminum company in carrying out these contracts. These contracts do not carry an escalator clause, and the increased costs of aluminum were for the account of the aluminum company and not for the account of my department. These are the only transactions affecting the Canadian treasury in the whole aluminum company picture.

What do we find? We find that this committee has investigated the question of cartels, the question of whether the aluminum company was a member of a cartel. Does that affect the Canadian treasury? We find that it has gone into the question of government ownership as against private ownership. Does that affect the Canadian treasury? I may say that subject was looked into very carefully before we made any decision in connection with the expansion of the aluminum company. We took account of the fact that part of the operations of the aluminum company were in British Guiana, that other operations were in Newfoundland and others in Canada. We also took account of the fact that when we entered the aluminum picture the British government had already made a great investment in this country, using its own capital.

We decided that it was not a situation calling for government ownership. We made that decision knowing all the facts, and it was a decision purely by the government. It is all very well for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to say that we should have built aluminum facilities as a public enterprise, but that was a decision for the government to make. Once that question is accepted, I think everything else falls into place naturally. In the matter of special depreciation, we did everything that had to be done in order to keep faith with other governments which wished to purchase aluminum in this country. Neither the British government nor the Australian government nor the United States government were able to buy aluminum from any source at a price lower than aluminum was bought by them in the Dominion of Canada. I think those members of the committee who heard the evidence will admit that at once.

I ask why the committee spent weeks of its time investigating aluminum when that fact was well known to them. Purchases by other governments were made by government agencies when those governments knew all the facts. Those governments believed they were being fairly dealt with by the aluminum company in this country. There were private transactions between a government agency in the United States and the Aluminum Company of Canada, and between an agency of the British government and the Aluminum Company of Canada. The fact that in one or two transactions I happened to act as the agent for the British government has nothing to do with the Canadian treasury, because anything I did in that connection was done for the British treasury and not for account of the Canadian treasury.

It may have been necessary to go into the cost of ingot aluminum as a factor in the case of fabricated aluminum, although I think even that is rather far-fetched. The committee has obtained reams of evidence on the cost of ingot aluminum. I reiterate that the aluminum situation as it affected the Canadian government was a simple one. We bought about $45,000,000 worth of aluminum, not directly by the government but mainly through contractors, and the report of the committee states that, on balance over the whole transaction, the aluminum sold to the Canadian government by the aluminum company was sold at less than the cost of production. We have bought fabricated aluminum for our aeroplanes cheaper than any other government has been able to buy fabricated aluminum for its aeroplanes. I have ample evidence to support that statement.

I suggest for the future guidance of the committee that it accept the place intended for it, namely, that it act as an assistant to the treasury of the government of Canada in time of war, in an effort to make sure that improvident transactions are not entered into. My department will welcome any help we can get of that kind. We have in the past, and I can assure hon. members of the committee that we will in future take active steps to correct any situation that the committee may bring before us. If it can bring us an example of dishonesty I shall be the most delighted man in the world. Members of the committee can regard it as scoring off the government if they like, but I will regard it as a means of recapturing money that has been taken wrongly from the public treasury. I am looking for that sort of thing constantly myself and I shall be very glad to have the help of the committee in that direction. I welcome their investigations of comparative prices. Perhaps we may know of them, but if they are brought forward by a committee we shall take still more energetic steps to correct discrepancies. It does not seem to me that this should be treated as a game in which the effort must be to score against the government. Rather it is a question of getting behind the treasury and helping the Department of Munitions and Supply to save every last dollar that can be saved. I appeal to all hon. members to stop the type of debate we are having here to-night. This is no time for a contest between one party and another. The situation is that we have a committee, its members drawn from all parties in the house, faced with a common task and we hope working toward a common objective. If the committee will work in that spirit, I can assure its members that their work will be more effective, and that the work of my department will be more satisfactory to the people of Canada.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have been ruled out of order at other times in trying to discuss the war expenditures committee, and I shall take only a few moments now.

First, I wish to express my disapproval of the manner in which the committee has sat in camera. The committee is composed of twenty-four members—eighteen government members and six for the opposition, all told. The committee has sat in camera, and a wrong impression has been created in that regard because the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) speaking yesterday, after citing the manner in which a similar committee sat in camera at Westminster, stated:

> There is always opportunity for hon. members to discuss matters before the public accounts committee if they have reason to believe that there are situations which should be discussed there.

All I have to say in reply to that is that on May 19 of last year the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) moved and I seconded a motion that the subject of the wartime information board be brought before the public accounts committee for investigation. A lengthy argument ensued in the house, led by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the chairman of the war expenditures committee, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), supported by the government, and the motion was voted down. They stated that the proper place to investigate that matter was before the war expenditures committee. That was the government's attitude at that time. That was over nine months ago. As I stated, the chairman of war expenditures committee argued that the matter should be investigated, if anywhere, before the war expenditures committee. Yet to my knowledge the matter has never been investigated before that committee.

There are many other matters to which I should like to refer, but since they are not mentioned in the report I might be ruled out of order. There was the purchase of property at exorbitant prices. There has been wasteful and extravagant expenditure of the taxpayer's money in these years of war.

An hon. MEMBER: What do you recommend?

Another hon. MEMBER: How do you know?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have all the details of the purchase of Gimli airport in Manitoba. The statement was made here that the government paid an average of $72 an acre for that property.

Mr. GOLDING: That is not true.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member is going back to 1941. What report is he referring to? Certainly not the 1943 report.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): An hon. member asked me how I knew that there had been extravagant expenditure.

Mr. GOLDING: The hon. member's statement a moment ago was not true.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I will prove before this session is over, if we complete the session, that it is still true. I will produce the evidence at the proper time. I say that there have been many other such matters which are not included in this report which we have never had an opportunity to investigate properly. The point I was trying to make clear was that the Prime Minister stated yesterday that we could discuss matters before the public accounts committee if we had reason to believe there were matters that should be discussed there, and I have already cited one example which occurred last year which the government refused to let us consider before the public accounts committee.

Mr. CLEAVER: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I take it that when a member misrepresents a report to this house it is distinctly the privilege of any member of the house to call Your Honour's attention to it. The hon. member has stated that the wartime information board was not referred to a subcommittee for investigation. I ask him to read the minutes of the committee of July 22, 1943, where he will find that the matter was referred to subcommittee No. 3 and on account of the length of the aluminum inquiry it simply was not reached. The members of that committee worked hard—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is exactly the statement I made, that it was not investigated by the war expenditures committee, and the chairman has just borne out my statement.

There is a statement in the report with respect to agricultural implements. I do not know how much time the committee spent in investigating this matter or how much it cost the taxpayers of this country, but I do know that the average farmer, at least in western Canada, knew the condition with respect to shortage of agricultural implements long before the committee investigated. We have known for some time that agriculture, despite a reduction of twenty-three per cent in labour, has increased agricultural production of this country by some forty-eight per cent. Only thirty-eight per cent of our Canadian farm machinery is produced in Canada, sixty per cent being used in the west and forty in the east. I wish that the committee had spent some of their time in investigating wasteful and extravagant expenditures of the taxpayers' money. If they had gone about that in proper fashion they might have brought about a very great saving to the taxpayers.

I am utterly opposed to sitting in camera, and the very fact that the committee sits in camera is a green signal to those people in this country—and I am sorry that we have them—who are looking for easy money from the public treasury to go ahead and get this easy money where it is possible to get it. If they knew that all these matters would be investigated in the open many of them would never attempt to get this easy money in the fashion in which they got it in the past. The Truman committee in the United States sits in the open, and I think that if we conducted our sittings in Canada in the open we could bring about a tremendous saving in war expenditures to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, there is a question of privilege which I wish to raise. This afternoon while I was speaking regarding air observer schools in this dominion the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), who throughout the day has been rising on all kinds of questions, made the statement that what I had stated was not in accordance with the facts and that all difficulties connected with the air observer schools and the very large profits which they had been receiving had been entirely settled in the summer of 1941. I had made the statement, Mr. Speaker, that the matter was not settled until May, 1942, when I brought the matter up in the house, and up until that time the only assistance I received from the hon. member for Halton was interference when I endeavoured to show in this house that these schools were receiving exorbitant profits. I now refer to the pages in question which establish that what I said was in accordance with the facts and that it was not until May, 1942, that this matter was brought before the house by myself.

I refer first to page 2357 of Hansard of May 12, 1942, where I pointed out the profits these companies were receiving. Then at page 2370 I went on to discuss the set-up of these companies, and I showed where certain parent companies were receiving from $12,000 to $15,000 from the companies that had contracts with the government. Then I referred this afternoon to the fact that while the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), thought the statements that I was making were not in accordance with the facts, because he relied upon statements made by the hon. member for Halton which were subsequently established to be far from in accordance with the facts, the minister stated the following day, as reported in Hansard for the same year, at page 2391:

I owe an apology to the hon. member for Lake Centre for having to some extent doubted the statement which he made with respect to air observer operating companies having a parent company.

Then the matter was continued until the minister investigated it, and as I paid a tribute to him this afternoon I stated that he put an end to this condition of affairs that was wrong but was defended by the hon. member for Halton, who stated all too frequently while I was bringing the matter before the house that the profits to which I referred as exorbitant were non-existent. At page 2701 of Hansard of the same year there is a complete answer given by the Minister of National Defence for Air, setting out in detail, on pages 2701 to 2705, the profits that these various companies were receiving. It was not until after May 25, 1942, after I had brought the matter before the house, that finally the minister, recognizing in all fairness that the thing was wrong, put an end to it.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): I did not at first contemplate entering this debate to-night, but, having heard the accusations of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), the present chairman of the war expenditures committee, in connection with the partisanship of this whole expenditures committee, I feel that as a member of the 1943 war expenditures committee it would ill befit one to hold a seat and not rise on this occasion.

I think the debate so far has amply illustrated the confusion, the confounded confusion of the public of Canada and the members of the House of Commons over the whole existence of the war expenditures committee, when you have the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) start up to-night as he did in this house and ask the war expenditures committee what they were doing in this investigation, what a nuisance they were to him, and what trouble they were raising.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think the very words of the Minister of Munitions and Supply indicate clearly that the war expenditures committee has been functioning as an obnoxious organization for this parliament to have. And then, when we turn around and find that members of this house are being asked to vote concurrence in a report brought in by twenty-four members, eighteen or whom are on the government side and six on the opposition; when 245 members who cannot hear a word of the evidence, who cannot be told a thing about the evidence, who can be given a report and not given an ounce of material wherewith to judge the wisdom or the folly of the recommendations or the truth of the allegations set out are asked to put the seal of their approval, as elected representatives of the people in a democratic state, on a report of this kind, that is to deny the existence of democracy. I say that hon. members have been elected to the House of Commons to perform a function on behalf of the people who sent them there. If the members of the House of Commons are denied the privilege of looking into the expenditures in this great time of expenditures, this time of war, and to report to the House of Commons itself, simply because witnesses are called by the chairman of the committee and told it would be in camera; that is, because they were told it would be in camera the members of the house cannot be given the data, then there is something wrong with the supremacy of parliament. We are denied the privilege of acting and functioning as we should, as representatives of the people, according to a truly British-Canadian institutional procedure. To think that 245 members of the house, less twenty-four, cannot go into such matters as wartime housing, the manufacture of aluminum, and the building of the Gimli airport, and that such things must be kept secret for fear they should console the enemy; in other words, that we must vote blindly and ignorantly concurrence in the report, does not add up.

I say to the members of this house through you, Mr. Speaker, that when a member of parliament elected to represent not only his own constituency but Canada at large, cannot compare costs, cannot get evidence, whereas the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the parliamentary assistant to the minister (Mr. Chevrier) can rise in their places and give facts from the department which the members of the committee are denied the right to give, there is something wrong with democracy.

Mr. CHEVRIER: On a point of order, if the hon. member will read the remarks which I made yesterday he will find that everything contained therein is contained in the report and these are not statements which are not available to the committee.

Mr. BOUCHER: Last year I was privileged to sit as a member of the war expenditures committee, subcommittee No. 1. I do not hesitate to say that an industrious time was spent by all members of that subcommittee. Some sixty-nine sittings were held, some forty-seven witnesses heard, and many plants were visited. All the sittings were held in camera, even those dealing with housing for the people of Canada. The members could not even get a copy of the evidence which was taken, the day after it was taken, for their own perusal or to assist them in coming to their conclusions, except that they could go to the clerk of the committee's room, look at the report there, read it there, or return it within a short time. Members were served from the department of government and the corporations that were investigated with prepared briefs, handed to us members of the committee to read, and then picked up, after they told us what was in the brief, before we had a chance to read it. I say also that in most, though not all of the meetings of the subcommittee to which I belonged in 1943, representatives of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and at times, representatives from companies we were investigating sat in at our committee to tell witnesses what they could say and what they could not say; and on one or two occasions we had difficulty in proceeding with our investigation by virtue of the solicitor of one of the companies we were investigating objecting to witnesses answering questions.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, just how long are we going to be subject to a breach of the rules of the house?

Mr. BOUCHER: We have had the hon. member for Halton attempting to make about fifty-two and one-half speeches this afternoon.

Mr. CLEAVER: This is a breach of the rules of the house, Your Honour.

Mr. BOUCHER: The hon. member does not want to hear the rest of it, but I should like to give him a little more, if he will kindly remain in his seat. I do not want any questions or any speeches or any interruptions from the hon. member for Halton.

Mr. CLEAVER: Am I not entitled to raise a point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) has raised a point of order. The hon. member who is now speaking should confine his remarks to the report itself. That has been the contention all evening. I will ask the hon. member to abide by the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BOUCHER: Perhaps I misunderstood the conditions under which we are discussing the motion, Mr. Speaker. As I understood it, the motion for concurrence in this report was introduced by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was not.

Mr. BOUCHER: It was introduced by the chairman of the committee. The Prime Minister stated that it would be followed by a motion to set up the war expenditures committee for another year, and that great latitude would be granted the house. In making my remarks to-night I am not stating anything that happened in the way of evidence in the committee of last year, because I was not a member of it. I am stating circumstances which by analogy, I should say, have a direct bearing upon whether or not we concur in this report. I do not feel that we can decide whether or not to concur in the report without the evidence on which it is based, without the facts upon which the reports were formulated and unless we know the nature of the sittings, the type of sittings that were held, and the investigations that were carried on. I say that is very apropos so far as the members of this committee are concerned when they are asked to concur in or reject the committee's report.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has made a statement. I think his remarks would be more appropriate when the resolution for the appointment of the committee is before the house. We shall then be dealing with the committee and his experience on it. At the moment we are dealing with the report, and all hon. members have been confined within the four walls of the report this evening. I should like to ask the hon. member to confine his remarks within the limits of that report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say a word in regard to what Your Honour has just said? Perhaps at the same time I may be able to clear up a certain amount of confusion; that is, by way of explanation, not to enter into debate. From what my hon. friend has just said I gather he is assuming that the government proposes to insist on hon. members voting on this question of concurring in the report. Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the house this afternoon when the mover of the resolution (Mr. Cleaver) indicated that he was quite prepared to withdraw his motion once hon. members had concluded their discussion. The government does not intend to insist upon having the resolution put to a vote. The purpose of this discussion—and now, Mr. Speaker, I refer more particularly to the remarks Your Honour has just made—has been not merely to discuss the report and the question of the approval of the report. There was an understanding that a certain latitude would be allowed to discuss war expenditure matters generally as the house would were its members discussing the appointment of the war expenditures committee. By allowing that latitude it is assumed that when this present discussion is concluded the motion constituting the committee will be voted upon without further discussion. For that reason it has, I believe, been generally and rightly assumed that a certain latitude would be allowed in debate in order that once the discussion on the present motion was concluded, we would be in a position to have the committee appointed in the quickest possible time, I hope this evening.

Mr. BOUCHER: I thank the Prime Minister for the words he has just spoken. I do not feel I should have to ask the government whether they intend at a future date to withdraw the motion now before the house in order to decide whether I should speak on it. The fact of the matter is that the motion is now before the house, and whether the Prime Minister sees fit to withdraw it or is willing to withdraw it matters not, until such time as he exercises his prerogative to withdraw it. Meanwhile, it is in debate. That being the case, may I proceed?

The members, as I said before, were dealing with matters of a very intricate nature, dealing with some things that undoubtedly would give assistance to the enemy if they were publicized. The main committee consisted of twenty-four members. It was divided into three subcommittees. I think the subcommittee on which I served had eight members. I had the privilege of recommending to the main committee that the members of the subcommittee be granted the assistance of cost accountants and counsel to help them carry on their investigations. In 1943 our subcommittee formulated certain reports which were brought before the house that year. I do not wish to read them in detail, but I should like to indicate to the members of the house that some pointed suggestions were made to the department and to this house, matters such as accelerated depreciation, shortage of accountants in the Department of Munitions and Supply, increasing costs, absenteeism, labour conditions and so on. All of these things require intensive research.

I do not think it is proper for a member of the subcommittee to say that when the committee has brought in a report its work is done. That is not true, until the work is thoroughly done. I ask the hon. members of this house to realize that there have been terrific expenditures made by this government for temporary buildings for private concerns as well as for public concerns. Many of these buildings are for war purposes only. When the war is over or a short time thereafter they must be disposed of. There are millions of Canadian dollars invested in them. The assets are there, and according to present arrangements they must be salvaged in some way before this war is over. Millions of dollars have been spent on private enterprise in the enlargement of plant and production facilities necessary for war production. This has all been paid for out of the taxpayer's money, put up by the government of Canada. That must be all salvaged in some way in post-war disposition of such assets. The question is whether it shall be returned to private industry or carried on as a government enterprise. I do not feel that information with regard to these matters should be denied members of parliament, when one considers that they have been entrusted by their constituents with the job of looking after their interests in the parliament of Canada. I do not feel we can shirk our responsibility by saying we can sit in camera. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) this afternoon agreed with the definition of "in camera" as laid down by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). The hon. member for Lake Centre said that "in camera" meant leaving the membership of the committee the privilege to use their own judgment as to what evidence should be disclosed.

I see rank confusion in the minds of the hon. members of this House of Commons with regard to the functions of this committee. I think I am corroborated in that by the statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). When we consider that millions of dollars have been spent, investigations have been authorized and held by the members of this house in the war expenditures committee, and when we consider that the government has had protection in this committee by reason of the large number of government members on it, so amply illustrated this afternoon by the hon. member for Halton, the chairman of the committee, showing rabid partisanship, I say there is nothing to inspire confidence in the people of Canada in the war expenditures committee, and that it is time the government cleaned house and stepped in and looked upon the matter as a businessman would look upon a business proposition.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put I wish to make one or two slight observations. We seem to be in the same embarrassing position now as we were in when the debate started yesterday afternoon, the position of having to vote upon a report based upon evidence which we have not been able to peruse. This would be quite all right if the report had been a unanimous report; but it was not a unanimous report. There was one hon. member who dissented. His dissension was in the form of a speech, and it is tantamount to a minority report in substantiation of charges which he made last year. I do believe that the government should, if possible, provide some way or another by which the charges that were made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar can once again be reviewed. The position that we are in is simply this. We have to satisfy our own minds in voting on this question. I should like to vote concurrence in the report because, when we set up a committee to undertake a work of this kind, to investigate war expenditures, I like to have confidence in that committee. Evidently all the groups in this house except one have been more or less satisfied with the report, apart from one or two things brought out in the debate. As I say, I should like to vote concurrence, but I must confess that I cannot see in the process of the present debate that the charges of the member for Rosetown-Biggar have been entirely and satisfactorily refuted. On more than one occasion he has made the statement that the report is a whitewash. That was brought out, when the report was first submitted, by going into the press, and it was said two or three times when he spoke yesterday. He is perfectly convinced, it seems, that the report is a whitewash. What I have to satisfy myself of is whether the report is in fact a whitewash or whether his charges are eyewash. It must be one or the other, and I cannot entirely satisfy myself on this matter.

Here is another thing I want to say, and in saying it I do not want the member for Rosetown-Biggar to carry away any inference from my remarks. I do not direct this to him; I am speaking of the matter in general. The position we are placed in is this—and perhaps I should not refer to the hon. member in this connection. I am doing so only by way of illustration. He could go out and say that his charges were not refuted and he could say that the government refused to produce the evidence because they were afraid to do so. He could say that he urged the production of the evidence. Furthermore, speaking in general terms now and not referring to him, a member could take the position that he urged the production of the evidence, as a sort of bluff to hide behind, knowing very well that the evidence would not be produced.

I have been told that the evidence submitted on behalf of my hon. friend fell completely flat. I am not prepared to accept that on the basis of his speech of yesterday, and yet what can I do? I cannot do anything in the matter for the reason that I have not access to the evidence; and so long as I have not access to the evidence I am afraid I shall have to vote against concurrence, much as I should like to vote concurrence. I urge upon the government, if at all possible, in order to allay any suspicion, that the charges made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar should be refuted in some way or another, and that can be done perhaps by having the matter reviewed again by the war expenditures committee that is to be set up for this session. I do urge something of that kind. I believe it would be protection for them besides having all the cards laid on the table in order that all members might be satisfied.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): Even at this late hour of the debate, since I was a member of the subcommittee of the war expenditures committee I think I would not be doing my duty if I kept silent and did not give the reasons why I am in favour of the motion, because in normal times I am so absorbed in the spirit of freedom that I would not allow anything to be hidden not only from this House of Commons but from the public in general.

The spirit of liberty, as we all know, is so strongly entrenched in our minds that we consider it as an inalienable right. As a matter of fact, we can trace the origin of our mentality on freedom as far back as the sources of our culture. But we are engaged in a struggle against the most dreadful enemy of all times; and if on the one hand it is repugnant to our love of freedom to follow his despotic attitude, on the other hand, should we not at least refuse to give him unwittingly all the information which he no doubt is so anxious to get from us?

This should not be an occasion where opportunists should try to derive political benefits out of such decisive questions. The lives of our sons and our national security as well are at stake; nay, the civilization of the world is more than ever in the scale. The result of this gigantic upheaval depends not only upon the success of our armed forces but upon victory, and especially upon the fruits of victory. A peace based on Christian principles will be obtained by our common effort, by the collective sacrifices of our personal interests, and by the obliteration for the time being of our political ambitions.

For fifteen years I have had the advantage of following the deliberations of this house. It has enabled me to get acquainted with most hon. members, irrespective of political affiliations, and it is indeed a great pleasure for me to say that I do not know of anyone who would not in the bottom of his heart be ready to help his neighbour. I do not know of anyone whose nature would be so low as voluntarily to hurt even an opponent in such a way as to do him personal harm. I am convinced that everyone of us is anxious to do his share according to the means given him by Providence, to foster the great future which is the destiny of our own country. In fact I know of many of the people's representatives, irrespective of race or religion, who for many years have sacrificed their personal ambitions and legitimate family interests for the public weal. More than that, I am in duty bound to declare, in justice to many of my colleagues, that I know of not a few who are so imbued with Christian principles that these words of the poet might rightly be applied to them:

> He doeth well, who doeth good
> To those of his own brotherhood;
> He doeth better who doth bless
> The stranger in his wretchedness;
> Yet best, oh, best of all, doth he
> Who helps a fallen enemy.

It is true that sometimes we witness in this house exhibitions by word of mouth which are foreign to the lofty sentiments of the soul. Generally, however, these expressions are uttered in the course of a hot debate, and I am sure that if we could look within the conscience of the one who did it, we would soon discover that he is the first to regret his action. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I can say without fear of contradiction that each and every one of us is big enough in these critical circumstances to put on the altar of his country his personal ambitions, his legitimate pride and his political advantages for the sake of the national exigencies of the hour.

If I dare speak for the party to which I belong, at any rate if I can speak for myself, I may tell you, sir, that the publicity of the deliberations of the war expenditures committee would undoubtedly turn to the advantage of the Liberal party. I contend that the publicity of the report would show that, notwithstanding the strenuous, not to say the laborious effort of some of our opponents to discover scandal, they absolutely failed to do so. Far from my mind is the intention of proving that everything was perfect. After all, those who are engaged in war production are only human beings; as a matter of fact, most of them were lacking in experience in the production of war implements. In some industries, it took more time to acquire the proper skill, and so the cost of production was higher. But in no case is there to be found any wilful intention to defraud the crown.

As a further argument I should like to remind hon. members of this important fact, that when the motion was put before the house to institute the war expenditures committee, it was agreed by a large majority, if not unanimously, and after a long debate, that the deliberations of this committee would be in camera. So that if according to the rules of our democratic system the committee was constituted with that very condition of secrecy, how can we go back on our decision and ask, now that it is done, to demolish what we have so cautiously built? We would not be fair with ourselves. We cannot logically change our minds. Among the many reasons given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his speech last night, as to why the deliberations of this war expenditures committee should be kept in camera, the most conspicuous one is that we should not give comfort to the enemy. If it is permissible for me to express my opinion concerning our conduct in the house about this question of secrecy since the outbreak of the war, I would tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have always been astounded by the imprudent manner with which all sorts of details have been freely given about our war effort.

Listening to the innumerable questions and answers about this subject, I very often fancy what would happen if Adolf Hitler had been allowed to sit within the precincts of the house, and the following question had been put to him: "Which would be the most agreeable to you, that the details of our war effort be rendered public, that the deliberations of our committees dealing with our war production be handed to you, or that all this information be kept under cover and the deliberations of our committee dealt with in camera?" Where is the hon. member in this house who has not already the answer in his mind? Where is he who would not say, for Hitler, "Most decidedly, please give me these details." Surely at this psychological time, when Hitler is confronted with ultimate defeat, if he could speak to his secret agents who, no doubt, are still to be found in our midst, surely he would tell them, "Do the utmost to obtain from the House of Commons of Canada any details about their endeavours, so that even in my desperate situation I may do my best to overcome their deadly production."

In conclusion, may I be permitted to entreat each and every hon. member in this house, imbued as we all are with the spirit of patriotism, to examine the present state of our war aims, to put aside our political quarrels and to show that we are big enough to take a wise decision, even if we are bound to give the benefit of the doubt to the present administration, and to decide once and for all until the ultimate victory that no detail, no matter how small it may appear to us, be rendered public, lest, through unknown and mysterious channels, such information might contribute to help our enemies.

At any rate, speaking for myself, if my attitude, if the humble share I have taken in our war effort, if the very imperfect contribution I have taken in this debate could have the result of saving the life of one of our soldiers or even of protecting him against the slightest wound, I should consider this as the greatest gift granted me by Providence in reward for the whole of my public life.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the house for more than a few minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LOCKHART: I will speak for forty minutes if I hear many interruptions like that. This is a serious matter. Like the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), after sitting in the house for the last day or so and listening to the discussion I have to ask myself many questions.

We are being asked now to approve a resolution for concurrence in the report. One might take back to his constituency the report of the committee, and might pin to it Hansard for yesterday and today. He might lay all that before the people, who are interested to know what is being done with public moneys. We hear arguments presented pro and con, trying to convince the house that, vague though it is, the report should be passed, and almost at the same time we hear members who sit on each side of me, members in different parts of the house, who distinctly make the bold statement that the report is not based upon the evidence disclosed before the committee. There is nothing left for one to do but oppose the motion for concurrence in this report. One must find a reason for taking that action. When the ayes and nays are called for on this motion, if they are called for, I propose to vote against it. As a member of the house who did not sit on this committee I intend to go back to my constituents, whoever they may be, and lay before them the evidence as I see it. I cannot reach any other conclusion than that I must agree with the hon. member for Macleod, that perhaps it has been a whitewash all the way through.

Ever since the housing investigation—I assume I cannot bring that in—I have been bitterly opposed to secret sittings except when there is the reservation which has been expressed in this house that the evidence would give comfort to the enemy. I do not intend to go into the details of this housing investigation, but that was one of the first exhibitions of this committee's work. When I consider the evidence given in the committee; when I consider the report and what little has been told the public; when I read the statements pro and con made by hon. members, my honest conviction is that it must have been a whitewash. Therefore I intend to vote against the motion.

I intend to show my people exactly how members of this house have spoken. I am strongly of the opinion that when they consider the words uttered, not only by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) but by other members of this house, the public of this country will not be too well pleased with the conduct of the war expenditures committee. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he had better have a house-cleaning in this committee or provide other conditions under which they are to work before he submits to them business which is of such utmost importance to the taxpayers of Canada. This committee is to investigate how money has been spent, and we must make sure that it does not come back with a report such as we have had. We who did not sit on the committee are being asked to vote concurrence, but I intend to vote against the motion for concurrence in the report.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up very much time because I understand it is the wish of the house to dispose on this matter this evening. I have been a member of this committee since it was organized three years ago. While I have not agreed with all the decisions of the committee I have endeavoured to work with them and be of some service. The report being discussed to-night is a majority report. We were not allowed to submit a minority report, but I wish to say that I am not in agreement with all that is contained in the report. Matters which I think could have been incorporated in the report have been excluded, but it is the report of the committee as a whole.

As I have stated in the house, in meetings of the main committee and of the subcommittee, I am opposed as a general rule to sitting in camera. Such sittings should be the exception. The members of that committee should be trusted to see that no information was made public which might prove detrimental to our war effort or bring comfort to the enemy. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) has referred to the investigation into wartime housing. When that matter was referred to the committee a year ago I took a definite stand that the meetings should be held in the open and that the evidence should be available to other members of the house and the public. I made a motion to that effect, but I was overruled. The choice then rested with me of deciding whether I would continue to sit on the committee or whether I would retire and I decided that I would sit in with the committee and serve the best I could.

The same might be said with regard to the inquiry into cargo shipbuilding. There was hardly a bit of evidence which came before the committee in connection with this subject which could not have been made available to the members of the house and the people of Canada, the taxpayers. They certainly paid a high price in some of the yards compared with what was paid in other yards. It may have been that certain matters in connection with the cargo ship investigation should have been withheld, but again I say that the members of the committee should have been trusted to see that no evidence was divulged to the public which should not be divulged.

I was not a member of the subcommittee which carried out the aluminum inquiry, but from the information submitted to the house by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) and other members of that committee, I cannot see that any information disclosed before that committee could not be made available to this house and the public. If there were contracts or undertakings which the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) had entered into with other governments and which he wished withheld, there was not a single member of that committee who would not have approved his request. I think it is in the interest of the minister, of the government and of the people of Canada that all the information with respect to the aluminum industry should be made available. At least it should be made available to hon. members of this house, even if in a secret sitting. They are entitled to full information in connection with these large expenditures.

I was a member of subcommittee No. 1 last year which inquired into naval and cargo shipbuilding. I am ready to admit that there were certain matters with respect to naval shipbuilding which should be withheld from the public, but I would like every hon. member to have the same information with respect to that matter that I had myself. Most of the information, even in connection with naval shipbuilding, could have been made available to members of the house and the public.

I was surprised when the Minister of Munitions and Supply refused to support a motion submitted by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asking for comparative prices on the 10,350-ton ships and 4,700-ton ships as between private yards and government yards. I think the house is entitled to that information. If the costs are higher in some yards an explanation should be given, as the minister did to-night. I am disappointed that the minister did not agree to that motion.

The chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), has made the statement which appeared in the report of our committee, although I did not favour having it put in, that there was a saving of from thirty to forty million dollars through the reduction in prices paid for cargo ships. I do not think that is a fair statement. Contracts for the first cargo ships were at a very high price placed with inexperienced yards. I go farther and say that if the lower costs due to greater competency and efficiency in private yards were compared with that in government-operated yards, even after the stated reduction of from thirty to forty million dollars, there would be a real and additional saving of from thirty to forty million dollars by having the cargo ships built in private yards.

Information has been submitted on behalf of the war expenditures committee—and this also is contained in the report—regarding the cost of the 10,350-ton ships. The average cost was given at $1,632,000. The cost of the first six ships built in private yards was $210,000 below this average price I have just mentioned. The private yards did excellent work and credit must go to the workmen and the management.

I wish also to pay my respects and express my appreciation to H. R. MacMillan, who was president of Wartime Shipbuilding and to his assistant, Mr. C. F. Dewar, now president of the crown company. I believe on the whole they have done a good job.

Our committee carried on under the greatest handicaps. Very few of us were lawyers. Some hon. members keep repeating that members of the opposition were looking for scandals and that we did not find any. The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) has just made such a statement. So far as my colleagues and I were concerned, we had no such thoughts. All we were concerned about was to get information and point out where savings could be made and greater efficiency obtained. As I said, we were handicapped in our investigations. We were without a solicitor, without an accountant, and with no secretariat to assist the members of the committee in assembling evidence. The witnesses who came before our committee were usually supported by outstanding counsel representing the Department of Munitons and Supply. We had not been in session for ten months when we started the 1943 sessions, and we have not been in session now for the purpose of taking evidence for about three months. We did the best we could, but we were able to touch only the mere fringe of war expenditures. If the members and public expect that we were checking up on all war expenditures in order to safeguard the country's interests, any claim of the kind is merely to beguile the public, for no complete study could be made of any single branch of war expenditure.

Our committee, No. 1, was assigned certain specific lines of investigation. We investigated naval and cargo shipbuilding and spent most of our time on that. We also had assigned to us "R.C.A.F. services and aircraft production"; "contracts with civilian flying clubs, associations or companies"; "airport, aerodrome and air force buildings construction, specifications and designs for such projects, and inspection thereof during construction." We had only one day's evidence under all of these three heads. Mr. R. P. Bell, Director General of Aircraft Production, who I believe has done excellent work, appeared before us one day only and gave merely a general résumé. The appropriation for "air services" for the fiscal year 1943-44 totalled the enormous sum of $1,129,421,414. The responsibility of checking this huge expenditure of over $1,000,000,000 was assigned to our committee, and we had only one day's hearing to deal with this huge expenditure. For the next fiscal year, 1944-45, the appropriation for air services is the enormous sum of $1,090,000,000. We have a responsibility to this house and to the public to investigate this to see that there is reasonable efficiency and no waste in its expenditure, but as I say we were barely able to touch on this huge expenditure of over one billion dollars for last year for air services. I say again that if the public or the members of this house think we are safeguarding their interests, to suggest it is simply beguiling the public, for no matter how determined we might be, we simply were not capable of making the investigation in the time at our disposal.

I wish to point out some other things. At a meeting of the general committee on war expenditures on October 14, I made the following suggestion, as reported by the committee to the house:

> Mr. Black suggested that the disposition of war products and the allocation of the billion dollar mutual aid appropriation be inquired into by the committee.
> In order to proceed with the subcommittee meetings called for htis day, the chairman suggested that the committee meet again tomorrow to consider the question raised by Mr. Black and any other matters to be brought before the committee.

On the following day it was reported as follows:

> . . . it was agreed that subcommittee No. 2 had the power under the terms of its reference dated July 22, to inquire into the disposition of war products. The question of inquiring into the allocation of the billion dollar mutual aid appropriation was referred to the agenda subcommittee.
> Mr. McGregor submitted that the committee should inquire into the salvage of government-owned construction equipment not in use. This was also referred to the agenda subcommittee.

Again I say it is my opinion that the war expenditures committee, having the responsibility of checking the expenditure of one billion dollars for mutual aid, should at least have examined into it, but we were not permitted or were not able to do so. In any event, no information under this heading was placed before us, and yet it was one of the major expenditures.

Tremendous quantities of war materials were being piled up along railway sidings and in storage, but no inquiry was made into their disposition or to ascertain whether any economies could be effected. Yet that was the responsibility assigned to this committee. Again I say we were unable to do it, and if the members of this house or the public think we did it, I say that they are just being beguiled.

In our 1943 report submitted to this house on January 27, 1943, this is one of the recommendations that was made:

> That as soon as company financial statements are available for the year 1942 a special study should be made of profits, accelerated depreciation and corporate taxation. The question of excess profits and accelerated depreciation has caused the subcommittee considerable concern.

That is a recommendation to the house and to our committee, I presume, that we should look into accelerated depreciation. We had some evidence of accelerated depreciation. I think there must be accelerated depreciation, but I feel that this committee should have this information placed before it. We had references by some of the witnesses to certain of the shipbuilding companies. Notwithstanding that I asked for this information and other members of the committee wanted it, it was never placed before us, although it was recommended the previous year that it should be inquired into. Again I point out the futility of this house or the public expecting our committee to discharge all that was expected of us.

We inquired to a limited extent into taxation on workers in shipyards. Dissatisfaction with respect to taxation on the "cost of living bonus," excessive taxation on overtime and full time, and no receipt when deductions were made of refundable taxation, were the main causes of absenteeism. We made some recommendations with respect to that in our report now before this house. I think that is a very important matter, to keep up the morale of our workers not only in shipbuilding yards but in mining industries and wherever war work and other work are being carried on. That situation has not been satisfactory, and we were not able to go into that to the extent that we should have liked.

I should say a word with respect to the programme of building the 4,700-ton Gray type ships. As the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) pointed out, there is great necessity for a larger number of ships of this type, ships drawing 20 ft. 10½ inches of water, fully loaded. While the larger, 10,350-ton ships have a twenty-seven foot draught and can use only the larger national ports and the St. Lawrence, the 4,700-ton Gray type ships can use the outports, many of which are in the maritime provinces.

I am pleased to learn to-night from the minister that the programme of producing a larger number of these ships is being proceeded with.

Our report submitted to the house with respect to the 4,700-ton ships is as follows:

> There is also variation in prices of the 4,700-ton ships from a low of $1,063,000 to a high of $1,854,693. In the yard, however, where the highest price obtained it was found this was the price of the first ship and the actual price of its eighth ship was $1,422,440 with an estimated price in the same yard of $1,235,279 for the tenth ship. The attention of your committee was arrested by the higher cost prevailing at Pictou, Nova Scotia, for the 4,700-tonners and made strong representations in that regard and during the course of our inquiry we were pleased to note that the cost had been reduced. The costs given above do not include capital expenditures or special depreciation.

We found there was a spread of eighty per cent in the cost of building this one type of ship in different yards. That information was placed before the house to-night by the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor), and as I interpret the remarks of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the hon. member was severely criticized because he pointed out the excessive costs in the government yard at Pictou. If there is a spread of $800,000 in the cost of a ship that in private yard costs $1,063,000; if this committee is going to be of any service to the taxpayers of this country why should we not point that out? Why should we not have misgivings with respect to that?

But that does not tell the whole story. There was a capital expenditure at Pictou—I do not know whether I am permitted to give these figures, but I will give them only in round figures—of nearly $3,000,000. There was an expenditure on building a wharf there, the contract being, I think, for $156,000. I do not get those figures through our committee's report, but from other sources. That contract was awarded to the Fundy Construction Company. When the money was pretty well expended the wharf slid into the harbour; the contractors were paid off, and the work was completed on a cost-plus basis at an estimated cost, I believe, of $383,000 at the time of our investigation, although less than that sum has been expended. That is all added to the cost of building ships in these government yards. Again I say, if the members of our committee are going to consider seriously our responsibility, why should we not give attention to these terrific costs in government yards such as the one at Pictou?

I might also refer to the information which came before us at the Montreal government yard. The costs there were staggering in comparison with the cost in some private yards; and I say it was our simple duty to make recommendations with respect to these excessive costs. We endeavoured to do so, and I believe that the representations we made, and indeed the mere fact that we were making these inquiries, induced the government, the minister, and those who were responsible in these yards to give better value, better service, better efficiency, so that our inquiries resulted to a very considerable extent in a reduction of the cost in these government yards.

The hon. member for York East gave certain figures to-night with respect to the cost of naval ships in Toronto in comparison with the cost in other yards. I believe that the figures are set out in our report, otherwise I would not mention this. The cost in the Toronto yard, as I remember, was almost half a million dollars, nearly fifty per cent higher than the cost in other yards. If we are going to function at all, why should we not take those figures seriously, and have some apprehension as to these excessive costs in what was a government yard, in comparison with other private yards?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not follow this any further. There is much more that I might say. As I remarked earlier, I was reluctant to go on this committee. I disapproved the procedure of having most of the inquiries in camera. I was outvoted; I subscribed to the wishes of the majority of the committee. I endeavoured to work with them as individuals; I endeavoured to be of service to the committee and to the taxpayers. I find that my name again appears on the list of members of the committee which is to be set up by this house when this debate is over. I am not anxious, as I said, to go on the committee; I should like to be relieved. On the other hand, if the membership of this house feels that I can be of service, I believe it is my duty to place myself at the disposal of the committee and I will again endeavour to work with my associates. But again I make an appeal through you, Mr. Speaker, to the government and members of this house that investigations of matters which are not injurious to the war interests of this country and our allies, and which cannot be of comfort to the enemy, be held in the open and not in camera, not in secret, because the members of this house and the taxpayers of this country should have the benefit of the information which is placed before the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to make one observation only, and that is to put our party on record. I understand that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) is about to withdraw his motion, as was arranged. In view of the fact that there will be no vote and in order to place our party on record, may I say that if there were a vote our party would have voted unanimously against concurrence in the report for the reasons which have been given by the members of our group.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I now ask that the motion for concurrence in the report be withdrawn, for reasons I have already given.

Motion (Mr. Cleaver) withdrawn.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein, and that notwithstanding standing order 65 the committee shall consist of twenty-four members, as follows: Messrs. Black (Cumberland), Cleaver, Donnelly, Dupuis, Edwards, Fauteux, Ferland, Gladstone, Golding, Hill, Homuth, Hurtubise, Jackman, Knowles, McGregor, Nixon, O'Neill, Picard, Pinard, Pottier, Reid, Shaw, Tripp, Winkler, with power to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses and to report from time to time to the house.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put to the house I wish to take a moment to place our position on record. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) proposes the constitution of the war expenditures committee, I wish to make it very clear that in so far as our party is concerned we are going to oppose the setting up of the committee. We opposed it last year and we are opposing it this year for the reason that we have felt the committee's work has been rendered largely unimportant because it has continuously sat in camera. That being the case, we wish to oppose the setting up of this committee. I wish to caution the government and the house by this reservation. Our members who have been named on this committee reserve their rights to refuse to sit on it if it or its subcommittees decide to sit in camera. That is the reservation which we desire to make. May I say to my hon. friend and to you, Mr. Speaker, that we feel in making this protest and by reserving our rights so far as refusing to sit on the committee if it sits in camera, we are doing something that is worth while in bringing out into the open the whole question of war expenditures in Canada. I make my position clear in connection with this at this time, so that there will be no doubt in anyone's mind as to the stand our party is taking with respect to this question.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I shall take only one minute. We approve the setting up of this committee. We believe it can and does perform a useful function. We share the view that this committee should sit in public except when information concerning the security of Canada or our allies is at stake. Then we believe that the committee itself should decide to sit, not in camera, if you like, but in secret. We want to see things open to the public except when something affecting security arises, which I think is not likely at the present time.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE: (Lethbridge): The members of our group are also heartily in favour of the setting up of the committee, but we feel also that the committee should be so managed that a large percentage of its sessions could be open. Those that should be held in camera we feel could be held in camera without doing harm to the war effort, and with no disadvantage to the country.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): There is just one observation I would make in this connection. I believe that though meetings are held in camera or in secret—there seems to be some difference of opinion as to the terminology or the definition of one or the other—there is a verbatim report made of the committee's proceedings. I believe that that report should be kept in the secretary's office and accessible to all members of parliament. I believe that we could trust the members of parliament just as much as we can trust the members of the committee. If that were done, we would not have what we have had in the last couple of days.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall take only one moment. First of all, I would direct the attention of the hon. members to the fact that the two parties, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the Social Credit party have expressed their approval of having a committee on war expenditures. The Progressive Conservative party propose to vote against the instituting of such a committee. I hope the attitudes will be clearly understood by the public. The purpose of the committee is to assist the treasury in effecting economies in war expenditures. That is the sole purpose of it, as set forth in the motion. But the Progressive Conservative party is unwilling to assist the treasury and the government in effecting economies in war expenditures.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister is not going to put words in my mouth again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am making my own statement and I have the right to make it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Make your own statement, but do not put words in my mouth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not putting any words in my hon. friend's mouth at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: You certainly are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; I am saying that the leader of the opposition has said —I believe I am entitled to speak—that his party proposes to vote against this motion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion is for the purpose of establishing a committee to effect economies in war expenditures. To do so, the committee is free to inquire into any war expenditures that are taking place in the country. I can draw only one conclusion from that, namely that the party represented in this house by my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, is unwilling to assist the treasury in effecting economies in war expenditures. That is the purpose of the motion. May I say that I am amazed, inasmuch as hon. members have before them the example of Westminster, and I make no apologies for citing Westminster as an example. The expenditures with respect to war at Westminster are very, very great indeed. When the members of all parties at Westminster are quite prepared to serve in assisting the treasury in effecting economies in war expenditures I can find no reason in the world why hon. members of this parliament should take a different attitude. However, in taking that different attitude they assume responsibility for the attitude which they are taking. While I may question and regret the course his party is taking I am glad that my hon. friend has made it so clear that his party is not prepared to cooperate with the government in a measure intended to effect economies and save waste in war expenditures in Canada on a motion which is identical in every particular with a motion which has been adopted year in and year out at Westminster.

Much has been said in the discussion by hon. gentlemen opposite to create the impression that the rights of private members in some way are being taken away because some matters are referred to the committee and because its members sit in camera. May I assume for a moment that there is no committee at all? The rights of private members will remain just exactly what they have been at all times in this parliament. By appointing the committee we are not taking away the rights of a single individual. What we are doing is giving to all hon. members of this house an opportunity to make inquiries into public expenditures, which they would not have but for the existence of the committee which we are establishing at the present time. That I want to have clearly understood. There is no right of an hon. member being taken away by the appointment of this committee. Every hon. member has the same right that he has always had with respect to any matter that should be investigated. He has the same rights to-day as he had in this parliament before the war began. But if this committee is appointed additional rights will have been given to hon. members inasmuch as there will be a committee which will be sitting in camera and which because of its sittings being in camera will be afforded an opportunity of carrying out investigations wider and broader than has ever been given to any committee in this parliament of Canada.

In regard to sitting in camera, I am not going to repeat the arguments that I have already given. They are set out in what I have said speaking to the amendment and in what has been said by other hon. members. I should like to bring up one point, however, which has escaped attention thus far, and it is an important one. When a committee begins an investigation in public, instantly the public gets the idea that there is something wrong about the matter which is being investigated. There are, let me assume, a dozen different industrial establishments in Canada that are carrying on similar classes of business, making munitions and other war supplies, others having to do with shipbuilding and the like. This committee has the power to go into all these concerns and investigate them fully, and if they find anything that is wrong they can take immediate steps to have it remedied. But every one of these concerns is surely not to be placed before the public as an institution that has been doing something contrary to the public interest and must therefore be investigated by a government committee. That would be the effect of having sittings held in public instead of in camera.

Honest firms in this country are entitled to the protection of the government when they are serving the country in a time of war. If the government were to take the position that every firm that is assisting in the war effort, conducting its business honestly, doing the best it possibly can, is to be held up for public investigation, I do not know what would become of the industrial establishments of Canada and of the reputation of our industrial leaders. Surely we have a right to begin with the assumption that men are honest, that they are not all dishonest; and being honest that they are entitled to protection until it is shown that they are doing something wrong. That is the purpose of having the proceedings conducted in the way that has been followed. I hope it will be remembered that the businesses that are being investigated are assisting in the winning of the war.

There is a further point to be kept in mind and it has been repeated over and over again in the old country in many connections. The Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Churchill himself, said to me one day, and he has said the same thing publicly: Until this war is ended, so far as the public is concerned, do all you possibly can to have them keep their eye on the ball; and the ball that the eye has to be kept on to-day is the winning of this war, the most terrible war in the history of mankind. I say, therefore, that if you begin a series of investigations in public with respect to different war industries before you know whether any wrongdoing has been done, before you have given any chance to concerns that may have taken some steps which they should not have taken, to correct the mistakes they have made and to make amends, and do this at a time when our armies are fighting as they are at the front, and when the war effort of the united nations is at stake, you take a position that cannot possibly be defended.

Investigations by government committees attract no end of public attention. They are the sort of thing that the press naturally makes the most of in headlines. Begin a series of investigations from now on, conducted in public, and you will have every day the papers of the country filled with sensational headlines whether there is ground for believing that there is any wrongdoing or not, and the people will be reading that sort of thing instead of paying attention to the war effort of the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do you think the Trueman committee is a bad committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not making any comment on what is taking place in other countries, but I say to my hon. friend that when it comes to choosing between the method of carrying on parliamentary business in the United Kingdom and in the United States respectively, I prefer to follow the British practice.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is what you did not do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hour is late, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not go farther into the matter, but I wish to repeat that we are in times that are very grave indeed, much graver than hon. members have yet begun to realize, and we are heading rapidly into a situation which will be the most desperate this world has known. I say, therefore, that for any body of gentlemen to refuse to assist the government in every way they possibly can in this war effort, in effecting economies, or to ask the government to take a step which will confuse the public mind and divert it from the winning of the war, into an effort to win elections and make political capital—

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —is to take a step—

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege and I want the Prime Minister to sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will tell my hon. friend—

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, a member always has the floor. The Prime Minister knows that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is that?

Mr. GRAYDON: A question of privilege always has the floor. I have the floor and I am asking the Prime Minister to sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not sit down at my hon. friend's request.

Mr. GRAYDON: At the request of the Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly; and so far as His Honour the Speaker is concerned I am quite prepared to follow the rules of this house. But I am not going to—

Mr. GRAYDON: I have the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You haven't got it yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is not going to tell me to sit down.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have asked you to sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down yourself.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman wish to rise to a question of privilege?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and the question of privilege is this. The Prime Minister again, of course, has become very much exercised—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. GRAYDON: The question of privilege is this. The Prime Minister has made a very serious charge against me and against this group which I at the moment lead, and that is, that instead of confining our efforts to winning the war we are now bending our efforts towards the winning of elections.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want him to withdraw that remark. It is not becoming the Prime Minister, and I know that if he were not in such a heat he would not make such a statement.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is something he would not do, of course.

Mr. SPEAKER: The statement of the Prime Minister, as I heard it, was not a charge against the leader of the opposition—

An hon. MEMBER: No personal motives at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: —nor against the hon. gentleman representing the Conservative party.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who represents that party?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Bracken. He is not here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The statement was an expression which is very common across the floor of the house and I do not think a question of privilege arises out of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: There should be no applause when a statement is made from the Chair. It is the duty of the Chair to look after the interests of both sides of the house and I deprecate deeply any applause given when a statement is made from the Chair.

Mr. GOLDING: Just before the vote is taken—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.20 p.m. until Thursday, at 3 o'clock p.m., pursuant to special order made Monday, February 21, 1944.

Thursday, February 24, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIVILEGE, MR. ROSE—ROOM ACCOMMODATION IN PARLIAMENT BUILDING

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. For a month or or more I have been waiting patiently to be assigned a room in this building. I did not want to bring up this matter in this house, believing that there were many more important matters which should be dealt with but I have pleaded with you, Mr. Speaker, and with the Clerk of the House without being able to get any satisfaction. I have had the job of mailing out my speeches; I keep my mail in a box somewhere in one of the rooms, but I have no proper accommodation, and I feel that the time has come when I must speak up, since apparently there is no other way of getting satisfaction. We talk about complacency. I have found a great deal of it, with people unwilling to move their desks in order to make it possible for another hon. member to do his duty to his electors, and I am afraid that reflects another sort of complacency among many hon. members here. As I say, I have waited patiently, but now I bring this matter to the attention of the house in the hope that I may get satisfaction. I do not believe it should have been necessary to mention it in this house; the matter should have been attended to the day I arrived here, and I should not have had to wait four weeks without result.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has a grievance which I think he has a right to express. I would point out to the hon. gentleman and to the house that I have been endeavouring to see that a room was provided for the hon. member, which would mean that changes would have to be made in the rooms at present occupied by other hon. members of the house. I have met with very little cooperation on the part of hon. members when these necessary alterations were suggested, but now that the hon. gentleman has placed the matter before the house I may state that I shall have to exercise the authority resting with the Speaker of the house, and I expect to receive cooperation from hon. members. There may be some inconvenience, but the hon. gentleman is entitled to the use of a room, and he must get it.

WAR EXPENDITURES

First report of special committee on war expenditures.—Mr. Cleaver.

SOCIAL SECURITY

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE STANDS

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Queens) presented the first report of special committee on social security and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this urgent? This report was presented only to-day, and concurrence cannot be moved without consent.

Mr. MACMILLAN: There is some urgency, because we desire to reduce the number necessary for a quorum. It will make it much easier to get a quorum. If the hon. member objects, we can let it stand.

Motion stands.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO SETTING UP OF EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE COUNCIL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an announcement which I think will be of interest to hon. members.

In conformity with the government's announced policy of promoting employee representation in private industry and the improvement of industrial relations generally, the treasury board has decided to provide for the setting up of an employer-employee council in the public service of Canada. In working out this policy the treasury board will accept as its general model, with the necessary adaptations to suit Canadian conditions, the pattern which has been evolved in the United Kingdom through the application of so-called Whitley councils to the British public service. The board is therefore providing immediately for the establishment of a national joint council of the public service of Canada equally representative of the official and staff sides of the public service, but, as it is desirable that the new organization and procedure should evolve as a result of consultation and general discussion rather than being imposed from above in any cut and dried fashion, we are immediately suggesting a tentative constitution of the new joint council and wish to have the council itself give the fullest consideration to all questions relating to its permanent organization and procedure and to make recommendations for a permanent constitution to the treasury board within a specified period.

Initially, the national joint council is to consist of six representatives of the official or employer side of the public service, and six representatives of the staff or employee side. The Civil Service Federation, the Civil Service Association, the Amalgamated Civil Servants, the Professional Institute, and the Dominion Customs and Excise Officers' Association are each being asked to name one representative to the council, and the three organizations which represent the postal employees are being asked to select one representative to represent them. The treasury board will itself nominate six senior civil servants to act as the representatives of the government, included amongst whom will be a representative of the Civil Service Commission.

The national joint council will act in an advisory capacity to the treasury board in all matters affecting the conditions of work in the public service. In certain fields their recommendations may appropriately be made directly to the Civil Service Commission. The council will, of course, not have any executive powers which would impair the responsibility of the cabinet or treasury board or Civil Service Commission, or possibly infringe upon the authority of parliament. While the council's functions will therefore be advisory only, it is clear that if both sides take their responsibilities seriously and endeavour to make the new organization a means of promoting better understanding, improved morale and greater efficiency in the civil service, any recommendations of the council reached by agreement should carry great weight with the treasury board and the Civil Service Commission.

The general purpose of the national joint council will be to secure a greater measure of cooperation between the state in its capacity of employer and the general body of civil servants in matters affecting the civil service, with a view to increased efficiency in the public service combined with the well-being of those employed; to provide machinery for dealing with grievances and for making suggestions for improved efficiency; and generally to bring together the experience and different points of view of representatives of the administrative, clerical and manipulative sides of the civil service.

More specifically, the duties of the national council will be:

(a) to recommend to the treasury board the best means for securing to the staff a greater share in and greater responsibility for the determination and observance of the conditions under which their duties are carried out, and in particular to consider and report to the treasury board not later than June 30, 1944, on a permanent constitution for the national joint council of the public service of Canada, on the advisability of providing for the establishment of various departmental or district joint councils, and, if such are recommended, on the organization and procedure of such joint councils and their relationship to the national joint council;

(b) to make recommendations to the treasury board or the Civil Service Commission, as the case may require, regarding the general principles governing conditions of service in the public service of Canada, including recruitment, training, hours of work, promotions, discipline, tenure, remuneration and superannuation;

(c) to recommend to the treasury board or the Civil Service Commission, or both, the best means for utilizing the ideas and experience of the staff;

(d) to make recommendations to the Civil Service Commission regarding the encouragement of the further education of civil servants and their training in higher administration and organization;

(e) to make recommendations to the treasury board or the Civil Service Commission, or both, regarding the improvement of office procedures and organization and the provision of opportunities for the full consideration of suggestions by the staff on this subject; and

(f) to make recommendations to the treasury board regarding proposed legislation in so far as it has a bearing upon the position of civil servants in relation to their employment.

In the tentative constitution which is being provided for the national joint council, provision is being made for the holding of regular and special meetings, for the appointment of a chairman (who shall be a representative of the treasury board) and a vice-chairman (who shall be a representative of the staff side and chosen by the staff representatives), for the filling of vacancies, and for other procedural and organizational matters.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY FOR COMING MILK YEAR

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I desire to make an announcement of government policy on milk and other dairy products covering the milk year which begins May 1, 1944, and continues until April 30, 1945.

I should like at the outset of my remarks to record the appreciation of the government of the splendid job which the dairy producers of Canada have done and are continuing to do on production in spite of difficulties. The season of 1942-43 was unusually favourable and a record production was secured. The latter half of the season of 1943-44 has been very unfavourable and milk producers have done a remarkably good job in maintaining milk production at high levels.

The chief difficulty beginning in November was related to a short supply of feed in eastern Canada, resulting from the poorest crop which eastern Canada has harvested in fifty years. Realizing the danger of a drop in supplies the government increased the subsidies on all dairy products between October 1, 1943, and April 30, 1944. This, together with assistance given toward the movement of feed grain from the West, has resulted in fair supplies under extremely difficult circumstances.

It is hoped that weather conditions will be more favourable throughout 1944, although it is recognized that to the extent that grain feed is required an improvement in the position cannot come until a new crop is harvested in the east. By far the greater part of dairy production will, however, depend upon pastures during the early part of the season, and to that extent costs will be reduced as compared with the winter season.

The new subsidy levels are therefore placed on a lower plane in the first five months than they were during the last seven months of the preceding year, but on most items will be placed at the same level for the last seven months.

The subsidies for the year 1943-44 were as follows:

	May 1, 1943 to Sept. 30, 1943	Oct. 1, 1943 to April 30, 1944
Fluid milk	25 cents a hundred	55 cents a hundred (excepting in certain districts where it is 25 cents)
Cheese (milk)	Nil	30 cents a hundred
Butter	8 cents lb. butterfat to Dec. 31	10 cents lb. butterfat Jan. 1 to April 30
Concentrated whole milk	Nil	30 cents a hundred

The subsidies for the year 1944-45 will be as follows:

	May 1 to Sept. 30, 1944	Oct. 1, 1944 to April 30, 1945
Fluid milk	35 cents a hundred (except in certain districts where it will continue to be 25 cents)	55 cents a hundred
Cheese (milk)	20 cents a hundred	20 cents a hundred
Butter	10 cents lb. butterfat	10 cents lb. butterfat
Concentrated whole milk	15 cents a hundred	30 cents a hundred

It will be noted that in respect of fluid milk there are some districts where there are exceptions to the subsidies suggested. In certain districts subsidies have been 25 cents throughout the year, and those subsidies will be continued.

We are at present negotiating a contract with Great Britain for cheese, which we hope will provide for Britian to take all the cheese we can provide during the next two years. Any surpluses of butter or canned milk which may result can be marketed in Britain.

We think these subsidies, along with the floor under prices already provided through our agreements and otherwise for dairy products, should result, if weather is favourable, in a record production in dairy products in 1944.

We therefore feel justified in urging the highest possible production of cheese in the cheese producing areas, the highest possible production of butter in the butter producing areas, the utilization of duplex plants for cheese in summer and butter in fall and winter seasons where duplex plants exist, and the production of whole milk tributary to cities and processing plants turning out commodities desired in our war effort.

We are taking authority through the food board to direct plants to depend upon the same sources for milk supply as in a previous year. We are most anxious that butter and fluid milk supplies should meet domestic requirements, and that cheese should be available for both domestic and allied markets.

Mr. TUSTIN: Does the twenty cents per hundred for cheese milk apply for the whole year?

Mr. GARDINER: That is right.

Mr. SENN: Would the Minister of Agriculture clarify the statement he has just made by saying in what years or under what conditions the subsidy on fluid milk will not be paid?

Mr. GARDINER: I think that would be too long a statement to make, Mr. Speaker, under any circumstances, but I could not make it at the moment with the information at hand.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

FREE RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION FOR MEMBERS OF HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 6, to amend the railway act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: This bill proposes to amend the Railway Act in order to provide certain concessions in railway fares to our soldiers during this war. At the present time the Railway Act does not provide any special concessions for soldiers; it applies only to civilians. The board of transport commissioners has no power to order any special rates for soldiers. During the last war soldiers were carried for half fare during week-ends and during this war they are carried for half fare on all days. However, the camps are located all across Canada and there should be some body such as the transport commission which should have power over it, to see that fares are reasonable, grant any necessary concessions, and eliminate any discrimination against our soldiers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SAINT JOHN-HALIFAX AIR SERVICE

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Did the Canadian Pacific Air Lines Limited apply to the government or the board of transport commissioners for permission to institute an air service between Saint John, New Brunswick, and Halifax, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, when was such application received?

3. Did the applicants state when the service would be started if permission were granted?

4. Was an exclusive franchise asked for?

5. Was the request of the company granted?

6. Did the boards of trade of Saint John and Halifax make a joint application to the board of transport commissioners in November last to grant a licence to responsible persons to operate a commercial air service between the two cities?

7. Did the board of transport commissioners grant the licence?

8. Has the governor in council named Saint John, New Brunswick, and Halifax, Nova Scotia, as places between which the board of transport commissioners may license aircraft to transport passengers and goods under the provisions of part 3 of the Transport Act, 1938, and if not, why has it not done so?

9. Is it the intention of the government to establish an air service between Saint John, New Brunswick, and Halifax, Nova Scotia, and if so, when will the service commence to operate?

Mr. HOWE:

1 and 2. Yes. To the board of transport commissioners, under date November 6, and to the Department of Transport, under date November 11, 1943.

3. No.

4. This point was not raised.

5. No.

6. Yes.

7. No.

8. No. By order in council, P.C. 976, of April 27, 1939, part III of The Transport Act, 1938, was made applicable to transport by air by means of interurban air transport services between "Moncton-St. John-Halifax". Subsequently the Maritime provinces were declared a prohibited flying area under the defence air regulations, and for this reason, said order in council was rescinded by order in council, P.C. 4040, of December 8, 1939.

9. Trans-Canada Air Lines has been authorized by order in council, P.C. 6256, of August 6, 1943, made pursuant to the "Trans-Canada contract" authorized under The Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, to establish a service between Blissville, N.B., and Halifax which will be placed in operation immediately upon the completion of a radio range now under construction at an intermediate aerodrome on the route between Saint John and Halifax.

PERSONNEL RECRUITED IN ONTARIO AND SHOWN AS RECRUITED IN QUEBEC

Mr. WHITE:

1. Have any persons recruited in Ontario since the beginning of the war to date, and sent to Quebec without being given their regimental number, been shown as recruited from Quebec?

2. If so, what is the number of such recruits?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. See answer to question No. 2.

2. There are no records which show the number of persons, if any, recruited in Ontario for Quebec or the number, if any, sent from Ontario to Quebec without being given their regimental number.

The records maintained at national defence headquarters do not give the number of men who may have gone from Ontario to Quebec to enlist. An examination of all the enlistment papers in the military districts of Quebec which would involve a tremendous amount of work, and then would not show those recruited in Ontario but would only show the number of those enlisting in Quebec who gave Ontario as their home address and such men would not necessarily have been recruited in Ontario.

BOOKLET "THE COMPLETE FLYING COURSE"—N. ROY HARBEN, D.F.C.

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. How many copies of the book entitled "The Complete Flying Course", by N. Roy Harben, D.F.C., were purchased?
2. What was the date of the original order, and who authorized the purchase?
3. What was the cost per copy?
4. How many copies were distributed, and how was its distribution effected?
5. By whose authority has the salvage officer, J. C. Kelley, called for tenders for 3,844 copies, as per circular No. G.S. 6066?
6. What is the official status of N. Roy Harben, D.F.C.?
7. Was he in the employ of the government?
8. If so, what salary or remuneration did he receive, and is he in the government service at this time?

Mr. MACMILLAN:

1. 5,325.

2. 27th January, 1940 by acting air member for organization and training, air commodore now Air Marshal L. S. Breadner.

3. $1.50.

4. 5,191 copies were distributed according to scale of issue for various schools—75 copies to initial training schools, 60 to elementary flying training schools and 105 to service flying training schools.

5. By memorandum of 21st December, 1943 from deputy director of publications concurred in by director of staff duties. Eighty per cent of those offered for sale have been returned from units after being used in training.

6, 7 and 8. When this publication was produced in 1938, Mr. Harben was the owner and civilian manager of Air Schools Ltd., Derby, England. His company carried on the elementary training of pilots for the R.A.F.

On the outbreak of war Mr. Harben, a reserve officer of the R.A.F., was brought back to active duty as a wing commander R.A.F. and as such carries on his peacetime profession of training R.A.F. pilots in elementary flying.

He has never been an employee of the Canadian government.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. BENCE:

1. How many charges were laid in Canada for violation of the wartime prices and trade board regulations and orders, and administrators' regulations and orders in, (a) 1942; (b) 1943?
2. How many of such charges were abandoned before proceeding to trial in, (a) 1942; (b) 1943?
3. What was the total number of convictions obtained as the result of such charges in, (a) 1942; (b) 1943?
4. What was the total amount of fines collected as the result of such convictions in, (a) 1942; (b) 1943?
5. What was the total amount of lawyers' fees incurred by the government as result of such charges in, (a) 1942; (b) 1943?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. The number of persons charged in Canada with alleged violations of wartime prices and trade board regulations and orders including administrators' regulations and orders was: (a) in the year 1942, 1,285; (b) in the year 1943, 3,792.

2. The number of the foregoing charges abandoned before proceeding to trial was: (a) in the year 1942, 91; (b) in the year 1943, 206.

3. The total number of convictions obtained as a result of such charges was: (a) in the year 1942, 1,107; (b) in the year 1943, 3,369.

4. Total amount of fines collected and deposited to the credit of the receiver general as a result of convictions and charges laid for violation of the wartime prices and trade board regulations and orders was (a) in the year 1942, $53,633.23, (b) in the year 1943, $185,-534.61.

5. Total amount of lawyers' fees and disbursements paid by the wartime prices and trade board as a result of charges laid for violation of the wartime prices and trade board regulations (a) in the year 1942, $27,483.46; (b) in the year 1943, $100,972.54.

ENEMY ALIENS—APPLICATIONS FOR NATURALIZATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. SHAW:

1. How many enemy aliens have made application for certificates of naturalization since September 1, 1939?
2. How many such applications have been approved and certificates issued?
3. How many certificates of naturalization have been issued since September 1, 1939, to enemy aliens who made application for naturalization prior to the outbreak of war?
4. How many certificates of naturalization have been issued to enemy alien members of the Canadian armed forces since January 1, 1943, who, (a) made application prior to enlistment; (b) made application following enlistment; (c) made no application?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Statistics are not compiled on the basis of dates of applications for naturalization but only in respect to certificates issued.

2. See answer to No. 1 above.

3. For reason stated in answer to No. 1 it is not possible to state what certificates have been issued in respect to applications prior to the outbreak of war. The certificates issued to former nationals of enemy countries are shown in the following statement:

	Finland	Germany
Sept. 1/39.....	...	263

METALS CONTROL

Mr. ESLING:

1. How many properties in Canada are being operated by the metals control board?

2. What is the total tonnage recovered as from January 1, 1940?

3. What is the value thereof?

4. How many properties in British Columbia were developed by the metals control board?

5. What was the total expenditure on each of these properties?

6. For what period was each property operated?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Wartime metals corporation have operated or are operating twelve properties.

2. 3,046,355 tons treated to December 31, 1943, to produce 80,943,472 lbs., recoverable metals.

3. The value of the contained metals at current market prices approximated $10,000,000.

4. Four.

5. To December 31, 1943:

	Capital expenditure	Operating expenditure
Twin "J".....	$270,445	$158,680
Kootenay Florence	181,681	140,241

6. Twin "J"—December, 1942, to present; Kootenay Florence—December, 1942, to present; Emerald Tungsten—October, 1942, to September 15, 1943; Lava Talc—October, 1943, to present.

R.C.A.F. AND R.A.F.—CANADIANS DECORATED FOR GALLANTRY

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many members of the R.C.A.F. have been decorated for gallantry in the present war?

2. What are the names and home addresses of the recipients of each of these awards for gallantry?

3. How many Canadians in the R.A.F. have been decorated for gallantry in the present war?

4. What are the names and home addresses of the recipients of each of these awards for gallantry?

5. How many members of the R.C.A.F. and Canadians in the R.A.F. have been decorated for gallantry by allied governments in the present war?

6. What are the names and home addresses of the recipients of these awards for gallantry from allied governments?

Mr. MACMILLAN: In honour of the more than 1,200 young Canadians who have received awards for gallantry, this somewhat extensive information is given as an ordinary answer rather than as an order for return. It is believed that every hon. member would wish to have printed on Hansard the names and home addresses of these gallant young Canadians in tribute to their splendid achievements, of which Canada is so proud.

1. At 17th February, 1944, members of the R.C.A.F. decorated for gallantry in the present war numbered 1,080.

2. See appendix "A".

3. At 17th February, 1944, Canadians in the R.A.F. decorated for gallantry in the present war numbered 164.

4. See appendix "B".

NOTE:—The R.C.A.F. can assume no responsibility for the correctness of appendix "B". However, the list has been compiled from official documents provided by the R.A.F. Home addresses are included where available.

5. At 17th February, 1944, members of the R.C.A.F. and Canadians in the R.A.F. decorated for gallantry by allied governments in the present war numbered 17.

6. See appendix "C".

UNEMPLOYMENT, 1943-44

Mr. KNOWLES:

How many persons, by provinces, were registered as unemployed on January 31, July 31, October 31, November 30, December 31, 1943, and January 31, 1944?

Mr. MARTIN: As the local employment and selective service offices report weekly, the information asked for is given as at the nearest dates to the end of the month.

Total applicants registered at employment and selective service offices by provinces and specified dates were as follows:

	January 28, 1943	July 29, 1943	October 28, 1943	December 2, 1943	December 30, 1943	January 27, 1944

It is inevitable that a certain number of people should always be registered as unemployed with local selective service offices. There are those who are regularly seeking and accepting short term or casual employment. There is also the group of people who are changing jobs.

CANADIAN FORCES—ALLOWANCES ON DISCHARGE—INCOME TAX

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Is the clothing allowance of $65 paid to other ranks on honourable discharge from the services regarded as taxable income for the year in which it is granted?

2. Is the gratuity of one month's pay and allowances granted to officers on retirement and other ranks on honourable discharge regarded as taxable income for the year in which it is granted?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. Not taxable income to recipient.

2. If the recipient, officer or other rank, is, as such, a taxable person, then the gratuity if paid in respect of services rendered is taxable.

LOANS BY BANK OF CANADA TO CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. McGEER:

1. What amounts of money have been loaned by the Bank of Canada to, (a) the Bank of Montreal; (b) the Royal Bank of Canada; (c) the Canadian Bank of Commerce; (d) the Bank of Nova Scotia; (e) the Bank of Toronto; (f) the Dominion Bank; (g) the Imperial Bank of Canada; (h) Barclays Bank; (i) Banque Canadienne Nationale; (j) Banque Provinciale du Canada, during each of the following years: 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943?

2. What was the period of time of each loan?

3. What was the rate of interest paid?

4. What was the amount of interest paid by each of the said banks in each of the said years?

Mr. ABBOTT: I spoke to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who asked this question, and he has agreed to allow me to reply to it by showing the total amounts of money advanced by the Bank of Canada to the different banks and the Quebec savings banks, rather than the amounts advanced to the individual institutions. It was not felt proper that the bank should disclose its transactions with individual clients. Similarly, we are showing the rate of interest prevailing on such advances during the period for which he is asking but not the amounts paid to the bank by each individual institution.

1, 2 and 4. The following table shows the total amount of loans or advances to the chartered banks and Quebec savings banks as reported in the weekly or monthly statements issued by the Bank of Canada during the years 1935-1943:

3. The Bank of Canada's rediscount rate was 2½ per cent from March 11, 1935, the date on which it commenced operations, to February 7, 1944, as of which date the rate was reduced to 1½ per cent. This was the rate of interest charged on all advances granted to chartered banks and Quebec savings banks during the years 1935-43.

OFFICERS' TRAINING CENTRES

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. Is the training of officers for the Canadian army being carried on at the present time in officers' training centres in Canada?

2. If so, how many men are now in training in the various officers' training centres in Canada?

3. How many officers, graduates of officers' training centres in Canada, are now awaiting appointment to active duty?

4. Have all the officers who have graduated from officers' training centres in Canada and who are still awaiting appointment to active duty volunteered for service overseas?

5. Have all the men now in training for officers in officers' training centres in Canada volunteered for active service overseas?

6. What portion of available officers whose training is completed will be required for service overseas?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Yes.

2. 978, of which 97 are officers such as medical officers, dental officers, chaplains, etc., who are appointed to the active army in commissioned rank and are required to undergo special courses on appointment.

3. All qualified officers on the strength of the Canadian active army, who are not disabled by injury or sickness or are not on leave, are on active duty.

4. See answer 3. All officers on the strength of the Canadian active army have volunteered for overseas service.

5. Yes.

6. Portion of officers required for overseas is dependent upon future operations and the exigencies of the service. All who are qualified by age and physical fitness are at call for service overseas as required.

WARTIME HOUSING—CONTRIBUTIONS TO COST OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What was the total or over-all cost per unit of houses erected under the wartime housing plan in the districts of Hull, Quebec; Oshawa, Hamilton, St. Catharines and Niagara Falls, Ontario?

2. Has any portion of the over-all cost of such houses in any of these centres been paid for by authorities or persons other than the Wartime Housing Limited?

3. If so, at what place or district, and what is the amount of such contribution in each case and in total; and by what authority were such contributions made?

Mr. HOWE:

1.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—PROFITS ON WAR CONTRACTS

Mr. STOKES:

1. Has the Minister of Munitions and Supply exercised his power under subsection 4 of section 13 of the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, chapter 8 of the statutes of Canada, 1943?

2. If so, what contract or contracts were found by the minister to be yielding "an unreasonable profit", as set forth in the said act.

3. What sums have been paid to the receiver general on the ditrection of the minister as authorized in the said act, and by whom were such sums paid?

Mr. HOWE:

1. In no case has it been necessary to exercise the powers given under subsection 4 of section 13 of the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. It has been found preferable to enter renegotiation proceedings on a less formal basis and in all cases in which the negotiations have been completed, a satisfactory price adjustment has been made on an amicable basis. Excellent cooperation has been received from the manufacturers and in a number of cases the initiative leading to important refunds has come from the contractor himself.

2. In the above circumstances and as unreasonable profits frequently stem from cost reductions due to the discovery of new manufacturing techniques or to other causes creditable to the contractor, it is not deemed equitable to disclose the names of the contractors concerned. There are, however, approximately sixty-seven manufacturers whose contracts have been or are the subject of renegotiation of one type or another.

3. It is not possible at this time to give an accurate statement of the amount recovered, and to be recovered under renegotiation arrangements, as the final figures will be subject to determination by the treasury cost accountants whose work in this matter is not complete. Moreover, renegotiation of certain ship contracts included an abandonment of the right to claims for extra and increased costs under the escalator clauses for amounts not easily calculable.

MONTREAL LAKE INDIAN RESERVE—TIMBER LIMITS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What timber limits have been put up for tender in each year since 1939 in the Montreal lake Indian reserve?

2. Were any tenders received? If so, by whom, and what was the amount of each?

3. To whom were sales made, and at what price?

4. Were any sold or disposed of without tender? If so, to whom, and at what price?

[Mr. Howe.]

5. Have any logging or lumbering operations been conducted on any of said timber limits during the said years? If so, (a) by whom; (b) how much has each of the operators removed?

6. Have the Indians occupying said reserve been asked to surrender any of their rights in the said limits?

7. Were any of said limits sold without public tender? If so, why?

8. What check, if any, is being made by the departent on the timber being cut on each of the said limits?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. 1939, Nil; 1940, Timber berth No. 4; 1941, Nil; 1942, Nil; 1943, Timber berths 1 and 2; part of timber berth No. 3.

2. Yes.

For berth No. 4:

By Wm. A. Bear, Indian, for spruce timber, at $3 per M f.b.m.

By Lumber Manufacturers Limited, Saskatoon, as follows—Spruce, $3.02 per M f.b.m.; Pine and birch, $2.50 per M f.b.m.; Balsam pulpwood, 75 cents per cord; Ties, jack pine, 10 cents per tie; Tamarack or jack pine piling, 2 cents per lin. ft.; Posts, tamarack, 2 cents per post; Cordwood, 25 cents per cord.

For berths Nos. 1 and 2:

By Brooks Construction Company, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, for white spruce timber, at $3.75 per M f.b.m.

For part of berth No. 3:

By Prince Albert Lumber Company, Limited, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, for spruce saw timber, at $4.50 per M f.b.m.

By Hertzog Bros., Tweedsmuir, Saskatchewan, as follows—White spruce saw timber, $5.75 per M f.b.m.; White poplar saw timber, $1.75 per M f.b.m.; Birch saw timber, $2.75 per M f.b.m.

3. Berth No. 4: To Wm. A. Bear, Indian, at $3 per M f.b.m. for spruce timber.

Berths Nos. 1 and 2: To Brooks Construction Company, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, at $3.75 per M f.b.m. for white spruce timber.

Berth No. 3: This block of timber was not sold, and has been retained for the Indians at their own request.

4. No.

5. Yes (a) and (b): Wm. A. Bear on berth No. 4, 448,440 f.b.m. to date; Brooks Construction Company, on berths Nos. 1 and 2, 315,755 f.b.m. to date.

6. Yes, and surrender accepted by governor in council by P.C. 298, dated February 9, 1939.

7. Yes. In order to save time the firms operating in the district were asked by wire if they were interested in submitting a tender to purchase the spruce timber on berths Nos.

1 and 2, this timber being urgently required for war purposes. The only tender received was from the Brooks Construction Company. The price offered was $3.75 per M f.b.m. and was accepted after being certified to be fair and reasonable by the supervisor, prices division, timber control office.

8. Returns are in the form of affidavits and are signed by qualified scalers. Cutting operations are under the supervision of the Indian agent.

MEAT AND BACON BOARDS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. Are any members of the meat board employed by or connected with the meat packing industry?

2. If so, in what capacity?

3. What was the amount of, (a) pay; (b) allowance; (c) travelling expenses, paid to each member of the bacon board during its operation?

4. Was any complete audited report of the operations of the bacon board published by the government?

5. Is any arrangement made for the publishing of a report of the operations of the present meat board?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. S. E. Todd.

2. Managing-director, industrial and development council of Canadian meat packers.

3. (a) Nil, (b) (December, 1939 to June, 1943), allowance for living expenses incurred during board meetings and to and from such meetings: J. G. Taggart, $2,130; L. C. McOuat, $2,164; S. E. Todd, $1,674; A. Morin, $324; (c) (December, 1939 to June, 1943), transportation to and from board meetings: J. G. Taggart, $1,351.82; L. C. McOuat, $98.50; S. E. Todd, $836.08; A. Morin, $171.75.

CONVERSION OF DREDGE "FIELDING" INTO OIL TANKER—COST OF FREIGHTERS

Mr. GILLIS:

1. What was the cost of converting the dredge Fielding into an oil tanker?
2. What is the cost of one of the 4,000-ton freighters built in the Saint John, New Brunswick, drydock?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The work of conversion on this dredge was not completed until November, 1943, and the final cost has not yet been determined.
2. The final cost has not yet been determined.

DISTRIBUTION OF RAW SUGAR LANDED AT HALIFAX

Mr. ISNOR:

1. In connection with the raw sugar landed in Halifax in January, 1944, what are the names of firms and locations to whom sugar was distributed, and what amount to each?
2. Was the sugar ordered by the sugar administrator or by individual firms? If the latter, give names of firms with quantities ordered.

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. It is not considered desirable to disclose current transactions relating to the business of individual firms. To do so would give information of value to competitors. Revelation of the total amount of sugar landed at Halifax in this period might make it possible for the enemy to draw inferences regarding the movement of ships on the high seas.
2. All importations of sugar into Canada are ordered by the sugar administrator.

COST OF QUEBEC CONFERENCE, 1943

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

What was the total cost to the Canadian government of the Quebec conference held during August and September, 1943?

Mr. McLARTY: Including expenditure in connection with the visit of the President of the United States to Ottawa, $366,596.27.

BATAWA, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Is there a post office at Batawa, Ontario?
2. If so, when was it opened?
3. What is the name of the postmaster?
4. When was he appointed, and by whom?
5. Is the postmaster a returned soldier?
6. If not, were returned soldiers considered for the position?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Yes.
2. 7 July, 1943.
3. James Arnold Stickle.
4. 7 July, 1943; by the Postmaster General.
5. No.
6. No returned soldier applied.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

LABOUR DEPARTMENT—GEORGE HODGE—P.C. 9384

Mr. ROSE:

1. Has George Hodge, a C.P.R. executive, been in the employ of the labour department at any time since the beginning of the war?
2. If so, since when, and in what position?
3. How much salary and how much expense money has he received since his employment?
4. What were his duties in different positions he has held?
5. If he is not now in the employ of the labour department, to what government bodies is he attached?
6. Was it within the scope of his responsibility to assist in the preparation of wage control order P.C. 9384?
7. If so, on what points in the order was his advice taken?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Yes.

2. Mr. Hodge was a member of an industrial disputes inquiry commission which was appointed in June, 1941. Mr. Hodge has not functioned on this board since the national war labour board was established in November, 1941.

In November, 1941, at the request of the then Minister of Labour, Hon. N. A. McLarty, the Canadian Pacific Railway made Mr. Hodge available, without salary, to act as a member of the national war labour board. He subsequently became a member of the executive committee of three.

Since the national war labour board was reconstituted in February, 1943, Mr. Hodge has served as a technical adviser to the board, a full-time post; as a member of the national war labour committee, and as a member of the national selective service advisory board.

Mr. Hodge was a member of the former national labour supply council. As such Mr. Hodge was not technically in the employ of the Department of Labour.

3. Mr. Hodge has at no time received any salary from the Department of Labour. He has been paid only actual expenses incurred by him as undernoted:

Number of days: fiscal year 1941-42, 142; fiscal year 1942-43, 362; fiscal year 1943-44 (to January 31, 1944), 304; total, 808.

Total expense: fiscal year 1941-42, $1,458.79; fiscal year 1942-43, $3,955.91; fiscal year 1943-44 (to January 31, 1944), $2,820.36; total $8,235.06.

Average per day: fiscal year 1941-42, $10.27; fiscal year 1942-43, $10.93; fiscal year 1943-44 (to January 31, 1944), $9.28; total, $10.19.

It should be noted that fees paid to Mr. Hodge as a member of the industrial disputes inquiry commission under order in council P.C. 4020 are not included in the above figures. These amounted to: remuneration at $20 per day, 1941-42, $1,440; actual travelling expenses, 1941-42, $707.27.

4. As a member of the industrial disputes inquiry commission, Mr. Hodge was required, together with other members of the commission, to make a preliminary inquiry into all disputes referred to the commission by the Minister of Labour.

In respect to the national war labour board, Mr. Hodge fulfilled the normal functions of an executive officer while a member of the executive committee. He now serves as a technical adviser to the board and is a member of the national war labour committee.

As a member of the national selective service advisory board, Mr. Hodge participates with other members in matters affecting national selective service.

5. See answers to questions 1 and 2.

6 and 7. It was not within the scope of Mr. Hodge's responsibility to assist in the determination of the provisions of wage control order P.C. 9384. Departmental officers of finance, justice and labour, whose duty it was to prepare draft of order in accordance with instructions, consulted others, among them Mr. Hodge in view of his experience in the administration of previous wage control orders, in regard to the phraseology of operative provisions of the order for their application in practice in accordance with regulations to be made effective as already determined upon.

CANADIAN ARMY—DESERTIONS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. How many of the 11,000 deserters from the Canadian army who have been apprehended have been tried by court-martial?

2. How many of them have been executed?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. 3,215 men have been tried by court martial on charges of desertion in Canada from the outbreak of war up to February 15, 1944.

2. No men have been executed for desertion from the Canadian army since the outbreak of war.

TOTAL ESTIMATES AND REVENUE

Mr. LACOMBE:

MEAT BOARD—ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. Are the administrative expenses of the bacon and meat board a charge against the products marketed under this board?

2. What has been the profit or loss in connection with the operation of the bacon or meat board on each of the contracts made with Great Britain on bacon since the outbreak of the war?

3. If profits have accrued, what disposal has been made of same?

4. What have been the expenses of the board in the years 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943 under, (a) salaries; (b) office expenses; (c) travelling and other expenses?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No.

2. The net operating margin under the first three bacon agreements were as follows:

First agreement (1939-1940), surplus, $1,317,912; second agreement (1940-41), deficit, $509,671; third agreement (1941-1942), deficit, $807,536.

Final figures are not yet available with respect to operations under the fourth agreement (1942-43).

3. Any moneys which have accumulated in the reserve fund of the board have been eventually disbursed through increases in the price paid for bacon for export to the United Kingdom. Hog producers benefited by this action through securing corresponding increases in hog prices.

4. Bacon and Meat Board Expenses

	1941-1942	1942-1943	1943-1944[2]
Salaries	$25,537.41	$28,681.39	$24,149.52

CANADIAN FORCES—OVERSEAS UNITS BROKEN UP OR DISBANDED

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many units of the Canadian army have been broken up or disbanded after their arrival overseas?

2. What are the names of these units, and at the time of being broken up or disbanded who commanded each of them, and what was the approximate strength of each of them?

3. What was done with the non-commissioned officers and men of these units after they were broken up or disbanded?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, for security reasons this question cannot be answered, and I ask that it be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

COAL CONTROLLER—COST OF POSTERS

Mr. REID:

1. What amount of money has been expended by the coal controller during the present fiscal year, up to the end of January, 1944, for posters?

2. In this connection, (a) what amount of paper was used; (b) what was the cost of such paper; (c) what was the cost of printing?

Mr. HOWE:

1. $5,623.25.

2. (a) 15,990 pounds; (b) $1,430.97; (c) printing, freight and tax, $4,192.28.

CHARTERED BANKS—ENLISTED EMPLOYEES—LIFE INSURANCE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. NAVAL SERVICES—ADMIRAL NELLES

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Why has Admiral Nelles been transferred outside of Canada to a post in the United Kingdom?

2. To what extent is the policy of the Royal Canadian Navy directed from the said post in the United Kingdom?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. In view of the larger number of R.C.N. ships and men serving in the European theatre and in view of impending events there, it was considered desirable that an officer of flag rank be sent to the United Kingdom, and Vice-Admiral Nelles was accordingly selected to fill this post.

2. The policy of the Royal Canadian Navy is directed entirely by the government of Canada, the war committee of the cabinet of Canada, and naval service headquarters at Ottawa.

INCOME TAX—INDIVIDUAL AND CORPORATION EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING, ETC.

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. To what extent are expenses for the maintenance of public relations counsel deductible from the income of persons or corporations, (a) in respect to public relations counsel employed by such persons or corporations; (b) in respect to contributions to independent public relations counsel?

2. To what extent are expenses for advertising of a political nature deductible from the income of persons or corporations before taxation thereof?

3. To what extent are expenses or contributions in respect to political parties deductible from income before taxation thereof?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. (a) and (b) To the extent necessarily incurred to maintain and earn the income of the payor, along with other necessary expenses, but not to the extent that they are deemed to be in excess of what is reasonable or normal for the business carried on by the taxpayer.

2. Not at all.

3. Not at all.

POST-WAR AVIATION CONFERENCE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the government been advised of a proposal to hold a conference on post-war international aviation matters in the United States in the near future? If so, where will the conference be held, and on what date?

2. Will Canada be represented at this conference? If so, by whom?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government knows of no proposal to hold a conference on post-war international aviation matters in the United States in the near future. The Canadian government is now taking part in discussions with the United Kingdom and the United States regarding the holding of exploratory conversations on international air transport. The date, place and other details of these conversations have not yet been settled.

2. Canada is taking part in the present discussions and expects to take part in the subsequent exploratory conversations. No decision has been taken as to who the Canadian representatives in those conversations will be.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH—TORONTO HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION

Mr. MAYHEW:

4. Where is the hospital to be situated?

5. What is the area of the site?

6. What is the cost to the department of such site?

7. Are utility services and transportation facilities available at the proposed site?

8. If not, how are such services to be provided?

9. Is a health and occupational centre contemplated for construction on the same site?

10. If so, for what type of patients is such health and occupational centre intended?

11. What is the estimated cost of, (a) the proposed hospital; (b) the proposed health and occupational centre?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. A new hospital is planned just outside Toronto City limits.

2. 1,400 patient beds, plus nurses' residence.

3. Yes. Messrs. Allward and Gouinlock, Toronto.

4. On a part of Sunnybrook Park plus additional land to be acquired.

5. The area of Sunnybrook Park is approximately 177½ acres.

6. No cost expected as to Sunnybrook Park. The City of Toronto has offered and is preparing to deed the property to the dominion government as a gift.

7. Officials of the city of Toronto have offered to arrange the necesssary extensions to the site.

8. Answered by No. 7.

9. Yes, on a part of Sunnybrook Park plus additional land to be acquired.

10. For persons who, at completion of usual medical treatment, are found to have suffered a loss or lessening of their ability to earn a livelihood and in whose cases there is a reasonable probability that, under appropriate supervision, such ability can be restored.

11. (a) $5,000,000; (b) $1,000,000.

PUBLIC SERVICE—EMPLOYMENT OF OTHER THAN CANADIANS

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Is Edouardo A. Astorga Barriga, a native of Chile, in the employ of the Canadian government at the Ottawa experimental farm? If so, at what salary, and since when?

2. What number of persons, other than Canadians, have been appointed to the civil service of Canada or taken on the federal government payroll in any capacity at a salary higher than $1,200 per annum from September, 1939, to February 20, 1944?

3. From what countries are such persons, to what positions were they appointed, and at what salary?

Mr. McLARTY: There will be no difficulty in answering the first question, but to answer the other two questions would involve a tremendous amount of work, because the files since 1939 would have to be gone over. I wonder if the hon. member would be willing to consider redrafting the question so that he could get the information he desires more promptly but in a more limited form.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall be glad to do that.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

4. What is the total cost of administration during the calendar year ending December 31, 1943?

ATHABASKA TAR SANDS

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. What amount of money was spent on the development of the Athabaska tar sands last year, 1943?
2. What amount was authorized and/or spent for the year 1944?
3. What office buildings have been built up to date, and what is the cost?
4. What residential buildings have been built up to date, and what is the cost?
5. How many of these residences are occupied?
6. How many persons are employed in these offices?
7. How many persons are employed in other occupations at this plant?
8. Has the pilot-plant been started yet? If so, how long before it will be completed?
9. When is it expected that this pilot-plant will be in operation, and what will be its capacity?

5. Have prisoners of war been engaged in cutting mine props and ties in Alberta at any time between January 1, 1942, and January 19, 1944? If so, where were they engaged in such work, and what was the total number of thousand lineal feet cut by such prisoners?

6. Were the mine props and ties cut by prisoners of war in Alberta sold? If so, by whom, to whom, and at what price per thousand lineal feet?

7. Was the subsidy paid on mine props and ties which were cut by prisoners of war in Alberta?

8. Were the mine props and ties cut by prisoners of war in Alberta sold at the prevailing rate for such materials?

9. Upon what date were the producers of mine props and ties in Alberta who were receiving subsidy payments notified that the subsidy was cancelled, and upon what date did the cancellation order become effective?

10. Did the cancellation prevent the collection of the subsidy for mine props and ties which were cut prior to the cancellation date of the subsidy but not sold?

[Mr. Reid.]

11. Were the producers of mine props and ties notified at any time since January 1, 1944, that they might increase the sale price of same? If so, by what amount could the price be increased?

12. Has the government or any government board increased the sale price of mine props and mine ties produced by prisoners of war since January 1, 1944? If not, why not?

PAYMENTS TO CANADIAN PACIFIC AND CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. CHURCH:

What has been paid by the government to, (a) the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; (b) the Canadian National Railways, during this war for each of the years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943?

CANADIAN FORCES—MEDICAL SERVICES

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Would there be any saving of personnel or increase of efficiency if the consultant, hospital and medical organizations of the three armed services were united?

2. When will the Archer report on medical services be made available to the public?

3. What number of medical officers in each of the three armed services who are qualified to practice medicine are engaged in clerical work only?

CANADIAN FORCES—CLOTHING

Mr. PURDY:

1. Does each one of the three armed services supply the same units of clothing to non-commissioned officers and men? If not, what are the exceptions?

2. Does each service have the same regulations with respect to replacements? If not, what are the major differences?

RADIO LICENCES—REVENUE AND EXPENSES OF C.B.C.

Mr. REID:

1. What number of radio licences have been issued during the present fiscal year, up to January 1, 1944?

2. What amount of money has been collected by the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Corporation during the present fiscal year, up to January 31, 1944, by way of, (a) radio licences; (b) all other sources, giving details?

3. What have been the total expenditures on behalf of and for the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Corporation during the present fiscal year, up to January 31, 1944?

PRODUCTION OF FLAX

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Was there a bonus paid by the government to the growers of flax during the 1942 season? If so, how much a bushel, and what was the total of the bonus paid?

2. How many bushels of flax were produced in Canada during the 1942 season?

3. How many bushels of flax were processed in Canada during the 1942 season?

4. How many bushels of flax were exported to the United States due to lack of machinery to process same in Canada?

OIL-BEARING SEED PLANTS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. What was the estimated, (a) acreage; (b) yield, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1943 of the following crops of oil-bearing seed plants: flaxseed, sunflowers and Argentine rape-seed?

2. What is the target acreage in these seeds for 1944?

3. To date, how much has been processed in these provinces, and at what points?

4. To date, how much from these has been processed in Ontario and other provinces?

RENTAL OF SPACE IN SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. What space, if any, has been rented by the Department of National Defence from J. Clark & Son, Limited, in the city of Fredericton or elsewhere in the province of New Brunswick?

2. What rent is being paid for each such space, and what are the terms of the rental arrangement with respect to time, termination of the rental contract, renewal arrangements, and other like conditions?

3. What space, if any, has been rented by the wartime prices and trade board from J. Clark & Son, Limited, in the city of Saint John or elsewhere in the province of New Brunswick?

4. What rent is being paid for each such space, and what are the terms of the rental arrangement with respect to time, termination of the contract, renewal arrangements and other like conditions?

Mr. McLARTY: Order for return.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; I want the information on Hansard. There are just four short questions requiring four short answers.

Mr. McLARTY: But two departments are involved, the Department of National Defence and the Department of Public Works. That is the only reason for making it an order for return.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To cover it up.

Mr. McLARTY: That is not the purpose at all. It is purely by reason of the fact that two departments are involved, and no one department could answer the whole question. If the hon. member wishes to separate the questions, they could be answered, but it is impossible for one department to answer the whole question as it now stands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Questions 1 and 2 refer to one transaction, and questions 3 and 4 to another. They could easily be answered. But if you do not want to do it that way, I will get it to the public in some other way.

MOBILIZATION ACT

STATEMENT AS TO PROCEDURE IN ISSUING CALL-UP NOTICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on February 7, as will be noted on page 205 of Hansard, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) brought up the case of a soldier who had been in the army since 1942 but recently received a call-up notice under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

I have made inquiries about this case and I find that the master registration card of the man in question shows that on registering he gave the date of his birth as July 18, 1925. It has been ascertained that he enlisted on March 30, 1942, at Petawawa, stating at that time that he was born on November 22, 1923. Consequently, at the time of enlistment he was under seventeen years of age.

Registration cards in the divisional registrars' offices are kept in order of the year of birth and the registrar would not be in a position to prevent the issuance of a call-up notice to a man reaching the age of eighteen and a half years against a notice of enlistment from the armed forces giving a birth date that would make the callee twenty years of age. It will be realized that this difference in ages would cause considerable confusion as to identification. The recent call-up of this man went out because he had reached the age of eighteen and a half years based on his registration record.

I might add that in November, 1942, a change was made in the method by which the armed forces advise this department of enlistments, and under the present system the registrar receives copy of a pro-forma for each man enlisted through very definite channels.

While there is always the possibility of clerical error there would be relatively few cases under the present system whereby a man already enlisted would receive a call-up under mobilization regulations, unless, of course, the information provided by the man at the time of enlistment was contrary to information given at the time of registration.

I return to the hon. gentleman the documents he gave me, with the exception of the railway ticket and warrants for meals, which will not be required.

CANNING FACTORY CROPS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, based on the policy of the government for the last two years of paying a subsidy on the canning factory crops, The question is urgent, because this is the season at which the growers and processors are entering into contracts for crop production. I might add that rumours are going around that the announcement of subsidies will not be made until late in March. Is the minister in a position to make a statement as to whether or not a subsidy will be paid, and if so, in what amounts? If he is not in a position to do so now, can he tell us when he will make such a statement?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I cannot make a statement to-day, but we shall be in a position to do so very shortly.

POTATOES

SHIPMENTS FROM UNITED STATES TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask a question of the government arising out of a headline in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not quoting the article, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members over here are always calling somebody else to order. They are generally out of order themselves. I should like to ask the government the following question: Which government officials arranged to allow the dumping of surplus American potatoes in Canada when Fraser Valley potatoes have to pay a duty of $7.50 per ton on certified seed potatoes and $12.50 per ton on commercial potatoes entering the United States? Has any effort been made to alter the situation?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question which should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I do that it will never be answered.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WARTIME LABOUR RELATIONS REGULATIONS, P.C. 1003

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Is the Minister of Labour aware that some employers, particularly in the province of Ontario, in industries where a vote has already been taken to determine the bargaining agency, and where negotiations with the bargaining agency so determined were entered into, are refusing, since the tabling of the wartime labour relations regulations order, P.C. 1003, to continue negotiations on the pretext that they are not clear what the status of the bargaining agency previously determined will be under the new order? Is the minister in a position to make a statement that would clarify the order as it relates to the situation I have described?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. member for Vancouver East, I should like to make a statement regarding the application of the wartime labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003, particularly in those provinces where legislation is at present in force providing for certification of bargaining representatives before collective bargaining is commenced. The provinces of Ontario and British Columbia have such legislation. So has Quebec, although I am under the impression that machinery has not yet been completed to administer the labour relations act recently passed by the Quebec legislature.

Hon. members will be aware that the wartime labour relations regulations, approved by the governor in council on February 17, are not yet in force. Section 48 provides for their coming into force on a day to be fixed by the governor in council. We first must set up the wartime labour relations board and the machinery to carry out the regulations. However, I can assure the house there will not be unnecessary delay in doing so.

In those provinces where machinery exists for the certification of bargaining representatives, and pending the coming into force of the new federal regulations, I would say that employees and employers should observe the terms of the existing provincial legislation and bargain in good faith after the bargaining representatives have been certified. If as a result of this bargaining a collective agreement is consummated before our regulations come into force, the collective agreement should be regarded as a valid one. If on the other hand the negotiations following the certification of bargaining representatives under provincial laws fail to produce a satisfactory agreement, either party may make application to the Minister of Labour for the establishment of a board of conciliation and investigation under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, provided the industry is one coming within the scope of that act as extended by order in council P.C. 3495.

It should be noted that the suspension of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act occurs only when the wartime labour relations regulations come into force. In other cases provincial legislation may provide for further reference to the competent authority when agreement on the terms of a collective agreement cannot be reached.

Where certified bargaining representatives are in negotiation with employers when our federal wartime labour relations regulations come into force, there might be some apprehension that certification of such bargaining representatives will again have to be sought.

Section 36 (2) of our regulations empowers the Minister of Labour, with the approval of the governor in council, to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces to provide for the administration, within those provinces, of the regulations. I would say that when the terms of these agreements are under consideration by the provinces and ourselves all questions which may arise, such as that of the recognition by the board of the decision of the labour court of Ontario or other provincial authorities with regard to certification of bargaining agencies or representatives, will be fully considered and adequately covered.

I make this statement at this time because I realize that some uncertainty is bound to exist in the minds of trade union officers and officials of employing companies, engaged in proceedings initiated under provincial regulations, as to their status under the national regulations; uncertainty which might tend to delay the current negotiations until our regulations are effective.

The interests of industrial peace and of the war effort will best be served if parties to negotiations now in progress continue their negotiations with a genuine desire to reach a satisfactory outcome.

Mr. ADAMSON: The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is still in force?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely; it is in force until the new labour code is proclaimed by the governor general in council.

Mr. GILLIS: Will the new labour relations regulations be printed for general distribution? There is a widespread demand for them.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have arranged for the printing of many thousands. I understand the first copies came to my office this morning. My hon. friend can rest assured that there will be a widespread circulation of the order, and it will also be printed in the Labour Gazette of this month.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the report of the war labour board be printed?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have made arrangements for the printing of both reports as an appendix to the Labour Gazette of this month.

CANADIAN FORCES

SERVICE PERSONNEL—TRANSPORTATION—RAILWAY FARES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Will the Minister of Transport or the government give some consideration to the large number of resolutions of municipalities and other public bodies regarding soldiers' fares? Could not the question and the bill I introduced be turned over to the railway committee or some other committee? This is a very important matter.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): I shall give consideration to that.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 17, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—ARMY SERVICES

2. Pay and allowances, $547,256,061.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, despite the statement of the minister concerning the matter of the amount of allowances payable to mothers of men in the armed services, I should like to press him to give the matter further consideration. It seemed to me that there was an inconsistency between the statement which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) made on page 613 of Hansard and that which he made on page 619. On page 613, when he was discussing the reasons for cutting off the allowances of dependents to any soldier who is absent without leave, he made this statement:

> Dependents' allowance is not granted as compensation to a wife because she has lost the comfort of or association with her husband. It is paid to the wife in order to promote the well-being of the service, and to relieve the anxiety which husbands overseas would have, if such payment were not being made.

In passing, I do not agree altogether with the spirit of that statement. It seems to me that dependents deserve some consideration in their own own right rather than simply on behalf of the men in the forces. But even taking the statement at its face value, I emphasize these words of the minister:

> It is paid to the wife in order to promote the well-being of the service, and to relieve the anxiety which husbands overseas would have, if such payment were not being made.

On pages 619 and 620, when we were discussing the difference between amounts allowed to wives and to mothers of soldiers, the minister pointed out that in the case of a wife, the $35 is given to her as of right, whether she has nothing or is a millionaire; and then he went on to say that the mother received the $25, not necessarily the whole of that amount, only if dependency could be established. There is also the further regulation that her total income outside assigned pay must not exceed $65. As all hon. members know, there are many men in the forces who have a deep anxiety because of the economic position of the mother at home, and if the minister is going to take the position which is set out on page 613 in regard to the morale of men in the services, I submit it ought to apply to mothers of men in the forces. If it is desirable for the morale of the forces to pay $35 to wives, it is at least equally desirable that the maximum payable to mothers should be raised to that figure, $35.

I hope that the minister and the government will give this matter further consideration, because it affects a great many men in the forces. Many a young man is just as much concerned about the economic circumstances of his mother, particularly where there is invalidity on the part of the father, as married men are for their wives and families. At the same time I should like to press further this point with regard to the regulation that sets $65 as the ceiling on income for mothers in this class. It has the effect of discouraging mothers who might otherwise get some kind of work as a means of stepping up their income, because when they do they are cut down in the amount of the allowance they receive. It should be remembered that in hundreds, perhaps thousands, of cases the mother is called upon to put up with conditions inferior to those under which she lived when the son was at home working and contributing to the upkeep of the home.

I bring to the attention of the minister and of the government these two points—the desirability of increasing to $35 the maximum allowance paid to mothers, and of raising the $65 ceiling to, I would say, $75, or better still, $100.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I support the very reasonable plea made by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). If a soldier can establish the fact that he was contributing to the support of his parents prior to his enlistment, I submit that automatically one of the parents ought to be entitled to dependents' allowance. Let me give an instance I came across the other day of a widow on a farm who had her youngest son helping her to operate it. The boy joined the army. The mother cannot possibly continue working the farm without men to help her, and at the present time she cannot hire reliable farm help. She therefore leaves the farm and goes to teach school, though she is not by any means a young woman. This boy had been contributing toward her support during all the years he was working on the farm. Now, because his mother is teaching school, she is not allowed the dependent's allowance. He can assign part of his pay as a contribution, but she cannot get dependent's allowance. If she stayed in town and sat around, she would get it, but because she teaches in a small country school, where teachers are hard to get, and receives $75 a month, she cannot get the dependent's allowance, since her income is in excess of $65 even without the dependent's allowance.

As the regulation stands at the present time, this woman could not get the full dependent's allowance if her income were more than $40. Her total income could not be more than $65. The government have set a very low figure if they think that the mother of a man in the services can live on $65 a month. It is far too low. This boy has been contributing for years to his mother's support; now he dons the king's uniform, and I suggest the government should underwite that boy's responsibility and shoulder the provision for the dependency of his mother, which the boy has been doing throughout the years. I ask the minister to consider the matter further.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was referring to two different passages of mine. What I was dealing with on page 619 was not the matter of the ceiling for dependent's allowance, but the necessity of showing need. There are two different principles with which the committee has been dealing and in which there is a difference between payment to mothers and to wives. In the case of the wife of a private the maximum dependents' allowance payable is $35, and in the case of the mother, $25; moreover, in the case of the wife the $35 is, in practice, paid automatically, whereas in the case of the mother, dependency has to be shown—that is, that the mother was receiving support from the son before he enlisted or that, owing to circumstances beyond his control, it was impossible for him to contribute.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is an entirely different principle.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. These are the two different matters with which I was dealing in the two replies. I take it that my hon. friend and the hon. member for Weyburn were both really dealing with the question of dependency, though the hon. member for Weyburn did deal with the matter of the ceiling as well. I do not think I can add anything on this question of dependency. The principle is that the country takes the place of the son who has supported his mother, up to $25 a month, exclusive of the assigned pay—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a condition precedent?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right; and the assigned pay may amount to as much as $23, which means that the mother may get up to $48 from the son and the country together in order to take the place of whatever contribution the son was making before he enlisted. In addition the mother is entitled to earn up to $40 before any reduction is made in the allowance. This means she could receive $88 in all, of which the country would continue to contribute the full $25.

Mr. LOCKHART: How long has that been in effect?

Mr. RALSTON: The allowance was increased from $20 to $25 as of the first of January, 1943.

Mr. GREEN: Is any cost-of-living bonus paid to the mother?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Following that up I should like to ask one other question, based upon a case that came to my attention. This was the case of the dependent mother of a soldier who, subsequent to his enlistment, married. What happens to the mother?

Mr. RALSTON: If the soldier assigns an additional five days' pay, then the mother may be granted the dependents' allowance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the wife also?

Mr. RALSTON: The wife also.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the condition precedent in both cases?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad I asked that question, because the minister has clarified the situation. The position, then, is that if the soldier has a dependent wife to whom he must assign some money, I have forgotten how many days' pay—

Mr. RALSTON: Fifteen days.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —she automatically gets the dependents' allowance of $35?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And if he further assigns five days' pay to his mother, then his mother will get the $25?

Mr. RALSTON: That is so.
