Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Thank you, Mr. Speaker—and this I will do. Keen fishermen and hunters will no doubt tell you that every year they have to travel a little farther in search of less abundant game in ever-increasing populated areas. Our natural parks guarantee the survival of our wildlife by protecting their natural habitats. Then, too, there are places where the tensions of city life can be forgotten, where nature can be enjoyed on a camping excursion or while fishing, exploring, canoeing, or what have you. Hunting is prohibited in our parks. Appropriate protective measures must be taken to create game sanctuaries at random points across the country, otherwise hunting may become a thing of the past.

Samples of our fauna and flora are needed for scientific purposes and to further our education and that of our children. We must also preserve the tourist appeal of our countryside and draw attention to certain areas of outstanding natural beauty which should be better known to everyone. This is what we are trying to do in our national parks. Also, in our national parks areas are left in their natural state to provide the perfect habitat for local fauna and to allow the species their liberty. They also provide visitors with the agreeable experience of seeing animals at liberty in their natural state. What is more, we have set aside areas of these natural sanctuaries for migratory birds. Such resources are of inestimable value for Canadians and tourists from other countries. Unfortunately, our national parks system is at present incomplete.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not like interrupting the hon. member or any hon. member, for that matter, but I have a responsibility to the chamber. May I re-read the motion which is before the House for consideration:

Proposed National Park

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of a description of the area which the federal government would like to see incorporated in the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area.

It seems to the Chair that the speech being made by the hon. member for St. Boniface is very helpful and useful in a general discussion of our national parks, and I am not in the least critical of it or of remarks made by other hon. members. But as occupant of the chair I have the responsibility to ask hon. members, in so far as it is possible for them to do so, to speak to the question before the House. I invite the hon. member for St. Boniface to do so, and I know he will.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I was coming to that point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Burton: That is what you said the last time.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I will watch it this time, and I am glad you have brought it to my attention, Mr. Speaker. I am very concerned about the parks both in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba. In fact, I am so interested in a national park for Manitoba that I should like to address some remarks to that subject. I should like to refer to an article pertaining to this question, which I believe is relevant to the motion before the House, appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press for February 26, 1972. It is headed "'Partly Right' on Park" and reads in part as follows:

Premier Ed Schreyer of Manitoba agreed Friday that he is no longer as interested in having a national park in the northern part of the province as when he was a member of the House of Commons for Selkirk.

The Premier was replying to an accusation by federal Northern Affairs Minister Jean Chrétien that Mr. Schreyer—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This quotation does have a bearing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I want the hon. member to continue, but I must once more say that the discussion of a park in Manitoba and the opinion of the Premier of Manitoba, or anybody else, on the question of the establishment of such a park is not relevant to the description of a proposed park in Saskatchewan. I know the hon. member is an experienced parliamentarian and that he will be able to tie these two matters together. I would invite him to indicate to the Chair the way in which his remarks are relevant to the motion.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Perhaps I should put it another way, Mr. Speaker. The Premier of Manitoba is not interested any more in having the federal government initiate a national park in Manitoba. I am very concerned about this and I think I should spell it out. If he is not interested, then I am. In speaking to this motion may I say I am interested in having a park in Saskatchewan and a park in Manitoba, to be immediately initiated by the federal government—and the sooner the better! If it had not been for the foresight of our forefathers, we would never have had our beautiful Banff national park. This is why I felt I needed to refer to this background before I referred to a park in Manitoba. The federal government, in co-operation with the Premier of my province, should initiate a park in northern Manitoba.

• (1740)

I am surprised the Premier would not wish to accept the offer of the federal government to establish a national park. He said he could do this just as well as the federal government. If it were done by the federal government, the saving to the people of Manitoba would be very great indeed, bearing in mind that the federal government would be responsible for looking after the area, beautifying it and making it a place that not only this generation but our children could enjoy. I hope the Premier, whom I admire, will reconsider his position.

Mr. Burton: What about the government reconsidering its view about this motion?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I did not hear what the hon. member said. Would he repeat his question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Regina East has a question.

Mr. Burton: Would the hon. member persuade the federal government to reconsider its views and accept the motion now before the House which has to do with the production of certain information or documents concerning a proposed second national park in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I appreciate that the hon. member is very concerned about Saskatchewan, I am equally concerned about a park being initiated in Manitoba. The federal government is doing its utmost to initiate both projects with benefits not to one province only but to two. I agree there should be a park in Saskatchewan, but it seems to me that it should be the policy of the federal government to deal with the nation as a whole and not only with Saskatchewan or Manitoba.

Mr. Burton: Does the hon. member not consider it would help him in his objective of securing a second national park for Manitoba if this information with respect to a proposed second national park in Saskatchewan were made available to the public?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am all in favour of any number of parks.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is what I am trying to do. If Manitoba or Saskatchewan wish to establish other parks on their own, I am in agreement. At the moment, I believe the province is responsible for long-term planning, if I may use that term—

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): —and has responsibility to preserve land for the enjoyment of the citizens of the future, keeping it as a wilderness for the recreation of those who come after us. This is the policy of the federal government, and I cannot understand why the Premier of the province changed his mind. He was in favour of the project when he was in this House, but now he is Premier his views have altered. According to the Free Press, he is reported to have said: "I am less interested today than I was five years ago." Mr. Speaker, I am interested every day of the year when the federal government has the common sense and initiative to help the people in our western provinces.

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there are certain pertinent comments I should like to put on record and address to hon. members in connection with the motion now before us.

[Translation]

I should like to make my remarks in French, Mr. Speaker, because it is the language in which I can express myself more easily and more fluently, particularly when I have no prepared notes.

The motion before the House reads as follows:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a description of the area which the federal government would like to see incorporated in the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area.

I do not possess much information on the area referred to in this motion, but I think it gives me an opportunity of making some comments of a general nature which can apply to any other proposal for national parks in Canada.

Earlier today, when I heard my two hon. friends exchanging remarks across the way, I made the following reflection: if it is difficult to determine the best place for the location of a national park in western Canada, I am prepared to accept every proposal of the government for the location of a third park in New Brunswick.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the motion proposed by the hon. member, asking "for a copy of a description of the area" could lead to a sort of excessive speculation on the land to be included into the general area of a national park. And it seems to me that the fundamental question to be asked—

[English]

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member whether he was in the House to hear what my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) said a few minutes ago in answer to earlier remarks about the possibility of speculation? My hon. friend said that most of the land in this area is Crown-owned; it is held on lease by various ranchers or farmers but speculation does not come into the picture. If at any time there are negotiations for the sale of privately-held land, people will be fully aware of what they are about.

Mr. Corbin: I was not in the House at that point in the debate. In this case we are, it is true, dealing with Crown land, but what the hon. member is trying to establish is the principle that the government should be obliged to table a map or general description of any area which is in the future to be designated as a national park. This is the heart of this discussion. The hon. member may have a point with respect to this particular proposal, but if accepted we would be setting a precedent which could be detrimental to the efforts of the government to establish at the lowest cost possible to the public purse a national park or a number of national parks.

I wished to refer particularly to the repercussions which the adoption of the motion before us might have on park proposals within my own province of New Brunswick; however, I should like to comply with the request of the parliamentary secretary and close my remarks at this point in order to give him an opportunity to put some facts on the record.

• (1750)

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) in the course of his remarks pointed out that some time ago he first raised this subject at a time when the seat of Assiniboia was not represented in this House. But in doing so I am sure he did not intend to indicate that was the first time this matter had been raised, because I know many hon. members are aware of the very assiduous efforts made by the former member for Assiniboia, the late Ab Douglas, one of the most respected men who served in this House. He made many efforts to secure this park for that part of Saskatchewan. If the hon. member had diligently studied the documents which were delivered to him some months ago relating to this park, he would have found that the first correspondence from any Member of Parliament was from the late Ab Douglas in relation to a proposed park in southwestern Saskatchewan.

The hon. member for Regina East seems to feel the government is placing a very high priority on the matter of secrecy. Let me assure him that this is not the case. The government does not wish to keep anything secret in so far as the park is concerned: it wishes to create a prairie grasslands park in southern Saskatchewan. It is the stated intention of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) to increase by 60 the number of parks in Canada before the end of this century. In the last four years the minister has done more to preserve the natural features of Canada for future generations than has any minister in the history of this country. One has only to consider the growth of our national parks system to recognize that the minister is not concerned about keeping secret the locations or delineations of national parks but, rather, is concerned about creating more national parks.

In the last four years the government has created 10 parks. Since 1944 it is interesting to note that with the exception of the province of Alberta, which even then had a greater percentage of its lands in national parks than any similar area of the globe, two provinces have not seen fit to transfer to the government the necessary land for parks. These two provinces have Socialist governments.

Mr. Burton: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That statement of the parliamentary secretary is irresponsible and inaccurate. It was the Liberal government in Saskatchewan which refused to negotiate in this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members may not agree with statements of other hon. members, but that is hardly a point of order.

Mr. Sulatycky: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the year 1944 which is a red-letter date for the Socialist movement in Canada, and in Saskatchewan in particular. Let me go back to the history of this park so that the statements of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) are not left uncorrected. First, as the hon. member for Assiniboia has said, in order for the land to be used by the federal government it must be Crown land. It may be in fact provincial Crown land. However, it is up to the provincial gover-ment to negotiate for the lands which it will be turning over to the federal government for use as national parks.

Therefore the federal government cannot delineate the precise boundaries it intends to set aside for a national park in southwestern Saskatchewan until the provincial government has completed its negotiations with the land holders. There are land holders in fee simple and there are land holders who hold land by virtue of a lease, which gives them as much right to hold the land and demand compensation as if they had it in fee simple. It is up to the provincial government of Saskatchewan to ensure that the land is acquired, that there are no encumbrances on it and that it is transferred to the federal government.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, if the hon. member who has the floor will receive it.

Mr. Sulatycky: I do not want to leave the wrong impression. In the last few months there has been more communication on this matter than ever in the past. This has been the situation since the last provincial election in Saskatchewan. The Hon. E. Kramer and our Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have ended an apparent breakdown, so to speak, in communication. Just last week the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development received correspondence from his counterpart in Saskatchewan and is now preparing a reply. So there is very good reason to believe that in due course positive evidence will be seen of the new negotiations which have taken place between the two governments.

I am hopeful that in very short order the minister will be in a position to make a statement to the House on this matter. I point this out in an effort to convince the House, the hon. member for Regina East and the hon. member for Assiniboia that it is not the purpose of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to keep this matter secret. It is not our intention to keep information from these two hon. members. All the documents which can be produced have been produced. We are simply waiting for the provincial government of Saskatchewan to acquire the land in an unencumbered state and transfer it to the federal government so that a second national park may be established in Saskatchewan as part of the effort the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been making in the last ten years to create a fully-rounded national parks system in Canada.

We place the highest priority on creating a prairie grasslands park. There has been tremendous public interest in this matter, not only from members representing federal ridings in Saskatchewan but from large numbers of people outside the political sphere and from people outside Saskatchewan who feel it is important that a prairie grasslands park be designated in order to give us the completely-rounded system which we all desire in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair, to resume the same at 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-4, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from January 1, 1971, to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, before recess, I was expressing the wish of numerous pensioners of the Canadian National who would like to see their pension increased. I was just going to quote figures to prove that this is possible, since by the end of 1968, the pension fund of the CN was close to $1.5 billion.

From 1952, the number of CN employees went from 121,000 down to 84,000, a decrease of 35 per cent.

On the other hand, from 1959 to 1968, the number of contributors to the pension fund jumped from 50 to 73 per cent, and I think that the day is not far when it will strike 100 per cent. During the same period, from 1952 to 1968, the reserve capital has gone up by 700 per cent.

According to the financial report, again for 1968, without taking into account the $41 million contribution of railways to the pension fund, the amount contributed by the employees, in addition to the interest on investments, was $65,880,597. Pensions paid during the year amounted to $46 million. Had those pensions been raised by 25 per cent, there would still remain $8 million to add to the reserve capital.

[Mr. Sulatycky.]

It is also found that if current regulations are maintained, contributions to the pension fund will have increased by 50 to 55 per cent in 1980.

I do not advocate a direct boost of 25 per cent. However, so as to eliminate any discrimination, current regulations should be examined. To this effect, CN employees made a complete study and even came to Ottawa to make recommendations to CN authorities. Some of these recommendations are found in Issue No. 29 of June 2, 1970 of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications under the chairmanship of the member for LaSalle (Mr. Lessard) and I quote:

> Recommend the immediate decking or stacking of the CN pensions with the Canada Pension, rather than the present integrated arrangement.
> Remove penalty for early voluntary retirement after the age of 55 years, where the age and service add to 85 or more as at present.
> All existing and future C.N. pensions to be increased in accordance with existing cost of living index and an escalator clause to be inserted in agreements to cover.
> Increase the basic pension under Part I from the minimum of $300 annually. Increase to be in accordance with the cost of living index applicable as from 1949.
> Recommended that the survivor benefits paid to widows or dependents of pensioners be increased from the present 50 per cent to the full amount of the pension formerly paid.
> That the present pension board, which now consists of four representatives for the company, and three representatives for the employees, (now held by union executives), be increased to four representatives each for the company and for the employees, plus one independent member, preferably an actuary. That the capital reserve of the C.N. pension fund be pegged at a set amount and be reviewed every three years when any recommended revisions necessary may be implemented.

Mr. Speaker, my suggestions can be summed up in three points. First, more security through better maintenance of railroad tracks by reducing the distances a given group of men has to cover. Second, a new method of financing which in fact would allow right off the bat savings of $75 million a year. Third, since there was enough in the pension fund for this tampering to be allowed to go on, let us put an end to that practice and let us see to it that our pensioners are treated with all the respect due to those people who devoted their lives to a Crown company.

• (2010)

In brief, Mr. Speaker, the government, the CNR, the employees and the public will all benefit from it.

[English]

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House, but having been a member of the transport committee and having enjoyed my relationship with it and with the people I was fortunate to meet in the Canadian National, Canadian Pacific, Air Canada and elsewhere in the transport industry throughout Canada, I do not want to let this occasion pass without participating in the debate.

I notice that when we enter this annual debate with respect to Canadian National Railways, the chamber retains mainly those members who are from the far reaches of Canada and who are interested in transportation problems. Those who are from the centre of Canada, within easy reach of Ottawa, do not attend this debate in great number. So it is on an occasion like this that we find in the chamber and interested in the debate members such as the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), on the shore of the Pacific, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), representing the greatest railway centre in Canada and the one from which a great deal of wheat is moved, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) whose riding touches the shores of Vancouver Quadra in and out of which ships take wheat to the Far East, the hon. member for Malpèque (Mr. MacLean), the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) whose riding in Prince Edward Island is almost wholly dependent not only on the efficiency of Canadian National but on the ferry service which it operates, and the hon. member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Smith) who represents a railway centre in the province of Quebec.

When I first came to this chamber in 1963 the standing committee on transport was the first committee with which I had anything to do. I have very vivid recollections of going into that committee, sitting down in a seat to look at a committee of parliament for the first time and finding myself seated between Douglas Fisher on the one hand and the late Sherwood Rideout on the other, a railway man from New Brunswick. These two gentlemen were the rugged defenders of parliament against the ogre of that day, Donald Gordon. They were in the forefront of what for many years had been a great vendetta between the members of parliament interested in transportation on the one side and Canadian National Railways on the other. It was an interesting procedure to watch. Donald Gordon, the president of the railway, would come into the room and he would have with him a coterie of vice-presidents and officials, each of whom had a black bag in which there were sheaves of railway statistics. When he was asked a question he would say, "I will defer to Mr. Smith, vice-president of the railway," to the "vice-president of maintenance of ways"—or of whatever it happened to be—"and he will give you the information." Whereupon this gentleman would open up his black bag and we would be showered with railway statistics for the next half hour.

I do not suppose that in the history of parliament a better snow job was done on parliament than that which was done by Donald Gordon, and I don't suppose a better job was done of squaring up to a rugged man like Donald Gordon and tackling him at the parliamentary level than was done in those days by Douglas Fisher and Sherwood Rideout. This was a great introduction for me to the procedure of parliamentary committees. When I look back on it now I realize that Donald Gordon really showed us only the tip of his slipper pushed out from beneath the Pullman curtain, because we saw so very little of what went on behind.

As time went on, the committee became more sophisticated and its members much more knowledgeable about railway and transportation affairs generally and about the CNR and Air Canada in particular. Over those and the ensuing years we took part in such debates and in debate on the act setting up the Canadian Transport Commission. We listened to many experts and in fact became semi-experts ourselves. In addition to that, the practice grew in the House of Commons of letting committees travel around the country in order to study what was going on. One of these committees which saw the country and discussed with people on their own ground the problems of transportation was the standing committee on transport. Over the years the committee has had many able chairmen, not the least of whom is the present chairman, the hon. member for LaSalle (Mr. Lessard). He is a fair and impartial chairman, very interested in the problems.

• (2020)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: I believe members on all sides of the House respect him as a parliamentarian—

Mr. Horner: What is all this leading up to? Are you going to put him in the Senate?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is too good for that.

Mr. Deachman: I have not had an opportunity tonight to say how much the committee has benefited from the participation of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) whose continuing interest in transportation has been over the years a highlight of the work of the committee. He suggests that the chairman of the committee should be sent to the Senate—

Mr. Horner: I did not suggest that. I rise on question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is attempting to—I do not want to use the word "twist" but he is attempting to mislead the House by his misinterpretation of the question I asked him under cover of flowery compliments paid to the chairman of the transportation committee. I posed the question—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Horner: I am coming to my question of privilege. I posed the question, "What is going to happen next? Are you going to put him in the Senate?" I did not suggest that he should go. I am one who wants him to remain as chairman of the transportation committee. The hon. member and myself and most members of the Convervative party get along very well when that member is in the chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Crowfoot knows that he cannot take advantage of a question of privilege to seek the floor in this way.

Mr. Horner: He misinterpreted my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): By using the Standing Orders and rules of the House the hon. member can gain the floor—

Mr. Horner: That was a bona fide question of privilege.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, if I were the Prime Minister, who is the only member of this House who can make appointments to the Senate, I would say to the hon. member for LaSalle, "It breaks my heart not to be able to send you there, but the boys in the House of commons want you on the transportation committee. Your time has not yet come."

Mr. Horner: Put me in the Senate, then.

Mr. Deachman: I will put in a word for you.

Mr. Horner: Thank you.

Mr. Deachman: Last evening, when we were debating this subject, one hon. member went to considerable lengths to point out the faults of the railway and describe how in terms of equipment, service, cleanliness and just about everything you can think of it was not living up to expectations. Tonight I want to say a few things on behalf of the railway. That may seem strange, but I think we should be realistic, look at what is taking place in the country and assess it.

I have here a press release issued last year by the CNR dealing with grain traffic. I should like to refresh the memories of hon. members about what is taking place in the movement of bulk commodities and grain in the west. This release is dated July 31, points out that Canadian National had just completed the best annual grain handling job in their history and goes on to say:

Reasons largely responsible for setting a number of new grain handling records in the 1970-71 crop year, which ends today (July 31), included a new pool unloading system instituted at the west coast and Thunder Bay terminal elevators, as well as CN's introduction of 1,400 covered hopper cars in the grain trade and the operation of 52 grain unit trains of 100 such cars each.

The pool unloading system now operating at Thunder Bay and Vancouver provides faster turn-around of railway cars. It was made possible through co-operative efforts between grain companies.

Many new export records also were established in the grain handling system, Mr. Gardiner added. The railways delivered more than 690 million bushels of all grains, five million bushels more than the previous record established in the 1963-64 crop year.

Then it says:

Nearly 260 million bushels of grain were handled through west coast ports in the 1970-71 crop year. This is about 25 million bushels more than the previous record year of 1965-66.

Mr. Woolliams: That is like saying you are one year older than last year.

Mr. Deachman: The release continues:

During the 1970-71 crop year, CN loaded 177,000 cars of grain, surpassing the previous record of 175,000 carloads. It also was pointed out by Mr. Gardiner that CN loading to Thunder Bay and Vancouver of wheat, oats, barley, rye, flaxseed and rapeseed all showed substantial average bushel increases per car than was achieved in the 1969-70 crop year.

It is also worth while to refer to the 1970 annual report of Canadian National Railways where they give statistics in regard to new equipment. This is a matter which has been discussed in the course of this debate. At page 10 the report points out:

During 1970 a total of 4,546 new freight units were acquired. These included steel-covered hoppers for potash, fertilizer and general service; bulkhead flatcars for international lumber service; newsprint boxcars; coal cars and Piggyback flat cars. In addition 51 diesel-electric locomotives of 3,000 horsepower each and 20 of 3,600 horsepower each were delivered during the year. On order at year end were 12 diesel-electric locomotives of 2,000 horsepower each, 20 of 3,600 horsepower, and 66 of 3,000 horsepower.

These facts escape the hon. member opposite who felt that the replacement had come to an end and that we were dealing with an antiquated railway system. The report deals with containerization at page 11 as follows:

In the spring, Japanese lines started operating regular container services into the newly constructed centennial pier in Vancouver, and this operation is expected to expand in the coming year.

One of the biggest, if not the biggest, containerized vessels in the world is now arriving on the east coast, and equally big and modern vessels are arriving on the west coast. The day is not far distant when freight will be moved in this way around the world, arriving in Vancouver on fast, ocean-going vessels which will discharge the containers on to trains which will move across the continent, then the containers will be placed on vessels at the east coast and thus shipped across the Atlantic.

• (2030)

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that I have a listener who wants to ask a question.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows that he may ask a question only if the hon. member who has the floor agrees, since the time taken is subtracted from the time allotted to the hon. member.

Mr. Deachman: I will be delighted to answer.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, disregarding for a moment

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, disregarding for a moment the euphoria of the hon. member over the modernization which he has described, can he tell us why the minister in charge of the Wheat Board said in the House today that orders for deliveries of grain cannot be accepted at Vancouver? If existing facilities are sufficient, why has the minister in charge of the Wheat Board informed this House that the authorities cannot accept orders for grain deliveries?

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I am not here to expound on the minister's problems.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gleave: They are not the minister's problems, they are the farmers' problems.

Mr. Horner: They are the problems of all western Canada.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, let me point once more to the figures which show what has taken place in the movement of grain on the west coast. I think the hon. member opposite knows as well as I do that in the course of a very few years the capability of the west coast to handle grain and move it abroad has doubled.

Mr. Gleave: So what? Doesn't the merchant build his business to suit the customer?

Mr. Deachman: Of course he does.

Mr. Gleave: What is happening makes me sick.

Mr. Deachman: Of course that is what a merchant does. And to satisfy the customer, the most efficient as well as well as the newest elevator in Canada, operated by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, has been built—

Mr. Gleave: It was built because you guys would not put up the money. All my neighbours put up the money.

Mr. Horner: What has happened to the government elevators out there?

Mr. Gleave: They would not even move the wheat out there after we had put up all that money.

Mr. Horner: The government elevators closed down in Vancouver.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. We must be fair to the hon. member who has the floor. Hon. members will have an opportunity to express views on the bill before us and on the operation of railways in Canada. We cannot make progress if there are lengthy exchanges among hon. members. According to the rules of the House, hon. members must address the Chair: that is the best way to make progress.

Mr. Deachman: These exchanges illustrate, I think, Mr. Speaker, what I tried to say originally. Members of the transport committee, as well as others who are interested in transport matters, are present and are anxious to take part in the debate. This is a good debate. Speaking as one who is taking part in the debate, I am delighted to find the great amount of interest that is evident in the House. Hon. members are listening instead of going to sleep behind the funny papers.

These exchanges illustrate that for those who live in western Canada on the west coast, on the Prairies, in Prince Edward Island or in the Maritimes, transportation is an interesting subject. When this subject is discussed in the House, people wake up and take an interest in what is going on. Therefore I welcome the questions and remarks that are coming from the other side of the House. Do not knock what is happening, Sir, because these exchanges are evidence of hon. members' interest in a subject that is well worth debating in this House.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Deachman: I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. Woolliams: Does the hon. member appreciate that right now they are short 20 million bushels of wheat in the terminals at Vancouver? In 1928 this country produced 600 million bushels of wheat. Then we had an old-fashioned railway system and the farmers delivered by wagon and horse and got their wheat to market. But now there is nothing in the terminals at Vancouver to move to market, as the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) just suggested. I should like the hon. member to say—and he can refer to documents—why this government is not moving our wheat from the Prairies to Vancouver. That is the question we must consider tonight, and not this nonsense to which the hon. member is referring.

An hon. Member: It takes Conservatives to move wheat.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer the hon. member's question. I think hon. members opposite know that I represent a riding in the city of Vancouver which is concerned particularly about the shipment and movement of grain. That movement, when I first came to parliament, did not begin to approach the grain movement that we now see going out of west coast ports. This movement has arisen in the course of a decade and we have had to cope with it in the course of a decade.

We are looking at the shift in the movement of grain from its traditional European export path to a Pacific export path. We are looking at a country that is attempting to orient its export shipments from a traditional eastward movement to a westward movement. When I see what has taken place in the harbour of Vancouver to cope with this problem, I think the harbour of Vancouver and the people who are responsible for it—

Mr. Horner: It has not changed one iota.

Mr. Deachman: Just a moment—

Mr. Horner: It has not changed one iota.

Mr. Deachman: Just a moment, now—

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member be willing to accept another question?

Mr. Deachman: I have been willing, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot force a question on the hon. member who has the floor. It was the impression of the Chair that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) intended to complete his remarks without accepting all the questions which might arise. If the hon. member accepts all such questions I do not think much time will be left for him to complete his remarks.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much not accepting the questions of hon. members. May I continue the thread of the argument I was following a moment or two ago? Hon. members opposite can ask questions if there is time, or enter into the debate. Essentially I want to say this: some of the things we have done in coping during the past decade, with the great switch in our export market which saw our outgoing Atlantic movement change to a Pacific movement, are as follows—

Mr. Horner: What changes have you made?

Mr. Deachman: There has been built, for instance, on the west coast the best and most modern elevator available.

Mr. Horner: And who built that?

Mr. Deachman: Well—

Mr. Horner: Who built that?

Mr. Deachman: I will be very glad to tell you hon. members who built it. It was built by the Saskatchewan co-op, by many hon. members opposite whose dollars are involved in that co-op.

Mr. Horner: Don't take the credit for it, then. Tell us what the government did.

Mr. Deachman: I am saying that it was built at Vancouver harbour to improve the grain trade.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deachman: And to provide access to that elevator the biggest suspension bridge in Canada was built across the harbour. Along the harbour, at other points, dredging took place in order to allow larger vessels to come to Vancouver harbour and accept grain.

Mr. Horner: The harbour is dredged every year.

Mr. Deachman: Longer jetties were extended into Vancouver harbour in order that vessels of longer length could be loaded and in order that more and more holds at one time could be filled, thereby enabling the men to work more quickly and ships to turn around faster. The net result of this—

Mr. Horner: Did you people put electric light bulbs over the edge of the harbour so that ships could be loaded at night?

Mr. Deachman: That may have been done. However, the net accumulated effect of all this, plus the accumulated effect of the additional boxcars and modern unit trains I referred to earlier in my remarks, has enabled the port of Vancouver to deliver twice the amount of grain—

Mr. Horner: No.

Mr. Deachman: It has moved twice the amount of grain that it was able to move a decade ago.

Mr. Horner: In 1960 they loaded one million bushels per day. They are not loading that much today.

Mr. Deachman: I ask hon. members who doubt these figures to check the amount that was loaded on average a decade ago. Look at the amount being loaded now and compare the operations of a decade ago with what is being done now.

Mr. Gleave: Who cares about what happened ten years ago?

Mr. Deachman: Also, Mr. Speaker, we who come from Vancouver can say that we have moved from being Canada's second or third ranking port to Canada's first ranking port in terms of export volume.

Mr. Horner: That has resulted from the level of ocean freight rates and not from anything the port did.

Mr. Deachman: One could say, perhaps, that we have not done the best job in the world—

Mr. Horner: Hear, hear!

• (2040)

Mr. Deachman: Essentially, what we have succeeded in doing—

Mr. Horner: Another failure by the government!

Mr. Deachman: No, it is not. We have succeeded in doubling the capacity of that port to take care of Prairie shipments. I do not think that is a bad performance. Hon. members opposite from the prairie provinces may want to tell us what they have done about grain drying and utilizing grain cleaning equipment to enable them to send clean, dried grain to the west coast so we would not have to perform those functions at the moment grain was demanded by ships. They might look at their own antiquated elevator system, which is based on the movement of the horse and wagon to a railway elevator point, and ask themselves just what they have done to improve the system on the Prairies for the smooth movement of grain. I listened to hon. members telling us about the movement of grain. I listened to experts who appeared before the transport committee telling us about the antiquated system for which members opposite have fought.

Mr. Horner: They are not antiquated.

Mr. Deachman: I do not think we on the west coast have to apologize for anything. We have twice the capability for moving grain that we had a decade ago. The people on the Prairies do not begin to have twice the capabilities. I drove through the Prairies. What did I see? Did I find the prairie people in the co-op, who were boasting a moment ago, capable of taking care of the grain situation? No. I found storage on farmers' land in increasing quantities because, I presume, the co-ops have not been able to take care of it. If I were looking for efficiency in the handling of grain and the storing and movement of grain, I would not look to the west coast for improvement but to the Prairies.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Deachman) sat down so quickly, because he was having such a good time telling us how great things are in the west. He could have started to tell us that in the east we have no problems in spite of the eight increases in freight rates we have suffered over the past three years and the considerable decline in the movement of our basic products such as potatoes to central markets. However, one presumes that the hon. member has no limit to his naivety and that on a future occasion he will favour us with a rendition of how things are not in eastern Canada.

Having listened to Aesop's Fables for the past few minutes, I think it would be useful to put some hard facts on the record. In the past few days I have received a newsletter issued by the potato trade which indicates in factual terms the deterioration in service provided by the railway for the movement of that basic commodity from Prince Edward Island. It is interesting to note the movement of potatoes over the past five years and see where increasing freight rates are leading the potato industry.

I shall read this into the record briefly. It stands as some kind of monument to the impact of the present transportation policy on the agricultural industry of eastern Canada. To February 25, 1968, there were 9,760 carloads of potatoes moved by rail from Prince Edward Island. To February 25, 1969, there were 10,912 carloads moved by rail. To February 25, 1970, 12,306 carloads of potatoes were moved. I stop at this point to indicate that until this time we had been operating under a freight rate assistance act that had not been altered substantially since before World War II. In those three years, 1968 through 1970, there was a considerable increase in the amount of potatoes moved by rail.

What happened in the first full calendar year after the new freight structure was introduced? To February 25, 1971, there was a sudden drop from 12,306 cars to 8,654—a fantastic drop of approximately 33 per cent. To February 25, 1972, the number of carloads of potatoes moved by rail declined by more than a thousand to 7,643. This is as a direct result of freight increases, eight of which we have suffered in the past 29 months. The last rail rate increase was on February 24 of this year. That increase, announced by the Railway Association of Canada on behalf of the Canadian railways, ranges from 4 per cent to 8 per cent.

The latest increase is another in what has become a pattern of increase every six months since the lifting of the rail freight rate freeze on September 23, 1969. This succession of rail rate increases now stands at a cumulative total of 35 to 68 per cent, depending upon the rate level, for non-competitive rail rates and 19 to 40 per cent on competitive rail rates. While it may be argued that railway rates were frozen for almost ten years prior to September 23, 1969, the accumulative increase enacted during the years immediately following the lifting of the wartime prices and income freeze, in fact for the lower rated traffic the increase since September 23, 1969, exceeds the increase in any similar period since World War II.

I wonder if the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra is still listening and is still prepared to tell me how wonderful things are with regard to the operation of the railroad and the discriminatory action taken by this government with respect to rail rates as they affect the Atlantic region. It is ludicrous for anyone in this chamber or anywhere else to suggest that we have somehow benefited from any kind of enlightened transportation policy. In fact, we know the situation is quite the reverse; we are faced with an extremely serious situation.

So that no one will be inclined to suggest that this decline in the use of the railroad is the result of shifting to other carriers such as truck transport, may I put on record the figures for the same five-year period. To February 25, 1968, 822 truckloads of potatoes were moved from Prince Edward Island. To February 25, 1969, 870 truckloads were moved. To February 25, 1970, 879 truckloads were moved. To February 25, 1971—presumably because some advantages were granted to the trucking industry—there was an increase to 1,173 truckloads. To February 25, 1972, when action was being taken to increase rates for the trucking industry, there was a substantial decline to 922 truckloads.

The situation in which we find ourselves at the present time with regard to moving perishable commodities and basic products such as potatoes is that increasing discriminatory action is being taken by the transport industry, I assume under the direction of the Canadian Transport Commission. This will undoubtedly have a continuing depressing affect on the agricultural industry of Atlantic Canada. In this respect I wish to refer to Fraser's Potato Newsletter which is published in Prince Edward Island, which indicates that this trend will probably continue and that we will be seeing more people moving closer to the population centres of Canada or to the ports where they can move their spuds to market short distances by truck and water instead of in the old-fashioned way. The old-fashioned way seems to be the fundamental way for the basic industry of Prince Edward Island. Unless and until the government requires its own agency, the CNR, to live up to its commitments, the agricultural industry in Prince Edward Island will face increasing difficulties. I find it rather difficult to believe that the government would introduce these measures without requiring their agency, the CNR, to reconsider its over-all policy respecting the movement of such basic commodities.

I do not want to spend all of the time available to me discussing the aspect of freight rates alone. Recently, both railroads applied to discontinue passenger train service to the Atlantic region, which applications were denied. I was happily surprised that the Canadian Transport Commission not only refused the applications of the railroads but took the rather unusual step, which I hope will be very largely responded to by the general public, of inviting suggestions from the public in regard to improving passenger train service between Montreal and the Maritimes.

If ever I felt there was need for public response and contribution it is in the area of giving some imagination to the current unimaginative and dreary attitude exhibited by the nation's railroads in connection with passenger service. I have occasion from time to time to travel on the railroad, both long distances from here to Prince Edward Island and shorter commuting distances such as to Montreal and Toronto, and every time I realize how actively the railroad discourages public use of the railroad for passenger traffic. It cannot be said more simply and directly than that. It is abundantly clear, particularly under the new transportation arrangements, that the railroads do everything they legally can to ensure that passenger travel will be at least an unpleasant experience. It is difficult to describe, unless one has a tremendous flair for language and colour, the paucity of imagination regarding the facilities provided for passenger traffic on our railroads. Just recently the railroads took a further backward step in deciding to increase passenger costs by separating accommodation and meals which had been hitherto provided on the same ticket. What does one find when one travels aboard Canada's railroads today?

Mr. Peters: Members of parliament.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is right, but you also find many people who have no alternative mode of travel. There are not many who travel because they choose to use the railways.

Mr. Woolliams: Only when there are strikes.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mostly during strikes, that is true. They do so out of desperation, I presume. No effort is made to make the trip an enjoyable event in itself, whether in terms of housekeeping facilities and general level of hospitality—if I may put it that way—aboard the railroads, or in terms of some diversion or entertainment while aboard.

It is a rather fascinating piece of Canadian history that when radio broadcasting was first developed in this country, which was in the 1920s, one of the first places a person could listen to the radio was while sitting in the lounge car of a railroad train.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A CNR train.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A CNR train, that is correct.

Mr. Woolliams: Both you and Stan are about the same age!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes, he is just reminding me of that. As I was saying, it is fascinating to realize that radio, that new and exciting means of communication, found its first home aboard a railroad car. What imaginative and daring people must have existed in the 1920s who not only placed radios in lounge cars but even began the first radio network. This was certainly an imaginative step to be taken by such daring individuals in the 1920s.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With an operator to keep them in good shape, too.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am reminded that there was an operator to keep them tuned in to the best programs of the day. Where are all the men of imagination and daring of the 1920s? I can only conclude they are 50 years older and are still sitting at the desks they were sitting at in the 1920s, never having had a new idea since. Who would think of doing such a dangerous and daring thing as placing a television set or a movie screen aboard a railroad car? That would be unheard of. Or who would think of supplying a stewardess?

Mr. Woolliams: Or even a janitor to clean up the floor.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): These are suggestions that must boggle the imagination of anyone who is responsible for passenger traffic on our railroads today. What has happened to all the old ideas? Or is it considered improper for a national institution like a railroad to do anything to entertain the traveller on short or long trips other than providing him with a Reader's Digest that is six months old or with bingo at ten o'clock? Certainly, this seems to be the sum total of their imagination at the present time. Somewhere in the dim and dark past the railroad apparently discovered that bingo was a good thing.

Mr. Woolliams: CPA have Playboy now.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Well, I will not get into that. Bingo is a good thing and the railroads feel it is an exciting diversion that satisfies every predilection of the travelling public. What utter, transparent nonsense!

I think it is time that somehow, somewhere, there be thorough shake-up of the individual and collective imaginations behind our nation's railroads. Perhaps in a way this is what the Canadian Transport Commission is trying to do when it suggests that the time has come for the general public to give its views on how the railroads tackle such things as the routing of trains, frequency of service, connections, times of departure, methods of providing meals, methods and cost of providing sleeping car service, fare levels, improved reservations and a whole host of other things that I will not bother to go into now. I sincerely hope that prior to the deadline announced by the commission of April 15, 1972, the general public in the Maritimes and Atlantic provinces inundate the Canadian Transport Commission with all kinds of suggestions.

The only place where there seems to be any kind of imagination shown, any suggestion that people might actually enjoy themselves while travelling on a train, is in these high-priced, glossy magazine advertisement that we see, or in some of the television commercials depicting happy, smiling, joking families having such a wonderful time aboard a railroad train in the dining car or lounge car. It is never made quite clear what they are enjoying, but obviously they are enjoying something. Perhaps it is time to call the bluff of the corporate bosses and ask them what the railroad plans to do to make passenger travel an exciting prospect for both long distance and short distance travellers.

Things are so bad in terms of the ability of the railways to adjust to the needs of passenger traffic that in Ontario the province is developing its own railroad to serve mass transit needs. The Go-transit system is Ontario's answer to failures on the part of the CNR. There are many examples of these shortcomings. One thinks of the commuter service operating between Ottawa and Montreal. I am not a regular user of this service but many members of this House are, and from time to time we hear laments, private and public, about the shortcomings of that service. Surely suggestions for improving it have been passed along often enough to merit a response.

I wish to turn now to another aspect of the responsibilities of the Canadian National, namely, the operation of the ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. There are few things of more vital concern to a Member of Parliament from Prince Edward Island than the efficiency of this ferry service. I do not want to be completely negative in my approach. I want to take this opportunity to say that one of the best things done by the CNR in connection with the service has been the complete structural change in terminal facilities at both Borden and Tormentine. The arrangements for both passengers and freight now represent a vast improvement over any we have previously known. This is an important development in providing a more humane and effective method of travelling to and from Prince Edward Island from the mainland.

Having said this, I want to make some specific suggestions with regard to improving the present service. I had occasion to use these terminals fairly recently and I can therefore speak from personal knowledge. There are two areas which need substantial improvement. The first is so obvious that it hardly needs mentioning. It arises from the fact that after ten o'clock in the evening there is no provision whatever for food or sustenance for those who might have to wait many hours for ferries. I cannot understand why, when they are so close to the operation, the CNR has allowed or compelled that restaurant service close at 10 p.m. while still operating the ferries until 1 a.m.

It would be bad enough if the ferries operated on a regular schedule. But everybody who knows this service knows that for a long period during the winter months one cannot be sure how long it will be before a ferry leaves or how long the crossing will take from either of the terminal centres. On some occasions people must wait five or six hours, well into the small hours of the morning, literally without food or drink to sustain them. Surely, inhumane conditions of this kind do not need to be perpetuated and a reasonable adjustment could be made in restaurant hours to provide necessary facilities required by travellers, particularly during the cold winter months.

My second criticism is of particular importance to those who use the service infrequently or rarely. There is a real paucity of information concerning the time at which ferries travel or what delays the traveller can expect. I arrived at one of the terminals the other night shortly after midnight and tried to find out whether the ferry would leave on time. For a long time I was unable to get this information. Finally, though, I was able to rouse an official who was occupied with quite another responsibility and he was able to tell me. Surely it would not take a great deal of effort or imagination to provide some way by which simple information could be given to the travelling public.

There is another matter I should raise in connection with the ferry service. A continuing bone of contention is the off and on again situation with regard to the John Hamilton Gray. Many hon. members will recall the concern expressed by Islanders when this vessel, the flagship of the fleet, was suddenly whisked away from the Prince Edward Island operation to the Newfoundland-Port aux Basques run. Islanders felt rightful indignation that a ship which had been constructed especially to operate between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick should suddenly be plucked from that service to supplement a service for which it had not been constructed and for which it was not, in some respects, particularly suited. I am aware that the Minister of Transport is again considering relocating the John Hamilton Gray on the Newfoundland service in the summer months. I think this would be a move not happily accepted by Islanders.

I am even more concerned about the possibility that, having once gone into the Newfoundland service again, the vessel might stay there for an indefinite period and not return to Prince Edward Island next fall. Any suggestion of such a step would in my opinion be tantamount to a breach of the basic agreement in the constitution to provide continuous and effective communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I cannot believe that any official in the Department of Transport would treat such a request seriously.

I ask the CNR to consider how it could ever discharge its duties in terms of the movement of heavy traffic during the winter months in the absence of a ship such as the John Hamilton Gray. It is crucial that the Gray be retained to handle the heavy movement of freight during the winter months. Moreover, in my opinion, it will be crucial, perhaps not this summer but in succeeding summers, to make use of the Gray to handle the tremendous annual increase in tourist traffic in Prince Edward Island. Any worsening of the service presently provided would amount to a great obstacle to the economic development and improvement of Prince Edward Island.

I wish to refer briefly to only one further question with regard to the legislation under discussion. This bill also encompasses grants of money for Air Canada. Prince Edward Island is a unique province in many ways. It is particularly unique in terms of air transport in that it is the only province not served by the national carrier, Air Canada. Prince Edward Island has never been served by Air Canada because our air transport requirements over the years have been met by regional carriers, first Maritime Central Airways and in more recent years Eastern Provincial.

There have been suggestions that Eastern Provincial will be altering its schedule shortly. It has an application to this effect. The application is to direct its main service from Charlottetown through Halifax and an intermediate point to Montreal. Such a step would certainly be a backward one. I have had the experience of representing an area, Summerside, in Prince County, Prince Edward Island, which has lost the air service previously provided by Eastern Provincial and before that by Maritime Central Airways. I would hope there is not an attempt on the part of the regional carrier to further downgrade the service provided out of the province itself by air.

Surely, if Prince Edward Island is faced with a deteriorating air service from this regional carrier there will deservedly be much more pressure for the national carrier to provide service to all ten provinces and not just nine as is presently the case. I would hope Air Canada as well would examine the air requirements from time to time which exist in Prince Edward Island, because I do not think it is inevitable that forever and a day the island should not be part of the national air transportation link. It might well be that on a trial basis Air Canada could well serve Prince Edward Island during the peak travel months of July and August. I believe this would be met with great favour by those who are increasingly using air transport to visit Prince Edward Island during the heavy tourist months.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude with the hope that Canadian National Railways, which has provided service internally to Prince Edward Island for years in the past, will continue to do so in the foreseeable future. Without the movement of railroad traffic it would be impossible to move internally or externally our heavy production in potatoes. I am concerned about the level of maintenance being put forward on the island roadbeds as they already exist. This is a matter I hope to raise at a later date either in this House or in committee.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I listened earlier to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) and I immediately understood why he is referred to as the member for "Vancouver quandary," because he certainly was in a quandary when he was trying to talk about grain, grain movement, elevators and the like.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not mind the hon. gentleman saying I am in a quandary. However, I come from a constituency in which we are proud of the name Vancouver Quadra, which commemorates the names of two great, gallant seamen. I do not particularly like it referred to as "Vancouver quandary." I do not refer to the hon. member's constituency in derogatory terms, and I know he feels as proud of his constituency as I do of mine. If he wants to say I am in a quandary, that is another matter. I will take my lumps in debate as well as give a few myself sometimes, but I think he should respect our constituencies and what they stand for.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am rather pleased I gave the hon. gentleman an opportunity to say something worth while for a change. Perhaps he was not listening. I do not wish to continue this sort of argument, but I said that after listening to him it is no wonder many of his colleagues call him the hon. member for "Vancouver quandary." I did not suggest that was the name of the constituency. The hon. member's oversensitivity ran away with his good judgment.

When I first moved up to north central British Columbia many years ago, Canadian National Railways used to operate a train between Jasper, Alberta, and Prince Rupert, the terminus on the coast, on a three-day a week basis. One day it went westbound and the next day it went eastbound and the seventh day was day of rest. After that a bit of progress was made and the passenger train expanded its operations to run six days each way. In other words, we had a train each day, one going east and one going west.

In recent years the Canadian National has seen fit to revert to that earlier time when there was a smaller population and less industrial activity than there is now. We are back on a three-day schedule, and have been for quite a number of years now except during the peak summer months of tourist traffic. It was always my impression that the Canadian National was an organization that always looked backward, but I see from the revelations about radio and things like that that it did not look back far enough in order to find some inspiration to do something worth while for the nation.

At one time it was a pretty proud occupation, and still is, to be a railroader. Railroaders had good morale, a good feeling, good comradeship and loyalty to the company, particularly in the Canadian National. There was a dedication of the individual to the efficient functioning and operation of the railway. The people who worked for the railway were very proud to be railroaders and proud to be working for that particular company. I do not know when the change took place, but there was a coincidental, if nothing else, deterioration in the level of service, a decline in the morale and feeling of railroaders at about the same time the late Donald Gordon took over the reins of the CNR and became its president.

I think this was probably because of the attitude of Donald Gordon, the attitude about centralization of authority in the CNR, the attitude of computerizing the operations, the attitude of using a slide-rule and not being concerned so much with the actual functioning and operation of the railway, and the attitude about lay-offs and curtailment of service as well as everything else. In other words, there was an indication to the people who worked on the railway that Donald Gordon as the president was really not very interested in the people who worked as railroaders. There was not the old spirit at the top, and it filtered down on the men and destroyed the morale and efficient functioning of the Canadian National itself.

An hon. Member: It reflected government policy.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): One of my colleagues tells me it was a reflection of government policy. That may well be so. We know Donald Gordon was one of the dollar-a-year men during the war years, and perhaps the disinterest of Mackenzie King rubbed off on him.

As everyone says, in northern British Columbia we have a fantastic amount of natural wealth, fantastic amounts of minerals, timber, lumber, pulp and paper and everything that flows from that. We have an agricultural potential and a hydroelectric potential for industrial activity which abounds all over that country. The Canadian National Railways has an industrial development branch, section or division which in theory is supposed to concern itself with industrial development.

So far—and this is within the limited years of my knowledge of what they do—the CN has ignored completely whatever potential exists in the area from which I come and, I gather, in other areas as well. While the Canadian National theoretically has concern about industrial development, engineering and structuring its activity to provide development and job opportunities for people, it has completely ignored it and has operated on a kind of single-track mentality without any regard whatever for what its function should be.

Northward from the community called Hazelton, which in B.C. is the northernmost point on the CN line, some time during the early years of the Second World War—this would be about 30 years ago now—there was a designation made of a route classified as route A. It was a wartime concept, the hope being that this was one of the north-south routes that could be used to tie Alaska with the southern continental part of the U.S. and help better to prosecute the war effort. Finally, a different route was used, of course—namely, the Alaska highway.

The point I am trying to make is that 30 years ago this route was conceived and on quite a number of occasions since then, and in the latter years particularly, the CN has had engineers in that area who have conducted surveys. It was the Department of Transport, I believe, which contracted an engineering firm by the name of Menzies a few years ago which conducted an extensive survey in the area for a potential northward line of the CN to open up that part of the country in the northern 500 miles of B.C.

There have been studies upon studies upon examinations of considerations, engineering reports and heaven knows what other kind of examination made of that type of extension, but no activity, no action, no concrete proposals and no attempts whatever to really do something about it. During the time that Jack Pickersgill was minister of transport, I wrote him a letter. This was before he got that cushy job for himself paying him $40,000 a year or something like that. The money is insignificant to Mr. Pickersgill. He was not concerned about the money. He was just concerned about finding an area for retirement for himself where he would not have to do anything, and he succeeded because it is he who conceived the legislation that created the job to which he got himself appointed after the legislation was passed.

However, I do not want to get involved in that sort of discussion about Mr. Pickersgill. I like him very much. In fact, I wrote letters to him when he was minister of transport in that informal way in which friends can write to each other. I started, "Dear Jack" and I related to him what was and what should be going on in B.C. about this extension, and I asked whether he would do something about it. I got a delightful letter back in which he wrote, "Dear Frank". It acknowledged my letter and told me that this had nothing to do with his department and that I should get in touch with Canadian National: they were the ones who were in the business of building railways, not him.

So I wrote CN and used almost the same phraseology. I said, "Here is the situation, here is the potential, here is the area, here is what is necessary. How about doing it?" The reply I received from CN was that they were not involved in that sort of activity. They suggested that I get hold of the Department of Transport and the minister because this was a matter of government policy. This running around back and forth between the government and CN has resulted in no activity taking place in terms of railroad development in that area where it can really be worth while.

Let us take a contrasting situation to put this matter in perspective. In my own province we have another socialistically-operated railroad which used to be called Pacific Great Eastern. The Pacific Great Eastern Railway right at the moment, and all credit to them, are building a railroad extension in exactly the same area into which we have been trying to push CN for a number of years. At one stage a premier of my province, who was also president of the PGE railroad, offered to buy the CN north line because he saw what the potential was. I cannot understand the reluctance on the part of the government, because they were not interested in that operation in the first place. I do not know why they did not enter into negotiations to sell the railroad, because now we have the ludicrous situation of PGE building a railroad extension northward from Prince George which for quite a distance parallels the Canadian National line after which it branches off in a northwesterly direction.

The question arises now: What happens to the Canadian National line, and what happens to Prince Rupert as a potential port for shipment of goods and materials in and out of that port? Is it going to be over the CN line, or will the Pacific Great Eastern—a provincially-owned and operated railway which is still building the extension where the CN should have built it, because the CN was in that area long before PGE was—manage all the traffic in and out of that area?

If I was running PGE I would want all the traffic possible to move over that railroad as distinct from trying to get it over the CN. I understand that some discussions are taking place, but what they are nobody seems to know at the moment or at least they do not want to say. I think this points out that the CNR really has not concerned itself too much about what it should be providing Canadians. It is a publicly-owned corporation and a publicly-owned railway, and undoubtedly its lack of concern reflects what successive governments have imparted to it.

Mr. Benjamin: They do not believe that.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): No, I guess they do not believe it. They probably do not believe in doing something worth while for Canada either. Consider the port of Prince Rupert. The CNR controls the waterfront in Prince Rupert. I do not know how much property they have along there, but the train runs in and out right along the waterfront and the CN has big blocks of property there under its authority and control. Each time there has been an attempt of any kind at port development in the city of Prince Rupert, in one of the finest harbours on the west coast, it has been blocked by the Canadian National. Each time a proposal has been put forward to do something worth while with that port, the Canadian National, which controls the waterfront, has said, "We are not interested in doing anything—in assisting, in giving up prerogative rights or doing anything at all worth while to develop the port."

• (2130)

The people in charge of Canadian National refuse to budge. Now they are in the process of closing some of the stations in communities that do not even have adequate road transportation and in some cases are on the off-side of the river from the highway and depend desperately on station agents and having a station operative at those points. But it is the intention of the Canadian National to close them, to ignore those communities and disregard the legitimate needs, desires and claims of the people who live in them—all for the purpose of trying to consolidate everything into these servo-centres that Canadian National now has.

With respect to Prince Rupert, I wonder if I could speculate for a moment about the attitude of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in his capacity of dealing with the Wheat Board. I do not know how many times it has occurred, Mr. Speaker, but on almost innumerable occasions matters have been raised about the terminal elevators on the west coast and about the shipment of grain, why the ports cannot be operated more efficiently and more effectively, why there have to be blockages, hold-ups and delays, why grain cannot move through these ports and elevators, why we cannot meet our commitments to world trade, why we cannot give guarantees to countries which have been told, "Not only will we sell you grain, but we will see to it that it is delivered."

Every time these questions are raised the minister stands up and talks about some place called the port of Vancouver, as if that were the only community in British Columbia. He is the head of the Canadian Wheat Board. He is a member of a federal government party that in 1926 built, and a few years ago doubled the capacity of, owns, operates and runs a terminal grain elevator in the city of Prince Rupert, an elevator that is under-used, that has a capacity that is not used to the limit, that sits idle without ships available for it, without boxcars or grain available for it at certain times of the year, while the city of Vancouver and Vancouver harbour, right outside in English Bay, upwards of a dozen or more grain ships are sitting and waiting either to get into the elevators or waiting because there is not sufficient grain. The same government that gives that response about Vancouver being the only port through which it thinks it can ship grain, on behalf of the people of Canada owns a railroad that runs right into Prince Rupert and owns a terminal elevator as well—but it ignores its operation and use. That is not being Canadian. That is not being helpful to our economy. That is not trying to do things that are worth while. In fact, that is putting an obstacle in the way of progress, in the way of any worth while use of these facilities.

It took a tremendous amount of effort, through two successive governments and I don't know how many ministers of agriculture within the last 12 years, to move the Canadian government to duplicate and double the storage capacity of the elevator in Prince Rupert. If the government really wanted to do something valuable, helpful and worth while for the shipment and movement of grain, which in turn would be helpful to the prairie provinces, helpful to the farmers, helpful to our commitments to world markets, helpful to the railroad—the Canadian National, because it would be moving the grain—helpful to Prince Rupert and helpful to the people of Prince Rupert who would be working in the grain handling facilities there, the government itself should have been working three or four years ago to build additional elevators in Prince Rupert in order to help take the pressure off Vancouver, if that is where the difficulty, the bottleneck, really is. But as I say, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian National and the government seem to have a one-track mind when it comes to the question of doing anything valuable and worth while.

Now I would like to mention in a more broad and national sense one of the things we are concerned about and were concerned about previously, namely, the financial structure of the CNR. As I understand it, the CNR came into existence as a company that incorporated a number of privately-owned, and at that time privately-being-built railroads that had gone bankrupt. The Canadian government at the time of the setting up of the Canadian National said to the investors in those bankrupt railroads, "Never fear; we will bail you out. We will take over your lines. We will guarantee your investment even though the private corporation in which you invested has gone broke or bankrupt and in some cases has probably fleeced you as investors. We, on behalf of the Canadian taxpayers, will take you over, consolidate you all into one railroad and guarantee your investment, guarantee to pay the bond interest and guarantee you won't lose your money."

I gather that one of the fundamental, principle points of the capitalist system concerns the question of risk capital. You risk your money in private ventures. You invest it, naturally in the hope that this will bring a return, but you take the risk that if the company you invest in goes bankrupt then that is too bad and you have lost your money. But the Canadian government at that time, and successive governments since then, did not really believe in that because they had friends amongst those investors, and governments of the time and ever since then have said to those old-time investors, "Never fear; we will dip into the taxpayers' pockets and we will guarantee your investment. We will guarantee to pay the interest on the money that you have put into these defunct and bankrupt railways." So we took them over and the result has been largely a millstone around the neck of the Canadian National in its financial structure.

Over the years, those original indebtednesses have been refinanced and other bonds issued until it is virtually impossible, without a fleet of chartered accountants going over the books, to find out what the original investment was and how much money was sucked out of the Canadian taxpayer who, through this system of government guaranteeing to those people—most of whom, I understand, were in England at that time—guaranteed that even though they had lost their money in a poor venture they, the Canadian taxpayers, would give it back to them. We went through all this a couple of years ago in trying to assess the financial position of the Canadian National when a similar bill was being dealt with. At that time we also went into extensive questioning about the Canadian National pension fund and the fact that that pension fund had millions of dollars in it of employees' contributions but is dominated by the Canadian National. The money in that fund is what the employees put into it, but it is Canadian National that decides what will happen to the fund.

We made some committee recommendations a few years ago about a couple of these items. Hon. members may wonder how that happened. One of the preludes to it was a CNR financing bill, as we loosely call it, that was before the House at the time. There was a deadline and a timetable, and speaking from memory it was December 31, 1969. Those of us who were interested in this denial of justice to CN employees of pension rights and pension contributions, and in the operations of the board, and those of us who were concerned about the ludicrous financial structure of the CN which makes it top heavy and always losing money, wanted to do something about it to see if it could be corrected. We engaged in a filibuster, that being the only mechanism with which to get any common sense through to the government of the day.

On December 10, 1969, as a result of our continued efforts, though mostly because of that approaching deadline of the end of the year, the government agreed to refer to a parliamentary committee the financial structure of the CN and the operation of the pension fund. The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications examined these matters in some detail. The report dated September 8, 1970, went into a number of those questions. It went into the fact that Canadian National Railways chose the chairman of the pension board and decided on the secretary or executive officer of the fund. It went into the fact that there are seven men on the pension board, four of whom are directors of CN and three are elected from the employees. It went into all this in great detail and made recommendations. With respect to the pension fund and the pension board, right at the beginning the report reads:

> It soon became evident to the committee members that there was a widespread and strongly felt dissatisfaction with the CN pension plans among the railway's employees—

The committee concluded that it was not fair nor just to have a pension board handling millions of dollars of employees' contributions; to have a pension board dominated by the company; that it was wrong that the chairman of that board should be a director of the company; that the chairman was not an impartial person; that the chairman had a vested interest in preserving the position of the Canadian National and disregarding the position of the employees and their pension rights; that the chairman was unfair and unjust in his dealings with those employees in regard to the pension fund. The only reason the committee was able to come to those conclusions based on the evidence presented was that some of us made life miserable for the government when it was trying to get the bill through the House. We wrung from the government a reluctant referral to that committee, otherwise there would have been no report. We see now that the referral to the committee was really a put-off, that the government was not sincere and did not care about justice for the employees.

Mr. Gleave: It never did.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): It said so at the time. I do not remember what office the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) occupied then, but I do remember that he said the government recognized the difficulties of the older employees on pensions and those on pensions right, and that he recognized the CN had difficulty with its financial structure. He moved the motion for referral to committee, and it was passed.

The committee made recommendations and concluded that the chairman of the pension board was unfair, unjust, dictatorial and concerned only with the Canadian National part of the pension fund and not concerned with the well-being of the employees. It recommended that the unions involved and the CN each choose an equal number of representatives to serve on the pension board and that an impartial chairman be appointed, "probably by a minister of the Crown".

That recommendation is as valid today as it was then, Mr. Speaker, but it has been ignored by the government that said it was going to do something about it. Obviously, the government was concerned only with cheating the employees of the CN; it was concerned only with cheating those who were on pensions and were denied fair treatment by the fund.

The committee pointed out that there was an annual surplus of some $7 million. Multiply that by the number of years the fund has been in effect—the report was made in 1970, so presumably there was $7 million in 1969 as well, and in 1970 and in 1971—and that amounts to $21 million. Every member of that committee recognized that justice had to be done to those who were on pension and recommended that the $7 million annual surplus be used to establish a new pension level for the old-time railroaders who went on pension under a less generous plan than now exists. In other words, it should bring them up to a meaningful amount of pension. That also has been ignored. That means nothing more than the government cheating people, the government flying in the face of an unanimous recommendation of the committee.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, this matter was referred to the committee because some members of this House who were concerned engaged in a filibuster and because there was a deadline for the passing of that bill—the end of 1969. Nothing definite has come out of that examination. The recommendations have been ignored by the CN, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his tribe of professional ignorers of almost everything.

We want to get some action and activity from this bill. We do not think it is sufficient for members to stand in the House and talk about the things they are concerned about in their constituencies, valid as those things are. We all know that if the government sets its mind to something it will get it through Parliament even if it has to ram it through, as happened with the tax bill. We all know that logic, common sense, reason, appeals to justice and fair play fall on deaf ears. We all know that speeches in this House go over the heads of the government because their minds have been set beforehand—they have a determination about what the government intends to do and will not listen to another point of view.

We are concerned, as well, about Canadians on pension, about the financial structure of the company and about things like the movement of grain, improper freight rates, about how the public is gouged on freight rates, about railway abandonment proposals, about the curtailment of passenger service and the level of that service. We are also concerned about the servo-centres, about lay-offs and about the destruction of communities resulting from removing from them stations, station agents and railway service.

I do not know whether there is any deadline for this bill. I do not know whether the deadline is the end of this month—nobody has yet said—or any other time. I think there is a deadline in that the government wishes to get on with other legislative matters. I am sure there are other bills the government wants to get through the House, otherwise they would not be on the order paper and the government would not have introduced them.

Whether there is a deadline at the end of the month because that is the end of the fiscal year, or whether there is a deadline in terms of the government's own priorities, I think we should indicate to those government supporters who want to listen or who want to read Hansard that if we have to engage in a filibuster in order to get the valid and worth-while recommendations of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications made on September 8, 1970, accepted, we will just have to engage in a filibuster.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

If we have to engage in a filibuster in the House and in committee to deal with the freight rate structure, the rationalization of that structure, the abandonment of service, the level of service and all the other negative things that Canadian National has engaged in, that is what we will have to do. I do not relish the prospect of engaging in filibuster tactics any more than anybody else. However, in a situation where logic, common sense and reason do not prevail, where the valid complaints of citizens of Canada are unheeded by a government that has a mentality like concrete—well mixed and well set—the only course available to us is confrontation. If filibuster and obstruction tactics are the only way to get at the meat of the situation, then let us engage in them. If that is the kind of game the government wants to play, that is the kind of game we will have to play, either until the demands of the people meet with success or until the government decides to call an election or do whatever it wants. That seems to be the only course available.

Reluctant as we are to waste our time, the time of the House and the time of committees, that is the course we shall have to follow in dealing with these matters. The primary consideration—I know that this may sound foreign to the government benches—is justice. Justice must prevail. Let us attempt to get it.

Mr. McQuaid: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—INQUIRY AS TO ADVICE FROM SECURITY PLANNING AND RESEARCH GROUP

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on February 29 I directed a question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) for which I have received no reply so far. It had to do with any advice that he is deemed to have received from the security planning and research group, as he called it in his statement of September 21, 1971, on page 8027 of Hansard. Previous to that occasion I had asked the Solicitor General a question on December 28 of last year to which I received what I considered an unsatisfactory answer. The minister so much as said that if I would like to check Hansard I would find all the information I would require with regard to this group for which the Solicitor General is responsible. In other words I was told to do my homework.

I checked through Hansard. I specifically checked the editions of April 1, 1971, September 7, 1971, September 9, 1971 and also the minister's statement given to this House on September 21 of that year. With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, the answers to the questions I had asked were not there. So at this time, as a result of the minister's inordinate preoccupation with keeping the functioning of this particular group secret, I should like to put on record a number of other questions in the hope that an early answer will be provided in this House when estimates are considered or on some other occasion.

First, I request that the government table the job description which appeared in British Columbia outling the functions of the first job available in British Columbia for this new, so-called group or intelligence branch as one might refer to it. Second, is the Solicitor General aware of representations made by the British Columbia Federation of Labour criticizing the entire notion of the establishment of this branch? Third, could the Solicitor General also outline the organizational basis of this unit? Will it be organized regionally or will it be organized on the basis of provinces? Fourth, has the Canadian Civil Liberties Union made any comments on the establishment of this group? Have civil libertarians in general brought their position to the attention of the minister?

Fifth, does the group investigate on its own initiative? Sixth, who has access to the files? Do other departments, for example, have access to the files of this division? Can these files be used as the basis for discrimination against individuals or groups applying for federal government jobs or grants in other fields? Seventh, I should also like to ask whether the subjects who are being investigated or evaluated are informed about this process. How long will this information stay in the records of this group for which the Solicitor General is responsible? Eighth, what kind of protection will be afforded to individuals or groups that potentially are being investigated. Ninth, was the justice department's advice solicited on the establishment of this security planning and research group or organization?

Tenth, will they share their files with the ministry of justice? Eleventh, how long will any investigation remain on file? Twelfth, I should like to ask if the advice of this group will transcend the advice of other divisions. Thirteenth, who gathers the information for this group to evaluate. Is it gathered by this particular group, is it gathered by the RCMP, and what are its terms of reference? Fourteenth, I should like to know how this group will make a distinction between anyone promoting social change and someone promoting subversion. My last and fifteenth question is, does this group intend to investigate individuals or groups regarding the objects of such individuals or groups who have received DREE grants, LIP grants or Opportunities for Youth grants which, after all, can be used and are being used in some cases for the promotion of social change?

It seems to me that there are so many questions that need to be answered about this group that it is time we paid more attention to the basis on which it has been set up and under which it operates. The minister's inordinate preoccupation with being secretive about this group probably is doing it a disservice and is perhaps hindering it from fulfilling the function for which it was formed.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the security planning and research group in the Department of the Solicitor General has not participated in any way whatsoever with respect to the so-called Geoffroy case. In suggesting in his question that the group would be giving advice to the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) regarding the penitentiary service and parole board, the hon. member has totally misconstrued the remarks made by the Solicitor General on September 21 of last year with respect to the function of this group. I would invite the hon. member to re-read the remarks made by the Solicitor General at that time and he will see that this group is engaged in studies and analyses of information pertaining only to internal security and not to such matters as are involved in the Geoffroy case.

If the hon. member were to re-read carefully the remarks made by the Solicitor General he would see that many of the questions that this evening he has added to his original question have been answered. As he is aware, the extreme time limitation imposed on me this evening and the lack of prior notice of his questions prevent my giving an adequate answer at this time. I suggest that the hon. member attend the appropriate committee when the estimates of the Solicitor General are before the House. At that time he will have an opportunity to extend the questions he has put on the record tonight.

It seems odd that there is so much mystery over this particular group. When the supplementary estimates were before the House last fall and the matter came before the committee, none of the questions put by the hon. member were presented to the Solicitor General.

TRANSPORT—SUGGESTED DELAY IN CLOSING OF CERTAIN SASKATCHEWAN STATIONS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on February 29 I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) a question regarding the suggested delay in closing certain Saskatchewan stations in so far as the customer service plan is concerned. At that time he said he would be glad to sift through all questions in Hansard to find the various representations and would do his best to follow them up. I hope the parliamentary secretary can indicate tonight that he has sifted through and followed up the suggestions in the questions asked.

We hear a lot about industrial peace. We hear a lot about a government and a labour department that wants good labour-management relationships. We read and listen to pious remarks about proper recognition of the rights of labour and the rights of management. Then we see and read a decision by the railway transport committee concerning the removal of 56 agents, nine caretakers and four caretaker-agents from Saskatchewan and four agents and three caretakers from stations in the province of Alberta, all from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

What are the facts, and why would one be concerned after a review by the railway transport committee which rubber-stamped the earlier decision? The review was held at three points in Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Battleford and Wynyard from December 1 to December 11, 1971. Hundreds of pages of testimony were heard by one commissioner. The commissioner repeated the fact he was taking and listening to testimony from all the witnesses and at a later date this evidence would be considered by other members of the commission and a decision rendered. On February 10 a decision was handed down rescinding the application by the government of Saskatchewan and giving the CPR the go ahead to implement its customer service plan on March 16.

What happened then, and why did it happen? The CPR moved ahead without regard to the social element involved in such an implementation. Can one imagine such inhumane treatment to employees expected to move their families if they wanted to be with them in the middle of March? Can you imagine a wife trying to shovel coal and haul ashes from some old, hand-fired furnace while her husband is hundreds of miles away if in fact he is one of the 50 per cent who may be still fortunate enough to have a job? Why did the commission not recognize the social consequences of long-standing employees and their families? What type of society do we live in, with such callous treatment from the hands of appointed boards and employers?

On the other hand, on the Laurentian division in Quebec an order approving the customer-service plan was handed down on January 17. However, the CPR is not implementing that service until May 1, which is realistic. Why the inconsistency in these two applications as far as implementation is concerned? Can the minister not have some input into a reasonable approach to such changes? Cannot the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) or his industry specialists bring reason and consideration to bear on the railway company? Are we concerned about industrial peace, or do we not give a damn? Surely there is responsibility on the part of government to use all means to bring about fair and proper treatment. Surely this government can move on its own initiative and not let an unfeeling and cold decision develop into bitterness and strife on our railroad.

All I ask is that this government, the minister and the parliamentary secretary use their authority to at least delay the implementation of the Saskatoon customer-service plan until June so at least families can make plans for the disruption which is evident. Let us not hear an argument quoting how people can appeal the decision. Surely there is room for reasonable men to deal with a reasonable proposal. Surely two months is not an unrealistic time to ask for in this situation.

I ask the parliamentary secretary tonight to make some representations to his minister. I ask him at least to get the minister to re-read the question I asked in this House on February 29 and to try to bring about a reasonable solution to a situation that could erupt into direct conflict between management and labour, which would not do either the nation or the economy any good whatever.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) for the opportunity of responding to this question. I know it is an important matter to him and to other hon. members.

The customer-service centre concept is one which is being applied widely in Canada and south of the border. I am told that it is an effective and efficient way of doing business with the railways in this fast-moving age. I understand that the many employees who exercise their seniority rights for the new positions which are created by the plan consider the new jobs very attractive and challenging.

On the general question, I am sure the hon. member is aware of the assurance which was received from the Canadian Transport Commission. I made it clear at this hour on February 22 on a question by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) reiterated it during the question period a few days later. It is essential to this matter. The assurance which was received from the CTC was that any and every specific complaint that the CPR is not carrying out any of the undertakings given the commission and set out in the decision will be investigated promptly and remedial action will be taken wherever warranted.

One of the specific items raised by the hon. member was the effective date of implementation. There is no evidence of an effective date of implementation in any of the CTC's orders which I have seen. This is a decision which the railway must make, taking into account their collective agreement with their employees. As of the date of the initial decision on such applications, the employees must be given 90 days' notice.

Mr. Skoberg: Thirty days.

Mr. Duquet: My information is 90 days. The hon. member has made a number of points which I will be glad to refer to the Minister of Transport. In addition, I can inform him that Canadian Pacific Railway is aware of his representation to the Minister.

HOUSING—POINTE-GATINEAU—LA FERME DU BARON PROJECT—REQUEST THAT OWNERS BE COMPENSATED

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on March 3 last, I tried to find out from the government what attitude it would adopt in the face of the justified discontent of the owners of the housing development La Ferme le Baron at Pointe-Gatineau.

Having had no reply, I return to the charge this evening to bring home to the government—if that is possible—what I consider to be the worst injustice towards low-income families.

In recent years, under the cover of the National Housing Act, the government has undertaken mass production of slums. I say slums because I visited the housing development La Ferme le Baron while it was being built, in April 1971, and I saw what kind of construction was going on. What is more, this is not the only housing project that offers those characteristics.

I was astonished by what I saw. It was the first time that I saw outside doors with running water inside. The newspaper Le Droit reported the matter recently after having pointed out the defects of those dwellings, namely extreme humidity, lack of insulation, water back-flow in basements and nonstandard party walls.

The builder simply replied: They only have to improve their ventilation system. Well, it is as simple as that! The builder is not the only one to blame. What he did in Pointe-Gatineau others have done elsewhere with the approval of some officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

When some builders are asked to draw up low income housing projects, they are told: Provide as little as possible. Do not build any sidewalk or cement stoop. When the owner will be tired of walking in the mud, he will build one. Hang interior rather than exterior doors, he will never know the difference. Yet, when he does realize this, he will have to replace two doors which will cost him from $300 to $400.

Mr. Speaker, home purchasers in the Le Baron project have been cheated, with the complicity of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I ask that justice be rendered to the homeowners who believe that they were purchasing a house meeting the major house-building standards, not only in the Le Baron project, but elsewhere also. It is not logical to let houses be built without supervision. That opens the door to all kinds of abuse.

On all house construction sites, sponsored by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, qualified and responsible supervisors should be appointed to protect the purchasers.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras) is doing a fairly good job of protecting consumers against faulty products and misleading publicity, but in the field of housing, the purchaser is left without protection. What are the government's intentions in this regard?

• (2210)

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) for bringing this important question to the attention of the House.

As hon. members may know, this housing project consists of approximately 575 single-storey units of which 51 are of conventional wood-frame construction and the balance of 525 in the form of quadrexes which involve a different system of building. Each quadrex contains four units, each of which shares two common party walls. The walls, floors and roofs are constructed of metal panel manufactured by ARMCO Canada Limited. The project, located in the northeast part of Pointe Gatineau, was one of the earliest proposals received in 1970 by CMHC under the $200 million program. At that time, with its proposed sale price of $10,900 the proposed 300 unit project was one of the first to raise hopes that a breakthrough into lower cost housing was possible.

Construction started in 1970 and was followed in 1971 by a further 147 units being financed by an approved lender and the remaining 128 units financed by CMHC. On December 24, 1971, half the roof and the front end of one of the quadrexes was torn off by wind. The builder, DuBarry Construction Limited, ensured that the needs of the occupants were taken care of and an immediate investigation was made in order to ascertain the reasons for this occurring, because only one building was affected. As a result of discussions between ARMCO Canada Limited, Quadrex Canada Limited, DuBarry Construction Ltée and CMHC, a method of strengthening was agreed upon and was implemented. No further problem is therefore expected in this area.

However, homeowner concern has arisen because of condensation problems and has led to representations by the homeowners' association. Basically, the problem is how to minimize excessive humidity levels created by normal living in houses that are tightly sealed. One method is to ventilate the house by opening windows and doors periodically, but this course of action does not usually appeal to homeowners. In eight of the units with the most severe problems, a system of mechanical ventilation is being tried. At the moment it is uncertain whether the problem has been overcome to the extent possible in these electrically heated homes. A meeting of the builder, the homeowners and CMHC was held on February 26 and a further meeting was held on March 2 with the homeowners association executive.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his time has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.16 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MOTIONS ARISING OUT OF DELAY IN TABLING AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the Chair received five notices of questions of privilege under Standing Order 17. All five were related to one or another aspect of the tabling of the Auditor General's report, and to references that had been made in debate to the delay in filing last year's report. In his reply, the President of the Privy Council agreed to sponsor one of the motions and it was unanimously agreed that the matter in dispute would be referred to the Public Accounts Committee.

At the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition, the Chair agreed to give further consideration to the other motions although it was pointed out that it would be difficult not to take into account that one of the several methods for proceeding proposed by hon. members had been agreed to by the whole House. To some extent, at least, consideration of the alternative proposals has to be somewhat theoretical; traditionally, the Chair is reluctant to make procedural rulings in such circumstances. I will therefore be very brief, which I hope will not be a reflection on the importance of the matter raised by the hon. members who presented motions to the Chair under the terms of Standing Order 17.

One of the suggestions made yesterday is that a charge against a senior public servant gives rise to a question of privilege. Hon. members know that there have been many instances over the years where accusations or charges have been made in relation to senior public servants. The Chair has never condoned such actions. Indeed, just a few weeks ago I suggested that a motion under Standing Order 43 was irregular to the extent that it contained charges against the chairman of the Public Service Commission. It was not my view, however, that the question was one of privilege, but rather one of procedural order. In the matter before us now, I would agree again that it is irregular for any hon. member to make a charge, directly or indirectly, against a senior public official in the service of the government or of parliament. I refer hon. members to citation 152(4) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, as follows:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attack and censure, have always been considered unparliamentary, and the Speakers of the British and Canadian Houses have always treated them as breaches of order.

The Chair is in full agreement with the citation, and I would hope that hon. members would remember that the practice is based on simple common sense and fair play. Hon. members will note, however, that there is no suggestion, either in the Beauchesne citation or anywhere in our precedents, that such breaches of order are tantamount to breaches of privilege.

With respect, I cannot accept the interesting suggestion that parliamentary privilege extends to senior officials, be they senior officials of parliament or of government.

Privilege, as hon. members know, is the sum of the special rights enjoyed by members over and beyond the rights enjoyed by other citizens under the common law. Without going into further detail on the definition of parliamentary privilege, I think it should be noted that it has never been deemed to extend to officials or servants of parliament.

The second aspect of this question is the interesting proposition advanced by the hon. member for Peace River that it would be a breach of privilege to impede hon. members in the discharge of their duties to deny the Auditor General adequate working facilities.

In the course of argument it was indicated that this is not a new complaint but has reference rather to a situation which is alleged to have obtained for some time. This, it seems to me, has to be viewed much more as a matter of administration than as one of parliamentary privilege.

In this respect, the complaint should be considered by way of substantive motion rather than under the guise of privilege. Alternatively, such grievances can be studied by an appropriate committee of the House, which is precisely the action which the House unanimously endorsed yesterday.

For these reasons, I have come to the conclusion that I cannot put this question to the House as one of a prima facie case of breach of parliamentary privilege. I remind hon. members that this is not a decision on the substance of the matter but one only on procedure, which is the limit of the Speaker's responsibility in such matters. In this respect, I refer hon. members to a decision of Mr. Speaker Michener who, having refused to put a motion as one of privilege, concluded his ruling with the following words which I believe apply to the present ruling. I quote from the Journals of June 19, 1959, at page 586:

> In finding that a question of the privileges of the House is not prima facie involved in this motion, I am making a procedural decision the effect of which will not prevent the further discussion by the House of the matters in issue. The effect is to refuse precedence to this discussion but not to prevent it. No barrier is raised to the presentation of this matter under different circumstances on another occasion. For example, the subject matter could be brought before the House as an amendment to the next motion to go into supply.

These words of a learned and distinguished former Speaker apply very well to the present situation.

DISCOUNTING OF GOVERNMENT CHEQUES AT USURIOUS INTEREST RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to make a motion which relates to the lending of money at usuriously high rates of interest of up to 1,000 per cent against the anticipated receipt of unemployment insurance cheques, income tax rebates, pension cheques and other benefits provided by law, a practice which I first drew to the attention of the government in early February. I would therefore move, since persons engaged in the practice can only operate as a result of a legal loophole:

That in the opinion of this House the government should immediately bring forward legislation which would ensure that the practice of discounting government payments to individuals, at usurious rates of interest to the recipients of benefits provided by law, is placed under the provisions of the Small Loans Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Selkirk. It requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

UPWARD MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POLICY—CANADIAN OPTIONS—PLANS TO ASSIST INDUSTRIES PREJUDICIALLY AFFECTED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. I am sure he is sufficiently familiar with the subject to be able to give me satisfaction. In view of the upward movement of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar, is it the policy of the Canadian government to continue a free float of our dollar?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be much happier to allow the Minister of Finance to deal with that question at a later date, but I would like to advise the Leader of the Opposition, at least in a general way, that the present policy of the government in that respect has not been changed.

Mr. Stanfield: Having regard to the existing situation according to the understanding between Canada and the United States and the other countries in the International Monetary Fund is Canada limited to a choice between a free float or clean float and a fixed rate of parity exchange? Specifically, would it be possible for Canada to maintain a float but also associate with it some restriction on the movement of short-term capital? In other words, what are the options under the existing understanding arising from the last discussions?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am now so far away from my studies in economics that I am not sure I can comprehend all the ramifications of this question. All I would want to say, aside from commenting on understandings that may have been reached, is that the policy of the government has been made clear on more than one occasion, and it is that the Canadian dollar is allowed to seek its own level on the market as a result of normal international market forces.

Mr. Stanfield: I have5one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I am sure the Acting Prime Minister will be fully able to answer. In view of the upward movement of the Canadian dollar and the effect of this movement on important Canadian industries, has the Canadian government any plans to put into effect to alleviate the difficulties being confronted by these industries, and the possible very prejudicial effect upon employment in Canada as a result of this upward movement of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, at the moment I am not in a position to announce any immediate plans that the government has in mind with respect to the protection of any industry or group of industries. I want to conclude by thanking the Leader of the Opposition for the confidence he has in my ability to answer these questions. I only hope it has not been misplaced.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that the confidence I have indicated is the least I could express to a representative of the government from my own province.

UPWARD MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF EXCHANGE CONTROLS—SUGGESTED LOWERING OF SHORT-TERM INTEREST RATES BY BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is Canada considering the imposition of exchange controls since most European countries are very active with their exchange controls, excluding American dollars from entry into their markets, and there seems to be a growing tendency for American dollars to find their way into Canada, thus raising the value of our dollar?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no indication whatever, nor would I like the hon. member to get the impression, that we are proposing a system of exchange controls in Canada at the present time.

Mr. Saltsman: May I then direct this question to the Acting Prime Minister. What steps is the government taking to urge upon the Bank of Canada the lowering of short-term interest rates to ensure that the Canadian dollar will not rise too substantially?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Waterloo might agree with me, and I suspect that even the President of the Privy Council might also agree that this is the sort of information which normally ought to be given on motions. The hon. member for York South.

• (1120)

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might rephrase that question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Waterloo on a supplementary.

Mr. Saltsman: I shall make it somewhat easier, Mr. Speaker, and ask the Acting Prime Minister whether any discussion is going on between the government and the Bank of Canada for the purpose of establishing lower short-term interest rates in Canada?

An hon. Member: Don't say "I don't know."

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is obviously in continuous consultation with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I am sure it would be improper for me to disclose the nature of those discussions.

Mr. Aiken: Even if you knew!

Mr. Fairweather: Shades of Paul Martin.

Mr. Lewis: I think the President of the Privy Council ought to go to the other place.

An hon. Member: That is what he hopes to do.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one Paul Martin there already.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ADMISSION OF EAST GERMANY INTO WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION AS STEP TOWARD PARTICIPATION IN UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON HUMAN ENVIRONMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister and if he does not know the answer perhaps the Minister of the Environment does, so I direct it to either. It concerns the United Nations conference on the human environment to be held in Stockholm next October. It is my understanding that the cabinet has been discussing the question of representation of East Germany at that conference, which is one of the stumbling blocks at the present time. Has the cabinet reached a decision with regard to supporting the admission of East Germany into the World Health Organization as a step toward its participation in the environmental conference?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I personally have been concerned about the nature of the Canadian delegation and the nature of Canada's submission to the United Nations conference on the human environment in Stockholm in June. I would prefer, however, to leave the matter of the representation of East Germany to be answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Lewis: I shall direct that question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on another day. May I ask the Minister of the Environment whether the submission that Canada will make to the conference will be made available to Members of Parliament and other interested groups in Canada before it is presented to the conference? Also, will the minister's department or the Department of External Affairs head the Canadian delegation?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Several different kinds of submissions will be made available prior to the conference in June. The Department of the Environment will be heading the delegation along with External Affairs.

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON HUMAN ENVIRONMENT—INCLUSION OF PROVINCIAL AND OTHER REPRESENTATIVES ON CANADIAN DELEGATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of the Environment whether he has entered into discussions with the provinces and whether there will be provincial representation on Canada's delegation and also non-governmental representation on the delegation of organizations interested in the question of pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there will be full representation from the provincial governments and from other interested organizations.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka on a supplementary.

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON HUMAN ENVIRONMENT—POSSIBILITY OF CANCELLATION

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary arises from reports circulating that the proposed conference on the environment is in some difficulty. Has the government had any formal indication that this conference on the environment may not proceed?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is our expectation that it will be proceeding and that all nations will attend.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I take that question as notice.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSSIBILITY OF INTERCEPTION WITHIN DEPARTMENTS OF PUBLIC SERVANTS' PERSONAL MAIL DIRECTED TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government aware of any practice or policy in government departments whereby personal and private mail directed to Members of Parliament from government employees, using the internal mailing facilities of the department, is intercepted and examined by departmental or any other security personnel to the extent of opening envelopes, examining the contents and, in the case of unsigned correspondence, subjecting the envelopes and contents to fingerprint and other identification tests?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such practice. I will be happy to take my hon. friend's question as notice and have it checked out to see whether there is any substance or basis to the serious matter he is raising.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the Acting Prime Minister consult with his colleagues, particularly with the Prime Minister, for the purpose of causing an investigation to be made of this matter in order to reassure government employees that they may communicate privately with their own member of parliament or any member of parliament in confidence and without fear, as is the right of every Canadian citizen?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be happy to raise the matter with the Prime Minister and to attempt to bring an answer back for the hon. member at a later date.

POSSIBLE WIRETAPPING OF MEMBERS' TELEPHONES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has any attempt been made to check out what is happening to our telephones? Apparently they are clicking on and off and there appears to be suspicion that something unusual is going on. I hope it is not wiretapping. Would the minister assure the House that no effort is being made at this time to wiretap telephones in the House of Commons?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely certain that there is no effort on the part of any officer of the House or any member of the House to have the telephones of hon. members tapped in any way. I am sure my hon. friend can be satisfied that that is the case.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I am quite satisfied that the minister's assurance is a valid one. However, I want him to check this out and ascertain whether there are any activities going on which might suggest to various members of the House or others outside the House that something is going on. I say that because there have been several strange noises on the line, strange clicks. The suspicions of some hon. members and members of their staffs have been aroused, and they doubt whether everything is in order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the question of the telephone system, I am sure we would all want to be satisfied about it and bring about any inquiries that are necessary to indicate that telephones are not being interfered with in any way. In so far as strange noises are concerned, they are hard to control. We had a few of them yesterday and I am sorry to say I made a few myself.

Mr. Erik Neilsen (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It seems that some hon. members find the matter humorous but I consider it to be quite serious. When the minister determines whether or not inquiries are necessary, will he specifically direct those inquiries to the possibility of long-distance calls to and from members' constituents being recorded through the long-distance facilities?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member is quite serious. If there is any possible suggestion that members' phones are being in any way interfered with, from whatever source, the matter would be quite serious indeed, and I would take whatever steps are open to us to ensure that Members of Parliament continue to have free and uninspected access to their telephones by which they are in contact with all parts of the population. I am sure that is what we all want and we will ensure that this takes place.

DISCUSSION WITH CIGARETTE MANUFACTURERS ON INCLUSION OF WARNING IN PRINTED ADVERTISING

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I had a question I wanted to direct either to the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In their absence, perhaps you would allow somebody opposite to take notice of it. Having in mind the fact that both in the United States and the United Kingdom health warnings are now published as part of printed cigarette advertising, have discussions taken place between the government of Canada and the Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers Council looking toward the inclusion of a similar warning in Canada as part of any permitted printed cigarette advertising?

TRANSPORT

GRAIN DELIVERY TO VANCOUVER—SUGGESTED OVERHAUL OF RAIL TRANSPORTATION POLICY TO EXPEDITE MOVEMENT—CONTINGENCY PLAN

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the Canadian Wheat Board has set a shipment target of some 30 million bushels of wheat to be delivered each month to Vancouver and at the present time the railways can only deliver approximately 16 million bushels each month, will the minister now undertake a complete overhaul of the rail transportation policy in western Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure what the hon. member means by a complete overhaul. There is an exhaustive study under way at the present time which involves my own ministry as well as the Wheat Board, the railways and various producer organizations with a view to greater rationalization of grain movement in western Canada. I hope something definite will come out of that in the relatively near future.

Mr. Murta: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. In view of the fact deliveries are currently some 25 million bushels behind the target figure for this year, is a contingency plan to catch up being prepared at the present time? If so, when will it be in operation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House when these questions were first raised some two weeks ago, at which time there was an even larger backlog of grain to be caught up on, the railroads agreed to attempt a target of unloads which would be adequate to catch up gradually on the backlog as well as to meet continuing commitments. The continuing very difficult weather in the Rockies has made that impossible, so the backlog has continued. It is certainly our hope that we will be able to catch up when there is good weather. The Wheat Board has also taken some steps to divert deliveries of grain that normally might be made out of Vancouver out of other ports for delivery so that the market can be supplied with grain as quickly as possible.

GRAIN SHIPMENT—SUGGESTED DREDGING OF CHURCHILL HARBOUR—LOCAL REPRESENTATION ON PORT AUTHORITY

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): My supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the considerable concern which is evident as a result of delayed shipments of grain, will the minister reconsider the decision regarding a dredging program at Churchill this summer, which is very necessary so that port can continue to be the most efficient port in Canada, as recognized yearly by the National Harbours Board.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his Chamber of Commerce remarks about the port. I agree it is a very useful and valuable port in Canada. Apropos the direct question, I am pleased to tell the hon. member that we will be appointing a port authority for the port of Churchill within a matter of a few weeks. One of the first assignments to go to that authority will be to make recommendations to us as to how best to improve it.

Mr. Simpson: Now that the minister has announced that the port authority will be appointed very shortly, will he again assure the House that the fullest consideration will be given to having local representation on that port authority?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think I have given that assurance on at least two previous occasions, but I am very happy to do it again.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON RATIONALIZATION OF TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the great interest being shown in the proposed Saskatchewan land bank policy and the federal government's small farm policy, and in view of the questions that have been asked with regard to making public the report on the rationalization of the transportation system, is the minister now prepared to table that report in the House so there can be some fruitful discussion throughout the various constituencies?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is really the same as it has been. We are discussing these reports with the provincial governments, particularly in the west, as well as with the companies on whom we have relied for a good deal of the calculations which are involved. At an appropriate time as these discussions proceed it is our intention to make the summary or the basic findings involved available to producers so that the discussions can proceed. I assure hon. members that it continues to be our intention to proceed only in line with producer wishes with regard to changes that may be made.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question would have been for the Prime Minister as it involves several government departments and could in part touch on his newly acquired training as a parent. I realize that the Acting Prime Minister lacks in that direction, but I will try my luck with him anyway. As a member of the cabinet is now advertising for an English nanny in the agony column of the Times of London, would the Acting Prime Minister cause vigorous efforts to be made to see if some fine, unemployed, Canadian, potential "Mary Poppins" could get a special manpower training course to fill this need?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I think the supplementary might better be placed on the order paper.

POTATOES—RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS FOR ACTION TO RELIEVE DEPRESSED MARKET—POSSIBLE DIVERSION TO STOCK FEED

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby wants to volunteer I do not want to interrupt him. My question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. I am very happy in this case that he is a Maritimer because my question is of importance to the Maritimes. A telegram was recently sent to the Minister of Agriculture, who unfortunately has not been in the House this week, with regard to the Agricultural Stabilization Board taking substantial stocks of potatoes previously committed by both Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick farmers. The joint potato committee of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick has asked the Minister of Agriculture to take immediate action in order to alleviate the depression that is currently affecting the potato market in eastern Canada. I would ask the minister to ascertain whether some action can be taken quickly on this particular problem.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to bring my hon. friend's question to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture as soon as possible. While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to answer a question that was asked of the Prime Minister a day or two ago?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might allow the hon. member for Egmont a supplementary question and then the President of the Privy Council can refer to the question he has just mentioned.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am grateful for the assurance of concern by the Acting Prime Minister and his willingness to act. Inasmuch as a number of carloads of potatoes in New Brunswick have been diverted to starch manufacturing and no such capability exists in Prince Edward Island, and in view of the active request of Prince Edward Island potato growers to have these potatoes diverted to stock feed, would the minister see whether the exploration of this possibility by agricultural officials can be accelerated? I think that is the essence of the matter, at least in terms of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will also add that query to the matter I will raise with the Minister of Agriculture.

[Later:]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, could the minister also make sure, because of the pressure of time, that a direct answer is given to these questions I have raised either by the Minister of Agriculture or by himself when the House reconvenes on Monday?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We shall perhaps have to limit the number of supplementaries. I believe the President of the Privy Council has replied in the affirmative to the hon. member for Egmont.

POTATOES—REQUEST BY PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question on this subject to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

Has the Agricultural Stabilization Board studied the request addressed to it by telegram this week by the joint committee of potato growers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member the telegram was indeed received and studied. With regard to the first part, hon. members will be happy to hear that as far as reporting what quantities of potatoes are held in stock in Canada, in the future a distinction will be made between the quantity on the market and that which is held under the federal government assistance program.

As for the second part of the telegram, it has been considered—

NATIONAL DEFENCE

OMISSION OF THE WORD "ROYAL" FROM ADVERTISING OF MILITARY COLLEGES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of this week the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington asked the Prime Minister about the use of the word "royal" in references to Canadian military colleges and, in particular, asked why the expression "royal" had not been used in certain advertisements. The inquiry I made indicates there are no plans whatsoever to change the names of any of the Canadian military colleges. There is no plan to change the name of Royal Roads at Victoria, British Columbia, the Royal Military College at Kingston or the Collège Militaire Royal de Saint-Jean, Quebec. Since 1948, when referring to these colleges collectively in advertisements, it has been the practice to call them Canadian service colleges or, latterly, Canadian military colleges. However, when the colleges are referred to individually their proper names are used and the full title continues to be maintained in advertisements at the present time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that Air Canada is now computing the pensions of all its employees on the basis of 2 per cent for each year of service, will the minister ask Canadian National Railways when it will take similar action and raise the basis of its pension plan from 1½ per cent to 2 per cent?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will ask them, and when a reply is received I will pass it on to the hon. member.

DISCUSSION WITH AIRLINES OF SECURITY MEASURES TO MEET BOMB THREATS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In light of the request by President Nixon that American airlines meet to discuss further security measures arising out of the incident last week, and in light of the incident at Windsor last night when Air Canada received a bomb threat to its aircraft, can the minister tell us whether he is also having a meeting of Canadian air lines and dealing with this problem in conjunction with the United States?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to both parts of the question is yes. Meetings have taken place between officials of the Department of Transport and representatives of the Canadian airlines. We are also involved not only bilaterally with the United States but with IATA and the various international organizations which are attempting to cope with this problem. As a general rule, our procedures at the moment and our general approach are much in line with those of the United States.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The question does not refer to the hijacking of aircraft. It has to do with the placing of bombs and the holding up of aircraft for ransom.

Mr. Jamieson: That is the subject I had in mind when I made my reply.

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF STABILIZATION PROGRAM DURING PRESENT SESSION OF HOUSE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Bearing in mind the statement made recently to the Saskatchewan outlook conference that farmers can look forward to large grain exports at low prices, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation this session to establish a realistic and economically viable grains stabilization program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I am certainly touched by the hon. member wanting a stabilization plan, after what was said earlier about such a plan by hon. members opposite.

It is unlikely we shall be able to find time in the immediate future to come forward with a stabilization plan, but it is certainly my view that protection against international market conditions is extremely important and I hope to be able to introduce legislation along those lines at least within a year or so.

Mr. Baldwin: Will it be a more intelligent plan than the one the government tried to introduce last session?

FUNDY TIDES—INQUIRY AS TO PUBLICATION OF FINDINGS OF STUDY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of importance to Atlantic Canada to address to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the findings of the study of the economic feasibility of using Fundy Bay tidal power to generate electricity be made public? If so, will this information be made available before the present parliament is dissolved?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the body to which the hon. member refers was appointed only the other day; I think it will be meeting in the next several weeks to plan its program of work. It is difficult at this point to indicate how soon it will be in a position to report, and what it will have to say on the question. I would expect that the report would be of such general importance to the three governments concerned that the findings would be made public.

INVESTIGATION INTO SINKING OF TUGBOAT, "HARO STRAITS"

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. The other day my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands asked the minister about an investigation into the sinking of the Haro Straits in British Columbia waters. The minister told us at that time that adverse weather conditions had hampered the investigation somewhat and that the vessel was still tied up to the tow. Can the minister inform us whether this is still the case, and what course the investigation has taken to date? Can he also say whether any attempt will be made to refloat the Haro Straits? I am tempted to ask also about the port authority for Prince Rupert—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might deal with the one matter and do so as quickly as possible because we are running short of time.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): With regard to the tug incident, the hon. member probably knows that a submersible has spotted the vessel. The work has been interrupted a good deal in recent days by bad weather. The on-the-spot investigation is not complete or, at least, it was not complete as of yesterday. Perhaps I am getting a little ahead of the normal procedure, but I would suspect that in this case we would first of all attempt to raise the vessel if that should be feasible. I also have very little doubt that the vessels of the preliminary inquiry will lead me to call for a normal inquiry.

FEED GRAIN—MEASURES TO ESTABLISH PRICE PARITY BETWEEN EASTERN AND WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Since a number of organizations on several occasions last fall urged the minister to consider the possibility of taking steps to enable eastern producers to pay the same price as western producers for their feed grain, I would like to ask him whether he has taken a decision about those requests and whether he is in a position to say when he will make a statement to that effect?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, studies are continuing with respect to the question of dealing with the problem of wide discrepancies in feed grain prices as between different regions. I do not have anything further to report at this time. It is true, however, that in the current situation feed grain prices in the prairie region have strengthened significantly, and I believe that with the announcement of an increase of five cents in the initial price for barley for next year, and with the very high level of exports this trend will continue. As a result, there is no immediate problem. The old problem was related to distress pricing and practices, and that has been solved by the very rapid movement of grain into export—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POSITION OF DISCUSSIONS ON ESTABLISHMENT OF GO-TYPE RAIL SERVICE NORTH AND NORTHWEST OF TORONTO

Mr. Rud L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the House as to the present status of the discussions which are taking place between Canadian National Railways, the federal government and the province of Ontario with respect to establishing GO-type transit service north and northwest of the city of Toronto?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the discussions are going extremely well. The last word I had of them was yesterday evening. The estimate of all three levels of government involved is that the report will probably be completed in May.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INVESTIGATION OF GRANT TO SCENE AFTER SCENE FREE THEATRE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. On March 6 the minister informed us that he was reviewing the $40,000 grant under the LIP program to the Scene After Scene Free Theatre in Dundas. Has this review been completed and, if so, what decision has been reached?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. A review of the Scene After Scene project has been made. It has been found to be proceeding within the criteria of the program guidelines, but it will be maintained under review as it goes along. This is a project which employs 17 persons and is producing two full-length plays by Brecht and Aeschylus, plays which are presented at universities and other institutions in Canada.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether any other specific reviews have been directed to be made and, more specifically, whether any projects have been denied their final payments or had their original contract payment reduced? If so, is the minister prepared to table that information?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first question, a regular monitoring service is going on, so that there is a continuing review of all projects. With respect to whether any have had reductions made, there is also a continuous adjustment of projects. Some are reduced, some are expanded, but we will do our best for the unemployed by making sure these projects remain feasible. I do not know that it would be of any advantage to table—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we are running short of time so perhaps we might move on to the next questioner.

PROVISION OF POLICY ON RIGHT OF PUBLIC TO KNOW

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour who I understand reports for Information Canada. As the need for a policy on the right of the public to know is again underlined in the annual report of Information Canada, what attention is being given to overcoming this serious policy gap?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we are giving considerable attention to that question. There are statutes in various countries known as "right to know statutes". They work less than perfectly. We are looking at all the options in this regard.

POSSIBLE MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—LEVEL AND NATURE OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES—DATE OF REPORT ON FEASIBILITY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs or his parliamentary secretary. In view of the possibility of an oil pipeline through Canada for Alaskan oil and the recent statement by Mr. Ruckelshaw of the United States environmental protection agency that the United States Secretary of the Interior has consulted with officials in Canada about the matter, I would ask the parliamentary secretary at what level of government did these discussions take place, and who were involved in them?

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the statement recently made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has been drawn to the attention of the United States government by our representatives.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Would the parliamentary secretary indicate the date of these discussions and what aspects of the potential pipeline were discussed, as well as the date that has been set for a report on the feasibility of such a pipeline?

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker, as indicated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, it is expected that the studies will be complete this fall. As to the other sections of the hon. member's question concerning the date of these conferences, I would have to take it as notice and check further.

RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS FOR ASSISTANCE IN FOWL BUYING PROGRAM

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. I should have liked to ask the Minister of Agriculture this question, but I understand he has been absent all week on doctor's order and will be present next week. I am sure we all wish him a speedy recovery and return to the House. Has the government received a submission from the Federation of Agriculture on behalf of egg producers in relation to assistance in a fowl buying program and, if so, what does the government plan to do about it?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government has received those submissions. They have been discussed and considered and I suspect that the minister will be in a position to make a statement on his return.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—MEASURES TO RESTRAIN INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but, as he is not here, I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister.

Considering that the cost of living continues to increase and that the rise in the consumer price index is mainly due to the price of food, would the minister tell the House whether the government intends to intervene in some way in order to curb the increase in food prices?

Mr. Speaker: Once again, I feel that the hon. member's question is rather general. Normally such a question would call for a statement on motions. The government may wish to consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Compton.

PROPOSED WEST COAST TANKER ROUTE—POSITION AND NATURE OF DISCUSSIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Is there anything going on these days between Canada and the United States regarding the proposed tanker route down the west coast from Alaska? The last report was of a meeting of officials and it was indicated they did not have enough information to make any findings. Have there been further consultations or active work undertaken on the part of Canadian ministers or officials of the government on this subject in their relationship with the United States?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there are no meetings scheduled between ministers. However, studies are continuing on environmental conditions and the impact of oil spills in Puget Sound and Georgia Strait.

Mr. Stanfield: What is the nature of these discussions and studies? Are they joint studies that are being made by Canadian officials in association with United States officials, are the studies being made by the United States officials, or are they being made by our officials?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there are studies on both sides of the line being carried out independently. I would have to add that they are being pushed more energetically on our side of the line than in the U.S.A.

Mr. Stanfield: Naturally, I would hope so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Yukon on a supplementary. We have reached the end of the question period but I will allow two or three additional short questions following the supplementary.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF PETITION OF OLD CROW INDIANS TO COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the government House leader which relates to the petition tabled earlier of the Old Crow Indian people concerning their land rights. Has the minister yet consulted with his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in order to ascertain whether the government is going to permit the Old Crow people to be heard by referring their petition to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member, I intended to confer with my colleague on this point. In view of the approach of the fishing season and the need for conservation of our salmon rivers, what action is the minister taking this year to increase the number of guardians to conserve our salmon stocks, in line with the need across the country?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, our regulations with respect to salmon, as announced last year, will be reiterated this year in almost precisely the same form.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the question about conservation and the need for extra river guardians this year. What are his intentions in this respect? Last year he had difficulty getting enough funds to provide the required number of guardians.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we can always do with more river guardians on the east coast.

In view of the leaking to the Montreal Gazette yesterday of a confidential government report on the possibility of substantial cuts in the price of drugs by prepackaging of the most commonly used prescription drugs, can the Acting Prime Minister say whether or not this confidential report will be made public so that the House and the public can study it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know about this report but I will ask the minister to look into it and to provide my hon. friend with an answer.

SUGGESTED FULL USE OF EASTERN CANADIAN PORTS FOR GRAIN EXPORTS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which I tried to ask earlier. Would the minister check to see that there is full utilization of eastern Canadian ports for grain exports? We all know that the St. Lawrence is frozen over, but there is storage at the port of Saint John and these facilities for the storage of grain are not being fully utilized.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that. Generally speaking, I think the record shows that use of the port has been on the increase in recent years, and I shall try to keep it rising.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising on a point of order?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Before we begin today's debate I wonder whether I could indicate that we are suggesting no change in the time limits provided in Standing Order 58(13). You will find, however, that there is agreement among the four House leaders that no one take any overtime today.

Mr. Speaker: I take it then that there is a standing instruction agreed to unanimously that the Chair is not to allow overtime to hon. members even if they seek it at that time with unanimous agreement.

Mr. Baldwin: Anybody who does should go in the penalty box.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE REGIONAL ECONOMIC DISPARITY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this House condemns the government for the disastrous failure of its regional development programmes to make any progress in eliminating regional disparities and, in particular, condemns the government for the lack of planning or strategy in its programs, for its total reliance on give-away grants to private corporations, most of them foreign owned, for the senseless practice of transplanting unemployment by assisting plants in one location while similar plants are being closed in another location and for the wasteful expenditure of large sums of public funds without appreciable results in jobs and economic development in the disadvantaged areas of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to say immediately, so that the position is clear, that I and my colleagues appreciate that the problem of regional disparity is a very difficult one. Indeed, it is a universal problem. There is hardly a country I know anything about in which there are not disparities among regions and in which there have not been considerable difficulties in getting rid of those disparities.

I also want to say immediately, so that there is no misunderstanding, that my colleagues and I do not question the sincerity of the minister in charge nor do we question his genuine concern about the objectives which his department is supposed to serve. My complaint is not that the minister and the department have not performed miracles. My complaint is that the department is now in a shambles, that the programs have proven themselves to be relatively worthless, and that hundreds of millions of dollars have been handed out to large corporations with relatively little result in jobs and in changes in the situation in the disadvantaged areas of this country. It is not that he has not performed miracles or has not accomplished what should take 15 years in about three years. It is a fact that there is no evidence in the department's plans and programs of any useful industrial or economic strategy or plan for the disadvantaged regions of this country. There is evidence of a department that has amounts of money it can use and has officials sitting more or less in a passive way waiting for applications from corporations and offering grants on the basis of those applications. I will come back to that in a moment.

I want to make another statement which may be one which removes some of the blame from the minister and the department. I appreciate that the minister's policy was doomed, almost from the start, to utter failure by the general economic policies of this government. The moment the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his advisors were ready to create massive unemployment in this country, the moment they were ready to slow down the economy and the moment they were ready to tighten all the various situations that would have made the economy go, the poor minister and his department were doomed to failure because in a situation of general economic deflation obviously the disadvantaged areas are hurt more than any other regions of the country. It is also obvious that what they are doing with the one hand is being taken away by the other hand of the government, and the minister and his department are therefore in a straitjacket of a cruel, outdated, heartless stupid policy which the government as a whole has followed.

I hope the minister objected to the policy and opposed it in cabinet circles. I would have even greater respect for him than I have if he opposed it not only inside cabinet circles but also spoke up outside cabinet, even if it meant that to stand by principle, to stand by decency and to stand by Canada, he would have had to resign from the government in order to make his point. I suggest that was his alternative. I am assuming he did not do this, although I cannot imagine the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) agreeing with a government policy that aimed, as the Prime Minister said, at 6 per cent unemployment or that the government would be ready to accept a 6 per cent unemployment level. If he did not agree with this, and if he saw as he should have the dangers that represented to his policy, programs and objectives, then I think there comes a point where so basic an issue weighs pretty heavily on the conscience of people concerned with making policy in this country. I suggest the basic problems which exist with this department and with this program is that it has no strategy and no plan. It is a continuing series of "ad hocery". It just has not worked and it just cannot work.

May I also say this to give the context in which I do my thinking about regional disparity. In a federal country like Canada in particular, one of the major duties of a central government is to seek plans, policies and programs, to equalize opportunity and to equalize conditions of life for all Canadians irrespective of where they may happen to live. One of the major duties of this government is to make sure the people of the Atlantic provinces, the Indians and Eskimos in their communities, the people in the Gaspe area of Quebec and other regions of that province, the people in northern Ontario and indeed the people in every part of Canada will have, if not exactly the same opportunity—perhaps that is not possible—and not exactly the same condition of life—perhaps that is not possible—at least will have a really humane basis for existence, with the gap between the poor and rich regions and the gap between the poor and rich groups in this country being constantly narrowed. That must be the objective of any decent society, any just society, any incentive society, any grand society and all the adjectives which have been used by Liberals and Conservatives in my opinion to bamboozle the people of Canada. Surely, this should be the major objective of the central government.

I assume in a spurt of concern, which the Prime Minister has not shown since, the Prime Minister made his only specific commitment or promise during the federal election of 1968. I say this is a spurt of concern which has not been in evidence ever since. That one commitment was that he would do something about regional disparity. I believe he used a more flowery expression. He was going to give every Canadian the same position and the same opportunity in the just society he was going to start building. That was the only, at least major, specific undertaking the Prime Minister made during the election of 1968. I say with sadness and sorrow that the fact is there has been no progress at all made on that. Instead of progress there has been a wastage of funds, there has been a lack of plans and there has been a total lack of any industrial or economic strategy.

The other day Professor McAllister of Dalhousie University in a recent speech in Ottawa—and I understand that Professor McAllister is occasionally used by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion because of his knowledge and expertise in the area—made this typically professorial understatement when he said:

> At present the pickings or threads of regional strategies that can be stuck together have an incomplete and unconvincing flavour.

Only a professor could have put it that gently. What the professor meant, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, is that the regional strategies consisted only of pickings and of threads and that they made no pattern at all. That is the truth of the situation at present. We had designated areas and then we had special areas and then we had other areas, with the result that the department now has areas of one sort or another that cover over 50 per cent of Canada's population. Montreal, a large part of Quebec in addition to the Atlantic provinces and other parts of other provinces have been brought under the umbrella. The result is, of course, that there is no sense in the situation. The growth centre concept is gone, the designated area concept is gone. You have a dog's breakfast of all types of special and designated areas that are given some kind of consideration here or there, and nothing of value is happening.

The other day the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion told us—I forget exactly on what date but it was very recently—that 50,000 jobs had been created by the incentive program. The Prime Minister, during his speech in the debate on the Throne Speech, said that the department had spent $907 million in the three years of its existence and 50,000 jobs had been created. I am not saying that the 50,000 jobs are related to the $907 million; they relate to much less than that, but the fact is that the department has spent over $900 million in the three years of its existence. The minister says that 50,000 jobs were created. Can he tell us how many net jobs were created? Can he give us the figures as to how many net jobs there are and how many jobs were lost as a result of his programs? Was that figure reduced to 20,000 or 15,000 or 30,000? It has been reduced considerably.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Only two jobs.

Mr. Lewis: What the minister's department has done as a result of the lack of strategy or plan, has been to make it possible for the Duplate Company to transfer its operation from Oshawa to Hawkesbury. The result is that there is a more modern plant in Hawkesbury which will employ fewer people and the plant in Oshawa which employed more people than the Hawkesbury plant will close. The same was done in the case of Aerovox which was transferred from Hamilton, Ontario to Amherst, Nova Scotia, and in the case of Union Carbide a plant was transferred from Welland, Ontario to Beauharnois, Quebec. Then, there is the Findlay Company in Carleton Place which closed its plant quite recently when the parent company,

Belanger Limited received a DREE grant in 1970 of over $200,000, or rather was offered over $200,000.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): They never got it.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is deliberately misleading the House and telling untruths. He knows that what he says is in error, and no member has the right to deliberately mislead the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And you have no right to split an infinitive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I cannot accept the point of order that has been raised because it is merely a question of debate. The hon. member will have an opportunity in due time to refute or to argue what has been said by the Leader of the NDP.

Mr. McBride: The point I am making is that the record has been clarified in the House and no federal grant went to the Tappan-Belanger plant. This fact is well known and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) should not perpetuate an error.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if this servant of a higher authority had had the decency and charity to wait in his seat, he would have heard me complete my sentence.

Mr. McBride: Why raise it if it is irrelevant and not part of your case?

Mr. Lewis: Sit still and listen. No one other than the hon. member is misleading the House.

Mr. McBride: Try telling the truth.

Mr. Lewis: The parent company was offered a grant of over $200,000. Members will recall that when the matter was raised in the House the minister had forgotten that it was offered, and later informed the House that it was never given but that, in any event, it was cancelled on February 11 last. The date of the question and the date of the cancellation are of some importance.

Mr. McBride: That is untrue also. He made the statement on national television on the very day reference was made to the closing of the plant.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, will you have this man—I forget his name and his riding; I do not want to remember it—remain in his seat and keep quiet.

Mr. McBride: Don't pretend you are interested in Carleton Place if you don't even know who the representative is.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I think the hon. member should be fair to the leader of the NDP and let him make his speech. In due time the hon. member can take the floor and make his own argument. It is the responsibility of the Chair to keep order and members should address themselves to the Chair. I do not think that exchanges from one side to the other by members shouting from their seats will help make progress in the House.

Mr. Lewis: I think the only thing to do is to ignore the comments from across the way. Grants have been offered to a subsidiary of ITT to start a pulp mill when another pulp mill was closing down in Témiscamingue in the same province. There have been huge grants to povertystricken organizations like Parsons and Whitmore to build a pulp mill in Prince Albert, which is in operation, and another mill in Meadow Lake which the new Saskatchewan government cancelled, while pulp mills were laying off people in Quebec, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Ontario. There has been no plan whatever and, I suggest to you that a good many of the jobs that DREE has created—50,000 jobs for the hundreds of millions of dollars spent are not too many anyway—were created at the expense of jobs of other people in other locations in this country.

I have already drawn attention on another occasion to the conflict of interest of members of the advisory board, Mr. Estey and Mr. Cork, which I think is not terribly serious, except that it indicates the kind of people from whom the minister and the department take advice, the kind of people whom they want to have.

Let me look for a minute at the situation in the disadvantaged areas. Remembering that I must not go over the 30 minutes, let me point out some indicators that show how utterly ineffective this very expensive program has been. Let us consider the investment in manufacturing. In 1961, investment in Quebec represented 55.1 per cent of investment in Ontario. Ten years later in 1971 the ratio dropped to a dismal 40.9 per cent. The Atlantic region's share of employment and manufacturing in 1961 was 4.6 per cent. Nine years later in 1970 it was about the same, 4.5 per cent. Quebec's share in 1961 was 33 per cent; in 1970, it was down to 31.3 per cent.

More relevant perhaps, and more important in terms of human welfare, is that in 1961 the Atlantic region's average weekly wages in manufacturing were 78 per cent of the average weekly wages in Ontario, and in 1970 its average weekly wages were only 75.6 per cent. The gap was growing, Mr. Speaker. The average weekly wages in what is known as the industrial composite, which takes in more than manufacturing, in 1961 in the Atlantic region were 89.1 per cent of those in Ontario, and in 1970 were 81 per cent, which represents a very serious increase of about 10 per cent in the difference between the Atlantic region and Ontario. The same is true for Quebec. Quebec's average weekly wages in manufacturing in 1961 represented 89.2 per cent of those in Ontario, and in 1970 this dropped to 87.6 per cent. If you take the Atlantic provinces' average annual wages and salaries together you find a drop from 79 per cent in 1961, as compared with Ontario, to 73 per cent in 1970 as compared with Ontario.

I am using the Ontario comparison rather than the national average because obviously the national average includes the low wage rates in the Atlantic provinces and in Quebec, and therefore would give a distorted comparison. The only sensible comparison is with a province like Ontario that will not include the low wage rates of these provinces. The same is true with respect to the per capita income in these areas.

Now, with these criticisms of the department and its failures, and I repeat that I make them not with any pleasure but rather with sorrow as well as with anger because of the necessity to do this, I view the elimination of regional disparities as one of the major objectives of the government of Canada and of this parliament. The immense failures of this department in this area, and the fact that there is no plan or strategy that indicates any likelihood of success in the future, are the reasons we put this motion on the order paper.

If I saw in the department, in any statement by the minister, in any organization that has been set up, any instrument established that showed there was a movement towards a plan, and that we knew what the plan was, then perhaps I would be ready to sit back and wait for ten years to see what the results were. But there is no indication that the department is changing its policies and programs. There is no indication of a plan or strategy, and therefore the failure is bound to continue. I want to suggest seven specific guidelines, proposals, objectives that this department ought to have if it is going to have any success whatsoever with this very difficult, almost intractable problem of regional disparities and regional underdevelopment.

I say first, Mr. Speaker, that to be effective, both in the short-run and in the long-run, we must develop an industrial and economic plan or strategy for the less developed regions of Canada, but that merely to have a plan for those regions will not do the job either. This plan must be part of a national plan for the use and allocation of resources so that, for example, there is a relationship between developing the pulp industry in one part of Canada and the same industry in another part of Canada, so that doing something in one section of the country is not harmful to another section of the country, because therein lies self-defeating regression rather than productive progression. Therefore, we need a comprehensive set of objectives in each region suited to the physical and human resources of that region. We do not need the building of monuments to Joey Smallwood or to somebody else. We need the development of job intensive industries, of a job intensive economy in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, related to the human and physical skills and resources available in that region.

Secondly, I urge that the program of this department must be directed to building and retaining viable communities rather than being concerned with enterprises whose main objective is the making of profits. If these underdeveloped regions of Canada were regions where profits could be made, the corporations would have been in there without the hundreds of millions of dollars that the minister offers them. They would be there because of the profits available. The reason they are not there is the fact that they cannot achieve in those areas the level of profits in which they, the corporations, are interested. Therefore, the total program has to be re-oriented to building human communities rather than being concerned with the making of profits.

Thirdly, the policy and direction of the program of regional expansion must be changed so as to enable direct public investment, where necessary, or a combination of public and private enterprise. A policy based on holding out carrots to private corporations has failed in the last 100 years and will fail in the future, for the simple reason that if investment in the disadvantaged areas could be made sufficiently profitable, the corporations would already be there without the carrots. Indeed, I suspect a good many of the plants would have been established there without the grants from DREE, and that the grants have merely increased the profits of the corporations, most of them foreign owned, instead of building up the economies of the areas. To make the program work, there must be direct public participation in one form or another for the social purpose of providing Canadians in these areas with the opportunity of developing conditions of equality with those in other parts of the country.

Fourthly, the policy of grants and loans and concessions to private corporations should be changed so that government grants would be matched by an equity interest in an undertaking for the purpose of giving the public adequate control over the activities and objectives of the enterprise.

Fifthly, all this also means that the department must play the role of initiator of projects and plans rather than merely replying to applications for grants. This is a very important change that must take place in the department. It ought to be developing plans and developing the kind of industry, the kind of enterprise, the kind of economy that is necessary, and go out and do this rather than wait for applications to be made to it.

Sixthly, I suggest that there is urgent need for new machinery which would involve direct participation by the provinces—not indirect, not merely consultative—and by non-governmental organizations in the development of the industrial and economic plan. In connection with representation on boards and agencies advising or assisting in this work, there must be measures to prevent conflict of private interest, something which is present in the advisory board which the minister now has.

Seventh, and finally, Mr. Speaker, to work effectively my party proposes that a meaningful regional development program requires that the Canada Development Corporation be re-organized and reshaped so that it becomes an agency responsible to parliament through the government, with large investment funds garnered by law from corporate investment sources as well as from individual Canadians. The role of this corporation must be redefined to change it from an independent mutual investment fund, which it now is, and which makes the CDC a socially useless organization, to become the source of development planning and investment, particularly in the less developed regions of the country.

As I said when I began, Mr. Speaker, I know of no task of this parliament or of the central government more urgent, more important, socially more necessary and morally more compelling than the job of equalizing opportunities and conditions across this country. This is what we thought the Prime Minister had in mind in 1968 when he made his commitment. This is what we thought the government had in mind when it set up the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It is the failure of this department to achieve anything like the performance for which it was established and the failure of any indication that it has changed policies and programs and developed strategies and plans to promote equality in Canada that makes us condemn the department and the government for the betrayal of an undertaking given four years ago.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the motion proposed by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), and before getting into the main thrust of the motion, I wish to remind him that any time you have a socialist government you have a drab society. In addition, any time you get into the position where the three levels of government extract something in the order of 50 per cent of the GNP in the form of taxes, you are eliminating the freedom of the individual in the decision-making process thereby making society dull, unexciting and stale, and lacking in incentive. I believe that our main complaint against this government is its tendency to be socialistically oriented.

Our complaints against the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and this minister can be summed up in three areas. First, he has refused to give an accurate and precise accounting for the $1 billion spent in recent years; second, he has failed to define clearly the objectives of the programs of his department and third, he has failed to listen to sound and constructive advice from his own officials, experts working in agencies similar to DREE. Further, he has failed to heed the advice of Members of this House. I suppose, however, we can understand his refusal to accept advice from this side of the House. This is a common practice of this government but it is very difficult to understand why the minister should refuse to listen to those on his own side of the House.

I am sure we all recall very clearly the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the Throne Speech debate in 1968 when he said:

> The attainment of a just society is the cherished hope of civilized men. . . . To this end, the proposals . . . will include the establishment of a department charged with the objective of ensuring that people in all areas and regions of our country have as equal access as possible to the opportunities of Canada's economic development.

What is the record? By March 31, 1972, this government will have spent $1,030,636,000 on regional development programs. To this may be added over $200 million in loans. What has been achieved for $1¼ billion dollars? I submit, instead of the equal access to the opportunities of Canada's economic development which the Prime Minister promised, the depressed regions have had more than equal access to the economic stagnation which has been created by this government.

What has the Minister been trying to accomplish with his billion dollar expenditure? What has he actually accomplished? One of the clearest descriptions of the minister's performance was provided in the report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council as follows:

> The refusal of Jean Marchand to commit the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to the Atlantic Development Council's 1981 goals and targets for the Atlantic region is as inexplicable as it is disappointing. . . . It reinforces the suspicion that DREE is nothing more than a well-financed giveaway program to be extended or retracted according to the economic and political exigencies of the moment.

When members of this House and the public in general express criticism of the manner in which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has functioned, particularly in respect of incentive grants, it has always been pointed out that we should consider what the alternatives might be in the form of welfare payments. Mr. Speaker, if the proposals put forth by the department are nothing more than a form of welfare, then let us do away with the department and combine it with the Department of National Health and Welfare. I believe that is a weak-kneed argument. I think the objectives of the programs should be to create jobs and meaningful employment, not to disrupt the social and economic well-being of areas as well as the job in other parts of the country. We find our criticisms being answered with statements of that nature, and we can only assume that this is a give away program which is perhaps tainted with political patronage.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Disgusting.

Mr. Mazankowski: The most visible of DREE's programs has been the payment of so-called industrial incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act. Payments are still being made under RDIA's predecessor, the Area Development Incentives Act, but DREE will not reveal the amounts paid under each. For the two programs together, $244 million of public funds have been spent since this regime took over. In addition well over $100 million has been offered to companies but not yet paid. The department has evaluated the earlier ADIA program but is keeping the results secret. They claim it was surprisingly good at creating jobs, but provide no proof.

We have evidence that some projects were granted extensions while others were not, and no reasonable or legitimate explanation was given. A firm in my province of Alberta, the Smoky Lake Processing and Dehydrating Plant, complied very closely with the criteria of the old ADIA program but were refused an extension while other firms in the province of Saskatchewan were granted extensions and are going ahead with their projects, although all started at basically the same time. I have asked for the production of papers in this House but the government has failed to produce them. This leaves a cloud of suspicion over the manner in which some of these grants are allocated and awarded. The current RDIA program was designed to provide for an active planning role by the federal government and better judgment in choosing firms to receive grants. As numerous concerned and responsible people outside the department have stated, no such effective planning and judgment is evident.

Our member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has pointed out that of the 49,266 jobs to be created through DREE's announced offers, at least 12,000 will likely never be created. Of the 18,537 jobs which DREE announced as expected to be created through grant offers in 1969 and 1970, 4,404 were later lost when the offers were withdrawn, declined or a firm went bankrupt. Of the offers accepted and announced up to the end of November, 1971, those relating to a total of about 5,000 jobs have subsequently been withdrawn, declined or lost through bankruptcy. Since these losses are often not made public until more than a year after the initial announcement, it seems probable, in view of the experience with the 1969-70 announcements, that 12,000 jobs that have been announced will have been lost by December, 1972, through withdrawal, refusals or bankruptcies.

An. hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Mazankowski: The total number of jobs that were announced and still expected to be filled, if one subtracts withdrawals and refusals, was 44,790 as of November 30, 1971. The number of jobs actually in existence as a result of RDIA grants is nowhere near this total. As reported by the Globe and Mail on February 11, 1972, information on actual jobs created and actual grants paid is not available from DREE. The best estimate that can be made on the basis of available information is that only about 5,000 jobs are in existence as a result of DREE grants. This figure, however, may be a bit of an overestimate in view of the numerous cases in which firms have laid off workers after receiving payments or in which firms have closed a plant in one location and opened or expanded another in a designated region in order to receive a DREE grant. There are many examples of this sort of process.

Perhaps the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) will not mind if I refer to the Belanger-Tappan case. The offer of a grant to the Belanger-Tappan firm was withdrawn, not because the company was going to close the Findlay plant, but because they did not do that soon enough. I believe the minister's statement outside the House indicated that the offer was withdrawn on February 11 because the company had not followed up its application within departmental time limits, even after it was given one extension. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this indicates that if the Belanger-Tappan firm had closed its Findlay plant and expanded the Montmagny plant sooner, the grant of $254,000 odd would have been paid.

This incident involving a plant closing is just one example of a more widespread failure on the part of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and its predecessor. The department and its predecessor failed to co-ordinate, when creating productive capacity in an industry, that productive capacity with realistic projections of demand. By paying incentive grants that will promote the expansion of productive capacity without first ensuring that there is demand for the products which will be manufactured, DREE will simply displace workers and capital in existing plants. There is considerable evidence to show that this has already taken place, Mr. Speaker. DREE's policies and programs have had precisely this effect.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Give some examples, please.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am glad the minister asked for examples.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes; give examples, please.

Mr. Mazankowski: For example, in my province, Alberta, it was planned to erect a $10 million fertilizer plant at Redwater. At the same time, fertilizer workers in Calgary were being laid off. Another example involves overcapacity in the meat packing and processing industry. After one or two such plants had closed in Calgary, a new one was to be opened in Lethbridge with the help of a federal incentives grant. Look at the tire industry, which is plagued at present with production and marketing problems. Despite that, the federal government supplied a considerable grant to a French firm which wanted to develop a tire producing plant in one of the Atlantic provinces. Such actions can only create disruptive effects and harm the social and economic welfare of people in other parts of the country.

Let me cite another example. One might ask if there is a shortage of liquor in this country. Are our own distillers broke? Nevertheless, we have given $10 million to the Seagrams people at Gimli, Manitoba. I understand that another $10 million has been given to the Hiram Walker people at Kelowna. I am sure that the overproduction of skidoos and hockey sticks in this country will too bring about plenty of disruptive effects for industry. As I say, I am pleased that the minister asked me to give examples. I could give many more.

For instance, consider the proposal in Alberta involving the North American Integrated Food Processing Company which wishes to establish a large, integrated hog processing and producing facility in southern Alberta, merely because the area in question has been designated and because the company wants a federal incentives grant. The details of the proposed transaction are somewhat sketchy at present. I believe the firm has applied for the grant to the department the minister controls. It wants to erect a huge complex for processing between 200,000 and 600,000 hog carcasses per year. What effect will this operation have on the established processing enterprises in Alberta, as well as those in the rest of Canada? The point must be made, I believe, that, in analysing this application the department must consider that, right today, major facilities for hog production and processing exist in the central and northern parts of Alberta. That is where the potential for such enterprises exists, because that is where feed grain is produced.

Statistics show that from the area in which this operation is to be installed, something like 245,000 hogs went to the Calgary packing plants in 1970. This clearly means that there is no large scale production there. It means that if you are to develop a facility which will process for market up to 600,000 hogs per year, you will need to develop a new group of ancillary enterprises there. I fear that a large number of enterprises may become involved in this integrated processing facility and production in northern and central Alberta will be harmfully affected. This new added production facility in the southern part of the province may have disastrous social and economic effects which, in future, will affect not only the hog industry in the province but that industry throughout the entire country.

Census divisions, 7, 10, 11 and 12 which cover the northeastern part of Alberta produced about 700,000 hogs in 1970. This area, as I said before, is where many hogs are produced because feed grain is produced there. There is a potential for marketing 1,750,000 hogs which will be produced in that part of the province in the next four or five years. So, it seems clear that if any expansion is to take place in the processing and production aspects of this industry, it should take place in the area where there is production at present, where it has future potential and such facilities should not be developed elsewhere. If they are, they will only cause major economic and social disruptions in the rest of the province and, indeed, in the rest of the country. I therefore urge the government to heed all the social, economic and geographic implications of any proposal or request involving the provision of grants that will assist the establishment of operations such as those to which I have just alluded. It should be obvious that economic and social reasons should govern the granting of loans, and not just political reasons.

May I continue with my remarks, Mr. Speaker? Before any more grants are given under the Regional Development Incentives Act, basic and fundamental guidelines with respect to grants should be established. For example, we should learn from the experience of the past and not give grants to an industry which is already suffering from an overcapacity of productive facilities and which is producing surplus products, or products it cannot sell. Secondly, I do not think that there should be an element of employee transfer in the matter of grants. That is, I do not think employees should be transferred from one area to another. Thirdly, the provision of assistance should be based on the need of the particular operation that wants help. It seems to me that the policies of this department work in exactly the reverse way. In other words, large companies which are financially able to discharge their obligations have a better chance of getting a grant than smaller companies. I believe that greater attention should be given to smaller industries, particularly in the rural areas, on the basis of rural decentralization. When we look at smaller organizations which may not have the expertise and legal ability to deal with all aspects of the legislation, we find their applications being turned down because of bureaucratic theory rather than practical business sense.

I hope the minister will take into consideration some of the effects of the experience which has been related as a result of the operations of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion throughout the past year. However, I want to issue one word of warning. No matter how excellent the specific means and objectives of the program of Regional Economic Expansion might be, there can be no reasonable degree of success—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time expired a few seconds ago.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to discuss economic matters such as the one before the House today, pursuant to Standing Order 58(4)(a).

The motion reads as follows:

That this House condemns the government for the disastrous failure of its regional development programs to make any progress in eliminating regional disparities and, in particular, condemns the government for the lack of planning or strategy in its programmes, for its total reliance on give-away grants to private corporations, most of them foreign owned, for the senseless practice of transplanting unemployment by assisting plants in one location while similar plants are being closed in another location and for the wasteful expenditure of large sums of public funds without appreciable results in jobs and economic development in the disadvantaged areas of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, may I say first of all that in order to have a sound policy and a sound economy, we have to take proper action.

Even if he is doing his best, the minister in the present circumstances cannot solve the economic problem because even the Pope could not do it. To do this, we would have to change our financial system which leads directly to bankruptcy.

The more we apply our economic system with its present structure, the more we increase the imbalance of our economy. It is true that a great many of our manufacturers go bankrupt because they are incapable of assuming their responsibilities. Our manufacturers cannot pay interest at 12 per cent on their borrowings, in addition to capital, a 50 per cent tax on such repayment, and let themselves be "devoured" by municipal, school and other taxes on production. There are all sorts of agencies which, under the present system, gnaw at the incomes of manufacturers and put them in a very uncomfortable position.

In several cases, industry cannot stand up, and this government can alleviate this situation—the minister did find a way—through the Local Initiatives Program that it has created so as to assist industry in various ways. The more we help industry, the more we enslave it and it can hardly survive. In fact, several industries may perhaps manage, provided others disappear.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair to resume same at two p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, before lunch I was explaining why foreign capital has so much control over the Canadian economy.

I was suggesting that it is because economic conditions do not encourage Canadians. First of all, it is increasingly difficult for Canadians to find capital to build plants, develop the country, do things the Canadian way.

Mr. Speaker, there are only two ways of getting capital at present: either you issue stock which is very hard to sell because Canadians have no money or because they are afraid of taking risks by investing in industry, or else you borrow.

Moreover, since governments absorb all savings by issuing bonds, Canadians invest with governments because they think it is safer.

Industry comes second. Governments are forced to get all the savings available in the Canadian economy, so there is almost nothing left for industrial development. This is one of the reasons why the minister has to come up with local initiatives programs, with new plans for industrial development.

The minister had inquiries made and found that there were regional disparities in the country and that there were many parts of the country where it was almost impossible to establish industries, because of the level of poverty. But all those programs that the minister has created to develop industry have not prevented poverty, the running into debt nor the taxes and surtaxes which are draining everybody's pocketbook and are making it impossible for anyone to accumulate investment capital.

We are forced then, in order to accomplish something, to go into debt. In order to take advantage of the programs started by the minister, to obtain $20,000, $25,000 or $33,000, manufacturers have to come up with $100,000. This liability is an enormous burden for them. The large reimbursements necessary are taxable at all levels of government.

These taxes, as I said earlier, amount to more than 50 per cent. A good number of manufacturers have been helped by the department's programs, but they will not be able to survive despite it all. They will be forced to declare bankruptcy because of the policy which gives with one hand and takes twice as much with the other.

We have spent millions of dollars in grants to manufacturers who are bound to fail eventually because they are unable to make ends meet.

I think that the problem is of an economic nature, and as long as we do not decide to settle it once and for all we will experience again the plague that is afflicting us now and we will have only foreign capital for our development.

I have just learned today that, in my riding, there is a furniture factory which operates with great difficulty. It does sell its furniture, but cannot get paid because 50 per cent of the people are near bankrupt. If the economy were sound and balanced, the manufacturer could sell his products. An American firm has just offered $250,000 for this factory. Once again, another industry will pass into American hands, even though this is but a small plant employing only 30 people.

It is our economy which is sick. One can always blame this government, but what solutions are being proposed? What are the causes of all these evils? Let us get at the real causes to cure this serious disease which afflicts us.

Our wish is to see Canadians gain control over their economy, their policy-making. Since the end of the last war, the awe-inspiring progress of this country and firms, Canadian as well as foreign, has not prevented malnutrition, misery, poverty and economic insecurity from settling here.

Economic stability cannot be generated by imbalance. Inflation, unemployment, poverty are economic and mathematical problems requiring economic and mathematical solutions.

National unity is not only a matter of language or culture; it is also and above all an economic issue. It is almost impossible for Canadians to own their industries or their inheritance because land and school taxes are now so burdensome that thay amount to forfeiture of private ownership to the state and prevent most Canadians from owning their industries in security, including the house in which they live.

And this feature of our economy leads us directly to socialism, which is contrary to man's most elementary right to own undertakings and even a permanent home. Canadians are no longer able to own their own home. A little house costs four or five times what it should. Indeed, a $10,000 home is sold from $25,000 to $30,000 on account of interest charges. Until such time as we take the necessary steps to check further increases in property taxes, which contribute to the rise of the cost of living, we will have only destitute people who live from day to day, without any hope or possibility of becoming homeowners.

That is why the Créditistes are asking that property taxes be removed or progressively reduced. They are also asking that the Bank of Canada provide interest-free loans to municipalities, school boards, provinces, to improve public services, which would push taxes down.

We find that unfortunately the big eat the small, since many are bemoaning in shameful abjection. Manufacturers and individuals go bankrupt, farmers lose their farms, all of it without any other justification than the lack of money. The public lives in hardship, and governments in bondage. We must stop suffering from want when there is in the country everything needed to ensure affluence in each home.

So, instead of managing Canada, governments have become collectors of taxes of all kinds, and a big part of those taxes, the most sacred part, which must not be talked about is precisely the interest on the public debt. Few rise to protest against the interest paid on public finance.

So, Mr. Speaker, as long as we cannot finance our public bodies with money that is borrowed interest-free or at a low rate of interest, we will always be in the red; never will the Canadian economy know stability. We will know nothing but the disappointments, the discontent we now know. To solve the problem, we are moving towards dictatorship, and the governments have to step in with money they take away from the people who have too little as it is.

When the minister grants subsidies to certain industries, to allow them to expand or continue their operations, he takes it away from the ratepayers who do not have enough even now. And so, money is taken from one place where there is a lack of it and put into another where there is a shortage, in fact where there will never be enough money. So, that does not solve the problem.

When we want to develop new industries, new capital is needed and it rests with the government and members of Parliament to settle that problem. If we had new capital to make new investments and if taxpayers were free to make some savings, they would develop the country and the government would not have to meddle everywhere as it is doing at the present time. The government could show some leadership in Canada instead of taking over the assets of our citizens or compelling Canadians to mortgage their property and borrow money to do something.

We know that foreign capital is blanketing the country. It is a deficiency of previous governments which are not the only ones to blame, but it is also our fault because we have never taken efficient means to finance our production and especially our consumption, since production is meant for consumption. The consumer is the individual who controls production, and when the consumer lacks the capital, the means, when he is increasingly impoverished by taxation, taxes of all kinds, and deprived of purchasing power, he cannot create a demand for the production which therefore fails to achieve its purpose. The purpose of production is to satisfy requirements and when this purpose is not achieved the economy is not fullfilling its function.

There must be a reform of the economy, a substitution to be brought about by financing property and new production through new credits whenever new developments are involved, in order to leave the population with enough economic blood for normal development of our economy. Its smooth operation calls for normal tools. The government must do its job and this job is not to get citizens into debts, but to pull them out of the hole; and at present, the more the state interferes with the economy, the more it puts us in a bad position, the more the people are facing difficulties, the more the economy is out of balance and we go from bad to worse.

I believe in the minister; he is not Santa Claus but he does his best within the present system. I do not blame him beyond measure because I know that he is doing his duty, that he is sincere, that he wants to succeed. However I am also sure that he knows about the impossibility of succeeding in the present state of the economy. I know he will admit that improvements are needed in our economy. We must eliminate the big economic abuses within our system if we really want to create something practical and something truly communal in order to allow the community to live in its own country full of riches and in order to allow each individual to enjoy that part of the riches that is due to him.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in the last few weeks there has been much talk of regional economic development inside and outside the House. This afternoon I will try to deal with this matter as dispassionately as possible. I know I will probably have to start all over again before the committee, which is quite normal, as members of this House are entitled to know what we do with the millions, and even hundreds of millions of dollars which are voted by this House, how we use them, and whether we really reach our objectives.

What strikes me in this debate, Mr. Speaker, is not so much the attacks made. Of course, there are little pinpricks, little hints, because when people cannot prove something and they think they can do harm to the other person, they resort to such hints.

People refer to the election fund and to the relation which may exist between donations and grants made by the department and, let us say, the Liberal party. I thought it rather amusing that one of the organizers of a recent Progressive Conservative banquet in Toronto was employed by a branch of a company which had received very nice grants from my department. Anyway, you only have to read the Globe and Mail to see this. It is perfectly natural. Some supporters of other opposition parties have received such grants, which is perfectly natural. This is a thing about which we are extremely careful; we make sure that this program will never lose its worth in the eyes of the public, precisely because tricks like those I have just mentioned would be resorted to by the powers that be.

But for all our caution, and even though I know that all the hints which are made—by people who do not have the courage to assert things—are lies, people still go on doing it. They go on repeating and whispering those things, which is certainly no way to improve the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I have not found one person who was really interested in making improvements. All they are interested in is making small electoral and political gains.

Actually, in order to find constructive criticisms that would really improve the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, I have to refer to documents and speeches of other persons than the members of the opposition. These criticisms are not always favourable: I read last week the important paper written by Dr. Firestone. It is a very serious document wherein Dr. Firestone questions with equal seriousness, some of the programs I implement. I think it is an honest study and I would like to discuss some points with him, since his criticisms differ from what I have been hearing since this morning.

What have we been actually hearing since this morning? Let us consider the gentleman who is deemed to have reached, intellectually speaking at least, a fairly high level; I refer to the leader of the New Democratic party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). What did he tell us? He touched on general topics and when he came to specific cases, his figures were all wrong. He claims in effect that economic development requires the establishment of humane societies. When I hear such opinions, I am all at sea.

He spoke about grants and means of destruction. Anyhow, this is the usual way that the department is spoken of. Before we come to these cases let us simply state that almost one third of my budget is earmarked for grants. The remaining two thirds are spent on joint programs with the provinces, either under ARDA or FRED. We discuss things with the provinces and the municipalities in order to carry out real projects.

However, all you hear is talks about grants. It would seem like the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has nothing to do but give grants to large companies, especially American companies. This is the criticism the opposition has been directing at the department which set out to reduce regional disparities as its objective.

So, here is the great theorician who is supposed to be very much aware of those problems, who is supposed to have a sophisticated social conscience, making this very artificial criticism that we must form human societies, that we must not necessarily give grants to large companies, especially large foreign companies. On that point, of course, there were virulent attacks saying, why give grants to Rayonier Québec Inc. (ITT) in Port-Cartier, when another mill is closing down in Kippewa, Témiscamingue? Is that a program that makes sense? To create jobs somewhere and knock some off somewhere else! It is certainly impressive, Mr. Speaker. However, the facts are less dramatic than that.

The Canadian International Paper company in Kippewa, Témiscamingue, decided to close down because for a great number of years it has been coming up with a deficit and all its projections for the future point to deficits. It does not even want to modernize its mill. The mill of Rayonier Québec Inc. (ITT) in Port-Cartier just received a grant, It will starting operating only in 1974. So, the CIP in Kippewa, Témiscamingue, is closing down in May, because in May 1974, another mill will start operating because they have a different market and are supposed to sell all their pulp in Europe. Here is the first great scandal.

I find this scandalous. I met the president of the CIP, Mr. Monze, I tried to convince him by telling him, listen, what if we tried to help you modernize, etc. He replied: "No, transportation costs are absolutely prohibitive, we cannot keep on operating the mill. If you want it, it is yours."

The member for York South said that it is because a grant was paid to Rayonier Quebec Inc. that the other industry is closing down. That is the first great scandal of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

The second has to do with Duplate of Canada Ltd, which left Oshawa for Hawkesbury. This case is not quite perfect as these are two Ontario municipalities. One of them should have been in Quebec for the case to be more perfect. Anyway, those are two Ontario municipalities and this took place under the old industrial incentives program which was amended because we had no freedom of movement. When a company settled down in a designated area it had to be given the grant provided for in the act. The minister was powerless, but the Department of Regional Economic Expansion came under strong attack. The act was amended and even the NDP members were scared: the discretion given to the minister might be used for patronage. They are convinced of that.

We wanted to change the act because we did not want such things to happen, that is to say that companies would move out and settle elsewhere to obtain government grants. This is a strong argument against the Department of Regional Economic Expansion!

Another is Michelin Tires Manufacturing Company of Canada Limited. The situation is identical. The grants paid to this company were paid under the old act. They had been asked for by Nova Scotia; the provincial government insisted on it, helped this company and I had no choice: I had to pay that grant as provided for in the act. This company has nevertheless created 1,800 jobs in Nova Scotia.

Let an hon. member from Nova Scotia attack that in his province. Let him go there and do so. It would be absurd.

Similarly, hon. members from Alberta will not be able to rail in Grand Prairie against the Procter & Gamble mill. Let them try if they have enough courage.

In any event, the Michelin affair is yet another scandal. That was under the previous act and we had no latitude.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

There is another case, and it is a perfect one, because it involves two provinces. It is that of Aerovox Canada Ltd. which moved from Hamilton to Amherst, Nova Scotia. Factories shut down in Hamilton. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) will surely remember that: Factories are closed in Hamilton in order to create jobs in Nova Scotia.

What is the good of that? And $235,000 went for that. There is no sense in running a department that way.

So where is the truth, Mr. Speaker? It is so simple. Anybody calling my office over the phone would have been given that information. Only they do not want to know the truth, because it is annoying. The truth is that we heard one day that Aerovox Canada Limited had decided to close its plant in Hamilton, that is all. They did not even ask for the department's permission. They decided to meet the needs of the Canadian market with their American plants. The first thing we knew was that the plant was closed. We thought maybe we could get them to stay in Canada. And so we engaged in discussions with the company as to the possibility of a grant, not so that they could leave Hamilton and settle in Nova Scotia, but to prevent them from leaving Canada and to provide for jobs here in Canada. And that is how we came to offer a grant to the Aerovox Canada Limited Company.

So people cry shame again: The department created jobs somewhere in order to eliminate jobs elsewhere. The facts were available. A phone call to my office would have been enough to know what had happened. There would have been no need for a debate. But people wished to cry shame.

Other speeches were delivered but I will not say anything about them at this stage. There is still a much better example but it would be hard to deal with it, for as far as politics are concerned, dealing with it now would be playing with dynamite. I will keep it for some other time.

I will now talk about Union Carbide Canada Limited, which left Welland, in Ontario, in order to settle in Beauharnois, in Quebec. "Ah, here is a wonderful opportunity for Ti-Jean Marchand to develop industry in Quebec, to the prejudice of industry in Ontario." The case they wanted, they have it at last. Now what is the truth about Union Carbide Canada Limited? That firm decided to settle in another country. And I could name it and if there is no objection on the part of the company, I may do it. The company said: There is no chance of success for us here, in the present circumstances. Here is what we are offered in some other country and we would be interested in going there.

And it was at that point, that we began negotiating with the company in order to find out where they could operate economically, and they chose Beauharnois. What a scandal! A French-Canadian member of the Cabinet is short-changing the industries of Ontario, is eliminating employment over there in order to create jobs in Quebec!

Mr. Speaker, what a whopper! This is the kind of criticism being aimed at the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

This morning, my hon. friend from Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) was overly critical in his remarks. I could recall the details. But let me tell him right now that practically all the cases he quoted, if I am not mistaken, come under the old act and not under the new one. There may be one exception. However, with your leave I shall reply on some other occasion. He may question me in the House, if he cares, but I could not afford enough time to prepare a summary of the cases coming under the old act on industrial incentives. My department had no choice, it had to do something about it.

Well, this is the scandal that was referred to this morning! We are charged with having provided grants to American corporations such as IBM. However, no mention was made of the funds that were provided to Stelco, for instance, a provincially-owned Nova Scotia steel company. This steel company would have shut down within a few years, had it not been decided to have it modernized now. The Department of Economic Regional Expansion granted this company $15 million so it could modernize and continue operations, but not a word is said about that. No, not a single word! This is much too risky.

We did also help Dosco Industries Limited, in Quebec. The amount involved was much smaller, but we did help them.

Were there any responsible remarks made about that? No doubt the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) will raise a point because, according to him, it is obvious the department did nothing. One only has to refer to the speech delivered by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) to note that nothing whatsoever was said about it. We are being accused of lacking a global strategy and of making whimsical ad hoc decisions.

There is first of all, an overall strategy, which may be criticized as such, as the hon. member for Egmont will probably not fail to do. I am thinking, for instance, of the FRED program in Prince Edward Island. I am not saying it is perfect. I say: Here is an effort made by two governments—the one in Ottawa and the one in Prince Edward Island—in order to try and establish a comprehensive 15-year program to improve the situation. Let people criticize the program—I do not know whether I will be here when the hon. member does so, but I find this perfectly natural. I am not saying we came up with a masterpiece. But to go and say there have been no efforts made is really to be irresponsible.

Some members of this House claim that some day they will be able to govern this country. This is rather amusing, especially when their leader is talking!

If people want to criticize the Eastern Quebec Planning Bureau, they can do so—it is an overall program. Studies were started in 1960. Mistakes have probably been made. There are still some things we will be changing—but to go and say that there has been no overall effort, no overall strategy, to try and develop that area is to be so partisan that it makes me wonder how such people can possibly claim that they are representing public opinion in the House of Commons!

I am not trying to put an end to criticism. I know that newspaper reporters are so fanatic that they are bent on slaughtering us by saying: You cannot even criticize what Mr. Marchand is doing, he is so thin-skinned. I do not mind criticism. I spent my life being criticized, and also criticizing others. I do not object to it.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am shocked by the kind of talk which I have been hearing in this place since this morning. I am shocked that public funds are used to provide research staff for the opposition parties and they do not even bother using them to call and check the most basic facts.

People have tried to prove how irresponsible the department was just because there have been bankruptcies. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) seeks out bankruptcies and hopes to detect the smell of petty scandals somewhere, and that will be funny. No doubt it will be. Besides, this is his job, but I regret that he does nothing but that. He should also do something, for example, to understand what is being done generally. It is true that bankruptcies have occurred. I am aware of 14 since the implementation of the new program and they amount to almost $900,000. I am not happy about it and it will be necessary to exercise more caution in the future, all the more when $40 million have already been paid up to now.

I am not happy and I do not like it, Mr. Speaker, but I do know that the leader of the hon. member for St. John's East has, in a single shot, lost around $30 to $40 million with his heavy water plant. This does not mean that the former premier of Nova Scotia is a thief, since he tried too much, but it can be said that he lacked foresight. Anyway he missed that opportunity.

I wonder therefore why people are shocked when a minister tries out new programs. Of course, a number of mistakes on bankruptcies may occur and that does not make me happy, far from it, but I will try to correct them.

Now people give us advice but the way they go about it is like my saying to a mechanic: "Look here, old man, before you find out what the trouble is with this car, have you turned on the ignition key, have you put the car into gear?" But people would say to me: "Listen, this is a mechanic."

An hon. member has asked: "Have you conducted market surveys? Are you aware that the construction of a plant would eliminate another and that you do away with jobs in an area and create others elsewhere? Do you take this into account? Well, we have extremely competent people—

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: That is gorgeous.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may come to my department. He could spend one day there and would not understand anything.

Those studies are carried out most seriously since we want all these programs to be efficient.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: When are you going to answer the phone calls?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You spoke this morning and I gave you every opportunity to speak without interruption.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, of course we are extremely careful about it. We know that no regional development can take place if those things happen systematically.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce studies each case, as does the Department of Agriculture when it is concerned. For instance, a case was mentioned this morning by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), and what did he raise in the House? Not the case of an application but that of an exchange of letters and apart from that we have advised the company that we do not accept because the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce believes that we are not justified to accept. This is another scandal raised by the hon. member this morning.

There is nothing at all. There is not even any application. As to the exchange of correspondence, we have said no. Your proposition is preposterous. The hon. member then says: How disgraceful.

At any rate, insofar as we are interested in connection with foreign capital, I have but one thing to say: I would be the first to wish for an economy more independent from the American economy, and I would prefer that Canadian companies show real concern about regional development. However, as long as I will be Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I will not accept that underdeveloped areas be imposed limitations which do not exist for other areas. Besides, the members of the New Democratic Party are realistic enough to admit that if an American company, for instance, were prepared to establish its operations at Halifax after obtaining a grant, it would be told: No, you are an American company, you will not get the grant. Then, the company could set up shop elsewhere. That criticism makes no sense.

In fact, one of those who asked me to support the establishment of Boeing of Canada Limited in Winnipeg was the Premier of Manitoba, and I do not hold it against him at all. He did what he had to and his electors would not have forgiven him if he had not done so.

That, of course, does not mean that Mr. Schreyer is in favour of American domination over the Canadian economy. I am convinced he is not, but the rules of the game being what they are, why should Winnipeg have been deprived of it and why should the company have settled in Montreal? That does not make sense. Some criticism that is!

That the New Democratic Party should critize in general, that is its policy, and I have no objection to it. But when it tries, on the basis of the regional economic expansion program, to impose upon underdeveloped regions restrictions that are not imposed elsewhere, that really does not make sense. From a political point of view, not a single member could survive in a area if he behaved in a such a stupid way.

Of course Mr. Speaker, they say that nothing has been considered in our department, that we have 2,000 employees who cannot think. It is difficult to organize a department with 2,000 individuals who are dull! In the first place, the prairie farm rehabilitation program in western Canada is efficient.

Under the FRED and ARDA programs in the Interlake area, some extremely interesting things have been carried out.

I am also thinking about the special areas on Prince Edward Island.

Nobody could make me believe that Quebecers do not appreciate what has been done in the Quebec City special area.

We will hold a meeting. Let our friend from Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) say in Saint John in New Brunswick that what we have done is stupid!

When all this was discussed, we set objectives and we are trying to develop, to use all this. No. Here is the sentence. The leader of the New Democratic Party has said that this was——a complete failure; it achieved nothing, nothing at all. Just give money away, that's all.

That is right. As long as the parties do not show more responsibility in the House, how can one expect the Canadian people to progress rapidly.

Once again, it is not because I am sensitive to criticism. On the contrary, I was reading what Mr. Firestone has written. Some passages are hard to accept, but here is a man who has stopped to think, who has done more than collect newspaper clippings and state in the House that what they say is true, without even checking when they can do so. They do not, because they probably find it too tiring.

Mr. Firestone does better than throw stones and suggest that all that helps to fill the party's coffers. Marchand is the bagman. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has spent his political life making insinuations. Furthermore, he has succeeded in getting rid of a number of people, one of whom I am probably replacing here today. But, I will tell him one thing: I am fairly thick skinned!

They will never get me that way.

As for hon. members—and I do not mean those of the New Democratic Party—who are obviously trying to do the same, I say to them that they have the wrong number, and that they will surely have a lot of trouble anyhow. The leader of the party should not try to go his own way so as to look like the nice chap while the others are doing the dirty work. I do not indulge in racism. I will never do that. I admit that they are free to criticize me and I will not hide behind the fact that I am a French Canadian to say: Because I am a French Canadian minister, they must not touch me. I am in the ring, granted; let them hit me, but fairly and not in a racist way, as a certain number of members are doing now.

So, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Who is attacking you because of that?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I just made an exclusion of your ranks.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I didn't catch that.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I just said I am not talking about this part of the House, but some others are, definitely, and I don't want to play that game at all. I just want to say that they are not going to succeed the way they succeeded a few years ago; that is all.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, all I want to say—some do not agree but I don't care—is that I do not mind dying provided I feel it is for a good cause.

Here is a department honestly trying—even the hon. member for York South said so—to correct an extremely difficult situation without any doubt. We do not have at our disposal any instrument for that purpose. We can always try with grants. Furthermore, there are the ARDA and FRED programs. With DEVCO we are attempting to ensure development on Cape Breton Island.

We are trying to re-examine all programs, and we have made mistakes. It is really difficult to develop a strategy. We are told: You are not through, you are going against the recommendations of the Atlantic Development Council. It is not true, Mr. Speaker, and I said so in the House several times. I am opposed to one thing only, namely, to determine the number of jobs which will be created in the Maritimes within five or six years. I am opposed to it because I don't know what the answer is. In fact, here knows and any prediction in this regard will only tend to confuse the public and create false hopes. So I do not know. If 175,000 jobs can be created, I will be the happiest of all.

As far as everything else goes, Mr. Speaker, in terms of development strategy, objectives that have to be reached, growth centres, we are in full agreement with the Board and my Department is geared accordingly. I have no objections to criticism in that regard, Mr. Speaker. But I will not have it said that the special zone program is not sound, that we should not choose a city but rather a region; that we should not move in such and such a direction and that we have so much money to spend. The criticism should be knowledgeable and make allowances for the means and instruments at our disposal.

This is not the way the criticism goes. They say: Union Carbide has moved from here to there, the jobs have been transferred, bankruptcies have occurred, etc. This is the only thing that interests vilifiers, but they don't even know the dates of expiry or application of the different pieces of legislation.

I sincerely regret the waste of time incurred for the House and the nation with such childish, futile criticism while I am sure some of these people could express constructive criticism as they are both intelligent and knowledgeable. Since we are in a pre-election period, they probably are only interested in making political mileage and engage in mud-throwing. I am sorry, but I think the mud they are throwing will boomerang. I know there can be errors, I know our programs are not perfect, but I believe in the honesty of our people and I know that the administration of the department is irreproachable in trying to reduce regional disparities.

Then we are told: "You say that you have created 50,000 jobs, but it is not so." Is this clear, yes or no? It is very clear. All people have to do is peruse the documents: Everything is there in black and white.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has a big deal. An official of the department probably tipped him off. A telephone inquiry apparently revealed that the number of jobs created under the previous plan was 19,000 instead of 40,000 or 45,000. That would mean that previous statements were not true. The inquiry covered only part of the previous plan which included three parts: grants, tax debates and corporation expansion.

The inquiry applying to the first part only could evidently not yield the maximum figure. It is strange that it should correspond exactly to the figure we had forecast for new ventures. As I have already told him, he does not know how to interpret figures. Nor do I, for that matter. I am not too good at it, but I have enough humility, when faced with statistics, to ask an expert to interpret them, instead of coming to the House to talk rubbish.

They may criticize my department in a constructive way, they may tell us what we should do to eliminate regional disparities, to try to neutralize the centripetal forces which play an important part in Canada. I do agree with that.

I have read the program of the New Democratic Party. Except for generalities, there is absolutely nothing in it. They do not propose any technical innovation nor any means of action.

They tell us: Why not concentrate your efforts on crown corporations? But what are we doing with respect to Multiplex at Saint John in New Brunswick?

• (1450)

What do we intend to do elsewhere where we had inquiries made and where we want to try new instruments? We will try them all. This cannot be done overnight. We may have had weaknesses, maybe we are not going fast enough. Let the criticisms bear on that, but I am not going to take the trouble of answering vague charges. Someone has said that there has been corruption and discrimination in the case of Quebec. That is what they say behind the curtains. I am not going to bother answering those insinuations. If anyone has anything to suggest, I am ready to listen to him for the greater good of Canada.

[English]

An hon. Member: Are you looking for an appointment?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, I am going now—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald).

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to snub the hon. member, but I have to go now to an appointment. I shall read it in Hansard.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Hit and run!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, I hit your boss and run.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the minister, in the concluding lines of his speech, said that he would welcome suggestions and then had to leave the chamber. I hope he will not only read my speech but respond to it.

As the Minister for Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) spoke, I looked to the Chair a couple of times to see whether Your Honour was still there. At several points during the speech I assumed that Parliament had been dissolved and a general election called. Certainly, it sounded to me like the opening shot of the minister's defence.

It is unfortunate that the minister, during his time in office, has been unable to distinguish between two basic functions of public life: the exercise of one's duties in whatever responsibility one is called upon to perform and the perpetuation of one's political role. The minister has always lumped the two together so that we get speeches that sound for all the world like Grade A stump speeches—they are full of sound and fury, signifying you know what. This is a very sad fact, particularly to those of us who have a very great interest in and basic concern for the administration of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

If ever there was a time when there was need for a concise and rational explanation of the problems of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, it is right now. The minister has repeatedly failed to come to grips with the legitimate questions being raised by opposition critics. In addition, he has not come to grips with the constructive suggestions from his own office, his own advisory council of rural development, the council for the Atlantic provinces or the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. I do not think the minister could accuse the latter of being partisan.

I, therefore, find it incredible and sad that the minister should think that the only defence he has left for his departmental administration is to launch into the kind of sweeping, general attacks that do no one any good and negate the hard work being done through his department. Surely, it is difficult for the most objective observer to take the minister seriously when he suggests, and I quote him, that "No one wants to find out what the truth is" or that he has not heard one criticism from anyone who is anxious to improve the situation. Does the minister really understand the particular weaknesses of the present programs and policies of the department?

In debate and discussion in this House, he should be outlining the steps being taken to alter programs or compensate for some obvious faults in evaluation.

Mr. McBride: You heard the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) this morning.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I heard both speeches but I am not aware that either of those members has the responsibility for running this department.

Mr. Peters: Just because he defeated you in Renfrew, don't cry.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

An hon. Member: This looks like a United Church squabble to me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind hon. gentlemen that the hon. member who has the floor should be heard.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would be tempted to say it is "all in the family" but I think that has a dangerous connotation these days.

Unfortunately, the minister's penchant for flying into oratory rather than viewing the substance of issues, has been carried into the department itself. That is not to say that the department is sending forth apostles to preach in the same virulent manner as is exhibited by the minister from time to time, but there has been a paucity of objective information from the department about the success being achieved and about the evaluation of programs attempted during the past 2½ years. There has been a lack of information ever since this department was established. There has been no opportunity for a public evaluation and no real suggestions in concrete terms for guidelines in the administration of vast sums of money.

Are there guidelines, for instance, to suggest the criteria that ought to be followed if departmental policies are to meet with success? There should be some guidelines. Is the department following any industrial strategy, or is it merely accepting the present industrial structure of this country? One is led to believe that that is the case. Also, others suggest that the department is trying significantly to alter the industrial structure of the country.

Apart from some inconclusive signs that one might try to decipher there is no information coming from the department, no factual statement to indicate what the present situation is. Members of the House and the general public need factual information if they are to understand whether headway is being made in closing the economic gaps existing in our country. We want to know, as well, when the federal government has initiated new programs and when there has been a proliferation of provincial schemes in this country, if many of these don't work at cross-purposes to some degree with respect to incentives provided by other agencies of the provincial governments or the federal government.

Valid questions have been raised from time to time about the end benefits accruing from the kind of general incentives approach which has been adopted by governments in this country. It is time we had concrete information so that we might know whether incentive grants are actually reaching their supposed goal of creating economic activity and closing to a certain degree income gaps in this country, or whether major benefits are going to company investors and shareholders.

In his speech the minister suggested that people were accusing him of giving away money, and that was all. Anyone who thinks that that is the major strategy or policy that motivates this department can only have been strengthened in that belief by the minister's performance earlier this afternoon. If the minister's remarks represent the best intellectual arguments and rationale that can be brought forward in defence of present regional development policies in this country, then we are in a very sad state indeed. In no way has the minister alleviated growing apprehension that the department's program is a kind of giveaway program and that our regional development policy is governed by a handout mentality. Certainly many provincial premiers, especially the premiers of wealthier provinces, might think that is so. The minister has done nothing to show that that opinion is wrong.

I come from an area of chronic economic disparity. In the final analysis we are concerned not with aid but with trade. That is the cliché used by the people of underdeveloped countries and it is a good cliché to apply to the development policies of the federal government. After all, would it not be better if such policies were tailored to establish real trade and to abolish economic disparities? At present they seem to consist of stopgap measures of the kind that are too much in evidence.

At the beginning of my remarks I said there has been far too much secrecy about the operations of this department. I suppose that if we want information we shall have to rely on leaks slipping out from underneath bureaucratic doors, because so far there has been no objective presentation of information regarding the effective workings of the department. Until this information is made available to us, how can members of the House know if the department is being viably operated?

In the meantime, some people pay lip service to the work of the department. When the minister or his officials talk about consultation between the federal department and provincial departments as well as other agencies, they are not really talking about consultation in the full sense of establishing an over-all policy or strategy; they are talking primarily of negotiations in which regions, provinces or various groups see how much money they can get. That, really, is the sort of consultation that takes place at present. We must recognize that there must be genuine consultation between the various agencies that play an effective role in the development field. If there is to be consultation, there must be genuine public participation in the field of development. Public participation in the field of development, if I may refer to myself, is my hobby-horse. I ride it hard because I feel this philosophy crucial to the concept of effective basic development. The importance of that field has not been sufficiently recognized by the federal or provincial levels of government.

I am convinced that no major alterations will take place in the economic regions of this country which are presently underdeveloped and underutilized until there is a sufficient measure of public participation in this matter. I think this question has been fully and interestingly elaborated on in a document that comes in a sense from the minister's department. I am referring to the third report of the Canadian Council on Rural Development which reads in part:

> In the first place, a development program of any kind needs to identify with reasonable precision its goals and objectives.

This statement, perhaps, might be news so far as the minister and his officials are concerned if it had not been made three years ago. Yet here we are, three years later, still waiting for some kind of reasonable and constructive response from the department. The report continues:

> Secondly, programs must be instituted consistent with these goals and objectives. These programs must be continuously evaluated both in terms of their effectiveness and in terms of priorities.
> If this is not done those concerned with the operation of the program will not know whether they are succeeding or failing, and, for that matter, neither will the public.
> A general declaration of intent is too vague to function as an operational goal. It is not enough, for example, to say that the goal of the Department is to iron out regional economic disparities. This is of the same rather unhelpful level of generality as to announce a program to fight inflation, or bad health, or crime. We tend to assume that Canadian governments seek to counter inflation, bad health, crime, regional disparity, and so on, as a matter of course.

Obviously, we need information and specific targets to which we can point. Secondly, Mr. Speaker, along with consultation there is need for effective co-ordination. I have said repeatedly, and I will go on mentioning this until the minister and his officials get the message, that the programs of the department need co-ordinating. Not only must there be co-ordination of specific programs which have vital roles to play—in earlier days we had in this area programs such as ARDA, AIDA, FRED, and so on—but there must be co-ordination with respect to many decisions which have ramifications for regional economic development. For instance, there must be co-ordination in such areas as fiscal and monetary policy. We must take into account the differences in the kinds of economic disparities that exist in the regions and there must be co-ordination in specific fields such as transportation.

Only last evening in this chamber I talked about the eight increases in freight rates which have taken place in the last 23 months. The level of freight rates has become prohibitive and has not helped our agricultural industry. Actually, freight rates have had a negative effect on the sale of basic commodities such as potatoes from Prince Edward Island. One can see what has recently happened with regard to feed grain assistance affecting parts of Atlantic Canada.

Also, we need to examine our tariff policy. Transport costs add to the cost of production. Although an initial grant may help a firm to get over the initial difficulties associated with establishing a business, such grant will do nothing to lower other ongoing costs of manufacturing and shipping.

Recently the Prime Minister has been telling us that the government is to introduce a policy with regard to foreign investment. He said something about domestic control of the national economic environment. I have directed questions to the Prime Minister ever since before Christmas. All that he has said since Christmas suggests he has engaged in the most perfunctory kind of consultation with the provinces with regard to what is possibly the most important decision in the national, economic field that might be made by this government.

It does not require too much brilliance to realize the amount of anxiety that exists in Atlantic Canada and with premiers in other parts of the country about prejudicial decisions that might be taken with regard to foreign investment and economic possibilities. We desperately need a national and economic strategy for this country, not one created in the isolation of the east block, apart altogether from the regional realities that make up this country.

The Prime Minister pays lip service to federalism in his constitutional preoccupation but completely ignores it when it comes to the nitty-gritty of economic management of this country. It is possible for a federal government to concentrate on elaborating a policy of foreign investment without the widest possible consultation concerning, among other things, regional economic disparities? Concentration on and elaboration of programs in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion must also exist with regard to the levels of authority in this country.

Surely by now there should be consensus on our goals and strategy, consensus as to what are the real social and economic indicators which show some measure of achievement or failure. There must be frank recognition of the regional economic variations that exist in this country. This government has never clearly stated that it recognizes there is today diversity in the economic needs and possibilities that exist within the various regions of the country. While the department continually reports the large sums of money it has expended, what has it really done to encourage some of the human realities of this problem? In the part of the country from which I come there is need for very heavy emphasis on the establishment of improved management and entrepreneurial capabilities. Without that kind of encouragement and very active stimulation, what can we expect?

In a general way, we need a grand design for the Atlantic region and other parts of the country. The minister pleads that DREE is new and has been in operation for only a few short years. This is not the first country, and he is not the first minister to be faced with the problem of economic development. The people who live in the Tennessee valley in the United States can tell this minister and his officials much about what it means to participate in a grand design.

The minister must realize by now that if the major issues of economic development in the Atlantic provinces are to be met, this cannot be done with a piecemeal handout approach such as has been adopted. We must think again about the establishment of a Crown agency within the Atlantic provinces which can function in an effective and decentralized way in dealing with the realities that exist in that area.

I believe that while the Atlantic Development Board was in many ways an imperfect structure, it was a much more important force, even if only potentially, than the Atlantic Development Council which seems to have little influence with the present ministry. Having benefited from the experience of the ADB, perhaps we should now engage in a program of establishing not just a Crown corporation mandated by the federal government but a new development agency mandated by the federal government and the four provincial governments within the Atlantic region. Surely on that basis, and with the widest path of public participation and the realization that specific goals and criteria have to be established, we just might be able to make some reasonable, measurable progress in this important area of regional economic development.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity of participating in this debate because I consider it very important.

I cannot say however that I consider the motion of the hon. member for York South very important, for it is but an exercise in propaganda to run down the programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It deals only with generalities and I see two things in particular that do not look too sincere to me. It seems to me that he does not necessarily wish to discuss regional development but rather national or general economic policy. He makes a point of saying that the department does nothing but offer generous grants to big foreign private companies.

I do not necessarily wish to question the good motives of the hon. member for York South, but I would ask him, whenever he wishes to criticize national policy, to do so from now on during an appropriate debate and to stop criticizing regional development, which is just beginning to prove itself in this country.

All those criticisms and that propaganda come from some members of the opposition—not all of them, for some are clever and practical—who know nothing about underdeveloped areas in this country, nothing about the problems that they have to cope with. In fact, they have never considered them, never defined them and have no idea how to solve them.

I say that what they are driving at with all that criticism is to make political hay for themselves, to try to prove that the government with its regional development program does not really want to help those areas but wants big foreign companies to get the benefits and refuses to take care of the national economy and to protect it from foreign control.

I believe that such arguments might have some value, but I wish they were put forward in a context other than the policies governing regional expansion, for they have no constructive impact and instead could prejudice our regional expansion. And I do not consider it appropriate for an hon. member to try to draw political advantage from such a situation.

Mr. Speaker, it is only normal that the policies of the government should be criticized in a system like ours. But that may spell danger. In fact, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been under attack for a year or two. There is a danger, while attacking certain programs, of jeopardizing the well-being of some underdeveloped areas. When commenting on poverty or on Indian affairs, I believe that hon. members should avoid criticism that can be morally or psychologically harmful to individuals or communities. They should avoid creating a climate detrimental to social or economic development in some areas. And even if the right to criticize is the basis of our democratic system, its exercise may sometimes become extremely dangerous.

What I have just outlined I have witnessed in my own area. For some months, the economic conditions have become very precarious in northeastern New Brunswick. Some people, mainly workers or animation groups as well as professionals or businessmen, got together and tried to dramatize this situation to draw the whole country's attention and use it as their battle horse at the national level.

Unfortunately, in my region as elsewhere, there are always people whose only purpose is politicking on this kind of problems. For instance, on January 16 a certain trade union motivated, of course, by good intentions arranged demonstratious and study meetings in Bathurst. They were well-intentionned but their action had political consequences. After these meetings, the member for York South, as leader of his party, came to visit the area. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) came also. They did not come because they were actually concerned with the welfare of this region but because this was a political opportunity to be exploited. They used this opportunity to tell the population that the government was not concerned about them or that the regional development policy was a flop.

My point is this: The political exploitation of this kind of question could emoralize the people of a region. This might well have happened in my area in north eastern New Brunswick because the people there are not forwarned against this kind of thing. In fact, some of them like it since they are aiming at dubious objectives, as the member for York South and the Leader of the Opposition are, who come readily to my region to speak of doom and gloom because they have points to prove: Namely that politically speaking the system does not meet the individual's needs. Those people use that tactic and repeat day after day that we are poor, that nothing can be done about it and that the situation is serious.

Mr. Speaker, it is good to see people remind us that this is serious. It is good to see people like the hon. member for York South tell us that this is serious. It is good to see the Leader of the Opposition tell us, your position is serious and the government is doing nothing about it. It is also good to see the hon. member for York South tell the people in my riding, get organized from a political standpoint, as if he were dealing with a bunch of animals, of uncivilized people that have never been organized politically. It is also good to see the opposition remind us that certain policies of the government could be better. Let them critize them. It is also good to see people in our riding remind us that certain deficiencies in the system do not work to the advantage of the population. But this is also dangerous. By spreading this continuously you create a psychological climate which does not promote development because in order to develop an area, as in the case of an individual, some psychological evolution is necessary at different stages. This evolution has to take place. People have to be constructive and be able, first, to define the problems and analyze them and, second, to examine the solutions. This, Mr. Speaker, cannot be done by crying, grumbling, or saying to one another, we are poor, incompetent and good for nothing.

[English]

I was interested in the speech made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). It showed how inept are the ideas of the New Democratic Party in the field of regional development and, possibly, of economics in general. The hon. member used statistics in a way which amounted to nothing but distortion. He compared weekly wages and output between 1960 and 1961 with those for 1970-71, barely a year after the department had been formed. For him, this was a wise way of trying to prove a point. He tried to argue that because the figures had not improved, the policy was not working.

Next, he compared figures relating to certain areas of the Atlantic region with the figures for Ontario. I think this is unfair. How can he justifiably compare statistics for Ontario with those for the Atlantic provinces when so little time has passed since the formation of the department? He told us he did not want to use the national average because it included elements from the Atlantic provinces. It was certainly not fair for him to try to make a point by comparing us with the fastest growing region of the country. I suggest the hon. member did not use the national figures because he knows very well that the gap has been reduced in the last six years or so.

Mr. Peters: Tell that to the people during the next election.

Mr. Breau: I can talk to the people of Bathurst, but the hon. member cannot because he does not know them. Before he or his hon. friend speaks to them he should learn a few facts about us.

Mr. Peters: Each of us has been there several times.

Mr. Breau: I do not want to talk at length about statistics. When one is talking about the maritime provinces it is not only statistics that count. Statistics are something upon which we can base our actions and they are very relevant to the cities where information concerning the number of jobs available, the amount of investment at any given time and the level of salaries paid is especially useful. But in the Maritimes we have to keep in mind the net social product, the quality of life. People in the Maritimes are not looking for the same salaries as those who live in Oshawa, in Sarnia or even in Calgary. The life in these areas is altogether different, but what we prize is quality of life.

The leader of the New Democratic Party talks about planning as if planning were the answer to everything. I can say, very humbly, that as a New Brunswicker I do not want any planning from Ottawa; I am sick and tired of it. There has been too much planning from Ottawa. The people who do the planning are utterly insensitive to local needs; they do not know what the people in the Maritimes want. In this they are just like the hon. member for York South. How can he say, on the basis of the statistics he used, that DREE is ineffective? He is looking for short-term political advantage in Toronto and other NDP constituencies. His party never elected a member from New Brunswick of Quebec or, indeed, from any of the maritime provinces so far as I can recall. And if they continue as they are doing, they never will. They do not know the area. They haven't a clue about what the people there want. If what the NDP has to offer is more planning, more theory and more philosophy, I hope they stay in Ontario and the west, because we don't want them.

Mr. McBride: We don't want them in Ontario either.

Mr. Breau: There is one aspect of the DREE program that Conservatives like the hon. member for Egmont (Mr.

MacDonald), the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell), the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) and the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) do not criticize. Here, for the first time, the federal government has said, "We want to equalize opportunity. Here are some funds. Go to the municipalities and decide how you want this money spent; what programs you want.

This program has just started. It may be politically expedient for some hon. members to try to judge the results of the program after only two or three years, but it is unfair to do so. Let me put a few facts on the record concerning members of the New Democratic Party. When we in the committee on regional development were discussing regional development legislation a few years ago you would never guess, Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) suggested. He has been fired from the committee since then and replaced by a more practical member from the west. The hon. member had the audacity to put to the House at report stage two ridiculous propositions. First of all, he proposed that foreign companies should not, as the minister said, receive grants. In this respect he has some kind of phobia. He thinks it is very bad to have foreign investors come to this country. He forgets we are a country that is capital deficient. I realize he did not really appreciate what he was suggesting, in his desire to fulfil his philosophical ambition, and because of his fear of foreign domination of our economy he gave a stupid and naïve interpretation of the regional development program.

As far as his second suggestion is concerned, I see a conflict between it and the proposals of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), a very practical and more pragmatic member who knows more about everyday life since he has had to work for a living. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby went on to suggest at the report stage that grants should be given to every service industry. Just imagine that, Mr. Speaker! If his proposal were put into effect, it would mean that every little truck delivering milk, ice-cream or packets of chips would qualify for an industrial incentive grant. The hon. member would assist the transportation companies and all the service industries, such as restaurants and motels.

He has some crazy ideas about economics and state intervention. He thinks that ideology can settle such problems. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby should not have suggested either in committee or in the House that grants should be given the service industries, and when he did the hon. member for Waterloo went red in the face; he could not believe his ears. This shows that we just cannot take the theories of the NDP, their economic planning or the philosophy of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), seriously. I suggest these hon. members visit the slow growth areas, find out a little more about what the people really want and consequently learn a little more about practical economics.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to talk about the overall situation; I would like to talk about my area, and especially the ARDA-FRED Agreement which is now being reviewed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the province of New Brunswick.

I see regional development efforts in three ways. Payments are made to individuals, and because some areas are more prosperous than others, some people will get lower incomes. Therefore, all the welfare programs of governments, be they unemployment insurance, manpower training, or straight welfare, are going to result in an injection of capital for the benefit of the people living in those areas because of their lower incomes. This is going to help the service industries.

Another form of regional development as I see it, is the equalization payment system, where money is given to provinces, but I see regional development as being effected through special agreements like those the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been entering into until now.

Mr. Speaker, the ARDA-FRED Agreement signed by the department in 1966 followed a provincial injection of capital due, for instance, to reform in New Brunswick. Nowadays, however, there seems to be a conflict in regional development concepts between the province of New Brunswick and the federal government. At present, I fear that revision of the agreement may be delayed because of conflict due to the present political climate in New Brunswick. In fact, we now have there a government elected by the south and southwest of the province, while the ARDA-FRED Agreement concerns the northeast area where that government does not arouse great political interest. I am afraid, above all, that equalization payments may not apply to that area.

I merely want to say that in revising the ARDA-FRED Agreement, the political context in New Brunswick should be taken into account because, at the present time, the equalization payments do no affect that area as they should.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member; his time has expired.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon when the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) spoke in this debate there was a lot of fury but very little of substance. When the minister chooses to take criticisms of his department as a personal affront I think it demonstrates his failure to understand some of the basic issues which are involved in the subject we are debating.

I note that the minister does not seem to hear very well, either. He said that all the opposition can do is criticize, that they cannot come up with any suggestions for improving his department's programs. I ask, where was the minister this morning? When my leader, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), was speaking in this debate he outlined a seven-point program which represented proposals made by this party for improving regional development programs. I saw the minister in the House at the time the hon. member for York South was speaking, but apparently he did not listen to the hon. member. The minister is perfectly free to disagree with any or all of the seven points offered by my leader, but simply to say that no suggestions have been made is the height of ludicrousness.

The minister also suggested that some of us seemed to be hung up on the point that grants are being made only to large and to foreign-owned companies, that that seemed to be our only concern and we are suggesting this is the only thing his department does. The minister cannot deny that in statement after statement, and in its own publications, his department has made it clear that the industrial incentives program is its number one program. He cannot deny that a significant percentage of grants given under this program is to large companies, for large amounts. That is a matter of record. Neither can he deny that a large percentage of the grants have gone to foreign-owned or foreign-controlled companies. Those are matters of fact, not matters for argument at all.

The minister then dealt with some of the examples given by the hon. member for York South in relation to the old question of transplanting unemployment. He dealt with a number of cases, such as the closing down of the pulp mill at Timiskaming and the grant for the ITT plant in another location in Quebec. He then suggested that we were saying that the Timiskaming plant was closed as a result of the grant which had been given to the other company. However the minister might wish to interpret the words of the hon. member for York South and others, he cannot escape the fact that a conflict is involved in the closing of one plant at one location and simply giving a grant to a company to open another plant at another location.

The minister also missed a very fundamental point made in one of the seven points put forward by the hon. member for York South, namely, that in dealing with the issues we must look at more than just the profit and loss position of a company. We must look at the question of community interest, a fundamental question of great importance.

The minister also suggested that one of the reasons the Timiskaming plant was closed was higher transportation cost. Why does the minister take note of that point? The fact is that if he and the government had taken steps to equalize transportation rates across Canada, they could do more to eliminate regional disparity than all the departmental programs initiated to date could do.

The minister then went on to deal with Duplate and Michelin and said that under the old legislation he had no discretion in their case. I acknowledge the minister's point in that regard, but at the same time he showed willingness and readiness to accept the phony arguments put forward by those companies for closing down their operations at other locations. Then later on he pointed out that Union Carbide had said they were going to leave the country.

It seems to me that no example could underline better the seriousness of the crisis facing Canada on this issue of foreign ownership. Where is the government's policy on foreign ownership? I can argue about some of the things said by the minister in relation to the program, but if he wants to eliminate some of the problems that he feels exist, why does his government not come forward with its policy on foreign ownership? Why does he not come forward with a meaningful policy which would result in a change of direction for Canada?

We could argue about some of the various firms and the particulars concerning them, but I think none of us has adequate information on the subject at this point. I think it is incumbent upon the government to table all the documents concerning these specific examples. I challenge the government to table the documents in respect of the grants made to these companies and the whole situation concerning the shutdown of these plants. These documents should be referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development. In this way we could perhaps answer some of the questions which many people are asking.

I also notice that the minister made no reference to the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board. He might recall that when the hon. member for York South spoke he referred to the problem involving the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board and the potential conflict of interest there. Why does the minister not take steps to correct this situation? When we make a suggestion that the minister should hew away such a conflict of interest we are attempting to help his programs, but he does not accept our help; he apparently thinks he knows it all. The fact is that at the present time there is a potential conflict of interest in respect of this board. I want to make clear that I am not necessarily casting any aspersion on the individuals involved; however, there is a potential conflict of interest which unless resolved and corrected is a situation with which no person can satisfactorily deal. We have Mr. J. B. Estey, executive vice-president of National Sea Products—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Weatherhead: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the hon. member would accept a question.

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a point of order. I should bring to the attention of hon. members that we could very well run into difficulty in respect of allocation of time. Perhaps we should have decided to have 15-minute instead of 20-minute speeches. There is a long list of speakers from different parts of the House. Hon. members might give thought to reducing the number of points of order and reducing the length of speeches so that more of their colleagues might have an opportunity to participate in the debate. The hon. member may, of course, accept the question, but that would be on his own time.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I wish to conclude my remarks. I shall be happy to answer a question at the end of my speech if there is time left, which I cannot guarantee at this moment.

We have these various officials. I mentioned one, Mr. J. B. Estey, executive vice-president of National Sea Products. This company received three grants totalling over $2.2 million for expansion of fish processing plants in St. John's Newfoundland, Halifax and Louisbourg, N.S. Then there is Mr. E. Kendall Cork, vice-president and treasurer of Noranda Mines. Noranda Mines received a grant of $3½ million. Then there was a grant of $1,155,500 to Gaspé Copper Mines, a fully-owned subsidiary of Noranda Mines. These are the things I think we must look into if there is to be any hope of success for the regional development programs.

I challenge the minister to deal with this situation and to do something about it. He said earlier that they had difficulty in finding people to act on the board. This is surely nonsense. It is certainly possible for the minister to find qualified people in business, in university circles and among other people in the community to act on this advisory board, who would not be involved in any potential conflict of interest. I think we must all ask where is there adequate information on some of the special programs this department is handling. We have very elaborate studies in respect of the proposed Gaspé plan, the northeastern New Brunswick plan, the Interlake plan and a number of other plans. However, there is only very brief mention of the other plans in the annual report of the department. Why can we not have some sort of report on these programs which involve expenditures of millions and millions of dollars?

I was surprised at the remarks of the hon. member of Gloucester (Mr. Breau). He came to the defence of the government and seemed to believe it is doing all right. I am sure the people of Bathurst would be very interested to hear this. I am surprised that any hon. member, even a government member, would not be calling on the government to improve these programs and pull up its socks. Certainly there is need for improvement in Bathurst, on the information available to us. If he is interested in the people who work in the plants in that part of the country receiving low wages, I am sure they would be very interested in hearing such a statement from the hon. member.

In 1968 we heard much about the just society, about doing something in respect of regional disparity and the problem of poverty. I think we must ask what progress is being made other than the fact that we are spending a good deal of money. The minister on more than one occasion made reference to specific projects. I think the minister can validly and understandably point to certain programs as having been useful and as having done some good. I have no argument with this, but when this is the type of defence he comes forward with, I think he misses the basic point about what has happened in the country.

Has there been any change in the picture in respect of regional disparity? I say there has been no improvement in this situation. I was very interested to note this afternoon that the minister chose to trot out some statistics which he used before the committee last spring. At that time he tried to show that we are making progress and that things are better. Today he did not attempt to do this. The fact is that some of the indicators he used at that time have taken a change of direction so that they could not be used for his purposes today.

I suggest there is an absence of effective planning in the department. The department has been used for crash programs and this has destroyed its basic purpose. The Newstart program was a very interesting social experiment. We expect a certain amount of difficulty in such a program, and I do not complain about that. In that sort of experiment you will not have a 100 per cent batting average. Although I do not complain about that, there was a body of knowledge, skills and expertise gathered together in the program which has been disbanded and we have not heard anything about what the government has in mind as a followthrough to that program.

Similarly we have the situation in respect of the multiplex program. Do we see any new results or any real initiative from the government in dealing with the problem in New Brunswick where this program was set up? We have an ad hoc approach. Then there is the question of the government's reliance on its industrial incentive grants. I suggest this reliance is based on the faulty premise that private enterprise can do the job of correcting regional disparities if given a little help. I suggest this is false because I believe private enterprise is responsible for some of the growth in some of the disparities we are trying to correct in Canada at the present time, which are admittedly difficult problems. There is a certain trend we should examine in respect of these grants; I think we should take note of them.

The fact is that there has been a steady growth in industrial incentive grants. I suggest that it will become a scandal in the future unless there is some change in the priorities and the emphasis of the government. Let us look at the picture. In the first quarter of 1970 there were 70 grants approved; in the second quarter, 77; in the third quarter, 78; and in the fourth quarter, 90. In the first quarter of 1971, there were 124; in the second quarter, 147; in the third quarter, 232; in the fourth quarter, 253. This shows a steadily rising trend. I suggest that if this trend continues, within three years the private enterprise of this country will take a rip off of $1 billion annually from the federal government.

The fact is that there are many other problems that could be pointed out with respect to industrial incentive grants—the unplanned growth, the very irrational designation of regions across Canada and the emphasis on pulp mills in some cases. In the case of the Saskatchewan pulp mill, it can be pointed out that the minister and the deputy minister said last spring before the committee that this pulp mill and the government would make sure that pollution control standards were met. Recently, the official of the Department of the Environment who is concerned with pollution control standards for pulp mills stated that the Athabasca pulp mill never had a chance; it simply could not hope to meet the pollution control standards that were being set up by his department.

That was surely known to the government last spring when they were engaging in the type of charade in which we were involved. A great many grants have been given to foreign-controlled firms and I think it is important that I deal with the question of the relationship between regional development and foreign ownership. I do this because of the Prime Minister's statements over the past several months in which he tried to indicate that one reason the government was being careful and was holding off on the foreign ownership policy was that it would hurt regional development programs.

I think we now have convincing evidence through the CALURA reports, the studies of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Gray report which came into public hands that in fact there is a higher percentage of foreign ownership in parts of the country such as Ontario which have enjoyed greater growth. This is no credit to the foreign-controlled firms but is due to the fact that they have concentrated their activities in that part of the country to the virtual exclusion of other parts of Canada. I suggest that much greater emphasis needs to be placed on infrastructure programs. The government will say that a good deal of money has been spent in this area. I suggest that money was spent quickly in the initial stages of the program but a good deal of it was on projects which were unplanned.

I suggest that with proper planning, infrastructure programs can influence the economics of an industry or of a region and the social conditions in those parts of the country. In particular I would like to make a case for the province of Saskatchewan, where recently we have experienced a disastrous turn in the economy. At various times in the past the Saskatchewan economy has been buoyant. The province has been leading in terms of economic activity. But this is not the case at present. In 1970 Saskatchewan stood seventh among the provinces in personal income per capita. It was well below the national average, approximately 20 per cent below the national average. There has been a population exodus from Saskatchewan.

At the same time, the government says that certain areas of Saskatchewan do qualify for assistance but we have seen very little assistance in that province. I also suggest that there is conflict between the minister's programs and the programs of departments such as the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport which have laid a great deal of emphasis on programs in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec to the virtual exclusion of programs in the Atlantic provinces and the four western provinces. I should like the minister to reconcile that program with the programs he is trying to carry on at present.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the suggestion has been made to the Chair that between now and the hour or so that is left, instead of having three 20-minute speeches, in order to give more opportunity to members we should have four 15-minute speeches, which would leave four or five minutes at the end of today's sitting for the independent member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle). I have in mind hearing the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras), the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and closing the debate by hearing the hon. member for Joliette. Of course, this is entirely in the hands of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Could we not make this an order?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Ever since I first read the motion of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) I have had an urge to take part in this debate, for many obvious reasons. Reading all of the 13 lines of the motion made me wonder how this could be tolerated in Canada where we ban hate literature. The leader of the NDP is not unlike the people with whom he keeps company, especially the company he kept at the Montreal Forum last Monday. I should like to mention a few names, such as those of his comrades Pepin, Laberge, and the clown of the court Chartrand who during this beautiful meeting did no less than incite the teachers and public servants of the province of Quebec to undermine the government and take as hostage the schoolchildren of the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Bourassa is undermining it well enough.

Mr. Dupras: In the few moments that I have at my disposal I would like to speak of the results of the program of regional economic expansion in the last five years. We have mentioned that it has created 50,000 jobs. Of course, to these 50,000 jobs we should add their generating value, which means another 150,000. I wonder if the people who fill these jobs are in agreement with the hon. member for York South regarding the value of the program. I wonder whether they share his view that this has been a disastrous experience.

Mr. Skoberg: You might be on the receiving end but on the losing end tomorrow.

• (1600)

Mr. Dupras: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to mention the 35 new industries that this program has brought to Labelle riding which I have the honour to represent. Let us ask the 1,500 workers or more employed in those factories if they agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) when he states that this has been a disastrous experience and that the government spends money needlessly.

A look at the figures concerning the increase in the Gross National Product is enough to show the effect of the program on the Canadian economy. In 1970, for example, there was a real increase—taking into account the devaluation of the dollar—of 5.4 per cent, that is the greatest annual gain in volume since 1966. Those are the results that were not mentioned, Mr. Speaker.

With regard to the province of Quebec, I would like to quote some figures which do not accord with the opinions expressed by the leader of the New Democratic Party when he states that the regional economic expansion program has been a useless experiment. In fact the percentage of the earned income per capita of the work force in the province of Quebec, which, from 1949 to 1951, was 83.5 per cent of the whole of Canada, increased by 6.4 per cent to reach 89.9 per cent in the years 1968, 1969 and 1970.

These few figures illustrate very well, I think, the value of the program as well as what the program has contributed to the underdeveloped areas in the province of Quebec.

For instance, in other areas of the country, in the years 1950, for instance, the per capita income in the Atlantic area increased from 68 to 72 per cent of the national average, that is an increase of 4 per cent in about ten years, while in Quebec, this income increased from 85 to 91 per cent.

Someone mentioned here today, Mr. Speaker, the importance of this program for the Atlantic Provinces. It was established in the 50's that no less than 10,000 individuals left the Maritime provinces each year. This trend increased as in the early 60's the number of people leaving the Maritimes each year reached 20,000. This exodus has been considerably slowed down since the implementation of the plan for assistance to underdeveloped regions in Canada.

The government plan for elimination of economic disparities is a result of the will to govern, to eliminate regional disparities and thus achieve national unity.

Of course, this problem of regional disparities is not exclusively a Canadian problem. It exists, as the hon. member for York-South stated, in many industrialized countries. Even our Southern neighbours are having trouble with some of their regions. Yet, we should still not underestimate the endeavours and say in advance that they are total failures just because the anticipated results were not achieved overnight.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) mentioned also the advantage that the designation of special areas represents for some parts of the country. We can see those results in certain parts of the Maritimes and in the part of the province where I live, particularly in the neighbourhood of the proposed airport of Sainte-Scholastique. No doubt the same will happen around the future Toronto airport, at Pickering, where an important infrastructure development will be needed in a relatively short period of time, something which the municipalities concerned did not take into account in their budget.

There is, for instance, Saint-Jèrôme, in my constituency, where they had to treble the capacity of a treatment plant in order to supply the Sainte-Scholastique airport with drinking-water. This expansion represents an investment of $1.5 million dollars, Mr. Speaker, and were it not for the federal government's assistance through the special area program, the town would have been unable to achieve such an important project for the administration of the town of Saint-Jérome and of the airport.

The same thing applies to the building of highways that have been made necessary by the establishment of the new airport. I refer to the building of a utility network to supply drinking water to the airport and to the communities that will develop around it.

The same situation occurred in the Trois-Rivières area, where following the establishment of a national park the government agreed to pay for part of the cost of the access road to that park. Of course, if the federal government is to agree to spend large amounts of money for the development of a tourist attraction for Canadians, it is certainly responsible for the increase in cost to the provincial department of highways which must ensure access to those sites built by the Canadian government.

The effects of the special zones program were felt by making those improvements possible, without however burdening the budgets of the surrounding municipalities and of the province involved.

[Mr. Dupras.]

In the municipality of Saint-Jérôme, which interests me particularly, we have experienced difficulties in 1966-67 in connection with the retraining of workers of a main plant in the city, namely Uniroyal Limited. That plant, which had established a reputation in the manufacturing of canvas shoes for many years, has been compelled for economic reasons to discontinue that production and to switch to a completely different field of operations. Since 1967, that retraining has resulted in a decrease in personnel of the order of 1,500 to 450 persons; the industry has always prospered from 1950 to 1960. But the establishment of a great number of new small industries at Saint-Jérôme has resulted in increasing those job opportunities eliminated by Uniroyal Limited. Those industries have allowed the workers of Saint-Jérôme to retrain without suffering economic hardships which could have proved fatal to the municipality of Saint-Jérôme which, after all, does not have many important industries.

There is a proof that the program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion managed to save from stagnation many Canadian municipalities.

I felt that, as a member from the province of Quebec, which admittedly benefits most from that program and where unemployment is highest, it was my duty to explain the situation and give details on the benefits the act has brought to certain areas of my county.

[English]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the motion introduced today by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) indicating the failure of the government to make any progress in eliminating regional disparities. I do not get too much opportunity to speak in this House, Mr. Speaker, probably because I do not force myself forward, but when I entered the chamber about an hour and a half ago and saw the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) speaking, I thought that you, Sir, had possibly changed the order of business and that we were discussing the Explosives Act.

I can verify the transplanting of unemployment by assisting plants in one location while similar plants are being closed in other locations. I can do this by referring to the main industry in my district, in the city of Corner Brook, the Bowater pulp and paper mill which is the main base of the economy of the city, and where 350 employees were laid off because of weakness in world paper markets. Yet at the same time announcement after announcement was being made by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion about massive regional development incentive grants going to other parts of the country to start up new paper mills. This was an example of unemployment hitting not only the 350 people employed in the mill but also affecting another 700 or 800 woods workers scattered across the province of Newfoundland, with the result that the economy of a good portion of the province was crippled, not to mention the indirect effect on industry and business dependent upon the pulp and paper mill.

But in spite of all my pleas in the House of Commons to the ministers responsible, particularly the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the matter was treated with complacency and almost disregard. This has resulted in the displacement of good, honest, experienced papermakers because they have had suddenly to change their way of life and uproot their families or resort to temporary unemployment insurance benefits.

Since last September the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and I have been at odds about the situation in the pulp and paper industry. Instead of action we have seen further close-downs of mills across the country. In spite of what the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion issues in his releases dealing with job creation, there is no evidence that this is helping in my district. Let me quote some figures from the manpower review listing clients registered at the Canada Manpower centres in the Atlantic region. The Atlantic region has 29 Manpower offices. At the Corner Brook office alone, serving a city of some 28,000 people, there were 5,500 clients registered. This figure is more startling because there are another 2,700 registered at the Stephenville office just 50 miles away, a community of some 8,000 or 10,000.

Compare this with the city of Halifax, where some 7,700 are registered. Corner Brook itself then falls second highest in the whole of the Atlantic region in the number of those registered. I mention these figures to try to point out the lack of planning or the realization of the seriousness of a one-industry town and the serious effect that a close-down in its main industry can have on its economy and the social problems that arise. Yet after almost eight months the ministers are still having discussions with the pulp and paper industry. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce what he was doing about these discussions, but just then he was going to a meeting so I did not receive an answer.

What about the close-downs of other mills in Quebec and New Brunswick, Mr. Speaker, and all across the country? The only action we hear about is that large development incentive grants are going to start other pulp and paper mills to create employment opportunities in other parts of Canada. It is a good description in this motion when it refers to the senseless practice of transplanting unemployment by assisting plants in one location while similar plants are being closed in another.

The government are not only transplanting jobs in Canada, to no avail, but what else are they doing? In spite of the loss of world markets, which is a great part of the problem because new mills are springing up all over the world, this government is giving guaranteed loans to undeveloped countries in order to help them build paper mills and manufacture other products. This further weakens our marketing position and emphasizes the lack of co-ordination between various departments of the government. It is the old cliché that one hand does not know what the other is doing. Here we are faced with the deterioration of probably the largest industry in Canada, yet the government failed to prevent the crisis and only agreed to meet with the association when it was too late.

This government is famous for starting new agencies and pouring millions of dollars into wasteful endeavours. There is no better example than Information Canada. Here we see triplication of effort, not just duplication. All they do is answer phone calls with questions and get the information from the information service of a particular department to pass on to the caller. Some of the work is the responsibility of Members of Parliament who are more capable of doing it. One day I received a call from Information Canada asking a question on veterans affairs. Apparently the person who called did not know that all they had to do was call the information service of the Department of Veterans Affairs to get the answer.

Another part of the motion before us today condemns the government for its failure to make progress in eliminating regional disparities. One of the failures in this regard is lack of co-ordination with associated departments and failure to look with seriousness at the need for the development of the natural resources of the particular region. The province of Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, has four main basic resources—fish, timber, agriculture and beauty—besides what we hope are good mineral deposits. This is where the emphasis should be placed.

True, there has been some concentration in this area in Newfoundland. One example is a linerboard mill which we hope will be successful with the assured markets. Whether the plan to transport the raw materials from Labrador will be a success depends on the provision of harbour facilities at Port Harmon in Stephenville, but little or no effort is being directed to providing the infrastructure funds necessary to support the industry. I hope there will be more liaison with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) toward reaching this objective and I should like to receive some answers on this problem as soon as possible. What evidence is there of liaison with the Department of Manpower and Immigration in order to establish a program to train local people for the jobs that will be available in this mill, and to ensure that there will not be more transplanting of personnel from other parts of the country?

Another example of the weakness in liaison is the development of an industry to produce electronic tubes in this community. When the grant was announced by the minister I asked for assurance that there would be a program to train people in this industry, but apart from sending half a dozen people to the parent plant of this firm and the promise of 80 jobs by last September there is still no evidence of success. After a grant to the firm of almost $400,000, this indicates lack of concern for monitoring progress in order to ensure that these firms fulfil their obligation. I hope and pray that these industries will be a success. Instead of the reams of paper coming across our desks announcing the grants, it would be interesting to get an up to date report on the progress being made by some of the firms who received large grants.

Another weakness in the programs of the department, Mr. Speaker, is the lack of co-ordination between departments of government. The need for supporting programs when people are moved to growth centres where industry is created has not been realized. In my province they are intent on resettling citizens to growth centres but without any consideration for what happens to these people after they move. This has caused great grief and difficulty for municipal governments and other responsible authorities who have to provide the necessary housing, educational facilities and public services to the people being resettled. It is only compounding the problem rather than solving it.

We hear figures of hundreds of millions of dollars bandied about and directed toward housing, but hundreds and thousands of families are still without decent accommodation in all parts of Canada. With all the experts flying around the various provinces on missions to coordinate and advise on these matters, and the formation of liaison committees, surely we should see some results by this time. Indeed, there have to be some results, Mr. Speaker. If you keep pouring enough money into something you are going to get some results, even by accident. But is it not time we started to take some advice from the people affected by the programs? Is it not long past time we proved our pledge to allow Canadians to participate with government in their own development?

The Local Initiatives Program proved in a great number of cases that people in all parts of Canada have the initiative to help themselves because they have experienced their needs every day for the past hundred years. With all our programs, are we getting the results we are looking for? When are we going to take the lead in providing initiative grants to Canadians without first looking at their bank account? If the government can provide funds for local initiatives programs to provide band-aid relief to unemployment, why can we not find a way to provide the small businessman or the prospective small businessman with some starting capital in order to apply his knowledge and initiative for the good of his region and the country?

We have many loan programs, Mr. Speaker. We have the fisheries improvement loans, the farm improvement loans, the small business loans and the Industrial Development Bank. But what have been the results in my province? In the latest report on small business loans, the figures for the quarter of October to December, 1971, show two loans to Newfoundland in the amount of $50,000. The report of the fisheries improvement loans for the same quarter, shows one loan to Newfoundland in the amount of $11,700. We did pretty well in this quarter under the farm improvement loans. Somebody must have made a mistake, because our usual quota is one per quarter but we got three loans under this program to three lucky farmers for the grand amount of $15,500! They would have been better off if they had submitted a project under the Local Initiatives Program.

Just try and get a loan in Newfoundland under these programs, Mr. Speaker. What happens when you go to the bank? If someone happens to have the security, a fisherman for example, he is steered away from the government guaranteed loan of 6¾ per cent and given a conventional loan of almost 12 per cent. I have letters to prove that. If he does not have the security, he has not a hope in hades of getting any consideration. The government always tells a tale of woe when you complain and says that the loans are considered in the conventional manner by the particular bank on the merit of the individual. Then why do we have these programs? If you go to the Industrial Development Bank in order to get a loan, you have to sign over your assets, even your wife and children. My colleagues from Newfoundland have raised this question time and time again, but to no avail. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) shrugs his shoulders or writes to the member that there is nothing he can do about it.

I submit that these programs should be investigated. The $75,000 a year president of the Bank of Canada should be directed to remind the chartered banks that it is their duty not only to make vast amounts in interest but also that they have a responsibility to Canadians and to the development of Canada. I understand that in agreement with the province of Newfoundland an industrial development corporation is being established with a fund of $600,000. This corporation will provide more assistance to Newfoundlanders and advise them in starting small industry. I certainly hope that there will be some common sense direction. I am sure there will, because the Premier and his Progressive Conservative government will ensure this when he wins a clear majority on March 24.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

• (1620)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with a few matters in connection with the very great subject of regional economic expansion because the Atlantic provinces, the area I represent in the House of Commons and the people of the area have an important stake in the efforts of the government to increase incomes and employment in the disadvantaged parts of Canada. If time permits, I would like to make some comments about three aspects of the program: first, the industrial incentives; second, the program of infrastructure and, finally, a part of the program of the department that has not been mentioned so far, namely, the work of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

Before entering these particular aspects of the work of the department I would like to refer to the suggestion that has been made that in some way there may be a conflict of interest in the operation of the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board. The Industrial Incentives Advisory Board is chaired by the deputy minister and is composed of civil servants as well as outside representatives of business and trade unions. There is no possibility of any conflict of interest arising in the operation of the board, because it is purely advisory in capacity; it makes no decisions. When matters affect any individual on the board or organization, the interest is made known and that is taken into account in the subsequent discussion and decision. I hope hon. members will relieve their minds by the knowledge that there is no possibility of conflict of interest. We ought to be careful in making such allegations so that we will not lose the services of persons who are making a real contribution to the industrial expansion of the disadvantaged areas in Canada.

With respect to the operation of the industrial grants program, it has been suggested in the debate that this is the major emphasis in the department. That, of course, is not the case. The total budget of the department is spent in a balanced assessment of the needs of industrial development, industrial grants, infrastructure, rural development and social adjustment. In fact, the total budget is split three ways among these three areas of departmental activities.

A good deal has been said about industrial grants. They have been knocked by the New Democratic Party as an evil of some kind. They have been linked to foreign corporations and giveaways. Certainly in my part of Canada the program of industrial grants is regarded as an essential part of a program of industrial development. Any effort to decrease or remove these grants would be greatly resisted by the business community and the population generally of Nova Scotia and the Atlantic provinces. In the real world where I live in Nova Scotia I can point briefly to a number of major plants that are contributing to the development of the province and enhancing employment opportunities, which have been assisted in locating in that province through the program of industrial development grants.

The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) is in his seat today. He knows that the foreign corporation Michelin was assisted to locate in Nova Scotia in part through the provision of industrial grants. It is a foreign corporation. No one in Nova Scotia would suggest that grants should be denied to this corporation locating in Bridgewater and Granton. It will ultimately provide employment for 1,800 people. An industrial grant has been given in my constituency, in the Strait of Canso, to Nova Scotia Forest Products Limited which is a European-owned and controlled company. Through a recent expansion it will provide increased employment in the plant of 250 people and in the forest and related industries of 1,000 people. Gulf Oil, which is located in the Strait of Canso, has established a refinery. It has been assisted by a handsome industrial grant of millions of dollars under this program. Through the co-operation of Devco it has established a large industrial development there.

Mr. Skoberg: At the expense of Moose Jaw.

Mr. MacEachen: the modernization of the Sydney steel plant, a cornerstone in the province of Nova Scotia, is vital. The industrial life of Cape Breton would be inconceivable without the continued operation of that plant. The modernization now planned will cost $95 million, and $15 million will come from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the form of an industrial incentive grant. That is what is being knocked by the motion before the House.

I can indicate from these major examples that these grants are important to the province of Nova Scotia and its future development. We do not take kindly suggestions that they are somehow a fraud on the body politic and that because capital is coming from non-Canadian sources grants should be withheld. Under this program grants have been made in Nova Scotia in the amount of almost $27 million. This involves a total investment of approximately $130 million. I want to put on record that in the allocation of industrial grants, Nova Scotia has the highest per capita figure of any province in Canada, including Quebec. I hope that will set to rest the allegation that is too often made, that the minister is somehow favouring his native province in the allocation of industrial grants and other parts of the program. If figures mean anything, and they mean a great deal, the fact is that my province has been treated better than any other province in Canada, certainly better than the province of Quebec. We want the program to continue.

In the field of infrastructure, a very important part of the department's work, we are giving support to special areas or growth centers in the province of Nova Scotia, one in Halifax-Dartmouth and the other in the Strait of Canso area. Under this program about $74 million has come in two years to the province of Nova Scotia to provide the necessary infrastructure related to industrial development. The key strategic concept in the industrial development of the Atlantic provinces is to build up certain growth areas which have the greatest opportunity for development and to ensure this development by provision of infrastructure including water, sewers, schools, highways, and so on. Up to the present time in Nova Scotia we have given $74 million for this purpose.

In Halifax-Dartmouth seven schools have already been built under this program. Water supplies have been guaranteed to the city of Halifax. The construction is in progress of transportation facilities leading into and out of Halifax to relieve traffic congestion. All are necessary to build Halifax as a major industrial centre providing the amenities of modern life and serving as a centre of employment for people from the hinterland of the province. This is a good, sound proposition. Nobody involved in the administration, the town planners or the mayors, is knocking this program. The theorists are knocking it, but the people at ground level who are building sewers and schools are saying, "more, please." The people outside the boundaries of the special areas are asking, "Why can't we get in?"

In my own constituency of Cape Breton Highlands-Canso there is a special area at the Strait of Canso. Infrastructure money is available to build the necessary industrial parks, to provide water and sewers in a community such as Mulgrave, to build roads from the main highways into the parks to make the area an attractive one for future industrial development. The schools in this area are overcrowded. The municipality cannot provide the schools needed. The province is strapped. So the federal government will be asked through DREE to make available the necessary additional school facilities so as to make possible the human services which must accompany industrial development. At the moment there is under way a special feasibility study which envisages a big new school in that area.

I regret that so little stress has been placed in this debate upon what is being accomplished, upon what is going ahead and supported, certainly in my part of the country, as an essential part of economic development, though undoubtedly there are criticisms to be made and improvements to be introduced. Let me refer again, particularly, to the infrastructure development which is related to the whole of the Halifax-Dartmouth area and through to Canso. The rest of Nova Scotia is wondering why it is not eligible for this special grant. It is not always easy to understand that what is being done is part of an over-all concept of regional economic development.

We want to see these two areas developing because of their greater potential and because, hopefully, there will spring up large centres of population which will allow young people from other parts of Nova Scotia to find jobs in the province rather than going off to Toronto or to the west to find employment. We prefer to see more of our young people stay and contribute in their own province of Nova Scotia.

The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) is in his place and is aware of the program we are operating particularly in Cape Breton through the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Hon. members opposite can knock regional development if they want to, but there is no one who would knock the concept of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and what it is attempting to do to stabilize the economy of Cape Breton Island. Were it not for Devco, as it is called, financed from funds of the department—and financed handsomely this year—the future outlook for industry in the hon. member's constituency would be bleak indeed. However, with the funds made available through the corporate structure the future is not entirely without hope.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the minister telling us how beautiful things were in Nova Scotia, how everything was functioning in a well organized way and how all this was possible because of the financing available through the department whose affairs have been the subject of so much comment during this debate.

It is interesting to note that the province from which I come, British Columbia, also received some grants under the DREE incentives program. I believe that of the total amount of money allocated under that program over the last two years, one half of one per cent was available to industry in one part, and one part only, of the province of British Columbia. We are glad to know that we are able to contribute something, probably, to the re-election of the minister in a riding which embraces one of the special areas to which everyone is so generous. That is, if he does not get to the Senate before then.

Mr. MacEachen: No chance.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Because of the limitation on the time available to us I shall refrain from making extended comments about what the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) had to say. I will only mention that after watching his performance this afternoon, the arm-waving, the histrionics, the sound and the fury of his presentation, I am convinced he is a great believer in the concept that when you have a poor case you should cover it up with a lot of noise. This is precisely what the minister did.

It has been argued that DREE has no strategy, no concept. I think it has. The basic concept is that of providing a great big barrelful of money. All anyone in industry has to do in order to get his hands into the barrel and get some of it is make an application. Just help yourselves! Government, supposedly there for the purpose of serving the interests of Canada, has set this up as an agency to respond to the requests of industry. Surely it should be the other way around. Surely industry should be required to respond to the requirements of government, because government is supposed to represent people.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

I think this was well illustrated by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion himself when he talked about Union Carbide moving out of the country, out of Welland, if the department did not step in and do something. Mr. Speaker, who is running this country, Union Carbide or the government of Canada? Who was elected to run the show, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cohorts in the cabinet or Union Carbide? I have the impression that Union Carbide is calling the shots and that the government is knuckling under and responding. This is what is wrong with the whole attitude of the government as reflected particularly in the actions of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Some years ago we believed in the concept that the purpose of government was to serve the people; that we would combine together to elect a government to do things for us collectively that we were not able to do individually. That is the way it was supposed to work. The political party heading the government of Canada today has for a number of years told us that that concept is wrong. What this government says is that the purpose of government is to create an atmosphere within which the capitalist system feels comfortable and then the benefits will come in a second-hand way back to the people.

Is the purpose of business to create employment? Certainly not. Business has no interest in creating employment, in providing jobs. The objective of business is a very simple one. As any businessman knows, it is to make a profit, to exploit resources, to exploit an area, to exploit the people in that area and the workers working within that particular industry. And all for the purpose of making a profit. The government has told us that that is a valuable thing today.

That is the strategy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, simply to let itself bend to the whim and will of industry itself, to respond to requests when applications are made for some of the $900 million that has been available over the past three years with a firm "Yes". It is a strategy that is not economically sound as much as it is politically advantageous. In operating this way, even though he says otherwise, the minister is looking at the political advantages to a large extent. These are not my words but the words of a member who used to be in the cabinet and left, who divorced himself from the cabinet. He sat in the same councils as the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion but could not stomach the short-range, sellout approach of this government.

I have an article from which I should like to quote briefly. It appeared in MacLeans magazine for July of last year and is headed "Baby, it was cold inside". It is the story of how Eric Kierans was frozen out by the Prime Minister.

Mr. McBride: Who is the author?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Walter Stewart.

Mr. McBride: Ha!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): My hon. friend may laugh, but let me tell him he will laugh on the other side of his face when he realizes that the minister offered $200,000 to drive an industry out of his own constituency. And what did he do about that?

Mr. McBride: That is not true. Even your own leader accepted that was not true. He tried to get away with the untruth but when I pointed it out to him he admitted I was right.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, would you protect me from this self-appointed purist over there? I should like to refer to this article. I assume certain passages are put in quotation marks because the author knew he was quoting the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans). This is what the article says in part:

—the decision-making process, as Kierans saw it, was not a controlled, efficient progression, but "ad hoc, scrambling and almost always tuned to 'How will this look in June, 1972?' "

That is the date that people looked to, even some years ago, as the date of the next election. I continue:

"We would get pushed into a project because it would provide some jobs in time for '72 and that would make one riding safe, whether the project made sense or not, whether it was for the long-run benefit of the country or not; it all came down to one thing, creating lots of activity for '72." Aid to American companies to build pulp mills in northern Manitoba and northern Saskatchewan while Canadian companies in Quebec were laying off workers could only be explained, Kierans felt, by the hope of buying votes with jobs.

Those are not my words. I did not sit in on cabinet meetings. I do not know what the internal discussions were but I am sure that the hon. member for Duvernay did. He was there and took part. He saw what was happening, but unlike the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion he at least had the guts to stand up and be counted and leave, because he knew that that situation was wrong. I wish the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion had as much courage. Certainly he should know better, unless his intention is to stay there and play politics right to the limit.

I should like to refer to what the minister said in the House a few days ago. He was asked about this dual role of his—on the one hand having hundreds of millions of taxpayers' dollars to give away to industry and on the other being the key campaign figure for the Liberal party, the chief fund raiser, in the province of Quebec. He was asked about this conflict of interest and I should like to quote from Hansard what the minister said when he replied in this House. As reported at page 458, he said:

Mr. Speaker, I state solemnly in this House, that I have never collected a cent for the Liberal party; as leader for Quebec, and responsible for Quebec,—

I take the minister's word for that. If he says that he did not collect a cent for the Liberal party, fine. He went on:

—I merely sent a letter of invitation to a fund-raising cocktail.

He continued:

All I did was send a letter and no one—this I state solemnly—knows the names of the companies that ask for subsidies from the department—

That is an outright falsehood. The minister issues press releases under his own name. A monthly summary is issued by the minister giving the names and addresses of the companies that asked for and received offers of grants from the department. So he knows who they are and so does everybody else. The minister continued:

—never are those companies approached for funds, unless it is later on, and then I know not by whom.

I suggest the minister does know by whom. He is in charge of his department. Over the last three years his department has had $900 million of taxpayers' money available to give away to impoverished outfits like IBM. He then sends a letter inviting them to a cocktail, fund-raising party and signs his name to the invitation. Who else in the Liberal party would approach these companies and say, "Look here, IBM, you had $6 million; Union Carbide, you had $1.3 million; Falconbridge, you had $4 million; Noranda, we gave you $4.5 million. How about giving some back to our campaign fund?" Is anybody telling me that the Liberal party does not do that? Does the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion expect us to believe that this does not happen? Of course it does.

The minister is a member of the political party that runs the government of this nation. The minister is able to make gifts amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars to certain companies. Then he puts on his other coat and becomes the Liberal party fund raiser, or somebody in the Liberal party goes to the back door, knocks and says to these companies; "Remember how kind the government was to you? Won't you be kind to us now?" That is how the taxpayers' dollars are siphoned off. This money is given to these companies so that they can give some money back to the Liberal party in order that they can run an election campaign. The government is buying us out with our own dough.

No wonder the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not want to see any disclosure of the source of campaign funds. No wonder he wants to protect his friends. No wonder he does not want to tell us who these 95 companies are the Liberal party has been living off over the years. No wonder he does not want to tell us that when he attended a fund-raising dinner in Toronto, IBM was represented, as was Union Carbide, Falconbridge, Noranda Mines and Gaspé Copper. Was that accidental, or were they wanting to pay their friends back again so that this same crowd of sellout artists could get back in and continue to sell us out?

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion used to be a member of the trade union movement before he was vacuumed into the Liberal party. If this is the way he operated then, thank heaven I was not a member of a trade union when he was negotiating for us or we would have been faced with sellout programs every week.

Speaking of foreign ownership, he is not satisfied to have in this country a situation where in 1969, 94 per cent of the money United States corporations used to buy out Canadian industry came from Canadian sources, from borrowings in Canada, from profits in Canada and from tax loopholes under Canadian law. He is not satisfied to have that. The minister has now taken another $42 million, or something in that order, of the taxpayers' money to give to various United States corporations to buy us out further with our own money. That is the sort of sellout artists they are, and it is very regrettable that representatives of that party stand up in the House and try to justify this sort of activity.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle).

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly anxious to participate in this debate because I represent a riding that has benefitted, for over a year now, from the advantages which derived from the programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

The privilege the minister granted my riding has been quite useful; I know a certain number of industries were able to settle there, and that some others derived some benefits.

As opposed to the mover of the motion, of course, I believe far more than he does in the validity of that policy. I feel there is far too much generalizing with regard to some of the weaknesses that may exist in so broad an Act as that on the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I feel that we would stand to gain if, objectively, we brought out the positive results of that act, if we really want to dispel some of the doubts and misgivings of the people.

I would like especially to point out to the government and to the minister the importance of this legislation for my area. I think that my first responsibility is to request that the government give a very special attention to the 30th of June when designated areas will be reviewed and I make this request on behalf of the businessmen in my riding and the municipalities which are exceedingly fascinated by this policy and which could obtain far more benefits than hitherto.

I believe it is my duty to request the special attention of the minister to my region, not only to maintain the designation that it has already acquired, but to ask him to consider the economic pattern that is ours and the difficulties we encounter in terms of unemployment.

My riding borders on an area which is going through quite an amazing development, the area of the airport at Sainte-Scholastique which enjoys a more advantageous designation. There are also surrounding ridings which are accorded more substantial grants than mine.

Therefore I take the liberty, on behalf of all the people concerned in my riding—who are entitled, I think, to the same benefits—of asking the minister to weigh the difficulties against the advantages that a more attractive designation would bring about. As regards the particular review of my riding, I believe, thanks to the minister's objectivity and his efforts to secure not only investments, but also to make economic injections in various areas, that my riding could enjoy, through a more advantageous designation, the same benefits as accrued to some ridings adjoining mine as well as the area which will benefit from the airport at Sainte-Scholastique.

I am confident that my recommendation today in this debate that bears particularly on the department of Regional Economic Expansion will be well understood by the minister. I know that he knows well the area that I represent and I must say after all that for the past year and a half, contrary to the views expressed in this House today, all those men and women who have requested services of the department of Regional Economic Expansion have met with excellent co-operation from that department on various kinds of problems.

With respect to this legislation, although it contains some shortcomings or poses some problems, I must admit that on the whole, we must support it as serious members of Parliament if we want to serve the people because this legislation represents very considerable efforts on the government's part.

Again, we should maybe be thinking of working in a more positive or a more effective way with regard to the industry which has had to disappear and I did not think it fair to blame the minister for the difficulties we are facing. We have a duty, as responsible members of the House and as men anxious to serve their country, to acknowledge his efforts.

The co-operation of opposition members is also necessary. We have a responsibility to forget about our electoral interests, which in a while may be very useful, to try and think rather of the interests of a society which demands and requires co-operation of its representatives. The government, which after all is aware of this situation, is prepared to study concrete proposals to realize its objectives in the best interests of the Canadian people. But for that we need to be more positive than we have been so far, and not limit ourselves to making the kind of negative criticism of which we hear far too much in this House.

Mr. Speaker, my time has expired, and I like to think that my remarks will have served the best interests of the area which I have the honour of representing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Honey): It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), debate on the motion is over.

The House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 13, 1972

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROCK—REQUEST TO BE SEATED AS MEMBER OF OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. Since the age of 13, with my heart and soul I have believed in and supported the Liberal party and its leaders. This innermost feeling has now petered out. With no regrets I have come to the conclusion that I cannot continue my support of this government and ask that I be seated across the floor with the official opposition as a Progressive Conservative member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: This is the beginning of the landslide.

An hon. Member: Watch them come now.

Mr. Paproski: The Polish members have to stick together.

An hon. Member: Send over the other 19.

Mr. Hees: This is going to be like those one-a day vitamins.

Mr. Cullen: Lots of luck, fellows.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

On the order: Questions on order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Questions on the order paper. Order, please. The Chair has called questions on the order paper. Shall the questions stand?

Mr. Trudeau: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, in all the ruckus I did not hear you call motions—

An hon. Member: Are you coming over?

Mr. Hees: Here comes No. 2.

Mr. Trudeau: —and I would like to table—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a suggestion by the right hon. Prime Minister that although we have gone beyond the order of motions he be allowed to table a document. Is this agreed?

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the difficulties the right hon. gentleman is having, Mr. Speaker, I think we should co-operate with him.

Mr. Trudeau: I am happy to hear that because I have another statement to make on motions and therefore I am sure I will have agreement.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—TABLING OF LETTERS TO PROVINCIAL PREMIERS FROM PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I should like to table, in both official languages, copies of letters which I sent to the provincial premiers concerning federal proposals on payment of family allowances.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I understand the Prime Minister also has a statement to make on motions.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON SECURITY OF MAIL AND TELEPHONES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member for Yukon asked whether the government is "aware of any practice or policy in government departments whereby personal and private mail directed to members of parliament from government employees, using the internal mailing facilities of the department, is intercepted and examined by departmental or any other security personnel." The hon. member asked whether in the case of unsigned correspondence there is any procedure "subjecting the envelopes and contents to fingerprint and other identification tests."

I want to tell hon. members categorically that there is no such government policy. Inquiries have been made of the RCMP on my behalf and I have been given positive assurance that nothing of the kind is done by the RCMP or on its behalf either in security work or in connection with criminal investigation. I am not aware of any such practice in any government department or agency and certainly there is no policy or direction in that regard. I should be astonished to learn that anything of the kind is going on anywhere. Frankly, I do not believe it is. If the hon. member has any evidence that it is in fact occurring, I think he has a clear responsibility, especially since he has raised this matter and given rise to widespread speculation. It is his responsibility to give such evidence to me or to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Forrestall: What can you provide?

Mr. Trudeau: What are you babbling about?

Mr. Forrestall: I am not babbling. You are waffling.

Mr. Trudeau: If he can provide such evidence, I can assure him and this House that an immediate and thorough investigation will be made.

The hon. member for Mackenzie also raised a question on Friday with regard to the telephones of Members of Parliament. It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the telephone services of members of parliament come within your own jurisdiction. So far as the government is concerned may I say, as categorically as in the case of the question relating to private mail, that there is no policy or practice by the government or by the RCMP to interfere in any way whatsoever with the telephones of members of parliament. If any hon. member has any evidence that such a thing is occurring, I would again think it is his responsibility to provide such evidence—in this case, I assume, to you, Mr. Speaker. The government would be glad to make any investigation that such evidence would suggest to be necessary or desirable.

Finally, the hon. member for the Yukon asked about long distance calls of members of parliament to and from constituents. The flat denials I have just made as to policy or practice by the government or by the RCMP in relation to members' telephones apply equally to long distance calls. There is no recording of any kind of which I am aware and certainly there is no policy of the kind the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the reference that I made to the Acting Prime Minister while the Prime Minister was away last Friday was not merely to telephone calls to and from members' offices involving constituents but long-distance telephone calls generally. With respect to the practice I alluded to last Friday the Prime Minister has said that the RCMP have assured him that no such practice or policy exists. But he says nothing about the security policy that exists within departments and which I believe to be part of the new security arrangements of the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) that were implemented a short while ago.

It is all very well for the Prime Minister to stand in his place and say to an hon. member who raises such a question that it is the member's clear responsibility to advance evidence, either to himself or to other members of the government, for the purpose of investigation or remedial action. But, Sir, what would happen if that were done?

Mr. Hogarth: Better fish or cut bait.

Mr. Nielsen: I did not hear the interjection by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Hogarth: Fish or cut bait.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Nielsen: It is all very well for members opposite and for the Prime Minister to say that it is the clear responsibility of a member to adduce evidence. However, were that to be done—

Mr. Stafford: Four years ago you said that a hundred times.

Mr. Nielsen: —were that to be done the source of information, if it were a government source, would be fired, and fired immediately, and the Prime Minister knows that. He would dearly love to know the source of the leakage of the Gray report and the source of the leakage of documents concerning the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but if that source were to be disclosed it would mean the immediate dismissal of that civil servant.

I do not accept the Prime Minister's assurance that these practices are not being followed because my source is much too highly placed to be wrong.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Introduction of bills.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond motions. The House gave unanimous consent to reverting to motions to permit the right hon. Prime Minister to table documents and also to make a statement. My understanding was that we were then to go on to other items of business. But again with unanimous consent, if hon. members want to revert to motions to deal with other matters I have no objection. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order because of the interjection from the other side of the House only to say that if the House leader wants to move a motion let him do it himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. The House will now go on to the next item, questions on the order paper.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CMHC LOAN TO VICTORIA WOOD DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Question No. 8—Mr. Ryan:

1. Does the CMHC loan to Victoria Wood Development Corporation Limited cover 95 per cent of the lending value of the low-cost rental part of the Main Square Development?

2. What amount of the CMHC total loan to Victoria Wood is earmarked for low-cost housing, and what amount is for other housing and commercial parts of the complex?

3. Does the loan cover 95 per cent of the lending value of the commercial part and the non-low cost housing part and, if not, what percentage?

4. What will be the total number of low rental apartment units in the Main Square Development and what amount per apartment unit is CMHC loaning to Victoria Wood?

5. Was any effort made by the government to involve a Canadian majority-owned and controlled development company in the development of Main Square at any stage of negotiations?

6. Is the Main Square Development leased by Victoria Wood to CMHC under terms that guarantee that CMHC will always pay sufficient rent to meet the mortgage payments?

7. What are the full terms of such lease?

8. Did CMHC investigate the possibility of having a Canadian majority-owned and controlled company manage the Main Square Development?

9. What methods were used to select a manager for the Main Square Development, and what are the terms of the management agreement?

10. Prior to or after the granting of the CMHC loan for Main Square were the plans altered to provide more housing units for tenants with school-age children and, if so, for what number of children was accommodation increased over the original estimate?

11. What amounts have been advanced to Victoria Wood by CMHC, when were such advances made, and what amount remains to be advanced?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1, 2, 3, 4. The CMHC loan to Victoria Wood Development Corporation Limited covers 92½ per cent of the lending value of the project. The total loan approved for the project is $13,774,000, with the loan attributable to the housing component being $12,685,000. A specific number of the housing units is not earmarked for low-income housing. The total number of housing units in the development is 1,080, with the average loan per unit being $12,753.

5. Victoria Wood had control of the Main Square site when it made application to CMHC for a loan. CMHC was not therefore in a position to involve anyone else.

6 and 7. The terms of the lease, within a contract between CMHC and Victoria Wood, are part of the arrangements between borrower and lender and are therefore confidential.

8. Management by Victoria Wood was part of the proposal submitted to and accepted by CMHC. Having assured itself that the total proposal, including management arrangements, was satisfactory, CMHC had no occasion to explore alternative arrangements.

9. See 6 and 7 above.

10. The number of bedrooms in the project is exactly the same as it was when the project was first presented for CMHC's consideration.

11. See 6 and 7 above.

NUMBER OF SUSPENSIONS FROM LE DAIN COMMISSION AS A RESULT OF DRUG POSSESSION OR TRAFFICKING

Question No. 211—Mr. Yewchuk:

Since its inception, has anyone been suspended from the Le Dain Commission because of possession and for trafficking in hallucinogenic drugs and, if so (a) how many (b) how many of those suspended are still receiving a salary from the Le Dain Commission?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) Yes. One person suspended for possession; (b) None.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise the matter of the failure of the government to answer starred questions. On March 1 I asked the following question, No. 242:

In what towns, villages, or municipal areas have projects under the local initiatives program been approved and in what amounts in the constituencies of (a) Saskatoon-Humboldt (b) Prince Albert (c) Saskatoon-Biggar?

There is no reason why that question should not be answered. The government has the information. They sent me an answer but it is altogether mixed up and wrong. I also asked question No. 243, which is not starred:

How many projects as of this date have been approved under the local initiatives program, and in what total amounts in (a) Saskatchewan (b) Alberta (c) Manitoba?

Sir, it is bad enough not to be able to get answers to questions asked orally in the House of Commons but it is worse when the government deliberately flouts the practice of the House with reference to starred questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is, of course, in error. The government never flouts any question asked by the right hon. gentleman, and I can assure him we will be looking into the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Look into it—12 days late?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING REFUSAL BY PERSONS RECEIVING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS TO ACCEPT JOBS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I always feel strong in the presence of the hon. member for St. Boniface. I have a question for the right hon. the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister, and I quote, "You know, there are people on unemployment insurance who prefer not to work and they have a perfect right to make that decision", I would ask him when the laws of this country were changed to justify that statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must have missed something because I did not understand the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nobody understood your statement.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the statement the Prime Minister made over the weekend that "there are people on unemployment insurance who prefer not to work and they have a perfect right to make that decision . . . should be no stigma attached to them . . . they paid their unemployment insurance", can the right hon. gentleman tell the House when the law of this country was changed to make—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have no objection to allowing the right hon. Prime Minister to answer but certainly that is argument. I suggest to the hon. gentleman who is asking the question that he might like to rephrase the question or ask a supplementary.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the Prime Minister has made a statement inconsistent with the law of this country and which seems, on the face of it at least, to encourage people to break the law. It is for this reason I am pursuing this line of inquiry. I would like to ask the Prime Minister when the law of this land was changed and if it was—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that a question asked in those terms is argument, not a question seeking information. I am inviting him to ask the question in another way. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Stanfield: I will ask the Prime Minister whether the statement that there are Canadians drawing unemployment insurance benefits who are making the decision not to work is based upon information he has or whether it was just made off the top of his head. Is it based on any study or any authoritative figures?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, it is not based on a study; it is just common knowledge that some people do not accept jobs which are offered to them by the unemployment insurance offices. I remember a case of a young man in Toronto at one of my rallies who had a placard asking for a million jobs. I said, "Do you want one job or a million?" He wanted a million. Later he came to see me and said he would take one job. I asked for his name and I looked into the matter. He had been offered two jobs by the Manpower offices but two were not enough and he turned them down. He still wanted a million jobs. That is the kind of case which is fairly frequent.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that this young man did not appreciate more the great efforts the Prime Minister was making on his behalf.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: There are lots of jobs available in the Privy Council office.

Mr. Stanfield: Inasmuch as the Prime Minister's statement was not qualified in that manner but was a simple statement that there are Canadians who prefer not to work and to draw unemployment insurance, and since in those terms it is an obvious encouragement to Canadians to break the law, may I ask the Prime Minister, in his capacity as Prime Minister, to correct this impression and to withdraw that statement as it was made?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I find it very difficult to accept this kind of question. It is obviously debate. Again, I will not oppose the Prime Minister replying to the question or suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition, but when in a supplementary question he invites the Prime Minister to withdraw a statement made outside the House I cannot see how that can be acceptable as a question asked during the question period.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I will ask a perfectly non-argumentative supplementary. The Prime Minister has spoken about the many thousands of jobs that are vacant in this country. Will he tell the House how many of these jobs there are and what measures he is prepared to take to assist people to take advantage of them?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is marvelous, every Monday, to see that the opposition has done nothing better over the weekend, it appears to me, than to read some abbreviated reports of speeches I have made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am very pleased to see that they are spending their weekends that way, although it might be more productive if they would think up some policies rather than nitpick. To answer the question, I think the Leader of the Opposition is referring to a statement I made, I believe in Victoriaville, in which I reiterated some information we had—I said it was several months ago—from Manpower offices in Montreal that there were something like 10,000 jobs available at the Manpower offices in Montreal. That is a clear statement. It does not go beyond that. If the opposition is hiding that fact from itself—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: —they are not realistic. However, it is a clear fact that there are jobs—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Again, I suggest that the reply given by the Prime Minister is also partly argumentative or debate. I do not think the question period was intended for this kind of debate which takes quite a bit of the time of the question period from day to day. I would hope the question period would be used for the purpose for which it is intended, the seeking of information.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to annoy the Prime Minister, of course, but I want to tell him that when he goes out every weekend making silly statements he has to expect pretty vigorous questioning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the alleged supplementary of the Leader of the Opposition was a supplementary question. It is a continuation of debate. I doubt that the matter should be pursued further. Unless the Prime Minister has a point of order to raise, I would be prepared to go to the next question.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am really rising on the same point of order. I simply say that if the opposition holds that there are no jobs being offered in Canada to people at large, if there are no such vacancies, then my statement may have been silly and then they may have a quarrel with me, but until they say there are no jobs being offered in Canada it seems to me that this whole line of argument is just hypocritical.

ENFORCEMENT OF LAW REQUIRING PERSONS RECEIVING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS TO MAKE THEMSELVES AVAILABLE FOR WORK

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, since a statement by the Prime Minister of the country may easily be believed by people across Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: —easily and unfortunately, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: —and in view of some of the statements the Prime Minister has made, may I ask these questions, not as nitpicking but because they are important for the understanding of the people of Canada. Is the Prime Minister aware that the Unemployment Insurance Act requires a person seeking to draw unemployment insurance benefits to make himself available for work? As he made the statement there are people who prefer not to work and to take unemployment insurance benefits, is the Prime Minister doing anything to get the present law, not any new law, enforced so that people who draw unemployment insurance benefits do in fact make themselves available for work?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the answer is very simple, Mr. Speaker. A person who does make such an application, which he is obligated to do under the law, is not obliged to accept any job that is offered to him at any salary and at any place in the country. I would have thought the hon. member would know of such a provision in the law.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for York South and there are four or five additional members seeking supplementaries. We have spent ten minutes on the first question. Perhaps we should limit the number of supplementaries and, if there is time, eventually return to this matter. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South on a supplementary.

AVAILABILITY OF JOBS FOR UNEMPLOYED

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Your Honour may wish to treat this as an original question rather than a supplementary. Is the Prime Minister saying that there are some jobs available, which no doubt there are on any given day, but jobs at very low wages and in undesirable working conditions which he is asking the unemployed to accept, no matter where they live? Is that the idea?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, certainly with the first part of that statement I am glad there is agreement between the leader of the New Democratic Party and myself. There are some jobs available. That is all I have been saying.

Mr. Lewis: As unemployment in the middle of January was 635,000 and in view of the likelihood that the unemployment figures which I understand may be released tomorrow will again show that level of unemployment, higher unemployment or a few thousand lower—I do not know what they will show—is the Prime Minister suggesting there is more than one job per 12 or 15 unemployed available anywhere in Canada at this time? Is he suggesting that all the unemployed can find jobs or that even 95 per cent of them can find jobs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member appreciates that this is debate. For the moment I will recognize the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings on a supplementary.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Can he offer any advice to those who are out of work and looking for a job other than what he offered in Victoriaville, namely, that people now leave where they are living and be prepared to work with a pick and shovel?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I said that the opposition had spent some time over the weekend reading badly abbreviated speeches I had made. I must also say that they are probably very poor readers of those bad reports.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will return to this subject in a moment. We will now move on to the second subject.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PROJECTS NOT APPROVED—PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the President of the Treasury Board, may I put my question to the Minister of Finance. I see him smile: it augurs well.

As many local initiative projects presented either by municipalities or other bodies have yet to be approved, for lack of funds—no one says so, but that would seem to be the reason—may I ask the Minister of Finance whether or not additional funds will be put at the disposal of the Department of Manpower and Immigration to enable it to approve those projects, especially in the underdeveloped areas, and in particular in the riding of Bellechasse?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in this regard I must consult my colleagues the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—PERMITS REQUIRED UNDER NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. On March 3 my hon.

friend the Leader of the Opposition, referring to the fact that a member of the government had admitted that permits were required under the terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act in respect of the James Bay project, asked the Minister of Transport whether any applications had been received for permits under that act. The minister said he did not believe so but that he would inquire whether any had been made and let the House know. Since the minister has not indicated whether any permits have been issued, I should like to ask the Prime Minister the following question: In light of the provision of the act which says that no work shall be built upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water in the absence of such permission, and in light of the fact that two bridges are presently being built, one across the Bell River and another across the Waswanipi River, can the Prime Minister explain to the House why the government condones this breach of the law and is an accessory to the fact?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question obviously contains statements or allegations. The hon. member asks the Prime Minister why the government condones what he calls a breach of the law. That in itself amounts to a statement. The hon. member might like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will rephrase the question and put it in this way: Have applications for permits been received in respect of these two bridges and, if not, will the Prime Minister inquire why these bridges are being allowed to be built, apparently in breach of the law?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I must say that this question, in its rephrased form, is the kind of question I like to hear from the opposition, because it genuinely seeks information, something which is rather rare during the question periods. Since the hon. member is genuinely looking for information, I will be very pleased to take notice of the question. I could have done so already had he placed it upon the order paper. But I will gladly take note of it now and refer it personally, or through someone in my office, to the Minister of Transport personally or to someone in his office. We shall do our best to get a good answer to the question and convey the information to the House leader of the very valiant Conservative party.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the Prime Minister give me an answer which is cluttered up by facts?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

ON-THE-JOB TRAINING—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NECESSITY FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS AND ACCOUNTING RESPECTING MONEY SPENT ON INDUSTRIAL TRAINING

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the recent announcement that an additional $30 million is to be spent on the program for on-the-job training, will the minister undertake to make a statement on motions explaining the necessity for this additional appropriation and the purposes for which it will be used? Could he at the same time present an accounting for the $40 million which has already been spent on the industrial training program, bearing in mind that no such report has yet been made available to the House?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the reason for making additional funds available is very simple and can be explained in a moment. It was done to accommodate the many useful further projects in connection with the on-the-job training program which could be in place by March 31. The number of persons who could be employed on these projects was sufficiently large, and costs were sufficiently low in relation to them, that the government decided to make additional funds available for these projects which must be in operation by March 31.

Mr. Rowland: Perhaps the minister could give consideration to making a statement in response to the second part of my question. In any event, can he inform the House whether any safeguards exist which would ensure that moneys being spent on the industrial training program are being employed for the purpose intended, that of training, and not simply as a means by which employers may reduce labour costs at public expense? If there are such safeguards, what are they?

Mr. O'Connell: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am sure I could refer the hon. member to the regulations concerning the safeguards which are maintained. But I would point out to him that these projects are contracted projects and the employer is obliged to follow the contract which is to put people on the job in training.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEPS TO ASSIST UNEMPLOYED TO RELOCATE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the right hon. gentleman's suggestion, as reported in the Toronto Star, that Canadians who are out of work could find jobs provided they were willing to relocate elsewhere—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member but his question is hardly supplementary to that just put by the hon. member for Selkirk. If there are no supplementaries to that question, I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Paproski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just about to reach that part of my question which is supplementary to the one raised by the hon. member for Selkirk. What steps does the Prime Minister intend to take to assist the unemployed to relocate? Can the Prime Minister tell the House where these surplus jobs can be found?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There is a provision in the law providing for manpower mobility. If the hon. member would look up that provision he would find the answer to his question.

Mr. Paproski: Where are the jobs?

Mr. Trudeau: There is one in your seat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INCOME TAX ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister advise the House when he intends to introduce the amendments which were promised by his predecessor on December 20 when he appeared before the Senate committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on what was then Bill C-259 and promised to introduce amendments early in the new year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in terms of this session it is still early in the new year. The Minister of State from Calgary South and myself are reviewing these propositions and the possibility of amendments on an active basis.

Mr. Hees: Obviously, what the minister's predecessor gave the Senators was a "con job". I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether he has yet acquired sufficient competence in his job to bring down a budget before Easter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether I should rule that the question is hypothetical, but it is out of order on other counts.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ACCURACY OF STATISTICS—NEW POLICIES TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Since the right hon. gentleman has indicated that things are not as bad as the statistics would suggest, does he propose taking some action to change the manner by which Statistics Canada produces information, or does he have access to other figures which so far have not been made public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. No such steps are required. But it is hoped that anyone who looks at statistics will look at them intelligently, even members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since the Prime Minister expressed some dissatisfaction with current manpower policies, I wonder whether he or the minister is planning to introduce changes with respect to manpower legislation to in fact relate all these jobs which are supposedly available to Canadians who are presently out of work, numbering some three-quarters of a million?

Mr. Trudeau: I did get an admission from the leader of the New Democratic Party that there were some jobs available, and that is the answer to the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont rises on a point of order. After we have disposed of the point of order the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, repeatedly this afternoon the Prime Minister has embellished his answers with irrelevant comments and not answered questions. He has made gratuitous references of one kind or another which are most unsuitable, and certainly improper under the rules of the House. I asked the Prime Minister a straightforward question with regard to manpower policy. I did not receive an answer, and I wonder if he would show me the courtesy of replying.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

WELFARE

BRITISH COLUMBIA LEGISLATION LIMITING PROVISION OF ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ACTION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister inform the House whether, in light of the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan with respect to persons in need and the appeal provisions included in that legislation, he has studied Bill 49, introduced in the British Columbia legislature by welfare minister Gagliardi, which would give that minister absolute discretion to decide who should receive social assistance and would deprive welfare recipients of the right to appeal?

• (1440)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that I have just heard about this proposed legislation in British Columbia and am looking into the matter now. After I have had a chance to study it I would be pleased to report back to the hon. member.

Mrs. MacInnis: In looking at the matter would the minister consider measures to deal with the problem, including the withholding of federal money from British Columbia and all other provinces that are violating the Canada Assistance Plan, if he finds that they are, and make an early statement to the House on his findings?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, with all respect to the hon. member, the question is purely hypothetical at this stage. I should like to have a chance to find out what the legislation is all about and then I will report back.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Considering that many local initiatives projects could not be accepted or carried out because of a lack of funds-and this I find unfortunate for small localities—would the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government intends to present a supplementary budget so that some projects may be carried out?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having voiced his approval of the Local Initiatives Program and also for having commented on its success.

To answer his question and for the moment, I can only say that no decision has been taken to that effect. We have created over 85,000 jobs through this program and, for the moment, we do not intend to renew it. But the question will remain under review.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—DURATION OF JOBS CREATED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

May I ask the Prime Minister whether the 85,000 jobs to which he has just alluded are of a greater duration than 8 weeks, or if rotation took place while some projects were carried out, which would have resulted in the multiplication of jobs when at times those jobs may have lasted only three or four weeks?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the supplementary asked by the hon. member is of a statistical nature. In my opinion, it should normally be put on the order paper. If there is any urgency, the hon. member may wish to give notice, and I will see to it that it is considered on the adjournment motion.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Munro.]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PASSPORT APPLICATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. About nine or ten days ago I asked the minister, in connection with the Geoffroy case, whether or not he would table in the House a copy of the application for a passport for Geoffroy and his paramour, and as yet I have not received an answer. It should be a most revealing document, one that I am sure will go a long way toward clearing up doubts in the minds of people in general concerning the issue of that passport.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have not made a decision on this matter. Perhaps I should explain to the House that there is nothing in these documents that we have any fear of revealing. Unfortunately there is the name of what is apparently an innocent man involved, a person whose name had been forged. I have had some hesitation in tabling such a document, because I know that if his name became known the casual reader might come to feel that he had had something to do with the case. In due course all these documents, I suppose, will be revealed when the case against Madame Geoffroy is proceeded with, but I will try within the next day or two to reach a decision on the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, ten days have gone by since the minister said he would look into the matter. No one wants to do any harm to an innocent person. All the minister will have to do in producing this application is to say that the name of the individual who is the sponsor was forged, and then there will be nothing adverse resting on the individual.

I do not know what the Prime Minister is pointing at, but I am afraid that he will start to swear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was under the impression that the right hon. gentleman had asked his question, that the minister had replied, and the matter was to rest there. The Chair then recognized the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. If the right hon. gentleman has a supplementary, I will recognize him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister was making signs to me to sit down. When Your Honour told him to sit down a few minutes ago he stood for fully two minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Disgraceful show of manners. Let him have it, John.

Mr. Trudeau: You have a good supporter now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate that hon. members seem to be enjoying themselves, but a number of others are anxious for an opportunity to ask questions. Therefore we might try to proceed with greater celerity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is no hilarity that is on the other side of the House. Today they are disturbed by the Rock incident. Is it the minister's considered opinion that this document will be produced in the House, in view of the fact he has stated that in any event when the trial takes place it will be available? It should therefore be made available to the House.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think the right hon. member, as a well known protector of civil liberties, would feel that I ought to consult with those who will be prosecuting in order to find out whether it would in any way interfere with the course of justice. If I am satisfied it does not, I am sure I will be able to satisfy the right hon. member.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY RESPECTING LEAVE FOR EMPLOYEES WISHING TO BE CANDIDATES IN FEDERAL ELECTION—REFUSAL OF LEAVE AND SUSPENSION OF ANN BOOTH

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Is it the policy of the government to permit those federal civil servants who wish to present themselves as candidates in the forthcoming federal election the privilege of taking leave from the public service, as was the case during the last provincial election?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this question does not fall within my jurisdiction. It should be put to my colleague the President of the Treasury Board, or to the Chairman of the Public Service Commission.

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I put the same question to the Prime Minister and add a supplementary to it. Would the Prime Minister look into the case of a Miss Ann Booth who has been refused leave to seek a nomination and has been suspended today by the Public Service Commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. While he is making this investigation will he also see whether or not some of the former drop-outs might be expected back after the next election?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I seek the assistance and co-operation of hon. members to reduce the number of supplementaries, and also points of order, so that we may proceed to the end of the question period and allow as many members as possible to ask questions.

INCREASE IN FEED GRAIN SUBSIDY—EXCLUSION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture who, according to the iniquitous roster system, should be here today. I should like to ask why Prince Edward Island was excluded from the list of provinces for which Canadian Livestock Feed Board subsidies for feed grain are to be increased, and has the minister received any indication of when this egregious oversight will be corrected?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice and speak to the minister about it, and if there is any information I will report back to the House.

FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGE—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Now that the government has the authority, either by regulation or by order in council, to raise the amount of the federal minimum wage, may I ask whether consideration is being given to doing this, particularly in light of the recent increases in the cost of living?

• (1450)

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I asked him last week if he had anything to report to the House on the continuing guerilla warfare between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and NABET in respect of CBC problems. On his return from the west he said he had not had a chance to check. Would he tell the House now what the present status is of this dispute?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have followed these developments, but the situation is so fluid that if I made a report now, it might prove absolutely

IMPRISONED SYRIAN JEWS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is a humanitarian question in respect of the plight of imprisoned Syrian Jews about which the international secretariat of Amnesty International has recently expressed very sharp concern. Can the minister advise whether the government has been made aware of this situation? If so, what action has it taken or does it intend to take on this issue?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have been informed and we have been working through our diplomatic channels to see whether we can do something effective on behalf of these people.

Mr. Forrestall: Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate whether or not he anticipates any position which would afford the government an opportunity to take some initiative in this case within the next week or ten days?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to discuss this question too specifically. We have found that we have been most effective on behalf of people in this circumstance if we move quietly without declaration and without publicity.

WAGES PAID TO FARM AND TOBACCO WORKERS IN ONTARIO

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Since on the weekend the Prime Minister led the public to believe that farm and tobacco workers in Ontario receive the minimum wage, would the Prime Minister inform the House as to what minimum wage law affects farm and tobacco workers in Ontario?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me it would probably be the minimum wage laws of Ontario rather than of any other province.

Mr. Ryan: As Ontario farm and tobacco workers are not covered by provincial and federal minimum wage statutes and as 42 per cent of farm workers in Ontario receive less than the provincial minimum wage, would the Prime Minister consider correcting his advice to Quebec residents who may be considering moving to Ontario for employment?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are three minutes remaining before the end of the question period. I would hope that we might limit supplementaries. If the hon. member has a supplementary he will be recognized, but I would hope we would try to have no more supplementaries in the last three minutes.

ALLEGED IMPORTATION OF ASIANS TO WORK IN BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL MINES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask a supplementary earlier in respect of the last revision of Aesop's Fables over the weekend having to do with the statement of the Prime Minister that British Columbia coal mines import Asian labour. I wonder whether the Prime Minister, with that appreciation of statistics which he said we all should heed, could inform the public as to what year he was referring to and has he any statistics to justify—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This type of question should be on the order paper. I cannot accept that it is a proper question at this time.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF COMPETITION BILL

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It arises from a report from Winnipeg that the government has made no commitment that the competition bill will be introduced during this session of parliament. Can the minister inform the House whether the government has any timetable for the introduction of this legislation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the report in the paper was somewhat erroneous. I was saying that there were certain measures which would have to be taken first before we could give a firm date. Those measures are primarily: consultation will all the provincial governments, and concurrently, return consultation with those who have submitted briefs. Both those series of meetings have been scheduled. One meeting took place in Manitoba on Saturday with the Manitoba government. Other seminars begin this Wednesday.

• (1500)

Mr. Dinsdale: A brief supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary and then we will be pretty close to the end of the question period. I suggest to hon. members that an attempt should be made by them to try to limit the number of supplementaries.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in light of the constitutional go-ahead given by the province of Manitoba, can the minister indicate whether unanimity on this point will be required before the bill is proceeded with.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would not make such a decision at this stage.

NATIONAL PARKS

REASON FOR MANITOBA GOVERNMENT CEASING NEGOTIATIONS FOR SECOND PARK

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the reason the Manitoba government has stopped negotiations with the federal government for establishment of another national park in Manitoba that there has been a change in the federal policy on parks or are there any other reasons?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand very much the government of Manitoba because as I said before in the House, the then member for Selkirk asked me the same question. I think it is a problem he has. He has more difficulty coping with the mining interests than I had when I established new parks in the north.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON PREPACKAGING OF CERTAIN PRESCRIPTION DRUGS TO CUT COST

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last Friday I asked the Acting Prime Minister whether or not he would make public a confidential government report dealing with the cutting back of drug prices by prepackaging. This report has been leaked to the press. The Acting Prime Minister told me he would ask the minister whether or not he would make the report public and I ask him now whether or not he will?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that whole subject matter is the responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I believe the question should be directed to him.

Mr. Nystrom: May I have an answer to the question then?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member, especially because he has been so patient over the last 40 minutes. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville on a point of order and the last question will be the one to be asked by the hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did not hear my question. Perhaps I may repeat it. On Friday I asked the Acting Prime Minister whether or not he would make public a confidential government document on cutting back drug prices by prepackaging. The Acting Prime Minister said he would take it up with the responsible minister. Can the minister say now whether or not that report will be made public?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will give that consideration and report back.

HARBOURS

SMALL CRAFT FACILITIES—TRANSFER OF ADMINISTRATION— MINISTER TO WHOM PETITIONS TO BE DIRECTED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of the Environment today in Vancouver is making a very important policy announcement wherein he states that the administration of small craft harbours at long last is being transferred from the federal Department of Transport to the federal fisheries services and that they will be asking commercial fishermen who want additional services provided for their fleets to organize local committees and submit their proposals to the Minister of the Environment. My question to the minister is, has this change been considered in the cabinet and will we on this side of the House in future be directing any petitions we receive for new additional public wharves or facilities such as skidways and so on, or for dredging, from fishermen in Atlantic Canada to the Minister of the Environment or to the Minister of Public Works.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I believe I should first read the statement made by my colleague before I am called upon to make any comment on it.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

POTATOES—RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS FOR ACTION TO RELIEVE DEPRESSED MARKET—POSSIBLE DIVERSION TO STOCK FEED

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On Friday last the President of the Privy Council as Acting Prime Minister undertook to provide specific answers to two or three urgent questions from me in respect of the disposal of potatoes in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. I wonder whether the President of the Privy Council has conveyed those questions to the minister and whether there will be any information forthcoming?

Business of the House

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I drew the matter to the attention of the Agricultural Stabilization Board. It is true that there are stocks of No. 1 Prince Edward Island potatoes in the hands of the board, but it is not feasible at the moment to consider disposing of these potatoes to feed stock or for any other purpose because the supply situation is not clear and it may be necessary later on to import potatoes. On the positive side, my hon. friend will be glad to know that the price of Prince Edward Island potatoes has increased significantly since March 1.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At this point we are prolonging the question period. This can be done only with the consent of the House. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that this was a question rather than a point of order.

POSSIBLE REFERENCE OF PETITION OF OLD CROW INDIANS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with House business. Now that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is back, I wonder whether the government House leader has yet had an opportunity to discuss with him the matter of the petition of the people of Old Crow, and has the minister come to the conclusion—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to rule that this is not a point of order but a question. I believe this question was asked a few times last week. Again I suggest this is not a point of order but a question relating to the order of business of the House, which does not make it a point of order. However, if the President of the Privy Council or someone on his behalf wishes to reply to the hon. member's question, I have no objection.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): I have not had a chance to speak to the minister this morning. I will do so today and give a definite answer tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF THE GOVERNMENT TO CO-OPERATE WITH PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENTS IN DEALING WITH URBAN PROBLEMS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House, alarmed at this government's inability to deal with the accumulating problems of urbanization in Canada, declares that a federal government must co-operate in good faith with provincial and municipal governments in planning and in implementing policies on revenue sharing, inter-urban transportation, housing, urban poverty, pollution and rural depopulation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution and in speaking to it I wish to emphasize particularly the problems of our urban communities, although I recognize that all municipal governments in Canada are having difficulty, whether they are urban municipalities or otherwise. But the brutal fact is that by 1980 it is believed that four out of five Canadians will be living in our large cities, and so far preparations have not been made for this nor are they being made today in an effective way to meet the problems arising within the next decade.

While these problems will deepen during the next ten years, they are already with us because in terms of transportation, housing, problems of pollution, recreation, and a decent physical environment, Canadian citizens are already facing an enormous challenge. Without any ability to control their own growth, the cities must nevertheless provide for the vast numbers of new arrivals from all over the country, and indeed from all over the world. They must deal with these vast numbers with their very limited powers, and having to rely in the main on financing largely from property tax as well as whatever help they can receive from the provinces, which is difficult in a number of cases. It may be said that under the constitution these are primarily provincial problems and that if the cities need help with their finances, that is a provincial problem. But both provincial and municipal governments are very hard pressed financially, particularly in view of the nature of their responsibilities and the growing cost of providing the services needed by the people of Canada.

In 1968, the then premier of the province of Ontario, the Hon. Mr. Robarts, summed this up rather neatly in the following statement:

The facts of life are that the federal government has the main access to the growth fields of taxation, such as personal and corporation income taxes. The provinces and the municipalities are boxed in by such slower growth taxes as retail sales taxes and in the case of municipalities, property taxes. At the same time, the provinces and the municipalities are the levels of government which are faced with the most rapidly expanding demand for services.

What the Hon. Mr. Robarts said in 1968 has become even clearer in 1972. The pressures on the provincial and municipal governments are even more severe now than they were in those days. Of course, one of the things that has added greatly to the financial pressures and the difficulties of our municipal governments—and I think this is particularly true of our larger urban governments—has been the vast growth in their welfare costs, the vast increase in the amounts they have to spend toward providing welfare for their residents as a result of the great increase in unemployment that has taken place during the last two or three years. This is directly attributable to the policies deliberately adopted by the present government. We have had massive unemployment, and as a result of this, a massive rise in welfare costs. It really does not help the municipalities any more than it helps anybody else for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to go around talking about how many vacant jobs there are in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: So far as our municipalities are concerned, they have been confronted by this vast increase in welfare expenditures which they have had to make as the result of federal policies, and this has added tremendously to their difficulties in discharging their other responsibilities and carrying out plans to meet the needs of citizens in these large communities. So, to begin with, the federal government should certainly share a far larger proportion of this welfare load that the municipal governments are carrying as a result of the policies of the federal government. Over and above that, because the federal government has created this problem for the municipal governments and for cities, it should be even more active, even more energetic in trying to co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in reaching solutions to these urgent problems faced by our cities.

But going beyond the present situation, going beyond the present difficulties that the municipal governments and our cities face, there are serious and urgent matters that have to be considered. There has to be some sort of national urban strategy concerned with the environment in which the great majority of Canadians work, live and play, and in which an increasing number of Canadians are going to spend their lives. In saying this, Mr. Speaker, I recognize the existence of constitutional problems. I recognize the presence of the constitutional question and the fact that it cannot be just shunted aside. But I also maintain that the constitution cannot be used as an excuse for the federal government to ignore the urban problems, as it has largely tended to do up to this time.

I am saying that the federal government must involve itself in working out a national approach to some of these problems. I want to emphasize that the provinces must always be involved in these discussions, these consultations and these policies. I am not suggesting for a moment, and I would be very much against the government of Canada in Ottawa, or even this parliament imposing plans in this area on the provinces, simply laying down here by edict, by law—if this could be done constitutionally—some program that the provinces and the cities would have to accept whether they wished to or not.

I want to emphasize that this has to be a co-operative effort in which the federal government has a role to play, but in which the provinces as well as the cities must always be involved. When I talk about the need for a national strategy with regard to growing urban problems, I am certainly not suggesting that there should be some rigid national policies set down with which all the cities in the country have to comply. Again, even if that were constitutionally possible it would certainly be undesirable because each city in this country has its own individual profile of problems, of opportunities, and of goals. Each one has its own character resulting from the ethnic mix in that city, its industrial base, its geographic location, and all sorts of other characteristics of which we can all think. Every city has its special quality and there could be no rigid national policy that would fit the needs of all our cities, even if it were constitutionally possible to devise such a policy.

At the same time there are problems such as the tax base, such as relations between the federal government and the provinces with regard to municipal problems; there are problems involving research and co-ordination of research in relation to transportation matters. Indeed, there are many aspects of urban life that are common to all our cities. I have to say that the visible rate of progress toward effective co-operation between all three levels of government in fighting in some common way these urban problems is very disappointing.

The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities pointed out in its brief in 1970 that there is a growing inconsistency between the low constitutional status of the city and its actual role in the lives of the people. I quote briefly:

> Changes in Canadian social, economic and political organization, stimulated by the increasing demands of urbanization will soon, we believe, make new approaches to the fundamental questions of governmental organization and structure inevitable.

But we have to work with things as they are, for the time being at least. We have to work with the constitution as it now is. And regardless of what one may feel as to whether the cities are adequately recognized under our constitution, I certainly endorse the federation suggestion that municipal governments should be recognized as de facto partners in all discussions of their problems. Any attempt to ignore their existence and proceed without their participation would certainly be unrealistic. It would be virtually unthinkable.

I recognize that an approach has been made towards a process of tripartite involvement in urban affairs, involving federal, provincial and municipal governments. This has been going on for some years in such areas as housing, and I recognize that this approach has to be broadened so as to include some structure that would provide for discussion generally among the three levels of governments of urban and municipal problems. This kind of approach would seem to be the only sensible procedure to follow because all three levels of government have their contributions to make in finding solutions to urban problems.

There should not be any attempt by any higher level of government, and certainly not by the federal government, to take over. There is certainly no reason for confrontation on this issue. After all we are dealing with the lives of millions and millions of Canadians. So, Mr. Speaker, I do not raise this subject to suggest that the government of Canada should dictate to others, should dictate to the provinces, should dictate to our cities and municipal governments. But in saying that, I do not mean to take away at all from my intense belief that the federal government must take initiatives in association with the provinces and with the municipal governments. I also believe that the federal government must broaden its interests. For example, if we think in terms of urban transportation posing a very acute problem in many of our cities, is there any particular reason, stemming from our traditions or constitutional considerations, why the federal interest in housing and in urban redevelopment should not be so interpreted as to include a consideration of and participation in the solution of transportation problems?

How can the federal government participate in a meaningful way in solving housing problems and urban redevelopment problems unless it is prepared to become involved in and help with problems of urban transportation? The federal government should be prepared to participate in studies of its own transportation policies to see how they have affected and are likely to affect the cities. This involves study of plane, train, and interprovincial bus services, as well as the federal involvement in roads. I believe the federal government should be prepared to involve itself on an urgent basis with the other two levels of government in consideration of inter and intra-urban transportation systems, and should also involve itself in commissioning and participating financially in research into these and related problems. It should be prepared to involve itself in the actual solution of these problems. How can the federal government do a meaningful job or involve itself in a meaningful way in the solution of the housing problem or the problem of urban redevelopment, unless it is prepared to get involved in the study of city transportation problems? I am again emphasizing the role of co-operation rather than the role of dictation or trying to lay down the law.

This kind of participation in meeting the problems of the city is all the more urgent, first of all, because of the extra burden that the federal government has imposed upon the municipalities as a result of the massive unemployment developed in the country and, second, because of the stand-pat position it has taken with regard to tax-sharing.

The tax-sharing agreement that will arise out of the proposed legislation before the House is really an extension of existing arrangements for tax sharing. There are changes in some details but by and large the tax-sharing arrangements proposed for the next five years are basically those that have been in effect for the past five years. In other words, the tax-sharing arrangements between the federal government and the provinces that are before the House indicate no recognition, and certainly are not based upon any recognition, of the growing needs and expenditures in the areas of provincial and municipal responsibility, especially in the large urban areas.

I remind the House again of the studies conducted some years ago by federal and provincial officials working together. They forecast the growth in municipal and provincial expenditures in relation to the growth in the responsibility to the federal government. The federal government authorized this study but paid no attention to it. Now, we are again in the position where the government of Canada has chosen not to recognize the growing responsibilities of the provinces and cities in bringing forward a tax-sharing arrangement. Indeed, the only tangible thing the federal government has done in this area is increase the amount spent on welfare. The growing welfare burden and the general tendency of provincial and municipal responsibilities to grow more rapidly in costs, make it all the more necessary that we have active and meaningful federal participation in meeting the urban challenge in this country.

I think there was some optimism early in the year in this general area of co-operation involving municipal government and relating to municipal and urban problems. There was the Winnipeg conference in the month of April and following that a period of optimism. This optimism seemed to fade following the August meeting of the minister responsible in the federal government, the then minister of State for urban affairs, with the provincial ministers of municipal affairs and the joint municipal committee, and in the meeting in August involving the three levels of government. This was followed by a feeling of very considerable disappointment. The progress toward common policies in this area and the progress toward working together in some effective way is not noticeable. I hope the minister will be able to persuade me that I am wrong, and that much is going on in this area of which that neither I nor the country generally is aware. I must say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that visible progress toward achieving common policies and some effective involvement in a co-operative way is not obvious to the naked eye.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I am not looking for this government or any government—in fact I would be opposed to this government or any government—trying to apply an urban strategy across the board. I do not ask for that and I would be opposed to it, but we do need a national approach to urban problems which would include flexibility and adaptability. I assume that the federal government has a national responsibility in this matter. This does not mean that it can or should try to solve the problems by itself. I am convinced that the federal government can co-operate, can provide the co-ordinating framework for the cities and provinces alike. It does not have to impose itself on anyone and it should not impose itself on anyone. Events themselves are imposing the need for co-operation on all three levels of government. I do not think any of the three levels will come out of this new process of consultation exactly as it went in. I do not deny that jurisdictional disputes may arise from time to time, but that is not the point. The point is that we do not have the right to refuse to embark upon this process and should do so very quickly. We are not merely dealing with structures here, although we need an appropriate structure; we are dealing with the future of the people and we cannot allow ourselves to forget this.

It is not enough for the federal government to appoint a minister of state for urban affairs and then let matters drift, leaving the cities and municipal governments to sink or swim in a sea of welfare costs. We need effective leadership from the federal government in this area and I say to the minister responsible that we do not seem to be getting it. I hope he can persuade us this afternoon that we are getting it, but as matters stand now progress is lamentably slow. We have no reason to believe that the federal government is meeting the challenge of the urban problems of this country.

I call upon the minister today to tell us exactly where matters stand and how he proposes to involve the federal government in a co-operative way in a significant contribution toward solving the urban problems that are overwhelming the people who live in our cities.

In case I did not do so, Mr. Speaker, I move the motion.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House deals with one of the most important and also the most difficult problems facing our people. I want to say immediately that I do not, nor I am sure does the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), blame any one person or indeed any one level of government for the immensely difficult situation in which our country finds itself. I certainly cannot undertake to go into the situation in a way that would satisfy me or anyone else in the 20 minutes available to me, but I want to make some general observations and some specific suggestions which will be followed by more specific suggestions made by my colleagues who will follow me.

The first problem that faces us is the constitution and the federal government's involvement in the urban problems facing this country. My first point, Mr. Speaker, is that urban problems are no longer local. Since 70 per cent of our people now live in urban centres, and in a few years 80 per cent or more of our people will live in such centres, urban problems are national in nature; they are no longer local and must be treated as being national in nature. Therefore, the federal role in this area is an absolutely essential factor, precisely for that reason. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, federal policies affect our urban problems in the same way as they affect all our other problems. As has already been said, economic policies which create massive unemployment add not only to the welfare rolls of the city, but add also to the problems associated with other aspects of urban life.

There are men and women who are anxious to work, despite what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has callously said from time to time. Well over 90 per cent—maybe 95 per cent or maybe 98 per cent—of those who are out of work want to work, and want work now. The Prime Minister has been guilty of a most reprehensive catering to the backlash of the hardhats of this country by trying to suggest, for reasons I cannot understand, that the problem of unemployment is not a serious one. He indicated, for example, that there were 10,000 vacant jobs in Montreal a few months ago. At least, that is what he said; yet his own manpower survey shows that in the last quarter of 1971 there were only 7,400 jobs available in the whole of Quebec. Why the Prime Minister said that I do not know.

As I said, economic policies which create massive unemployment not only add to the welfare rolls of urban governments but also, unfortunately, add to our problems of delinquency, family welfare, family disruption and bring about all those other effects of idleness and humiliation that unemployment produces. That is why I am so angry about the callous way in which the Prime Minister has dealt with this problem, for he has been refusing absolutely to recognize that in addition to considering the question of unemployment insurance benefits, we must consider the human problems involving idleness and degradation which flow from unemployment. It was shameful that the Prime Minister talked the way he did about the serious problem facing our people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: That, Mr. Speaker, is the second reason the federal government is involved in this area. Its policies necessarily affect all aspects of urban life. Its third reason for that involvement is, obviously, that urban governments are incapable of dealing with their problems in this area, in view of the present financial structure of this country. Therefore, again, we must look to that level of government, the federal government, which has the capacity to generate funds for those activities and works which must be carried on by the municipalities as well as by the federal and provincial governments.

I repeat what has already been said. Appointing a minister without portfolio responsible for urban affairs was a useful but small step to take. And, despite the charming side of the present minister, the establishment of a new ministry will be a small step and, indeed, of no value at all unless that ministry has the imagination and determination to evolve entirely new avenues on which the federal government can play its role and retain participation in the development of useful urban policies. Therefore, the first point I make, Mr. Speaker, is that urban governments in this country, in some way—perhaps at the local level, perhaps at the level of the Canadian organization, perhaps at the level of the provincial or municipal organization, I am not particularly concerned how this is done—must be given the opportunity of direct participation in discussions and plans affecting urban life. That, as has been suggested, does not mean that the federal government must emphasize its view and impose its will on the urban level of government; rather, the federal government must have a direct part to play in this matter.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that we need constitutional change for that purpose. The government hid behind the constitution for years before it summoned up enough nerve to appoint a minister responsible for urban affairs. The government has carefully indicated that that department is not an operational department but merely a coordinating department. We shall have to see if there is any difference between the meanings of these terms. I say that even under our present systen, we can set up the necessary structure and machinery to involve local governments directly in the over-all planning and budgeting for the crucial needs of our urban communities. So far, we have failed to evolve such machinery. I hope the minister will indicate any steps in that direction that may be taken.

I am not talking about an occasional conference, about an occasional meeting or about an occasional response to some demand by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. I am talking about a permanent structure and permanent machinery, with regular consultations and regular meetings. To me, the gap between the urban needs of this country and our failure to evolve such machinery is a major gap which must be overcome if urban problems are to receive priority in our national objectives, a priority which they demand and deserve. Our urban problems, Mr. Speaker, have become so large, so overwhelming, as to be almost unmanageable, largely because of the dreadful delays in launching our concerted attack on them. I plead with the government to end these delays. Let there be no more dragging of feet on the part of the federal government, on the part of provincial or municipal levels of government, or, indeed, on the part of the citizenry of Canada as a whole.

We have talked a great deal about urban matters and about the quality of life in our cities. That subject competes with motherhood as the subject of speeches made by people at all levels of politics. Actually, though, the steps we have taken so far are miniscule in relation to the size of the problem that faces us. I appeal to the minister and to the government to start marching wilfully and in a planned way to the goal of engaging the people and municipalities of Canada in steps that will solve this problem.

The first point to be considered is the question of funds. The first problem that municipalities now have to deal with is the massive difficulties involving the problem of the availability of funds. All who live in the larger urban centres, as I do and as the minister does—I represent a Toronto constituency and the minister represents a Vancouver constituency—know about the problems that the people in urban centres experience. I am referring to the congestion, overcrowding, snarling traffic jams, deterioration of the city core, sprawling "planlessness" of the suburbs, shortage of housing, squalor of slums and rundown neighbourhoods, lack of playgrounds and parks, difficulties associated with urban transportation, dreadful pollution of the air and waters surrounding our municipalities, high cost of and greedy speculation in land, heavy cost of servicing land, and the ever increasing costs of education and welfare. These problems have evolved in the last number of decades and were not foreseen in 1867, for then the people looked at a municipal government as a little, local outfit that would have to do some minor things in society. Today, municipal governments have to deal with the major problems facing the overwhelming majority of the people of this country. Those problems require funds for their settlement. Indeed, even if we are to begin settling those problems, we will require massive funds for that purpose.

Municipal costs have risen steadily. They have risen not only absolutely but, as well, in the size of the proportion which they bear to total government expenditures and gross national product.

Let me illustrate with some figures, the latest I was able to get. In 1958, for example, municipal expenditures were 23 per cent of all government expenditures. By 1968, ten years later, they had risen to 27 per cent, an increase of between 15 and 16 per cent. In 1960, municipal expenditures were 7 per cent of the gross national product. In 1970, 10 years later, they were 9.1 per cent of the gross national product, again an increase of some 30 per cent in the proportion of the gross national product used up by the municipalities. Therefore, there is the problem of cost that the municipalities cannot meet. What is even worse, the municipalities are forced to meet these costs largely from property taxes, the most regressive form of tax in our society.

Property tax falls heavily on the low income group, older citizens who have managed to acquire a home during a lifetime of work, young married couples who undertake to build or buy a home, as well as those who rent accommodation because invariably the landlord passes this on to the tenants through increased rents. The property tax is the worst possible and most regressive form of tax in our society. It has another disadvantage which in any discussion of the problem which the motion raises ought to be mentioned. Another disadvantage of the property tax is that it has disastrous consequences in that it distorts the objectives of our cities. Assessment becomes the major concern of municipal councils. They change plans and rezone land in their competition for industrial, commercial and other development.

In my experience, I have never known of a municipality or a planning board which started with great social objectives of building a decent city or environment which did not in the end become distorted or destroyed by the assessment demands of the property tax. The municipal council feels it has to cut corners and change plans in zoning bylaws for the purpose of getting more assessment and money. That destroys the capacity of a municipality, even if the will is there, the plan property for the quality of life for those Canadians who live in the large centres of this country.

I do not have time to develop my first point other than to just state it. There has to be a complete review of the tax base of the municipalities in Canada. This is where the federal government and the provincial governments come into the picture. We ought to give consideration to a system of unconditional grants based on some established, recognized and agreed-on formula or extend the tax base for municipalities to include some income tax or some form of other tax, or a combination of these and all other taxes. In some way, the municipalities have to be given the finances to meet their problems and carry on with their plans without constantly being frustrated and diverted by the demands for taxes and, therefore, the demands of the developers which, as I said, distorts the objectives of these municipalities.

The other point I want to make in this general introduction is that our talk about pollution will have very little meaning unless we take into account the municipal situation. Much of the pollution of Canada's waters occurs as the result of inadequate purification and recycling plants in this country. There are very few urban centres in this country that have adequate purification plants. We are talking through out hats and not being honest, in fact we are being hypocritical—and I am not pointing my finger at any one party or spokesman—when we talk about pollution and do not recognize that a major amount of the pollution of our waters as well as our air results from the failure to build the necessary purification, sanitation, recycling and other plants in every urban community and, indeed, rural community where necessary. Until we are willing to make funds available for that, we will continue polluting the air and water in this country without taking any meaningful steps to clear up the situation. That is another area in which the federal government is directly involved.

There should be a massive program of municipal works dealing with the garbage and refuse that is created in our urban centres, large and small. That massive program cannot be carried on without major participation by the federal government. That is the kind of thing I have in mind. This kind of program would have the added advantage of setting Canada on the road to a program that would meet social needs, improve the quality of life and, at the same time, create jobs for every employable Canadian for decades to come.

I think I only have a minute or two remaining. I just want to say I am disappointed that studies in the hands of the minister have not been made public. I do not know why the minister is hiding them. I think that discussion in Canada needs the publication of these studies. Either those studies include matters which the minister is afraid to make public or there is some other reason for his failure to do so. I hope that is not the case.

Mr. Francis: Some good ones have been released.

Mr. Lewis: Some have, but I am informed there has been a study on urban assistance by Professor Glen Milne who, I am informed, now works in the Privy Council office. I hope he is not there merely to prepare an election program at public expense, but to work on some kind of program to assist urban governments and the financing of urban governments. I am also informed that a study was made by Professor Michael Dennis which includes a great deal of information which we need today. This lack of information for parliament and the country is inexplicable on any ground, other than an attitude toward secrecy and hiding things which, in this particular area even more than other areas, is unforgivable. Therefore, I call on the minister to publish these studies without delay. They have been prepared by academics who have gone into problems that concern this parliament and the people of Canada.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, we are dealing with a motion that covers some of the major problems facing Canada and the quality of life of Canadians in the urban centres. This parliament, and this or any other government, will not fulfil its obligation as legislators unless a great deal more is done in this field and until the municipalities become involved in planning the priorities we can set before the Canadian public. Until we deal with these matters seriously, we will talk about a just society, grand society or whatever you like, without any honesty as far as the people of Canada are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the motion now before us whereby this House blames the government for not having taken the necessary steps to ensure greater co-operation between the federal, provincial and municipal governments. This motion says among other things, and I quote:

—that a federal government must cooperate in good faith with provincial and municipal governments in planning and in implementing policies on revenue sharing—

All this phraseology is fine, and for years now we have been discussing in Canada this problem of revenue sharing, in order to enable the various governments to take care of their own responsibilities.

When I was 20 or 25 years old, I took part in the celebration of the 25th anniversary of the election of the provincial member for Lotbinière, who was a member of the Taschereau cabinet.

At that time I did not know much about constitutional matters, but I was struck by the remarks of the late notary Verville, who was then the hon. member for Lotbinière and who said: "How nice it is to live in Canada under the maple trees." But those were in fact pine trees and they are still there.

On that occasion I heard the rather strong speech made against the central authority by the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Taschereau. He said, the East is paying for the West. That was in 1935, when it was said that old age security pensions were paid for by the taxpayers of Quebec for the benefit of older citizens in the West.

I can also remember the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who was at that time the member for Quebec East and later Minister of Justice in the government of Mackenzie King, who had stated exactly the opposite on the same platform. I was so struck by this that from that moment, I tried to find out who was right. From that day, I followed with great attention all political events and all federal-provincial conferences and listened carefully to all arguments put forward pro and con, depending on whether they came from members or ministers in the provincial or federal administration.

The same minister who was being made much of at the time became, two years later, a member of the federal Parliament, representing the same region, the constituency of Lotbinière. At that time, his attitude changed.

It is my conviction that the experience acquired by these responsible men—whose sincerity I do not doubt—should allow us, in 1972, to reap the results of those years of debates of conferences at all levels and reach a conclusion establishing, once and for all, what are the real responsibilities of municipal, provincial, and federal governments, so that subsequently each level of government may avail tiself of the funds required to carry out its responsibilities.

I shall now quote from the text of the resolutions adopted in 1971 by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, as set forth in that organization's brief. That brief was presented to the Canadisn government on April 28, 1971, and I would like them to follow the suggestions made.

We talk about fighting pollution—and we have pollution indeed. Ths morning, as I was crossing the city of Montreal, they announced on the radio the degree of pollution in the Montreal area. It was .13 degree, while according to the commentator the acceptable limit is .10 degree.

There are known means of fighting air pollution. If we are to succeed, governments will have to come to an agreement on their respective responsibilities, and each will have to have the money necessary to carry out those responsibilities in order to give the Canadian people a healthy atmosphere to live in and to ensure the health of the human race.

Unfortunately, we are always faced with the same problem: lack of money. People sometimes say: Those Créditistes are always talking about money; they can talk about nothing else.

• (1600)

Last week, I attended a meeting of students who talked about their lack of money to pursue their studies. They have to fight to get scholarships. They are speaking of money when they speak about scholarships.

And here, in parliament, what do we talk about the year round? We talk of money. Whether we are discussing taxes, tax reform, the Opportunities for Youth program or the Local Initiatives Program we are talking about money. Everybody is talking about money. Why? Because money is the name of the game and also the economic blood of the nation.

We, the Créditistes, are also talking about money. We are suggesting a reform so as to see the day when this means of exchange will be truly the servant of the federal, provincial and municipal governments instead of being their master.

If we are wrong, this means that the government is right and if it is right let it prove it so that we can at last see the just society. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is smiling but I am convinced he agrees with me. It is possible to set up a just society in Canada even though our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated, not so long ago, that no government would succeed because Canadians are mortal and imperfect.

Mr. Speaker, these same men were also mortal and imperfect in 1968 when the Liberal party introduced its program for a just society. At that time, they sincerely believed in this or they were cheating the population. If they sincerely believed in it then, they should keep on believing in it today and work for the true establishment of a just society.

In spite of our differences of opinion in this House I think all hon. members want to work with sincerity toward obtaining the highest degree of justice in this country. It is imperative for society to allow not only three Canadians out of five but each and everyone of them to enjoy security and justice in our free country. Why? Because it is possible in 1972.

I would like to refer to the recommendations of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities and quote from their brief submitted to the government. They said:

WHEREAS urban development programs require increasingly larger investments—

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

They too talk about money. They are not asking themselves if anything needs to be done materially because they know the need is there, and they talk about financial possibilities. And it goes on:

—specially in urban transportation, including the acquisition of land for the rights of way, housing, the fight against pollution, water supplies, recreational facilities, industrial parks and others;

WHEREAS it is in the national interest to give high priority to several programs affecting the standard of life in our communities and the effectiveness of our regional economies;

WHEREAS it is not in the national interest for our municipal governments to be forced into competition with federal and provincial governments as well as private corporations on the capital market;

WHEREAS the long experience of municipalities and higher government sin Western Europe proves the value of institutions specialized in municipal credit, not only through granting adequate priority to their needs for urban development and favourable credit terms and conditions, but also by adopting modern methods of long term planning and debt financing in line with a sound intergovernmental tax system;

I agree with those "whereas" of the resolution, which is very sensible, and I do believe that in the mind of the hon. leader of the official opposition (Mr. Stanfield) his motion agrees with them as well. As General de Gaulle would say, you have to get to the bottom of things. Even if that great general had left us only that sentence after his 75 years with us, his heritage would still be invaluable. Why? Because, regardless of one's field of administrative responsibilities one must always get to the bottom of things, objectively, in all sincerity.

The mayors wanted to get to the bottom of the matter and asked in their brief that as much attention be given to under-developed Canadian municipalities as to under-developed African or Asian countries. The conclusion is as follows:

We also ask how the federal government can grant interest-free loans to under-developed countries, while refusing the same privileges to such a great number of under-developed municipalities in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, since time goes quickly, I would like to show the veracity of the brief and prove that the mayors were right. I have here several letters from various mayors. Are they old letters? No, they are dated February 28, March 5, 4, 6 and 9. They are quite recent letters dealing with what matter?

You will recall that on October 14, 1971, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) announced a program to fight unemployment in Canada, in order to enable municipalities to undertake works which had been delayed due to the lack of funds and construct water or sewage systems, arenas or other buildings needed in their community for a long time.

As the member for Bellechasse, I had faith in the local initiatives program and I co-operated with the government. The facts are there to prove it. I took the trouble of contacting all responsible public officials without any political consideration, because I feel that there is a period to fight and assert one's views and it is the electoral campaign. It is followed by a much longer administrative period during which we must all co-operate to achieve something, whatever may be the government in power. And if that government makes mistakes our task is to say so quite honestly. If the role of the opposition in parliament is not accepted it is urgent to change the constitution. If we accept the job of the opposition members, account must be taken of the fair claims which can be made for those we represent, and let the government accept our co-operation when it concerns serious reforms.

Unfortunately I was unable to discover the criteria used by bureaucrats for approving local initiatives programs. Those who submitted projects received a letter saying: Your submission was very meaningful. However, we regret our inability to assist you. Had they at least been told very sincerely: Your project was meaningful but it was not approved due to lack of funds, of available credits, that would have been true, and those people would not have been disappointed about having worked two or three weeks preparing a project, hiring an engineer or an architect and ending up with what? The same situation as before October 14, a situation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I greatly regret having to interrupt the hon. member for Bellechasse, but I must point out to him that his time has now expired.

Unless there is unanimous consent of the House, the hon. member will not be able to continue his remarks. Does the House agree to the hon. member going on with his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues in this House for their generosity. I know this generosity is motivated by the merits of my remarks. At any rate, I heartily thank them and I shall try to be brief.

One of the reasons for my question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) today is that on December 8, 1971, the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) made a statement in the House to the effect that he was altering the criteria for application of the program announced on October 14 in order to make it available to municipalities.

Before that, I had met the parliamentary secretary to the minister and told him: "It is not possible for small rural municipalities to benefit by this program because 30 man-months is a disproportionate requirement. So, when the government—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Chair is not seeking to limit the hon. member's remarks but earlier, and precisely when his time was about to expire, the Chair was wondering how the hon. member's remarks, in connection with a specific program, were related to the motion under study.

I understand that the motion deals with urban poverty. Of course, the hon. member can always allude to specific programs but I am precisely wondering whether the Chair may allow him to proceed with his speech for such a prolonged period of time on a precise program and to elaborate as he has been doing until now. This is why I would invite him not to refrain from expressing his opinion on this program but to limit his remarks and to deal with the motion now before the House.

• (1610)

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am going to abide by your ruling. However, I think that the comments I intended to make were related to the motion now before us and I believe that the Chair as well as my hon. colleagues will agree that they have received with great satisfaction the statement made last December 8 by the former Minister of Manpower and Immigration to the effect that the criteria of the program had been changed to enable small communities to take advantage of it. It was reduced from 30 man-months to 15 man-months of work. Some municipalities have therefore benefited from the program, but one and a half month had been already lost since they could not have foreseen, on November 1st, that they could benefit from the program in view of the established criteria.

I remember that I had replied in this House to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration to say that I was glad of this improvement. But since it was evident, according to the minister that, and I quote:

—it is now apparent that more applications which meet the basic criteria will be received than can be approved within available funds.

—I said, as appears at page 10253 of Hansard, that I deplored certain man made actions and the fact that people who were prepared to pool their efforts in order to fulfill a need of the community could not do it. I predicted also at that time that owing to the amendments introduced to the criteria applicable to municipalities, a greater number of projects could readily be submitted. So, when I see, for instance, that $15,000 are granted to an association called the Community Hemophile Association of Toronto, to assist in the operation of its centre as a refuge for hemophiles who have adjustment problems, I do not object, but when $10,000 or $8,000 are denied to municipalities to establish a community centre from which they will benefit I protest, because in my opinion it is normal to accept programs of this nature when they are proposed in good faith by voluntary administrators in municipalities who are dedicated to the task of trying to secure some well-being in their community.

If extra money is voted, I hope that these communities will be able to start and complete their projects. I am satisfied that by this means the government will help reduce the impact of unemployment in underdeveloped areas, in the areas where the people suffer greatly from the lack of employment, from a lack in income and to enable all family heads to meet their obligations.

May I repeat this once more for the minister. Extra money simply must be given to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in order that he may give a favourable reply to the requests that were presented, not before February 20, but before January 20. The deadline was January 31, so it cannot be said that they were received too late.

I hope that this motion and this debate will bring about concrete realizations and that at least we will be pleased to hear that the federal government and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) will be able to direct their officials to re-examine all these serious projects that have been proposed so that they be accepted in order to distribute some of the wealth we have in Canada and in order to promote further in this way the establishment of the just society, something which we can do in Canada although our people are imperfect and mortal.

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the three interventions so far with a great deal of interest, particularly the energetic presentation of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). I say to him first that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) will, I am sure, note his remarks about the Local Initiatives Program. In so far as he spoke about cost-sharing with other levels of government, and in so far as the leaders of the other parties spoke on that subject, they will note that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has been in the House listening to their remarks. No doubt, he will want to deal with that issue on a future appropriate occasion.

If I may, I should like to deal with the resolution which is before us and with the remarks that have already been made. I wish to assure hon. members that for the balance of the debate today I will listen to the suggestions and comments made with a great deal of interest. I want first to express my gratitude to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for moving this motion. I hope it does not have the same result as that which occurred the last time his party moved a motion related to a former department of mine. They once moved a motion about consumer affairs which so divided the Conservative party that they never again, during the three years I was minister, moved a similar motion related to consumer affairs. The Conservatives did not seem to be able to agree as to what their position should be in respect of consumer affairs. I hope they will be more in agreement in respect of urban policy.

As I say, I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his kindness today in moving the motion that he has because it is a kindness to this government when he asks us to co-operate in good faith with the provinces and municipalities on urban matters. That is preaching to the converted, if I ever heard it. The Leader of the Opposition read us a lesson which indicated that we ought to be doing precisely what we have been doing for some time, what we are doing and what we shall continue to do. It was this government that initiated, and has expressed up and down the country, the concept that urban problems and urban opportunities, so pressing, so accelerating and so far-reaching in their effect on Canada, require co-operative mechanisms and approaches from the government. It was this government that sought to persuade others to develop new mechanisms and approaches so that governments at all levels could impose shape and direction on the growth of urban Canada.

All those things that the Leader of the Opposition mentioned are precisely the reasons this government has a Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. This is what my ministry has been seeking to do, amidst some clucking of hesitancy from some Conservative elements in the country. Such co-operation is what the provincial premiers agreed to support at the first ministers conference in Ottawa last November. The motion that is before us today is, in fact, a lesson for which this government provided the Bible, as it were, in the first comprehensive study of urban conditions in Canada, a study that was published by this government entitled "Urban Canada". It was that study that provided the Bible from which the Leader of the Opposition took his text today. That study analysed the current problems and predicted the deterioration in our life, as well as the worsening and greater inequality of social conditions if trends in urban life do not change.

This government understood those prospects and formed the ministry under my predecessor. It was established, plainly recognizing and accepting two key facts; first, the Canadian fact of life, which is offered not as an excuse but as a fact of life, that municipalities are the creatures of the provinces for jurisdictional purposes, and second, that no one level of government could possibly begin to tackle urban problems in the comprehensive way that is required. These problems required the comprehensive and co-ordinated action of all three levels of government. Accordingly, my ministry's mandate states that it shall foster co-operative relations in urban affairs with the provinces and, through them, their municipalities, and with the public and with private organizations.

Our mandate is:

> to co-ordinate the activities of the government of Canada in establishing co-operative relationships with the provinces and their municipalities for the enhancement of the human environment.

Co-operation and co-ordination with provinces and municipalities is precisely the purpose and the mandate of this ministry. Our mandate is broader than this, requiring us to evaluate existing and proposed policies, projects and activities, to initiate proposals for new policies and to seek, in consultation with other authorities concerned, the co-operative development of an urban policy in Canada. This ministry is instructed to initiate research and policy studies relating to urbanization and is to co-ordinate urban related research within the government of Canada.

It is a wide-ranging mandate that recognizes the crucial importance of co-ordination and co-operation within all levels of government. I quote that mandate because it was alarming to me that the Leader of the Opposition or his research staff, in what I take was a major presentation on urban policy, seemed unaware of what our mandate was and that we have within the government an instrument to do precisely what he was requesting.

I would have enjoyed hearing from the Leader of the Opposition constructive suggestions on how I could fulfil that mandate in an effective way. If he has criticisms of what is being performed, I would have liked to have heard them. But the Leader of the Opposition and his research staff seem unaware of the fact that such a mandate exists. Flowing from this mandate, there have been important initiatives and important new programs. There has been an important shift in attitudes both inside and outside the government. People are beginning to take into much greater account the urban impact on specific problems in transportation, taxation, welfare, environment, housing and so forth. The opposition motion sets out such factors as if they were separate issues to be dealt with separately.

What the motion should do is to appreciate that such problems are a part of each other and are interrelated. For instance, what one does in transportation has an immense impact on job patterns, on housing, on requirements for schools and sewers and much else that goes far beyond transportation's immediate aim of moving people and goods from place to place. I would have hoped that the Conservative motion would have recognized the essential interdependence between these various policies that must be carried out.

Similarly intertwined are those things that governments do in urban Canada, including revenue sharing, social security, immigration, creation of jobs, industrial strategy, and so on. This fact should have been reflected with perception in the motion which attempts to understand, as the opposition alleges, the accumulating problems of urbanization in Canada. We should have heard something positive from them about how such complexities can be studied, debated and acted upon by different levels of government in productive concert. That is the path upon which the government has embarked with some success, and it is to that aspect that the Opposition should be addressing itself today. The motion that is before us today affords us at least the opportunity to report just what is happening, and the Leader of the Opposition has asked for such a report. That is why, as I said, he has done me a real kindness in putting forward the motion today.

It has been the conviction of the government that we in Canada are at an urban crossroads. We know that there are serious social, economic, environmental, cultural and political questions about Canada's urban future, and some have been touched upon today. We also have, and let us grasp this important fact, more bright and more easily realizable opportunities than almost any other highly developed industrial nation. Canada's major problems of poverty, housing, transportation, environment and social equity are in fact her opportunities to create a society of special excellence in the northern part of North America. These problems and opportunities are rooted in the intensifying process of urbanization. As I have said, they are characterized by a high degree of interdependence. They are influenced by a wide range of government policies and programs at all levels of activity. If we are to accomplish our goal, there must be unprecedented co-operation and co-ordination in planning and action between all levels, or the high quality of urban life we have now will become unstuck, and that will create divisions in this country that could sunder it.

The great excitement that I find in travelling through cities in Canada is that people in those cities see other cities in North America and in Europe, many of which are huge urban areas, that have become quite unpleasant areas in which people have to live. The excitement that I find results from the realization that Canadian cities are at the threshhold and so have an opportunity not to go down that path of building huge megalopolises that are unpleasant and unrewarding places in which to live. We have a choice to take another route and to build the kind of urban centres in Canada that we want to build. That is the excitement which I see reflected in the planners, builders and politicians across the country whom I meet.

I say this because I want to make a plea for co-operation at all levels. Anyone who is at all familiar with Canadian urbanization trends appreciates that intergovernmental consultation and co-operation are no longer discretionary. They are mandatory. We face a very rapid rate of urban growth. Most of our principal cities could double their populations, and our biggest cities could triple their populations, over the next three decades. These decades will require the development of more urban area than has been developed in the entire history of the country—more houses, bridges, and roads, more schools and cultural centres, more sewer and water facilities, more of almost everything that makes an urban community. This growth will be guided and shaped by policies and programs within the jurisdiction of and administered by the three levels of government. If this growth is to result in the high quality urban environment that we all desire, and that we can have, not only governments but also other public and private institutions will have to put their heads together as never before, and work co-operatively together as never before.

This government has not needed to be told that there are real problems, national in scope and transcending all political jurisdictions. That is why my predecessor, even before this ministry was formed, began talking about the need for a special study of these problems and for new tools to plan and implement public urban policy. That is why he began seeking national urban planning consultations which would, for the first time, bring the municipalities to the table. That was, and still is, a federal government initiative.

The motion before us refers to co-operation with municipal as well as provincial governments. But the trilevel consultations sought by the government have met difficulties in some provinces which objected to any major consultative role for municipalities. The Leader of the Opposition touched on some of those difficulties. Federal-provincial-municipal talks, meant to lead to some sort of structures for consultation, have been held in Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Victoria. Finally, here in Ottawa last November, the premiers of the provinces agreed to support the principle of, and I quote:

—close co-operation between federal and provincial governments toward the effective co-ordination of their relevant policies and programs.

The first ministers at that meeting instructed that:

—on-going discussions to finalize the exact elements of the consultative mechanism go forward and be expedited.

That instruction, an initiative of the federal government, broke the impasse.

The on-going discussions referred to by the first ministers had been held between my predecessor, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras), and the then Ontario minister of municipal affairs, Darcy McKeough, and Mayor Marcel D'Amour of Hull representing Canadian municipalities. Changes in portfolios delayed the resumption of those discussions.

The Leader of the Opposition asked what was going on, and I am happy to report to him and announce that those difficulties have now been overcome. There is to be a meeting between Mr. McKeough for Ontario, myself for Canada, and Mayor D'Amour on April 10 at Mayor D'Amour's chambers in Hull. That will be a meeting of the committee of which Mr. McKeough was chairman and which was instructed to convene a trilevel conference, and to work towards such a convening. We are to work toward establishing a date and a specific agenda for the first national consultation. I said, Mr. Speaker, this is to be the first national consultation, and I certainly hope it will be the first of many. I hope that meeting will show a federal initiative realized. I hope that bodes well for the future of trilevel discussion, planning and co-operation in Canada. I give the Leader of the Opposition my assurance that I will be there at that meeting, endeavouring in every way I can to ensure that it is a success and that it is productive of results for the development of further consultative machinery and mechanisms.

Our effort toward co-operation goes well beyond trilevel national consultations. The ministry has been engaged from its first day in the development of structured co-ordinating links with separate provinces and, through them, with specific urban regions. These efforts are now starting to show progress, despite the difficulties inherent in such a process. Links have already been established, and specific bodies created for the urban regions of Vancouver and Montreal. These have already yielded practical results of short and long-term significance. Similar links are currently being created for the urban regions of Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Quebec City and Halifax, in all cases with full provincial knowledge, support and involvement. I know that the Leader of the Opposition would wish me well in the creation of those links.

Through such continuing tripartite structures, the ministry is placing itself in a position of knowledge and competence to stimulate and co-ordinate federal in-puts into these urban regions, not on an ad hoc problem by problem basis, as the Leader of the Opposition would have us do, but rather in full awareness of the inter-relationships of urban issues, and within coherent urban frameworks agreed to by all concerned. The ministry has focussed on key agencies in its task of establishing links within the federal government to bring co-ordination and a specifically urban view to federal policies and programs. These include, for example, involvement in major federal works in cities, in disposal of urban located military bases, in decisions regarding the management of federal lands in cities, in investigations and policies regarding urban transportation alternatives in some urban areas.

There is, Mr. Speaker, the closest consultation and involvement with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in developing new and co-ordinated approaches in housing. This involvement with CMHC extends to plans for careful intergovernmental consultation on any new approaches that materialize, after they have been presented to parliament. I want to say a little more in a minute about federal housing programs that were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne.

I wish to mention some aspects of urban transportation, a subject which is referred to in the resolution. Of course, the outstanding example is the recent announcement by both the federal government and the government of Ontario of the site northeast of Toronto for the region's new international airport. The choice of that site was made as a deliberate stimulus to planned urbanization. As the joint announcement of the governments of Canada and Ontario stated, it was made after an exhaustive federal-provincial evaluation of potential sites. The site was chosen for many reasons that are set out in the announcement, but a major one, and one mentioned in the joint announcement was, and I quote:

> —the location east of Toronto is the result of joint federal-provincial effort to provide a major stimulus to development east of metropolitan Toronto as called for in the Toronto-Centred Region Plan.

The government of Ontario has been redesigning the shape and location of some of the proposed communities in order to take the airport location into account. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the airport can provide the stimulus and foundation for an entirely new community. The government of Ontario proposes to establish such a community, which is to be called Cedarwood. The development of this new town, as well as of many of the other principal features of the Toronto-Centred Region Plan, will require the concerted application of both provincial and federal policies and programs. This must be, to a very large extent, a co-operative venture. Both governments recognize this, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition asked what co-operation is there, and I am citing this as a specific example of specific programs that have been co-ordinated.

In its second report on the Toronto-Centred Region Plan, the government of Ontario stated:

> We look forward to working very closely with the (newly established) Ministry (of State for Urban Affairs) in the formulation and implementation of many of our development policies.

May I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the Leader of the Opposition that we are also looking forward to working very closely with Ontario in this area, and discussions to this end are now under way.

Another important part of the mandate of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is to conduct, support and co-ordinate urban research. We are well launched into that. We have begun to study the effects of a range of current government policies on cities and on urban regions. The ministry is now designing public program impact models, of both national and big city scale, that are heavily based on computer simulation. Groups are working on the social consequences of what exists now and what we could have in such areas as housing policy, transportation, government operations affecting urban land and development, new devices to affect the use and allocation of land, and others.

Another important role of the ministry is evaluating existing and future federal policies as they affect urban areas. Our priorities for policy studies include population distribution, urban concentration and growth, government finance and revenue sharing, transportation and communications, federal land management, the character of employment to be created in this decade to meet the massive growth in labour force that is occurring, the federal role in the problems of urban poverty, and others.

You may notice, Mr. Speaker, that our various studies and various initiatives in this area cover the separate items in the opposition motion. In our research effort and in our role of evaluating existing and future federal policies, I want to assure the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) that we are not using research as an excuse for not doing anything but are acting already on the basis of information. In this kind of research and study, we are not seeking theoretical answers but practical solutions and implementation programs.

Having dealt with the ministry, may I now deal with the question raised by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, pollution. I should like to point out that the Department of the Environment has already brought in much legislation in this regard and through the agency which reports to me, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the federal government has, with other governments, been deeply involved in pollution control by means of sewer treatment projects. The National Housing Act provides for federal loans to provinces and municipalities of two-thirds of the cost of sewage treatment facilities including a grant of one-sixth of the cost of each works. The municipalities are hard-pressed for finances, and we are all concerned about pollution. This year, we have made available more than $100 million to the municipalities for this purpose, with the provinces setting the priorities as to where the need is greatest. We have been spending increasingly more in recent years in this program, for a total to date of $500 million. The governments of Canada and Ontario have also entered into an agreement about cleaning up the lower Great Lakes, and the federal funds of $167 million will be provided through this sewer treatment program over the five-year period.

Mr. Speaker, last year and the year before we mounted colossal housing programs, programs amounting to $1.7 billion. It would be infantile to think that we could have done this without the close co-operation of other governments and the private sector. I wish to take this opportunity to thank the provinces and municipalities for this co-operation in serving Canadians. It is this kind of co-operation in good faith, pragmatic co-operation to get things done, that the urban affairs ministry, CMHC and the federal government will pursue and nurture. We believe we will continue to get this kind of co-operation from the provinces and municipalities, in many endeavours, in turn.

If I may give some statistics on the housing program that has been launched, I should like to put on the record the tangible result of the co-operation with the provinces and municipalities which I have already mentioned. In the year just passed, there were 233,000 housing units started and more than 200,000 completed. At the average occupancy rate, this is new housing in one year for more than three-quarters of a million Canadians. It is unthinkable that this could have occurred without the best co-operation between the federal government, the provinces, municipalities and the private sector. With that kind of record I will not accept a charge by the opposition that we have failed to co-operate with other important levels of government.

In 1971, the record year for housing in Canada, the federal government made available to the provinces $306 million for public housing. It is in this particular field that the provinces and municipalities play the greatest role. We provided $306 million for this co-operative effort for Canadians of low income in one year. In the years 1957 through 1963, the Tory government provided an average of $7.5 million a year for public housing, compared with $306 million by the Liberal party.

In 1964, the government of Mr. Pearson amended the National Housing Act to provide the provinces with an option of taking a loan from the federal government for public housing rather than the former system where the federal government had retained a 75 per cent interest. It was this amendment that paved the way for the great upsurge in the building of public housing, and which spurred the creation by the provinces of provincial housing corporations. It has been from the growth of these provincial housing organizations that the great thrust in housing in Canada has become a reality. That thrust, with the federal government the driving force, is assuring that the homebuilding record of 1971 is almost certain of being well surpassed in 1972.

With the provinces, we are co-operating in supporting non-profit organizations in housing the elderly and the handicapped. For two years with a newer thrust, that of home ownership for people of low and modest incomes, provinces have introduced complementary programs to help these home owners, with help ranging from capital grants to interest rebates. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think the mechanism of co-operation has existed in terms of building housing for Canadians. In the ministry we are developing a new mechanism of co-operation and co-ordination, not only on federal government policy but on federal, provincial and municipal policy.

I am grateful to the House, Mr. Speaker, because I think I have gone over my time. I have outlined the kind of programs and the co-operation and co-ordination which were developed and which I have no hesitation in saying will develop. In conclusion, may I say a few words about where that will lead us in terms of federal housing policy.

In the Speech from the Throne which began this session the government said that we will be proposing fresh concepts, continuing research and imagination in neighbourhood improvement, with emphasis on the need for low cost housing. We will be proposing, on the one hand, new financial mechanisms to improve the flow of funds for housing from the capital market. On the other hand, we will be proposing amendments to the National Housing Act to provide a broader range of projects for meeting the needs of low income persons and families and the improvement of urban neighbourhoods.

As a result of the steps that have been taken since 1964, such as the freeing of the National Housing Act, interest rates have increased the flow of funds from the capital market into housing to the extent that we expect the private lending institutions to finance 195,000 housing units in 1972. This funding by private lending institutions is in addition to what the government will do. This, together with the federal government's investment on behalf of low income families, will ensure that at least 240,000 housing units will be started in 1972. We believe that more can be done, particularly to improve the liquidity of mortgages held by such investors as Canada's pension funds, the charter banks and the trust companies. It will be proposed, therefore, that a publicly-owned residential mortgage bank be created to buy and sell residential mortgages, and thus create the liquidity sought by some investors. Opportunities will be created for smaller investors to provide funds through new mortgage investment companies which will create—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I have one more paragraph—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I regret having to interrupt the hon. minister, but I tried to allow him a half minute or so. I think the House is disposed to let him finish but I have to ask for consent. Is there consent for the minister to conclude his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: I would be happy to have the minister finish his paragraph.

• (1650)

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for allowing me to finish my submission. I was saying that, through this legislation, a new residential mortgage bank will be proposed to parliament. Through that instrument, opportunities will be created for smaller investors to provide funds through new mortgage investment companies which will create a new source of funds for residential investment and will also provide the opportunity for small investors to invest their funds at, or near, current mortgage rates.

The amendments to the National Housing Act that parliament will be asked to consider are intended to provide a wide range of assistance to improve the quality of urban neighbourhoods. We intend to provide a wide range of choices for meeting the needs of low income families and disadvantaged groups, wherever they are to be found in Canada. We will continue to offer the strongest support to the provinces for meeting their special needs, and the federal government will also exercise its own initiatives on behalf of low income people. In this co-operative way, we will meet the housing and many other urban needs of Canadians, working in concert with various jurisdictions to maintain and create an urban Canadian excellence.

I thank the Leader of the Opposition for moving his motion and giving me the opportunity to make a statement. I listened to his presentation with interest. I can assure hon. members that I and my officials will listen with great interest to any comments and suggestions that are made in the balance of the debate.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the minister expressed a desire to create in Canada an urban society of special excellence. I am sure that is what we all wish. May I point out to the minister, and to the House, that there is no situation of special excellence at the present time involving the core of Metropolitan Toronto.

First, let me allude to the CMHC plans for building a low dividend, 13-story $2 million apartment house complex in my riding known as Richmond Square. Thirteen floors were supposed to have been finished by last April.

Yet, there the structure is standing, stark and empty, a ghastly sight against the sky. The building has settled in part. The people refer to the 13 floors that dip down as the "Trudeau depression", and with good reason. This is a very poor job on the part of CMHC as well as the contractor. There is no special excellence in certain parts of my riding, where about 25 per cent of the employable people do not have work. They are existing on welfare and unemployment insurance, or using up their savings when they are too proud to apply for welfare.

I confess that the situation would be far worse if it were not for the Local Initiatives Program. I must give the government some marks here, because lots of people are employed on worth-while projects financed under the LIP program. All the same, some of these projects are the goofiest projects you ever heard of in your life. I wonder what the reason is behind giving a grant of up to $12,000 to an individual or group—I am not sure which—for opening a coffee house with the emphasis on creativity. Where does all this lead us—to "spiked" coffee? I really must thank the government for approving an inordinate number of LIP projects in my riding. Out of $23 million or so allowed for Ontario, $1 million worth in projects has been approved for Spadina. This is all very well, and I appreciate it very much. I do not know whether the government is trying to elect me or defeat me in the next election. I know, however, that it seems a little strange that over $277,000 of this money, almost one third of the total approved for my riding, is to go to projects based at Rochdale College. Mr. Speaker, the government must make greater endeavours to bring about special excellence in our urban society, and especially in the core of Metropolitan Toronto.

Of all problems accumulating in the urbanization of Canada, the problem of poverty is one of the most acute. In 1967 our metropolitan areas accounted for more than one third of Canada's poor families and for more than one half of individuals living below the poverty line established by the Economic Council of Canada. A 1965 study by the Canadian Welfare Council gave equally startling and depressing accounts of the high incidence of urban poverty in Canada. The median per capita income of surveyed poor families was less than $400 in St. John's and Montreal, $500 in Toronto and $600 in Vancouver. Mr. Speaker, it takes a great deal more to live in downtown Toronto than in a village like Omemee near Peterborough. Poverty is not a problem merely of an insufficient income. It is a problem of inferior health, inadequate housing, low education and involves many other difficulties. There is no doubt that the urban poor face these difficulties to an almost intolerable degree.

The National Welfare Council's urban policy study found that 26 per cent of such families had no male head; in 43 per cent of such households there was a chronic physical problem in the family. The study also found that 70 per cent of the males and females involved had less than a grade 8 education; 46 per cent were unemployed for a period greater than ten weeks and their housing was judged to be unfit or bad, being in the lowest of possible categories in almost half of all the cases reviewed. The need for aggressive government policies to cope with this problem of urban poverty is very great. The need is immediate, Mr. Speaker, for the problem is a growing one.

The Lithwick report on urban poverty released last year warned that urban areas were increasing their relative share of Canada's poor population.

I contend that, despite the demonstrated need for a concerted federal effort to cope with poverty and, particularly, urban poverty, the Trudeau government's philosophy and policy in relation to the problem has been chaotic and inconsistent, as several examples will easily demonstrate. Last March the Lithwick report slapped the Trudeau government on the knuckles for its mistaken approach to the problem of aiding the urban poor. According to the Lithwick report, the majority of urban poor are unemployables who are not helped by manpower policies. Fully 40 per cent of all urban poor are single individuals over 65 years of age or consist of families headed by an aged person. Another 30 per cent are not in the labour force for other reasons, such as illness or handicaps. The Trudeau government has, on occasion, publicly supported the Lithwick findings. Equally frequently, it has denied the very same findings.

Consider, for example, the actions of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro). He has been known to set himself up as the champion of the cause of the urban poor against what he has called the extreme, intolerant rightism or welfare backlash. In a speech on October 10, 1971 he is reported to have said that most of the people receiving welfare in our society are not the unemployed employables. Scarcely six weeks later, he spoke about poverty and welfare to members of the House of Commons. Despite his statement that almost 90 per cent of people on welfare are totally outside the work force and often incapable of ever entering the work force, he spent the majority of his speech telling us about unemployment insurance, opportunities for youth and other job creating schemes that the federal government had authorized as part of the anti-poverty battle. Small wonder that the Toronto Star headline for the next day read "jobs, not handouts government policy for the poor: Munro". There is no doubt that the programs the Trudeau government has billed as its anti-poverty weapons are inadequate to do the job. Both manpower and non-manpower programs are at fault.

Let us consider the anti-poverty plan most publicized in recent months by the Trudeau government, the Family Income Security Plan. According to the official news release, FISP is, and I quote:

—part of a larger 'package' which the federal government has developed to fight poverty in this country.

However, the minister has forgotten to co-ordinate all parts of this so-called package with the result that there is a flaw, possibly a fatal flaw, in the anti-poverty effectiveness of FISP. The problem is that under the Canada Assistance Plan, the provinces are entitled to lower their rates of welfare assistance in proportion to the higher family allowance payments these families will be receiving when FISP becomes law. Under Section 2(b)(iii) of the Canada Assistance Plan, there is a provision that the provinces, in determining the degree of need and arrangements for social assistance to applicants for welfare, shall take into account all income maintenance payments through unemployment insurance, old age security, Canada Pension Plan, and guaranteed income supplement schemes. However, it is optional for the provinces to take into account family allowance and other schemes. Currently, none of the provinces calculate family allowance payments as income for purposes of social assistance.

However, it is entirely possible that when the new, higher benefits to poor families are paid after FISP becomes law, some of the provinces will start to include FISP as part of the welfare applicants' incomes and will lower family social assistance payments correspondingly. It is especially likely that the poorer provinces, which have long felt hard-pressed by the inflexible 50-50 cost-sharing arrangements with the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan, will unfortunately feel compelled to make such a revision. This problem in the relationship between FISP and the Canada Assistance Plan is an important one, and it is essential that the Minister of National Health and Welfare take immediate steps to correct it if he is sincere in his desire to fight poverty.

The Family Income Security Plan has been a political football for the entire life of the Trudeau government. Its repeated delaying of the plan, its high-handed approach to negotiations with Quebec and its refusal to let the people of Canada in on its intentions for the plan certainly throw into question the stated desire of this government to aid those in poverty. Today, we have again heard rumours of a major change in FISP. It is to be hoped that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare change their tactics this time, that they carefully and immediately explain the changes and ramifications of these changes to the Canadian people and that they then act upon these changes in the form of legislation brought before this House without further delay.

Family allowances are not the only means stated by the federal government to cope with poverty in this country, especially in urban areas where the majority of the poor live. Manpower policies are another route by which the federal government has proposed to help some of the poor. It is not necessary to carry out much investigation before coming to the conclusion that Canada's manpower policies do not serve best those who need them most. Too much of the emphasis in manpower policies is on helping those Canadians who are able to achieve the same goals under their own steam, and too little manpower money is allocated toward helping the hard-core unemployed, the poor, and persons otherwise disadvantaged.

For example, Canada's manpower training programs have come under heavy fire from critics who point out that present programs tend to favour those persons who offer the best potential for employment to the detriment of the riskier subliterate individual who may be one of the hard-core unemployed and the poor. In many ways, the principles, regulations and practices of the manpower training program operate in such a way that the majority of resources are channelled toward those who would likely be successful on their own and away from those who really need the help.

Like the training program, the scheme of mobility grants has been proven guilty of favouring the best prospects for success and of leaving the poor and hard-core unemployed where they seem always to have been, at the bottom of the Trudeau government's list for receiving federal aid. One survey of workers receiving mobility grants found that 75 per cent of the movers openly stated they would have moved even if the government had not offered them mobility grants. Therefore, only 25 per cent of the people were really influenced by the grants.

The catalogue continues in similar fashion. Opportunities for Youth, Local Initiatives, all are schemes oriented to the young, middle-class generation that have the information and education necessary to dream up a project and present it to the federal government, using terminology and phraseology that civil servants understand and the regulations demand. The poor and the hard-core unemployed lack this essential background. Consequently, the manpower policies and programs of the Trudeau government are a failure in helping the 13 per cent of the poor who are in the labour force, and that is the estimate of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as well as the other poor people who could join the labour force if there were an appropriate strategy geared to meeting their needs. Indeed, an appropriate manpower strategy has many times been suggested by reputable persons.

As the Economic Council of Canada has pointed out, the federal government's strategy in the field of manpower policy is primarily a growth strategy, with the objectives of equity and stabilization clearly being secondary. I refer hon. members to the Eighth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, page 98. Recently several prominent economists have been suggesting a shift in our priorities in manpower policy goals so that equity is more directly sought. The Trudeau government is urged to heed this advice. What about the other urban poor, the ones who are not helped by either family allowances or by manpower policies? According to the Lithwick report, a large number of these are the aged and female family heads with children. What is the Trudeau government doing for these people?

The Liberals' efforts to help the aged are now generally recognized as miserly and hypocritical. After boosting old age pensions by 42 cents and removing the 2 per cent cost-of-living escalator, they rationalized this move by loudly proclaiming how generous they were being in raising the guaranteed income supplement. Yet people receiving even the maximum supplement, in cases of extreme poverty, still are not brought up even to the poverty line. A single person in 1971 received OAS and GIS payments at a rate of $1,620 per year while the poverty line for them in that year was $2,013. Likewise, a couple receiving maximum OAS and GIS benefits at a rate of $3,060 in 1971 still got less than the 1971 poverty line of $3,355. Consequently, the Old Age Security and guaranteed income supplement legislation fall far short of helping the aged poor.

The hypocrisy of the government is again shown by its attitude toward females who are heads of families. Where is the massive day-care centre plan needed to help poverty-stricken mothers who wish to get off the welfare treadmill and back into the labour market, but cannot afford to do so because of the cost of boarding children during the day? The new tax deductions for day care may help the middle income working wife, but they are insufficient in themselves to help the poverty-stricken mother who must raise her family alone. These women also need other supportive services from the federal government.

Throughout its term of office, the government has consistently turned a deaf ear to the valid criticisms of many Canadians with regard to its anti-poverty programs. Many of these faults could be corrected without too much fuss, yet the Prime Minister and his cabinet are so stiff-necked with pride that they refuse to accept most criticism directed at them. Instead, they righteously parade their list of so-called accomplishments, and sulk with hurt pride whenever they are chided for errors and inadequacies in these accomplishments. Many issues facing the nation today are too urgent to permit such time-wasting. Urban poverty is such an issue.

The problem of urban poverty is a growing one. Present welfare and manpower programs are inadequate to deal with the problems. New initiatives, a new approach and a new commitment to solve the problem are needed. Mr. Speaker, if this government is not willing to provide these, the Progressive Conservative party is.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF THE GOVERNMENT TO CO-OPERATE WITH PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENTS IN DEALING WITH URBAN PROBLEMS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stanfield:

That this House, alarmed at this government's inability to deal with the accumulating problems of urbanization in Canada, declares that a federal government must co-operate in good faith with provincial and municipal governments in planning and in implementing policies on revenue sharing, inter-urban transportation, housing, urban poverty, pollution and rural depopulation.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Official Opposition for moving the motion which is before us; it gives us an opportunity to take part in a general debate on a whole range of questions. The difficulty about the resolution and about the debate so far is that both are so far-ranging. The matters mentioned in the resolution include revenue-sharing, interurban transportation, housing, urban poverty, pollution and rural depopulation. In such a form it amounts to a kind of motherhood resolution asking the federal government to co-operate with the provinces and municipalities in examining a wide range of urban problems. None of us in this House would deny the need to look at these matters. The minister, replying to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), drew attention to the record of the government in showing initiative in these fields and in bringing about co-operation on a broad front in the course of these activities.

Today I shall not attempt to deal with the generality of these questions, some of which are extremely serious and will be with us for some time. Instead, I shall attempt to place one specific matter before the House and call attention to the need for further initiative with regard to it. I believe the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, should institute a program of grants for capital and operating costs in connection with a system of underground rapid rail transit in all our metropolitan cities. If we were to pick one single priority which would contribute most in terms of an improvement to the quality of life in our cities, I think it should be this one. As a starting point, I would take every metropolitan area with a population of 500,000 or more.

The story is the same in case after case. The automobile, which made the suburbs possible, is slowly strangling urban life. I am proud to see present in the chamber some of my colleagues who have co-operated when other motions have been before the House on other occasions. I go back to the question of public transport. The automobile creates a most difficult situation for those who are responsible for municipal affairs. It distorts budget priorities. As a member of the Ottawa City Council I never heard a single taxpayer complain about the million dollars a mile it cost to build a thruway, the Queensway, for example, or about proposals for a never-ending series of rapid, limited access expressways to bring yet more automobiles into the centre of the town and put them on streets inadequate to cope with them. But many taxpayers complained loudly about suggestions that a modest subsidy be granted to the operation of a public transport system. The automobile not only distorts the budget but it benefits from an untold number of subsidies, subsidies to build those expressways, off-street parking, traffic signals, a whole range of facilities. Public transportation does not receive the same kind of subsidy or encouragement.

Apart from this, there is the whole question of pollution to be considered. Anyone trying to take a walk, even in Ottawa which I consider to be a relatively unpolluted city, finds himself plagued by exhaust fumes, the waste products of lead fuels used in internal combustion motors. They are inescapable. We learn from recent studies that more than 50 per cent of the nitrous pollutants in the air of our cities come from private automobiles. There are conditions in which fumes from private automobiles and other industrial sources of pollution can be deadly. In certain conditions, sulphuric acid droplets are created in the air, droplets corrosive enough to erode the stone of these very buildings.

Federal Co-operation in Urban Problems

In the course of the great efforts which have been made to improve the national capital, some tentative steps have been taken toward improving public transportation. I had the honour to sponsor a resolution calling upon the government to enter into negotiations with the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec with a view to establishing a national capital region public transportation authority. This resolution was cast not in terms of solving the problems of a relatively small area, however important. It was designed to permit the federal government to set up, as a demonstration, the sort of arrangement which could be carried out in all our large cities. This motion was debated on March 6, 1970 as reported in Hansard at pages 4494 to 4504 and again on May 17, 1971, as recorded on pages 5872-5875. On the latter date I enjoyed the rare honour of seeing a private member's resolution passed in this House. I am still waiting to learn what consequences follow from such a signal honour. Nevertheless, it was a source of some satisfaction to me.

Today, I welcome the presence in the House of my colleague, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) who supported me in the earlier debate. He has favoured the idea of a monorail. I have an open mind on that matter. Possibly monorail transit is the solution. But this leads us to the second aspect of the question, which is that the federal government should take the lead in an area in which the municipalities themselves are powerless to do so. It must lead not only with grants and programs but with some basic research as well.

The technology of moving men and women in vehicles other than the private automobile in peak hours from the centre of cities has to be examined through a series of research grants. Some years ago when I was a member of the Ottawa Transportation Commission I had an opportunity of going to a United States transit association convention in San Francisco, and there we looked at the Bay Area Rapid Transit system. They were building something like 75 miles of rapid transit in one fell swoop, giving rapid transit to a city that had almost forgotten what public transportation was. Before embarking upon that system they had had to establish test laboratories to find out what kind of motors should be used. They were testing two kinds of alternating current motors and two kinds of direct current motors. They had to design coaches and do some fundamental research before making the decisions appropriate to their conditions.

The reservations that I have about a monorail system are twofold. First, there is a major switching problem of going from one line to another. The system seems to be adaptable for use as an airport line; for example, going from the centre of a large metropolitan area to the airport serving the community and back again.

Then, there is a major question concerning weather conditions. We are faced with ice and sleet, which is a severe test in wintertime, and these conditions do create problems for public transportation systems. I note that the famous Turbo train which operates between Toronto and Montreal ran into continuing technical difficulties, and had an accident resulting from weather conditions a few days ago.

Federal Co-operation in Urban Problems

Surely one of the very specific areas in which the government of Canada can take the initiative, consistent with our constitutional position and with the rights of provinces and municipalities, is in the area of public transportation. If a city is desirous of establishing an underground transportation system, such as Montreal did for Expo, the provision of some research grants would produce some conclusive and reliable evidence as to whether to develop a rapid transit system consisting of steel on steel or rubber on steel. Montreal made its decision based on the fact that they had to meet a serious time factor, and as a result their system was a costly one.

I am glad to see the minister is paying careful attention to my remarks, and I am delighted to see him here. I think that federal initiative in this area should be geared to the specific conditions prevailing in Canada, to the kind of cities we have and the kind of population densities we have in those cities, and to the immense difficulties we have to face in trying to plan forward in cities when we do not know what the future holds. An underground rail rapid transit system, could be the key to the kind of densities that you would have in centretown, to the use of the most expensive real estate, to the patterns of transportation which flow from the centre of metropolitan areas through an interurban pattern. The technology has to be established, and it can be established only with financial assistance at senior levels of government.

I have touched on just one problem. I am sure members on the other side of the House are interested in this matter and will give us their views. In my submission, this is one specific area in which it will be possible to make a positive contribution to the quality of life in our cities.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate on the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), which reads as follows:

That this House, alarmed at this government's inability to deal with the accumulating problems of urbanization in Canada, declares that a federal government must co-operate in good faith with provincial and municipal governments in planning and in implementing policies on revenue sharing, interurban transportation, housing, urban poverty, pollution and rural depopulation.

I should like to put some emphasis on the question of rural depopulation. The nature and extent of rural depopulation in Canada has severely damaged the quality of life in rural Canada and has aggravated many of our urban problems as well. The Progressive Conservative party has committed itself to revitalizing rural Canada. This is an important aspect of providing more humane and manageable urban development. The following resolutions were formally accepted by our policy convention at the Progressive Conservative annual meeting on December 5, 1971.

1. Federal policy should recognize and develop the importance of Canadian towns and other communities under 10,000 population, in the following ways:

(a) Present national policies which in fact now hurt or with change could help Canadian small communities should be systematically reviewed and changed.

(b) Meetings should be convened with the provinces to develop a national policy for the towns and rural communities of Canada.

(c) There should be consideration of establishing an objective "Towns Test" to determine the effect upon smaller communities of every piece of new legislation proposed for consideration by parliament or for implementation by order-in-council, and a National Council from the towns to ensure a liaison between the national governments and representatives or local government, to meet quarterly for two-week periods in Ottawa to review legislation and practices which affect smaller communities and rural Canada, and to make recommendations informally to standing committees of parliament and government departments and prepare a formal annual report to parliament.

(d) Public servants whose decisions seriously affect Canadian small communities should, wherever possible, have personal experience in small communities and should be required to spend an annual two-week sabbatical in a different town or rural community, in a different region each year.

(e) In consultation with the provinces, professions, and representatives of small communities, there should be established a small agency of lawyers, economists, and others, independent of federal government in the manner of a Crown corporation, supported in part by the subscription of local governments, and available to assist member local governments, when they are engaged in major confrontations with groups whose expertise or other power is disproportionately strong.

It is now the unique good fortune of Canada to possess both great cities and strong smaller communities. Any serious weakening of Canada's smaller communities would involve a high human cost to the people forced to move, a high dollar cost to the cities forced to receive them, and a higher cultural cost to a country which values the qualities of life in smaller communities.

There is evidence that smaller communities can be both viable and valuable to Canada. Roughly 35 per cent of Canadians interviewed in the 1966 census live in communities of population less than 10,000, and the general quality of Canadian life is enhanced by the continued existence of communities where there is a sense of place, a sense of neighborliness, a tradition of responsible participation in local affairs, and a respect for environment.

While it is recognized that the provinces are responsible for municipalities, it is also recognized that many areas of federal responsibility nevertheless seriously affect smaller communities in Canada, and that it should be a conscious policy of the federal government to co-operate with the provinces in developing the full potential of these communities. Present national policies concerning transportation and transportation services, housing, industrial development, agriculture, taxation, trade and other matters often harm or fail to benefit smaller communities in Canada. The official harm done these communities, while sometimes deliberate, is often simply the result of policy makers ignoring or not knowing the interests of smaller communities. The limited budgets, limited experience and limited expertise of smaller communities often place those communities at a serious disadvantage in dealing with governments, agencies, corporations and other powerful groups.

There is now virtually no effective federal provision to help provinces or smaller communities meet the special problems and opportunities of smaller Canadian communities. Leadership by government in recognizing the potential and value of Canadian towns and smaller communities will encourage private industry, institutions and individuals to recognize the viability of such communities. A Progressive Conservative government of Canada will encourage and strengthen smaller communities, as a necessary complement to the continued growth of large urban communities and attitudes. A Progressive Conservative government will undertake a systematic review and amendment of all national policies which in fact now harm but which with change could help smaller communities including, specifically, policy respecting housing, industrial development and incentives, resource development, railroads and other national transportation, the Canada Council, the CBC and other national cultural institutions, agriculture, manpower, taxation and trade.

A Progressive Conservative government will convene meetings with the provinces to work out a national policy for the towns and rural communities of Canada. A Progressive Conservative government will consider, as one step, the establishment of a special small communities branch in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to, first, maintain in co-operation with the provinces and local communities an up to date inventory of industrial opportunities in Canadian smaller communities; second, to ensure the inclusion of small community representatives in certain Canadian trade missions and government-industrial briefings; third, to circulate to local officials the latest information on trading and industrial developments of importance to small communities; fourth, to prepare and circulate an annual report on technological and other changes which allow modern industry to move outside cities, and a list of the kinds of industry so liberated; and, fifth, to otherwise assist the development of a modern industrial base in Canada's smaller communities.

A Progressive Conservative government will consider the establishment of an objective test, perhaps to be called a town's test, to determine the effect upon smaller communities of every piece of new legislation proposed for consideration by parliament or for implementation by order in council.

Mr. Baldwin: This government would fail on that score.

An hon. Member: The echo over there is significant.

Mr. Paproski: These are all real suggestions for the government and I want the minister to take note of them so he may implement them in his new work.

Mr. Baldwin: He will not be here long enough to do it.

Mr. Basford: There will be more chance for me to do it than for the hypothetical government they are talking about.

Mr. Paproski: I hope you do something in respect of that bridge in British Columbia; they are still asking for a little loan. A Progressive Conservative government will consider the establishment of a national committee from the towns, appointed for short, fixed terms by elected local councils through the provinces—under the representational formula pertaining to the Senate—to ensure liaison between the national government and the representatives of local government, to meet quarterly for two-week periods in Ottawa to review legislation and practices which affect smaller communities and rural Canada and to make recommendations informally to standing committees of parliament and government departments and to prepare a formal annual report to parliament. Isn't that great stuff!

A Progressive Conservative government will consider the appointment of a five-person secretariat, along the lines of the office of the commissioner on bilingualism, to assist the national committee from the towns and to work with standing committees of parliament whose deliberations concern rural Canada. The hiring policy of a Progressive Conservative government will consider the personal experience in towns of each public servant whose decisions would seriously affect Canadian small communities and will further consider sending public servants in such sensitive positions on an annual two-week sabbatical to a different town or rural community, in a different region each year, to help develop in Ottawa an adequate perspective on small communities and to help forge human links between national policy and local requirements.

In recognition of the serious lack of relevant expertise in small communities dealing with governments, corporations and other powerful groups, and in a consequent attempt to give David a slingshot, a Progressive Conservative government will consider establishing, in co-operation with the provinces and professions, a small agency of lawyers, economists and others independent of the federal government in the manner of a Crown corporation, supported in part by the subscription of local governments and available to assist member local governments when they are engaged in major confrontations with groups whose expertise or other power is disproportionately strong. A Progressive Conservative government will, through its appointments and other means, act generally to utilize the talents and potentials of Canadians from smaller communities so they might better make their indispensable contribution to the quality of life of modern Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this is my part in the debate and I hope the minister has taken note of it.

Mr. Basford: Have you run out of notes?

Mr. Paproski: No. I have a lot of material, but other hon. members wish to speak this afternoon. I thank hon. members for allowing me the time to speak.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to preface my remarks by congratulating the minister on his appointment as Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I would remind him that when he was Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I tagged him as the national shadow-boxing champion of Canada, for the simple reason that under his ministry Canadians had the highest priced drugs than ever before. He has assumed the mantle of Minister of State for Urban Affairs when Canadians are paying the highest prices for housing we have ever experienced. I hope that when he re-reads the speech he made today he will, in all humility, appreciate that Canadians are paying the highest price for housing that we have ever experienced.

We in the New Democratic Party agree with the motion presented by the Progressive Conservative party and we share the alarm expressed because of the government's inability to deal with the problems of housing and urbanization. Indeed, we share the alarm of most Canadians, not only in respect of the inability of the federal government to deal with these problems of urbanization but the inability of the provincial governments.

I think it would be fair to say that this federal government to the present time has shown lack of leadership, slowness of response and lack of co-ordination and planning in respect of the problems of urban life. It could be said that the provinces also have been guilty of lack of co-operation, participation and determination as well as lack of appreciation of the magnitude and urgency of urban problems. Having blamed both federal and provincial governments, I would imagine most Canadians would say, "Plague on both Houses", but I am a charitable person and would like to think that these problems are not directly the responsibility of either the federal or the provincial governments: they are an accumulation of problems as a result of urban growth in an industrial society. When one realizes that by the year 1980 two-thirds of all Canadians will be living in 29 major Canadian cities, one appreciates the impact of these problems and the necessity to tackle them. This also indicates the urgency of the need for co-operation and co-ordination.

When I heard the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) speak about the mandate of his government I was reminded of the year 1967 when the federal-provincial conference on housing and urban development met. At that time Mr. Pearson took the initiative and suggested the establishment of a national urban council to take on the problems of the big cities through a tri-level approach. I was also reminded of the rejection of this proposal by most of the provinces. It was the predecessor of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who reintroduced the idea in 1970 and then, rather cautiously but persuasively, tried to impress upon the provincial governments the need for a tri-level approach to our major problems. In November of 1971 all the provinces made a commitment to form a national urban council. From that time to today, when the minister announced that there will be a meeting in April of this year of federal-provincial-municipal representatives, we have been left in the dark with regard to the problem.

As has been indicated by some of the provinces, there has been a change of attitude. The province of Ontario has attempted to approach the problem from the point of view of tax sharing revenue, which would probably scuttle the structure of a national urban council. Today we find that the minister has announced the meeting for April. One wonders just how long it would have taken the minister to announce the meeting if the opposition had not brought forward this motion today. One wonders what political advantage he was attempting to gain by holding off and keeping quiet.

I should like to deal very briefly with one of the major aspects of this resolution, that is, the aspect of housing. May I remind members of the House that in April of 1969 we witnessed the resignation of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) because the government refused to implement the recommendations of the task force report on housing. From that time there has been no legislative program on housing by this government and we have had very little new programs in the housing field: no legislative changes have taken place since.

The predecessor of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs was a man who dedicated his time to research rather than to action. He surrounded himself by academics and consultants, and instead of tackling problems he attempted to research them. We now find that the problems are still with us, but the minister has left us. The previous minister appointed Harvey Lithwick to make a study. He came forth with a report entitled "Urban Canada—Problems and Prospects". Today, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs called it the bible. I might say that probably he and many others have not read Harvey Lithwick's report. I hope that after the minister reads it he will take some action on it, because when he calls it the bible this might mean that, like the bible which usually sits on the shelf and accumulates dust, the same might be happening to the report.

As to Harvey Lithwick, he resigned in disgust because of lack of initiative of this government with regard to implementing the ideas that were set forth in his report. He revealed the bureaucracy and empire building that goes on within the department and then took the obvious course and resigned.

The minister's predecessor appointed Walter Rudnicki to set up a new policy and planning division. He also appointed Michael Dennis to prepare a report with regard to social housing, in particular low cost housing. He also had a task force to report to him within one year on what changes should be made to the National Housing Act to meet the needs of the seventies. None of these reports has been made public, although the minister has had them in his possession for some time. I call on the minister to exercise participatory democracy by divulging to all Canadians what was contained in that report.

Canadians should know what they have paid for in obtaining consultants to prepare reports concerning the housing and urban problems in Canada. I do not think the minister should take upon himself the decision to keep these reports secret. He should make them public and refer them to the appropriate committee for study and discussion. It is only by hearsay and from articles that we know what the reports contain. In a recent article by Michael Audain, entitled "Housing and People", published by the Canadian Council on Social Development in the December 1971 issue, he attempted to point out the gist of some of the recommendations which Canadians have paid for and which the government is keeping secret. The first recommendation is as follows:

> CMHC should be restructured and reoriented to change its role from that of primarily serving as a public lending institution to one capable of devising comprehensive and socially sensitive housing policies for the federal government, the implementation of which might in many cases be devolved to provincial and local agencies.

We have seen the performance of this government in the past few years, namely, that of a friendly banker being slowly pushed into developing a program to assess the comprehensive needs that Canadians have with regard to housing. We agree with this principle and we urge that the federal urban council be set up immediately because it is needed to assess, to plan and to co-ordinate housing needs across Canada and, as the minister said, not only housing needs but the impact with regard to pollution, transportation and many related problems. We agree with that and we ask the minister to change the role of a friendly banker to one of active participation in developing a comprehensive program of our social needs in housing. The second recommendation in the report is as follows:

The federal government should undertake an aggressive land assembly program to stem the most inflationary factor in housing costs: the price of land. This program would involve a considerably greater financial commitment than the $100 million that CMHC has spent on land assembly in the last ten years and a much more direct relationship with municipalities.

Of the three cost items with regard to housing today—land, building materials and interest rates—the greatest increase in cost has been in land. It is high time that the government took the initiative with regard to a land assembly program initiated by them in co-operation with the provincial and municipal governments. I am reminded of the experience of the hon. member for Trinity when he attempted to direct moneys to municipalities for housing, and the storm that he encountered: it was probably one of the major reasons he resigned. For the edification of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs may I quote the words of a British expert, Professor John Donnison of the London School of Economics who, speaking in Canada in 1968, said:

Municipal authorities must act quickly to acquire large tracts of land, before they are actually needed, and under compulsory powers if necessary, to counteract the problems of fast-rising land prices in urban centres. Buy more land now, rather than try to control prices. The land thus acquired can be leased to private developers, for example, when the time is right for development. Such programs may call for a large initial investment by the government, but thereafter they generally cover their costs or make a profit.

The government, even though it has had the mandate, has not acted with regard to land assembly. It is time the minister set forth in his capital budget the amount of money he is prepared to make available to the provinces and municipalities with which to acquire land. If he does not, we will have a continuation of the speculation that prevails with regard to housing and we will experience ever higher costs of land.

The third recommendation of the task force is that a new section regarding housing rehabilitation should be written into the National Housing Act. Under its provisions, low-interest rate loans would be made available to landlords and homeowners prepared to improve their homes without displacing present occupants. May I remind the minister that home improvement loans in Canada have been on a steady decline for the last four or five years. It is high time that grants and low-interest loans were made available for people to rehabilitate and rebuild their homes. It is not sufficient to give such grants and loans to landlords without taking into account the necessity for rent control or strict adherence to housing maintenance bylaws: otherwise, the money goes to subsidize slum landlords who do not pass the benefit on to their tenants.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has often asked for the provision of such low-cost loans and has told us of the experience of old age pensioners who live in cities and who want to repair their homes but do not have the necessary money to undertake repairs. Surely it is time for the minister to make available to municipalities moneys so that it can be loaned to house-owners, who in turn will repay these loans at very low interest rates as part of their taxes. It is not the duty of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to protect the banks and insist that people go to banks for home improvement loans. He has a duty to take care of people who cannot obtain loans from banks and cannot pay the high interest rates that are demanded. I urge the minister to take note of this suggestion.

The fourth recommendation that might be incorporated is an important one: it is that the federal government should reduce its spending on subsidized public housing to a point that might lead to eventual abandonment of the program. This is a recommendation in the report that the government has in hand. It seems that the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) is still haunting us!

In his task force report on housing development, he said, "Away with public housing!" He made it the whipping-boy. Instead of attacking the problem which shows that housing needs cannot be met through the private market, he made public housing the whipping-boy. I hope this minister does not fall into the same trap and follow that line of argument. The so-called stigmatization of the social environment by public housing is something that is completely false. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that only 10 per cent of all 1970 starts were in public housing. I remind the minister that the Senate Committee on Poverty has urged an expanded program of public housing. Surely it is time that we built public housing which would be satisfying for people to live in, embracing some of the ideas and initiatives that have been tried in European countries? As in England, we could have municipally-owned public housing. We could develop co-operative housing as they do in Sweden and adopt the idea of rent allowances as in Germany.

I notice that my time is drawing to a close, Mr. Speaker, and therefore I wish to direct my final remarks to the interest rates that people pay for housing. The minister expanded his chest and boasted that legislation has been prepared with regard to a residential mortgage bank. Isn't it high time that he directed his efforts to our high interest rates, the highest we have ever experienced in Canada?

There are four things we need in Canada: a right to housing, a right to medicare, a right to employment and a right to education. It has been said many times that every Canadian is entitled to clean, warm shelter as a matter of basic human right. I call upon the minister to forget the banks and lending institutions and direct his attention to lowering interest rates so that all Canadians may live in decency.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Federal Co-operation in Urban Problems

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the minister had assumed the functions of Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In his three years as consumer and corporate affairs minister he brought in 12 new pieces of consumer legislation—more legislation in the consumer field than we had seen at the federal level in the last 20 years. His experience in consumer affairs is the right kind of background for the public housing role which has become the pre-eminent concern of CMHC during the past several years. Just to show how important that role has become, in 1971 the government of Canada made $306 million available for public housing. The public housing impact has pushed housing unit starts to new records—to 233,000 starts last year and over 200,000 completions in 1971, while at least 240,000 starts are forecast for 1972.

There is no lack of activity, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to pose the question about the quality of this activity in terms of the kind of living conditions we will find in all these new subdivisions, condominiums, limited income and various low-cost housing five or ten years from now. I represent an area which reflects the accommodation and living problems which plague major Canadian cities. What I find most frustrating is that we seem to know pretty well the way in which most of the problems should be solved yet we continue to commit the same errors of planning, the same unco-ordinated, unaesthetic development of subdivisions and apartments that characterize most of our suburban landscape whether it is outside Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg or Vancouver.

The Speech from the Throne indicated what the minister reiterated today, that the government intends to introduce new measures to provide a wider range of assistance to improve the quality of urban neighbourhoods. This program will replace the urban renewal program which the previous minister dropped last year because it tended to encourage the bulldozer approach to urban renewal. The new program will stress urban rehabilitation, a concept of which I heartily approve.

However, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the result—certainly unexpected—of the decision by the department to drop the urban renewal program.

Two municipalities in the riding of Laprairie, namely Greenfield Park and Laprairie, had undertaken some rather expensive studies under the urban renewal program with the idea that they would receive subsidies from the federal and provincial governments. When the program was suddenly terminated last year, these municipalities, which has undertaken these studies in good faith, found themselves saddled with considerable expenditures which were unexpected and not provided for in their estimates.

I think that it is altogether unfair, on the part of the federal government, to refuse to honour the obligations that it had agreed to assume when Laprairie and Greenfield Park ordered studies under the urban renewal program.

I strongly advise the minister to make sure that the department recognizes what I consider to be its moral obligation toward Greenfield Park and Laprairie.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

While it appears from the Throne Speech and from what the minister said today that much will be done to improve the quality of urban neighbourhoods, I ask: What about suburbia? When will we realize that by giving a stronger social animator role to CMHC we could, at practically no additional cost, vastly improve our expanding suburbs. This social animator role on the part of CMHC would necessarily reflect the needs of any given area.

I do not think the corporation could expect to play the same sort of role in all areas across Canada. For example, in the national capital region it is time that CMHC, in co-operation with the National Capital Commission, started pushing for underground electrical wiring and underground telephone cables. A street not far from Parliament Hill was completely ripped up last summer. I happened to travel over it at that time. A few months later I noticed that although the street was fully repaired, one side of the street was a tangled network of telephone and electrical cables. I am sure, since the city of Ottawa had spent hundreds of thousands of dollars repairing the street, that at very little additional cost it could have put these electrical and telephone cables underground. However, it is not possible, apparently, for the National Capital Commission or CMHC to force these kinds of measures on the city.

We who are in public life find that too many people take too many things for granted. For instance, to the average citizen it seems that governments think out solutions to all kinds of problems more thoroughly than is the case. Such an assumption is in error, as is evident when one comes to this place. I also think that different levels of government assume that other levels of government are thinking more about problem solving than is the case. Here we find the city of Ottawa allowing overhead wiring to exist even though opportunities present themselves for placing these wires, at low cost, underground. I feel that in an area such as this the National Capital Commission and CMHC in concert ought to exert some influence. These bodies should adopt an innovative, social-animator role in the Ottawa area and put pressure on the municipal council to act.

In other parts of Canada the role played by CMHC might differ. Along the south shore of the St. Lawrence, in the federal electoral district of Laprairie which I represent, one finds that many things have not been done that should have been done. For instance, many municipalities are still encouraging new housing subdividers to come in without properly capitalizing the costs of all services related to such subdivisions.

The municipalities look at obvious things such as sewage, water, perhaps sidewalks, and capitalize the cost of those services; that is, they apportion over a fixed period the capital costs against people who will live in the neighbourhood or subdivision and will have to pay these capital costs through taxes. However, the rest of the people in the municipality end up paying for a whole host of other costs associated with the development of any particular subdivision. I am talking about things such as interest charges, street lighting, police services, fire services and administrative services as well as the many small items that do not look very large when provided for a single house but which add up very quickly when provided for a 200- or 300-house subdivision. These costs become a serious tax burden for the taxpayers of a municipality.

Now, in some parts of Canada, provincial governments are requiring adequate capitalization to provide such services so that they are included in the price of the lot. This, however, is still not occurring in Quebec. I suggest that in areas where provincial governments do not take on the necessary innovative or social animator role CMHC should exert indirectly the kind of pressure that is necessary to protect the average municipal taxpayer.

Let me talk about planning. Generally speaking, I feel that there is lack of local and regional planning because we are still putting low-cost housing into areas that really cannot afford to support it. Houses go into a small municipality: taxes are low when they first go in; however, by the time people start paying through taxes the various costs associated with the development of such low-cost housing, the people who first went to that municipality to take advantage of such low-cost housing find they are paying astronomically high tax bills. I feel strongly that CMHC, the organization for which the minister is responsible, should not allow low-cost housing to go into a municipality that does not have a sound tax base. In the long run we are only inflicting higher costs on the people we are supposed to be helping if we allow that type of housing to go into a municipality which does not have a sound tax structure.

There are several other areas in which CMHC can act in an innovative and animator role. We should concentrate more on architectural standards, for example. The amount of space which CMHC insist on being devoted to green areas is not large enough. In Montreal, at least, this green area rule has not been vigorously enforced. In many cases we find that designated green areas have been rezoned by towns after a period of years. There appears to be no real guarantee in law that such green areas will be kept green or as park areas for the benefit of local populations. CMHC should be very much more vigorous in enforcing this green area rule and in eliminating from its list of acceptable municipal areas any towns or municipalities that renege on their original green area agreements. This has happened in almost every municipality of the south shore that has benefited from CMHC or NHA funds.

Also, CMHC does not protect the consumer enough. They do not appear to regard themselves as the protectors of house buyers. They feel that their legal obligation is to make sure that a house bought with CMHC guaranteed funds is structurally sound and it ends at that. I feel that under the guidance of the minister, CMHC can become much more consumer conscious and more of a protector of the house buyer no matter whether that buyer buys a low-cost house or a more expensive suburban house that is backed by an NHA guaranteed loan.

More public input into CMHC decisions is needed. It would be distinctly to our advantage if there were more public input into deciding where subdivisions are to be placed, into what areas around any large city are to benefit from CMHC funding of public housing, etc.

We hear a great deal about the quality of life these days. The minister has more potential for upgrading the quality of the living conditions of Canadians than any other individual in this country. I am confident that this is the kind of challenge the House relishes and I implore hon. members to take hold of CMHC with both hands and mould it into the innovator, social animator and consumer protector role which this country needs.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, one of the specific failures charged to the government in the motion we are considering is that of dealing effectively with the problems of pollution in the urban environment It has become fairly obvious that pollution goes hand in hand with urbanization. The problems we face in our cities are such interrelated parts of a vicious circle that no single thread can be found and no problem can be easily pinpointed without including in that the question of pollution control. Since 1968 the present administration has enacted some legislation relating to pollution. In a sense it can be said that the government has acknowledged its obligation to the Canadian people to deal with pollution problems in this country. However, if we look at the bills that have been passed and the effect they have had in the 3½ years of this administration, we find we have made very little progress in pollution control per se and much less in terms of pollution control of the urban environment.

We have had amendments to the Canada Shipping Act regarding marine pollution. The government has created the Department of the Environment with the express intention of co-ordinating all pollution control efforts. We have had the Clean Air Act, the Canada Water Act, the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act and several others—but none of these pieces of legislation deals directly with the problem of pollution in urban areas. Not only that, none of these bills has yet become an effective part of the law of Canada. I could go through them one by one, but I will not do that at this time except to mention the Canada Water Act which was brought in with great fanfare in 1969-70. However, to my knowledge it has not resulted in any agreement in the two years it has been in existence to effectively create pollution control projects. There have been some studies but no actual accomplishment.

Mr. Basford: You did not listen to my speech.

Mr. Aiken: The same goes for the Clean Air Act. It has not yet been effective. The control of urban pollution has been largely left to the provinces and municipalities. This has resulted in a very unco-ordinated attack across the country on pollution control and urban centres. When it comes to the field of pollution, the federal government seems to hide behind the constitution. Thus, the activities of federal departments for airports, expressways, bridges and public buildings seem to be immune from urban planning and environmental control. So are the activities of federal enterprises responsible for harbours, railways terminals and corridors, power plants, telephone and other utilities.

However, taken together, the significance of federal involvement in urban areas is very high because more and more the federal government is taking over large segments of the economic life of this country. There are more federal departments, federal buildings, harbours, airports and everything. In large part this is causing a problem rather than helping to solve it. The presence of the federal government as employer, developer and taxpayer in our larger urban regions will almost inevitably increase in the future. If urban problems at all levels of government are to be harmonized with environmental and related urban problems, it will be difficult to avoid the conclusion that relevant federal agencies must participate actively in community planning. Until this time they have managed to be exempt, in large part, from community planning and regulations that control everybody else.

I would now like to get down to specifics. Water and air pass freely within, between and over all political jurisdictions in Canada. They know no boundaries. Hence, all jurisdictions have a necessary role to play in their management. The sad part of the whole mess is that most cities do not know how much air and water pollution they actually have. If they do know, they are not telling their citizens. People who live in Toronto happen to know about air pollution measures because the Ontario government both monitors its urban air and takes corrective measures after monitoring. The federal government recently announced it was undertaking a national survey of air pollution sources and the amount it would cost for clean-up. I hope this survey produces fruitful results—but surveys are only the beginning. We have had air pollution problems for many years, but the federal government has always backed off them and has said it has no responsibility and, therefore, has taken no action.

Under constant pressure from pollution control groups, members of this House and members of the public, the government has admitted it has responsibility in connection with air pollution: it has undertaken to expand its air control facilities. It is only now, at least ten years too late, that it has expanded its control system far enough to even know the whole picture across the country. Even if cities are ill-informed on air pollution, about which there has been some argument, every city should know what it is doing to its water because of sewage. Given the increasing urbanization trends in Canada, the sewage treatment situation in our larger centres is of the greatest significance.

Quebec City and Montreal treat virtually none of their sewage, while Vancouver treats only 30 per cent. In fairness it can be said that over the years these large cities have had the sea at their door and the sea has been considered a wide-open and limitless dumping place for all kinds of waste and sewage. We are now finding that this is not true; it is not limitless and there are areas where sewage comes back on people further downstream. These responsibilities are now beginning to be recognized. The remaining large Canadian centres such as Toronto, Edmonton, Ottawa, Hamilton, Calgary and Winnipeg treat up to 100 per cent of their sewage at least in a primary way, but only Toronto and Edmonton, as far as I know, provide more than primary treatment for their sewage.

Expenditures on urban water treatment facilities have been growing at the rate of 8 per cent per year nationally.

[Mr. Aiken.]

This is faster than the national population growth. However, much higher levels of expenditure are necessary if our urban areas are to catch up with their backlog and treat waste-water discharged by their new populations and industries to minimum acceptable standards. Not only do we need an air monitoring survey, as I mentioned previously, but we must conduct a national industrial survey to determine the exact breakdown of the wastes from every plant in this country which is discharging waste. This information is not available to us. Work has only just begun in dealing with some of the major pollutants. It is true that several bills have been passed in this House, but they have not yet become effective.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) shows great interest in his department and a real concern for the quality of the environment—but it takes more than one minister in a cabinet of 30 to provide the impetus and the funds which are required to control pollution. There must be a commitment by the government as a whole to give priority to pollution control. It is not sufficient just to set up a Department of the Environment and allow one minister to make speeches and bring down legislation: financial backing is necessary, and this has not yet been accorded.

I wish to consider for a few moments the case of the automobile. The automobile is about the worst polluter of the air. In the larger population centres, it is the worst. Conditions in Montreal dramatize the situation facing all Canadian cities, in some of which carbon-monoxide levels are higher than they are in many large United States cities. Statistics relating the total number of vehicles in Canada to the number of miles of highway are not sensible, inasmuch as motor vehicles in Canada are concentrated in relatively few areas—within half a dozen of the major urban centres. This is where the threat is developing. Little has yet been done. City planners have been telling us for years that private automobiles have no place in the centres of major cities. As long as automobiles cause pollution, cars should be kept out of the central cores of urban areas where, in any case, other pollution levels are high. Experiments are taking place in an attempt to produce vehicles which do not cause pollution. They show promise, but obviously it will be a number of years before there is any hope of our seeing these vehicles in common use.

As to getting industry to clean up its own mess, the budget of last June announced the withdrawal of sales tax on anti-pollution equipment. This is a step forward, one for which our party and others have been asking for a long time. The government has shown wisdom in taking this course. I understand there was to be a loan fund to assist industry in meeting the cost of installing new pollution control equipment. The Minister of the Environment has been talking about such a fund, but we have not seen evidence of it yet. I hope something may be done soon along these lines. It is generally accepted that if a corporation operates a plant which regularly discharges pollutants into the atmosphere, it should be punished. Before punishment is imposed however, the firm concerned should be given a chance to improve the situation and see that no offence occurs.

I wish to mention, in passing, another aspect of pollution in urban areas—the disposal of garbage. This is the ugly side of plenty. Solid waste produced in Canada is estimated to be 673 million tons a year. Industry produces 67 per cent of this total, agriculture 30 per cent and the municipalities about 3 per cent. The average Canadian in an urban area generates 4.3 lbs of solid waste every day, or 1,500 lbs a year.

This represents a tremendous volume of garbage and suitable methods of dealing with it have yet to be developed. I might add that every day increasing numbers of plastic products, which cannot be broken down or recycled, are reaching consumers. This, of course, cannot but add to the difficulty. This is a situation which must be dealt with effectively, but so far I have seen no movement on the part of the government to do so. This is not just a problem which affects one city or a few cities; it is a national problem and is one concerning which the government should be taking action. I submit the government is not doing so.

I wish to conclude with this comment. Disregarding the several gestures which the government has made in response to the demands of the public, it has not yet shown real concern about pollution in Canada and the need for measures of pollution control as a priority: control of pollution is not rated as a first priority, as a second priority or even as a third priority. As I see it, it tags along as an addition to the various areas of responsibility which the government exercises. It is attached to fisheries, it is attached to transport, it is attached to water, it is attached to public health. The intention originally was to centralize responsibility in one department so that effective measures could be taken. I say that though the form was changed and a new department set up, action by that department has been restricted through lack of wholehearted support.

Presumably, the government as a whole believed that the problem would go away or that the people would forget about it. I assure hon. members opposite that neither of these things will happen. The problem will not go away, and as long as people are troubled by evidence of pollution which they can see every day for themselves, they will not forget about it. The challenge to the government is great. I commend the government for the efforts it has made so far in preparing the ground and bringing down legislation. But so far none of this work has been followed up. Regulations putting teeth into these laws have yet to be passed. The large sums of money necessary to make them operative have yet to be provided. The form is there; the shell is there: but to this point it is a hollow shell, devoid of substance.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in his speech this afternoon the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) outlined just how the tripartite discussions between the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipal governments are once more back on the rails with the meeting in Hull on April 10 next. He also outlined our housing successes of last year consisting of 230,000 housing starts, with great emphasis being placed on public housing, and the hope and expectation is for 240,000 starts this year.

Toward the end of his comments the minister also made reference to our proposed new policies regarding mortgage banks, which are designed to make a mortgage a more liquid security, and to our policy regarding improving drastically the quality of urban neighbourhoods. I thought that tonight I would make a few comments, not so much in my capacity as parliamentary secretary to the minister but more in my original capacity as a member of parliament from the metropolitan Toronto area.

In my first speech in the House of Commons on November 12, 1968, I said I was completely in favour of a new department of urban affairs being established. As reported at page 2652 of Hansard for that date, I said:

> —I believe first of all that a new federal department of urban affairs should be created. Such a department would be able to be an effective liaison not only between the various federal departments interested in urban matters but would be able to direct and increase the co-operation among the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government, which is so necessary because of the overlapping constitutional jurisdictions in this field.
> Such a new department would also be able to focus federal interest and concern on urban areas and also stimulate research, both in our universities and in the department itself, on urban problems. We have had departments of fisheries and agriculture ever since confederation and now, when most Canadians reside in our cities, I strongly submit that a department of urban affairs, with its own minister in the cabinet, is not only desirable but absolutely necessary.

As I say, I made that speech in this House about 3½ years ago and at that time a great many Members of Parliament from different parties, both from Toronto area and elsewhere, were saying somewhat the same thing. I confess that at that time I was not too optimistic about our government's attitude in this respect. It seemed that we had real constitutional problems. As the minister stated this afternoon, it was not a question of using the excuse that the municipalities are under provincial jurisdiction—there is no question of that. It was more a question of how we could become involved more significantly in the field of urban affairs without treading on the toes of the provinces, or at least seeming to do so. However, I must say that with the appointment of the then minister responsible for housing, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras), to that portfolio in the spring of 1969, I believe it was, he quietly and effectively came to stress in his speeches, both in the House and outside, the importance of urban matters to the national scene.

The minister also mentioned earlier today that Mr. Harvey Lithwick and other consultants were commissioned to make an in-depth study of the problems facing urban Canada. When that study was published a couple of years ago the statistics and facts contained in the report were enough to convince the government that the time had indeed come to appoint a minister of state for urban affairs. According to the statistics, about 70 per cent of the Canadian people today live in cities. As of 1980, about 80 per cent will live in the cities. Even more significant than that, by the year 2000, if present trends continue, approximately 73 per cent of Canadians will live in our largest 12 urban cities, about 45 per cent of these—almost half—living in the cities of Montreal, Vancouver and Toronto.

According to a projection to the year 2000, the city of Toronto will then have six million people, as against only about two million now, a figure which most people regard as too many. Without being facetious, the fact that by the year 2000 Toronto will have six million people living in the city is enough to demonstrate to the federal government the necessity for a ministry of urban affairs. One has now been created.

As illustrated in the speeches of the former minister, as well as the new minister of the department, 27 federal departments and agencies and 112 federal programs directly relate to urban Canada. Therefore, we have to be able to co-ordinate all of these federal departments and agencies and, more importantly, federal programs, and direct their thrust at the urban areas. We must also stimulate liaison between the provinces and municipalities, which is one of the objectives of the new ministry. Then, of course, we must facilitate urban research both at universities and in the urban ministry itself.

It is quite easy to say that we do not need studies of this kind or that kind, but may I remind hon. members that that it was the study conducted by Mr. Lithwick, as well as studies of a similar kind, that graphically showed just where the country was heading as far as urban Canada is concerned and underlined the importance of urban affairs to the national scene. So I suggest that studies of this kind are very important.

As I have said, liaison between the federal government, the provinces and the municipalities is very important, especially when there are municipalities the size of Toronto within which some two million people are living under a system of regional government. There are other municipalities in Canada of similar size, which means that in terms of population they are larger than some of the provinces. It is extremely important to maintain close co-operation with large municipalities of this kind.

If I may say something about the Toronto area and federal concerns in the field of urban affairs, I suppose the classic and most recent case is the proposed new airport to be constructed in the Pickering area. The history of this airport is quite well known but perhaps I could refer to it briefly for a minute or so. The House will recall that in the fall of 1968 the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), announced that the federal government intended to expand the area of Malton airport, increase the terminal facilities and also runway facilities so long as any land expansion in the area met with the approval of the people living in surrounding communities. That was the basis on which the minister's plans were presented.

Led by members of parliament from the area west of metropolitan Toronto, such as the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie), who is presently Minister of State for Science and Technology, the then hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) and the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell), the federal government was persuaded that an expansion of this area would be too detrimental to the people living in the surrounding district. This area was entirely built up to the west and south, and also somewhat to the north and east. After a great many consultations with the municipalities in the area, the federal government kept its promise and while it decided to considerably increase terminal and runway facilities at Malton it did not expropriate or acquire any more land in the Malton area.

During the last three years, about $80 million of federal money has gone into the Malton airport and into improving transportation facilities there. A new terminal is to be opened on July 1, I believe, of this year with much additional runway space to be completed at the same time. However, there is still great need for a second airport in the Toronto and southern Ontario region.

The federal government made an extensive search of potential sites in the southern Ontario region from Lake Simcoe past Hamilton toward Lake Scugoc in the east. With the co-operation of the federal government and the general desire of the provincial government, the site was finally located, as announced a week or so ago, in the Pickering area. Why was it located there? This is a project involving $350 million or so and, in addition, at least as much provincial money will probably be involved, before the project is over, through acquiring the surrounding land for commerial and housing purposes. It was placed to the east of Toronto in order to coincide completely with the provincial government. The Toronto centred regional plan—the blue book which the provincial government brought out in May, 1970—stressed that the area to the west of Toronto was being built up quickly and there was no need for further stimulus in that area. Instead, the provincial government would like to develop the area east of Toronto which had been going forward fairly slowly, comparatively speaking. I may say that the new ministry of state for urban affairs had considerable input, as it should have, in this particular decision.

The members of that ministry and the ministers themselves—the former and present ministers—were very strong in agreeing with the general concept for the plan for urban development in the Toronto area. They wanted to co-operate with the province in this regard because they thought it was by and large a good concept. Therefore, after considerable negotiation and some delay caused by the provincial leadership campaign and the provincial general election, we heard in the past couple of weeks the announcement of the location of the second Toronto airport. This was a joint announcement of the provincial and federal governments. They agreed 100 per cent with this particular location. I do not think there is any question that the second airport is needed, because the Toronto-southern Ontario area is the most populous area in the country. We are the business centre of the country. Also, because of the multicultural nature of so many of our people there is considerable air traffic between the Toronto area and countries in Europe.

I do not believe there is any doubt that the people in the region as a whole will be happy to see the airport develop. However, at this time I believe we must exercise great care in respect of the people in Pickering and the surrounding area who will be affected by the airport. Under the Expropriation Act passed a few years ago in this House, the people in this area, and indeed many others in the country who have objection to a second airport, will be given the right to attend hearings particularly set up for this purpose, at which they will be able to argue as strongly as they wish that the airport should not be located in the Pickering area but somewhere else.

However, if the courts should rule that the governments concerned may expropriate the area in question, I believe it will be up to the people themselves, including their representatives and local members of parliament from the area, to make sure they receive the highest compensation the law will allow, not only for the land itself but for disturbance and moving expenses as well as anything else for which an allowance might be made.

There is no doubt that the airport in this region will create a hardship for many people in the Pickering area. If an airport in any part of southern Ontario is to be of any use to the people as a whole, it will be a hardship to the people located in that area. I believe the people will have every opportunity to present their full case to the boards or courts in question and will be treated very fairly so far as compensation is concerned.

What are some other federal projects of interest in the Toronto area which come under the general urban affairs connotation? We have the problem of commuter rail transportation to the Toronto area. As we know, in many cities in North America, and in many cities in Europe, commuter rail transportation to and from our large cities is quite a common occurrence. This, however, has not been the case in the Toronto area. Our people have been accustomed to coming into the city by and large by automobile; they have not used trains because train service has not been available. Under the aegis of the chairman of metropolitan Toronto, Mr. Campbell, a joint commuter rail study was set up in the spring of last year between metropolitan Toronto, the railways and the provincial government. This study involved, in considerable detail, an examination into the various options so far as rail service to the Toronto area is concerned. I understand this study is to be completed by May of this year and I trust the report will be made available at that time.

We, of course, have the same difficulties as other major cities. As the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) indicated, there is the difficulty of cars coming in great numbers into the downtown area and choking it. We may be able to use our excellent railway lines coming into the city in order to take some of the pressure off the highways.

We also have the question of the somewhat controversial metro centre project in Toronto. The federal government would be involved in the metro centre concept because the two Crown corporations would be quite heavily involved in the project if it proceeds. The CNR is a partner in the project with the CPR, and the CBC has a considerable interest in it. The CBC would like to locate its main transmission centre in that location and consolidate its other services in the Toronto area in this central location. The CNR and CBC, I understand, would look to the federal government for financial assistance to help them locate in the new metro centre area. As hon. members are aware, the city government has approved the plans and the provincial government has referred the metro centre plan to the Ontario Municipal Board for final determination.

The metro centre concept has come under attack from national groups, including the amalgamated group known as CORRA which is protesting some aspects of the plan. I think it is excellent that the ratepayers' group in particular is taking a direct interest in this plan which would change completely the downtown area, with heavy federal financial assistance. This should be considered carefully. It is interesting to note that on one hand the federal government will be heavily involved in the plan and on the other the federal government has in the past, through CMHC and other federal departments, financed CORRA is some of its activities. So we are seeing direct citizens' participation in this project. If the municipal board decides that the plan can go ahead, perhaps with some amendments, we will see great changes in the downtown area of the city.

I might mention the possibility of a dome stadium in the Toronto area and of the federal government being involved in such a project. Again, this is a controversial matter, a matter of federally-owned land in the Downsview airport area which might be made available by sale or, more probably, by lease to an organization or to a non-profit group for sports purposes. I could mention a number of other projects, but my time is rapidly terminating.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, if the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), made under mysterious circumstances on the weekend, have any truth to them, he would be the only prime minister in history who would go into an election campaign with a rather interesting statistic to lay before the people—that is, if this parliament lasts until next year into the fall and the government has gone its full five years plus. He would be able to say that over one million housing units have been built in his term of office, an impressive statistic but also one that has paradoxical disadvantages for the government because that sort of statistic would quite easily prove that the right hon. gentleman has not succeeded in establishing the merits of his so-called just society.

I shall proceed to explain the paradox in a moment, but first let me warm up with the reflection that housing has many economic ramifications. It is one of the largest single industries in the country; it is an enormous consumer of capital and resources and it is the livelihood of many professions and trades. It is also very much a social enterprise in that it supplies a commodity without which men cannot live in this climate. We all know what the great Canadian winter is all about, something to be endured and generally not enjoyed, and without which families cannot enjoy feelings or well being, security, dignity and social justice.

Housing is a necessity. Yet too often federal policies submerge this necessity or make it play a secondary role to temporary financial and credit measures. In his interesting speech to the Canadian Conference on Housing in 1968, the English expert in this field, David V. Donnison pointed out:

—housing is too big a sphere of responsibility to be cornered by one department, and it could not be dealt with effectively if it was. Housing policies are a matter for governments as a whole, and many departments and levels of government—federal, provincial and local—must play a part in formulating and implementing them. The task is a complex and continually changing one which each country must pursue in ways that suit its own needs and resources.

We all recall the tremendous efforts that have been made in this Parliament over the years to get government to take even the timid step of appointing somebody as minister of one of these new state creations, let alone putting him in charge of a fully-fledged department of urban affairs as would be done very quickly under a change in the prime ministership of this country.

The former and first holder of that ministry has said that the government has been the driving force behind 750,000 new housing starts, yet a CMHC survey in 1970 revealed that less than 16 per cent of all new houses for sale in that year were priced at under $20,000, and the average that year was $28,614. Fewer than 7 per cent of Canadians can afford homes with that kind of a price tag upon them. That is where, as I said at the outset of my remarks, is the paradox of the just society which enters into the housing picture.

Let us examine further illustrations in this field. Let us take the statistics of CMHC and borrowings under the National Housing Act. In 1968, the lower income third of the population of this country took 6.5 per cent of the money available for housing, the middle income third took 49.4 per cent and the upper income third took 44.1 per cent. Two years later the figures in those three respective categories were 5.3 per cent, 54.2 per cent and 40.5 per cent.

If you want to show how rapidly the position of lower income Canadians has deteriorated in almost the last decade, note that in 1965 the lower income third share of the borrowings was 17.9 per cent, which shrunk to 5.3 per cent in 1970—an almost incredible statistic and an almost incredible indictment of the government in the housing policy that simply does not permit the little Canadian to have his share in home ownership. I think this is the most serious problem that could possibly be faced in the overall housing field.

Therefore I say that there must be a greater federal role in enabling home ownership for the lower income groups of Canadians. There are some provinces, namely Ontario, Nova Scotia and others, that are waging this battle to give the lower income Canadian his place in the housing sun. On several occasions I made the suggestion to the former minister that more had to be done by him and by his government. I give him fair notice that this plea will be followed up when he takes his statistics into one of the House committees for study. That is one area where a change must be made; but it is the most obvious one where a change of heart, a change of direction and a change of the money flow is needed.

Let us examine briefly some of the other points with which a Conservative administration would concern itself in this very important field. One is the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, one of the most iniquitous levies ever put on a social necessity. Also, we must realize that there are one million substandard homes in Canada, 250,000 of them in a state of serious disrepair. Leaving the centre of cities rotting until it is too late to do much about them, and then entering into costly clearing schemes, has simply proved to be an insufficient answer. A better cure, and one that is available, is a revamping of the home improvement loans plan.

The fourth thing that should be done is to provide greater tax incentives for the developers. The fifth thing that should be done is to make CMHC regulations easier for the man or woman who wants to live in rural Canada, to make it easier for that person to obtain mortgage financing. In my province there is only one company, privately owned, that does a real job in that field and one other company that does part of a job. Guess where the great, Crown lending agency fits in, Mr. Speaker? It fits in with the also-rans that really do no job at all. CMHC and housing policy must recognize the realities of rural living and needs.

Sixth, if one gets to the problem of growth in the cities and we accept the idea of designated growth areas, as some government departments have done, then surely CMHC and housing policies must recognize such growth concepts. That is why I mentioned earlier the absolute need for a housing policy that not only reflects an increased stature for this strange ministry that has been created in recent months but that will put some hair on its chest, if I may use that expression when speaking to the minister.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That isn't fair.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) has come alive.

Mr. Basford: Some people wish they had hair in other places.

Mr. McCleave: As my seventh point, I suggest putting hair on the chest of the department. The eighth thing that needs to be done is to establish a national urban council to work on and advise the government on a national urban policy. Perhaps the closest we have to that is the Community Planning Association of Canada. Last year it conducted a survey of people interested in urban affairs problems and came up with a six-point synopsis of the major issues. I wish to put them on the record, quoting from a brief that was submitted to the former minister of state for urban affairs:

1. That Canadians have a major concern for the future of their cities.

2. That Canadians are anxious to express their aspirations for the city but do not know how to do so.

This is a brief for Information Canada. This is a real challenge for them.

3. That Canadians are entirely convinced that government must listen to the citizen's viewpoint on urban affairs and that it must be able to utilize such a citizen input.

4. That, although Canadians are aware of the various levels of government, it is the local level (because of its immediacy) to which they relate.

5. That most Canadians demand a strenghtening of local government.

6. That Canadians, as citizens, are insistent upon their involvement in the development of a Canadian urban policy and that government provide for them to be so involved.

With the kind of attitude shown in that survey it is quite obvious that the government, and particularly this minister, are considered to be a long way from meeting the needs of our times. Further, Sir, to strengthen the need for the development of an urban national council to give advice may I make this argument briefly, one which I have made time and time again, namely, that it will be difficult for any government to solve the problem that is bursting upon us with almost frightening rapidity, that is, the growth of the megalopolis stretching from Montreal along the St. Lawrence Seaway to Detroit, Chicago and Milwaukee which by the turn of the century, and probably before then, will have a greater concentration of people than the Atlantic seabord megalopolis stretching between Boston and Baltimore. Those of us who have travelled through the latter area know that it is really one large city: you cannot tell one place from another except by the landmarks. It is an antheap of humanity crying out with problems concerning transportation, crime, housing, health—every type of problem under the sun—aggravated because people are living together in almost inhuman conditions.

That is exactly what is developing in Canada. And there is a lesson to be learned. How effective has the American federal government been in co-operating with the states and the huge cities that make up its megalopolis terrain area? At least we have an example to learn from, an example of what is happening. I suggest that the problems there have not really been successfully handled. From this example we can see the handwriting on the wall for the present government and the government that will succeed it. The federal government must do something, and do it quickly, to involve all levels of government in tackling this problem. This involvement perhaps may be harshly different from anything that has been attempted up until now. It is a problem that has to be solved, otherwise the Canadian way of life that we talk about so much will be no better than the American way of life, and perhaps we will be worse off simply because we have not been bright enough to learn from the experience that the Americans are undergoing.

The Americans have hang-ups about transportation in their crowded corridor. In this context it was interesting to hear the remarks made by speakers in this debate on transportation matters. For instance, the preceding speaker and others put in a thoughtful plug on a very serious matter indeed. All these things, transportation, housing needs, planning needs, health needs, the use of water resources and the fight against pollution—all those creations of a Frankenstein that should frighten hell out of any government—point out the necessity for a lot more zip, a lot more consideration by the government and by this particular minister with respect to something we are rapidly facing, a change in our Canadian way of life.

Federal Co-operation in Urban Problems

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, we have heard—

Mr. Stanfield: Joe, I heard you were going to speak.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is indeed a pleasure to see the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) coming in here to listen. I appreciate that.

Mr. Paproski: Where is your leader, Joe? Is he crossing the floor?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am addressing you but I repeat that my answer is "No" to any suggestion of the sort. Many members on both sides of the House have spoken about urban problems, about the problems of local governments. I do not think anyone spoke with any great experience of the actual problems facing local governments in various parts of the country. Some have probably made a study, and I would excuse the minister in this regard.

Mr. Stanfield: Why?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I think many of the problems facing local and provincial governments have not been spelled out in detail. For years the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities have been making these studies, though not on a continuing basis, and have reported to the government. At the end of this month they will present a brief to the minister and probably will want to know if he has a different policy in regard to their requests.

Mr. Stanfield: Or whether it is the same old thing.

Mr. Crouse: The same old bunch, Joe.

An hon. Member: The same old bunch, and the same old speech.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): If anybody from the other side is going to say the same old thing, I do not have to hear them because once their leader speaks I know what they are going to say. Even so, he will stumble on that.

Mr. Crouse: Now, now, Joe; don't be nasty.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, many hon. members from the other side used quotations from newspapers in their speeches and I want to follow their example. I refer to the brief dated April 26, 1971, which was presented to the government by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. They make representations from time to time and they are real contributions. At page 2 the brief reads:

—we must now set goals for a balanced socio-economic program, giving due importance to the quality of shelter, to open space and recreation, to health services, to conservation measures for water, air and other natural resources, to balanced systems of transportation for people and goods in and around urban areas and, not least in difficulty and expense, to the disposal and recycling of wastes.

They go on to give many details. Some hon. members who have spoken mentioned underground wiring, other underground services and such things which are a requirement in any new development. In fact, they are necessary and should be provided as we go along so that we do not fact the same problems as were faced 30 or 40 years ago. But, Mr. Speaker, it does not matter how it is done, it is always the same taxpayer who pays the bill—the fellow who purchases the house or rents it. He has to pay for all the services, the schools and parks, whatever is provided. I agree with many things that have been said, and possibly lower rates of interest should be considered. One thing that should be considered once and for all is the elimination of school taxes, at least in my province. This would be a great change and would certainly help newcomers who are just going into housing and senior citizens who are moving into senior citizens' homes. The latter should not be paying the heavy cost of development and should get some relief from taxes.

Referring to an intergovernmental council on community development, the brief continues:

> Under conditions of increasing insecurity for the citizen, and in the face of threats of environmental deterioration, it is the local officials who feel the first impact of public concern. Mayors and councillors, being of the level of government closest to the people, are very often blamed and held responsible for programs and policies, or lack of them that originate at the federal and/or provincial levels. Many Canadian citizens claim they are the victims of economic dislocation, technological change and the kind of misallocation of resources that gravely threaten their standards of living. Local government has no choice but to demand a co-ordination of the efforts of all levels of government toward the attainment of economic growth and improvement in human well-being.

This is what the federation had to say last year. They also made some recommendations which I think are important, as set out at pages 4 and 5 of the brief as follows:

> 1. "areas requiring special measures" be redefined to rid us of the anomaly of the ineligibility of urban slums for federal-provincial financial assistance by virtue of their proximity to affluent suburbs. The principle of equalization which is the keynote of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion reflects the true character of Canada but its application leaves much to be desired. The deprived in Victoria suffer as much hardship as those in Halifax.
> 2. the current freeze on urban renewal funds be lifted immediately for programs of neighbourhood improvement—
> 3. the federal government pursue its objectives of creating a ministry of state responsible for urban affairs—

The brief continues:

> We are also concerned with the apparent intent to exclude non-urban communities from the anticipated trilevel consultations.

The concluding paragraph in that section reads:

> For these reasons we endorse the proposal for a trilevel forum—an intergovernmental council on community development—to provide for the free exchange of views by federal, provincial and local policy makers; a forum that would enable all governments to clarify their roles in providing leadership, direction and action in response to the real need of our citizens.

I think this spells out what local governments all across the country are concerned with, and I think they know the problems better than anybody else. They have often made good representations which possibly have been overlooked at times. When they make their recommendations at the end of this month, I hope due consideration will be given to them.

Mr. Stanfield: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am sure this will be the case, because last fall the then minister of urban affairs said, as reported in the Globe and Mail of October 21:

> The federal government is willing to reduce its powers in the field of urban development, if that reduction leads to federal-provincial co-operation—

That is what the Leader of the Opposition was talking about this afternoon.

> —in the redevelopment of Canadian cities, urban affairs minister Robert Andras said in Montreal yesterday. He said in a luncheon address to the Canadian Real Estate Association annual convention that in effect this was what the federal government was doing in seeking new methods of working with the provinces.
> "For reasonable men, the answer (to urban problems) must lie . . . through consultation, the sharing of knowledge, and the commitment to seek new mechanisms of collaboration.
> And in this sense, by putting its urban policies and programs on the table for discussion, the federal government is, if anything, permitting a lessening of its powers rather than the reverse: seeking to intrude into an area of provincial jurisdiction."

He went on to make several comments along the lines on which I have been speaking tonight. I hope that the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities will continue to apply pressure when they present their briefs because I think we could benefit from many of their recommendations.

When the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead) spoke a short while ago he said, among other things, that consideration should be given to building a dome stadium in his area. I did not think I would be standing up tonight and saying that since the government is to build a second, multimillion dollar airport in the Toronto area, why does it not build a domed stadium for mine. Surely to goodness western Canada needs one or two facilities like that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I should like nothing better than to see a domed stadium built in Winnipeg so that we could see all sorts of finals and football games in our area without being snowed out or rained under.

An hon. Member: What about Vancouver?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): An hon. member mentioned Vancouver. I thought we might begin where the west begins and go on from there. They did that with the railroad, by the way. Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I think a domed stadium should be considered for that area. Many other facilities might be considered. The point is that as was spelled out this afternoon the area municipality, in co-operation with other levels of governments, might solve some of the problems affecting the area. No matter whether proposed projects involve slum clearance, urban renewal, new development—call them what you will—all the citizens of the area and of the country will benefit if money is spent in that way. I think there is no better way of spending money than on programs which municipal governments at present most earnestly need. Those programs can be carried out in co-operation with provincial governments. If the minister—who is here—takes my representations into consideration as well as the representations which will be made to him shortly, he will go a long way toward meeting the demands of certain municipalities and we shall solve many of our problems to the ultimate benefit of all Canadians.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when I heard that the minister to whom we listened this afternoon had assumed the portfolio of urban affairs, I felt a degree of sympathy for him because of the awesome task that he had taken upon himself. The problems of the cities are formidable and growing ever more formidable as time goes on. Problems of unemployment, poverty, housing, pollution, financing, as well as many more, call for Herculean efforts of leadership if there are to be solutions.

As I listened this afternoon to the smooth-flowing discourse of the minister, I realized once again that what this government says and what it does are worlds apart. Indeed, the minister's speech made me realize that the policies of this government are made by comfortable people for comfortable people who delude themselves into thinking that while there may be a few unemployed, sick or handicapped people around, with a little more effort on their part they could join the ranks of the affluent instead of allowing themselves to depend on the taxpayer for social assistance.

The minister waxed lyrical over our urban possibilities and over the opportunity to "create a society of exceptional excellence" in Canada, yet he overlooked the need to take the first urgent steps to that end. One of the most urgent of those is the matter of housing for low-income people in the big cities, although rural areas have also been shamefully neglected. He boasted of what he calls the government's colossal housing program and of the number of housing starts in 1971. I ask, housing starts for whom?

Less than 10 per cent of housing starts in 1971 were for subsidized public housing. That is the only kind of housing the poor can afford. Long lines of them wait patiently for clean, warm shelter while the National Housing Act serves those who are in less need of help. The National Housing Act was supposed to help people on low income. What are the facts, Mr. Speaker? As the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) said, in 1970 the lowest income third of families borrowing under the National Housing Act amounted to only 5.3 per cent of the total. These were people with incomes of up to $7,000. So we have a National Housing Act that under this government's policy provides almost 95 per cent of its resources for the service of people with incomes of $7,000 and over. The other 5 per cent of resources go to those with incomes of under $7,000. Clearly, the poor get only the crumbs.

The minister may say all he likes about research into housing, new products and new ways of doing things. The fact remains that those on low income are getting the short end of the stick and are very likely to continue doing so. And it is a very short end indeed. The only satisfactory way to provide for the needs of the poor is to provide them with income.

Mr. Speaker, income and options go together. When those who are poor can get income and the means of earning it, they can and will decide on the kind of place in which they want to live; and it will not be a high-rise, urban ghetto. There are already far too many of these areas in Canada.

In January of this year a four year-old boy was fatally injured when he fell from a seventh-floor balcony in Toronto. He was still conscious when his mother picked him up. He was crying, "Mummy, Mummy." He died three hours later. That was the seventh time this year a child has fallen from an upper storey window or balcony in metropolitan Toronto. Studies have shown that housewives and children living on the upper floors of high-rise buildings are far more prone to illness, physical and nervous, than those living near the ground.

Meanwhile, until poor people cannot obtain the kind of income that will enable them to get the kind of housing they want, let me urge upon the minister that every sort of public housing ought to provide adequate play-spaces and facilities, both indoor and outside, and that there should be child-care facilities either in the project or in a community centre nearby. The minister knows Vancouver very well. He knows the need is there and he knows it is not being met. I urge him to use the National Housing Act and make the provision of such facilities mandatory.

Mr. Basford: Well, what did we do at Reilly park?

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, one swallow does not make a summer, and one raindrop does not make a rain-shower.

Mr. Basford: What about Britannia? We spent half a million dollars there.

Mrs. MacInnis: Did the minister mention Raymer?

Mr. Basford: Britannia.

Mrs. MacInnis: Because if he did, let me remind him that the people there had to fight like fury to make sure their children were able to go to school without the danger of being run over by trains on the way.

An hon. Member: The government is still crowding people into ghettoes.

Mrs. MacInnis: I suggest that the minister explore the possibility of introducing a number of low-income families into co-operative housing developments, such as is being done now in the De Cosmos village co-operative project in the Vancouver area. Let them enjoy the fresh air and decent surroundings of such a project. The low-income families that went to the De Cosmos village project were very happy over the prospect. Actually, they were overjoyed at being able to get away from the stigma that is attached to the residents of ordinary low-rent projects.

Every report we get from every committee and authority concerned with urban problems stresses the need of adequate income for those who are poor. Enough income means a chance to live in modern, well planned neighbourhoods, a chance to get away from the heavily congested core areas and a chance to give their children an opportunity to associate with other children free from the stigma of poverty and insecurity. And, Mr. Speaker, that is a very real stigma in the minds of people receiving social assistance or on low income.

An hon. Member: Especially in the minds of the young.

Mrs. MacInnis: We are beginning to realize the social costs of keeping poverty. The Lithwick study refers to the way in which women heads of families are rendered particularly immobile because we have no day-care system to help them. The elderly, the handicapped, the unemployed and chronically ill are chained remorselessly to their situation by lack of income. They are chained with all the cruelty of chains in a medieval dungeon. Their options are non-existent and their numbers are growing. If the minister will not use the National Housing Act to provide day-care facilities in each project or, where that is not desirable, in community centres nearby, he should do something which would cause his name to be inscribed on bronze plates around Vancouver. I would take pleasure in seeing that he got one or two.

What about the dollars and cents cost of keeping poverty? The welfare system at all levels costs the Canadian taxpayer more than $6 billion a year. The Senate Committee on Poverty said:

> The welfare system, at all levels, costs Canadians more than six billion a year, yet it has not significantly alleviated poverty let alone eliminated it. The problems grow; costs go up and up and will, in time, suffocate the taxpayer. The welfare system is increasingly unable to deal with the needs of its clients. It has failed to acheive its humanitarian goals. It deprives its recipients of dignity and provides no incentive or rewards to escape from poverty. It has become punitive and demeaning. It is a mess—a social wasteland and an economic morass.

So much for the Senate Committee on Poverty. Poverty is a waste, an intolerable frustration and a soul-destroying torture to those caught in the morass. We can no longer afford it. The only way to wipe it out is to provide income for the poor. All the housing reports say so, a decent income based on the cost of living index and rising with it. Along with this must go opportunities for useful activity in the community according to the measure of one's ability to serve.

My earnest suggestion to the minister is that he approach his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and any other colleagues necessary with a view to finding ways and means of building an income floor beneath which no Canadian will be allowed to fall. In my view, this would be a major step in dealing with one of the most serious urban problems, the problem of poverty and insufficient income. It would lighten enormously the burden of the minister in dealing with other urban problems if he could make a frontal attack on this core problem of poverty. It is not going to stay in the core; it will spread in ever-widening circles to get people enslaved.

There is also the problem of urban traffic. I feel sure that in his heart the minister knows we should now consider the moving of people rather than providing endless transport facilities for cars. I feel certain he realizes that to divide and destroy neighbourhoods by great, noisy freeways is to move away from the dreams of a society of exceptional excellence. The remarks of the minister at various times in Vancouver have shown that he is aware of a rising feeling in the community, that what is immediately required is not a third crossing of Burrard Inlet which would benefit only a limited number of citizens, but a well planned system of rapid transit which would serve the whole metropolitan area. Why then does he not involve himself as Minister of Urban Affairs? He must involve himself because some of his colleagues are taking the opposite side of the coin and saying that we must have a third crossing of Burrard Inlet. They say this must be the first priority. The minister owes it to the people of this country to take the initiative and say where he stands.

The minister has talked of the need for rapid transit. He has indicated that even though a certain portion of the population wants a third crossing, Ottawa should not be content to give a grant for it but should use it for rapid transit if the majority wants that. Why, then, as Minister of Urban Affairs can he not become involved and take the initiative in getting that rapid transit system instead of the third crossing?

The minister has talked of the need for tripartite consultation and planning in these matters. Let him now take the initiative and convene a meeting of the other levels of government to discuss the best course to follow from the standpoint of the whole community rather than that of special groups and interests. I am sure that such action on his part would be infinitely more impressive than hours of talk about the need for co-operation.

If the minister announced that he was seeking the co-operation of provincial and municipal authorities for this purpose, I am sure that neither of those levels of government would dare refuse him a meeting. If he does not do that, he is open to a charge of fence-sitting and staying clear because he wants to stand well with certain groups and interests. He can smile pleasantly and look like the smiling Buddha all he likes, but the people are likely to discover that smiling Buddha is not what they need right now. They want a man of action, a man who will act in the interest of the whole community of Vancouver, someone who is not afraid even if he is called a hamburger by the head of the city or runs the risk of being called a bigot by the premier of that province. I do not know the danger in that regard.

In my view, in addition to tripartite consultation there should be a fourth level, those interested community groups which are becoming the counterweight to the pressures of special privilege which exist on every hand. We discovered the value of such volunteer community groups during the debate of the Canada Water Act when the efforts of anti-pollution groups all across Canada succeeded in stopping the great detergent companies from continuing to ruin the waterways with high concentrations of phosphates. In that instance, the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was exceedingly glad of the pressure of those volunteer groups which helped to get the anti-phosphate provision into the Canada Water Act.

This minister can, if he will, discover the value of such voluntary groups in the stiff battles that lie ahead to preserve and improve the quality of urban environment. He should welcome the pressures which have fought for things like keeping the quality of the environment in the entrance to Stanley Park and preventing such horrors as the Four Seasons which would block the entrance to Stanley Park, cut off the view and make the traffic far more contested at that point that it would otherwise be.

Mr. Basford: I fixed all that up last week.

Mrs. MacInnis: The minister may have fixed all that up, but will it stay fixed? Mr. Fix-It may have fixed it for a while, but he is no white knight on a white charger coming to clean up things in the way the advertisers claim. Ajax will not work without public opinion and public organization behind him.

As I say, this minister can, if he will, discover their value in the stiff battles ahead to preserve and improve the quality of urban environment. Problems like air pollution, industrial and domestic waste, the proper use of land, the saving of recreational areas and many others can be solved satisfactorily only with the co-operation of all levels of government plus the growing strength of well organized and well informed community groups. The minister is well aware of this. He also knows how to take advantage of those groups when there is pressure, if he wants to do the job. I hope he wants to do it.

Looking at the unplanned chaos of our great cities, we are becoming aware that unless something far-reaching is done soon the whole population is headed for serious trouble. It is in the cities that we see the full impact of poverty and pollution, the effects of bad housing and an unwholesome environment on whole areas of chronically unemployed people, their families, the unskilled, poorly educated, crippled, aged, one-parent families the idle young people, thousands of individuals doomed to struggle uselessly in the trap of poverty, condemned to raise their children there and in turn watch them struggle vainly to escape, only to subside into frustration and bitterness or to gamble desperately with law breaking and revolt. One can look at the great cities south of the border to see what happens when cities get bigger—the numbers of poor people increase and nothing adequate is done about it.

If the home is to be the cradle of citizenship, let the Minister of Urban Affairs take as his first priority the giving of leadership in the building of homes and neighbourhoods fit for the future citizens of this country, beginning with those whose need is the greatest, the people with low incomes. Let him not rest content until every Canadian has enough income to lift himself or herself out of poverty and enough opportunity to contribute something of value to the Canadian community. Let him not take refuge in quoting statistics which tell only part of the story. Let him get busy and make statistics of his own, figures which can stand the light of day and which can be divulged without fear of the consequences to the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Shall I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege before I address myself to the subject of the adjournment debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member knows that in connection with the debate on the adjournment, no question of privilege can be raised.

Mr. Paproski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wished to draw to the attention of this chamber the presence of two distinguished guests from the University of Arizona, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, who are with us tonight having travelled all the way from Tucson just to watch our proceedings in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I agree that we have distinguished guests, but in order to keep the record straight may I say this was not a question of privilege.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HIGHWAYS—TWINNING OF TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST YELLOWHEAD PASS ROUTE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, on March 8, as reported at page 638 of Hansard, I directed the following question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé):

> Would the minister please advise the House why his department made the decision to twin the southern part of the Trans-Canada Highway in Alberta leading to Banff and discriminate against the Yellowhead Trans-Canada Highway which is the northern counterpart.

Although briefs have been presented by the interdepartmental highway and road co-ordinating committee to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and to the former minister of public works, I find the government playing politics and spending money twinning the Banff-Jasper highway while forgetting to upgrade the Yellowhead highway to trans-Canada standards so that other communities might enjoy a new recreational, commercial and industrial communications corridor. This highway will have a great bearing on the future development of Canada as a viable and expanding nation. It will play a vital role in the development of the vast areas of natural resources it serves, and the efforts which have been expended on the roads to resources program by all levels of government will bear this out.

The minister should be made aware of the tremendous difficulties being presented at this time in connection with the route which was accepted as the trans-Canada route, particularly through the Rocky Mountains section of that highway in Alberta and British Columbia where, due to heavy snowfalls, the danger of avalanches is always prevalent during the winter months. This, combined with high railway transportation costs which result from these unfavourable conditions, presents an economic picture which must affect not only the transport facilities available to Canadians but the development of our export trade.

The key to the Yellowhead route is that it takes advantage of the finest pass in the Canadian Rockies at an elevation of some 2,000 feet less than that of Rogers Pass. At its highest snowfall level, this route experiences less than 50 per cent of the snow recorded on the other route over a long period. Climatic conditions along the two routes vary widely. The most undesirable of climatic conditions affecting motor travel is doubtless snowfall and its accompanying hazards. Along one path of the Yellowhead the most severe snowfall occurs at Blue River, approximately 146 miles northeast by road from Kamloops where an average 159 inches falls annually over the long term. Secondary to this, the average annual snowfall at Red Pass, some 42 miles west of Jasper, is 137 inches. These two spots represent the only two major areas where snowfall is significantly greater than would be encountered across the Prairies. At no point along the entire route is snowfall heavy enough to present the danger of an avalanche. Thus, the danger of snowslides does not exist along the Yellowhead.

This is not the case, however, along the Rogers Pass section of the trans-Canada highway. Rogers Pass experiences one of the highest recorded annual snowfalls in Canada. The long-term average is 370 inches per year. Further, even at Lake Louise, only 50 miles or so into the Rockies, snowfall approaches 200 inches per year, greater than at any point along the Yellowhead route. Road closures due to avalanches or to the danger of avalanches are a frequent occurrence along the southern route, seriously hampering the scheduling of passage of vehicles using it during the winter. An analysis of the statistics makes it obvious that on a year-round basis, due to elevation and grades, and on a seasonal basis due to snowfall, the Yellowhead route is not just an alternative route between the Prairies and the coast: it is, indeed, a much superior one.

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased tonight to answer, in the name of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé), the very talkative member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski).

Mr. Dinsdale: Articulate is the word.

Mr. Blouin: Here is the information I have obtained. The trans-Canada highway through Banff National Park was financed and constructed by the Department of Public Works originally as a two-lane facility, the majority of the work being done during the 1950s. With the completion of the trans-Canada highway through Rogers Pass to Revelstoke and with the increased tourist activity, traffic volumes increased considerably.

• (2200)

Mr. Dinsdale: That was in 1962.

Mr. Blouin: I suppose it was previous to the time you were minister. Extensive traffic studies were carried out by the department which indicated conclusively that there was need for a four-lane facility from the east gate of Banff to mile 47, and that recognized warrants for such a facility were greatly exceeded. The large traffic increase was compounded when the province completed its section from Calgary to Banff east gate as a four-lane facility. It should be noted, however, that under the trans-Canada highway agreement Canada shared in the original construction of a two-lane highway on this section but the later improvement to a four-lane facility was planned and financed solely by the provincial government. Thus, the decision to twin the trans-Canada highway from the Banff east gate westerly was based purely on need and there was no discrimination against any other highway.

I am glad to have been able to supply this information to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre, and there is more detail that could be made available to him if he wishes it.

Mr. Paproski: What about the Yellowhead route? You have said nothing about the Yellowhead route.

Mr. Blouin: I have the information here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please.

DRUGS—REQUEST THAT FURTHER REPORTS OF LE DAIN COMMISSION BE WITHHELD PENDING INCLUSION OF CAUTIONARY FOREWORD

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, the Le Dain interim report of May, 1970, and the latest part of the report entitled "Treatment" have many well documented errors and inadequacies. These are the product of bias and incomplete research. I suggest to this House that we must insist that the expected publication and distribution of the Le Dain commission's forthcoming major study on cannabis be withheld from public distribution until a team of leading Canadian medical scientists has examined it carefully.

Ten prominent Canadian doctors proposed this measure in a Canadian Press statement of October 14, 1971, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the federal and provincial ministers of health and welfare, and justice. "Silence must end," they said, denouncing the interim report of the Le Dain commission. "In our judgment, the Le Dain commission showed both bias and social and scientific irresponsibility" in some of the evidence presented, while "evidence of the harmful effects of this drug, cannabis, was buried under hundreds of pages so that no clear warning could be derived by an uncritical reader". The signers included the former head of the Canadian Psychiatric Association and doctors associated with six prominent Canadian universities and hospitals.

I also have a 70-page study of the interim report prepared by Dr. Fred Lundell, eminent practitioner, associate professor of psychiatry at McGill University and head of a hospital drug research team, which criticizes the interim report in these words: "The studies selected for discussion were highly edited and hardly current" and, further, "Serious reactions—to cannabis—do occur with greater frequency and more severe consequences than suggested in the report".

Dr. Conrad Swartz, prominent drug research specialist and chief psychiatrist at the student health centre, University of British Columbia, in his study of the interim report cites an example where the report "omits some of the prime statements of the 1968 British commission study entitled 'Cannabis' which would discourage any suggestions that cannabis be legalized".

Dr. Andrew Malcolm, a well known practising psychiatrist of Toronto, who has devoted the past ten years to a study of the illegal use of drugs as a senior officer with the Ontario Addiction Research Foundation, gave to the Canadian Press and the Canadian Medical Association on January 31, 1972, a detailed analysis of the first volume of the Le Dain commission's final report entitled "Treatment", followed by a highly detailed medical criticism of chapter VI of the treatment report on February 20, 1972. Admitting that the treatment report contains much information that is perfectly acceptable, it is, he states, "frequently out of date; it contains a staggering amount of misinformation; its proposals are often misquoted and unrealistic". Dr. Malcolm then detailed 22 major and minor errors.

Equally serious is the February 14 Canadian Medical Association's press statement about the treatment report. After mild praise and acceptance of some recommendations, the CMA statement makes the startling request "that the federal government consider attaching a letter to the report to bring it up to date and to make the important corrections that are required" before sending it out to Canadian doctors and medical institutions.

Imagine the implications when medical experts say we should correct the Le Dain report before sending it out for doctors to use as a "manual of treatment" on Canadian citizens! I am informed that proper information was available to Le Dain in ample time to have been included in the manual. This is inexcusable. The British Columbia Medical Association in a statement to the press on March 10 said:

> In our opinion the section on short-term medical management contains so many confusion and questionable points that its distribution to physicians, hospitals and agencies in its present form would only tend to destroy the credibility of the commission in the eyes of many professionals. We request that this chapter VI of the report be not sent to physicians in British Columbia until either it is rewritten or accompanied by a detailed list of corrections of the points which we and others have noted.

It further added:

> We are concerned at the rather casual approach in this document to LSD and cannabis.

I am informed that certain other provincial medical associations are equally critical and will soon make their reports public. These documents, and the one to come, cost the Canadian taxpayer $3 million. The British Columbia Medical Association also strongly criticized Le Dain for not making use of the important work of Dr. Andrew Malcolm. I am disturbed that immediately following his public criticism of the Le Dain treatment volume, Dr. Malcolm was fired on one day's notice by the Ontario Addiction Research Foundation, after ten years' service, on the grounds of budget requirements. The March 10 edition of the Toronto Sun states the firing "was the latest in what critics claim is a dispute over the foundation's alleged tacit support of legalizing marijuana."

In view of the Commission's bad track record in its first two publications, I fully support the insistence of the ten eminent Canadian doctors when they say:

> Our most immediate and grave concern is the possibility that the Le Dain commission may publish a highly permissive fact-hiding and vacillating final report similar to its interim statement of a year ago. Like other commission reports it would be freely available throughout the country and as with the interim report, readership would be promoted and encouraged in some cases by government departments.

And further:

> Should the document fail to identify clearly the harmful effects of cannabis use, immense pressures would be created, especially on youth, to increase use of the drug.

It goes on:

> If it is placed before the public it must contain a clear and unequivocal statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare pointing out the extremely serious problem which arises from the taking of soft drugs and the necessity of abstinence at this stage of our knowledge and experience.

For example, the month-old study of the National Institute of Mental Health, reported in the February 28, 1972, edition of U.S. News and World Report, warns, as do the ten doctors, that women of child bearing years would be unwise to use cannabis due to abnormalities found in a few children born of marijuana-smoking mothers, possibly due to the drug and also from experiments with rats which demonstrated serious deformation of offspring as reported in the statement of the ten doctors.

I have also been informed that the so-called leak of the United States President's Commission on Cannabis which appeared in the February 28, 1972, edition of Time magazine does not properly represent the findings of the commission, which are to be published in Washington in late March. To further support their concern, the ten Canadian doctors strongly condemn the recent commission on youth report prepared for the Secretary of State for its "inexcusably dangerous claim" that, in the words of the youth commission, "soft drugs are relatively harmless or at least so they seem in the absence of any medical evidence to the contrary". The doctors point out that large amounts of available research suggesting harmful effects are available.

What happened to this youth report? Thousands of copies were distributed across Canada by the Secretary of State's department, including Information Canada. I have a newspaper published by the Canada YMCA last fall called, "It's your turn". It was distributed to all its branches across Canada calling on youth to buy and study this youth report, with special emphasis on its inexcusable drug recommendation and calling on youth to write to the Secretary of State encouraging him to pass laws supporting youth demands.

I therefore implore the government to withhold the public presentation of the cannabis report of the Le Dain commission until a team of appropriate medical experts has examined it. On the team must be Dr. William Craig, head of research for the Department of Health, as well as Drs. Swartz, Malcolm and Lundell. If their findings warrant it, an appropriate, cautionary foreword should then be written warning all readers of the biases, inaccuracies and incomplete information and advising them of the danger of soft drug use in the light of our present incomplete knowledge. Such action would be one of responsibility toward one of the most vital social problems of the day. If soft drugs are not harmful, we should not restrict their sale. If they are harmful, the law should contain certain restrictions.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in his question of March 9 the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Stafford) asked the government to withhold publication and distribution of the next report on cannabis until it has been carefully scrutinized and a proper precautionary foreword prepared by a team of medical experts. In his submission tonight the hon. member has re-emphasized the position he took at that time.

The commission of inquiry into the non-medical use of drugs will shortly make public its final report on cannabis. It does not seem to us to be in the public interest to delay publishing the report on such a controversial subject.

On such an important matter involving the health of so many Canadians, the minister and his department would be expected to consult, if necessary, members of the medical profession and would also rely on the collaboration of those national bodies specializing in the health care of Canadians. The final report on cannabis will be made public in the near future and, as in the case of so many other reports of this kind, interested bodies will certainly make their views known. Surely that is one of the points of financing such a report. The government will also study very carefully the recommendations of the commission before taking any action.

In order to reassure the hon. member I would like to refer him to the example of the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) of February 24 on government action to control abuse of methadone and amphetamines. The hon. member will see the extent to which the minister went in consulting the medical profession.

Finally, the hon. member should remember that the commission itself has been consulting over the last two years dozens and dozens of experts in the field of the non-medical use of drugs and has received a great number of briefs from interested groups and individuals. A glance at the interim report and the treatment report will show the hon. member the seriousness of these studies.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION BY HEALTH CLUB AGAINST VETERAN WITH WOODEN LEG

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): On February 29, as reported at page 357 of Hansard I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing) whether he would investigate the incident of discrimination against an Ottawa veteran. To that he replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I would doubt very much that interference on my part or on the part of the Department of Veterans Affairs would be very helpful in this particular case.

Not being satisfied with the answer, I am now pursuing the matter on the "late show" this evening. I think that a case such as this incident should be investigated by the Department of Veterans Affairs, and if not by them by the Department of National Health and Welfare which has some interest in health clubs, or by the Department of Justice, because in my opinion this is a case of pure discrimination on the basis of the physical disability of a person who lost a leg in the Second World War.

The facts of the case are pretty well known, but I want to give a brief history of them tonight. Harold Mullins is an Ottawa veteran who lost his leg in the Second World War. In April of 1967 he joined the Carlingwood branch of the Ottawa, Vic Tanny's health club. A year later he bought a life membership and in total spent $500 in membership fees for himself and his wife. Vic Tanny's knew when Mr. Mullins purchased his membership that he was an amputee: he did not try to hide it. Mr. Mullins is quoted in newspapers as saying:

> The first thing I told them when I signed up was that I had an amputation. My disability was discussed at the time and the fellow that sold me the membership said in my case it didn't matter.

Mr. Mullins then used the facilities, I am told, on an average of about three times a week. He had no problem with the facilities, he used most of them, and this is vouched for by members of the club to whom I and those in my office have spoken. His membership was revoked by Vic Tanny's because, as they said, he did not meet certain regulations outlined by the club. Mr. Mike Mundy, Ottawa director, said, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of March 23, that the decision was prompted by the regulation requiring members to have all four of their limbs. He said:

> —we have nothing against amputees. We simply were not covered by insurance.

I decided to investigate the case, and on March 9 I telephoned Mr. Mundy's office. He referred me to the general manager of Vic Tanny's at Toronto, Mr. Leizer. The general manager in Toronto told us that insurance was not a factor, and he did not refer at all to the regulation that a person should have four limbs to participate in his club. As a matter of fact, we are quite sure of the reason he did not refer to it. I have here a contract signed by Mr. Mullins when he joined Vic Tanny's and it states quite clearly that a person with his type of disability can participate in the club. The only part of the contract that refers at all to a disability is paragraph 6, and I want to put this on record:

> Buyer and member warrant, represent and agree that member is in good physical condition and that he has no disability, impairment or ailment preventing him from engaging in active or passive exercise or that will be detrimental or inimical to his health, safety, comfort, or physical condition if he does so engage or participate.

The type of disability Mr. Mullins had would not have prevented him from participating in activities at this particular club. The general manager of Vic Tanny's health club in Toronto said that his membership was revoked, not because of the regulations but because it would be very hazardous for a disabled person to get around the club. He said there were "steps leading to the various facilities". He offered to fly to Ottawa to show me around the club. This was unnecessary, Mr. Speaker, because I and my office had already talked to club members who had said that this was not the case and that there are no steps once you get into the club.

Why, then, was Mr. Mullins' membership revoked? From our investigation we see that the reasons originally given by the club were not valid at all. Instead, it appears to us that officials of the club panicked after a certain incident occurred. We are told by Mr. Mullins and by other people that on February 8 a 70 year-old amputee died of a heart attack after swimming in the pool in the club in Ottawa. That very evening Mr. Mullins was told that he would have to hand in his membership card in order to prevent a repetition of such an incident. It was at this point the club decided that Mr. Mullins could no longer participate. There is no relationship at all, I suggest, between amputations and heart attacks. In fact, the 70 year-old gentleman who died that day had a long history of heart condition.

On the other hand, Mr. Mullins is fit and healthy. Even though his leg is amputated below the knee, last summer he bicycled eight miles to work from his home in Aylmer. He is active and participates in swimming and weight-lifting. There is no reason for his membership to be revoked. This is why I am asking the government to investigate the case because this type of thing should not happen in our country.

The fact that his money has been refunded is not the point. Because of certain pressures, Vic Tanny's have refunded his money. He wants to be reinstated in the club. He does not want this type of incident to happen to other veterans or to other people who have physical handicaps of this nature. Mr. Speaker, there should be regulations to protect people from this type of discrimination. I would like to encourage the veterans of the country to protest against this type of discrimination. I am looking forward to a reply from the minister, and I hope that something can be done.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the statement of the hon. member. Without question, the individual concerned is an employee of the Department of Veterans Affairs. He is a man in good physical condition who prides himself on his regular program of exercise and he is a well regarded citizen of the community. In the circumstances, I cannot help but feel that the incident is deplorable in the extreme. However, I would like to point out a few facts so far as the government's position is concerned.

There is a contract between the individual and the particular club. That contract was referred to by the hon. member in his statement tonight. The contract is the basis of his claim against the club. I think there is sufficient reason for his wishing to consult his private lawyer in terms of the contract and whether or not it was breached. So far as the government is concerned, however, I am not aware of any basis on which the government can act on what, on the face of it, is the matter of a private contract.

• (2200)

As I have said, however reprehensible the policy of the club is, it does not appear to be a basis for intervention by the government. I believe that the publicity associated with the case has, in the sense of public interest, been good publicity. As was indicated, Vic Tanny's refunded the full membership fee and the individual had used the facilities for some time. It appears to me that this matter involves a private remedy. There is a clear contract, and I think the individual could consult his solicitors and take appropriate action in the courts.

ALLEGED WIRETAPPING AND UNAUTHORIZED OPENING OF MAIL TO MEMBERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pringle: —to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Last week, over the weekend and, indeed, as late as yesterday there have been suggestions and claims that the telephones of some members of parliament have been tapped and that mail addressed to some members has been opened without their authorization. These claims cannot help but cause suspicion in the minds of the general public and therefore can hinder members in performing their duties. It is most important that this matter be investigated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pringle: —so that members can carry out their work without any doubts or suspicions about security.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a motion he should put it to the House now without argument.

Mr. Pringle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am only taking my lead from my friends in the opposition. Therefore I ask leave of the House to move, and I do move, seconded by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner):

That the allegations concerning wiretapping and opening of mail of members of this House be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion is made under the terms of Standing Order 43. It can be put to the House only if there is unanimous agreement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I will therefore put the motion. Mr. Pringle, seconded by Mr. Penner, moves:

That the allegations concerning wiretapping and opening of mail of members of the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges, and Elections.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Pringle) agreed to.

TRANSPORT

IMPACT OF FREIGHT RATES ON MARITIMES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask leave of the House to move a motion on a subject of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the government's announced intention of reducing regional disparities in Canada, and in view of the fact that increases in freight rates have the effect of further weakening the competitive position of Maritime industries vis-à-vis the rest of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House instructs the Minister of Transport to appear before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications at the earliest possible date to discuss plans for an immediate reduction in the freight rates which have such a deleterious effect on the Maritime economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This motion is also proposed to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion therefore cannot be put.

Mr. Bell: What have they got to hide over there that they cannot give us a break?

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASONS FOR DROP IN LABOUR FORCE GROWTH—MEASURES TO STIMULATE INVESTMENT BY INDUSTRY TO CREATE JOBS—GOVERNMENT OBJECTIVES FOR 1972

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising from the drop in the labour force between January and February, the largest reported in the history of Statistics Canada. Is the minister commissioning any inquiry into the reasons for this? For example, is he having any study made to see whether this may have been partially caused by the new tax laws that have gone into effect?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I do not accept that suggestion, Mr. Speaker. The figures speak for themselves. I derive some encouragement from the latest figures, but that is small comfort for those men and women seeking work. As I have suggested to the House earlier, statistics are no substitute for the human problems of unemployment.

Mr. Stanfield: I quite agree but I wondered whether the minister might make some inquiries as to the cause for the drop in the work force.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What did you do with Rock today?

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that the increase in employment recorded between January and February is about average, and despite the fact that the local initiatives program presumably created some thousands of temporary jobs during that period, is the minister considering any measures to stimulate the rate of investment by industry in Canada, thereby creating jobs? I ask this particularly in view of the fact the government's own surveys show that investment intentions and commitments in industry are only about as high in 1972 as they were in 1971.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, any measures taken by the government will be announced at an appropriate time. I believe these figures reflect a deep human problem and should not be a statistical game played in the House of Commons once a month.

Mr. Stanfield: I could not agree more with the minister, Mr. Speaker, but in regard to the latter statement I should like to ask whether he can inform the House when he will be presenting a budget? Can he also assure us that when he presents it he will at that time indicate his goals and objectives for the year 1972 with regard to economic growth and lowering the rate of unemployment?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at the moment I cannot tell the hon. member if or when there will be a budget.

[Mr. Bell.]

PROGRAMS TO PROVIDE JOBS FOR PERSONS RECEIVING MANPOWER TRAINING AND THOSE NOW EMPLOYED UNDER LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, like the Minister of Finance I am very happy to see the down curve in unemployment and I hope it will continue in future months as well. I want to ask the Minister of Finance the following question. Since there are now, I am informed, over 100,000 men and women under manpower training—in school, as it were—and some tens of thousands of people employed under LIP temporarily and as that program expires on May 31, may I ask the minister whether the government is now giving consideration to programs following May 31 to make sure that the people who are now being trained and those now employed under LIP will have jobs to go to?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give consideration to that suggestion. The objective of this government is to ensure, so far as we can, that the economy is reflected, in human terms, in jobs.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Richmond rising on a supplementary?

Mr. Beaudoin: No, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEASURES TO ASSURE STEADY WORK FOR PEOPLE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the minister.

Since the province of Quebec has an unemployment rate of over 7 per cent at the present time and the Quebec people are concerned about the employment situation, due to the fact that except for the local initiatives program no other measure has been taken to provide regular employment to Quebec workers; can the minister tell us, to give hope to the unemployed in Quebec, that they will have a regular job after the implementation of this program—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this is a question that the minister would normally answer on motions by making a general statement. The minister might want to answer something along this line.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, could I explain my question?

I repeat it, in view of the fact that in Quebec the unemployment rate is 7.7 per cent, what does the Minister of Finance intend to do to offer an alternative to the unemployed who will find themselves on the labour market—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is repeating his question of a moment ago. I suggest to him to ask it only to the extent that he is inviting the minister to make a statement on motions.

[English]

May we have order, please. It is very difficult to hear. Order, please. It is very difficult for the Chair to follow proceedings with all the conversations that are going on at present in the House. I invite hon. members to wait for a while before they pursue these conversations.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED ACTION TO BRING ABOUT TRANSFER OF INVESTMENT FUNDS FROM RESOURCE TO MANUFACTURING SECTORS TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. Would the Minister of Finance give serious consideration to increasing the rate of taxation on the resource sector of the economy to at least the level of the manufacturing sector in order to bring about a transfer of investment funds from the resource sector to the manufacturing sector soon and, thus, the creation of many more jobs?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take what merit I can from that suggestion.

FINANCE

DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING FINANCING OF MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Is it correct that his department has initiated discussions with the provincial governments in order to find a formula for financing the public sector, particularly municipalities, so that the latter may be able to proceed with the urgent works they have to do and for which they lack money?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Not at present, Mr. Speaker.

AIRPORTS

NEW TERMINAL BUILDING, TORONTO—REASON FOR PAYMENT OF ADDITIONAL MONEY TO CONTRACTOR

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to explain to the House why the government has found it necessary to pay the contractor an additional $2½ million over and above the original contract price to enable the new air terminal building at Toronto International Airport to open in June whereas the original contract required that it be opened in March?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would assume that the estimates of the department will very soon be before the committee, at which time I will be prepared to answer all questions relating to this item.

• (1420)

Mr. Hees: At the time the minister is answering all questions, will he also be prepared to answer questions as to why the contractor has said that he, the contractor, is not responsible for any delay in construction or increase in costs? Will the minister explain who is responsible and why?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Have we got another Bonaventure on our hands?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NEW TERMINAL BUILDING, TORONTO—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CONTRACTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a different kind of question relating to this subject. Will the minister table the amendment to the contract with Piggot Construction and the details of the arrangements with that company so that members of parliament can see exactly what is involved in view of the fact there has not only been, I understand, a $2.5 million additional payment to Piggot but also an additional $1.7 million for delays for which the department is alleged to be responsible? Will the minister table the contracts involved and the amendments to the contracts?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to the extent that it is within the government's power to do so and these are not private matters of the contractor, I will be glad to table or make available to members all details relating to this particular project.

CRIMINAL CODE

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—REVIEW BY HOUSE DURING PRESENT SESSION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that on December 29, 1967 the House of Commons deemed advisable to amend section 202A(2) of the Criminal Code, dealing with capital punishment in Canada, with a few exceptions, made the amendment to remain in force for a five-year period ending on December 29, 1972, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether he intends to have the House deal with the matter this year, during the present session?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to broach this matter during the present session. Normally, a new session should begin in the fall. Normally also, the present government will be in power and we shall then be able to deal with the problem.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

STEPS TO CONTROL RADIATION FROM MACHINES USED FOR TEACHING AND OTHER PURPOSES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the recent findings of dangerous amounts of radiation being given off by machines used for teaching and other purposes, what steps has the minister taken to stop or control the use of faulty machines and the purchase of cathode tubes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might reply briefly to the question. I have the impression this is a question that ought normally be placed on the order paper. Of course, I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member. The minister may want to reply briefly to the question.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I would not disagree with you, Mr. Speaker. I will take the question as notice and try to get an answer for the hon. member.

BANFF—REQUEST FOR FURTHER HEARINGS ON PROPOSED LAKE LOUISE PROJECT

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the hearings in Calgary last week in connection with the Lake Louise project were alleged to be totally inadequate for the number of people who wished to present briefs, will the Prime Minister consider rescheduling hearings with regard to the Lake Louise project in other areas of Alberta before a decision is made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into the matter. I have not been following it. I will discuss it with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

TRADE

SUGGESTED TAX OR CREDIT INCENTIVES TO STIMULATE EXPORTS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact the export figures for last year have now indicated that Canada's export performance not only lagged behind the growth of world trade generally but was indeed less than the average of the exports of the 14 leading industrial countries, is the minister prepared to initiate any new tax or credit incentives to increase our trade, and can we expect a statement in the House shortly?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): First, Mr. Speaker, I want to report that the first two months of 1972 have been very good, 11.4 per cent. As to the subject of taxes, that could be answered by the Minister of Finance. With regard to incentives, I am surprised the hon. member has not seen the number of communiqués which the department has issued with respect to what is being done in supporting financially bidding abroad by Canadian exporters, participation in fairs, in bringing buyers to Canada and so on. We are working very hard at it. I could refer, also, to the missions which have produced good results up to now—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Danforth: May I ask the minister whether he would forgo all the cosmetics and get down to the prime factor? Will he tell us whether or not there is difficulty in arriving at a comparative value as between the Canadian and the United States dollars, a difficulty which is holding up some of our exports and delaying settlement of the automobile trade agreement between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Pepin: I do not understand the last part of the question, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry.

OIL

INQUIRY AS TO REVOKING OF DRILLING PERMITS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA COASTAL WATERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last week I asked the hon. gentleman for certain information with regard to the granting of oil exploration permits to Petrotar Development Limited of Calgary covering some 2.7 million acres of coastal waters in British Columbia. The minister promised to look into that situation. If I may particularize, I have in mind the 1.4 million acres in Hecate Strait and Queen Charlotte Sound and the 1.3 million acres west and northwest of Vancouver. Were these permits granted and, if so, have they now been revoked?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not happen to have the actual geographical co-ordinates in connection with the permits. I can confirm that there are permits outstanding to Petrotar. My understanding is that in general terms they relate to the Queen Charlotte Sound area. I undertook to get more detailed information for the hon. gentleman's examination. While there is a great deal of technical detail on this sheet, there is perhaps not sufficient to satisfy him and I have asked the department to get more.

My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, made a statement on the coast this week with my concurrence indicating that we are in the process of developing zoning areas for the purpose of determining environmental areas not only on the west coast but on the east coast. This will be of guidance, in due course, in determining the continuation of either seismic operations or ultimately drilling operations. At the moment I cannot give exact details of how the proposed zoning arrangements will affect the permits to which he has referred, but I will be glad to keep the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the minister. Unless he wishes to return to motions and make a statement I suggest he might allow the hon. member to ask a supplementary.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that permits for seismic operations must inevitably lead to oil drilling permits unless the government breaks faith with those who take out the permits, and in view of the commitment made by the Minister of the Environment that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources intended to revoke these permits, may I ask the minister whether it is now the policy of the government to revoke all oil exploration permits off the Pacific coast?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would point out that if seismic studies indicate there is no field there, then, of course, there will be no drilling.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With regard to the—the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands seems to have a lot more to say, so I will sit down.

POSSIBLE REVISION OF POLICY RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF TEXTILES AND FURNITURE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Since it is difficult for Canadian textile and furniture industries to compete, as a result of the present policy under which too many imports are flooding the Canadian market, is the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask a question. He should not take advantage of a question to put forward an argument. He should ask his question as quickly as possible.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Owing to that problem, is the minister considering the opportunity of altering that foreign trade policy in favour of the Canadian market.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am truly offended, considering that the policy respecting textile products is now recognized by both employers and employees as one of the federal government's big successes. I am surprised by the reaction of my hon. friend.

I cannot explain the whole policy once again; he should have knowledge of it.

As for textile exports, in the primary sector, they exceed 100 million, while clothing exports are close to 90 million—

TRANSPORT

INCREASE IN BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE TO EXPEDITE RAIL FREIGHT

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Since the air traffic control facilities are now functioning at a level which allowed the minister to make a welcome visit to Prince Edward Island yesterday, can he now give some assurance that the capacity of the Borden-Cape Tormentine ferry service will be increased so that rail freight especially can be handled more expeditiously during periods of bad ice conditions?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I can give that assurance. We had some very useful discussions with the government of Prince Edward Island yesterday. The immediate difficulty does not appear to be with the ferry services themselves but with the shortage of reefer cars. I am told that approximately 100 of these were moved to the island or were on their way to the island over the weekend, and the situation does seem to have been relieved quite a bit. So far as the question of ferries is concerned, capacity would seem to be adequate and we intend to keep it that way.

SUMMERSIDE, P.E.I., AIR SERVICE—RESULT OF DISCUSSION WITH LOCAL REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister regarding his conversations yesterday with the government of Prince Edward Island. I believe that one of the purposes of his visit was to determine the adequacy of air services, particularly in view of the termination of air service by Eastern Provincial to Summerside. Can the minister report on the difficulties that are being encountered by business people in the Summerside area, and can he also indicate the reasons for the dismantling of the air terminal in light of the fact that EPA was granted a suspension for only two years, not a complete termination of service?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the second part of the question I would imagine that is a matter for the airline itself to decide. It is their property, if they choose to dismantle it.

With regard to the first question, we had a lengthy discussion with a delegation from Summerside yesterday and a number of alternatives were discussed. I put forward some; the group from Summerside put forward others. We are now in the process of comparing these suggestions with the objective of restoring some form of air service, the best and most desirable form of air service, to Summerside.

UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—ACTION TO OFFSET EFFECT ON CANADIAN COMPANIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in relation to what is ordinarily referred to as the United States DISC program, on which we have questioned him many times before. Has the minister now determined the effect of this program on Canadian industry and what action, if any, he proposes to take to offset this program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust that the minister can reply briefly. The Leader of the Opposition will recognize that this is a very general question. Perhaps the minister might attempt to reply very briefly. Otherwise he should reply to the matter by way of a statement on motions.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be as brief as I usually am. The answer is simply that the regulations under the DISC program have not yet been published. Second, all the efforts we have made to assess the use that United States companies will make of the DISC program have produced contradictory results. If my hon. friend himself knows what the results of the program will be on the Canadian economy, or knows people who know, then by all means I should like to hear from him, as a contribution to the body of knowledge presently being assembled.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SECURITY OF MAIL AND TELEPHONES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—PROTECTION OF JOBS AND CAREERS OF PUBLIC SERVANTS WHO TESTIFY BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of the statement he made in the House yesterday, following which he gave certain assurances at a press conference outside the House with respect to employees of the government feeling free to come forward to testify on the material contained in his statement yesterday. Can the Prime Minister in the House, on his own behalf and on behalf of all his cabinet ministers, give the House his assurance that no public servant who appears before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to testify will be fired or have his or her career in any way prejudiced as a result thereof?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is rather like the kind of question about whether you have stopped beating your wife.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: Have you started?

Mr. Hees: Give him a chance; he is going to need help here.

Mr. Trudeau: In so far as I can answer the question without any of the aforesaid implications being read into it, of course the assurance is yes. It is not the practice or policy of this government in any way to seek retribution against any people who testify before a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Hees: Except the Auditor General.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question in view of the importance of the matter. Now that the subject has been referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and since the Prime Minister went beyond what he has just said at the press conference yesterday, when he gave his outright assurance and said that public servants would be commended if they came forward to tell of any such incidents, all I am trying to get from the Prime Minister is his assurance that if any civil servant does come forward he will not be fired or in any way have his career prejudiced.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member is repeating the question. I may have missed something, but this appears to me to be the same question.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but with the greatest respect I did introduce a further element by specifically quoting what the Prime Minister said at his press conference yesterday. I wonder whether he might be permitted to reply, because the assurance I am requesting is extremely important.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly prepared to renew those statements and assurances. I would only hope that if the hearings before the committee show that the allegations of the hon. member are pure fabrication his seat will be at stake as a result.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order? Otherwise we should go on to the next question as we are running short of time.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I simply want to set the Prime Minister's mind at ease immediately by telling him that the Liberals have been after my seat since 1963, but I will not give them any assurance that they will regain it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT OF PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I wanted to direct to the attention of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask a question in those terms. He cannot ask whether a minister is correctly quoted or whether a statement in the press is correct.

Mr. Mather: Perhaps I could rephrase my question. Can the minister say whether his department is working on a public transportation policy?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, various aspects of public transportation are being examined within the government, not only within my own department.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

TENDERS FOR RECONSTRUCTION OF COLLEGE GYMNASIUM AND LIBRARY FOLLOWING FIRE—POSSIBILITY OF REMOVAL FROM SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the anxiety still existing in regard to the future of the Canadian Coastguard College in so far as locale is concerned, would the minister advise when tenders are going to be called for the reconstruction of the gymnasium and library which were destroyed by fire last year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether this is the kind of question that normally ought to be asked during the question period, but the minister might reply briefly, the question having been asked.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I seem to recall an item in my department in one of the reports from my officials having to do with expenditures at Sydney in the current year. Whether they apply to the gymnasium or not, I am not certain. If the hon. member will give me a day or so I will get him an answer.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary, but I think I ought to remind hon. members we will be running short of time very soon. We should try by co-operation to limit supplementaries and get on as quickly as we can.

Mr. Muir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I speak very rapidly in any event. Can the hon. gentleman advise when the report of the committee which is studying the future locale, co-ordination and operation of the Canadian Coastguard College will be presented, and would the minister also outline to the people why he said there were no immediate plans to move the college and the minister in Nova Scotia said there was no foundation whatsoever to these rumours?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I guess it is a matter of semantics. I am quite prepared to confirm the statements of the minister representing Nova Scotia in that there is no—

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—ISSUANCE TO QUEBEC UNDER NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT OF APPROVAL FOR BRIDGE ACROSS BELL RIVER

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which concerns the James Bay project. Yesterday the Prime Minister took the question as notice so today I will address it to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister inform the House whether under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act the Quebec government presented an application to the federal government for approval of the construction of the bridge that is now being built across the Bell River as part of the James Bay project and, if so, was approval granted by the minister?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that an application was received from the Department of Natural Resources of the province of Quebec for a bridge to cross the Bell River at Matagami and this was approved on January 28, 1971. I want to make the date clear. I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition because I said I did not think anything had been received recently, but when we looked into the files we found the application was made presumably in 1970 and approval was granted on January 28, 1971.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the minister inform the House when the application was received by him?

Mr. Jamieson: I do not have that particular date with me but obviously it must have been before January 28, 1971. If members are not right in suggesting that my department is reasonably slow in these matters, which I deny emphatically, it was obviously some time in late 1970.

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATIONS FROM QUEBEC RESPECTING DAMS OR OTHER PROJECTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Transport indicate whether any application has been received from the province of Quebec in respect of any dam project or any other projects in respect of this undertaking?

An hon. Member: Watch your language.

Mr. Stanfield: Don't say "dam".

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, so that I do not get into the same trap I will say that I do not think there have been any applications for any cotton-picking projects but we are reviewing the matter further, the Prime Minister having called it to my office's attention this morning.

POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNIONS ON NEW CONTRACT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the fact that the contract with the postal union has almost expired—I believe the date is March 27 or March 29—has the President of the Treasury Board anything to advise the House in respect of the negotiations and whether he is hopeful of an early settlement?

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. gentlemen both in the House and in committee, I do not think it would be helpful to constructive progress of the negotiations to conduct them in public. Consequently I will withstand the temptation to make a report. I am hopeful, of course, that we will be able to reach a settlement before the contract expiry date.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PLANS TO REDUCE STRIKES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. In light of the fact that the President of the Treasury Board has accepted a policy of reducing strikes in the Public Service rather than withdrawing the right to strike, can he advise the House when he will in fact be laying on the table the policy and the plans with regard to that attitude of the President of the Treasury Board and whether in fact this follows from the Bryden report?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention and, indeed, it is not my hope to lay before the House a policy on what the hon. gentleman calls strike reduction. I must confess I do not quite understand that. In so far as the so-called Bryden report is concerned, I think the House leader has already made reference to that at an earlier date.

Mr. Alexander: A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member wishes to ask a further supplementary but if he will look around him he will see there are many hon. members who are anxious to ask questions and we are running short of time. Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that with the indulgence of the Chair, we might clear up the matter in respect of what I was trying to bring out.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order. It is the responsibility of the Chair to decide when we should go to the next questioner. Discussions are continuing in that direction and we hope soon to be in a position to make the usual announcements.

At that time he suggested that the national port authority had representation from the Prairie region. In view of recent problems I wonder whether the minister would reconsider the possibility of appointing someone from the Prairie region to the port of Vancouver authority?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe that would be consistent with the policy, nor in fact would it achieve the objective which I think we share. I had hoped we would have the National Ports Council in operation now. I believe I have a nominee from Saskatchewan, but I have had some difficulty with the change of government. PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST OF ANN BOOTH FOR LEAVE TO SEEK NOMINATION AS CANDIDATE IN FEDERAL ELECTION—PRESENT STATUS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. It is a question that was asked of the Prime Minister yesterday by the gentleman who is now sitting beside the President of the Treasury Board. In the interest of promoting fairness, will the minister now report on the status of Ann Booth, the CRTC employee who wishes a leave of absence to seek a nomination for the forthcoming federal election?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that an application for leave of absence to seek the nomination in a local constituency was made by Miss Booth. That leave, which may be accorded or withheld by the Public Service Commission, was in fact not granted by the commission. Consequently, Miss Booth's action or intention to proceed to seek the nomination anyway would be against the Public Service Employment Act. Miss Booth has been suspended by reason of failure to comply with the act.

Mr. Fairweather: Is the treatment of Miss Booth likely to be duplicated as other public servants seek nominations?

Mr. Drury: I hope that all public servants who seek nomination will, as the law provides, seek leave of absence for the purpose of getting it and proceed in accordance with the decision rendered by the Public Service Commission.

In view of continuing reports of difficulties in the CBC with NABET, would the Prime Minister ensure that the Secretary of State will come into the House tomorrow and make a statement on motions or at some time during the day to clarify the situation, since the fluid position which he said existed on Monday, according to NABET today has not improved from the position which existed in May, 1971, and I suggest is stagnating.

PLANS TO REDUCE STRIKES—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to follow up my earlier questions with a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the fact that the President of the Treasury Board has indicated he is more interested in reducing strikes than in withdrawing the right to strike from the public service, I wonder whether the President of the Treasury Board intends to make a statement regarding the criteria which will be set in order to accomplish this, or whether it will be done by way of legislation and, if so, how soon we can expect this legislation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the House leader has given an indication of when there will be possibilities or otherwise of legislative enactment in this respect. My practice will be to ensure that the negotiations and the framework of negotiations are such as to lead to the conclusion of an agreement rather than the precipitation of strike action.

The government House leader indicated to me yesterday that he would have an answer for me today as to whether he would permit the petition of the people of Old Crow to be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have examined the petition and also the machinery and procedures that might be used in respect of the grievance that has been submitted by this group. I have concluded, in consultation with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that the commission which has been established by the government under Dr. Barber would more probably produce better results in this case than a reference to a standing committee. I understand that the Yukon Native Brotherhood has had preliminary discussions with Dr. Barber and will be making formal submissions including the matter contained in the petition which my hon. friend laid on the table of the House.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

DATE OF PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, with regard to a point of order concerning House business, I would like to ask the government House leader when the report of the Committee on the Constitution will be tabled in the House.

Mr. Speaker: This is not a point of order. The hon. member is putting a question which could have been put during the oral question period; I am the first to recognize that he did not have the opportunity of doing so. It might be simpler to allow the minister to answer it. But, again, I remind hon. members that it is irregular to put questions under the guise of points of order, once the oral question period has ended, unless hon. members agree to it unanimously. In any event, the question having been put, the minister might perhaps answer it quickly.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I really do not know when the committee will report, but I will have a word with the chairman.

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on a point of order or question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this afternoon the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, misinformed the House. I know the hon. gentleman well enough to believe that he would not deliberately do so. The question referred to whether or not the United States has formulated regulations arising out of the DISC program. If I understood the minister correctly, he said that the U.S. government had not formulated such regulations. If that is what he said, it is contrary to the fact, and I refer the minister to Sunday's New York Times which contains an article pointing out—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question of privilege; that is a point of debate between the minister and the hon. member. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of a Ways and Means Motion to amend the Income Tax Act.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things:

(1) That with respect to taxable income earned after June 30, 1971 and before January 1, 1973, the tax payable under Part 1 of the said Act for the 1972 and 1973 taxation years by every corporation liable to pay tax computed under sections 123 or 143 of the said Act as it reads in its application to those years be reduced by an amount equal to seven per cent of the amount by which

(a) the tax so computed

(b) the deductions permitted by sections 125 and 130 of the said Act as it so reads, and that consequential adjustments be made in the manner specified in the said measure in computing the amount of any applicable refunds of tax permitted by Part 1 of the said Act as it so reads.

(2) That the tax payable under Part 1 of the said Act by an individual for the 1972 taxation year be reduced by an amount equal to three per cent of the aggregate of the "tax otherwise payable under this Part" (within the meaning assigned by paragraph 120(4)(c) of the said Act as it reads in its application to the 1972 taxation year) and any amount added thereto pursuant to subsection 120(1) of that Act.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-4, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from January 1, 1971 to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railways Company, and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, while I am personally convinced that, so far as bringing about necessary changes in the operations of the Canadian National Railways is concerned, this debate is an exercise in futility, I feel I cannot pass up the opportunity to place on the record some of the many important changes which should be made in order that the Canadian National Railways may better serve the purpose for which it was established. Year after year, we find this railway appropriations bill before us. Year after year, members stand in their places and make recommendations on how the railway's operations could be improved, and year after year the government pays absolutely no attention to those representations.

There was a time when this railway did serve the people of Canada well. There was a time when it served the purpose for which it was originally intended, but I am afraid that situation has passed, and today the railway is definitely not performing the function which it was established to perform. I lay the major portion of the blame for this failure to perform its proper function, on the Canadian Transport Commission. It is the duty of the Canadian Transport Commission to see that the railway functions properly. One of the reasons that Commission was set up was to see that the railway provided the services which it was originally intended it should provide when it was first built across Canada.

Quite obviously the Commission is overlooking the basic premise that communications are the key to economic development. I suggest that economic development cannot take place unless we have good communications. We cannot have satisfactory economic development without a proper transportation service. Industries will not establish in an area where transportation is inadequate. They can hardly be blamed for that because an industry must be able to get its product to market at a minimum of expense, and a minimum of inconvenience. This basic fact was recognized as far back as 1961 by the MacPherson Royal Commission. That Commission was set up to study the whole subject of transportation. I think it important to place some of its recommendations on the record in order to indicate that the Canadian National is not now carrying out the recommendations made at that time.

The report of the MacPherson Royal Commission on Transport at page 72, volume I, reads:

> Locational and resource disadvantages are well known in Canada. Remedies for overcoming them have been built into national policy. Transportation has been used as one instrument for mitigating locational disadvantage ... Locational disadvantages can still be ameliorated by national transportation policies.

The Commission pointed out that the railways retain a real economic advantage with respect to many essential traffic movements and that they will remain, for some time to come, the backbone of the transportation system in Canada. The Canadian Transport Commission unfortunately fails to recognize this fact.

> It is also apparent that each of the different modes of transport comprising this system—rail, road, water, air and pipe line—makes it own unique and necessary contribution to the functioning of the whole. There is a need for all, and there is room for all. We have reached, in other words, the era of competitive co-existence in transportation in Canada and it is the task of the public, and of the industry itself, to ensure that present and future policy is formulated in the light of this development.

[Mr. McQuaid.]

We should note the Commission's observation that transportation has been used to mitigate locational disadvantages, and that such disadvantages can still be ameliorated by national transportation policies. It is too bad that the Canadian Transport Commission is not guided by that observation. Had it been guided by it, we would not have seen literally hundreds of railway stations close down throughout the length and breadth of the country, with the accompanying loss of jobs, and accompanying inconvenience to employees who had to move themselves and their families to other parts of Canada.

Railway passenger service is in a sad state. It has been drastically curtailed, and in some provinces, such as my own, it has been completely eliminated. When you curtail or eliminate passenger service you eliminate the ability of the public to choose among different modes of transportation. I realize that air transportation is speedy. In many cases it is convenient, but we must realize that not everybody chooses to travel by air. Not everybody likes to travel by air. The services of the railway should have been retained for those people who want to travel by that method. Indeed, that is the prime reason that this railway was constructed in this country, and I think it is nothing less than criminal to allow the Canadian National Railways to discontinue passenger service in some parts of Canada.

The elimination of railway passenger service naturally increases the use of the automobile as a means of transportation, and we have now reached the point where it is becoming a menace because of the pollution disseminated and the traffic congestion. If railway service had been maintained, and those people who prefer to travel by rail given the opportunity to do so, we would not be suffering from pollution and traffic congestion to the degree that we do today. There is another important point, Mr. Speaker. In many cases our road systems are not adequate to handle the increasing volume of traffic.

The excuse offered by the Canadian Transport Commission and the government for eliminating or cutting down the railway service is that it was not making money. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that profit-making should not be the sole criteria. Essential public services must be provided to the people of Canada whether or not they are profitable. We have innumerable examples of public services which are not operating at a profit and, to my mind, there is no excuse for the government or the CTC eliminating railway services simply because they are operated at a loss. Railways were built to provide service to Canadian people, not necessarily to make money for the government. If they can be operated at a profit, that is fine, but the fact they can not is not a reasonable excuse for eliminating them.

Within the last week the railway announced plans to increase sleeping car fares on passenger trains by 5 per cent to 9 per cent. The increase is to become effective on June 1 this year, and apparently is the result of a directive from the Canadian Transport Commission that sleeping and dining car services must be self-supporting. Mr. Speaker, I by no means agree that these services must be self-supporting. They are a public service and as I have said, there are innumerable public services operating in this country today which are not making a profit.

Let us consider the matter of freight rates. In the Atlantic provinces we are more affected by this than people in any other part of Canada. In the past 29 months we have suffered eight increases. There was a freeze on freight rates until 1969, and since then we have suffered these increases. To give an idea of how serious they are, I offer the following figures. In June, 1962, the basic freight rate per carload of potatoes from Charlottetown to Montreal was 46 cents per 100 pounds. In 1967, it was 51 cents; in 1969, it was 54 cents and in 1970 as well as at present, 57 cents. In 1962, from Charlottetown to Toronto, the rate was 61 cents; in 1967, it was 67 cents; in 1969, it was 71 cents, and in 1970 and at present, 75 cents. That is an increase of 14 cents from 1962 to 1972. The situation is even worse from Charlottetown to Newfoundland. In 1958, it was 88 cents; 1959, 95 cents; 1967, $1.04; 1968, $1.06; 1969, $1.15; 1970, $1.19; 1971, $1.30; and 1972, $1.44. From 1958 to 1972 an increase from 88 cents to $1.44.

These increases are detrimental to the potato industry in the province. As hon. members know, we are heavily dependent on that potato industry. With these increases we cannot compete with potatoes grown in other parts of Canada, despite the fact that Prince Edward Island produces a quality of potato superior to that grown in any other part of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: Industries are discouraged from coming to our province because of the vicious freight rate structure. We have no raw materials in Prince Edward Island, so they have to be brought in for the purpose of manufacture. Then, the finished product is sent to market, but with the high freight rates on the raw materials as well as the finished product our industries cannot compete with those in other parts of Canada. This naturally is a discouragement to industries which might otherwise be interested in settling there.

Just last Wednesday, the Department of Agriculture announced changes in the Canadian livestock feed freight subsidy for feed grain. This grain comes from western Canada and the freight rates are subsidized. The subsidy was raised for the provinces of Nova Scotia, Ontario, New Brunswick, Quebec and British Columbia but Prince Edward Island was not mentioned. Mr. Speaker, if there is a province in Canada to which the increased subsidy should apply it is Prince Edward Island, where the livestock and dairy industries are suffering because of the high cost of feed grain. Practically all feed grains have to be brought in from western Canada. I very sincerely ask the government why they have discriminated against Prince Edward Island in this matter.

An hon. Member: They have no seats there.

Mr. McQuaid: Possibly that is the answer but it is a most unfair situation, and one to which I take very serious exception. The increased subsidy should have been granted to our province because our need is equal to, and in some cases greater than, those provinces to which it has been applied. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is reported to have made a statement that the changes were made to bring freight subsidies in line with changing costs during the last year, particularly in the remote areas. Mr. Speaker, our area may definitely be classed as a remote area, especially so far as the transportation of feed grain from western Canada is concerned. I want to know from the Minister of Agriculture or the government why Prince Edward Island has been so grossly discriminated against with respect to these subsidies.

• (1520)

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. McQuaid: Another serious complaint heard in our province relates to the lack of availability of refrigerator cars used for shipping potatoes. The growing of potatoes is a prime industry in Prince Edward Island, and we must get those potatoes to market. It will be impossible to get them to market unless the railway provides us with the necessary refrigerator cars. The situation during the past week, as noted by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) today, has been very, very serious. When refrigerated cars are not available, we cannot transport our potatoes to markets which are crying for them. As I say, potatoes cannot be shipped if the railways will not supply us with refrigerated cars. Other modes of transport are not available, refrigerated motor trucks not being available in sufficient quantities to transport our potatoes to market. I hope, therefore, that the department will take steps to remedy the situation as soon as possible.

The last matter I want to mention, Mr. Speaker, is the matter of air transport. Strangely, some people apparently do not recognize Prince Edward Island as a province of Canada, because we are the only province of Canada to which Air Canada has refused to come.

Mr. Forrestall: That is disgraceful.

Mr. McQuaid: A few years ago an application was made to Air Canada for the provision of air transport to Prince Edward Island, at least to a limited extent, so that we would be serviced in the same way as the other provinces of this country. Air Canada refused. I say with considerable pride that we have been able to get along without the services of Air Canada. That, however, does not excuse Air Canada for refusing to serve that area. Eastern Provincial Airways is presently providing a modern, up-to-date service to our province. The airline operates three Boeing 737 jets, each of which can carry either 108 or 109 passengers. It also operates eight other propeller driven aircraft which provide transport facilities between the island and other parts of the eastern seaboard. Eastern Provincial Airways presently employs 500 people. So, it is an industry. There is now a non-stop flight from Montreal to Charlottetown. The trip takes one hour and fifteen minutes, and the aircraft continues on, from Charlottetown, to Halifax and various other places in Newfoundland.

Eastern Provincial Airways presently has an application before the Air Transport Commission for a service which would link the three Maritime capital cities with Montreal. It is proposed that this service shall start in Charlottetown at eight o'clock in the morning. The aircraft is to proceed from there to Halifax, Fredericton, Chatham, New Brunswick, Charlo, New Brunswick, and then to Montreal. I presume, and take for granted that this service will be in addition to that presently being provided. I certainly hope that the Air Transport Commission will grant the application and permit Eastern Provincial Airways to expand its service to Prince Edward Island, and will bear in mind the refusal of Air Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: I have talked about some of our transport problems. I cannot resist the temptation to suggest that, in addition to the remedies I have mentioned, there is another remedy which, if it had been applied, would have improved our situation tremendously. If the government in power today had seen fit to build the causeway to Prince Edward Island, our situation would have been transformed entirely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: I was interested to read a speech made in the other place a few days ago by Senator Bonnell, a Senator who comes from the island. He said in part:

> Honourable senators, what is needed to prevent this continued isolation—

He was speaking of the isolation of Prince Edward Island.

> —is something we have heard about so often—the causeway. Different prime ministers have promised the causeway, but each time the project has been postponed by some tight money policy or high rates of interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that it is irregular to quote from the debates of the other place.

Mr. McQuaid: Mr. Speaker, what the Senator neglected to say was that if the Diefenbaker government had remained in power, Prince Edward Island would have had a causeway today connecting it with the mainland. There is absolutely no question about it.

Mr. Pepin: Make it retroactive.

Mr. McQuaid: I sincerely suggest that if the government wants to improve our communications in that way, it is not too late for it to do so. Let the government go ahead with the construction of the causeway, and let there be improved railway service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible in the time that I will have today to deal with all the questions and issues which have been raised in this debate.

Mr. Forrestall: The minister might at least try.

Mr. Jamieson: I might say to the hon. member opposite and others that I fully intend today to make a very objective and non-controversial speech. I hope it will be received in that way. I repeat: I would find it impossible to cover all the matters which have been raised in the time allotted to me. Transportation is such a complex subject that it simply cannot be covered in a speech of 40 minutes. I assure the House and all hon. members, including the hon. member who made a remark just now, that I am at their disposal, either in committee or elsewhere, as often as they wish and for as long as they wish, to ensure a full discussion of those matters that are of concern to them and fall within my area of responsibility.

I agree with the claim that a reorganized structure is necessary in order that members and the country generally can obtain more information, and obtain it more easily, about all aspects of transportation. With this objective in mind, I propose to bring before the House in the next session three important pieces of legislation on which work is proceeding at the present time. The first of those is a bill designed to reconstitute Air Canada as a separate Crown corporation, thus divorcing it, as it were, from the CNR. I will also introduce a Canadian National Railways revision act and a companion piece of legislation covering amendments to the Railway Act. Hon. members will know how involved and far reaching these changes are; they have been asking for them for the last two or three years. These changes have entailed a great deal of work, which is still proceeding. I believe, however, that these bills are essential and I will bring them forward as soon as they are ready.

Since there will be time for a wide-ranging discussion in committee, I thought that it might be appropriate if, today, in the 40 minutes which are available to me in this House, in accordance with a commitment previously given, I were to discuss and deal with one subject that is obviously of very great interest to a large number of hon. members, the matter of a transportation policy for the Atlantic Provinces. I feel reasonably confident that we can all agree that the transportation problems of the Atlantic region cannot be considered in isolation. This is on all fours with my own judgment since I, like most hon. members, recognize that transportation policy must be the means to the attainment of economic and social objectives. Unless we who live in the Atlantic area know what it is we want to achieve and gear our transportation planning to assist these objectives, there is every possibility that we will repeat the mistakes of the past and fail to make our initiatives in transportation responsive to our wider and more basic objectives and ambitions.

I think we have to agree, as well, that the record of the period dating back almost to confederation is crammed with evidence of attempts at economic development that failed to meet the expectations of their well meaning and often dedicated promoters. There are many reasons for these costly failures; amongst them is the inadequacy of past transportation policy and facilities. It would be a mistake, however, to preserve the mythology, entrenched by nearly a century of frustration, that great industrial complexes would blossom throughout Atlantic Canada if only the transportation drawbacks were removed. Regrettably it is not that simple.

The problems of the past in attracting industry to this area will be compounded in the 1970's. We have only to look at such centres as Toronto, Montreal and a few others to realize that most new types of developments tend to polarize around large metropolitan centres. I am compelled to state my belief that despite the best efforts of aggressive Chambers of Commerce and the provision of attractive incentives by DREE and others, few so-called secondary industries are likely to locate in comparatively remote regions where they are isolated both from the other undertakings upon which they must rely and the major markets on which they depend for their viability.

Given these predictions, Atlantic Canada faces a number of alternatives. We can accept the trend as inevitable. If we do, the historic erosion of our best young native talent will accelerate. It is estimated, for example, that at least half of the students in Newfoundland's Memorial University will leave the province soon after graduation. The future may not be quite as bleak in the Maritimes, but I have no doubt that the same trend is now in evidence. If we are to reverse this migration, it is clear that ways must be found to provide an increased number of more rewarding jobs in the Atlantic region. I do not suggest that greater employment opportunities are the whole answer, but without them all else is futile.

Where, then, are the additional jobs to come from, and how can we improve the lot of the present work force so that they will not be attracted to better opportunities in other parts of Canada or elsewhere? And what role can transportation play in answering these questions? The most logical approach is to make the most of the natural advantages we possess. There is encouraging evidence that both public and private agencies are having an increasing degree of success in this task.

The industrial complex now growing up around the Canso Strait area is one example. The Churchill Falls development is another, although in a different category. I believe that efforts in recent years to rationalize and stabilize the fishing industry will prove to be highly successful and beneficial. Other natural resources are also making an increasing contribution, with mining showing a considerable improvement, particularly in New Brunswick and Labrador. The creation of promising container ports at Halifax and Saint John, of refineries in Newfoundland and other Atlantic locations, are other examples of the effective promotion of a natural asset Atlantic provinces possess because of our geographic location. These and other developments illustrate that we stand our best chance for economic improvement when we seek to make the most of the opportunities that are, in effect, at our doorstep, applying the value-added principle whenever possible and, of course, benefiting from the service industries that will follow with their generally high employment prospects.

I have said that most industries today are reluctant to operate, as it were, in isolation. The exceptions, of course, are those undertakings that require specific natural resources or those to which Atlantic Canada can offer certain special advantages. It is obvious, however, that even in these cases there is a preference for a comparatively large community or at the very least, for ready access to the services, amenities and social attractions that a larger community has to offer. This is why the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has chosen to promote the growth centre concept.

The leaders, private and public, of all four Atlantic provinces have indicated their agreement with this principle even though, like me, they realize that it must be done with great care and with the proper respect for the rights of the individual and for the important traditions of a way of life that has served residents well in the Atlantic area for centuries. Also, transportation and greater mobility are extremely important to the growth centre concept. An understanding of the growing phenomena of industrial interdependence and an acceptance that such a trend is inevitable for a variety of reasons will help our planners to avoid the dissipation of effort that has brought something less than total success in the past.

In summary, therefore, I agree with those who see, as a first priority for the Atlantic region, the development of all of our natural resources, not simply in terms of first phase exploitation, that is the exporting of raw materials, but also in upgrading our natural products within the region to the maximum extent possible. Secondly, I see the need for the strengthening of the general framework of our larger and more viable communities, not merely because these are the most logical centres for economic growth, but also because they offer the best chance to our people to enjoy the levels of services which all of us now accept as our right in the Canada of the seventies.

In all of this, transportation has a vital role to play. I have indicated that transportation policy must be responsive to the general objectives of the region. This, however, is an over simplification. Proper transportation planning can help to shape the Atlantic region of the future. We who have responsibilities in this field must initiate as well as respond. That is what we are seeking to do, and I may say that the role of the initiator is by far the more difficult.

Much has been said about the Atlantic Premier's Report of 1969. This provides recommendations for the implementation of a basic transportation policy in the Atlantic provinces. Recommendations are made under the following headings: Rail Regulation, Highway Regulation, Subsidies and Public Policy, Role of the Carrier and Shipper, Highway, Rail, Air, Ports, Ferries, Water, Research Organizations and Freight Rate Freeze. The report called for a national policy which will require for the Atlantic provinces an effective combination of competition, regulation and financial assistance. It called for a revision of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, something to allow flexibility for changing circumstances over time.

It will be useful to examine the major recommendations of the report, and I would like to comment on what has been achieved so far. I will deal with the headings as they are, in fact, set out in the report.

First, rail regulation: Recommendations were made concerning the interpretation of the term "alternative, effective and competitive service" under the act. The weight base of 30,000 pounds for maximum rates is queried, and a suggestion is made that where a maximum rate is increased, such increase be limited to the increase in variable costs. It is suggested that the Canadian Transport Commission should be empowered to suspend a rate, presumably a rate increase, where it has received prima facie evidence that the rate is discriminatory, and it is suggested that the provinces or their agencies should have access on a confidential basis to relevant railway cost data.

Apart from the first point, which reflects the intention of the legislation anyway, that is to provide alternative and competitive means of transportation, the others would require changes in legislation. The 30,000 pound weight base was the subject of lengthy debate in parliament. I think it is fair to say there was a wide difference of opinion in all parts of the House as to this particular matter. Limiting increases to variable costs only would in time lead to distortion as new rate patterns were established. Suspension of an increase where evidence of discrimination appears to exist is a reasonable request. As far as costs are concerned, publication of average costs might go some way toward allaying some concerns, and I am presently raising this possibility with the Canadian Transport Commission and with other persons who would be concerned in answering this particular question.

There are, of course, a number of cases proceeding under Section 23 of the National Transportation Act, and it would be premature to think of changing the act until these cases have run their course and their impact has been assessed. Section 23 permits appeals in cases where it is claimed that actions of the carriers are detrimental to the public interest. This has not been decided up until the present time. A number of applications under Section 23 are now being decided. I am sure the findings will be historic and, indeed, may form a very strong base for future action.

Most of the points made in the section of the Premiers' report dealing with highway regulation relate to items under the control of the provinces themselves. The comments generally refer to the need for uniformity of regulations within the Atlantic provinces and wherever possible between other provincial and state authorities.

Proclamation of Part III of the National Transportation Act is in the spirit of what is said in this section. I have had three separate meetings with the provinces regarding an appropriate federal role in this field and, without labouring the subject, I can say that we are prepared to act as soon as the provinces reach a consensus amongst themselves as to how we can best co-operate with them in this complex regulatory field.

In terms of subsidies and public policy, the call of the premiers was for updating of the Maritime Freight Rates Act so as to effectively assist the economic development of the region and to give assistance beyond the unilateral subsidization of rail traffic. The provinces emphasized that they would be prepared to accept modification in the blanket subsidization of intraregional traffic provided that a federal-provincial agency, located in the region, was empowered to administer transportation assistance from federal funds on a more selective basis. This agency, it was proposed, would have funds at its disposal for the existing MFRA westbound rail, $5 million for extending westbound subsidy to other modes, and an amount to be negotiated for other forms of more selective assistance.

In response, the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act of 1969 did introduce more flexibility, and in 1969 the outbound subsidy was extended to trucking. The Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Region Transportation was set up to advise on subsidy policy, not as an agency to administer funds as had been contemplated. The reason for this decision was that both the provinces and ourselves questioned whether the provinces acting unilaterally would be able to agree on an equitable distribution of funds. Also, it is important to note that the $5 million requested to subsidize other modes is only about one third as much as will be paid out this year to subsidize trucking within the region.

The section of the report dealing with the role of carrier and shipper discusses the avenues open to carriers and shippers in the use of new technology and by joint efforts in pursuing expanding markets. Recommendations here concern reductions in intra-maritime rates referred to in a November, 1967 announcement, deferment of the elimination of less-than-carload freight rates in the Atlantic provinces and ask that the density rule of one cubic foot equalling ten pounds be changed. The deferment of plans for elimination of less-than-car-load rates in the region was subsequently agreed to by the railways. The density rule applies across Canada and does not appear to raise problems elsewhere.

The recommendations relating to rail refer to implementation of rail realignments where these are shown to be worthwhile, and the need for research into passenger traffic by road, rail and air. The recommendations are not specific, but the transport development agency of the Ministry of Transport, as well as other groups, are continuing very detailed studies of these and related questions.

Recent actions taken by some hon. members with regard to the matter of the discontinuance of passenger service in Newfoundland, actions which may require me as Minister of Transport and as a member of the government to become involved in possible judicial proceedings, make it improper for me to comment on the issue at this time. I can, however, make some general remarks on the matter of rail service in Newfoundland. It is the government's intention to see that the rail line across Newfoundland, coupled with the ferry services between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, remains the main transportation link for goods moving into and, I hope, in ever increasing volume, out of the province.

I do not agree that a standard gauge system, costing a very large sum of money, is necessary to achieve this objective. Tens of millions of dollars have been spent already on improving the existing right of way, not to mention the even greater amounts which have gone into terminal facilities at Port aux Basques, North Sydney, the Canso Straits and Argentia, plus the cost of additional ferries, many of which were designed to accommodate themselves to the narrow gauge system. I am not unmindful, either, of the great social disruption which would occur, particularly at Port aux Basques and in southwestern Newfoundland, if a standard gauge track was introduced. The livelihoods of many hundreds of families are at stake, and I intend to see that these are protected.

In my opinion, it would be far better to use the tens of millions of dollars that a standard gauge system would cost in order to help provide still more good roads in Newfoundland and Labrador, a policy which, as the record shows, the government has been carrying out at great cost and with good effect over the past three years and, indeed, before that.

During the weekend I held the most recent of many discussions with officials of the CNR with a view to improving the existing rail route still further. There are grades and curves which it may be possible to eliminate, and I have asked for detailed costs and other estimates. As for rail passenger service, I want to repeat what I said a few days ago to the representatives of the national rail unions when they met with me here in Ottawa. The evidence is growing that the future of rail passenger travel depends to a large extend on new technology. Experience in Canada and in the United States has shown that conventional rail travel cannot compete with other modes over long distances and through sparsely populated areas. This is why the Ministry of Transport and the CTC, at my direction, have stepped up their research in this important field.

We have produced the first comprehensive assessment of a transportation corridor concept between Windsor, Ontario and Quebec City. We are examining very carefully new methods and designs for surface transport. A commuter study for the area of metropolitan Toronto, involving all levels of government, will be completed in May or June. All of this work and much more, some of it centered in our universities, as well as our agreement which I was happy to negotiate to share research information with the United States, will, I am sure, lead to a great deal of improvement and innovation in the years ahead. It is by no means inconceivable that out of this combination of research and testing will come ideas and new designs which will make wholly new and more rapid and comfortable means of rail travel possible in many parts of Canada, including Newfoundland.

I turn, now, to air transportation. The Premiers' report called for a redefinition of air transportation policy in order to permit a redistribution of air routes between trunk and regional carriers and suggested compensation for carriers servicing uneconomic parts of the network. It proposed federal aid to the regional carrier to enable it to re-equip its fleet and upgrade its airport facilities and navigational equipment.

Air Canada has already initiated talks at the regional carrier level with a view to a redistribution of some routes. Goose Bay has been transferred from Air Canada to EPA. EPA received a total of $1.3 million in subsidies during 1970. My department has a five year plan for improving its airports and equipping them with appropriate navigational aids. Much of this work has already been done. At St. John's, Newfoundland, although we encountered some unanticipated technical problems, the instrument landing system for one of the main runways is operating satisfactorily and a second system on another runway will be operating later this year.

Incidentally, and this will be of special interest to hon. members on the other side who understand the technicalities involved—I am thinking, in particular, of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—the region's engineers are working to establish this facility to what are known as category two standards, that is, visibility, 100 feet altitude, one-quarter mile horizontal. If this effort is successful it will help to cut down significantly on the degree of interference by bad weather with airport operations. I see the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) is here today. I should like to advise him there will be a substantial upgrading of Charlottetown Airport this year involving something like half a million dollars or more.

Under the heading, ports, nothing specific was called for in the Premiers' report but reference was made to the need for joint consultations, studies and financial arrangements between provincial and federal governments to take advantage of opportunities offered by technological change. A number of such consultations and studies have been going on, particularly with regard to Saint John and Halifax where much actual consultation has already taken place. Establishment of the National Ports Council and of local port authorities in National Harbours Board harbours is a significant response to this item.

Reference was made in the report to the need for additional capacity on the Wood Island-Caribou ferry service and a request was made for lower truck rates on P.E.I. ferries. A new vessel is under construction for the Wood Island service, and in the fall of 1970 truck rates on P.E.I. ferries, as well as on Newfoundland ferries, were reduced. Two new vessels, the Holiday Island and Vacationland, were introduced to the Borden-Tormentine service last year providing much improved capacity. The report also called for an acceptable fare structure on the Digby-Saint John ferry service. Indications are that the level of service and rate structure presently provided have been well received, and this is confirmed in the second report of the Federal-Provincial committee.

The section under the heading, water, suggests a need for a broader examination of coastal services and for further studies of ocean services and rates.

• (1550)

The Darling report has subsequently been prepared and is currently under study with, I may say, many differing points of view being presented in response to my invitation.

With regard to transportation research and organizations, comments here concerned primarily the need for work to be done by the provinces themselves.

With regard to freight rate freeze, it was suggested that this be maintained until the new regional policy was effected; however, the freeze was lifted in 1969 for reasons I have explained and which I believe are very valid.

With regard to rail rate increases since 1969, I want to point out that the freeze on freight rates which began in 1959 with the Freight Rates Reduction Act was continued in the Atlantic provinces for 30 months longer than elsewhere in Canada. This means that there has been a lag in applying increases in the Atlantic provinces and while the lag has been reduced to some extent, it does not now appear that it will be entirely eliminated. In addition, the Maritime Freight Rates Act keeps rail rates in the select territory and on outbound movements to other points in Canada below the levels that would otherwise apply. When compared with similar rates elsewhere in Canada, therefore, Atlantic province rates still remain below the national average by a sizeable amount.

These were the main recommendations of the Atlantic provinces report. I think it is clear that we have acted positively on the majority of them. This does not mean that the job has been completed. Probably more detrimental than freight rates themselves, are the still complex and often costly distribution patterns within the Atlantic area. I agree with the premier's report that greater rationalization of distribution is desirable, even necessary, and considerable progress is being made along these lines. One has only to look at the remarkable increase in truck movements to see that this is so. And the process of change will continue.

We in the ministry of Transport accept the need for change. What I, as minister, do not accept, however, is the idea seemingly entrenched in the minds of some that at some given moment we will present an all embracing and final transportation policy, something that in its own way would become as rigid and permanent as the Maritime Freight Rates Act once was. Transportation policy must be an evolving plan. It must not only seek to meet presently identifiable goals, it must also be sufficiently flexible to respond quickly when need become apparent or when long established requirements cease to exist.

Historically—I believe this is often overlooked—the main purpose, perhaps the only reason for freight subsidies and similar assistance to Atlantic Canada, was to enable industry in this area to compete on a more equitable basis with industry in other parts of our country. The basic argument was that goods of various kinds produced in the east were not marketable on a competitive basis because the transportation cost of reaching the markets to the west was unreasonably high. The same basic principle led subsequently to the provision of subsidies within the region so that Atlantic industry and commerce could, to a greater extent than previously, supply the regions own internal needs. I want to emphasize that only in comparatively recent times has the relationship between transportation charges and the cost of bringing goods into the region become a central issue. Today, in much of the discussion and argument, it is the main theme of many who protest rising freight rates and other changes in the tariff. No one is more aware than I of the high cost of living in Atlantic Canada, but confusion is inevitable when the two objectives of industrial development and, for example, lower living costs become part of the same argument.

When a subsidy is paid on the whole range of goods entering the Atlantic provinces, this is clearly a benefit to manufacturers in other parts of Canada who ship their merchandise into the region. It surely follows that such subsidies must be detrimental to manufacturers within the Atlantic provices who are in direct competition with those from outside. To some extent at least, therefore, blanket in-bound subsidies, while they may do something to reduce cost, are self-defeating in terms of the other and broader aim of economic or industrial expansion.

I believe, therefore, that it is necessary to separate these two frequently opposed objectives. In my judgment, economic expansion is by far the more important, and it is to this aim that we must direct our efforts in evolving the transportation policy to which I have referred. I want to emphasize that I am not unconcerned about the cost of living aspect, but there are other mechanisms that can be employed more effectively in dealing with this problem. I should say in passing that it is not only in the Atlantic provinces that freight rates and the like add to living costs. The same general problem exists over a very large part of Canada, and I believe it is generally agreed that in this one problem area at least, greater and more effective competition rather than subsidization will provide the most effective solution.

In the course of my remarks I propose to show the remarkable way in which this competition is increasing and also the relative differences between rail freight rates in the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada. I believe I can demonstrate also that on the matter of industrial growth, there is little evidence that the previous formula for subsidies was truly effective. This is due in part to the fact that up until the past year or so the available assistance applied only to rail shipments. This, as you know, has now been changed for out-bound cargoes and I am encouraged by the extent to which trucking is now offering the railways more effective competition.

As to the subsidy now being paid on movements within the region, once again there is growing evidence of the comparative ineffectiveness of present arrangements. Within the past few days, I have received the second report of the federal-provincial committee established in 1970 to make recommendations concerning the so-called intra-subsidy and a number of related matters. Within a short time I propose to make it available to members. There has not been an opportunity as yet for a thorough study of this second report, but I think it can be said that its findings confirm that further changes should be made in the present methods of payment to make these more selective and thus more efficient.

The first committee report revealed some surprising facts in support of this contention, and I recall them to the attention of hon. members. For example, it is interesting to note that in 1970 about $8 million per year was paid in subsidies on rail shipments within the Atlantic provinces, and this figure had not changed substantially in the past decade. This suggests that most, if not all of the growth that has taken place in recent years, has been as a result of the activities of motor carriers. It is also significant that the greater part of subsidized rail movements originate and terminate within the same province. This is true of 68 per cent of all such movements in the Atlantic region as a whole. Not surprisingly, in Newfoundland the proportion is as high as 91 per cent. Obviously, therefore, the role of rail transport is not as important as that of other carriers in interprovincial trade.

A further finding of the committee, as some members will be aware, is that a relatively small number of commodities generally characterized by heavy weight and low dollar value account for the greatest part of rail movements. Only about 12 commodities, led by petroleum products and pulpwood, accounted in 1970 for as much as 65 per cent of the subsidized rail movements within the Atlantic region.

Despite this concentration on movements of such commodities, the average length of rail shipments within the Atlantic region is only about 150 miles, a distance which is well below the optimum range of railway operations in the light of most North American transport experience. This indicated a misallocation of transport resources and tended to suggest a certain discrimination against the motor carriers which, there is little doubt, was detrimental to all parts of the region, but particularly to the two island provinces of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. It seemed evident from the committee's findings that changes in the internal subsidy were called for and, as members know, we introduced these along the lines of the committee's recommendations. I will deal with these in greater detail in a few moments.

While, as I have said, the second report has not yet been studied fully I can tell the House that I have already made certain decisions on some of its recommendations. The second report of the federal-provincial committee suggests that the intrasubsidy reduction from 17.5 per cent to 15 per cent go ahead as planned this year but that exemptions to the reduction be made to the potato industry and certain sectors of the wood residue industry.

The report suggests that the exemptions be regarded as special assistance cases where the high subsidy level or the differential between the normal and high level be paid to the shipper rather than the carrier. The latter course may be one which is relatively simple to implement and could be the beginning of a more selective subsidy policy. I favour these recommendations and fully expect that they will be implemented. I do, however, want time to explore their ramifications and decided, therefore, not to reduce the present intra-subsidy of 17½ per cent on April 1st as the committee suggests, but only at a later date and after consultation with those concerned. I am aware of the widely held view that when assistance is provided, it should be paid direct to the shipper rather than to the carrier. I subscribe to this principle and assure the House that if, in fact, we do not get the benefits to industry this plan is designed to achieve, then we will accelerate the changeover to our shippers more quickly than in the policy I have described today. It was in the interests of getting the plan into operation quickly that the decision was taken to use the simpler system, but we will continue to work on the problem of payments to shippers, beyond the initial step I have mentioned today.

The reading of statistics can be a dull business, but as painlessly as possible, I would like to give the House some indication of the levels of federal spending on transportation in the Atlantic provinces in recent years. This is the backup and support that I have been indicating today. We have implemented the recommendations of the provinces themselves.

In 1970-71, all forms of subsidies, maintenance and operating costs in the Atlantic provinces totalled $113 million. In 1971-72 this figure increased by over $5 million to more than $118 million. Of these totals, subsidies to various ferry services amounted to about $36 million per year. Last year, the first full year of the trucking subsidy, payments to both rail and trucking totalled over $20½ million in the first year in which we were paying the trucking industry. This immense figure may surprise hon. members, but it supports the tremendous growth in the Atlantic provinces. I now estimate that the trucking portion alone is likely to reach close to $14 million in the current year, just within the Atlantic provinces, and that does not include the subsidy on westbound traffic or the out-of-the-region subsidy.

National Harbours Board capital expenditures combined for the current year and the previous two, add up to about $15 million and all the capital expenditures of the Ministry of Transport and its related agencies, over the same period, fall just short of $72 million dollars.

Over and above direct spending by my ministry, other departments have contributed substantially to the improvement of the transportation network of the Atlantic provinces. Between 1968 and the current year, both inclusive, the Department of Public Works has undertaken capital works in the region worth about $33 million, excluding such large lease-back projects as the $20 million wharf for the Come-by-Chance refinery in Newfoundland and a similar structure on the Strait of Canso.

A special word is called for regarding assistance for road construction in the Atlantic Provinces. There was, first of all, special help provided for the completion of the trans-Canada highway in the region with the federal government contributing 90 per cent of the cost. At the peak of this program this support was at the level of about $57½ million a year.

Special DREE programs sustained this level of support from 1969 to 1971. Last year new agreements were negotiated with New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland totalling $60 million. Over the past seven years, therefore, federal support for Atlantic province highways has averaged about $45 million a year, or over the period some $315 million, with many projects being funded entirely by the federal government.

The Atlantic Premiers' report suggested a 10 year program, properly planned, and interim assistance of about $66½ million. It can be seen from these figures that this second request has been met and exceeded, and long range planning for federal participation in highway construction is well advanced.

I emphasize these expenditures, because while they are not all made directly by the Ministry of Transport, they are nevertheless a vitally important part of our Atlantic transportation policy and have gone a long way toward meeting the needs of this area.

I would also like to recall some of the other federal undertakings of the past few years as evidence that we are moving ahead with a comprehensive program, which fits pretty squarely with what was recommended not merely by the Premiers' Committee but also by hon. members of the opposition and on this side of the House. Some of these projects may tend to be overlooked because of the present evident preoccupation with the problem of freight rates which, though important, is only one part of the challenges we face.

In 1969 as I have mentioned, the 30 per cent subsidy on outbound shipments was extended to trucking and railway express. Simultaneously subsidies were provided to maintain water transport from St. John's and Corner Brook to Montreal, and similar subsidies have been continued for service between eastern Newfoundland and Halifax. A good prospect for Halifax at the present time is again a program in which the federal authorities are involved with regard to the shipment of automobiles from a special gathering point in Halifax to Newfoundland and perhaps elsewhere. During the same year we undertook a considerable expansion of ferry service to P.E.I. with two new ferries introduced last year and a third coming into operation this year. I believe it is agreed that results have been highly satisfactory. We have undertaken, in co-operation with the government of Nova Scotia, major improvements in the shore facilities for the Woods Island-P.E.I. service and these are now well underway.

In co-operation with Canadian Pacific, ferry service from Saint John to Digby has been modernized at a cost of many millions of dollars, and we have provided the financing for a ferry terminal at Yarmouth to accommodate a second ferry to New England which is being sponsored by the government of Nova Scotia. Construction in the Strait of Canso of a new rail car terminal provides an alternate ice-free port for the Port aux Basques ferries. New harbour facilities have been constructed at Corner Brook at an estimated total cost of about $5 million. This year the National Harbours Board will undertake studies expected to lead to expansion of St. John's Newfoundland harbour facilities at a cost of as much as $10 million. Last year and again in 1972 we will operate two additional ferries on the Gulf service, thus greatly expanding capacity.

Air services in the Atlantic region have also been improved through the provision by EPA of jet service to P.E.I. and to Labrador. In addition, I have obtained a detailed study of future air traffic patterns in the Atlantic provinces and in the Atlantic region and have made copies available to members. These will help us to determine our airport policy in this region in the future. Many improvements have been introduced at both major and minor airports throughout the region. By introducing the so-called "TOPS" program we reduced landing fees at Gander by approximately two-thirds and the runways at Gander have been lengthened, at very great cost, so that Gander can now accommodate the world's largest airliners.

These are by no means all the projects either completed or underway in the Atlantic provinces. We have provided much better transportation services to the Magdalen Islands and will spend close to half a million dollars this year to improve loading facilities in both P.E.I. and on the Magdalens. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island who spoke earlier I am sure will be glad to hear this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Jamieson: May I continue, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that the minister be allowed to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am just about finished.

A special commission recommended ways in which we could modernize the coastal boat services in southern Newfoundland and the ferry operations between the Island and Nova Scotia and many of these have been implemented. A similar commission is now examining coastal services in the rest of Newfoundland and Labrador. We have also, I might add, provided a federally subsidized ferry service across the Straits of Belle Isle and supported several other short-haul ferry services in eastern Canada, as well as in other parts of the country. This combination of projects will, I am sure, continue to bring about worthwhile improvements in the whole mix of our Atlantic transportation services.

For over two years I have been very conscious of the need to integrate various waterborne and air services into our transportation planning. In line with what I have said about the need to encourage industrial development, I have asked for a detailed examination of the advisability of providing some form of assistance for various raw materials originating outside the Atlantic region but which must be brought in in order to permit greater manufacturing and fabricating activity. I believe this is one important issue to which all of us should apply ourselves. You will appreciate that it is not an easy task for I believe that such assistance must be provided on a selective basis and only where there is clearcut evidence that industrial stability and expansion would result. In cases where such raw materials are most economically transported by water, it seems logical that this mode should not be excluded from consideration for subsidies.

I am also seeking means through which Labrador, that increasingly important area of Atlantic Canada, can be assisted through new transportation policies. Obviously the long term solution lies in opening up Labrador through a good system of roads, but this will take some time to achieve and in the interim I have asked for an assessment of the possible benefits of an extension of water and perhaps air subsidies to communities in this region.

What I have recounted today is only a little of the over-all story. We have seen over the past nearly 100 years how intractable some of our problems are in the Atlantic region, partly because of the unnatural geographic makeup of Canada but also because of many other factors, some of which I have tried to outline. I think it is now clear, with the benefit of hindsight, that simply arguing for lower freight rates is not the answer. I have no quarrel with the argument that transportation costs have to be kept as low as is reasonable, but I suggest that it does over simplify the problem. Nor is it entirely a matter of providing more and ever more public moneys. These have to be spent of course, and when the total from all departments is taken into account, as I have shown, the annual federal expenditures in this region are by no means inconsiderable, and they are increasing all the time.

If I may have the indulgence of the House for another moment I should like to make a few general comments. What we must do with these expenditures is to channel them to the maximum extent possible into the creation of a stronger, more permanent economic base. I do not believe that any member of this House from the Atlantic provinces would disagree with this objective. It will serve little purpose in the long run if we build roads at great cost only to find that their main purpose is to speed the movement of people out of the region. Lower freight rates will be of little consequence if we continue to face the present lamentably high levels of unemployment, and improved facilities for the transportation of passengers by air and sea as well as through surface modes will not constitute much of an attraction for people who just cannot afford to travel.

We must recognize far more than many of us do at the present time that government expenditures alone, no matter how lavish and well intentioned and no matter from what level of government they originate, simply cannot generate the kind of wealth necessary to give Atlantic Canada the level of services and the standard of living that will make those of us who live there feel that we are getting our fair share of Canada's prosperity. Only economic expansion with the fuller employment it offers can have the type of impact this region so desperately needs. I believe therefore that it is to this we must devote our major efforts and the undoubted talents that this region possesses, some of which are well represented in this chamber.

Let me assure the House that there will be no lack of federal enthusiasm and support for any worthwhile proposal that may be advanced. Let me be equally frank, however, in saying that like many of you we have reached the conclusion that there is little real future in pouring good money after bad or in supporting impractical schemes simply on the grounds that something has to be done.

As we enter the 1970's I have a growing feeling—and this I have not touched on at all in my general remarks—that the Atlantic provinces can become very attractive to an increasing number of Canadians who are being compelled by events to reassess their value systems. In short, I believe there will be a growing attraction in Atlantic Canada. Perhaps it is too narrow a word to describe it in terms of the tourist industry, but nevertheless I refer to the whole concept of people wanting to get away from it all. I do not mean that those who live in seriously troubled huge centres of population are likely to desert these in favour of the way of life most of us in Atlantic Canada presently enjoy. I do think, however, that if we take full advantage of our natural attractions and shepherd them well, and if we provide, as I think we can, decent means of transportation and opportunities for economic growth as well as for the development of the other important dimensions of our lives, we can look forward to steady progress and to the attainment of the goals that have eluded us so often in the past.

I want to thank the House for its indulgence in letting me complete this report, and I hope it provides some information to members.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, whatever the policy is, it is bound to dance, sing and skip to the lilting cadence of the minister whenever we get around to hearing it, and it will follow the old familiar tune. There is no question about that. There were one or two things in the minister's statement this afternoon that I think need immediate comment, such as the indication from the minister of the proposed separation of Air Canada from the Canadian National Railways. Frankly, it comes as a surprise to me. It is a matter that has been discussed at some length in various circles.

We welcome the indication that study has been given to this matter, but I would express the caution that we be not overly hasty in this separation. We must maintain a political or institutional capability to control some concepts with respect to Air Canada, particularly that aspect of Air Canada that has to do with its national responsibility to serve Canadians from one end of this country to the other, not just in the most lucrative areas of the country. While we welcome the proposal, there is a necessity to project a note of caution with respect to it.

The minister indicated in a very clear manner, with respect to one of the major problems facing people in the Atlantic provinces, that he is in fact waiting for the premiers to agree. Hon. members are well aware of the necessity of coming up with some method of shifting the payment of subsidies from carriers themselves to some other aspect of the movement of goods, such as the shippers or subsidy. The fact the minister indicated that he is waiting for the premiers to agree on what is the best formula seems to me to be just another example of the length to which the minister and the government are prepared to go to avoid the required decisions, not only in Atlantic Canada where this has particular application but also throughout Canada. Western members who are deeply involved in the movement of wheat and who rely upon freight cars to move their product, are very much aware of the degree to which this government, while talking a lot, so far, has not been able to do much in a practical way.

We welcome some other comments made by the minister, such as the addition of substantially upgraded navigational aids for our airports, the upgrading of the runways, and so forth. These are all welcome. I regret deeply the indication from Air Canada of its intention to remove from the Halifax international airport its flight dispatch facilities as we are one of two areas of the world which have extreme difficulty with weather forecasting. The only other area that is as bad as ours is the Irish Sea. This is a matter to be regretted, and I think we must ask, as forcefully as we can, whether or not Air Canada has in fact received comments from the Department of Transport with respect to safety, and whether or not there is a prejudicial implication in the removal of the dispatch office from the Halifax international airport to Montreal. We wonder why there is a dispatch office at Toronto, another one 250 miles away in Montreal, and now they are planning to leave the next 1,000 miles of Canada without what is in my opinion a very necessary service, particularly with the unique weather forecasting conditions that arise in the Atlantic area and especially in Nova Scotia. The dispatch office at Halifax serves not only our own area. It serves Saint John, Fredericton, Moncton, St. John's, Newfoundland, Gander, Stephenville, Sydney, Yarmouth, Boston, Bermuda and New York. It is a service that has come to be relied upon by trans-oceanic pilots, particularly because it is in the middle of a very unique weather area. I suppose that the closer you are to the fire the greater is the heat. I wonder about the efficacy of this decision. I wonder about any decisions that are based on experiences elsewhere in the world that only take into account fact, and not necessarily the particular circumstances surrounding what appears to be fact.

One of the reasons given for the removal of the dispatch offices from Halifax is that one of the major U.S. airlines, I believe it is Eastern, has centralized all its dispatch facilities in Florida. The question is asked: if they can do it there, why can't we do it here? This seems to ignore the fact that there it is essentially a north-south operation, while here we are talking essentially about an east-west operation. In no other part of the Atlantic seaboard is there such a concentration of all the weather coming off the North American continent as there is in the Atlantic provinces.

I understand that this matter is presently under consideration. I urge that it be given the most thorough review possible, by transport officials, from the point of view of safety. It should be determined whether or not we are downgrading the safety of the operations of Air Canada. This is something that is important not only to us in the Atlantic provinces. There are only a dozen or so jobs involved, possibly 55 or 60 people involved. That is bad enough, but the important consideration is whether or not the removal of the dispatch office, together with its responsibility, to a site 1,000 miles away, taking into account the uniqueness of the weather situation in Halifax, is a wise decision.

We again warmly welcome the minister's indication that for the time being he will stay any reduction in the intra subsidy rate, the percentage reduction from 17 per cent down to a suggested 15 per cent. As I say, this is welcome. We hope that the studies which the minister is undertaking, and which he indicates he intends to continue undertaking during this stay of execution, will be fruitful, and that out of them will come the type of responses that are urgent and necessary to businessmen in the Atlantic area. In this connection I think most members of the House, particularly those from the Atlantic area, would welcome an early opportunity to examine the second report to which the minister made some considerable reference this afternoon.

The minister made a very forceful point with respect to the level and the impact of rail transportation, particularly within our region. He cited a lot of statistics. He will have to read them tomorrow to see just what in fact he was saying. For example, it would be interesting to ask how much of that $15 million was used to subsidize the movement of furniture out of the Maritimes, and thereby families, to other parts of the country. I am not at all sure that that major loophole in the decisions of 18 months ago has been corrected. If it has not, it is time that it was corrected. The very thing that the minister was commenting upon is indeed encouraged by the existing policies. The minister was correct when he said that essentially we must get the most advantage out of what we have available to us. That goes without saying.

Now, dealing with an entirely different area, Mr. Speaker, I wonder when the minister will be able to deal effectively with the establishment of independent port authorities. I would like the indulgence of the House to discuss this matter for a few minutes, and summarize the events of the last eight or nine years.

In 1963, the Glassco Royal Commission, in volume V of its report dealing with the organization of the government of Canada, at page 87, recommended, and I quote:

> Control of the seaports and airports now under review is centralized in Ottawa. This results in criticisms of standards adopted for capital works—too lavish to be economic but short of what local pride demands— of services provided, and of charges therefor. Internationally, the trend is to decentralize administration of harbours and airports, thus passing responsibility for capital and service standards to either municipal authorities or to local bodies created for the purpose. The geography of Canada being what it is, your Commissioners are of opinion that the aim should be to foster local pride and promote local participation, and to arrange that standards of works and services be such as to permit charges that are fair and reasonable.

On July 24, 1970, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) told a news conference that the government would phase out the National Harbours Board and decentralize port management. He said, and I quote:

> All Canadian ports have different problems and decentralization would enable local authorities to deal with their own special problems in each area.
> The new national authority will act as custodian of all federal port property, recommend national objectives, establish tariff and user charges, and set guidelines for leasing, licensing and contractual agreements. Local port authorities will submit an annual budget to the central executive.
> The local authority will administer daily operations including traffic promotion, maintenance, property and lease hold management, and planning analysis for long and short-terms. It will also handle capital investment, co-ordination of port development planning and liaison with local governments.

That sounded pretty specific to me, and I am sure it did to a lot of other Canadians. But about a year later the minister had changed the emphasis slightly. In a statement on May 12, 1971, he said:

> I am convinced that the federal role can be achieved best through the closest co-operation with the provincial governments and even more particularly with those concerned with the particular ports themselves.
> I propose to create local port authorities for each of the nine major ports now administered by the National Harbours Board.
> I also emphasized the greater emphasis which was to be given to decentralization of responsibility and to the concept of financial viability through the balanced use of the principle of cost recovery. The new ports policy is not only consistent with this objective, but an important step in carrying it forward.

A point of interest will always be the extent to which shipping in the St. Lawrence will pay on the principle of cost recovery on winter arrangements for the support of navigation. Throughout the winter information is available on the constantly changing ice situation, advice on the easiest routes to follow, and icebreakers are available to escort ships through difficult areas. If they happen to be there on flood control duty, well, that is the way we tend to approach these problems. Then, there are all the additional services and projects on the St. Lawrence that have been added since the above details were provided by the then parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport in reply to a question on December 20, 1967. Sometimes one may be forgiven if one suspects the minister has a policy of granting subsidies to the wealthy, and payment on a cost recovery basis for the poorer provinces. This is particularly true if we look at the additional charges on oil shipments, when they are brought into the picture.

On October 8 last year the minister stated in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas):

I cannot do the latter, that is, announce the make-up of the nine port authorities. I can say, however, that most of the problems have been resolved.

• (1630)

In the Atlantic region, Mr. Speaker, we are still waiting for the local Port Authority. We are waiting to see whether it can foster the pride suggested by the Glassco commission some nine years ago. Not only are we waiting for the degree of decentralization which the present minister has designed to give to ports so far, but there are considerable fears that the new local Port Authority will in practice only add yet another level of administration. The best we are promised—and promised and promised and promised—falls far short of the effective decentralization envisioned and recommended by the Glassco commission. It is difficult to imagine that the time delay, even under a local Port Authority, in port capital development projects would be shorter than at present, with the submission requirements for annual budgets, closest co-operation with the provincial government, national objectives and guidelines, not to mention the minister not being able to make up his mind.

Such is the dynamic speed with which the Minister of Transport acts that in his May 12, 1971, statement to the House he was able to reiterate the following vague outline some eight years after the Glassco Royal Commission reported:

Details concerning the responsibilities and make-up of each of these authorities will be worked out through consultation.

Isn't that a wonderful thing? It is exactly what we want?

In general terms, I can say that each group will be as representative as possible of all local interests, including management and labour, municipal and provincial authorities. Each will have a good deal of autonomy, including consultation in the appointment of port managers—

Hah!

—the preparation of budgets, forward planning and all other important matters.

When compared with the minister's statement a year before at the Transport and Communications Committee on April 9, 1970, we are able to see clearly the inability of the minister to make a significant advance in the decentralization of the administration of the ports of this country.

In fairness to the minister, he did indicate that he felt the big problem was trying to define the levels of responsibility and authority both of the local manager, or whatever it would be titled, and the national body. That is a direct quote, "of the national body". I thought we were going to decentralize but here we are talking about a national body. The minister went on to say:

This is an extremely intricate arrangement and, as I said this morning, I do not believe that you can apply it in precisely the same way at every port across the country—you have to take local conditions into account.

CNR and Air Canada

Mr. Speaker, a principle is a principle. How it is applied in different areas may differ but the principle remains. Either it is hollow or it is not.

As recently as October 8, 1971, the Minister of Transport stated:

It is the intention of the government to locate one member of the National Harbours Board in the Atlantic provinces, but where he will go is the key question, as the hon. member well knows.

If the location of the regional member of the National Harbours Board is a key question, he will obviously be important in the determination of port policy and decisions. If he is that important, it is also evident that the decentralization is not intended to be significant. The minister cannot have it both ways simultaneously.

Either the regional National Harbours Board representative will be important or we will have effective decentralization. This would place in the hands of our communities the major portion of the responsibility for the operation of those ports.

Yet, decentralization is essential if we are to avoid the kind of federal mismanagement which led to the development of two container berths at the south end of Halifax over opposition and in face of the accusation that you are rushing out to do something because somebody said it had to be done. I agree that it had to be done and it has given Halifax a significant jump in capturing containerization markets in North America. We wanted that and we welcome it, but I still make the point that the absence of a local authority led to what most people in the Halifax area agree was an unwise location. Now, we have prospects of an immediate expansion of this capability at an alternative site which should have been developed initially and which would have been capable of expansion. At least ten berths could have been provided at one site instead of the split site operation now to be imposed on the port of Halifax-Dartmouth. At present it is difficult to see how the limited decentralization promised by the minister and as yet not realized in the Atlantic provinces will be able to resist adequately the present government's penchant for error and short sightedness. I hope they will not repeat the errors that have been made to date with respect to the management of our ports.

In view of the many disadvantages suffered by the Maritimes, it is something of a blow to find that geographical nearness to European markets is no advantage since it is costing shippers at the Montreal railhead the same as at the Halifax terminal to send goods to Europe. This, despite the $80 to $85 cost of sending a 20-foot container from Montreal to Halifax. How do you rationalize these things?

The whole transport policy of the government must be clearly stated so that informed criticisms and economic responses may be made, particularly by the people directly affected. In recent days in this House we have heard members from the western provinces pleading for boxcars to move their grain to market. Why have we not got them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: We get excuses such as in wintertime this or that cannot be done. That is nonsense. You do it. If there are not enough boxcars, then buy some more or rent them from the United States.

Mr. Benjamin: You would think this is the first year we have had snow.

Mr. Forrestall: My colleague from Prince Edward Island spoke about the lack of refrigerator cars for moving potatoes from the island. What in God's name can be the rational excuse for not being able to move our goods to market? We give these companies millions and millions of dollars year in and year out, yet our farmers cannot sell their wheat because they cannot move it. This is lunacy, and I cannot understand it. I can only suspect that the same situation obtains when the minister stands up and says in such a convincing way, "That is a great question; glad you raised that. We were talking about that just this morning and I am going to have something done about it before tomorrow. If the hon. member will give me a couple of days we will straighten it out". Then, you never hear of it again. It is the same with boxcars for moving wheat and refrigerator cars for moving potatoes, the same thing with fish.

Mr. Benjamin: Every year for four years.

Mr. Forrestall: Yes, but I am not worried so much about the past as what it augurs for the future. We have had talk about this for months. Are there not enough boxcars in Canada to move grain? Why not? If the CNR has not got the initiative to get them let's sell it to some enterprise that can build the boxcars.

Mr. Benjamin: No, no, don't do that; it is worse in the CPR.

Mr. Forrestall: I am not sure which is the worst.

Mr. Speaker, this is what I have been trying to illustrate on the subject of national ports—the minister is emphatic about something and everybody talks a lot but nothing happens. Of course, these problems pose difficulties; but please do not tell us that they will be resolved, that they are being worked on and that they will be squared away the day after tomorrow when, actually, you do not have the foggiest idea as to where in the world you are going. Do not mislead people. If there are not enough boxcars, do something about it. Do not simply admit the shortage and do nothing, which is what is now happening. Western Canadians and people living in the Atlantic region deserve somewhat better treatment from their national transport system than the sort of treatment they have been getting in recent years. There is a need to resolve our problems in the east as well as in the west. I think most problems could be resolved if people spent more time working them out instead of talking about them.

• (1640)

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Buchanan) is covering the debate on behalf of the minister.

Mr. Benjamin: That's a lot of help.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Thomson: I think, perhaps, that it is. I have found the parliamentary secretary a hard working fellow and conscientious. Moreover, he does his homework. If he is to solve the problems that have been raised in this debate, he will have to work at night, too. I want to talk about some problems. I hope he listens to suggestions that I and others might make and, hopefully, deals with some of these matters.

In my hand I hold a collection of newspaper articles which deal with more export trade for Canada. One column in the Globe and Mail is headed, "More Pacific trade predicted by Pepin". That is okay. I hope that this is not merely a pep talk by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). Logically, we can expect more Pacific trade, and I hope it will come about. I hold here a news release from the Canada Department of Agriculture. In it the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) refers to record export sales of agricultural products. I hope that the statements in the release are not merely political statements. I come from an area which exports agricultural produce, and we want that trade to continue.

I now pick up a report from the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool which refers to the new trade agreement involving wheat sales to Russia. The first paragraph says that Canadian grain producers are assured of good wheat deliveries; the author assumes that we can get the grain to market, of course. Then, I pick up a copy of a speech which was delivered by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang), otherwise known as the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. He spoke in Thunder Bay about transport matters. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, he certainly makes a good speech. He knows all the details and talks of what should be done with new and modern methods of transport and so on. But you know, Mr. Speaker, that is not enough. Making studies or studies of studies is not enough. There comes a time when you must decide to act on the basis of those studies. That is where I criticize the present government. We have seen more white papers and studies during the last four years than in any previous four-year period in Canada's history. Some of those studies have been wonderful. However, when it comes to doing something constructive to meet some of the problems uncovered by those studies, the record of this government is not so good. I hope the parliamentary secretary is listening.

I want to say something about shipping grain to the west coast, or about trade and the west coast, if you will. The bulk of my remarks will be on that theme. In that connection I have in my hand an article that I wish to quote from extensively. It comes from British Columbia and is entitled, "Is Vancouver's port strangling?" It is written by John Clarke and reads in part:

> The end of the U.S. West Coast dock strike will only partially relieve pressure on the port of Vancouver. The port's basic problems are made in Canada or, more precisely in the words of Vancouver officials, in Ottawa.
> For weeks upward of 20 ships have been lying idle in English Bay unable to get to a berth to load cargo. Already prairie grain farmers have lost $3-million this winter, the cost of penalties for late deliveries from West Coast ports.
> Exports through the port this year are expected to be 43 million tons, nearly 22 per cent higher than in 1971. Shipments last year totalled 35.3 million, which was 30 per cent higher than in 1970.

Clearly, it looks as if trade is growing. I continue:

These statistics show Vancouver to be not only the busiest port in Canada but the busiest on the West Coast of North America. Only Long Beach, Calif., comes close. It handled about 27 million tons last year.

Most of the shipments through Vancouver are in bulk cargo—grain, sulphur, coal. Grain shipments have been held up not only by trouble at the port but because of delays on the railways which have been blocked by more snow slides than at any other time in memory.

The view of shipping people here is that the rail delays merely emphasize the lack of co-ordination in transportation systems that is slowly strangling the port. One official said this week: 'It's too late now to do anything about 1972. The port has been oversold and we're going to pay the consequences.'

But officials are looking beyond 1972. The startling increase in port volume forecast for this year is regarded as a portent of even greater problems ahead ... The federal government has said it expects much of Canada's economic expansion in the years ahead to take place in the Pacific.

The federal government in this case means the Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, and they expect some trade expansion in this area.

Vancouver is the main funnel for east-west trade and the volume it will be asked to handle sends chills through port officials. The feeling is that Ottawa still does not—

I underline "still does not."

—appreciate these problems. A remark by Transport Minister Don Jamieson last November struck shippers as rather heartless and cynical. He said: 'I don't have a dollar's worth of business that I can justify expenditure of public funds on.' Delegation after delegation has gone to Ottawa in search of a listening ear and found none, even though Vancouver has been blamed by western farmers and businessmen for not living up to its responsibilities.

Vancouver can't do anything without a nod from Ottawa. The appointment earlier this year of a long-awaited Vancouver Port Authority raised hopes. But officials are puzzled by what they regard as a persistent lack of urgency in Ottawa's attitude. They have sought dock improvements, more up-to-date equipment, more container facilities not only as local amenities but as vital necessities for the good of the country as a whole.

Port officials believe the problem will have to be tackled on a broad scale. Rail and road operations will have to be dovetailed with improved port facilities in a total system that will provide alternatives when lines are blocked or delays of any kind are encountered. For instance, it's felt that much of the grain that's delayed between here and the Prairies could be diverted to U.S. rail routes.

I take exception to that suggestion. If we must use U.S. railroads, then we must. Surely to goodness, Canadian railroads will be able to haul this grain. I continue:

It's also felt that pressure in the congested Vancouver harbor area could be relieved if the increased bulk traffic were switched to Roberts Bank, 30 miles south of Vancouver.

That article, Mr. Speaker, sums up in language better than any at my command some of the problems afflicting the port of Vancouver.

May I also refer to a paragraph in the Palliser Wheat Growers Association bulletin or newsletter of February 29, 1972. It says that the Vancouver grain handling system can be termed a Mickey Mouse operation, and that that system appears to be obsolete. It goes on to say:

Improvements can still be made in it, but with limited trackage through Vancouver, and at the terminal elevators, coupled with the time-consuming cleaning process, it is very unlikely that the port can increase its throughput enough to allow for increased sales to Pacific Rim countries.

• (1650)

The point I am trying to make is this. The government has actively sought new trade in the Pacific rim countries, and for that I compliment them. They have not tied in the transportation with this important trade, nor do they appear to be looking at the problem as thoroughly as they should. If you are going to improve one line of your business, you have to improve some of the facilities that service the increased business. The government has been lacking in its efforts to do something about the problem with which it is faced.

There are some very urgent things that should be done at this time, even thought they may be temporary measures. I will only give some examples because I do not claim to be an authority on transportation. We might look into unit trains or renting diesel units or boxcars from the United States. Perhaps we could divert boxcars from other sources and, if necessary, have more overtime. We should do whatever is required. Let us not lose any business. In view of the unemployment problem in Canada, we should not lose any business. By giving some thought to this problem, we might create employment for some of our unemployed by supplying some of the transportation needs of this country.

With regard to long-term measures, we should consider another rail line to the west coast. Perhaps we should make more adequate use of the northern route. Judging from the use that is made of the port of Prince Rupert, one would almost think it was not there. Is Vancouver the only port in British Columbia? Possibly we should make better use of the port facilities at Prince Rupert. Why not expand this port and make more use of that route? I ask the parliamentary secretary if any study has been made of this route or any studies with regard to shipping grain out to Prince Rupert? Is consideration being given to making greater use of this route? Attempts should be made to solve this problem. I would be sympathetic if some mistakes were made. However, I am not sympathetic toward a government which sits on its hands and does nothing. In the field of transportation we have done nothing for too long, particularly with regard to shipping grain to the west coast.

I have been farming for over 20 years in a part of this country that has been faced with grain shipping problems. Whenever we have a big grain sale abroad, it is always said that we do not have the facilities to handle it. After 25 years, something should be done about this problem. It has been suggested that the CNR or CPR join one end of the PGE and use that route into Vancouver. I am not in a position to say whether this would be a good move, but I suggest that we look into it. These problems will get worse if we do not do something about them. If the organizing efficiency is not improved, we can count on the problem becoming worse. The government tends to react to emergency situations instead of planning in advance.

I want to commend the government on the block system on the Prairies. If the parliamentary secretary wants to take credit for this, that is all right. The block system is an improved system of handling grain. The many elevator agents, station agents and people involved in the movement of grain to whom I have talked have almost universally told me that this is working better. I thought perhaps the government and the parliamentary secretary would like to know there has been some reaction. For years farmers have argued that better use could be made of the boxcars. It has even seemed obvious to people living along the track that we should make better use of these boxcars. This system seems to be working better, and I commend those responsible for it.

I would like to talk for a few moments about the servo centre concept which has been suggested by the railroads. Some members of parliament presented briefs to the Canadian Pacific Railway hearings that were held on the prairies. Actually, this is something which both railroads are doing. It seems that the freight service on the Prairies, at least in Saskatchewan, has been downgraded as far as the railways are concerned. They are only interested in moving items that can be moved in bulk. Anything else is to be discarded at their earliest convenience.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House agreed that we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell)—Pollution—Reconsideration of levies on oil tanker shipments to provide contingency fund in case of spills; the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin)—Unemployment Insurance—Montreal—Payment of benefits delayed—Investigation requested; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave)—Grain—Allocation of boxcars to increase stocks at Vancouver.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

[English]

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a disposition among parties to take up four bills relating to changes of names of constituencies. These are Bill C-55 standing in the name of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan), Bill C-74 standing in the name of the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Deakon), Bill C-92 standing in the name of the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Hopkins) and Bill C-167 standing in the name of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Lajoie). If it is agreeable to hon. members, I wonder if these bills could be taken in that order.

[Mr. Thomson.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the proposal of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC BILLS

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex) moved that Bill C-55, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

• (1700)

He said: Mr. Speaker, when redistribution took place on the last occasion my riding changed an awful lot. It took in part of what was called old Essex-East and old Essex-West and part of the riding I represented at that time called Essex-South. Since then, the City of Windsor has annexed a large part of the suburban areas surrounding it. The city was part of my riding and is still part of my riding. The constituency I represent includes a large part of Essex County and also a large part of the new City of Windsor. The City of Windsor is a rapidly expanding industrial area. Many people have moved to the area in the last few years from other parts of Canada to find employment, and they did. Windsor has one of the lowest rates of unemployment in the country. It has one of the fastest growth rates of any constituency in southwestern Ontario. It has increased its number of voters by 10,000 since the last election according to the recent census figures.

Mr. Broadbent: They are all NDPers.

Mr. Whelan: I think the mayor of Windsor well described that group after the leader of the New Democratic Party went down there and said Windsor had not changed for the last 30 years. Even though these people may be supporters of the NDP they are not going to vote for a party whose leader does not recognize the great changes which have taken place in the city in the last 30 years, or in the last ten years, or in the last five years, if it comes to that.

It is important that this great constituency be recognized as part of the city and part of the county. I am, therefore, asking for approval of this proposal to change the name of the constituency from Essex to Essex-Windsor.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I listened with a great deal of interest to the reasons given by the hon. member opposite for changing the name of his constituency and I see no objection to this very sensible proposal. We on this side of the House feel it does not go far enough. We agree that a change in name is appropriate, but what most needs to be changed is the pervasive and pernicious influence of the Liberal party. So, we are looking forward to a more substantial change after the next federal election.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council): Without getting into a discussion as to the validity of the last proposition, may I say a word about the motion from a procedural point of view? The motion as it stands asks that following second reading the question be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There have been indications from members on all sides of the House that it might be better if the motion were amended so that the question would be referred to the Committee of the Whole. There seems to be some disposition to finalize the matter today, and perhaps this could be done with the consent of hon. members.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I am enjoying the humorous exchange between the mover of the motion and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Perhaps, when the chips are down, they will have had the fun and we shall have the seat.

The suggestion of the parliamentary secretary is a reasonable one. It is a tradition in the House that members requesting changes in the names of their constituencies receive the approval of their colleagues, and we are all in favour of expedition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House has heard the proposal of the parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed that the motion be changed accordingly? Perhaps we could agree to change the wording of the other similar motions so as to refer each of these bills to the Committee of the Whole House instead of to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I wonder if the House would also agree to proceed with the motions for second reading of the remaining three bills, at this time? We could then study all four bills in committee of the whole without unnecessary loss of time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park) moved that Bill C-74, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to change the name of the present federal constituency of High Park to High Park-Humber Valley. This change is asked for following the circulation of a questionnaire among constituents of the said riding, the result of which indicated that a majority desired the name to be changed. At present this federal constituency consists of parts of four provincial ridings, High Park, Humber, York West and York South. It contains within its boundaries two main parks, High Park and Humber Valley Park, one on either side of the Humber River. It is a very diversified riding and I submit that the change in name would result in a more accurate description of its component parts. I there respectfully solicit the support of the House for the passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North) moved that Bill C-92, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the reason I ask for this change of name is, I believe, a very valid one. As the result of the last redistribution, my constituency of Renfrew North doubled in size. It is now the largest of the 77 constituencies south of North Bay in Ontario.

The riding consists of 49 townships in the District of Nipissing and 15 in the northern part of Renfrew County in addition to the City of Pembroke and the towns of Deep River, Mattawa, Bonfield and several villages, including Petawawa. The northern part of Renfrew County should not be identified with the town of Renfrew itself because the town of Renfrew has never been in the constituency of Renfrew North. There has always been some confusion over this; when I mention the name of my constituency people automatically begin talking about the town of Renfrew. It is my desire to retain the traditional name, Renfrew North, but to add to it Nipissing East so as to take in the 49 townships included in that part.

The County of Renfrew is the largest county in the province of Ontario and it is divided among three different constituencies and is part of each. It is my desire to consolidate these in Renfrew North—Nipissing East so that all the areas in the constituency shall be identified in the name of the riding.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

• (1710)

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-G. Lajoie (Trois-Rivières) moved that Bill C-167, An Act respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act

He said: Mr. Speaker, the main reason for my asking that the adjective "metropolitan" be added to the name of my riding of Trois-Rivières is that my riding really includes Trois-Rivières, Cap-de-la-Madeleine and Trois-Rivières-Ouest.

I am making this official request because the citizens of those three cities have asked me to do so, and also to avoid the confusion that exists between the name of the provincial riding and that of the federal riding. I must add that the provincial riding does not include Cap-de-la-Madeleine, a city which has a population of 32,500.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I understood that the hon. member wanted to bring a correction to the French version of the bill. Is this the case?

Mr. Lajoie: Mr. Speaker, a slight printing error did, in fact, slip into it. The French name is "Trois-Rivières-Métropolitain", whereas in English, this comes out as "Metropolitan-Trois-Rivières". This is just a printing error, I think.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The correction can be made in committee. May I dispense with reading the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, just before the bill carries—and I hope I am intervening in time—do I understand that it is the intention of the Chair to recognize the mistake to which the hon. member has drawn attention in the English text, and that the electoral district will appear as "Trois-Rivières-Métropolitain" in French and the equivalent in the English version?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): That is agreed. As I have said, the correction can be made in committee of the whole, and then the bill reported as amended.

Pursuant to special order the House will now go into committee of the whole on Bills C-55, C-74, C-92 and C-167.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now examine Bill C-167.

On clause 1—Metropolitan Trois-Rivières.

[Translation]

Mr. Lajoie: Mr. Speaker, I understand your question very well. In other words, the name of the constituency in French as in English would read "Trois-Rivières-Métropolitain".

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: From a procedural point of view it might be preferable to have another hon. member move the amendment. However, is it agreed that the translation be amended to read "Trois-Rivières-Métropolitain" instead of "Métropolitain Trois-Rivières"?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 1, as amended, agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill C-55, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Whelan.

Bill C-74, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Deakon.

Bill C-92, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Mr. Hopkins.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I think there is some disposition, now that all these electoral boundaries bills have been disposed of, to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, on a note of personal privilege and before Your Honour leaves the Chair, could I remind all hon. members of the showing of "The Tenth Decade" in the Railway Committee Room commencing at seven o'clock this evening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The time appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-4, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from January 1, 1971, to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, before five o'clock I had intimated I wished to speak for a few moments about the servo-centre concept introduced by the railways. This may or may not be a good concept; perhaps time will supply the answer in this regard. It seems to me, however, that the hearings in western Canada were an exercise in futility. Several members of parliament, the Senator from Saskatoon and a great many individuals from different communities in Saskatchewan, presented briefs at those hearings. For all practical purposes the hearings might not have been held, because in this case the CPR was given leave to introduce the services it sought to introduce. I am concerned that railway service has been downgraded, at least in western Canada, an area with which I am quite familiar. It may be that we should not expect to have some of the services we have had in the past in little villages, but it would seem that at least there should be some, if you like, over-all concept of freight service to the people of these areas. I suggest there is no such service.

In the past there have been unilateral changes of position by individuals and groups who have needed a particular freight service. I refer specifically to federal government changes. First, there is the mail service. At one time the railways provided this service, and finally the government, by putting its trucks on the road or through contract took the service from the railways and provided it in a different manner. Similar changes have been made by various organizations picking off a little business here and there, as it were. Not much in the way of service which paid was left to the railways.

We have Federated Co-operative Trucking using its own trucks, we have the dairy companies hauling their products, we have the buses hauling people and the trucking lines providing services. The business that was left was not profitable for anyone. It would seem to me very unfortunate that such a situation has arisen, at least in our prairie districts, because it means downgrading of service and economic activity. The result is that people are being forced out of business because they do not have the freight service which is necessary to remain operational. We might take the example of a garageman who must be able to obtain parts in order to repair vehicles. When he was unable to do this because of existing freight services he went out of business or moved to another location where these services could be provided. We have seen much of this in the Prairies.

I could talk at length on this matter but it seems to me we are beating a dead horse. We on this side of the House are not very happy with the way in which the government has managed transportation by rail. We are not satisfied with the way in which the government has handled the pensions of CNR employees. Also, we have complaints about lack of policy and future planning of freight needs. Earlier this afternoon I indicated that Canada's trade with the Orient has increased by leaps and bounds but that transportation service to the west coast has not improved. We find that the capitalization of railways has been inadequate in view of the transport needs of the nation. For these as well as other reasons we do not believe the government is entitled to a vote of approval by this House. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding):

That Bill C-4 be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months' hence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Hon. members have heard the motion of the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson). It seems to me to be a proper amendment and the House will proceed on that basis.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on Bill C-4, the annual CNR financing bill. We must remember that the history of Canada in the past 100 years has been largely the history of the railroads, at least in relation to that part of the country west of upper and lower Canada. Because this is a debate which arises every year it provides me with an opportunity to present a few ideas on railway transportation in western Canada in particular.

I should like to say a few words regarding CNR transportation in the Hudson Bay area and the town of Dauphin which I represent. Although the comments I will make are in many respects local, in total the changes are indicative of what is happening all across the country. I am referring to the CNR changes from so-called areas to so-called regions. These changes from area management to centralized regional management have caused considerable disruption of CNR personnel and have been the cause of widespread fear that small communities will lose out so far as jobs and services are concerned. As was stated by the last speaker, there is great disillusionment in western Canada and the feeling exists that many small communities will disappear because of the attitude of the railways, particularly of CNR, with regard to the area that I represent.

The changes mean, in effect, that jobs will be moved from smaller communities to areas of greater concentration such as, in the case of my riding, Winnipeg. It has been said that this area type management has created a situation where there are 18 small railroads corresponding to the number of areas created by the CNR. If this is the effect of the so-called area concept it means that ultimately there will be considerable disruption in the towns and villages which the CNR services, and in fact this is what is happening.

For years the CNR seems to have been making much of the transportation policy for western Canada, and the inactivity and unresponsiveness of the federal government to the needs of the people has been detrimental to western Canada. From the practical point of view, the fact that the CNR has its main office in Montreal means that it views the problems of western Canadian transportation in the context of its location there. We cannot quarrel too much with that, but I think that probably the CNR management does not realize the dependency of western Canada on the railways and the lack of alternative methods of transportation which are available in the east. It has neglected the fact that there is lack of competition in western Canada, which is not the case in the east. The trucking industry has introduced a measure of competition in western Canada but there are many bulk commodities such as grain, fertilizers, and so on, that must travel by rail. The concentration of CNR management in Montreal makes it unlikely that on-the-spot decisions will be useful to western Canada.

At present the Canadian National transportation, reporting and control system has been introduced in Montreal and the final phase of the TRACS program is to be implemented by 1975. Ultimately, the whole CN system will report to a computer in Montreal. This facility will process the data fed directly into the computer from operations in the field. The information thus obtained will be returned directly to the operations in the field in the form of advance train notices, bypassing the present regional control centres. The information could, and probably will, be used as a basis for administrative decisions, which will greatly reduce the need for regional administrative people. The objectives of the program are commendable if the costs of transportation are reduced and better service is provided to the public.

We will have to live increasingly with the changing technology which will result in the considerable decrease of CN jobs in Manitoba, most of them in Winnipeg. It appears that the centralization which has occurred so far with respect to Winnipeg and other regional operational and administrative centres has been only an interim move. Probably the most significant feature of this centralization of the CN is that the decision-making process will be further removed from the action, at least so far as the west is concerned. Policy made elsewhere will govern, in some measure, day to day life in Manitoba and other parts of the west. This illustrates return to an attempt to control from Montreal substantial segments of the life of western Canada. The CNR, by circumstance, has become a government corporation controlled in the main by federal prerogative. To concentrate the decision-making process so far away from many regions can lead only to misunderstanding. Modern centralization might be advantageous at times and necessary in the interests of efficiency, but centralization of control of a transportation system that is so vital to western Canada should not be carried to this extreme.

Phasing out the area system with respect to the Hudson Bay region may well be followed by the downgrading of other regions in favour of more centralization in the east. The net result will be loss of jobs in smaller communities and a feeling of remoteness on the part of employees and of the public served by the CNR. The CNR seems to allow situations that are not good to develop, and takes a long time to correct them. But once it starts something the CNR seems to overreact and to create other situations that are not good.

In phasing out station agents in various parts of western Canada both the CNR and the CPR have opted for servo-centres. Presumably, the idea of the servo-centre is that it will give better service to the customer—but it eliminates the station agent in small communities, a person who acted as a public relations man as well as the business agent for the railway. Where conditions are such that a trucker can undertake the work previously done by the railway, he will have the benefit of residing in a small community and personally serving business establishments. Servo-centres are impersonal and business contacts with them may be difficult. The inauguration of the servo-centre idea means that the railway has opted out of the business of less than carload lots in carrying freight.

The concept of phasing out an area has created considerable dislocation and alarm in the town of Dauphin due to the possibility of people moving from the area. So many misgivings were expressed by the mayor and council of the town of Dauphin that the CNR issued a public statement in February, 1971. The gist of the statement was that the CNR claimed that 27 jobs would be transferred from Dauphin but 24 new jobs would be created in the servo-centre, meaning a net loss of three jobs. It also suggested that when centralization was completed, possibly another 14 jobs would be transferred or abolished, making a grand total of 17 jobs lost. The CNR also claimed to know of no further plans for attrition. It stated that Dauphin would remain an important rail centre and that any further movement of employees would represent only a small percentage of its work force in Dauphin. In February, 1972, the CNR issued another press release in Dauphin stating that the net employment loss in the town was 39. Canadian National employee groups claim that there has been a loss of 69 positions and the creation of only seven new ones, making a net loss of 62.

The community has lost employment supervisors and staff, an area engineer and complete engineering department staff, an accounting supervisor and staff, an equipment supervisor and staff, bridges and building foremen and staff, administration or general offices and staff, freight and passenger sales supervisors and staff, superintendents of transportation and staff, a road foreman of engines and staff, supervisors of car distribution and work equipment and staff. Again, the CNR has stated that Dauphin will remain an important rail centre, but it does not yet seem to have decided what departments will finally remain there. The phasing out of management in this area has created considerable disquiet. It has caused loss of jobs and has detracted from the importance of the community. Whether railway operations will show increased efficiency remains to be seen. I would hope that when the CNR makes changes affecting small communities it will demonstrate forbearance and will be absolutely sure that the changes it makes will provide a better transportation system.

I would now like to mention the problem of the railway running into the port of Churchill. The possibility of record grain sales this year seems to present a transportation problem. These projected record sales are given in terms of bushels, not in dollar value, and it should be remembered that Canada does not export much more agricultural produce than it imports. There have been reports of ships waiting in Vancouver harbour to be loaded with wheat. There is widespread feeling that more use should be made of the port of Churchill, thus further diversifying our grain handling ports.

Increasingly the railways have been accused of not being able to move sufficient grain to the west coast or even to the lakehead and Churchill. One of the methods by which the port of Churchill could be made more useful would be to undertake an increase in storage facilities at the port. These should be increased to handle up to 20 million bushels. This would allow a much more orderly movement of grain out of Saskatchewan and Manitoba and would provide a steadier use of the Hudson Bay railway line. In this way there would be no necessity for the grain rush that occurs each June in order to get the port of Churchill opened.

Enlarged storage facilities would double or triple the amount of grain that could be shipped out of Churchill. In the cold climate of Churchill the storage of grain can be undertaken with minimum risk of spoiling. It is generally considered that the structures required to store grain there could be relatively inexpensive. If adequate types of grain were in storage at Churchill it would do much to minimize the bottle-necks that occur in the railway system in delivering wheat to the west coast and other grain handling ports.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few brief remarks to make on this bill to legalize the granting of money to Canadian National Railways, most of which money already has been spent. It goes without saying that railway lines are being abandoned right across Canada. To many people, particularly those in rural areas, this is foolish. If Canada is ever to achieve the potential that we all seek and which is envisaged by the statisticians, railroads are necessary for its growth. Why abandon rail lines and tear up the tracks now, only to relay them later? We have a startling example of this in the electric railroad that used to run north from Toronto through Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Newmarket and Aurora right up to Lake Simcoe. It was abandoned, but now traffic on Sundays is so congested that travel is almost impossible.

Canada, and Ontario in particular, is growing rapidly and will require more food. We shall also have to produce food for sale abroad. It is estimated that at the turn of the century the world's population will be over six billion; therefore more food, more space and more transportation will be required. As we see it now, additional transportation will have to be provided by motor car, train or bus, making for even greater problems of pollution caused by exhaust fumes and litter on the highways. We should realize that every foot of pavement we lay stops the production of oxygen from our plants and trees.

The automobile is our major source of pollution and we cannot but be alarmed when we see cars with only one or two occupants. A good example of what pollution can do can be found at the international airport at Malton. In the unloading area it gets into your eyes and you can even smell it. We must stop using for the construction of highways arable land that provides food and oxygen. We must stop driving cars, which create two-thirds of the pollution in our cities. Transportation must, therefore, be by rail or large buses. It is said that people will not travel by rail. But, Mr. Speaker, if we provided a speedy, clean rail service, people would travel by rail. But now they are not given this choice. The speed of trains today is about the same as it was 50 years ago. The old International Limited was fuelled by coal and run by steam, but it made the Montreal to Toronto run as fast as the trains do today—and it had to stop to take on water and fuel!

Trains serving Simcoe county have been cut off until in an area of about 100,000 people there are two trains daily; one down to Toronto in the afternoon around 2 p.m. and one up at 5 p.m. leaving Toronto for Vancouver. This is the daily train service except for the dayliner at weekends, which is always crowded. The Supercontinental is supposed to go through Orillia at 2 p.m., but it is often 12 to 14 hours late. Who is going to sit around a station for that length of time? How can people travel by rail when the service is once a day each way at haphazard hours? People cannot afford to rely on this type of service when they have appointments to keep. A few days ago there was a snowstorm in the area and the train was stuck for three hours between Washago and Orillia. The railway had to send to Toronto for the snowplow to come to the north country and dig out the train. That is the type of transportation system we have in Canada today. I should say, also, that the train was 14 hours late. People will wait once and will learn not to do it again.

In London, England, trains come into the station every minute or so. The same thing applies in Europe: trains run on schedule. We are supposed to have a lot of technology in Canada, but even so we cannot get an efficient railway service. Yet Sir John A. Macdonald, that great old Tory and Father of Confederation, was responsible for our building a railway across Canada by pick and shovel and mule train.

In Japan, trains run up to 150 miles per hour, about twice as fast as ours. But our transportation system is run by an ox-cart philosophy. In other words, the transport commission is run by a man who was once a cabinet minister and who created the job for himself. I do not know whether he set the salary, but there he sits, not responsible to parliament except that he comes here after the money has been spent and asks us to pass the bill.

An hon. Member: He is certainly not earning it.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that control of this railroad should be brought back to Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rynard: The National Transportation Act, which gave this gentleman his job and set up this commission, should be repealed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rynard: The railroad is neither adequate nor efficient.

Mr. Benjamin: How about the government?

Mr. Rynard: You could probably say that about them, too. The subsidy passenger clause which reimburses the railway for 80 per cent of its losses should be removed. There is not much incentive to run a good passenger service and make it pay under those circumstances. A railroad running on schedule at satisfactory hours during the week would carry many people to work and cut down dramatically the one and two-passenger automobiles hurrying to work, polluting the atmosphere, crowding the roads and using up parking space. A re-examination and reorientation of railway service in keeping with the last half of the twentieth century must take place right away. The first thing to do, Mr. Speaker, is to get rid of the Canadian Transport Commission and bring control back to parliament, to the representatives of the people.

I should like now to make a few remarks about airports. It is my opinion that as far as possible airports should be constructed on waste land. Failing that, we should use water transportation as far as possible. I say this from the standpoint of an airplane landing, from the standpoint of pollution and from the standpoint of usage of land. An airport should be far enough away from urban centres so that people do not suffer excessively from noise and pollution.

I have been wondering about the new airport proposed for Brougham, a town near Pickering. It makes one pause and wonder why good farming land so close to the city of Toronto would be taken. It is within 30 miles of Toronto and will add to the pollution of that area. There is also talk about establishing another city of 200,000 people in the area. Yet this government talks of green belts and regional development and doing away with pollution. One wonders why the government is doing what it is. Why is it taking over good, arable farmland that over the years could produce cereal grains, beef cattle, hogs and chickens—food that we will need when our population increases? By paving that beautiful, arable farmland you also stop the production of oxygen from trees, grass and other plants. Therefore, not only are you adding to pollution; you are stopping the creation of oxygen. It seems to me that the government could have used waste land which is less productive. I am thinking of level areas north of the proposed site that is waste or poor land. Such land is not economically viable as farm land. Why could not the government have used that?

I also wonder why we must take two bites at the cherry and build two airports. There is to be an international airport at St. Scholastique, Quebec. Now there is to be another one at Pickering, making two large airports for the Toronto area. Why must we take two bites at the cherry and run backward and forward across Toronto between one airport and the other? What is the purpose of putting the airport there? My question is as simple as that.

The minister is the person who says where national and international airports are to go. The other day in the House I asked why the proposed site has been chosen, but he had nothing to say and made no statement in the House. I suggest that parliament and the people are entitled to know the government's reasons for putting the airport at the proposed site. Perhaps there are good reasons for putting it there. If there are, give them to us. It now appears, that the airport will not be large enough, if the forecasts of statisticians about the size of the population in the area are correct. If their forecasts are right, my argument will be strengthened. I do not know, and not many in this House know why the government is putting the airport there. I think parliament has the right to know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Rynard.]

Mr. Rynard: I say this because Parliament and the public deserve an explanation. Other sites are cheaper and not as economically important. Why have they not been chosen? Since this is to be an international airport, the minister is obligated to tell this House why he prefers that site. When the head of the Canadian Transport Commission was a cabinet minister I asked him if he would consider asking the airlines to instal escalators for the use of the aged and those with heart conditions when boarding airplanes. If one looks through Hansard he will see that the minister promised to look into the matter as soon as possible and see that such escalators were installed right away. Well, he has gone. However, the escalators or elevators to help people board airplanes have not been installed. This matter is of medical importance since many travelling today suffer from heart conditions. When you consider that one male in three over 50 in this country suffers from a heart condition, you will readily understand why I am concerned about this matter.

I should like to conclude with another observation. The airlines are to serve many people at Toronto International Airport. The other night when I was at the unloading ramp I could not stay there because of the stink in the air from polluting exhausts and from buses. The polluted air was overpowering. What a foul place it was! That operation is run by the Department of Transport. Without using any fancy adjectives, let me say that is a heck of a way to run an international airport. I hope that the former minister of transport who now heads the Canadian Transport Commission will read my remarks and remember some of the promises he made when he was minister of transport.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing Bill C-4 which is to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period January 1, 1971, to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the CNR and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada. These matters are outlined in the bill now before the House. The presentation of this type of bill is an annual event. We are being asked, actually, to rubberstamp the approval of expenditures made by these Crown corporations. However, this legislation gives us an opportunity to speak on general transportation problems and to make suggestions for change. This, Mr. Speaker, I intend to do.

May I speak briefly about the fixed charge debt of the CNR. This guarantee was given by the federal government many years ago when the CNR system was formed in 1923 from a number of railway lines which were on the verge of bankruptcy. The CNR guarantee at that time was more than generous, but I feel it saddled the Canadian taxpayer with interest payments on a debt which could not be justified. The CNR continues to carry this unjust debt load upon which we still pay interest. I believe the CNR capital structure ought to be changed again, for the railway can never be a paying proposition considering the immense load of debt and consequent interest payments now being carried.

The shareholders of the almost bankrupt railway companies which eventually made up the CNR fared well at public expense over the years. In retrospect, Mr. Speaker, it would appear that Canada and the CNR would have been better off by hundreds of millions of dollars if a start had been made with companies which had gone broke. Instead, we bailed them out and we have been paying ever since. Regardless of past history, a thorough review of the CNR capital structure is in order and should be carried out. We should consider that question in conjunction with our consideration of this bill. When the bill goes to committee I hope this will be one of the items to receive a great deal of consideration and discussion.

The leader of my group spoke about the need for an integrated transportation policy that would take into account all four major means of transport—air, rail, road and water. This is a necessity in any modern, industrialized nation. Canada has a long way to go in this regard but seems reluctant about approaching the problem. There is no doubt that a modern, efficient and integrated transport system is one of the main requirements of a modern, industrialized nation if that nation is to meet the many challenges from its competitors throughout the world. The quick, cheap and effective delivery of raw materials or goods is of prime importance in the world of today.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that a modern and efficient transportation system can also be a major factor in the unity of our country. It is necessary that raw materials, finished products and people have quick and cheap access to every part of our nation. We talk about trying to eliminate regional disparities in Canada, yet we have set up programs to deal with disparities on a piecemeal basis. At the same time we find that this government has done nothing to eliminate the rank discrimination which exists throughout Canada in relation to freight rates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harding: This problem alone is the cause of great friction and hardship in some parts of Canada, including British Columbia. I feel that one of the greatest unifying moves we could make in Canada would be the bringing about of equalization of freight rates in our country. For too long successive governments have allowed this problem to remain dormant.

• (2050)

I would like to deal briefly with my home province of British Columbia. For the most part, the freight rate structure has been rank discrimination as far as we are concerned. The tendency has been to force trade north and south rather than to the east. This is to be deplored. A proper freight rate structure years ago along with adequate government policies, of course, could and would have helped build a different economic approach to that which has been developed in our nation. Nevertheless, the unfair freight rate structure is still with us. I hope this Parliament will be in a position to make sure that this is changed. I hope it will be one of the priorities of any national transportation policy.

This afternoon I listened to a number of speakers from various parties dealing with freight rate problems concerning their areas. The story is the same. It does not matter where you go; in the eastern and western parts of Canada this is one of the major problems facing the provinces. I will use the maritime provinces as an example. All you have to do is look at the unemployment figures which today were made public. The maritime provinces have one of the highest rates of unemployment in Canada, just over 11 per cent. At one time there were a number of industries in the Maritimes which do not exist today. They were able to ship their goods to other parts of Canada. However, discriminatory freight rates have effectively barred them from the best market for Canadian industries, our home market. There are 22 million people in Canada, yet discriminatory freight rates have forced a number of industries out of business by barring them from this market. The same applies in the western provinces.

As I said earlier, I regret that the equalization of freight rates has not been tackled by the present administration. This is something we need. It would help to bring unity to Canada. I mentioned the need for a national transportation policy. The government will say we have a national transportation policy, and this is so,—but it is a national policy to a rather minor degree. There are one or two things which a national transportation policy should include. A policy of this nature should include the moving of Canadian goods and raw materials over Canadian transportation systems. I raise this matter because last year we had in Ottawa a hearing before the Canadian Transport Commission. This was brought about by the Kootenay and Elk Railway Company in British Columbia which wishes to build a spurline from the American border to the coal fields in the East Kootenays with a view to shipping a large portion of the coal currently being mined in that area south over the Burlington Northern railway lines to the Pacific coast. The Canadian Transport Commission rejected the application by the Kootenay and Elk Railway. At present this matter is before the Supreme Court of Canada. It is my understanding that if the Kootenay and Elk Railway Company had applied to become a common carrier, it might well have been granted permission to build this link to the American border and hook up with the Burlington Northern. Away would go many hundreds of jobs for Canadian railway men and many millions of dollars of revenue for our country.

I would like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to make a statement in the House that we are not going to allow Canadian goods to be carried over foreign transportation lines when we have our own communication lines. The provinces of British Columbia and Alberta are very anxious to see railway links built to hook up with American railway lines. I have no objection to some kind of link if the normal interchange of goods must take place, but the day we allow such railway links to be built with a view to transporting our raw materials or finished products, when they should and could be going over Canadian lines, we will be doing something completely wrong.

As far as rates are concerned we have a public utilities body in the federal field, the Canadian Transport Commission. If rates are out of hand, let the commission pull Canadian Pacific or Canadian National into line. Under no circumstances must we allow another phase of our economy to get into the hands of foreign- controlled transportation companies. We have lost enough, Mr. Speaker. We have lost control of a great portion of the Canadian economy. It is time for the Minister of Transport to get up in this House and state that Canada will stand firm and insist on the movement of Canadian goods and raw materials over Canadian transportation lines to ports from which they are exported.

There has been a problem with snowslides in British Columbia. The provinces say these rail links must be built to ensure continuity of supply to coastal points. There are alternate routes that can be set up. I believe members of all parties should look into this question and insist upon these alternate routes being in Canadian territory.

I shall come back to the matter of hauling coal and the transportation of wheat. Over the past few months we have had the unhappy experience of trains being delayed. As far as the terminals in Vancouver are concerned, wheat supplies are short. This, again, is a matter of proper transportation policy. If necessary, this government should invest in a number of elevators at the ocean, in Vancouver. Wheat should be stored in these elevators to tide us over periods when we have two or three weeks of trouble in the winter due to snow. This can and should be done. It should be done in the interest of agriculture and that of our basic commodity, wheat. There would be nothing wrong with the government investing in an elevator or a series of elevators, not only at Vancouver but at Prince Rupert. There are other deep sea ports in British Columbia that could be utilized throughout the year. Stocks should be on hand there so that exports could continue regardless of weather conditions in any part of the nation. As far as wheat is concerned, this would halt the demand to build another link to the United States so that these commodities could be shipped by United States rail lines.

I want to go back to the subject of coal haul. Not only coal is affected in connection with the rail link proposed in the East Kootenay area. If an application goes through for a common carrier, tens of thousands of cars of lumber will be moving down what we call the Columbia valley into the United States and, once again, the number of jobs available to Canadian railway workers will be reduced. There will also cause a further reduction in the revenue of Canadian transportation systems, a reduction which would affect the whole economy.

I should like to say a few words about railway passenger service. The subject has been covered by other speakers but I, too, would like to protest the increasing curtailment of passenger service in various parts of Canada. In some countries of the world railways are beginning to come into their own again. I think the same pattern should be followed in Canada. Trains can be designed nowadays to run very fast, some of them at speeds well over 100 miles per hour. In some areas of Canada there are closely packed industrial complexes where this type of rail transportation should be used. The government, and in particular the Department of Transport, should pay far more attention to rail passenger service than has been the case in the past.

May I now deal with another matter which has not been talked about very much in connection with the bill before us, although it certainly comes under the heading of national transportation policy. I refer to the Canadian merchant marine. We are a country with one of the longest coastlines in the world. We are one of the greatest trading nations of the world. Yet the shipbuilding industry which once flourished in Canada, and the ships which used to sail as Canadian ships or under the Canadian flag, have been practically eliminated. There was no need for this to have happened. Here are two basic industries. No trading nation in the world—and Canada is one of the leading trading nations—can afford to let this happen. We should be in the business of building ships. We should see that a great proportion of Canadian goods exported from our shores is exported in Canadian bottoms. I would go further and say there is no reason why a large portion of the imports reaching this country should not arrive in Canadian ships.

The neglect of the shipbuilding industry is nothing short of scandalous. Apparently the government feels we cannot compete in the international field of shipping and shipbuilding. This is nonsense. We can and should compete. The fact that our shipbuilding industry has dwindled almost to nothing, together with the merchant fleet, is an indication that the government has lost sight of one of the key factors in any national transportation policy. In British Columbia we had some of the finest shipbuilding yards in the country—in the world, if you like. They fell into decline and key workers were obliged to leave because jobs were not available. The same thing has happened in eastern Canada. It is no credit to the government or to the minister that this should have been allowed to happen at this stage in our development as one of the great manufacturing and trading nations in the world. We have allowed two important industries, industries which every important trading nation should have, to get out of our hands. We should build up a Canadian merchant marine owned, controlled and operated by Canadians, in the interest of Canada.

There are many railway workers in my area. They are very interested in transportation policies. One matter which is constantly brought to my attention is the lack of safety precautions. The big transportation companies are paying less attention to the roadbeds. Crews have been reduced. The amount of inspection carried on is, I understand, less than ever before. This is another aspect of rail transportation which I feel the minister should be examining, because serious wrecks in any part of the country could bring about major disruption in rail communications.

One of my hon. friends has moved that this bill be given a six months' hoist. I should like to put on the record some of the reasons why we feel the measure should be held up for a short period. They are as follows: Lengthy discussions took place last year on this subject—in fact, they have been going on for several years—in the course of which the very points I have been trying to make briefly tonight were gone over time and time again in this House.

We want to see some commitment by the government in regard to the matters we have been raising for years and which we have raised in today's debate. So far, there is no indication that these matters have received attention, far less the action which is called for. For instance, I refer to the fact that little or nothing has been done about CNR pensions. This question should be looked into. The capital structure of the railway remains a problem which has not been touched. The fact is that railway services, including passenger service, have been rapidly going downhill, have been ignored, as has the whole question of freight rates and the need for the major changes which I have mentioned briefly. We feel these matters are so important that this bill should not go through the House until they have been dealt with. The only way to get the attention of the government is to endeavour to hold up the bill for sufficient time to give the government and the department the chance to discuss adequately both in committee and in this House the points I have listed.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have listened for several days now to this most interesting debate about the money to be made available to the CNR and our air transportation system. I often wonder how many pages of Hansard have been filled with suggestions and proposals each year as this particular debate comes forward. I wonder how many years of Canadian history have been spent discussing and debating railroad transportation policies. The railroads in this country have been tied so closely to history that one might think the history of this nation concerned little else.

We look back at history and find that governments have helped build the CPR by continually granting it sums of money, money given to a private corporation that is based upon profit for its shareholders. We reached a point where the CPR might not have been finished and may have brought the Macdonald government to its knees had it not been for those people living in Saskatchewan who supplied the country with rebellion. The role of the CPR in the building of the west is an interesting one. The railroad was paid off by the granting of land in the west. In the area around Weyburn and west of Weyburn there are many farmers farming quarter sections, half sections and whole sections which were originally CPR land. Railroads such as the CPR and the ones that followed were built on an assumption of an exploitative nature and were not based on any concept of service. Railroads built through the west were built mainly on the basis of bringing people into the west to provide a market for industrial goods from the east.

Throughout the years the railroads, through their freight rates and possibly at one time through their passenger service, accrued vast amounts of revenue from people living in the west. That revenue was used by the railroads, I suppose, in all parts of Canada, and this may well be justifiable. But in the course of time the very railroads that accrued a large amount of revenue from the west continued to erode the kind of service that the people of western Canada and of Canada generally deserved from its railway system. And each year this government continues to bail out, if I may put it that way, this particular system of transportation and to neglect the overriding problem of developing a national transportation policy for Canada.

This afternoon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) made a speech—finally—in which he talked about this and that and about his department and what it is doing in the Maritimes. But as he went on he continued to ignore the real necessity for sitting down and deciding what the national transportation policy of Canada is going to be.

What is the justification for building two new airports? What is the justification behind some of the railroads' application to dispense with station agents in the prairie west? In Saskatchewan over the years we have seen continual attempts by the railroads to cut back on the kind of service needed by western farmers. We have seen these railway corporations, whether it be the CPR or the CNR, with the backing, as far as I am concerned, of the federal government, withdraw the services of station agents on some kind of pretence that the public will get better service from a servo-centre when there is no proof at all that a servo-centre will serve the needs of the people in the west.

The Canadian Transport Commission, headed by its impartial chairman, implements policies that allow the railroads to curtail the role of the station agent. I suppose in coming years when that commission deals with the question of rail line abandonment we will again see its impartial chairman implement policies to abandon railway lines in Saskatchewan with no regard for the effect on various communities and the farmers involved, who will be given no alternative mode of transportation with which to market their goods.

The people in my riding have expressed real concern that many of the railway lines that service their communities, such as the line running from the town of Radville east to the town of Goodwater, may possibly be abandoned. They are concerned that the line running west from Radville through to Willow Bunch may be on the chopping block, that the line running through Coronach may also be on the chopping block and that the railways may apply to abandon the line running west of Estevan. As long as the government allows a kind of non-policy activity on the part of the Department of Transport, we will continue to see the eroding of services that are needed by Canadians.

Many farmers and people living in the rural areas of my riding have pointed out to me, as I have myself noticed, that service of the track running through the area is not up to par. The track is continually neglected and many parts are in need of service. The gauge of the track is far below what is required by modern diesels. Some of it is as low as 85 gauge, when it should have a gauge of somewhere around 120. Until the government commits itself to a national transportation policy we will continue to see the railways being allowed to carry out such unfair practices.

The freight rates association announced that on February 11 freight rates would be increased from 3 per cent to 8 per cent on approximately one-third of the goods carried by the railway. General grain and grain products are subject to the rate increase except where covered by statutory rates and traffic moving under agreed charges. Such increases are unwarranted at a time when the farmers of western Canada are facing economic difficulties in terms of ever-rising costs of production and low prices received for their commodities.

Once again I suggest there is need for a national transportation policy for all Canada. If this nation is to be held together as a single country, an attempt must be made to bring in a national transportation policy that equalizes all freight rates across Canada, thus alleviating the disproportionate rates paid by western farmers. I call on the government to make public its transportation policies which have been kept hidden in the office of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). Why has this report not been tabled in the House of Commons for the scrutiny not just of members of the House of Commons but of people in my constituency who will be affected by government policies in the future? They want to know where they stand. I believe it is the responsibility of this government to outline that program.

Is this report to suggest a reduction in delivery points in the Prairies? Is there to be some mention of rail line abandonment in this report which is in the minister's office? Further, will we see this report and be able to judge it before the next election? I have grave doubts about that.

Any new national transportation policy should be given jurisdiction over Canadian harbours. I point out that in the 1972-73 estimates the amount of money allocated for harbour improvement is down over the previous year. Yet we have seen a backlog of grain and grain-carrying ships at Vancouver as well as difficulties in respect of transportation. This is not the year for any government to be involved in the cutting back of expenditures for the development of facilities at Canadian harbours. I suggest this happens because the government does not draw up a national transportation policy for all of Canada.

There are other matters which could be discussed in terms of an improved transportation policy. It is time we developed a transportation policy based upon service and not profit. It is time the CPR was nationalized and made a public utility which would involve itself in service to the Canadian people. It is time the government ensured that the port of Churchill is put to full use. We in Saskatchewan and in the prairie west have for years heard the Hudson Bay route association representatives shouting for proper use of the port of Churchill, yet there has been no emphasis on this particular aspect of transportation by the government.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) pointed out in the House a few days ago that there is a government terminal in the city of Prince Rupert. He also pointed out that the harbour there is one of the finest on the west coast. It is time the government re-examined its policy on grain transportation and looked into the possibility of the use of that terminal. It is interesting to note that when the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan) spoke in the House on this matter he pointed out to the government that the agricultural committee started seven years ago to press for the need to improve port facilities. However, the government in its policy has not seen fit to give emphasis to the requirements in this regard. The hon. member for Essex is quite well known for his habit of pointing out the lack of consistency or lack of good policies by this government. I do not understand how he can still stand and vote along with them when the crunch comes.

I have taken up a considerable amount of time in respect of transportation related to railway and harbour facilities in Canada as well as the real need to equalize freight rate costs and the real need to give Canadians the opportunity to travel within their own country at costs which are less or at least equal to the costs involved in travelling to Europe. There are other parts of this bill which deal with the expenditure of money in respect of Air Canada. When this government came into power it suggested there would be an end to regional disparities. This sounded quite good to the people of the country. However, we have seen no proof of this. I wish to note in respect of spending on air facilities that there is to be an expenditure of 60 cents per capita for airport facilities in Saskatchewan, in comparison with an expenditure of $3.20 per capita in Ontario. Including the grant of $42,766,000 which is to be made for the building of a new airport in the area of Toronto, we would have a per capita expenditure of $10.05, compared to 60 cents in Saskatchewan.

As pointed out so adequately last week in Saskatoon by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), it is high time the airport at Saskatoon was improved and the air facilities in Regina improved in order to meet the needs of the people of Saskatchewan. I have pointed out these things to the government in the hope that the Minister of Transport will come to grips with the problems of transportation in Canada. Earlier in the House I asked him about the possibility of Prairie representation on the port of Vancouver authority. At that time he said no to the suggestion. I repeat that I believe there is need for a new national transportation policy in which the prairie region would have the privilege, if you wish to call it that, of having representation on the port of Vancouver authority to look over and examine the policy and how our grain is handled at this west coast port.

In the short time I have been on this earth I have on many occasions travelled on passenger trains. On those occasions I felt that the service was relatively good. I often wondered, however, whether with a little imagination the railway companies in this country could develop a passenger service which would be attractive to Canadians who wish to travel from one end of the country to the other. When one travels from the east coast to the Rockies one can see an immense amount of beauty, and if one were to travel on the railway one could do so without the inconvenience of having to drive on our highways. I believe that with a considerable amount of imagination in the area of passenger service the railways could provide the type of service which would bring about increased use of our railways by people who travel in Canada.

I thank members of the House of Commons for their kind attention. I hope the government will support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson), which would give the government the opportunity to draw up a truly national transportation policy to meet the needs of the Canadian people.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to be a great expert on our transportation system, but I should like to deal with one particular aspect pertaining to western Canada, my riding and all prairie ridings. I refer to the grain transportation situation. This problem has been accentuated this year because of the heavier than normal movement of barley. However, there is also the fact that in other years, because of railway service, sales have been lost.

When I think for a moment of the situation in which prairie farmers find themselves, of their incomes this year and in past years, of the transportation system which in a great many cases has not enabled them to sell their products to any great extent, I feel sick. The movement of our agricultural products from the Prairies is of paramount importance and is the whole foundation of the western economy. This is borne out by the statistics which show that 60 per cent of our agricultural products must of necessity be exported to other parts of Canada and to other parts of the world simply because we do not have the population in western Canada to consume the products we produce.

Historically, wheat has been by far the biggest crop in western Canada. Technology in wheat growing and other techniques have drastically reduced the causes of serious crop failures in western Canada as well as in other parts of Canada. Even in 1967 during the widespread drought conditions in Saskatchewan our grain crop exceeded the long-term average. We have hardier varieties of grain and greatly improved farm equipment, and the increased use of pesticides and herbicides and a much heavier application of fertilizers has contributed to the high yields per acre achieved in recent years which has given cause for optimism for the future. Improved technology has permitted farmers to put into production lands which formerly had been considered marginal or submarginal. I think it is significant that in 1968 nearly one million tons of fertilizer was used in the prairie provinces, compared with only 85,000 tons in 1950.

This trend will continue as farms become larger and the need to reduce costs per unit becomes greater. As a result, the Canadian wheat crop in the latter part of the 1960s has been extremely large. The crop harvested in 1966 was the largest on record and subsequent crops have also been extremely large. Improved farm technology is an important factor in the expansion of Canadian wheat production but it is also a big factor in the dramatic increase in self-sufficiency of the developing countries so far as grain production is concerned. For example, new strains of wheat have been developed for adaptation in warmer climates, which has led to improved harvests in many developing countries. Increases in wheat production in India and Pakistan are of particular significance. India now claims that within two years she might become self-sufficient so far as grain production or agricultural production is concerned. Advances in milling and baking technology have also permitted many countries to which we used to sell, to use their own wheat to greater advantage and hence not depend on our wheat to the same extent as a few years ago.

This is the background against which I think we should review the present government's position with regard to the grain transportation industry in Canada. A commodity such as wheat or barley depends on speedy marketing and a rapid response to customer needs, not only in Canada but also overseas. In this sense an adequate transportation system is essential. More than ever it is now necessary to ship from western grain growing provinces to the customers, which brings honestly earned income to our farmers in western Canada. These markets must be won and held on a continuing basis.

I believe that given the proper initiative Canada could, and I expect she will within the next few years, export one billion bushels of grain a year. I foresee this in the near future. This depends on our ability, not necessarily to produce the product but to deliver it to our customers. Our agricultural system is only as strong as its weakest link and in the past few months it has been made obvious that the weakest link has been our transportation system to the west coast.

Rail traffic has suffered difficulties due to snowslides and adverse conditions in the Rocky Mountains, but I suggest that snowslides in the Rocky Mountains in the wintertime are not new. Clearly we must concern ourselves, not only as members of parliament but as grain producers, with what I consider to be the four basic needs which should be acted upon at present. As has been mentioned before in the House, we need increased storage at our Vancouver terminal. I realize as well as anybody else that building storage is an expensive business, but I think that given the proper techniques storage could be designed relatively cheaply. We do not need expensive storage but we need more of it than we presently have to be used for what I would call a surge capacity. So long as we have winters such as we have, threats of strikes or slowdowns of railway employees, we will always have the problem of transporting the product out to the port from which it will be shipped. I think increased storage is of paramount importance to the total grain transportation.

Secondly, a few months ago there was a unit train which was moved from one of our inland terminals at Saskatoon to Vancouver. This train, comprised of hopper bottom cars and three large diesel locomotives, hauled cleaned grain from one of our government inland terminals, which has not been used to a great extent directly, to Vancouver and then loaded it directly on to a waiting vessel. The system worked well at the time and I wonder why it is not being used at present to move grain out to Vancouver. The system is used so far as the potash industry is concerned and I believe it is high time this method was adopted on a continuing basis to move grain.

The third thing which should be realized and acted upon by the railways is that more hopper bottomed cars are needed and that these should not be put into service only when an emergency arises, as seems to be the case at present. I think we can call the present situation an emergency when we are roughly 30 million bushels of grain behind in our export shipments. Many of the railways cars now in use are antiquated. They are slow to fill and slow to unload. New kinds of cars must be purchased and used on a continuing basis. The old rail cars at present in use move about 2,000 bushels of grain each. The new cars can move about 3,000 bushels of grain and can transport it more efficiently and quickly. As a result, the unit cost per car is lowered. The unit train that I mentioned which ran to Vancouver carried 270,000 bushels of grain. There is no reason why two unit trains could not be moved from each of our inland terminals each week. This would amount to an additional movement of 75 million bushels of grain per year.

The government, and through it the Canadian people, owns inland terminals on the Prairies. I point out that there is a terminal in Saskatoon which until recently was not used to any great extent. It can hold approximately five million bushels of grain. There is no reason why the railways cannot move grain into such terminals, keep them filled with a variety of grain, clean the grain in the terminals and load it into hopper bottomed cars for movement to a waiting vessel at the coast. This could mean a little more stress on our communications system to coordinate the arrival of trains and boats. But this is done for other commodities; it is done with respect to the movement of potash and there is no reason why it could not be done with respect to the movement of grain.

Rail travel, as is well known, has suffered at times from snowslides and other problems. These are not the fault of the farmer, of the government, of the railways or the railway employees. Snowslides are a problem that must be tackled with a long-range approach, adopting the four suggestions that I have put forward. We should utilize our railway system more fully so that temporary snowslides do not bring about a similar situation.

Recently, for the first time in many years, Japan tendered for grain in Canada but we could not offer grain because we thought we could not fill the order on time. This shows how serious is the present situation. The minister responsible for the Wheat Board has reported that for the time being we have stopped accepting tenders for grain sales. I believe the situation will not get any better unless worth while planning is undertaken and implemented.

We cannot expect the farmers to continue to bear the cost of government mistakes in policies. There is no justification in having the farmers pay, either directly or indirectly, $3,000 to $6,000 per day in demurrage charges for a ship waiting outside the port of Vancouver. The Wheat Board, I know, ultimately pays the demurrage charges but in the last analysis the farmers may lose their final grain payments. Some people in the grain trade believe that in a crisis situation such as we are experiencing we could use the Burlington Northern railroad which could transport grain through southern Montana out to the coast at Vancouver without encountering all the trouble the CN and CP meet running through the mountains to Vancouver. This is something that should be examined.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is a serious problem but it is only a small part of our transportation difficulties. Other hon. members have mentioned the discrepancies in freight assistance and have pointed out how regional disparities are encouraged by railway policies. In the present circumstance a concerted effort is necessary on the part of the government, the railways, the train companies, the people at the terminal positions and the farmers to reach a satisfactory solution. If we are to talk in terms of a billion bushels of grain per year, these problems have to be tackled and solved.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I heartily support the idea of giving this bill a six months' hoist. As the member representing the constituency of Saskatoon-Biggar I am not prepared to see this bill pass until the government gives some adequate answers on transportation. Such answers have not been given yet. We have not had a clear indication that the government is prepared to come to grips with the transportation problems facing western Canada. Apparently the government is prepared to let western Canada be held to ransom by the railroads and the grain companies.

Our present situation is not altogether due to snowslides and difficult conditions in the mountains. The circumstances that exist were known as far back as when a Conservative government was in power prior to the Pearson government being elected. At that time meetings were held on the west coast to try to assess the problems facing the transportation of grain from western Canada. Since that time, and in addition to the movement of grain, we have been faced with the problem and the logistics involved in the movement of potash from Saskatchewan which has put another major volume of freight on our railroads.

We have also faced rapid growth in the movement of sulphur out of the province of Alberta. In other words, there has been a major increase in the volume of transportation and the need for transportation facilities in that period of time, but no comprehensive move on the part of the Department of Transport and those responsible on the other side of this House to meet that need.

When speaking to a certain individual the other day I mentioned that the only thing that has been done to my knowledge is that the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has built a five million bushel terminal at a cost of $25 million in Vancouver. I asked if he knew of anything else that had been done in the way of accommodation for the increased movement of grain.

A number of solutions have been advanced, Mr. Speaker. Some people suggest an increase in the movement along the line to Prince Rupert, some say increase the amount of storage in the port of Vancouver, others suggest an increase in or building of storage at Roberts Bank, while still others propose the creation of additional trackage down to the coast. I submit that we need to do all those things. What I am saying to this House, Mr. Speaker, is that we need a massive investment in rail transportation and grain storage if we are to cope with the situation facing us. We have to reverse the thinking that has prevailed in this country with regard to rail transportation since the MacPherson report. That was an abandonment report which suggested abandoning branch lines and cutting down on service. We are now reaping the result of that attitude and must move forward to a progressive, expansionist approach.

In my constituency the branch lines are in such shape that some of the railroad men responsible for running the locomotives will book off and forfeit their earnings rather than put a locomotive over the branch lines running out of Biggar on the subdivision. You can believe that or not, but I have the evidence in letters from the brotherhood in the town of Biggar and I have sent them to the rail transport committee. On behalf of the workers I asked the committee to investigate the complaints and the condition of the trackage on the subdivision. A man was sent out there, or I suppose he was because he wrote a report. He said there was a limit on the speed at which they should drive locomotives on these tracks, 15 miles an hour. However, he did not go near the workers who made the complaint. I wrote the chairman of the committee and suggested that he again meet these people. I understand he was sent back and did meet the workers, but I have not seen the second report.

Mr. Benjamin: You never will.

Mr. Gleave: This is the stage we have arrived at with the railroads, and I can quote letters, dates, and so on, to illustrate this. In one case when they drove a snow-plow down the track and the snow pushed the locomotive off, the track was not solid enough to hold the thrust of the locomotive in this subdivision. How can you guarantee to bring grain off a branch line and put it on a main line to go to Vancouver when you do not know if the branch line will let you put a train over to go and get it? This is the sort of problem we are facing.

While we are looking at this mess in transportation we have money enough to build a multimillion dollar airport in Quebec and money enough to build another one outside Toronto. We have money enough to spend on research on short take-off and landing aircraft.

Mr. Benjamin: They don't haul wheat.

Mr. Gleave: I do not know exactly what they are going to do for us, but I hope they have a better pipedream than the hydrofoil and some other things that have been done. The government can think of all these things but they cannot think of the practical things that will enable the farmers in the western half of this nation to move their products to the markets of the world in order to sell them.

This is the nature of the crisis facing us, Mr. Speaker, and I do not know if it is even any use to talk of bringing it to the attention of those responsible. Something new is required. The Canadian Transport Commission should take some action instead of sitting on its butt making rules. It would be a new departure for them to go out and do something. Action is foreign to them and I do not know whether they could bring themselves to it. However, we can always hope for the best.

Sometimes I think that the grain farmer is the only risk-taker left in the whole system. There are other parts of the system such as the railroads, the grain companies and the stevedoring companies who are the scalpers, the play it safe boys. I wonder when some of them are going to take a risk for their money. The day they do, Mr. Speaker, they will make some money.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

POLLUTION—RECONSIDERATION OF LEVIES ON OIL TANKER SHIPMENTS TO PROVIDE CONTINGENCY FUND IN CASE OF SPILLS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, it is not very often that I take part in the "late show" so I should like to pay tribute to those members who do not go to bed but stay up and bring these important matters before the House. I have probably listened to more late shows than I will ever participate in, but I do pay tribute to those members who do such a good job. I also pay tribute to certain, and few, members of the government who help. The hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), the former postmaster general, who was here a moment ago, was very diligent, and I know the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), who is here tonight, tries to fit it into his busy schedule.

The matter I wish to mention is in connection with oil levies for pollution in the Maritimes, and is prompted by a question asked on March 3. In answer to that question the minister said there was a willingness on the part of the government to meet various persons and government officials on this controversial matter. I refer also to another question asked on February 18 at the beginning of the session. At that time the minister intimated that the fund for pollution, correctly called the maritimes pollution claims fund, would probably reach a level of $25 million or $30 million.

Hon. members will recall that in the previous session we brought in Bill C-2 which, among other things, provided for levies on oil shipped in and out of Canada on ships of over 1,000 tons. The limit on levies was to be 15 cents a ton. The regulations were brought in on February 15 and went right to the limit: fifteen cents a ton was imposed. During the debate on that legislation we agreed that we would react to the sort of problems we had encountered with the Arrow and other ships and that something should be done about pollution.

I am not quarrelling with the contention that there is tremendous interest in pollution and that we need to do something about it. I do not deny that. I am merely saying that since then we have been looking at the whole problem from a new perspective. We now have Gulf Oil located in Nova Scotia and everyone knows that tremendous developments are taking place. Funds of which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) spoke so proudly have been provided by the federal government. Only this afternoon he took credit for the DREE work and this type of activity.

The president of Gulf Oil (Canada) Limited, Jerry McAfee, said last week, if I may paraphrase, that a 15 cents per ton levy is twice as high as is required. He failed to see why the government was insisting on such a high ceiling. What interests me particularly, of course, is that in New Brunswick there is a Continental Oil development outside Saint John involving $60 million that has been promised. The people there are very alarmed about the size of the levy, the amount of the fund and the number of years for which they will be required to pay.

I know the matter is under negotiation. Premier Hatfield, for example, has engaged in correspondence and there have been replies. I wish to bring this matter to the attention of the minister and ask certain questions, not so much in the hope of a full reply this evening but in order to bring forward the seriousness of this matter affecting the joint development that New Brunswick is involved in at the moment.

My first question is this: Is the minister aware that this levy and the extent of it may kill the entire Conoco project for the Saint John area? Another question is: Is the minister aware that because of the way this matter is now developing—perhaps this was not foreseen when the legislation was passed—we are being unfair to legitimate producers and refiners and that the result may be a boom for tramp steamers like the Arrow which pass through that area?

My next question is: Is the minister aware that in this case the province of New Brunswick received no federal incentives grant? The province was legitimately and honestly on its own in this project. Another question is: How can we possibly be expected to compete with Portland, Maine, which imposes a levy of only one half cent, especially when we consider that through that port many products such as oil enter the Montreal market?

Those are the questions I wish to ask. The minister may reply that he personally is giving serious consideration to this matter at the moment. I hope that this will not be another routine type of bureaucratic matter that has come sliding over his desk. I hope he has not gone along with civil servants who may suggest that some people are overreacting to pollution without considering some of the development that we need in my province—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bell: I hope, Mr. Speaker, to receive some kind of answer from the minister that will give us hope for this development.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked four key questions. Obviously, I cannot answer them in detail in three minutes. I will, however, assure the hon. member and the House at the outset that I am personally considering the matter. I have had several conversations with Premier Hatfield and have indicated my willingness to meet with him and, indeed, with officials of the oil company concerned or any others, for that matter, at any time he designates.

As to whether this will kill the project, that of course is something on which I cannot pass judgment. However, I would like to say that from our point of view it is a question of the minimum amount we feel is necessary in order to ensure that clean-up operations can be carried out effectively. We have determined a ceiling which I have clearly stated as being $25 million. That is the minimum amount we feel is necessary. The reason for this is that the Torre Canyon cost something like $16 million to clean up. It was a substantially smaller matter. These are vessels carrying 300,000 tons of oil. The Arrow cost some $4 million. As I said to someone the other day, it was carrying a mere teaspoonful in relation to these huge vessels. We talked about the Irving Whale which cost in excess of $2 million. We are not talking about small change in terms of the Canadian taxpayer.

I do not want to put forward an unnecessary impediment to the development of industry, particularly in the Atlantic provinces. I have said that the ceiling would be $25 million. We put it at 15 cents a ton in the first instance because we deemed it advisable to get a fair amount in the fund initially. If we had put it at a lower rate it would have gone on for a very much longer period of time. My suspicion is that the shipping and oil companies would not have been much more satisfied had the amount been lower.

I said that if the fund builds up very rapidly, more rapidly than we anticipate—I emphasize that this is a preventive measure—we do not want to spend out of the fund and we will review it over a period, let us say annually. If we are getting an amount in there and we have not had any spills, we will consider reducing the levy. I have given that undertaking. Furthermore, since it will be more than the undertaking of the minister I have said we will try to incorporate such undertakings in the regulations.

As for it being unfair to legitimate operators, I think that the world or virtually all of it has now come to the conclusion that it is not a matter of legitimacy or otherwise: it is simply a question of these being huge hazards even for the best operators. We need to have some way to look after them. I was not asked for federal incentives. As for the state of Maine, they of course cannot carry vessels of this size.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MONTREAL—DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have already directed a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) with regard to the delay in the unemployment insurance benefit cheques since the introduction of the new unemployment insurance plan which, as everyone knows, has replaced the former act.

Let us explain the problem briefly: Let us say that a worker became unemployed on October 16. By February 1 or 15, he has not yet received any unemployment insurance cheque. Yet, he has repeatedly contacted his regional office—and, in Lotbinière, it is Sherbrooke, Trois-Rivières or Quebec City—and each time the devoted official could only answer: Sir, an order for your cheque has been given to the Montreal office.

Now, the Montreal office, as we know, is the central office for issuing cheques throughout the province and those cheques do not reach those who are entitled to them.

To show the tragedy in this situation, I shall point out that some of these men have seven or eight children. Being without work, they have no income.

On January 26, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), sent a letter, I believe, to all hon. members, promising that in all cases of simple delay a payment would be made within 48 hours and that a review would take place within 72 hours. This was not done, in spite of the minister's utterances and his good will. A little later, I handed to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a petition with 400 signatures, attesting to this. Those are the facts.

Mr. Speaker, the situation is tragic. I understand that the government took concrete remedial steps. Nevertheless, once the minister has given instructions to civil servants and the cheques have been issued, thus solving the individual's problem for two or three weeks, the same problem arises again. The individual, after a waiting period of a month and a half, received two or three cheques. But he now not only does not receive a cheque, he does not even receive forms to be filled in, although he has made enough contributions.

I stand ready tomorrow to submit to the parliamentary secretary a list of over 300 names of citizens of my constituency and the neighbouring constituencies of the Eastern Townships who are faced with this situation.

Mr. Speaker, I personally called several times on the Sherbrooke, Trois-Rivières and Montreal regional offices. I do not blame the officials, they are doing their best. Moreover, in the Sherbrooke office they hired 25 extra employees to face the demand, proof that there was a problem which has not been solved since the officials tell us they are too few to cope with the load and that they are forced to work in unsanitary conditions.

Mr. Speaker, this problem of unemployment is of national urgency and is far from being solved since the number of unemployed is increasing, the winter season is a particularly difficult one for those who are without work and without income.

Since I was not satisfied with the reply given the other day by the parliamentary secretary, I wanted to raise this matter again in the hope that the government will study the way in which cheques are issued at the Montreal office and will consider the advisability of decentralizing the system, since the whole Quebec population is obviously too much for computers to cope with.

I also hope that the government will study the operation of unemployment insurance district offices with a view to making them more efficient, and will help officers by giving them the necessary tools.

Mr. Speaker, let us review, once and for all, all those cases of delays, and let us stop saying, as the minister wrote in his letter—and instead of tackling the real problem of the issuing of cheques: If you do not receive your cheque, go to the welfare bureau and borrow money, and when you receive your cheque, you can pay the welfare bureau back.

Mr. Speaker, considering the interest you take in the fate of Canadian people, surely you will agree that the direct effect of this is to reduce to the most abject poverty those workers who become unemployed overnight and are then doomed to live on welfare.

Mr. Speaker, I do hope that the government has been sensitized to this problem. The prime minister came to Victoriaville recently, and people asked him that question. They gave him a rather cold welcome, as they should, precisely because this problem is so real.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely ask the minister to remedy this situation, to stop hiding and to really come to grips with the problem. I think that the Canadian people will be really grateful to him for doing so, since this is at present the most serious problem faced by Canada.

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has suggested that computer operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in Montreal have not been functioning properly and that this has caused delays in the processing of unemployment insurance claims. For the information of the hon. member I should like to say there have been no cases of delay in the Montreal office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission caused by computer breakdown.

Together with the hon. member and my minister, I want to see as speedy as possible processing of unemployment insurance claims. Nevertheless, I would point out to him that after his allegations of March 9, in which he stated there were 450 cases of unresolved unemployment insurance problems, it was determined upon investigation that he was apparently talking about all the cases he had looked into during the past six months, not only for Sherbrooke but also for Quebec and Trois-Rivières.

I have been advised by the Unemployment Insurance Commission that between January 24 and today the hon. member has submitted to the Sherbrooke office a grand total of 132 cases, not 450. Based on commission experience across Canada in January and February, no more than one-third would have been designated problem cases.

In any event, as of March 10, 1972, the Sherbrooke office was in the process of answering only 19 cases which had been submitted by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). Of this number, the commission has reported that at least half were cases which had already been submitted where people were not satisfied with a previous decision of the commission. In view of the foregoing facts it would seem that there have not been inordinate delays occasioned by alleged computer breakdown or by any other factor.

If in fact the hon. member has any specific cases of delays in the processing of unemployment insurance claims that he would like to bring to my attention, or if he can be more specific as to the nature and time of these so-called computer breakdowns, I will gladly have the charges investigated at the earliest possible opportunity. As the hon. member knows, my minister is determined to provide the speediest possible service for those with a legitimate entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits.

GRAIN—ALLOCATION OF BOXCARS TO INCREASE STOCKS AT VANCOUVER

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on March 9 I asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether, in view of the low level of wheat stocks at the west coast terminals, he could assure us that the volume of grain to be moved and the allocation of boxcars by the two railroads would be such as to correct the situation. I had the assurance of the minister that it was not shortage of cars or shortage of motive power that was the limiting factor at the moment but, rather, the unusual and severe snowslide conditions in the Rocky Mountains which had prevented these rail facilities from carrying adequate amounts of grain to Vancouver.

My concern is really about the answer the minister gave. I think we are faced with a basic shortage of facilities for moving and handling grain destined for the west coast from the prairie region, a situation that I do not think is a temporary one. I realize, as I am sure the minister does, that we have had much worse weather conditions than normal, such as snowslides and so on but I think we have to be prepared to cope with that sort of thing. If you are operating a farm you come to know that you should not schedule a certain level of operation and expect it to continue uninterrupted; that just does not happen. What you have to do instead is to build in a certain amount of power, equipment or labour reserve to handle what we call "down time", a term that is also used by the construction industry. We know we will hit this condition to a certain extent.

I would be more encouraged were the minister able to assure the House that the government had in hand programs to move the volume of traffic that will have to be handled if we are to stay in business. If we are to move the volume of grain that the minister has forecast we are going to sell in the coming year, these programs must be formulated now. I am satisfied we could have sold more grain than the minister has forecast had the Wheat Board been given assurances that it could move sufficient grain to fulfil any contract the board was willing to undertake.

The minister has admitted, as has the Wheat Board, that contracts have been turned down because they could not afford to be in the position of being unable to deliver on contracts which had been made. They now, I am sure, must be very close to this position on some contracts which have been made. The information I have is that last week there were 400 cars a day unloaded, when they should have been unloading 800 cars. This is a chronic condition. If the minister can give the House some assurance that this situation will be corrected or that there are long-term plans, I believe the House would be very glad to hear this. I know I would be glad to hear it.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has observed the tremendous movement of grain in the country and out of the prairie region. Indeed, this year with the unprecedented sales level, even though we had a very good crop last year, we will probably be disposing of more grain than is grown in the prairie region. In the case of the port of Vancouver, for instance, notwithstanding all our difficulties and notwithstanding the fact that last year we had a record year in respect of exports from the west coast, as of March 1 our exports were running 25 per cent ahead of the figure for the previous year.

It is true that we have had snow difficulties in the Rockies, and I did tell the hon. member that during this period of time it is, in my view, not a shortage of cars or locomotives that is causing our problems but weather conditions. The railways have enough equipment to reach the 800-car target if weather conditions would permit. We are selling at record levels. We will continue to do so. We will continue to set ourselves new and difficult challenges in the selling of grain and in putting stresses and strains on the available equipment. I do not say we have enough equipment at the present time to meet next year's challenge, and we are looking very closely at the additional equipment needed for that purpose. We have been studying the grain handling system, so that we know a good deal about which way to go in making improvements.

With things like the block system and the co-ordinators working at both terminals, as well as the car pooling which goes on, we are getting much more out of the system than otherwise would be the case. As to the question of whether we have to go to a six or seven-day week in the elevators and in the terminals, we could get more out of the system in this way but I think we will need more rail equipment for the movement I see ahead, because we will go after new sales in very significant quantities year after year and we must go on building the system to accomplish that end.

We will need the co-operation of all parts of the system, the farmers, the handling system and the railways, in order to achieve these sales records, but I am confident that we can do so. We will take the necessary steps. When the difficulties of snow and weather began in Vancouver we had in store at that port about the right amount of grain. It was not as though those terminals were empty; they were relatively full to their working capacity. I believe this is something we should remember.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REFUSAL OF PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION TO GRANT LEAVE TO ANN BOOTH—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I should like to move a motion concerning the case of Miss Ann Booth, which I raised in the House on Monday and which was raised again yesterday by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, to present herself for nomination as a candidate for a political party. Her application for leave of absence was turned down and she has now been suspended and proceedings are being taken to terminate her employment in the public service.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster):

That the subject matter of the refusal of the Public Service Commission to grant leave to Miss Ann Booth, a lawyer with the CRTC, to seek a political nomination be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This motion is made to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is always surprised when there appears to be unanimity. Sometimes I fail to believe my ears so I shall inquire again whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be unanimous consent and the motion will therefore be put. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, seconded by the hon. member for Algoma, moves:

That the subject matter of the refusal of the Public Service Commission to grant leave to Miss Ann Booth, a lawyer with the CRTC, to seek a political nomination be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Reid) agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HALES—UNAUTHORIZED OPENING OF LETTER

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have in my hand a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa. It was delivered to me yesterday, opened, by the Postmaster of the West Block post office. He did not know who had posted it or any other circumstances other than that the letter had been opened. He brought it to my office. On the front of it was written "105S West Block".

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: I am rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member who has the floor. There appears to be no interpretation. I gather that is why the hon. member for Abitibi was rising to put his own question of privilege. Perhaps by the time the hon. member resumes his presentation the matter will have been cleared up.

[Translation]

If the hon. member wants to pursue his remarks, I believe the interpretation system is functioning again.

[English]

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I shall start over again. I did not know the wires were being cut off so soon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hales: I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa, Ontario. It was delivered to me yesterday by the Postmaster of the West Block post office. The letter had been opened. There is a piece of cellophane across the top. There was no explanation whatsoever as to why it was opened. On the front of it somebody had written, "105S West Block". There is no such room in the West Block, although there is a Room 105S in the East Block.

Mr. Baldwin: That is the Gestapo.

Unauthorized Opening of Mail

Mr. Hales: I should like to submit this letter to the Standing Committee on Elections and Privileges and let them find out where it went and who opened it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can do this by communicating directly with the committee. The hon. member knows that he cannot raise a question of privilege at this time since the Chair has not received notice as required by the Standing Order. The hon. member in his statement referred to the fact that a committee is investigating such matters. I would hope there would not be debate from day to day on matters which are being considered by the committee. Certainly, the hon. member will recognize that he has not given the notice required under the Standing Orders. Since, by his own admission, this only happened yesterday, the matter cannot be raised at this time.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, could I revert to motions to move a motion under Standing Order 43?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When the hon. member requested the floor a moment ago I was under the impression that he was seeking the floor to put a motion under Standing Order 43. If he wants to move a motion it will be proposed, but I have some qualms whether we should by a motion moved under Standing Order 43, bring forward for debate in the House a matter which, by unanimous order of the House, is now under consideration by the committee.

All this having been said, the hon. member might indicate what the motion will be. Of course, if the hon. member wants to propose a motion the Chair will consider it.

Mr. Hales: I would therefore like to move, Mr. Speaker:

That the letter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for their investigation.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will supply the Chair with a copy of the motion, as required by Standing Order, it will be put to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43.

I was going to suggest that we could go to another item of business. However, the motion is being presented now. Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Wellington. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jerome: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jerome: I said no.

Mr. Fairweather: Why did the hon. member say no? Is he following a double standard?

Mr. Jerome: I said no.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the motion I am about to present under Standing Order 43 and in view of the general agreement, I believe, on all sides—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that any member would object to hearing the motion.

An hon. Member: That is not strange.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the precedential decision by the Alberta legislature to permit radio, television and photographic coverage of its proceedings and, recalling the lengthy discussion and investigation of our own committee on procedure and the general agreement of all members and, because of a basic public right to see, hear and know, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan):

That this House undertake to provide access to all its proceedings for the purpose of broadcasting commencing April 10, 1972.

I would hope this motion would find favour with all members of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Egmont. The motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Minister does not recall making the exact statement as it appears in the first part of the question but he has stated that many people are frequently unaware of the services available from the various government departments and agencies. With regard to the second part of the question he does consider manpower counsellors capable of assisting the unemployed through the various manpower programs and services provided through Canada Manpower Centres, including occupational and labour market counselling, referral to employment, occupational training and allowances, referral for vocational rehabilitation and geographical mobility assistance.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN—PAYMENT OF SALARIES TO PERSONNEL

Question No. 177—Mr. Caouette:

1. Does the federal government pay half of the salaries of provincial public servants who administer the social assistance Acts on the same basis that it pays half of the benefits to welfare recipients?

2. Are there any mechanisms for assuring that salary policies are being respected and that the money is not being used for other purposes and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. No. The salaries in question are considered as welfare services and the federal government currently shares, under the Canada Assistance Plan, to the extent of 50 per cent of the portion of such costs in excess of base year costs as established for the fiscal year 1964-65. Benefits to welfare recipients are not subject to base year deductions.

2. Yes. Persons whose salaries are cost-shared must be employees of provincial or municipal welfare departments, or of agencies which are nominated by the provincial authorities and approved for cost-sharing by the federal government. Claims for shareable costs are audited by provincial auditors, examined by field representatives of the Canada Assistance Plan and by federal auditors to ensure that they comply with the terms and conditions of the Act and the agreements made under the Act.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORTHCOMING VISIT BY PRESIDENT NIXON TO CANADA—INQUIRY AS TO PRIOR RESUMPTION OF TRADE TALKS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Now that the dates have been fixed for the visit to Canada by President Nixon, I should like to ask whether dates have also been fixed for the resumption of meetings between ministers and officials of our two countries with regard to trade? Have dates been set for such meetings to take place prior to President Nixon's visit to Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I do not think those dates have yet been fixed. There have been some conversations involving my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in which United States representatives were discussing the resumption of these talks, but I do not think a date has yet been fixed.

FORTHCOMING VISIT BY PRESIDENT NIXON TO CANADA—INQUIRY AS TO PRIOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Will the government announce its policy with regard to foreign investment in Canada prior to President Nixon's visit to our country? I ask this question in view of the breakthrough with regard to understanding that the Prime Minister announced he had achieved during his last visit to Washington.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I do not think the visit of the President is relevant to this question one way or another. As the hon. gentleman knows, we have been working on the application of principles upon which we have already agreed. This, and the preparation of the background material, is the only reason why an announcement has not been made. It has nothing to do with the attitude of the United States government, which has not expressed a view on this subject.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POSSIBILITY OF PRESIDENT NIXON APPEARING BEFORE PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE DURING VISIT TO OTTAWA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Acting Prime Minister inform us whether approaches will be made to President Nixon with a view to arranging that he appear before an appropriate committee of parliament during his visit, as was arranged during the visit of Premier Kosygin, or so that a senior cabinet member accompanying him can appear before the committee in order that there can be a mutual exchange of views?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I would hope, as I am sure the hon. gentleman does, that the President would be very warmly welcomed in Canada. I would hope that perhaps the President himself would have an opportunity of appearing.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): During the visit of the President is it the intention of the Prime Minister to announce one of those fantastic breakthroughs, when he will be able to tell the country that President Nixon has assured him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSALS BY RAILWAYS TO LEASE ADDITIONAL LOCOMOTIVES AND FREIGHT CARS TO EXPEDITE MOVEMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether the C.P.R. has made specific proposals to the Canadian Wheat Board offering to lease additional locomotives and freight cars and to put them exclusively into grain service for the last three months of the current crop year on the condition that the Canadian government would be prepared to pay the leasing costs? If so, can the minister inform the House of the reply made to this offer by the Wheat Board or by himself as the responsible minister?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the question of available equipment and steps required to add additional equipment to meet our ever-increasing record volume of sales—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: —is under discussion between the Wheat Board and the railroads. The government is following the discussions keenly. It would be premature at this point to comment on where they stand, but I may have something further to say to the House in due course.

Mr. Gleave: Can the minister tell the House whether the C.N.R. has made a similar offer or whether it has been asked to make a similar offer so that the Wheat Board might be better able to meet its commitments and enter into new contracts?

Mr. Lang: The Wheat Board is holding discussions with both railroads.

PROVISION OF SUFFICIENT CLEAN GRAIN AT THUNDER BAY TO MEET COMMITMENTS WHEN SEAWAY OPENS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary or related to the one which has just been asked. Having regard to the forecast that the St. Lawrence Seaway will open early this year, and the current widespread concern in the grain trade that there is not nearly sufficient clean grain in storage at Thunder Bay to meet our spring overseas commitments, will the minister check into this serious situation immediately with his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to ensure, if possible, that the railroads take steps at once to rectify this problem?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board is fully aware of the possibility of an early opening of the navigation season on the seaway and welcomes this very much. The Wheat Board is accordingly trying to arrange for the appropriate movement of grain to meet its needs. I understand they are satisfied with the program that is in place and that they are in close contact with the railroads to ensure that grain is moved as required.

POSSIBLE OPERATION OF VANCOUVER TERMINALS ON SIX OR SEVEN-DAY BASIS—PAYMENT OF OVERTIME BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board what the status is of discussions or plans concerning operating the terminals at Vancouver on a six or seven-day basis rather than on a five or five and a half day basis? If operations are to be on a six or seven-day basis, is the government giving consideration to assuming the cost of overtime pay?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that in earlier discussions the terminals indicated to the Canadian Wheat Board a willingness to move to longer periods of operation whenever that would clearly allow the unloading of more cars of grain. There has been no question of additional payment above the regular rates paid for handling of grain.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will notice that there are quite a few members seeking to ask supplementaries. We will have two or three and then go to the next subject. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

SOURCE OF ADDITIONAL FREIGHT CARS TO EXPEDITE MOVEMENT

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask either the minister in charge of the Wheat Board or the Minister of Transport where these extra cars will come from, from the United States or elsewhere, since apparently we were not able to fulfil the need at Vancouver during the last several months?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be premature to comment on the exact source of the cars. There are some cars available and steps are being taken to ensure that they are put into place.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister responsible for the Wheat Board whether the department accepts the position that unless something is done—by that I mean putting grain elevators and terminals on a seven-day week—the government will have to finance a costly expansion program of locomotives and car fleets to meet this year's requirements?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that is really another way of asking basically the same question in regard to what we may do. What we are doing is to try to ensure that all parties involved in the grain movement face the challenge presented by the record volumes that will have to be moved, and that each in his own turn plays his part to make that possible. I cannot at this time be specific about the exact things that will be required to accomplish this, but I can say that almost every sector of the industry will have to put additional effort into this movement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize a last supplementary on this subject for the moment from the hon. member for Regina East, and then the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SHORT AND LONG-TERM PLANS FOR TRANSPORTATION AND HANDLING

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to undertake to make a statement on motions in the near future outlining plans which are being made to handle the anticipated grain movement during the next several months; and could he also indicate when we might have further word on long-term plans concerning grain transportation and handling, and particularly on the report which I understand is being prepared by a group under his direction?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as decisions are taken about additional steps to carry the large movement of grain they will be announced either in the House or by the particular portion of the industry concerned, or by the minister, as may be appropriate.

HOGS—COMPENSATION TO PRODUCERS OF WEANLINGS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

In a press release dated February 3, 1972, the minister announced the policy on compensation to weanling producers who took losses in 1971. Since that date, has the minister received from producers of weanlings, known in French as "naisseurs" requests for compensation to make up their losses over that same period?

Inquiries of the Ministry

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is yes. I have received representations in many forms, directly and through dozens of letters. But the situation is that we would not like to pay the $5 deficiency on the same hog more than once. Therefore we are going to pay when it comes to market, and not each time it is traded along the way.

[Translation]

DISTINCTION BETWEEN HOG AND WEANLING PRODUCERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister.

I understand perfectly this point of view, but I would ask the minister whether he is prepared to recognize that one must distinguish between the ordinary pig breeders and those who breed piglets?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): It is very easy to recognize that there are people who are engaged in the business of producing feeder hogs, sometimes called piglets or weaners, for people who fatten them to market weight. We certainly recognize that they had low prices during 1971 as well as in other years, but the administrative problem of attempting to work out one deficiency payment for one hog and not pay it each time it is traded is very real.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I should like to put a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We must try to move along or we will be running short of time. Perhaps we might return to the subject later. For the moment the Chair will recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

AIRPORTS

RESPONSE TO OBJECTIONS TO SITE FOR NEW FACILITY IN PICKERING TOWNSHIP—REQUEST FOR LIST OF LOCATIONS CONSIDERED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct this question to the Minister of Transport. My interest goes back to my boyhood days when I lived in the Pickering township area. Because of the tremendous unrest and ill feeling that have resulted from the choice of the area in Pickering township for the new airport, and having regard to the fact that it means the destruction of one of the finest agricultural areas in the province of Ontario as well as the removal of many historic buildings that go back 150 years, is consideration being given to paying any attention to the strong objections that are being raised not only privately but publicly at meetings against this decision?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer the number of issues raised by the right hon. member as quickly as I can. The short answer is yes. There are hearing procedures and people can file objections, so that there will be an opportunity for a full venting of this particular issue.

On the matter of historic sites, we have made arrangements and I have given instructions that every effort be made, and I think it can be made, to preserve all of these. In many cases, people whose land is expropriated will not necessarily have to move from that land, and we are prepared to put it on a lease-back basis to them until such time as it is needed. All of these facts will emerge over the next few weeks. Since the right hon. member lived in that area we might even find that spot and make it a historic site as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It so happens that the school in question at which my father taught is just outside the area. I would ask the minister whether, even though provision is made for objections to be raised, any attention will be paid to the objections or will it merely be a formality? Second, because of the many other available sites that would not entail the destruction of valuable farmland, would the minister table the list of the 50 or so areas to which consideration was given before the final decision was made, and will he let the House know what were the last three areas from which the choice of Pickering township was finally made?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do not know about the 52 sites. I think that would be a very big job for assessment, even for the right hon. member. But what I have said is that we will make available all of the relevant data—and I use that in the broadest sense of the word—so that people will know the basis on which the decision was made. I should also point out, of course, that it was made in conjunction with the government of Ontario which also has plans for that area and is in fact covering a larger portion of property than ourselves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the fact that the two governments joined does not make it any better or any worse, and I do not excuse it on that basis.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORT BY DR. USHER—REQUEST THAT MINISTER APOLOGIZE FOR COMMENTS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development based on a personal attack made by him on one of his employees, Dr. Usher, in connection with the Banks Island report that was produced. Is the minister prepared to accede to the request of the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada and apologize publicly to Dr. Usher and concede that the remarks were inappropriate?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my reputation is fairly well established and I have only said what I really thought. That document was published at the request of Dr. Usher who was attacking the government. Obviously, he could expect me to reply, because I do not usually let myself be attacked without defending myself.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Will the minister at least concede that his description of Dr. Usher's conclusions as being stupid was wrong and that it was indeed not a shabby piece of research as the minister alleged?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I read this report and, on being asked what I thought of it, I answered with my well-known frankness.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members who were in the House yesterday will remember that the Chair undertook to try to give an opportunity to ask questions to members in the fourth and fifth rows who were left by the wayside during the question period yesterday. I would hope I would get the co-operation of hon. members in that respect. I always find it a little difficult not to give some priority to the frontbenchers and to the second row frontbenchers. This is why I am seeking their co-operation in giving the Chair an opportunity to see members in the third, fourth and fifth rows.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR GENERAL REVIEW OF RAILWAY MAINTENANCE PROCEDURES IN LIGHT OF ACCIDENTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent numerous and serious accidents on this country's railways, which have not been confined to any particular locale, would the minister consider having a general review undertaken of the maintenance procedures of this country's major railways?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I thank hon. members for their applause.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: Joey Smallwood has left.

Mr. Jamieson: Such a review has already been undertaken and, as I recall, there are three separate reviews. The most comprehensive one by the Canadian Transport Commission is, I understand, just about ready for tabling, and I have asked that it be speeded up as much as possible.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): In light of the indication from the minister that this very serious matter is being considered, would he refer to the group making this inquiry the recommendations I have brought before the House with respect to an independent transportation safety inquiry commission?

Mr. Jamieson: I do not think it would be appropriate to refer it to the Canadian Transport Commission, but if the hon. member will give me more details and tell me how such a plan might be effective I will be glad to consult with all the relevant authorities. Indeed, if it makes more sense than the present arrangement I have indicated I will be prepared to implement it.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the increasing number of derailments and fatalities that have occurred in the past two or three weeks in rail operations, would the minister not agree to institute a public inquiry into these mishaps rather than the type of inquiries we have seen in the past?

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether a question asked in those terms is in order.

ABANDONMENT BY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS OF PASSENGER SERVICE TO GRAND CENTRE, ALBERTA

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Transport. Does he intend to take any action to prohibit Canadian National Railways from ending its passenger service to Grand Centre, Alberta?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Selkirk.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—ACTION TO PREVENT LOAN-SHARK OPERATIONS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the government yet taken any steps to end the practice of lending money at usurious interest rates against the future receipt of unemployment insurance cheques?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, the minister is very concerned about the practice of discounting unemployment insurance benefit warrants. I want to assure the hon. member that consideration is being given to a number of measures designed to halt the practice. I can inform the House that as of now a process is beginning and new regulations are being instituted under the unemployment insurance plan to prevent the use of an address which is not that of a claimant for mailing purposes without the permission of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I must say our survey shows that there is little evidence that the practice of discounting benefit warrants is related directly to delays in payment of UIC benefits.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the parliamentary secretary if the government is contemplating legislation. I can see how this particular regulation will have some beneficial effect, but is the government contemplating legislation to stop this discounting practice permanently with regard to unemployment insurance cheques, pension cheques, T4 slips, income tax rebates and so forth?

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

ALLEGED DIFFICULTY IN CASHING OF CHEQUES AT BANKS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary to the parliamentary secretary. In light of the fact that there seems to be some problem in respect of recipients cashing unemployment insurance cheques in that banks are balking at cashing these cheques, would the parliamentary secretary take it upon himself to discuss this matter with the leaders of the banking industry so that some solution can be found?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would express the hope that the lending institutions of Canada would accept their social responsibility and provide whatever assistance they can in this direction.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR COMPLETION OF PROJECTS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Will the municipalities where local initiative projects have been approved after the deadline be authorized to carry on their work after May 31, 1972?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for sending me notice of his intention to ask this question. I do not think there is any consideration being given at present to the proposed extension. There may be some confusion since there was a recent announcement that under another program begun in the previous year, the loans program, there is an extension from March 31 to May 31. That applied to municipal projects but not to LIP projects.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

ACTION TO PROVIDE RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE LUMBER AND AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on an urgent matter for the Minister of Transport concerning the shortage of box and flat deck rail cars in the area served by the CNR from Prince George and in the Kamloops-Cariboo territory. Would the minister advise what immediate steps are being taken to provide for the transportation of lumber in these areas so that shift work will not be reduced, thereby causing temporary lay-offs of up to 50 per cent?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all I can say other than that I will take the question as notice is that I know there have been additional problems this year because of the extremely severe weather conditions, but I will get more details and provide them to the hon. member as soon as possible.

MANPOWER

STUDY OF SITUATION IN WEST GERMANY BY FORMER LIBERAL PARTY OFFICIAL—DATE REPORT EXPECTED—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Last week the House was told that J. P. Lefebvre had been hired for a 15-week period at a total salary of $9,000 plus expenses and secretarial costs to study manpower policies and institutions in West Germany. Can the minister now say when Mr. Lefebvre's report is expected under the terms of his contract with the department and whether it will be made public?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that a question of this kind normally should be placed on the order paper, but if the minister wishes to reply briefly he will be allowed to do so.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we expect the report to be made available to the department within the terms of the contract. I will report later on whether it will be made public. It is an internal document, as I understand it, for the department.

Mr. Paproski: In light of the fact that sources in the minister's own department have said that the same information Mr. Lefebvre is seeking is already available through ongoing surveys by the OECD, will the minister tell the House now, or by way of a statement on motions, what additional information he expects to receive from this very costly contract to a former Liberal party member?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cardigan.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION OFFICE IN CHARLOTTETOWN

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the government any immediate plans to move the Unemployment Insurance Commission office back from Moncton to Charlottetown so that claims in Prince Edward Island can be dealt with more efficiently and promptly?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ACTION BY MINISTER TO RESOLVE DISPUTE WITH NABET—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. On Friday last the minister said that the situation in respect of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and NABET was fluid and that he hoped it would stabilize around the bargaining table. From recent newspaper reports it would appear that there is now a solid state of stagnation in the bargaining procedure. Can the minister, as the minister responsible, tell us what initiatives he intends to take to clear up and resolve this unfortunate labour dispute?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been misinformed. Conciliation is continuing. The conciliators have asked for five more days to meet the parties separately, after which they would hope to meet them together.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Is the minister saying then that the two sides are presently negotiating? He has been asked since last Friday to make a statement on motions on this important labour dispute involving the most costly Crown corporation to Canadian taxpayers, which may set an example for the public service and all types of labour—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: I was coming to the question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should ask the question. He will appreciate he was perhaps going beyond the limits of an ordinary question. Would the hon. member kindly ask his question.

Mr. Nowlan: I may be going a little beyond the ordinary, confined, restrictive rules of the House, but when we see a public corporation involving taxpayers' money and the government sitting on its fat seat—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly ask the question. We do have to try to make headway.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Nowlan: Shame on the government for sitting on its seat. My question is this: Will the minister please check with the various parties to ascertain whether more than 100 substantive items are still outstanding and make a report to the House and to the people of Canada tomorrow on what is holding up settlement of this dispute involving a Crown corporation that receives more money from the taxpayers than any other in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for a minister to give a daily account on motions of negotiations between a Crown agency and its employees. The answer to the hon. member, therefore, is no, unless new developments occur.

• (1450)

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State whether he would follow the suggestion made by the Quebec vice-president of the CBC to the president and urge the president to enter into the negotiations himself with some authority so that this dispute can be brought to an early conclusion?

FISHERIES

DECLINE IN CATCHES OF CERTAIN SPECIES—TALKS WITH RUSSIA AND OTHER COUNTRIES ON CONSERVATION OF CONTINENTAL SHELF RESOURCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the significant decline in the Canadian catch of haddock, redfish, codfish and herring brought about by the overfishing of these species by the Russian, German and Polish fleets on our continental shelf, has the minister held any talks recently with these countries, and specifically with his counterpart in the U.S.S.R., concerning the necessity of carrying out conservation measures with respect to the groundfish resources on our continental shelf?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs I have made statements of this kind, but my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, has had direct talks and of course is urging upon them the desirability of conservation measures that will be adequate to preserve these species.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct one supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the decline by approximately one-third in the catch of some of these species, would the minister table in the House the fruits of his discussions with the Russians on this important matter?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I believe a release was made yesterday of the results of our negotiations with the other 13 nations in the Commission for the North Atlantic fisheries. It dealt with herring. Herring stocks are being depleted. We have established quotas for the first time, international agreements on quotas in international waters, which will help, with amendments, in time.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask one further supplementary question. Have quotas—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member, but I have to point out to hon. members that we are again running short of time.

Mr. Crouse: Just one brief supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I realize that a statement on herring was tabled yesterday, but my question related to the main resource of codfish on the Grand Banks. Have any quotas been established between Canada and the countries I mentioned for codfish in particular?

Mr. Davis: Not yet, Mr. Speaker, but we are working on one species at a time. The principle has now been established. For the first time all 14 nations have agreed on over-all quotas and division of quotas in international waters.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STANBURY-FIELDS REPORT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I understand the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would like somebody to ask him a question. Will he take deliberate steps himself to table in the House the Stanbury-Fields report on taxation of Indians in British Columbia?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we cannot publish this report because we would need the consent of the government of British Columbia and the hon. member for Skeena probably has better relations with that government than myself.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTIONS TO ESTABLISH COMMITTEE AND CHANGE STANDING ORDERS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed either to the President of the Privy Council or to the Minister of Justice. Would either of the two ministers advise the House when it is the intention to bring forward the resolution to establish the committee on statutory instruments and also the resolution with regard to the change to be made in the Standing Orders of the House to give effect to the operations of that committee?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take that question as notice.

FINANCE

REASON FOR HIGHER BANK RATE IN CANADA THAN IN UNITED STATES—EFFECT ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Why is Canada's bank rate higher than that in the United States, and does this not encourage foreign investment in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question of this nature cannot be asked at this time.

POTATOES—RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS FOR ACTION TO RELIEVE DEPRESSED MARKET—POSSIBLE DIVERSION TO STOCK FEED

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. I am delighted to have the opportunity to ask him this question because for some days I have been trying to get answers from the President of the Privy Council and others with respect to the disposition of a number of carloads of potatoes that the Agricultural Stabilization Board has in Prince Edward Island. Did the minister's office receive a telegram this morning from the chairman of the Prince Edward Island Potato Co-ordination Committee expressing extreme dissatisfaction and surprise that the Agricultural Stabilization Board has not yet made a decision on using stocks of potatoes under the board's control for stock feed on Prince Edward Island? In light of the fact that very shortly these potatoes will be of little use even for feed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question. We are short of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether we are in receipt of that particular telegram, but I am well aware of the requests that have been made. There is another consideration that has to be taken into account, and that is the interests of those producers who have taken an advance payment. Now that the price in Prince Edward Island is well above the price at which these potatoes were purchased, those producers to whom an advance payment was made have some right to reacquire these potatoes and take advantage of the higher price by selling them on the market.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): As a supplementary—

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont seeks a supplementary and also the hon. member for Malpeque. There are four minutes remaining before the end of the question period. I also see the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants who I think should be recognized. He has been trying to get the floor for a few days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize profusely to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. The hon. member for Egmont seeks the floor on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I seek the floor because the Minister of Agriculture has deliberately misled the House.

Mr. Olson: Not at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot, according to the rules, charge another member, whether a minister or private member, with deliberately misleading the House. The hon. member knows that that is unparliamentary. Hon. members may mislead other members but not deliberately; they cannot be charged with that capital offence. The hon. member, I am sure, will withdraw this suggestion. We are now just two minutes from the end of the question period. If the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants will be patient he will be recognized in one moment.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I would not accuse this minister of doing anything deliberately, but it is very true—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, under the rules of the House the hon. member is required to withdraw the statement he has made. You, Mr. Speaker, asked him to do so, and he is not doing it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont knows what the rules are. He is required to withdraw, and I am sure he will.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this minister would not do anything deliberately but he did mislead the House in suggesting that in fact potato growers in Prince Edward Island—

An hon. Member: Be a man for once.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —are in a position whereby they are going to get a great deal more for their potatoes than earlier expected. This is only due to an artificially inflated price because of the shortage of reefer cars and it is not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is debate. The hon. member, I take it, has withdrawn the statement. He has no right to suggest that another member has deliberately misled the House. I am sure it is recognized by all hon. members that the rules have to be respected by them if this House is to operate as a parliamentary institution. My understanding is that the hon. member has withdrawn, and I am sure he will want to confirm this for my peace of conscience.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I will be quite happy to withdraw provided the minister clarifies—

Mr. Olson: There are no provisions or conditions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot conditionally withdraw. I do not want to make an issue of this, but the hon. member should very simply indicate that he has withdrawn. This is my understanding in any event, and I do not feel it is necessary to pursue the matter.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, if he would simply indicate—

Mr. Olson: No provisions.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —that the price was artificially inflated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are obviously not profiting from this exchange. I take the liberty to bring to the attention of hon. members that this is why we get into difficulty from time to time, in fact perhaps every day during the question period. Many hon. members and, I suggest, very often the same hon. members, from day to day take what I consider very honestly more time than we ought to take on points of order, and that is unfair—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —to many other hon. members seeking the floor. This is not a very tragic matter. The hon. member knows and we all know there are certain things we should not do. Sometimes in the heat of argument the words we use are a little stronger and go beyond our thought. The hon. member has said he did not want to charge the minister with deliberately misleading the House. This is what he said, and he cannot say it conditionally. I am sure he agrees with this. I point out that we have already taken three or four minutes of the time on this point, and I would hope we could now be allowed to go to the next question.

FISHERIES

SWORDFISH—NEGOTIATIONS WITH WASHINGTON RESPECTING RESTORATION OF MARKET

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I put some fish with those chips on the parliamentary plate and ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries whether there are active negotiations with Washington to meet the petition of Nova Scotia swordfishermen which was recently sent to the federal government and, if so, are these negotiations being handled by our embassy in Washington or from Ottawa?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED DUMPING OF NETHERLANDS STARCH IN CANADA

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister taken any action to inquire into allegations that starch is being dumped in Canada from the Netherlands, thus making difficult the diversion of surplus potatoes?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have had a representative of the department visit the producer in New Brunswick who made a complaint about this matter, and as a result there has been a certain amount of investigation. The department has now obtained sufficient information upon which to decide whether there are grounds for initiating a formal investigation under the anti-dumping legislation. I shall make an announcement very soon.

TRANSPORT

REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER TO RAILWAYS TO PURCHASE MORE EQUIPMENT TO MOVE GRAIN

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that every year representations are made to him to request the railways to make larger purchases of equipment, including locomotives, for moving grain, potatoes, and so on, can the minister tell the House whether he has made such representations? If he has, what kind of response has he received from the railways? Also, will he advise the House what priority Canadian National Railways are giving, in view of the $42 million to be provided under the bill we have been debating, to the purchase of locomotives and equipment suitable for grain movement?

Mr. Forrestall: Can the rest of us make a speech too?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to answer the hon. member, but it appears that hon. members opposite are not anxious to hear it.

An hon. Member: Don't take as much time as the member did.

Mr. Jamieson: On the question of making representations to the railways, the answer is yes. We have not only made representations but there has been considerable discussion with Canadian National in recent weeks on the question of providing sufficient cars primarily for grain. I can report to the House that a good deal of progress has been made. I am not sure of the percentage of the $42 million that has been mentioned, but perhaps that will come out in the discussions.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING EFFECTS ON INDIANS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development if he would make a statement at an early date indicating whether his department has considered the effects of the proposed James Bay project on the native peoples living in the area, what studies his department has conducted, and whether the project as contemplated by the province has the approval of the minister with regard to its effect on the native peoples?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. leader of the official opposition for his question. We are now looking into this problem. As I have already mentioned in the House, the Indians of the province of Quebec are negotiating with the Quebec government so as to reach a satisfactory settlement. I am following the situation very closely. We have already told the Indians that we would be willing to help them but up to now they have preferred to conduct their negotiation themselves.

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—STUDY TO DETERMINE ACCEPTABILITY FROM ENVIRONMENTAL VIEWPOINT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. In light of the admission yesterday by the Minister of Transport that the government will have to give prior approval to all dams built for the James Bay project, is the government now undertaking an environmental study to determine whether the project is acceptable from an environmental point of view?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Jamieson: I rise on a point of order, if I may, Mr. Speaker. I am sure—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Transport rises on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Too many points of order are being raised.

Mr. Jamieson: I simply wanted to clarify, for the House and the hon. gentleman, the statement made yesterday. If he looks at Hansard he will find that I did not say all dams will require approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Nesbitt: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not usually do this, but since the minister has raised the matter can he indicate to the House what dams or bridges he would not have to approve under the terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that might be the kind of question the minister should answer by way of a statement on motions. The question period expired a few minutes ago but the hon. member for Churchill has a supplementary. He may ask his supplementary.

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—DATE FOR SETTLEMENT BETWEEN QUEBEC GOVERNMENT AND INDIANS

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the James Bay project seems to be progressing unhindered at the present time, is the minister prepared to set a date by which the Quebec government must come to an amicable settlement with the Indian people in order to be allowed to continue that project?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): It would be very difficult for me to give an exact date. However, I already said many times over the phone to the Quebec Prime Minister that the sooner the better. As I mentioned earlier the Indians are consulting the government now and when they ask me to intervene I will be pleased to do so.

GOVERMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—EXPEDITION OF PUBLIC SERVICES AFFECTING QUALITY OF LIFE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been agreed among all parties that after the speech of the hon. member who is presenting the motion and the speech in reply of the government member, all speeches should be limited to 15 minutes. I am told there are many members on both sides who wish to speak, and this arrangement will give them more opportunity.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is true there has been agreement amongst those representating the parties, but it is also part of the agreement that no one request overtime.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

• (1510)

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix) moved:

—That this House urges the government to expedite those public services which affect the quality of life so that entitlement to status and payment of benefits may be sooner established and paid, and in particular, in respect of unemployment insurance benefits, pension and assistance benefits, immigration and passport procedures, post office deliveries, and public service collective bargaining.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 58 enables the opposition to introduce from time to time motions whereby it does not necessarily present only grievances, but also suggestions to the government.

From the beginning of the present session, Mr. Speaker, we have been surprised to see in this House the very defensive attitude of government members and the extent to which ministers apparently defending their policies readily flare up, turn red and often blast the opposition's attempts to be useful to them by practical suggestions liable to lead the government to efficient solution of problems now facing the people of Canada.

It can be wondered whether this is a symptom of the end of the present government, Mr. Speaker. Past experience has shown that when a government is always on the defensive—

An hon. Member: Like the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Asselin: —and refuses to fight, its hours are numbered.

Mr. Speaker, the present government is faced with the problems of unemployment and inflation which it has been unable to solve during its four years in office. The government, as I said earlier, is about to come before the people, asking for re-election.

For some time, we have seen the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) roaming up and down the country—

An hon. Member: Like the Leader of the Opposition!

Mr. Asselin: —and trying to gauge voters' opinions on the themes that he should use in the next electoral campaign which in my opinion is to start soon.

Well, the Prime Minister can no longer say once more to the people that his objective is still to build a just society because this election slogan will never be accepted again by the Canadian people. What the government has done for the past four years is overwhelming evidence, I suggest, that never before have the citizens of this country suffered so much from blatant injustices that have so obviously affected their existence.

It would take too long to recite all the grievances that we could rightly state to demonstrate the correctness of this. To demonstrate the serious nature of those injustices, it would be enough to detail all the hardships and humiliations to which Canadians are subject because of the serious situation created not only by unemployment and cost of living increases but also by misunderstanding and carelessness from the government in improving public services to which the people are entitled.

For these reasons, the official opposition has felt that it had a duty to remind the government of certain truths and to insist that it deal with the urgent problems that we are now facing.

From the opening of this session, we have badgered the government and particularly the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) about the delay in paying unemployment insurance benefits to eligible persons.

Over Christmas and New Year holidays, members of all sides of this House have received scores of telephone calls and visits to their offices from people at grips with these problems and who were asking for a remedy.

Day after day since the beginning of this session, my colleagues of the official opposition as well as those from the other opposition parties have urged the Minister of Labour and his parliamentary assistant to come to the aid of these people who were in deep misery owing to the treatment they were getting under the unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. Speaker, referring back to page 2586 of Hansard, we find that the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) asked the minister for some explanation of the delays in the payment of unemployment insurance benefits.

We can also refer back to page 2484 of the same publication where we can read the always interesting comments made by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) who asked the minister to do something to improve operations at the Toronto unemployment insurance office.

Hon. members from all provinces have made similar requests. After approximately two months of sittings, we are still talking about this problem. In fact, several hon. members of the opposition have asked the parliamentary secretary today when this problem would be solved.

Mr. Speaker, as far as unemployment insurance offices are concerned, this government made an error in attempting to centralize those offices thereby eliminating existing regional offices. The taxpayers are the victims of this policy. Since unemployment insurance offices are located in the big cities—and here I am speaking about my own constituency—people cannot cover a distance of 200 or 300 miles to meet officials and discuss their claim with them.

The telephone lines are busy all day long so that in addition to his normal duties a member has to act as placement agent for the unemployment insurance officials who have been transferred to the big cities.

Mr. Speaker, the delay in unemployment insurance payments caused flagrant cases of injustice and reduced to dire poverty a countless number of eligible people. I know of distressing cases in my riding. For instance, many heads of families applied for benefits during two months. Most of them had four or five children to support and could not get money from any source other than unemployment insurance because they did not qualify for welfare allowances.

Even if the minister said that he made arrangements with social welfare offices in order to help those people in great need, the public servant takes weeks to complete the means test and meanwhile, those people entitled to unemployment insurance benefits suffer.

Mr. Speaker, the government thinks it can erase all its mistakes by distributing millions of dollars to organizations and taxpayers, so it will be able to tell them at the next election: Gentlemen, vote for us, because we gave you this and that grant.

• (1520)

Now, Mr. Speaker, and this I say firmly and forcibly, central state paternalism is today outmoded; the Canadian population no longer accepts it. This government will be judged according to the manner in which public funds have been spent. The distribution of grants is not well planned. The Local Initiatives Program offers ample evidence and this applies also to economic development and Opportunities for Youth programs. We shall soon receive a report to the effect that the latter was not well planned. It was ill-conceived because the ministers acted hastily and the government got panicky on account of its inability to give a strong and profitable impetus to its economic policy.

Mr. Speaker, there are also other subjects on which we want to draw the government's attention. One is mentioned in our motion and it obviously has to do with the postal service.

In 1968, when this government took office, they said: The Post Office Department will go to a great economist, the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), who started out by turning everything upside down; he believed that the department ought to pay its way; he forgot the human factor. In his economic dissertations, he stated positively that the Post Office Department must bring in profits. That was his first mistake.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that the Post Office is a public service that cannot bring in profits, it is impossible. It is a service which the public is entitled to because not only does the public pay taxes but it also pays for mailing letters and parcels. Therefore, it is a service to which the public is entitled.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after a few years under the direction of the hon. member for Duvernay, the Post Office fell into almost complete chaos. Grievances and requests kept pouring in from our constituents. They were asking us to intervene in the House in order to tell the minister to come back to common sense and to try for better planning. Then again, the former Postmaster General said: I will make a complete change. Mr. Speaker, this resulted in the closing of many local post offices which had served the taxpayers for years and represented for them essential services. All that was done, we were told, to save money.

In my constituency, some people have to walk four or five miles, morning and night, to get their mail. We told the minister about it. He replied: The post office has to be profitable! The postal rates were increased through legislation passed in the House.

And lately, Mr. Speaker, we have learned that another measure was being worked out by the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté).

My attention was drawn to the fact that notice has been given that the business hours of post offices located in small localities would be reduced shortly. At the present time, it is said that business hours will be reduced to 20 per week and wicket service provided 16 hours per week. And this will happen shortly, since the taxpayers have received notices to that effect.

I have already received many representations from municipal councils and public bodies opposing reduction of business hours in post offices. Does the minister want to repeat the mistake made by the Minister of Labour—centralize post offices in large centers?

Mr. Speaker, government services should be available to the poeple and the people should not have to look for them. This is a service that should be made available by the state to the taxpayers and I say to the minister that if he intends to centralize post offices in large centers, he is falling into the same trap as the Minister of Labour and the Canadian people will again have to foot the bill.

I meant to deal with immigration and passport procedures but I will let other colleagues take care of that.

Of course I should like to deal briefly with strikes in public services. Under the present administration, Mr. Speaker, there has been a major deterioration of relations between employees and employers. The settlement of union conflicts has been dragging out and in many cases without taking account of the taxpayers' ability to pay.

In that field, the government, particularly the President of the Treasury Council (Mr. Drury), were in total confusion because they never clearly defined the government's wage policy. In that field as in many others, they tried to solve problems in a haphazard way, without planning, without a clear policy, thus increasing tensions between the employer, which is the state, and the public service.

The union leaders, Mr. Speaker, knew about the weakness of the government in that field. Several strikes in the public sector had dealt a heavy blow to the stabilization of our economy. I am not here to excuse union leaders, for I deplore the fact that in many cases they acted irresponsibly. This country witnessed more strikes that ever, strikes that could have been prevented had a negotiation system been established, through which employers' and employees' representatives could have been brought together in a permanent way around the same table. Of course I would digress for a moment to point out the chaotic situation now prevailing in Quebec where 210,000 civil servants, hospital employees and teachers are about to go on strike on March 17. It is time for governments to suggest to our citizens efficient and workable solutions to prevent strikes in the public service.

Mr. Lachance: What are your solutions?

Mr. Asselin: I am coming to that because we do have solutions.

The ministers are repeatedly asking the opposition whether it has solutions to the government's problems. Yes indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have solutions. Quite often, it can be seen in the House—three ministers are now present—that the ministers do not listen. If at least they would read Hansard. They do not seem to read it since after four years they have not yet found the workable solutions suggested by the opposition.

Earlier today questions were asked to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) in connection with the CBC's striking NABET members. Those people have been laughing at the public for two months.

We know the public likes its special programs such as hockey games or popular series. On some Saturday nights when people were getting ready to view the hockey game on television we have seen NABET union members come to work for two minutes and then suddenly bring the broadcast to an end.

I suggest that union members have no right to laugh that way at the people of this country. We will have to find a means of avoiding strikes in public services. Some will say, but you would also have to take away the right to strike from employees in essential public services, but I do not think this would be the solution. If this Parliament has given public servants the right to strike it would be ill-advised to take it away from them through legislation because I believe in free association of union members who use their association as a means of pressure but with the proviso that these means of pressure be warranted. However, I suggest that this is not a solution to be considered.

We could, of course, talk about compulsory arbitration. Here again, this system has been tried in the past but failed to stop unions from striking, even illegally. We have often seen illegal strikes across the country; union members do not hesitate to leave their job and go on strike.

I am not a specialist in labour relations but I think it is imperative that we find a permanent conciliation mechanism that would keep employers and employees in constant communication so as to avoid strikes such as those which are disrupting public services.

The leader of the Progressive Conservative Party (Mr. Stanfield) has recently dealt in Toronto with this important question. He referred to the possibility of adopting a legislation similar to the Taft-Hartley Act providing for a period of 90 days during which union members would be compelled to go back to work while possibly resuming negotiations with their employer.

There is a host of systems we might put to the test, but it would be imperative for the government to devise a formula that would prohibit strikes, particularly in the essential public sectors. Actually, strikes are very costly to the Canadian economy and to union members themselves because it is they who, more often than not, have to foot the bill for the strike and not their union leaders.

As I have just said, Canadians are greatly concerned about the disastrous consequences of strikes on our economy and their financial repercussions on the family. Canadians will insist, at the next election, that all political parties take a clear and unequivocal position on this issue and we would be derelict in our responsibilities if we should allow the present situation in the public services to worsen by maintaining the status quo.

If I had enough time, I would have liked to deal with the question of passport delivery. It may be possible to say, in the light of the Geoffroy case, that order should be restored in this sector, and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) should establish another system to replace the present one. But I shall let other hon. members deal with this issue.

Mr. Speaker, may I say in closing that the whole system of social benefits paid to taxpayers by governments, both federal and provincial, must be totally revamped.

In many cases, especially with regard to social security, there is duplication and a considerable loss of public funds. The judisdiction in that field could be divided amongst the various levels of government.

The solution to the problem must not be administrative only. Naturally, the present government sticks out its chest and says: We have solved the problem of family allowances. It is not a solution, although I do congratulate the government for having dropped its arrogance toward Quebec and having shown itself a bit more flexible; these are only administrative arrangements that do not solve the problem.

To my mind, the jurisdictions amongst governments should go further than that. Our jurisdictions must be thought out anew to prevent payments from ratepayers who often pay the provincial and federal governments for those same services. To prevent duplication, things must be straightened out, Mr. Speaker, and we will achieve that objective,—of that I am convinced—by finding a new formula for federalism.

The report of the Committee on the Constitution, in preparation for two years, will be tabled in the House tomorrow. New formulas will be proposed. Obviously, some hon. members will present minority reports, but I insist on saying this: If Canadian unity is to be saved, Mr. Speaker, it will be necessary to seek a new form of Canadian federalism advocating greater decentralization of federal government powers to the benefit of the provinces, and it is simply on that condition that we will be able to say that we are endeavouring to safeguard the Canadian unity and that we will continue to do so.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that under the guidance of a government which was elected largely on the promise that it would bring about a just society, and of a Minister of Labour who has spoken so often and so honestly about his desire to protect the rights of ordinary citizens, we should today be debating a system which has created incredible hardship for tens of thousands of Canadians who find themselves unemployed through no fault of their own and must depend on unemployment insurance payments to provide the necessities of life.

Let me digress for a moment to say that the position of the government has not been helped by the strident partisanship of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) who has rejected the claims of members of parliament, who has virtually branded as untrue articles by newspaper columnists in almost every newspaper in Canada, both Liberal and Conservative, which have outlined the plight of those who are unemployed and who have not been able to get unemployment insurance, and has denied that there is much loan-sharking going on, one of the most despicable methods I have ever seen of depriving people of their basic necessities.

Before I go into some of the difficulties which I and other members of parliament have encountered through phone calls and letters from our constituents and calls from newspaper and radio commentators, I want to make it clear that I do not lay the blame mainly on the Unemployment Insurance Commission, on the employees of the commission, many of whom are working long hours of overtime to try to meet the needs and difficulties which are brought to their attention.

The main responsibility for the mess we are in has to be placed on the government, because when the Unemployment Insurance Act was changed the government wanted to improve the benefits people would receive while they were unemployed, but they wanted to do it on the cheap and in order to save money they decided to incorporate in the new act certain provisions which have created most of the difficulties about which people are complaining. First, the waiting period, which was a week before a person could qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, was increased to two weeks. Members of my party who were on the committee which dealt with the bill in detail warned that this would create a great deal of difficulty. Those warnings were ignored and rejected by the government. There is provision in the bill that before a person qualifies for benefits he must use up any statutory holidays pay which he has accumulated. For some people, such as construction workers, this can amount to $600 or $800, a substantial sum of money. Averaged out at $100 a week, a person can wait eight weeks or more before qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits.

I am sure there is not one member of this House on the opposition side or on the government side who has not had daily telephone calls or letters from constituents who have had to wait 8, 10, 12 or 14 weeks before receiving benefits. And this despite the vehement denials of the parliamentary secretary that such is not the case. There is not one member who has not been told of cases where benefits have stopped without explanation. Although very often there is an explanation, because of the complexities of the act the employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission do not know what the explanation is.

Let me give the House an illustration of what I mean. One of my constituents called me during the Christmas recess. Her husband had had a heart attack in the middle of 1971 and under the provisions of the act he was entitled to receive unemployment insurance benefits. He did receive those benefits for a number of weeks until suddenly, without any notice or explanation, the benefits ceased. This lady told me that since her husband was not well enough to go to the unemployment insurance office, she telephoned the office several times. Usually when one phones the unemployment insurance office one gets the busy signal, but after repeated calls she finally got somebody on the line but could not get an explanation of why her husband's benefits had ceased. She was told she could not know the employee's name so she could not check further into the matter.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

She went down to the office and stood in line for several hours until it was her turn to speak to someone. Even then the office could not give her an explanation, so she called me. I had the advantage of the special telephone number that is available to members of parliament and I called the office. May I just digress for a moment to say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who is not here today, that the very fact that there is a special telephone number for members of parliament is an indication of the number of calls that must be made by ordinary claimants. If there were not so many calls and the lines were not so busy for most of the time, there would be no need to give members of parliament and members of the legislatures a special number.

I want to make it clear that the employees handling inquiries made by Members of Parliament at the Winnipeg office are very co-operative, as I am sure they are in most offices. After I had made my inquiry and the clerk had looked into it, she called me back to say that there was a very simple explanation why the benefits had ceased. Under the provisions of the act, a person who falls ill and draws unemployment insurance benefits is entitled to receive benefits for only 15 weeks. If that is the case, then it seems to me it would be a very simple matter to attach to the last cheque mailed to a person receiving benefits under this provision a notice explaining that this was their last cheque since the act only provided payments for 15 weeks. I cannot understand why such a policy is not followed. Neither do I understand why those who work for the Unemployment Insurance Commission do not know the provisions of the act so they can explain to people what is going on. Obviously, the complexity of the act is such that the staff simply do not know its provisions.

Another major problem has arisen as a result of the decision of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, I am certain with the agreement and approval of the government, to computerize the whole operation. I had occasion to talk to one of the top officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare recently who was very intimately involved in the family allowance program. He told me that when it was decided to shift the payment of family allowance cheques to a computer operation, for a number of months until they were certain that the "bugs" in the system had been ironed out duplicate systems were run, the old system under which things were done manually as well as the computerized system. Not so with the Unemployment Insurance Commission; they went straight to a computer operation.

I suppose I have to take the word of the parliamentary secretary that 97 per cent or 98 per cent of the people who file a claim for unemployment insurance benefits have the claim settled and receive payment without difficulty. I shall come back in a moment to the length of time it takes to make these payments, but the usual answer of the government in this regard is to quote statistics. If 3 per cent of the people applying for unemployment insurance run into problems and there are 500,000 or 600,000 applicants for benefits, then we are talking about tens of thousands of people who are having difficulty. This is the real problem we are facing.

In the old days before computerization—which may be more efficient for the large mass of the people—if one had a problem one could make an inquiry and find out what was happening. But today if the computer makes a mistake or somebody fills out a form wrongly, the delay can run into weeks or months. People have to wait anywhere from 8 to 13 weeks. What does this mean to the ordinary citizen, particularly the citizen in the lower income bracket? It means that if he has been unable to save any money there is only one place to go.

The parliamentary secretary tried to create the impression that arrangements have been made with the provinces and municipalities to give these people emergency welfare which they can repay when they get their unemployment insurance cheques. I have checked with the province of Manitoba and no such agreement has been made. I understand that where agreements have been made, no publicity has been given to such agreements either by the Unemployment Insurance Commission or by the province concerned. The result is that people in need are being forced to go to loan-sharks to get money with which to buy food.

The parliamentary secretary at first tried to pooh-pooh the suggestion that this was going on. In the city of Winnipeg there are at least two agencies that advertise regularly every day that if these people need money all they need do is bring their unemployment insurance cards and they will get it. The fact they discount the claim by something in the neighbourhood of 200 to 300 per cent interest does not seem to interest the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Obviously, he is not in need of money to pay his next week's grocery bill.

This disaster which was created first of all by the deliberate action of this government when it amended the Unemployment Insurance Act to extend the benefits but to keep the amount of money which is paid out within the same range as before, has befallen tens of thousands of people in Canada. The administrative mess for which one can blame the government, the minister and the top officers of the Unemployment Insurance Commission has created a blot on our society of which every citizen and certainly every member of parliament should be ashamed.

We have been told again and again that steps have been taken at this late to clean up the mess. I believe that the minister—I believe him a good deal more than I believe his parliamentary secretary—is sincere when he says that he has ordered that steps be taken to clean up the mess. I hope it will not be very long before people who are unfortunate enough to be unemployed, a large percentage of them because of the deliberate policies regarding economic growth put into effect by this Liberal government, will get the benefits to which they are entitled. These people are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. They have paid their unemployment insurance dues for years and are now in need of the benefits.

I hope that when the minister answers some of the complaints which have been made both inside and outside parliament he will take a much more realistic and humane attitude, one which will show some sympathy and concern for the people who are unfortunate enough to be caught in this terrible tragedy. I hope that his attitude will be much more sympathetic than the one demonstrated by the parliamentary secretary in his statements during the last couple of weeks.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to speak to the motion introduced today and which in short blames the government for being slow in administering its various programs.

Mr. Speaker, even if that non-confidence motion deals with part of the problem, I feel that it rather restricts that criticism and that it does not truly tackle the problems affecting the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some brief comments. This government as the previous ones at first passed a great number of bills, each one encroaching a little more upon the freedom of the individual or the citizen, while driving him a little more in a state of financial insecurity.

I would now like to discuss the second point, that is the fact that the citizen becomes more and more dependent upon the state, which is more powerful than ever.

I will conclude my remarks with some very definite examples. Finally, Mr. Speaker, in view of this great number of social projects and programs, bureaucracy has reached such proportions in Canada that it now manages the country instead of Parliament and the government. This bureaucracy is such that it not only controls the departments and the government, but stifles the people with all sorts of programs and harasses them with repeated inquiries which tend generally to downgrade the individual.

Mr. Speaker, as members of this House, we have a choice to make in 1972. Should we continue to support a policy which is responsible for depriving the individual bit by bit of its freedom while subjecting him to more insecurity—I refer to the measures which are submitted to us in Ottawa, in Quebec or elsewhere, aimed at slowly implanting socialism—or should we adopt a policy which tends not to discourage personal initiative, but on the contrary, to motivate the individual and enable him to assume his proper place in our country?

Here is a particular example, Mr. Speaker. To obtain their votes, students are promised scholarships which are insufficient as well as discriminatory since they are not granted generally.

Mr. Speaker, this scolarship system which is protected and established by federal and provincial governments directly discourages the individual in our society. This can be readily understood.

Let us consider a young student who works all summer and applies for a scholarship. Let us forget, for a moment, his father's salary or his family's income. If that student has worked all summer to help himself, he will not be eligible for a government's scholarship. He would receive a letter simply stating that: In view of your summer income, we are unable hereafter, in accordance with the scholarship program for students to grant you the financial aid you require.

Why? Because he has worked, because he wanted to help himself, because he wanted to assume responsibility for his own future, because he wanted to keep busy instead of wasting his summer doing nothing. That one is not encouraged.

The student who failed to find a job, who was not able to work for pay during the summer, will apply for a scholarship and will get one, Mr. Speaker, taking into account, always, his parents' income.

Then, the authorities will say to the young: Get on the bandwagon, help us to build this country!

Mr. Speaker, that is a very definite example, that we are now experiencing, which shows that this particular policy with regard to scholarships has the direct effect of discouraging the young from helping to build their country. One prefers to have them doing nothing during the summer and to help them through welfare payments when they attend school—scholarships amount to that more or less—and to make of them human wrecks who no longer have the heart to put up a fight.

Let us consider unemployment for instance. It is obvious that the Unemployment Insurance Act is in itself, outside of the economic and social context, excellent. It is obvious that it provides for the payment of benefits up to $100 a week, thus assuring some security to the unemployed.

But if I go further back into this legislation and if I put it in the economic and social context in which we live, I can say straight out that we have reached a stage in Canada where it pays more to be unemployed than to work. We are now at the point where unemployment competes directly with work. It is surely not a measure meant to encourage the individual to take responsibilities, to participate in the building of his country.

• (1600)

Mr. Speaker, a man is ahead in Canada if he works during seven or eight months of the year and draws unemployment insurance and welfare benefits during the other four months instead of working all year long. And while that man is living off the fat of the land, because the ever more powerful government has convinced him that it is better that way, most Canadians are going to work for the government.

What about the old age security pension? They give something, but just enough to disgust the people. From 60 to 65 they cannot work any more, or most of those people have lost their job. Furthermore the amount they get is unsufficient.

More cynical than ever the government grants them a monthly increase of 42 cents. Patent proof that even that program is unsufficient and does nothing more than keeping the recipient near the poverty level. That is the way our Canadian citizens are rewarded.

I shall quote another example to show how far from the individual we are in our socialization system. Some farms in the past could provide a living to even ten generations, not small but large families, of which our people were proud. Now, farming cannot provide a living for the farmer. The government said: We will organize production. It said to the various producers: Improve your land, your equipment, your buildings, your herds. The farmers replied: But, we have no money. Again the government came up with this: There is no problem, we will finance you. That is how the federal and provincial farm credit organizations were established. All farmers took advantage of them. And at that time, the government was already beginning to subdue people who until then had led an independent life. They turned to farm loans, which were good in themselves, but very bad on the whole.

And the governments thought: We are controlling his production now let us control his income. This is how the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Dairy Commission were invented and quotas imposed. When a farmer does not fill his quota, fair enough, he gets a grant from the government. He becomes a civil servant.

But when the farmer exceeds his quota not only does he not get any help from the government but he is fined for having worked too much. He must pay a fine for having got up too early to defend himself in his own country.

What are the results, Mr. Speaker. The radio and the newspapers advertise auctions: Auction for Mr. X in Township Y, auction of Mr. Z. in Township W, and so on. Farms are deserted. What is done about it? The social-oriented government has foreseen everything and says to the farmers: Move to the cities, desert your farms, the government will take them over; come to the cities and you will attend training courses.

The farmer attends those courses and wakes up unemployed. It is not better than before. He finds himself with useless diplomas and ends up on welfare.

This is quite serious. And yet in connection with the delayed employment cheques, what did the government do? Instead of dealing with this problem, on January 26 the minister sent a letter to all the unemployed whose cheques were delayed telling them to go to the nearest welfare office to secure a loan and that after they got their benefits they would be able to endorse their cheques and refund the welfare office.

The worker, who used to be independent, has gone unemployed because of the stifling and omnipotent government bureaucracy. The individual eligible for unemployment benefits does not get his cheques, so he must borrow welfare money and sign an IOU; and when the government finally decides to send him his unemployment cheque, he must first refund his debt to welfare. This is when he becomes totally dependent because while waiting for his cheques he has used up his savings.

So there is another welfare system that is becoming permanent, there is another Canadian in the majority that the minority will have to serve from now on. We have come to a point in this country where more and more people depend less and less on others for their living. Fewer and fewer people are earning a living for the majority.

That is what we have come to, Mr. Speaker. That is why the governments, grits on tories, that have been following one another for many years in Canada, kept on increasing taxes everytime they came back to power and everytime, Mr. Speaker, they introduce other socializing measures which are responsible for decreasing individual liberty and creating a growing feeling of insecurity.

The result is greater dependence from one year to the next on the state, and finally, the government must spend more and more for its administration, since the social security programs have reached the point where they cost a fortune. Why? Because the administration of such programs, the salaries of bureaucrats cost more and more and absorb the majority of the funds voted by Parliament for such programs.

As I said, we must make a choice, namely keep on supporting socializing measures that limit individual initiative or measures which not only would not discourage the individual, but would help him to help himself.

Mr. Speaker, what are the governments waiting for, what do they want? To make Canadians more and more dependent or to enable each citizen to live his own destiny, in freedom and security?

Mr. Speaker, some very funny government members will perhaps tell me that Social Credit is utopia. I will tell them that their system has reached such a point that our citizens are being turned into slaves.

Industries are closing down. They have developed, Mr. Speaker—and that underlines the ridiculous aspect of the system—a craze for creating jobs. They grant millions of dollars to industries. This is a form of social welfare. Why? To create jobs. However, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) says: Production is too high, we must control it.

On one hand, jobs are created to increase production and, on the other, Canadians are being told: Tighten your belts because production is too high. And all the time, while poverty is rampant in western Canada because of too much wheat, while poverty is rampant in Quebec and the Maritimes because there is too much of everything, three Canadian families out of five live in poverty, according to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

Mr. Speaker, in order to allow each Canadian to have his share of the wealth of this country, we must support with all our energy any policy devised to encourage the initiative of the individual and to make him independent from governments for his living, devised to encourage the initiative of the citizen who is anxious to get out of it by himself.

And with this I bring my remarks to a close, Mr. Speaker. I am convinced that if governments gave Canadians a chance to build their country instead of discouraging them, they would build their country.

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the comments of hon. gentlemen opposite and I wish to thank them for some of the suggestions which have been made. The mover of the motion spoke a good deal about the quality of life and its relationship to public services, and suggested that the momentum of the government with regard to creating a just society has been subsiding. I wish to assure him that the only thing that has been subsiding is the currency of the phrase and not the thrust of the government's dedication to that concept.

There is no question that injustices remain in Canada. In fact, their very existence is what caused the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and this government to launch a determined attack on injustices wherever they exist. There is no question that one of the greatest of those is unemployment. I should like to make a few comments on that matter and to areas where we on this side, and I am sure hon. members opposite, recognize that progress is being made. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) will speak more specifically on some of the points raised with respect to unemployment insurance.

I begin, Mr. Speaker, by simply saying that we see unemployment, not in terms of the statistics which are so often passed back and forth across this House but in terms of its social and human dimensions, which is the only true way to see it. While there are now some encouraging statistics emerging, I would like to draw attention to the larger framework in which policies are being developed, some quite innovative policies, because if we see some of that larger problem we can appreciate the magnitude of the problem in Canada which we are resolving.

First let us consider the Economic Council of Canada's fourth annual report. We were told there, on the basis of the data that I think is uncontrovertible, that in the 15-year period beginning in 1965 and ending in 1980—we all recognize that we are over one-third of the way into that period—the Canadian labour force, the people who want to work, who consider themselves employable, will grow by 50 per cent. This is a growth rate that is entirely unique in the western world. I do not say this in seeking any kind of excuse but only to lay in front of all of us the challenge and opportunity which we have. How can this be compared with the problems of many other western countries? The United States labour force is to grow by 30 per cent, against our 50 per cent. What is the rate in the United Kingdom? It is 4½ per cent in the same 15 years. What is it in Sweden? It is a zero growth rate. What is it in France? There it is 13½ per cent. Mr. Speaker, I am quoting these figures from memory but I think they are accurate.

In Germany the predicted growth rate of the labour force in this period is 5½ per cent. In Italy the predicted rate is 2½ per cent. In Canada, I repeat, it is 50 per cent. This is an historic, non-recurring opportunity and challenge for us because if we can get an economy that will put those people to work—and they are mostly young people, relatively well educated—we will have in this country an economic base for a more just society and those greater opportunities that we all want in areas other than the economic area.

What is this rate in real terms? In real terms the challenge is quite staggering. We will be adding three million people to the labour force in that 15-year period. In the first five-year period one million new jobs were created in Canada. We appear to be on track but not quite. The three million people who will come into the Canadian labour force will equal the absolute additions of people to the labour forces of Great Britain, West Germany and Italy combined, in that period. On our population base of 20 million people we have to find as many new jobs as those three countries combined. That is a very significant challenge. When we talk about unemployment figures in Canada and compare them with other countries, I think we have to appreciate that we have a historically unique situation.

In the first five years of the period about which the Economic Council advised us, the one million new jobs created in Canada equalled the new jobs created in seven European countries—Great Britain, France, West Germany, Italy, Belgium and a couple of others that I just do not recall at the moment. So there has been some progress down that road. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to linger in making that kind of recital to the House but I do want to draw it to the attention of hon. members. We have in this country, as I see it, such a challenge that we could not rely on the normal fiscal and monetary measures that are employed in other countries. What does it really mean in Great Britain if they use anti-inflationary policies to control an inflationary period? There is no pressure upward on their labour force. Their unemployment does not mount as it does in Canada. What does it mean in France? It means the same thing.

What does it mean in Canada? It means that if we employed the standard techniques which have been developed since the great depression, the Keynesian techniques, and applied them here, confronted as we are with this pressure of entrants into the labour force unemployment will be bound to rise to perverse levels which none of us would want to tolerate. Therefore we have limitations in the use of the standard tools.

What has the government been doing to cope with this quite unique Canadian problem? I want to mention a few of the measures we have adopted. The DREE program is too well known for me to go into it here, but it is a determined effort to find new formulas, new approaches to bring economic expansion into the slow-growth regions where much unemployment exists. Some will say that it has not fully succeeded. Some will say it has not done much more than prevent a widening of the gap. But we all know, if we want to be honest with ourselves, that if we look at this problem internationally the wealthy nations are still pulling ahead of the undeveloped nations in spite of transfer payments, transfer programs and aid programs. We see that the more advantaged regions are still pulling ahead of the disadvantaged regions. We are launched on a very major program to redress some of the regional imbalances and I think there are some successes that ought to be acknowledged.

What else has the government done? There are the two experimental programs which have been launched to consider the human and the social side of unemployment in Canada. These are the Opportunities for Youth program and the Local Initiatives Program. They are innovative. What do they really mean in terms of this larger context? Surely they mean that if we cannot make use of the standard tools without incurring on the one hand undue unemployment and on the other hand excessive inflation, then we see we have in this unique period a unique system that will cope with only so much and in a sense we have to go out beyond that system with innovative programs.

With the two programs that have been successful, judging by the appeals coming to me as acting minister of manpower and immigration to the effect, "Please approve more of these projects," and the agonizing response I must make that the funds have now been allotted, our approach is to go to the people themselves and say, "Rather than delivering more programs from government, and we recognize their limitations, we will put resources in your hands." We say to the people, "Look at your communities. See how you can improve your communities and employ yourselves, or devise projects that will employ persons now unemployed." As all members of parliament know, we have found that the response has been overwhelming, that persons have displayed new energies. They have defined problems and opportunities in their communities. They have found work for people. This is the government that recognizing a unique employment problem took steps to put funds in the hands of local people who had initiative and were ready to go into action. Some of the results have been very dramatic not only in terms of community betterment but in terms of individual opportunities.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, we expect that in the private initiatives area and the municipal initiatives area the LIP program will provide temporary employment for 92,000 persons. The Opportunities for Youth program is again initiated for the summer and will find employment for 30,000 students. Additional summer programs in various areas, the militia for example, National Health and Welfare and travel and exchange programs will provide further opportunities. These are innovative approaches in the search for the just society. You may say that the phrase has been worn out, but the concept is there and the action is there. I have mentioned two or three instances of it.

There are some people working in Canada this winter who perhaps for a decade have not worked during the winter. People in isolated communities are working during the winter when previously the only persons to work would have been the postmaster and the grocery store proprietor. Those are the kinds of concern that this government has for unemployed persons, persons who find themselves seasonally disadvantaged. We are saying to these people, "We will reach across that gulf of injustice you have suffered over the years. We will put resources in your hands. We will trust you to generate projects to better your community." In that kind of partnership we will find employment and a new path toward the just society which is as alive in the concerns of this government as it has ever been.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, there are in Canada people who are disadvantaged in another sense than seasonal. I have mentioned the special efforts made to cope with the seasonal problem of students, the one million or so who join the labour force every summer. There are special measures to deal with that seasonal problem and the seasonal problem which comes in the wintertime. But there are persons who are permanently disadvantaged, the native people, the poor, and there are new kinds of programs in existance and new programs to come which I hope will be available in this session.

The mover of the motion mentioned the quality of life. I should like to digress a little from the major concern that we all have in the area of unemployment and mention a few areas where the quality of life has been dramatically improved and new thresholds have been reached. Let us consider national parks where the Canadian public has a proper, new level of concern for the environment as it will affect future generations. In this government's four years of office our national parks have increased from 18 to 28.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is not an answer.

Mr. O'Connell: That is a 50 per cent increase. The hon. gentleman says that is nothing—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I said that is not an answer to the motion.

Mr. O'Connell: This is right on the motion, Mr. Speaker. I challenge the hon. member to deny that the motion is about the quality of life.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is not UIC; it is not the quality of life.

Mr. O'Connell: It is service to the people of Canada down through the future. There is a 50 per cent increase in the area set aside in perpetuity for national parks.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On Baffin Island, the Northwest Territories, the Yukon.

Mr. O'Connell: Canada leads all countries in the world in land set aside for future generations. These parks are in every province and in the territories; they are in all regions.

What about the Great Lakes and the treaty we hope to make with the United States to service all Canadians in terms of the quality of life? I think this is an answer to the motion before us. Already the government of Canada and the province of Ontario have an agreement with respect to the Canadian contribution to the clean-up of the Great Lakes so that future generations may benefit and that the Canadian economy and society as it is built around that Great Lakes system may benefit in perpetuity from that magnificent body of water. We expect to spend on that project something like $150 million in a very short period of time. This is for the just society. This justice, in terms of quality of life, has something more behind it than talk.

I mentioned earlier the concern for regional justice and the quality of life in regions of Canada that have been designated for special programs. The government has a very special interest in the development of the economy and social conditions in western Canada. To many people western Canada has been seen as an agricultural base and more recently as an energy base. I do not think that does full justice to the possibilities, the potential and the aspirations of the people of western Canada. In our search for an improved quality of life and justice this government intends in its industrial strategy, which hopefully will soon be announced in greater particular, to open up opportunities for industrial development. The industrialization which has been available to central Canada and increasingly is the concern of Atlantic development strategy will be available in western Canada.

One sees some evidence of this already in the establishment of the head office of the Canadian Development Corporation on the west coast. Already one sees the beginning of that new economic justice for western Canada in the interests of the Pacific rim countries, in the concern to develop trade relations with China, the Soviet Union, the Pacific countries and Japan to open up resources to a processing and manufacturing phase of advanced technology. A good deal of the forward trend in a new industrial strategy for this country will be toward developing higher levels of economic activity in the west. It is in a sense a decentralization of industrial activity in the search for the just society in terms of quality of life and national unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, there is another point which I should like to mention. It is the contribution being made by the middle-income people of Canada to this thrust into a more just society, into higher orders of justice and into the area of the quality of life.

An hon. Member: They are carrying the load.

Mr. O'Connell: In the early stages, the first elements of a search for a more just society must always be for those who are most disadvantaged, those who have to catch up. One must begin by putting resources in their hands and by seeing that there is justice in their conditions of life. I shall not go into the various measures that have been adopted, other than to mention the tax reform proposals and the tax reform legislation. However, if we want to be honest with ourselves we know that in the last three years this government has assisted more people of low income into more housing units than were available at any time in the past.

Mr. Alexander: After much prompting.

Mr. O'Connell: May I also mention the FISP program. We must also consider family allowances and the income support program which the minister brought before the House for the first time this afternoon. Major efforts are being made in this country to improve the lot of lower income persons. The greater part of the burden created by any redistribution of that type has been carried by the middle-income groups in Canada. We recognize their willingness to accept that burden as well as the extreme strains that have become evident as the challenge is being met. We ought to be aware of the size of the burden being carried by middle-income Canadians who are helping us in this unique period of our history to attain a higher order of social justice.

Let me now turn to another subject. The Canadian labour force, despite being the most rapidly growing labour force in the world is almost the smallest in proportion to total population. We do not remember that too often. Our work force, if measured as a percentage of total population, is smaller than that of any western industrialized country. So rapidly is it growing that there will soon be a change in this proportion. Nevertheless, those are the facts. Five years ago the work force was much smaller than it is now. What has that work force been trying to do? Here we have an earning stream and there we have an income stream. This relatively small group of people who make up our work force have been educated in an expensive educational system. It is expensive because we wanted the best, the very largest flow of young people making up the population, on a proportional basis, of any country in the western world. They are now being educated at the most expensive level, the post-secondary level. That contribution and that burden we must recognize.

Secondly, this relatively small work force is supporting a relatively highly developed social security system and retirement system for persons over 65. I will not say it is the best in the world; others have said that and perhaps it is. We know that it is a substantial and good retirement program. The social security program is also substantial. The burden of carrying these programs rests on our relatively small work force. In time the distribution of that burden will be corrected. I wanted to remind hon. members that middle-income people of this country have played a large part in bearing the heavy burden which Canadians must bear. I trust that they can continue to bear the weight involved in some of these changes and unique challenges that face Canada.

The government is making determined efforts, partly through its industrial strategy, to so enlarge economic opportunities that all, including those performing professional, academic, managerial and other skilled tasks will be rewarded with an expanding future. At present middle-income citizens are carrying a great burden. However, as new people enter the work force the weight of that burden will be spread ever more evenly and borne by more people.

I do not want to say much more, Mr. Speaker. I merely want to remind hon. members that we are going through an exceptional period in Canada's social development. It is exceptional particularly in terms of the numbers who in this country are available for employment. To provide employment opportunities, of course, is a top priority of the government. The government recognizes that the traditional methods of bringing about employment opportunities and therefore an improved quality of life must be changed. It has launched new programs and is evaluating them to assure the country that they are not stopgap efforts but, rather, are the beginnings of major efforts to cope with this unique situation. Having said that, I say to the mover of the motion that no momentum is lost through this thrust. Perhaps all we shall lose is a little currency. The action is there, if I may use that phrase, and will increase.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is a nice choice of words, a beautiful vocabulary.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, before speaking to the motion may I say a word or two about the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell). He suggested that the Economic Council of Canada forecast that 50 per cent more persons will be entering our labour force in 15 years. That is true and we are aware of it. I say, then, was it not utter folly on the part of the government to adopt a policy which would create unemployment? Was it not foolish to adopt such a policy as its number one weapon in fighting inflation?

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): I want to address myself in particular to these words of the motion: "payment of benefits may be sooner established and paid, and in particular, in respect of unemployment insurance benefits, pension and assistance benefits." I wish to touch on three major aspects involving the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the administration of the program for which the commission is responsible, veterans' pensions and benefits paid under the Canada Pension Plan. I should first like to deal with the program of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

There has been much repetition in this debate and hon. members have raised the same problems about which I intend to speak. Unravelling the problems of people trying to get unemployment insurance benefits takes far too much of the time of members of this House no matter where they sit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Some members have hired extra help to handle nothing but unemployment insurance claims. I represent a rural area where you would not expect such difficulties, yet hardly a day goes by when I receive no calls for assistance. Sometimes I receive 15 requests for assistance in a day and rarely are there fewer than three of four such requests. As I say, these calls come from a rural area. While criticizing the Unemployment Insurance Commission's over-all program, let me pay tribute to the excellent service that officials in regional offices have rendered to members of parliament. My area is served by Hamilton and the people in that office have been co-operative in trying to solve the problems of my constituents.

Mr. Alexander: How true.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): The terrible thing is that some individuals who seek redress from the commission cannot get the time of day from some offices. I talked to a man who tried to telephone the Hamilton unemployment insurance office for six hours. He timed his calls. Finally he called the operator and asked if the office telephone was out of order. She said no, it was not. The only thing left for him was to call his member of parliament.

The delays in putting cheques into the hands of the unemployed are bringing serious consequences to local municipalities. One such serious consequence is the increase in municipal welfare costs. When I met welfare officers of Norfolk county they said that this was a common problem. They told me that they were being asked to make welfare payments to those who were not able to get their unemployment insurance cheques. When the cheques eventually arrive the recipients are paid twice, so to speak, once from the Unemployment Insurance Commission and once from welfare funds.

Mr. Alexander: And that is the just society!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): According to the minister there is supposed to be some means of assigning cheques to municipal welfare departments so that this duplication of payment will not occur. According to the minister, this system is in effect. Before rising to speak I called the welfare officer in the town of Delhi. He assured me there is no means at his disposal to assign unemployment insurance cheques. As this program is in effect it is time the minister and his officials made known the means by which the assignment may be made.

The situation is further aggravated by the two-week waiting period. Today, most people have a hand-to-mouth existence. In this welfare state we rarely find people who lay aside money for a rainy day; therefore, any interruption in their earnings represents a hardship. In committee we suggested that the waiting period be reduced from two weeks to one week in order to avoid this hardship; the report of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration will show that we moved an amendment to this effect, which was voted down.

To summarize, I have been highly critical of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and I wish to make some positive suggestions as to how it might be improved. First, regional offices should be decentralized and sub-offices established with proper facilities to process claims and service recipients.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Originally, each unemployment insurance office was a more or less self-contained unit which processed and paid all claims. After a series of changes a new system is coming into force whereby there is a division into three main types of office. There is a parent office, full-time offices and itinerant offices. The parent office has complete files on all claimants. It processes claims. The full-time office usually has staff for benefit control, to check frauds and the like as well as looking into inquiries. The itinerant offices have on staff just one person for all or part of the day or week and he is only responsible for handling inquiries. These offices simply cannot satisfy the demands of claimants.

Surely, efficiency should be the prime concern of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and service to people should be a priority. The program has been decentralized. Cheques are processed by a computer and cheque-writing machine at Belleville. This system was supposed to be efficient but it does not provide good service. Surely, this should be their main concern.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Another positive suggestion is one which I have already mentioned, reducing the waiting period. The minister said that cannot be done because it will cost an additional $180 million. However, data from July through to November indicates that it would cost only an additional $10 million for that period. Recently it has been very difficult to obtain sufficient data from the Unemployment Insurance Commission to make an unbiased calculation of what the increased cost might be. I challenge the minister to produce figures which indicate that a one-week waiting period will cost the large additional amount that he mentioned.

The third suggestion I make to the department is that there be closer liaison with municipal welfare officers, including cheque-assigning procedures. It is up to the Unemployment Insurance Commission to make available the information and procedures by which this can be done. My fourth suggestion is that there should be an independent consulting agency to make a study of the efficiency of the Unemployment Insurance Commission's procedures. It seems they have set this system up on their own. They claim it is efficient but the results prove otherwise. Independent advice should be sought. Also, the regional offices should be given authority to write cheques when recipients have been unduly deprived of their benefits, rather than having the long procedure of going through Belleville.

I now wish to make a few suggestions with regard to pensions and benefits to veterans. As a member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs I feel obligated to draw the government's attention to some of the difficulties and hardships being experienced by our veterans. Difficulties were experienced when we changed the method of paying war veterans allowances or, as our veterans call it, the burned-out pension. They consider it a form of pension although it is really a form of welfare. Let's face it, it helps the person who is down and out, although the veteran does not think of it in that way. He thinks it gives him special status, and it does. He is being recognized for his service in defending this country.

Veterans resent the reduction in the war veterans allowance. They now receive old age security, the guaranteed income supplement and the war veterans allowance. That is unnecessary and demeaning to those who served our country well in times of danger. There are difficulties as a result of this change. The war veterans allowance was non-taxable. Under the new plan, the old age security pension and guaranteed income supplement are subject to income tax. Veterans are now forced to pay income tax on an amount that was formerly free of tax.

Also, there is the deeming principle which was very difficult to get across to our older veterans. If a veteran 65 years of age did not apply for and receive the old age security, he was deemed to be receiving it and his war veterans allowance was cut accordingly. After we got this straightened out and he finally received the back payments of old age security and guaranteed income supplement in a lump sum, the veteran was above the ceiling for war veterans allowance for that year and he or his widow was forced to repay to the war veterans allowance board the amount by which he was overpaid. This repayment causes an undue hardship to these people. They do not understand it. When they receive a cheque from the government, they spend it because they expect the government to know what it is doing. It is an undue hardship even for them to repay in small amounts a sum of money which was paid to them by the government. There is another difficulty which our veterans face. The level of the basic rate of war disability pension has fallen $1,000 below the level of untrained labour in the public service. This was supposed to have been the base on which we judged the basic rate for a war disability pension.

I wish to refer to a brief submitted to the minister by War Amputations of Canada on February 21 of this year. I will not read it because it would take too long. They selected five categories in the public service which are called untrained labour; these are correctional offices, building services, messenger services, protective and custodial services. The average wage of these categories is in the neighbourhood of $4,551. This indicates that their pension is $1,000 less, because they receive only $3,500 than unskilled and untrained labour in the public service. The Department of Veterans Affairs should look into this matter with a view to bringing veterans pensions more in line with the base set out for them in the Pension Act.

Veterans are faced with a backlog of appeals regarding adjustment of their war disability pensions. They must go through the entitlement board, the pension board and the pension review board. I do not have the figure before me but I understand that at the present time hundreds of cases are waiting to be reviewed.

An hon. Member: Thousands.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): My colleague informs me there are thousands. It is high time the appeal procedures were streamlined and speeded up. Perhaps the commission could be broken down into panels so that three cases could be heard simultaneously instead of only one.

If time permits, I will deal with the third phase of my remarks. This has to do with the Canada Pension Plan. From my own experience, and after discussing these matters with my colleagues, it appears it is taking far too long for Canada Pension Plan administrators to approve payments and place cheques in the hands of recipients. Especially is this true in the case of those who are entitled to disability pensions. Officials responsible for the Canada Pension Plan admit it takes up to six months to process an application for disability benefit.

• (1650)

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): The delay is caused in part by the refusal of the department to accept proof of disability established by another department of government for which, for instance, the applicant might have been working. As a result, many pensioners are being deprived of their just rights for many months.

In conclusion, may I summarize by directing attention again to my comments on the subject of unemployment insurance, by urging a review of benefits to veterans and especially the need for an increase in war disability pensions and, last, to the case for speeding up procedures under the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the time allocated to me this afternoon I wish to refer to two matters of substantial interest to all hon. members wherever they may sit in the House. I propose to deal with the subjects of immigration and unemployment insurance.

The hon. member's motion includes a reference to immigration procedures, in broad and sweeping terms, and because of the vague wording of the motion I can only guess at those aspects of immigration procedures which the hon. member believes need to be expedited. Presumably he is referring to the situation of visitors from abroad who seek to remain in Canada permanently. Before commenting on the situation as it exists today I should like to review briefly the legislation and policy affecting this class of immigrant so as to place the matter in its proper context.

Until 1967, Canada, like all other countries, attempted to discourage this kind of immigrant movement. Strong efforts were made to prevent the initial admission of people seeking temporary entry who, it was believed, really wanted to stay permanently. Most visitors who tried to obtain landed immigrant status were required to return abroad and make their applications to the appropriate visa office. This policy was followed, not for arbitrary or legislative reasons as some have suggested but for the very practical reason that it is much simpler and more effective for a person to be examined as an immigrant on his home ground, so to speak, by an officer experienced in immigrant selection and in the ways of that country, than for him to be examined thousands of miles away.

We must not forget that the entitlement to take up permanent residence in Canada is not a right in the person but, rather, a privilege to be accorded in the exercise of Canada's sovereignty if it is felt that the applicant can contribute to the development and quality of life in Canada. The immigrant selection examination is thus not a determination of rights but a review of a person's qualifications for being granted a privilege.

Nevertheless, in the broad and substantial liberalization of immigration legislation and policies in 1967, two very important changes were made in the interests of creating a more positive attitude to immigration in Canada and of ensuring that every individual was treated justly and sympathetically. First, the immigration regulations established, for the first time ever, the right of a non-immigrant or visitor to seek to change his status to that of a landed immigrant or permanent resident without having to depart from Canada. These people were to be examined in essentially the same way as applicants abroad, that is, in accordance with clearly stated, almost entirely objective criteria which were to be applied without regard to the person's race, religion or geographic origin, and had for their sole purpose the determination of whether a person would be a good resident and future citizen of Canada.

Second, an immigration appeal board was established. This board was to be completely independent of the department and of the minister responsible for immigration. It was given full power to deal with all appeals against deportation orders made by officers of the department, including cases of visitors who were refused landed immigrant status. In addition to dealing with the legal aspects of each case, the board was also empowered to set aside the Immigration Act and regulations in any case in which it felt there were strong compassionate or humanitarian considerations which should be taken into account.

At about the same time the Department of Manpower and Immigration, in close co-operation with other departments, initiated a joint program to facilitate tourism by speeding up inspection at the major ports of entry to Canada, especially the international airports. This program, involving the inspection of arriving passengers by a single officer representing four inspection services, has been highly successful in expediting the flow of the 38 million foreign visitors who come to Canada each year. It has made it much more difficult, however, to detect the fraudulent visitor who is really a clandestine immigrant.

When these generous changes in policies and procedures were made it was recognized that there would certainly be an increase in the number of visitors, bona fide and otherwise, who would apply for landed immigrant status in Canada. There was no way of foreseeing, however, that the number would skyrocket. From one or two thousand cases a year before 1967 it has shot up to about 45,000 persons each year, or something in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent to 25 per cent of all applications received from all around the world.

You can appreciate, Mr. Speaker, the impact this has had on offices in Canada unprepared both as to number and kind of staff required to cope with the workload. The inevitable effect, despite the often maligned but nevertheless heroic efforts of the staff, was the gradual development of backlogs in many offices, especially those receiving the greatest number of applications. By September of last year the total backlog across Canada has reached more than 7,000 cases. If the hon. member had submitted his motion at that time it would undeniably have contained some substance.

I am happy to report, Mr. Speaker, that the situation to which I have just referred no longer exists. By means of still greater efforts than were being made before, by diversion of both staff and resources from other areas of the department's work, it has been possible to effectively eliminate the backlog so that it may now be said that applications are dealt with on a current basis.

This is not to say that an individual application will be decided, as compared to put into process, without some delay. The determination of a person's suitability as a resident and future citizen of Canada requires, by law, an interview, medical examination, certain documentation and certain background checks. These cannot be completed overnight and, as I indicated earlier, they cannot be done as easily in Canada as would be the case if the applicant were in his usual country of residence. Nevertheless, decisions are rendered in many cases in as little as six or eight weeks, although some, depending on the country from which the person came to Canada, may take several months. Everything possible is done to keep these delays to a minimum. Nobody, be it the applicant, the department or Canada itself stands to gain anything by having cases drag on longer than is absolutely necessary.

I suppose that the hon. member might also have in mind delays in immigration processing after the examination stage. Because of factors that I mentioned earlier, such as the reduction of initial inspection at ports of entry, the facility of applying for landing within Canada and the independent and very powerful appeal board, the provision for applications in Canada is being used not only by genuine visitors but by many people who are immigrants all along and who know or suspect they would be refused if examined overseas. Indeed, they may already have been refused overseas. The result is that a substantial proportion of applications in Canada must be refused.

If the applicant declines to leave Canada on receipt of the decision, as most do, the department has no choice under the law but to undertake deportation proceedings. Because of the large number of applications and the large number now completing the examination stage, it is quite true that there is a large backlog awaiting attention by departmental enforcement staff. I must point out, however, that at this stage it is no longer a question of "entitlement to status and payment of benefits", as mentioned in the hon. member's motion; rather, it is a question of determining whether the person is in Canada lawfully at all and, if not, whether his removal should be directed. The same is true of the third and final stage, the appeal against a resulting deportation order. Although there is also a well publicized backlog at this third stage, I do not consider either the second or the third stage to fall within the terms of the hon. member's motion.

May I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the House that the minister and the officials of the department are not insensitive to the plight of people caught in delays at any of the stages, even though many have brought the difficulties upon themselves. The minister has not assumed his new responsibilities in order to rest on the status quo. Consideration is being actively given to administrative and legislative measures to provide solutions to the situation that has developed as a result of the desires of so many people to immigrate and settle in Canada.

The second point that I should like to deal with is that of unemployment insurance. There are reports originating in Toronto that the welfare department of the province of Ontario is seeking to recover from $1 million to $2 million from the federal government. The sums, it is claimed, are additional welfare payments made to certain unemployment insurance claimants arising from alleged delays in the processing of claims. I am advised that this matter was in fact discussed on March 3 in the provincial legislature. At that time the Ontario minister of social and family services, in reply to questions concerning delays in payment of unemployment insurance, indicated that his department had been working closely with federal officials in efforts to establish arrangements whereby moneys that had been paid to municipalities could be recovered from payments of unemployment insurance.

In light of these events it is indeed difficult to understand that the Ontario minister would say that the new unemployment insurance program is causing extra costs to the province in welfare payments. Recent surveys have indicated that welfare payments generally have decreased primarily as a result of the more generous provisions of the new program. In actual fact, the unemployment insurance program, combined with the special employment program will save social welfare agencies, local taxpayers and provincial governments millions of dollars in 1972. And any reports to the contrary are totally incorrect.

As a matter of fact, the welfare commissioner of the city of Toronto recently indicated that welfare expenditures would be reduced by some $8 million as a direct result of the unemployment insurance program. Discussions have been proceeding with all provinces, including Ontario, in respect of the assignment of unemployment insurance benefits. A meeting has been arranged for March 21 in Toronto to review the procedural aspects for the assignment of unemployment insurance benefits.

I am further advised that the Toronto metro executive committee met yesterday and announced a $2 million reduction from its welfare budget. This saving is not unconnected, I suggest, with the new unemployment insurance program and the special employment program. So we see substantial social welfare cost reductions predicted for the province of Ontario and other provinces, yet some people in Canada still say that social welfare costs are increasing as a result of the new unemployment insurance plan. To say the very least, that kind of misinformation is most unhelpful.

It should be noted that the old unemployment insurance program did not permit the assignment of unemployment insurance benefits, and this frequently resulted in persons being paid twice for the same period of time. The new Unemployment Insurance Act gives the Unemployment Insurance Commission the power to assign benefits where arrangements have been made with provincial and municipal authorities.

It has been suggested this afternoon that there should be a one-week waiting period. Surely an actuarially sound program must proceed according to actuarial principles. If we were to reduce the waiting period to one week, the premiums would have to be increased substantially and benefits would be reduced. Anyone who buys automobile insurance knows that the $25 deductible policy is far more expensive than the $100 deductible. A two-week waiting period was thoroughly discussed in committee and is the result of actuarial estimates.

It has also been suggested that there should be a greater degree of decentralization. Surely the hon. member is aware that since 1970 unemployment offices, including service offices and central offices have increased in number by 50 per cent and that during the same period telephone lines have increased by 65 per cent. Surely he is not unaware of the fact that every two weeks well over 600,000 cheques are processed and despatched to grateful families from coast to coast. It might be useful to emphasize some of the undoubtedly positive accomplishments of this, the world's finest program of unemployment insurance, a fact which is beyond dispute.

This does not mean to say that this department or the government is resting on its laurels. Both before and during the recent criticisms of the commission's claims processing procedures extensive action was taken to identify and correct any administrative deficiences which could be the cause of the criticisms. The situation is now nearly back to normal, but the meaning of "normal" must be understood in the context of the magnitude of the commission's operations and the unfamiliarity of the unemployed with the new act, regulations and administrative procedures.

Currently, payments are being made every two weeks to well over 600,000 persons. However, these persons are continually changing at the daily rate of 10,000 new persons added and about 8,000 persons returning to work or exhausting their claim. The effect of 10,000 new claims per day is reflected in inquiries to the commission as each person proceeds to ask for application forms and perhaps to query the two-week waiting period, request an explanation of his benefit rate or income tax deduction or object to a disqualification, disentitlement or notice of ineligibility, etc. About 2,000 persons per day are subject to a disqualification procedure. The commission is averaging over 50,000 inquiries per day, a 50 per cent increase over last year due to the new act, regulations and procedures.

There has been continuous monitoring of the operations under the new act and procedural changes have been made as experience dictated. During December it became apparent that there were three major problems. First of all, the first cheque took longer than expected to reach the claimant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret that the time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House may I finish my statement?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member knows that the unanimous consent of the House is required for this. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I hear some no's.

Mr. Perrault: I thank the House for its courtesy.

Mr. Crouse: If you knew what was going on you would not need any extra time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I have rendered my decision and there should not be any argument.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I trust I will not try to get by a House order regarding timing. It was agreed at the beginning of this debate that no member would ask for extra time. This afternoon we heard a lengthy reply by the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) to a motion which I think he completely misread. I may say that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) was rather more on target because this motion deals with the period of waiting, the disentitlement, the effect on status and the way the citizens of the country have been affected in a number of areas. My colleagues have spoken about them. I refer to service pensions, Canada Pension Plan disability payments, the unemployment insurance field. Now I wish to refer in particular to immigration.

I am very glad that the Immigration Department prepared an apology for the parliamentary secretary to read to the House with regard to what has happened. It is not that everything was wrong before 1967 and everything has been right since. If there has been anything wrong with regard to immigration, it has been since 1967. In 1967 the department warned that the change in the regulations affecting the rights or the privileges of visitors to apply for landed immigrant status in Canada was going to cause trouble, and nothing has come but trouble to the point where it is suggested in many areas that there is abuse. There is nothing in what the parliamentary secretary has said, nor has any evidence come forward from the department except tacit admissions that there is abuse, that there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, who come to this country, presumably as visitors, apply for landed immigrant status and then disappear when they are turned down and turn up elsewhere, most of them in the United States. This country has become another avenue of illegal entry into the U.S.

What gets me is that in the Throne Speech of October, 1970, we were told we were going to get a white paper on immigration, an examination of the trend in immigration. Immigration has gone down from 200,000 persons per year to about 125,000. Ask any immigrant family what their attitude is toward the government. Let me say that the majority of those people are not a drag on the labour market. There are some casualties among them but the majority of them are hard working people. They do not have to conform to the artificially high standards that are set in the points game that people have to play with the department.

Never in my life have I seen anything quite so artificial as this rigid and arbitrary standard that has been set up with regard to the admission of immigrants to Canada. You have to go to school for 11 years or nine years as we do in Canada, but in the country from which the individual comes in six or seven years he may learn almost as much as in the nine years here. That is certainly true of the trades. I have never seen such an ostrich-like performance in the standards that have been set under a minister who did not care a whit about immigration. We know that the minister who was responsible at the time did not care a whit about immigration. As a matter of fact, his background is such that he would wish to eliminate as much immigration as he could.

Mr. Béchard: Who is he?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He is now Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). That is the point.

[Translation]

And I told him that too, without beating about the bush.

Mr. Béchard: Yes, but he answered you too, did he not?

[English]

We know that the regulations were made by the officials, approved by the minister and were never submitted to parliament for examination. We are always told that they have been passed by parliament. Not on your life. Be that as it may, there is that great, running sore that we were to have the benefit of the government's views on this, according to the Throne Speech of 1970. I asked the former minister many times when we were going to get the white paper on immigration. "Soon," he said, but 16 months have elapsed. We have had a new Throne Speech in which nothing was said about this.

We were told we were going to get amendments to the Immigration Appeal Board Act, but nothing has been said about that. The replies were "Soon," but the net result has been that the Immigration Appeal Board itself is run into the ground. They are doing yeoman work. They deal with just under 1,000 cases a year, which is a lot, yet there is now a backlog of over 7,000 cases. If there were no further appeals as of today it would take the Immigration Appeal Board seven to eight years to deal with the backlog.

What happens to the people in the interval? I admit that some of them are acting in direct contravention of the law. I do not want to call into question any of those cases where there may have been fraud. But what about all those people who are now in the country awaiting appeal, working, getting married and having children? Are we simply going to leave them in a limbo and five years from now say, "But you have only 45 points. Out". What about the children? What about the prejudice to the individual because there is a blind and obstinate desire or insistence on fulfilling bureaucratic rules? This is the point that I am concerned about.

I will argue with the Immigration Department about their standards but that is not the point that I am trying to make today. The point is this business of the continuous pile-up. I am referring to the case where an individual, having come to this country, applies in a bona fide manner according to the law and the immigration official does not grant him sufficient points but does not tell him that he has only perhaps 35 or 36 points out of the required 50. The individual must then ask for a special inquiry and at the time of the special inquiry the information is disclosed, not beforehand. The individual cannot go to anyone who is knowledgeable. He is often a poor immigrant who does not speak too well in either of our two official languages. He is in a strange land, baffled by officialdom, row upon row of officials, a great big machine which absolutely terrifies and intimidates even those who come from countries where English is spoken.

I have seen Australian girls, competent computer operators, turned down because they were short of one or two years of their school education. They were told to ask for a special inquiry. They were petrified at the prospect of facing such a special inquiry. What is the lot of the individual who does not get a change of decision at the special inquiry and still there are grounds for dispute and there is a right of appeal? He gets a deportation order and is told to either go voluntarily or be deported.

There are presently 7,000 to 8,000 people who have deportation orders hanging over their heads. They cannot leave the country to go to the United States for even 24 hours. They cannot cross the border. On occasion I have asked ministers and senior officials when they intend to change this barbarous procedure. They say they are studying the matter and will bring in a white paper. Where is that white paper? In the interval, thousands and thousands of people are being made the subject of deportation orders. This is totally unnecessary.

This is the type of thing which is on one's record for life. At a future date, if a person were to ask for citizenship he would be asked whether he had ever been subject to a deportation order. That person must answer yes even though the deportation order may have been vacated. This is what I call an insistence upon an unjust society. I believe this is a situation in which thousands upon thousands of people in this country are suffering injustice from a bureaucratic system. Nothing is being done about this. This is the reason I make this protest.

This situation could be changed very easily. I invite hon. members to turn their attention to this matter. It is a narrow field. There are not hundreds of thousands of people affected; there are only a few people affected, but they are people in the main who are unable to defend themselves unless we speak up in this House. I am very pleased today to speak up on behalf of every one of them and I invite my colleagues to do so as well.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the resolution and I am not worried, as the parliamentary secretary is, about the broad sweep of its language. The resolution was intended to identify a serious problem which governments face and which this government faces in respect of its credibility because of, if I may put it fairly, lack of efficiency in adjudication of some of the claims. This is a serious matter and one on which I believe the House does well to spend a few hours.

This is a government which speaks of its flow charts and boasts about the efficiency of its organization. All this, I am sure, may be excellent but unfortunately a flow chart is quite lacking in compassion. I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Perrault) tell us about the number of cheques which are going out each week. I think this is something for which the government may well take credit. But while we play this numbers game in respect of totals we must remember—the parliamentary secretary and the minister are well aware of this because they had to go to extraordinary lengths to provide members of parliament with facilities to deal with the many thousands of cases which do not appear in the statistics—that these are not all "plus" statistics, if I might put it that way.

We respect those public servants who are doing a superb job in trying to handle the difficulties and we welcome the special telephone numbers, although I must say I somewhat resent the fact that a member of parliament is given the privilege of using a special number when members of the public who are entitled to it because of their contribution are unable to have the service. There is something in the way of elitism or unpleasantness about this. Surely each citizen should be able to reach the Unemployment Insurance Commission and other government boards without the need of this sort of intermediary pressure.

The particular aspect I wish to speak about today is the unconscionable delay which was alluded to by my friend the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) in respect of the adjudication of Canada Pension Plan claims particularly in so far as the disability aspect is concerned. This is not a matter of privilege. What is being adjudicated upon under the disability section of the Canada Pension Plan is a right which has been bought and paid for by the individual citizen who participates in the plan. I believe it is quite unconscionable that people who are at a very serious stage because of ill health must go through a period of delay month upon month. My hon. friend spoke about delays of six months. When we inquire about situations in respect of the Canada Pension Plan we are told quite casually by officials that there is a six months' waiting period.

I genuinely wished to take part in this debate today to say this is quite an unacceptable procedure. We were all here and took part in the debate in respect of the Canada Pension Plan and there was no question, when we passed that statute, that there would be a six months' delay. Certainly, when the head of a family is stricken because of ill health there should be no question of a six months waiting period. This is an example of straight bureaucratic inefficiency.

This resolution is designed to identify the problem to the government and, with the greatest respect, is an attempt to get the government off its celebrated status quo to which the parliamentary secretary alluded. There can be no excuse for a six months' delay in respect of disability pensions. I have had several cases involving a lengthy waiting period. I had an unfortunate case recently under the Canada Pension Plan involving an orphan who waited for entitlement from January until July 1971. It is no wonder governments are thought of cynically. There is a credibility gap, if I may use a cliché. It is no wonder governments are under pressure from the public when such unnecessary delays occur.

The motion also included a reference to delays in passport applications. I give the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) credit for the opening of regional offices. It is somewhat ironic, when one department centralizes, which is the case in respect of the unemployment insurance offices which are being centralized, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has recognized a need for decentralization and has set up offices in Vancouver, Edmonton, Montreal and Halifax to mention but a few. However, there still remains a very serious problem in respect of processing passport applications. I do not know whether the House is interested in these sort of anecdotal references, but they are the only way in which a member of parliament can personalize individual cases. This brings flesh and blood into what otherwise would be a series of meaningless statistics.

• (1730)

Presently I am trying to deal with the passport application of a man who served this country in World War I and World War II. He has his World War I army discharge certificate. He has a notarized copy of his entry in the family Bible. He has an identification card with his fingerprints and photograph, and with the signature of the Deputy Minister of Munitions and Supply, which allowed him to go in and out of the offices in which he worked in Ottawa during World War II. But still he is ineligible for a passport.

This is an individual case. Governments get tired and frustrated with individual cases. But the member of parliament who is representing individual cases, and is glad to do so, is perhaps the last humanizing link between the citizen and the state. Really, Mr. Speaker, it becomes very frustrating for us when these almost incomprehensible—I hate to use the expression red tape because it is overused—regulations prevent citizens from entitlement to their ordinary privileges.

I do not know whether my colleagues in this House enjoy Kafka, but Kafka was a contemporary philosopher of the absurd. I think it is fair to say that Kafka would understand perfectly; as a matter of fact he would really be the patron of the Department of Labour and its machinations with the Canada Pension Plan and unemployment insurance. Kafka warned mankind that if man allowed himself to be captured by the mechanisms of modern technology, then the ordinary human elements of life would really be second or third rank. As I say, he was a philosopher of the absurd and therefore he would have identified very readily with the motion that is before the House.

An hon. Member: And with practitioners of the absurd.

Mr. Fairweather: Yes, with practitioners of the absurd.

Mr. O'Connell: You are well versed in the absurd.

Mr. Fairweather: Any member of parliament who is doing his duty is well versed in the absurd when dealing with this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: There is no problem with that, particularly when we hear great lines of figures read out, with talk about 600,000 cheques. As members we have to deal with individual persons, and it is a good thing for this country that some people are dealing with persons on an individual basis. We see the difference between insensitivity and compassion. In fact, this may be a good subject for an election manifesto.

No doubt we will soon have great election lists recording boasts of achievements. I presume one that the government will want to lay claim to is the Canada Pension Plan. But nowhere in its boasts will be the orphan who had to wait seven months for an identification of his claim. Nowhere will be the individual people who are suffering disabilities, who have paid for their entitlement and yet cannot get adjudication for six or seven months because of absurdities. This motion is intended to jolt the government off its very complacent status quo and I am delighted to support it.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to see this motion appear on the order paper, particularly as it deals with a number of departments. It indicates that people have difficulties with quite a number of departments. All members of parliament receive mail outlining individual problems. The people concerned encounter a stand-off in trying to achieve ready settement of what appear to them to be simple problems.

The matter of unemployment insurance is one that has been raised a number of times in this House. I am always surprised to find that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) is able to read some of the garbage that some civil servants hand him. He did it again today. He pointed out that 600,000 cheques were mailed out; but really what does that mean? Every person in this country who works at a job paying over $25 a week and who spends over 24 hours on the job pays unemployment insurance. He pays it just as sure as the sun rises and the sun sets. It is taken from his pay cheque.

There is no question about whether he wants to pay it or not. No consideration is given to the possibility of slow mail, of a lost contribution, or to the possibility that the computer did not handle it properly. The government is highly efficient in getting its pound of flesh. On the other hand, different criteria apply when the government is dealing with individual people who have claims against it.

The parliamentary secretary has often said that 97 per cent of the unemployment insurance cases are settled within what he calls a normal period of time. What is the normal period, Mr. Speaker? It is between four weeks and eight weeks. Anything over eight weeks is considered to be not quite normal. This amounts to three to four paydays that the worker must wait. In such a case it is not difficult to understand why people seek welfare. I send my share of people to welfare offices because I sympathize with them and I am never sure that the UIC will solve their problem soon or at all.

I am also prepared to tell many people that if they can get out of signing the assignment, they should do so. The amount of money these people get is never $100, as the government claims; it is always considerably less. It is a physical impossibility to get $100 under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Although there are many booklets pointing out that the worker is entitled to $100, the worker never gets that amount.

Mr. Perrault: You had better read the book again.

Mr. Peters: I know it has been rewritten several times, but despite the propaganda that claim is not true.

Mr. Perrault: You are misleading your constituents.

Mr. Peters: You simply can't get $100. A person accustomed to an income of $8,000 or $10,000 a year finds that $100 is the minimum he needs to make the payments which he has contracted. But he finds income tax deducted from the $100 and his actual payment is considerably less. Some of the problems connected with unemployment insurance are the fault of the government. One mistake was the computer. We undertook the computer system on the cheap. I am sure it is costing the UIC several millions of dollars to cover the mistakes obviously made in the development of its computer. In the unemployment insurance offices in each province the computer has a payout recorder attached to it. This payout goes on tape which is then sent to the various offices. When someone wants information from it they must scan the whole computer tape. An outlying area may be two or three days behind and have to go over a number of these tapes. This is very expensive and causes difficulty. If someone telephones for information they cannot get a reply because it takes so long to find it and, of course, the person answering the telephone has no connection with the particular section responsible for the computer.

Mr. Perrault: You are badly confused.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I handle many more cases than the parliamentary secretary does, so I am familiar with this matter. He is not familiar with anything. He is just an apologist for the government. He has been that kind of apologist since his election and that is what he will continue to be. He knows only what he is told by an official of his department, so sometimes he is able to convey sensible information to the House.

Mr. Perrault: You are misleading your constituents. You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Peters: The Unemployment Insurance Commission should have a computer system similar to that used by Air Canada for reservations, so that when information on a claim is requested it can be retrieved from the memory bank. That should have been done in the first place and I hope it will be done now. There are other delays, Mr. Speaker. The office that I deal with is at least 50 per cent understaffed.

Mr. Perrault: I think it is some of the poor advice you are giving to your constituents.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, my constituents will worry about that when the time comes.

An hon. Member: We want them to get their money.

Mr. Peters: I would like them to get their money and every municipality in my area would like them to get their money. Many of the municipalities are rural and they cannot afford to pay these people; they just do not have the funds. There are at least a dozen letters from the unemployment insurance office in Kirkland Lake demanding some sort of courtesy to that office. Kirkland Lake has an unreasonably heavy unemployment insurance load and it cannot afford to pay the claims made in the form of welfare payments. True, Ontario has an assignment but when a person draws less than two-thirds of his former wages in unemployment insurance, and many of the unemployed are in that category, he cannot go four paydays without money and therefore he goes to the municipality for welfare.

This is a point that bears investigation, Mr. Speaker. Toronto is in a different category from other areas because it has an unemployment insurance district office and people can go there in person. Areas outside the major cities operate entirely by mail and this presents another problem involving the post office. This afternoon I was talking to a member who indicated that on occasion he can get a letter in British Columbia within a day, but a very important letter on one occasion took nine days.

An hon. Member: That is not unusual.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Perrault: There was an air strike.

Mr. Peters: It would not be so bad if that happened all the time because then you would know it takes nine days. But in another case where air is not involved the Unemployment Insurance Commission in Belleville mailed five letters on Monday, five on Tuesday, five on Wednesday, five on Thursday and five on Friday. The office in Timmins got two letters on Tuesday, four on Wednesday, two on Thursday, three or four on Friday and the balance the following Monday. How can a thing like that happen, Mr. Speaker? They put it in the mailbox, onto the sorting table then onto the truck and then on the second day you get two letters. These letters were specially prepared by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, but of course the parliamentary secretary would not know anything about that because he has not been told by his officials.

Mr. Perrault: Did you contact the postal workers?

Mr. Peters: You cannot blame the unemployment insurance people for that but you can certainly blame the government. When you put an eight-cent stamp on a letter, if you knew it was going to take eight or nine days to get to British Columbia you would think about operating a special airline. And what about the letter that takes one day? How did the two letters get from Belleville to Timmins in one day and some did not arrive until the following week? These are simple problems, Mr. Speaker, and people want to know the answers.

Mr. Perrault: Have you written to the post office?

Mr. Peters: Then I would be in the same position as everybody else.

An hon. Member: They would never get the letter.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago I asked the post office for some literature and suggested that I would send a messenger for it. They said they would put it in the mail and that I would get it right away. Well, they did and four or five days later I had to send a messenger to get it. About a week later it arrived in the mail. They had put it in a brown envelope and you know the people who handle the mail do not like touching those.

Mr. Perrault: Are you sure you put a stamp on it?

Mr. Peters: I didn't send it, Mr. Speaker; the post office sent it to me. I did not have anything to do with putting a stamp on it.

An hon. Member: He just doesn't understand anything.

Mr. Peters: The point is that in a modern society we have to speed up processes. There are ways of doing things that will cause little displacement in the life of the average individual I may be wrong, but I believe that rather than keep two plans going the Unemployment Insurance Commission should have had two systems going. When a person phones saying that it is four or five weeks since he sent in his form and he has not heard anything, there should be another side to the unemployment insurance system, as there once was, where the matter could be dealt with by hand.

If the computer rejects a claim, then someone should take another look at it and see that it is processed by hand. If not, the person has to start all over again and another four or five weeks go by. I do not know why we have not been able to operate the systems simultaneously. Computers are probably the tool of communication of the future, but there is a human element involved which means that we will always have difficulties, and steps should be taken to deal with them. It is not good enough for the parliamentary secretary to say that only 2 per cent or 3 per cent of the population is affected.

Mr. Perrault: I never said that.

Mr. Peters: You did, in exactly the opposite way. You say that 97 per cent are being paid regularly. The hon. member has said it at least four or five times. I presume he had previously read what he was reading then, but of course he may not have. I think that members of parliament have to get as much assistance as possible from the department and they will have to intercede on behalf of constituents who have problems.

I have read in the newspapers about people asking Star Probe to investigate a problem. What did they say? Star Probe handled the problem of a man who was laid off last July. He said that his experience was like screaming in a soundproof room.

• (1750)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak to the motion now under study. I listened with great satisfaction to the speeches of several hon. members, and one thing that makes me happy is the fact that the motion calls upon the government to accelerate public services which affect our way of life.

We often tend to blame the government very categorically. In view of the phrasing of the motion, the government will normally be inclined to reply in the affirmative to the requests made today by hon. members concerning certain services which cannot always, this is true, be easily improved.

To give the impression that the minister alone is responsible for unemployment insurance benefits is unfair, in my view. I am sure that the minister, as well as hon. members, want every claimant to receive his cheque without delay, and that the difficulties suffered by those who have been waiting for their benefits, especially since January, will be overcome.

I shall refrain from simply accusing the minister of being responsible for those difficulties, as I believe that the government has in fact tried to improve the service. I wonder, however, if it would not have been better to keep a certain number of regional offices, because it is possible that the experiment that was carried out is not conclusive.

I personally had occasion to ask the minister, six or seven months ago, to reopen an unemployment insurance office in my area, and I received an affirmative reply. Now, this service is again available to my riding, and is most appreciated.

I should also like to ask the government to consider improving services at the civil servant level, taking into consideration all the time spent on negotiations concerning the new agreement on family allowances in the province of Quebec and the other provinces.

I could also mention the endless negotiations concerning the policy on telecommunications. It is evident that not only the province of Quebec, but the others as well, often complain about these long-drawn out negotiations. In fact, we are quite aware that citizens would benefit greatly if these services could be improved.

I suggest that the government could give favourable consideration to the request expressed in this motion, urging them to seek solutions for improvement of these services.

Of course, I shall not dwell on the immigration and passport procedure. I know that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) gave an account of the situation. There again, I imagine that the white paper in question should normally be published and tabled in the House before long.

Distribution of mail was also mentioned. Of course, many changes have been made in the Post Office over the last four years. On being elected to the House of Commons, I deplored the serious changes that were made, without enough concern for the service that department was to offer the public.

I remain deeply convinced that the Post Office is a public service. The public not only needs that service, but is entitled to it. I do not believe it wise to put profitability before service due the Canadian people among the assessment criteria. Some definite changes have been made now following the replacement of the imcumbent at the time, and I hope they will produce much more humane results for the country.

I felt it necessary to make these few remarks and to call upon the government to seriously consider improving such services, in the interests of the Canadian people. I have faith in a motion requesting the government to consider all representations from hon. members. In the debate, they did not simply blame or criticize the government, but outlined to the minister the difficulties being experienced by the Canadian people. I believe that we can thus make the government aware of the situation while providing it with as much information as possible, and this solely to improve the services provided to our people and to give them the satisfaction they so legitimately look for.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

The House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—PETITION OF OLD CROW INDIANS

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Yukon rising on a point of order?

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on the question of privilege, notice of which I sent to Your Honour yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to cause any difficulty, but I was not aware that the Chair had received notice of a question of privilege. I believe I received notice of a motion yesterday but not notice of a question of privilege. Perhaps it might be difficult to determine whether the notice was notice of a motion or notice of a question of privilege. I suppose it is a question of interpretation, whether the words used by the hon. member can be interpreted as notice of a question of privilege rather than notice of a motion. In the circumstances, I will give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt. He may indicate what the privilege is that he proposes the Chair should consider.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises as a result of the petition of the Old Crow Indian people which was tabled in the House of Commons a short time ago and is based upon Standing Order 67(8) which reads as follows:

No debate shall be permitted on the report—

The report of the Clerk of Petitions.

—but a petition referred to therein may be read by the Clerk of the House at the Table, if required;—

Your Honour will recall that instead of being read the petition was printed in Hansard as though it had been read. After the semicolon in paragraph 8 of Standing Order 67—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with hon. members in welcoming back to the House the Minister of Manpower and Immigration after his illness. After the semicolon there follows an alternative procedure that is available if certain conditions are met:

—or if it complain of some present personal grievance requiring an immediate remedy, the matter contained therein may be brought into immediate discussion.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is now a requirement for an immediate remedy since the minister has invited applications for the construction of a pipeline or pipelines which inevitably must cross the land forming the subject matter of the claim of the Old Crow Indian people as contained in their petition. I do not suggest, nor do they, that they be heard in this House immediately, but they seek the same accommodation that was given to a member a short while ago when a petition he presented was referred to a standing committee for consideration, the same accommodation that was given by unanimous consent yesterday when the complaints of Miss Booth were referred to a standing committee of the House for consideration. They seek only to have the petition referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

• (1410)

The fact that the Barber commission has been set up does not offer an acceptable nor an effective alternative to the petitioners. Because of the immediate requirements which I have outlined to Your Honour and because the rules do contain an alternative procedure whereby the petition can be referred, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Yewchuk):

That the petition of Chief Charlie Abel and Councillors of the Old Crow Indians in the Yukon Territory, presented to this House on February 29, 1972, be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for inquiry and report with the committee's recommendations, if any, thereon.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member for Yukon will appreciate, there are procedural difficulties with which the Chair is faced. The Standing Order to which he referred does provide a procedure which in some instances can be followed, but I respectfully suggest to him that that procedure was not available for consideration of the House when the petition to which the hon. member referred was presented to the House.

The hon. member now seeks to raise the matter by way of a question of privilege. I have serious doubts whether a matter of this kind can be brought before the House by way of a breach of parliamentary privilege. This is really what the hon. member must allege at the present time, that there has been in some way a breach of parliamentary privilege. If anyone's privileges are affected, it would be the signatories of the petition. It would be the Old Crow Indians referred to in the petition submitted by the hon. member for Yukon. I doubt very much that it can be argued successfully, at least so far as I can judge, that the parliamentary privileges of the hon. member for Yukon have been affected to such an extent that I should rule there is a prima facie case of privilege.

As the hon. member knows, when in the opinion of the Chair there is a prima facie case of privilege there can be a debate. What is referred to a committee is the breach of privilege, not the substantive matter. What the hon. member now proposes is that the petition of Chief Charlie Abel and other members of the Old Crow Indians be considered by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for inquiry and report. That is really a substantive motion. In my view, the hon. member will have to find another way to submit the substantive motion for consideration by the House.

The hon. member quite rightly referred to the fact there was accommodation in another instance when the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond presented a motion which in a way was similar to this one. It was also based on a petition. It was agreed between the representatives of the parties that the matter would be considered by a standing committee of the House. There is that possibility yet, I suppose. I would urge the hon. member to take this up with the representatives of the other parties. I would certainly supply my good offices to the extent they could be helpful in trying to achieve compromise or accommodation as was done when we were met with a similar difficulty some months ago.

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in both official languages the final report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Editor's Note: For text of above reports, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Charlevoix rising on a point of order?

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before this report is tabled, I should like to bring up a point of order.

The document being tabled is extremely important; it deals with the constitutional future and the fundamental laws of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this report did not get the unanimous support of the committee. Diverging opinions were voiced about the philosophy of the report and certain chapters.

The hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) and myself have prepared a minority report and I understand that other members of the committee did so too.

The possibility of members filing minority reports was discussed in committee. That right was refused by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, we claim that this fact contributes to denying the minority the right to express itself. Should permission be denied to table minority reports at the same time as the main report of the committee, I feel that this would constitute a very serious reflection on democracy.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker, the committee in question is not like other committees; it is a special committee and, on referring back to Votes and Proceedings, one finds that this committee is called the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada. And I emphasize this point: it is not an ordinary but a special committee.

I would now like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the following fact: it is obvious that, according to some practices of the House, minority reports on standing committees of the House—and I say "standing"—cannot be tabled at the same time as the main report. And in my view, this is wise. Here is why: it is obvious that when standing committees are called upon to study a public bill or a government measure, it is not possible to accept minority reports from such standing committees.

It would not seem to me that the Chair could have accepted, let us say on the proceedings of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, minority reports regarding legislation introduced by the government.

May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether there could be a little more order in the House so that I can make myself heard. It is of course not pleasing to hear French spoken in this House, but nevertheless I should like my hon. friends to hear my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a regular but a special committee in which no government policy is involved and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry I must interrupt the hon. member, but I agree with him.

[English]

These private conversations which are going on in the House are very embarrassing to the hon. member who has the floor and certainly make it difficult for the Chair to understand what is being said by the hon. member.

[Translation]

I suggest that hon. members having conversations or discussions to carry on do so as much as possible behind the curtains, in the lobbies.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, that joint special committee was in no way involved in government policy. That is why I say that because of that we should depart from the general rule adopted in the House to the effect that no minority reports can be submitted following proceedings of a permanent committee of the House. As this is a special committee, I feel that it should be allowed, in order that the voice of the minority may be heard, to submit minority reports concurrently with the main report.

Mr. Speaker, it would have been desirable after the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution to be able while reading the report of those proceedings to notice the dissent that was expressed from time to time either on questions of principle or opinions concerning some of the subjects that were dealt with. But such is not the case. If you peruse the report of the proceedings of this committee, whose report is being tabled in the House, nowhere can you see the names of one or more members who had taken objection. All that was done was to put the question, count the votes and say, for instance, ten members are in favour of the motion and 11 are opposed; therefore, the motion is negatived.

This is all that can be read in the reports of the proceedings. Perhaps if the heading "dissenting" had been put into those reports, I should not be making this request of the Chair today.

Besides, I would also refer the Chair to the mandate conferred to the committee by the government. The latter did not say: The committee shall consider such and such viewpoint or government policy but it merely advised: We appoint a special joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the constitution of Canada in order to study the Canadian constitution.

The government did not lay any policy on the line when it asked the committee to study the constitution of Canada and, in my opinion, the mandate did not commit the government at all. This is why the report does not bind the government. In fact, it can reject or accept it in whole or in part. I feel that this is an important point in the matter I am raising.

I should also like to recall a precedent dating from June 23, 1971, when the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence was submitted. I refer to paragraph 26 on page 3114 of the proceedings of the committee. This committee has submitted to this House a main report where dissidences were recorded. I refer this House more particularly to paragraphs 26 and 27 which read:

26. Some members of the Committee feel they are not able to concur with the Committee's findings, even though they approve a number of specific conclusions. In their view, the evidence and the facts which emerged from the Committee's examination justify a much more critical assessment of the first policy paper.

And the matter of minority opinions continues to be raised.

I therefore uphold that my request is well founded and that the precedent which I just quoted must bind the Chair to consider favourably the point of order which I raised.

Mr. Speaker, I say again that I have here copies of the minority report of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) and of myself, in the two official languages, and that I am prepared to table them if the Chair so decides. But before I close, I would like to say that, subject to the decision given by Your Honour, I reserve the right to move in the House a motion asking leave to produce the documents to which I have alluded.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) in the point of order he has raised. It seems to me it is one of very great importance. Whatever may be the technical and legal position taken in the past, I believe the time has now come when official recognition should be given to dissenting or minority reports.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: The great growth in the number of committees, the development of the committee system, the importance of the matters referred to committees, and the scholarly investigations of important subjects sometimes made by the committees through the hearing of witnesses have made it timely that we look very carefully at this rule which seems to provide at present that minority reports are not to be tabled. It is ridiculous to suppose that these committees are in fact unanimous in their findings. Yet the filing of only one report creates the impression that there has been a unanimous point of view; this is a misleading impression.

The committee we are now discussing has spent months studying the whole question of the fundamental law of Canada, namely the constitution of Canada. If my recollection is correct there are some 100 recommendations in the report, and it would be extraordinary if the members of the committee, representing as they do not only the different parties but all regions of Canada, came to a unanimous decision on all these recommendations. Yet the minority views may have very great value when the House comes to review this fundamentally important subject. They should also be of very great value to the public in its concern about the fundamental framework of all our parliamentary and governmental activity.

I shall cite very briefly at least two historic references to instances where dissenting reports later became the orthodox opinion of the majority. One was the case of a great theologian named Athanasius who stood out against 300 of his colleagues and pronounced a theological doctrine which eventually was accepted by the councils of the church and is now incorporated in the orthodox doctrines of the church. Another example is the dissenting opinions of two great United States justices, Mr. Justice Hughes and Mr. Justice Brandeis, whose dissenting opinions in the United States Supreme Court became the prevailing opinion of the whole court and expanded tremendously the field of civil liberties and the scope of the Bill of Rights in that country.

I understand that our present rule is that a committee, provided a majority of its members agree, may refer to a minority view if it wishes to do so. I would suggest that the responsibility for expressing minority views should be on those who hold such views. If the rule, through some technical, historic background, is that no minority report can now be presented, I urge that it be considered by the appropriate committee and changed. I say that it will be of value to the public discussion of fundamental issues if viewpoints are stated clearly. Indeed, a unanimous report, were it truly unanimous and not just made to appear unanimous, may have very great value.

In this particular committee I was impressed with the degree of unanimity on many fundamental issues of the members on that committee representing the Senate and the House of Commons from every corner of Canada. Yet at this moment under the present rule we do not know which of these 100 recommendations have the unanimous support of the whole committee.

I have not tried to argue this matter on a technical basis, but I say that a modern, intelligent, commonsense rule would permit minority voices to be heard in these reports.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to support firmly the point of order raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) and supported by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). As a member of this committee who has a minority report that is not the same as that of the hon. member for Charlevoix and the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), I think we are perpetrating a complete fiction by continuing the present system. Here we have a committee of 30 members representing four political parties from all the regions of Canada, composed of not only members of parliament but also ten senators.

An hon. Member: Wow!

Mr. Nowlan: Live ones?

Mr. Hees: It is hard to tell.

Mr. Allmand: Like other hon. members who have spoken, I feel that if we are truly going to contribute to the debate on the constitution, or on any other subject which is dealt with by a report, the serious minority views that some members of the committee may have after studying the situation should be attached to the report, published with the report and distributed with the report so that all persons who read that report will also be made aware of the principal minority positions that are being put forward by those members. Let me point out that in most deliberative bodies such as royal commissions and task forces there is a place for minority reports. Our Supreme Court and Courts of Appeal publish minority decisions.

I urge the House to accept the minority reports for tabling today. As I said, I have one as well. We should allow these reports to be part of the great debate on the constitution.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I must speak to this point of order, since we are obviously much concerned with it.

Generally speaking, it is not usual—and I agree with you on this—to allow the submission of a minority report together with the formal report of a committee. We know this rule applies to both standing and joint committees, as well as to special committees of this House. This is the case, for instance, of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Furthermore, according to the practice, dissident members may express their views in at least one way, that is—still according to the practice—in the report of the committee.

In this regard, I refer the Chair to paragraphs 26 and 27 of Issue No. 31 of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, one reads, and I quote:

> Some members of the Committee feel that they are not able to concur with the Committee's findings, even though they approve a number of specific conclusions.

Such is the situation of the dissident members of that committee.

In paragraph 27, one reads, and I quote:

> These members are also unable to agree with the underlying tone of the policy paper in its repudiation of the earlier idealistic internationalism in foreign affairs.

Mr. Speaker, within the standing committees of the House, the members were able to express their views, without being named for that reason, and, in the official report, account was taken of their disagreement. Their views were even printed, something which this committee has not done.

Mr. Speaker, in Citation 318 of the Fourth Edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, on page 642 of the Eighteenth Edition of May's Parliamentary Practice and on page 471 of the Fourth Edition of Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, it is provided that members may not present minority reports.

That is one thing. Another was accepted on June 26, 1971, when the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence was submitted: in the majority report, a dissident opinion could be expressed without naming the hon. members, this having been requested by the hon. members for Matane, (Mr. De Bané), for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) and others, but it was not taken into consideration by most of the committee members. Mr. Speaker, the former made their views known within the committee and asked for the inclusion in the report of the constitutional principle of self-determination. I quote an extract of the said report:

> This matter gives rise to strong exchanges of views, but the inclusion of this right in the Constitution has always been refused as principle.

And this principle was not included in the report even though the request was made several times.

Mr. Speaker, here is another inportant argument. As was the case with the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the members of the committee on the constitution, if I am not mistaken, asked several times that their differences of opinion be put on the record in the report, without mentioning the names of the members concerned; as usual, this was rejected. Thus, we ought to say a word about the rights of the minority.

Issue No. 31 of the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence does mention a fact that we should explain. That report indeed recognizes the right of hon. members to express different views and sometimes even views that are opposed to those of the majority, and the right to put these views on record in the majority report, which has been refused by the majority of the special joint committee on the constitution. That is the question of privilege we are raising today.

It therefore follows that when discussing a revision of the constitution we are dealing with a substantial question. It is clear that such discussions involve, not only for Quebec but for all other Canadian provinces, the right of self-determination. However, hon. members have no other channels for stating their views than the normal legislative institution, which they control. They are therefore muzzled and unable to express their opinions, even diverging, otherwise than by their remarks or their vote within the committee—neither in the report nor in the House.

According to the normal regulations to which I referred previously, the Standing Orders obviously do not as yet authorize minority reports, a fact to be deplored in 1972, an era of such critically serious problem. And, what is worse, in this case the majority report deliberately ignores dissidence.

The procedure established for the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence represents an eminently noteworthy precedent and in my opinion dissident members have been denied their fundamental rights.

In fact, it might happen that a group of members of the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee, engaged in a study of the Canadian banking system, would want its opinions on monetary reform to be taken into account. If a similar right is denied today to members of the Committee on the Constitution, it will mean, to all intents of purposes, that members of the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee would likewise be unable to bring forward the concept of a monetary reform through the channels of the parliamentary institutions they control. Thus, their only means of having their views considered would be through action outside the House and the committees, which is quite incompatible with the definition of Parliament, a democratic institution in the highest sense of the word, where the minority is and should continue to be respected. Under that system, the Canadian people can express their views through their spokesmen, the members of Parliament.

This shows how important this question is. We are now dealing with a basic issue which the Chair must take into consideration when it renders its ruling.

We could also mention the reports of standing and special committees with which the government disagrees. What becomes of those reports? They remain on the shelves. And then the majority of the committee is muffled and stifled in favour of the silent majority in the House.

This is why members of our party wish to support dissenting members and to insist strongly that the rights of the minority be respected in the report without the names of the members involved being disclosed.

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the basic principle expressed by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin). I should also like to emphasize that it should be made clear that this principle extends not only to special committees but also to the standing committees of this House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wahn: —such as the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to which reference has been made. We faced this problem in that committee on a number of occasions. We could find no specific precedent which would prevent the expression in our report of minority points of view, although there seemed to be a general feeling that the House did not recognize minority reports from committees. On investigation we could find no specific precedent that would prevent minority views being expressed in our reports. Therefore we made provision in several of them for minority points of view to be recorded in the main body of the reports.

We did see that some confusion might result and that the system might be open to abuse if the principle were adopted that minorities could publish separate reports on their points of view at public expense, but we did not feel that this same objection could apply where the views of the minority were recorded within the main body of the report. This was the procedure we adopted. It was based on our experience that, if we refused to permit a minority to express its point of view in the main report, that minority simply prepared a report in any event and then gave it to the press. It seemed to us much better that the minority point of view should be summarized and discussed within the committee and form part of the main report rather than have this informal procedure followed.

We think that the procedure we have adopted works well and we hope that Your Honour's ruling will recognize it as a proper procedure and that it will be extended to all the standing committees of the House.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Your Honour is receiving a great deal of useful advice and I am not going to prolong this matter unduly. One of the points raised earlier was the question of whether there was sufficient precedent within our parliamentary tradition or whether it was possible within the foundation of our parliamentary system for there to be such minority reports. Without repeating the excellent arguments put forth for the acceptance of such minority reports, I think it might be useful to consult not the Mother of Parliaments in this case but one of our sister parliaments, that of Australia. In the Senate there, which is an elected body, minority reports are permitted. In Australian Senate Practice, third edition, 1967, the following is recorded at the conclusion of Standing Order 311 relative to the preparation of a draft report:

> A protest or dissent may be added to the report.

It goes on to say that the Senate considered there was considerable value in minority reports.

I think it is right and proper, as the chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence has stated, that such minority reports should be included from time to time where it seems appropriate. I shall not repeat the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) and others with respect to the importance of this question in relation to a matter that is so fundamental to the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in rising this afternoon to support unreservedly this submission and the request of the hon. members for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) and Matane (Mr. De Bané) so that this report can be tabled before the House.

Reference was made to the importance of our constitutional future in relation to the report produced by the committee and it is clear also in my mind that we have recognized that there could be no unanimity on this committee. A minority report is not normally acceptable to the House. I think however that one must consider the implications of the particular report that is being presented to us. I know that traditionally minority reports have not often been tabled, although it is recognized that precedents have existed.

Mr. Speaker, to justify the tabling of such a report, I should like to lay strong emphasis on the importance of the submission that is being made to the House by the hon. members for Charlevoix and Matane.

Members from Quebec and all others obviously need the information contained in the report which could be titled: Everything that a Member of Parliament Should Know. It faithfully reflects the situation in a province unsure of a country's future. I therefore believe that the clear and distinct conditions and explanations it contains would enable our English-speaking friends and colleagues to understand that the report is invaluable as far as the constitutional future of our country is concerned.

I am convinced that I had to make those few comments in order to justify the presentation of the report and that the federal government and Parliament today had the opportunity of proving themselves. Rejection of the report could be interpreted by citizens of one province as the refusal to acknowledge and listen to the truth which should have been exposed in the House a long time ago.

For all those various reasons, I dare hope that all members of the House will co-operate for unanimous concurrence in the report.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not intend to limit in any way the discussion of this very interesting and important point of order but as the afternoon wears on I would hope that all hon. members would want to attempt to limit their contributions to the procedural aspect of the discussion. I am sure this is what has been done pretty well until now. Hon. members may agree that to this point we have considered most of the procedural arguments which might be advanced in relation to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix. Having said that, it is certainly not my intention to limit the discussion and I shall listen to further argument on the procedural aspect of the matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, you are perfectly right when you say that the comments which have been presented may have exhausted the matter, but on the other hand, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that there is another precedent, in 1964, and I think that it is worth mentioning.

When the Special Committee on the Flag included in its report the votes taken during its proceedings, it was then extremely important that hon. members knew that votes had taken place, and I even think that the names of hon. members who had voted on those occasions were listed in the report. I am not absolutely sure of that, but the result of the votes was in that report.

I was sitting on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution, and I have personal remarks to make in that connection. These comments should be added as an appendix to the report or be included in it.

I read the report prepared by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) and the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané). I fully agree with their remarks, and I would also like my report to be tabled with the majority report.

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there were, I believe two aspects to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin). If I may deal with the first aspect at the beginning, it was to the effect that dissenting opinions expressed in the committee have not been recorded in the report which has already been tabled. It has been stated that that was the practice followed by the committee on external affairs, as verified now by the chairman of that committee. It seems to me that was the line of argument taken by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) also. On that particular aspect of the problem I am not proposing to argue, because it is a matter that ultimately must be resolved in committee and it does not arise in this case because the report now before the House does not contain any dissenting opinion. It may be that in future, through examination in the committee on procedure, we ought to devise a method or recognize a procedure by which dissenting opinion can be set out in the main report of a committee.

I believe we ought to reflect for a moment on the nature of the parliamentary process and on the nature of the reference that has been given to this committee and which was discharged today. The House of Commons asked the committee to study and bring forward recommendations on the constitution of Canada for consideration by the House. In the normal course the decision, either in this chamber or in a committee of the House, is rendered through the decision of the majority. The decision of that majority, whether in a committee of the House or in the House itself, becomes the decision of the House itself. It is recognized in the constitution of Canada that the majority decision becomes the decision of the House. The committee, having received a reference from the House of Commons, has deliberated. The majority has reached conclusions that have become the report of the committee itself as presented to the House. That is the traditional approach that has been followed pretty regularly, with the exception that has already been noted, and it may be an exception that we ought to continue in the future.

It is urged today that, in addition to receiving the report of the committee itself, the House ought to receive not only one minority report which is proposed to be laid on the table by the hon. member for Charlevoix and the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) but a further minority report from the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) and, finally, a further report from the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance). In other words, the House, having asked the committee to simplify its task by studying the problem and bringing forward conclusions that would aid the House, instead of receiving that assistance is to be confronted not with one main report of the committee but with four reports. That is really what is proposed.

An hon. Member: Five reports.

Mr. MacEachen: Five reports.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you people opposed to ideas?

Mr. MacEachen: It seems to me, if that proposition is admitted, that it will lead inevitably to the conclusion that every member of a committee is entitled to have his report tabled in the House. If that logic is admitted it means that, if one member can move concurrence in his report, every other member can also move concurrence in his report and there will be 10 or 15 contradictory propositions before the House at the same time. I believe that is not what is contemplated either in the minds of hon. members or by the rules. What is contemplated is that when the House receives a report from a committee it will receive the majority conclusions and that will be dealt with by the House. That does not preclude the right of the minority to make heard its dissenting voice, as undoubtedly was done in the committee and as can be done in the committee and as can be done in the House if and when a motion to concur is moved in the House. It is not a formula to eliminate dissent or the right of minorities to express their opinions. It is a practice that allows the House, with the greatest possible simplification of procedures, to deal with one report and still preserve the right of others to make their views known.

I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker, that our present practice is certainly more valuable and more useful to the House than any practice would be that contemplated any member of a committee having the right to table a report, have that report considered and a motion of concurrence moved with respect to it. I realize that there may be strong views as to the future course the committee system ought to take. I believe that the consequences of this matter are so important that it ought to be considered further. For the moment, however, I think we ought to maintain what has been the tried and tested practice followed by the House for a long time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice that there are still as many as six hon. members who want to take part in this interesting debate. As I said, I do not intend to limit the debate because this is such an interesting and important point, but I hope that hon. members will make their contributions as brief as possible.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I agree to some extent with what the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has said but I would differ in this respect. One of the problems encountered today arises from the fact that too often when committees consider their reports they consider them in camera. The motions that are made are usually made in camera. Opportunities for visible expression of dissent are not available to the extent that they would be in other circumstances, particularly in the House. In addition, Mr. Speaker, another problem we are confronted with is that too often committee reports are not discussed or debated in the House. There is a certain opportunity, of course, to discuss them but it is a limited one. An opportunity for hon. members who dissent from a report to move motions expressing their dissent might be one way of overcoming the problem to which my hon. friend from Charlevoix has referred. I think the right of dissent must be preserved. I know it is not held in high esteem across the floor, at present.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I feel, however, that we should try to preserve it as much as possible.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to address a few words to you on this matter, before you render your decision. As much as I might be tempted to agree with the generally persuasive words of many hon. members on this subject, especially those of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), I submit that the question which is raised today is not precisely the question they have been discussing. If, as I believe that the practice of the house is fairly well established, this is not the time for us to debate whether or not that practice ought to be changed. May I draw to your attention a discussion that took place in the committee itself on this question. On May 5, 1971, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce moved a motion which was subsequently adopted:

> Whereas this committee had discussion as to whether or not members should have the right to append personal minority reports to a committee report and whereas it was suggested that this was contrary to the rules of the House of Commons and the Senate,
> Be it resolved that this committee request the House of Commons and Senate for a clarification on this point and if such a right is contrary to the rules of the House and the Senate, that the rules be changed to allow for such personal minority reports.

In pursuance of this matter I contacted the Table and received in reply a letter from the Clerk, which it might be proper for me to table this afternoon. The substantial point made in that letter was that no known precedent exists for a minority report either in our practice or in the practice at Westminster. Citations were given from both Beauchesne and May. I will not take the time this afternoon to read the letter or to indulge in a lengthy procedural argument because I believe the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has already satisfactorily dealt with this part of the question.

I do not believe the members of the committee felt they were not at liberty, if they wished, to include in the report views which dissenting members had or to mention the names of those members. The fact is that the committee, in pursuance of the jurisdiction given it by the House, decided not to follow that course. The report I presented this afternoon is the report that was adopted by the majority of the members of the committee. The committee has, as it should, made the decision to print only the majority report. I should say, however, that in the text of the report the committee acknowledges there are dissenting opinions. In several places in the report there are references to positions taken as being the positions of the majority rather than of all members of the committee.

In conclusion, with regard to the matter of incorporating names and the particular feelings of individual members on questions, the committee has already made its decision and I submit that the House has no option but to accept the decision which has already been made by the committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall heed your admonition that comments be brief. In response to part of what was said by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), I think there should be in our minds at any rate a distinction between legislation when it is referred to a committee and a subject.

When a bill is referred to a committee, that committee has to make its report in clear terms, yes or no. However, when a subject is referred to a committee, surely what this House wants is ideas. I do not see anything wrong with a report or reports coming back from a committee to the House which give to the House the benefit of not only the ideas of those who comprise the majority but the benefit of the ideas of the minority members of that committee.

I thought another point which the President of the Privy Council made or sought to make was a bit of a red herring. He suggested that if there were four, five or six reports we could have a series of debates on motions to adopt those various reports and that would create a great deal of chaos and confusion.

If we are going to meet this problem effectively, it is obvious we are going to have to make some rule changes. Certainly we could provide in any rule that it is only the majority report that is debated on the floor of the House. At the present time the only provision for concurrence by motion is in a report, not in a minority report or a minority opinion which might be tabled at the same time.

I have no hesitation in saying that I realize Your Honour will have difficulty, particularly in view of the clear language of citations 318 and 319 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, in ruling that the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) or other members have the right today to lay on the table their minority opinions or minority reports. However, I want to underline two things that have been said during the course of the debate this afternoon.

The rules, including citations 318 and 319 to which I have just referred, do not deny to any committee the right, by a majority vote, to include in its report the opinion of the minority. The hon. member who spoke just before me, the chairman of the committee, said that his committee decided not to do that. However, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) earlier reported that his committee had decided to take that course of action.

Perhaps I may be digressing for 30 seconds from the point of order, but I should like to say this. With all the talk we hear from the other side about participation in the process of government and all the talk we hear about the importance of the committee structure, is it not time that committee work was made something other than monolithic? Is it not time that committees had the decency, courtesy, foresight and intelligence to report back to the House not just the opinion that got the largest number of noses when the count was made, but the opinions and ideas that came out of the discussion in the deliberations of that committee?

I make a strong appeal to committees, to this one and to others, to update themselves and think of committees not just as instruments of the government there to endorse one opinion only but as instruments of parliament that have been given a job, to bring ideas back to the House of Commons.

As I said in my opening remarks, I see a difference between legislation and subjects which have been referred to a committee. In the case of subjects, surely we want all the ideas we can get that will be good for the discussion that goes on in parliament and in the country.

The last thing I should like to do is concur in the suggestion that others have made that surely the time has come to make any changes in the rules that are required in order to update ourselves in this regard. If this means that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization should look into this matter, I hope it will be given the opportunity to do so right away.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to comment on what was said by the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). He made several references to the proceedings of the committee. His argument serves the point raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin). He said that when a member suggested that his opinion be included, the majority decided, that when a member suggested that votes be registered, the majority decided.

In the House of Commons, everyone at least has the right to have his opinion made public. It is recorded in Hansard. As hon. members know, when a committee report is drafted it is done in camera. The public do not know what has been said there. It is not recorded. When a member moves a motion or votes for or against something in the House, it is recorded and available to the public. The stand that each member takes is known.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the point raised by my hon. friend, the co-chairman of the committee seems to concern us.

Mr. Speaker, I think we all appreciate the same values—that states, countries, forms of government, political structures and especially the number of reports are sacred and history is there to prove it. And how! What is eternal, precious and must be saved at all costs is the primacy of man, the principle of freedom, equality and the right to defend our own opinions within legal structures.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take the liberty of pointing out to the hon. member that as much as possible he must restrict himself to the procedural aspect of the issue under consideration. He now seems to be expounding the philosophy of the parliamentary government and I do not think that is the point raised at the present time.

Mr. De Bané: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, my second point is that committee reports are always prepared in camera so that members do not have the opportunity of expressing their points of views, as is done in any other debate of this House. Of course, one may reply that members who have minority reports to submit can always forward them to the media, but obviously this is not the point because members enjoy the privilege of having their reports recorded for all time in the proceedings of Parliament.

It can also be said, as the co-chairman of the committee suggested, that the report states a few times—especially in the communiqué—that the majority has decided a certain thing. They do not say "unanimously". But of course saying "by a majority" does not indicate who voted for and which motions have been rejected by a majority.

I would like to end by quoting to Your Honour, further to the quotation of my hon. colleague for Charlevoix regarding paragraphs 26 and 27 of the 1971 report by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the Report of the Select Committee on Overseas Aid, Session 1970-71 of the House of Commons in London.

At page 67 of the 1971 report, the name of the sponsor of each motion is given in full and then it is stated. The amendment was made, the Committee divided—"Yeas", so many, "Nays", so many.

And when the vote is tied, the chairman has a casting vote.

So, when the joint chairman of the committee argues that there are no precedent here or elsewhere, the hon. member for Charlevoix mentions a precedent from this House, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) mentions one from Australia and I mention one from the Mother of Parliaments.

• (1510)

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the problem with which we are dealing now is of the utmost interest to me. I listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) and also to those of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen).

The issue is one of procedure and the function of committees, according to what the President of the Privy Council said, is to examine a particular question in order to further the work of the House. In a committee, the question is given closer scrutiny while often the House can proceed with other measures.

I always understood that committees had a responsibility but I never understood, Mr. Speaker, that some committee reports are discussed by Parliament and others are never discussed.

If committees have been established for studying specific problems, I think this was to throw more light on a subject after a special study. So, if this is the purpose, when a committee is tabling its report and dissenting members cannot have their viewpoints stated in this report, I think the House and the government are deprived of valuable information.

Since Parliament may accept or reject a committee report and in view of the serious nature of the problem and of the Canadian political climate, Parliament should stand as an example to the whole country and respect any and all minorities.

Under the present circumstances, the tabling of a minority report is requested. We are not aware of its content. So if the government wishes to know the viewpoints of all the committee members we should logically accept both the majority and the minority reports. This would be a fine example to the whole country and government would be able to know the evidence given to each committee member everywhere in the country.

Finally, I must say that I have already been a member of a most important committee which spent tax money to travel throughout the country. I had no opportunity of having my views incorporated into the report. I was quite disappointed and this report which was tabled in the House has never been called by the President of the Privy Council to be debated.

That, in my opinion, is the procedure which should now be followed. I readily agree with the hon. member for Charlevoix and ask the Chair to accept the minority report.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members of every party who, for the guidance of the Chair, have stated some sound views, I am sure, which I will try to take into consideration when giving a ruling on the point of order of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin).

The hon. member has indicated that he was rising on a point of order before concurrence in the report.

I wish to point out immediately that the matter has nothing to do with the approval of the report. A motion for concurrence in the report will be put forward in due time, I suppose, either by the chairman of the committee or another member on his behalf or a member speaking on behalf of the committee members.

We are now discussing the tabling of the report and we must take for granted that it has already been tabled and that it is now before the House.

If I understand correctly, the hon. member for Charlevoix rose on a point of order because he would like to know whether minority reports can be tabled or should be concurred in at the same time as the majority report. No need to indicate to hon. members that this would be an entirely new practice.

Members who have participated in this debate on procedure have referred to parliamentary practice in Australia. The hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) has referred to the procedure in Great Britain, but no precedent has been quoted to me to the effect that I could allow the submission of one or more minority reports.

Members have largely quoted, I admit, sections and precedents which carry weight in such cases. Paragraph 319 of the 4th edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms has been quoted to this House:

The report of the committee must be signed by the Chairman. No other signature should be affixed to a report for the purpose of showing any division of opinion in the committee, nor can it be accompanied by any counter statement from the minority, as such is unknown in British parliamentary practice.

I would add, by the way, that it is also unknown in Canadian parliamentary practice.

I keep on quoting:

The Chairman only signs by way of authentication on behalf of the committee. He should sign even if he dissented with the majority of the committee. No minority report should be made to the House.

It should be noted that Bourinot refers to the fact that in certain circumstances, a minority report has been attached as an appendix to the majority report of the committee.

It must be indicated also that the precedent quoted to justify this practice dates back to 1874. It might perhaps be useful if I were to read this quotation from the 4th edition of Bourinot's. Here it is:

• (1520)

[English]

No signatures should be affixed to a report for the purpose of showing any division of opinion in the committee; nor can it be accompanied by any counter-statement or protest from the minority, as such a report is as unknown to Canadian as to English practice. When the chairman signs a report, it is only by way of authentication. In 1879, a report of a dissenting member was brought in and appeared in the votes, but attention having been called to the irregularity of the proceeding, this minority report was ordered not to be entered on the journals. The rule with respect to such matters, however, has been more than once practically evaded by permitting a minority report to appear in the appendix to the report of the committee;

[Translation]

This is where reference is made to a precedent dating back to 1874.

On the other hand, hon. members, especially the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) have stated that in recent years, especially in 1971, the report of the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence included the dissident or minority opinions of some members.

I find nothing in the precedents established by the House to prevent such a procedure. What the Standing Orders and parliamentary practice forbid is the tabling of minority reports. It is somewhat in the nature of an obiter dictum to suggest that a report may include dissident or minority opinions.

But what reaches us eventually is a single report, the majority report, and the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence which was presented last year contained dissenting opinions of course but only one report was presented and no suggestion was made that the House should receive at the same time a second, third, or fourth minority report.

In view of the circumstances, I really cannot see how I could ignore this long parliamentary tradition and allow the hon. member for Charlevoix, the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance), the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), in short all hon. members who said that they had minority reports to present, to table those minority reports.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In very eloquent terms, the hon. member for Greenwood suggested that time has come to change the Standing Orders. It is possible. Some members have said that time has come for Parliament to give members of a committee the opportunity of expressing their diverging points of view in a minority report. Perhaps, but unfortunately it is not up to the Chair to make such a decision.

The hon. member for Greenwood and, I believe, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested it. The proposal is valid, interesting and could easily be studied by the Procedure and Organization Committee. Many times, I took the liberty of recommending that this committee examine some parliamentary practices. Here is one which I think could be usefully studied by the committee.

Having said that, I do not think I can comply with the hon. member's request that the minority reports be now presented.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, when I raised on a point of order, I reserved the right to move the appropriate motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. Without contemplating an appeal from your decision, far from it, I would like to obtain the unanimous consent of the House.

May I move my motion immediately or should I do so on motions?

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, the hon. member should wait for motions, which will be called in a moment, I think.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENTATION OF MINORITY COMMITTEE REPORTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask unanimous consent of the House to move a motion providing for hon. members who so desire to present minority reports on the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion presented by the hon. member for Charlevoix. That motion requires the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to Standing order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

Mr. André Fortier (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

It seems that we have reached a point where a minority of one single hon. member can defeat the majority.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENT IN "CANADA 1972"—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning the dissemination of seriously misleading statements in a document published under the authority of one of the ministers of the Crown. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That the publication Canada 1972 and particularly the statement on page 105, "Defeat of a major government bill will ordinarily be considered a vote of confidence . . . but the cabinet can choose to consider any such defeat not decisive," be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for examination as to any real or implied diminution of the rights and priveleges of this House or of its members.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be a lack of unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) might have been making a statement on motions today, but in light of the fact that he is not I request unanimous consent of the House under standing Order 43 to move the following motion of urgent and pressing necessity, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean):

That in light of the breakdown in communication between the potato producers on Prince Edward Island and the Minister of Agriculture, resulting in widespread misunderstanding and anxiety—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have serious doubts about the terms of the motion proposed by the hon. member. It is obviously argumentative. Perhaps the hon. member might indicate quickly what the rest of the motion is so that it might be put.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In light of the request received today by the minister for his attendance at a mass meeting of growers in Charlottetown tomorrow I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque:

That this House does request the Minister of Agriculture and his officials to attend this meeting so that there may be a resolution of the concern and anxiety about the diversion potato program in the shortest possible time.

Mr. Speaker: The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

RESEARCH ANIMALS PROTECTION BILL

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR HUMANE TREATMENT

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-171, to provide for the humane treatment of vertebrate animals used in scientific and industrial experiments, tests or training by recipients of grants from the government of Canada, by agencies of the government of Canada and by persons manufacturing or testing pharmaceutical or biochemical products for sale to the government of Canada or to any of its agencies.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Speaker, those who have looked at this bill know it has been introduced in the House previously. Its purpose is self-evident. I am hoping that this time the House in its wisdom will see to it that the bill is passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION OF BUDGET AND ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. On Tuesday, in answer to a question from the Leader of the Opposition regarding whether or not the government intended to introduce a budget this spring, the Minister of Finance used the following words:

I cannot tell the hon. member if or when there will be a budget.

Can the Prime Minister advise the House and the country whether or not the government intends to introduce a budget this spring, and also would the Prime Minister advise the House when the government intends to make known its policy on foreign investment in Canada so that the uncertainty surrounding both these matters may be removed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member is asking a double-barrelled question, if not two questions. I think hon. members, when they have the floor, should make an effort to ask only one question at a time. Perhaps the hon. member might allow the Prime Minister to reply to the first question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot tell when, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Then, Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is: Would the Prime Minister advise the House when the government intends to make known its policy on foreign investment in Canada, and when he is answering that would he give the House something more definite than the word "soon" with which we have had to content ourselves for the last eight months.

Mr. Trudeau: My answer was in reply to both questions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: I have a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is it possible for the people of Canada to come to any other conclusion than that the government intends to duck both these important issues until after the next election for obvious political reasons?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON PARTICIPATION—STEPS TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATION TO ASSIST CITIZEN PARTICIPATION PROGRAMS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister some questions arising out of a confidential report which is in my possession dated October 18, 1971 and presented to cabinet by the interdepartmental committee on participation which was established following a cabinet decision of December 23, 1970. In view of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday to a group of Ottawa highschool students and his repeated assertion that citizen participation in government is a priority with him, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has taken any steps to implement the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the interdepartmental committee to which I have referred.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course I do not have that particular interdepartmental committee in mind, but the House knows the government has taken a great many steps to implement its belief in participation. If you will allow me sufficient time, Mr. Speaker, I can answer this question. We have, for instance, increased the facilities of opposition members in participating in the parliamentary process by allowing, at public expense, the hiring of research people. We have increased participation in the country by increasing the number of white papers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the position of the right hon. gentleman who is trying to reply to the question of the hon. member for York South. He might require more time than is usually required to make an answer during the question period. I would think this kind of information normally ought to be given to the House by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. With respect may I say I did not ask the Prime Minister to indicate the steps. I asked him whether any steps have been taken to implement the recommendations. I think I should also point out that funds have not been provided only to opposition parties for research purposes, but also have been provided to the government party—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that this is debate. Perhaps the hon. member might now ask the supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: —not to mention his own office. I want to ask as a supplementary whether the government has created participation groups to assist departments and agencies of government to develop citizen participation programs, and whether the Public Service Commission has been asked to implement a participation training program so as to give Public Servants a greater awareness of their duty at least to the citizens of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows there are a great many funds expended by the Secretary of State in the area of encouraging all kinds of groups across the country to participate. He knows, for instance in the case of Indians, that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has supplied a great deal of funds to increase the participation of that group.

Mr. Hees: You are losing your place.

An hon. Member: Is that Dr. Spock's book?

Mr. Hees: Old sulky. He is sulking. He is getting mad. Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we should try to move a little more quickly. The hon. member for York South apparently has a further supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: I am rising on a supplementary, but before I ask my question I want to rise on a point of order, Sir. I appreciate the great talents our Prime Minister has—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: —talents for acting and dissembling. I appreciate those.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the hon. member has a point of order, but if he has he should indicate what it is. I suggest to hon. members, however, that we should make an effort, by cooperation with one another, to proceed with the question period.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, you will forgive me, but if you will wait a moment I will vary the point of order. I wish to say that one talent which ought to be shown by the Prime Minister is courtesy to this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: This deliberate activity of reading a book while he is listening to and answering questions is a piece of disgraceful behaviour, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may wish now to ask the supplementary question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the courteous and thoughtful Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: There is no limit to that stupidity. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether, as is recommended in the report, the government has taken steps to minimize the disadvantages faced by citizens' groups in trying to influence government affairs and government policy as compared with business and professional groups. Has the government taken any steps to minimize those disadvantages or is it contemplating such steps.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust the hon. member will agree with the Chair that this is a very large question. If the Prime Minister can reply briefly he will be allowed to do so, but I suggest respectfully and kindly to the hon. member for York South that such a question normally calls for a very general statement to be made on motions. Having said that, however, I will allow the Prime Minister to reply to the hon. member's further supplementary question.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, the answer, Mr. Speaker, is of course that the many, many grants given in all the fields enumerated earlier are a demonstration of this.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one short further supplementary. Would the Prime Minister undertake to make a statement to the House on motions with regard to the report to which I have referred signed by Bernard Ostry, Chairman of the interdepartmental committee and tell us what steps the government has taken if any to implement the conclusions and recommendations in this report.

• (1540)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is not my custom or the custom of the government to make statements on the basis of reports to the government which are confidential and which have been obtained by I do not know what means.

UNEMPLOYMENT

SHERBROOKE—DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—WORKING CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

A few days ago, in the minister's absence, due to circumstances beyond his control I am sure, I pointed out to his parliamentary secretary that a very difficult situation had developed in the Unemployment Insurance regional office in Sherbrooke, namely that the number of employees had been increased by about 25 or 30 per cent on the same premises, and that service to the unemployed was thus greatly reduced, since many of them had been waiting eight or ten weeks now to get their unemployment insurance cheques. Is the inquiry over now and can the hon. minister tell us whether something is being done in order to improve that situation?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that the allegation regarding any slowness in the unemployment insurance office in Sherbrooke has not come to my attention, but I will look at it as soon as possible and report to the hon. gentleman.

INDUSTRY

DOMINION AVIATION—POSSIBLE REFUSAL OF GRANT FOR DEVELOPMENT OF STOL AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Did the government reject an application by Dominion Aviation, a western Canadian company involved in the Canadian development of STOL aircraft for grants and assistance under any government programs, and if so, in the light of the report of discussions between that company and American interests, including Howard Hughes Industries, for the possible sale of the corporation, will the government now review its decision?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Obviously, I cannot remember every request for research and development grants that comes to my department, and if I did, the hon. member would accuse me of having a hand in the selection.

Mr. Baldwin: In view of the urgency of this issue and the importance of the work in which this company is involved, will the minister give immediate priority to examining this issue to find out whether such a request has been rejected and whether the government intends to review its rejection in order to save this company?

Mr. Pepin: I will do that with great pleasure.

While I am on my feet, may I kill a rumour which was alluded to two days ago by the members for Lachine and Sainte-Marie—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the minister wishes to make a statement, he will have to revert to motions. However, if he is replying to a question which was asked previously, he can do so at this time. I recognize him for that purpose.

An hon. Member: Are you resigning and crossing the floor?

ACTION TO PREVENT REMOVAL OF NORTHERN ELECTRIC FROM MONTREAL

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I wish to answer a question which was raised having to do with the Northern Electric Company in Montreal. The rumour was that the company was about to leave Quebec to go elsewhere. That is not true. I telephoned the president of the company and he told me that even the thought never crossed his mind. As a matter of fact, the percentage of Quebeckers in the company's population is increasing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Later:]

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I asked the minister a straightforward, legitimate question and I did not catch his reply.

Mr. Pepin: I said I would do so, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—POSSIBLE CHARGES AGAINST GUARANTOR OF PASSPORT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Has the guarantor of the passport of Geoffroy been charged with any offence?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I know of no additional charge having been laid against another person other than those previously referred to in this House.

Mr. Woolliams: Is that matter under investigation, and if so, will that person be charged?

Mr. Lang: It would obviously be very difficult for me to say very much about any part of that matter without touching on matters which are before the courts, and I think I should refrain from doing so.

POSSIBLE ROLE OF RAYMOND DENIS IN OBTAINING PASSPORT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): What part did Raymond Denis play in reference to obtaining the passport or any other matter with reference to the case?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): To my knowledge, no part at all.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORTHCOMING VISIT BY PRESIDENT NIXON—POSSIBLE ARRANGEMENT TO ADDRESS SENATE AND HOUSE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to disturb the Prime Minister in any way from his absorption in reading, but I would like to ask a question which I hope he will not regard as controversial or upsetting to his equanimity. Has the government extended an invitation to the President of the United States on the occasion of his prospective visit to Ottawa to speak to the House of Commons and the Senate, as was the case during my period as prime minister when we had visits from President Eisenhower and President Kennedy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The arrangements between the two countries are not final yet, and I think it would be improper for me to announce them in a unilateral fashion. However, as soon as possible, we will announce the program for the president's visit in Washington and in Ottawa at the same time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not a question of unilateral revelation at all. The Prime Minister does not trust this House because he reads.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He reads with prima donnal arrogance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a disgrace to the House of Commons.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN LAKE LOUISE RESORT CENTRE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has there been any federal participation in the Lake Louise project in the Banff National Park, and if so, what is the nature of that participation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand the question. Lake Louise is located in a national park and the project the hon. member refers to is probably the one that is now under study; tenders have been called and a public hearing was held before we took a final decision.

[English]

Mr. Harding: Has any federal money been expended to date on this project, and if so, how much was allocated by the department, how much has been spent, and for what purposes?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the question, which is essentially statistical in nature, should be placed on the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—POSSIBLE DIVERSION TO FEED STOCK—ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT MEETING IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I would like to pose a question to the Minister of Agriculture, and ask him whether he is prepared within 24 hours to approve the diversion of surplus potatoes held by the Agricultural Stabilization Board to animal feed, and if not, whether the minister is prepared to have his deputy or himself attend a mass meeting of potato growers in Prince Edward Island tomorrow as requested by the PEI Federation of Agriculture. I warn the minister that potato growers in Prince Edward Island have their Irish up and tomorrow is St. Patrick's Day—

• (1550)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked the question. The minister might be given the opportunity to answer.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I can advise the House that we have made the preparations that will be necessary for diversion of potatoes to livestock feed if and when that appears to be the most beneficial action to take.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Olson: I cannot give an undertaking that it will be done within 24 hours. When I arrived in the House today, I was unaware of this so-called mass meeting that is being called.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that there has been this request, which perhaps the minister has not yet seen, I wonder whether he can take steps to arrange that either he or his deputy minister meet with the potato growers in Prince Edward Island in order to alleviate much of the misunderstanding and concern that has arisen in the past few weeks over this matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are always anxious to alleviate any misunderstanding, but within the hours that have been set, whether all the arrangements can be made, is something I will have to investigate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the last supplementary on this subject. Afterwards, with the assistance of hon. members, I shall try to recognize those who were not recognized yesterday and, to the best of my recollection, I shall try to give them priority for a few minutes. The hon. member for Hillsborough on a supplementary.

POTATOES—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTER OR FARM ORGANIZATIONS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): A supplementary for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of this very serious situation, has the minister communicated with the provincial minister of agriculture or with the federation of agriculture, to consult on a worsening situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken directly to the minister of agriculture, but I believe the federal deputy minister did yesterday. The other important factor is that potatoes are now selling at about 25 per cent over our purchase price in Prince Edward Island—

An hon. Member: We were told all that yesterday.

REQUEST BY QUEBEC MINISTER FOR ASSISTANCE TO GROWERS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture.

Can he tell us whether or not he was recently asked by his opposite number in Quebec to participate in the financial aid program requested by Quebec potato growers who lost 50 per cent of their crop last fall because they had a bad year?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the offer to purchase potatoes and to make a cash advance was made equally to Quebec and to the other provinces.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH—STATUS OF APPLICATION FOR STUDENTS EXPERIMENTAL TRANSIT SYSTEM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the wholly unacceptable deterioration of rail service to Barrie, Orillia and points north, has the Secretary of State given his personal attention to the application under the Opportunities for Youth Program for $110,000 to finance a train service between Barrie and Toronto called the students' Experimental Transit System, and if so has the minister given his support to this application?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe this is a question which normally ought to be placed on the order paper or considered at the time of adjournment, but perhaps the minister might reply.

Mr. Rynard: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This question cannot be put on the order paper in view of the time taken to answer such questions in the past because this proposal has to take effect in the next few days.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member perhaps may not have heard my suggestion that the minister could reply to the question.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to answer the question because that project in probably one of the 20,000 or so we received within the last six days; if I tried to answer I would be afraid of getting off the track.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary—

Mr. Rynard: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will notice that quite a few supplementaries are sought on this question. The hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NUMBER OF APPLICATIONS AND METHOD OF PROCESSING

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question. I wonder if the minister would agree to make a statement on motions soon to indicate whether there might be some interim report on the number of applications received and, more important, the way in which applications will be processed, in view of the fact that the vast majority of them will not be accepted by the department?

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH—REQUEST FOR THOROUGH REPORT ON PROGRAM

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): A supplementary question for the Secretary of State. REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEW BRUNSWICK—POSSIBLE REVISION OF 1966 AGREEMENT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of statements as far back as 1968 that the 1966 FRED agreement for north-eastern New Brunswick was to be revised, and in view of acknowledged problems with the original agreement, can the minister indicate if a revised agreement has been concluded for this multi-million dollar project?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I hope we will be able to sign this agreement soon.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East would be patient for at least a moment. I would bow to the hon. member's supplementary, and then recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. The hon. member for Regina East on a supplementary.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EVALUATION OF IMPACT OF REGIONAL PROGRAMS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): In view of the millions of dollars being spent on this and other FRED projects, can the minister indicate if any evaluation has been made of the impact of these programs on increased employment and improved income and living standards and would he be prepared to make any such evaluation available to the House or to the Standing Committee on Regional Development?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as we said it is an agreement between the provincial and the federal governments. We have considered the situation, assessed and corrected what appeared to us as defects in the agreement, and now I believe it will not be too long before we sign it.

I shall be ready to supply the committee with all relevant information.

OIL

POSTPONEMENT BY GULF AND CONTINENTAL OF CONSTRUCTION OF FACILITIES IN NEW BRUNSWICK—EFFECT OF LEVY FOR POLLUTION FUND

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Luck is not with me this week. This is the third time I have risen to ask a question, and now the Prime Minister has left the House.

An hon. Member: Thank God!

Mr. Forrestall: I wanted to direct my question to him, but in his absence I would ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would take note of it and perhaps have the Prime Minister consult with his colleagues. The question concerns the indefinite postponement of the expansion by Conoco of its trans-shipment terminal in New Brunswick and the indication by Mr. McAfee, President of Gulf Oil, Canada, Ltd. that the levy for the creation of a maritimes oil pollution fund seriously jeopardizes any prospects for expansion of oil trans-shipment capabilities in the province of Nova Scotia. This comes immediately on top of the decision of Continental Oil Co. to indefinitely postpone a $60 million plant in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the leaders of the other parties, the Prime Minister felt it was in order for him to leave but I shall bring this matter to his attention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: When did he worry about that?

Mr. Bell: He went to finish the book.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow another supplementary, but we will be running short of time and I am anxious to see those hon. members who were not recognized yesterday. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

MARITIME POLLUTION FUND—REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OUT OF GENERAL REVENUES RATHER THAN LEVY ON CARGOES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister would as well take notice of a request that the government consider the establishment of a fund of approximately $25 million out of general revenues, which is the amount estimated to be required, thereby permitting a longer time for the development of this fund through a direct levy on a per ton or per barrel basis?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the subject of this levy has been very carefully studied. It is my understanding that no change will be made for the time being until some experience has been gained.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR REVISION OF APPLICATION FORMS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is just leaving. I wonder if he could return for a moment or two. We know the minister has been ill, and we are certainly glad to see him back in the House after his long absence. I should like to know if the minister has had an opportunity in the last few weeks to look at the incredibly complicated application form that people must fill out at the manpower centres. I think it is a form designed to fit in with the ACES system, but it is very complicated and it is giving headaches to the people who are applying.

• (1600)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply. I suggest to hon. members that if questions are too long and contain too many explanations, we shall run short of time soon.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I agree with him. We had an analysis made which confirms that some of the forms are too complicated. We are in the process of preparing new forms. We are testing them in the field and discussing them with appropriate groups such as the advisory committee to the Unemployment Insurance Commission as well as the trade unions of the country, in order to come up with a much more simplified form.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mackenzie. I will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby in a moment, but at the moment the hon. member for Mackenzie has been recognized.

PROGRAM TO ASSIST SMALL FARMERS—AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask whether he has had meetings since the middle of February with any or all provincial ministers of agriculture pertaining to the small farm development program, and has he been led to believe that there is agreement between the federal and provincial ministers on this program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the last meeting I had with the provincial ministers of agriculture was, I believe, on February 14. There was, of course, no disagreement on the features involved in the program, although there was further work to be done and, I suppose, some disagreement on the division of administrative responsibility.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising from a reply that the Prime Minister, prompted by the Minister of Agriculture, gave me on February 29. At that time I raised a question pertaining to this whole matter. I asked the Prime Minister:

—whether, in the interests of federal-provincial relations, it is still government policy to get approval from the provinces of policies in which they have a direct interest, prior to proceeding with them?

The Prime Minister replied in his usual way, "To get approval from the provinces when?" I said, "Prior to proceeding with these policies." The Prime Minister then said, "What policies is the hon. member talking about?"

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please indicate his point of order. Will he please resume his seat for a moment. I think hon. members have a responsibility to their colleagues and must be as brief as possible when raising points of order during the question period.

Mr. Korchinski: I appreciate your comment, Mr. Speaker. May I continue? May I point out that the Prime Minister's final answer on that occasion was:

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture tells me that there is no opposition, that the provinces agree with the program.

I have looked at a Canada Department of Agriculture press release dated February 14, in which the minister is reported as saying:

We were hopeful that the provinces would see fit to join us in a federal-provincial program, but agreement has not been possible to attain despite a year of negotiations and meetings.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member. He has had the floor for some moments and he still has not indicated what his point of order is. Up to this point it appears that there has been merely a disagreement on what might have been said in the House by way of an answer, and that cannot be considered a legitimate point of order.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to you and to the House. It seems that a misleading answer was given, intentionally or otherwise, and I should like the matter to be corrected. I should like to know what the proper answer is with regard to this situation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE REVISION OF REGULATION RELATING TO SEVERANCE AND HOLIDAY PAY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to an earlier question regarding changes in UIC regulations. Is the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in a position to announce to the House any changes in Unemployment Insurance regulations which would take into account complaints which have been registered concerning the connection between severance pay and holiday pay and the level of unemployment insurance benefits to which a man is entitled?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have reviewed the regulations and I must state categorically that I have no intention of providing Unemployment Insurance to anybody who is on vacation; nor do I have any intention of revising the regulations in such a fashion that the Unemployment Insurance Plan, which is an insurance plan, becomes nothing more than a welfare plan. On the other hand we are reviewing the regulations to see if some unintentional harm has been done to certain categories of workers. If and when I come to the conclusion that those regulations can be changed without weakening the insurance principle, then I will be prepared to bring forward those changes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR REVISION OF TAXING POWERS TO ALLEVIATE BURDEN ON MUNICIPALITIES RESULTING FROM INCREASED PRICES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Finance who was supposed to be here today. In his absence, since the Prime Minister is also absent now, may I direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Since prices rose in such cities as St. John's, Ottawa and Toronto by over 4 per cent in the past year, is the government now willing to open up the area of tax redistribution with the provinces and cities in order to alleviate partly the strain on municipal costs and services which are rising?

Mr. Speaker: I trust that the minister can reply to the question briefly, because it is of very wide import. I doubt whether it can be answered by way of a reply during the question period.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is concerned about rising prices, of course. I do not think that there is a very relevant connection between the cost of government services in those cities and the rise in the local cost of living.

HOGS—SUBSIDIES TO CORPORATE PRODUCERS TO BUY CHEAPER FEED GRAIN

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question which is supplementary to the question asked by my colleague the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

Several breeders sometimes get together in order to buy at better price the feed for hogs. Could the minister tell us whether the regulations of the new plan providing a subsidy of $5 per head, index 100, and more at slaughter, up to $1,000 yearly by breeder, will also apply to each of the breeders grouped together that way?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, what we are asking from those people who make application where sales have been made in one name, whether by a corporation or partnership, is information respecting the nature of the partnership or corporation so that we can examine this matter. We certainly want to make payments to each bona fide hog producer.

POLLUTION

SHIPWRECK RESULTING IN OIL SPILLAGE NEAR PACIFIC RIM PARK—REQUEST FOR NAVIGATIONAL CONTROL SYSTEM

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. It arises from a number of telephone calls made from the west coast yesterday and today, all prompted by a major shipwreck yesterday, the third one this year incidentally, Mr. Speaker, off one of Canada's newest national parks, the Pacific Rim Park. There has been an oil pollution threat which today has become a fact. Will the minister act now and take steps to make this type of marine accident less likely by setting up a modern traffic control system in this area with all the necessary equipment and rules to make it effective?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will certainly take that suggestion under consideration.

Mr. Groos: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might ask his supplementary quickly. We are running short of time.

OIL SPILLAGE FROM SHIPWRECKS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question to the government House leader is as follows: would he consult with his colleagues on the opposite side of the House with a view to reconstituting the special Committee on Environmental Pollution, which would study this specific problem and make recommendations to the House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have that question under consideration at present and have already had some communication with the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, the chairman of that committee, with a view to either reconstituting the committee or providing some other method by which this very useful work can be carried forward.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

DAMAGE TO FRONT STEPS—REQUEST THAT CONTRACTOR MAKE REPAIRS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to our congenial Minister of Public Works. Will the minister ask his officials to look at the front steps leading to the Parliament Buildings which have been severely damaged by a backhoe used for removing snow. These hand hewn stone steps are severely chipped, and I suggest that the minister should ask the contractor to make good the damage done.

AGRICULTURE

RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS FOR ASSISTANCE IN FOWL BUYING PROGRAM

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, when I raised my question originally with the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture, I was told that I would obtain an answer on the minister's return. My question is related to the submission to the government of the Federation of Agriculture, on behalf of egg producers, for assistance in the fowl slaughtering program. What action is the government going to take on that request?

• (1610)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have asked the representatives of the egg producing associations to work on an urgent basis to put together a marketing plan that is acceptable across the country, one that will bring supply and demand into balance. When that is done, we will be willing to give favourable consideration to some financial assistance that will help immediately.

Mr. McKinley: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Huron might be allowed to ask a supplementary question and then we will call Orders of the Day.

Mr. McKinley: With regard to the fowl buying program announced by the government last year under which assistance was going to be given to producers, how much money was paid to producers under that program?

Mr. Olson: None, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question ought to be placed on the Order Paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader about the business for this week and next week. Also, if he is able, can he give any indication about the Easter recess? Finally, he might want to say how long we will be here when we return after Easter.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the business of the House, we will continue today with the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements bill. This will be followed by the budget bill that is on the order paper. If that is concluded today, we will begin the explosives bill. Tomorrow is an allotted day.

With regard to the legislative outlook for next week, following the explosives bill, we will take the Criminal Code amendments, keeping in mind that at any point I might call the amendment to the British North America Act which has been at the front of the program for several days. In referring to the Criminal Code amendments, I have in mind the hijacking bill and the bill on privacy. Next week, Mr. Speaker, the allotted days will be Tuesday and Thursday.

The proposed tentative date for the beginning of the Easter recess is the Wednesday prior to Easter Sunday, which I think is March 29. The date of our return is not yet clear, but it will certainly not be sooner than April 10 and possibly later. In exchange for all that information, Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend will tell me which day next week he intends to be the opposition voting day.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, it is a matter to which I will give serious thought and make my decision known in due course.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Arrogance.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

AUTHORIZATION OF FISCAL PAYMENTS TO AND TAX COLLECTION AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-8, to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved motion No. 1 as follows:

That Bill C-8, an act to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, be amended by deleting from clause 32 paragraph (a), subparagraphs (iii), (iv), (v) and paragraph (g).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have arranged to exchange with my colleague the order of speaking. Because of pressing arrangements he would like to speak now on the amendment I have moved.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House, and I shall not be very long. There are a couple of points we should keep in mind concerning Bill C-8. The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs had not only the benefit of hearing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) but the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) and the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada when the Committee was considering this bill.

There have been and continue to be national goals in post-secondary education. I suggest that we must be very careful to nurture and foster this national emphasis. Your Honour will be glad to know that the length of my speech will have no bearing whatever on the earnestness and seriousness with which I view future federal involvement in this field. I am uneasy about the government of Canada turning away from its obligations to our universities and colleges. This will have very great implications on the future of post-secondary education in our country. The policy of assisting universities with capital and operating grants may not be the best method the government of Canada can adopt, but it is better than a mere transfer of income tax points which would have the effect of leaving each province on its own in the university sphere.

It would be pointless to reargue or rehash the point I tried to make the other day about section 93 of the British North America Act which in its proviso states very clearly, if I can put it that way, "in and for each province the legislature may". Then there follows a series of things it can do in the field of education. I do not for one minute want anyone to think I wish to interfere in any way, by argument, policy or philosophy, with the fundamental right of the provinces in the field of education, particularly at the level of the school curricula, and so on. However, I suggest that when the Fathers of Confederation framed the constitutional provisions that make up the British North America Act there were no such things, with two very noteworthy exceptions, as universities transcending provincial boundaries. I do not think universities have an international boundary, let alone a provincial one.

This whole question has been eloquently discussed time after time by Dr. J. A. Corry who was an adviser to the office of the Secretary of State on the matter of post-secondary education. Also, this policy was inherent in the adoption by the government of Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson of the formula of which this bill is really nothing more than an expansion. I feel that in this stage of our constitutional evaluation it would be a very good idea to have an educational council in this country, in no way diminishing the basic and fundamental constitutional rights of the provinces but, rather, acting as a clearing house for essential information, an exchange of views, and so on, in education.

I think it is seven years ago that the Bladen commission carried out a very worth-while study on the funding of higher education. Its studies have really been overcome by events. I respectfully suggest that during the next 24-month period, when we will have to develop a policy of federal aid to post-secondary education, would be an excellent time for the government of Canada, with the help and assistance of the provinces, to arrange for a new study on post-secondary education. This is really a plea for us not to get into a position of looking inward and looking provincially, if I can put it that way, in the field of post-secondary education.

Not all Canadians, despite the findings of the Wright commission, and perhaps this is a good thing for Canada, can be born, can be educated and can die in Ontario. This seems to be the philosophy of the Wright commission report. There are disquieting bits of evidence which lead one to the conclusion that despite the national goals so clearly enunciated and supported, I may say—and we welcome this—by the government of Canada in its generous funding provisions under clause six of this bill, the federal government would like to be done with this and would rather transfer these funds under, really, a points system leaving the provinces free to develop in ten tidy, watertight compartments that which surely must not be compartmentalized these days, that is, the thrust and policy development of post-secondary education in our country. This is the plea: I hope that within the next 24 months serious attention will be paid to this problem.

I do not say this in any threatening way, but I suggest it will be a great disservice to this country, one which members on the government side, certainly many among the official opposition and, I am sure, members to my left, if the federal government feels it can in this way discharge its constitutional responsibility in funding and supporting national goals in respect of post-secondary education. This responsibility cannot be discharged by mere transfer of a few tax points. Obviously these are days when national goals must not only be developed but must be fostered. I say that should the government think it can discharge its undoubted responsibilities by merely transferring income tax points, then, as distinguished Senator Eugene Forsey has said, many of us will want to tear the purple off the cloths.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). Most of us share the concern he expressed about future government policy respecting the financing and funding of educational institutions.

Attention must, however, be paid to the terms of the motion which is before us. I am at a loss to understand what members of the official opposition wish to accomplish by the wording of the amendment. As I see it, they propose to weaken clause 32 which gives the governor in council power to make regulations. They intend to remove therefrom the power to make regulations which define the expressions "junior matriculation," "post-secondary level," "assisted, sponsored or contract research," and "operating expenditures." The amendment proposes to omit a general, catch-all provision at the end of clause 32 which would enable the governor in council to make regulations carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of the act.

There may be some logical explanation for this, but it seems to me that simply to remove the power to make regulations or to define these expressions and terms which are important in carrying out the provisions of the act would leave a gap in the legislation. It seems to me there ought to have been another amendment defining those expressions if in fact it was the intention of the official opposition to ensure that there would be no tampering with the definitions.

At the same time, I should like to make it clear that we share some of the concern he has expressed about the involvement of the federal government in the financing of post-secondary and other educational programs. The federal government has become involved in these programs over a number of years, during which it has contributed in a special way to the cost of education in Canada. An attempt has been made to do this in a way which does not interfere with the constitutional prerogative of the provinces in the area of education.

Because of the federal structure of our country and because the federal government has the resources at its command with which to finance the cost of education in Canada in something approaching an equitable fashion, we must be concerned about the future of this program. The federal government entered these programs and its action in doing so was generally welcomed. This does not mean there was necessarily agreement as to the particulars of the proposals made by the federal government when it entered this field; nevertheless, there was a large measure of agreement with the decision made by the government some years ago to enter the field and contribute toward the cost of financing.

In the meantime there have not been any basic changes to the financial structure and revenue raising arrangements in Canada or the division of revenue raising power as between the federal government and the provinces. What lies ahead? There is every indication that the federal government is seeking ways and means of limiting its contribution to the financing of these shared programs. We should like the federal government to state clearly what its intentions are for the future.

Statements made before the committee indicated that some of the shared-cost programs are under negotiation and that various proposals are being discussed. This is fine; no one would object to this sort of discussion. At the same time, we would appreciate a clearer indication of what the federal government intends to do. Do some of the proposals it is making at the present time represent merely a negotiating stance, or do they really represent a studied policy for Canada? I hope we shall hear more from government spokesmen on these matters while the motion is under consideration.

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, as usual I find myself in a very agreeable frame of mind when dealing with propositions put forward by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). Certainly, the desirability of federal participation in the financing of post-secondary education is not questioned.

I searched the hon. member's comments for some support of the amendment to which he was speaking, and I must say I searched in vain. I suppose I share the mystification which the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) expressed in that connection. The provisions which the amendment seeks to delete are essential to the operation of this program. They deal with the power to make regulations under the act.

The intent of the provision respecting post-secondary education transfer of funds is to provide financing to each of the provinces equivalent to 50 per cent of the eligible operating expenditures incurred by post-secondary institutions. The transfer is unconditional, which is to say that the provinces can use the money in any way they see fit. But the amount to be transferred, the quantum of the transfer, is based on the 50 per cent formula, or in the case of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland on a $15 per capita escalated amount.

To effect this transfer to the provinces it is essential that the Secretary of State know how much is in fact spent on eligible operating expenses of post-secondary education institutions. For this reason, clause 32 (a)(iii) is required so that the Secretary of State may ensure that the federal government is not sharing in expenditures incurred by institutions at the secondary school level. The program is for post-secondary education. For example, grade 13 in Ontario and grade 12 in the other provinces are considered post-secondary. Therefore, in order to administer the program you must be able to distinguish, in expenses incurred by a high school, between those at the post-secondary level—grade 13, or grade 12 in provinces other than Ontario—and those at lower grades that are secondary level. Accordingly, clause 32 (a)(iii) is necessary.

Paragraph (iv) of clause 32 permits the definition, by regulation, of the expression "assisted, sponsored or contract research". This, again, is to ensure that the federal government is not paying twice for research, once by way of contract, as is often done under other programs which would in many cases involve bearing the full cost of this type of research, and again by paying 50 per cent of its cost through the post-secondary education program.

Paragraph (v) permits the definition, by regulation, of the expression "operating expenditures incurred for post-secondary education" and again is needed so that the quantum of funds to be made available can in fact be determined. If there were no definition of "operating expenditures incurred for post-secondary education" there would be no way of determining whether the provinces were receiving more or less than they should. With great respect, I suggest to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that his amendment would, if adopted, be a real disservice to the provinces. It would simply make it impossible for the program to be properly administered.

With regard to the general authority to make regulations contained in subclause (g) of clause 32, I think I see in the amendment the well-known stamp of the hon. member for Edmonton West who fights a battle against the power to make regulations when any bill containing such provision comes along. I can only say that the necessity for making regulations here has been recognized. In discussions with the provinces they have never for a moment suggested that regulations should not be permitted to be made. As a matter of practice, the provinces are consulted to inform them of the government's intentions to make regulations and to obtain their views before any regulations are passed. As I say, no province has suggested that this power should not be in the bill, since it is most necessary and desirable to permit some flexibility in the operations of the programs as they evolve.

Accordingly, I ask the House to reject the amendment before us.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the amendment now before the House may be justified, especially in the light of the essential principles that should apply in all equalization matters and tax sharing arrangements between the central government and the provinces.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Mr. Speaker, in his speech of March 2 last my colleague the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) summarized the whole problem ably, sensibly and very accurately.

If the central government has so much money available, if it is in a position, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), to dictate to the provinces their policy in the economic and financial sector, it is by reason, at the very beginning, of poor coordination and of the conclusion of temporary agreements which are becoming more and more permanent. The takeover by the central government in some fields that were to be the sole responsibility of the provinces, according to the constitution, is becoming more and more abusive.

Today, many Quebecers are severely blaming the central government for its intrusion in some fields supposed to belong exclusively to the provinces. They are right in their reasoning.

By way of heavy expenditures, an effort is being made to coordinate taxation between the central power and the provinces, and once this has been achieved, it is doubly costly, whereas it would be so simple to allocate responsabilities first and then give each government the necessary resources to administer itself properly.

There is however a time when in spite of everything, we should say to ourselves: No matter where the money comes from, it is our money! And even if the results of expert calculations would seem to show that one province is paying more and another is paying less, that may not always be correct and most of all that may not be fair.

Of course the money allocated in all kinds of ways by the federal government always comes from the taxpayers' pockets. So why not then preserve certain prerogatives, certain special rights, I would even say certain privileges which certain areas of this country, including the province of Quebec, want to preserve above all? Why not? We know that Quebec prizes the education field like the apple of its eye.

As it was so well demonstrated by my colleague from Roberval, a simple way to solve this problem would be to conclude a new constitutional agreement under which all the provinces could determine new structures that would permit everyone to live in a more independent, free and happy way.

Mr. Speaker, when we are faced with the fact that the provinces themselves are accepting these proposals—and it is understood that a technical difficulty remains to be overcome—I do not see why we should repeat the same mistakes already made in Quebec when money from the federal government was refused in the name of basic principles. Finally, it turned out that this money was simply lost. Quebec never saw the colour of it and yet it had been paid by Quebec taxpayers as well as by taxpayers from other provinces.

So, this is why we are facing some sort of dilemma. If the government rules and administers the country in a dictatorial fashion and the provinces accept it, then there is nothing to be done about it. What would need to be done would precisely be to change the system basically. But when it comes to education the provinces should, of course, have all the tax resources required under the present system in order to be able to administer their business as they see fit.

We already have this centralization that has always been exposed and we will indeed have an opportunity tomorrow to expose it even further in our opposition day, Mr. Speaker. This decentralization is not only necessary but in fact essential to this country. In a country as vast, as large as Canada, a country bigger than the United States and even Europe from a geographical point of view, let us not claim that we are in a position to control everything, to set everything, let us not claim that we can achieve serious coordination of all parts of a country as vast as ours. And this, all the more when the ethnic difference which should be taken into account underlines more clearly the need for decentralization.

Then, of course, the governor in council would make regulations defining certain expressions for the purposes of this act and I quote the relevant subparagraphs:

(iii) the expressions "junior matriculation" and "post-secondary level",

(iv) the expression "assisted, sponsored or contract research", and

(v) the expression "operating expenditures incurred for post-secondary education" by or in respect of an educational institution or secondary institution;

Mr. Speaker, when we read through these subparagraphs, we realize that we are faced with an established fact, which is that the federal government is interfering, without any embarrassment, in matters that come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

It is a fait accompli. I find this extremely unfortunate, and I feel we could remove the subparagraphs. But I do not think we will ever change anything with amendments of that type. So, until we are determined to change from the start the whole tax system, until we acknowledge the need for reform of our economy and our monetary system, in short, until we come to realize that we have to change our constitutional structure in order to give every area, every citizen or every group of citizens in this country the opportunity to become more liberated and to develop better, we will just be marking time, so to speak.

This is why I say that all those amendments that we want to propose would of course preserve a principle very dear to the heart of the province of Quebec, that of remaining in control of education. But I feel that this is only a small thing when we consider that the whole bill under study should have been amended—and this, within a process of general constitutional reform.

[English]

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, reference has already been made to the obscurely worded amendments proposed by the official opposition. I make no comments on these amendments because they appear to bear very little relationship to the important points that were made by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) in advancing them. This is not the first time that opposition proposals have been badly related to the substance of the real issues before Parliament, but I think all of us here should be very concerned about the measure which is before us and about the judgments which have been placed on it by the university community.

I make the suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that it would be helpful to hon. members if they read the March 14 proceedings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs when the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada made its presentation to the committee. Running all through that presentation was not only a clear note of concern and apprehension, but a clear note of warning that the present system of federal involvement in the financing of Canadian universities was open to serious question. My purpose in speaking in this debate is not to review all the intricacies of the discussion which took place in that committee and which has been carried on in greater detail throughout the country.

The present system of financing Canadian universities is for the provinces initially to set the standard, as it were, by determining how much money they will devote to university education in terms of operational expenses as defined in the regulations. When that determination is made, the federal government becomes a passive contributor of an equal amount of money. If a province chooses to spend a lot of money on university education, then it will follow that the federal government will spend a lot of money in that province. If another province decides to spend a lesser amount of money or, what is more important, a lesser percentage of its total expenditures on university education, then the federal contribution to university education in that province will be less. This leads to the obvious result which was underlined by the representatives of the universities and colleges, namely, that we do not have a common national standard of excellence in Canadian universities.

Without going into detail, Mr. Speaker, it was quite clear that the representatives of the universities and colleges were concerned because there were varying standards of quality in university education and that they were brought about because of differing financial resources. This is a matter which should be of great concern to us and really a principal reason for reviewing very carefully the basis of university financing in this country.

There is another concern which is growing and which is also a product not only of the financial arrangements described in this bill but of the financial assistance given to students pursuant to the student loans underwritten by the federal government, and the grants of assistance to students made by provincial governments. There is no question that the declining mobility of Canadian students from province to province is a feature of modern university life in this country. Canada benefited greatly from the fact that students from one province could be attracted to a university in another province.

We need every incentive we can find in this country to overcome our regional differences and parochial attitudes, but the present nature of university financing arrangements, coupled with the provisions for granting student assistance, puts more and more of a premium on students going to universities only in the province in which they reside. This to me is a trend which is not satisfactory and should not be encouraged.

• (1650)

Coupled with it is the fact that the present nature of university financing arrangements and student assistance militates greatly against the entrance of foreign students. In provinces which are under great financial strain, the entrance of a foreign student to a university in the province probably represents an unwelcome financial charge and burden regardless of the contribution foreign students can make to the university life of Canada and through that university life to the whole of the community.

Another matter which greatly concerns the university community is the fact that all the financial assistance from public sources is funnelled to them through one channel. The evidence given by university representatives who appeared before the committee was to the effect that more than 80 per cent of the costs of operation of universities are now paid by the government and in all cases this money now reaches the universities through the provincial governments.

I believe the universities have good reason to be fearful of the erosion of their independence by reason of the tremendous concentration of fiscal power in the hands of the provincial governments. This would seem to be another good reason to look for alternative ways to provide fiscal assistance at the federal level for post-secondary education.

It is clear that there is no cow more sacred in our political history and in our constitution than that of education which, because of the inept wording of section 93 of the BNA Act, is presumed always and eternally to be a provincial responsibility. On the face of things it is impossible to believe that university education, the comprehension of knowledge at a high level and over a great scale, can in any sense be just a provincial responsibility. The mere fact that the universities have to find a location or physical site in various parts of the country is an accident which cannot be avoided and is not one which should be used to impose burdens upon university students no matter from what part of Canada they come.

I have contended vigorously for many years that the federal government should have an active role to play in university education. I am distressed to see that the report filed today by the constitution committee does not accord the federal government the hope of achieving a role of that kind, and retreats again into the ancient formula which assigns university education to the provinces just as if it were elementary school education in the year 1867.

We are fortunate that the arrangements being proposed here are of an interim nature. Obviously, we look to a better permanent arrangement for the future. I share entirely the apprehension of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal that we may try to avoid the basic responsibility of parliament to university education merely by the assigning of tax points or tax room to the provinces. We must do more than that if we are to achieve the full potential of university education in this country for the benefit of all our citizens and for the benefit of the nation.

The question of the future financing of university education in Canada is, I believe, too important to be left to private discussions between ministers of the federal government and the provincial governments. I hope very serious consideration will be given to the submission made by the Association of Universities and Colleges to the federal government and to the council of ministers, federal and provincial, which I understand was prepared and filed in the autumn of 1971. Among other things, this submission, as reported at page 244 of the March 14 report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, recommends that there be a separate, countrywide study of the subject of financing higher education in Canada. It recommends that the terms of reference for such a study should include the following areas of concern:

1. the role and responsibilities of universities in the contemporary Canadian society;

2. the distribution of the financial costs and responsibilities as between governments and students and between federal and provincial governments, and the financial devices by which the desired distribution could be effected;

3. regional disparities in educational opportunities and appropriate devices for eliminating them;

4. universal accessibility and student support;

5. role of the federal authority in support of research, student mobility, graduate study, and foreign students;

6. ways of achieving provincial, regional and national co-ordination of activities, ways of achieving economies in university operations and ways of preventing unnecessary proliferation.

Mr. Speaker, through you I should like to thank the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for moving the amendment which has provided an opportunity for this important discussion. As I said at the beginning, his amendment regrettably bears little relevance to the matters I have discussed and the matters raised by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, but I say in all seriousness to this House that one of the most important items we must decide in the future is a better and revised way of financing university education in Canada.

[Mr. Blair.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Agriculture—Potatoes—Response to representations for action to relieve depressed market—Possible diversion to stock feed; the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Dispute with NABET—Request that CBC engage in meaningful negotiations; the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin)—Criminal Code—Abolition of capital punishment—review by parliament during present session.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills and public bills.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I understand there have been discussions among the parties on both sides of the House and there has been agreement to ask for unanimous consent to call the report stage and third reading of Bill C-164. I would therefore ask the unanimous consent of the House to proceed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz). Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

PRIVATE BILLS

UNITED BANK OF CANADA

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-164, to incorporate United Bank of Canada, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, at this report stage of Bill C-164 I should like to move the following amendment:

That Bill C-164 be amended by substituting the word "unity" or "l'unité", as the case may be, in the title thereof for the word "united" or "unie" and elsewhere in the bill as required.

• (1700)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unanimous consent is required to move the amendment at this point, notice not having been given. Is there consent that the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) be allowed to move the amendment at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Haidasz: Then I so move, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion (Mr. Haidasz) agreed to.

Mr. Haidasz moved that Bill C-164, to incorporate Unity Bank of Canada, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I would like to make a few brief comments at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion before the House is on the report stage of the bill. The hon. member might wish to deal with it at a subsequent stage.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker, unless I reserve my position completely. The fact is that we are debating the bill this afternoon by consent. I want to point out a practice which seems to have arisen in the filing of reports by various chairmen of committees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. member is rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is right, Mr. Speaker. Today the report was tabled and it included the provision that the evidence and the minutes of the committee be tabled therewith. The committee completed its deliberations at one o'clock this afternoon, and the report was deficient; I will not say misleading. I have been told, and I have ascertained it, that many chairmen are doing this. I would say that that is totally wrong.

A committee chairman can come here with the report of the committee and the evidence and the minutes of the meetings attached to it. Then hon. members must wait 48 hours before they can discuss the report, unless it is done by consent. This business of trying to slide things through must stop. Hon. members are being asked to decide on a motion before the House not having had one moment's opportunity to look at the evidence. There is no way that we can do this.

I am raising this as a point of order as I do not particularly want to pick out the Chairman of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I take it that this happened on a previous occasion with Bill C-8. I know this because the transcript of the evidence of last Tuesday morning was published only this morning just before ten o'clock. It was certainly not available when the report of the committee was tabled last Tuesday. As I said, this is happening with other committee chairmen who have come here with reports from their committees. That is against the rules, and I think we should stick to the rules in this regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members know that we are on a point of order. The motion before the House is for adoption at the report stage. I can only put the motion with the unanimous consent of hon. members, and I take it the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has indicated, for the reasons he has expressed, that he is not giving his consent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker; I am giving my consent under the circumstances, but I wanted to raise the point of order because this should not happen again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for clarifying the point. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Haidasz moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I would like to make a few comments with regard to this proposal. It is not often that we get a bill before the House to incorporate a bank. This is one of the few occasions that have been reserved for private bills following the change in our procedure. Following the amendment, the bank is now called the Unity Bank of Canada. I must say that having gone through all sorts of travail in the committee this morning and votes on the word "United", I do not think the soup could be spoiled more than by this change of name. However, the incorporators want it that way and it is their problem. I am glad I do not have to support it.

With regard to this bank, subject to the requirements of the Bank Act, the provisional directors and the organizers of the bank will have to endeavour to convince the public that it will be worth while investing in their shares and that they will meet all the necessary requirements. I hope we will not have any difficulty with funds that are advanced by prospective shareholders should the matter not come to fruition, as was the case with the Bank of Western Canada. I do not think Canada can really stand one more of those.

However, if the provisional directors of this concern are able to get together a satisfactory management team, men who will be skilled in the business of banking—and that is not something that is picked up from textbooks or from reading newspapers; it requires many years of downright hard experience and courage—I hope that it will prosper. I will not say any more about what I feel with regard to the bank, but I hope they are able to make a go of it on the basis of a business unadorned by the peripheral considerations that may have entered into the discussions during the promotion of this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is disposition among hon. members to take up item No. 17 on page 7 of today's order paper, the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder if I may confirm what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) and add a word to it. Your Honour will note from the order paper that this item has had 57 minutes of debate, which means that there could be another 43 minutes, following which it is our intention to ask for a recorded vote.

• (1710)

I think you will find there is agreement among the parties that, if Your Honour is prepared to do so, you can consider we have now had the hour and a half of debate provided in the rules, so that there can be two speeches, a five minute reply from the government side, which I understand will be made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, after which the mover of the motion would like to take his final five minutes and then we could have the vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. parliamentary secretary speaking to the point of order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. parliamentary secretary will excuse me for a moment, the Chair will ask if there is consent to the procedure outlined by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and perhaps we should add that prior motions be permitted to stand and reserve their place. Is it agreed?

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NATIONAL PARKS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR DESCRIPTION OF AREA NEAR VAL MARIE-KILLDEER TO BE INCLUDED IN PROPOSED PARK

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Burton:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of a description of the area which the federal government would like to see incorporated in the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this government's aim is to create, with the co-operation of the government of the province of Saskatchewan, a new national park in the short grass prairie area in the southern part of that province. Negotiations are continuing between the Minister of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Natural Resources of the province of Saskatchewan. The channels of communication are open, but there are still several questions to be resolved before agreement is reached. In all negotiations with provincial governments concerning the establishment of national parks, it is the responsibility of the provincial government, once agreement has been reached on all aspects of creation of the park, to acquire and transfer the lands within the agreed boundary, whether they be provincial Crown lands or private lands, to the federal government for national park purposes.

Agreement on precise boundaries for this proposed park has not been reached. The delineation of boundaries is only one aspect of negotiations concerning the creation of a national park. Resource potential, natural features and possible effects on persons living and working in or near the proposed park area must all be considered together and by the two governments.

The release of information about one aspect of the present negotiations could seriously prejudice the possible outcome as it would be a breach of confidentiality always maintained in negotiations of this nature. This is even more important as the province is responsible for the eventual transfer of lands in general. Before a provincial government agrees to a precise boundary and transfers land for the purpose of a national park, it will decide upon its own priorities between various possible uses of the land. Boundaries considered in negotiations between the federal government and a provincial government are assessed in the light of these provincial priorities and therefore the feeling is that the federal government cannot unilaterally at this point disclose details of these negotiations.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance who gave quite a concise and objective statement of the state of affairs, as I understand them, involving the negotiations for this particular park. I commend him for it. I should like to note, however, that one of his points was there would have to be negotiations to obtain the title to land which is not Crown land, land already in the name of the province of Saskatchewan. The fact is, however, that most of the land under consideration is presently owned by the Crown; very little is privately held, although a portion of the Crown land is under lease for grazing purposes at this time.

There is no question that many people would like to see a park created in this part of the province. A good deal of information has been made available by the government on this subject, and the last time it was discussed I pointed out that, in response to a motion for papers, I received a two-inch thick volume of material. This has been very useful to me and to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) in whose constituency most of the land is located. I received further information in response to one of the particulars contained in the material delivered in response to this motion for papers.

The purpose of this motion is that we would like to have a map or description of the area which the federal government is proposing to include in the park. The parliamentary secretary says that he cannot make it available, that it would release information on one aspect of the negotiations. This is nonsense, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that a good many of the local residents know a great deal about what is going on at the present time. I have no objection to that, but there are a good many rumours going around as well about what is taking place and some of these could be set to rest if the government were prepared to give adequate information. As I think the parliamentary secretary implied, the livelihood of some of the residents in that area will be affected but he says that we cannot get the map.

Mr. Speaker, I know a private individual personally who went to the minister's office and said he would like to get more information on this park. The minister was very co-operative and referred him to one of his officials who showed him a map of that area. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the government is denying members of this House the right to have access to that map. I suppose we could go around the back way and get the map, but I suggest that as a matter of right members should have access to it.

Another aspect of this subject was discussed last Thursday when, at page 689 of Hansard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Sulatycky) is recorded as saying:

> We are simply waiting for the provincial government of Saskatchewan to acquire the land in an unencumbered state and transfer it to the federal government so that a second national park may be established in Saskatchewan—

I should like to put on record a news release issued by the Minister of National Resources for the Province of Saskatchewan subsequent to that statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but the time allowed to him by special order has expired. According to the same order, it is my duty to put the question to the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the motion carried.

An hon. Member: There are not enough of them!

Mr. Gilbert: Justice triumphs!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Am I to understand that the order also contemplated calling it six o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is true, Mr. Speaker. We had expected to have to take a recorded vote which would have taken us to six o'clock. Since that has not been necessary we suggest you call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hour appointed for consideration of Private Members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.21 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

AUTHORIZATION OF FISCAL PAYMENTS TO AND TAX COLLECTION AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-8, to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motion No. 1 of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the subject which was raised in this debate by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and by my colleague from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair). This is a subject which was raised when the bill was discussed in the finance committee. It is a subject which has caused me such concern that I have debated earnestly with myself whether I should support the amendment now before us. I find it difficult to understand the amendment although it has been explained to me. I understand it generally.

I have another reservation in respect of this package which is Bill C-8. After all, it is a package proposal. It has been introduced following negotiations. In a sense, it is a document negotiated between the federal government and provincial governments. For that reason I have decided to support the legislation. However, I must tell the Minister of State (Mr. Mahoney) of my grave concern over the situation which the federal government is proposing. I ask the minister if he can assure us that the government is equally concerned about this problem. In the 24 months' period of the present arrangements is there some hope of raising this matter with the provinces? In other words, will the position that I will describe in a moment be brought forward and, hopefully, will something be done about it?

First let me tell the House what the problem is. Under the present fiscal arrangements which are being continued for five years under this legislation we, on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada, pay half the costs of operating the universities of this country. That is to say, universities are administered in the normal way, the provincial ministers are responsible for the contributions which their governments make, the provincial governments determine the extent of university operating costs and the taxpayers of Canada, through the federal parliament, pay half the bill.

Times have changed since I went to university, and that was not too long ago. However, when witnesses from the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada appeared before us I learned something I did not know, namely, that a policy is developing throughout this country, and in some places it is being implemented of charging higher fees for university students who come from outside the province. This is a proposal in Quebec and British Columbia. A student from another part of Canada who comes to a university in those provinces will be charged $2,500, for example, for one year's tuition whereas a student resident in the province may be charged only $400 or $500 for exactly the same course.

I can understand why the provinces are doing this. I understand why pressure is being put on the universities to restrict entrance, in effect, to residents of their province. It is an entirely fiscal problem, the problem of financing the universities, but I suggest it is a self-defeating operation. In the long run, provinces which exclude out-of province students by charging very high fees will find their policies being adopted by other provinces. We will end up with a situation where Canadian students will not be able to travel to universities which they would like to attend, because of barriers created by provincial policies in the field of education. I oppose these policies and as a Canadian I am very concerned about them. It is good for our universities to welcome students from all parts of Canada and, although it is another issue, they should welcome students from outside our country. It enriches our university community and our country to have this kind of mix. In a country that is concerned about national unity and is as diverse and widespread as ours, for the federal government to watch a development taking place that will prevent students from across this country from having maximum access to higher education is completely wrong.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

I know the other argument, that education is a provincial matter. We know the problems that developed when Premier Duplessis refused to accept very nominal amounts offered by the federal government because of the fear they might be followed up by conditions as to the way the money should be spent. Such conditions might be imposed but I say this without hesitation because of my concern that the provinces are embarking on a course that is destructive of national unity. This course will weaken our universities and will weaken Canada; I object to this arrangement.

I would like the federal government to do something about this, but on the other hand I understand it is a negotiated agreement. It will last for only two years so I do not intend to oppose it. I would like to know that the government of Canada is concerned about this problem and that we will not support universities which have a policy of excluding Canadians living outside a province from attending university in the province. I do not think the taxpayers of Canada want that kind of policy to develop. I understand why the provinces are doing this. I know the position they are in, but I do not think we who represent the people of Canada should sit back, pay half the bill and let this development take place.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, although this is my amendment, by arrangement with my colleague, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), I let him speak first. To that extent I have drawn some opprobrium as to the nature of my amendment. I want to point out to hon. members who may be baffled by some of the complexities of procedural amendments, and so forth, what I have done. As a matter of fact, the Chair has reversed the position of my amendments. Amendment No. 2 should have been No. 1; that would have made quite clear my purpose in introducing the amendments.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and one or two members have wondered about my amendment which appears as No. 1. If there had not been that amendment—it is about the only possible amendment having to do with this feature of education—they could not have made their speeches at this stage. It was for the purpose of bringing forward the point of view that hon. members have expressed supporting the cause of AUCC in this House; otherwise, it would only have appeared in the transcript of the proceedings of the finance committee which is read by a miniscule number of persons. In fact, it only appeared at ten o'clock this morning.

This is a point of view that has found favour. The purpose of this amendment was to give us the framework or a base for discussion on a point which has found favour on both sides of the House. Perhaps if members looked a little closer at these amendments we would not get statements that only display a lack of knowledge with regard to procedural amendments.

The reason I want this and the other amendment discussed is to reiterate the point of view put forward in part by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) the other day on second reading. This appears at page 438 of Hansard. We discussed the degree of negotiation that takes place under federal-provincial financial agreements. There is a great picture painted. The minister stated this afternoon that the regulations were made after consultation; then he said after "information" to the provinces. "Information" is the word, not "consultation."

This bill represents an agreement reached between the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces. However, they failed to see that the whole of clause 32 unilaterally reserves power to the government of Canada to change the guts of this agreement, the heart and core, by making regulations which only it has to consider without calling in the provinces.

I now wish to turn to the definition of the revenue base, the expressions "revenue source," "junior matriculation" and "post-secondary level." We are talking about part VI of the act. When the federal government has the unilateral power of defining expressions such as "junior matriculation," "post-secondary level," "assisted, sponsored or contract research" and, finally, "operating expenditures incurred for post-secondary education by or in respect of an education institution or secondary institution", it can decide what expenditures it will support and what expenditures it will not support.

It is said the provinces have agreed. But any of the provincial ministers of finance or their equivalents will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that they were most unhappy about this agreement. However, there was nothing they could do about it. This is why I have brought forward the amendment we are considering, to show that this is not what was said by the Minister of Finance or by his supporters in the government. I believe the provinces are definitely unhappy about many features of this arrangement, but there is nothing they can do about it. They are caught. This is why, during the committee meetings, there was all this talk about additional domination by the federal government during every period of renegotiation.

I wish to support what has been said today by my hon. friend from Fundy Royal, by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) and by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) in their strictures against the growing practice of some of the provinces to talk as though we shall see the balkanization of post-secondary education, that we shall see graduated fees coming into effect for residents and non-residents or, what is even worse, that something terrible will be done with foreign students. I have never heard anything so chauvinistic as this idea.

There are different kinds of universities, some teaching disciplines which are not taught in certain provinces. Some students prefer to attend smaller universities. Why not? After all, the government of Canada rebates through the ceding of the four points of income tax almost 50 per cent of the provincial contribution to post-secondary education. But since this is assimilated into the revenues of the provinces, the provinces seem to think they contribute all this money. This is not the case.

One of the things we must avoid at all costs during the period of two years during which a new arrangement is being arrived at is the balkanization of post-secondary education. It may cost the government of Canada something more. No; I should say, rather, that it may cost the Canadian taxpayer more. I find it extraordinary that the provinces should make representations vis-à-vis the government of Canada or vis-à-vis other governments as though they were acting for foreigners, for strangers and gaining advantage for certain people as opposed to others.

I saw an instance of this the other day, expressed in headlines as the words of Premier Bourassa—that he had achieved "a triple victory over Ottawa." A victory on behalf of whom, against whom? A victory on behalf of Canadian citizens against other Canadian citizens? That is a shameful statement to make. It is a shameful attitude to hold. No Canadians can score a victory over other Canadians in such matters. We all pay the same taxes and we are all entitled to the same services. There are different administrations, different regional considerations, but I do not for one moment concede any strength or validity to those arguments.

It is for this reason I put forward the amendment. I do not intend to press it on the House. I trust that having now provided a forum for the discussion of this point, the House will permit me to withdraw amendment No. 1 and then consider amendment No. 2, to which I propose to speak very briefly. My seconder is not here at the moment but I know he would have no objection to this course.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion which has just been made. Is it agreed that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) be permitted to withdraw the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Lambert) withdrawn.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved motion No. 2 as follows:

—That Bill C-8, an act to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, be amended by adding in clause 32 after the word "Act" in line 4 on page 31 the following:

"provided that any regulation made pursuant to any of the above paragraphs shall be subject to a negative resolution adopted by not less than the majority of the provinces both in number and in population at the first plenary session of first ministers of Canada and the provinces or of their respective finance ministers following the making of the said regulation."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the Chair recognizes the mover of the motion, may I say I have some doubt about its procedural acceptability. Hon. members might be prepared to assist the Chair in this respect.

Perhaps the best way to say what I wish to say is by first of all reading part of clause 32:

The governor in council may make regulations—

(g) generally for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of this act.

As I understand the proposed motion, it would provide that such regulations be subject to a negative resolution adopted by not less than a majority of the provinces, and so on.

Two matters arise for consideration. The first does not cause me much concern at this point. I am referring, now, to the somewhat unusual constitutional aspect of a group or body outside the federal authority in effect rescinding or vetoing an order in council. It does seem to me that this is a matter of importance, possibly one involving constitutional law. Though I would be pleased to hear representations with regard to it, I would not at this point wish to rule the motion out of order procedurally on that basis because I think it is a matter of law rather than a matter of procedure.

The second point is one which does cause considerable concern from a procedural standpoint, namely, whether or not the amendment is of a substantive nature; whether giving provincial ministers of finance authority to suspend or veto the operation of an order in council is really a matter of a substantive nature which is outside the clause the amendment purports to amend. I have no fixed opinion on the matter, but it is something with regard to which I should like to hear representations if hon. members are prepared to assist the Chair.

• (2030)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all dispose of the difficulties facing you on the first point. With the greatest respect, it is not the duty of the Chair to rule on the constitutionality or otherwise of a particular motion or matter. I put it to you that this House having given power to a particular body to make an order in council, can just as easily provide that some other body review that order in council and annul it if necessary. The governor in council has no power to make an order in council under the act unless that power is given by this House; and I suggest that what has been given can also be taken away.

Under the Statutory Instruments Act, this House has already provided for an overriding veto by the House, following certain procedures, in connection with orders in council. To my mind it has always been the greatest abuse of the privileges of the House for the governor in council to say that once the House has given authority to pass an order in council, that is the end of the matter and no further review is possible. That is entirely wrong. As I have said, having given the right to do something, the House can take that right away. In this particular case, in giving the governor in council the power to pass certain orders in council the House can certainly grant the right of review to some other body. This is what the amendment provides for.

In regard to the second point raised by Your Honour as to whether this is a substantive matter, we are talking here about the power to review an order in council affecting an agreement embodied in this statute. An agreement presupposes consent of both parties to the agreement. So far as orders in council are concerned, one party arrogates unto itself the exclusive power to make and to amend the agreement. This House is the ultimate authority in regard to the agreement that is entered into by the governor in council. This House has provided that the governor in council may make orders in council, but that they shall be subject to review on behalf of the other contracting party to that agreement or order in council by convening a meeting of first ministers, including the representative of the government of Canada, or of ministers of finance, including the Minister of Finance of the government of Canada.

Yesterday I asked the President of the Privy Council when action was going to be taken to put into the effect the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act, which I know is going to be blazoned forth as one of the jewels of some studded crown. The Statutory Instruments Act will be trotted out as some sort of an achievement. I submit not one thing has been done about implementing that statute. So far as the House is concerned, no motion has been introduced. This is what I was objecting to during the passage of the bill, and my colleagues objected as well. We said that the initiative under the Statutory Instruments Act would rest entirely with the government, both as to the composition of the committee and as to amending the rules to make the necessary provision. The Statutory Instruments Act calls for a change to the rules, and this is where we got the definition of a negative resolution. At one time I made reference to that in my motion but I thought it would introduce further complications and procedural arguments.

I have presented this amendment merely because of the default of the government. Yesterday the President of the Privy Council told me he would have to take my question as notice because he did not know the answer. If you were a betting man, Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to bet you $10 that we will not see any motions presented by the government until after a certain event. This parliament will not see any steps taken in regard to the Statutory Instruments Act until then.

The Minister of State was quite right when he said he recognized that I opposed this type of clause giving blanket authority to make orders in council. I understand, just as well as he or anybody in this House, the efficacy of having the ability to make regulations under a statute. But I object to giving blanket power to make regulations of all kinds under a statute without the power of review.

Since the government refuses to make any move under the Statutory Instruments Act to place regulations under review, I have to provide an alternative and this is the purpose of my amendment. I put it to you that on that score, supported by the arguments I put forward, my motion is acceptable. If there has to be any argument or debate on this particular point, I hope that some government spokesman will come forward on behalf of the governor in council and tell the House when a motion will be presented to set up the appropriate committee under the Statutory Instruments Act and to change the rules to that effect.

Last year we went through an exercise in total futility.

• (2040)

I do not think this House should be played with. I do not think it should be taken through this sort of exercise and left without recourse. It is for these reasons that I feel this amendment is quite in order. It does not introduce any substantive matter beyond merely the procedure of reviewing the effects of a power granted under a particular provision of the legislation.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, you have asked for comments on the procedural aspects of the amendment. I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that it lies within the power of parliament to call for a review by an appropriate body of any delegated authority which it may grant to the governor in council or indeed to any other body. I do not think the question is whether it lies within the power of parliament to adopt this but, rather, whether this particular suggestion is appropriate to the operations and principle of the bill as it now stands. Perhaps one of my colleagues will have some remarks to make on the subject of whether or not this is a substantive matter, but I wish to point out that I am concerned about two points.

First, the amendment purports to vest in a body called the "plenary session of first ministers of Canada" powers which this body does not now have. Unions of first ministers or finance ministers have no power to take or implement collective decisions. In each instance this is merely a consultative body and the decision-making process relates entirely to individual undertakings to do or not to do certain things with respect to their legislative masters. This applies to first ministers and finance ministers.

Therefore there is no procedure now, there has not been in the past, nor do I think there is any envisaged whereby this grouping, this coming together of either first ministers or finance ministers, could or should take collective decisions binding on anyone, whether by a formal vote or an informal vote, weighted or unweighted and without a very substantial reorganization, not only of the modus operandi but also of the purposes of meetings of first ministers and of finance ministers. I do not think this particular suggestion would work. On that ground, rather than proposing an unworkable suggestion I would hope the hon. member for Edmonton West would withdraw his amendment.

I said I was concerned about two things, Mr. Speaker. The second one is that the hon. member indicated that his purpose in doing this was to compel the government to take action in quite a different arena. This is a subject which I suggest should be tackled and settled on its own merits, without making use of this particular piece of legislation as a means of forcing the government to take action which the hon. member has suggested is urgent and necessary and which has not been approached with the speed and diligence with which he feels it should be approached.

If I understood his words correctly, he would be quite prepared not to proceed with this amendment if he were to get his view accepted by the government with respect to action in relation to another piece of legislation. In recognition of the fact that his suggestion would not work, again I suggest that the hon. member might wish to withdraw his amendment. Also, procedurally I question whether the amendment is in order, given the fact that its purpose is not merely to change the operation of this bill but really to get government action in another field.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unless other hon. members wish to make submissions on the procedural point, the Chair is prepared to rule on the procedural acceptability of the motion put before the House for its consideration. As I indicated in my initial remarks, I was not seriously concerned about the constitutional question of giving authority to a body outside of the federal authority, if I may use that term again. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and, I believe, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) did not disagree with him, said that this is a question of law that is not the concern of the Chair. I raised it only in a preliminary fashion so that hon. members would have it in mind and so that if they felt I was in error in that respect they could argue the point. I need not deal further with that aspect.

The second point in my preliminary remarks concerned the substantive nature of the motion and whether it was in fact beyond the four corners of the clause of the bill that we have before us. Again, I do not think the President of the Treasury Board has any quarrel with the hon. member for Edmonton West, and indeed I have no quarrel with the hon. gentleman in this respect. I think we are in agreement that there is no question but that it lies within the power of parliament to provide for a review of regulations when it makes provision for their enactment. Of course, it is within the authority of parliament to provide for a review or check on those regulations. So I do not have any concern about that matter.

My only concern is whether or not the check or the veto, if I may call it such, which is provided for in the motion goes beyond the scope of the clause of the bill that the House has before it. The hon. member for Edmonton West argued with respect to the Statutory Instruments Act and appeared to be critical of the government on that point. I am not going to base my decision on his argument in that respect. The President of the Treasury Board indicated that if the hon. member for Edmonton West was chastising the government for its inaction in certain other areas, he should not use this particular vehicle. I agree with that.

That leaves me with the consideration of whether or not the motion before the chamber is of a substantive nature, that is, whether it goes beyond the scope of the clause that it purports to amend. It is quite a substantial change, but I am going to allow the motion because it does seem to me that while the authority respecting the veto may be substantially different than the power given to the governor in council, I would not want to say as to what degree or where a checking power, if I may use that term, a power of vetoing or checking the authority given to the governor in council goes beyond the authority contemplated in the bill. In other words, I would not want to say at what point the authority to provide a check or veto goes beyond the original thought of parliament in enacting the clause of the statute. For those reasons I shall allow the amendment. The motion has been put to the chamber and it is not necessary for me to read it again unless hon. members wish me to do so. It is before the chamber for debate.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I shall not impose on the House much longer. Arising out of the discussion we have had, I should like to say that the purpose of my amendment is that any negative resolution, as I indicated in my motion, would not ipso facto have the effect of negativing the order in council, but I think no governor in council faced with a negative resolution would dare maintain such a regulation. That is a point which would have to be considered, obviously, by the governor in council. It seems to me it is inherent that if there is to be an agreement there is much to be said for it being between equals. Yet in the statute which embodies the agreement maybe 50 per cent or 60 per cent of the power is reserved unilaterally to the governor in council without consultation with or consent of the provinces. This I find fundamentally wrong.

If there is something that has to be highlighted on behalf of the provinces, then so be it. After all, I would hope that during the course of this debate either the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) or the Minister of State (Mr. Mahoney) could give us an undertaking on behalf of the government with regard to the other matter of the Statutory Instruments Act. I have raised this question because the Statutory Instruments Act applies to clause 32 of the bill. It is to apply to every section of every act authorizing the governor in council to make regulations.

Months have now passed since the passage of the act, and nothing concrete has been done. It may be that through, shall we say, informal channels some work has been done, but nothing has been done with regard to this or any other act and the House is being asked to pass this bill giving the governor in council carte-blanche again. The governor in council may make regulations generally for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of the act, with some other definitions in between. There is no undertaking with regard to the Statutory Instruments Act. Parliament passed the Statutory Instruments Act and it is now law. Yet we have the governor in council defying the law that this House passed and then coming along and saying, "Give to the governor in council full power again to make statutory instruments, but we deny to parliament the right to review what this provides for." I say that is unacceptable to this House.

It behooves the government to now tell us when we will have positive action and will see the resolutions with regard to the setting up of the committee under the Statutory Instruments Act and all the appropriate changes in the rules so that they can be carried out. Beyond this I have nothing to add to my argument. This is the purpose of my argument: we must have some form of review of statutory instruments. I would think that if we in Parliament cannot provide for a review then we should let the people who are chiefly concerned, the representatives of the provinces, have the right to review regulations.

Remember, this is not a suspensory form of resolution. The regulation has effect unless revoked. It cannot be revoked at some indefinite time in the future but, rather, at the first plenary session of either first ministers of the provinces and of Canada or the finance ministers of the provinces and of Canada. We have a problem which I want to highlight with my amendment and I hope the House will support me.

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, if we need any arguments to support the proposition that the motion should be defeated, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who proposed it has certainly given them to us. Really, we are being asked to entertain a very serious amendment to a very serious bill that forms the financial framework of our confederation because of his dissatisfaction with what he feels is lack of action by the government in bringing forth procedures under an entirely different piece of legislation, the Statutory Instruments Act.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

I would not denigrate for a moment the seriousness or importance of that act but I do not feel, as important as it may be, that that type of dissatisfaction stands as a valid ground for making unworkable the financial arrangements which exist between the federal government and the provinces on shared-cost programs. This is a curious, if not astonishing amendment to put before the Parliament of Canada. Basically, of course, it would give to provincial governments, provincial cabinets and provincial first ministers—not provincial legislatures and not provincial members—a veto power over changes in a federal program or a series of federal programs.

"The first plenary session of the first ministers of Canada and the provinces" is the expression used in the amendment. Unlike the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of the provinces, the first plenary session of the first ministers of Canada is not something that is bound to meet at any particular time. There have been in our history periods when there have been years between meetings of provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada. There have been other periods in recent years, of course, when these meetings have been very frequent.

It is possible that the financial arrangements on which our confederation is largely based could be established on a basis that the federal government could put forward the regulations and continue the operation of these programs for a period of months or years, and then find that the next plenary session of this particular group could nullify the whole operation. This would be totally unacceptable. This is an exercise in charity and I do, in charity, thank the hon. member for Edmonton West for bringing forward these two amendments, the one that has been withdrawn and the one we are now considering, because they have given members on all sides of the House an opportunity to express their views on very serious matters.

The question of post-secondary education dealt with under the previous amendment specifically is one which must be of great concern to us. I suppose it should be noted that while the bulk of the particular programs that are envisaged under this bill are continued for five years, the post-secondary education program under part VI of the bill is continued for two years only. Obviously, this is a matter that is now under review and under discussion with the provincial governments.

• (2100)

The balkanization of Canada in respect of post-secondary education or in any other respect is not an objective of the federal government. From that point of view I thank the hon. member for bringing these amendments before the House because it has given all of us an opportunity to debate them. However, the amendments per se are manifestly not acceptable, are manifestly unworkable and perhaps having accomplished the purpose for which they were brought forward, namely, to permit debate in specific areas, the proper thing to do, if the hon. member does not propose to withdraw this one as he did the last, would be to get on with it and defeat them so that we can make sure that these very valuable and worth while fiscal arrangements which exist between the federal government and the provinces of Canada will continue.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister permit a question? He defined federal programs as programs which could be affected by the group of provincial premiers. Perhaps he would look at the title of the bill and see that it is the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. Does he not agree that this is an embodiment of an agreement between the federal and provincial governments?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Speaker, of course but it is a federal program which is proposed to and accepted by the provinces. It is a program that has evolved over the years in a co-operative spirit and one that has worked very well. Nevertheless, it is a program that is based on federal initiatives and as such it is a federal program.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to lend my support to the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) because it seems to me that it has the effect of placing a certain power in the hands of the provinces which does not properly rest with them and should not properly rest with them. I think we should hesitate to adopt any step where the actions of the government of Canada could be vetoed by the actions of not just the legislatures but by the ministers of the provinces concerned, as was pointed out by the Minister of State (Mr. Mahoney).

It seems to me that this would be a totally faulty principle on which to carry on the operations of the federal government. It would be a totally faulty principle for this Parliament to adopt. But having said that, I think that there is a valid area of concern which should be noted by the House. It is, as was pointed out originally in the second reading debate by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), that there is a greater degree of flexibility left in the legislation as compared to previous legislation in this field, that some of the details, some of the particulars of the new formula and the new legislation are to be worked out through regulations. While this has a certain amount of merit because of obvious difficulties and problems in dealing with a very complex problem, I think it does pose some concerns for members of parliament in terms of our exercise as legislators on behalf of the people of Canada in the control of the expenditure of money, because in fact what we are doing by allowing some definitions in other areas to be spelled out in regulations is to determine in a much more precise way than is contained in the legislation the extent to which the federal government will be making payments to the provinces.

It is the case that even some of the principles involved in making payments to the provinces are not fully spelled out, that in fact some of the principles involved in making payments to the provinces and carrying on the various programs contained within this package of legislation will have to be spelled out by regulations. Thus, there is no control by the Parliament of Canada over some of the money that in fact will be spent as a result of the authority granted under this legislation.

It seems to me that there is a deficiency in the legislation and that possibly there has not been adequate consideration of this point so far in the debate on the bill. It would be much more in keeping with the concern which I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West was attempting to express if we were to accept an amendment which would give parliament a greater right of veto over regulations that may subsequently be established, to have such power of veto exercised within the time period that is relevant to the passage of these regulations and which would not be delayed for a considerable period of time.

I hope that in time we will find some way to deal with this problem through the legislation, namely, to provide for whatever degree of flexibility may be necessary and desirable in the legislation while at the same time ensuring that we as members of parliament exercise a proper degree of control and authority over the spending of public money. I am not sure that that has been accomplished in the bill which is before us.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add to what my colleague has said just two or three sentences. I find it a strange piece of irony that last year the former minister of justice with great fanfare piloted through the House the legislation known as the Statutory Instruments Act. We remember still how keen he was and how sincere he seemed as he expressed the desire that parliament would have the chance to exercise its authority with regard to the growing use of the power of regulation, the power of order in council. Now we have before us a bill in the name of the same individual, the very same person, who is now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and yet no provision has been made for the powers that were brought before us last year with such fanfare to be used with respect to this bill. To me this is sheer irony.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Having ventilated the question, I am quite prepared to withdraw the amendment. Certainly I would not divide the House if we could get on to third reading. But I am disappointed that we could not get an indication from the minister that he would take some action under the Statutory Instruments Act. The government can rest assured they are going to be badgered and pushed around by us with regard to the point until they do something.

• (2110)

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said, the very same minister popped all the buttons off his shirt in the pride he had in piloting the Statutory Instruments Act through the House. I should think he would now cover his head in sackcloth and ashes for the government so far as that action is concerned.

With the consent of the House I should like to withdraw the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) be allowed to withdraw motion No. 2 which has appeared in his name at the report stage of Bill C-8?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Lambert, Edmonton West) withdrawn.

Hon. C. M. Drury (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-8, to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Drury (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I think there is no doubt that dominion-provincial conferences which deals with various matters are becoming more and more a concern on the governmental scene and that the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures have somewhat less significant roles to play.

If we were philosophers we would simply see this as constitutional change in our time because the constitution is, after all, more than 100 years old. As politicians, though, I think we would like to see more of the action in our own arena. We long to have more clout with regard to some of the great arguments of the day, instead of seeing the marvellous postures that various federal people or various provincial premiers and their ministers adopt in negotiations in public and then, when faced with something like the current piece of legislation, no matter what they said about each other or to each other find out about the buddy-buddy system that has been reached in federal-provincial horse-trading which goes on behind the scenes. One becomes a little wary and perhaps more eager, if more frustrated, to discuss some of the subjects that form the basis of federal-provincial agreements.

We in this party make no apology for the accent we put on federal moneys available for higher education at the second reading debate, in the study by the finance committee, and on the motion that has been presented earlier for discussion at the report stage. Some of us have a feeling that the federal authority and the provincial authorities are treating the costs of higher education as one would treat the juggling of eggs—one would wish to put them aside, one would wish to have some control over their rather fragile nature. The fact is that this is a nettle that has to be grasped by both provincial and federal governments and it is a nettle that concerns us very much in this Parliament.

One of the thoughtful presentations, and indeed the only presentation that came from outside sources on this particular bill came to us because the hon. member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Fairweather) thought that we should hear from the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, so they appeared before us. I should like to place some of their comments on record in addition to what was placed on the record earlier. In a submission regarding federally-supported universities and colleges of Canada that was made to the government of Canada by the Council of Ministers of Education and is appendix B to issue No. 2 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, at page 37 the AUCC brief reads:

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

> We are concerned that there be adequate support for higher education in the face of the projected increases in enrolments, the growing need for research support and facilities to foster the cultural, economic and social requirements of the country as a whole and its regions, the need to reduce the regional disparities across the country and the need to make provision for the mobility of the Canadian population. Moreover, the question of the number of foreign students the universities of Canada should accept is related to Canadian external policy.
> We sense a growing demand for continuing university education on a full time and part time basis for retraining, upgrading and for general educational advancement. It is our conviction that universities must prepare for a much deeper involvement in continuing higher education than they have in the past.

That covers a fair amount of waterfront. It deals with the preoccupation of being good citizens in the world at large and being of some help to developing countries as well as concern about our own country. The brief goes on to meet one of the great issues of our time which has not yet been successfully dealt with in this parliament:

> There appears to be a growing demand, reflected in our projections, on the part of women for further education to prepare them more adequately for increasing participation in the economic and community activities of society, more informed participation in the activities of the home, and for personal satisfaction. Nevertheless, there are constraints which discourage women, regardless of their ability, from entering university. These constraints include cultural and social attitudes respecting the obligations of women, fewer job opportunities, lower rates of pay and the like.

Mr. Speaker, before redistribution in 1968 I had the honour of representing five or six universities. Under the new boundary arrangements, Halifax-East Hants has only one university, Mount St. Vincent, which is a university largely for women so I am striking a blow for them this evening. What will be the demands on the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the various provinces over the next decade from the standpoint of financing the costs of higher education? I admit that this subject makes any minister of finance nervous, whether federal or provincial, because the costs have gone up a great deal. I really cannot see that any restraint or constraint can be placed upon them. This is something that has to be faced, and that money has to be provided. At page 39 of the report the association makes the following projection: in 1958-59 full-time enrolment at universities was 95,000; in 1968-69 it had increased threefold to 293,600; in 1975-76 it is projected to reach 560,000, and in 1980-81, 750,000 almost an eightfold increase as compared with the enrolment of 1958-59. These projections indicate a problem that must be met: it cannot be wished away.

Finally, may I quote further from this thoughtful brief which is many pages long. I have only touched on its highlights this evening. At page 44 we find these words:

> In conclusion we wish to emphasize that the probable enrolment is already in sight and has been measured. If adequate financial support is not forthcoming the universities, having made what economies are appropriate and possible, have two options: turn away students who wish to attend or allow quality to deteriorate. We believe the former to be unacceptable to the public and the latter disastrous for the public good.

There, Mr. Speaker, are a few views on the matter, although they do not cover the entire period covered by the agreements entered into under Bill C-8 which we are now considering.

The other matter I wish to touch on I raised during the second reading debate on this measure. I gave the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) notice at the first committee meeting on Bill C-8 that I would be dealing with this matter when the bill came before the House for third reading. Since the Minister of Finance might still be involved in this bill in his former capacity of minister of justice, I am surprised not to see him here. At any rate, I gave him notice of my intention and I therefore hope some member of the ministry will have the courtesy to give me a response on the point I am about to raise. This is what I said, Mr. Speaker, when the matter arose in committee, as recorded at page 9 of issue No. 1 of Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs:

The point that I made in the House was that as far as I could determine there was really no legality or legislation that I could find that gave any right to the federal authority to collect such taxes—

I was referring to succession duties.

—in those six provinces which are proposing to enter into the succession duty field. I wondered if the Minister, who had been Minister of Justice before, had advised the Minister of Finance then as to whether or not this course could be followed.

I might say, to refresh the memories of hon. members, that this point concerns clauses 9 and 10 of Bill C-8 which empower the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces for the collection of succession duties. The Minister of Finance replied to me in committee as follows:

I cannot describe to the honourable Member, Mr. Chairman, what advice I gave to the former Minister of Finance when I was the former Minister of Justice, but I can say that the statutory framework for these collection agreements is found in the bill itself. In other words, it provides an umbrella situation for agreements for the collection of taxes to be made under the general statutory authority of the bill.

I then asked:

Am I right then in assuming from the minister's answer that the situation will become regularized by the passage of this measure and that no other authority exists other than that found in clauses 9 and 10.

The minister answered, "Yes, sir." That, Mr. Speaker, confirms the point I made originally in this debate, that we are now being asked by the government to legalize more or less an ad hoc arrangement which the government has entered into with the provinces. I submit that no legislative authority exists for such an arrangement and that it is in breach of our constitutional practice and parliamentary practice as they have been followed from the dawn of our parliamentary system. I shall deal with that matter in the remaining portion of my speech before founding my motion on that theme.

The government has given instruction to the banks to restrict the amount of assets which are to be released from an estate and it seems to act as though it has the power to collect succession duties. On March 3, 1972, I quoted part of a letter sent by Mr. J. C. Ruddy, director of the estate and gift tax division of the Department of National Revenue. Actually, the references to the letter begin at page 507 of Hansard and continue for several pages. I said that the government cannot claim that it has the power to give these instructions to banks under the Estate Tax Act for that act was repealed when Bill C-259 of the previous session became law. The government cannot claim it has such power under the authority of provincial legislation which is to be adopted.

Of course, we could negate Bill C-8 entirely. That is to say, we could throw it out and that would clearly be the end of any such claim on the government's part. I submit that clause 9 of Bill C-8, dealing with fiscal payments to provinces and related matters, provides that the government of Canada will be entitled to collect estate tax duties after an agreement is concluded with the provinces and after the appropriate provincial legislation is adopted. So far as I know, this is not happening with any one of the six provinces; therefore, I submit that the federal government is acting on agreements and legislation which are not in existence.

The authority for the federal government to prohibit the opening up or removal of any property in a depository or the delivering up of any property held in safekeeping for a deceased person was previously found in the Estate Tax Act. That act required the consent of the minister before such property could be released. As I say, Bill C-259 of the previous session effectively repealed the Estate Tax Act with respect to the death of any person who died after the stroke of midnight on December 31, 1971. Therefore, in respect of the property of these persons the federal government no longer has such authority.

I submit that until a province or the federal government enacts similar legislation there is no authority to require a bank to receive consent before releasing the property it holds on behalf of an estate. Clearly, if some crusty executor or lawyer of the old school got mad with the estate tax division of the Department of National Revenue and wished to raise cain about this matter in the courts of the land, he could. I suggest the courts would have no sympathy for the Department of National Revenue for entering into arrangements that in effect freeze estates in six provinces and say that only on the say-so of the federal district director of estate taxation shall assets be released.

That arrangement has been entered into without a jot or tittle of legislative authority. If some crusty Canadian wanted to test these rights in court now, he would make the Department of National Revenue look pretty sick in any court of the land. I do not know if such a crusty Canadian exists. However, if you read cases in the English law reports you will find that there was such a crusty Englishman. Some of those fellows fight until hell freezes over—

An hon. Member: Be careful now.

Mr. McCleave: —because they will fight over a point of principle. The case I have in mind is Bowles v. Bank of England, reported in 1913 Chancery Law Reports, page 57. The case was actually heard in 1912. What I found interesting was the length of the report. It begins at page 57 and ends at page 91 and many pages are devoted to the decision of one member of the court. I am not referring to the court of appeal. I found it fascinating because the report of the argument alone covers 25 pages and the report of the decision only eight. It is fascinating because counsel involved were among the most eminent of men who ever clapped wig on head and strode into English courtrooms to argue points of law.

• (2130)

It is also fascinating because one lone Englishman asserted principles for all of us against all the might of government and all the best legal brains the Bank of England and the government of that day could produce. From reading the case it sounds as though that lone Englishman, Mr. Bowles, had some legal training but maybe he found it all in the museum or went somewhere to get his law. Anyway, he stood off all the legal forces arrayed against him.

I will now proceed to what the case was all about. I am going to spend a little time on it. It was so well decided that the Parliament of England settled the question by passing a provisional act, the Provisional Collection of Tax Act. This is something we do not have in Canada. It enables the English government to do with estates what the Canadian government is now attempting to do. It was to cure the decision of the Bowles case. They could get away with it in England and in legal standing; we in Canada cannot because we do not have that corrective action.

I will be as brief as I can but I want to make the record complete, if only to tell my grandchildren that I stood in the line of those who thought it was all right that Charles I was separated from his head. I hope I can get others in parliament to share my interest and concern in this matter. After the next election perhaps it will be found that a great number of the public share that particular concern. I quote:

On April 2, 1912, the Committee of the House of Commons for Ways and Means passed a resolution approving of the imposition, for the financial year commencing April 6, 1912, of income tax at the rate of 1s. 2d. in the pound, and this resolution was reported to and adopted by the House of Commons on June 24, 1912.

The dividends on the stock were payable on January 1 and July 1, and on June 26 the plaintiff issued the writ of summons in the present action against the defendants, the Governor and Company of the Bank of England—

Part of his claim was:

An injunction restraining the defendants, their servants or agents, from deducting, by way of income tax or otherwise, any sum whatsoever from the dividend . . . payable to the plaintiff on July 1, 1912, in respect of . . . Irish Land Stock, of which he is the registered owner—

He also asked for—

—a declaration that the defendants, their servants or agents, are not entitled to deduct, by way of income tax or otherwise, any sum whatsoever from the dividend—

All this was done in the face of a resolution that had been passed by a committee of the House of Commons. On June 28, 1912, the plaintiff added another arrow to his bow, or quiver. He asked for——"a declaration that the defendants, their servants or agents are not entitled to deduct, by way of income tax, any sum whatsoever from any dividend or interest payable by them upon the public funds or the said public stock before such tax is actually imposed by Act of Parliament"—

This is very germane to the point I am now making. All this is to be found at pages 58 and 59 of the report in the Chancery Division. On July 1 the Bank of England paid Mr. Bowles his dividend less a certain amount of money. That certain amount of money for income tax was paid into court. The matter then got into the law courts where, as I said, the plaintiff, Mr. Bowles, argued his case in person. The Bank of England had Romer, who was a distinguished King's Counsel of the day, and S. A. T. Rowlatt who later became a judge of the high court. There is a great quotation from the Magna Carta right down to the laws that existed in 1912. At one point Romer, the distinguished counsel for the bank, said rather plaintively:

[Mr. McCleave.]

The Bank is placed in the awkward position of being sued by Mr. Bowles if it deducts the tax, and of being sued by the Inland Revenue if it does not.

That was a perfectly true statement of the bank's position. That is found at page 63 of the report. After considerable argument the case was adjourned. When it resumed the plaintiff was back, again without a lawyer. He continued to argue his case. Mr. Romer was there for the Bank of England. Howard Wright, another distinguished commercial lawyer at the time, was there for the Bank of England having replaced Rowlatt who had been appointed to the high court.

The government got into the act at that point. It had Sir Rufus Isaacs, the attorney general, and Sir John Simon, the solicitor general. I think any lawyer in this House will recognize that these were two of the five or six very distinguished lawyers at the English bar in this century. The Crown did not exactly wander in without the best counsel it could obtain in this matter. I quote further from the argument in the case:

The Treasury, when brought to book by the Comptroller of the Issues of the Exchequer, excused itself by alleging a resolution of the House of Commons; but on the question being laid before the law officers of the Crown, then Sir Robert Finlay and Sir Edward Carson, they decided that the Treasury was wrong and its action unlawful; and Mr. Blain, representing the Treasury, on being asked by the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, "I suppose you will agree that there was an infraction of the statute?" replied, "After the law officers' opinion we certainly must agree as to that. Of course the Treasury would feel all the more bounded in any future case that nothing of the sort should happen, so far as they could prevent it":

With two more quotations the foundation of my case will be laid on this particular matter. It was stated by the plaintiff in the argument in his brief, and these briefs are very extensively quoted:

The principle that the subject cannot be taxed without consent, or otherwise than by law, is as old as history. It was affirmed by the laws of King Alfred. It was adopted and confirmed even by the laws of William the Conqueror. All the earlier great jurists have asserted it, from Bracton in the Thirteenth century to Sir John Fortescue in the fifteenth century, who in his De Laudibus Legum Angliae says (see translation by Robert Mulcaster, ed. 1567, c. 9, pp. 25, 26)—

I hope Hansard will take the spelling found at page 72 of the Chancery Division report; it is quaint.

"The Kynge of England cannot alter nor change the lawes of his royalme at his pleasure"; he can neither change lawes without the consent of his subjects, nor yet charge them with straunge impositions against their wylles." So, too, say the later authorities, from Selden to Hallam, and also the statutes.

It concluded with Mr. Bowles.

I challenge the Attorney-General to present any authority suggesting that the power of taxation is to be found in anything whatever save and except an Act of Parliament.

Sir Rufus Isaacs and Austen-Cartmell, who had joined the case, and Sir John Simon and W. Finlay with them for the Crown, said in their opening statement:

The general propositions laid down by the plaintiff are beyond dispute;

• (2140)

He won the day and the small amount of money taken from him for the purpose of paying income tax which had not been imposed by act of parliament was ordered to be returned to him. You will also be pleased to note, Mr. Speaker, that the judge ordered that the bank must pay the costs of the action. I imagine that the bill of costs when it was drawn up, with all those counsel running around, would amount to a very substantial sum. The monetary return to the plaintiff would be secondary to what happenned when that bill of costs was marched before the taxing master.

In any event, perhaps I can sum up the points I made on second reading, notice of which I gave to the Minister of Finance. I advised him then of the case from which I would be quoting. That is the case from which I have in fact quoted. I say that the federal authority, the Department of National Revenue, without a tittle of right under our constitution or parliamentary practice, issued directives to the banking system of Canada that in six provinces in which people had died since January 1, estates could only be dealt with at the will of federal bureaucrats, that is, people in the former estates tax division of the Department of National Revenue.

I say there is not an ounce of authority for that directive and there will be none until this bill is passed—and there is nothing in it which would seem to make it retroactive—or until provincial legislation is passed. Accordingly, because I feel strongly about this and because the practices of the House have been abused, I now move, seconded by my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That Bill C-8 be not now read a third time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the action of the government in arranging by departmental directive for machinery to collect taxes for several provinces of which Parliament had not yet approved is contrary to established practice and without constitutional authority.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there may be a procedural point involved here. I will be prepared to argue on at least one aspect of the procedural question should Your Honour wish to hear argument tonight. It is possible that you may wish to reserve your ruling until another occasion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I should tell the hon. member at this point, before I put his amendment, that I have reservations with regard to it, mainly because it appears to go beyond the purview of the bill which is before us. I refer the hon. member to citation 418 of Beauchesne which reads:

The question for the third reading is put immediately after the report from the committee of the whole. All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

Maybe it is an appropriate moment at which to invite the hon. member's comments. The main point I wish to raise is that the amendment does not seem to meet all the requirements, particularly the one which says that an amendment should be relevant to the bill.

Mr. McCleave: I appreciate the difficulty in which the Chair finds itself. I have read the citation in Beauchesne which was applicable when a situation of this kind was discussed in the House on March 24, 1948, the citation then being 710; perhaps it has been changed in the latest edition.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That would have been the third edition.

Mr. McCleave: It would have been the third edition, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) reminds me. The argument I should like to put forward is twofold. First, similar amendments were presented in this House as recently as December last on the occasion of Bill C-259. On that occasion, I suggest the amendment put forward was parallel to the one I am seeking to propose today, which is simply an attempt to indict a practice which has associated itself with the measure before us. Your Honour may wish to withhold a decision on this rather important point until you have had an opportunity to read the relevant extracts in connection with the third reading of Bill C-259.

The other argument I should like to present to Your Honour is this: the principle which could be cited against an amendment of the type I am proposing arises out of a practice which grew up when legislation was dealt with somewhat differently in the House: it went through second reading, which was regarded as the decision of the House on the question of principle, was sent to committee of the whole and finally given third reading. Now, however, the rules provide for a somewhat different procedure. We are often told that the purpose of second reading is to get a bill into committee where its merits can be studied. Then comes the report stage, followed by third reading. The type of third reading we have now, and which many argue is really the decision by the House on questions of principle, is different from the old practice set forth by Beauchesne and other learned authors of the past.

• (2150)

Considering those two points, and inviting Your Honour to look at the rulings which were given by the Chair in the final hours of the passage of Bill C-259, the income tax omnibus bill, perhaps Your Honour would agree with me that my motion is in order, as I so submit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I am sure the hon. member understands that he cannot ask the Chair to rule on the intention of an amendment. The Chair can rule only on the procedural acceptability of an amendment as such.

To my mind, the terms of the present amendment appear to criticize the actions of the government. Hon. members know that according to the rules of the House an amendment must relate to the content of the bill. It can either refute the bill or must relate to something that is found in the provisions of the bill. I have already referred to the citation in Beauchesne that clearly provides that all amendments that may be moved on second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading, with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill. If the hon. member would also refer to the top of page 572 of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, seventeenth edition, he will see quite plainly provided:

> As the debate on the third reading should be confined to the contents of the bill, reasoned amendments which raise matters not included in the provisions of the bill are not permissible.

In view of these two citations, it is clear that the hon. member cannot ask the Chair to postpone its decision as to the acceptability of this amendment on the sole ground that it might be, in the mind of the hon. member, a very important question. For these reasons I cannot accept the amendment.

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the five minutes remaining before ten o'clock to rebut very emphatically the suggestions of impropriety imputed by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave).

It is somewhat astonishing to hear it suggested that the federal government does not have a right to offer the provincial governments its collection facilities through the Department of National Revenue in the case of succession duties or estate taxes that the provincial governments might choose to levy. The whole point of the argument made by the hon. member was not really whether the federal government has this right, as indeed it must have, but rather whether some of the provinces have not exercised proper budgetary procedures in choosing to impose their particular taxes as of and from the beginning of the current year. That is not a subject upon which this body should be asked to adjudicate or to pass judgment.

We have before us in part III of the bill a whole system of arrangements whereby the federal government collects taxes for provinces, I am sure all Canadians would agree at very great savings and to the practical advantage of all. The federal government itself determined when it brought down the budget in June, 1971, that it should discontinue collection of death duties with the inception of a capital gains tax in Canada.

However, this was a tax field that was properly open to the provinces. It was evident that, with the exception of the three provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia which had theretofore been collecting succession duties, the machinery would not exist at the provincial level to enable the provinces to move into this field should they wish to do so. Therefore, the federal government suggested to the provinces that if four provinces other than the three I have mentioned wished to move into this tax field, the federal government would for a limited period of time make its collection facilities available to those provinces through the Department of National Revenue. That is all that has happened.

The question whether these taxes are properly or improperly imposed is one that will have to be answered by the provinces that imposed them. The federal involvement in this field is purely as a collecting agent. I think it would be most unfortunate, unfair and regrettable if the imputation were left on the record, at this particular hour of the night when the debate is closing, that the federal government has done anything other than fulfil its obligations to the provinces in making available its services should the provinces choose to use them.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I want to make some remarks on third reading of the bill, but since I see the clock moving very close to ten o'clock I would ask that we call it that.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether there would be unanimous agreement to calling the next question, in view of the fact that the minister is not here and that he indicated to me a few minutes ago in the committee that he would be here. I can then go on in a few minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The minister is not here but I was asked to answer in his place.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member knows I would have to ask for unanimous consent of the House. From what the parliamentary secretary has said, there does not seem to be that unanimity, so I think we should proceed.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, that was not the same point of order. I was speaking to the minister 20 minutes ago in the committee and he indicated to me that he wished to be here and asked that we hold the question until the second order of business. He will be here shortly. On that basis I do not think there will be any objection.

Mr. Béchard: I agree, Mr. Speaker, and therefore I will be able to leave right now.

• (2200)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that we change the order and put this question as No. 2 on the list?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—DISPUTE WITH NABET—REQUEST THAT CBC ENGAGE IN MEANINGFUL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the course of action that has been taken and am very pleased that the minister who is going to reply to my question is in the House. I hope that the interventions that occurred earlier will not subtract from the time that I have available to present my case. It deals with the NABET-CBC dispute. I fully realize that there is little political mileage to be gained by anyone, especially one who speaks on behalf of the complainants in a labour dispute these days. That is simply an acknowledgement on my part of the particular climate of Canadian public opinion as it applies to strikes.

I believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is convinced that his predecessor, Mr. Pearson, made a gross error in ever permitting strikes in the civil service at all, and the present government strategy, whether we are talking about the air traffic controllers, the airport technicians or the CBC technicians, is one of foot-dragging for the specific purpose of encouraging the build-up of a negative opinion with respect to strikes, to the extent that frustrated Canadians will rise up as a man and demand a system of compulsory arbitration in labour disputes in the public service. I am very pleased that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) looked up at that point, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased if I reached him. It does not seem to matter whether the particular component of the public service affected by a dispute is essential or not in the public interest.

The NABET strike-lock-out routine with the CBC has gone on since January 22. These men and women, employees of the CBC, were pushed into the position they now occupy because ever since May, 1971, the CBC has refused to budge from its initial working conditions and wage offer. Someone has said, and his name escapes me even though I consulted the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) on the source, that justice delayed is justice denied.

It is always easy to blame labour for the interruption of a popular broadcast such as NHL hockey, particularly if one does not take the time or trouble to identify where the blame really lies. Our affable Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has a line that he often uses in this House, based on a popular song. He often says that it takes two to tango. But, Mr. Speaker, it also takes two sides to negotiate. When one side solidifies, then productive negotiations cease. I believe that has happened for the past ten months with the CBC and NABET, but recent calls by NABET for a summit meeting with the President of the CBC have produced some result. Apparently there is to be such a meeting tomorrow. I am extremely happy with this but I would like to know the basis for the inflexibility shown in this dispute. Why has it gone on so long before this summit meeting takes place?

Sometimes I wonder if it is the death wish of the CBC. I also wonder, and I hope I will be excused for my suspicion, if there is some kind of link between the Liberal government and the treasury board that seems to motivate or occasion deliberate and identical tactics which the treasury board introduces no matter what the particular bargaining component concerned happens to be.

All of us have observed, and I regret this personal inference, that Mr. Davidson, the president of the CBC has rather large ears. There is a strong, positive correlation between large ears and acoustical sensitivity. I point out that Mr. Davidson is a career civil servant and he does not like noise. I believe that the reason he is president of the CBC today is to keep things quiet. After people such as his predecessors met with trouble and controversy with programs such as "This Hour has Seven Days" the government was on the lookout for someone to clamp the lid down for at least a few years. I think the president of the CBC has done this with considerable success.

But what I am concerned about is the outright neglect and waste not only of the taxpayer's interest but also of his money. It has been estimated that the NABET strike has cost Canadian taxpayers between $5 million and $10 million to date from the time it started. I do not know; it depends on how one looks at it. I do not have with me the accounts of the President of the Treasury Board and I do not have his ability to figure. But I believe it would be much more simple and far less costly in terms of morale and finance if there had been a settlement a long time ago, because the ultimate figure probably will not be much more than $6 million, $8 million or $9 million. I do not think that was the strategy. I think public opinion was built up behind a particular strategy so that the government could call for a board of arbitration in respect of this dispute. I believe there would be a good deal of support for this. I am sorry to say so, but I believe this is the situation.

So the government's strategy is working. I regret it, but I think that is the case. The CBC is supposed to be an independent Crown corporation. I do not believe it is independent of government influence. I do not understand how anyone could listen, for instance, to Ron Collister interviewing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and still believe the CBC is an independent Crown corporation.

I think the sinister implication of a prolonged strike, however disparate the position taken by the French director Raymond David, will ultimately occasion the death of the CBC as we have come to know it and to depend on it in its role as a public broadcaster in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The time of the hon. member has expired.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the form of the hon. member's question somewhat surprises me. First of all, I don't see any connection with the principle of the CBC employees' right to strike, which has never been questioned. I believe there must be some confusion in the mind of the hon. member when he glibly speaks of the "lock-out" which the CBC is alleged to be perpetrating since January, without the slighest reference to the rotating strike which the union is not making any secret about, I believe, and which has been carried out quite openly.

I also fail to understand how he can, in the same breath, mention the interference of the Treasury Board in a Crown corporation while calling for respect of the CBC's independence in its negotiations, and at the same time say we are guilty of non-interference in this labour conflict because the government did not intervene in the internal affairs of the CBC, leaving settlement of the dispute to the management of the corporation.

At any rate, I feel that the hon. member's most important point is what I wanted to tell the House tonight, that upon the invitation of the president of the CBC a summit meeting has now been arranged between the union leaders on the one hand and the management of the CBC on the other hand, together with two executives of the union and of the corporation.

I should just like to abstain from comment and hope that this renewal of direct negotiations—which I had hinted at in my reply to a question in the House yesterday or the day before—will lead to settlement of the dispute.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should also like to answer the hon. member who enquired about the financial losses caused by the strike, that is the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). The CBC is in the process of studying the financial results of the strike, to establish what gains and losses were incurred. I believe the figures the hon. member quoted are far removed from the facts but, still, we will have to wait for the CBC's figure to solve the matter.

AGRICULTURE—POTATOES—RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS FOR ACTION TO RELIEVE DEPRESSED MARKET—POSSIBLE DIVERSION TO STOCK FEED

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to deal with what is becoming almost not a day by day but an hour by hour issue between the people of Prince Edward Island and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). I think that somewhat innocently enough negotiations began last fall with respect to the disposition of the agriculture stabilization board to assist in dealing with the orderly marketing of potatoes and hopefully the establishment or the improvement of the general level of income received by farmers for their produce in potatoes. On March 4 a telegram was sent to the Minister of Agriculture, a copy of which was sent to me and others, which reads as follows:

> The potato committee of N.B. and P.E.I. held a joint meeting on March 4. The two committees unanimously agreed to urge that all potatoes committed to the price stabilization board be deleted from federal potato storage holdings report of March 1. We also urge that immediate disposition of committed product be undertaken and that the means of diversion used in any area be the most suitable for the producers of that area. We urge your fullest co-operation.
> Ira Lewis, Chairman, P.E.I. Potato Co-ordinating Committee.
> Fred McCain, Chairman, N.B. Potato Industry Committee.

Following that, I tried on one or two occasions to raise this matter with the Minister of Agriculture, who was not available. Initially I raised it with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) who last Monday was reporting for the Department of Agriculture. He indicated that the board was not prepared to take a decision. This produced a second telegram from the chairman of the P.E.I. committee which reads as follows:

> P.E.I. Potato Co-ordinating Committee is dismayed at recent stabilization board statement that they are not prepared to sell back committed potatoes for livestock feed purposes. In view of wholehearted support for this use by all segments including Potato Dealers Association and Minister of Agriculture as expressed to board from meeting February 4 and the fact that detailed procedures for disposal as feed were suggested to the stabilization board by this committee as early as February 8 in Ottawa this decision is acutely disappointing. Our committee emphasizes that every day's delay is costing island farmers money.
> Further delay to assess already known stocks for a market that is artificially high due to reefer car shortage is both futile and costly. In view of extremely adverse producer reaction to this latest of a long series of delays and the mistrust it is creating we urge in the strongest possible terms implementation of the livestock feeding program immediately according to procedures outlined at February 8 meeting.
> Ira Lewis, chairman.

Then this morning there was a further telegram, this time from the president of the P.E.I. Federation of Agriculture, which reads:

> Hereby advising that island potato growers waiting only 24 hours more for decision re diversion program potatoes. If no decision by tomorrow noon permitting livestock feed program proceed immediately we calling mass meeting of all growers involved in Charlottetown and hereby request your deputy Mr. Williams attend this meeting to explain position and delays of stabilization board.
> Wallace Wood, president, P.E.I. Federation of Agriculture.

Finally, this afternoon, in the provincial legislature of Prince Edward Island the following resolution was passed. I will not read the whole of the resolution because the "whereases" really reiterate the arguments which were previously put forward. The body of the resolution reads as follows:

> Be it therefore resolved that this Legislature do unanimously approve the resolution supporting the federation of agriculture and other farm groups in their request for an immediate reply for the disposition of the potatoes purchased by the stabilization board.

It is absolutely incredible that the Minister of Agriculture and the stabilization board should at this time, so many days and weeks after the representations received from all levels of the potato industry in P.E.I. plus the provincial government, be unable to explain or inform the agricultural industry of Prince Edward Island their reasons for the delay in dealing directly with this problem. Indeed, as I look at the question I find it not only disturbing but downright confusing.

There are some obvious benefits to be derived from the immediate disposal of the stocks that are presently held. These benefits can be seen firstly and perhaps most obviously in terms of the general level of agricultural need at present in P.E.I. There is a very obvious need at this date in the winter season for extra feed to carry over the various stocks that are being handled in the agricultural segment this year. Secondly, there is the remaining 75 cents per hundredweight that would go into farmers' pockets that should not be overlooked at this point. Thirdly, because of the shortage of reefer cars and the few potatoes moving generally, some very important employment could be provided in the grading of potatoes. Fourthly, the extra grading space available is not inconsequential. Fifthly, and this is the strongest argument which the minister himself advanced in the miscellaneous estimates committee yesterday, the disposing of these potatoes would likely raise the market price.

Perhaps in a way the minister tipped his hand yesterday when he dealt with the question. He said he would not want to do that because that was not the purpose of the program at all; it was not to deal with price raises but to ensure the farmers of some kind of minimal return. If that is the only interest that the minister and the stabilization board have, surely that is not sufficient for the needs of the potato growers of Prince Edward Island. The minister continues to talk vaguely about export markets. What export markets? When? I know as sure as I stand here that two or three weeks from now when the minister makes a decision it will be the same as it could be today, and that is to divert these 600 or 700 carloads of potatoes for badly needed stock feeding.

I cannot understand, nor can anyone in Prince Edward Island, why in the first instance the minister does not reply and meet with the individuals directly involved and, secondly, explore the matter in the most direct way possible.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of very serious inaccuracies in what the hon. member has said, and in the three minutes allotted to me I want to point them out as clearly as I can. In the first place, the purchase program was, if you like, indeed a cash advance of 75 cents per hundredweight with a further 75 cents available to the producer when he was called upon to deliver the potatoes. The fact is that today those potatoes are selling anywhere from 30 cents to 50 cents per hundredweight over the $1.50 we guaranteed.

If we call them forward from the producers and call them at $1.50, where is the justice in that to the individual farmer when there is a rapidly escalating market at the moment where he may want to sell them? He could then refund the cash advance we have made and take advantage of the price higher than $1.50 per hundredweight. The hon. member seems to completely ignore the case of farmers who have taken this cash advance and who may have an opportunity, which is manifest right today, of probably getting another 30 cents to 50 cents.

If we were to call for delivery of the potatoes today, which we have a right to do, and pay him the other 75 cents he would only get $1.50. When the market is escalating as it is and he wants to give back to us the interest free cash advance, then he can avail himself of the market which is higher. There is justice involved in that.

If we were to divert these potatoes to livestock feed, whose potatoes would we call? We would have to call them from individual farmers, and this is nonsense. Are we going to deny them the right to avail themselves of the higher price? I do not think that we are, or that we ought to. I think the hon. member should take this into account. He complains that there are no reefer cars. I checked today and I know there is a shortage, but at the same time there has been a reasonably good movement of potatoes compared with this time of the year in other years. So it is not fair to say that is the whole reason.

We introduced this program for the purpose of raising the price at least above $1.50 because each producer knew he could get that much from us. We tried to make it clear, in spite of their attempt to cloud the issue, that if the farmer could avail himself of a price in the market higher than $1.50, that opportunity would be open to him. I intend to see that the individual farmer has that opportunity.

CRIMINAL CODE—ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—REVIEW BY HOUSE DURING PRESENT SESSION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday March 14 last, I put the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

> In view of the fact that on December 29, 1967 the House of Commons deemed advisable to amend section 202A(2) of the Criminal Code, dealing with capital punishment in Canada, with a few exceptions, made the amendment to remain in force for a five-year period ending on December 29, 1972, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether he intends to have the House deal with the matter this year, during the present session?

The Prime Minister answered that he did not intend to broach this matter during the present session.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the question should be submitted to the House as soon as possible. A few months ago, I sent to the 18,000 family heads of my constituency a questionnaire in which I asked them to state their opinion on that controversial issue. I received 4,752 answers. Therefore, over 25 per 100 of the citizens of my constituency took pains to send me their answer in Ottawa. As you undoubtedly realize, that percentage is quite significant and shows that this problem concerns my constituents as does any other event in French Canada.

Of all respondents, 322 stated that they thought it better to leave the law unchanged and 4,250 asked that the legislation be amended and that the death penalty be restored. Hence, roughly speaking, 92.6 per cent of the people in my constituency want the restoration of capital punishment. Moreover, the results of a poll conducted by the Canadian Press among federal members of Parliament indicated that 77 per cent of the people's representatives wish to revert to the wording of the 1967 Act.

Mr. Speaker, so as to enlighten hon. members' memory, I should like to call their attention briefly on a few changes brought to the legislation since 1961. In 1961, murder was considered as capital in all instances and the permissible verdict was capital punishment in all cases if the judge so decided.

In September 1961, murders were differentiated in two very distinct categories. First, capital murder could entail capital punishment and was defined as premeditated murder or the murder of a police officer, a prison guard or any other law officer. In addition, murder committed during the perpetration of another criminal act entailed the possible application of the same verdict.

The second category was that of non-capital murder, which entailed a possible sentence of life imprisonment. All other murders were classified in this category.

Lastly, on December 29, 1967, the legislation was changed for a five-year trial period, or until December 29, 1972. Under the amended legislation presently in force, capital punishment, as provided for capital murder, applies only to murderers of officers of the law. All other murders are subject to life imprisonment.

Thus, by amending Section 202A(2) of the Criminal Code in 1967, we did not abolish capital punishment, but we limited the meaning of the phrase "capital murder". Thus, nowadays, the man who kills a cashier during an armed robbery only gets a life sentence. If under the same circumstances he kills a policeman or a constable, he can be sentenced to death, if the judge or jury so decide.

In short, Mr. Speaker, when we ask that capital punishment be reinstated, we want to phrase "capital murder" to apply to cases other than the murder of a policeman.

I think I should point out to the House a few statistics which show conclusively that there has been a frightening rise in crime since 1967, especially in Quebec. In 1967, there were 52 murders in Quebec; in 1968, 91, and in 1969, 128.

Admittedly, the rate of population growth increased as well, but there was an extraordinary increase in the number of murders committed. For instance, the ratio of murders was 0.7 for 100,000 people in 1966. In 1969, for the same number of people, the ratio rose to 2.1. In Quebec, there has been almost a 55 per cent increase in the number of murders since 1967, whereas the average increase in Canada and the United States was 10 per cent.

Therefore, we face a major problem, and despite what the Prime Minister may think, it is urgent to find a solution. Personally, I do not like at all the differentiation made in the present act, and by which the life of a policeman is considered to be more valuable than that of other citizens.

It is true that some policemen do dangerous work but, among us, who will not at least once in his lifetime have the opportunity of helping justice by stopping a criminal or surprising a thief red-handed?

In any event, the law as it now reads is not logical. Since the amendment in 1967, three policemen have been killed in Canada. The three criminals were condemned, and this government has pardoned the three by sentencing them only to life imprisonment. I suggest that the criminal who kills a cashier is just as guilty as if he killed a policeman. I can see no difference whatever in the gravity of the crime.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), I really had not intended to debate the whole question of capital punishment in this country. I think the question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was, when it is intended that the legislation will be presented and when will this House debate it?

I assure the hon. member there will be legislation introduced in the House well in advance of December 31, 1972, which is the deadline, and in ample time to provide the fullest possible debate and decision prior to the expiry of the five-year trial period. I think that is the important point which the hon. member is trying to make, and the important commitment that the government makes.

The questionnaire of which he speaks which was sent to his riding cannot help but reflect the feelings of his constituents in Richmond. Perhaps the hon. member is guided by this. However, there are questionnaires and various polls, the Gallup poll and statistics on this subject from Statistics Canada. These are all interesting to interpret in whatever may we wish to interpret them.

We have to make certain we understand the reasons behind increases or decreases in certain types of crimes. The important thing is that we have the fullest possible debate and the longest possible experience prior to introducing new legislaton for full debate when the hon. member and other members of the House will have ample opportunity to express their views and their constituents views on this extremely sensitive matter.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to propose a motion with reference to the proposed James Bay power project. There is some urgency that the federal involvement in this project be clarified and discussed in an open manner. Premier Bourassa has recently disclosed that he has had discussions on this matter with the Prime Minister, although that hon. member has been very elusive in response to questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. the hon. member should present his motion.

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That in the opinion of this House the government should set up an interdepartmental committee to work with the appropriate parliamentary committee to co-ordinate the federal responsibility such as Indian affairs, navigable waters, environment, in the James Bay power project.

Mr. Speaker: The motion submitted by the hon. member under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether there is unanimous consent. I will inquire again.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The nays are now more hearty. Apparently there is not unanimous consent.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Témiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-172, an Act respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gendron: Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill is self explanatory and does not require any special comment, except to say that it tends to add the name "Rivière-du-Loup" to the constituency of Témiscouata, so that we may again use the very well known name of "Rivière-du-Loup—Témiscouata".

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AUDITOR GENERAL

REQUEST THAT REPORT FOR YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1971, BE PUBLISHED EVEN IF PARLIAMENT NOT IN SESSION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, who is probably seeing whether it is safe to prepare a budget, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Having in mind the statement made by the Auditor General that his annual report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, will not be available to be presented until May of this year, will the Prime Minister assure this anxious House and the country that, if Parliament is not then in session, the report and its contents will be made public right away?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question is hypothetical, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: What about what you said to the blonde the other day?

• (1110)

Mr. Baldwin: I should like the Prime Minister to review that answer in view of the fact that if an election campaign is then pending and as government waste and extravagance will be one of the main issues in that campaign—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRADE

UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—MEASURES TO COUNTER EFFECTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As it is more than three months since President Nixon signed the DISC act in the United States and in view of the fact that this legislation is expected to increase United States exports by $1 billion annually, mainly at the expense of Canadian producers, has the government yet prepared measures to counter the effects of DISC?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The hon. member was slightly wrong the other day when he raised this issue as a question of privilege and asserted I had misled the House, or something to that effect. What has appeared in the United States is a handbook, a guide to understanding of the DISC program.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Pepin: I am coming to it. The main regulations in connection with the DISC program are not out yet; consequently it is very difficult to know how much the program will affect us. As I said the other day to the Leader of the Opposition, if the hon. member has some information to give us we shall be delighted to receive it. All the figures he has quoted this morning are guesstimates and not at all—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would like the hon. minister to resume his seat. In my opinion, he is engaging a debate with the hon. member.

[English]

The hon. member may ask a supplementary.

Mr. Broadbent: I would be glad to pass to the minister a copy of the New York Times of December 10 in which the details are given. Since the DISC legislation is in flat contradiction of both the spirit and the letter of the Canada-United States automotive agreement, has the Canadian government informed Washington that the pact has been violated?

Mr. Pepin: There is no disagreement between us. We agree that DISC is a very bad piece of legislation. It violates GATT. It violates the auto pact agreement. But I understand the automobile manufacturers in the United States have no intention of using it. So before making threats, before committing ourselves to legislation counteracting DISC, it would be wise to know what effect it will have, and it is too early in the game to know that.

Mr. Broadbent: A further supplementary.—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This exchange is really developing into a debate, but the hon. member may ask a last supplementary.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you. I understood the minister to say that the auto manufacturers have agreed not to use the DISC legislation. Can he advise the House whether the parts industry, which affects over 100 communities in Ontario alone, has given assurances to the government that it does not intend to use the DISC legislation?

Mr. Pepin: No assurances have been given, but I repeat that efforts are being made to collect as much information as possible on this subject. The Americans themselves do not know with any precision. I understand that very few companies have used the handbook, the guide; very few have filed applications. I repeat, it is too early to judge. We shall be delighted to receive estimates or forecasts by any knowledgeable people, including the hon. member, but before making moves to counter possible effects we have got to know more.

AGRICULTURE

PAYMENT OF PREMIUM TO PRODUCERS OF NON-CLASSIFIED HOGS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. Minister of Agriculture and his parliamentary secretary, may I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister?

Can the Prime Minister indicate to whom the Department of Agriculture will pay subsidies for live hogs that were auctioned by farmers and for which the farmers have no classification certificates?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am pleased to take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—SUGGESTED UNWILLINGNESS OF UNITED STATES TO RESUME AUTO PACT DISCUSSIONS UNTIL POLICY ANNOUNCED

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As reports coming out of Washington clearly indicate that the United States government is not willing to proceed with discussions on the auto pact until the Canadian government makes known its policy on foreign investment in Canada, can the minister advise the House when this policy will be announced and when the discussions will be able to proceed?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the connection between the discussions on the automobile agreement and the statement of policy on foreign investment is one with which I am not familiar. I do not think that any such connection exists. Certainly the United States negotiations have never raised it in any discussions we have had with them. Personally, I would welcome a statement on foreign investment as early as possible because I think it would be helpful. I do not see why my hon. friend makes a relation between the two; certainly he has no grounds for doing so.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if the minister checks in Washington he will find out that what I say is true.

POSSIBLE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON CANADIAN EXEMPTION FROM INTEREST EQUALIZATION TAX AND AUTO PACT NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Have there been discussions with the United States government in regard to Canada's present exemption from the interest equalization tax, and are these discussions connected with the discussions on the auto pact?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this question should be addressed to the Minister of Finance when he is in the House.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY BEFORE VISIT OF PRESIDENT NIXON TO OTTAWA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman say whether or not the government's policy on foreign ownership will be made public before the visit of the President of the United States to this country in April?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot say for sure, Mr. Speaker.

RELATIONSHIP OF TRADE NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES TO DISCUSSIONS ON CLEANING UP GREAT LAKES

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Prime Minister which is related to the question of foreign investment and cleaning up of the Great Lakes. Have there been any discussions with regard to cleaning up the Great Lakes as related to the whole question of Canada-United States relations and the trade pact?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions on the subject of Canada-United States relations, but is the hon. member speaking of the auto pact? What trade pact is he referring to?

Mr. Aiken: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the auto pact and other trade matters are directly related to the discussions concerning the clean-up of the Great Lakes?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I see no possible relation between them.

Mr. Hees: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has finished reading the book that took up so much of his time and interest yesterday afternoon?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: It was a very good book.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN—REPRESENTATIONS OF QUEBEC AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS RESPECTING SUPPLY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I wish to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister, since he has already met with the leaders of the organizations which I will refer to in my question.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has received this week representations from the Federated Co-operatives of Quebec, the Catholic Farmers Union and the Millers Association, who are asking the government to take a position as soon as possible on the unfair treatment suffered by the Quebec producers in terms of their feed grain supplies, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to react favourably to those representations.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly relay the question to the Minister of Agriculture.

AIRPORTS

RESPONSE TO OBJECTIONS TO SITE FOR NEW FACILITY IN PICKERING TOWNSHIP—REQUEST FOR LIST OF LOCATIONS CONSIDERED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and relates to what is regarded by the people of Pickering Township as the ravishment of their area without an opportunity to them of making effective criticisms and representations against the taking over of the area for the proposed airport. The other day I asked whether the minister would file a list of the 50 or so areas—I do not know the exact number—that were given consideration, without, of course, attaching the reasons why each and every one was not accepted. I wonder whether he is prepared to do that now. Would the minister also state, in view of the almost unanimous feeling of the people in Pickering Township that this airport should not be proceeded with, whether the objections they are making at public meetings and otherwise will receive full consideration by the government?

• (1120)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can repeat the assurance I gave to the right hon. member a few days ago that any representations, whether they be made directly to me or through the hearing officers on the expropriation procedure, will certainly be given every consideration. I might remind the House through you, Mr. Speaker, that this is of course a joint endeavour with the government of the province of Ontario. As for the presentation of documentation and that type of thing, I have said that I am prepared to provide whatever is necessary to support the decision that was made. I shall consult with them with a view to seeing what kind of package we can make available which is as informative as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, that is another matter. What we are dealing with in this Parliament and have a right to deal with is what the government of Canada is going to do in connection with the airport. That is the information I want.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the right hon. gentleman is reiterating the question that was asked in the first instance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not reiterating. Apparently it becomes necessary to repeat rather than to reiterate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister produce all the documents concerned with the decision, however much I disagree with what is being done? I refer to the documents having to do with the airport that the government of Canada contemplates building. Will the minister give those documents? That is what I am asking for.

Mr. Trudeau: That is a reiteration.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, that is a reiteration. I assure the right hon. member that I have no difficulty—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Just an echo.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think it necessary for the minister to reiterate the reply he gave a moment ago. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege. This does not apply to the minister in question, but questions that are asked are brushed aside with an insouciance—

Mr. Drury: Order!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that is not in keeping with parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am trying to get information for people who have a right to be heard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CONSIDERATION OF INCREASE IN BASIC RATE OF WAR DISABILITY PENSION AND VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of representations made recently to the minister by the War Amputations of Canada calling for an increase in the basic rate of the war disability pension, can the minister say whether consideration is being given to those representations?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question. Is consideration also being given to increasing the amount of the war veterans allowance?

Mr. Laing: At the present time, no, Mr. Speaker, but an action taken in one place might have consequences in another.

AIRPORT FIREFIGHTERS' WAGE SCALE—ACTION TO PREVENT FINANCIAL LOSS TO WORKERS EMBODIED IN PROPOSED ALTERATION

In light of the recent series of troubles at Canada's airports, will the minister give urgent attention to forestalling the proposed alteration in the wage scale for airport firefighters, expecially that part which will result in serious financial loss for many faithful workers?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the circumstances but I will look into this.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR QUEBEC MUNICIPAL PROJECTS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

Is it correct that the government has agreed to add an amount of $5 million for local initiatives projects submitted by municipalities of the province of Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In view of the statement of the Municipal Affairs Minister of Quebec and since the federal minister said at the time that projects submitted as late as February 7 had been accepted, could the right hon. Prime Minister enlighten the House on that matter?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is repeating the same question and I do not think this is in order.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Is he for the continuation of the local initiatives program until the next federal election?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTIONS TO ESTABLISH COMMITTEE AND CHANGE STANDING ORDERS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped the President of the Privy Council would remain with us, but in his absence I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Two days ago I asked the President of the Privy Council a question concerning the government's intention to bring forward appropriate resolutions to set up the committee under the Statutory Instruments Act and to amend the House regulations in order to implement the bill passed by parliament and he indicated he would look into it. Has this matter been discussed by the government, and what is the intention of the government with regard to this very deliberate action on the part of the government, both in bringing in the legislation and then leaving it inoperative?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): With great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the question on behalf of the President of the Privy Council.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—REFUSAL BY NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD TO GRANT EXPORT APPLICATIONS—REQUEST FOR REVIEW—STEPS TO ASCERTAIN ACTUAL RESERVES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the decision made in December, I believe, by the National Energy Board in which it refused applications to export natural gas to the United States. I would refer the minister to Volume 35 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates where he will find that Dr. Howland, a witness before the committee, said, first, that they took no account of any reserves in the Arctic and, second, that they took no account of any reserves in the future even though proven reserves have tripled in the ten years since the Borden commission was set up. In light of the fact that Imperial Oil say they now have reserves—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that this is a statement more than a question. He should ask the question as briefly as possible.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes. I am just coming to it. This is a difficult question. In light of the fact that Imperial Oil say they now have reserves of 20 trillion cubic feet in the north which were not taken into account, would the minister, in light of that new evidence and in light of what Dr. Howland said, be prepared to recommend a review by the National Energy Board, particularly before he makes his speech to the Petroleum Association next Tuesday in Calgary?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of the question. As I recall the decision of the board last fall, the reserves in the north were referred to by the board as being unquantified and inaccessible. It seems to me there has not been a change in that regard. If the hon. gentleman by any chance is referring to the article in the Globe and Mail yesterday he will have noted that the 20 trillion cubic feet was stated as the target of Imperial Oil but the president of that company did not say they had reached the target yet.

Mr. Woolliams: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I did give the minister notice of the question because it is a difficult one. In light of the fact that the government has no way of measuring these reserves, is the government now prepared to approach Imperial Oil and other companies that have some knowledge of these reserves, particularly in view of the relation of the government and Imperial Oil at Lake Louise, and obtain this information so that western Canada at least will get a fair shake in reference to the export of this commodity?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the reason the reserves are unquantified is that the field is still in the process of being drilled. Quite naturally, with more drilling experience we may be able to make a better estimate of it. That, of course, still does not get around the problem of bringing the gas to the market over the approximately 2,000 miles from the source.

• (1130)

Mr. Woolliams: Is there any body or any group working for the government to ascertain these reserves in the north, and have they any information from these corporations in reference to their reserves, or are you just shooting darts in the dark?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As the hon. member knows, the best way to find out is by shooting drills into the ground, and that is what the companies are doing.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. What consideration is being given toward expediting the government's foreign ownership policy, having in mind the fact fears are being expressed, now that Howard Hughes is located in Vancouver, that Premier Bennett may sell him the rest of British Columbia?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Answer.

URBAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED TORONTO METRO CENTRE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTERS OF INTENT AND AGREEMENTS PRIOR TO ONTARIO MUNICIPAL BOARD HEARINGS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It concerns the metro centre proposed to be built over the rail yards in downtown Toronto. Does the minister intend to table the letters of intent, agreements and proposed arrangements made between Canadian National Railways, Canadian Pacific Railway, Toronto Terminal Railways Limited, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and other parties before the Ontario Municipal Board hearings in April, or will he be making a statement in the House about the whole proposition?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I question very much whether I can do either in view of the fact this is essentially a private development in the sense of any direct relationship with the federal government per se. Canadian National Railways are one of the participants in the metro centre, and to the extent that they are, I have indicated my support for CNR's participation. Documents relating to that, such as they are and there are not very many—they were just a simple conveyance of information—I will be glad to table. The balance would have to come from other sources.

Mr. Ryan: With respect to the CBC and the proposed exchange of lands and leasing arrangements, would the minister either take it upon himself or in association with the Secretary of State endeavour to get some information that could be put before the House prior to this hearing?

Mr. Jamieson: I will be glad to convey the request to the Secretary of State.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

PROPOSED TORONTO METRO CENTRE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FEDERAL INVOLVEMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in view of the tremendous importance of this vast development, which affects transportation in the future and many other aspects, will the minister consider making a statement on motions as to the federal concern in this whole project?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I will be glad to consider that. I think the difficulty arises from the fact that as of the moment we are not entirely sure exactly what constitutes the whole project in view of the fact there are a number of outside interests involved.

SUGGESTED RETENTION OF TORONTO UNION STATION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in view of the many representations with regard to the proposed demolition of the Union Station which forms part of the complex, is the minister persuaded that it should not be demolished but should be retained?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I am not competent to pass judgment on that question, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENT INCREASES FOR MARRIED QUARTERS—ACTION ON COMPLAINTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence who I understand is away for some time. I have tried to give notice to whoever is the Acting Minister of National Defence. It concerns an important matter having to do with the recent announcement of rent increases and rent changes with regard to personnel married quarters both on and off base. Can the acting minister report whether there have been a number of complaints received, particularly from places like Chatham, New Brunswick and Summerside, Prince Edward Island, where service personnel are greatly agitated by this recent decision. If so, what action is being contemplated?

[Translation]

Mr. J.-R. Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to the hon. member for Egmont.

[English]

The weighted national average system of setting charges for married quarters will be discontinued. On April 1 married quarters charges will be established on the basis of CMHC appraised monthly rental by location plus the appropriate charge for utilities provided. CMHC appraisals are based on the equivalent civilian market rental rates in the local area. Therefore it follows that charges for married quarters will differ at each location. This means effectively that charges for approximately 8,200 married quarters—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might keep the rest of the information for the supplementary questions which apparently are going to be asked.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In light of the fact that these very changes that are going into effect on April 1 will in effect mean in some places such as Summerside, P.E.I., that a corporal off base will be paying more rent than an officer commanding on base, I wonder whether or not there can be an investigation into the obvious injustices that will occur under this new system and whether consultations directly with the people involved will be held as there is very great concern about these changes?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, for married quarter occupants of the rank of sergeant and below, the increase will not exceed $15 per month. As for others, they will be increased accordingly.

RENT INCREASES FOR MARRIED QUARTERS—SUGGESTED DELAY UNTIL PARITY WITH PUBLIC SERVICE ACHIEVED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I will have to ask you to bear with me, Mr. Speaker. I have two supplementary questions. The first one I want to direct to the President of the Treasury Board. Inasmuch as this new policy is tied directly to the determination by the government to bring about parity between the Canadian armed forces and the public service of Canada, and as parity will not be achieved for at least another full 12 months or more, would the government consider a delay in the implementation of this new rental policy until such time as parity is in fact achieved?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting suggestion. I think, however, that the hon. member is quite correct that the eradication of inequalities is done in two stages and will not be completed until next year. The hon. gentleman may have noticed that the equivalencies in relation to housing are modified or limited; they are not absolute in their application.

Mr. Forrestall: I gather from the minister's reply that he will not consider a delay for a year. I wonder whether he would initiate discussions within the cabinet with respect to a system which would permit Canadian forces personnel who are compelled to a major degree to live in rented quarters during their careers to build an equity, a method through which a portion of their rent could be set aside against their retirement?

Mr. Drury: This is an intereating suggestion. I will certainly be glad to see it explored.

Mr. Baldwin: We give you lots of them.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. He will have a chance to ask his question soon.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could respond to the second question regarding whether there will be consultations with the personnel, instead of reading an answer.

Mr. Comtois: I would like to repeat what I said before, namely, that charges for approximately 8,200 married quarters will be reduced.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Egmont might assume that the question has been noted.

Mr. Forrestall: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS TO ACQUIRE ADDITIONAL ROLLING STOCK TO MOVE GRAIN

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway that they would require subsidies from the government in order to acquire the necessary rolling stock and motive power to move grain, have they made any such request or representations to the government through the Department of Transport or other avenues?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the matter is of course under discussion and has been for some months with both railways. My recollection is that within the last two or three days there has been a letter, I believe, from the vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway on this matter. I have asked the officials to give me their opinion on it. On the question of the CNR's participation, I have had a lengthy document from them on the best way in which to provide additional cars and discussed the matter in person with the president yesterday with a view to meeting with him again next week.

• (1140)

Mr. Gleave: Have there been consultations and discussions between the Minister of Transport and the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board on some mutual approach to solve this very serious problem?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The consultations to which I referred have in all cases involved either the minister responsible for the Wheat Board or officials and others who report to him.

PROGRESS OF RAILWAYS IN EXPEDITING MOVEMENT OF GRAIN TO VANCOUVER

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question I would like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he can report to the House today on what progress the railways have made in the last week in the movement of prairie grain to the port of Vancouver in terms of the specific number of carloads per day being unloaded at Vancouver.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, normally I would have that information before a two o'clock question period, but this is Friday morning and I do not normally get it until later in the day. The only thing I can say in a general way is that the report is that the situation is improving but that there are still problems because of weather conditions.

DISCONTINUANCE OF RESPONSIBILITY ON PART OF CPR FOR MAINTENANCE OF SIDING TRACKS AT GRAIN ELEVATORS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, as a further supplementary I would like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has investigated or will undertake to investigate the situation whereby the CPR no longer accepts responsibility for maintaining rail trackage adjacent to elevators, in other words, railway sidings where elevators are located, in view of the change in its operations whereby the CPR no longer maintains section crews at regular intervals?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I will be glad to look into the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will return to this interesting subject in a few moments but for now the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Compton.

FINANCE

PARTIAL WITHDRAWAL OF GOVERNMENT FROM TAXATION FIELD

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since the government will probably be transferring certain fiscal benefits to the provinces, such as family allowances in the case of Quebec, could he tell us whether the government intends to withdraw from the fiscal field also to the same extent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very complex question. I could just say that, if the federal government were to withdraw from those areas, the have-not provinces could no longer enjoy the benefits they are now receiving and consequently social security in the well-to-do provinces would be adequate whereas the less well-to-do provinces, such as Quebec, for instance, could not have a social security system equal to that of the other provinces.

POLLUTION

SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—NEGOTIATIONS WITH MANITOBA GOVERNMENT ON ACTION

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Can the minister say whether negotiations are continuing between his department and the authorities in the provincial government of Manitoba in relation to a pollution problem on the Saskatchewan River as a result of effluent from the Forest Products plant at The Pas, Manitoba, and, if so, what progress is being made?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have been in close contact with the government of Manitoba concerning the necessary plant needed to clean up the effluent from the Churchill Forest Products mill. The government of Manitoba knows what plant is required in order to make this clean-up possible. It is an expensive plant. It will take a while for them to finance its installation.

FISHERIES

SWORDFISH—NEGOTIATIONS WITH WASHINGTON RESPECTING RESTORATION OF MARKET

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. It is the same as one taken under consideration by the Secretary of State for External Affairs earlier this week. Are active negotiations under way with the United States government regarding the possible reopening of that country to Canadian catches of swordfish and, if so, is the minister's staff in on these negotiations?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, there have been frequent discussions. Our staff has always been involved. However, the United States food and drug administration is still adamant. The standard is one-half part per million of mercury in fish. They are not allowing any shipments into the United States of fish from any country that exceed that level.

Mr. McCleave: I wish to ask one brief supplementary question. Is the minister's department still going to persist in seeking methods of continuing the dialogue on this very important matter?

Mr. Davis: Yes, and I might add that we are still trying to convince health authorities round the world that one-half part per million of mercury in fish is an extremely safe level and could be increased to one part.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF ADDITIONAL TERMINAL ELEVATORS AT PRINCE RUPERT TO RELIEVE PRESSURE ON EXISTING EXPORT FACILITIES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked with respect to the movement of grain. In the absence of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and of the Minister of Finance may I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he will raise with those two gentlemen and others in the cabinet the question of providing funds for the establishment of additional terminal elevator facilities at Prince Rupert in order that that port could be used to alleviate the pressure on the export of grain through other ports?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question on behalf of the ministers.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSITION OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON EXTENSION OF BILATERAL AGREEMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister give a progress report to the House on the status of the discussions with the United States on the extension of the bilateral air agreements, particularly as they affect western Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the last round of negotiations took place a few months ago in Washington. It is normal that the next round would occur in Ottawa. We have indicated to the appropriate authorities in the United States that we are prepared to proceed at any time. The decision as to when the talks will continue is entirely one for the United States as of this moment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is there any indication of when that might be?

POLLUTION

GREAT LAKES—UNITED STATES VETO OF SEWAGE DISPOSAL PROJECTS—EFFECT ON JOINT PROGRAM

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the recent report that the proposed $138 million anti-pollution program for an accelerated clean-up of the Great Lakes has been vetoed by the Nixon administration, I wish to ask the minister what effect this will have on the joint Canada-U.S. program to deal with this problem?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): My expectation, Mr. Speaker, is that the joint program, which in principle has been agreed upon between Canada and the United States, will be put into effect.

Mr. Harding: Has the minister made any representations protesting the continuing delay, especially by the United States government, in making a meaningful start on this major international pollution problem, and will the target date of 1975 for meeting certain standards have to be revised?

Mr. Davis: I hope not, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

DOMINION AVIATION—POSSIBLE REFUSAL OF GRANT FOR DEVELOPMENT OF STOL AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Peace River asked if a company called Dominion Aviation had requested assistance through certain development funds from my department. The answer is yes. Back in November they asked for support under the general adjustment assistance program. It was found that they were not eligible, not having any manufacturing capacity in Canada. However, as recently as March the company came back to discuss the possibility of assistance under the PAIT program, and this is still being considered now.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the lion's share of assistance for the aviation industry has been largely granted in central Canada, to Canadair and de Havilland, and as this company might very well lose its identity to an American corporation, will the minister look seriously at the application of this company in order that it may be preserved for Canadian industry?

Mr. Pepin: We always do that, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

PENDING ENTRY OF BRITAIN INTO EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—STEPS TO PROTECT CANADA'S INTERESTS

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact much opinion in Canada indicates that Canada's trading position will be damaged by Britain's entry into the Common Market, does the government intend, as a matter of self-interest, to encourage the rejection of entry in the proposed referendum announced by President Pompidou and, if so, what steps are currently being taken to protect Canada's interests?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have no intention, nor have we got the power, to prevent the enlargement of the European Economic Community. If the hon. member comes to the committee before which my estimates will be presented in a few days time, I will answer questions on what we have done and intend to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling orders of the day I think the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley should be recognized.

ATOMIC ENERGY

ACTION TO PROCURE HEAVY WATER TO AVOID SHUTDOWN OR POSTPONEMENT OF EXPANSION OF POWER PLANTS—POSITION RESPECTING NUCLEAR LIABILITY

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What action is the government taking to procure heavy water and avoid a shutdown of Douglas Point nuclear power station or postponement of the further expansion of the Pickering atomic energy power plant? I wonder if the minister would also answer my question of the other day regarding nuclear liability?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The chairman of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has been seeking to purchase additional quantities of heavy water from foreign sources and has had certain success in this regard. However, the demand for the commodity in Canada at the moment exceeds available supply because of the failure of the Glace Bay plant. Therefore there is a problem. I think I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Pickering program will not be interrupted. That particular system will continue in operation and further successful development.

With regard to the question asked the other day about nuclear liability, at present all nuclear sites in Canada which would be covered by this particular statute are the subject matter of contractual relations between the government of Canada and the individual contractors or provinces in question. The hon. member is quite correct that the Nuclear Liability Act is not in operation, but third party liability is covered by the contracts between the government of Canada and the particular participants.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Is the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville rising to seek the floor on a point of order or question of privilege?

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

CORRECTION OF ERROR IN FINAL REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with respect to correcting the record. There was a small but significant omission in the report presented yesterday by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. I merely ask to have the report corrected.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Forrestall: Is the hon. member referring to a minority report?

Mr. MacGuigan: No. I thank the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) for drawing this matter to my attention this morning. I am referring to the chapter on the national capital area. On page 42 of the report, or page 109 of Votes and Proceedings, the first sentence reads:

Hence, we recommend the eventual establishment of a tripartite board appointed jointly by the Ontario, Quebec, and Federal governments.

The sentence should read:

Hence, to determine the nature of this structure, we recommend the eventual establishment of a tripartite board appointed jointly by the Ontario, Quebec, and Federal governments.

The words to be added are, "to determine the nature of this structure".

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO CONSULT PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES ON DECENTRALIZATION OF MONETARY AND FISCAL POLICIES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain) moved:

That this House regrets that the government has not established consultative bodies with the provinces and municipalities, with a view to decentralizing monetary and fiscal policies in such a way as to permit each level of government to assume its own responsibilities in a manner less burdensome to the taxpayer.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to move the motion you have just read, the purpose of which is to set up mechanisms for the decentralization of decision making with regard to monetary and fiscal policies, and for giving co-ordinated access to the provinces, and through them to the municipalities, to the source of national credit to finance public capital.

We are not dealing here with specifically Créditiste proposals but rather with means capable of meeting the wishes, the requests of provincial as well as municipal authorities.

The Quebec Minister of Finance, Mr. Raymond Garneau, belled the cat during a working session held at Sainte-Agathe-des-Monts, in November 1971, and convened by the Canadian Institute of Public Affairs.

This is how this statement is reported in the newspaper Le Devoir on November 8, 1971:

While taking part in the study sessions of the Canadian Institute of Public Affairs, Mr. Garneau stated explicitly that the control measures taken by the federal government are such that considerable time elapses before the Quebec government can implement Ottawa's comprehensive policies.

Mr. Garneau puts all the blame for this procedure and the long delays it entails on the federal officials from whom, he said, the provincial government meets with great resistance. "There is sometimes a time lag of six months. This is much too long. We are always caught in the maze of the federal administration."

That is what the Quebec Minister of Finance said, Mr. Speaker.

I continue the quotation:

It was while replying to the audience's question in the presence of federal Industry, Trade and Commerce minister Jean-Luc Pepin that the Quebec minister made this charge against Ottawa.

Cornered from every quarter, the minister had just admitted that his government had proven its inability to work out a practical industrial policy for Quebec or even for the whole of Canada.

In replying, Mr. Garneau pointed out that Quebec was not alone in airing its grievances but that such a feeling was increasingly shared by all provinces which are putting a mounting pressure for the elimination of the unbalance which "the population refuses to accept any longer."

But federal minister Pepin was not through with his troubles. Following the intervention of the Quebec Finance Minister, former federal government minister Maurice Sauvé launched another attack.

"The big mistake is that the federal government never did accept that Canada is not a unitary country, but a country with five different regions", he said.

"That is a fundamental problem which has never been solved and as long as they will not adopt selective policies, there will be tensions and contradictions. I submitted those problems to the government, but they never were prepared to admit it", Mr. Sauvé added.

Finally, Mr. Garneau indicated that his government was advocating a revision of the means of stabilization at both the level of federal government expenditures and the level of such institutions and organizations as the Industrial Development Bank and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The government, he said, is considering the introduction in the next tax agreements of a new automatic stabilizer which is the cyclical stabilization fund. That stabilization would enable the Quebec government to have sufficient resources available to undertake investment programs which would have priority and would also be located in some regions.

However, if the provinces are not satisfied with the federal government, the municipalities are not happy either about the treatment they are getting from the provinces. Evidence of this is the criticism addressed by the Quebec Union of Municipalities to that provincial government in May 1968. This is what the reporter Claude Masson stated in La Presse on May 27, 1969:

The municipalities no longer want to be spoon-fed like babies by the Quebec government. On the contrary, they want to be considered like adults and given a reasonable share, a bigger share.

Thus, the Union of municipalities has just made a formal application to Quebec to set aside the "sop" allocated to municipalities in the last provincial budget in favour of permanent provisions to improve the financial situation of urban centres and rural municipalities throughout "la belle province".

The Union of municipalities, whose reaction is supported by a brief submitted to the government a few days ago, on the subject of municipal taxes concerning municipal-provincial relations, not only calls for permanent provisions, but suggests what these could be.

The Quebec Union of municipalities reiterates its key suggestion, creation of a standing provincial-municipal fiscal committee, which the organization believes is the essential instrument of a structure to ensure an equitable distribution of sources of income, and responsibilities between the two levels of government.

The municipal organization headed by the mayor of Montreal North, Mr. Yves Ryan, also claims that "the only remedy for the situation is to accede to our long-standing request for phasing out school boards from the property tax field, which should be left to municipalities." In return, the Union of Quebec Municipalities recalls that it has already offered to preserve for the government the revenue from the sales tax which it could use in its tax and budget reforms. Most if not all the sales tax yield could be used to finance education.

But the municipalities want to go further still and at its convention in Saskatoon in June of last year the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities requested the right to participate in constitutional conferences and put forward rather convincing arguments.

Federation president Allan O'Brien stated on that occasion, having accepted this office:

In my opinion, we must first of all have the provinces and the federal government recognize our right to be consulted on all issues concerning the territories under our jurisdiction and also of interest to the federal government. I think we should have this right to consultation recognized before we express too definite demands for changes in the Constitution other than this right to consultation.

In short, the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities requests the right to participate in every aspect of Canadian life and, particularly, in the drawing up of a new Canadian constitution that would take into account the financial and fiscal needs of all levels of government. Here is what the representative of La Presse wrote in this connection on June 16th, 1971:

To date, provincial governments have not yet recognized the municipalities as their equals: they still maintain that they are merely their creatures, "their offsprings". Still, there will be a tri-partite conference, on October 16th next apparently at which the three levels of government will be called upon to exchange ideas.

Municipal representatives want to be recognized in a "new Canadian constitution". When the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities studied the 52 or so resolutions on the order paper of the convention Tuesday morning, the general assembly adopted a resolution asking the government of Canada and the provincial governments to recognize the role of local administrations in the management of public affairs.

The resolution goes even further and asks those same governments to consider the municipalities as their equal partners in the drawing up of a new constitution.

• (1210)

For municipalities, as well as provincial governments and the Federal government are faced with financial problems that become insoluble as long as we cling to present day solutions.

The following is a letter sent to all hon. members by the secretary general of the "Union des conseils de comté" of the province of Quebec, on June 14, 1969:

Dear Sir,

We have sent to all members of the Assemblée nationale an excerpt of our annual brief presented to hon. Jean-Jacques Bertrand on March 26 last, as well as a study prepared by the firm Cliche and Associés Limitée. Copies of these documents are herewith enclosed.

We humbly submit these documents so that you may appreciate the problem created by the sale of bonds by municipal and school corporations.

This problem is national in scope and all provinces are involved. We submit these suggestions to you and we expect your valuable cooperation in an effort to convince government authorities of the merits of our requests.

An exchange of ideas on the subjet should take place between the central government and the provinces.

Yours truly,

André Nadeau, notary,

Secretary general,

Beaurivage, Lotbinière, Quebec.

What does l'Union des conseils de comté want exactly? The following is a quotation of the annual brief presented by that body to the Premier of Quebec on March 26, 1969:

MUNICIPAL BOND ISSUES

The government of the province of Quebec is asked to pass legislation exempting from tax interest yields on municipal bonds whenever bonds are issued for utilities purposes.

The Quebec government should also undertake without delay negotiations with the government in Ottawa so that the latter may declare free from tax interest yields on municipal loans already declared free from tax by the Quebec government.

The second resolution, that requesting the government to exempt from taxes some kinds of bonds deserves more attention, for the experience made in the United States seems conclusive. As an example, I recall that the last United States government $4 billion issue (April 1969) bore an interest rate of 6.40 per cent. To this must be added discounts and issuing expenses, which means that the actual borrowing cost was roughly 6.60 per cent. This is the highest rate of interest ever paid by the American government over 105 years, that is since the War of Secession.

Now, at that time, for tax-free municipal or school board issues maturing on the same date, the yield was about 5 per cent, the short-term and long-term yields being 4.40 per cent and 5.75 per cent respectively. If such bonds were not tax-free, the municipalities involved would have to float loans yielding at least 1 per cent more than those of the American government. Therefore, one can readily conclude that the American tax system enables municipalities and school boards in the United States to borrow at a cost nearly 50 per cent lower.

If Quebec municipalities, school boards and hospitals could borrow under the tax-free bonds system, their savings would be substantial. In fact, total borrowings by our municipalities range between $125 and $150 million.

The school boards' borrowings represent similar amounts. Since last year, and for many years to come, CEGEPs must borrow from $50 to $100 million a year. Quebec hospitals will have to borrow at least $1 million per annum within a few years from now. The grand total of such loans may therefore reach a level of $450 to $500 million per annum. Therefore, for a single year, a saving of 2 per cent on interest rates would be the equivalent of about $10 million.

On the total of their outstanding loans, these public bodies could save over $100 million in interest each year; of course, these figures are only approximations. It is difficult to obtain the figures showing that aggregate debt of all our public bodies. With a 2 per cent difference in interest rates, $100 million would mean total debts of about $5 billion, and this is a conservative estimate.

One has only to recall that the debt of the city of Montreal amounts to about $680 million and that of the city of Laval is of the order of $140 million. As the debts of the school boards are nearly as high, the debts of those two cities alone amount of $1.5 billion.

If you add to that all the debts of the cities and towns, school boards, CEGEPs, regionals, hospitals and universities, the total debt of all those bodies can be safely estimated at roughly $4 or $5 billion. So, with annual savings in interest of roughly 2 per cent it can be reasonably said that our public bodies would save approximately $100 million per year if the interest on their bonds was tax free. On the other hand, with present market conditions, the saving in interest might even be greater than 2 per cent.

What are we suggesting, Mr. Speaker, since we always want to be constructive and positive?

All those proposals as well as the policy outlined in the motion now before the House, Mr. Speaker, can be found in a resolution carried by our national council in Ottawa in March 1971, and approved at our national convention held in October 1971, in Hull. That is what is contained in our document entitled "Constitutional Positions".

However, the Social Credit party of Canada believes that we must go beyond the present status quo which satisfies no one and empower the provinces to be themselves, to develop and flourish in accordance with their needs and aspirations.

Therefore, the Social Credit party of Canada proposes that a new constitutional framework be considered and implemented, within which the provinces or groups of provinces would participate through their representatives or their governments in the formulation of policies affecting the country as a whole and in the best interest of all Canadians.

The Social Credit party of Canada therefore proposes that a new constitution made in Canada, by Canadians and for Canadians be drawn up in order to do the following things.

First, to revive the spirit of a true confederation in which the components, that is to say the provinces, will recover and assume the powers which belong to them, so as to protect and preserve their identity.

• (1220)

Secondly, to aim at insuring an effective participation of the provinces in monetary, fiscal and commercial decisions in Canada since decisions made at the federal level have serious effects on provincial economies and policies.

Provincial governments should have their say in the development of a monetary policy. The exclusive control of monies and its corollary, the credit facilities granted by the central government, the action of this government in matters pertaining to exchange rate, fluctuations of currency in circulation and prices and inflation, have a direct bearing on provincial finances and on the opportunities for local economic development.

This is why the provinces should participate in the establishment of such a policy. They should be able, in consultation with the central government, to cash in on their own credit in the same way they are now entitled to borrow on such credit.

Decentralization of the decision-making power in the matter of monetary and fiscal resources, financial decentralization that will allow the various levels of government to finance their needs for public funds according to the wishes of their taxpayers as well as the physical and material possibilities of provinces and municipalities, such is, Mr. Speaker, the policy advocated by the Social Credit Party of Canada, and which, were it followed, would put an end once and for all to this ruinous and gradual running into debt of all governments, and would free a huge amount of capital for financing industry and trade which create employment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the present government does not have absolute control over solutions to the problem. We only need to study the failures of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to see that we should implement the policy which we advocate—which is, the joint development of fiscal and monetary programs by the various levels of government.

There is no question, Mr. Speaker, that nobody knows more than the citizens of Quebec City about the problems of the province or of the city of Quebec. Nobody knows more about the problems of Edmonton that the citizens of that city.

This is why the various levels of government should co-operate in order to find adequate answers to the economic problems facing us from day to day.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the comments of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) who spoke on behalf of the Social Credit Party and I am really at a loss to know where to begin.

Though I shall not venture a personal opinion on the views expressed by the hon. member, it seems to me they contain a host of inconsistencies and I wonder whether the resolution moved by the Social Credit party to which he referred is actually a separatist manifesto for Canada, not for the secession of one single province, but for the balkanization of the whole country since it is suggested that the regions, the provinces or municipalities should be entitled to make their own claims and develop their own monetary policy, I wonder whether this is in the public interest.

But what is Canada?

An hon. Member: It is not a dictatorship.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Canada has a population of 22 million people whether they come from Chicoutimi or any other Quebec area, from St. Albert in Alberta, from Newfoundland or Saskatchewan, it does not matter. They are Canadian people who pay into the coffers of the federal, provincial and municipal governments. They are all the same people!

And if you say: We want rights for the municipalities, however these rights will be exercised at the expense of other municipalities, other provincial governments.

Therefore, governments are but instruments of the people. If you insist on rights of some individuals, it will be at the expense of the rights of some other individuals.

The Prime minister of the province of Quebec prided himself recently on the triple victory of the province of Quebec over Ottawa. But a victory against whom? Does it mean that the people from the province of Quebec, as Quebecers, under their provincial government, would act against the interests of other Canadians? They are the same people, and when the hon. member thinks of himself as a Canadian taxpayer, he must consider the total of his contribution to the municipal government—which includes school taxes—the provincial and federal governments. The whole represents his contribution to the administration costs of his country.

There may be differences of opinion as to the share of each sector, but as far as the taxpayer is concerned, is he gaining anything whenever we take from one sector in order to give to another? Would that be more helpful? Perhaps as regards services a new distribution should be made, but when it comes to the contribution by the various levels of government, be it for municipal, provincial or federal programs, whether there is waste or dishonesty at any level, there is no loss for the taxpayer, it seems.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the representations by the Union of Municipalities of the province of Quebec. I do not wish to point a finger at or criticize that Union for its views, because we have seen them expressed in several resolutions that were passed by many municipalities throughout the country.

We were told that the interests payable on municipal loans should be exempt from federal income tax, but people seem to forget that there exists in addition a provincial income tax. At the present time, all Canadian provinces have the right to and do levy income tax. But the municipalities claim an exemption because they want to save money!

• (1230)

But from whom do they borrow that money? Mostly from the public market—from Canadians, from caisses populaires, from trust companies, in short, from all the people who invest their money in bonds issued by municipalities, school boards, or federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Latulippe: Like big corporations!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, but I am thinking of the public. Corporations, the Caisses populaires Desjardins, for instance, and insurance companies also invest money. I have no doubt that the hon. member has taken insurance policies on his life and on those of his wife and children. People invest their money in those companies, and they are the ones who—like the hon. member and his family, for instance—indirectly benefit from it.

If we ask that municipalities be exempt from taxation, what will happen to the revenues of provinces and the federal government?

We cannot say that municipalities will not be asking the provinces for so many grants or subsidies, or that the provinces will not be asking so much from the federal government.

Let us be realistic about it, the "sucking" is not going to lessen. Is public demand for education, health services, hospitals, highways, transportation, expenses, postal services, going to diminish? Not in the slightest!

And yet, we are demanding a reduction of revenues in a certain area because we want to replace them. Such is at present the policy of federal and provincial governments, which indicate today that they need all those revenues.

Mr. Latulippe: It is a debt policy.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is not a debt policy, but rather a policy of responding to public demand, which is often overheated by partisan and political claims. This is what happens. We urge people to demand services from their governments without telling them that this is going to cost money, and that the public will have to foot the bill. Every single penny spent by government authorities in Canada comes out of the taxpayer's pocket, in one way or another.

An hon. Member: There is the Bank of Canada!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is no magic in that. It is very simple.

An hon. Member: And what about the public in all that?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We will see whether the hon. member can offer another program to meet the legitimate requests of the Canadian public. The hon. member and his colleagues are always the first to add to that list of requests. Who will bear the cost? That is what is being demanded, and it is very often—

Mr. Prud'homme: The Bank of Canada.

Mr. Latulippe: It is the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I know who will pay for it: it is the Canadian taxpayer, with his efforts, his work, his ingenuity, in other words the whole industry, our economy as a whole. That is the source of income.

Mr. Prud'homme: The Creditists do not know that.

Mr. Latulippe: There is not a single worker who makes money.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is the source of income for all government activities. Municipalities—

An hon. Member: There are many of them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, there are many of them. As a matter of fact, the mayor of my own city is among the first to ask for more money. Why? With all due deference, that is just like him. A mayor has lots of more important things to do.

The municipalities are spending money. This is good but who foots the bill? Because in the final analysis there is always somebody who pays for it. Whether it is at the municipal, provincial or federal level the taxpayer always ends up paying the shot.

We have now reached a point where if we want participatory democracy we must accept the status quo in the field of consultations between the federal government and the provinces although there is much room for improvement.

However, the hon. member will admit that the dialogue between him and his wife or the members of his family is sometimes not quite up to par.

Mr. Prud'homme: Just like within the creditiste party.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, no. One should recognize that it is a question of human relations. The people of this country are in constant communication. But let us leave them alone and start looking at what is happening in our own back yard.

I will now limit myself to the political or monetary question. In fact, do we not all agree that in the tax field there is a need for more consultation. This was brought up as recently as yesterday in a federal-provincial issue. I will not finger anyone or lay the blame on anyone in particular because everyone has to assume his share of responsibilities.

However, as far as the monetary system goes every province or area should have the right to make the decisions likely to meet their needs. But here we are going back to the Middle Ages because when is it going to stop? If the province of Alberta, Saskatchewan or New Brunswick wanted to develop a monetary policy with respect to interest rates, currency value, etc., we would be going back to the Middle Ages, to the era of the city-state. We would mint coins and bite in them or cut them to know their value. And this city-state money was worthless—

• (1240)

Mr. Latulippe (Compton): What is it worth today?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It has a value. Today you can buy a shirt or a pair of trousers with a $5 or $10 bill. You put a price on the goods and the shopkeeper is willing to receive a bill in exchange. He does not accept—

Mr. Latulippe: He pays half of it to the government.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He pays half of it to the government. He pays 37 per cent to the three levels of government. Today, 37 per cent of the gross national product goes to the state one way or another. If the state is required to spend more, then it will ask for more since, as I said earlier, he has to foot the bill at the end.

Any public service, or pension plan or health insurance scheme has to be paid for, and it is hon. members together with their families, their neighbours and other Canadian citizens who have to meet the whole cost.

But can one imagine the people of Alberta or British Columbia insisting on exercising any rights that would be detrimental to Quebecers? What would entitle them to do so since we are all Canadians irrespective of our province of origin?

Mr. Latulippe: Where do they get their money from?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member asks where they get their money from. I am going to tell him, Mr. Speaker. They use their two hands and their brains coupled to the will to work, to succeed and to put their shoulder to the wheel. This is how Canadians succeed.

But we never stop making claims on the government. And I am speaking now as a Progressive Conservative member. I for one have nothing to blame myself for on this point. The development of our economy and the progress of our country depend on our willingness to put our shoulder to the wheel. That is all.

Mr. Latulippe: Money does not come from the wheel.

Mr. Prud'homme: You know nothing.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to let us speak, after which he can make his speech.

Mr. Speaker, I see my time has expired. I thank you for your indulgence in allowing me to speak a few minutes longer.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker there was silence for half a minute, so that got me to my feet.

Mr. Prud'homme: When you speak we have to do that—a moment of silence before you speak.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Actually, Mr. Speaker, a statement of substance will be made by one of my colleagues this afternoon, but since in most cases the House likes to hear from all parties in the first round of debate, I shall take the floor for a few minutes.

• (1240)

In so far as the precise suggestions contained in the motion now before us are concerned, I have to say they seem to us to be ones which would be most difficult to implement. When one starts to talk about decentralizing monetary policy, and when this is mentioned in the context of a motion that refers to three levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal, it is a little difficult to see where it would all lead. Municipal monetary policy does raise some pretty far-reaching questions. However, it is not my purpose to become involved in an argument over these technical details, but rather to say that in so far as our friends of the Social Credit party are asking us today to think about ways to make taxation less burdensome to the people of Canada, then, of course, we feel that is a welcome subject for debate. As will be suggested later on today by one of my colleagues, we think there are definite ways in which taxation can be made less burdensome. Those ways, of course, involve the revision of our tax structure and placing it really on the basis of ability to pay.

When one refers to a revision of our tax structure, that conjures up immediately the picture of what we went through in 1971 or indeed what we went through during a period of several years, the result of which was supposedly a new income tax act. As a matter of fact—and we made this clear during the debate on that bill—there was no real, basic reform in last year's new tax bill, and in this year 1972 the taxpayers are discovering that the new heaven and the new earth that was supposed to result from that bill have not yet materialized. Therefore, we say the answer to the problem of making taxation less burdensome is to attack the whole question of our tax structure and to place taxation on the basis of ability to pay. We have not yet done this—particularly at the federal level, which is our major responsibility. In so far as this motion today is asking the House to think in terms of changes which should be made in our tax structure, we welcome the debate this motion produces.

The other way in which to make the payment of taxes less burdensome, to use the words of the motion, is of course to raise the economic standards of the people of this country. This raises the whole question of what we should do about wage levels, both minimum wages and fair wages, and what we should do about things like old age pensions, family allowances, disability pensions, veterans pensions, industrial pensions and so on. I, therefore, take this minute or two to repeat a theme this House hears from this corner of the House time and time again. The society we have at the present time certainly is not the just society we have heard about, nor is it the final word in the area of economic affairs of a nation like ours.

I feel very strongly that we must move in the direction of guaranteed income levels. When one mentions that, he must make it clear that he does not think in terms of means tests, income tests and that sort of thing but rather of allowances or demogrants and so on, which bring up the income level of our people. To do this sort of thing is costly, but not to do it and to try to continue with a society which is as divided and unequal as ours is much more costly. In a country as advanced as ours, with the capacity we have, I believe we can establish levels of income for workers in city and country alike, and that we can provide allowances, pensions, housing, health care, education, recreation and all these things that will put all of the people at a decent economic level.

Mr. Speaker, that frankly is all I wish to say in this opening round of the debate, namely, that we cannot go along with some of the details in the motion but that we warmly welcome the call for arrangements to make things less burdensome to the taxpayers of this country. There are two ways to do this. One is to place taxation on a more equitable basis, and the other is to raise the living standards of all our people.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion, I am sure that hon. members are aware of the constitutional and jurisdictional problems connected with relations between the federal government and the municipalities. This does not mean that we are oblivious to the problems of the municipalities. We are aware that a city can exceed a province in population and budgetary expenditures. Some of the federal government programs, such as the Local Initiatives Program, are directed specifically at the municipalities. The federal cabinet will meet on Monday, March 27 to receive the annual submission of the Association of Mayors and Municipalities. I do not intend to pursue this particular phase of our concern for and preoccupation with municipalities. As I understand it, another speaker plans to deal more extensively with this particular topic. I should like rather to concentrate on federal-provincial relations.

No doubt the House is aware that the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements bill which was before the House yesterday was a product of some two years of consultation and meetings of ministers and officials. The Ministers of Finance and Provincial Treasurers held their 12th meeting recently in Jasper. For the last few years it has been a policy for these ministers to meet at least quarterly to discuss matters of mutual interest to both levels of government. I might say that all sections of the draft fiscal arrangements bill were thoroughly discussed at these meetings of federal and provincial ministers and many changes were made in the draft bill as a result of these consultations.

A large part of this bill dealt with equalization, whose purpose is to allow each province to give to its citizens a level of service at least equal to the national average, without having to resort to unduly high levels of taxation. In addition, the federal government will guarantee that provincial revenues will not be less than their revenues of the previous year. This 100 per cent revenue guarantee is another example of a federal contribution to provincial fiscal stability. This is the very essence of the bill, and that is why I am somewhat surprised that the motion does not acknowledge the extent to which the federal government has recognized the growing needs of the other levels of government.

For example, in 1960, before transfers, the federal government share of total government expenditures was 61 per cent compared to a provincial-municipal share of 39 per cent. In 1970, the federal share had decreased to 52 per cent, while the provincial-municipal share had increased to 48 per cent. In 1970, after transfers, provincial and municipal governments accounted for 60 per cent of total government expenditures. The trend to decentralization is clearly shown in these figures, I suggest.

On the matter of decentralization, I should like to draw to your attention another example of the federal effort to recognize the different levels of economic activity existing in the country. For instance, the Special Development Loans Program of 1970, and this year's Federal-Provincial Employment Loans Program, allocated funds for provincial and municipal projects on the basis of the level of unemployment existing in each province. The first program, for instance, recognized the high level of unemployment which existed in British Columbia in the winter of 1970-71 and allocated some $37 million under this program to the province. This represented 23.1 per cent of the total $160 million in the program. Under this winter's program, because the unemployment had dropped considerably in British Columbia, its allocation was less. Ontario, on the other hand, which was allocated just over 10 per cent of the funds in the first program, saw its allocation rise to 16.5 per cent under this winter's program.

At the finance ministers conferences the economic and fiscal situation and outlook is always the first item on the agenda. This is especially important for the January meeting each year because it provides the most current information on the economy to enable the governments to plan their budgetary strategy for the period ahead. There is a very frank interchange of information on a confidential basis at these meetings.

There is also a Federal-Provincial Continuing Committee on fiscal and economic matters which is composed of senior financial officials from both the federal and provincial governments, and which services the ministers. As well as engaging in joint fiscal and economic studies as directed by the ministers, this committee does the preparatory work for the ministerial conferences. It held its fiftieth meeting just prior to the Jasper meeting of ministers. An example of the type of work in which the committee is presently involved is an analysis of the employment program at not only the federal level but also at the federal-provincial, federal-municipal and provincial-municipal level. This mandate for the evaluation was given to the ministers of finance and provincial treasurers last fall by the first ministers. The Continuing Committee is now conducting this evaluation with a view to reporting to the next federal-provincial conference of their ministers.

The terms of reference given to the committee were essentially those which were contained in the communiqué from the federal-provincial conference last November. These terms of reference proposed a joint examination of the relevant programs to evaluate their effectiveness, assess any problems which had been encountered, and propose criteria and guidelines that might be applied in the design of contingency plans of a similar nature. The ministers also expressed the hope that this committee might be able to submit at least a preliminary report in May, having in mind the relevance of such an evaluation to proposed contingency planning for similar programs in the future.

In addition, I would like to emphasize that since the present government has taken office, not a year has passed without there being a discussion at the summit level of the fiscal and economic situation. Before concluding, I should like to turn briefly to the monetary policy. The Fathers of Confederation in their wisdom clearly gave the responsibility for the management of money in the Canadian economy to the federal government.

Canada's widespread branch banking network, which is part of a well developed capital market, enables funds to move freely throughout the country. In a country with one currency and a single capital market, you simply cannot have a basic monetary policy for one part of the country which is different from the policy applied in other parts. Even if one could somehow contrive to make credit in general cheaper in one part of the country than another, capital would inevitably flow to the places where it could get the highest return; nothing of value would be accomplished for the less prosperous regions which would find it even more difficult to raise their capital requirements. This does not mean that the monetary policy is insensitive to regional conditions. In formulating national policies, the government and the Bank of Canada do take into account the circumstances in all parts of the country. As well, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have, from time to time, asked the banks to be especially sympathetic to applications for credit from parts of the country whose economic position is particularly unsatisfactory.

The government of Canada also takes into account in the formulation of its debt management policy the borrowing requirements of the provinces and the impact of all governmental borrowing requirements on the Canadian economy. Again, there are regular discussions of these matters with the provinces. For example, at a federal-provincial meeting in Winnipeg in the spring of 1970, as a result of concern about the effect of a very strong Canadian dollar on our economic growth and the level of employment, the Minister of Finance asked the provinces to consider very carefully whether they had explored fully the availability of funds in the Canadian capital market before floating issues outside Canada. This request was then extended to all Canadian borrowers. We have received a notable degree of co-operation in this regard, and the use of foreign capital markets by Canadians has declined significantly. To help enable other levels of government to find their funds in Canada, the federal government has kept its public borrowings to the short and medium term markets, leaving the long end to other governments and private sector borrowers.

I think that within the limits imposed by the constitution, and by its responsibility for the economic health of the whole of Canada, this government has demonstrated its willingness to do the very things that are regretted in the motion now before the House.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): May I call it one o'clock Mr. Speaker?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until 2 p.m. this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Rodrigue: Mr. Speaker, I would like to use the few moments at my disposal to discuss the way the Minister of Finance prepares his budget year after year. I would like to see included in that famous budget some information which in my opinion is quite important and which would show the real economic conditions existing in the country.

What surprises me in the budget presented each year by the Minister of Finance are the huge amounts appearing under the national debt item as well as the amounts required each year to pay the interest on the national debt.

The Canadian national debt which amounted to $75 million in 1867 at the time of Confederation had quintupled before the First World War to reach some $314 million. After the First World War the debt went up to $1,200 million, representing an increase of 500 per cent in six years.

Alleged Decentralization of Policies

Afterwards we experienced the 1929 depression and the Second World War. The national debt of Canada amounted to over $11 billion in 1945. From 1945 to 1960, we had a new increase, somewhat less pronounced than during the war years, an increase representing another $1 billion and bringing the debt to $12,089,195,000.

From 1960 to 1968, that is over a period of 8 years, the net debt has once again increased to $16 billion, and we can expect that with the budget announced by the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), last October, this debt will increase by another billion before the end of this fiscal year.

Even more striking are the ever-increasing amounts that taxpayers have come to pay each year for the interest of the national debt.

In 1969-70, the actual expenditures incurred to pay the interest on this debt amounted to $1,709,938,172. In 1970-71, according to figures in section 15 of chapter 8 of the estimates, expenditures for public debt amounted to $1,822,843,840. In 1971-72, still according to the same source, the estimates for public debt amount to $1,994,000,000, and will increase to $2,160,385,000 during 1972-73.

• (1410)

Mr. Speaker, the interest that 22 million Canadians will have to pay amounts to approximately $2 billion per year. This represents, for each Canadian, $100 a year.

But, it should be recalled that in 1945, after the second world war, the interest paid on the public debt was $26.42 per capita. This increased later on to $42.17 in 1960, and 12 years later, in 1972, each Canadian will have to pay about $100 for the interest on the public debt. I am not referring here to the interest charged to provinces, municipalities, school boards, which amount to close to $3 billion per year now.

Such are the fruits of the financial system of which this government and its predecessors have been and are still the faithful servants.

But there are some, Mr. Speaker, who will say that this is good, such as Mr. Alexander Hamilton, the spokesman for international finance and, above all, the spokesman for the conservative party of federalists in the United States, who stated that a public debt is a national blessing because it offers businessmen and financiers a safe investment.

A Canadian Minister of Finance stated around 1945 that the national debt was the barometer of civilization and, to prove his point, that same Finance Minister stated: Well, the natives in Africa do not have any national debt and they are not civilized.

Others, Mr. Speaker, state repeatedly that a national debt is not harmful for the country because Canadians owe this money to one another and that the money paid to maintain this debt goes from one pocket to another.

It is true for some, Mr. Speaker, but only a very small percentage of average Canadians have invested their savings in the public debt of Canada, the provinces, the municipalities or the school boards. These people should know that those pockets do not ordinarily belong to the same taxpayers.

Alleged Decentralization of Policies

We have already asked the Minister of Finance to tell us about the holders of government bonds, to give us the names and addresses of the State's creditors. The government was either unable to give us the answer or did not want to do so. If it had, we would have found that the people who receive interest payments on the public debt get some $2 billion per year—that Canadians will pay in 1972—and that such people are not in the low-income group.

On the contrary, those who receive such interest payments are in the high-income bracket, and a large part of such interests will merely add to the dividends of financial institutions.

Therefore, we can draw the conclusion that public debts are regressive and vindictive, because they penalize mostly low-income people. About 15 per cent of their taxes are used towards the interest on such debts.

It is therefore time, Mr. Speaker, to come back to sounder financial concepts and to bring in realistic budgets which really reflect the existing financial situation in Canada.

The Minister of Finance has the responsibility to prepare the federal budget. He calculates expenditures to be made and taxes to be levied in order to meet them. If the public seems to be overtaxed, the Minister of Finance starts thinking about ways and means of either cutting expenditures here and there, or floating new loans that will result in more increases of the public debt and more interest to pay each year.

• (1420)

At present, public finances are nothing more than simple bookkeeping with expenses and revenues which end up each year with either a balanced budget or a deficit budget. Thus, as years go by, as I said a while ago, the debt increases continually and in turn increases the interests that the Minister of Finance must collect through taxes.

The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is behaving exactly like all previous ministers of finance. I would even say that most political parties are not thinking differently and would not do otherwise if they were called to form a government in a month or two.

We, of the Social Credit party, agree on one point. The Minister of Finance must bring in a budget taking into account revenues and expenses for the year. But there is more than a mere alignment of figures. We believe that the Minister of Finance should also show the assets and liabilities of the country. Assets should indicate the enrichment of the country, and liabilities, the depreciation and impoverishment that Canada suffered through immediate consumption or consumption spread out over several years.

For this purpose, a Creditiste government would establish a National Credit Office who would enter in the assets column any increase in the wealth of Canada. For instance, the building of a bridge in Canada is an enrichment that should be taken into account in the assets column. New highways, a seaway, new hospitals or schools all constitute an increase in the assets.

[Mr. Rodrigue.]

At the present time, I challenge the government to indicate where that fits into the estimates that it proposes and to tell where these increases in the assets of Canada are reflected.

On the same general subject, Mr. Speaker, the new plants built in Canada as well as the increase in the Canadian population should be taken into consideration. It is said that human resources are our greatest asset. Where is this written in the books of the government? Where is this indicated in the assets of Canada? Nowhere.

This year, more than 300,000 new graduates will join our work force. This is certainly a gain because these new workers, being better educated than their elders will devote their energies and their knowledge to the aim of producing more and making better products. I suggest that this is an asset for our country.

So, every year the asset should increase, but this does not show in the estimates tabled by the Minister of Finance. For instance, what body sees to it that this increase in real credit is reflected in financial credit? Who provides for an increase in financial credit in view of present circumstances? The increase in financial credit is done haphazardly, according to the whims of the only credit makers in Canada.

If production increases, who sees to it that the purchasing power is also increased? No one.

What governmental body sees to it that more money is put into circulation so that the new production, the production that is possible thanks to new plants, new workers and new brains gets to the consumers. Nobody worries about that.

No government has ever proposed that the assets and the enrichment of Canada be made to work for the Canadian people. All that is left to the discretion of those who are in power. Governments and Finance ministers never worried about regulating the whole volume of money in circulation according to the assets and the liabilities, according to annual enrichment and depreciation. The governments leave it up to the industrialists and to their ministers of Finance to get along with the bankers when they run short of money. Private interests decide about increasing or decreasing the volume of money as far as production is concerned. Those same interests will also decide that all that money must be taken away from consumers or taxpayers through taxes or price increases.

In my opinion, this amounts to slowing down, penalizing and taxing every enrichment. Farmers, industrialists and the government are all subjected to the discretion of private interests and to the conditions they set.

But what would a Social Credit government do? That is what some people will ask. Thanks to the monetary techniques of Social Credit we would, at first, fill that gap by introducing an accounting system that would correspond to reality. If the production capacity increases, it must be reflected in the national credit account, in the assets. In the same way, when there is depreciation, attrition or just a loss or destruction of production, that must be reflected in the liabilities, and the difference between the assets and the liabilities must normally bring about a net enrichment and that enrichment must be accompanied by an equivalent increase of the money in circulation so that the country may take advantage of that enrichment.

It may not seem much but if in 1929 we had applied such an accounting method to reconcile money supply with the facts, people would not have starved when there were masses of products and when unemployed wanted nothing more than to work at making products and services available to their families and their fellow citizens.

If in 1971 we had had the same accounting method, there would not now be 700,000 unemployed, a fact that reveals production paralysis because there is no money but an abundance of products.

What does the Minister of Finance ask himself when preparing his budget? The following questions: What does the country want? What is it able to pay? More often than not, he first asks himself the second question if he wants a balanced budget.

Under a Créditiste government, the Minister of Finance would try to answer the two following questions: First, what does the country want? Second, what can it produce? Not in money or taxes, but in available manpower, in unused resources, in technology?

What labour and equipment can the country do without, for instance, in the production of food, clothing, housing, highways? We can ask what choice can be made, if we can choose one or the other or both. If the government decides to build the Mackenzie pipeline, surely the workers and businesses engaged in that undertaking will not produce food or clothing. It will be up to other workers to produce these foodstuffs in their place, both for themselves and for those engaged in building the pipe line.

The problem is therefore whether the country is physically able to build the pipe line without hindering the production of other consumer goods. I don't see that money would have anything to do with it if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) were really against all that.

Under a Social Credit government, there would still be problems of physical possibilities, but no financial problems, since money must necessarily reflect reality and come with it.

The Social Credit budget would be based on the hierarchy of public services called for and achievable. The underlying concept of that budget, Mr. Speaker, would be that of whatever public and private goods the country can produce, i.e. consumer goods, without considering financing problems, since the funds should be produced automatically as and when required, and according to the physical possibilities of implementation.

[English]

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate this afternoon. I have to say I am in favour of keeping control of monetary and fiscal policies essentially in the hands of the federal government in Ottawa so that they can be used to influence the economy as a whole and place from time to time different emphasis on different regions in the country depending on economic conditions in each region.

Alleged Decentralization of Policies

I agree with the comments made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) just before lunchtime with respect to the increased emphasis the federal government has placed upon the equalization payments program. This subject has been debated in the House in recent days. There is no question that these payments, which are made in varying degrees to the less advantaged provinces, have been very beneficial to those areas and it is for this reason also I think it is necessary to keep control of monetary and fiscal policies in Ottawa.

The President of the Treasury Board also referred to the great success the Local Initiative Program has enjoyed in the last few months, particularly with respect to programs initiated by the municipalities. I know that in my own area, the borough of Scarborough has obtained a great many grants to aid local projects under this program. I am sure this is the case throughout the country. Preference is given to places where unemployment rates are higher.

I think there is no question that collection of income tax by the federal government rather than by individual provinces leads to great savings to taxpayers as a whole. To reverse this process would not, I feel, result in a less onerous burden for taxpayers as the motion suggests. In my opinion, it would be the other way around.

This afternoon I should like to comment on a slightly different aspect of the motion, the need for consultative mechanism between the provinces and the municipalities. My own minister, who is in charge of urban affairs, has been in favour of developing a consultative mechanism with the provinces and the municipalities on matters which are of extreme importance to most of the people in this nation. As you know, Mr. Speaker, and as was pointed out in the debate in this chamber on Monday, about 70 per cent of the people in our provinces at the present time live in urban areas. This proportion will increase to about 80 per cent in 1980. Therefore, the problems of the municipalities are to a large extent the problems of our growing urban areas—transportation, welfare, the environment, housing and so on. All these are essentially urban problems, integrated one with another. This gives rise to a need for improved methods of consultation between the federal government, the provinces and the municipalities which, by and large, face the consequences of the population increase.

There needs to be better co-ordination between the 112 federal programs which affect urban Canada, and this led to the creation of the Minister of Urban Affairs last July. As the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) said in this House last Monday:

> Our mandate is to co-ordinate the activities of the government of Canada in establishing co-operative relationships with the provinces and their municipalities for the enhancement of the human environment. Co-operation and coordination between the provinces and municipalities is precisely the purpose and the mandate of this ministry.

The present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras), when he was minister responsible for housing, in a speech before the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities in Halifax on June 10, 1970 called initially for federal, provincial and municipal consultation on urban matters—some structure, perhaps an urban council, within which political representatives supported by officials of all levels of government would meet to discuss urban policies regularly. Since that time there have been meetings in Winnipeg, in April, 1971, and in Victoria, in August, 1971, between the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the provincial ministers of municipal affairs and representatives of Canadian municipalities to explore means by which tri-level consultation can be launched.

At the Victoria meeting, a tri-level interim planning committee was formed consisting of the then minister of state for urban affairs, Mr. Dalton Bales, the then minister of municipal affairs for Ontario and Mayor D'Amour of Hull, representing the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. At the first ministers conference in November, 1971, the first ministers consisting of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers or prime ministers of all the provinces, agreed that on-going discussions to finalize the exact elements of the consultative mechanism should go forward with expedition. A meeting of this interim committee to pursue this matter was scheduled for late January, 1972 but had to be postponed at the last minute when changes were made in both in the federal and the Ontario cabinets, resulting in a new Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) and a new provincial minister responsible for municipal affairs. However, as the Minister of State for Urban Affairs announced last Monday, a meeting of this interim committee is now scheduled for April 10, 1972 at Mayor D'Amour's chambers in Hull. It will be chaired by Hon. D'Arcy McKeogh, Ontario minister for municipal affairs, and will comprise himself, our minister for urban affairs and Mayor D'Amour. They and their officials will be discussing the process of tri-level consultation—how to do it, when to do it, who should be included in it, and so on.

It is not envisaged that matters respecting possible fiscal transfers between the federal and provincial governments will be discussed by this interim planning committee, nor in the ensuing urban council of whatever type is recommended. Any debate regarding fiscal transfers per se will continue to be carried on essentially by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and by the provincial treasurer of each province. This morning the President of the Treasury Board dealt with the matter in further detail and also commented, I understand, on how closely the provincial and federal financial officials keep in touch with each other on this very important matter.

However, hopefully such an urban council would allow representatives from all levels of government, including the municipalities, to move effectively and with greater continuity in co-ordinating and focusing upon urban issues. These issues, I repeat, are largely issues faced by the provinces and municipalities, but also confront the country as a whole. The issues of housing, transportation, pollution, social services, etc. are all included under the heading of urban issues and, it is hoped, will be focused upon by the meeting in Hull on April 10. This consultation with the provinces, and through them with their municipalities, will enable a concerted drive to be made to alleviate the worst of these problems and I think will be of considerable benefit to all Canadians.

[Mr. Weatherhead.]

May I say I appreciate the opportunity of speaking on the motion moved today by the representative of the Social Credit party. The question of consultation among the three levels of government is a very important one. While I do not agree with the suggested form of consultation with regard to monetary and fiscal policies, I hope I have pointed out that other forms of consultation regarding the broad national and urban issues are proceeding very satisfactorily, and I believe will be a great success.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte).

I find it somewhat difficult to accept unreservedly the motion introduced by my friend and it will be impossible for me to support it as moved.

However Mr. Speaker, some parts of this motion give me the opportunity of making a few remarks, and I will try to make them as obectively as possible.

But first, I should like to go back to what happened through the years since 1949, for instance, which were fraught with far-reaching consequences.

Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that federal-provincial relations and the sharing of the tax basis have always given rise to great difficulties and constant wrangles, at least between the provincial and federal governments.

• (1450)

Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that it was under the guise of national emergency that the first incursions into the provincial field were made in 1939 by the centralist government of the time, a liberal government.

They will also recall that the then premier of the province of Quebec was sharply criticized—and he still is, as a matter of fact—for opposing the centralist views of the government in office. And in so doing, Mr. Speaker, he was only following the example set by his predecessor the Hon. Alexandre Taschereau.

Also, from 1939 to 1945, the central government found its way into the manpower field, especially into unemployment insurance. Premier Duplessis said at the time that the field of activity was definitely the responsibility of the provinces. However, anxious not to interfere with the war effort that this country was making toward a victory in the conflict that opposed us to Germany, the Quebec Premier simply gave up objecting.

They will also recall the letter that was written by another former premier of the province of Quebec, Mr. Godbout, relinquishing to the central government a large share of the powers which, according to the constitution, belonged to the provinces. Here again, this was done as a contribution to the national effort to ensure victory.

Mr. Speaker, I am mentioning those historic events simply to show that the Liberal party has always produced centralist governments, which ignored needs and aspirations not only in the province of Quebec, but also in all the other Canadian provinces, in order to preside over the fortunes of the country, in their own way. The Liberal party has always considered itself called upon by divine right to govern the country and it has always discharged its functions in that spirit.

Mr. Béchard: What are you driving at?

Mr. Ricard: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) that if he has any remarks to make he can make them after I am finished. However, if he does not want to be polite enough to listen to me he could at least in all due respect for this House listen to what is being said. I am certain he will learn a great deal not only from the one who has the floor at this time but also from those who will follow me.

One vital condition to the progress of the business of this House is to know how to listen and learn when the opportunity arises. So, I suggest strongly to my hon. friend the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice to keep his ears wide open. It would be to his advantage and also to that of the House which could benefit from the same courtesy I have shown for those who have spoken before me.

Mr. Béchard: I hesitate to listen to the hon. member.

Mr. Ricard: You see, Mr. Speaker, he will never understand. If you wish to call him to order, you are welcome, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. In keeping with the usual practice, whenever a member has been recognized, other members should let him exercise his right to speak and listen to him with as much attention as possible and without interrupting him.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member. I will simply make some comments after his speech, which is more or less excellent.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I notice the hon. member said "more or less excellent". He is probably short of vocabulary.

Mr. Speaker, in his motion the hon. member for Champlain deplores the lack of communication between provinces and the central government and the fact that it has been worsening during the last four years. I will quote from a few newspaper clippings to prove what I am saying, and I shall not rely only on evidence from opponents of the present government. Mr. Speaker, I have here a clipping from the March 5, 1968, issue of Le Devoir, bearing the headline "Provinces unanimously denounce central government fiscal policy" and where one can read:

> All of them denounce what they consider as the law of the fiscal jungle which was proposed to them by the federal government in 1966.
> All of them denounce the inflexibility introduced in fiscal relations as an aftermath of the federal government's determination to impose joint programs and its firm intention of withdrawing from them now.

I will also quote the words of former Quebec Prime Minister Jean-Jacques Bertrand, as reproduced in the November 5, 1968 edition of Le Devoir:

> What strange thing are we witnessing at the present time, more particularly since the last four months? We are witnessing—and I regret to have to deplore it—an arrogant and imperialist attitude on the part of the federal government.

Now let us read what the Ontario Minister of Finance, Mr. Charles MacNaughton, had to say as reported in Le Devoir of November 14, 1968:

> Last week, those taking part in the federal-provincial conference have been assured that the federal government would reconsider the question of tax sharing. But since then, we heard the central government make another statement to the effect that the provinces must collect themselves their additional taxes if they need supplementary revenues.

This is certainly evidence of a lack of communication, a lack of exchange of views between the central government and the provincial governments.

What does the present premier of Quebec, Mr. Robert Bourassa, now say? In Le Devoir of November 16, 1971, one can read this:

> Quebec premier, Mr. Robert Bourassa, blamed yesterday the federal government for failing to consult the provinces when formulating its policy against unemployment, and he called the conference of the premiers of the country, which he attends until tomorrow, an a posteriori consultation.

• (1500)

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) would surely be offended, and he would probably accuse the Quebec premier of racism, if he heard the words the premier is reported to have said. I quote:

> In fact, the premier stated that the activity of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, headed by Mr. Jean Marchand, had not changed things very much. More specifically, Mr. Bourassa said, the report had not affected the overall situation in Quebec and on the whole, the results were not very satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker, were the Minister to hear this, there would be no end to his laments, to the effect that we merely want to destroy him. We have no intention of destroying anyone, but as members of the official opposition, it is our duty to ensure that the government produces the best possible administration for the Canadian people.

The quotation goes on:

> Basically, the premier wants the federal government to adopt more selective economic remedial measures.

That is what we have been asking the present government all along.

As I said at the beginning this government interfered in fields of exclusively provincial jurisdiction, and later on warned the most interested parties, that is the provinces.

For instance, the federal government meddled in health insurance. Originally, the legislation was to have come into force on July 1st, 1967, but because of the objections of several provinces, its application throughout Canada was delayed by at least one year. We know that the Quebec government, through its premier, the hon. Daniel Johnson, had opposed the measure. He wanted Quebec to receive the tax levied in his province, the so-called social improvement tax. Not only was he the only one to demand that those payments be remitted to the province of Quebec, but after him, the provincial Liberal government has always done likewise while the federal and centralizing Liberal government has refused to accede to the demands of the Quebec government whose duty it was to look after the best interests of that province.

We know what was the comment of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the recommendations made by the then provincial secretary Mr. Mario Beaulieu. I will not repeat his first comment: it was the second time that he was using the term, but I will say however that he dismissed as stupid the claim of the Quebec provincial secretary.

Such refusals and arrogant attitudes give rise in Quebec to an antifederal feeling which is used as a springboard by those who wish to create dissension and promote separatism in Quebec. It is high time, Mr. Speaker, for the members opposite to throw off their own arrogance, to accept finally to hear the province of Quebec through its elected representatives, and to accede to their claims not only for its good, but also for the sake of good understanding and national unity.

Until our current leaders carry out that policy, Mr. Speaker, we will go from bad to worse and have one trouble after another.

The sooner this government becomes more flexible, the sooner it listens to reason, the better it will be for everyone.

And I hope, Mr. Speaker, that those who are from the province of Quebec, the friends of the Liberal party, will convince of that those who hold the reins of power, those who occupy the government benches.

Mr. Ouellet: You have forgotten to talk about family allowances.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must tell my colleague the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) that, although I listened with both ears, I did not learn anything new from his diatribe this afternoon, except—

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, there are some who never understand anything.

Mr. Béchard: I would ask the hon. member to please listen.

Mr. Ricard: Some never understand anything, and you are one of them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I believe that it is now the turn of the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine to have the floor, and I would ask hon. members to show him some courtesy.

Mr. Ricard: That is exactly what I am doing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I have not deemed it advisable to ask you to call to order the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, because, as he is very courteous, he would not dare challenge what I have just said.

I was greatly surprised to hear the allegedly accurate remarks of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. In fact, he stated that the Liberal party is the most centralizing since Confederation, and that the legally and democratically elected government of the province of Quebec had been refused the refund of this famous tax, that is an amount of $200,000. What is right—and I shall say it for the information of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, who is a former neighbour of the late Daniel Johnson—is that Mr. Johnson himself refused to put into force, in our province, the medicare plan which had been accepted by his predecessor, the hon. Jean Lesage.

Would a truly centralizing government make such proposals as, for instance, that he has just made to the provinces respecting family allowances? Is this a centralizing government?

It shall also completely withdraw, and this is retroactive to January, from the estate tax field. Is this the action of a centralizing government? This government also will negotiate tax agreements such as it is negotiating under Bill C-8, now before this House on third reading. Some will say, as the Progressive Conservatives are always doing, that the Liberal party is the most centralizing party.

Strangely enough, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec has always put its trust in the Liberal party, as it will again at the next elections.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to get into electoral matters, but I want to say that there is no reason to be surprised or overly concerned because of the regret expressed today in the motion brought in by the Ralliement, sorry, the Social Credit party—it is always changing its name—and which reads as follows:

> That this House regrets that the government has not established consultative bodies with the provinces and municipalities, with a view to decentralizing monetary and fiscal policies in such a way as to permit each level of government to assume its own responsibilities in a manner less burdensome to the taxpayer.

• (1510)

No need to be surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the regret expressed in the motion of the Social Credit Party of Canada if we recall the events since Canada was introduced to the policy of Major Douglas—that was his name, I think. Then there were the John Blackmores, the Solon Lowes—deliberately forgetting of course the Mannings and the Bennetts who are simply Conservatives in disguise, not even Progressive Conservatives, the Thompsons, another one who became a Conservative—he was one and he stayed one—the Caouettes, the Samsons and the Bois who don't even know whether they should cheer for Créditistes, Péquistes, Independantistes or the Ralliement national (nobody knows any more), they morbidly took it upon themselves to settle all economic problems through the Bank of Canada.

You will agree, Mr. Speaker, that it does not take a great deal of imagination to propose such a childish and, on the surface, such an easy solution to settle the economic problems of a country.

Strangely enough, however, until now, no other country faced with economic, monetary or other difficulties has ever thought to use the cure-all advocated by the Social Credit.

You will not learn anything from me, Mr. Speaker, since you are quite familiar with this Social Credit theory, if I say that there has not been a single debate in this House, since at least 1962, on such varied subjects as grain sales, bilinguism, the movement of feed grain in the East, the national capital, abortion, wiretapping, in which the Social Credit members have taken part, that did not end with their suggestion to use the magic method available to the government, namely the Bank of Canada, to settle all problems.

The absurdity of such a policy was once well described to the Canadian people, and especially to the Quebec people, by a former member of this House, a bitter opponent of Social Credit and, mainly, of this frivolous doctrine,—a serious and most effective opponent,—the former member for Saint-Jean-Iberville, Mr. Yvon Dupuis.

I sincerely urge Social Credit members to look through the Official Report of Debates of the House of Commons as well as the daily newspapers of that period, from 1961, 1962, 1963 onwards. They will find those speeches and I invite them to meditate on them for their own edification, because they were tremendous, they were not only a verbal but also a concrete condemnation of loony Social Credit theories.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gauthier: Wait a while!

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I hear some Social Credit members laughing. They should not laugh, they should be weeping because of the lies they have been bandying right and left for so many years and which they unfortunately succeeded in having too many of our people swallow. They know full well that they are unable to solve any problem from the corner where they sit, since they will never—and fortunately so—be in charge of the country's fortunes.

Mr. Gauthier: Wait a while.

Mr. Béchard: I hear the hon. member for Roberval saying: "Wait a while, wait a while" We have been waiting a long while, and there will, I hope, be a while more to wait so that the people of Canada may not be afflicted with such malaise and misfortune.

Mr. Speaker, even if there is no reason to be surprised by the kind of regrets expressed by the Social Credit, there is still reason to be seriously and deeply concerned with the attitude reflected by this proposition of the Social credit party from the constitutional viewpoint.

In fact all members of the House—at least those of the majority party, those of the official opposition and, I hope, those of the New Democratic Party—know that municipalities are brought into being by provinces and are therefore under provincial jurisdiction. Social Credit members are perhaps not yet aware of that.

As stated by the mover of the motion, who by the way disappeared this morning, so faint is his interest in this debate—although the municipalities do not want to be treated like little children, but be fed their revenue with the soup-spoon and not with the tea-spoon as was said this morning, and I do gladly agree with that, nevertheless the Canadian Government can in no way, within the present constitution and without incurring blame, extent its authority to the municipal field which is under the exclusive control of the provinces. And we would be criticized legitimately if we interfered with the rights specifically attributed to the provinces by the British North America Act in 1867.

I agree with the mover of this motion to the effect that there should be some co-ordination of the jurisdictions in the vital tax field to prevent our municipal, provincial and other officials engaged in public administration being plagued with headaches.

But to say, however, that the Canadian government, as is suggested by the motion of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), and I quote in part:

—the government has not established consultative bodies with the provinces and municipalities—

—this, in my opinion, is bad faith.

When you are a representative of the Canadian people, when you were duly elected to inform and protect the rights of these people, I say that you are dishonest or partisan or else you show complete ignorance of the development of Canadian politics in the field of federal-provincial relations if you make such gratuitous statements.

I shall go one step further, Mr. Speaker, and say that a member who shows such ignorance—I dare not say, "crass ignorance"—is not worthy of the confidence that the people bestowed upon him in 1968 because he shamelessly misleads them by introducing such a motion and elaborating on the remarks that he made this morning during the debate.

Because of such remarks, because of such an attitude, those members have a duty not to ask their constituents again for this confidence which they abused and these people have a duty to show them to whom they should direct their confidence for the management of public affairs.

• (1520)

It is a sad thing to see that when the Social Credit party of Canada deplores the fact that the government has not taken steps to establish a consultation process in order to decentralize monetary and fiscal policies in a way which would allow each level of government to assume its responsibilities with less expense to the taxpayers, it deliberately forgets the positive efforts made by the government in this direction. It forgets one of the main formula for redistribution of taxes levied—the equalization formula, under which the richer provinces contribute to the greater well-being of the less favoured ones.

Incidentally, the share of Quebec—if this is the province to which the hon. member for Champlain and the Social Credit party are alluding in this motion—had been increasing continually since this measure was initiated in the forties. Renewal of those fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces is provided for in Bill C-8 which is now under study, and which we discussed on third reading only yesterday.

Such arrangements were the result of continuous and intensive consultation with the provinces. In the past few years—as was very eloquently pointed out this morning by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury)— there have been regular meetings of ministers. The new Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) participated in the 12th meetings which took place in Jasper in January.

Moreover, fiscal and economic policies are discussed at almost all federal-provincial conferences—and God knows how many of them we have had since 1968, when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power.

We have besides a federal-provincial committee of officials, which to this day has held some fifty meetings.

If you do not call that serious consultation, I will not hesitate to say it is as good as what takes place within the Social Credit party.

Regulations have also been made. Nothing is more natural or human than the desire to reduce the tax burden of the people by distributing it on the greatest possible number of taxpayers. This is what this government and all former Liberal governments have been doing all along in Canada.

However, one should be careful, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) so rightly pointed out this afternoon, not to keep on asking the government to do things, without thinking of the cost that will have to be met at one time or another. After all, money does not grow on threes whatever Social Credit members may think to the contrary.

I have mentioned fiscal arrangements and the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) knows that money does not grow on trees.

Mr. Latulippe: We have never suggested that.

Mr. Béchard: He is a shrewd businessman and has not picked up his money on trees!

Mr. Latulippe: It was within the present system.

Mr. Béchard: And it is within the present system that he has succeeded in business and I commend him for that.

I referred to fiscal arrangements as being one of the existing formulas that contribute to the funding of provinces to enable them to carry out their commitments towards the taxpayers and consequently, towards the municipalities which they have created.

Have the members of the Social Credit party, and the hon. member for Champlain in particular, forgotten the initiatives taken by this government in favour of young people, groups and municipalities through the Opportunities for Youth program and the more recent Local Initiatives program? Have they forgotten the large amounts made available to the provinces by the federal government—

Mr. Gauthier: You should say made available to Liberal organizations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I would like to point out that these last few moments, there have been interjections coming from the other side of the House. I would invite hon. members to allow the hon. member who now has the floor to proceed.

[Mr. Béchard.]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your call to order, but I must say that those interruptions do not bother me at all.

Mr. Gauthier: You are used to them.

Mr. Béchard: Large amounts have been made available to provinces and municipalities, groups and citizens.

For instance, in 1970-71, $140 million were paid in loans to the provinces; $25 million were spent on the Opportunities for Youth Program; $40 million on other summer programs to help the students earn money for their studies; $150 million on the Local Initiatives Program and, during the same year, $160 million in loans to the municipalities, etc.

That redistribution of public funds, Mr. Speaker, helped considerably, directly or indirectly, to lighten the fiscal burden of the ratepayers for, in several cases, the projects carried out by groups within the Local Initiatives Program enabled those municipalities to get jobs done which they had been unable to tackle before for lack of funds.

That is the role of the Canadian government; it assumes it responsibly when it distributes throughout Canada the money collected from every class of society, from every province, rich or poor alike, and redistributes it amongst the most needy of them, and redistributes it equitably.

Has the Social Credit also forgotten the development programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which are considerably helping not only our industry but also our municipalities to build for example, under the special designated areas program, some aqueduct and sewage systems, bridges, sidewalks, municipal facilities and roads?

Nobody would suggest, for example, in the lower St. Lawrence area and in the Gaspé Peninsula which were in a dire need of roads in the 70's and where the federal contribution was up to 50 per cent under the area development program for the construction of roads alone, that there is no communication between the two governments. There is a communication for the welfare of the people in that area of Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is expired. I even let him speak one extra minute. Therefore, to allow him to carry on with his remarks, the unanimous consent of the House is required. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I wish to thank my hon. colleagues for their courtesy. I shall quickly list some of the aspects the Créditistes may have omitted.

I have referred to the programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. There are several of them, but I refer in particular to those that greatly assist our municipalities. Here is the proof: a considerable number of requests for funds are being received by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Quebec Development Board. Why? To help those municipalities without the necessary funds. So, with this co-operation between Ottawa and Quebec, we can benefit, like other provinces, under similar arrangements. Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and all provinces benefit from this legislation of the Regional Economic Expansion Department.

But, Mr. Speaker, have the Créditistes forgotten the whole program of social security that was introduced in Canada by the Liberal party, clamorously called a centralizing party by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) whom we may not have the pleasure of seeing in this House after the next election?

Mr. Ricard: The Liberals have repeated this six times, and I have beaten them each time.

Mr. Béchard: In your riding it was said six times, but in mine it has not yet been said. Some are starting to say it about you.

For instance, are old-age pension plans, unemployment insurance plans, Medicare, hospital insurance, family allowances, Veterans allowances etc. not meaningful? If Canadians did not have these programs now, where would they get money from? They would have to get it from other sources.

Those are therefore measures that ease the burden of the Canadian taxpayer.

And Mr. Speaker, I have no compunction, as a representative from the province of Quebec, in Ottawa, in asserting that the party to which I have the honour of belonging has made available to all citizens indiscriminately the social security measures which it behooves the government to provide for the people of Canada because wealth should be equitably distributed in order that the less well-to-do, who worked at the building of the country may, upon retirement or at a given time of life, receive a part of what they gave the nation.

• (1530)

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the remarks of the previous speaker. I especially noticed that, at the beginning, he said that he would not embark on electoral matters. However, I must say that his speech had something of an electoral savour.

I do not usually insist on such things. This afternoon I intend first to try and explain to the House that the Creditistes are not the only ones who realize the defects of the present system. And I am very pleased to support the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), particularly as far as the federal-provincial relations in tax matters are concerned. I will try to make a suggestion as to how we could put some order in the present system.

Even though some people take pleasure in praising the party in power, we really cannot but notice that we are up to our necks in debts and that there are thousands of unemployed.

Mr. Béchard: Please, no electoral speeches!

Mr. Dionne: There are the results of a regime praised by people who are geared for an election campaign.

Enough about that. I shall now deal with the means to which the government could resort to clean up the present mess.

The way to increase the standard of living of all Canadians, without taking anything from anyone, without paralysing economic activity and without generating either inflation or delfation, would be the financing of public investment by means of interest-free loans granted by the Bank of Canada.

An hon. Member: That was mentioned earlier!

Mr. Dionne: It was mentioned but only to indicate that we always conclude our speeches with references to the Bank of Canada. I mentioned it at the very beginning of my comments and I explained how we could benefit from the services of the Bank.

Such a measure, as can readily be seen, would result in lower taxes levied by the government to pay interests on the public debt—which is unpaid and unpayable under the present system—or lower borrowings from the government and would increase accordingly the money available to the consumer to get goods to meet his needs.

Créditistes are not alone in favouring the creation of new credit on an interest-free basis for the financing of public capital.

In his book Demain, c'est l'an 2,000, Mr. Gaston Bardet, professor of applied economics at the University of Brussels, after the publication of a thorough study of the banking system and studies performed in Britain by the MacMillan commission and in Canada in 1939 by the House Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, draws the following conclusions:

> Hence, there are two possible approaches to financing which are totally opposed in character: one coming from savings, or surplus money, the other being projected in anticipation. In the first case, he said, as far as private production is concerned, self-regulation should come from the existing supply of capital—incidentally, we disagree with Mr. Bardet in this regard; in the second case, from demand as it concerns the surest primary needs.
> Thus bank financing is highly advisable for building up the country's real estate equipment that is beneficial to the country at a whole. Wherever overproduction is not to be feared, demand determines the issuing. Needs in housing, highways, bridges, hospitals, schools then become the regulators of anticipated scrip money.
> As those are consumption and not production loans, Mr. Bardet says there cannot be any interest. The country and the community cannot be usurers.

Another economist has taken an interest in this problem of financing government activities, and he came to the same conclusion that the Créditiste party has discovered a long time ago—the financing of public capital by new credit issued without interest.

The statement of this approach is found in Robert Theobald's book entitled "The Challenge of Abundance" which is available at the Library of Parliament.

This is what Mr. Theobald has to say on the subject, and I quote:

> A government can use three different methods to obtain the funds it requires to meet its obligations. First, it can tax its citizens and institutions, thus gaining possession of their money. Second, it can borrow money from people and institutions and pay interest on the amount it borrows. Third, it can simply create money and use the resulting funds to make its purchases.

The one point on which everybody agreed before 1936, continues Mr. Theobald, was that the government should never simply create funds. The prohibition against creating funds was based on the assumption that the demand for goods would always be equal to supply as long as government did not interfere with the economy. Keynes destroyed the validity of this assumption when he showed that there was no certainty that the demand for goods would always be equal to the available supply in rich countries.

There are other methods, said he, that could be used to close any gap between supply and demand. It would be possible to decrease the level of supply without greatly affecting demand by cutting hours of work and leaving wages unchanged. It would be possible to raise the desire for goods by making people feel that more products were necessary for the good life and a decent standard of living.

The government could simply take up the slack between actual and potential production by building new schools, by demolishing slum housing and building new accommodation, and by controlling pollution. Because there would be unused resources in the economy, the government would not need to raise this money by taxation or by borrowing, the money could simply be created. The additional funds would not cause inflation, for there is—by definition—no shortage of goods.

Mr. Theobald thinks it is possible to democratize money and to use interest-free credits for the country's economic and social development.

I should like to state the opinion of an eminent British engineer, whose ideas create considerable interest in Great Britain.

Volume 183, Part I, no. 5 of the 1968-69 minutes and proceedings of the Great Britain Mechanical Engineers Association contains the full text of the lecture delivered to that Association by Mr. Anthony Vickers, under the following title: "The Engineer Society".

• (1540)

In this study, Mr. Vickers, who was warmly applauded and whose comments were later discussed by members of the Institute, deals first with technological development and the expectations it provides in terms of economic development. Then, in the second part of his report, he dwells on the means of financing social development and concludes by saying, and I quote:

This education requires, first of all, that each and everyone should grasp simple facts as well as the various functions of money whether it be metal, paper or bank credit. This does not entail endless studies of economic and monetary policies. It means that everyone should be able to understand that:

(1) Money is a means of exchange or a method of payment that is intrinsically worthless and costs nothing.

(2) The control and regulation of the amount of money required must be greatly improved to meet the demands of technological development and the changes resulting from a capital intensive economy.

This is not the view of a Créditiste, but, as I said earlier, that of an engineer who knows the problem.

In the last part of his report, the author explains how it would be feasible, within a full employment economy, to provide Great Britain with the social assets presently unavailable due to money and credit scarcity.

According to him, the United Kingdom has been reviewing for a number of years seven dam building projects intended to increase water resources, enlarge the national heritage, improve shipping and harbour facilities and in some cases, enable the construction of electrical facilities and the improvement of the road system.

All these projects would turn out to be important assets for the people besides creating considerable opportunities for employment. Hundreds of millions of pounds would be needed, but the cost of creating the necessary credits would be negligible. Is this not the right opportunity of implementing Keynes' insistent suggestion to the effect that what is physically achievable should be made financially possible?

First, a national investment or finance company should be created. Commissions of all kinds are already in existence: Unemployment Insurance, Workmen's Compensation, and so on; therefore, why not institute a special commission to look after monetary reform? The purpose of this national finance company would be to supply the necessary credits for the creation of assets for the benefit of society. This would mean providing work as long as the resources allowed.

In a free society, in peacetime, overabundant manpower cannot be assigned to alternative jobs; however, through education, rehabilitation, good salaries and decent housing, it can certainly be attracted to other occupations, keeping in mind that the gross national product can be boosted annually by at least 600 million pound sterling.

Never before was our production, transportation or communication capacity altogether as large as today. However, the government invites us to tighten our belts, and this unavoidably causes restrictions being imposed in various ways by producers. Of course, time will tell that taxation was too much costly and complicated, but, even though the purpose of this demonstration is not to discuss taxation problems and basic objectives, it remains, nonetheless, that technological progress requires economic expansion for full employment.

This is why we are suggesting, concerning what we call non-profit capital goods, the institution of a national finance company meeting such needs. Its task would have to be stated clearly in order to avoid conflict with the various financial organizations serving the private sector of the economy, which is based on profit.

This national finance company, which would be one of the most important factors in government policy, would provide a large part of the money or credit now levied through taxation.

In spite of the present high rates the tax system cannot use the inactive resources to build, for example, a modern road system and it also adds a great deal to the costs society pays in the form of interests.

Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) stated in this House that he would like to be in a position to finance the building of a Canadian pipeline in the Mackenzie Valley but that he was not a creditiste and did not know how to print money. If the minister does not know how money and credit are born all he has to do is consult his banker who, if he is the least competent and honest—and bankers are generally very intelligent people—will tell him how the banking system creates credit out of nothing and if his banker does not know I will send him a copy of the very informative brochure published by the Royal Bank of Canada. This way he would learn that all that is physically desirable must be made financially possible and that with a financial system attuned to reality financial problems would no longer exist when there is no production problem.

As Marquis Serra wrote in his book entitled "Le Chaos économique et la Révolution qui vient", and I quote, > Counting in terms of units called dollars the development of materials, natural resources and technology is an art in infancy. And so it is also when we create purely monetary means—credit, that is—to facilitate the exchange of various services which will carry out the plans.

I think that in this day and age it would be proper for all concerned to seriously look for a way out of this ludicrous social structure which allows a close mixture of poverty and wealth. Money does not grow on trees, as someone said earlier, and the creditistes have known that for a long time. It does not come out of thin air. It is created by man, made scarce by man and, unfortunately, the government which claims sovereignty lets itself be led and controlled by those who manipulate the money and the country and who hold the economic life in their hands to the extent that without their consent no one can breathe.

I think the creditistes are right in offering the solution they advocate and the population who is beginning to understand what is going on is prepared to change this system that breeds too much misery.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to comment on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte).

There is obviously some depth to this motion, and this does not please all hon. members. Those who are working in this House in order to get re-elected certainly do not like it. This motion does not suit them at all.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the hard times we are going through nowadays, I would say that there is too little understanding, too much disagreement, too little dialogue, too much parading, too little comprehension. At a time when we should be understanding one another in this House, at a time when we should be sharing an educative system in order to rebalance our economy, we just turn our backs and make fun of those people who really have in-depth reforms to suggest in order to rebalance our economy, which is completely unbalanced.

This does not mean that government supporters or administrators are all to blame. I have said this before and I am saying it again: Several of them are in good faith, and working for the common good. However, when you have to work with faulty, outdated tools, even if you do your best, you cannot obtain adequate results.

• (1550)

History should make us friends, economics should make us partners and necessity should make us allies. Nobody should divide two peoples that nature has thus united. Our relations with English-speaking Canadians are becoming more and more essential; they are in the best interests of Canadians. If the situation is somewhat muddled, if there is some confusion in our relations with other ethnic groups, somebody must say so, but in a sensible, normal and scientific manner. We therefore have serious responsibilities.

As to the maintenance of our economic structures, our relations show an unusual decline. Mr. Speaker, we want to see Canadians control their economy, their political life, but we also wish to live in harmony with the other Canadians, regardless of their race, creed, colour or political allegiance.

We are told that our problem is economic, that it must be solved here in Canada through adequate policies; yet, they refuse to discuss those policies. And so, since the end of the last war, the tremendous progress achieved by the nation, by companies, has not prevented under-nourishment, poverty, insecurity and hardships among the vast majority of our people. Economic balance cannot spring from economic imbalance. It is an economic and mathematical point of view that demands economic and mathematical solutions.

Mr. Speaker, all those problems are easy to solve; they are not so colossal. It is a matter of finding the necessary means to solve the economic imbalance we now know. We did not produce that imbalance, we did not create unemployment in Canada, we did not organize the unions or give rise to dissatisfaction.

That dissatisfaction and all those new organizations which spring up overnight are the result of the inability of our governments to give the people what they are entitled to, to develop and take all possible scientific and economic means for the benefit of the people and not to subjugate them.

Financial organizations are subjugating the people who have a power of life or death over the government; it is not the government which must control people, but people who must direct the government and say what means should be taken, if it can not find them, to restore economic balance in order to provide to all a share of our natural wealth.

Mr. Speaker, our economic climate is polluted by our rotten social environment which breeds distrust, hate, dissension and discord among us. The stink of a decaying economy makes us experience the fears of inflation and deflation, financial crises, economic recessions, tightenings of the belt, debts of all kinds, useless direct and indirect taxes and especially continuous interests on swollen figures created with a stroke of the pen.

All this leads to social insecurity. As a reward for the work of past generations, the people, in general, only reap the bitter fruits of unemployment, debts, and sky-high taxes of all sorts.

Even though salaries are going up, they will never satisfy the greedy unions. There must be some order and authority; otherwise, everything will crumble, and we are going to experience here what millions of human beings who have lost their freedom are going through.

We, of the Social Credit, have been saying for 35 years, in every possible way, that the monetary system is strangling us, squeezing us dry. In fact, did Henry Ford not say once: "If the American people realized in what a crooked financial system they are living, they would not tolerate that system another day".

Alleged Decentralization of Policies

We are suffering from monetary anemia. The value of our dollar has decreased by 70 per cent in the last 20 years, and this reduces our purchasing power gradually, when, in fact, it should be increasing with the rise in national production.

The time of the lean kine and the fat kine is no more. We have only the lean kine now, and such a situation is no longer advisable.

Our capitalistic society was born, has grown and has developed. The modern world is going back to paganism, towards inhuman capitalization, where man lives in affluence, but is more and more isolated, being deprived by financial forces.

The Social Credit party wishes to make capitalism more humane, by making a servant of it instead of an exploiter. All tools of capitalism should be available to everyone. Such tools should enable everyone to obtain a vital minimum.

In short, such is the justification for the Social Credit, what makes it different from the old, worn out and dangerous political parties which, for dictatorial reasons, are depriving the citizen with financial weapons over which they do not have ultimate control.

Previous speakers have pointed out the untoward effects of our current situation, the result of banks financing social projects of various governments which in turn leads to the indebtedness of the public, the taxpayers and all governments and to tax increases which mercilessly eat up the low income of plant workers, farmers, blue collar workers, civil servants, in short all the classes of society now in a state of stagnation.

The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) said that if I have been successful in our society, I owe it to the present system. Indeed, I have been successful in this society, but I have worked perhaps fifty times more than he did. If someone succeeds in this system, it can only be at someone's expense. I am human enough to allow myself to live, but I also let other people live. That is why I work.

Mr. Béchard: Everybody does.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, other spokesmen for the Social Credit party have proposed a new finance formula, a sound and logical formula that could only benefit all Canadians. I cannot see why hon. members opposite would not consider our economic arguments to settle the problem and balance our economy in a normal fashion.

• (1600)

Nobody is satisfied with the present economy, because it is out of kilter from A to Z. The governments will be collecting taxes from the people. The hon. member for Bonaventures-Iles-de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) had this to say a moment ago: "We paid out social welfare benefits, family allowances; we financed the Opportunities for Youth Program and made, all kinds of payments to the population." But how could they do it? By increasing income tax, and all kinds of other taxes, direct and indirect, and after having accumulated huge deficits. These will be increased to $3 million at the end of 1973 in order to cover social legislation designed to allow people to live decently. But what is still far from being decent, is the piling up of deficits, and these must eventually be paid, and that is what the hon. member does not understand.

Other members of the Social Credit party have brought forward a new financing system a sound formula.

Mr. Speaker, during the few minutes available to me, I want to point out some of the advantages which would result for all of the population from the implementation of the policies set forth in the motion submitted by the hon. member for Champlain.

First and foremost, social needs of CAnadians could be met to the extent allowed by the physical resources of this country. In other words, if there are brains and brawn available, if our resources are plentiful, nothing could prevent from coping with the needs of Canadians in the fields of social projects, education, health, urban renewal, public equipment, at all levels.

I would like to repeat here that we believe education to be a provincial matter. Therefore, we believe that the provinces should be responsible, through school boards, colleges and universities placed under their jurisdiction, and in consultation with bodies representing that sector—i.e., parents, teachers, church and state—for the development of programs which will however, take into account the objectives pursued by society, and the needs of that society.

However, all those educational needs—be they school facilities, vocational training, or comfort of the students—cost a lot of money, and we believe that a formula like the one we are advocating, although it would not solve everything, would at least eliminate the most serious obstacle which at present paralyzes all good will and practically crushes the best initiatives.

The same thing is true of health services. Before you can cure people and prevent illness, you need first of all to have enough institutions to accommodate the sick. You also need doctors and specialists.

There are now medicare and health insurance programs in all provinces of Canada.

Without trying to determine whether those programs are justified or in what manner they should be implemented, the fact remains that all present health insurance programs are faced with financial difficulties.

The difficulties are such that the federal government has almost called upon the provinces to reduce the costs of those programs which get increasingly higher.

We must not forget that the provinces have to face the costs of building hospitals, that they are responsible for the training of competent staff, that they must negotiate with employees who have the right to strike with respect to their salaries and their working conditions. The provinces bear the brunt of those medicare and hospital insurance programs. They face the cost of those programs and they struggle in order to find the money needed to improve health facilities. They must meet exorbitant costs considering the high interest rates they have to pay for the money they borrow on the free market.

This is something the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) never did and never will understand, I am afraid, because he says one must work to get money. But where does money come from to pay for labour? To pay for labour, you need investments. Investment money must be borrowed at interest, you must repay the borrowed capital and the interest, which is money that has never been in circulation. This is the reason for the public debt that we now have and that is approaching $46 billion. The cost to each Canadian is approximately $115 to $120 of tax money to pay the interest on the debt. Old parties view this as normal, as good management. They have long had the population believe this but today the people are beginning to realize that there are other means of financing, other means of curbing the increase in those public debts and in taxes which are at the top of the whole economy.

We can no longer levy taxes. Whatever taxes would be levied would not be paid by the citizens because they can no longer afford it. Hon. members, those great economic experts who can solve any problem, are faithful to the system that led us to such stagnation and unbalance. They think they are smart because they follow the beaten path instead of opening new trails and searching for new horizons. Instead of progressing towards real solutions, we are sinking deeper into chaos.

I would like to deal with the social security measures we could improve with a financial system that would be attuned to reality which would not neutralize good will and initiative, but would be reconditioned to give all Canadians at least the strict minimum to which the wealth of their country entitles them.

We think the question to ask is the following: Is Canada wealthy enough, are Canadians able to produce enough to meet the basic requirements of the whole population? If so, why are those needs not met? Simply because the present financial system paralyzes everything, grabs for itself all the wealth, emasculates all efforts.

A financing method which would allow everything physically possible and desirable to materialize would have the effect, Mr. Speaker, to bring hardship and distress to an end for millions of Canadians living below the poverty line.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to say a few words on the consequences of initiating such a financial system on savings, investments, employment and finally on consumers at large—

Mr. Speaker: It is with much regret that I have to tell the hon. member that his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this debate I notice that on this Friday afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not with us.

An hon. Member: Where is your leader?

Mr. Broadbent: I have not yet finished my comment. I realize that many members are away on legitimate business on Friday afternoons and I was about to say that I hope the Prime Minister is not away today making the kind of speech that he made a week ago today when he visited Victoriaville, Quebec. In his quaint, casual, profound way he was informing the people of Victoriaville that we in Canada are embarking upon a new age of leisure; that contrary to what a lot of troublesome, misleading, misguided and misinformed opposition politicians are saying, there really is not an unemployment problem in Canada.

To the people of Victoriaville the Prime Minister said, "Do you realize that in the city of Montreal alone there are 10,000 jobs available for those who want to seek them?" Later in that speech, if reports are accurate, he said, "Things really are not bad in Canada. You know, conditions aren't as bad as they were in the thirties". That is the Prime Minister's standard of comparison: things are not as bad as they were in the thirties. It is interesting that he seized upon the 1930s, because we are not far removed from that period if we consider the absolute number of unemployed.

The speech made by the Prime Minister cannot be taken lightly, or simply dismissed as a somewhat mistaken view or interpretation of what is going on. It must be seen for what it is—a kind of hoodwinking attempt to say that things are not so bad. As someone once said, "That just ain't the case"—because in saying what he said to the people living in that town of Quebec, he left unsaid that for the 10,000 jobs available in Montreal there were in the province of Quebec alone 230,000 unemployed looking for jobs. If the Prime Minister had wanted to be honest and to fully inform the people of this country, in his speech he would have said that there are 16 or 17 people pursuing each job that is available across the country.

This situation compares with the western European average, to be on the generous side, of roughly two people looking for each job that is available. In fact, in Austria, Norway, West Germany and Sweden—countries governed by parties with a social philosophy identical to that of my own—you will find virtually full employment, the highest level of employment in the history of western Europe. That is the kind of point that the Prime Minister finds it convenient to ignore. He is much more interested in talking about the level of inflation of these countries and uttering blithering economic nonsense about how much better off we are because our inflation is not running at the same rate. The Prime minister totally neglects to inform the people of Canada that inflation in itself is not necessarily bad if you do what those countries do to protect pensioners by having fully effective escalator clauses in pension contracts or by getting workers to join trade unions. Something like 85 per cent of the workers in the labour force of those countries are unionized and can therefore deal with an inflating economy. We have something like 35 per cent; therefore it is difficult for us to deal with inflation. But that is the progressive solution: leave this inflation to create full employment; get people into the trade union movement; protect our pensioners. This would be a vital approach to our economy, a sensible one and one which would show a sense of compassion. Perhaps that is why it is not pursued by the Prime Minister.

• (1610)

I share some of the philosophy of my friends in the Social Credit party on the social objective of this debate; that is to say, we must have something to produce real economic benefits for those in our society who are suffering at this time. That is a pretty general objective and to that extent I will be speaking directly on the motion before us. I should like to suggest four or five practical steps that could be taken right now to bring that about.

The first of these is a change in tax policy which would benefit the vast majority. It is the kind of change that is in complete contradiction of the bill that we will probably be discussing in this House on Monday or Tuesday next which proposes an across the board tax cut of 3 per cent to individuals and 7 per cent to corporations. That kind of tax cut is wrong on the grounds of equity and employment which are the two objectives of a sensible tax policy. The 3 per cent across the board tax cut for individuals means, of course, that millionaires or people with substantial incomes save much more than those with average or low incomes and that is why it is unjust.

An across the board tax cut, of course, is beneficial to a party seeking re-election, especially a party that relies for a good part of its support upon upper-income groups. What we need, instead, is the kind of proposal that I and some other members will be making in the debate next week for a 40 per cent tax cut and to put a ceiling on the amount. In a debate on a similar subject last Christmastime I made a proposal for the introduction of a tax cut of 40 per cent with a ceiling of $40 for the individual. Under the present tax approach of this government, a man earning $30,000 upward will save from $1,000 to $5,000 a year in tax.

Under the government's proposal, a single individual earning $2,000 would save $2.25, a single individual earning $4,000 would save $16.41, and so on. These are paltry sums for low-income people under the so-called tax reform of this government. Having a minimum tax saving of, say $40 for tax payments in Canada would mean something to the low-income people and there would be a ceiling on it so that no one would save more than $40. With the present legislation, upper-income people will save thousands of dollars.

The second practical and just role would be to start hitting the people on the stock market and the land speculators with a full capital gains tax. The government, with all their wisdom and bravado said they were bringing a capital gains tax to Canada but they did not say that we are the only country in the western world, with perhaps the exception of Spain, that has not had a capital gains tax for many years. Instead of bringing it in at the full rate, they brought it in at the 50 per cent rate. Instead of people in the stock market paying tax on a $10,000 gain, these people have an exemption on half their gains. This is completely unjust and inequitable. This kind of thing is responsible for the cynical attitude of low-income people in Canada when they see the fat cats getting fatter by not paying their share of the tax burden. That minimal kind of equity would be desirable both in psychological terms and from the point of view of tax equity.

Another kind of injustice is brought to mind by the $150 exemption to be allowed as work-related expenses. I have heard Liberal politicians say that this is wonderful, that ordinary workmen will be able to claim the expense of driving to work or of purchasing tools without even having to turn in receipts. I do not find this a remarkable or significant innovation. If they had said to the corporate set that a $150 limit per year would be set on their expenses, that would have been fine. But they did not say that. In any big hotel in Toronto or Montreal, and no doubt in Bayshore in Vancouver where Mr. Hughes is currently residing in his attempt to purchase another part of British Columbia, there can be the situation where jet-set executives entertain their clients and write the whole thing off as a business expense.

If a business proposition is involved, the fact that $150 is spent in one night on wine, good food, and so on, is incidental. But that, Mr. Speaker, reveals the hypocrisy which is built into our tax structure. We say to the working people of the country that they will be allowed to claim $150 a year without even producing receipts, and we say to the upper-income people that they can spend $150 a night and claim it as a business related expense. I say this is completely unjust and should be abolished. What is fair for the poor or average man should be fair for the rich man as well, and this just is not the case with the present tax laws.

I should like to go back to the question of the general reduction of taxes with which we will be presented early next week. I made reference to the across the board 3 per cent tax reduction for individuals. I should also like to say something about the 7 per cent reduction in the corporate sector. If it would not bore my colleagues, I could quote economists on this point. The 7 per cent across the board is for many companies simply a windfall profit by which we will allow them to have a little more money this year. If you reduce taxes in the corporate sector, the least that should be done, instead of giving an across the board reduction, is to analyse this reduction to make sure that what you achieve in the corporate sector is what you intend.

What should be done is to have a 7 per cent across the board reduction in every sector of the economy only if at the end of the fiscal year they can show they have increased their labour force and have expanded their enterprise by a certain percentage. That is the motivation that was argued by the minister of finance last fall when he announced the tax reduction. The motivation was to improve the job situation in Canada. If that is the motivation, there should be a rider attached to the tax reduction and no company should receive the tax benefit at the end of this fiscal year unless it has improved the job situation and has expanded employment. With the present legislation there is no such criteria. So, to repeat the point, it amounts to a windfall profit for a good number of companies and achieves no social benefit for the people of Canada.

Secondly, if we are to have significant corporate tax reform it seems to me what we need is a shift in the tax burden from the manufacturing sector to the resource sector. That is the kind of shift that would result in an increased number of jobs. In Canada the resource sector of the economy pays taxes at rates which are roughly, in their final effect, 50 per cent lower than in the manufacturing sector. Again, if the government wanted to create jobs, what it should do is remove this disparity because everyone knows it is the manufacturing sector—the textile mill in Montreal, the auto plant in Oshawa and the few firms which still exist in Mr. Speaker's riding—which employs significant numbers of people. You can have another oil well in Alberta or in the north, or anywhere else in the country, and it just sits there gurgling away and producing almost no employment.

However, it is the manufacturing sector of the economy, as the former finance minister said when he was in opposition—and that might be significant—which is adversely affected by our tax system. We pour money directly into the resource sector by not taxing it at the same level as we do the manufacturing sector. The result is we have a disproportionate amount of capital investment going into the resource sector and not enough into the manufacturing sector, where it should be. What we need right now, to get back to the motion, is to create a greater sense of fairness. That means greater employment. What we need is a tax increase in the resource sector of the economy which will have, as an effect, the rechannelling of investment into the manufacturing sector.

This government has been quite consistent in its tax policy. It takes great pride in consistency and consistent stupidity. I suppose it would prefer to be consistent rather than make an intelligent and just change. Let me conclude with a practical recommendation. We have now in our foreign reserves almost $6 billion. If we intend to keep our dollar floating, and particularly if we intend to maintain a clean float, as the economists say, there is no need for that little depository of money to simply sit around. A couple of years ago I argued that we should use a good part of the reserves—I believe the amount then was around $3 billion—to buy a controlling interest in the petroleum industry of Canada. I argued that this would make very good economic sense. This is a growth industry, and with control we could carry out our own research and development in Canada by employing Canadian scientists. This would lead to the development of new projects.

Has my time expired, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot ask a question of the Chair, but I will tell him that his time has expired.

• (1630)

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in speeches delivered both inside and outside this House the Creditistes have often quoted as an example the building of the Jacques Cartier bridge which everybody knows and which was built according to official figures at a cost of $18,571,308.71. At the present, the taxpayers of this country have paid in interest only for that bridge the amount of $20,198,266.33 and there is still $14,065,605.39 to be paid on the principal.

As we have already said on several occasions, Mr. Speaker, this is dreadful nonsense. A nonsense that the Creditistes undertake to do away with as soon as they have taken over. This should happen soon because the people of Canada have their fill with paying two or three times the actual cost of a product or service they require when it would be possible to build bridges or schools, to carry out various public works without the taxpayers being called upon to pay the cost of two or three bridges when they only get the use of one.

Under the Creditist system, Mr. Speaker, finance is nothing else but facts expressed in terms of accounting. If a production takes place, we write down in the credit column the value of what has been produced. If that production is consumed or destroyed we write down in the debit column the value of what has been consumed or destroyed. Under a creditist regime we would not be asking ourselves questions such as: Do we have the money? Can we pay? Can we borrow? How are we going to pay back?

Has a bridge become necessary? Is a new school being called for? The only question those in charge will have to ask themselves is this, can we build the bridge? Can we build the school that is being called for and needed?

Whether we can build a school or a bridge or not, Mr. Speaker, does not boil down to, do we have the money? It is a matter of, do we have materials, wood, brick, tools, engineers, technicians, workers, to build it?

We, of the Social Credit party, know that the real credit of a country, of a province or of a municipality lies in the productive capacity of that country, that province or that municipality. That is the real credit.

Financial credit should, on the other hand, reflect the real credit. Financial credit should then derive from society itself or rather from a monetary institution which could well be the central bank, which operates on behalf of society and on its instructions. This monetary institution which is only a book-keeping instrument, could well be the Bank of Canada at the national level, or a Quebec institution at that province's level, in case the Quebec government and that of other provinces should take the initiative if Ottawa refused to do so.

But let us assume that the Social Credit party is in power in Ottawa and that the incumbent Postmaster General wants to build a post office somewhere or that the Minister of Transport and Communications wants to put up a bridge between Montreal and the south shore. The ministers concerned would submit their projects to parliament and the members would decide whether they can be physically carried out and whether they meet actual needs. In no way do the members have to ask themselves whether they have the money or not. They only have to consider whether these projects meet actual needs and are physically possible. This means that the members will have to agree if the productive capacity of the country allows it to carry out these projects while still providing the goods required by the private sector. The decision of parliament to allow the construction of a post office or a bridge has nothing to do with any financial concern. In order to reflect realities, finance will have to play its part. The credit board or central bank would have nothing to decide, nothing to dictate with regard to the carrying out of the project. It would merely finance the construction of the bridge and make the required entries in a national ledger.

Let us suppose a $10 million bridge is to be built across the St. Lawrence. In his tender, the contractor would have provided for the expenditures; the purchase of materials, labour, transportation and the cost of money. But where would he get the money to pay his bills from day to day if he is short of cash? From financial institutions, banks, for instance.

Under a créditiste government, the banks would continue to exist, to make loans and give credit. They could lend money from the savings of citizens, or still obtain interest free credit made available by the central bank, with the only requirement of paying back the whole of the loan over a given period.

But banks being agencies serving the public will have charges, salaries to pay, and they will have to make profits if they are to carry on their operations. Therefore they will ask their make borrowers to pay charges that could be described as interest or service charges. But under a Créditiste government, the essential difference would be that the banks would not grant credit that they could not generate themselves, nor would they appropriate it as though it belonged to them, but they would get it from the Central Bank, depository of the national credit.

Upon completion of the bridge, the government would inspect the works, and if it found it in accordance with the plans and specifications, it would pay to the contractor the sum of 10 million dollars. That amount would include all the contractor's expenses plus his profit, as well as the financial costs he had probably provided for in his bid. But some people may say: The government now owes $10 million to the central bank, since it is the bank that advanced the credits to pay for the building of the bridge. But no, there is no indebtedness. The bridge is wealth newly created by the people, through the work not only of those who helped to build it, but of all those who enabled the contractor and employees to build the bridge by providing food, clothing, tools, etc.

As we do not ask a farmer to pay for the milk he produces on his farm, so we should not have a country run into debt for its own production. If that bridge had been built in the United States, it could be looked upon as a debt to the Americans. But in a realistic system, a public debt, a national debt has no sense and cannot exist except with regard to foreigners, if we received from them in actual goods, material, manpower and services more than we sent them.

Some people may say: "But those $10 million were put in circulation. Are you going to recover that amount through taxes in order to pay for that bridge? Certainly.

• (1640)

I have just said that the people do not have to pay for the construction of the bridge, since they built it themselves, but they have to pay for the use of it, for depreciation, as it deteriorates and depreciates.

As Creditistes say, new production must be financed by new capital, and the retirement of such capital must be done at the rate of consumption, that is at the rate of the disappearance of the wealth that was created and financed.

Let us go back to the comparison with the milk of the farmer. Production should not be paid by him, but rather by the consumer.

In the case of the bridge, it is the public who must pay, not as a producer, but as a consumer.

Let us suppose that the bridge has a life expectancy of 50 years. This means therefore a yearly depreciation of $200,000. So there are those $200,000 which the public will have to pay back to the Treasury office as a tax or as a toll for a period of 50 years. After, whether the bridge is completely out of use or not, payments will end because it is impossible to consume something two or three times. Nobody should be asked to pay for the consumed thing two or three times, not any more than the milk consumer has to pay twice for the milk he buys from the farmer. Only a financial system as preposterous and as dishonest as ours would exact payment two, three times from the population for its acqueducts, its schools, its bridges, its roads, etc.

What would be the results of such a policy? Governments would stop getting the citizens into debt. There would be ne more debts incurred by the country, the provinces, the municipalities and the school boards while the real needs would be met without the government and the citizens having to wonder whether they can affort them, which taxes are to be imposed, whether they should agree to such sacrifices.

They would no longer have to ask themselves such questions, save this one: Is such production called for? Does it meet some needs? With our material means, can we afford to achieve it?

But with what resources would the government's public services be paid for?

Some public services, such as the post office, can very well be paid for by the users, as well as the railways and the expressways.

Others could be paid for by the public at large. I am referring to ordinary roads, national security and administrative services. All citizens benefit from such services as they ensure order and good public management.

However, some services benefit only a certain group of citizens, such as water and sewer systems, sidewalks. In such cases, the cities and municipalities that avail themselves of such services should have the use and depreciation of same paid for by their own citizens.

In brief, it can be said that it is the responsibility of those who benefit from such services to carry the charges not twice or three times, but once.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to continue my explanation on the financing of public investments by means of interest-free credit made available by the Bank of Canada and to quote statements by Sir Arthur Bryant reproduced in an article entitled An Alternative to Socialism, that appeared in The Illustrated London News on May 31, 1969.

This text is self-explanatory. And I quote:

[English]

What, I believe, is wanted is a total and categorical differentiation between the private and public sectors of the economy. To the former should be restored what it enjoyed before the first application of Socialism at the turn of the century—its ancient monopoly of earning the national income free from government interference in industry and business. Though this would enable the laws of supply and demand to operate once more, with the beneficial result of enabling the efficient to undercut and out produce the inefficient to the all round advantage of the consumer who would benefit by better service and reduced prices, it would not mean the abdication of the state's authority in those matters where state action and monopoly is requisite and beneficial to the community as a whole. Far from advocating a return to the anarchy of nineteenth century untrammeled laissez-faire I would give the state, in its own allocated sphere, far greater power to serve the public good than it at present possesses. In other words, I would render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, while rendering unto the individual economic man the things that are the individual's.

To certain statutory public services I would apply the same principle that governs the administration of the fighting services. The goal set them by Parliament would not be to make them pay in terms of money and take the lead, as at present, in the inflationary spiral by forcing up costs and wages, but to provide essential public services to the community at the lowest possible cost or even free. Instead of such essential public services as postal communications, rail transport, electricity, gas, and water being sold to the public and the private sector of industry and commerce at ever rising prices, they should be provided either free or at a steadily diminishing cost with the deliberate intention of making it easier for private industry and business to operate cheaply and efficiently and of reversing the inflationary spiral both for commerce and the private consumer.

Such public services are at present financed by extracting the cost from the public in the shape of ever-rising taxation—a method of public finance which we are beginning to see is a hundred per cent inflationary in its effect, for every increase of taxation is followed by a comparable or even greater rise in wages and prices, with all the additional attendant costs of revenue-collection, administration, and strikes. Instead, I suggest the wage and other costs of public service would be met by the creation of debt-free money by the Bank of England, the finance available for such increase being based, broadly, on the annual rate of growth or wealth increase earned by the nation's private sector. Heretical and even outrageous as this suggestion must seem to any orthodox financial mind, it would, in fact, be no more inflationary than the present system and probably, because of the immense increase in productive activity stimulated by the release of industry and commerce from the restraining and penalizing hand of the civil servant and tax-collector, far less so in relation to the nation's real wealth and earned income.

The corollary to this would be that those who serve the state to provide essential services to the public would do so, though on a free contractual basis, under the same kind of conditions as soldiers or sailors. They would enjoy special status and privileges, ample pay and pensions, but they would not be permitted, as at present, to hold the public to ransom. Nor would the owners of land, whose ultimate freehold would be vested, as before the seventeenth century, in the Crown. For though those who occupied land, both agricultural and urban, would have security of tenure and be free to develop and improve it, they would not be free to make a financial profit by committing waste or trespassing on its permanent value, beauty, and general use to the nation whose continuing and inalienable property it was. The whole basis of such a revolutionary economy would be the creation and preservation of real wealth, both national and private, as opposed to sterile speculation in money values which, though enriching certain individuals, may impoverish the nation.

Given the immense inertia of accepted habits of thought and the even greater power of vested interests, such a revolutionary but, as I believe, basically conservative policy—for it would conserve the national character and values—is obviously the merest pipe dream. Yet, put into effect, it could give new life and hope, not only to the British people, but to the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the remarks I have just quoted entirely apply to the Canadian economy. Indeed, not only the Créditistes in this House, but progressive people wherever in the world the current economic system is not serving its purpose, advocate reforms like the ones we have had in this House in the past few years, as well as financial solutions to the present economic system in order to cope with our problems, which cannot be solved in the financial melting-pot which we have experienced in the past and are still experiencing.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to use the 12 minutes or so which are left to say a few words about the motion proposed by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte).

According to figures already quoted by other Créditistes speakers, the public debt reaches frightening heights in Canada, and the amount keeps increasing as the federal government, provinces and municipalities of Canada run into more and more debt.

In a paper tabled in the House of Commons by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) on May 4, 1970, statistics show that for the year 1966, the net debt of provinces was $3,260 million; for 1967, the net debt of municipalities amounted to $8,862 million; the debt of Crown corporations was $12,064 million, while that of Canada amounted, in 1968, to $17,336 million.

All in all—the statistics for 1968 and 1969 are not included in those figures—the public debt of Canada amounts to $11,552 billion, which represents a debt of more than $2,000 per capita.

And that is a debt which accrues as fast as the country expands, becomes richer with new products, new plants, new housing, new utilities.

In 1867, the debt of Canada was $75,728,642.

In 1913, before the World War I it was $314,301,625. After the war, it had jumped to $1,514,331,033; 25 years later, namely in 1945, the debt had gone up tenfold to reach $11,298,362,018. In 1960, it was $12,089,194,003, and in 1968, it finally hit $16,759,725,147.

Let us also note that the provinces, the municipalities and school boards are also getting into debt deeper and deeper.

How can that be, when there is more wealth, a greater abundance of goods, a larger number of plants, an increase in population, and when industrialization allows greater and cheaper production?

The answer is simple: it lies in the financial system itself.

The industry that mass produces furniture does not also manufacture the money to buy it; the banks manufacture the money.

The farmer who breeds stock to sell them to the slaughterhouses does not produce the money to buy the meat in food-markets; the farmer who grows potatoes does not also grow money in his field. Money is produced by another "plant", another body. It does not grow in fields or on trees, as one member said a while ago: it springs from the pen of the banker.

However, money is only created provided it yields to the banker who creates it as a loan, a higher amount that the one he lent. This is known as interest. But the banker never advances with his loan the interests accruing therefrom, the refund of which is the condition of the loan.

Consequently, the higher the production, the greater is the volume of manufactured products, the more abundant are the crops, the more fertile is the soil, the more productive are the workers, the more the automatic and electronic equipment is operating quickly to create more goods, the more the government builds roads, bridges, public buildings, schools, the greater are the financial needs to buy that production, the more the bankers are lending money for the disposal of that production, the higher are the interests to be paid and the total debt.

Is it not possible to completely repay those debts? It might be possible in some isolated cases, but on the whole, it is impossible; it is merely a pure mathematical reasoning.

It is impossible to pay off public debts completely under the present financial system, even with all money now available, for the simple reason that the debtor must always pay back more than he borrowed, and this, because of the interest charged on the loan.

It may happen that the total debts decrease over a certain period if, for instance, bankruptcies cancel debts. But then, factories close down, farms are abandoned, debtors are disowned, there is unemployment and poverty. Debts are only written off at that cost.

But what does happen in the case of governments? Some of them manage sometimes to decrease the public debt. They do this first by taking in taxes more money than they distribute in services or benefits. They may do so still by alienating their resources, by selling them to foreigners, or to industries in this country.

In the first case, it is a question of reimbursing the public debt, by ensuring a favourable trade balance through a larger volume of exports than what we now have. There again, that is a local solution that cannot be applied globally, because all countries cannot at one and the same time have a favourable balance of trade.

As for the sale of natural resources to local industries, so that they may be disposed of on the local or domestic markets, it may enable to pay off a national debt, but the purchase of national resources, or the payment of royalties by industrialists, would compel the latter to include such payments in the price of the finished products sold to the consumers. The latter are the ones who must pay the higher prices. Their taxes are not as high, but they have to pay higher prices.

But then, will it be alleged, how would a Creditiste government curb the increase of the national debt and even reimburse the existing one?

Let us suppose that the government wants to build a bridge across the St. Lawrence between Sorel and Berthierville. The engineers estimate the construction costs at $10 million. The contractor does or does not have the money to build that bridge. So, he borrows the money from the bank and pays interests. He feels that the $10 million contract will bring in enough profits to pay that interest easily.

Once construction is completed, the government takes over the bridge built by the contractor and gives the latter a cheque. But where will the government get the money to pay for the bridge? He will get it from the country's actual credit, which was increased through a $10 million asset. Therefore, if the country has grown richer physically through the acquisition of a $10 million bridge, there is an increase of $10 million in the country's actual credit. And, on the other hand, financial credit should reflect actual credit. Therefore there is no debt in the sense we usually understand the word.

Finance should be a reflection of reality. Physical reality was increased by a bridge worth $10 million; the financial credit should increase by $10 million to reflect such an asset. Therefore there is no debt as far as the people are concerned.

One of the members who spoke earlier explained how the repayment of the credit advance would be made in accordance with the depreciation of the bridge, without the interest being repaid. The bridge wears away every year and is being depreciated. If the depreciation is based on a 20-year period, the citizens will have to repay under one form or another the amount of $500,000 a year because we are talking about consumption. If the bridge depreciates 5 per cent a year, actual credit is reduced by 5 per cent. Since finance should reflect the physical reality, financial credit should be reduced by 5 per cent each year. This is the financial balance advocated by the Social Credit party.

But how would we go about paying back the present public debt? First of all, the Créditistes do not want to repudiate debts honestly contracted by earlier governments. However, they make a distinction between the debt the government owes those who saved and lent their money to the government through bonds, and the debt the government has vis-à-vis the banks who have simply created money by a stroke of the pen in order to pay for their bonds.

So, a Créditiste government would ask the bearers of bonds to assert their rights. If a holder has in fact paid for his bond he would continue to receive interest right up to its due date; if a holder has acquired a bond by a stroke of the pen, another stroke of the pen would immediately cancel that debt. Since the banks hold at least 20 per cent of public debts these would be immediately reduced in that proportion, as would the interest to be paid.

As to bonds held by true savers they would be redeemed upon maturity. A person holding a bond of $1,000—
