Mr. Speaker, I should also like to congratulate my neighbour and colleague from Trois-Rivières (Mr. Lajoie) for the superb fashion in which he discharged his heavy responsibility, that of seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

His first contribution to this House proved just how fond he is of our magnificent country. Through his eloquence, he managed to have us share in the pride which stirs him in his pursuit of the Canadian adventure. He and his charming wife, who have a large family set an example for all Canadians. I too take this opportunity to pay tribute to him, to express my admiration for him and to assure him of my support and co-operation. To the voters of the riding of Trois-Rivières, I extend my congratulations for their shrewdness in electing a man of his stamp.

Mr. Speaker, those two men enhance the value of our institution, and reassure all Canadians about the worthiness of the majority of the men it includes.

• (1740)

Mr. Speaker, as a government member I am pleased when I consider the various bills which were enacted during the last session. I am more especially referring to the steps taken to assure increased security to our old people. We have passed in favour of our Canadian pensioners the highest old age benefits in the world and if there is a generation which is worthy of our encouragement, it is indeed the precedent one. Acknowledging their needs is only a step toward greater balance in the redistribution of our national resources.

This pursuit of equity and justice can also be noted in the new legislation voted in favour of veterans. Having served in the armed forces during four years, I am quite pleased that those of my comrades who have shown courage and energy and offered their life to defend their country may enjoy the highest pension in the world. They were the best. The Canadian people surely appreciate the rightful token of gratefulness.

These various pieces of social legislation, Mr. Speaker, are the mark of a government whose total efforts make possible fair distribution of the country's resources to everyone.

In the economic field, we have seen the acumen, the common sense and the prudence the government displayed, enabling us to weather the period during which our neighbours were imposing a surcharge on their imports, of course for the purpose of protecting their industry. What country in the world was in such a critical position as ours, as a result of our proximity and of a certain degree of economic dependency. The outcome of the negotiations which followed these measures, skillfully conducted by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), will restore to Canadian industry a competitive position on the vast American market and make a positive contribution to sustaining the economic revival which could already be felt in the spring of 1971.

During the past 12 months, Mr. Speaker, in spite of that setback, we achieved new records in development and the rate of growth of our gross national product exceeded that of all industrialized countries. Other equally meaningful results were obtained as a result of the confidence the government placed in Canadians. Thus the Local Initiatives and Opportunities for Youth programs are instances of new, bold ventures of which we can be proud.

The new parks to be developed to the north of the 60th parallel and which will soon acquire an enviable renown will bring to 28 the total number of our national parks. These parks are not meant only for the inhabitants of the surrounding areas. They are national lands the government of Canada is reserving for the whole population and future generations. Under the act, they are dedicated to the people of Canada for their benefit, their education and their enjoyment. Recognizing the increasing importance of maintaining contact with nature and indeed drawing closer to it, the people of my constituency are viewing with great interest and patience the efforts being made to turn a part of the country into a national park.

Thanks also to such outstanding talents, Canadians are in the forefront in the field of satellite communications whereby every citizen will be integrated into the great Canadian family.

As we mention the judgment, the energy and the wisdom of the Canadian people, we may notice that those are the qualities of the Prime Minister who was able to carry out the projects that are useful to us and who continually takes up new challenges.

Mr. Speaker, we are now in a transition stage which will eventually open onto a new world, a world that will have been created by our own hands and our own will.

We will have to maintain the tradition and bring it into harmony with the vanguard performances that will allow us to go forward without interruption. And it is also thanks to the inventive and industrious spirit of Canadians that we shall succeed in creating a country in which all citizens without exception will be happy to live. By the same token, we shall be able to help in a more tangible way the less developed countries.

It is by striving to provide equal opportunities to every citizen that we shall succeed in building a hospitable country. We can only endorse the conviction of the Prime Minister that there is room in Canada for any person and any region. This spirit of tolerance should be the essential feature of the Canadian people. The twentieth century will be ours only if our economic success and our social measures are achieved with an openness of mind which would once and for all enable every citizen to be accepted and to participate and not merely to express their wish for participation.

It is in that context that the French language units, both in the Armed Forces and in the Public Service, appear as a project that could give concrete form to what was only a pious wish. With those French language units, Mr. Speaker, French will become a working language in the Public Service and the Armed Forces. This original measure shows that our government is able to take up challenges in an original manner. Thanks to this project, French-speaking civil servants will better be able to show their professional qualifications in carrying out their duties and will thus increase their chances of promotion within the Canadian Public Service.

Our ancestors were faced with many challenges. They succeeded in finding original solutions in each case. We must face the challenges of today in the same spirit. So we shall have to devise new methods to protect the quality of the environment. The situation is critical in many cases. We must find original methods to protect our rivers and our lakes threatened by pollution, and others, so as to clean the water which already is thoroughly polluted. Also, we shall have to devise measures to save certain species of our wildlife which are threatened with extinction. Only through dynamic action shall we be able to meet these challenges. In this country which we are building for ourselves and for the future generations, the time is for action and not nostalgia.

The most important challenge lies indeed in the field of job creation. We are now facing new circumstances which no one could have foreseen. Technology has totally disrupted our approach to work. Not only must we consider developing new work methods, but it is our very concept of work which we shall have to alter. We must adjust without delay. Those who will have neither the strength nor the courage to do so will be left logging behind their own times. But our spirit of innovation will enable us to develop a society in which life will be well worth living. The initiative, creativeness and ability of our workers and of those who are seeking employment must be put to better use if we are to reach this goal. The present situation is but another challenge to our will to fight.

To show as much wisdom as justice sometimes represents a difficult dilemma. Still in that field, we must make suggestions, provide all the tools needed and intervene judiciously. Only thus shall we bring about ingenious and fruitful initiatives.

Gloomy thoughts and set ideas are out. People who are always afraid to take initiatives and who lack imagination are not with it. Canadians want to go ahead; the government will give them the opportunity to do so.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) and in particular to his high praise of the efforts of the mover and the seconder of the motion in connection with the Speech from the Throne. I was interested, in particular, in his use of the phrase, with reference to the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), that his was a great, statesmanlike utterance.

Those of us who have become familiar with the tactics and the oratorical style of the hon. member for Bruce would not quite describe his talents in the same terms as the hon. member for Labelle with respect to statesmanlike utterances. I would say that the hon. member delivered a great, partisan, tub-thumping speech, and I suppose that is what we should expect in the Parliament of Canada. It did suggest what I feel is the main defect of the Speech from the Throne; it is more noteworthy for its style rather than its substance.

We had all expected that the Speech, as is usual with these state of the nation presentations, would be full of substance, full of firm plans and policies to deal with the fundamental economic issues facing us. The more I examine the Speech, the more I conclude that it is better examined for its style than for its substance. It is an empty Speech from the Throne and, as a result, most of the speeches presented by spokesmen for the government have lacked the substance that should prevail in a debate of this kind.

The present administration which has been in office since 1968—

An hon. Member: Too long!

Mr. Dinsdale: —had little to offer the people of Canada when it came to power but the slogan "the just society". It had no policies for the latter part of the sixties but rode in on the economic and financial momentum generated in the early part of the decade. As we move into the decade of the seventies and are faced with mounting economic problems reflecting the growing complexity of national and international relations, and so on, it is disappointing to find a Speech from the Throne which has no policies for this important decade.

In an election year it would seem to me that the government would have something to offer more than style to the people of Canada. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) moves about the hustings, testing the atmosphere and mood of the nation, I notice that he does not quite know whether to go for broke with elaborate promises or attempt to repeat the tour de force of 1968 when he was able to get by without promising anything, creating the impression that his was a new style, a new era, the dawn of the age of Aquarius.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment placed before Parliament by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is right on target and I trust it will have support from all members of the House. The amendment would add the following words to the motion:

but we find intolerable the utter failure of this government to bring forward a decisive policy to achieve full employment and the continuing uncertainty and hesitancy in the economy because of the chronic indecisiveness of this government.

I am sure that when we use the phrase "we find intolerable," we are speaking for the people of Canada. But I shall deal with that later in my remarks.

It is true that economic issues are the mainspring of any government policy. As the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) said in his speech this afternoon, the B and B issues are fundamental—the "bread and butter" issues. As I move around the Canadian body politic, I realize this is where the buck is lying at the present time. There are the issues of great concern to the majority of the people of Canada.

When we say in the motion that the government is indecisive and lacks a sense of leadership, it is because the record of the past four years has indicated that the government's approach to economic problems is an ad hoc, unplanned approach. This ad hoc, unplanned approach reflects the personality of the Prime Minister who, after all, is the leader of this House and the leader of the government.

His whole life style and his excursion into politics has been that of an individual uncertain of his personal commitment in terms of party, in terms of policy and in terms of program as he now exercises the supreme responsibility of leader of this nation. He came to this House in 1965, recently converted from the New Democratic Party. He is not the only one in the present Cabinet to have that pedigree. There should be a fundamental difference between the philosophy of the NDP and that of the Liberal party which he presently supports. If there is not, I am sure that explains why there is lack of dynamic and sure-footed leadership at this time.

Mr. Muir: The NDP were glad to get rid of him.

Mr. Dinsdale: Some of the main initiatives of the present government, Mr. Speaker, have reflected this unplanned, ad hoc approach to the major issues before us. We are a northern nation beset every year by winter unemployment. This applies in western Canada, particularly the prairie west, perhaps more than in the other areas because of the severity of winter conditions there.

I well remember the Prime Minister indicating that he was no longer going to use the excellent winter works program that had been developed by the Conservative administration which occupied the treasury benches between 1957 and 1963 because there was not going to be any fundamental problem of unemployment. So the "Do it now, why wait for spring?" program was set aside. In its place, for the last two years, because of the chronic problem of unemployment we have had the ad hoc Local Initiatives Program, the Opportunites for Youth program, and so forth, instead of deliberate planning to meet a severe problem.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resume at 8 p.m.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, when the House recessed at six o'clock I was pointing out to hon. members that the basic criticism we direct at the present government led by the Prime Minister is that it has failed to deal realistically with economic and financial matters. Instead of being presented with a co-ordinated, national economic policy in which the priorities would have been set by the people and the people's representatives, we have been led through an incomprehensible maze plotted by this super group surrounding the Prime Minister's office and involved in all the activities of the government generally. The result is, Mr. Speaker, that the private sector of the economy has been stifled because of the smothering effect of the super group.

I recall the words of a distinguished Senator who put on record in the other place precisely what has happened. I read from a report in the Globe and Mail written under the heading, "Liberal Senator attacks policies of government":

> Senator Daniel Lang, ... Toronto lawyer and business executive, charged that the Trudeau government is alienating businessmen by its tax legislation, its proposed changes in competition and labour laws and its promotion of friendship with the Soviet Union.
> He argued that the future of Canadian confederation itself depends on good relations between business and government and called for a rapid return to that condition of mutual respect—'
> Senator Lang, former treasurer and campaign chairman for the Liberal party in Ontario, was speaking in a Senate debate on the Canadian economy.
> He raised issues that have been the subject of growing complaints by businessmen lately.
> He said private business was uncertain and fearful of administrative powers given to the public service.
> I am afraid that many in the private sector regard this bureaucracy as aloof, intransigent, doctrinaire and oftimes hostile,' he said.

It is obvious that some hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches have become concerned by the present economic course of the administration. I was interested in a speech that crossed my desk not long ago. It was delivered to the Canadian Club in the Hotel Vancouver on Friday February 4, by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis), who is the hon. member for Capilano, if I may refer to him by naming his constituency. The title of the speech was, "Canada's economic Oscar".

According to the speech, which continued for 21 pages, the Minister of the Environment was obviously more concerned about the political environment than about the physical environment, because he was at great pains to point out that all was for the best in the best of all possible worlds. I read from page 18 of that speech the following remarks:

> I know you're worried about our new Competition Act. But this legislation is being withdrawn. It's being rewritten. The emphasis is being put, increasingly, on competition. I'm sure that you agree, at least in principle, that competition is a good thing. More competition rather than less will be a good thing for Canada just as it has been a good thing elsewhere—
> Confidence and competition; the two go hand in hand. I personally believe in an open economy. I believe, wholeheartedly, in individual initiative. I believe in private enterprise. I believe, also, that Canadians can be enterprising.

I agree that Canadians can be enterprising if they are given a chance and not smothered under the overwhelming influence of the present bureaucratic structure of government particularly in the office of the Prime Minister. I have a recent comment on the attitude of business toward government policy as reported in the Globe and Mail "Report on business" of February 23. Hon. members can read this report for themselves. The article is headlined, "Economic Council predicts slowdown in capital spending", and I quote:

> The veil of gloom that permeated business circles last October, and has only recently been partly lifted, has yielded the most pessimistic forecast of capital spending plans ever made by the Economic Council of Canada.

The president of DuPont found fault with industrial and tariff policies. I quote the following excerpt of his words:

> Current government policy is for an open economy and industry that is world-competitive. But this is not consistent with a proposed new Competition Act that would fragment industry, with regional-development policies that have philosophical merit but are economically disastrous, with a technical innovation system that is different from and more restrictive than those of other areas.

The former minister of consumer and corporate affairs is a neighbour of the hon. member for Capilano, the Minister of the Environment. I am sure that the transition in ministerial responsibility is further proof of the growing disease that exists among the business community and the Canadian body politic. It is not only in big business; it also affects small business, farmers and wage earners. We were recently in our constituencies for a particularly long recess. If hon. members will speak the truth on the matter, I am sure they will admit they were beset and besieged by farmers, businessmen and indeed all Canadians with regard to the uncertainties arising from the impact of the so-called tax reform measure that was forced through the House under closure just before the Christmas recess.

Last week a member of the House, a former deputy prime minister, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), summed it up in these words, "The government's economic policies are stupid and even subversive." That sums up the situation as seen by someone who obviously had inside information as a key member of the Trudeau administration.

I want to speak briefly on a matter that I know something about personally, and refer to comments made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) in his speech in the House on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. He gave forth, under the title "The quality of Canadian life":

> We want to safeguard those diversities, to give them full play in the shaping of a proud Canadianism which reflects all the elements of our society.

The hon. gentleman was reading from a printed text that was distributed to the press and members of the House concerning in general terms the quality of Canadian life. He was not necessarily dealing with economic matters. I want to give the hon. gentleman credit; since he assumed his portfolio he has grown in stature in office. From the quotation I have just read to hon. members, obviously he has gained wide understanding of the new dimensions in Canadian confederation.

I shall not go into detail on some of the economic matters he dealt with in connection with northern affairs, because we welcome him to the family circle of those who in the past decade or more have regarded the great undeveloped part of northern Canada in the Yukon and Northwest Territories as the last great frontier of Canadian development. News of oil discoveries, news of a boom in mineral development and national parks in the north were subjects being discussed and planned when the vision of northern development was regarded with scepticism by members on the opposite side of the House. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has now become the chief exponent of this enthusiasm.

I want to link the quotation with regard to the proud Canadianism which reflects all elements of society to another major responsibility of the hon. gentleman; that is, developing policies and programs for our native Canadians. The real resources of Canada are human resources. The area of development of human resources, particularly our native population in the territories as well as in other parts of Canada, is where the government has been sadly negligent. If we are to achieve a quality of Canadian life adequate for our first Canadians, be they Indians, Eskimos or Metis, we must recognize the basic rights of all elements of Canadian society. In particular, we must recognize land claims and aboriginal rights which thus far have been short-circuited by this administration.

When the Prime Minister was specifically confronted with these matters he told these people, who are an important element of the great Canadian mosaic, to forget their traditions and become good Canadians. I suppose the proper response to that statement by the Prime Minister would be, "Physician, heal thyself."

It is true that human resources is the main ingredient in the development of this nation. In the few moments that remain at my disposal I wish to point out that this is another area of serious neglect on the part of the administration, particularly as it applies to western Canada. It has been said that mankind is one, the human family is one, but cultures are many. There is a new dimension of Canadianism that has emerged outside of upper and lower Canada, that has not yet been fully grasped by this administration. There is no dominant cultural group in western Canada. The compact theory of Confederation does not necessarily apply there, nor is it readily accepted. Rather, we are faced with a mosaic which is as colourful as the Canadian maple leaf.

Western Canada is not willing to become lumped material to be shaped in the image of the Prime Minister of Canada. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) used a word which is loaded with emotion—several other hon. members have mentioned it—in describing the Premier of a western province as a bigot, he was not contributing much to the dialogue respecting national unity. The premier of British Columbia was pointing out that if bilingual qualifications were to become a major requirement among those seeking job opportunities in the capital of the nation, then people from western Canada would clearly be discriminated against. This point was raised repeatedly by spokesmen from western Canada during the debate on the official languages issue.

The situation, has of course, been aggravated by other measures taken by the government such as the changing of names which are an integral part of the heritage of western Canada. It is easy for the Prime Minister to make a joke about changing the historical and traditional description of what used to be the Northwest Mounted Police, and later became the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to the simple word "police", but it is not being accepted in western Canada. I was in the west last week and I am aware of the strong feeling on this issue in all the western provinces. I am sure the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) is aware of it too.

The time has come, it seems, for two provinces in Canada, or one province for that matter, to refrain from imposing its image on the rest of Canada. A multicultural society is emerging which expresses the real spirit of Canadianism in this second half of the twentieth century. The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) will be in Vancouver within the next couple of weeks. Obviously, he recognizes this problem because he will be participating in an important conference promoted by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews concerning the implications of the policy of multiculturalism in this country. I say again that the situation is not being resolved when the Queen's first minister describes the Premier of one of the western provinces, in the course of a public statement, as a bigot. In other words, if you do not agree with the Prime Minister you are a bigot. It is an expletive which will not be accepted in the west.

There are two further matters I should like to bring to the attention of the House, if I have time. They concern government efficiency. If you have no policies which are going anywhere in terms of economic development, I suppose it is impossible for there to be administrative efficiency. We are faced with a breakdown of administrative efficiency at the senior level of government. I refer, of course, to the unemployment insurance fiasco which has been causing severe headaches to all members of the House of Commons, the immigration situation, the strikes which have been dislocating the public service in the past few weeks, and particularly the strike which has been tying up Canada's air service to such a degree that it is bound to have a profound adverse effect on the economic well-being of the nation.

I refer also to discontent which has been rampant among the staff of the Post Office. As critic for the official opposition in this field, I have spent much of my time receiving and replying to complaints in this area. People are seeking improvement in the quality of the basic service which is supposed to be provided by the Post Office Department, and I do not think that the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) or the government as a whole pay the slightest attention to these complaints. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read one or two of these complaints into the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): That could be done by unanimous consent; otherwise it could not, because the hon. member's time has expired. Does the House agree to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: This letter was addressed to the Prime Minister himself, by a Mr. Evans in Ashburn, Ontario:

Have you heard that your mail service stinks? That is a good old-fashioned work, like fuddle-duddle. And God help us if your government intrudes into any other functions or enterprises until it masters the mail service.

That is one letter which has come to my attention. Here is one from the United States. Perhaps this is why there is lack of communication between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): May I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Would the hon. member allow the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) to ask a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: When I have concluded my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I rise on a point of order that relates to what the hon. member was saying. I ask the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) if he can quote a letter received from his constituency instead of quoting letters from the United States and Ontario.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I want to be fair to the hon. member, but he should not take advantage of a point of order for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Dinsdale: To reply briefly, I have been overwhelmed by complaints from my constituency concerning the closing of rural post offices, as the hon. member knows. But in this debate I am trying not to be parochial; I am trying to show that the problem is one of national, even international significance. The following letter was written by a lady doctor in Denver, Colorado. Strong language is used, which I shall not put on the record. She writes:

Since October 21, 1971, no communication written by me has ever been received in St. Catharines. In addition to this, since that date, none of the communications from St. Catharines has been received by me . . . Would you please send someone to find where all of those sacks of mail have been for all of these months and could you please get them delivered? I would be eternally grateful.

That letter, too, was directed to the Prime Minister, among others. I could read many more, similar complaints but my time has expired. I shall conclude by saying that in 1963 the Prime Minister wrote of the Liberal government of that day:

There is not one man in this party to whom principles mean more than power.

The same men, the men of whom he wrote so bitterly, sit beside him on the government front benches today. Nothing has changed except the title of the jobs they hold, and their grim determination to hang on to office at any cost is as evident today as it was ten years ago.

• (2030)

I would urge hon. gentlemen opposite, if they really want to understand what is going on in Canada, to get out and listen to the people. The old slogan, "Power, patronage and perpetuity", which has long been a slogan adhered to by successive Liberal governments, will not be realized following the next election.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for St. Boniface wishes to ask the hon. member for Brandon-Souris a question.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the hon. member for Brandon-Souris whether the policy of his party, the loyal opposition, regarding recognition of all land claims, aboriginal rights and obligations to the Indians, is as he mentioned a while ago in his speech.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer the hon. gentleman's question. If he would look at the records at the time the previous Conservative government was in office—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I asked whether it was present policy.

Mr. Dinsdale: Let me answer the question—there was an item of government business on the order paper to set up a land claims commission at that time. Then in 1963 the government changed, and no action has been taken by two successive Liberal governments since they assumed office.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join my colleagues in this House in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne for a job well done.

I am rising today to speak about the government's plans to improve the fabric of Canadian social justice. I hope to back up these plans by establishing the bona fides of the government in this area over the past few months, and certainly during its term of office. In doing so, I bear in mind what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) stated in his address to the House last week. He said that statistics are no substitute for the individual citizen's well-being. We can talk all we like about participatory democracy, we can mention the millions of dollars that we have spent or intend to spend on items like old age security, family income security, medicare, hospital insurance, rehabilitative welfare services and the like, but in the end a satisfactory participation level depends upon the individual.

When we talk about the individual in the context of social justice, we come down to the individual's alienation from the society in which he lives and from his fellow Canadians, all of whom contribute to the cause of this feeling of alienation. We are familiar with many of these causes: the bigness of our institutions—the "bigness" syndrome of industrially-developed countries like Canada. This tends to make the individual feel small, to make him feel that his role is sometimes meaningless and lost.

All this has resulted from rapid technological change and great innovations in the area of automation and cybernation. This alienation is also contributed to by the rising expectations which our consumer-oriented society all too often is geared to create but unable to fulfil. Once these rising expectations are created, individuals feel alienated by poverty, by feeling uncertain in an era of rapid social change. They are fearful because the old values on which they base their pattern of life and look to for certain security for the future no longer seem to be there.

Therefore, when we talk about alienation of the individual and the participation level of the individual in society, we must concern ourselves with policies designed to cope with the situation. The three components of this policy seem to me, depending of course on the nature and quality of the service to the individual, to break down, firstly, to that of economic security, secondly, access to services and, thirdly, the individual's involvement in decision-making.

First let me talk about the individual's economic security as a way of combating his alienation from society and his fellow man. By "economic security" we are really talking about finding jobs for the individual. To a large extent this is what economic security means to him.

What has the government done to establish its bona fides in regard to future plans? May I talk about those who are already employed—the employables, if you like. I am talking not only of those who are employed but of those who are employable and are waiting to get into the labour force. What are some of the government's policies for them? Under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce we have the PAIT program which is designed to encourage industry to make breakthroughs in areas of new technology: we award them grants to carry on and develop that new technology. That is one example. Export development grants is another program of the government. Accelerated rates of depreciation is another. Setting up boards, such as the textile review board, to encourage industry in their particular area and to keep that sector of our industry alive is yet another policy of the government.

The second area of stimulation of the private sector in terms of job creation is the attention we have paid to slow-growth areas through our regional development programs. Thirdly in the area of providing stimulation to the private sector to provide jobs, I think we should mention our manpower training program and our encouragement to industry to provide training within industry itself through direct government grants. In this connection I refer also to direct grants under the Local Initiatives Program and the winter employment municipal loans fund. It seems to me that all these programs are designed to encourage the private sector to provide jobs.

There is also the Opportunities for Youth program. In terms of our youth, this program is designed to encourage the private sector to provide jobs for youth. These are some of the many policies that have been implemented by this government over recent months and years to provide a degree of economic security for Canadians.

As I mentioned at the beginning, these policies were designed for those Canadians who are employable. Within that category, of course, there are Canadians who are employable but who have special problems which for one reason or another are inhibitors in terms of their finding ready access to the labour market. There are three areas here about which I wish to speak. Firstly, there are the physically handicapped. What have we done for these people? We have the vocational rehabilitation program, and we have very recently increased veterans disability pensions.

Secondly, we have the socially and emotionally handicapped, those who unfortunately have a minimum of education, who are often below manpower retraining standards and have suffered from long-term unemployment. What are some of our policies to help these people? We have the work activity projects under the Canada Assistance Plan which are covered by a cost-sharing arrangement with the provinces. Lately we have very much encouraged the provinces to take greater advantage of this provision under the Canada Assistance Plan and to submit work activity projects that carry with them personal counselling and professional help to the long-term unemployed in order to help them acquire work habits which would enable them to re-enter the labour market.

Another group of employables who have special problems is mothers who are alone, or spouses without partners who have children they must support and who are considered employable. It would enrich their lives as well as their children's lives if they could enter the labour market. What have we done in this area? Under the Canada Assistance Plan we provide financial assistance, under a cost-sharing arrangement with the provinces, to provide day-care centres. In the fiscal year 1971-72 the federal government spent approximately $4 million for this purpose which, counting the provincial share, represents over $8 million in the last fiscal year to commence, in combination with the private sector, a network of day-care centres to allow mothers who are alone to go into the labour market to pick up either full-time or part-time work.

Also, in discussing the provision of economic security for individuals we must also take into account those people in our work force who are unemployable, who are permanently out of the work force and who could not re-enter it even if they wanted to do so. What have we done for this group of people? Of course, a very large segment of the Canadian population which is permanently out of the work force is our senior citizens, many of whom, because of infirmity or advanced age, could not work even if they were desirous of doing so and even if the government wished them to do so.

Recently we raised the level of the guaranteed income supplement. No matter what criticism it may be subject to, the government has raised the basic income floor for over one million Canadians who now obtain the guaranteed income supplement either in whole or in part to levels which are now nearly approaching the level of adequacy and which are far more generous than anything we have known before.

I spoke about policies designed to help senior citizens who are permanently out of the work force. The next group of individuals with whom we must concern ourselves, who are permanently out of the work force, is the disabled. As indicated in the white paper on income security, the government has shown that this is a group of people we must next take into consideration. The white paper spoke about applying the same technique as is applied in the guaranteed income supplement to the disabled, so as to provide them with a basic guaranteed minimum income upon which they can rely. It can be subject to an income test and does not carry with it the humiliation of a means or a needs test.

We spoke about what we have done for the employables in terms of stimulating the private sector; we spoke about employables with special problems and about some of the programs we have devised to assist these people. We spoke about the unemployed who are permanently out of the work force. There is another group of Canadians who are suffering from low incomes, that is people who are in the work force but who are earning marginal incomes. What has the government done for them, and what does it plan to do to assist them?

In terms of the federal government's capacity to do so, and in terms of our jurisdiction under the constitution, we have provided increases in the minimum wage levels for all working in industries falling within federal jurisdiction, during the life of this Parliament, to the degree that those levels are well in advance of most of the minimum wage laws of the provinces. I do not say this with any degree of exultation, but I think all hon. members are aware of it.

What else have we done for many Canadians in the work force earning marginal incomes? Many of them are veterans for whom we have provided increases during the life of this Parliament under war veterans allowances. This does provide income supplementation for them. I would refer in this regard to the recent tax bill of the former minister of finance, which provided assistance to people earning marginal incomes whereby upward of one million persons were taken off the tax rolls entirely.

I might speak here about all the people who fall in this category and who have benefited from the greatly enriched benefit structure of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Of course, I should refer also to a policy we have discussed in this Parliament, one on which I have spoken, on behalf of the government, with the provinces. I refer to the Family Income Security Plan which I hope to bring before this House very soon. This will afford meaningful income supplementation to hundreds of thousands of families the heads of which are in the labour force and are working but are working at marginal incomes.

This plan provides for that inevitable deficiency which occurs in the private sector where private industry rewards a man on the basis of his ability and his value to that particular industry, but without any regard to his dependants. The Family Income Security Plan takes this increased dependency into account and provides income supplementation.

I have spoken of some of the policies already adopted and some we intend to adopt in terms of assistance to that group of individuals who are already in the work force but are earning too little in many cases. Now I would like to move on to the second major area which I identified in my opening remarks in terms of a basic policy designed to cope with the alienation of the individual and to enhance social justice in Canada, that is, access to services.

This area is very important indeed but is one about which we do not talk very much in Parliament. We all know that the health of the individual is basic to his person and to his family. In the area of personal health, we know that Canada, in relation to many of the countries in the free world, has one of the lowest ratios of doctors to population and one of the lowest ratios of hospital beds to population. At the same time, we know that in relative terms we have a well developed health delivery system. But we know there are deficiencies in terms of the distribution of these services, in terms of the distribution throughout Canada of our doctors, of our medical health and health personnel and especially in terms of lack of adequate distribution in low-income areas and in rural areas.

What has the government endeavoured to do in this area? We have suggested a new policy to the provinces, the new health cost-sharing arrangements. They are designed to keep costs to a reasonable level. This is essential if we are not to price these services beyond the public's ability to pay and perhaps risk total public disapproval of schemes such as medicare and hospitalization, which I think a majority of the members of this House endorse.

What else have these policies been designed to do? They have been designed to sponsor new health delivery systems in order to bring them closer to the public. I have talked about the new cost-sharing formula and in particular the Thrust fund provision that will give greater flexibility to the provinces to develop community health centres and services which will relieve the burden on active treatment facilities that are so costly, and in many cases are utilized by people who do not really need them. Among other things that the policies are designed to do is bring about improved redistribution of resources. Here I refer to the special incentives to doctors to move into rural areas and thus improve our distribution of health personnel.

The Thrust fund will also help provinces to undertake new schemes in this area. It will allow them to develop new paramedical personnel, which will relieve the burdensome task on many of our doctors who are now providing a service that, because of their high qualifications, in effect is a waste. Many doctors admit that all too many of their man-hours are spent on tasks which other trained personnel could perform just as adequately.

Of course, one of the basic fundamental philosophies in the whole health cost proposals is the great emphasis we are placing on preventive techniques, which will mean greater improvement in health services for Canadians. In recent years we have put too much emphasis on curative medicine as distinct from preventive medicine. The Thrust fund and the new health cost-sharing proposals will also encourage such programs as mass screening that will detect illnesses which have not yet come to the surface, thus allowing a quicker response to them and allowing us to save many lives that might otherwise be lost. Here I am talking about mass immunization programs and much greater emphasis on public health programs, including improvement of the diet of all Canadians.

In talking about access to services, I might also mention what we have also done in the health area but we often do not think of in terms of health programs, but which nevertheless forms part of them. I am talking about the program to enhance the physical fitness of Canadians. Here I would refer briefly to the creation of Sport Canada and Recreation Canada. Over the course of the last three years the financial resources put into these areas have been more than doubled.

Dealing with this subject, I refer to the agency specifically set up to increase participation in physical recreation which enjoys the co-operation of both government and industry and which can call on the private sector, especially the media, that is, television, newspapers and radio, to combine with us in packaging programs which can have a much greater impact upon Canadians. Here, in terms of past bona fides, I talk of our Cross-Canada Sports Demonstration, and our Sports Caravan which is now going around many parts of this country, bringing the message of physical fitness and sports involvement directly to the mass of the public and schoolchildren.

I also talk about government programs designed to increase local facilities through grants under DREE, and the winter employment municipal grants. I also refer to our department's facility survey conducted last summer—will be conducted again this coming summer—to help rural areas develop greater use of facilities already in existence. Of course, I also refer to the Opportunities for Youth program and the Local Initiatives Program which have assisted work in the recreational area, with people at the grass-roots level. I also refer to grants to groups such as Indian bodies to permit them to develop recreational and physical fitness programs.

Here, too, I talk about our sports administration centre which has brought together on a more adequate basis the administrative people in our sports bodies, thus assisting them in the technical area in terms of coaching so that they in turn can stimulate greater use of facilities in Canada and a greater degree of mass participation in sports. I also refer to our Canadian Games which now are almost a national event in Canada, in addition to the Canadian Olympics. Under both programs we give grants to municipalities to develop sports and recreational facilities for the long term.

I refer also the Canadian fitness awards scheme which we have introduced to all primary and secondary schools in Canada, which is designed to provide incentive to our young people to acquire awards in accordance with the standards set out in the scheme. I also refer to our scholarship program which is encouraging many of our young people to be an example to the rest of the Canadian public. These are some of the positive programs we are undertaking in this area on the health side.

But, Mr. Speaker, some negative influences have been at work in our community on the health side, of which hon. members are aware. Here I refer to the misuse of drugs by an all too alarming number of Canadians. In this area we have commissioned the Le Dain report. That commission has already brought in a preliminary report, and more recently the first instalment of its final report on treatment. I would point out that we had acted on many of the recommendations even before the final report on treatment came out. Here I refer in particular to our recent action which received the general approbation of hon. members, placing greater restrictive use on amphetamines and methadone.

Under our drug abuse program we have taken steps to get into the area of street-level analysis and into the area of research into illicit drugs. There are also the innovative service grants that we established during the last two years which give grants to local agencies to help people with drug problems as well as related problems connected with food, clothing and shelter, and diseases that all too often go with drug abuse, such as VD. We have funded drop-in centres and crisis centres to help people who are having so-called bad trips or are suffering very serious illness because of drug abuse.

I also refer to funds provided for public education programs designed to establish a basis of credibility so that we can motivate Canadians, especially young people who have not yet resorted to drugs, not to do so and to persuade those committing drug abuse to discontinue their habit.

Another area, in terms of access to services, is that of the impact of the law on the individual. In the Speech from the Throne we heard of the intention of the Minister of Justice to provide a legal aid, in combination with the provinces, to those who have been charged with criminal offences.

I think the House may be well aware of what we have done on the civil side, and particularly at the lower income level, through our national welfare grants. Here we have been prepared to fund at the local level organizations which are prepared to emphasize, first the curative side and then the preventive side in terms of legal services. On the curative side I refer, in terms of assistance, to people who have, for example, landlord and tenant problems or debtor and creditor problems. On the preventive side, with the aid of our grants people can receive counselling on their rights, especially in the consumer area in which many low-income people suffer discrimination. With respect to welfare appeal rights, our grants can assist them to better learn what their rights are.

I would refer to the advocative side where we would talk in terms of funding some groups to bring group action in pollution cases, urban redevelopment cases and tenants' rights organizations; this would allow them to better organize in order to present their point of view. There are techniques here, such as those the government has, which can be used to assist individuals to have access to services.

On the legislative side there is, of course, a role for government, Mr. Speaker, both before and after any confrontation with the law which may be necessary. First, I should like to deal with the preventative side where legislation is designed to assist the individual before any involvement with the courts and the adversary system. There are the government programs for consumer protection. One which I am sure stands out in our minds was brought into this House by the previous minister of consumer and corporate affairs and was passed. This was part X of the Bankruptcy Act, where a person in the low-income category, a debtor, can now have greater access to public trustees to advance a declaration of his bankruptcy in order to become devoid of his debts. Another is the Bills of Exchange Act. At one time, upon a third party assumption of a promissory note, the third party did not have to accept any of the obligations of the person with whom the debtor originally made the contract. This situation has been corrected.

Legislation has been implemented on the rehabilitation side. I refer to the Criminal Code amendments announced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) a few days ago. The highlights are conditional and absolute discharge, intermittent sentences and matters that the Solicitor General

(Mr. Goyer) and the Minister of Justice have talked about in terms of penal reform.

Having talked about the individual in terms of our health legislation and policies and in relation to our law, I should now like to speak about families and how we have assisted them in terms of access to services. One area is housing. I would point out that in 1971 we had the highest record in dwelling houses built in Canada, with a record number of homes for low-income families. In the Speech from the Throne the government has referred to fresh new concepts in neighbourhood improvement and new emphasis on low-cost housing.

I refer, as well, to our policies in the Department of National Health and Welfare relative to family planning where this information is made available to everybody. Too often only the higher income groups have had access to this information, but our program is designed to provide it to all regardless of income.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt, but the time of the hon. Minister has expired. If the minister wishes to continue, I must have the consent of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five minutes; agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCleave: He is not hurting us.

Mr. Munro: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members. I think I can finish in five minutes. I should like to mention some of the policies of the government which have general application in terms of access to services. There are the initiatives we have taken in regard to nutritional upgrading. I have written to many hon. members about the Nutrition Canada survey which is going on now and which will permit us to ascertain the diets of Canadians, their eating habits, so that we can design policies to improve or correct these. The findings of this survey will be available soon.

I have spoken of improved health services for our native peoples. In the last three years we have increased the budget to the point where the native people themselves are prepared to admit that the program has improved. I think it is safe to predict that the infant mortality rate amongst our native peoples will decrease. I have spoken also about the action taken to reduce the high cost of prescription drugs. We have enclosed with the old age pension cheques and family allowance cheques a list of the comparative prices of drugs. A quality inspection system has been established within the Food and Drug Directorate, and in the course of the next year and a half we will be able to send information to physicians showing them that on the basis of our tests they can depend, where it is so, on generic drugs and brand name drugs being of equal quality.

Many physicians have indicated that they are not prepared to prescribe a generic drug because they are not confident that its quality is equivalent to the brand name drug. We are prepared to increase funding in order to give them that assurance. This program will bring down the cost of drugs. I refer, also, to action taken in this area by the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs in terms of the Patent Act which has had the effect of bringing down the cost of drugs.

Mr. Speaker, I have talked about two main areas, the economic security proposals of the government and access to services. We have brought in meaningful prroposals designed to combat poverty and to increase the participation level of the individual and thus bring about a greater degree of social justice. The third area, one in which I cannot enlarge to any degree due to time constraint, is access to decision-making. I would point out the many programs we have designed such as the Opportunities for Youth program, innovative service grants in the drug abuse area and welfare grants to enable low-income people to organize and express their views. Then there are the minority group citizenship grants under the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), which allow people to organize and present their views and preserve their very distinct qualities as Canadians, and the multicultural grants recently announced by the Secretary of State. All these are designed to enhance the accessibility of the decision-making process to Canadians.

We have used as a government the participation role in the design of policies. This technique was used in the white paper on tax reform and I have used it in my department on income security programs where we have received input from people knowledgeable in that field. There is our recent action in terms of providing greater equality to women. We have received the royal commission report and many departments, including my own, are providing a greater role for women who are being appointed to more national boards and, within my department, to advisory boards where they have equality in designing social policies. There are also policies designed to involve our retired citizens. I refer of course, to the Canadian Executive Service Overseas program under the Department of External Affairs. Also under our welfare grants programs we are providing funds to enable senior citizens to come together in meaningful endeavours.

In conclusion, from the Speech from the Throne we learn that we can look forward to new policies in terms of access to services, such as new policies in housing, new policies in terms of more humane treatment of offenders and in the area of drugs. In terms of economic security we can expect policies in the family income security area and policies designed to provide compensation for victims of crime. There is a rich record of governmental accomplishment in terms of social justice in these three main areas. These are three main, necessary areas involving social justice for Canadians. Certainly, the proposals in the Speech from the Throne will enhance these policies and bring social justice, as a reality, closer to Canadians.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I was most interested to hear the minister's speech. There is no doubt that his department and other departments of government have brought forward many programs over the past four years. I was interested to hear him say that to a great extent one of our big problems today is that of human alienation. It would be funny, if it were not so tragic, to suggest that despite the hundreds of millions of dollars being spent today by this government, in my opinion people today are more isolated than ever before. They feel more alienated than ever before from a computer-oriented, de-personalized government. It makes little difference if you talk about new programs in terms of quantity: it is quality and closeness to the individual in society that counts, so far as I am concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, even though it is not the first speech I have made in the House, I should like to take this opportunity to tell hon. members something about my constituency. This will not be the usual, flowery description of the greatest little corner of Canada, for surely this is too serious an occasion for that; but it will be, rather, an analysis of many of the ill effects the present regime has had on that constituency.

One of the main reasons, Mr. Speaker, why many people in Brant did not vote for the Liberal candidate in the by-election last spring was that they had become disillusioned with Liberal party policies. Today, if you go west, that disillusionment is even greater. If you go east, the disillusionment is greater, too. This government is a government whose major strength came from central Canada in 1968—and my riding, Brant, is in central Canada. So the disillusionment today is not only widespread but intensive in central Canada, where the party in power had its strength four years ago.

As far as population is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the federal riding of Brant consists mainly of the city of Brantford, the town of Paris and the villages of Burford and St. George, with a combined population of some 75,000 people. Rural Brant is populated mainly by good, progressive farmers specializing in dairying, beef, hogs and cash cropping. Both urban and rural Brant have suffered as a result of government policies—or lack of them.

To begin, I should like to discuss the single, most pressing problem in urban, and to some extent rural, Brant. I am, of course, referring to unemployment. Since 1970 the official rate of unemployment has hovered around the 8 per cent mark. The unofficial rate has gone to between 12 and 15 per cent, thanks to the former minister of finance's bungling of the economy. His name has become a pretty miserable household word in my riding. The unofficial rate of between 12 and 15 per cent was given to me by an employee of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in Hamilton.

The present government has become famous for its almost zealous devotion to statistics. But, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the flesh and blood behind the statistics. Let us look at the misery and social dislocation caused by severe unemployment in just one riding, where unemployment insurance claimants are being forced to go on the welfare rolls because of the ineptitude and utter chaos that now reigns in the Unemployment Insurance Commission throughout this country. I receive 25 to 30 phone calls a day and 20 letters a week. The vast majority of these cases concern unemployment and unemployment insurance.

Mr. Speaker, I was elected to represent all the interests of Brant. I was elected to be a parliamentarian. Considering the salary I receive, I do not think that 75 per cent of my time should be devoted to acting as a troubleshooter for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn: Since I was elected I have never shunned my responsibility as a member whose primary concern has always been the best interests of his riding. People, out of desperation, phone me to see if I can get them a job or an unemployment insurance cheque. Contrary to popular opinion, the vast majority of unemployed persons in my riding and elsewhere in Canada in fact wants to work. For a man to sit around home all day is both degrading and depressing. He loses his sense of worth as head of a family and eventually begins to lose his self-respect. Yet our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has never had to go through the agony of hustling for a job in his life, has the unmitigated gall to tell the jobless of this country, most of whom are out of work as a direct result of his stupid and irrational economic policies, that there are all kinds of jobs across the country if only the unemployed would get up off their behinds and go to where the jobs are.

The Prime Minister reminds me of some of the Paraohs of ancient Egypt summoning the masses to come and chip stone and build a pyramid. He also says, outside the House, in his heartless way that the jobless will not work because they will not accept a wage of $1.75 an hour. Who can raise a family today with dignity and hope, in this "just society", on $1.75 an hour?

What the Prime Minister has failed to tell the jobless is that there are approximately 40,000 jobs chasing nearly 700,000 unemployed, and that most of those 40,000 job vacancies require highly skilled persons, not the kind presently going through manpower retraining. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, manpower retraining has become just another Liberal gimmick to reduce unemployment figures. Most of the trainees, who have been trained at tremendous expense to the taxpayer, find it virtually impossible to obtain gainful employment after finishing their courses. In fact, Mr. Speaker, there is virtually no relationship between manpower retraining courses and present job vacancies. I think this illustrates once again the almost total lack of economic planning on the part of the mod-squad government with which this country is presently faced.

As for moving around the country in search of work, I am reminded of John Steinbeck's epic novel "The Grapes of Wrath". At least at the height of the great depression there was some excuse for this kind of tragedy. It seems to me that our Prime Minister is still thinking in terms of the Okies' search for employment in southern California. The Prime Minister has once again evaded the truth. I have personally attempted to get jobs for men in my riding in the north and western parts of Canada, but I have found it virtually impossible to get a local Manpower officer to advise a man whose savings have already been wiped out by a grossly inefficient Unemployment Insurance Commission to head north or west, or anywhere for that matter. The answer I always get is, "He'll likely end up on welfare if he gets stuck out there."

So you see, Mr. Speaker, not only has this government created misery and hardship for hundreds of thousands of Canadians, but the Prime Minister has attempted to mislead the people on his jaunts across the country. Just last weekend he told an audience in Sturgeon Falls that he was glad he could get out to the people and tell them the truth. Apparently this time around we are to have yet another truth squad. I say to you, some squad; some truth!

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the horrendous and demoralizing problem hundreds of people in my riding are having with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. First, it is the consensus of people I have talked to that unemployment insurance advertising is misleading on two major points. It is claimed, first, that the waiting period is only two weeks, whereas it can be between three and four weeks after the claimant has applied. Actually, the minimum time that elapses between when the claim is established and the day the claimant's first cheque arrives is five weeks, making a waiting period in some cases of eight or nine weeks.

Let us bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the savings of most people today are exhausted after one month without income. No wonder the tension, no wonder the frustration, no wonder the bitterness engendered by such an inexcusable mess within the Unemployment Insurance Commission! There is only one man responsible for this mess, the man who was given the mandate to establish a "just society"—the Prime Minister.

The other misleading factor is that most people have been led to believe that they will receive increased benefits under the new Unemployment Insurance Act. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that is not entirely accurate. To begin with virtually no claimants qualify for the $100 per week maximum. Secondly, now that benefits are taxable, the average net cheque is virtually no greater than it was under the old act. Moreover, because many claimants fail to qualify for the major attachment requiring a minimum 20-week work period due to the on again-off again employment picture brought about by the government's inane economic policies, their benefits are still very low, averaging $50 per week after taxes. Yet unemployment insurance claimants are being told that the new act provides the greatest unemployment insurance program in the world. Some program!

I would now like to illustrate my condemnation of the de-personalized, computer-oriented Liberal regime by citing specific cases relating to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I received a letter from a constituent, dated February 19, 1972; I will not mention his name. I quote from the letter:

Dear Mr. Blackburn:

I am another of those having trouble with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I was laid off December 3, 1971; all I have received so far is a card every two weeks to send back in and a notice to Claimant stating, "A decision on your claim has not yet been made". The only thing I know is that my claim is dated from December 5, 1971. Also, I was told two weeks ago to expect a cheque within two weeks. As yet none has come. At the moment I have another card to mail back the weekend of the 27th of February. The only people who seem to get any results are those who go to their MPs. It seems that once UIC puts you on the delay circuit they are not able to get you off without help.

Mr. Speaker, I cite another example. A man got in touch with me on February 17, 1972. He applied for benefit and received report cards from last September. He received his first cheque on February 14. I will cite another case. I received a telephone call from a man on January 21, 1972.

He had been laid off the second week of November, 1971. He received a letter saying that all benefits were refused. He received a second letter stating that his claim was established for the 32 weeks at $70 a week. As of January 21, 1972, he had received no benefits. However, in a letter dated January 26, 1972, from the chief of Insurance Operations, Hamilton Unemployment Insurance Commission, I was informed as follows:

The reason for the delay in Mr.—

I will not mention his name.

—claim is that the decision of the insurance officer did not get matched with his payment register in Belleville.

Remember, he had been laid off in November. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is very simple to present this kind of excuse but it is not easy to be the victim of such gross incompetence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn: This government must realize that it is dealing with human beings, not punch-cards in a computer. In concluding this section of my remarks let me cite one more example. I do not wish to overdramatize or emotionalize, but a man came to my home one day in tears: for the previous week he, his wife and young daughter had been living on potatoes and rice, and if it had not been for his $6 baby bonus he would have been forced to go on welfare. It is absolutely repugnant to me that any person who is forced by law to contribute to the unemployment insurance fund should be forced to go to welfare, begging.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn: Yet the minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission had the audacity a few weeks ago to imply that happy days were here again when he said that unemployment insurance claimants could assign their cheques to local welfare agencies. To me, this is simply another example of gross and heartless mismanagement on the part of the government.

I have one more point to make with regard to unemployment insurance. It relates to the shutdown last August of Canadian Westinghouse in the city of Brantford. Severance pay was given to employees at the termination of their employment. This severance pay was given to them in lieu of the pension they would ordinarily have received had they been able to work to the date of their retirement.

Under the present terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act severance pay is, in my opinion, unfairly calculated as earnings. The workers were told that they could not apply for unemployment insurance until the severance pay period had run out. However, several persons I know personally were energetic and aggressive enough to apply for and get a new job within that severance pay period. Two persons in particular were subsequently laid off still within the severance pay period. Deeming their last employer not to be Canadian Westinghouse, they applied for unemployment insurance. They began receiving benefits and then subsequently were charged with an overpayment. One lady in particular has been charged with an overpayment of some $340. I consider this to be a great injustice to that person who had the gumption to go out and find herself a new job, only to be severely penalized for having done so, and I will demand of the minister a complete explanation for this injustice.

I state most emphatically that the whole question of severance pay and vacation pay should be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for reconsideration of this most despicable section of the new Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member. It being 9.30 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to special order made Wednesday, February 23 last, to interrupt these proceedings—more particularly, the hon. member—and put every question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House.

The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Alexander) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

At 9.55 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 29, 1972

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ESCAPE FROM CUSTODY OF YVES GEOFFROY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. I present it in the lowest key possible. I want to provoke nobody, and I dare to hope that the government will see fit to accept my motion. Indeed, I have given notice of it to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen).

In view of the fact that we are getting nowhere in batting a certain issue back and forth across the floor of this House, and in view of the fact that the public would like an independent judgment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House requests the government to establish forthwith a judicial inquiry into all matters relating to the escape from custody of Yves Geoffroy.

If the government would like time to think it over that would be fine, but it is a matter that should be settled independently.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has proposed a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STANFIELD—ALLEGED DELETION FROM "HANSARD"

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I realize that perhaps the time to do this has gone by but I would like your permission to raise a question about a deletion from Hansard as the result of an exchange between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and myself yesterday.

I say quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, that I did not hear what the Prime Minister said to me, but I saw what was in the blues and it has been deleted from Hansard. I feel duty bound to raise the question as to why this has been changed and under whose authority it has been changed, since it seems to me that it relates to the privileges of the House.

If somebody wants to swear at me in the House it does not matter to me personally, but I think Hansard should be an accurate record of what takes place in the House.

Mr. Speaker: I will look into the matter. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and all hon. members know, the Chair does not change the transcript of what is said in the House. The reporters have entire responsibility for this, but I have taken note of the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition and I will look into the matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, these words, these opprobrious and profane words were spoken by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: What words?

Mr. Benson: You weren't here.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Is the right hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister owes an apology to the House and to the people of Canada for using that kind of language in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HAULAGE OF LOOSE MATERIALS SAFETY BILL

PROVISIONS RESPECTING CARRIAGE OF LOADS ON PUBLIC HIGHWAYS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-159, respecting the safe haulage of loose materials.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I think the bill is self-explanatory. Its purpose is to prevent damage to motor vehicles as was pointed out when it was introduced in the last session of the House. I believe the explanatory notes spell out the reason for the introduction of the bill at this time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

RAILWAY ACT

PROVISION FOR REPORTING ACCIDENTS INVOLVING DAMAGE TO ROADBED OR EQUIPMENT TO TRANSPORT COMMISSION AND MAKING REPORTS PUBLIC

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-160, to amend the Railway Act (notice of accidents).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, in view of the greatly increased number of wrecks and derailments the purpose of this bill is to make it mandatory that all accidents to equipment or roadbed, the damage to which is greater than set out in subsection 3, be reported to the Canadian Transport Commission. In the past, Mr. Speaker, accidents involving damage to roadbed, other than bridges, tunnels, viaducts or culverts, were not required to be reported. I believe it is most important that this bill be introduced.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

EXCESSIVE OUTDOOR NOISES BILL

PROVISIONS FOR CONTROL

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-161, respecting the control of excessive outdoor noises.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is for the government to give consideration to the dimensions of the problem of noise in our society. The time has come to introduce legislation to control excessive outdoor noise produced by surface transportation, it being an environmental hazard involving a variety of physical and emotional ailments including deafness, pain and nervous breakdown.

In short, this bill is designed to provide legislation to curb unnecessary noises which, if allowed to go unchecked, will affect the nerves and health of many Canadians.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the government now prepared to authorize an independent or judicial inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the escape of Yves Geoffroy?

[Mr. Skoberg.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The circumstances are well known to the public.

Mr. Stanfield: In light of the suspicions that exist, is it not the view of the government that it would serve the cause of penal reform and the program that is under way if such a judicial inquiry were authorized at this time?

Mr. Trudeau: What is the question?

Mr. Stanfield: Is it not the view of the government that the cause of penal reform would be served by such an inquiry at this time in view of the suspicions that exist with regard to the circumstances surrounding the escape of Yves Geoffroy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is no cause for suspicion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The facts are well known to the public. They have been restated by the minister several times. I think the cause of penal reform would only be harmed by the line that the Leader of the Opposition is following.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the Prime Minister give any reason why an independent judicial inquiry would not be beneficial? Can he give any reason at this time why a judicial inquiry would be harmful rather than helpful to the cause of judicial reform, in view of the suspicions?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can. If the facts were not known, if the facts were not stated as clearly as possible by the government and if there were some question of an inquiry into facts which were not known, then there might be some reason for such an inquiry. But I do not think that an inquiry into the policy itself is a matter for a judge or commissioner to go into. It is for the Canadian public to say whether they are on the side of penal reform or not.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Since the Solicitor General answered a question of mine and as a result of the question made a statement in the House on this matter in which many facts were left out, since he admitted that someone made a mistake without saying who it was, since he said that if there were any irregularities there would be an inquiry, and as we now have the question of the obtaining of a false passport, would the Prime Minister not reconsider the government's position and give the Canadian people a judicial inquiry which would bring out all the facts as they really exist?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the facts as they really exist are being brought out by the government to the best of its ability.

Mr. Horner: And by the newspapers.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

Since police forces are unable to track down Yves Geoffroy, could the government not try to obtain the services of a certain Toronto Globe and Mail newspaperman who, with great ease, had located Gerda Munsinger and Hal Banks?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN CONTROLLED INSURANCE COMPANIES—STEPS TO BRING ABOUT CANADIAN OWNERSHIP AND MANDATORY INVESTMENT OF CAPITAL IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Since a recent Swiss-based study revealed that Canada leads the world in the percentage of foreign controlled insurance companies, even being ahead of Pakistan and the Philippines, I might add, and given the fact that these companies derive over $2 billion in premium income annually from Canadians, most of which they invest outside of this country, does the minister intend to take steps to ensure that the insurance industry becomes exclusively or at least predominantly Canadian owned?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to read the report to which the hon. member refers to see whether his allegations are borne out.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that the allegations, as he describes them, are accurate. May I also ask the minister whether his department is giving consideration to making it mandatory for the insurance industry in Canada, foreign owned or not, to invest a fixed minimum and large percentage of its acquired capital in the Canadian economy in order to create jobs in Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will take a look at the situation as the hon. member describes it to see whether his argument warrants serious consideration.

Mr. Broadbent: May I direct a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister appeal to the five directors of the Canada Development Corporation, who are at the same time directors of eight insurance companies, to use their influence to persuade their companies to invest their Canadian-derived earnings in the Canadian economy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's further supplementary is in the form of a submission or representation.

MONTREAL—DEMONSTRATION OF QUEBEC WORKERS—INVITATION TO PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he indicate whether he or a member of his cabinet was invited to attend the demonstration staged by Quebec workers at the Forum last evening?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that kind of question is in order.

[Translation]

I believe that this question should be put on the order paper. The hon. member alluded to an occurrence which already happened. It seems to me that a question relating to the fact that an invitation was or was not extended could easily be put on the order paper.

Mr. Rondeau: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE

POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNIONS ON NEW CONTRACT—SUBMISSION BY TREASURY BOARD OF PROPOSAL ON WAGES AND JOB SECURITY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the government's previous track record in negotiations with the postal unions and in light of the fact the present contract expires within the next month, can the President of the Treasury Board inform the House whether present contract talks are close to an agreement and whether Treasury Board has made a proposal on wages and job security guarantees?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in the preliminary negotiations we have not yet reached the point where wages and job security have been discussed.

Mr. Paproski: In light of the fact that Treasury Board only sat down to negotiate some six or seven weeks before the expiry of the present contract and in light of its performance in other disputes recently, is Treasury Board going to take steps to obtain advice from the private sector on more efficient and modern labour-management practices?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, we are glad to seek and, indeed, take advice from any sector we can, including the opposition if they have any useful suggestions to make.

Mr. Paproski: May I make one suggestion? Would you please give the matter back to the Postmaster General? He can handle it better than you.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—INQUIRY AS TO ADVICE FROM SECURITY PLANNING AND RESEARCH GROUP

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. On September 21 last the minister stated that his security planning and research group would be giving advice regarding the Canadian penitentiary service and the National Parole Board. Can the minister now inform the House whether he or his department had the benefit of such advice with regard to the release of Mr. Geoffroy?

ENERGY

SUPPORT OF FURTHER GAS AND OIL EXPLORATION TO REDUCE NEED TO INCREASE PRICES TO CONSUMERS

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of recent predictions by western natural gas producers of increased prices and in light of the same indication to customers by Union Gas Company of Chatham, Ontario, has the government developed a policy to support further gas and oil exploration so that increasing reliance on increased prices to consumers can be mitigated?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of that question for the minister.

SUGGESTED ANALYSIS OF PRICE CONSEQUENCES OF REFUSAL BY ENERGY BOARD TO GRANT GAS EXPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): The parliamentary secretary may as well take notice of this supplementary and a couple of others that go along with it. In light of statements by natural gas producers at the Alberta gas hearings that the National Energy Board's decision to reject the recent gas export bid will likely lead to higher gas prices for private and industrial gas consumers, has the government or the National Energy Board prepared an analysis of the price consequences of that decision and, if so, will it be made public?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that all decisions made by energy boards throughout the country are watched by the National Energy Board and the department very carefully.

Mr. Paproski: A further supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have to give other members a chance. He will be allowed one last supplementary and the Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. Paproski: In light of recent developments and uncertainties in the gas and oil industries, can the parliamentary secretary inform the House, or ask his minister to do so, when the long-promised energy policy will be made public?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Cullen: I believe the magic word is soon, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

POSSIBLE REVIEW BY NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD OF DECISION NOT TO GRANT GAS EXPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): My supplementary question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre. It is directed to the Prime Minister. Having regard to the fact that the National Energy Board did not take into consideration the reserves which are present in the Arctic, and that the National Energy Board witnesses before the standing committee said there was no way of calculating those reserves or any reserves offshore at the present time, and since the Prime Minister said he was prepared to ask the Energy Board to review its decision, may I inquire whether he has asked for this review and, if so, when it will take place?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If I correctly recall my answer at the time it was that I did not believe the government had any power to embark on a review of this situation.

Mr. Woolliams: It may be—I do not make anything of this—that the Prime Minister was misquoted during the recess, but in the news it came out he had stated he would ask for a review.

AGRICULTURE

HOGS—ADJUSTMENT OF METHOD OF PAYING SUBSIDY IN CASES OF FARMERS' PARTNERSHIPS OR JOINT PRODUCTION UNITS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister arrived at any decision or given serious consideration to an adjustment in the method of payment of the hog subsidy in those cases where farmers are operating in a partnership or where several farmers are operating in a joint production unit?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have given a great deal of consideration to this. What we are asking is that we be informed of all of the circumstances relating to the ownership and the number of people owning hogs that may have been sold to a packing house under the same name, if it is a corporation or whatever it may be. We certainly want to make rules that will be fair and equitable in this situation. As soon as we have this information we will try to accommodate that requirement.

PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY WHEN HOGS SOLD IN COMMUNITY SALES

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Can the Minister of Agriculture indicate whether he has been able to solve the problem in a number of areas involving a major portion of Ontario where there are no hog collecting points for the marketing agency and therefore the hogs are sold through community sales and other methods and there is no record available as to the grade when the hogs are finally slaughtered?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): If the hogs are sold to a local slaughterhouse we believe most farmers will be able to obtain some record of the sale having been made. Though they will not know the grade we believe we can find a basis upon which to pay them about the same percentage of the total as would be paid under index 100 or higher. If, however, the animals pass through another selling ring and eventually wind up in a slaughterhouse, then obviously we cannot pay in those circumstances.

Mr. Peters: The act as presently worded does not really allow any leeway in deciding on the limitations. The act says that if the price is 90 per cent of the ten-year average, payment will be made. We have added an extra condition. Will the minister consider, in those areas where hogs are going through a ring, are being bought by drovers and then put on the market, that if records can be shown of the number of sales then at least a basic payment will be made to these producers?

Mr. Olson: We are trying to work that out, but the producer must provide us with complete evidence of the sale and that is the only sale for which payment is made to that producer.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The Chair will recognize a last supplementary on this question and then return to the previous question and recognize the hon. member for Calgary North.

HOGS—COMPENSATION TO PRODUCERS OF WEANLINGS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I ask the minister a question in the light of the development in hog production in recent years? Many are engaged only in the production of weanlings; they do not finish hogs. They have also suffered considerable financial loss during the past year. Is consideration being given to some method of compensating these farmers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): There is automatic compensation in the marketplace because the price of this type of hog goes up very quickly if there is an improvement in the marketable or slaughter value. Also, the fact that many of these pigs were sold into the feeder market for weeks and, indeed, months at a price somewhat higher than even feeders received is automatic compensation from the marketplace for this type of sale.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION IN QUEBEC—INJUSTICE OF FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS—REVIEW OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce stated, last Thursday, that the renewal of the fiscal arrangements with regard to postsecondary education perpetuates an injustice that might cost Quebec $300 million in the next five years, and that it is, I believe, the second statement the minister has made on the subject in less than a year, is the minister willing to revise the agreement on fiscal arrangements?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. I believe that I myself, or my colleague the Secretary of State, will have the opportunity of discussing the matter, seeing the debate on the bill starts tomorrow, if I am not mistaken.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REMOVAL OF STATION AGENTS, SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION ORDER BY CABINET

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and has to do with the question I asked on February 22 about the closures that have been approved by the Canadian Transport Commission of stations, largely in the province of Saskatchewan but as well in Alberta. At that time I asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that these closures would create a serious situation in many of our larger towns and villages, the government would give consideration to reviewing this order to the end that except for a few which naturally should be closed the overwhelming many would not be, in the interests of the economy of our province.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I said at the time that I would look into the matter and in fact did direct the question to the attention of the Minister of Transport, to whom this type of question should be addressed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I like the way they pass the buck, Mr. Speaker. I now pass the question to the Minister of Transport, who has a reputation for not insulting the House but for answering questions.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this matter was raised on February 22, I believe, on the adjournment motion, at which time my parliamentary secretary replied that any and every specific complaint that the CPR is not carrying out any of the undertakings given the commission and set out in the decision will be investigated promptly and remedial action will be taken whenever warranted. That was in answer to that part of the question having to do with the CPR failing to live up to its commitments.

On the more general question, my information is that there is an appeal procedure that can be undertaken by any of the parties affected and, of course, if they should decide to file an appeal I will certainly see that it is dealt with.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not a fact that the government has already been notified of an appeal by various institutions, municipalities and the like in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to quarrel with the right hon. gentleman about whether these constitute formal appeals in the sense required by the act. My information is that no such formal appeal has yet been filed, but I will be glad to find out if such is the case and advise.

SUGGESTED DELAY IN CLOSING OF CERTAIN SASKATCHEWAN STATIONS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the order to close the Laurentian division stations was dated January 17 but is not to be effective until May 1, and in view of the fact that the Saskatoon division date of order was February 10, to be implemented on March 16, would the minister investigate to see what brings about this inconsistency, and would he make representations to the CPR to delay the implementation of their Saskatoon customer service plan until at least some time in May in view of the hardship that will be created by the closing on March 16?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to sift through that question in Hansard to get the various representations that are in it, and I will do my best to follow them up.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking to ask supplementaries, but since we will be running short of time I will try to recognize some members who rose yesterday but were not recognized and distribute opportunities as equitably as possible.

INQUIRY AS TO FORMAL INVESTIGATION INTO SINKING OF "GULF GULL"

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Has a decision been made yet to initiate a formal inquiry into the tragedy of the Gulf Gull?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, no decision has been made, the reason being that, as I believe I outlined to the House a few days ago, the first step toward such a decision is the report on the routine inquiry that takes place immediately after the accident. When that report is received, which should be within a few days, a decision will be made whether any further inquiry is desirable.

Mr. Muir: In view of the tragic loss of the Gulf Gull and the loss of six lives, would the minister take it upon himself to bring to the attention of the House as soon as possible the decision that is reached regarding a formal inquiry?

Mr. Jamieson: I shall be glad to do that, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

QUEBEC—ACCEPTANCE OF PROPOSED CHARTER—DISCUSSION WITH OTTAWA RESPECTING JURISDICTION OVER SOCIAL SECURITY

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday when the Prime Minister was questioned about the constitutional review, he suggested that his government was not interested in resuming the debate as long as Quebec does not submit other proposals.

Since Ottawa and Quebec are discussing possible arrangements in the fields of family allowances and manpower, is it not an indication that Quebec would like the debate on constitutional matters to progress?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker. The province of Quebec, as far as I know, does not wish that those discussions be considered from the constitutional point of view but only at a statutory and administrative levels, which I regret.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

Did the federal government put as a condition that an agreement in the fields of family allowances and manpower would be subject to acceptance by Quebec of the proposed Victoria charter, or other similar proposals in the constitutional field?

Mr. Trudeau: Not at all, Mr. Speaker.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MANUFACTURING AND TESTING OF TOYS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is supposed to be in the House today but is not. Perhaps he will be here soon, but in the meantime may I give his parliamentary secretary notice of my question.

In view of statements made recently by the Canadian toy manufacturers to the effect that certain kinds of regulatory action being taken by officials under the Hazardous Products Marketing Act is having a very restrictive effect on the present manufacture of toys, and in view of the recent withdrawal of support by the toy manufacturers for the toy testing council, would the minister be prepared to make a statement on motions reporting what action is being taken by his department in order to improve the over-all situation?

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have noted this question, Mr. Speaker, and will bring it to the attention of the minister.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION BY HEALTH CLUB AGAINST VETERAN WITH WOODEN LEG

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the minister undertaken a full investigation into a clear act of discrimination against an Ottawa war veteran who lost a leg in the second world war and had his life membership in an Ottawa health club revoked when an official of that club, namely, Vic Tanny's, discovered that he had a wooden leg?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would doubt very much that interference on my part or on the part of the Department of Veterans Affairs would be very helpful in this particular case.

ROCHDALE COLLEGE—PRESENT POSITION OF FORECLOSURE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Rud L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Would the minister be prepared to advise the House as to the present position of government action against Rochdale College?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are, as the House has been advised, taking foreclosure proceedings with relation to this property. We were very recently refused by the court an order for interim possession and financial management. Therefore our lawyer has been instructed to seek an early trial date and to proceed with the main foreclosure action as expeditiously as the rules of the court allow.

FINANCE

OBJECTIVE OF PRESENT MONETARY POLICY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that the Bank of Canada for the last month has been pursuing a more restrictive policy and is driving up short-term interest rates, has the government's monetary policy switched from fighting unemployment to trying to control inflation and, if so, when will the minister make a statement to the House on the matter?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I might say that there is no restrictive monetary policy. I am advised that the banks have an amply supply of credit to extend to any credit-worthy borrower.

BILINGUALISM

MONCTON—POSITION OF MAYOR—POSSIBLE REACTION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

During the weekend, his colleague the Secretary of State stated that, if the mayor of Moncton did not modify his position with regard to bilingualism, the federal government would intervene by reducing its financial aid to that municipality. Would the minister tell the House if he intends to reduce such aid and what measures he will take—

Mr. Speaker: I have a feeling that the same question was asked yesterday. In any event, the minister may wish to answer the question.

An hon. Member: The Secretary of State is not present.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a point of order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, it appears that my point of order is related to a new development. The hon. minister, according to today's news, contradicted the Secretary of State on this point and I ask him to clarify his position.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have noticed that I merely indicated my impression that the question had already been put, while leaving it to the hon. minister to reply if I was mistaken. The hon. minister may still reply to the question if he so wishes.

Mr. Valade: May I put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion inform the House whether he agrees with his colleague the Secretary of State that joint federal assistance grants to Moncton will be curtailed if the mayor of that city persists in his attitude?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was in the House, as was not the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, and the hon. Secretary of State did not make the statement the hon. member alleges today.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATE INCREASES, MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO CORRECTIVE LEGISLATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the continuing complaints and protests from Atlantic Canada about the eight increases in maritime freight rates over the last 29 months, has the minister taken any action at all such as having discussions with the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission, or does he intend to lay before the House legislation to correct this fantastic increase which is undoing all the good work that is sometimes done by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): There is no short answer, Mr. Speaker. As you know, I am continually bound by the National Transportation Act. But I think the hon. member has left out a lot of other things which have been done in an attempt to equalize freight rates in the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Are we to understand from the minister's answer, even in an abbreviated form, that his department intends no new legislation or amendments to the National Transportation Act to correct this situation which is causing adverse conditions in the Atlantic area and undoes all the good work that has been attempted there in the last 25 years?

Mr. Jamieson: In so far as changing the legislation is concerned, I have no immediate plans to do so. But that is not the route through which any correction of the transportation problems of the Atlantic provinces could be achieved most quickly. I would assume that when my estimates are before the committee I will be asked about this matter and I will be glad to give a thorough report at that time about the many good things that have been done.

Mr. Nowlan: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

METHOD OF INVESTIGATION INTO LEAKING OF CABINET DOCUMENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Perhaps he will recall that on February 24 I asked him about the investigation into the leaking of confidential cabinet documents and in particular whether to his knowledge any minister had sought the assistance of the Solicitor General to supplement his own efforts. The Prime Minister said he would have to look into the matter; he did not know offhand. I should like to ask him whether any of his ministers has sought the assistance of the Solicitor General regarding the leaking or disappearance of confidential cabinet documents?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did check with the RCMP—sometimes known as the police—and I found that no minister asked for assistance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Because of the interest evoked by the Prime Minister's answer I was not able to hear it and I would ask him to repeat it.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer is no.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that some of these leaks took place a number of months ago and the investigation is still left in the hands of the ministers, he expects any of us to believe that he is anxious to find out how these leaks occurred?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a question; it is an argument.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Since the RCMP have not been called upon to assist, have the so-called special security police set up a couple of years ago been asked for their assistance? I understand that this was the reason for setting up that force.

Mr. Trudeau: I have not heard of the special security police, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sure the Prime Minister knows the force to which I refer, the force set up under the Solicitor General with the government's approval very recently. Is this not precisely the kind of thing that the security personnel should be looking into and is not that why they were established?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member in his question is now referring apparently to something which the Solicitor General did a few months ago, but in his previous question he said "a couple of years ago". I assure the hon. member I do not know to which force he is referring.

[Later:]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Prime Minister has left the impression in the House that he did not know what I was speaking about when I referred to the security force which should have been called in to investigate the leaking of cabinet documents. On page 8027 of Hansard for last session the Solicitor General explained at some length the function of the security planning and research group which was set up by his department precisely to do the things I have suggested. Just because I used a different name to refer to the force does not justify the Prime Minister pleading ignorance. I should like to ask him again whether this matter of the leaking of confidential documents—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: —has been referred to this group for investigation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this is hardly a question of privilege, but I see no objection to his rephrasing the question or asking a supplementary to try to clear up this matter, and then we will go on to another matter.

Mr. Nielsen: The question has been asked, Mr. Speaker. Now that the Prime Minister's memory has been jogged, perhaps he might answer.

Mr. Trudeau: It really was not a matter of the designation of the group. The hon. member, when he asked the question, referred to something that happened two years ago, and I thought he was referring to the time when we established an assistant commissioner of the RCMP. At that time we were implementing the report of the Royal Commission on Security. That is why the hon. member's question was not clear to me.

On the subject that the hon. member has now clarified, if he refers to the statement he will see that the group in the Solicitor General's department is not an operational group and is not meant to make any kind of investigation of its own. It is meant to analyse and assess results of operations carried out by the RCMP, otherwise known as the police.

Mr. Nielsen: On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask a last supplementary, but I point out that there are only three minutes left before the end of the question period and we will have to give other hon. members a chance to ask questions.

Mr. Nielsen: I will not enter into debate with the Prime Minister. It would not be proper for me to do so at this time, but what he has just said does not square with what the Solicitor General said. Since the Prime Minister has repeatedly promised the House a one-day debate on the report of the Royal Commission on Security will he not now consider setting aside a day in the near future so we can get these new security services sorted out and debate that report?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is provision in the rules for opposition days at regular intervals.

Mr. Nielsen: You promised a day.

Mr. Trudeau: And if they think the subject is very important they can bring it up on one of those days. Otherwise we will bring it up in due course.

TRADE

DISPLAY OF CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS AT PEKING FAIR

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last fall I asked the minister whether any provision had been made for a display of agricultural products at the China fair which his department claims is all-important in 1972. Since I had no answer last time I wonder whether such provision has been made?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I understand that up to now 250 different Canadian groups want to take part in the Peking fair, which is what my hon. friend is referring to. The selection is being done now on the basis, among other factors, of information we received last December from the Chinese themselves as to what their import intentions are for 1972. In due course I will advise the House as to which companies or which groups of companies have been selected for participation.

Mr. Knight: Can the minister state whether or not the Canadian Wheat Board or any selling agency for agricultural products has put in an application to display their products?

Mr. Pepin: I do not know, but obviously, judging by recent sales, the Canadian Wheat Board has a direct line of communication with the purchasing agency in China—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

LACHINE CANAL—USE FOR PLEASURE CRAFT—OMISSION FROM TAKEOVER BY DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the Lahaye report which recommends that the Lachine canal be used for pleasure craft been submitted for cabinet approval?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Rock: My supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. Why was the Lachine canal not included in the takeover of historic canals and given national park status?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I indicated yesterday to the House that I thought that kind of question normally should be placed on the order paper. It is basically argument. If there is urgency about the matter, it can be discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Rock: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Rock: Are you aware, Mr. Speaker, that your own constituency also has a historic canal which I believe should be included?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INCOME TAX ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT RESPECTING EMPLOYEES' PROFIT PLANS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State, the hon. member for Calgary South, likely to be in charge of the promised amendments to the Income Tax Act, or the son of Bill C-259. Can the hon. gentleman indicate whether we might get on with such things as the law relating to employees profit plans as promised by the former Minister of Finance? I believe this may be the maiden test in the question period for the new Minister of State.

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Changes in the law, if any, such as are contemplated in the hon. member's question, would ordinarily follow a budget speech by the Minister of Finance.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RETIRED EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR ANNUAL ESCALATION AND CHANGE IN BASIS OF CALCULATION—REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of mounting concern with respect to Canadian National pensions, including both the need for the pensions of those already retired to be escalated annually and the need to calculate Canadian National pensions on the basis of a factor of 2 per cent per year of service, will the minister make renewed representations to the Canadian National concerning these two matters?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to ask a supplementary question. When the minister answers will he also tell us how he is getting on with the Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to pensions? Ten o'clock.

PRIOR APPROVAL BY PROVINCES OF FEDERAL POLICIES—SMALL FARMS LEGISLATION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. May I ask him whether, in the interests of federal-provincial relations, it is still government policy to get approval from the provinces of policies in which they have a direct interest, prior to proceeding with them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): To get approval from the provinces when?

Mr. Korchinski: Prior to proceeding with these policies.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Trudeau: What policies is the hon. member talking about?

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to proceed with the legislation on small farms in light of the opposition from all the provinces, including Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture tells me that there is no opposition, that the provinces agree with the program.

TRADE

POSSIBLE SALE OR RENTAL OF MINI-TYPE SUBMARINE TO SOVIET UNION—SECURITY CLEARANCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. It arises out of continuing efforts by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to reopen negotiations between a west coast firm and the Soviet Union for the sale or rental of the Pisces. Since we were asked to refuse an export sales permit for this deep-water submersible, can the Minister of National Defence indicate whether it now has security clearance not only from Canada but from the United States as well?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): The matter is still under discussion.

NATIONAL PARKS

GATINEAU—ACTIVITIES TO BE PERMITTED

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of recent representations he has received regarding Gatineau Park, can he tell us what activities will be permitted in the park, and does he intend to make a statement on the matter?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the question should be limited to whether the minister is going to make a statement on motions. I do not think the detailed information sought by the hon. member should be given during the course of the question period.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the plan is for the National Capital Commission, later in the year, to issue a set of general principles relating to park policy. The Chairman is anxious, and I for the government am insistent, that those principles should be commented upon by all people with knowledge or who are interested in that policy, out of which will come the long-term policy for Gatineau Park.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION ON OFFICE OF SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: For the brief moment we have left the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings on the last question.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker. The exercise has been good anyway. I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation at this session to provide for the election of the Speaker of the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this is a very important question and one that is bothering the country at the present time. Might we have an answer from the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this subject in correspondence, notably with the Leader of the Opposition, and the position of the government is the same as that in that Mother of Parliaments in the United Kingdom. We hope that the opposition parties will be enlightened enough to follow the course which is followed in other countries, but this does not seem to be the case.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hogarth: Don't swear at him, Bob.

Mr. Stanfield: There is no need for me to swear at him. There are enough people in the country swearing at him already.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly true that the Prime Minister and I have had correspondence on this subject, and he has expressed regret that I have not been very enlightened. I must express the gravest and deepest regret that he has not been enlightened enough to do something about regulating in a satisfactory way the position of the chief officer of this House.

Mr. Trudeau: Is that a question or a point of order?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not wish to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, but perhaps this might be a good time to call orders of the day. Orders of the day.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ross Whicher for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I take pleasure in joining with previous speakers in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply.

I feel that the two members whom I have just mentioned—the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Lajoie) and the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher)—somewhat represent or symbolize what the House of Commons is—made up of newcomers as well as old hands who know all the tricks, all the strings which need to be pulled. As a matter of fact, it was interesting to compare the two speeches, which were very different indeed but which at the same time reflected very well the changes which can occur in individuals as they acquire greater experience of this House.

I would like particularly to point out to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières that of course we cannot keep for many years the kind of naïveté which characterizes all of us when we first join this House. Once we become more familiar with the unknown people in this noble institution, once we get to know men better, we become of course both enthusiastic about some things and extremely disappointed with some others.

In this majestic chamber, Mr. Speaker, there is first the institution—the House of Commons itself—which cannot but impress people as an institution, polished as it has been through centuries, and which allows the people, through their representatives, not only to make their grievances known but also to influence the government and the country's general administration. There may be a few things in this area which need to be corrected, but I think that on the whole all Canadians, and particularly members of this House, are proud of this institution which was given to us by the confederation agreement and which we inherited from Great Britain.

Within this institution there are parties and their value as well as that of the men who belong to them vary with time. As for the parties, many things have been said about them both by opposition and government members; they were global and radical statements and the government has been judged once and for all.

I would also like to judge briefly the opposition since it is an integral part of this noble institution known as the House of Commons which can influence the country's administration for better or for worse.

Speaking about the opposition, Mr. Speaker, it reveals a kind of odorless, colourless and congenital impotence. About another party, we might say that it shows shameless arrogance and demagogy and, about still another, that it is an old record always playing the same tune.

In my opinion, the quality of opposition should be enormously improved and we will certainly have this opportunity and no longer hear—

[English]

Mr. Hees: You will get a chance very soon.

An hon. Member: They had a chance.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): In my opinion, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees)—

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: It will be good for you to be in the opposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, it is quite disappointing for a newly elected member of the House to hear such statements as those made by the member for Prince Edward-Hastings in connection with price controls. Listen to me one moment because this kind of gem is rare.

With regard to price controls, the hon. member stated and I quote:

• (1200)

[English]

The second way we can keep prices down is to take steps to keep prices from rising at the very rapid rate at which they are rising at the present time.

There is the whole philosophy of the opposition the co-operation we get from them.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to stay on that level where, unfortunately, the opposition stands most of the time. Notwithstanding the overall judgment I may have passed on the opposition the fact remains that a large number of the members across the way are worthy men, their hearts are in the right place, they represent their electors honestly and they came here to improve the situation in Canada. It is not because they belong to another party that I underestimate them. Some people are extremely critical of the government and I sometimes find that they are right. Among the most critical is the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) who, when he refers to DEVCO and the issue of industrial development—although, of course, I am not here to make admissions—is basically right and I think that there are some things that must be changed.

What is extremely annoying and frustrating from the opposition is never to have constructive proposals in front of you but to be continuously under the impression that you are on the eve of a general election. The opposition tries by all means to gain the electoral advantages that can be gained in the House of Commons.

At any rate, I shall deal with a more important issue, Mr. Speaker, namely regional development, which was the subject of much criticism here in the House and also outside. This subject is too important for me to season it with jokes or try to minimize its importance by my tone.

Barely three years ago, we tried to launch a concerted attack against regional disparities. We attacked on three levels at the same time. First, we initiated the industrial incentives program. Then, we developed the infrastructure assistance program and improved this instrument which is also used in the agricultural field, namely ARDA. Lastly, we enacted provisions for the social adjustment of workers.

We resorted to these three instruments and tried to trigger a beginning of correction of regional disparities, which has not been successfully undertaken since the inception of confederation in Canada.

Thus, in that first part of the program, that is the grants, my department has accepted since 1969-70, 1,200 applications for grants which brought or will bring about 50,000 new jobs, despite the allegations of some opposition members who should make better use of their research staff. If we take into account the multiplying effect, that will give us 125,000 or 150,000 additional jobs.

Of course it is always possible to retort: there are plants that will go bankrupt, other will not meet their objectives. That is possible, but on the other hand there are other plants which at present expect to employ say from 100 to 150 men, but which will in fact hire 300 or 400 men because their forecasts were to pessimistic.

By the way, those who are interested in research will be able to study what happened under the former industrial incentives legislation and they will find out that in spite of the odd failure the number of new jobs square exactly with the employment announcements that had been made when the inquiries began.

Besides, some cases have already arisen where the number of available jobs has been underestimated and where employment opportunities are actually far more numerous.

Now with regard to infrastructures, Mr. Speaker, we are aware that some regions will never benefit from industrial development if they cannot offer modern enterprise some basic infrastructures. We have therefore entered into agreements with the provinces and this program is now fully operative. It is so effective that we are receiving hundreds of applications from municipalities as well as from various regions and communities in Canada and it has become necessary to create "special" regions in order to perfect these infrastructures.

Here is then a means which, after a couple of years trial has really produced astonishing results.

Then comes the problem of rural planning, farm productivity and development of natural resources. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we are all aware that thousands of our fellow citizens will continue to make a living out of natural resources and it is our duty, as far as is practicable, to go all out and help them. That part of the program is also very active.

We now have a social adjustment program. Doubtless, Mr. Speaker, when we speed up the urban phenomenon, when we multiply or improve industrial techniques to enable some industries to survive, men are affected. Indeed, they must be transplanted, moved, and all this is part of an a slow and extremely tricky process.

Mr. Speaker, I remember very well indeed having experienced it one day in Prince Edward Island. We were attempting to convince a farmer to leave his farm to allow regrouping of several of them so that those who would replace him could live decently and use modern equipment. He answered and I quote:

[English]

"I was born here, my father was born here and my grandfather was born here. Whatever the government does I am going to stay here".

[Translation]

That is the type of human problems—

[English]

Whoever does not care about that does not understand anything. That is why some of the things we do cannot be done overnight. We have to take time, we have to convince people. That is why sometimes, when there are complaints from the other side of the House, I do not think they are serious, because the people over there have never had to deal with such problems. That is why they make such statements.

• (1210)

Mr. Speaker, there has been much censure of the department, in a general way, broad statements, but nothing concrete. I have sought everywhere for some useful information, some meaningful suggestion the opposition might have given us in order to speed up industrial development in Canada. I have tried to understand the New Democratic philosophy in the field of regional development. Well, even young members one might consider to be quite open, such as the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), have, if I remember well—

[English]

"You know, policies of regional development have been a complete failure."

[Translation]

That is the subtly distinctive judgment bearing on a whole program, on the efforts of thousands of men, not merely on the federal or even provincial government levels, but on the levels of municipalities and private agencies seeking concrete solutions.

"It has been a complete failure!"

That is all they are able to say after two and a half years of concrete, highly efficient achievements which I shall enumerate later on if you permit it.

Mr. Speaker, we have been told that there was lack of planning. Our denigrators did not say how they would have made their plans. They allege lack of planning, lack of leadership—

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I only have half an hour. Recently, I have spoken three times in this House and I do want to use this opportunity. After that, if the hon. member wants to ask a question I will accept it with pleasure.

Furthermore, another global statement was made which, in my opinion, is unfair. They say that there has been a lack of consultation. If there is, within this government, one department that goes in for consultation, it is ours. In fact, it is so systematic that one can even wonder whether, sometimes, there is not too much of it, because we do consult in all areas. All agreements under the ARDA program, for instance, are reached with the provinces. It is the provinces that take the initiative. We discuss all points with them, and finally agreements are reached.

The same applies to the FRED program; we discuss things with the provinces, municipalities and private organizations. We are constantly doing that in the special areas. The latter are established with the help of the provinces; priorities are set the same way; municipalities are involved and, finally, we try to consult as many people as possible, but in this House, it is said that the government, the department—

[English]

"You never consult with people. Bureaucrats from Ottawa say what should be done in the north or in Nova Scotia." That is not true, Mr. Speaker. We consult all the time and enjoy it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Another accusation was brought against us and even published in the Globe and Mail, namely that our figures on employment forecasts are overestimated and that, in fact, we should reduce them by 25 per cent because we took into account applications for grants which were withdrawn or undertakings which had not attained their goal. This is false because figures tabled in the House did take into account applications withdrawn and undertakings failing to reach their goal.

We pay for a research office for the opposition, Mr. Speaker. Of course everybody cannot be a statistician. I am not even one myself. But, at least, why not elect members who can read two rows of figures and say: What do they mean, instead of writing to the Globe and Mail that we are deceiving the public with false figures. Why such scheming?

It is also said: Well, that is a department from which no information can be had. We table a monthly report. I can table all the agreements into which we enter with the provinces under the ARDA and FRED programs and under the special areas program as well. If anybody wants to see them, I am prepared to supply them with copies. They are public records.

As to the area of subsidies, the paper is tabled in the House and anybody can raise the questions he wishes, except if they are related to records which are the exclusive property of the companies which file applications, namely private documents.

Except for that, everything is published, but just the same allegations are made. Here is however something both funny and serious: those who ordinarily make those accusations, those who make that kind of criticism are those who would benefit most should the regional development program be expanded.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): What about APEC?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I was going to say, whatever the hon. member thinks about APEC, many other people think otherwise, even Mr. Jones from Moncton, even Mr. Price. Why does the hon. member not ask his colleague from Saint John-Lancaster what he thinks about it? Just ask him.

Criticism does not shock me, Mr. Speaker, if it is meaningful and substantial, in short if it was not merely a matter of playing politics, we would readily accept it. We realize that we are experimenting, that we can make mistakes, but considering how criticism is voiced in the House and elsewhere, the regional development programs will be killed at the expense of the people from the Maritime provinces, Manitoba and eastern Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I do not object to constructive criticism and would undoubtedly welcome it. If I do not agree, I will say so, but let us see if there is anything in such criticism other than generalizations which only show the ignorance of those who make it, except perhaps the member for Cape Breton-East Richmond. I do accept it, but not because I know I please everyone by saying so.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): What has been the position of the maritime premiers in all this?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I realize, of course, that there will always be those who criticize without just cause. As I have said, I think those people are doing a great disservice to the idea of regional development. But I do not believe the people of this country are being deceived. In three short years we have succeeded in putting in place the most comprehensive set of regional development programs in Canadian history.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Nothing plus one is still one.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): In the same period, our budget has risen from approximately $242 million in 1969-70 to an estimated $505 million in the fiscal year which is soon to begin. I think it can be fairly said that we have quickly generated a good deal of momentum.

Mr. Broadbent: And how many jobs?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): There are many, I know, who would agree—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): —and I am happy to say that more than a few have said so publicly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: They certainly do not agree in the southern part of Timiskaming.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): But in the final analysis the opinions of average Canadians are what really count. I think it can be said that the awareness of and enthusiasm for our program is growing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): —certainly among those who have seen tangible results in their own communities and areas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologize to the hon. minister for having to interrupt him.

[English]

I suggest to hon. members that they allow the minister to make his statement. It seems to me that we have enjoyed a good debate until now. Hon. members have been listened to by other hon. members, and I think the minister should be allowed the same privilege.

Mr. Peters: It is just that he gets so excited, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Since I have been in the House, some seven years, I believe I have never yelled at any speaker whatsoever, notwithstanding the inanities and stupidities which might have been said.

I shall now go on with my remarks, Mr. Speaker, as I have only eight minutes left.

• (1220)

[English]

Ask the people in the Winnipeg Beach area, Mr. Speaker where, as part of the ten-year FRED program, we have made available an excellent recreational resource which in the summer of 1970 drew over 100,000 visitors. They will tell you that, apart from the direct employment impact on the Interlake area, business sales have increased by as much as 30 per cent and that a number of stores are now being modernized or renovated.

[Translation]

Ask the people of Matane, Sainte-Anne-des-Monts, Gaspé or Chandler what they think of our financial participation in the building of 400 low rental dwellings for the poorly housed of the Gaspé area. They will tell you that our program is certainly useful.

[English]

Ask the people in Prince Edward Island where we have undertaken a federal-provincial development plan that is unique in its comprehensive character. They will tell you that the resulting improvements in the agricultural and fishing industries, the better network of roads, the systematic development of the tourist industry and the increasing attention to the general quality of island life are benefiting the people.

Ask any of the 3,500 families affected since 1968 by the ARDA program in Ontario. Among other things, some 300,000 acres of land have been purchased. About two-thirds of that land has been leased or sold to some 1,500 farmers who, for the most part, have since been able to earn better incomes because they were able to enlarge their farms.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Most of the remaining acreage, unsuitable for agriculture, has become Crown land and is being converted to more suitable use in such fields as forestry, recreation and wildlife conservation.

Ask the people in the Hermes Electronics plant in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, if our incentives program is wasteful and ineffective. They will tell you that our intervention prevented the closing of the plant and, in addition to salvaging 300 existing jobs, created an additional 70 in the revitalized operation. These jobs, many of which are scientific and professional, might well have been lost to the Dartmouth area. In addition to providing a valuable Canadian source of electronic components, the project represents a major addition to exports which will be of great benefit to the whole community.

Ask the people in the town of Slave Lake, Alberta, Mr. Speaker, if our incentives program is of no consequence. They will tell you that it has resulted in the construction of a large modern sawmill in the Mitsue Lake Industrial Park which already employs 70 people, many of native ancestry. And they will tell you that a further 100 people are working in wood-cutting operations in support of the mill.

Ask the people of the Burin Peninsula in Newfoundland about the steps being taken to meet the needs of their young people for educational facilities. They will tell you about the four schools now well under way at an anticipated total cost of more than $4,500,000. They will point out that, in the case of one of these schools, the Burin Vocational School, my department authorized the expenditure of substantial funds to design, construct and equip a students' residence and an auditorium.

Ask the people in Saint John, New Brunswick, Mr. Speaker, where much important infrastructure has been put in place to serve the needs of industry and a growing urban population.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This is how they behave. Here is a serious program and all they do is laugh and make generalities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is all they do when I am speaking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): They will tell you that the 18 industries which have been induced to locate in the area and are expected to generate some 1,200 jobs are meaningful to them and their families.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, ask the people of Montmagny where 450 jobs were lost because of the closing of Chemcell Limited. They will perhaps tell you that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion means something to them.

[English]

Ask the people in Bridgewater and Granton, Nova Scotia, about Michelin's two new manufacturing facilities both now in production.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Ask them. Why don't you talk to those people? Ask the people in the Okanagan Valley. They will tell you that we have helped to rehabilitate the existing irrigation systems.

Ask the people in Grand Falls and Florenceville, New Brunswick, where our incentives program helped make it possible for McCain Foods Limited to establish major food-processing facilities. Ask the people in the nearby Mactaquac area what has been accomplished under our FRED plan.

[Translation]

Talk to the people of Quebec City. They will tell you what we have done at Place Royale and St. Charles River for the development of tourism in Quebec City. Go and ask them what the Department of Regional Economic Expansion means to them.

An hon. Member: That's the best you can do.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I could go on but I know I am running out of time. Nevertheless there are some who are embarrassed because they know they could not repeat to their voters what they say in this House under the protection of the Speaker and the Sergeant-at-Arms. So, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Come to Prince Edward Island and say that.

An hon. Member: You are cheap, MacDonald, and you know it.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I know that in a few minutes my time will be up. I conclude my remarks by mentioning a very important program—

[English]

An hon. Member: What have you got for Cornwall?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This is small politics, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think that opposition members, and in particular those of the New Democratic Party and the Progressive Conservative party showed today what they think of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the seriousness with which they fulfill their responsibility as members of Parliament. This is why they will be judged very harshly. They have tried to exploit everything for political purposes and to destroy all the values which are of so much concern for this country, especially for its future. I infinitely regret, Mr. Speaker, that the areas that are represented—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Before I allow the hon. minister to continue—

[English]

The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I know it is the right of each and every member in this House to say whatever he thinks he must say in his own defence or in defence of any particular program. However, when a speech reaches the low degree which the minister's speech has reached—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): The minister is imputing motives while hon. members sit and listen in the vain hope—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —that he will give answers to many of the important questions with regard to regional disparity in this country instead of resorting to this cheap political—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously not a question of privilege.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am only getting back the minute that was taken from me by the hon. member for Egmont.

I merely want to submit an idea for consideration by the House: even if we had a 50 per cent rate of unemployment, that would not necessarily mean that our programs are not effective. Instead of hiding behind general figures, the opposition should consider the real effects of the programs that we are putting into force, and not limit itself to vague references to unemployment. Should the opposition follow our advice, and not change its views in spite of that, then, we can be sure that it is too fanatical to do so.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. minister as his time has expired.

[Translation]

The hon. minister's time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I have heard enough yelling, now I would like to hear some debating.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a point or order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

• (1230)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am sure hon. members on this side would be quite willing to extend the time available to the minister, particularly since so many important questions have not yet been answered.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has indicated that he has finished his remarks, and his time has expired.

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on the point of order on the question of extending the minister's time. The minister did indicate earlier in his speech, when I rose to ask whether he would answer a question, that he would be prepared to do so at the end of his comments. In view of this undertaking, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would consider answering the question now.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has indicated that he has concluded his remarks. Of course, with unanimous consent the minister could be granted additional time if he wishes to reply to questions. But the hon. member will appreciate that he cannot ask a question now unless the minister is prepared to reply.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Just one, then.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Boniface rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): My question of privilege relates to the hon. member for Egmont who wanted to hear more from the minister. May I suggest that if the members of the loyal opposition had kept quiet and listened to him they would have heard the answers to some of their questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that we are going nowhere fast. We are losing what I suggest is precious time. The Chair has been informed that a number of hon. members are anxious to take part in this debate between now and the end of the day. If we go on dealing with what I suggest are not legitimate points of order or questions of privilege we could spend a great deal of time without accomplishing very much. Perhaps we might allow a question from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister said he was prepared to consider serious questions and regretted that none had been raised in the course of this debate. Earlier in the debate I made two specific criticisms of his department, and whether or not he agrees with what I said I should like to hear the answers to those criticisms. The first was that his program was founded on the assumption that there would be an economy committed to full growth, especially in the heartland of industrial Ontario; it was based on the assumption that the economy would be founded on full production. The second criticism was directed to specific inadequacies. I listed in my speech of last Tuesday some eight grants which had been made to companies to enable them to move from one part of Canada to another with a consequent shifting of unemployment from one area to another. I ask the minister whether he thinks this is a sensible kind of policy and whether his department intends to continue doing this kind of thing.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not know from what source the hon. member heard that the department was founded on the assumption that the economy should be running at full speed. I think my program would work much better if the economy were operating on that basis—there is no doubt of that—but it was not founded on the assumption the hon. member mentioned. I do not know where he got that from.

Mr. Broadbent: The Economic Council of Canada.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Well, the Economic Council of Canada is not the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

As to the second point, I agree entirely with the hon. member. If a plant is moved from one part of Canada to another, meaning that some Canadians lose jobs while others get jobs, it is all wrong. But I think the hon. member should not make general affirmations of that kind. Let me know the companies, their names, and I will give the answer. It might be we have made a certain number of mistakes in this respect. It is possible. But do not make these statements in general terms. Just come to my office and I will give the answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair is prepared to recognize the hon. member for Simcoe North. Perhaps he might be given an opportunity to make his speech. I see the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, the hon. member for Regina East and the hon. member for Annapolis Valley all wish to ask questions of the minister. If this is what hon. members wish, perhaps we might set aside the debate on the address. But I think that in fairness to the hon. member for Simcoe North he should be recognized now.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to add my congratulations to those which my colleagues have extended to the mover, the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) and the seconder, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Lajoie) of the address and also to congratulate the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). I have not seen such a show since the last medicine show I saw when Professor Mulvany was cutting a tapeworm.

Looking over the Speech from the Throne, one is struck by the number of items, some 29 of them, all dressed up with platitudes and folksy words. In the ordinary course of events, were this agenda to be carried out it would take nine or ten months. I note that one of the steps proposed is a program to do more in the way of humane treatment of offenders, with further reforms in the penal system. I want to congratulate the government on this; they did not take very long before putting their preaching into practice. Surely the government will be hard put to it to do any more than has been done for Yves Geoffroy if the stories we hear are correct.

This man was released from prison in order to marry a lady who was a Crown witness when he was tried for murdering his wife. He managed to obtain a false passport and make arrangements to dispose of his property and assets before leaving the country. Is this what is meant by more humane treatment of offenders—if you don't get along with your wife, murder her, it will soon be forgotten? The ad lib women should have a look at this. How do women in general feel about this type of crime? To most men it must surely be repulsive. I am wondering whether this is the thin end of the wedge to distinguish between a domestic crime and other criminal acts.

An hon. Member: Goyer says Geoffroy is not violent.

Mr. Rynard: That is what I am coming to. Is taking a life different in a domestic case than it is in any other case?

I do not intend to deal with the Speech from the Throne for too long except to say that if it produces no better results than the preceding three Speeches from the Throne, after which we witnessed mounting unemployment, rising inflation, more people living in poverty and the development of the worst-managed economy in the western world, the Canadian people will have had just about enough.

When one talks about unemployment one is talking about a tremendous economic factor. When you have 7.7 per cent of the people out of work it is not only that they are out of work but that someone else is keeping them and someone else is paying the shot. It is a tax on the economy and they lose their moral strength and their dignity. The psychological effect on the unemployed and their families may be devastating indeed. This is only a small part of the economic picture when you consider we are losing approximately $3.5 billion in production per year. I do not believe that Canada or any other country can really stand such a situation.

Businessmen have been afraid to invest. Many businesses have been sold. They are distrustful of the government, of the changes in the labour laws, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the proposed competition legislation and of the arrogant use of power in Ottawa. We have witnessed the flight of a great deal of capital from Canada over the last few years and the next year is likely to see a further cut in business.

Last night the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) spoke about social justice. The present government has frozen old age pensions at $80 a month. Let hon. members not forget that the $80 of last year purchases just over $75 worth of goods this year. This situation applies to every pensioner, even those who pass the means test and receive the guaranteed income supplement. The only increase they receive is 2 per cent. That is the social justice that this government talks about!

In one year alone inflation increased nearly 5 per cent, yet we are shortchanging all pensioners in Canada on fixed incomes. Year by year they become poorer. The government talks about economic security, but what about drug care? I think it is worth repeating that the old age pensioner has paid for his pension. It is not a case of their receiving charity; they have been taxed for their pensions and deductions made from their pay cheques. A pensioner who happens to fall just short of qualifying under the means test is finding that his $80 is being rapidly eroded. If inflation continues at the present rate, which is almost 5 per cent a year, it will mean, Mr. Speaker, that by the year 2000 we will require a salary four times what we have today in order to retain the same purchasing power.

Whether or not inflation and unemployment can be solved by this government remains a mystery. The government has shown no capability for coping with the situation even though it has been in power for four years. In the first place the government has taken more and more tax dollars and has spent more and more. The operations of the office of the Prime Minister alone indicate this; his office has increased its expenditures almost ten times.

I was struck by what Mr. Bennett, the Premier of British Columbia, the so-called bigot of British Columbia, had to say in this regard. He pointed out that the federal government and other provinces had spent extravagantly on the furnishing of government offices and increased their hirings of staff much more so than in British Columbia.

The estimates for 1972-73 are up by 10 per cent. This probably means that when the supplementary estimates have been added the increase will be 12 per cent or more before the year is out. It is recognized that government is growing larger and larger. This is true of governments in general, but is probably more the case with the federal government than with any other government. The federal government should at least set an example. Instead it has become larger, more bureaucratic and more inefficient, with little or no knowledge of the people in the hustings who have to work and pay all the bills. It is quite apparent that if the government does not change its direction we are in for very serious trouble.

Today there are more young educated people than we have ever had in this country. But we also have more young educated people without jobs than we have ever had, which represents a tremendous waste of manpower and brains.

Sometimes I wonder just what advice the government receives. The Minister of National Health and Welfare spoke in the House the other day about how deeply concerned he was over the non-medical use of drugs and their effect on society. Then he went on to say that the government was taking action to restrict the use of two types of drugs, the abuse of which had been a public health problem in this country. I refer to methadone and amphetamines. If a little research had been done or a few questions asked of the medical profession, the minister would have discovered that during the last five years doctors have cut use of amphetamines in half, that during the last half of 1971 use had been cut by more than half. Use of this product has been diminishing very fast. In other words, the medical profession has been policing itself. But no, the government had to interfere.

The point I am making is that the minister is only touching the tip of the iceberg, not the part that lies below the surface. The minister should be tackling the problem of drug peddling and other forms of abuse. This is an area he has not touched at all; instead he had to enter the medical field. In spite of the very satisfactory decline in the use of the drug, the government must use the big stick.

In my opinion the minister has taken a very disturbing step. From now on the ordinary practising physician will be unable to prescribe this drug even though, as a result of his training and experience, he feels in all conscience it should be prescribed. He will now have to consult another physician, which in remote places itself creates a problem because doctors are in short supply. How will physicians in such areas be able to get in touch with other consultants? Not only this, but the minister's action, in my opinion, casts a shadow on the competency of the general practitioner who is the backbone of the medical profession.

When I listened to the minister last night expressing his concern I almost shed crocodile tears. Having heard him speaking about drug abuse the other day, I think the people of Canada would be amazed if they looked at the 1972-73 estimates, which were tabled in the House last Wednesday, and found that the government was going to spend $358,000 less on its drug abuse campaign than it spent last year. On the other hand, it has doubled its anti-smoking program to $386,000 but has done very little about it. So when the minister speaks in those terms it makes me question his sincerity. Perhaps he was speaking out of both sides of his mouth.

In his announcement the other day I noticed he referred to the Le Dain commission but he did not mention use of alcohol which the Le Dain commission said was the worst drug of all. It was pointed out by the Le Dain commission that there are over 500,000 alcoholics in the dominion of Canada. I see the Minister of Justice in the House. No, I am sorry, he is not Minister of Justice any more; he has been moved up, and I congratulate the minister on his new appointment because he is a great guy.

As I was saying, there are 500,000 alcoholics in Canada. Since 1951 the drinking of alcoholic beverages has more than doubled. Liquor has become part and parcel of our social life. Many people are able to enjoy a drink and have never any medical problems. However, last year there were over 2,000 deaths in Canada from automobile accidents where alcohol was a related factor. This amounts to over two million man-days lost, costing the economy $40 million.

I am not going to refer to any of the diseases caused by alcohol consumption; they are many and are increasing rapidly, and they are mostly fatal. The point I am making is this: How much money is the government prepared to spend to educate our young people to the dangers presented by the use and abuse of alcohol which, according to the Le Dain commission, is far more dangerous than drug abuse? What is the government doing to assist the young people to adapt themselves realistically to a society which accuses them of using drugs while their parents use alcohol and give them the right to drink at 18, even though the minister cannot enforce a law— and nobody is asking him to—to abolish alcohol as he tried to do with some drugs such as the sugar substitutes?

I hear the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) making some remarks. If he wants to stand up and give us his thoughts, that is all right.

What has the minister done about research into this matter? I am sure the hon. member will support me on this. If he sits and listens he will learn. Surely the minister can do something about research into the dangers of the excessive use of alcohol. The danger not only includes harm to the persons themselves but to other people as well because an alcoholic affects the lives of many others. Fortunately we now regard alcoholism as an illness which should be treated, and more research into alcoholism should be carried out. We should spend more money on research so as to prevent the long list of tragedies that follow in its wake.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rynard: This is not the only area in which the minister lags. He has done little or nothing, even though a Liberal government brought in medicare in 1966, to provide the necessary doctors to carry out the increased work required under medicare and to meet the loss of doctors. Last night the minister said in the House that Canada had one of the highest ratios of doctors to population in the western world. I do not like him to mislead the Canadian people and to put the doctors of this country in a bad light, because that is exactly what he is doing. He is not telling the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rynard: I have here United Nations figures which I will table. They show that in Canada we have one doctor per 890 people. In the United States there is one doctor for every 650 people, in England and Wales one doctor for every 860 people, in Northern Ireland one doctor per 780 people, in Scotland one doctor for 780 people, in Sweden one doctor per 850 people, in West Germany one doctor per 650 people, and in the U.S.S.R. one doctor for every 430 people. The World Health Organization figures show that in Canada there are 120 doctors for every 100,000 people, in the United States there are 130 doctors, in the United Kingdom there are 147 doctors, in France, 154 doctors, in West Germany, 193 doctors, in Israel, 250 doctors, and in the U.S.S.R., 250 doctors per 100,000 population. Eastern Europe which fell so far behind has caught up today and they have a better record in many cases than Canada.

I will table this information because I think the minister should stop this nonsense of saying we have the best record in this respect when this is not so. He is casting a reflection on the doctors of this country. The figures which I have read will appear in Hansard.

The government was to provide medical complexes and to provide teachers and equipment to expand medical schools. What has the minister done in this respect? Year after year we have asked for medical schools to be operated in the summer months so as to step up the graduation of doctors by 30 per cent. What has the government done in this respect? Not one solitary thing. Year after year the minister has been promising to see his colleagues about it, and year after year doctors are left shorthanded and are criticized because there are not enough of them to do the work they are called upon to do.

I remember the time in the House when the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who was the premier of Saskatchewan for many years, said that medicare would increase the workload by approximately 25 per cent. The Hall Commission report recommended that the government get busy at once and increase the number of medical students thus increasing the number of doctors to meet the increasing demands. What has happened? We have only to look at the sorry record. We are importing as many doctors as we are graduating students; about 1,000 doctors were brought into Canada and 1,000 students were graduated with little or no improvement in the situation. A start was to be made at once. We have rejected many of our own students while accepting doctors from other parts of the world who were less well educated that our own. Now the government is talking about medical assistants, about felchers, or whatever you want to call them, who are partially trained doctors or nurses. Would they make house calls? Some three years ago when I was in Washington I was advised by some Russian doctors that they have found the felcher system to be wasteful. The system did not work out so well and sometimes it created problems which took longer to clear up than if qualified doctors had seen the patient in the first place.

The situation we have today has been created as a result of the fact that the emergency units of the hospitals are overcrowded. Many of the units have workloads requiring several doctors and nurses to operate them on an emergency basis. It is grossly unfair to blame the doctors for sloppy work. Their workload has been extended to the point where it is difficult for them to spend the necessary time on a patient or to do a thorough clinical examination, and consequently cases are missed and patients are often seen hurriedly, which leads to expensive medicare. Again and again we find that it is the poor who are suffering and it is they who are going to emergency units in far greater numbers than others. If we look at the record of admissions to hospitals we see that there are three or four times as many poor and underprivileged as there are well to do people.

I was interested to hear the minister say last night that the department would set up clinics to practise preventive medicine. May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PRIVILEGE

MR. STANFIELD—ALLEGED DELETION FROM "HANSARD"

Mr. Speaker: Before we call it one o'clock may I refer to a point of order which was raised earlier today at the opening of our proceedings in the House. The Leader of the Opposition raised a question about a deletion from yesterday's Hansard relating to an exchange between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. I indicated at the time that I would look into the matter. Since then I have had the official record examined and no evidence could be found of any deletion from the record. I have the assurance of the Editor of Debates that what appears in Hansard of yesterday is an accurate report of yesterday's proceedings.

It being one o'clock I now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ross Whicher for an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General in reply to his speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, before the noon adjournment I was mentioning the shortage of doctors. To recapitulate, I point out that national medicare was introduced by the parliament of Canada. Once that was done, it became the responsibility of parliament to see that sufficient doctors were provided to implement the findings of the Hall Commission report which formed the basis for medicare. But in the intervening years, no real attempt has been made to provide sufficient doctors.

We need at least 2,000 more physicians per year to maintain the current level of health services, and the current level is inadequate. This does not take into account the number of physicians who go into administration, do research, or undertake the education of other doctors. We must also keep in mind the fact that approximately 50 per cent of our physicians are only in general practice. To illustrate how we are meeting the need, I point out that last year we graduated 1,152 new doctors, but we needed 2,000. I see the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) looking at me when I say this because he knows that we imported another 1,113 doctors, a lot of whom came from countries that could ill afford to lose them, and from countries whose requirements for entrance to medical school are lower than the requirements of Canadian medical schools.

Furthermore, I point out that only four out of every ten students who applied were accepted for Canadian medical schools. It is not a question of our having insufficient numbers to enter medical schools. I repeat that only four out of ten were accepted. The reason for this was that the government did not provide the necessary health resources fund to make available the spaces and the universities to train all the students we should have taken. That is the real problem. Neither did the government give the universities or students the money and facilities to continue their training during the summer semester.

The health resources fund must be expanded to cope with all the students who wish to go into medicine. Some of those in government and universities say that doctors cannot be adequately trained in such a way, but I point to our performance during the last war. The doctors who at that time finished their courses in four years have not taken second place to any who were trained under the six-year plan, either before or since then. Those who graduated after four years had put in the necessary hours of training. Last year 600 Canadian students possessing all the basic qualifications adequate to go into medicine were rejected, yet I repeat that we accepted 1,100 immigrants from outside the country. In actual fact, we turned down our own Canadian boys and girls. I repeat that 50 per cent of our doctors specialize, or engage in administrative insurance and other fields.

I now wish to deal for a few minutes with the bureaucracy that has crept in under the national medicare plan as a result of the number of forms used. Forms have become very important and when patients are transferred from one place to another these forms have to be filled out in duplicate. I am sure the hon. member for Hull will substantiate this. I have been told by doctors in practice, as he is, that 10 per cent to 20 per cent of their time is spent just filling out forms. This adds to their expenses and leaves them less time to practise medicine. People are getting a little bit fed up with this situation.

In the province of Ontario it costs the taxpayers around $50,000 to train a doctor. People are saying it is easier to get their car serviced than it is to get medical service. Surely, that situation has to be corrected. The high-sounding platitudes spoken by the minister last night are not going to solve the problem. What has been accomplished in his four years as minister? Let him state just one thing that has been achieved in this field. He talks about community clinics but if there are not enough doctors now to look after the sick, who is going to staff the community clinics? How does he propose to set them up and to service them? I agree with the principle of preventative medicine, but where are we going to get the doctors to put it into practice. Is the minister going to have these doctors on duty every hour of the day and let all the people who are too ill to go to a clinic die without any attention? He says there is too much treating of the sick in hospitals already, so what is he going to do when there are not enough doctors to discover and treat incipient disease. He has not prepared for that day as was recommended in the Hall commission report.

This government stands condemned at the bar of justice for what they have done to the medical profession by not supplying more doctors and for what they have done for the people of Canada under medical care by not providing the doctors to give adequate medical care, either for sickness or prevention.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so in order to advise him that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. members for Bruce and Trois-Rivières (Mr. Whicher and Mr. Lajoie), who performed their task with great intelligence and integrity.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the accomplishments of the government speak for themselves and many members on the government side have referred to them in the last few days, particularly since the Speech from the Throne, so I feel there is no need for me to reiterate at the moment. However, I shall do so in my own constituency because I believe that the people of Canada should be well informed at all times. Statements about events can certainly be slanted so badly by members of the opposition that I believe we have a responsibility to go back to our constituencies and put the record straight by telling our constituents how things are in a straight and orderly fashion.

After listening to the speech of the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), I should like to congratulate him. Not only did he give the true story of what has taken place in his department, but he also gave the true explanation of what is taking place in various parts of Canada with regard to development, particularly in the DREE areas.

On the other hand, the members of the loyal opposition since 1968 have done nothing but criticize government policies. In all fairness, I must agree that it is the role of the opposition to criticize but what has the loyal opposition offered as concrete, sensible suggestions? Most of the time they talk about doom and gloom—the same old story, the same old speeches. If you took their speeches from one day to the other, put them all in a bag and mixed them up and then took out the words one by one you would get a repetition of the same old thing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): There has been no change since 1968; in fact, there has been no change since 1962-63. They are still talking about the short time when they were the government. I think they are still dreaming about it and are not doing the constructive job that they should as the loyal opposition. They rearrange their speeches, possibly with a few more words, but they all have the same meaning, the same criticism, the same lack of feasible suggestion.

As an example, let me refer to their own convention held last December 5, 6 and 7 at the Chateau Laurier. I have here a few notes extracted from the various reports and papers. The subject of prime interest to the delegates was Canada's economic independence, the guaranteed annual income, tax bill C-259 and auto-determination for Quebec, but the delegates were so mixed up, Mr. Speaker, they did not know which way they were going. The delegates were not of one mind, the story went, about whether anything at all needed to be done about the extent of foreign ownership of the economy. It was also fairly clear that more of them supported a moderate form of economic nationalism. For example, the first resolution on Canadian economic independence stated that the federal and provincial governments should take urgent steps to reach a consensus on long-term economic and political independence in Canada.

I am now speaking of the Conservatives, the loyal opposition, Mr. Speaker. Disagreement amongst them on the subject of taxation was so widespread that their committee on economic affairs held a special debate on the subject. Many delegates wanted taxes to be cut but could not agree on how much or the way in which it should be done. Others argued that the government must cut back on spending, but again they did not know how to do it. Discussion on the tax bill was mostly negative. May I repeat that last word—negative. I do not hear too much hollering this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, because there are so few members in the House. I am surprised that they do not come and listen to some of the backbenchers once in a while.

The question of the guaranteed annual income scheme was first raised by Mr. Stanfield in 1969 and created a conflict between left and right wing Conservatives in their own committee discussions. As a result on the final ballot there was a resolution indicating the need for a guaranteed annual income.

I could go on and indicate that the members of the loyal opposition do not agree amongst themselves on their own policy. In fact, they have not got any policy. They do not agree on it, Mr. Speaker. They do not agree on leadership, either. I could go on about that particular convention. It was said that it was the dullest event that occurred in Ottawa that week. Unless you were a Conservative and attending that convention, by gosh, you did not know it was going on.

An hon. Member: Stay in there, Joe.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The opposition, Mr. Speaker, has framed no understandable policy on the nation's basic problems. I see some hon. members want to enter the chamber. There are so few opposition members here that I welcome them.

Mr. Paproski: Stick to your speech.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I can give as good as I get, so I ask the hon. member to be careful in what he says. The opposition, may I repeat, has not framed an understandable policy with respect to the nation's basic problems. It has contrived no specific issue and has relied, so far, only on the government's unpopularity, a negative and dubious assumption.

I wish to refer to the challenge thrown out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), as recorded in Hansard for February 18, page 36, in the bottom paragraph of the right hand column.

> I challenge the Conservatives, Mr. Speaker, to describe honestly and candidly to the Canadian people what their posture towards the United States would be in this difficult negotiation. Would they have gone to Washington cap in hand, to employ their own phrase, and agreed to a forced upward valuation of the dollar in order to prove their friendship with the United States? We didn't, and we did not endanger Canada's good standing with the United States in any way by not doing so.

The Prime Minister went on to say—

Mr. Woolliams: Good for him.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I see the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has come in. It is nice to see him in the House on any afternoon. The Prime Minister went on and said:

> Would the Conservatives have made unilateral trade concessions in order to free us of the requirement of tough bargaining? We didn't, and we don't intend to do so now. Just what is the stand of the Conservatives. A sell-out to the Americans to prove friendship? Or do they secretly admire the way in which the government has handled these negotiations but are too small to say so publicly?

The Prime Minister also said, as recorded at page 37 of Hansard:

> If the opposition parties disagree, then I wish they would address themselves to that issue and those objectives and stop chasing their colourful theories.

My question then is, Mr. Speaker, why has this challenge not been taken up by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition? Why is it that when challenges have been thrown out by the Prime Minister and other ministers in this House, the loyal opposition has not at any time taken them up? I also wish to ask members of the loyal opposition and their leader if they would like to tell the House what their party policies are on such matters as foreign ownership in the economy?

Mr. Forrestall: What are yours?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What is their policy on taxation?

Mr. Forrestall: What are yours?

Mr. Woolliams: We know what your policies are.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What is their policy on a guaranteed income?

Mr. Forrestall: What is yours?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What is their policy on abortion, or legalization of certain drugs?

Mr. Forrestall: What is yours?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What is their policy, Mr. Speaker, pertaining to the two famous words they have used for many years, "two nations;" and last, but not least, what is their policy on bilingualism?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I have listened to hon. members opposite all week, and some of them do not seem to know of the great unity which has been established in Canada by this government. Every single Conservative who has spoken in the House of Commons in the last few days, with the possible exception of the last speaker, has done harm to the cause of Canadian unity. They could not accept a bill which was passed in this House with their own approbation. I am talking about the bilingualism bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Many hon. members opposite have spoken against it in the last few days. That is typical of the Tory party, which always speaks with a forked tongue. Hon. members use a different language when they speak outside this House.

Mr. Paproski: Don't bother speaking about bilingualism, speak about bread and butter.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am talking about bread and butter. You need it, too, mister. If I were like the hon. member, I would go without butter.

Mr. Paproski: Shame.

Mr. Woolliams: You look pretty healthy, too, Joe.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Perhaps the problems I have spoken about are too complicated, too difficult and too involved for the loyal opposition to understand or deal with. Perhaps that is why the opposition has not offered—I repeat, has not offered—concrete, sensible and feasible suggestions to this House and the Canadian people. That is why they have not accepted—

Mr. Woolliams: The so-called just society.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is why they have not accepted the Prime Minister's challenge. It would be too difficult for them to understand. They cannot formulate a policy and let the nation know about it. May I repeat this, to emphasize it. I am not the only one making such statements. Bruce Hutchison, in last night's Ottawa Journal, examined this situation carefully and said that the opposition had offered nothing concrete, sensible or feasible to this House.

Mr. Forrestall: He is one of the leading Liberal spokesman.

Mr. Woolliams: But Mr. Hutchison is not unbiased.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): If the Conservative party cannot agree on its own policies, how can it ever offer constructive criticism on the government's policies? The opposition has done just the opposite by slanting and ridiculing our just society. The good will and support of everyone, and particularly of the opposition, are needed if we are ever to realize the just society.

Mr. Forrestall: That will be the day.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, to illustrate the attitude of the opposition may I say that when the House was requested by His Excellency, the Governor General of Canada, to proceed to the other place to hear the Speech from the Throne—

Mr. Woolliams: There was nothing in it.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): —on Thursday, February 17, most members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition opposite me did not attend. Why, Mr. Speaker? Why did they not attend en bloc, as they say in French. In other words, en bloc they protested and did not attend the Senate; this is true of all except one of their members who went there humbly, cap in hand, as did their leader. Why did they stay away from the Senate en bloc? This was a direct insult levelled at Her Majesty, the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This was showing disrespect to Her Majesty the Queen, to the Senate and to the Governor General of Canada.

Mr. Forrestall: There speaks a great monarchist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Shame on you, Joe. They will never believe that in St. Boniface.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, they did not attend the Senate en bloc, thereby showing disrespect to Her Majesty the Queen, His Excellency the Governor General and the Senate of Canada.

Mr. Nesbitt: Joe, you pay attention and I will drive.

• (1430)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): In the same breath, the opposition tells the House and the public that it is concerned about the coat of arms on RCM Police cars and that we on the government sides are against the monarchy. This confirms once and for all that the loyal opposition is only playing politics. They are not sincere with the people they represent. They are not even sincere when they talk about the monarchy, or they would have attended the Senate as a loyal opposition normally does.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): There is no doubt some members of the loyal opposition are sincere and do a good job. There are a few. However, when only the leader attends the Senate, that is very bad. This is the first time I have seen so many members opposite present in the chamber.

Mr. Forrestall: It is all because of you.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I would like to raise another matter. I wish to quote from a newspaper. I got this idea from members opposite who are always quoting from newspapers. They could not make a decent speech without quoting something. If they did not have an editorial staff to write their speeches, editorials and articles in the press, we would gain at least three quarters of the time we are now losing by listening to members opposite quoting from newspapers during their speeches. I felt that possibly I should do the same once—so that they could see what it is like.

An hon. Member: You do not have a very good audience.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): They are not very appreciative of this fact.

Mr. Forrestall: No one over there is paying attention to you.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Recently, the Prime Minister was criticized. He was quoted as saying that British Columbia adopted a bigoted attitude towards bilingualism.

Mr. Woolliams: He called Bennett a bigot.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Is that it? Stand up and correct that statement for me. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) will do it for me.

Mr. Woolliams: We will get the facts straight for you.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The opposition does not practice what it preaches. They also speak while remaining seated, but that is all right; I am used to that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are honest, Joe.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to an article published in Le Soleil, the only French-language newspaper in British Columbia. The few lines I have here reflect the feelings of the Francophones not only in British Columbia, but throughout Canada and more particularly in western Canada.

Here is what they say:

> The attitude of the provincial government toward French Canadians must change, and the best time for it is now.
> The general public in British Columbia seems to worry about the fact that their premier was described as he appears to be; that reaction is unfortunate and somewhat exaggerated when the incident is seen in context. The general public should worry instead about the discrimination against an official minority in the province, discrimination that starts in the very denial of the existence of that minority. We can start remedying this situation by promoting adequate teaching in and of French in our schools, and by supporting rather than hampering the efforts of existing French Canadian institutions and their culture in British Columbia.

Mr. Trudeau has drawn public attention on the well known fact that the government of British Columbia is working very hard to hamper anything French. Let us note the fact that so far, nobody has yet rejected the charge that the head of the provincial government is following a course which seems based on ignorance and narrow-mindedness. The people around him justify his attitudes and policy despite their lack of soundness.

> He maintains that French Canadians—the one million of them outside Quebec and more particularly the 90,000-odd in British Columbia—have no right outside Quebec and must accept that.
> It can certainly be recognized that it is increasingly urgent and essential that French Canadians be entitled to their language and their culture throughout Canada—even in British Columbia—or else we are going toward fragmentation of our country.
> So far, extremists, whether English- or French-speaking, have not been successful in dividing us and they will not sunder us if moderate men are sufficiently anxious to work against any policy of division or discrimination which might exist in our province.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to keep on quoting the article of the same paper:

> In order to clarify any misunderstanding, let us mention that there are close to 90,000 French Canadians living in British Columbia, and more than one million outside Quebec, in the nine other provinces.
> To put everything into perspective, six of the Canadian provinces have fewer than one million inhabitants, so the million of French Canadians outside Quebec is an important group indeed.
> The federal policy on bilingualism is undoubtedly favourable to Quebec and a critical factor for the survival of French Canadians outside Quebec.
> Bilingualism is of primary importance for the 1,000,000 French-speaking Canadians residing outside Quebec, and no anti-Quebec sentiment should enter the discussion merely to justify an anti-French-Canadian policy in British Columbia.
> That province's government does not provide adequate opportunities for the teaching of French, either to French Canadians or to English Canadians, and an anti-Quebec feeling can no longer justify such a deplorable situation.
> If Premier Bennett is not a bigot, let him prove it through his policy, because it is only through this that we will be able to judge.

[English]

I think that really tells the story of how people feel. This editorial was written by a Francophone in British Columbia. The same applies to other Francophone groups in western Canada, including Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta where they are certainly numerous. I deplore the fact that after having voted for unity and bilingualism in Canada, some members of the loyal opposition make statements that are contrary to the principles they have supported. In fact, this is evident from what they have said in the past few days. The members of the opposition should either put up or shut up. They should tell the Prime Minister, if they accept his challenge, what they would do if they formed the government. Then, they might make a valuable contribution to proper legislation being passed in this House. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that this was a forum in which to discuss policies and all kinds of problems. I think it is also a responsibility to come up with something that is sensible. They should make sensible suggestions and not just speak for the sake of speaking.

I would like to speak briefly about something which has been on my mind for a long time, the old age pension. I do not always agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I somewhat agree with his philosophies in this regard. I will support an increase in the old age pension. I would certainly be pleased if this came about and I will make personal representations to the government in that regard. I will make every attempt to do so when the occasion arises. Rest assured that I will do this. I can speak just as loud in caucus as I do in the House.

There is one further thought I have. I would suggest to the government that a lot of consideration be given to the implementation of wage and price controls. I am one who believes that the sooner this is done the better it will be. There are many other things I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members. Perhaps I shall have a chance to do so later on. I shall finish up by saying to the Leader of the Opposition that the sooner he accepts the challenge of the Prime Minister, the sooner I shall take my hat off to him.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was not in the chamber to hear the closing remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken in order to learn something of the way in which political parties should act before and during an election campaign by setting out their policies in detail. In 1968, if I recall correctly, the Prime Minister said: I have no policy; I promise you nothing; I will give you the just society. Well, it is not just for us in western Canada. It is not just for those who are unemployed. It is not just for those in the Atlantic provinces. It has turned out to be just for Grits.

I want to deal, now, with one or two matters of very deep concern to my country. I have been in this House a long while and I intend to stay a long while longer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In spite of the vicissitudes of public life, with one party or another being in power, I have never known my country to be in the doldrums as it is today.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Many members opposite who groan will be groaning on election night because they will not be here. Everywhere in our country, men and women of all political faiths, are asking: Where are we going? They have a deep sense of fear. There is none of that pride in Canadianism which has been ours throughout the years, and which was shown to all the world at Expo '67 which my government had the honour to bring about.

I see parliament. What is it? A caricature of the institution it should be. The Prime Minister yesterday made a statement in this House indicating peevishness, pettiness, with profanity. That observation will, I am sure, have the same effect as the short statement by the Right Honourable Mackenzie King in 1930 had on the Liberal party of that day. As I go across the country, I meet older Canadians as well as the youth of our nation. I have always been very proud of them and I am more so with the passing of days. They want to do something for Canada. There are about 4 per cent who want to create trouble, but the rest are motivated by tremendous dedication to the building of Canada. They want to bring about changes and bring them about by democratic means. They come here and they sit in the galleries of the House of Commons. And they leave asking: What manner of institution is this?

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

The hon. member who preceded me said that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition did not have the regard for the Queen and for the monarchy that we should have. I find it difficult to understand that anyone could be suffering such a degree of innocence as was displayed by the hon. member in those words. The subject of Her Majesty the Queen has come to the fore with the approach of the election. She was left out of the Speech from the Throne in 1969. The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who has the custody of the Seal of Canada, voted for the abolition of the monarchy. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) did the same. The Prime Minister was asked whether he had voted and he said he had not. But he went on to explain that he had less regard for the monarchy than he had for skiing or even for snowshoeing.

Just follow the peregrinations of this government. One day the monarchy is condemned. The next, the Speech from the Throne refers to the fact that the Governor General is thanking parliament in the name of the Queen. A little later on in that speech, Her Majesty becomes "Our gracious Queen". So it is in almost every field, with the Prime Minister making statements one way today and then saying the very opposite tomorrow. That tortuous course was suggested 500 years ago by Machiavelli, who said, in effect, let the people understand what you are doing and you will encounter difficulties. Parliament is one day lauded to the skies by the Prime Minister and the next day members of the House of Commons are described as nobodies. This institution is the only place in which the freedom of the country can be maintained and continued; there is no other.

Now, there is a great national movement underway to build up the Prime Minister. I read that the president of the Liberal Association, Senator Stanbury, said: "We have to build him up". Then, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) uttered some immortal words. I am sorry to see he is not here today as a result of circumstances that I hope turn out favourably, but quoting him—because, after all, he is worthy of quotation—he said: "Greater faith must be built in the Prime Minister". That shows that some of the Liberals are beginning to need that inculcation. He said he was tired of hearing that the Prime Minister had feet of clay. Only deities do not, Mr. Speaker.

Today in the city of Ottawa there are a number of United States press and radio men who have been brought here for the purpose of seeing the Prime Minister at first hand. Many of the papers of these representatives have agents in the press gallery, but that is not good enough. Do you know the reason they are here, Mr. Speaker? It is because the Prime Minister is trying to make the United States forget the fact that when he was in the U.S.S.R. he said: "We fear the United States culturally"—and I can understand that—"and we fear the United States economically"—and I can understand that. Then he said: "yes, and even militarily". I say there never was a more dastardly statement made of the United States anywhere, any time, by any person. That is why their newspapermen are here today, for the purpose of learning at first hand that the exact opposite of what was said is the truth.

I have a great admiration for adroitness, providing it is accompanied by truthfulness. I have been watching the Prime Minister in action and have heard him say one thing and then the very opposite. I often think as I watch him in action that he epitomizes the game we used to play as boys called fox and hounds, in which the fox scattered the paper around indiscriminately in order to deceive those who were the hounds, to mislead them. That is what is happening here.

The cabinet has been shuffled around. The Prime Minister took the deck and shuffled it. He added one that added nothing and shuffled the rest. I have played cards from time to time but have never known anyone, however often he shuffled, who could turn four deuces into four aces. I allow my hon. friends opposite to place themselves or their colleagues in the particular categories.

We have today a cabinet that is noted for its absenteeism, not for good reason but just to avoid having to answer questions. However, there is one minister for whom I have a great deal of admiration, and I refer to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). I knew him before he became a Liberal, at the time he was a labour leader. Today, he is a minister of the Crown. Can you conceive of a minister of the Crown, Mr. Speaker, with hundreds of millions of dollars to expend, being the leader of his party in the province of Quebec, sending out over his own signature requests for Liberal party funds? Here is what his letter said, in part:

Funds must be available so that the work of the party, in the next few months, may be adequately financed.

This is a course of action that is dangerous to parliament and is something that cannot be condoned. It must have been approved by the cabinet or it would not have been done, and indicates the degree to which this government by insidious methods will place many companies in the position where they will have to contribute, or at least will find that to contribute will be conducive to receiving contracts. Such a course is inexcusable, reprehensible, and cannot be justified in any way.

Since the hon. gentleman who preceded me dealt with the subject, may I too, refer to the Queen. We all know what the government has done with the coat of arms. Only a few ministers have the coat of arms on their letterheads today. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has part of a flag with a tractor going through it. I do not know whether it is an imported tractor, but it indicates an attitude of mind on the part of all. Although the Prime Minister has not yet removed the coat of arms, others have.

The abolition of the monarchy, may I mention, was in the minds of the Liberal party on December 13, 1968. After all, there was criticism from the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who is always going around with a scholastic egotism which I like to watch. He now has control over the CBC. I do not know whether he has control over that other gentleman of the Cité Libre, Mr. Gagnon, but I intend to deal with him shortly since his past record qualifies him in every respect for consideration.

Let me quote from Time magazine for the date I mentioned in 1968:

Last week, thinking aloud in the Liberal caucus, the P.M. said that the government hopes to "Canadianize" the monarchy by quietly "depersonalizing" the Queen's role in favour of more emphasis on the constitutional position of the Governor General—by, for example, replacing the name of the Queen with that of the Governor General on all official documents.

It was said that this could not be in their minds. Then, the government came out later on with its organization of the government of Canada, a large volume that comes out each year. I venture the opinion that few of the members supporting the government have ever looked at it, and certainly we followed suit. It is simply a conglomeration of information. In January 1969, the statements in it followed the Provisions of the British North America Act. It stated:

The Executive Government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

That has been erased. It now says that the cabinet is actually in charge of the executive. If you follow it along, you see what has happened. The Governor General cannot do anything except that which his ministers permit him to do. He is the representative of the Queen. He is not the leader of this nation. He is not a head of state. Yet, in 1971 he was in Iran at their twenty five hundredth anniversary. There were three categories of guests invited: royalty, heads of state and representatives of heads of state. The Governor General of Australia was in the third category, but the Governor General of Canada was there as a head of state.

The direction of the movement is obvious, but suddenly the Prime Minister changes his mind. His actions can almost be compared to those of Saul on the way to Damascus. After having criticized the monarchy, both directly and by imputation, the Prime Minister now in 1972 says that he will not abolish the monarchy. He has made a sudden discovery that he cannot do it. The only way in which the Crown can be abolished is by a vote of the House of Commons, the Senate and all the provinces. So, he comes out in his white shining armour and says "I am all for the Queen", and she gets triple mention in the 1972 Speech from the Throne, but there was no mention of her two years ago.

Now, I come to a matter that has been up several times, that is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I have listened to what the Prime Minister said outside the House. I wish he would say some of those things in the House, and then I would operate without anaesthetic. Let him say them, even if he reads them, in the House of Commons. Does he like the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Some hon. Members: Sure.

Mr. Gibson: Oui, pourquoi non?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not. I will tell you why not. I am glad the hon. member asked. Has he forgotten that in the days of war the Prime Minister rode around the city of Montreal on a motorcycle wearing a Nazi cap?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member wanted information. I know he does not want it now. The Prime Minister rode around the city wearing a Nazi cap in order to tease the mounted police.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The interruptions indicate that ignorance is still a qualification for membership on the other side of the House. They say today that the change so far as the RCMP is concerned was evolved three years ago. Of course, someone had to be blamed, so the mounted police are blamed. If it was evolved three years ago, why is it that the cars purchased in 1972 with the RCMP sign on the side have had the sign repainted at a cost of $100 each?

Mr. Gibson: So people would know it meant police, people who are not Canadians, people who travel around; that is why.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to know that the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) knows one thing because up to the present time I have not heard any suggestion from him that would indicate acquaintance with or knowledge of anything else. When I heard of this sign in Saskatoon, I wrote to the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer). Mind you, the story now is that although the change has been in effect for three years, it has not been enforced. When I was in Calgary, I saw the sign at the airport which has the coat of arms with RCMP written under it. This has not been changed because there would be a second northwest rebellion if they did change it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: They have no regard for the west.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked the Solicitor General to explain in a letter which I wrote to him on January 17. I pointed out to him that there was no reference to the RCMP on the sign. It had the crest with the word "police" under it. I wrote:

> Why is there no reference to it being a detachment of the RCM police? Is this the result of policy?

I did not receive any reply on January 17. Yet, they had the answers. If the story they are telling today is true, why did they not give it? It took two telephone calls to prod them into giving an answer. This was before they worked out this latest alibi for what has been done. The answer stated:

> I am informed that this detachment displays the new sign designed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to blend with contemporary buildings.

That was the explanation, and it indicates, of course, that the sign was designed by the RCMP. They have to blame somebody. There are no other buildings there, but within the same building is the Royal Bank of Canada. The word "Royal" is still permitted there. The explanation that was given to me tells the story of the falsity of what is endeavoured today to fool the Canadian people. I simply say through you, Sir, to the government of Canada: your conduct toward the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has lost you hundreds of thousands of votes, not only in western Canada but throughout Canada, and you cannot alibi yourselves out of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is this new force that has been set up?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Nielsen: The super-duper snooper force.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right. The description of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is well taken. But it is interesting that the government did not know there was such a thing. On January 29 I directed a question to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp). It was in connection with the civilian secret service being established to replace the RCMP security and intelligence agency. Finally, the former minister of manpower and immigration said there was nothing to that. Then, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) asked about it and received much the same answer. But the Prime Minister said:

> Here again I think there is a misunderstanding. This is not a separate security force as the hon. member seemed to understand. It is a small co-ordinating body to make sure that the ministers in the cabinet have information collected from various sources including the RCMP so that the government will be better informed on the facts spread around in the various government departments.

Somebody asked the Prime Minister who was going to head it. He asked:

> Who is going to head the non-force, Mr. Speaker, a non-head?

The person who answers to that description, of course, is the Solicitor General. Then, Douglas Fisher, an astute member of the press gallery and a one time member of parliament wrote:

> I understand that the new departmental group is to have a permanent advisory function but that its first assignment is to recommend changes in the composition and operation of the RCMP.

• (1510)

They don't like the RCMP. As long as the RCMP is in charge, there is no danger in our country from communism. But it wasn't sufficient.

Then, the Solicitor General stepped in and explained away the unexplainable in these words, to be found at page 7699, and here he was quoting the Prime Minister:

> The security service, under the Commissioner of the RCMP, will be increasingly separate in structure and civilian in nature.

In his own words, he said:

> That principle remains. It is respected, and the fact that a research and planning group has been put in action does not change anything in the basic principle expressed by the Prime Minister.
> I would add that there is no question of this group directing police operations as such. As a matter of fact, as is indicated by its name, it is a research group, a planning group that will be mainly concerned with analysis.

The black cat gets out of the bag in the next sentence.

> In fact, what are the true responsibilities of this working group? First of all, to compile information and not to go and find it; also to set up some police services. The information will be provided mainly by the RCMP, of course, as well as by the Armed Forces, other departments that have information relating to the security of the country as well as by provincial government and other sources accessible to the public.
> It should then assess this information and call for additional information should the data obtained be inadequate. Finally, it should analyse the information as a whole, not merely from a strict police point of view, but in a much wider spirit, that is taking into consideration social, economic and political factors.

That is where the truth gets out. This force that has been set up is investigating. It is a force away from the RCMP, and among other things it is supposed to look into political matters. When one thinks how that murderer was given such fine attention that he was able to escape from the penitentiary, one wonders whether that comes under the heading of a much wider spirit which is included in the phrase "social, economic and political factors."

The Prime Minister said it is not true. He said the big lie shocks him. If he were here today, I would deal with that question at length. The truth is that every person in this country who has looked at the new RCMP badge knows that the designation "Royal Canadian Mounted Police" is out, excepting for the coat of arms. And the reason given is that the people, when they are looking for the police, do not know what RCMP means. That is what the Prime Minister said the other day. He said, "It is false. We have not done anything."

I have here a picture from the Toronto Star, Mr. Speaker. I cannot put it on the Hansard record; I wish I could. It shows the Solicitor General looking at a sign. This is the sign with the Coat of Arms and "Police." There is nothing else. What is being done in this case is undermining the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and then the government explains it by saying the Royal Canadian Mounted Police thought they would like the change made. Can the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police say that? A few months ago he pointed out that if an embassy were opened in Ottawa by China, it would be a breeding place for agitators. He was immediately told, "Shut your mouth and never talk again." Yet now, these same people come along and, to exculpate themselves with respect to the dastardly deed that has been committed, they say, "After all, the Mounted Police wanted it done."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I must interrupt the right hon. member, the time allotted to him having expired, unless he gets the unanimous consent of the House to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give unanimous consent to the right hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, Sir, I will move away from Canada to the international field, but only for a short time. I do not think I have ever known my country to be lower in prestige internationally than it is today. The statement by the Prime Minister that we feared the United States militarily was one that shocked the sensibilities not only of Americans but of free men everywhere in the world.

Then, there was the other statement made by the Prime Minister when he was asked by Ukrainian Canadians, and Ukrainians from other parts of the world, to bring to the attention of the Soviet authorities what was taking place today, not only in the Ukraine but throughout the captive nations of the world. Kosygin, when he was here, said he loved peace. How he must have laughed when he said that. Today Brezhnev and Kosygin are reviving the Stalinist repression that seemed to end with the elevation of Khrushchev to authority.

In the case of the Ukrainian people, 11 of their leaders have been arrested, not because of their advocacy of revolution but because they have been critical of the Soviet government's failure to live up to its pledged principles in the United Nations. There is a new wave of Russian persecutions against Ukrainians. The intellectuals who speak out are accused of dealing in anti-Soviet propaganda. The Sovier courts are applying a new rule and imposing additional sentences for acts allegedly committed against Soviet society while an accused is in prison. I can give example after example. One is Valentyn Moroz, a young Hungarian historian, who was sentenced in 1970 to nine years of hard labour for writing a report about Beria Reserve while serving a previous sentence of four years in that prison camp. I have the list here of free men, many of them communists, who are being put in jail without trial.

The World Congress of Free Ukrainians wishes to have this matter fully investigated. I intend to do what I can in that connection, it having honoured me by naming me as the national chairman. I will do what I can to assure those who love freedom, as we love freedom, in the Ukraine and in the Baltic countries of Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia, and in other countries that are under communist domination, that what is wrong will be revealed.

People ask where does the Prime Minister come in on this? I do not want to quote at length, but I will quote what he said when he was asked by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) what he was going to do about it, and what he had done. As reported on May 31 he said he had little sympathy with nationalists in Canada or the Soviet Union. He said:

> I quite frankly avoided talking about that. I tried to get some data which would permit me to talk about it on a basis on which I felt really involved and convinced, and—quite frankly—couldn't take up the causes, several of which were put to me, that I should protest in favour of so-and-so and so-and-so who had been jailed because of their nationalistic beliefs.
> My position in the Soviet Union or in Canada is that anyone who breaks the law to assert his nationalism does not get too much sympathy from me.

In 1958, he said that everyone had the right to oppose any law if he did not agree with it.

Again, according to the report on May 31, he said:

> I didn't particularly feel like bringing up any cases which would have caused Mr. Brezhnev or Mr. Kosygin to say: 'Well you know, why did you put in jail certain FLQ leaders? After all they think they are only fighting for the independence of Quebec. Our people say they are fighting for the independence of the Ukraine. Why should you put your revolutionaries in jail and we shouldn't put ours?

• (1520)

That statement was an insult to every Canadian of Ukrainian origin and to every other Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is equating the murderers and kidnappers with intellectuals who are simply advocating that the law be lived up to. Then, when the Prime Minister got into difficulty about that he said "I really didn't mean that". The same old equivocal course. Say the thing, have the accolade of Kosygin placed upon the brow for having said it, then say "I really didn't mean it". If I say that he must have meant it somebody might say that I have partisan reasons, but I will quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of June 2, 1971. This newspaper is an avowed and dedicated supporter of the Liberal party but an article in it reads:

> Prime Minister Trudeau's unfortunate comparison between the Ukrainian nationalists and the FLQ in Quebec is beyond comprehension.

And later, in the same article:

> The Ukrainian nationalists were arrested because they strove to keep alive Ukrainian culture, language and literature in an increasingly Russian environment.

Perhaps the Prime Minister has forgotten the millions of dollars spent on the B and B commission for an analogous performance if he is really seeking analogies. Then, in the same article:

> To compare these Ukrainian martyrs with a misguided band of kidnappers and assassins is not only an insult to the Ukrainian intellectuals and their kin, but a slap in the face of every democrat who abhors totalitarian tyranny.

Having got himself in that difficulty, he followed his usual course. He brought the leaders of the Canadian Ukrainian Committee to Ottawa and told them that he loved them, that what he said was misunderstood. But no amount of charisma can explain away what took place when he dared say this to people with that little flame of freedom before them. Many of them were martyred. Today thousands are in danger and hundreds have been picked up recently. Why has the Canadian government not pointed this out at the United Nations? They have never said a word, not one word. When Khrushchev was there in September, 1960, I mentioned the awfulness of the course of these people, and I was told by the highest ecclesiastics that the change that took place thereafter was amazing because public opinion in every other part of the world does affect the Soviet Union. This country has half a million Ukrainians, some of whom are our finest citizens and have served our country tremendously in days of war as they served in peace. It is beyond me to contemplate why the Prime Minister should have engaged in the blackmail of untruth.

I told you, Your Honour, that I would only take a few minutes. I thank the House for its consideration in permitting me extra time.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex): Mr. Speaker, I rarely speak in this House and I rarely speak after one so well known as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), but I think I would be remiss if I did not comment on some of the statements he made. One of the things he seemed to try to get across was that the image of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the United States was not good.

An hon. Member: It is not.

Mr. Whelan: I can tell you that a recent article written by an American reporter in the Detroit Free Press indicated that as far as many people in that area were concerned, they would trade two states of the union, the President of the United States, several senators and two or three of the United States largest corporations if Prime Minister Trudeau would go to their country and run it for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I live in an area that is very close to United States. We do not always agree with the United States, but I do know the feelings of the people in that part of North America.

An hon. Member: We will give him away.

Mr. Whelan: They do not think the way the right hon. gentleman tried to say they do when he talked about our international image. I have not travelled very far but I have travelled in different parts of this country. I know that a delegation of young people is getting ready to go to Europe. How do I know they are going to Europe? Mr. Speaker, they did not ask for the badge of the red ensign or anything else, but they asked if I could get them some Canadian flag pins or maple leaf pins so they would be recognized in Europe as Canadians. That is what they wanted.

I thought also when the right hon. gentleman mentioned how the Ukrainians and some of the other people suffered, and none of us are denying they have suffered, that he would tell us about some of the other historical events of which some of us are not aware, such as what is happening in Northern or occupied Ireland. I thought he would tell us the background of that country which has been suppressed for over 700 years.

When the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) was speaking, someone said that we should talk about bread and butter. That is what I am going to do in my speech now. I shall try to stick to the bread and butter issues in which I think some Canadians are interested. Some of us use a different terminology and say bread on the table and shoes on the baby.

I want to thank the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne for their fine contributions. I have known the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) for many years, even before he knew me. I used to watch him in the Ontario legislative assembly when I was attending junior farm meetings. He was not much older than I but he was always well respected and admired for his free-wheeling, knowledgeable way of speaking in the Ontario legislature. I know most of us who have listened to him and read his speeches here are aware of the ability he has shown in this House, too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I do not know the hon. member for Trois-Rivieres (Mr. Lajoie) as well, but I have followed his contributions to the House and in committee as long as he has been a member of the House of Commons. I can say that as far as I am concerned he, too, has already made some good contributions and will make more. He comes from an area in Quebec from which many of the French people in my area came when they settled in that great southern part of Canada. Their contributions have been tremendous and will be great for many years to come.

Some hon. members have seen fit to find fault with what the hon. member for Bruce said, particularly his statement that our senior citizens are looked after, better than any others in the world. One member went so far as to say that all we gave them was 40 cents a month or a total of $80 a month. Mr. Speaker, hon. members know that is wrong.

An hon. Member: They know you are wrong.

An hon. Member: It is 42 cents a month.

Mr. Whelan: They know very well that with all the other benefits given to senior citizens, such as the supplement, the right to free hospitalization, free medicare, free dental care, free glasses, free drugs and low cost senior citizen apartments, if they can prove their need, that these senior citizens are better off than any others in the world. I challenge anyone to prove otherwise. Any politician that tells them any different is guilty of a misdemeanour.

• (1530)

Mr. Whelan: I might add, Mr. Speaker, that the county of Essex and the city of Windsor, which is the general area I represent, has more accommodation for senior citizens per capita than any other comparable area in Canada. The local municipalities, of course, deserve lots of credit for this, but we must also remember that at least 95 per cent of the money involved in these projects comes from the federal treasury. In many cases the province of Ontario, which administers the Ontario Housing Corporation, does not want to give anyone else credit for this, and acts as if the federal government did not exist.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Whelan: That provincial government thinks it is a nation unto itself.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Whelan: I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the area I represent is probably the most diversified area that any member represents in Canada. It is the most productive, both industrially and agriculturally, in all Canada. In agriculture, I understand that only one spot in North America is more productive than the area I represent, that other area being the San José Valley in California. These qualities do not mean, however, that my area does not have its problems. I have mentioned the great diversification. Let me refer to some of the people in my area. As I said, the people of my area probably are the most diverse in Canada.

Mr. Haidasz: And they are represented by one of the best Members of Parliament.

Mr. Whelan: The first group of people, who still are an important part of our population, is the French who came first as soldiers and later as settlers. Then, there are the Irish, Germans, Scots, English; later on came the Italians, Slovaks, Portuguese, Lebanese, Hungarians, Poles, Dutch, Roumanians, Russians, Greeks, Yugoslavs, Ukranians, Latvinians, Lithuanians, Serbs and Croatians. You name them, Mr. Speaker, and we have them. Also, Mr. Speaker, this area was the first area which offered freedom for African slaves coming from the nation to the south of us.

Mr. Haidasz: Are there any Conservatives there?

Mr. Whelan: These people came as immigrants, because Canada offered them freedom, as it still does today. There are other groups that I should mention, Mr. Speaker; I know that. We have them all and we are proud of them. They are the main reason for our productivity. They like the freedom and opportunities Canada offers. They know you can get on if you want to take a chance and accept a challenge. They are doing this every day. In that way, they are taking advantage of opportunities found in Canada.

Also, Mr. Speaker, these same people are involved in agricultural production, and they are very productive. They have brought their abilities with them and their desire to create and produce. However, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding all these qualities, we must remember one thing. All people, no matter in what part of this nation they reside, whether in the city of Windsor, the county of Essex or elsewhere in Canada, want to be properly compensated for their productivity. You may ask what I mean, and I will tell you. I mean, for the worker, a decent living for himself, his wife and family and, for the farmer, a decent return for his productivity and investment, so that he may obtain the same return as his city cousin. In both instances productivity, whether that of a city worker or of a farmer, must receive a return. Even the Canadian Labour Congress recognizes that those in well organized labour unions have kept ahead of the cost of living but that the unorganized people in most instances have not. The same holds true in agriculture. Some groups have not fared too badly, yet others have not done well even though they have been very productive. Actually, in many instances they have become so productive they have put themselves out of business.

You may wonder how this is possible. Who are some of these people, hon. members may ask? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, who some of them are. The poultry producers are a perfect example. Look around the country. How many empty poultry houses are there? I am told, and have no reason to doubt the authenticity of the statement, that without much effort we could produce within a year more than double the number of eggs Canadians could eat and more than twice the amount of poultry meat. However, we all know that it only takes overproduction of 1 or 2 per cent to create chaos in the market place as has happened in the past year not only in poultry products but, as well, in pork.

I congratulate the government, Mr. Speaker, for the aid it is giving to hog producers and for the aid it is giving wheat growers who produce grain for domestic consumption. It has been recognized that producers in these areas need assistance if they are to supply the cheapest, high quality food to any consuming public anywhere in the world.

Let us for the moment talk about some producers who are not being looked after so well, and who are just as productive. Let me speak first of those who produce the most nutritious food in the world, food containing more life giving substances than any other food grown by man anywhere. What is it, Mr. Speaker? It is grain corn. In Canada, today, we produce over 100 million bushels of such corn. Not long ago we produced only between 30 million and 40 million bushels. At that time we were not producing enough for our own consumption, and Canada imported every year about 20 million bushels of such corn from the United States. Even in those years, we always received between $1.50 and $2 a bushel for our corn. That is what it cost our industries to buy American corn, less the refundable 8 per cent duty on imported corn that was manufactured into a product and sent back to the United States, mostly as whisky. I am sorry the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not here. I think some of that whisky was called Royal Crown Whisky.

An hon. Member: Was it not Crown Royal?

Mr. Whelan: Those factors set the price Canadian producers received for their corn, and they still do. The duty means nothing whatsoever. It only rules the price that Canadian corn producers can get for their corn. Also, it sets the price in Canada of all other feed grains produced and sold in Canada.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I can remember several years ago being told that when we become self-sufficient in corn production in Canada, no more corn will come in from the United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, we are self-sufficient and we are still bringing in cheap American corn, although this year we are bringing in only 8 million bushels. Nevertheless, we are producing a surplus and do not need one bushel of imported corn from any country, let alone from the United States. Eight million bushels out of their tremendous production does not mean any more than a speck of pepper in a manure pile. We do not need their corn here. We should not let it enter this country.

Some will say to me, "You are not a free trader." Mr. Speaker, you cannot import one bushel of grain in Canada, that is other than corn, unless the Canadian Wheat Board issues a permit. I say this is good, and is as it should be; yet, by God, if it is good for the people in the west it is good for us in the east; and if this is free trade, I say, Mr. Speaker, give us more free trade.

Western members should be concerned about this, as well, because these factors have an effect on every bit of feed grain their constituents sell. Also, may I point out that the American protects his market to the tune of a 25 per cent duty, whereas ours is 8 per cent, and most of that is refunded, because the product that is manufactured from corn is shipped to the United States. The American is not a free trader in any product unless he cannot produce it and needs it for his own consumption. Really, the United States is the most protectionist country in the world. Mr. Speaker, if there is to be any real free trade with the United States, let us have it. Let there be real free trade, because we can compete with them in most areas.

I can remember when we used to produce sugar beets in our area for a sugar refinery in the United States. They stopped us from shipping beets to their country because they wanted to protect their own sugar beet growing industry. While mentioning the sugar beet growing industry, I may say I feel it is an industry the government should consider rejuvenating. I can remember that several years ago we lost the last sugar beet refinery in Chatham, Ontario, owned by Tate and Lyle. At that time sugar was eight cents a pound. Today, it is 15 cents a pound. Sugar today is costing the people of Ontario $100 million more than in 1966.

All the producers needed was 10 cents a pound to make it a profitable industry, but because the province would do nothing and we did nothing federally, the foreign-owned company closed down their refinery and we lost the sugar beet industry. Oh, the government bought some of the equipment and paid the farmers some money, but do you know why? The economists told them these farmers could switch to growing corn and still make a living. Corn, Mr. Speaker, was over $1.50 a bushel at that time. Today it is $1.06 a bushel, delivered to the elevator. The corn farmer cannot make any money, the sugar beet industry was lost and the consumer is paying nearly double what he was for sugar. In addition, the Caribbean sugar worker is not a great deal better off than he ever was, which is not what we were told would happen. This is what the economists told us. Some of these same people are still advising the government on what it should be doing about agriculture. I say these people should be fired.

The only ones who are better off are the sugar barons and the refining companies. The government should investigate aiding these people in southwestern Ontario. In rehabilitating this industry, the government should also take some immediate action to aid the corn growers in the same way as they have the milk producers, hog producers and wheat producers because these people are in need now.

I can think of some things that we recommended to this House of Commons and the government at the time I was Chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. That was over six years ago. Yesterday I listened to an hon. member speaking about how we should improve our rail and elevator facilities on the west coast. It may sound strange to hon. members, but when I was chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, we investigated the operations of the Wheat Board. We recommended an improvement in the rail, grain handling and elevator facilities as well as improved port facilities on the west coast. The members of that committee were ordinary members of this House. There were not many members who had a Ph.D. or some other degree. For this reason, I feel that no attention is paid to the suggestions made by members. We know that was wrong. It is very discouraging to be the chairman of a committee which submits a report prepared by 46 members of all parties of this House and find no attention is paid to it.

I also have in my hand a brief from a group of producers concerning the future of the tomato growing industry for canning or processing. Their main concern is imports of cheap tomato paste from overseas countries that have a production cost of about one-third of ours. I am told the canning companies are telling producers they cannot be paid as much per ton as last year, otherwise they are going to import more paste from overseas. We know we cannot compete with tomato paste produced in countries such as Portugal, Roumania, Italy and Spain where labour and other costs are approximately one-third less than ours.

Also, many of our farmers who grow crops for the frozen food overseas markets, especially in Great Britain, stand to lose these markets. This will be a gradual process most likely, but we can expect acreage cuts in the production of corn and pea for freezing, plus losses in other areas such as frozen french fries, broccoli and so on. Why will we lose these? Mainly because of Britain's entry into the common market. What can these farmers grow in place of these crops? Really, they have not much choice. They can grown grain, corn, or allow their land to remain idle. It is very difficult to explain some of these things to the farmers. I know because I have tried. We always hear a holler from other parts of the country that feed grains must be cheap in order to maintain cheap beef, poultry and hog products. However, never in the history of our country has grain been so cheap and the price of beef so high. Why? Is it the price of corn and other feed grains? No, Mr. Speaker, I have said that has nothing to do with it. It never does, regardless of what the economists tell us. The reasons are simple. First, for increased beef production, one must keep off the market cows and heifers for breeding purposes. Actually, thousands of animals are kept off the market in order to create a shortage. With the increase in population, the demand for beef is there.

Also, scientists have not yet learned how to make a cow give birth to five or six calves at one time. We have not learned how to make cattle as productive as poultry, hogs and so on. Therefore, there will always be a scarcity of beef, no matter what anyone tells us.

Even though either pork or poultry products are cheaper, a large portion of our population who earn high wages or income feel they have the right to eat steaks, roasts, and so on. Therefore, they buy them and, Mr. Speaker, even when one considers their buying power today compared to, say, even 10 years ago, the price of these cuts of meat is not out of balance with what they earn. They take the steaks and roasts home, but leave the chicken, turkey and pork products on the counter, even though in many cases they are as nutritious and much cheaper. Because they are not buying them, a surplus is being created.

If we adopt this attitude, and if the government goes along with it, we do not need an agriculture industry in Canada. We can live on slave-labour produced foodstuffs from all over the world, and maintain our high standard of living at the expense of the poor people. But should we not do that with all other products including manufactured products? Why don't we just let the barriers down and let people in here holus-bolus in the same way as we do tomatoes and many other products. Hon. members know we would have utter chaos if we tried this. We do this in the food business at the expense of a few, not just the producers, but also the consumers. Our whole import-export policy should be changed so that those people who are directly affected have some say. They are sick and tired of being used by the government and other economists as if they were chess players. I might say, too, that since I have been a member of Parliament, which is going on 10 years, I have never known an economist to be right yet. I could go on and on about free trade and who is a free-trader but, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say there is no such thing as a free-trader. It all depends on whose ox is getting gored.

I want to mention several other items. The first one is the new Unemployment Insurance Act and the present controversy that is taking place concerning its administration. I first of all want to say that I believe when one considers all the facts, the people administering this act have done, and are doing, as good a job as anyone could do. I have personally handled many calls from people suffering delays. I have visited the Unemployment Insurance office in Windsor on different occasions to see how it functions. I am confident that these people are doing a good job if one takes all the facts into consideration. Our calls, or, at least, my calls I should say, because my wife accepts most of them at home while I am here, have dropped off sharply in the last two weeks.

One of the things that annoys me about the critics of the plan, the news media, politicians in other parties and some in our own, is that they never tell the good parts in this plan such as increased weekly benefits, such as payments when you are sick, such as payments for women during and after pregnancy, such as payments for those who are unfortunate enough, shall we say, to get hurt on the way to work when they are not covered by their own workmen's compensation plan, and many other benefits which affect many of these people. I am sure that when all is said and done this will be recognized as one of the most efficient plans in the world. Also, I wish the critics would tell the people what a small percentage of the thousands and thousands who are collecting unemployment insurance are suffering inconvenience and unnecessary hardship. Our people in the local offices have worked hard and long to help these people who I believe in the long run are fortunate enough to be entitled to unemployment insurance under a plan superior to anything they have had before.

I want to mention some of the things which have been said about our present immigration legislation and these unseen people who have been quoted in the press as condemning our immigration laws. The writers seem to forget one thing, an important thing as far as I am concerned. It is that in a democratic country the Members of Parliament still have some say about making the laws. We have a fair idea what is going on. We should not be blackmailed into passing any legislation whatsoever, leastwise on the basis of that conservative Sedgwick report. Mr. Speaker, I have never read anything I can remember that contained so many fantasies about immigration and immigrants. I was raised in a neighbourhood full of immigrants of every description, plus the fact that in my family I have a Finnish sister-in-law, a Hungarian sister-in-law, a Roumanian brother-in-law, two German brothers-in-law, a Huguenot sister-in-law and a Scottish sister-in-law and am married to a Yugoslav of German descent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I believe I could write a much better report than Mr. Sedgwick has, or at least a more realistic one. While I am talking about immigrants I might refer to some of the things the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said when he went on about royalty, etc. Of the immigrants I know, all want to be recognized as Canadians, not something else, but just Canadians and in most cases they are better Canadians than we are. If we followed the philosophy contained in the Sedgwick report this land would only be for the selfish chosen few. As long as I am a Member of Parliament, I will fight this kind of conservatism which we do not need in Canada.

I want to say a few words about pollution, especially international pollution. First, I want to say to the government that it has been foremost in the world in its action and legislation in trying to control pollution in our country. Along with several other members, I attended an environmental meeting in Germany last June attended by representatives from 22 other countries, including some of the most advanced countries in Europe. It is obvious we are a long way ahead of them. Some of them have not even scratched the surface compared with what we are doing in Canada. The area I represent is bounded on three sides by the international border between Canada and the United States. These boundaries or borders are Lake St. Clair, the Detroit River and Lake Erie. I need not say much more than to say I am more optimistic than most of the so-called smart people about this area and the prospects of bringing it back so that man, fish and wildlife can use it again as they did before. We know it is much better now than it was five years ago, but the most disappointing thing is the recent announcement that the United States government has decided to curtail its expenditures on cleaning up the American side of the lakes and river. It is reassuring to hear our own minister in charge of the environment say that the President of the United States will sign an agreement with Canada to expedite this program when he comes here in April.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I regret I must interrupt the hon. member to inform him that the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue only if he obtains the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House consent to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whelan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank the members of the House of Commons. Really, when you think of the area I represent, the amount of pollution that is in the water, and of the fact that the Americans, who have only 50 per cent of the right to the water have caused 90 per cent of the pollution in the water, the time for action by them is long overdue. We in our area are sick and tired of their pollution, and the people I know in the United States are sick and tired of the inaction of their government. I might mention sound or noise pollution now. Where I live, I get some of the worst sound pollution from the aircraft using Detroit Metropolitan Airport; Canada is used as a flyway for practically all flights going to the eastern United States. That is a lot of flights because Detroit Metropolitan Airport is one of the busiest in North America. This should be stopped.

Just one or two words about the auto pact. I have expressed my opinion on the auto pact. I was a member when the auto pact was made. I have had discussions with my colleagues in that area and also with the men involved. I feel sure that the auto pact or a similar type of agreement will be made so that the industry will be greater than it has ever been. One should pay attention to what the president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, Mr. Bennett, said in St. Thomas yesterday. His main concern was not the auto pact but the number of imported cars coming into Canada and the fact that they were trying to compete with these imports. If more Canadians would buy more North American built cars, we would be in a better position.

I believe Canada is a great country. It is a country which has its problems, but if we compare them to those faced by Viet Nam, Pakistan, the Middle East and Ireland, ours are infantile indeed. Our country has a great future. Our people will have an even greater one if the government accepts some of our humble suggestions. Socrates said, and I am talking here about agriculture, and he was, too, that when the land lies barren and those who cultivate it suffer, so do all other ways of life.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to take part in this debate. This is the fourth session of the twenty-eight parliament. We have watched the legislative performance of the government over the past three sessions, and in the current Speech from the Throne we find an outline of the proposed legislation for the present session. On the basis of its performance stretching over three and a half years, and of the proposals we are presently considering, the Canadian people should be in a position to judge whether the present administration has been good for Canada or not. In my opinion, the faith and hope which a large number of Canadians expressed after the 1968 election have been destroyed by the ineffective program and policy of the government. What started out hopefully as a fresh and invigorating approach to our national problems has turned into a nightmare of economic mismanagement for the majority of Canadians.

During the last campaign, the election slogan of the Liberal party was "The Just Society". I suppose a great deal depends upon the definition of what a just society actually is and how it could be attained. In my opinion, any just society should be able to provide employment at an adequate income for all Canadians able and willing to work. It should be able to provide decent and adequate housing accommodation for the people of this nation and ensure all Canadians, especially those who have retired or are unable to work, an adequate standard of living, including full comprehensive health care.

I would suggest there are many other components of a just society in Canada, including the right of every citizen to a good education, the right to live in a clean and unpolluted environment, and the right of ourselves and our children to be masters in our own house, both economically and politically. The just society must surely envisage an equitable tax system and the wise use of our abundant natural resources for the general good of the nation as a whole, and this includes the indigenous groups in our society. Along with these goes the part that Canada should play in international affairs, including our role in assisting the developing nations and the independent role which I feel Canada should play, especially at the United Nations, in the search for world peace.

When I view this Trudeau administration and its slogan of a just society in relation to the several points I have raised, I can come to only one conclusion, and that is that Canada is no closer to the just society in 1972 than it was when the present administration took office in 1968. In fact, in many respects we are farther from the goal than ever before. I would like to deal more fully with several of the points I have raised to show that this administration's campaign slogan in 1968 of a just society certainly does not measure up to the expectations of most Canadians.

Let us look first at the tragic unemployment situation which we have in Canada. The latest available figures show that up to the middle of January there were 665,000 jobless Canadians. This is 7.7 per cent of the total labour force. The rate of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces stood at 12.9 per cent of the labour force. In the province of Quebec it was 9.8 per cent, and in British Columbia 8.7 per cent. The rate in Ontario and on the Prairies stood at 5.8 per cent. It all adds up to a national tragedy and is a clear indication of the totally inadequate economic programs and policies being followed by the present administration. It is a far cry from the goal of a job for all Canadians willing and able to work.

I would not be so critical of the present administration if our current unemployment problems had been of short duration, largely beyond the control of our federal administration. But this is not so. In 1970 this government deliberately implemented an economic policy aimed at creating mass unemployment. At the time the Prime Minister announced to the country that he was willing to tolerate a 6 per cent rate of unemployment in an effort to beat inflation. He was more than successful in forcing tens of thousands of Canadians out of work, and for several months in the latter part of 1970 inflation was held in check.

But what do we have today, Mr. Speaker? In 1971 the cost of living rose by 5 per cent, the largest annual increase in our cost of living in a decade. Also in the year 1971 we find that the unemployment index is the highest for at least the last 16 years. I do not have the statistics prior to that date. I must point out, however, that increasing unemployment has been one of the main features of this administration since it took office almost four years ago. We find that in 1968 and 1969 the annual average unemployment in Canada was 315,000. In 1970, it was up to 495,000 and in 1971 the annual average showed 552,000 jobless Canadians.

The government has tried to soft pedal the unemployment situation in Canada. The Prime Minister and others in this House have glibly talked about higher than normal increases in the labour force and in the participation rates as compared with the 1963-67 period. A review of the statistics clearly shows that the increase in the labour force for the 1968-71 period is substantially lower than in the 1963-67 period, and the participation rate increase is also much lower. The leader of this group thoroughly squelched this argument by the government when he spoke in the Throne Speech debate on February 18, so I do not intend to cover those points again.

Canada has the largest unemployment rate of any western industrialized nation. Most of the problem can be attributed directly to the programs and policies of this Liberal government. Some of the trouble can be traced back many years to the economic policies adopted by the old line parties at that time. I refer to the established policy of shipping increasing amounts of raw materials out of our country to be processed elsewhere. The failure of successive governments, including the one now in power, to rectify this situation is largely responsible for part of the unemployment which we have today.

There is no sign that this government has learned this hard economic lesson, which has cost Canadians hundreds of thousands of jobs and deprived many of our young talented people of job opportunities in their own country. I am hopeful, however, that at long last Canadians are waking up to the fact that a completely new approach must be taken toward the development of our natural resources. I am certain it will not come from the policies and programs of the present administration, which have given little indication of it over the past three and a half years, or in those measures it hopes to present to this session of the 28th parliament.

I would like to deal briefly with the current unemployment insurance situation and its effect on our unemployed workers. I would say at the outset that I have been able to assist hundreds and have had the full co-operation of the unemployment insurance personnel. I must say that those employed in the unemployment insurance personnel offices in my area, and in areas outside, have co-operated with me fully, and I can certainly commend the work they have done in helping me iron out many of the difficult problems that have been brought to my attention. The administration of the new Unemployment Insurance Act, however, has been anything but satisfactory. Ever since it became law at the end of June, 1971, it became increasingly apparent that the administrative aspects of the legislation had been badly bungled. I cannot agree with those in government who insist that only a relatively small percentage of workers is involved. Most claimants experienced delays far in excess of the promised processing time for claims. A smaller percentage of workers had the misfortune to get really bogged down in the processing of their claims and had great difficulty in getting them straightened out. I know of many claimants who went without benefits for months and in the process suffered immeasurably.

Many workers were forced for the first time in their lives to ask for welfare assistance. They had the humiliating experience of having their credit in the community stopped and the experience of not being able to pay their bills. This administrative fiasco has left many Canadians bitter and angry over the government's administrative handling of the new Unemployment Insurance Act. Every member in this House has experienced similar problems in his constituency. We have found many of the causes for the lengthy delays experienced by the claimants and have passed them along to the department or to the officials concerned. I am certain that the work of the members has assisted in making the new legislation more workable. I trust that the committee which will deal with this problem can come up with some meaningful recommendations to amend both the Unemployment Insurance Act and its regulations. There are several points, however, which I feel should be raised at this time.

One of the main causes of trouble with unemployment insurance claims is the far too complicated application forms. If some mistake is made by the applicant in filling out the form, then the stage is set for a series of lengthy delays. Claimants generally find the forms difficult, and I feel that the department should try to revise and simplify them. There is an old saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, and it certainly applies to the forms which unemployed claimants have to fill out.

In our area, the department has centralized the records office in Kelowna. There is no quick way for a claimant to get at his unemployment insurance records and set things straight if trouble arises. Why can there not be a central records office in the Kootenays to deal with the workers in our area? I feel that the department is over-centralizing the Unemployment Insurance Commission in the hope of cutting administration costs. There will always be a host of problems with unemployment insurance claims, and perhaps the aspect of decentralizing the keeping of claimants' records should be closely examined to see if changes are warranted.

One of the delaying factors in processing claims is the fact that holiday pay and severance pay must be known before the claims can be properly adjusted. I feel that the act should be opened this session for amendment, and both holiday and severance pay should be excluded as earnings under the provisions of the act. Our party called for this change last June, but it was turned down by the government. Today, however, surely there is enough evidence, now that the act has been in force for eight months, to indicate clearly to everyone that the inclusion of holiday pay as earnings is a backward, regressive and discriminatory measure. I have received numerous complaints and protests from individuals and unions from all over my riding regarding the inclusion of holiday and severance pay as earnings under the new act.

Let us look briefly at the problem. For years, organized labour fought for the principle of holiday pay. It was designed to assist all workers and their families to take an annual vacation. The provisions of the new Unemployment Insurance Act have denied this right to those unfortunate enough to be out of work. I feel that this is a retrograde step, and that this type of discrimination should be eliminated by amending the act. At present, if a workman becomes unemployed his vacation pay benefits must be used at a pre-prescribed rate per week until they are entirely absorbed before the worker can even commence his two week waiting period for unemployment insurance benefits. It is, in effect, a means test.

Vacation pay is really part of the normal wages of a workman and should not be treated any differently from any other portion of an hour's pay. The voluntary or legislated arrangement to save a small portion of the pay for each hour worked and accumulate it for vacation purposes is entirely the business of the person who has earned the money. It should not be subjected to interference by legislation. The law says that the holiday pay of a workman must be accumulated by the employer and paid to the workman either on termination of the job or when the workman takes his annual holiday. Why this accumulated savings for holiday purposes is classed as earnings after a workman's job is terminated is difficult to explain. Not one penny of it is earned in the unemployed period for which it is classed as earnings by the government. It should be 100 per cent applicable to the period in which it was earned, and for this reason should not be used for unemployment insurance purposes.

[Mr. Harding.]

Severance pay also should not be classed as earnings under the act. This is clearly pointed out in a recent CLC brief from which I should like to quote as follows:

> Severance pay, in particular, is paid under various negotiated formulae, dependent upon years of service, and therefore constitutes a deferred payment of wages for work performed prior to the date of separation. It should as we see it, be treated in the same manner as savings which, as you know, have no effect on whether a person receives benefits or not. To deny unemployment benefit payments to a worker who has lost his job and thereby force him for an extended period of time to depend for his income upon his severance pay is tantamount to rubbing salt into a grievous wound.

Severance pay is accumulated savings in the hands of the employer, and I see very little difference between a person putting money in the bank out of the cheque which he earns from his employer and this type of accumulated savings which he receives in the event of the termination of employment. Again I will suggest that the act be amended to remove this type of discrimination which hits hard at many of the jobless Canadians today.

Earlier I spoke about the just society in Canada, and I indicated I was not too pleased with the program laid down by the present administration. I pointed out the trouble which the government has had in the field of unemployment. Frankly, I do not think they have done a good job and I am quite convinced that there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who feel the same as I do. But there are also other fields which I think we, as legislators, and the Canadian people should look at to see whether this goal of the just society is being achieved and if some progress has been made toward that goal by the legislation and the moves made by this government over the past four years.

Earlier I mentioned housing as being one of the great needs of Canadians. I say without hesitation that this government has failed completely in the field of housing, particularly in providing housing units for those who need them most, namely the under-privileged who live in our cities, those whom we often class as being at or below the poverty line. They cannot afford to buy into those housing units about which the government boasts. We should get to the root of the housing problem in Canada by making certain those who need housing the most get it first. But that approach was not adopted by the government during the past four years. There has been some move toward the setting up of public housing units, but this has been far too little in relation to the need.

All we have to do is look at the recommendations of the task force on housing, a task force which travelled from one end of Canada to the other examining the housing needs of Canadians. Yet we find in 1972 that the vast majority of its recommendations have been completely ignored by the present administration. We all know about the excessive interest rates, excessive land costs, and also about the lack of opportunities which those in the extremely low income brackets have of owning their own homes. Precious little has been done by the government about this problem during the past four years.

Now, I come to the problem of Canadian ownership, the problem of being masters in our own house. What has happened under the Trudeau administration during the past four years? There is more foreign ownership of Canadian firms than ever before in our history. In the past four years, an additional 200 large firms have been taken over by people who live elsewhere. There is no use kidding ourselves about this matter. Those who control the economy of this country control the destiny of the country. That must be crystal clear to everyone.

There is some reference to the problem of foreign ownership in the Speech from the Throne, but we have no indication what the legislation will be, how restrictive will be its terms, and whether it will be effective at all or not. It breaks my heart to realize that secondary industry has been neglected by scores of past governments. Both the Tories and the Liberals can share the blame for the lack of secondary industry in our nation, for the gradual sell-out of our vast stores of resources to people in other countries, until the point has been reached that Canada is almost simply a source of raw materials for other nations. All this is inexcusable when we find that many of our young people whom we train in our universities cannot get jobs in their own country. This will be a big issue in the coming election. We will demand that steps be taken to repatriate the Canadian economy, to let us be masters in our own house, to let us have the opportunity to make decisions as to whether raw materials will be fabricated here in job intensive industries that would provide hundreds of thousands of jobs for those young Canadians who desperately need them.

What has been done about this matter? There has been very little talk, and absolutely no action to date. But with an election due in a few months time, you can bet that the administration will come up with some kind of program in the hope that it will fool the Canadian people again. I am convinced that far too many of the Canadian people understand the government's past programs, and I do not believe they will be fooled again.

In my view a just society means an equitable tax system. Do we have an equitable tax system in Canada? Last session we passed a tax reform bill. We made some welcome changes. But did we get the equitable tax system that we need to bring about the just society? We did not. I hold in my hand a table of statistics produced by an ex-cabinet minister, showing the type of taxation that has existed here for years and that has not been corrected. The facts would be most unpalatable to the Canadian public if they knew them.

With respect to mineral fuels, companies engaged in this section of the mining industry made book profits of $795 million during the period 1965 to 1968. The oil companies are practically all foreign controlled, and they paid taxes on only 5.7 per cent of their total book profits. Out of $795 million book profits they paid taxes on only $45 million. Is this an equitable tax system? Why does the government insist on catching those in the middle income tax brackets, taking hundreds of dollars out of their cheques every payday? These oil and gas companies will pull out of Canada once our resources are depleted. Has the government been on guard for Canadians in this respect? It is utter nonsense to say it has. Metal mining in the same period 1965 to 1968 showed book profits of $1,707 million, and paid taxes on only $222 million, at a rate of 13 per cent. Yet the government talks about the just society. I say you need an equitable tax system if you are to have a just society in Canada.

My time has almost expired, Mr. Speaker. Several other matters that I wish to deal with, including the environment, I will cover at a later date. I trust that when this debate is finished and legislation is introduced based on the suggestions in the Speech from the Throne, the government will be willing to accept good amendments to its bills because I am certain many of the bills will desperately need amendment.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) and the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Lajoie), the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply for their interesting and invigorating speeches. I fear that the balance of this debate may not have lived up to the standard they set because it seems to me to have followed the traditional pattern of Throne Speech debates, that is, the government and all its works are praised by members on this side of the House and there is nothing but condemnation and negativism from the other side. I think the people of this country would be happily surprised if this rigid pattern were broken one day. I speak for only one constituency in this debate and it is my intention to break away from the pattern because the things I wish to speak of on behalf of my constituents are in the nature of criticisms and critical comments on government programs.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to speak to the House about the issue which above all others is most widely discussed and is the subject of the greatest controversy and concern in my riding, that is the application of the bilingual program of the government to the Public Service of Canada. This program is discussed almost as if it existed in two separate worlds in this city. On one side, there is a thin veneer of high officials, of pundits in the media and others to whom this program appears to be highly successful. An air of euphoria seems to float over their discussion of the program and, indeed, it is regarded by many people on this side almost as an act of ill-will and malice to utter any criticism of it.

On the other hand, and I regret to say that the group of which I now speak is in the majority, are the large numbers of members of the public service and the public in general who are increasingly expressing concern about the implications of the program and the manner in which it is being applied in practice. These people see evidence which cannot be denied that the program in their opinion is not satisfactory. This great gap exists in discussions in this city and is very rarely bridged, although it was bridged to some extent by the interesting comments on the subject by the Official Languages Commissioner in his first report.

It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that the problems created by the application of the bilingual program are serious and that they cannot be ignored by this Parliament. We are entitled to ask ourselves why these problems have developed and what constructive and positive steps we can take to alleviate them. We were all here three and a half years ago when the Official Languages Act was passed in an atmosphere of outstanding good will and with a heavy commitment to future good relations in our country. The program was supported by the leaders of all parties, and indeed by all parties and all sections of public opinion. What we sought to attain was a degree of bilingualism under which it should be possible for citizens, whether English or French in origin, to approach the federal government in their own language. I think that no one then or now would detract from the propriety of that objective or from its importance in terms of the survival of this nation and its equal importance in terms of the achievement of fairness in the lives of members of both linguistic groups living in this country.

I have to report that the attaining of the objective is now threatened because of the means adopted in going about it. As a member representing a public service constituency, and one close at hand, I see much evidence of growing discontent with the policy. For example, a year ago I circulated a large questionnaire in my constituency, large in the sense that over 25 per cent of all households responded. One of the questions I asked was "Are government policies regarding bilingualism generally satisfactory"? Only 1,827 people responded yes, and more than double that amount, 4,022, responded no, while 1,833 were undecided. The questionnaire was returned with many comments written by constituents. It was then made obvious to me, even more forcefully than before, that the bilingual policy of the government was not only misunderstood but was regarded as being wrong in many aspects of its application.

In my own area I have sought to be as good a representative as possible in terms of meeting the people. Since I am close at hand, I have been able to conduct a large number of public forums to keep in rather close and constant touch with my constituents. I have found, particularly in the last year and a half, that the first and indeed sometimes the only subject which is raised in my frequent contacts with my constituents is bilingualism. I am always in the position of explaining, defending, commenting, criticizing, informing and reporting on this subject. I have tried to walk what I think is a proper line and not fall into the trap of condemning every new movement out of hand nor, on the other hand, of lavishly over-praising things which this government has done. I find that the people I represent have this same concept of a sense of justice and fairness in the application of this policy. The reason it is being increasingly subjected to criticism is that in the opinion of many people it has ceased to be just and has ceased to be fair in some of the aspects of its application.

It is not an easy subject to discuss. Simultaneously I have been accused of almost being a bigot as a result of a public pronouncement and, on the other hand, I was accused the other day by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox-Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) of bowing before some sinister force. But I have tried, and I say this even though the hon. member is not here, to maintain a consistent line in what I have said. My speeches and pronouncements are on record and they have been made over a period of two years. I have sought, and will continue to seek, ways and means of making this policy more sensible, fair and proper in its application.

Mr. Speaker, I have found that this is not a subject which commends itself to discussion in this House of Commons or in its committees. I say that with some regret because I think if we cannot discuss it properly here we are in difficult times. More than a year ago there was considerable uproar in this House about certain aspects of this policy. The question of bilingualism and of the policy was referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates along with the estimates of the Public Service Commission and other allied organisms of the government. We heard a great deal of evidence in that committee about the application of the policy, and it was highly enlightening and very important. At the end of the committee's hearing of the evidence I made a motion, recorded in proceedings of the committee No. 28 on May 18, at page 22:33 and 28:34. The proposal I made in my motion was that the government be urged to review the policy and to consider seriously making certain changes which I shall refer to a little later. To my great surprise, that motion was declared to be out of order. One could almost hear the collective sigh of relief of the representatives of all parties on that committee, because this meant that the committee was relieved of the responsibility of discussing the matter.

I think we must be prepared in parliament, in a non-partisan way to look at this policy; we should keep it under review and I think that we should remember that if we do not do so, various emotional arguments made against it will escalate. Those who oppose this policy, whether from one linguistic camp or the other, will be armed increasingly in their opposition to it.

I should like to review very briefly, Mr. Speaker, what are the real problems which lie at the back of the present malaise, fear and uncertainty regarding the application of the policy in the public service. First and foremost, is the fact that the pledge which was given by two prime ministers, Mr. Pearson in 1966 and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1968, was not realized in fact. They said, in effect, that the career of any public servant who was not bilingual would not be prejudiced by reason of the application of this policy. Actually, this has not happened. The highest organ of the Public Service Commission has said that that is not what the law says. They have said, further, that it does not really matter whether parliament was induced to pass this law by reason of the undertakings given by those prime ministers because they, the appellate organ of the Civil Service Commission, are not bound by these undertakings. Indeed, it is now said that the protection to be accorded to public servants is only this: they will not be dismissed or demoted if they are not bilingual. That is quite different, in my judgment, from the original undertaking which said that their career opportunities would not be prejudiced.

I suspect, as I have contended elsewhere, that our main problems with the policy arise in this area, since there is no right on the part of public servants to appeal against the basic determinations which say that certain posts are to be bilingual. These determinations fall outside the total appellate process. Those who say that there are no real complaints, that there are not a large number of examples of protest against the policy, should also add that there is no way for people affected by it to protest effectively.

This point has been made clear by the leader of the Public Service Alliance, Mr. Claude Edwards, and others.

The second thing which I believe has caused great discontent is this: when the program was introduced, emphasis was placed on the fact that people who were willing to learn the second language would be given an opportunity to do so. I have encountered a number of cases in which people have been actually on a language course or have been striving to get on a language course but, when promotion has opened up above them they found that because they were not then bilingual, they were denied the opportunity for promotion.

The third factor which I think has contributed to our present difficulties is the establishment of what are called target dates for implementation. These target dates appear to be increasingly rigid. There is also confusion on bilingual policy. The policy recommended in the fourth report of the B and B Commission suggested that there should be a greater racial balance in the public service. I am informed by many of my constituents that the problem of the English speaking public servant who is bilingual is compounded because efforts are being made to introduce a greater proportion of French speaking public servants into the public service. There is also dissatisfaction about the test of linguistic ability, and this dissatisfaction expresses itself in two ways. First, there is dissatisfaction with the actual tests themselves. Second, and this is more important, the proper authorities have been unable to fashion tests which are suitable for and applicable to special jobs and categories within the public service. I know that progress is being made in this area, but I think it should be expedited. We have a long way to go.

Finally, there is no body to which a public servant affected by this process can appeal. He cannot appeal against the designation of a job, because that has already been done, and those who say that he ought to appeal are running in the face of reality. He would be appealing against a decision of his boss, his superior authority. Most people in the public service I have spoken to about this feel, I think with justification, that they will suffer if they do so. As I have said, there is no proper appeal tribunal, because the Public Service Commission, to the extent that it might intervene, has excluded itself for the reasons I gave earlier.

What is the result of all this? Unhappily, in this city at the moment there is opposition, fermented by rumour and wild report, against this policy. Admittedly, some people who are unsuccessful in their public service careers use bilingualism as an excuse for their lack of success. Speaking as one who almost daily is in contact with public servants, and who listens to what I consider to be reasonably legitimate complaints regarding the program, I can discount the suggestion that we only hear from incompetents or malcontents. Indeed, what should give us concern is that there are many, many reasonable, fair minded people who are becoming increasingly concerned about the policy and concerned about its application, not only to themselves but to the public service as a whole.

One can ask, what is to be done, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that we do not need to sit here in a state of grave concern, holding our heads in our hands because, in my judgment, some things can be done. Indeed, they should be done now. These matters should not be the subject of a prolonged inquiry on the part of a parliamentary committee, royal commission or anything like that. The report of Mr. Keith Spicer, Commissioner of Official Languages, at pages 92 to 93 provides a proper starting point for a discussion of positive reform. He restated his main points in a speech he made recently at Seneca College. He called attention to what he considers the anguish, fear and concern of public servants who are affected by the policy. He suggests it is rather ludicrous that a policy, which in its inception was designed to become an instrument of justice, now appears to some to be an engine of injustice. He suggests that the policy be applied with greater moderation. He also suggested that three other things be done. I commend these to the consideration of the House.

First, if it is decided a position is to become bilingual, that decision should be made in advance. He suggests this should be done six months in advance of the time that ordinarily the position might become open. This may produce difficulty in some areas, but there is unanimity of opinion among the representatives of public service unions to whom I have spoken that if this scheme of prior designation were really applied, a good deal of the discontent with the policy would disappear. Certainly, we would eliminate this in-fighting that seems to go on in some departments when promotional positions become open and a decision must be made as to whether the position will be unilingual or bilingual.

The second proposal made by Mr. Spicer is this. If a person in the natural line of the progression of his career, and if he otherwise qualifies, becomes eligible for a promotion to a position which has become bilingual, he should be given that position provisionally with a period of time within which to acquire a bilingual qualification. Mr. Spicer suggests a period of not less than 18 months.

Third, he dwells in some detail on the necessity of distinguishing the various occupations and categories in the public service so that the linguistic test will be different and suitable for each category. I am convinced this would open up a great many avenues to public servants and eliminate many causes of the present discontent.

I would make two further proposals. First, there must be some legal recognition given to the pledges of Mr. Pearson and the present Prime Minister. Second, we should carefully consider the establishment of some new type of adjudicative tribunal. Perhaps this could be made up of senior or even retired public servants of a high reputation and long experience. They could review in a broad fashion the careers of people who think they have been affected by this policy. They might also review some bilingual designations of positions, which they think have had an adverse effect.

Looking beyond the confines of this chamber, there are other problems which are becoming increasingly apparent to those of us who live in the capital region. In a sense, the capital region has become the area of experimentation of this policy. If our nation is to succeed with this, we must succeed here. First, many people I have met expressed grave concern over the fact that in the public and secondary schools in this city, in any event those which English speaking children attend, bilingual education is in a very primitive stage. I have long been of the opinion that because the policy of the federal government has created this situation, we should be prepared to jump over the constitutional barrier and give support to bilingual education in the elementary and secondary schools here. Many people believe that if this were done they would be heartened as to the future and be more prepared to face their own problems.

Second, the increasingly bilingual nature of this city has produced problems in the private sector. The private sector is not like the public sector which has a more tender concern and is bound by statute and moral obligation to look after its employees. I, and no doubt others, have heard of cases where employees have suddenly been dismissed because it has been decided to make this or that operation bilingual. I am told this is true. This question was raised and debated at a public meeting a few weeks ago which was sponsored by the CBC. A number of people have become unemployed because they are not bilingual and now, through the auspices of the Department of Manpower and other federal agencies, are not even able to acquire an elementary language course which might make them suitable for their old career. This type of language training should be added to manpower courses.

My time is drawing to a close. There are many things I could have spoken about such as the problems of farming, recreation and business in my constituency. However, I have spoken as fully and, I hope, as fairly as I could about this supremely important national problem. I believe that if we do not do this properly in the Ottawa region, and if we continue to not recognize the problem which exists, we will create a condition which will become a festering sore in the whole of the country. There is evidence available to me, as I am sure there is to other hon. members, that this is becoming a matter of concern elsewhere in this country. In the application of the bilingual policy, we should recognize that there is a crisis of confidence. There is disbelief, to an alarming degree, about the fairness of the policy. There is a credibility gap in many of the explanations which have been made about it.

I suggest that if the rather modest and sensible proposals made by Mr. Spicer and myself were implemented, we would go a long way towards correcting the grave problems which we face.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that my participation in the debate could have been improved had I followed the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). I express gratitude for what he has said. However, flattery is very healthy, except if you inhale it.

I want all hon. members present to inhale at least two words which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said with regard to a subject which I have been following closely for over three years. I refer to the situation affecting the Cape Breton miners under the Devco Corporation. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion referred to my representations. That is right and justified.

I very much appreciate the acceptance by hon. members of a petition put before this House on this subject matter. I also very much appreciate the findings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which came out with a very favourable and unanimous report with regard to the petition.

The minister having said I was right and justified, and every member here today having received correspondence from me, and not a member in this assembly to whom I have spoken having found fault with the representations I have been making—this includes many members on the government side who have listened fairly to the representations I have made—I feel my action was justified. My timing would have been better had I been able to follow the minister and remind everyone of the remarks he made with respect to my representations as being right and justified.

Of course, my timing might have been even better had I been able to follow up in debate the information made available by the Order in Council passed on December 7 remitting certain taxes to Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited. This is a United States oil company. I say this because the Sun Oil Company of Philadelphia owns most of the capital stock and has provided major production finance. This oil company entered the literary field and immediately produced a best seller—a hard luck story which it sold for $6 million. There is not an author alive who could have done better.

An hon. Member: What about Clifford Irving?

Mr. MacInnis: Even Irving could not have done as well as this. Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to tell you a story which will bring us $6 million, as much as Great Canadian Oil Sands got for its hard luck story, though I am sure I have a Pullitzer prize-winner here. We can start with the most recent move made by Devco. It is disturbing. It is unfortunate. It will bring about serious economic and social problems in the mining towns in Cape Breton. On Friday last, despite the legislation which has been placed before us, despite the appeals made by many people—including a committee composed of municipal, provincial and union representatives who came to Ottawa within the last couple of weeks—the corporation has again closed a colliery, this time in the town of Glace Bay. I say this is in defiance of the legislation which has been passed in the House setting up the corporation.

I should refer momentarily to the preamble to Bill C-135, an act to establish the Cape Breton Development Corporation. In that preamble the operative words are, "for the modernization and rehabilitation . . . "Mr. Speaker, no attempt whatsoever was made to rehabilitate or modernize. This cannot be denied. The preamble to the legislation goes further. It says the duty of the corporation is to—> —reorganize and operate the mines with a view to the rationalization of coal production therefrom and the progressive withdrawal of the corporation from such production in accordance with a plan which takes into account progress in providing employment outside the coal-producing industry and in broadening the base of the island's economy.

I say, without fear of contradiction, that the closing of No. 20 colliery on Friday last is in contradiction of the terms of this legislation. The petition placed before the House, and the correspondence carried on with every member of this House, outlines quite clearly that all I have sought on behalf of the miners of Cape Breton is that which the government itself has undertaken to give but which Devco has never delivered. All I request of the House of Commons is that hon. members stand behind legislation which makes provision for the people of the mining areas of Cape Breton and the general economy of that island, the promises placed before the House in accordance with the terms of that legislation and further supported by the intent announced by ministers while the legislation was before the House.

I understand that all parties are holding caucus meetings tomorrow. I ask all members attending them to make an appeal on behalf of these miners and their families, bearing in mind that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the minister responsible for the Devco organization, has described my representations as being right and justified. I ask them, also, to keep in mind the fact that a United States oil company has just received $6 million by way of remission in taxes. I contend that in justice the Cape Breton miners should be given what is their due. It would amount to a lot less than $6 million and it would benefit between 1,700 miners who are today walking the streets despite the fact that they are still of an age at which they should be accepted by industry, even by government standards.

If members will keep this in mind, they will be backing up the statement made earlier today by the minister responsible when he described my representations as being right and justified. Flattery is healthful, it is said, only as long as one does not inhale it. I would ask everyone to inhale those two words "right" and "justified" and to make representations for the sake of 1,700 or so miners.

All hon. members are aware that a large portion of my appeal on behalf of these men has been based on section 18 of the act. Section 18 makes it imperative for the Devco organization to set up pension arrangements for every person employed by that organization. Again, without fear of contradiction, I say this has not been done. No pension arrangement has been set up for the employees and dependants of Devco. Then I move on to section 18(A)(2), where it is stated that pension arrangements for the benefit of former employees and their dependants should be set up. We have seen some action in this field in recent months, though not to such an extent as to meet the requirements of the legislation.

As I have pointed out, the legislation requires a pension arrangement to be set up for former employees and their dependants. To show how far this corporation has gone, Mr. Speaker, let me say that there is not a dependant of a former employee of Devco receiving anything by way of a pension. The Devco literature itself points this out. On the death of a pensioner, a widow will receive a pension for the month in which her husband dies and the month following, but not thereafter. This is in direct contravention of section 18(A)(2).

Now we come to a most interesting area, the area with regard to which I find myself most disturbed. Many hon. members have heard the representations I have made on behalf of miners who were obliged to use their own UIC fund in order to subsidize their pensions. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to ask hon. members to excuse me because I have used the word "pension". It does not belong in any such context concerning Devco. It is pre-retirement leave. A man who qualifies for old age security benefits does not receive anything from Devco by way of pre-retirement leave pay. But the fact that these miners have been required to subsidize their retirement pay is shameful.

Many hon. members are familiar with the consequences of this subsidization: the matter has been placed before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I have here a copy of two cheques received by a miner in one month. Each is made out in the amount of 1 cent. If there is any question or doubt about whether these copies are authentic, I will produce the actual cheques. I have hundreds of copies available for any member who may wish to examine them. I can also produce evidence from a number of miners who have received nothing at all.

Here I have two separate cheques, representing one month's allowance from Devco, made out for one cent each. These miners were promised protection when this legislation was passed—but let us see how much protection the individual has had. I can document the evidence I have here; in fact, I will say nothing in this debate that I cannot support with documented evidence. I have before me a report by the Great West Life Assurance Company regarding a small number of employees in the Devco organization who worked on the railway and were given the opportunity of paying into what is referred to as a voluntary contributory pension plan. Let me review the situation of the railway workers under this organization. The railway employees have always worked on a seniority basis. Any man who worked for the railway reaches his best earning years as he acquires seniority.

Here we have the case of a man who had just reached this point and was looking forward to his last five years of service being his best earning years as a result of wage increases and a position of seniority that kept him fully employed every day. He had reached the age of 60 and was paying into the voluntary contributory pension plan which had been in effect only for a short number of years. After his first year he received from the Great West Life Assurance Company an estimate of the monthly pension that he would receive at his normal retirement date. Because this man was in the plan for only a short time, his estimated monthly pension at normal retirement date, which is 65, was $45.34 per month.

But what happened in his case? As the result of an arbitrary decision of the responsible Devco authorities, this man lost five years' work. I appreciate that these officials are no longer with the Devco organization. It took some time to see through their incomptence and inability, and they are no longer with the company. Nevertheless, Blackmore and Ord were responsible for the fact that this man did not get any protection. Although I am grateful that Blackmore and Ord are no longer with Devco, the results of what they did to the miners are still being felt. Today, miners walking the streets in Glace Bay, New Waterford, Sydney Mines, Dominion and Reserve Mines are paying for the sins and maladministration of Blackmore and Ord.

As I was saying, this individual was looking forward to his best five years of employment and was building up a pension that would amount to the "enormous" sum of $45.34 a month. As a result of the maladministration of Blackmore and Ord, he was compulsorily retired at age 60. Consequently, his contributions toward his retirement were curtailed. So although in January of 1969 he was looking forward to a monthly pension of $45.34 at age 65, at the end of 1970, his first year of forced retirement, his pension was reduced to $32.19. In other words, $13.15 a month has disappeared from this man's pension because he has been forced into retirement. Granted, he was promised protection—and I shall refer to that later. For the next four years this man will receive less as a result of his being forced into retirement by Mr. Blackmore and Mr. Ord—happily no longer with Devco—and the miners of Cape Breton are continuing to pay for their maladministration.

Again I ask hon. members opposite to keep in mind the remarks of the minister that my representations were right and justified. In view of the fact that $6 million has been given to a United States oil company, I appeal to hon. members to give to the miners that to which they are entitled through legislation and the promises made by the minister when the bill went through the House.

If I have not put sufficient appeal into that argument, let me remind hon. members of some of the statements made before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs by Devco officials. When they appeared before committee in 1969 they claimed that this position had been accepted by the Cape Breton miners. Let me assure hon. members that that is not so. That is another of the blatant lies told by Mr. Blackmore, the responsible official in the coal division at that time. I say that that is a blatant lie, and I will repeat that statement outside the House of Commons on any platform in Canada, even in Alberta where they will have to suffer him now. I will support that statement with that of no less a person than the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who has given it to me in writing. The Cape Breton miners today are living with a lie told by Mr. Blackmore. They are living with the maladministration of Mr. Blackmore and are paying a very high price for doing so. I ask hon. members to keep this in mind and to ask the government, on behalf of the Cape Breton miners, for a fair deal.

I said that I would refer to certain statements made before the standing committee by Devco officials. Basically, what I am asking hon. members for is to have this government refund to the miners the money taken from them through the subsidization of their own retirement by the UIC fund. In this connection I refer to section 18(1)(b) of the legislation. Section 18(1)(a)(i) and (ii) call upon the government to set up pension arrangements for all present employees and their dependants. Section 18(1)(b) calls upon Devco to set up pension arrangements for former employees and their dependants, and reads as follows:

> (1) The corporation shall by by-law provide ... (b) for the contributions thereto to be made by the corporation out of moneys administered by the corporation for the operation of the coal division—

That spells out where the pension money is to come from. But Mr. Blackmore and Mr. Ord decided to use the UIC fund. Although I do not have a great listening audience, this is recommended reading and I would ask each and every member of the House to check the accuracy of what I say. Let me repeat that I am going to say nothing that I cannot back up by documented evidence. Page 29 of the sixth report makes it quite clear that Devco admitted the use of coercion to subsidize the miners through the UIC fund. In face of that admission by Devco, and in view of the $6 million remission, how can we deny the Cape Breton miners their rightful benefits under UIC?

At page 29 of the sixth report it is said that they used coercion to get the men to collect UIC in order to subsidize their own retirement. They said that in 1968-69 this plan had been well explained to everybody involved. Why, then, did they say again before the committee, as appears in the sixth report, that they had to take certain questions back to Sydney in order to analyse their position, and they admitted they could not fully explain it in 1971? Again, that evidence is contained in the committee's report.

Why did they say to me on this occasion that I was asking questions on which they had not done enough homework? They were the high-priced help and the administrators of this plan, and they told me that I was asking questions on which they had not done enough homework. I always said that if Mr. Blackmore had hung around long enough I would have had him up on a charge of contempt of Parliament because he told the parliamentary committee that all the unions had been advised on this matter.

I would ask hon. members to read the committee proceedings at page 19. This is the evidence put before the committee by the then chairman of Devco, who said:

> There is no question about that so we will say that if a thing is a fait accompli, it is not so much that it is consulting, it is probably telling. That is the whole root of the matter.

The subject matter of that discussion was whether or not the unions involved in this pre-retirement plan had been consulted on the matter. The then chairman of Devco used the expression fait accompli. The unions were told of the arrangement after it was agreed to. It was not a matter of negotiation. Yet we have Devco submitting to the committee what they refer to as a pension plan which was available to miners in Cape Breton. They call it the 23 plan. This was never a pension. The miners have never contributed to it, and it was something which the company could have cut off at any time. In fact, the record will show that at the time of the closure of the former Dosco mine, Dosco did cut this off. It was never a pension.

Yet now, when Devco produced their evidence before the committee, they referred to this 23 plan as a pension plan. That is very strange, because on June 20, 1967, the minister responsible for piloting the bill on Devco through the House, Bill C-135, an act to set up the Cape Breton Development Corporation, as recorded on page 1756, referred to this as a gratuity. Those are the words of the minister responsible at the time the legislation went through the House. So how can Devco call it a pension?

I would further substantiate my claim that the legislation under section 18 (1) (a) and (b) has not been conformed with and that the Cape Breton Development Corporation is supposed to conform with that legislation. This is a matter that can be checked out. You can ask Mr. Kent, the president of Devco, what the situation is with respect to pension arrangements laid down in the legislation of 1967, and he will tell you, "We are now negotiating". They are now in negotiation with respect to pensions covering the employees and their dependants under section 18 (1) (a) and (b). There is no doubt that the legislation has not been conformed with, despite the claims Mr. Blackmore made before the committee. He was then in charge of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, coal division.

I referred to the remark made by the minister regarding the situation in the mining towns of Cape Breton today, numbering in excess of 1,700 men, all of them at an age which would make them acceptable to industry in accordance with government standards. They are now walking the streets, and in many cases they are forcibly retired. I refer to the situation in the town of Glace Bay, where the mine was closed in defiance of the legislation which asked them to rehabilitate and reorganize the mines; and also to statements made before the committee when Devco officials told us that no pit would be closed until alternative work could be provided. The legislation refers to alternative work being outside the coal industry. Yet last Friday Devco announced the closure of the mine in the town of Glace Bay.

What is the situation? The legislation was passed in which it is quite clearly spelled out that Devco was to broaden the base of the island's economy. I buy that—but I also insist that the economy of Cape Breton Island can just as well be broadened from the towns of Glace Bay, New Waterford, Dominion and Sydney Mines as it can be from any other place on the island. I have always maintained that the energy of Devco should be extended in the direction of the town of Glace Bay and other towns on Cape Breton so that they could obtain the protection referred to by the minister who represents Cape Breton Island when he said on June 15, 1967, at page 1579:

—and in the meantime build up alternative industries so that there will be a cushioning effect on displacement and so that the total economy and the total community will be protected.

This is what I referred to as the intent of the legislation, because when the legislation is going through the House and has been studied clause by clause and questions come from the opposition or even from the government side of the House, whether or not a particular clause is passed depends on the answer provided by the minister at the time.

The miners in the community were promised by the minister at that time that their total community would be protected. All that Devco has so far accomplished in the mining towns of Cape Breton is to remove from these towns millions of dollars. The social obligation which was recognized at the time the legislation was passed by the House has been completely ignored. I am hopeful that under the direction of Mr. Kent, many of the evils left behind by Mr. Blackmore and Mr. Ord will be corrected. The fact remains that it will be a long, hard tow because of the fact that good legislation has been completely ignored.

I appeal to members of the House to take my plea into consideration. I can ask for nothing on behalf of the Cape Breton miners and their communities than that which was promised in the legislation. All I ask for is that which was granted by way of legislation and passed in the House. Support such as was given by the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee would require all hon. members of the House to stand behind something that this House has put in writing as a promise to these people and their communities.

I am not asking for $6 million for these 1,700 miners. If you are going to compare hard-luck stories and produce $6 million for an American company, surely you can back up your own words and the words of the minister. We, as Members of Parliament on all sides of the House should appeal to this government to deliver to these miners what they were promised in 1967 by way of legislation. I am not asking for anything more and I would not be satisfied with anything less. Surely on the opposite side of the House there must be somebody who can take up my cause in the Liberal caucus tomorrow, before the cabinet, and plead it on behalf of the Cape Breton miners.

• (1730)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear hon. members suggesting that the hon. member should continue. Of course, I am in the hands of the House in this regard. However, I wish to indicate that this evening will finish the Throne Speech debate, and there are many members who wish to speak. I repeat that I am in the hands of hon. members. Does the hon. member have consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, since I am making an appeal as strongly as possible I will not infringe on the good will of the House. I spoke of the pension arrangements provided by funds allocated to the coal industry. I might mention that Mr. Ord said that UIC funds were being used because they were public moneys. This has been denied by the minister in charge of the UIC fund. He has clearly stated to this House that the UIC fund belongs to those who contribute to it. In this respect Mr. Ord was wrong; Mr. Blackmore lied about UIC. I have documentary evidence to that effect.

With respect to the protection of the communities referred to by the minister from Cape Breton Island, I would refer to the minister responsible at the time the legislation was put through who, when asked about the situation with respect to any mining town that may have suffered because of a mine closure and thus had lost tax revenue, said:

This is exactly why we are providing millions of dollars to help develop the industrial basis of these towns.

I am sure that on reflection members of the government and its supporters would wish to see, with respect to legislation passed by this House, that it would deliver to the miners that which is theirs, including the return of their UIC benefits, the setting up of protection for present employees and their dependants and for former employees and their dependants, something which is not evident today despite what was laid down and promised by legislation in 1967. Again, I thank members of the House for their indulgence.

Speech from the Throne

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity in the fourth session of the twenty-eighth Parliament of Canada to participate in the debate in Reply to The Speech from the Throne by congratulating the mover, the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), and the seconder, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Lajoie). They performed their task with distinction by appraising frankly the situation in our country and reminding us all of the aspirations, the concerns and the achievements of Canadians and their government under the leadership of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who recognizes the changes in modern society and uses his talents and energy in persistently attacking our country's problems to provide a better life for all Canadians. The goal of a just society which he is striving to achieve is our deepest desire, and we wish him success.

The government's record in the first three sessions of this Parliament is an enviable one. I think that all Canadians should be proud of the reform legislation which Parliament has passed to improve the quality of life for all our citizens. I think we should also be proud of our country, rejoice in its great potentiality and be thankful for so many blessings. I agree with those who have stated before me in this House that there is no better country in which to live.

It is my privilege to represent in the House of Commons the people of the cosmopolitan constituency of Parkdale. It lies near the heart of the city of Toronto, on its southern borders, and I am proud of these hardworking, loyal citizens of various cultural backgrounds who through their industriousness are making a significant contribution to the development of Canada. Above all, they cherish the freedom and unlimited opportunities which Canada offers to all who are willing to work for self-improvement.

Many people in Parkdale are new Canadians. Having found freedom and opportunity here in Canada, they have a firm determination to preserve it. Consequently, they have understandable concern about people in other lands who do not share these blessings or who have lost them. At this point in Canada's history and development, the people of Parkdale, along with their fellow Canadians, are working together in that great national effort to develop further the good life in Canada, to promote the principles upon which our confederation is based and to help further develop Canadian identity and strengthen national unity.

The Speech from the Throne has outlined the federal government's philosophy and legislative program for the fourth session of this Parliament. I welcome the philosophical attitude and intentions of the federal government which were stated in the Speech from the Throne, especially in the following words:

> Everyone of us is enriched through involvement in this stimulating process we call Canada. Our goals and hopes are bound up in the restlessness and vitality of this rich land. We in this place have a special responsibility to help bring these goals and those hopes within reach, to make real the Canada of which our forefathers dreamed: a land so large that some of its will remain always serene and unspoiled; a society which believes in the dignity of every single individual; a community which husbands its resources and shares them justly among this generation and those to follow; an enterprise which permits and provokes each Canadian to contribute his skills and his talents. There will be an opportunity in this session of this Parliament to pursue these ends.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. Speaker, I hope all of us in this House will give most serious consideration to the government's program and, above all, co-operation. I welcome the announcement in the Speech from the Throne of Heritage Canada, the proposed legislation which would set up a broadly-based corporation to preserve individual buildings and sites in areas of historical and natural value that are regarded as nationally significant. Heritage Canada will add a new dimension by involving individual Canadians who are becoming increasingly aware and interested in preserving their historical, architectural and natural heritage. Heritage Canada will be launched with the aid of a generous federal endowment grant to give it a start, and the private sector will have a major role to play in it. Specifically, its aim is to enable anyone anywhere in Canada interested in preserving our historical and natural heritage to play a part in discharging a national responsibility.

Our cultural heritage is a vital part of the quality of our life. We must not only preserve it but make it available to all Canadians. Lack of knowledge about the culture and history of the various groups that make up our population has had more to do with dividing us than any other single factor. Historic sites and monuments, historic parks and museums enrich the quality of Canadian life and strengthen the fibre of national unity. Such endeavours will teach us who we are. Communication and understanding are essential in a pluralistic society like Canada. We should do everything possible, therefore, to deepen that communication and understanding which I believe are essentially to greater appreciation of one another. This type of Canadianism is the foundation of the federal government's policy on multiculturalism so enthusiastically received by all the ethnic cultural groups in our country. I urge the government to allocate all the necessary resources to make these programs successful.

In the Throne Speech, Mr. Speaker, the federal government stressed the importance of economic security as one of the most effective forces with which to counter social isolation. It stated that more job opportunities must be found and income uncertainties overcome if all Canadians are to share the richness of this land. We welcome the government's statement that the attainment of such an economy and increased employment has a very high priority in its programs.

At this time I should like to emphasize to all hon. members that the Employment Support Board Act which was passed in this House last September, in the last three months of 1971 saved approximately 7,700 jobs; the Opportunities for Youth program last summer provided 30,000 jobs and the Local Initiatives Program, initiated a few months ago, has already created 90,000 new jobs. This means that real and effective steps have been taken to find jobs for our rapidly expanding labour force which encompasses Canadians from age 14 to 70.

I agree with the government that our economy is dependent, as are the economies of other countries— especially those that are highly industrialized—on research innovation. We welcome the remarks of the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) a few days ago when he outlined for us the government's program to improve research facilities in our industries.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that our industries be given more assistance and incentives to further increase their productivity and competitive position. A major factor in the strength of the Canadian economy is provided by exports. Although the government has in the past amended the export credit legislation, it should improve this legislation and develop programs which will help to sell more of our products throughout the world. This will also require the government to take bolder steps to strengthen our secondary industry.

In view of our rapidly growing labour force we must not become complacent even though the United Nations organization for economic development and other financial bodies have stated that Canada's economic performance is outstanding and that our industrial output has grown faster and prices have risen slower than in any other democratic country in the world. True, our dollar is strong. True, our economy is growing rapidly. However, inflation and prolonged strikes, if allowed to continue, especially in essential services, can endanger our economy as well as inconvenience the public.

At least twice a year in my regular report to the people of Parkdale I have included a questionnaire to ascertain their views on some urgent and important matters. The majority of those who replied expressed themselves in favour of some form of control of prices and wages to fight inflation, and also favoured compulsory arbitration in labour-management disputes especially where they concern essential services or the public sector. Recently, a prominent labour leader in the United States admitted that strikes are outmoded and that better ways should be adopted to solve labour-management disputes. People today appear willing to submit to controls and other restrictions in order to ensure a stable economy and to protect their jobs. We must protect the savings of our people, especially those living on fixed incomes, such as our senior citizens. I urge the federal government to fight inflation without producing unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, I think that most Canadians would agree that a major economic problem in Canada today is cost-push inflation, where increases in costs have exceeded increases in productivity. The schizophrenic state of our industrialized society, where big unions and huge corporations compete for survival alongside unorganized workers and small businesses, has contributed to inflation and especially to an economy which has been very difficult to manage with traditional economic theories and tools.

Today new theories and tools are needed. I believe this is a top priority need to which our government should give attention. This may mean a real change and, therefore, essential adjustments may be required in our life. It would be rigidity or stupidity if those responsible should refuse to make the changes and adjustments which are necessary to ensure an economy that would lead to full employment and, if possible, zero inflation. We should adapt to change more quickly. Our failure to do so will serve only to perpetuate chaotic economic conditions. Of course, we should not be so naive as to believe that these changes and goals can be achieved instantly. Any opposition party spokesman who promises to perform instant miracles is irresponsible and should not be trusted.

I also urge the government to protect the economy and consumers from the real causes and harmful effects of labour-management disputes. The right of an individual to bargain for his conditions of work and withhold his labour is part of the philosophical basis of the free enterprise economic system. However, we must always keep in mind that the concerted withholding of labour by employees as an economic weapon to pressure employers to accept their demands always has an indirect and adverse effect on the suppliers and consumers of the product or service. Moreover, when the effect of a strike is to deprive the public of an essential service for the carrying on of day-to-day living or to withhold from the public a convenience or essential service which is paid for by it through taxes, the public usually regards this as unfair or intolerable and pressures the government for protection and restoration of order.

Strike action, most of the time, benefits no one. Wages are lost, production comes to a halt and consumers who depend on the services or products are adversely affected. A strike is expensive to all concerned, including the innocent consumer. This is even more true when public servants withhold their labour. Those who accept employment with the government have a special responsibility to the public for whom they perform services.

Governments at all levels, and their agencies, Mr. Speaker, should devote more attention and resources to the problems of our retired citizens. More and more people are retiring at an earlier age, and retirement brings on personal and social problems. One solution to the personal problem faced by many older people trying to lead a useful and challenging life is to provide them with opportunities to help solve the problems of our society. The Canadian Executive Service Overseas program, under the sponsorship of the Department of External Affairs, is a step in the right direction.

I should like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to express our appreciation to the former minister responsible for urban affairs who has done a great deal to produce more housing and has come to the assistance of our cities in an imaginative way. In 1971, 220,000 housing starts were achieved, which is a record in our history. In the past three years of this Liberal government, more low-cost public housing was built than in the previous 20 years. But our government will not be resting on its laurels. It announced in the Throne Speech that it will be proposing to Parliament fresh concepts and continuing research in neighbourhood improvement, with emphasis on the need for low-cost housing.

I wish the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) success in his new responsibilities and ask him to seek closer liaison with our rapidly growing cities. A fast-growing city, like my native metropolitan Toronto, encounters many problems and has many special needs. There are projects in Toronto involving the waterfront plan, metro centre, transportation and improved airport facilities which need major attention by the federal government. People in Toronto are asking for lower air fares, landing rights for more transatlantic air carriers and an early decision on a second airport to better serve the area's air travelling residents. I repeat my appeal to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to give these matters his urgent and favourable consideration.

We can proudly say, Mr. Speaker, that in instituting social justice our government has made sure that the health of our people receives top priority—for without health of mind and body, nothing can be realized. We can proudly say that Canada has made great progress in improving its health and welfare system, especially since 1957, with the introduction of hospital insurance, followed by medicare, the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, youth allowances, the guaranteed income supplement, many consumer protection laws, new drug programs, restrictions in the use of DDT and phosphates, the Canada Water Act, the Clean Air Act, the day-care centres program and many other programs. The budget for the Department of National Health and Welfare alone for the next fiscal year is $3.8 billion, and I believe that this sum will go a long way to improving still further the quality of life of our citizens.

Last week the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) announced a new program in the House to combat narcotic addiction and the misuse of stimulant drugs. If this program is to be successful, it must be properly enforced. Methadone maintenance and amphetamine restriction programs are a fairly good beginning in the national effort to control drug abuse. I hope the minister will soon give his further attention to the other recommendations in the policy statement of the Canadian Medical Association issued on February 14, and particularly to that statement which said that the drugs most extensively used and most frequently misused today are alcohol and tobacco. Programs and necessary legislation to deal with these problems should be developed in co-operation with provincial health authorities without delay. The increased incidence of venereal diseases should also receive greater attention by governments at all levels.

Canada's number one killer, Mr. Speaker, is cardiovascular disease. In 1971, about 77,000 Canadians died of various forms of cardiovascular disease. Last year, heart attacks and strokes alone accounted for 50,000 deaths in Canada; yet only $5 million was spent on research in these diseases. Of that total, only $1.5 million was contributed by the federal government. I therefore wish to renew my appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to launch a full-scale national attack on cardiovascular diseases. The minister should allocate more financial resources to increase research in this field and to assist the provinces in the provision of better emergency treatment and long-term care in the areas of heart disease and strokes. Also, he should help in launching a campaign for the education of the public.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the Speech from the Throne has clearly outlined our problems and our goals. It has also announced remedies and means to deal with them. I hope that Parliament will act responsibly and support the government's proposed legislation so that the quality of life for all our people may be further improved.

APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the House to revert to motions in order to bring forward the terms of reference for the special joint committee on the constitution? This motion has been cleared by all the parties and its purpose is to set up, or reconstitute the committee so that it may make its report to the House at an early date.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the minister. Is it agreed that the House revert to motions in order that the minister may move his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen moved:

That a special joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to examine and report upon proposals, made public, or which are from time to time made public by the government of Canada, on a number of subjects related to the constitution of Canada during the course of the comprehensive review of the constitution of Canada, which review was agreed upon at the Constitutional Conference of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers and Prime Ministers of the provinces in February, 1968, and alternative proposals on the same subjects;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers, and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the quorum of the committee be 17 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, as long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when 7 members are present so long as both Houses are represented;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the second and third sessions be referred to the committee and made part of the records thereof;

That the following members be appointed to act on behalf of the House of Commons on the special joint committee, namely: Messrs. Alexander, Allmand, Asselin, Breau, Brewin, De Bané, Dinsdale, Fairweather, Gibson, Gundlock, Hogarth, Lachance, Laprise, MacGuigan, Marceau, Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo), McQuaid, Osler, Prud'homme and Rowland.

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting Their Honours to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems so advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I will now leave the chair to resume same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resume at 8 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ross Whicher for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, in the speech he delivered on February 18 last, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who obviously wished to defend his government subjected to attacks from all sides, did not spare any effort to make us believe that all is well in Canada. He even quoted some statistics to show that Canada had created more jobs than seven European countries put together: France, Germany, Belgium, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden and the United Kingdom.

Everybody will agree with me that it is relatively easy to create thousands of jobs when thousands of workers are unemployed. But in countries with a low rate of unemployment and a small labour force, the task becomes more difficult for manufacturers.

On page 10 of the Economic Council of Canada report entitled "Performance in Perspective 1971" there is a comparative table of unemployment rates in certain OECD countries. Of all the countries mentioned, Canada has the highest rate.

For instance, in West Germany, the unemployment rate is only 0.6 per cent, whereas it is 5.9 in Canada—those are the figures for 1970.

In Japan, the unemployment rate is only 1.2 per cent, and in France, 3.3 per cent. Even in Italy, it is only 3.5 per cent, whereas it is 5.9 per cent in Canada.

So when the Prime Minister wants to make comparisons with European countries in the matter of unemployment, he should tell the whole story and quote the statistics which show that the unemployment rate is higher in Canada than in any European country.

In our country the current unemployment rate is increasing among workers of all ages and both sexes. For workers between 25 and 44 years of age, it has gone up from 93,000 in 1965 to 157,000 in 1970. For workers between 45 and 64 years of age, it has risen from 70,000 to 106,000 over the same period. As I said, this phenomenon can be observed in the case of women as well as men.

Despite the Prime Minister's effort, despite the ministers' making presents right, left, and centre in order to create thousands of jobs, the unemployment rate goes on increasing in Canada, for young people between 14 and 24 years of age as well as for workers 25 years old and over. The unemployment rate has been increasing constantly since 1968—the date at which the present government came to power.

In that connection, here are some statistics from "Manpower, December 1971." The publication contains a table indicating the average unemployment for Canadians from 14 to 24 years of age. In 1968, the average was 6 per cent; in 1969, it was 5.9 per cent, for 1970, it was 7.7 per cent and for 1971, it was 8.8 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, if the increase in the rate of unemployment is higher among young people, it remains that it is generalized. Unemployment is like a cancer undermining the whole Canadian society, and in my opinion, had the prime minister consulted his immediate advisors, it is likely that the whole content of his speech would have been changed. Many ministers of his Cabinet are perfectly aware of the situation.

First here is what the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) said at Jasper on February 1, 1971, as reported by the Canadian Press:

> The federal government has agreed to work out a program to deal with unemployment which will probably be very high next winter, stated yesterday the president of the Treasury Board, Mr. C. M. Drury.

As for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) he was also forecasting unemployment and, for a wonder, he foresees even more during the next winter.

Mr. Speaker, I was sorry to learn that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration had to be hospitalized. I therefore take this opportunity to wish him an early recovery.

• (2010)

Be that as it may, here is what Le Devoir of February 10th last reported with regard to the minister's statement, and I quote:

> 665,000 unemployed in Canada, 233,000 in Quebec, (that is over 35 per cent of the total number)—and that is not all: the federal Minister of Manpower, Mr. Bryce Mackasey, thought it wise to warn us that the situation would go from bad to worse in the coming months!

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Lamoureux) the Speaker of the House of Commons, member elected under the Liberal ticket in 1965, stated at a public meeting held in his riding that 19 per cent of the workers were unemployed, and we know that his riding is represented in the Ontario legislature by a Conservative minister. In spite of that, in the spring of 1971, unemployment in Stormont went up to 19 per cent.

The Prime Minister did try to have the people believe that there was no discontent. I can assure the House that the unemployed workers themselves realize this winter that they are left behind. For those who are the victims of unemployment in Canada at the present time, this is a real tragedy, a situation worse than any other up to this day.

Personally, I spent half the adjournment period—and I presume that most members did likewise—trying to untangle the difficulties involving the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Due to the constantly increasing number of unemployed workers, the officials of the Commission are overwhelmed with work and in spite of their good will and their overtime, the situation remains the same. In my opinion, the worst backlog is with respect to claims covering periods of illness. In addition, the staff dealing with claims in insufficent, and I think that this government should give particular attention to this problem.

Even though the Speech from the Throne is full of optimism, even though the Prime Minister says that everything is fine in the best of all worlds, there still remains the fact that it is with pessimism that experts in international trade view the years ahead. Here is what the Secretariat of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) thinks about prospects for 1972, according to a dispatch from Geneva:

—the increase in international trade exchanges will not be higher in 1972 than in 1971, that is five per cent, a much lower proportion than the average for the sixties.

As for the reasons behind our trade difficulties, Mr. Speaker, we can summarize them quite easily.

In the first place, Canada has to export a number of products of all kinds; raw materials, finished and semi-finished products. Our country must export much more than it imports because it must pay for the services rendered by other countries.

These services include the interest on money Canada borrows abroad. Then, Canada has to pay for transportation of its imports and exports because we have no merchant marine. We must therefore charter foreign ships to transport our products. Finally, Canadians travelling abroad spent more than tourists visiting Canada. These are the reasons for our services dificit, that is why, even when our trade balance shows a surplus of some $400 million for the last quarter of 1971, our deficit in the service sector was over $600 million, leaving a current account deficit of some $200 million.

That is one of the reasons why we should strive, without resorting to foreign capital to develop our natural resources and ensure the expansion of our industries. We could then consider giving Canada a merchant marine enabling us to transport our products while providing work to our dockyards and a host of related industries.

Mr. Speaker, another sector where economic activity should be followed closely, I suggest, is home construction. There is a shortage of housing and we know that throughout Canada the slums should disappear. We know that home construction is an important factor at the manpower level.

It is no secret that the financing of housing at acceptable interest rates would help this branch of our economy. The government, which helps some foreign countries by granting them loans at low interest rates, should also help the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with the same conditions. The corporation could thus meet the requests of customers interested in things other than the exorbitant interest rates charged at present which has a workman who gets one of these loans to repay the cost of three houses in the following 25 years: one for the principal and two for the interest.

So, to reactivate home construction, there is no need for miracles; it would be enough to do for Canadians what we do for foreigners. As the 11 per cent tax on building materials is never charged on products sold to foreigners, I suppose it would be normal for this tax to be removed for Canadians also and replaced by a 10 per cent discount on materials sold inside our country.

Mr. Speaker, I have the conviction that it is possible to meet the needs of Canadians. Even though I am known in the House as a Social Credit Party member, the fact remains that I am aware that poverty exists in our economic system and that we must eliminate or at least alleviate it.

First of all, with regard to the problem of poverty, one must ask oneself if it truly exists in Canada. A national product of $90 billion in 1971, for a population of 21,500,000, meant $4,300 per person. And we can only repeat that, if poverty exists, it is poverty in the midst of plenty.

According to the data published in the 1970 Canada Yearbook, our country is the second largest in the world, the largest in North America, and the world's largest nickel producer. In 1969, 25 per cent of the total production of zinc of the non-communist world was produced in Canada.

In 1969, Canada was the second largest molybdenum producer, after the United States. It was one of the five largest cobalt producers. It accounted for 70 to 75 per cent of all exports of asbestos and 35 per cent of the world's production. Canada was the largest producer of potassium and the most important producer and the first sulfur exporting country in the world.

Canada is also one of the three most important fish exporting countries. Because it is seen as a very important producer of grain, Canada is called the "granary of the world". Mr. Speaker, the list of our country's achievements is a very long one and its potentiality is unlimited.

If, as a governing body, we give the people the means to obtain all that they need to subsist, there will be no longer any problem of poverty.

Mr. Speaker, in the last few years this government has introduced many projects designed to boost our economy. It went as far as loaning money to the Chinese so they could buy our wheat. They obtain loans on fairly long terms and then they buy from us the wheat they will be eating during the forthcoming 24 month period.

Millions of dollars are handed over to France so that they may have their boats built in our shipyards.

In order to restore our economy, Canada has been subdivided into "special" or designated areas. Last year, I was with a group of visitors travelling through Manitoba and Saskatchewan and I discovered that the majority of the people we met were convinced that the Prime Minister was responsible for the current economic crisis prevailing in the Western provinces because he, being a French Canadian, was channelling all the funds into Quebec. This is what they think over there.

The same situation prevails in the Maritimes. As a member of the Committee on Transport and Communications, I have had the privilege of visiting this other part of the country, and almost all of the briefs submitted on that occasion by the Chambers of Commerce, the various social agencies and the governing bodies of several cities, would wind up with this particular sentence:

"Gentlemen of the government, you are treating us shabbily because we are far from the capital, and we know Quebec would not accept such a situation."

So, Mr. Speaker, in the view of the citizens of the Maritime provinces and those of the Canadian West, Quebec gets very good treatment. Quebec is favoured but is well aware that many of its citizens also have financial problems.

Throughout all this, the Canadian government has commandeered quite important groups to analyse the situation. Among these agencies is the Economic Council of Canada, which, in December 1964, submitted its first review entitled "Economic Goals for Canada to 1970".

That agency's second annual review was published in December 1965, entitled: "Towards sustained and balanced economic growth".

In November 1966, another review was produced on "Prices, Productivity and Employment".

In September 1967 a review by the Economic Council of Canada was published, entitled "The Canadian Economy from the 1969's to the 1970's."

In September 1968, another review was published, entitled "The Challenge of Growth and Change."

In September 1969, another review was published to make us aware of Canada's perspectives for 1975.

Mr. Speaker, all these reviews produced by the Economic Council of Canada having failed to make a meaningful contribution to date, are now making proposals for 1975.

Mr. Speaker, without knowing them, I am convinced that those who are responsible for the Economic Council of Canada make comments on coming years simply because they know they will no longer be there then.

Study No. 17 of the Economic Council of Canada was presented in November 1967, and was entitled "Economic Cycles in Canada." On page 25 of that report, we read, and I quote:

> The identification of the "reference" cycle is based on the overall performance indicated by the "peaks" and and the "troughs" of the "particular cycles" . . .

Further on, we read this:

> The period between the trough or lowest point in a reference cycle and the peak or highest point of return is generally known as "expansion". The period between a peak and the following trough is called a period of "contraction".

On page 23 of the same report, Mr. Speaker, we find something fantastic, and I quote what its authors had to say:

> In length, economic cycles can vary from over one year to ten or twelve years;

Mr. Speaker, after reading that report, one can assert that the Pharaoh's economists mentioned in the Bible were surer of themselves than the economists who now surround the Prime Minister. You will recall that the Pharaoh had been warned that there would be seven years of abundance following seven years of famine. That was clear.

Today, in this country, to justify poverty in the midst of plenty, the economists take no chances. In fact, the economists surrounding the Prime Minister state in their reports that:

—economic cycles may vary from one to 10 or 12 years.

Mr. Speaker, to suppress hardship, poverty and insecurity among the Canadian people, certain measures are required. Those measures must of course be somewhat different from all that is being done at the present time and that has led the people to this imbalance to which we are referring and that we want to correct.

To get off the beaten track, Mr. Speaker, it has to be conceded that the situation is not what it was 75 or 100 years ago. It has to be conceded that following the technological revolution man, as a worker, is more and more replaced by the machine. Anyone who reflects upon the progress of machines which keep increasing in number must logically conclude that our civilization is heading toward the establishment of a system where, on the one hand, human labour tends to decrease constantly and to be replaced by machines while on the other production has a tendency to increase indefinitely.

Now, these two logical consequences of technology are in the present state of the economic system quite incompatible.

Man can get products—even if they are in great abundance—only by working but at the same time machines are taking jobs away from him, hence the infernal cycle of economic crises, unemployment and unfortunately, wars which find there one of their main causes.

• (2030)

It is in time of peace that we discover more easily the victims of our present system because the whole production is directed toward regular consumption.

Since workers have less and less to do in the manufacturing of products, fewer and fewer products are sold while there are more and more unemployed.

So there is only one way out: to get rid of that economic rule whereby every product must have a commercial value and to admit that some products may be depreciated, in other words given free of charge.

Some hon. Members: Here it comes.

Mr. Godin: The minimum living wage is a necessity. Our country has and will have at its disposal more and more means of living that were inconceivable at the time of the ox plow.

It has been said time and again that the machine has to serve man and not the other way round. One infallible way to put automation at the service of man is to distribute profits equitably. It is as clear as that.

Without raw materials and natural resources, a country is at a disadvantage. However, we Canadians are blessed in this regard for we are amply endowed with both.

Some hon. Members: Now, he is coming to it.

Mr. Godin: We also have an adequate transportation system, highways, navigable rivers and railway and air transport systems that can be improved if necessary.

When we consider our manufacturing facilities, we find that many are operating below capacity and that some have closed altogether.

There is no shortage of manpower in Canada. The stagnation in our plants is caused by our failure to sell our end products.

The goods that fill our stores and warehouses are Canadian products or products exchanged with other countries. For all practical purposes, this production that fills our stores and warehouses may be regarded as Canadian.

A great many individuals and governments would purchase more Canadian goods, individually and collectively, provided they would not be required to borrow money at exorbitant interest rates, thus getting deeper into debt.

Some hon. Members: There we are.

Mr. Godin: Others cannot afford or are not sufficiently solvent to purchase the goods they need. That is why such goods remain unsold in stores and warehouses. Indeed, it is the lack of purchasing power in the hands of the potential buyer which is at the root of our economic problems.

The fact that the same thing happens in all modernized countries does not warrant, I think, our tolerating such a situation.

Throughout the world, highly qualified people have exposed the current situation and suggested solutions. Some of those solutions could easily be applied by the Canadian government.

The increasing public debt at all levels is enough of a proof that it is time to improve the system.

The government has had inquiries conducted in all fields; many would be surprised at the number of people appointed to find out the reasons for our economic and social difficulties. Unfortunately, those people must follow strict instructions and until now they have investigated everything except the operations of our money and credit system. In my opinion, this is why it is high time to give up the ostrich policy.

Considering that, currently, money is born and dies in the chartered banks empowered by the government to—

Some hon. Members: At long last we are going to have it.

Some hon. Members: Now we will hear about Caouette's machine.

Some hon. Members: Here it comes.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I deplore that it is called "Caouette's machine" but I would point out that this machine had—

Mr. Latulippe: Anyway, it is still better than the "tax machine".

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, better than the "tax machine".

Mr. Godin: —been announced mainly by the Right Hon. Mackenzie King.

Indeed, we need a statutory monetary power that would put the monetary institution at the disposal of the community.

It is urgent that the money supply be first regulated and determined as a function of a certain national production level that would be scientifically and regularly calculated.

Second, it is urgent that the Bank of Canada alone be authorized to expand the money supply needed by Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh! Here it comes.

[Mr. Godin.]

Mr. Godin: Third, that any additional line of credit extended by the Bank of Canada be charged to a national credit account.

Some hon. Members: Here we are.

Mr. Godin: Fourth, that the money deposited in the national credit account be allocated for the needs of the Canadian people according to their wishes, as expressed through their representatives in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Godin: Once this solution is implemented, Mr. Speaker, whenever the level of the national inventory of buyable products passes a certain point, this will be justification to increase the money supply by an amount equal to the value of the inventory above a certain level. The additional money will be created by the Bank of Canada, after it receives authority to do so from Parliament, and will be deposited in a national credit account. If the level of the inventory of buyable products goes down it will then be necessary to reduce the money supply. And in order to reduce the money supply, there is no better way than taxation. This means that when the whole population and the accountants responsible for supervising the national inventory, i.e., the people who will have authority to balance the national credit account, then we will turn to the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Mr. Benson), who will waste no time in laying hands on whatever excess there is.

Mr. Duquet: You have the wrong minister!

Mr. Godin: Once this solution is implemented, the present allocation of funds from the national credit account by Parliament will be accomplished without creating any further national debt, and will at the same time reduce taxes. The Canadian people will be assured at all times that there is enough money to purchase the buyable production available in Canada, such available buyable production being the final result of the efforts made by Canadians, individually and as a group.

Once this solution is implemented, it will follow that the increase in production resulting from automation, cybernetics, and so on, will become a real blessing for Canada. This solution will remedy once and for all the distribution blockage which at present restrains the economy of the western hemisphere countries, of which we are part.

Implementation of this solution, Mr. Speaker, will allow chartered banks, which provide a service necessary in our society, to remain free competitive enterprises. The only change will be that only the Bank of Canada will be empowered to create additional money supply for the needs of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: It is over, at last!

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to join hon. members who have expressed congratulations to the mover and seconder of this motion. I am in a unique position in this regard because I think I am one of the few sitting members who has in fact had this assignment in the past and I know what an honour and a milestone it is in the history and life of any parliamentarian.

In the last few hours I have re-read the Speech from the Throne, and I have read or heard most of the comments that have been uttered in this debate during the last eight days. Having done so, I can sympathize with the point of view once expressed by Winston Churchill when he said that democracy is the worst possible form of government except for all the others.

The exercise of looking at what I might describe as the total package of the so-called Throne Speech debate is also useful in that it gives one a better understanding of what a growing number of people, particularly young people, are beginning to question more and more; that is, the relevancy of this institution. They are beginning to say more frequently and with more conviction that, to use the modern expression, this simply is not where the action is.

The fact is that when one looks at the totality—I am saying this in an objective way—we have not in fact had a debate at all, in the strict sense of the word. Certain members have said during this debate, with a measure of truth, that it does provide an opportunity for individual members to speak on behalf of their constituencies or, indeed, to talk on any topic of their choosing. But the end result of that, when one looks at it in its total context, is that it is simply not worth it—which might be the conclusion of a group of students if, let us say, they were to examine this debate as an essay assignment or something of that sort.

Indeed, when I read the total package I came to the conclusion that this whole process is now rather an anachronism. It is true that it is sanctified by tradition and that there are certain aspects of it, as I have said, that members regard as being tremendously important. But in terms of communicating additional knowledge about the affairs of this country to the public or even, indeed, to members of the House, I would have to say that the exercise has not been much of a success.

I think the best example I can put forward is the fact that when one analyses literally the total contribution to this debate of members of the opposition, one finds that they have not at any time—or perhaps, to be fair, I should say with very few exceptions—come to grips in any realistic way with the many issues raised in the Throne Speech, some of them contentious and some controversial. The fact is that these issues have been glanced over, if indeed touched upon at all, and we have fallen back almost totally on what might be described as confrontation politics. In a sense, the whole objective seems to be to smite the government hip and thigh.

There is no better example of this than the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I read it in full again this afternoon. I find it takes up eight pages in Hansard. Of those eight, six and a half pass before the Leader of the Opposition even gets around to indicating what kind of policies his party might pursue in the event of their gaining responsibility for government. But he even deals with that question in a most casual and offhanded fashion. There is nothing basically wrong with this, Mr. Speaker: it is fair ball, fair game. It is a form of political activity, or political strategy if you like. It is probably as old as the parliamentary system: it is based on the assumption that governments don't get elected, but simply that other governments get defeated.

I can imagine the Leader of the Opposition and his advisers and speech-writers sitting down and saying, "What we should do now is create a compendium of all the discontents, real and imagined, in this country at the present time. We have to indicate that we are on the proper side of each one of them. We have to get in that bit about old age pensions; and don't forget about the native peoples. And whatever you do, don't leave out that long-standing commitment about the small, family-held farm. Wrap these all up in a bundle and then fall back on your most imaginative writer for a few, hopefully, humorous one-liners. Then stretch out the paragraphs in the most tortuous way you can so that you eventually get to some kind of punchline."

That is in fact what the first six pages or more of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition reflect. He has an absolute right to do this and it is a quite appropriate stance for him to take, to smite the government hip and thigh. But I say to him and to hon. members opposite that it is rather naïve of them to expect that the public will accept as an alternative to the government a party which simply does not put forward alternatives and does not get down to arguing the basic and very important issues which are not only stated in the Throne Speech but are so obvious to all of us in this House.

As a member of the government, when listening to the Leader of the Opposition I felt a kinship with the two sailors who, after a very rough Saturday night, found themselves compelled to go to church parade on Sunday. They went, and discovered that the sermon was on the Ten Commandments. It was a real old-fashioned, hell-fire and brimstone sermon admonishing people as to what would happen to them if they broke the Ten Commandments. The two sailors listened silently; then as they emerged from church one turned to the other and said, "At least we haven't made any graven images." Time after time the Leader of the Opposition has come forward and said that the government has done absolutely nothing right. I would remind him that even a stopped clock is right twice a day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, as I read the speech of the Leader of the Opposition I began to wonder what would happen if in fact positions were reversed and we had the speech of the Leader of the Opposition as the Throne Speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: Let us look at what the position would be if in fact we had the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, delivered in this House, as the document that was read by His Excellency the Governor General. What would we find in it with regard to policy? What would we find in it with regard to plans, alternatives and options that the opposition—which then, of course, would be the policy formulating body—would undertake? First of all we would have this:

Our first objective would be the creation of sufficient opportunities for meaningful employment for Canadians—

Motherhood! Sheer, unadulterated motherhood! There is not a word about how this would be achieved, not a single word from this party which would provide sufficient opportunities for meaningful employment for Canadians.

Mr. Bigg: Tell us something about transportation, and not political garbage.

Mr. Jamieson: It looks like we're scoring, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: What I started to say, Mr. Speaker, was that having made this very profound statement with which nobody can disagree, the Leader of the Opposition gives no indication of how his party would wrestle with the universal problem, experienced in industrial countries at least, of how one achieves full employment while at the same time controlling runaway prices and wages and all the other problems that have inflation as their root. Nor does he indicate whether his party is in favour of price and wage controls. Is it in fact the policy of the Tory party to introduce price and wage controls? Does the Leader of the Opposition support them, or is that the private preserve of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), that perennial Peter Pan of the Tory party?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: One can imagine what the reaction would be if this statement of the Leader of the Opposition were in the Throne Speech, standing all by itself, unprotected:

Our third priority is the pursuit of steady economic growth in terms both of gross national product and in terms of productivity through a program of incentives to encourage the initiative of Canadians in all branches of business, industry, farming and other occupations.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what is known in legal terms as the basket clause. You throw the whole works in together. You get in the motherhood words, like "incentives" and "initiatives" and you latch them on to every conceivable pressure group in the country. How this is going to be achieved, we do not know. It says nothing. And what about this marvellously ingenious phrase:

Fourth, we recognize the need as a basic priority to communicate a sense of national purpose to the Canadian people.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the first politician who ever took to the hustings in Canada invented such a phrase. In fact, there is nothing new or ingenious about it. Even Dalton Camp and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) could agree on that one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: But, Mr. Speaker, I ask you, what kind of initiative, what kind of incentive and what kind of national purpose? Are these initiatives that are going to be provided, and have been included in this basket clause, to cover all manner of people—incentives of the sort that would give a guaranteed annual income, something which is an anathema to a large section of the party opposite? Or is there to be an incentive for the free-wheeling free enterpriser section of the Tory party? You have to choose between these two kinds of incentives.

Is the incentive going to be freer trade, which undoubtedly many of the farmers might very well want; or is there to be more protection for the businessman whom the Leader of the Opposition puts cheek by jowl with all the other occupations in that phrase? I say once again that if the Leader of the Opposition expects the people of Canada to swallow these kinds of generalities, he is very much mistaken. Next in this imaginary Tory Throne Speech we come to these words:

We should adopt immediately the concept of a full employment budget in this country.

That is it, full stop, paragraph, nothing else.

We should adopt immediately the concept of a full employment budget in this country.

How are we going to adopt it? What kind of full employment budget? The Leader of the Opposition points out that in fact this has been done in the United States. Mr. Speaker, it was done about a year or so ago in the United States; but is the Leader of the Opposition suggesting that the results that flowed from it there are the kinds of things we want in Canada? Is that the model we want to follow? Has he forgotten that just a few months after the so-called full employment budget was introduced in the United States their levels of unemployment were still virtually what they were before, and that in addition the United States had to undertake the most drastic kind of fiscal and monetary measures, perhaps the most drastic known in the history of that country? He simply says, calmly and coolly:

• (2050)

We should adopt immediately by the concept of a full employment budget in this country.

Then we come to this one, and it is a real puzzler. If this were in a Tory Throne Speech, I do not know how I would respond to it. The Leader of the Opposition said:

There should have been some proposal to draw Canadians together in the fight against inflation and, in particular, some clarification of the role of the Prices and Incomes Commission.

What does that mean? Does it mean that this party which has villified the Prices and Incomes Commission from the beginning will retain the commission? If it intends to retain it, presumably it will make substantial changes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: Please do not bother me while I am at work. I don't go down in the sewer and take your time. The hon. gentleman will have his time, if he has not had it already.

Mr. Bigg: Tell us about freight rates.

Mr. Jamieson: We are hitting you, boy, right where it hurts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I think hon. members should let the minister complete his remarks. An hon. member who wants the floor can seek it by the normal procedure. The Minister of Transport.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentlemen are as confident as they say they are, that after the next election they will be over here, they should be listening and getting used to it, because if that is the case that is what I will be telling them then. Is that all right? Let me repeat this gem:

There should have been some proposal to draw Canadians together in the fight against inflation and, in particular, some clarification of the role of the Prices and Incomes Commission.

As I say, is the suggestion that the role of the Prices and Incomes Commission should be changed drastically? If it is, surely it is not unreasonable to say to the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Bigg: Tell us about transportation.

Mr. Jamieson: I will tell you about transportation. I would like to put you on your horse and send you out of here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: On second thought, maybe I got the horse wrong.

Mr. Nesbitt: Now who is getting under whose skin?

Mr. Jamieson: The point is, Mr. Speaker, that it is impossible for the opposition to leave a comment like this standing without indicating whether they have plans, presumably, for the retention of the Prices and Incomes Commission. Are they going to have some form of enforced wage and price controls? If they are, the country and this House has the right to know, rather than leaving it in limbo. Incidentally, the only other support that is given to that particular sentence—and imagine this in a Tory Throne Speech—says:

We should be fighting hard now to get some guidelines accepted in fighting inflation.

This is from a party that has consistently and without exception said that guidelines will not work. I can quote from many speeches of members opposite asking when the government is going to give up the folly of guidelines. Now they are suggesting that this is the solution. Again I have to ask, Mr. Speaker, are these the guidelines that are going to be enforced, or is this to be some kind of voluntary exercise of the sort that hon. members say is meaningless and ineffective?

I should like to come now to—

Mr. MacInnis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: My point of order arises from the statement made by the minister. He said he was prepared to quote, and the question arises: Who is he going to quote and what is he going to quote? Let's hear it.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, if I had a little time I am sure I would be able to find—

An hon. Member: We will give you all the time you want.

Mr. Jamieson: What I said, Mr. Speaker, is a matter of record and I think it can be supported—that indeed many members of the party opposite have indicated that the voluntary guidelines exercise is not a workable solution to the inflation problem. In fact, it has been an almost basic tenet of their arguments over the last four years.

Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the Leader of the Opposition, toward the end of his speech he did recognize that there was necessity for him to make some comments about policy and to assert some leadership. I will say that in reading his speech I noticed that he added a new wrinkle to the old, so-called confrontation politics; that is, there are occasions when he comes down squarely on both sides of an issue. This is what is known as the "sweet reasonableness approach": you do not really take a stand until you have had an opportunity to weigh public opinion and get some idea of how the cat of public opinion is going to jump. So we have various references to this, and, on the other hand, that.

He says during his speech that many of the points he makes with regard to policy will be elaborated by those coming after. I searched and found nothing in the way of elaboration or policy declaration that followed. For example, on a matter that is of great concern to me—Newfoundland—he said one line, and one line only in the whole speech:

—more effective measures to ensure the conservation of our fisheries.

Nobody disputes that. But what kind of measures does the leader of that party suggest; and would they be prepared to support the kind of unilateral action that is being recommended by certain members of the party, a kind of gunboat diplomacy? Are they in fact prepared to assert unilateral control over the continental shelf? Is this the policy? If it is, we have a right to know. In fact, not only do we have a right to know, but that kind of discussion in this House would be useful because this is one of the most complex of subjects.

If the Leader of the Opposition is prepared to assert, as a matter of policy, that regardless of international agreements, regardless of treaties, regardless of international law, we propose to move unilaterally in that direction, then I say it is his obligation to spell that out and not simply to have it quoted as a possibility or even a faint hope by some of his followers.

Finally comes a ringing declaration. This has got to be the most inane sentence I have ever read, standing by itself. He said:

Our industries in Canada must be put in a position to compete.

Now, what industries? And compete with whom, and under what circumstances? Tonight I do not propose, despite what hon. gentlemen have said, to talk about transportation, to go into it in detail because there will be an opportunity during the debate on the Canadian National—

An hon. Member: Don't talk about it. You don't know.

Mr. Jamieson: Do you want an answer? Would you like to take the floor? I would be happy to give you the floor.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

An hon. Member: Careful about that one, Don.

Mr. Bigg: What do you know about freight rates? Do you want some more?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, what I was about to say with regard to freight rates and the whole question of transportation was that in point of fact I am exercising the democratic right which many members opposite have explained as being part of this debate, that is, that a member is free to talk about any subject of his choosing. This is what I have chosen, and I feel it is apt.

Mr. Bigg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Bigg: Yes, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I was asked by the hon. member who has the floor to rise and say something and explain why I want to talk about transportation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Hon. members know we must abide by the rules of the House. The minister has the floor, and unless he yields the floor no other hon. member can speak. The rules do not permit us to go from one hon. member to another and get into an exchange. Each hon. member has to make a speech in his due time, and only when recognized by the Chair. The Minister of Transport.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: You are quite right, of course, about the rules, Mr. Speaker; but I would point out that in this case the minister, not doing very well having the floor, gave it to the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): On the point of order just raised, the hon. member knows, I am sure, that it is for the Chair to recognize hon. members and not for a minister or a private member.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) for his short, instructive lecture on parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Baldwin: Any time.

• (2100)

Mr. Jamieson: As the hon. member knows, I am always anxious to hear what hon. members opposite have to say. I wish to say once again, if I may answer my hon. friend, that the debate on CNR financing is coming up in a few days and it was my intention to devote a speech at that time to the questions which he raised. I hope that will dispose of the matter.

What I was going to say on the question, if I may put it in simple terms, of making sure that our industries in Canada are put in the position of being able to compete is that the subject is tremendously complicated and involves transportation. I merely want to say that, ironically, I have received even in the last few days protests from Manitoba to the effect that the freight assistance we are providing in eastern Canada constitutes unfair competition. Therefore, one has to go to western Canada to hear something good said about transportation in eastern Canada, and vice versa.

I say in all seriousness that it is not enough simply to add that our industries in Canada must be put in the position of being able to compete. We must round that out, when we talk about competition. How are they to compete, and with whom? Are we talking about international trade? Are we talking about the tremendous competition which goes on among the various regions of Canada?

As the statement stands in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, it is meaningless, totally and absolutely. And so, Mr. Speaker, in concluding my commentary on this sort of imaginary Tory Throne Speech one must say to use a stock phrase, that it is more significant for what it does not contain than for what it says. Even in terms of a speech by the Leader of the Opposition, about the best that can be said for it is that it is essentially rambling rhetoric and oversimplication. Indeed, it would be well if most of us in this House, regardless of where we sit, heeded something once said. I do not remember which particular philosopher said that the essence of tyranny is the denial of complexity, but if ever there was a denial of complexity one can see it in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. I could put everything of a policy nature which was contained in his remarks on one page.

Mr. Nesbitt: And the Speech from the Throne could be put in one sentence.

Mr. Jamieson: I am sorry to say that his statements were not in the least significant. My time is running out, Mr. Speaker, and I may not be able to do justice to the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis) and the other heavyweights who took part in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Jamieson: I confess that I was singularly disappointed by the contribution of the leader of the NDP. He knows—and I wish he were here tonight—that I have great respect for him and for his debating ability. Yet when one looks at his contribution in this debate, once again it is easy to see that he has totally avoided saying anything about his party's policies and, on that occasion at least, he resorted to the cheapest kind of political haymaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: He began by describing the Throne Speech as a speech made up of purple prose. I wish he were here, because I would tell him that if he were to read his remarks with intellectual honesty he would discover that the further he went into his speech the more purple he became, and by the time he had finished anything in the Throne Speech, in terms of rhetoric and purple prose, had been left far behind in his remarks. I confess that my difficulty with the NDP is not one of philosophy or ideology. There are many matters on which that party and I agree completely. I think we can resolve our differences of ideology as mature people who can look at the issues and confront them squarely. But, Mr. Speaker, what really irritates me about the NDP is the sanctimonious, holier-than-thou attitudes which that party adopts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: On every occasion, that party likes to feel that it is the possessor of all truth and wisdom. If we could go back to the days of Cecil B. de Mille and he were to make a film about this House, I think it is fair to say that if he made it according to an NDP version all the rest of us would sit here in darkness, total and utter darkness, and a thin ray of light from heaven would shine squarely down on their corner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: They don't even swear in the NDP.

Mr. Jamieson: It is perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the NDP is finding no great difficulty in restraining his enthusiasm for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Indeed, one can say that his attitude toward him falls somewhat short of idolatry. I realize that the Prime Minister does not need me to defend him against the slings and arrows that political leadership inevitably attracts, yet I must express my resentment about one comment which the leader of the NDP made in his remarks.

An hon. Member: Just one?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, just one. He was talking about the unfortunate effects on certain elements of our society which our economic difficulties are creating. He was talking about the Prime Minister's attitude toward those people. Once again I say that the government is fair game for the opposition to attack. But the Leader of the NDP said that the attitude of the Prime Minister of this country to those people was an attitude of someone who has never had to scramble to pay the rent. I say that is purely and blatantly an appeal to prejudice. I will tell you the sort of category in which I would place that remark. I place it in exactly the same category as another statement that at one time was heard in this House and it practically drove the NDP out of its mind. It has now gone out of existence; we do not use it any more. Putting it in its simplest terms, the NDP leader's remark is in the same category as the one in which it was alleged that no man was fit to sit in this House and govern if he had not had to meet a payroll. That kind of remark, in common with the remark of the leader of the NDP, was calculated to create a prejudicial appeal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the minister, but his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the Chair to assume that the House gives consent to extending the minister's time and that he may complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: Provided he sticks to the NDP, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to hon. members and undertake not to impose unduly on the time of the House. I again say, in all seriousness to the NDP, that they are not the repository of all compassion in this House.

An hon. Member: The minister should think about his record.

Mr. Jamieson: I say to the hon. member and to others over there that although I cannot speak for the Prime Minister, I can speak for myself. I have had to scramble to pay the rent and I would be glad, even though I am not sure whether hon. members would particularly enjoy the experience, to trade poverty stories with them at any time they choose. There are a great many hon. members of this party and in this government who are in exactly the same position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: So let us have no more of this talk.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: I repeat that one group only does not hold the conscience of the House. All of us, in our own way and on the basis of our own convictions, are sincere people trying to do the job for which we were sent here.

I should like to make one or two other points of a personal nature, if I may, Mr. Speaker. Six of us in this House are different from other hon. members in one respect: we are different from all other members of the House. I speak of myself and the five fellow Newfoundlanders who are present. We are different because we did not mature or grow up as Canadians. Actually, we were adults before we became Canadians. We did not enter confederation until most of us had reached adult years. Of course, I can speak for myself and cannot speak for the other Newfoundland members, but I am sure that their sentiments are the same as mine.

I personally voted on two separate occasions against becoming a Canadian. My reasons for doing so, although it is not necessary for me to go into detail, had to do with the fact that I prized my independence. I was concerned about my personal independence and about that of my country. This is something which all of you can understand, I am sure, in your own way as we struggle in this country for a greater degree of independence and sovereignty.

I say in conclusion that being a relative newcomer to confederation and having been honoured by Canada in a way in which very few people get to be honoured by this country, I perhaps recognize more than most the necessity for equality for all the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I was disappointed in some respects that neither the Leader of the Opposition nor the leader of the New Democratic Party chose to make any reference in their remarks either to national unity in the context of the Official Languages Act or anything relating thereto. Unfortunately, when references are made to this subject they tend, as has been evidenced in this debate, to generate a degree of emotion. This is not a bad idea, but I suggest it is the wrong kind of emotion. For my part, I have no desire either during this debate or at any other time to inflame or add to the difficulties which we are presently experiencing. I can say that as someone who has been given great opportunities since becoming a Canadian and has travelled this country widely from one end to another, I understand and feel a kinship with those whose mother tongue is French.

There is not a great deal of difference down underneath. Certain stories are told. They may be the kind of derogatory stories, although perhaps humorous, about the backwoods French Canadian woodcutter and the Newfie stories about which we hear so much. I feel there is a certain distinction about the fact we have both reached a maturity that enables us to laugh at ourselves.

Although we Newfoundlanders do not suffer the added problem that alienation creates when there is a language barrier, nevertheless I believe that we in Newfoundland and I as one Newfoundlander understand how it feels to experience this kind of alienation. Of my own achievements as far as they relate to government activities, the one of which I am most proud is that this Parliament, with the support of all parties, passed and endorsed enthusiastically the Official Languages Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I hope there is no suggestion at the moment that any party or any member of this House is prepared to compromise the principles of that act. If there are injustices, of course we have to deal with them; but we must deal with them on both sides. I appeal to hon. members to realize that when the Official Languages Act was set up and, in fact, when this House felt in its heart the necessity to right historic wrongs, it removed it from the political arena and tried to lift it above politics. It tried to make this an issue that would unite Canadians and not one to divide it. I believe this will continue to be the case. I am prepared to stand upon the achievements of this government and its policies in this regard and, believe me, there is no better place that I would rather stand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). He left me wondering as to what he said. As he said, no wonder the young people are questioning. They are questioning speeches such as he made when he should have been dealing with the substantive issues that were almost contained in the Speech from the Throne and with which he did not deal. Instead of that, he erected a Throne Speech of the opposition. He gave me the impression that I was over there, he was over here and he was delivering a speech in criticism of a Throne Speech that came from us. I wondered for a moment where I was in the House, whether I was on Your Honour's right or left.

I say it was dishonest for the minister to say the things that he did. He called the New Democratic Party sanctimonious. He ended his speech with a plea for national unity. He criticized the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for things that he said, and called it motherhood; yet that is exactly what he was doing. As I sat here I tried to sort out all these matters. He drew an analogy between himself and other impecunious Liberal members who sit on the government side, and their inability to pay the rent. This put me in mind of the writings of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he made the allusion to the brave donkeys lining up at the trough.

It pulled at the strings of my heart to hear the difficulties that the Minister of Transport and his colleagues have gone through. I contrasted his remarks with the difficulties being experienced in every riding in this country by constituents of every member of this House, those sitting opposite and on this side. They are undergoing extreme hardship because of the inefficiency and every other shortcoming of the government with regard to the administration of Unemployment Insurance. I listened to the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan) talk this afternoon about the streamlined efforts that are being made by the Unemployment Insurance offices. I still think of the people in my constituency, and I am sure in others, who have to apply for welfare because of the inefficiencies of that department.

The minister spoke in sanctimonious terms and made accusations against the leader of the New Democratic Party regarding the Official Languages Act. I have sat in this House as a member of the government as well as a member of the opposition. I know the record of the former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), with regard to bilingualism in this country. I know that the cubicles in the corners of this chamber were installed under his prime ministership. I know that bilingual cheques came about under his term in office as prime minister. The simultaneous English-French translation system came about under his prime ministership. Suddenly we hear the Minister of Transport being as sanctimonious as hell about being the inventor of all these innovations.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Someone on the other side said "Order". I did not say "Fuzz off"; I do not spell it that way. I did not say "God-damn". However, if we have reached the stage in this House where these epithets are in order—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But they are not.

Mr. Nielsen: —then at least I can refer to the place below.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't act like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Mr. Nielsen: I remind the Minister of Transport that the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission started under the previous Prime Minister, yet the minister stands in his place, sanctimonious as all get out, and speaks as though it was all invented by the Prime Minister of the day and his government.

There are serious concerns being expressed, not only here, unvoiced by those who sit in the back benches opposite but I am sure they are heard in caucus every Wednesday morning. There are concerns that we have gone too far. When I first started hearing these things 15 years ago they were being expressed by French-speaking Canadians who were not being heard; they were not regarded as equals in this House. So these changes came about. We brought in simultaneous translation, and other steps toward rectifying this inequality were taken. No criticism was directed at that time against French-speaking members who rose in this chamber to complain of the imbalance in terms of English-speaking and French-speaking membership of the civil service. We listened and I am sure most hon. members listened. In all likelihood it was as a result of those speeches and the attention given to them that changes came about.

Now, when the reverse is the case and when concern is being felt by English-speaking Canadians that the pendulum has perhaps swung too far in the other direction, there is intolerance; in effect there is bigotry—a label of Birchism or McCarthyism is attached to anyone who dare support the opposite point of view. That there is another point of view there can be no doubt. It is very real. No one in this House who has travelled through the west can fail to appreciate immediately that it has reached serious proportions and that there must be some lessening of the rapidity with which the government is proceeding. This sentiment is very real and very logical. There is nothing McCarthyist about stating this point of view because it is a reasonable view held by a large number of Canadians.

The Minister of Transport spoke about employment. Members of the government have indicated that they invented unemployment; they sought to cure inflation. The Minister of Transport wants to disassociate himself from that policy, but the former minister of labour took pride in the fact that the government took the course it did. He said it took a great deal of courage to implement a policy such as this in order to curb inflation.

The Minister of Transport said that one page would have contained the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition. Yet when I look over the Speech from the Throne and compare it with the minister's speech, a speech which has taken things out of context, isolated them and tried to demolish them, I cannot but wonder about the direction the government is taking. Is it any wonder the young people are asking questions?

I have before me a background paper which was used by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). I am happy to see he is present in the chamber, one of the few ministers who is here tonight. This paper served as a basis for discussion at a special meeting of the Capilano Liberal Association in the North Vancouver Community Centre on December 11, 1971. It is entitled, "What do western Liberals want?" and the author is the Hon. Jack Davis, P.C., M.P., Minister of the Environment. The hon. gentleman makes an inventory of what he supposes western Liberals want.

Mr. Baldwin: They want to get into the cabinet.

Mr. Nielsen: They're almost all in the cabinet already, either that or they are parliamentary secretaries or chairmen of committees. He says they want to be free to act on their own. They will never get that freedom under the present Prime Minister. They want to explore new horizons, he said. They want to pull the rest of Canada into a world of fantastic tomorrows. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what kind of trip the minister was on when he used those words, but he certainly was not down to earth. He listed this one under a series of subtitles. First, he said, good relations with the United States are wanted. Here is a government which has gone out of its way to destroy good relations with the United States, yet in this hypocritical way the minister and, I am sure, the rest are trying to erect an image in western Canada and elsewhere supposed to reflect the constructive efforts they are making to bring about good relations with the United States.

At the same time we have a Prime Minister who makes derogatory statements with respect to the United States while on a visit to the U.S.S.R. and countenances statements by the Premier of the U.S.S.R. which are derogatory to the United States while on a visit to Canada. He refuses to refute them, allowing Canada to be used as a platform for anti-American sentiment expressed by the communist world.

The Minister of the Environment says we need partners across the Pacific. The government is certainly not doing anything to encourage this. Then, he says, the Liberals want less protectionism in Canada. Mr. Speaker, he is a member of a government which has passed legislation insisting on control of foreign ownership, insisting upon restricting investment capital flowing into the country. It has given some $6 million as a tax rebate to a United States oil company. No wonder young people are put off by this kind of hypocrisy!

In juxtaposition to this desire for less protectionism in Canada, the minister wants more foreign capital for expansion. This puts me in mind of a speech made by the former minister of mines, energy and resources, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Greene), and a speech made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), one delivered in one part of the United States and the other in another part in the south. One minister was saying we needed more capital, and the other was asserting that we did not need more capital.

Here is the Minister of the Environment telling his friends in Vancouver that we need more foreign capital for expansion, while at the same time with its tax reforms the government is erecting barriers against foreign capital which, in the Yukon at any rate, has resulted in a diminution of the investment flow by some 70 per cent in the last mining exploration year. The ECC has indicated that by 1973 that inflow of capital will have been curtailed by 18 per cent.

Last, but not least, the minister told his friends in Vancouver that what he wants is more projects and less red tape. Here we have a government which is obsessed with the idea of control, a government obsessed with the concept of power, yet the Minister of the Environment says we need more protection and less red tape. He has visited my constituency, that colony in Canada, that colony in North America which is run on puppet-strings manipulated by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as is the case in the Northwest Territories. And the minister says that we want less red tape! We like that. We endorse it 100 per cent. But let me ask why the government does not cut out the red tape. Why does the government not adopt policies and projects that will result in an administration in this country that is designed to reduce, not expand?

I was looking over the figures of civil service hirings during the last quarter and had always thought that there was a growth of roughly a net 1,000 a month. However, I find that in April, 1971, the growth was something in the order of 3,000 net, and slightly under 4,000 net growth in May of 1971. That is explainable by the six newly created ministries in the government during the regime of this Prime Minister. And the Minister of the Environment has the hypocrisy to say that what we need is more projects and less red tape!

The sixth item in this great paper that he delivered was this, "Wanted: Less government and more tax cuts". I did not hear the minister during the tax reform legislation make a plea for the prospector. Prospecting is a very important pursuit in his part of the country, yet I did not hear him make a plea for the prospector's wants, that he not be subject to the capital gains tax, the imposition of which has literally killed prospecting in his country and in mine. Neither did I hear him rise in his place and utter one criticism of the increase in taxes that was imposed on his constituents and others in this country. He has the gall to go to the west of Canada and to tell those who attended the meeting of western Liberals that he wanted more tax cuts, and he supports a government, in his hypocritical way, that imposes further taxes!

Less government, he says. Yet we have more boards, more commissions, more regulations, more provisions in our statute law, giving the government more and more power. There is more interference with the private lives, liberties and freedoms of the individual. The minister has the hypocrisy to go to Vancouver and say, "We want less of this" and then does nothing about it. Instead of delivering this paper in Vancouver, the minister should have been trying to convince his cabinet colleagues of the truth that is contained in it. But even better, it would have been an indication of his bona fides and sincerity had he risen at any time during his time in this House to espouse the principles that he sets forth in this paper.

Then again in this paper he says that the over-all tax bite is increasing. Then he compounds his hypocrisy with untruths, because he goes on to say that this trend toward even greater government influence in our economic affairs is bothering western Liberals, that it is bothering many independent-minded Canadians from coast to coast. Many people, he says, unthinkingly blame Ottawa for this trend. Few of them realize that the provinces, and to a lesser extent the municipalities, are the villains. So not only is he attempting to cover up the inadequacies of his party; he is also attempting to throw the blame, wrongfully and falsely, on the provinces and municipalities. He is trying to blame them for the excesses of his own government.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Then he asks what western Liberals want Ottawa to do about this. He says that they want the government to curb its own spending. But, more than that, they want the government to stop collecting revenue for the provinces and municipalities. They want the other two levels of government to collect their own taxes. It will be interesting to see what is brought forward tomorrow when the equalization legislation comes up for debate.

The minister responsible for the legislation, and his parliamentary secretary have been telling us about the 90,000 new jobs that have been created by the new incentives program. I do not know what is going on in other constituencies in the country but I can tell hon. members what is going on in mine. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are going down the drain. In one instance, $17,000 odd was spent on a group of Indian people to cut wood which they would have had to cut anyway to employ themselves during the winter months. Some $17,600 was approved for another Indian band to repair housing on land set aside for the use of Indian people, none of the money being applied. In fact, the situation is becoming so alarming that the Indian people who were allotted this money have taken to cannibalizing empty houses to keep their fires going. Thousands of dollars are being wasted in this fashion. I say that the claim of 90,000 new jobs is an outright lie, and the quicker the Canadian people realize that taxpayers' money is being spent in this fashion, the better.

The Minister of Transport played down this debate. He said, in essence, that it was a useless exercice. I think this debate is a good exercise, if for no other reason than to expose the inadequacies of the government. He said that the Leader of the Opposition did not put forward alternatives. We have been putting forward alternatives for almost the last four years, alternatives that in some cases, admittedly belatedly, have been accepted by the government.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that last April we started speaking about the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada. We started speaking about the likelihood of a very critical unemployment situation developing in the fall. But the government did not listen to us. Our alternatives were just sloughed off. We advocated a revocation of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, and have been doing so for a good number of years. We advocated real, meaningful tax cuts as far back as last April. We advocated other measures too. But the government adopted the position that everything was rosy, that inflation was going away, that unemployment was going away, that the economy was expanding. All these hypocritical statements came from a government as sanctimonious as the minister who has just spoken.

Everything the government said has turned out to be wrong. This is why our young people today are asking questions; it is why they are disillusioned. The government is not saying it like it is. It is not telling the people of Canada the truth. Try and get the truth in this House, Mr. Speaker. Ask questions of ministers, or of the Prime Minister, as I attempted to do yesterday. He knew exactly what I was talking about when I asked him about the special security force. Again I am misnaming it, but the Prime Minister knew what I meant. Yet he chose to hide behind the hair-splitting subterfuge that it was not specifically designated. There are some ministers who will answer questions forthrightly, but very few. The Minister of Transport is usually one of them, but I was disappointed to hear the kind of speech he delivered tonight because he certainly did not evidence his usual forthrightness when answering questions. Try to get straighforward answers from the government and from the ministers, and you do not; you get everything from a ducking and a weaving to outright deceit in their answers.

I believe, Sir, that the minister is correct when he says that the young people are disappointed and disillusioned. They are so because politicians think that the most important thing in the world is to be re-elected. I suppose that is the most important thing in the world to a good number of them. But when they think for a moment they will realize that the most important thing is a confrontation with the issues of the day in a forthright manner.

The government proposal of the Minister of the Environment, in the great paper which he delivered in Vancouver, was for decentralization of decision-making, and he spoke of Crown corporations. In recent weeks a new Crown corporation was set up which is called the CDC. I want to revert here for a second to my remarks about the French-English question which exists in Canada. It makes one wonder, when we read statistics like this concerning the CDC.

On the CDC, the board of directors consists of 18 members and of these 18 members one director comes from British Columbia, one from Alberta, one from Saskatchewan, one from Manitoba, one from New Brunswick, one from Nova Scotia, and there is no director from Newfoundland and no director from Prince Edward Island; there are four directors from Ontario and eight from Quebec. The quorum on that board of directors is eight. What that means is that all the membership from the province of Quebec, numbering eight plus one more to side with them, can make decisions which will result in the flow of capital into that or any other province unlimitedly. It seems to me that there is cause for concern about this state of affairs. Why is this imbalance present?

I stand behind the right hon. member for Prince Albert when he spoke today about security. The fact that this separate security force has been set up in Canada is very disconcerting to me as well as to a good many other Canadians, and I am concerned about the fact that we are hearing nothing about it. The Prime Minister promised in April of 1969 that we would be given a full day of debate on this matter when the security report was tabled. We have not been given that opportunity, and apparently he has backed away completely from his position and now says that we should take an opposition day for the purpose.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 5 of Standing Order 38, to interrupt the proceedings forthwith and put any question necessary to dispose of the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion (Mr. Whicher) agreed to.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the said address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, before we adjourn would the government House leader confirm that there has been no change since last Wednesday when he indicated the order in which government business would proceed?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take the bill indicated last Wednesday, namely, an act to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, and following second reading we will proceed with the list of bills as given. If there are to be any changes I will advise my hon. friends.

Mr. Baldwin: I have just one more question, Mr. Speaker, of which I would like now to give the government House leader notice. Will he some time within the next week or ten days indicate that the government intends to bring in a budget before Easter?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

On motion of Mr. MacEachen the House adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING OF SECOND REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the second report of the Clerk of Petitions.

[Later:]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I was delayed for a moment in getting into the House and so was not present when the second report of the Clerk of Petitions was tabled on behalf of the people of Old Crow. I have discussed this matter with the government House leader and I would now ask that the House give unanimous consent to have the text of the petition printed at the appropriate place in Hansard for today's proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, under the terms of the Standing Order the Chair now has to inquire whether there is unanimous consent for the reading of the petition but I assume that the same result would be achieved by unanimous consent to print the petition. Is there unanimous agreement to this effect?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of above petition, see appendix.]

SPRING!

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege affecting all members of the House and all people in Canada. Your Honour will have noticed that hon. members are wearing daffodils today which marks the arrival of spring in Canada. I bring greetings from the people of the west coast, and in particular from the Greater Vancouver Tourist and Convention Bureau which has sent this gift of daffodils to mark the arrival of spring, incongruous though that may seem here in Ottawa today.

ST. DAVID'S DAY

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the House that today, March 1, is St. David's Day, named for the patron saint of Wales. It is a great pleasure for all of us that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is present and in good health, he having recently become a Welshman by blood transfusion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—ALLEGED CONFLICT BETWEEN INFORMATION IN DEPARTMENTAL PUBLICATION AND ANSWER BY MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege, notice of which has been given pursuant to the Standing Order. My question of privilege arises out of information given the House on a matter within the administrative responsibilities of the government. I shall be as brief as possible. I regret that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is not in his seat.

The facts are as follows: in a government publication issued by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion under the authority of the minister and entitled "Regional Development Incentives Act, A Summary of Offers Accepted to 30 June, 1971", a certain entry appears. This entry lists the firm of A. Bélanger Ltée., Montreal, and its location is given as Montmagny, Quebec. Under "Type of Industry" it states that the firm is engaged in the manufacture of stoves, freezers and metal shelves. It goes on to describe the capital cost of the plant and the amount of the grant paid to the firm, which was $158,580.

On Monday, February 28, 1972, during the oral question period there occurred the following exchange between the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, which is to be found at page 305 of Hansard:

MR. MURRAY MCBRIDE (LANARK-RENFREW-CARLETON): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the announcement on Friday last by Belanger-Tappan Limited that they propose to close their Carleton Place plant known as Findlay's Limited in the very near future and to concentrate their production at the Montmagny plant in the province of Quebec, has this company received any federal assistance from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to create, improve or enlarge this company's facilities at Montmagny?

• (1410)

HON. JEAN MARCHAND (MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no, and there is no relationship between what is going on at Montmagny and the closing of the Findlay plant at Carleton Place.

MR. MCBRIDE: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Are we to take it that no application for a grant is at present before the department, as well as no grant having already been provided?

Regional Economic Expansion Information

MR. MARCHAND (LANGELIER): At present there is no application from the company, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the firm of A. Belanger Ltée and the firm of Belanger-Tappan Limited are one and the same. In the words of the law, "the matter speaks for itself". I will not go beyond pointing out that the apparent conflict between the statement made in the document that was issued under the authority of the minister and the statement voluntarily made by the minister in the House is such as can only be investigated in a committee of this House where witnesses can be called, put under oath, questioned and cross-examined. I believe it is the right and due of any member to obtain correct information from ministers of the Crown. That right is the very keystone of the privileges of the parliamentary process.

Therefore, with your approval, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections forthwith inquire into and report upon the matter of the information published by the government relating to federal grants to A. Belanger Ltée, a Montreal firm, for projects at Montmagny, Quebec, and the information given to the House by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion during oral questions on the 28th February, 1972 in reply to the member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) respecting "Closing of Carleton Place Factory by Belanger-Tappan Limited—Inquiry as to Grant for Montmagny Plant", and that the report of the committee, with its recommendations thereon, be made to the House as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East has filed with the Chair the notice required under the terms of Standing Order 17. With respect, I suggest to the hon. member that the matter which he proposes for consideration by the House cannot come before us by way of a breach of parliamentary privilege. I remind him and all hon. members that the whole question of the administration of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, including the question of the minister's administration, is now before the Standing Committee on Regional Development. I would suggest that the hon. member's claim that there is a discrepancy between a verbal reply given by the minister and a publication issued by his department should be considered by the Standing Committee on Regional Development rather than by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The hon. member suggests in his presentation to the House that this kind of matter should be considered in committee where witnesses can be called and examined. I would think that that could be done and should be done not by way of breach of privilege of the House but in the appropriate committee. There is a long line of rulings, as the hon. member knows, that discrepancies between statements made by a minister cannot be brought up in the House for consideration by way of a breach of parliamentary privilege.

Therefore, consistent with long-established practice I have to rule that there is not a prima facie case of privilege to be considered by the House at this time.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could rephrase the motion?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Whether the motion were to refer the matter to another committee or not, the decision of the Chair is that this kind of matter cannot be considered to be a breach of parliamentary privilege. Even if the motion were changed I could not agree to putting the matter to the House for discussion and debate by way of a question of privilege.

TABLING OF MEMORANDUM ON AGREEMENT WITH NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK FOR STUDY OF FUNDY TIDES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Baldwin: The minister is always moving about.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have found I have to keep moving, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: Why does the minister not move forward instead of backwards?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is an expert on that.

Mr. Baldwin: I certainly am, having watched the minister.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to lay on the table a memorandum with respect to an agreement between the premiers of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and myself on behalf of the federal government concerning a review board to study the question of tidal power in the Bay of Fundy and setting out terms of reference and also the personnel appointed by each of the three governments.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PAYMENTS FOR WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY FOR NEXT CROP YEAR

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the practice established by the government for the first time last year of announcing initial payments for wheat, oats and barley prior to seeding time, I wish to inform the House of the level of initial payments which will become effective for purchases by the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year commencing August 1, 1972.

For the basic grade of wheat, No. 1 Canada Western Red Spring Wheat, the initial payment will be $1.46 per bushel, the same as in the current crop year. The initial payment for No. 3 Canada Western Six-Row Barley will be 96 cents per bushel, an increase of 5 cents on the level presently in effect. The initial payment for No. 2 Canada Western Oats will be 60 cents per bushel, unchanged from the current crop year. All initial payments are basis in store Thunder Bay.

The initial payments for the grades of wheat, barley and oats other than basic grades mentioned will be established by the Canadian Wheat Board and announced at a later date.

I should like to add, Mr. Speaker, that a newsletter will be mailed to all prairie grain producers in the next few days indicating crop prospects, acreage guidelines, and minimum quota levels for the 1972-73 crop year. A minimum total delivery by producers of 505 million bushels of wheat, 260 million bushels of barley, and 13 million bushels of oats is assured in the coming crop year. These are minimum deliveries and if sales require increased deliveries, additional quotas will be opened.

I apologize to hon. members opposite for the shortness of the notice I was able to give them of this matter. However, the very good news of the large sale to the Soviet Union required us to do some final work on that matter. I am sure hon. members opposite will support the high levels of grain which will be received next year as a minimum and also the increase in the initial price for barley.

Mr. Baldwin: When will the government learn how to deliver the grain? How about transportation?

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, as is evident from some "heehaws" we heard in the House when the minister announced the mailing of the newsletter, it is quite obvious that we will take it with more than a grain of salt. We will treat it with the respect that it deserves prior to an election.

Mr. Knowles: This is all being done at government expense.

Mr. Korchinski: May I point out it is evident that the minister was very reluctant to increase—

An hon. Member: Very happy.

Mr. Korchinski: —the price of spring wheat. It is evident that there is no prospect for an increase in wheat prices in the year ahead. It is also evident, therefore, that next year, as pointed out in studies which have been made, there will be no increase in wheat prices. Despite the minister's reassurance that there will be more sales we are not very happy because in the end result it is what you get for your product that really counts. We know that the price of other products has risen. We want the price of our product to rise also, and a prospective increase for wheat is not evident from the minister's statement.

The payment announced for barley is very interesting. A year ago we were told that a certain price would be paid for barley. Then the Canadian Wheat Board committed itself to a certain level of shipments. It was not able to meet that commitment because farmers were getting a higher price from other sources than they could get from the Wheat Board. Consequently, they were not delivering to the Wheat Board. The Wheat Board had to increase the price by ten cents. There was an interim payment. That ten cent increase resulted in a $10 million deficit for the pool account. This year the increase is not 10 cents but 5 cents.

With regard to oats, only 13 million bushels are involved, which is neither here nor there. One can almost completely disregard the amount of oats as they will be used entirely within this country.

Regardless of what assurances the minister may give, transportation of grain in and outside our country must always be foremost. This has been quite evident in the last year. The stabilization bill also enters into this announcement if the minister is going to propose stabilization in the manner he proposed it before. The barley producers would have lost the $10 million under that proposal, and the government has to make up the difference.

May I make one other point. No encouragement for the production of wheat is to be found in the price. The farmers are getting about 40 cents less than they were in 1967-68, and there is no encouragement at all. Even if the price had been increased by 10 cents I do not think anyone would grab for it, but it would have committed the government. It would have indicated that perhaps the government is optimistic about markets and opportunities to sell grain at a higher price.

Although we welcome the fact that the minister has announced prices, we wonder why a statement has been made in this case when the minister merely tabled a report the other day on the sale of wheat to Russia. On this occasion he made comments. If we are going to play a fair ballgame, if the Minister of Justice is going to be a minister of justice, and if justice means anything to him, he should realize that comments on all aspects of grain sales, which are paramount to the total income of not only the Canadian producers but also the—I am sorry Mr. Speaker, but I am being interrupted.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might take this opportunity to interrupt the hon. member for a moment and remind him of the requirements of the Standing Order. From time to time I take the opportunity to remind hon. members that the Standing Order as drafted requires members making comments on ministerial statements to be brief. Sometimes it is difficult to interpret the term "brevity", but I hope the hon. member will consider bringing his remarks to a conclusion as soon as possible.

Mr. Korchinski: I appreciate Your Honour's comments. I will only be another minute. When the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) took a fairly long time to make a statement the other day I thought that this was an acceptable procedure of the House.

I only want to say I do not think the minister gave any indication that there will be an increase in revenue for the western grain producers. Every indicator shows that they will have reduced incomes. The 5 cents which the minister has offered on barley will certainly be very discouraging even for the barley producers because of the $10 million loss last year. In other words, they might as well get out of the business.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, at least the minister is coming into the House with forecasts and is stating what he considers to be reasonable objectives that farmers can meet this year. I hope this may indicate that the minister has returned to the basic concept upon which the Wheat Board was established, that of an agency to sell grain and return the proceeds of those sales to the farmers.

I hope he has finally got away from projects such as Lift, has finally abandoned the intricacies and convolutions of grain stabilization programs and has returned to the position where he intends to move the grain and get the high dollar for the farmer. If this is any indication he intends to do that, we shall all cheer.

I would point out one thing to him. Taking the initial prices for the three grains, the initial price for barley should be increased. The minister has concerned himself with distortions in production. The low initial price for barley may be one of the factors which will distort production in the coming year.

I think, also, that the study on the rationalization of transportation and storage should be released to the public without delay. Unless this is done, the system of handling, storing and moving grain will not make the progress which should be made. We are in a crisis with regard to the movement of grain to the west coast. This is common knowledge. Before the House is dissolved, before we go into an election, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board or the Minister of Transport should bring forward an all-inclusive program in relation to the movement and storage of grain. If this is delayed for another year we will have lost that much time in implementing a program to meet this crucial problem for Prairie farmers. This is our lifeline and if the government does not bring some program into the House before the next election it will be failing in its responsibilities to the grain farmers of western Canada. I take the opportunity to say this to the minister in the House because there will be changes in the grain handling industry in any case and unless they are properly directed they may very well not be the ones we want.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, considering that I have read the minister's statement in the last few minutes only, it was obviously impossible for me to compare prices for 1971 with those that the minister has just announced for 1972.

In any event, when looking at the budget that was tabled, particularly at the amounts allotted to agricultural expansion and to price support, one finds that, in the primary sector, there is a reduction from this year. Now, it is quite possible that adjustments were made in different sectors.

I note, for instance, that subsidies for dairy products were reduced to $21 million. I cannot say whether this reduction is justified because I have not had the opportunity of studying the matter thoroughly.

At any rate, I say that both in the east and in the west, it is the government's responsibility to give the people of Canada a strong, stable agricultural industry. To this end, the government must give producers advance notice of the prices to be paid them during the crop year. On that point some headway has been made.

Concerning grain, the hon. minister has, for the second consecutive year, made a sufficiently early announcement of his policy, for which I am much thankful to him. I should, however, like to seize the opportunity of once more calling his attention to the existence in Canada, and particularly in the eastern provinces, of a serious feed grain problem

It is urgent that a solution be found. I understand that efforts have been made, that there has been some improvement, but not enough to place eastern producers on the same level as those in the west.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the Prime Minister's statement in Montreal last month that agriculture must learn to be self-sufficient and that grants for agricultural production must be discontinued, I disagree entirely with him on that subject and I should like to put this on the record, because many other sectors of our economy get government grants for their survival. We could see, in the speech that the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) made yesterday, that my remarks are utterly correct in this respect.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the whole agricultural community I wish our governments would get into the habit of being efficient, not only during the last year of their terms of office but throughout their terms, because when I, for instance, hire someone and he is efficient only during the last hour, I say that he has not fulfilled his responsibility and I hasten to fire him.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent importance, namely, the indiscriminate and indiscreet distribution of large amounts of money under the local initiatives program sponsored by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That a special reference be made, from this House to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, to investigate the distribution of funds, to examine the criteria on which the distribution was based, to examine the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and officials of his department, in order to determine the bases for project decisions of a questionable nature, and to recommend to the House a set of guidelines and principles which would give the representatives of the Canadian people more control over the spending of the taxpayers' dollars on the programs involved.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the motion proposed by the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity; the motion cannot be put.

TAXATION

SALES TAX REMISSION TO GREAT CANADIAN OIL SANDS LIMITED—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I should like to seek the permission of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the decision of the government to remit $6 million in sales taxes to Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited. In view of the fact that there was supposed to be a question of need and the company was supposed to be poverty-stricken, whereas subsequently it was discovered that the same company also applied for and received a remission of royalties from the province of Alberta, and as it is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Sun Oil Company of Philadelphia, whose net revenues were $152 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows the rule. He is required to put the motion without argument or debate.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I had just reached the point of proposing the motion, Mr. Speaker. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—

This committee was chosen deliberately because justice is needed here.

—be authorized to inquire into the decision of the government to remit $6 million in sales taxes to Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited with particular reference to (1) the public interest (2) the remission of royalties by the Alberta government, and (3) the financial position of Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited and its relationship to Sun Oil Company of Philadelphia as well as to the financial position of the said Sun Oil Company.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity; the motion cannot be put.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

IMMEDIATE PRESENTATION OF LEGISLATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I should like the consent of the House to present a motion. The government appears to have given low priority again to the proposed family income security plan, even though we on this side of the House had offered to sit for an extra week.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to take exception to the kind of motion which is now proposed by the hon. member. Hon. members know that Standing Order 43 is a very exceptional Standing Order. If the government were to take advantage of the Standing Order in the way private members are doing, I think there would be a great hue and cry that the government was trying to propose motions without giving due notice. The only justification for the submission of a motion under Standing Order 43 is that the matter in question is of such urgency that the time-honoured, traditional provision that there shall be notice given of any motion proposed to the House by the government, by the opposition or by a private member, cannot be followed. The only exception to that rule is where the matter is of such urgency that a motion should be proposed, either by the government or by a private member, under the terms of Standing Order 43.

I submit that this Standing Order does not provide members with the opportunity to make allegations, statements of fact or alleged fact, in support of the motion proposed. The only statement that can be made, I suggest, must have reference to the matter of urgency. If we get involved in a situation where every day we have motions which are actually debate, every one of the 263 members in the House could tomorrow move three or four motions of this kind without giving due notice. This certainly would not be in conformity with the traditions of this House.

I am not pointing the finger at the hon. member in particular because he is, perhaps, only doing what we have slowly slipped into doing, namely, the submission of argument when he should really be limiting the brief presentation to the question of urgency which would justify the very exceptional circumstance of an appeal to Standing Order 43.

Mr. Bell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am just reminding hon. members of the rules. If the hon. member is rising on a point of order, I will hear him.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to repeat what I have said before. The main reason that we move these motions is the disgraceful attendance of ministers under the roster system, and I include the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) the fact that his leader is away today.

Mr. Peters: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with your decision on the last motion moved under Standing Order 43 and on a number of others as well. However, it does seem to me that if members use this method in a bona fide way as a means of putting forward their point of view on a matter of extreme urgency, then there has also to be an obligation on the part of members who refuse to give unanimous consent. I think they should have to stand and object to the putting of such a motion. It seems to me that if this is not done the use of this Standing Order will become a safety valve such as the "late show" and it will lose its importance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point made by the hon. member has been made before. What the hon.member is suggesting, effectively, is that the Standing Order should be changed. That is a possibility which might be considered by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I have indeed suggested before that this Standing Order and its operation should be considered by this august body and I am sure that some day they will get around to it. For the moment I do not want to raise a fuss about the matter, particularly in relation to the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. He was not at fault any more than others. I thought it might be a good opportunity to make my point of order, and I will be glad to listen to him now.

Mr. Peddle: Mr. Speaker, I would have been long since finished and we would have been halfway through the question period. In any event, the urgency of this question is that this legislation was placed on the order paper last September and allowed to die because the government would not bring it up. I will proceed to my motion. In view of the fact it appears that this legislation will be delayed much further, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House urges the government to present forthwith the legislation on family allowances; that second reading be called by no later than next Monday, and that highest priority be given its passage through the complete legislative mill to permit its earliest possible implementation.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard a number of nays and the motion cannot be put.

The following table provides figures for total production and estimated cash value of cranberries in Prince Edward Island and for all of Canada. Complete data for Prince Edward Island are not available as wild crops are being harvested and, therefore, production and value are to some extent, estimated.

Questions

3. A research grant of $3,600 was made for 1971-72 to The Nova Scotia Agricultural College, Truro, for a study entitled "Field Studies of Foxberry". This is a species closely related to cranberries. No requests or grants have been made for marketing studies on cranberries.

4. An application is currently on file requesting a research grant of $8,000 for a study in 1972-73 at the University of Moncton (Department of Chemistry) on "Alcaloides de canneberges du Nouveau-Brunswick".

P.E.I.—CONSTRUCTION OF SUBMARINE CABLE

1. Has the government or any Crown corporation given any undertaking to construct a submarine cable for the transmission of electric power to Prince Edward Island from the mainland?

2. Has any research into this project been carried out and, if so, at what cost and over what period?

3. What representations have been received for construction of such a cable?

4. What is the estimated cost of such a cable?

5. What are the estimated advantages of such a cable?

[Mr. Jerome.]

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the department of Regional Economic Expansion as follows. 1. No. However, it has been included for possible consideration in phase 2 of the Prince Edward Island Comprehensive Development Plan.

2. The cost and feasibility of a power cable connection from P.E.I. to the mainland was studied by the former Atlantic Development Board over the years 1963 to 1969, at a cost of $79,308 for consultants' services. This cost was divided between studies on the feasibility of a submarine cable, amounting to approximately $54,000, and the installation of the power cable link on the crossing structures of the proposed causeway to join the Island with the mainland, which amounted to approximately $25,000.

3. Representations were made to the Atlantic Development Board by Premier Shaw on July 15, 1964 and by Premier Campbell on December 19, 1967. Other provincial authorities requested that it be included in phase 2 of the P.E.I. Comprehensive Development Plan on March 7, 1969.

4. The estimated cost of the submarine power cable inter-connection in 1968 was $6,829,000, based on costs scheduled to provide inservice by 1971.

5. (a) P.E.I. would make arrangements for sales of any surplus capacity to mainland utilities during off peak periods. (b) Access to lower cost power and energy from sources within and outside the Maritime Power Pool. (c) Capital participation in large generating units on the mainland, with resultant savings in cost of power to P.E.I. (d) Access to potentially lower cost peaking capacity (hydro on the Maritime Power Pool).

3. What was the amount of interest paid on amounts due with respect to the 1970-71 crop year and how was this amount calculated?

4. What amount of the payments made with respect to the 1970-71 crop year was allocated to the Pool accounts for 1969-70 and 1970-71 respectively?

3. What penalties are invoked for the violation of such resale agreements?

Return tabled.

[Later:]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should have raised it immediately following written questions but I missed the opportunity to do so.

In regard to Question No. 156 presently on the order paper having to do with Canada's observance of International Book Year, I would like to lodge a complaint once again about the erosion of the effectiveness of written questions in this House. I first placed this question on the order paper in the last session on December 14.

It was not answered up to the time the session died in February. I again placed it on the order paper on February 22, and again it has not been answered. However, in its place there was issued from the minister's department last night a news release having to do with some aspects of this question. It seems that the government finds it easier to issue press releases than to submit written answers to members' questions in the context of the rules and procedures of this House.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF INDUSTRIAL INCENTIVES ADVISORY BOARD

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the potential for conflict of interest involved in the dispensing of many millions of dollars of public funds to private corporations under the Regional Development Incentives Act on advice to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion of the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board, whose members include two executive officers of corporations that received five grants totalling $6.9 million.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina East has filed the notice required under the provisions of Standing Order 26. In essence, what the hon. member proposes is that the House adjourn under the terms of Standing Order 26 for the purpose of debating a policy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or of the government in relation to the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board.

It seems to me that Standing Order 26 is not intended to provide an opportunity for debate on such a general and wide question of policy. The hon. member is aware of the terms of subsection 16 of Standing Order 26 to the effect that the matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency. It would seem that the matter raised by the hon. member for Regina East does not meet this test and in the circumstances his proposed motion cannot be put.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 7 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and to the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that notice of motion No. 7 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COPY OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MANITOBA AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENT RELATING TO NELSON RIVER POWER PROJECT

Motion No. 7—Mr. Faulkner:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence between the Government of Manitoba and the Government of Canada relating to the Nelson River Power Project to date during 1971.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, with respect to Notices of Motions Nos. 6 and 15 dealing with the Geoffroy case, since we have been denied a judicial inquiry to date may I ask when we may get an answer with respect to the production of these papers? These notices of motions have been on the order paper since the beginning of the session. I do not think there should be much difficulty producing the documents in reference to the passport that were forged. Neither should there be difficulty in producing the documents in reference to the other matters that the Solicitor General did not disclose the other day.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, just before the beginning of today's session I spoke to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Hogarth) who will be having some conversation with the hon. member later today about this matter.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POST OFFICE

REASON FOR NEGOTIATIONS NOT HAVING COMMENCED WITH UNIONS ON WAGES AND JOB SECURITY—RESPONSE TO UNIONS' PROPOSALS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Arising out of the answer to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) yesterday that negotiations with the postal unions have not yet reached a point where wages and job security have been discussed, and in view of the intense public concern about strikes in important services of this sort, has the President of the Treasury Board any explanation to give the House why negotiations have not even commenced with regard to wages and job security although the wage contract is to expire on March 27?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As is traditional in these matters, the representatives of the employees would prefer to take first, in the period of negotiations, the easiest items. In a contract composed of a very considerable number of articles, nearly all of which have been opened by the unions for negotiation, they have started, as is traditional, with the easier ones, leaving the harder ones for later.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the collective agreement expires on March 27, and as I understand that Treasury Board has now received a proposal from the unions with regard to both wages and job security, can the President of the Treasury Board indicate when the government will make a response to these proposals from the unions?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think that rather than try to set a particular date at which a response would be made, I can reassure the hon. gentleman that we will proceed in the most orderly way to deal with the issues as originally agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: I wish to ask one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the track record of the Treasury Board with regard to negotiations in recent times—

Mr. MacEachen: It is an excellent one.

Mr. Stanfield: —I have to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he intends to make a response before or after the expiry of the collective agreement or whether he proposes to let things drag on so long that the issues can only be finally settled by a strike?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think I can assure the hon. gentleman that there will be a government proposal both with respect to wages and job security before the expiry of the current contract.

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO IMPROVE NEGOTIATION PROCEDURES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a related question to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the fact that negotiations proceed as set out by the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and that this leaves much to be desired in the sense that there seems to be more confrontation than negotiation during periods of negotiation between the Treasury Board and representatives of the Public Service, is the government seriously considering bringing in amendments to the act in order to improve the procedures and, if so, when can we expect some idea as to its intentions?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do share most heartily the view of the hon. gentleman that there has developed over the years rather more of a technique of confrontation than real negotiation, and it is our hope to reverse that trend. However, this takes time to do, and I am not sure that merely the introduction of hasty legislation would bring about in a satisfactory way the resolution of this particular problem. This is something which can only be developed by agreement.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to know that the minister is as concerned as I am about it, but would he answer my question and advise me whether in fact the government is delving into this matter in order that legislation can be brought forward? I think it is high time that the whole act was reviewed in view of the confrontation rather than negotiation that exists—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question. The minister may want to reply briefly so we can go on to the next subject.

Mr. Drury: As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, we are very much concerned about this and are first endeavouring to discover what is a better arrangement and how best it can be brought about. I am not convinced that legislation in the next month or so would be the answer.

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF INDUSTRIAL INCENTIVES ADVISORY BOARD—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has he considered the potential conflict of interest involved in the fact that four members of the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board are prominent members of the business community, and has he satisfied himself that there is no potential conflict of interest? In particular, has he investigated the circumstances surrounding grants in 1971 totalling $6.9 million to Noranda Mines Limited, Gaspé Copper Mines Limited and National Sea Products Limited, whose executive officers are members of the advisory board?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker, because when we made regulations concerning this matter, this aspect held our attention for quite a long time. It is very difficult to find businessmen who are not, at a certain time, directly or indirectly concerned with requests addressed to our department.

So, we made a regulation under which people who are directly or indirectly concerned with a request submitted to the department or one of its decisions are not to take part in the discussions of the committee, and have nothing to say concerning the decision.

[English]

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, would the minister be willing to have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development so that it could receive thorough study and examination, particularly in view of the very glib manner in which the department has dealt with the matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I am not very much concerned with this, but I believe that votes will be submitted to the House and referred to the committee. I shall then be prepared to answer all questions. There is actually nothing to make a fuss about and there is no hushed scandal.

[Later:]

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, a moment or so ago the minister indicated that those who were representing management on the advisory board would not of course be involved in the granting of loans. Looking over the record of the advisory board, may I ask whether the minister is aware that Mr. Kendall Cork, who is on that board, indicated that he did not miss any meetings and yet Noranda Mines Limited got several millions of dollars in grants when he was vice-president?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I should like it to be clearly established that the committee takes no decision with regard to government subsidies. Decisions are made within the department by duly authorized personnel. The committee merely exercises a sort of supervision. That is all, period.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PAYMENT OF GRANTS TO POLITICAL ORGANIZERS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

[Mr. Burton.]

Do the regulations he mentioned a while ago include a provision forbidding the granting of subsidies, through the local initiatives program, to political organizers who are playing politics?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, this does not fall within my jurisdiction.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REFUSAL OF CERTAIN PROJECTS— AVAILABILITY OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can he tell us whether or not it might not be wise to look into the application of the local initiatives program seeing we are told that a large number of projects are turned down for lack of funds, and that urgent achievable projects should be accepted?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had some difficulty in hearing the question. I shall take it as notice and reply directly to the hon. member.

[English]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—GRANTS TO GROUPS ASSOCIATED WITH ROCHDALE COLLEGE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister in view of the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and his parliamentary secretary. At the first opportunity will the Acting Prime Minister arrange to have a statement made on motions giving all details of the local initiatives program grants to groups and/or projects either located in or associated with Rochdale College in Toronto totalling $277,000, with particular reference to the grant of $25,900 to a group known as The Process of the Final Judgment for the alleged purpose of "expanding a program to test the resources of young people," when this group is widely reported to promote devil worship with attendant rites and rituals, and also with particular reference to—

Mr. Woolliams: That must be the Liberals.

Mr. Nesbitt: —a group known as Crunch—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask the question quickly. It seems to me that questions ought to be shorter than the one the hon. member is presenting to the House now. He should indicate what the question is as succinctly as possible.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I could not hear Your Honour as there was certain extraneous conversation.

Mr. Speaker: I am inviting the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Nesbitt: I thought I had made it fairly clear, Your Honour, and I think the Acting Prime Minister perhaps heard the substance of the question. I just wish to add, with particular reference to other groups known as Crunch and Commune-iton Collective.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary, or at least—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might allow a reply, and then he can ask a supplementary. We could start with the answer to that question and then go to the supplementary.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and when he is here tomorrow he will be very happy to reply in detail. However, since one particular question was asked I thought I should take the opportunity of replying immediately. I saw the headline in the Toronto Sun, from which I think the hon. member got his report, dealing with the so-called Satan organization. May I point out to him that the plan for which application had been made was endorsed by such groups as the YMCA, the mental retardation centre—

Mr. Hees: That is understandable.

An hon. Member: Is that the government?

An hon. Member: The Privy Council office?

Mr. Baldwin: The Liberal party from Eglinton.

Mr. Sharp: —and in the same category, the Department of Health of Ontario, the Toronto Doctors Hospital and, if that is not sufficiently respectable, the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question. I just ask the Acting Prime Minister, who is apparently a little nervous about this question—

Mr. Sharp: Oh, no!

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister would also arrange to have one of his colleagues inform the House of the reasons for turning down a grant to the Salvation Army branch on Lisgar Street in Toronto for assistance to the unemployed. As far as devil worship is concerned, it does not surprise me that they endorse it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In relation to the question asked by the hon. member may I say that normally questions relating to individual applications, unless in very special circumstances, ought to be placed on the order paper. I appreciate that in some instances there might be special circumstances, but as much as possible individual inquiries ought to be placed on the order paper or considered at the time of adjournment. I would point out to hon. members that we are running behind time.

Mr. Nesbitt: They should send the Prime Minister a long spoon for his dinner tonight.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Does the Acting Prime Minister think it is appropriate for the government of Canada to give $26,000 in public funds to devil worshippers regardless of who recommends them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that is a point of argument. The hon. member for Trinity is inviting the Acting Prime Minister to express an opinion.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE EXAMINATION OF GRANTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In order to facilitate matters of this nature in the House, Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Acting Prime Minister or the House leader who was earlier in the House or the parliamentary secretary when he returns from behind the curtain, if they will consider a reference to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration so that grants such as the one to the worshippers of Satan and other such eminent organizations alluded to by the hon. member for Oxford could be examined. In this way we could determine the basis for such decisions and recommend a set guidelines in order to give the representatives of the Canadian people more control over the dispensation of the taxpayers' dollar.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): When the estimates for this department are before the committee there will be ample opportunity, and I am sure the minister and his parliamentary secretary will be able to satisfy hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members in large numbers are again seeking to ask supplementaries. We will be running short of time and should give an opportunity to other members to ask questions.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF BILINGUAL DISTRICTS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the Secretary of State.

Since the Duhamel report on bilingual districts was tabled in the House nine months ago already, and since Official Languages Commissioner Keith Spicer stated recently that it was difficult to act as an ombudsman regarding official languages as long as the government will not proclaim the establishment of bilingual districts, could the minister tell us if the government intends to do so?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration by the cabinet.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Could the minister tell the House whether the establishment of bilingual districts will be made before the next federal election?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member wishes to direct a supplementary question.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell the House why the government has delayed nine months the establishment of bilingual districts, since they are essential if the Languages Commissioner is to administer the government program, that is the Official Languages Act?

Mr. Pelletier: One of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, is that we had committed ourselves to hold consultations with the provinces, and we did so. I could give several other reasons, but it is not a proclamation which can be made lightly. The government wanted to be quite careful in establishing those districts, especially since available figures dated from 1961.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—POSSIBLE AGREEMENT WITH IMPERIAL OIL FOR RESORT CENTRE AT LAKE LOUISE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and concerns the situation at Lake Louise in Banff National Park where a projected $30 million resort centre is being set up, to be operated by Imperial Oil which is 60 per cent owned by Americans, and Lake Louise Lifts Limited. It encompasses the gradual elimination of facilities near Lake Louise, including the removal of Chateau Lake Louise. I ask the minister whether, technically, any agreement in this regard has been made. Second, since such an agreement, if made, would be detrimental, does he not believe that one of the finest resorts in all the world, in a national park, should not be turned over to a private company?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration. We have made up plans to hold public hearings on that problem. The public hearings will be held in Calgary next week and all persons concerned may attend. It will be only after those public hearings that a decision will be taken by the government.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister say why it was that, with its strong anti-American attitude with respect to investment, the government would even consider permitting Imperial Oil to get so much control over this park? Second, will he not have this matter brought before parliament so that this magnificent park will not be destroyed by bureaucratic considerations?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that the government is not ashamed of its conservation policy. It has created ten new national parks in Canada within four years. When the hon. member was himself Prime Minister, he did not establish a single one—

[Mr. Asselin.]

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question was not answered, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the minister should be given the opportunity to reply to the question. I invite him to do this rather than enter into debate. The minister has the floor. Then, I will recognize the right hon. gentleman for a supplementary.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this project was allowed to develop after public tenders were called. There were many groups invited to make proposals, but this was the only proposition made when we called for tenders. We are considering it. However, before a decision is made may I point out that public hearings will be held in Alberta and they are starting next week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask about tenders. I asked a question about the most beautiful park in Canada, a park which this government is trying to sell out to private interests.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggested a moment ago that there should not be debate between the right hon. gentleman and the minister.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should not let this thing go too easily. There has been skiing in the lower Lake Louise area for many years. It was begun a long time before this government took over in 1963.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That does not justify selling out that part of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that is not a question of privilege. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Skeena, who I believe has a supplementary, and then the hon. member for Yukon who also has a supplementary.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, surely we should be permitted to answer the question of privilege raised by the minister. We should be free to do that. He raised a question of privilege relating to the lower Lake Louise area and suggested that there was no free enterprise there. These free enterprises spent $5 million there, and the government knows it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I suggest to the minister that he did not have a question of privilege. I was hoping that he would not start a debate, which is obviously what we are doing. I remind hon. members that the question period is quickly running out. If we are to make progress, we should move more quickly and not spend ten minutes on each question. The hon. member for Skeena on a supplementary.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance about a subject that I am sure is burning in his mind every hour of the day. Can he tell the House when he is going to present his first and, I hope, his last budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I cannot, Mr. Speaker, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will survive as long as he does.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary did not refer to the question previously being considered. I did not appreciate that his supplementary was not related to the question asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I will recognize the hon. member for Yukon, who I believe has a supplementary to that particular question.

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF THREE NEW NORTHERN PARKS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the minister say that public hearings are to be held into the question of private enterprise incursions into the Lake Louise area of Banff National Park. Would he refer the matter of the establishment of the three northern national parks which he recently announced to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development so that conservationists and industry might be heard with respect to boundaries and other park problems?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my department's estimates will be referred to the committee in the near future, and if hon. members then wish to ask me some questions on the matter, I will be pleased to answer them.

POSSIBLE CONFLICT OF INTEREST INVOLVED IN GIVING GRANTS TO FALCONBRIDGE, IBM, UNION CARBIDE AND WESTINGHOUSE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question really is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Regina East. In the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, may I direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether any conflict of interest is involved between grants given by DREE to Falconbridge Nickel Mines, IBM, Union Carbide and Westinghouse totalling over $12 million and the announced plans by these companies to book tables for today's Liberal fund raising dinner in Toronto?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member no doubt appreciates that a question asked in those terms is not in order. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister to whom I wished to direct my question, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, has fled from the House so I will wait.

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—REPRESENTATIONS FOR NEW TRIAL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the Attorney General of Canada took notice of a question of mine the other day.

An hon. Member: Hurrah!

Mr. Woolliams: I asked whether he had been approached directly or indirectly about a new trial for Geoffroy under certain conditions. As I say, he took the question as notice. I now ask whether he has been approached indirectly, either by one of his associates or by anyone else, and how has he been approached? Was it by telephone or by a conference in his office? If so, who was with him and in what manner was he approached?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the use of the word "indirectly" may, as used by the hon. member, be misleading, although I think the word was contained in his earlier question. What I meant in my earlier reply was that at that point I had no personal knowledge of any such contact. I have since checked the matter with my department and they have received no communication on this subject. So there has been no communication with my department or with me on this subject.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked whether the Solicitor General—and I appreciate the niceties of the question—had approached the Minister of Justice, because he says that somebody had contacted him. I want to know from the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, whether any conversation took place in regard to this, what that conversation was, and who contacted the ministers of the Crown in question?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I believe that when this question was put to the Solicitor General he replied. As to the matter of any contact with him I know, although ordinarily we do not make comments about communications between members of the Privy Council on matters like this, that the simple answer is no, flatly; there was no conversation between the Solicitor General and myself.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the parliamentary secretary a question about an answer given by the Solicitor General. I had hoped he would be here today. The Solicitor General mentioned, in answering my question, that he had been contacted by a person in relation to a new trial for Geoffroy, in accordance with the terms and conditions of the Criminal Code. In what manner was the minister contacted? Was it by telephone or by letter? Also, is he now prepared to divulge to the House the name of that person, the contents of that conversation and what took place?

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—SUGGESTED MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER OF JUSTICE AND MR. RICHER

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice.

Considering that Mr. Albert-Paul Richer, a known investigator, stated yesterday that he could guarantee the return of Mr. Geoffroy within 24 hours if the Solicitor General assured Mr. Geoffroy that he would have a new trial, would the Minister of Justice comment on this statement or assure the House that he will get in touch with its author to discuss it with him?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that, although I have seen these reports on the matter, I have no personal knowledge of them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a last supplementary on this subject, because we shall soon be running short of time.

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT WHEREABOUTS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Pursuant to Mr. Richer's statement that he could locate Mr. Geoffroy within 48 hours, could the minister tell us if he now knows where Mr. Geoffroy is and under what name did he leave Canada?

• (1520)

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to questions directed to the Solicitor General and what people may have said to him, I think these questions should properly be directed to him. I have no personal knowledge and neither has the Minister of Justice. The Solicitor General will be in the House and he has told me he will be very happy to answer these questions.

With regard to the second question about the passport, I should inform the House that at ten o'clock today charges were laid against Madame Geoffroy née Parent. Four charges were laid: false declaration in order to obtain a passport, possession of a false passport, counterfeiting, and the use of counterfeit documents. These charges were laid at ten o'clock this morning before Mr. Justice Emorand.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I again suggest to hon. members that for the moment we go on to the next subject. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have now had some answers. Ministers come and go as if they were playing a game of musical chairs. If we do not ask the questions today we will not have the ministers here tomorrow. As far as I am concerned, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made an important statement. We would like to know if these people are under arrest, what they are doing and so on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: I think we are entitled to an answer.

Mr. Speaker: The point made by the hon. member for Calgary North may be well taken. Until we return to this question, I thought we might give other hon. members an opportunity to ask questions. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley West and return to this matter in a moment.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can we not regard the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as a statement on motions and give hon. members an opportunity to respond to it?

PUBLIC SERVICE

OPERATIONAL GROUP—USE OF REGIONAL RATHER THAN NATIONAL PAY SCALES IN BARGAINING—POSSIBLE CONFLICT WITH DREE OPERATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. During the negotiations between Treasury Board and the occupational groups in the operational category of the Public Service, has Treasury Board been bargaining for the acceptance by the operational category of regional rather than national pay scales?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is in the affirmative. It has been the policy of successive governments to move from a scheme of national scales of wage rates to ones which are more appropriate and more commensurate with local operating conditions.

Mr. Rose: Since the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is engaged in spending millions of public dollars in an effort to reduce regional disparity, is the Treasury Board's posture on regional pay rates not entirely contradictory to that of DREE?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this is argument and to that extent the question is not in order.

USE OF REGIONAL RATHER THAN NATIONAL PAY SCALES IN BARGAINING—POSITION OF FORMER GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board a supplementary question arising out of his statement that this has been the policy of successive governments. How many governments in Canada have been moving away from the national scale policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether this question was presented in the form of an argument. I may have misunderstood the question asked by the hon. member. If I did misunderstand, the minister may reply to it briefly. He will be recognized for that purpose.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as collective bargaining has only been in operation since 1967, the answer is two.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Both Liberal.

POSSIBILITY OF LOCATING MR. AND MRS. GEOFFROY FOR RETURN TO CANADA TO FACE CHARGES—ISSUANCE OF WARRANT FOR MRS. GEOFFROY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In light of the statement just made by the Acting Prime Minister, and I want to do this properly, from the investigation that has been made is the minister now able to report progress in ascertaining where Geoffroy escaped to, what plane he took, if any, who accompanied him and if he is residing in a nation where extradition would apply? The minister told us today that the lady in question is being charged with certain offences. Was that done because of knowledge it will be possible to bring these people back to justice?

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Will the member for Calgary South keep quiet.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Broadly speaking, Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to the question is yes. We are very anxious to get Geoffroy and his wife back—Mr. Geoffroy back in prison and Madame Geoffroy to stand trial on the accusations which have been made.

Mr. Woolliams: I am sorry, I did not hear. There was a little noise. Did I understand the minister to say he has knowledge where these people are and, through the administration of justice, is in the act of having them returned to Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I said I agreed with the hon. member that we are trying to get them back. I do not personally know, and I do not know whether the police in the course of their investigation want to reveal their suspicions, because their desire, of course, is not to feed public curiosity but to get the Geoffroys back.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that these four counts have been laid against Madame Geoffroy, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the House whether a warrant for her arrest has been issued and whether such warrant is Canada-wide?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been a—

A warrant for his arrest was also issued.

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY— SUGGESTION THAT MR. RICHER BE CONTACTED

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Following the statement he just made, would the minister say if consecutive to Mr. Richer's assertion reported in today's newspapers his department has tried to arrange a meeting with Mr. Richer or has given any instructions to this effect in order to find out exactly where the fugitives are?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ricard: You are not trying to get him.

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PASSPORT APPLICATION AND RELATED CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will table in the House the passport application for Geoffroy under whatever pseudonym he appeared so that we can find out who was the guarantor? Also, will he table the correspondence showing the address to which the passport was sent and any correspondence with the department in which Mr. Denis of Rivard fame participated? I ask this because once charges are laid the government might very well suggest that we cannot discuss this matter any more. If the minister will just table these documents, no harm will be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The minister may wish to reply to the question, but I remind hon. members there are only three minutes remaining in the question period. I see that some of our distinguished colleagues are getting very impatient.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): May I reply briefly, Mr. Speaker, and say to the right hon. gentleman that I would like to give consideration to his question.

An hon. Member: I bet you would.

Mr. Sharp: It is a serious question. There are aspects of it that I do not think the right hon. gentleman quite appreciates. If he did know, he might be sympathetic to the point of view of the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, we have waited ten days and nothing has been indicated to cause me to extend sympathy to the government in connection with this matter.

GRAIN

ALLOCATION OF BOXCARS TO POOLS UPON TAKEOVER OF FEDERAL GRAIN COMPANY ELEVATORS—WAIVER OF NORMAL NOTICE OF SEVERANCE TO EMPLOYEES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice as minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In the light of the proposed takeover by the pools of the Federal Grain Company facilities, is it intended that the boxcars which would have been allocated to the Federal elevator system will be turned over to the pool system after the takeover?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The ordinary practice in the event of an exchange of elevators is, I believe, for the portion of the boxcars allocated to those elevators to go along. I expect this will be the procedure in this case. There are some serious questions in relation to congested elevators and particularly facets of the formula, which are under consideration in relation to this recent development.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be allowed one supplementary because we are getting very close to the end of the question period.

Mr. Korchinski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter. It will come to a head on March 10, and I think it should be cleared up before then. In light of the fact that the pools are only buying the facilities, not the farmers, will the minister consider allocating some of the boxcars which might have gone to that system to another system? May I ask the Minister of Labour whether there was consideration given to waiving the normal five month period in order to provide notice of severance of employment to all those Federal grain employees who will be affected? Was a waiver granted by his department?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a waiver was granted early in February of the group termination notice under certain terms and conditions, to which the company agreed, which were deemed to fulfil the intent of the act and in the light of an alternative plan proposed by the company with respect to its employees which in many respects went beyond the provisions of the requirements of the code.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Peace River before calling orders of the day.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REQUEST TO FACILITATE ORGANIZATIONAL MEETING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the leader of the House whether he would not facilitate the organizational meeting of the Public Accounts Committee so that the committee can complete its examination of the report upon which it is now engaged— it is now almost a year behind—so that the next report of the Auditor General, which is shortly to be made, can be taken up by the committee when it has completed its present survey?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Certainly, we shall be happy to facilitate the organization meeting of the Public Accounts Committee and to give it every encouragement to pursue its work.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SITE OF NEW FACILITY

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I realize you have had a heavy day on questions, but I have a very important question which I think should be asked in view of what appeared in the press this morning. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is in a position to make an official announcement about a new auxiliary airport for Toronto.

Mr. Speaker: The House might with to permit the minister to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Wellington. As I said, we have reached the end of the question period, but the question having been asked the minister might with to reply briefly. I will then call orders of the day again.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I suppose I could be extremely brief and answer by saying no. However, I should like to provide a little additional information. Negotiations with the province of Ontario are proceeding, I think I can say, at a very rapid rate and I would hope to be in a position very shortly to make the announcement to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. Hales: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In this morning's Globe and Mail there appeared an article stating that the airport would be located in the Claremont district near Pickering, Ontario. We have been asking questions about this new airport for two years. The minister gave the House an assurance that he would make the announcement in the House in due time. He said that two weeks ago today. Now there has been the announcement in the press about its location and I think we, as members of this House, are entitled to be told in this chamber whether this is the location or not, and why an announcement was not made simultaneously yesterday when it was apparently announced in the Ontario legislature.

Mr. Jamieson: I am not sure what my privileges are in these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, but if that can be taken as a question I could answer that the story today, as far as I am concerned, is merely one of a long series of speculative stories. I do know, as a matter of fact, that no announcement has been made in the Ontario legislature.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Wellington is really asking a series of questions after we have reached the moment to call orders of the day. This, I suggest to him, is irregular. I stretched a point by allowing him to ask a question by way of a point of order, and the minister replied. Then the hon. member asked a supplementary which questioned the minister's answer. If it is the wish of all hon. members, perhaps the hon. member for Wellington might be allowed a further supplementary.

Mr. Hales: My supplementary would be this, Your Honour: Is this the location which has been selected or is it not? It has been announced that this is to be the location. I want to know whether that is correct or not.

Mr. Jamieson: I think it is perfectly obvious that I cannot be asked to confirm or deny a press report. I can only say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I have consistently respected this House. I have made a commitment that any official announcement will be made in this chamber and I reaffirm that commitment by saying I shall do so at the earliest possible moment after negotiations have been concluded with the province of Ontario.

Mr. Simpson: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It is based on the fact that for four days I have waited to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On two of those days he was supposed to be in the House according to the roster system. Today, since the question is urgent, I intended to direct it to the Minister of National Revenue because he, too, has some responsibility for the Canada Pension Plan. Before the end of the question period the Minister of National Revenue left the House. Surely, if we are compelled to operate under a roster system, with very few ministers attending, at least the ones supposed to be here in accordance with that system should be obliged to be here and, when they do attend, to remain for the whole of the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in order to assist the House. In view of the fact that we have a limited time during the question period, in view of the fact that in the future I can foresee many questions on the local initiatives program, and bearing in mind that perhaps the Acting Prime Minister did not realize the significance of the request to refer that program to the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration, I should like to know whether it is in order to raise with the leader of the House the need for a specific reference to the committee of the local initiatives program with a direction to report to the House on guidelines and principles which could be recommended to the House and perhaps approved. This is quite different from a reference of the estimates which does not provide for such an investigation or report.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, this is somewhat irregular. If the President of the Privy Council wishes to reply briefly, I suppose he might be allowed to do so but we have now exceeded the question period by ten minutes. There is, of course, no authority for allowing members to ask questions after the expiry of the question period unless by unanimous consent of the House. But I would not want to complicate matters. If the President of the Privy Council can reply briefly he might do so, and we shall again try to get on with the business of the House.

Mr. MacEachen: I shall be brief and advise the hon. member that in my opinion the efforts of the committee would be quite as successful in any case, since with the authority granted to the committees to study the estimates there would be no necessity for any special reference.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Burton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Earlier in the question period I asked a question about a serious potential conflict of interest on the part of members of the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board. In view of the seriousness of this matter and, I am sure, the desire on the part of all hon. members to see the matter cleared up as soon as possible, I wonder whether we could have some indication from the government House leader, since the Acting Prime Minister has now left the chamber, whether the government would be prepared to table the minutes of all meetings of the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board—

• (1540)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I suggest to hon. members that it is an abuse of the rules to attempt on points of order to ask questions which might legitimately have been asked during the question period. Hon. members know that there are 40 minutes allotted to the question period. If from day to day considerable time is spent on one particular subject or another, be that subject very important, then some other questions, also important, will have to be set aside. Today I was anxious to recognize the hon. member for Churchill, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, who rose at the beginning of the question period, and the hon. member for Algoma. We should try to keep that in mind if we are to give all hon. members the opportunity of asking questions, or at least to give more hon. members the opportunity of asking questions during the question period. The matter raised by the hon. member for Regina East might be raised again, and I will try to give him an opportunity to do so during the question period tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

AUTHORIZATION OF FISCAL PAYMENTS TO AND TAX COLLECTION AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-8, to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House is the cornerstone in the structure of federal-provincial fiscal relationships in Canada. It is the key to effective co-operation in income tax policy across the country. It defines the mechanism for the sharing of revenues from this all important tax field. It provides for equalization transfers beginning at $1 billion a year. It gives real meaning, through these equalization transfers, as well as real substance to our ideals of national unity in a federal state. It contributes to stable economic growth by protecting all the provinces, whether those provinces be rich or poor, against the adverse effects of a sharp reduction in provincial revenues. It brings the aid of the broad federal taxing power to help the provinces in one of their most significant responsibilities, namely the financing of higher or post-secondary education.

More generally, it sets out the interrelated pattern of fiscal arrangements which support a high average standard of public services for all Canadians, no matter the province in which they live. Added to that, the bill, I believe, provides the flexibility necessary to adapt national objectives to regional and local conditions. For all these reasons I feel confident that the bill, after a thorough debate, will commend itself to the House.

Because of the division of powers under the British North America Act and the great differences in wealth among the provinces, the debate about federal-provincial relations is as old as this country. One hundred and five years ago Sir John A. Macdonald and his colleagues thought that they had worked out a satisfactory and binding financial arrangement under the terms of the British North America Act. They thought that this arrangement would underpin the new Canada. Almost before the constitutional ink was dry, financial pressure upon certain of the new provinces forced fiscal readjustment. Indeed, as early as 1873 special federal grants, which were the forerunner of today's equalization grants, were already being paid to the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia.

Subsequently, for 60 years the pattern of federal-provincial financial terms continued to evolve from decade to decade, from royal commission to royal commission, from conference to conference, from one ad hoc "final settlement", so-called, to another. But the misery, the widespread suffering of the great depression of the thirties, followed by the challenges of the second world war, brought about revolutionary changes in thinking about public finance in a federal state like Canada.

The landmark 1940 report of the Rowell-Sirois commission advanced at least three central concepts which have governed a great deal of thinking on federal-provincial fiscal relations since that time. The first was that the federal government has an over-riding financial role in the pursuit of national growth and stability. The second was that fair standards of public services and taxation in all regions of the country are vital to our national unity. And thirdly, that co-ordination in tax policy between the central government and the provinces is essential in a modern industrial state. The wartime tax rental agreements, forged in response to the urgent demands of war finance, provided the framework for putting these concepts into practice.

The fiscal provisions of the present bill are the outcome of these initial discussions. They are also the climax of 25 years of change, since the end of the war, in the course of which both theory and application of these concepts have been adapted to Canada in the 70's.

The provisions are particularly based on the concepts of fiscal independence and fiscal responsibility for each of our eleven sovereign governments. In this regard, they aim at a balance between centralization and decentralization of public finances in Canada. They therefore fully respect constitutional rights of provinces in the area of direct income tax. However, they also provide an efficient framework within which the two levels of government can co-operate on matters of policy and fiscal administration.

What is just as important is that they provide a basic financial framework within which national standards for essential public services in all regions of the country can be ensured.

[English]

Our success in developing an effective system of intergovernmental tax and fiscal relationships have attracted the attention of students of public finance from many other federal countries. For example, I refer to a recent report issued by the United States advisory commission on intergovernmental relations. This commission, composed of members of the federal, state and local governments and private citizens, reporting directly to the United States, comment in their report as follows:

Canada's tax sharing approach has gone a long way in redressing the general revenue imbalance within the Canadian federation. One of the tests for ascertaining the relative fiscal and political strength of the partners in a federal system is to observe how they share the intergovernmental revenue pie over time. Using the "revenue pie" test, the performance of the provinces is truly impressive. Between 1957 and 1969, the provincial share of all revenue collections rose from 18 to 33 per cent; the federal share fell from 69 to 52 per cent; and the local share increased slightly from 13 to 15 per cent.

By comparison, the performance of our States was far less impressive ... most of the remarkable revenue gains chalked up by the provinces during the 1950's and 1960's can be attributed to the willingness of the federal policymakers to negotiate with the provincial political leadership and their decision to share their prime revenue source with the provinces.

Further in their report this United States commission also concludes that, to use their words:

Canada has achieved a very high degree of federal-provincial tax co-ordination.

• (1550)

The report goes on to note its approval, using their own words again:

That Canada has developed a sophisticated and effective method for equalizing the revenue capacity of the provinces.

This analysis by the U.S. Commission refers particularly to the basic system of fiscal relations set out in the current Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1967. Major parts of that legislation are due to expire on March 31 of this year, which lends a certain urgency to the bill now before the House.

During the past two years, my predecessor had some seven meetings with his provincial opposite numbers for the purpose of assessment and consideration of a total plan. It was recognized that the scope of the plan called for close study of its operation and possible improvements, and consultation on these points. It was also necessary to readjust somewhat the revised tax structure in the amended federal Income Tax Act. The Department of Finance has also undertaken a number of technical studies. A committee of federal and provincial officials has made a detailed review of these studies and reported to the ministers concerned. The technical analysis and the numerous discussions among the ministers have led to the plenary federal-provincial meeting of last November, where all the matters dealt with in the bill have been reviewed.

This review has shown that a great deal of interests are opposed to and in conflict with one another. This cannot be avoided in a country the size of Canada with the diversity of its various regions. Some of these differences cannot be completely ironed out and the responsibility for the necessary decisions rests finally with the Parliament of Canada. However, the bill has, as much as practicable, taken into account all the exchanges of opinions, studies and discussions that have taken place between governments.

[English]

I would now like to turn to a review of the main features of the bill. Part 1 extends the 1967 arrangements for equalizing total provincial revenues for a further five years. Although the basic equalization formula is not changed, provision is made for certain technical improvements which reflect experience and various developments in provincial financing over the last five years. Hon. members will recall that the 1967 arrangements provided for the equalization of provincial revenues on a comprehensive basis. The formula measures the revenue raising capacity of each province. To the extent that the per capita revenues of any particular province are below the national average because of a lack of provincial revenue capacity, the federal government fills the gap by a direct grant.

[Translation]

Previous arrangements were formally started in 1957 to balance only part of the provincial revenues. In 1967, the then Minister of Finance, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), made a great leap forward by extending this formula to include all sources of provincial revenues. The equalization payments of the federal government increased therefore dramatically from $371 million in 1966 to $546 million in 1967. In view of the continued growth of the economy, as well as of provincial revenues, the equalization payments now total almost one billion dollars.

[English]

Equalization is based upon a comprehensive statistical measurement of the revenue raising capacity of each province. Consequently, the amount paid to each recipient government varies widely. Under the formula set out in the bill, the poorest provinces would receive the largest per capita payments. Thus, both Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island would qualify for about $213 per person in the next fiscal year; New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan form a middle group with per capita payments of $164, $135 and $102 respectively; Quebec and Manitoba, both provinces only marginally below the national average in revenue potential, would qualify for the smallest payments of $74 and $58 per person respectively. These variations help, I think, to make clear the basic principles of need and fairness which underlie the system. At the committee stage on the bill, I shall be glad to table extensive tables and illustrative material documenting how these calculations are made.

Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia are all provinces with a measured revenue raising capacity above the national average and hence are not eligible for payments. Of course, if any one of these provinces met adverse circumstances which reduced their fiscal potential below the national average, they would qualify for payments immediately and automatically. Needless to say, none of these provinces, I am sure, would want to undergo that experience.

I want also to stress to Your Honour an important point. Unfortunately, it appears as if some Canadians believe that the governments of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, or the taxpayers in those provinces alone, supply all the tax revenue redistributed in the form of equalization. This is not so. Equalization is paid out of the general revenues of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the government of Canada. These are drawn equally from any given level of income earned by taxpayers wherever they may reside in Canada.

Let us view it from another perspective. It is also clear how important these equalization transfers are to the qualifying provinces. For Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Quebec, equalization amounted to from 13 per cent to 16 per cent of their gross revenues from their own provincial sources in 1971-72. For Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the proportion was much larger—somewhat more than a third. For the two island provinces, equalization represented 55 per cent and 66 per cent of revenues from provincial sources.

These proportions do not arise—and I want to make this clear—from any unwillingness on the part of these provinces to tax their own citizens. On the contrary, studies in my department show that the tax effort by almost all of these provinces is about, and in some cases well above, the national average. In contrast, the higher income provinces, particularly British Columbia and Alberta, enjoy below average levels of taxation. This is so because of the abundant resource revenues which obviously contribute to the favourable position of these two western provinces. For Newfoundland to raise from its own tax base the full amount of its federal equalization transfer would require it to boost its tax rates by an average of 75 per cent. That would mean for Newfoundland a retail sales levy of 14 per cent, a gas tax raised from 25 cents to 44 cents per gallon, and a personal income tax rate hike from 36 per cent of federal tax up to 63 per cent.

Thus it is understandable why the lower income provinces, properly anxious to provide their people with decent schools, adequate health care, better roads, and all the basic services of a modern civilized society, place such great importance upon the equalization system authorized by parliament. They regard it not only as vital to their own financing but also as vital to fiscal federalism in Canada. Equalization is critical to their existence as viable social and political entities, and as such it is fundamental to our country.

Fortunately, I do not believe there is any serious dissent from the objective of achieving reasonably comparable standards of public service all across Canada. However, there have been differences of view as to how far the principle of equalization should be carried. Some concern has been voiced that heavier financial transfers from the higher income regions of the country to the poorer provinces may slow down total national growth. Specific features of the formula have been criticized in some quarters, particularly the equalization of revenues from particular kinds of natural resources. There has also been discussion among the provinces and the federal government as to what revenues ought to be calculated in providing the base for equalization.

An alternative approach to the financial problems of the poorer provinces has also been suggested. This would replace the present grants to the lower income provinces by direct federal payments to poorer people in all parts of Canada. It seems to be argued that such payments to individuals would result in an increase of tax revenues to the lower income provinces, and thus there would be no need for equalization transfers. I suppose this may be an appealing notion but it does not stand up under any serious analysis.

What would happen to provincial revenues if we abolished equalization payments and substituted $1 billion in payments to persons? In the ensuing fiscal year equalization payments will represent about $1 billion. The answer is that revenues to those provinces formerly receiving equalization would decline disastrously. The equalization transfers themselves would vanish from provincial receipts. Of the equivalent amount paid to individuals only about 55 per cent would be received in the seven lower income provinces. The remaining 45 per cent would go to persons in the three wealthier provinces.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Moreover, even if this limited amount of guaranteed income payments helped persons in the less wealthy provinces, the tax revenues received by their provincial governments would be reduced. Not only would there be a smaller flow of total income received and spent in these provinces but the tax revenues generated in the process would clearly be less than those generated by government spending on goods and services. Thus it will be clear that the seven provinces concerned would lose both the equalization grants and a portion of their own tax revenues. In such a situation these provinces would have to increase tax rates to impossible levels simply to maintain services to their people, or else they would have to abandon efforts to provide those services.

As an alternative scheme one might then ask what level of direct payments to persons would generate as much revenue in the lower income provinces as is provided by the existing equalization grants? The obvious answer is: enough to raise the average income of individuals to a level about equal to the present national average in Canada. The data available do not make a precise estimate possible. Nevertheless I have had it estimated for me that the net cost of a guaranteed income scheme of this nature across the country, necessary to compensate those provinces for equalization grants, would be in the nature of $13 billion to $14 billion.

This is a net cost after deduction of off-sets for equalization and existing federal and provincial transfers to lower income individuals which would no longer be necessary. However attractive the notion, it is safe to say that not even the most ardent advocate of the guaranteed income has aspired to new federal expenditures of these heights, having in mind the boost in tax levels necessary to finance them.

The federal government is fully committed to explore the use of the guaranteed income as a technique in the war against poverty. But, as we have emphasized, it is a mistake to suppose that any realistic form of such income support to individuals will solve all our problems, and particularly within the context of this bill, the problems of serious regional disparity, geographic disparity in incomes, and the differences in regional public finance.

In the ministry that I held before assuming this responsibility I became familiar with the constitutional aspects and structure of our country. I believe that for those of us who were involved in those federal-provincial discussions it was a unique learning experience.

Our revenue equalization system is one of the most fundamental aspects of federal-provincial relations. It goes right to the heart of the way that this country is bound together and held together. If the economically stronger parts of Canada are not prepared to help the weaker, generously and freely, can we really be said to have a country? I have no doubt that members of all parties and from all parts of Canada will give their answer in their support for this bill.

May I turn now in general terms to Part II of the bill which deals with the closely related question of the stabilization of provincial revenues. I suppose one could consider that the equalization system itself provides a type of effective stability of provincial revenues in the less wealthy recipient provinces. But the express stabilization feature which is carried over from the former act of 1967 into this bill is designed to meet other potential needs. These include the maintenance of revenues not only for the so-called have-not provinces but for the other three provinces, indeed for all the provinces. In other words, stabilization applies to all the provinces of Canada in the event of a general decline in total provincial revenues.

What the bill does under the stabilization provision is provide for a floor under provincial revenues. This floor consists of a federal guarantee to make a grant to any province whose revenues fall below 100 per cent of those received in the immediately preceding year. The year to year comparison for the province would of course be based upon the same rates and structure of its taxes.

This program, Mr. Speaker, is an improvement over the provisions of the 1967 act in which the revenue "floor" was set at 95 per cent of the preceding year. Fortunately, in the last five years, not a single province has been faced with circumstances such as would have entailed a federal stabilization payment. We hope that this situation will continue in the next few years. This bill guarantees however to each province and its people the maintenance of most public services, even though economic conditions might suddenly and unexpectedly deteriorate.

Another benefit of stabilization is the help it provides to provinces when they attempt to borrow on international money markets. Borrowers will be conscious of the new "floor" set at 100 per cent instead of 95 per cent, and the general financial position of the provinces should consequently improve.

[English]

I come now to deal with Part III of the bill in general terms. This extends the system of intergovernmental tax collection agreements which has developed over the past 30 years. You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that despite the taxes imposed both by this parliament and by the provinces, the great majority of Canadians need comply with only one income tax system. They file only one return and deal with only one group of tax collectors. This contrasts sharply with the situation which obtains in many other federal countries. Frequently the separate jurisdictions in other nations have different income tax laws. These are potentially confusing, irritating and burdensome to individual taxpayers and corporations.

Canada has developed both formal co-ordination and informal co-operation which minimize these difficulties. In all provinces except Quebec individual citizens are able to use only one return for federal and provincial taxes, based upon the same definition of taxable income, the same allowable deductions, and the same progression of rates.

Both provincial and federal taxes are collected through the federal machinery at no cost to the agreeing provinces. They and their taxpayers are thereby relieved of administration costs which have been estimated to run as high as $100 million annually.

Similar joint arrangements apply to the corporation income tax in all provinces except Ontario and Quebec. Even here I expect that substantial and effective harmonization in both law and administration will be rapidly restored as the reformed federal tax law settles firmly into place.

Within this framework of tax harmonization and uniformity, provinces are perfectly free to establish their own rates of taxation. They have been doing so to an increasing extent. This is the real test of fiscal independence and decentralization—the willingness to exercise the responsibility to tax as well as the responsibility to spend.

We are also continuing to improve the degree of flexibility available within the arrangements. A new agreement with Ontario was recently announced by the provincial treasurer of that province which will tie credits against provincial income taxes into the system, replacing that province's existing program of separate property tax rebates. Under the new system, individuals may file proof of property taxes paid, and certain deductions from income tax will be allowed, or rebates of the property tax already paid will be issued. Persons who do not normally file income tax returns will be able to do so, in order to claim their rebates. Similar consultations are being held with Manitoba about credits for their provincial sales tax.

The present bill would also empower the federal government to collect, on behalf of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and the four Atlantic provinces the succession duties which they have proposed. I want to emphasize that these provinces have made the decision to rejoin Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia in the succession duty field entirely on their own. We have had no part in their decision and have agreed to assist in collections only in response to their urgent requests to us. I believe that the people of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia should be aware of that. The aforementioned provinces have pointed out that they do not have collection machinery available for this purpose and that considerable benefits in terms of efficiency and cost-savings could be achieved by federal administration. Under the terms of the bill, however, this commitment would end in three years' time—it lapses after three years. The bill would also authorize the federal government to collect gift tax for certain provinces.

Parts IV and V of the bill deal with special questions arising out of the reform of the federal Income Tax Act, passed by this House before Christmas. Provinces were concerned that the higher exemptions, increased deductions and revised rate structure in the new federal act might cause them a loss of revenue if they adopted all these features as a part of the reform package. The bill therefore provides a five-year guarantee that each province will receive as much revenue from the reformed personal income tax as it would have under the old system. This guarantee would be available to provinces which harmonize their personal income tax acts with the federal statute, and which levy rates of tax at January 1 no higher than the effective burdens imposed in 1971. Because of this guarantee, nine provinces have remained within the tax collection system and Quebec has stated its full intention to harmonize its own income tax legislation with the reformed federal act.

In response to provincial requests to share in the revenues from the tax on payouts of undistributed profits held at the end of 1971, the bill also proposes a transfer of one-fifth of these revenues to the provinces. This is roughly the same proportion as the federal government now shares with the provinces in the corporation tax field.

The other part of the bill deals with the method whereby the federal government helps the provinces to finance 50 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education in Canada. Here again, it is an extension of the program launched for the first time in 1967 and which is to be terminated on March 31 next. The support of the federal government in that area came in the form of tax point transfers as well as adjustment grants. Education is a complex area of public policy where a rapid ferment of change is assailing accepted ideas and institutions.

This is why the bill proposes that these provisions be extended only for a period of two years. During that period we look forward to intensive consultations with the provinces to determine more specifically the goals, the trend of the policies and the responsibilities of the federal government. This is a pressing problem which comes under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier). I expect him to intervene during this debate to deal in depth with this important issue.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague tells me that his speech might last about ten minutes and if after my speech the leaders of the other parties would agree, instead of having the usual reply, the minister might be given the floor for ten minutes to complete the picture. It will be up to the House to decide.

[English]

The final part of the bill is concerned with two further questions upon which I should comment briefly. There is first a "housekeeping" section, including reference to the making of regulations. I was concerned with this question in my earlier responsibilities. The government is fully committed to the policy of limiting its own powers of regulation to the minimum. This is the burden of the Statutory Instruments Act passed by this Parliament and the burden of the review of the Scrutiny Committee to be set up in this session. It will be obvious, however, that the substance of this bill depends upon a great many technically complex definitions, measurements and calculations. Indeed, the revenue guarantee envisages the use of abstract mathematical equations. To have attempted to incorporate all of this into statutory language would have been impossible, or resulted in a completely incomprehensible bill. The provinces have also urged that technical details should be prescribed in regulations upon which they might be consulted, and it would be our intention to proceed in this way.

There is one more question which remains to be decided in the last part of the bill. It has to do with the application of the revised version of some provisions of the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act. This legislation was passed in 1965 and included an option for a different kind of federal payments to the provinces regarding selected shared-cost social programs. Instead of a concrete federal contribution in the form of a cash grant, that legislation provided for transfer of fiscal "elbow room" to the provinces. This additional taxation field allowed provinces to levy part of the revenues needed to finance their own programs. This "non-participation formula", as it could be called, was applicable to hospitalization insurance, welfare programs and general health grants. Although all provinces had access to that offer from the federal government, only Quebec chose to take advantage of it. A similar agreement was later introduced in order to support post-secondary education in all provinces.

It is important to realize that for the seven years during which those agreements were in force, Quebec has received no less and no more federal assistance than would have been given under the traditional cost-sharing method. The provisions of this bill simply extend the validity of those arrangements for a further period of five years. They have been adjusted, however, to reflect the slight changes in the value of transferred fiscal points due to income tax reform.

[English]

This general question of "opting out" was discussed at some length at the federal-provincial plenary conference of last November. At that time, the federal government suggested that it was not at all clear how full financial responsibility for the shared-cost social programs, together with the necessary financial resources, could be transferred to all the provinces on a fair and lasting basis. The health and welfare programs, which were thought to be well established, have in fact been undergoing rapid change. Their form, coverage and substance have all been rapidly evolving as new ideas, new techniques, and new institutions have come to the fore. Parallel with these developments, cost control and prediction have become more difficult. Consequently any simple mechanistic transfer of financial responsibility and tax room is not likely to provide lasting and useful solutions. Instead we have been exploring alternative means by which the provinces might enjoy greater flexibility and freedom to design their own programs and fix their own priorities, but still receive fair and appropriate financial support from the Parliament of Canada.

These explorations and consultations with the provinces will continue. But they are more likely to succeed if carried out on a program by program basis. This will ensure that careful attention is paid to the special circumstances and developing prospects in each case, and that the central objectives of these basic social programs are not lost sight of in a squabble over the form of financing.

In all of these consultations, however, we must keep constantly in mind the responsibilities of the government and Parliament of Canada toward all Canadians. I have attempted in these remarks, Mr. Speaker, to convey something of the historical foundations, the broad philosophy and the main highlights of the bill. I should like to reiterate, in closing, its urgent importance to the provinces, and thus to our country and its citizens. It is a lengthy and technically difficult bill, and perhaps not one to attract widespread public attention. But as I have emphasized, it renews and improves a set of interrelated fiscal arrangements which are fundamental to federalism and national unity in Canada. On that basis I feel sure that it will be received with keen interest and debated with understanding in this House.

• (1620)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It was my understanding that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) intended to ask for leave to table certain documents. Did I understand correctly?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I said, Sir, that when we reach the committee stage, if we do, I would be glad, in response to any request made in the committee hearing, to table documents in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I beg the minister's pardon. I misunderstood him.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the House for giving unanimous consent to my introducing Part VI of the bill. I think that all hon. members will benefit from having the bill explained to them now. Any hon. member who is not a lawyer, at least, is bound to find the legal language used in the bill very difficult to understand compared with the relative simplicity of explanations given in non-legal terms.

Therefore, I am happy to join my colleague in introducing Part VI of this bill under which, as you know, the post-secondary education adjustment payment program adopted in 1967 will be continued for the next two fiscal years, that is up to March 31, 1974.

The federal-provincial conference of October 1966—hon. members will no doubt remember—was preceded by three days of talks on the financing of higher education, to which the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and all his provincial counterparts at the time participated.

The Canadian government then indicated some changes to be made to its policy concerning financial aid to education, particularly secondary education. The first object of these policy changes was to replace the system of grants to universities being distributed through the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada—and in the case of Quebec, by means of some tax-sharing arrangements between the federal government and the provinces—by assistance enabling the provinces to cope with the increasing cost of post-secondary education, for operation expenses as well as for capital expenses, under a special arrangement concerning fiscal transfers.

The second object was to eliminate any distinction between university training and post-secondary technical or professional training, in fact, to eliminate anything which, on account of the federal contributions, could indirectly exert some influence on the particular trend of development of institutions in any province.

The third object was to substitute an adult professional training program to the assistance granted under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act of 1961, which was about to expire.

[English]

Hon. members will realize, I believe, that these programs have expanded very significantly during the past five years. The assistance offered through Part II of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1967, has doubled. Under the post-secondary education support program, fiscal transfers made by the federal government to the provinces rose from $422 million in 1967-68 to $870 million in 1971-72. I would like, with the permission of hon. members, to table some statistical material regarding payments made from 1967-68 to 1971-72 under Part II of the 1967 act. While the remarkable expansion of post-secondary education in Canada during the late 1960's was made possible by energetic leadership on the part of those concerned, both in the provinces and in the institutions themselves, the action of the federal government in assuring financial support provided the needed stimulus.

We are all aware that public expectations with regard to education grew steadily during the 1960's. The expansion in enrolment and educational services during this period resulted in a rapid escalation of costs, with total expenditures on post-secondary education by all levels of government rising from about $340 million in 1960-61 to over $2.5 billion in 1971-72, and the federal share rising from 25 per cent to 49 per cent during the same period. The rate of increase in total expenditures on post-secondary education has been considerably higher than the growth in GNP and this cost escalation has been of great concern to all governments, both in relation to government revenues and in the allocation of funds between priorities.

Realizing the complex problems which arise when growth is so rapid and when programs, such as the post-secondary education fiscal transfer, manpower training, research support to universities, and student assistance, are so diverse, the federal government is undertaking a review of its future long-term involvement in post-secondary education. I wish to assure the House that this review will be made in full consultation with provincial authorities, of course.

Following a letter dated November 9, 1970, which the Prime Minister sent to the first ministers concerning the federal-provincial post-secondary education fiscal transfer program, I began, early in 1971, consultations with the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada and with each of the individual ministers to obtain their general comments on the operation of our program for the two years 1972-73 and 1973-74. In the light of all the circumstances, it was felt that a ceiling should be agreed upon to limit the annual rate of growth of the federal contribution. These points were discussed with each minister of education and, on two occasions, I met with the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada.

The federal government has found these consultations very helpful and we shall try to ensure that co-operation with the provinces will continue in the future.

Part VI of the bill now before the House will permit continued progress of post-secondary education in the provinces until 1974; we will then be in a position to make a detailed and motivated statement on the attitude contemplated at that time.

Part VI of the bill therefore extends for two years, until March 31, 1974, the post-secondary education fiscal transfer program. It sets at a yearly maximum of 15 per cent the national rate of increase in the federal contribution and I mean the "national rate". It will still be possible to grant individual provinces increases in excess of 15 per cent as long as the overall federal contribution to the provinces as a whole does not exceed the 15 per cent ceiling. However, if during one of those two years, the authorized expenses of post-secondary education institutions were to boost the overall national federal contribution over 15 per cent, the provinces with an increase rate above 15 per cent would have their payments reduced in proportion to the excess amount which the payments made to them would have contributed to create.

Clause 24 of the bill is a statement of conditions applicable to the 15 per cent ceiling. Clause 26 deals with the implementation, by the Finance Minister, of the federal revenue reduction relating to post-secondary education. As for the remainder of Part VI of the bill, it is identical to Part II of the 1967 act.

Under the circumstances, I think that the proposed amendments offer a reasonable procedure enabling us to take into account a transitional period during the next two years which seems to me to be fair for all parties concerned, while being reassuring as regards the ceiling on total federal expenditures. Therefore, I hope that hon. members will give favourable attention to that bill.

With leave of the House, I would like to table the figures outlining the application of the 1967 agreements during the years for which comprehensive results are available to the government.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Does the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) have consent to table the documents to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Barnett: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the documents are not too lengthy, I wonder whether there might be agreement to have them attached to today's Hansard as an appendix so that we may be able to review them along with the minister's speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might say the documents are not lengthy. Is it the wish of the minister and hon. members that the documents tabled be appended to today's Hansard?

[Editor's note: For text of documents referred to above, see Appendix B.]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I must begin by agreeing with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) about the importance of the subject matter of the legislation. There can be no doubt about the importance of this legislation to the provinces and the country.

The minister reviewed the history of this legislation to some extent. He went back to the prewar days when everybody was on their own, so to speak, through the wartime period when it was strictly a tax sharing proposition. Subsequently, this was discontinued and at some point not long after the war, the principle of equalization was introduced. My recollection is that initially the principle of equalization was based on the per capita yield from the three taxes, corporate income tax, personal income tax and succession duties, the per capita yield in these three areas in the two or three highest yield provinces. As the minister reminded us, the principle was changed in 1967 so that the concept of equalization since then takes into consideration virtually all revenues and brings each province up to the national average yield of provincial revenues from all sources. That, of course, is in per capita terms.

I am not going to indulge in a comparison with the United States. I understand that anyone in the United States would regard this as a vast improvement over any system there because there are virtually no fiscal relationships between the administration in Washington and the states. My impression is that the state governments have very little idea about what the federal administration is doing. Sometimes both levels of government operate in the same area of jurisdiction without the slightest idea what the other is doing. As Leader of the Opposition, I have to agree that in a comparison of relationships, that is fiscal and other relationships, between Washington and the states, our relationship here is happy by comparison. I think the minister will agree that by and large this is a stand-pat arrangement, except that arrangements with regard to post-secondary education are to terminate, as far as these arrangements are concerned, after a two year period.

I only want to say two things at this time about the post-secondary aspects of this bill. First, the uncertainty should be removed quickly because it is not possible to do much planning on the basis of a two year assurance. I am sure the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) will agree it is imperative that whatever new arrangement is made to replace this will be satisfactory. Any government that I am in charge of following the next election will ensure that it is satisfactory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is imperative that it be worked out quickly in order to reduce the degree of uncertainty as rapidly as possible.

Second, it is imperative that there be real consultation. The Secretary of State told us something about his consultation. There was supposed to have been consultation the last time. Actually, what was worked out was improvised at the last minute. There was no real consultation prior to the current arrangements having been adopted in the first place. I stress the importance of real and meaningful consultation between those responsible in Ottawa and those responsible in the provinces for whatever scheme replaces the present arrangements with regard to financing post-secondary education in Canada, a very important topic.

As I said previously, this is basically a stand-pat arrangement. It continues the same equalization formula with the exception that the guarantee is moved up to 100 per cent from 95 per cent. We should bear in mind there are two aspects of the financial sharing arrangements of this bill. There is the regional aspect of straight sharing in the area of taxation in which both the federal and provincial governments have an equal right to tax. This began during the war and has continued. It was designed to reduce the tax jungle in this area as much as possible. There is the straight tax sharing arrangement. Most provinces which do not receive any equalization payments receive certain points of the personal and corporation income taxes. That is one aspect of this bill. It is a stand-pat arrangement in that regard.

Provinces which do not receive any equalization payments will receive the same proportion of revenues from personal and corporate income taxes as they receive under the agreement that has been in effect since 1967, except there will be a guarantee that they will not receive less in any one year than they received during the previous year. I want to emphasize that this is a stand-pat arrangement in this regard as well as with regard to the concept of equalization. The minister stressed the national importance of the equalization aspect of the measure. He may not have used the words "national unity", but he stressed the importance to the concept of Canada and the importance of providing something like an acceptable standard of provincial services across the country. It does not really do that. As I am sure the premier of any Atlantic province would argue, it does not really achieve that entirely. He would argue, I am sure, that municipal revenues should be included in the equalization concept. If the minister has not heard that argument I am sure he will hear it frequently in the future.

The equalization formula has been improved over the years. It is not yet to be regarded as perfect. I emphasize that this bill does not bring about any further change in the equalization formula except that the guarantee is moved up from 95 per cent to 100 per cent. The bill does two things in this regard. It shares tax revenues which arise from a field of common jurisdiction, personal income tax and corporate income tax, as well as the equalization aspect. The reason I emphasize this is that prior to the arrangements which were incorporated in legislation back in 1967, a limited study was conducted by a team of federal and provincial officials. The purpose of that study was to forecast provincial expenditures across Canada over the ensuing five year period based on programs then in existence and to forecast provincial revenues over the ensuing five year period based on taxes then in existence. The same was done with respect to forecasting federal expenditures and revenues. Of course, this study had to be conducted on the basis of certain assumptions, but the team of officials agreed on results which show that, on the basis of programs then in effect, provincial governments would run into positions of increasing deficit and that the federal government would move into a position of increasing surplus. To my knowledge, these findings have never been disputed. I believe there was also a ten-year forecast which indicated the same thing.

I can recall very well the vividness of the disappointment of those responsible for provincial financial matters when, having authorized the study and having carried it through jointly with a team of federal officials, they found that the federal government was paying absolutely no attention to these findings and had proceeded to put into operation the tax sharing arrangements which are now in effect, ignoring completely the consequences of that study. This is one of the things that are annoying to so-called "have" provinces—the fact that their share of the proportion of the field they are constitutionally entitled to occupy, personal income tax and corporate income tax is frozen, although the joint study to which I have referred has indicated that the revenues needed to discharge their responsibilities are growing at a rate much more rapid than the increase in federal costs.

I am dwelling on this point because I believe it is one of the factors which is weakening the desire of the people who live in those provinces to support the principle of equalization as fully as they did a few years ago. This is why I emphasize that we are dealing with a stand-pat arrangement with regard to the tax sharing aspects of this formula as well as the equalization aspects of it. Since 1967, it is fair to say, most provinces have been obliged to raise their taxes, not for the purpose of fighting inflation but in order to find money to meet their expenditures and to provide services directly, or to ease the municipal or urban tax load to some extent. As a consequence, as the minister himself mentioned, most provinces are now levying income tax in addition to the general prevailing rate across the country, revenues from which are shared. The Province of Nova Scotia is moving toward this position at the present time. At least, that is the intention of the government if it can get a bill through the legislature down there, as one supposes it will.

The increase in provincial expenditures arising from the nature of provincial responsibilities during the last five years has obliged the provinces generally to increase their taxes. At the very time the so-called tax reform bill is coming into operation, the provinces are already levying rates of taxation at levels substantially above the rates specified in the federal tax legislation. I am bold enough to forecast—I shall probably be called a prophet of gloom for doing so but I venture to believe I am being a realist—that the situation will continue to deteriorate during the five years of the arrangement we are considering, if it stays in effect for five years. On the basis of the prediction made some five years ago by federal and provincial officials that the cost of provincial programs and services would continue to grow, even the most prosperous provinces will be struggling to find new means of revenue to finance those programs and services, and the rate of taxation in the so-called tax reform bill passed just before the end of the year will bear less and less relationship with reality as those five years go by.

I think we should understand that the kind of taxation we are discussing, particularly personal income tax, is the most elastic form of revenue that exists in the country. It is the form of revenue which grows most rapidly as compared with other revenue sources available to provinces. This is another reason for expecting increasing resort by provincial governments to imposing, within their provinces, income taxes at rates above the schedule in the tax reform bill. Provinces are already resorting in increasing numbers to succession duties in a manner which bears no relation at all to the capital gains tax incorporated in the tax reform bill. No attempt has been made to integrate the two. The result is that succession duties will be piled on top of the capital gains tax, although I believe all us realize there ought to be some form of integration.

The Minister of Finance emphasizes that it is the provinces that are making this decision—he is suggesting that the federal government is not responsible for it in any way—but I would throw that claim back at the minister. Indeed, I feel I have to because the minister and his predecessor, and the government to which they belong, abdicated their responsibility. Instead of simply vacating the field at very little financial cost to themselves, they should have negotiated with the provinces an arrangement to integrate succession duties in a sensible way with capital gains tax payments, perhaps by some system of cross credits.

I would regard this as an important priority for any federal government in this country to pursue. We already have a situation where we will have this kind of jungle in relationship to succession duties and capital gains tax. We already have an increasing number of provinces imposing a higher income tax rate than that contemplated by what I might refer to, if I am in order in doing so, for purposes of shorthand, as the "Benson bill". What the members of this House have to ask themselves is: What are the provinces going to do if these projections are correct and their expenditures are going to increase, as predicted by this joint team of officials? Can the provinces cut back on their programs, must they resort to additional taxation, or both? I suggest that they will have to do both, and the municipal and urban taxpayers will suffer in the process.

On the basis of the evidence that we now have, we have to conclude that the provinces will need to resort to additional taxes to meet their own needs, plus the needs of the municipalities. The provinces have been saying this themselves, of course, but it is backed up by the study made by the joint team of provincial and federal officials.

I suggest it is all very well for the Minister of Finance to talk so earnestly about a policy of jobs for all, a policy of development for this country. Nevertheless we are already heading into a tax structure that is not conducive to growth. If by any stretch of the imagination one can argue that the bill that was passed was a sensible piece of tax reform, conducive to growth, which I would not admit, then even if the bill were sensible, it would not meet the realities today in this country. Because on top of the bill there will be succession duties and income taxes that the provinces are now imposing at increasing rates, indeed which they will have to impose in order to enable them to keep afloat and to provide the very basic services to their own people. I contend that the bill that was passed before Christmas will become increasingly meaningless as time goes on. These two bills together, the so-called tax reform bill and the bill we are now debating, do not constitute a package that indicates equity in this country in terms of taxpaying, or a package that will lead to equity in terms of taxpaying, or which will encourage economic growth in the fight against poverty and unemployment.

This government cannot consider tax reform in isolation from provincial taxes, which are very much a part of the tax picture across the country. For tax reform to be meaningful it really must be approached on a truly national basis, not simply on the basis of the taxes that the federal government admits to being its own. I still believe that the tax reform bill in itself is a mess; but that bill, plus the implications of this one, I contend will produce a mess of really massive proportions in this country during the next five years. The pressures of provincial and municipal expenditures are going to add to the eventual distortion.

What is there here to ensure that the fund of taxes contributed by the people of this country is going to be devoted to the priority items, or to ensure that the tax structure really is equitable and is designed to promote growth? The federal government is prepared to carry on where it began some five years ago, but it has not been prepared to take into consideration the findings of the study that was made at that time. At least prior to the 1967 arrangements a study was made and a projection put forward, though no particular attention was given to it when completed. But this time, so far as I know, no study at all has been made. The government of which the Minister of Finance is a member simply said: "This is it, gentlemen; we will discuss details with you, but this is it". And that was that.

It is all very well for the Minister of Finance, his predecessor or for any of their associates to say that if the provincial governments need more money, then let them raise it. The minister talks of fiscal responsibility, but in terms of personal and corporate income tax this is a field of taxation that is just as much provincial under the constitution as federal. When the federal government ignores the findings of its own officials as to the growing need for the provinces to discharge their own responsibilities, then it is harmful to the establishment of a sensible tax structure, to the growth of the country and to the meeting of the most urgent needs. If that is right it places strains upon national unity by increasing the reluctance of the relatively well-to-do to aid in the provision of services in the less well to do parts of the country.

I realize that we have the fine words, but I should like somebody on behalf of the government to indicate to us in some convincing way that under the arrangements that the minister has put forward there will not in fact be an increase in the piling of provincial income tax upon the schedules in the income tax laws that have been adopted. Is there not, in fact, as a result of this and as a result of the pressure to try to cover services even in the more prosperous provinces, going to be an additional strain upon national unity to maintain this kind of equalization program in the country? I feel very earnestly about this and it is my hope that this bill is referred to the committee quickly. I realize that the old arrangements run out at the end of the month, but I hope nevertheless that the committee will take the time and the trouble to hear representations from the provinces on the point I have raised as well as other points, in order to make certain that the bill we are adopting is really the bill that is best designed to serve the people of Canada, and in order to make certain that at least all the time and effort that was devoted to tax reform during the last year or two in this House will not go down the drain as a result of the inadequacies, not only of the tax reform bill but of the measure that the minister has presented to the House at this time.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anyone in this House who does not approve the principle of the equalization formula. I think there are very few of us who would not say that this country has survived because, in fact, we have worked out such a formula. If survival is the test, then to some extent we have been successful. However, if satisfaction is the test, we have been far from successful because what we have had in fact is survival without satisfaction. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction across this country with the relationship between the provincial and the federal governments and the relationships between various provinces. I would like to suggest to you that the government has not put enough effort into the idea of cost-sharing or the sharing of revenues between one part of Canada and another, nor have they used their imagination in a way that might have resolved some of the difficulties we now face.

There are serious strains on confederation. I think it is important at this time to take a look at some of these strains and to treat some of them seriously. I know the government is prone to dismiss with certain glib phrases the attitudes of certain premiers with whom they disagree. I want to take all the criticisms in as serious a vein as I can, to see to what extent those criticisms are valid and to what extent we can do something about them.

Recently, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) alluded to the proposal of the Premier of British Columbia. I tend to agree with the Minister of Finance that on the surface the proposal looks very alluring, but in fact it would be disastrous to the poor people of Canada and certainly to the poorer parts of this nation. I am prepared to say that the premier has the best intentions in the world. It would be different if he said that, on top of the money we are now devoting to equalization, we should devote additional moneys to a kind of guaranteed annual income. This would make some sense. But to say "we will do this instead of" does a terrible disservice to the people he proposes to help.

Perhaps this is an argument that did not occur to the Minister of Finance because he is a Liberal and does not think along these lines. What has to be recalled is that the equalization payments which go to the provinces enable the provinces to provide public services, the chief beneficiaries of which are the poor of those provinces. The important distinction is that, even if the transfers to individuals were similar to the transfers to the provinces,—which the Minister of Finance pointed out they would not be—the transfers on a personal basis are largely for consumer goods while the transfers to provinces are largely for public goods such as hospitals, schools and transportation. Not only that, but many of these programs, assuming that they could be bought privately, would not be as efficient as those provided publicly and universally.

We went through this argument with medical services and hospitalization. I think our experience in Canada has proven conclusively that if we offer universal programs of public merit they can be provided at a lower cost and they are more readily accessible to everyone. On the whole, it has been those public programs that have most helped the poor of this country. I must say that in many ways we have not really narrowed the gap between the rich and the poor in the area of actual income distribution, so the only real successes we have had in narrowing the gap has been in the level of public services we have provided that are equally accessible to the rich and to the poor. Surely, the premier of a province would not dismiss this kind of advantage too easily. Granted that he wants to improve the system, I think this is something he has to consider very carefully.

I said that I wanted to treat very seriously the proposals that come from the province of British Columbia. Perhaps there is an added reason today to treat these proposals seriously, since we are all wearing lovely flowers that the B.C. members have so kindly provided for those of us who are here today. We are, therefore, all friendly and well disposed toward the great province of B.C. British Columbia, which is a resource rich province, makes the argument that it is taxing its resource industries to the hilt. Of course, my colleagues in the legislature would not agree with that. They do not think B.C. is really taxing those resource industries as adequately as they should be taxed.

Nevertheless, British Columbia argues that it is taxing the resource industries at a level which is not being matched in some of the provinces that are receiving assistance under this equalization formula. The Government of British Columbia says, we do not mind paying equalization, we do not mind transfer payments from a province like ours if in fact it is richer than the recipient, but we expect you will also tax your resource industries at the same level. They would like to see those provinces which are receiving equalization grants taxing the resource industries at the same level as those provinces which are providing funds for equalization. I think that is a valid argument.

I think the argument is overstated because, in fact, some of the provinces at which the premier of B.C. pointed his finger do not possess, in my view, resources as rich or as accessible as those in his own province. But even accepting the overstatement, which does not come as a surprise from that source, there is an element of truth in the argument. I think the federal government has contributed to this feeling of alienation and has fostered the feeling against equalization because it has not acted. I want to point out the number of areas in which it has not acted.

Recently, we have had a debate on the new corporate income tax legislation, and we argued over and over again that all industry should be taxed equally, that favouritism not be shown in the tax system to the resource oriented industries. That argument fell on deaf ears on the government side, with the result an entire area is opened up for provinces to play games with resource industries. This is something we could have avoided had we passed an intelligent, sensible bill that dealt with this problem. These criticisms keep cropping up, criticisms we might have avoided. This is why I suggested in my opening remarks that we could have made some considerable improvement in the attitude towards sharing and towards fiscal transfers between provinces.

The whole question of regional grants is having a distorting influence on the entire picture. Today, some of my colleagues raised some very disturbing questions about these grants, how they were being given out and to whom they were being given out. When the idea of regional grants first was proposed, those of us who lived in the most populous and better-off provinces were very pleased to support the idea of regional payments to stimulate industrial development in parts of Canada that did not have a great deal of industrial development. However, Mr. Speaker, all of us have become disillusioned with the way that those payments are being made. All of us are starting to question whether the vast sums of money that have gone into that program have, in fact corrected anything at all, have in fact done little more than fatten the coffers of corporations that did not really need money, and have in fact not settled the glaring regional disparities in this country.

Yet the federal government, under constant prodding and questioning from this side of the House, has done little except defend itself and this program with great indignation. In effect, they have said, "How dare you question our veracity, our wisdom," even though the program is collapsing around their ears and these vast sums of money are going down the drain. Perhaps we should consider taking much of the money that is going into DREE now and incorporating it into the transfer payments system. Perhaps the provinces could make better use of this money if it were transferred to them so they could undertake industrial development. There are provinces that are quite prepared to set up Crown corporations to do the kind of development work that private industry is either incapable of doing or unwilling to do. Yet those provinces cannot get any funds from DREE. However, DREE will give money to a large American international corporation. I repeat it will not give funds to a province in order to support a development corporation. This is an area where the federal government is creating a fantastic amount of dissatisfaction, both in those provinces that are receiving the grants and in those provinces that, to a large measure, are paying for them.

There has been a failure on the part of the federal government to head off some of the provinces who, understandably because of their rather desperate circumstances, in trying to correct unemployment problems, indulge in give-away programs. We have the picture of one province luring an industry to it by virtually giving that industry the moon. We have a situation in the pulp and paper industry where, as a result of provincial policies, due to the desperate position in which provinces found themselves, provinces went on a most unwise program of encouraging anyone who showed any inclination to establish a pulp and paper mill and so provide employment for their populations. The results have been disastrous. We have built too many mills. Giving money to one mill has forced the shutting down of another mill.

In the province of Manitoba, they are still trying to untangle the snarl that was created by a previous government with respect to a pulp and paper complex. They are trying to figure out how in the world the province got into that kind of messy situation. At the time it was launched, the program met with considerable popular acceptance. When a province is looking for jobs and says it needs to offer some seed money to attract industry, it is understandable that people will accept that fact.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) that unless the federal government establishes some clear method of ensuring that all provinces will tax resource industries according to the way they should tax them, and not play the game of robbing Peter to pay Paul, or of stealing industry from other provinces, we will not get harmony, and we will not get satisfaction from any kind of equalization program.

I would like now to spend a moment or two discussing a problem that is arising in the province of Nova Scotia. This concerns offshore mineral rights. I am pleased to note that the province has discovered some minerals. After starting its existence as a very prosperous part of Canada, and later seeing its standard of living decline as industry shifted and changing patterns brought other provinces into prominence, it now sees the prospect of getting large revenues from offshore oil. A conflict is developing between the province and the federal government. Naturally, the province of Nova Scotia would dearly love to get out of the position where it is receiving equalization payments and into a position where it was contributing to other provinces. The federal government has now taken the stand that it will share with the province in revenues from affshore oil. Perhaps that is the only position that can be taken at this time. But the point arising from that particular situation is that we must clearly establish that all revenues will be shared, that the base for equalization will be broadened.

In this context, the federal government has to consider seriously the proposals advanced by the province of Manitoba, and supported by the province of Saskatchewan, that municipal assessments be included in the taxation base for sharing. If you include resource revenues I believe you also must include the revenues from manufacturing. If you do not do that, there will always be a feeling by some provinces of being mistreated or short-changed in the equalization program. The only way you can include all the revenues from manufacturing is to include the municipal revenues as well. But this does not mean that the entire municipal revenues have to be included, because obviously some of those revenues have to cover the costs of essential services for manufacturing, the costs of housing, and things of that kind. But over and above that, there are revenues that go to pay for educational services and that help underwrite the infrastructure of the social services of a province.

A difficulty arises when those revenues are not included in the base. This difficulty has been pointed out by the province of Manitoba. I understand that the province of Manitoba would like to shift the costs of education from the regressive base of property ownership to the more progressive base of corporate and personal income tax. But if it does that, under the present scheme it would lose out in terms of equalization. Its income tax, or its base for calculating payments from the equalization fund would increase, and therefore the payments to it would decline, and all this because the province wanted to move in a progressive direction. Unless some of this municipal revenue is included in the tax base in such a way that it does not disadvantage those provinces that wish to be progressive, there is bound to be dissatisfaction with the system. It means that every province in Canada, in terms of how progressive its tax system can be, is limited to the policy in the province of Ontario. They can move no faster in terms of this progressiveness than the province of Ontario moves.

Mr. Thomson: Backwards.

Mr. Saltsman: Sometimes it is backwards. The province of Ontario now transfers some of the educational costs to the provincial level. However, it is a long way from removing the burden of education from the municipal level to the provincial level. There are other provinces which would like to move faster than that. There are other provinces which, for good reasons, would like to change the way school costs are borne and they cannot do that under the present agreement.

• (1720)

There is another grievance from the province of Manitoba which ties in with that. Recently the province of Ontario was given the opportunity of reducing or instituting an across-the-board tax cut which is acceptable under the present formula. When Manitoba wanted to reduce its taxes, and reduce them in a selective way so that it would not be across-the-board but directed mostly to those people who needed assistance, their request was turned down. So, you have a system that is encouraging regressive taxation and discouraging anyone who wants to improve the tax system. The federal government has failed to give us a progressive tax system and is saying to the provinces that they are going to throw every roadblock they can in the way of it being done. That has to be changed. It is a legitimate complaint and the federal government should be able to present legislation that would take it into account.

Although I have understood it, I have regretted the fact that the Province of Quebec has opted to take points rather than have its taxes collected as the other provinces have. We can argue that Quebec is a special case. Every province is a special case, but perhaps Quebec is a little more special than the others. I think they have special problems and sensitivities which have to be allayed. In confederation, we have to bend a little bit in order to accommodate the sensitivities of any group. But I deplore, Mr. Speaker, the tendency of other provinces to want to go the same way. It is one thing for Quebec, which at the moment is a "have not" province and receives assistance from the others, to take this position because of its cultural needs, but it is a different thing when the province of Ontario, the rich province of Canada and perhaps the other rich provinces, decide to go the same way.

Ultimately, this will destroy the whole principle of equalization. It is not good enough for the federal government to say any government can take its tax points and get out. That is no good to a province without a great number of tax points. Perhaps the minister is going to remind me later in the debate that there is a guarantee that, to the extent their revenues fall short of the tax points, the federal government will make it up. I would respectfully suggest, considering the record of this government, that this is no guarantee at all, especially when we remember medicare and post-secondary education. The only effective guarantee for the provinces is a continuation of the equalization formula and prevention of any province opting out. Otherwise, no one is going to have any confidence in the future.

The federal government has also indicated that it intends to get out of the cost-sharing programs, that is medicare, hospital insurance and post-secondary education because costs have escalated beyond their calculations. They imply that the provinces have been irresponsible under these cost-sharing programs and so the federal government will limit its participation in the years that remain to an increase at the most of 15 per cent. Mr. Speaker, I think it is immoral, it is unfeeling and it is dishonest, for a government to make this argument.

We in this party supported with the greatest enthusiasm a national program of hospitalization and a national program of medical insurance. We felt that there had to be standards in those areas across the country, and that whatever the cultural or linguistic differences across this country or differences in life style, these elements were so fundamental they had to be available to every Canadian. The government made the right moves in this direction, although reluctantly and some 30 years after Mackenzie King had promised them, but we never thought that it would renege on its promise. It is all right for some of the richer provinces that have set up their infrastructure. In the early years of these programs they had the resources which enabled them to build the facilities necessary for a shared cost program and thus prepare themselves for the future under a medical and hospital service plan. But it is not fair to the poorer parts of Canada and the provinces that are only now starting to develop these programs to the fullest extent.

The federal government has been unfair in another way. It has not provided flexibility and a lot of the fault for over-spending rests on its shoulders. Because of the rigid formula introduced for both these programs it is virtually impossible for a province to find ways to cut costs or to experiment with finding better ways to handle the services. Now, the government accuses the provinces of wild spending, seeming to forget that each province has to put up half the money. This is almost harder for some provinces to acquire than is the portion that comes from the federal government. I think it is imperative that the federal government give an assurance to the provinces that it will continue these programs which are national in scope, on a shared-cost basis.

If there is to be a change, and if the federal government feels that it does not have as much control as it would like, then it can move in a number of directions. One would be to provide more flexibility, so that provinces could use their discretion and another would be for the government to take over the entire cost of the program. Of course, I have some reservations, and I think we all have about shared-cost programs. We know there are difficulties with them, but we do not think these are the difficulties that are being enumerated by the federal government, nor do we think the reasons are those that the federal government is stating. Some of the finest programs in this country are totally operated by the federal government. It may be that it will have to move out of shared-cost programs into programs entirely operated by the provinces or entirely operated by the federal government. If there is to be a move in that direction I suggest, in fairness to all the provinces and particularly the poorer provinces, that the federal government should assume the total cost of medical and hospital programs as it does the old age pension and unemployment insurance.

If these are national priorities, and I think they are, then it should be the responsibility of the federal government to assume them.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? I have been following his argument with some interest and, as I understand it, he is arguing that the federal government should assume the entire cost of certain programs which have been traditionally within the jurisdiction of the provinces according to our constitutional arrangements. Does he envisage the provinces continuing to administer these programs or does he envisage a situation where the federal government would be responsible for raising money and provincial governments for spending? Would he explain to us what he has in mind at this point?

Mr. Saltsman: I certainly think there are some difficulties connected with the position, and I do not underestimate them. I suggest to the hon. member, if I may reply to his question, that if we want to move in this direction then, if experience from the past is any guide, we would find ways of making the constitution fit our needs. We need to establish many programs, and the hon. member knows this as well as I do. No one would quarrel with us if the federal government set them up, even though they did not fall under federal jurisdiction.

Let me point out that, originally, unemployment insurance was not under federal jurisdiction, either, yet we got around that difficulty by agreement. Manpower policies are financed by the federal government and administered by the provinces. There you see a joint operation. If we want to do certain things which appear unconstitutional, I say that the constitution will present no problem. When hon. members do not want something to be done, they bring forward the constitution and conveniently hide behind it. I do not know why they do not stop doing this. When the government finally decides to do something in an area previously considered to be outside its jurisdiction under the constitution, it suddenly discovers how remarkably flexible is our constitution. I say, therefore, that the constitutional argument is not really valid. I am not trying to ignore such arguments, because I admit that there are problems in this area. I merely suggest that when we really decide to do something, the constitution is not allowed to stand in our way. In those circumstances you hear no one saying that the proposed program does not conform with the constitution because there is a comma in one place or a word in the other and that we should not introduce it. Canadians are far too sensible to go along with legal rigidities like that, because they know that there are ways of doing those things which are important for them.

I have dealt with some of the criticisms that have been levied against the present arrangement. I do not suggest that our present equalization formula is not reasonably good. I think, on the whole, we have done fairly well. I noted the minister was quoting from the report of an American committee and boasting how well Canadians are doing in this field. If we compare ourselves with other countries, we shall see that we have done reasonably well. All I am suggesting is that there is no reason why we should not be moving in the particular direction I am pointing to. The minister should not hide behind the sort of pat on the head he has been given by a commission in the United States or use what has been said by them as an excuse for not taking action. After all, some of the amendments which have been incorporated in this bill are really minor in nature. They are a sort of minimum accommodation. One wonders where the great vision of the just society and all those other ideas that permeated the other side of the House almost four years ago disappeared to. These are niggling little amendments we are talking about. They will not solve basic problems; neither will they advance the cause of confederation very far.

I should like to raise another point. Really, it is a grievance that involves not only the western provinces but other provinces as well. Provinces ask why the federal government cannot, under a stabilization program, permit them to borrow directly from the Bank of Canada? They wonder why they cannot ask the federal government to raise resources on their behalf?

An hon. Member: Bennett suggested that.

Mr. Saltsman: It is a sensible suggestion, no matter whether it was made by Premier Bennett or others. Why can the provinces not ask the federal government to do that, Mr. Speaker? That suggestion may be one of the few sensible suggestions the premier has made, and I am prepared to accept sensible suggestions no matter what their source, even from the hon. member who just spoke. When he has one of his own, I wish he would let me know.

An hon. Member: You will wait for a long time.

Mr. Saltsman: Please, do not be too unkind. Mr. Speaker, why cannot this be done? Why must provinces be put in the position of having to go to money markets, at times, perhaps, when those markets are not ready for them? Why must the provinces pay higher rates of interest than the federal government could obtain on their behalf? Surely, that is the least assistance that the federal government should be prepared to offer.

The minister himself said that the measures in this bill will probably never come into effect and will probably never be required. The kind of stabilization I have spoken of the provinces need badly. In its management of the economy the federal government has tended to create unemployment, and provincial governments have wanted to take action in their own provinces to curb that unemployment through the introduction of accelerated building programs for hospitals, schools and so on. They need assistance, and the federal government should provide it. It should not give it directly, in the form of money; we are not asking for that. We are asking for the federal government to use its powers and its prestige in borrowing on behalf of the provinces. Such action would be in line with the suggestions of a former minister of finance who told Canadians to borrow in this country instead of borrowing in the United States, and thereby put less pressure on the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Why would a government not do that?

Mr. Saltsman: Who said that?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman rising to ask a question or to harangue?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): To ask a question, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member knows that he can ask a question only if he is allowed to by the hon. member who has the floor.

[English]

Is the hon. member for Waterloo prepared to accept a question?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased to accept a question from the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member referred to the possibility of provincial governments borrowing money through the federal government I ask, is he aware of the policy of the provincial government of Manitoba with regard to borrowing money? I believe that government has borrowed money in the United States. Does he consider that as foreign investment? When a government goes to the United States to borrow money and brings that money to Canada, does he consider that as foreign investment coming into this country?

Mr. Saltsman: I do not know whether the hon. member for St. Boniface realizes this or not, but he is making the very point I have tried to make in this House. I suggest that the province of Manitoba would like nothing better than being able to borrow its money in Canada, at favourable rates, if the federal government were to give that province access to credit at the Bank of Canada. The hon. member for St. Boniface is quite right in his concern. He knows that the people of this country, and the members of my party particularly, are enormously concerned about our going to the United States to borrow. We are enormously concerned, and we do not think we should borrow there unless it is absolutely a matter of survival. Actually, that is what is happening. The province of Manitoba does not want to borrow money in the United States. It wants to borrow money in Canada, but cannot do so because of bad government policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: I suggest to the hon. member for St. Boniface that his quarrel is not with me and that his question should not be directed to me. It should be directed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Benjamin: Pay attention, Joe.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude by indicating that some of the frictions which have come about in this country—I hope the hon. member for St. Boniface is not rising to ask another question.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I feel my question was not answered. I asked whether provincial government borrowings in the United States constituted foreign investment.

An hon. Member: You couldn't understand that, anyway.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Could the hon. member say yes or no, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. An hon. member may answer a question in any way he wishes, and the hon. member who asked the question cannot quarrel about the answer he is given unless he is ready to seek the floor himself and make a speech.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for St. Boniface does not understand what I have tried to explain. I know he experiences some difficulty with explanations. I shall be pleased to give him a private lesson in economics some other time.

Mr. Benjamin: Charge him for it.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise some other matters. I wish to talk about a prior condition, so to speak. This is an important point, although it is not included in any bill. Before any kind of equalization arrangement can properly be made, there must be full employment. A prior condition to such arrangement is a policy of full employment. In other words, the government must commit itself to full employment. If one looks at the history of frictions in sharing agreements one will find that frictions invariably occur when Canada is suffering from heavy unemployment. When there is full employment in this country there is not the same reluctance to share. It is much easier for provinces to be generous when everyone is doing well, and particularly when the richer provinces are doing well. When they are not doing well, when conditions are rough for them and they do not obtain the revenue they require for their own purposes, they begin looking for areas to criticize, areas in which they can reduce their commitments.

• (1740)

When speaking at a federal provincial conference on November 15, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, and I hope I will be excused for paraphrasing, that there is a vast sum of money being transferred, an amount which represented 6.7 per cent of the total budget of the federal government. In his view, this is a very large sum of money. What the Prime Minister did not say, and perhaps should have said, is that as a result of the policies of his government which have created unemployment in this country, the losses to all governments in terms of revenue has been over $1 billion annually, more than the entire cost of the equalization program.

If we had a policy of near full employment and had brought our level of unemployment down to 3 per cent, which was recommended as a minimum by the Economic Council of Canada, the federal government could have doubled all the equalization payments across Canada. This is something that has to be grasped by this government when making its deliberate calculations to throw people out of work. When there is unemployment, all kinds of things start going wrong. People who are normally amenable to suggestions suddenly start saying that charity begins at home. People who might be inclined to share begin to say that their needs are also great. A psychology is created in the country which is destructive of the better instincts of the people.

I wish to emphasize another aspect which is not yet in the bill, but should be an intregal part of any equalization policy. Freight rates across Canada must be equalized if this country is to survive. There must be maximum amounts allowed on the movement of any goods, not just wheat or grain. Something is being done in those fields because we recognize the merit and justice of doing it. All goods should move at equalized rates across the country. Perhaps if we did that, we would remove some of the great anomalies that exist between one part of the country and another. Perhaps it would cause a great many less problems than DREE and other programs in which we are involved. This would enable people in any part of to Canada effectively compete in the central markets of Canada and the international markets of the world. This is all they are asking. They are asking that the disadvantages be removed, not that they receive subsidies, bonuses or industrial grants. They want to start off reasonably equal. I can think of some plants in the Maritimes that have closed for only one reason. The cost of shipping their goods to the central market was too high. Had there been an equalization program of freight rates, a great deal more could have been accomplished.

I see that Your Honour is going to rise. At the time Your Honour rises to announce that my time has drawn to a close, possibly you could ask if the House will consent to my continuing. I will not be very long.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give consent to the hon. member completing his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you Mr. Speaker. I also thank members opposite for according me this courtesy.

The matter of equalization of freight rates is of paramount importance. If freight rates were to be similar in terms of distance, so that distance would not be a disadvantage, many areas of Canada that were once prosperous would not be declining today. We forget that the maritimes was once a prosperous part of this country. It was only when the central market in Ontario developed, as well as the market between Ontario and the northern United States, that the Maritimes began to suffer a decline. If freight rates equalized distance, we could solve a great number of our problems.

We should recall that this country was built in defiance of geography. The lines of trade always wanted to run north and south. In order to build a nation, we insisted that they go east and west. We never followed the logic of that argument by saying since the country was made in that particular way that transportation, rail and air in particular, should be operated as a public utility, paid for out of the taxes rather than the phoney kind of corporations now in operation. I go further. Not only should freight rates be equalized for all industrial products, but this equalization principle should be extended to passenger service as well. It should be possible for people who live on one shore of Canada to travel across this beautiful land to the other shore without having to pay the present enormous transportation costs. If we are serious about tying this nation closely together, and about getting people from the east and west as well as the English and French speaking Canadians to know each other better, we must have a more intelligent transportation policy than that which now prevails.

It is ridiculous when a national airline such as Air Canada follows the examples of other airlines and makes it less expensive for Canadians to travel an equivalent distance to Europe than to travel in their own country. The opposite should be true. Perhaps we should extend this to tourists from outside Canada. We should be prepared to tell them that if they visit Canada their travel will be made easier in order to give them an opportunity to see this great land of ours. This is very important. It has been part of the program of my party for a long time, and I think it has also been the position of the western provinces.

Some of the eastern provinces have argued in favour of preferential rates. I do not like that. It is not preferential. We must remember that parts of Canada which are poor today may be rich tomorrow, just as parts of Canada that were rich yesterday are poor today. In fact, in nation building there is no assurance that the rich will always be rich and the poor will always be poor. Those provinces which today are handing out money through equalization payments may at some time in the future be the recipients of such payments. The suggestions which we make are not charitable suggestions.

I want to repeat my earlier argument that we must remove the subsidies to private industry through programs such as DREE, which do very little good, and tackle the problem in another way. We have to set up some kind of national standard in order to avoid the provinces being pushed into the position of having to barter off their livelihood one against the other out of desperation. Part of that arises from the inadequacy of the equalization formula, but part of it arises from the desperation of the situation in which they find themselves.

We have to put some teeth into the equalization formula so that if a province with natural resources does not take the tax from those resources to which it is entitled, it should be penalized. This may be a rather harsh position to take, but unless we take this position we are going to encounter a great deal of opposition from those provinces which are fairly taxing their resources. Their argument will continue to be against those provinces which are not matching their taxing position.

The federal government must change its present laws and tax all industries alike. Resource industries must be in the same kind of tax position as the manufacturing industries, otherwise there will be the same kind of resentment that now exists in the manufacturing provinces. The manufacturing industry feels that it is being treated unfairly. It feels it is paying a much larger share of taxes than are other primary industries, and it obviously is.

If we do some of these things, if we make a commitment to total equalization, we could move the country forward. Obviously, for some provinces equality of opportunity is not enough; it means nothing except the perpetuation of poverty. We must commit ourselves to equality of education. Just as is the case with respect to individuals in one family, we must ensure that one province is treated equally as compared with another and that the rich support those who are not so rich. Only then can we move toward a national policy. An attempt should be made to lessen the emphasis placed on mineral extraction and lay greater emphasis on employment-producing jobs in the manufacturing industry. To provinces which are heavily dependent on resource industries we could offer a new transportation policy which would enable them to get more industry than before. To the extent that revenues of a province declined as a result in change in national policy, lost revenues would be made up by revenues from provinces whose position had improved.

The minister is a new minister. He is a young man trying to get ahead. He is trying to make prime minister. I hope he succeeds. He is somewhat more polite than the present one. He might just break the jinx. This is the new minister's opportunity to make a hero of himself and find some bold and imaginative approach to problems which have been largely ignored by his predecessors. We, on this side, wish him well and are offering him able advice as to what he should do, and we hope he accepts it.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, since the former speaker has left me only four minutes, might I declare that it is six o'clock so that I may continue my remarks tomorrow?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree that it is six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m.

At 5.56 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX A

PETITION BY OLD CROW INDIANS RESPECTING CERTAIN LANDS

To The Honourable The Commons of Canada

In Parliament Assembled:

The Petition of the undersigned members of the aboriginal people of the Old Crow Indians, in that area known to your honourable House as the Yukon Territory, who now avail ourselves of our ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy.

SHEWETH:

That for so long that the mind of man runneth not to the contrary and for so long as the waters of the Old Crow and Porcupine Rivers have flowed, and flowing mingled, for so long have the people of the Old Crow occupied those lands that lie south of the British Mountains, west of the Richardson Mountains and north of the Ogilvy Mountains;

That these lands are not included in the documents of title under which Canada defines its boundaries either through the purchase of the territorial rights of the Hudson's Bay Company in Rupert's Land, as defined in the Rupert's Land Act, 1868, of the statutes of the United Kingdom, or through treaty purchase from the people of the Old Crow, or in any other wise or at all;

That Canada has trespassed and continues to trespass without lawful title or colour of right upon these lands of the people of the Old Crow, where the rivers flow westward to the Pacific Ocean, and, by such trespasses, asserts a legal title to these lands;

That your Petitioners, adopting for their own and incorporating by reference herein so much of the arguments of their brothers, the Nishga Indians of British Columbia, submitted in a cause now pending in the Supreme Court of Canada, as are applicable and pertinent to the subject matter of this Petition, stipulate the distinction that the trespasses complained of in that cause are committed by a province of Canada while the trespasses complained of in this Petition are committed by Canada and are therefore proper to be presented to and considered by your honourable House;

That your Petitioners, by their Petition, do not submit themselves nor any other of the people of the Old Crow to the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, or of any institution by that Parliament created, nor do your Petitioners, by their Petition, admit the authority of the Parliament of Canada, or of any institution by that Parliament created, to determine that any rights of the people of the Old Crow are either less or more;

That this Petition is presented to your honourable House to the end that your honourable House, upon consideration thereof, will resolve to respect the territorial integrity of the people of the Old Crow as by reference to our Prayer hereafter will more fully appear: so that thereby will your Petitioners be upheld in their belief that your honourable House, guided neither by the trivial considerations of commercial profit or commercial loss, will govern itself by the law of good faith which, as between peoples, must be the philosophy of their politics and the religion of their governments;

Wherefore your Petitioners PRAY that your honourable House will prevail upon Her Most Gracious Majesty's Canadian Government to cease and desist from the trespasses hereinbefore recited and to acknowledge and respect the aboriginal rights of the people of the Old Crow to their ancient tribal territories, and that your honourable House will provide such further and other relief in the premises as to your honourable House seems just and meet;

And your Petitioners now prayeth and will ever pray,

And your Petitioners have, and each of them hath, signed this 21 day of February, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Nine Hundred and Seventy-Two.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

AIRPORTS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SITE FOR SECOND TORONTO INTERNATIONAL FACILITY—STATEMENT ON ONTARIO AIR SERVICES

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the same statement as the one I am about to read to hon. members is being made at this hour by the Honourable the Treasurer of the province of Ontario in the legislature at Queen's Park.

The government of Canada and the government of Ontario have agreed that a new major airport will be located in Pickering Township just to the northeast of Toronto. The site is roughly between a line just north of Highway No. 7 in the south, north to the Uxbridge-Pickering Township boundary and between the Little Rouge Creek on the west and East Duffin Creek on the east. As a co-operative venture, lands will be acquired by the federal government for the airport site and by the provincial government for the immediate surroundings.

The choice of a site northeast of Toronto has come after an exhaustive federal-provincial evaluation since 1968 of 59 potential airport sites in the area within a 50-mile radius of Metropolitan Toronto.

It has now been decided that for a number of compelling reasons, the Pickering Township site is more suitable than any of the other sites studied. In the first place, it is an excellent site, consistent with safety and other aeronautical considerations.

Second, it is also the closest site to Toronto of all the proposed sites and, therefore, provides the easiest accessibility.

Third, because it is reasonably close to Lake Ontario and to a number of major transportation arteries leading out of Toronto, investment in water, sewage and transportation access facilities will be less than at other sites.

Fourth, even though it is close to Toronto, population in the immediate vicinity of the new airport is small. No major communities will be seriously affected by expropriation or very high noise levels and the environmental impact is minimized.

Finally, and in many respects most important, the location of the airport east of Toronto is the result of joint federal-provincial effort to provide a major stimulus to development east of Metropolitan Toronto, as called for in the Toronto-centered region plan.

The southern part of the airport site lies along the route of a series of proposed urban communities to the east of Toronto, which will be separated from existing lakeshore urban centres by a series of multi-purpose transportation, service and recreation corridors. The government of Ontario has been redesigning the shape and location of some of these proposed communities in order to take account of the airport location and to ensure that areas which could be affected by uncomfortable noise levels are not slated for residential development. Transportation and service access facilities are also being designed so that the airport will be on a rapid-transit line linking the new communities east of Toronto to Metropolitan Toronto and Malton. The proposed parkway belt and service corridors are also being designed to serve as a separator between the airport and the airport-related community and the existing urban centres along the lakeshore.

The airport site itself is in the neighbourhood of 18,000 acres. The initial role of the airport will be to provide a variety of services, including international, scheduled and charter operations, thus complementing on a rational basis services at Malton and relieving congestion at Malton.

In addition to providing a new national major airport site, it will also be an integral part of an air system for the Toronto region, and will ensure the provision of efficient and adequate air services, minimizing the problems of noise and air pollution. The land acquisition will begin immediately and the opening date for the first airport activities is planned for 1978-79. Flexibility in the scale and time of expansion is a designed feature of the new airport system.

The governments have agreed that serious consideration will be given to the utilization of the existing Toronto Island airport for short take-off and landing—STOL—aircraft as this technology develops.

The federal government is today filing notice of intention to acquire, in accordance with its new Expropriation Act, all the land required for the airport site itself.

The provincial government is introducing legislation today related to the acquisition of land in the vicinity of the airport which will be crucial to the orderly provision of service and transportation access to the airport and the development of the planned community associated with the airport.

The provincial government will ensure by a number of actions that land use in the airport vicinity is compatible with airport operations and with the regional planning concept. Land exposed to aircraft noise and areas being substantially influenced by urban growth pressures generated by the airport will be controlled by the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Second Toronto Airport

Agreement has been reached in principle between the two governments on the sharing of many of the expenditures associated with the airport development. A portion of the land acquisition by the province will be carried out through funding arrangements under a variety of joint endeavours.

Generally speaking, it has been agreed that the federal government will be responsible for on-site costs of airport projects, as well as relocation costs resulting from the displacement of services. The provincial government will assume responsibility for the provision of basic services such as water and sewage to the boundaries of the airport. Federal assistance may be provided to a certain extent through existing programs. The two governments have agreed to study the implications of mass transit and other transportation facilities related to airport development, with a view to working out joint financing arrangements. This is, in fact, a continuation of work now going on in the Toronto area.

To study this and other related co-operative aspects of implementation, the federal government and the government of Ontario have agreed to establish a federal-provincial committee to make recommendations to their respective governments.

The implementation of the airport project will require close collaboration among all three levels of government. Obviously, the federal government will have basic responsibility for the development on the airport site itself. The province has the prime responsibility, in co-operation with the area municipalities, for the implementation of development off the airport site. The municipalities will be informed immediately of the implications for them and discussions will begin on the establishment of machinery to ensure that they are effectively involved in the implementation process.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the end of the joint statement by the federal government and the government of Ontario. I should like now to add, on behalf of the federal government, Mr. Speaker, that on various occasions I have stated publicly that for large developing areas such as Toronto and southwestern Ontario the construction of one new airport is not in my view the sole solution for the provision of adequate aviation systems for the public at large. For areas such as these, I have stated that rather than the development of one airport we have to be more concerned with the development of an aviation system. In this context, the government plans to take immediate steps to upgrade existing facilities in southwestern Ontario and to continue studies to determine the long-term requirements of the area as a whole.

The initial step in developing an aviation system for Toronto and southwestern Ontario will be the extensive improvement of facilities at Hamilton, London and Windsor airports. Amongst other considerations, the purpose will be to provide better domestic services directly from these centres and the capacity to originate and receive long-haul charter and international flights. It is planned that these airports will be an integral part of the over-all system which includes the present Toronto international airport at Malton and the new international airport which is to be built, as I just said, 30 miles to the northeast of downtown Toronto.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

The underlying purpose in terms of the travelling public is that these three centres form the hub for a series of growth centres which the federal government feels are entitled to improved domestic services as well as longer haul charter and scheduled international services. This will tend to relieve existing pressures at Malton.

There will, of course, be a continuing need to provide better feeder service from a variety of centres in Ontario to the two major airports in the Toronto region, and I have asked Air Canada to consult with the government of Ontario and other interested parties with a view to initiating services to this end. We will also, in conjunction with Air Canada, take into account the latest technologies including STOL which has important significance for the Canadian aerospace industry.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I will ask Air Canada to look into the initiation of improved services to and from Toronto to northern Ontario centres including Sudbury and Timmins. That is the end of the statement. I now wish to table an exchange of correspondence with the Hon. Mr. McKeogh which confirms the statement I have just read and contains an annex with more details concerning the extent and degree of federal-provincial co-operation.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I first want to thank the minister for providing copies of the announcement he has just made concerning the location of the new auxiliary airport in the Pickering township area.

We have waited for this announcement for some time. As a matter of fact, many Canadians have been held in limbo as to decisions they should make one way or another arising out of the location of this new airport. The minister promised a decision on this site as far back as November, 1969. In April, 1970 he said the decision would be made by the fall. At that time he did not say which fall. In any event, he is making the announcement in the spring of 1972. We appreciate receiving it at last. Maybe we appreciate it a little more because we waited so long for it.

Up until yesterday morning this was one of the best kept secrets in many a day. Maybe the minister could instruct some of his colleagues in the cabinet on how to keep secrets.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hales: We would not have quite so many leaks. Until the article appeared yesterday in the Globe and Mail the new site had been a well kept secret. I congratulate the minister and his staff on doing just that.

We do not propose to agree or disagree with the location. No matter where an airport site is chosen, there will be those in favour and those against. I agree that it is a difficult decision. However, the official opposition feels that the government has not had a long-term aviation plan for Canada. The government recently agreed to spend approximately $400 million on the Ste. Scholastique airport outside of Montreal and now it is going to spend $400 million on another airport site near Toronto. If the government had taken a long-term view of the whole aviation program, it might have considered it would be much better to establish one airport in the Kingston area where good subsoil exists and develop a railway service along the lines of what Japan has with its torpedo train that operates at 135 miles an hour, from Kingston to Montreal and Toronto. People could then land at one central airport and be in either Montreal or Toronto in one hour or less. This type of long-term planning could have saved the Canadian taxpayers a great deal of money and also have provided the type of service they expect.

The area that will apparently be expropriated is approximately 18,000 acres. I do not think this is nearly enough. If these are the facts, this is most important because future requirements and the protection of land owners and taking care of speculators have been overlooked. We will wait and study this matter further. I hope that arrangements have been made to protect a greater area than 18,000 acres.

There are many other things I should like to say at this time but we will reserve further observations until we have had a better chance to study what the minister has said. I am prepared to forgo some of my time in favour of the hon. member for Trinity, who is an independent member, if it will not offend precedent. He lives in Toronto and I am sure he is very interested in this matter and might wish to make some observations.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join the Conservative member who has just preceded me in welcoming the minister's statement. We have been looking forward to this statement for some time. I think the five reasons given in the communiqué which was issued jointly by the minister and his counterpart in the Ontario government are very cogent.

I should like to stress in particular the importance and relevance of two points which were made in justifying the location of the new airport north of Pickering. The first is that it will be an important shot in the arm economically for the whole region east of Metropolitan Toronto. It is a region which from the point of view of both federal and provincial policies has been somewhat overlooked in terms of development. It is my hope and belief, and presumably it is the government's also, that location of the airport there will assist in bringing about the kind of economic development that is necessary.

Second, there is the fact that relatively few people live in this region northeast of Metro Toronto. Airports, as we are increasingly coming to realize in the developing industrial world, are by no means an unmixed blessing. I was very pleased, from a human point of view, to learn that the airport is not to be located in an area in which population is densely concentrated.

Having said this, I should like to raise three questions in connection with the minister's statement. The first is based on the fact that the airport is to be designated as an international airport. This has important consequences for future air travel in Canada as it affects both passenger and cargo service. Does this mean, as I hope it does, that in future international airlines will have landing rights not only at Montreal, for example, but in the Toronto region? The need for this has been overlooked in the past. A change is overdue. I do not mean just the Toronto region but, hopefully, the Winnipeg area as it develops. In terms of providing international service, service should be the important factor and international carriers should have the right to land not only at Montreal but at points west. It would seem to me from the minister's announcement that this is what is intended. I hope this intention is carried out.

The same point could be made in relation to air cargo traffic. Some tough-minded economic decisions obviously have to be made here, too, in terms of giving priority to one area as opposed to another. Once again I think, frankly, the policy should be one of giving the customer the right to decide to which airport his cargo should go. In this area, government regulation on the basis of the information we have now is a bad thing; it is better that a laissez-faire policy, if you like, in terms of air cargo should prevail.

The next point I should like to make was alluded to by the previous speaker. I refer to the important question of land speculation. I noted that in last year's estimates the minister's department, for example, had an intended expenditure of $24 million for the purchase of land. The estimates for 1972-73 include an estimate of $62 million, which is a rather substantial increase in the amount allocated to the purchase of land.

Although I do not wish to imply there is anything untoward about this—the minister knows, of course, that no one makes political speeches in the House—I should like to ask whether the change in the allocated amount is to meet the cost of the same land. The minister announced today that the intention was to purchase 18,000 acres, and I am interested in whether the change in the estimate from $24 million to $62 million covers the same land. If it does, then there has been rather an inflated increase in the price of that land. I think this is a serious issue and we should learn soon exactly what acreage was involved for which the two estimates were made.

Related to this, Mr. Speaker, hon. members read with interest, I am sure, the cabinet leak that appeared in yesterday's Globe and Mail concerning the location of the airport. This leak turned out to be what one might say was a reasonably accurate estimate of where the new airport would be constructed. This dovetails with the land speculation question. I hope it is the case that this information was not known to people who might have had a vested economic interest in this land many days preceding the minister's announcement today. A cabinet leak of this sort is of very real importance to the taxpayers of this country. For example, if the location was known a number of weeks ago it might well be the case that some people have been put in the position to make a rather substantial profit on the land that is going to be sold to the government.

May I make one last observation. It seems in this instance that we have had a good example of federal-provincial co-operation in reaching a common objective. I should like to hope that this is the beginning, from the point of view of the minister, of the development of a national transportation policy in which the federal government, together with all of the provinces, can sketch the outline of an integrated transportation policy which would include rail, air and road travel, so that in future we can have a healthy meshing of these different kinds of services.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by congratulating the minister on his decision; I think it was a wise one.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement announcing a tripartite agreement will promote, we hope, the development and progress of that area of the country. We hope that activities at that airport will not give rise to any conflict nor lessen the importance of the Sainte-Scholastique international airport.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST OF INDUSTRIAL INCENTIVES ADVISORY BOARD MEMBERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask for unanimous consent to move a motion under Standing Order 43. My motion arises from the fact that four out of five non-civil servant members of the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board are prominent members of the business community, and two of them are executive officers of a corporation that has received five grants totalling $6.9 million. This obviously poses a very serious potential conflict of interest. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the matter of potential conflict of interest for members of the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board be referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development for study and report thereon.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has proposed a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 which would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The hon. member's proposed motion cannot be put.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table in both official languages a copy of the task group force report on plans for federal maximum security institutions.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING FALSE FIRE ALARMS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Criminal Code (false alarm of fire—penalty).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which I tabled on September 17, 1971 and which, through the kind co-operation of the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has now been incorporated in Bill C-2 tabled on February 21, 1972.

I would therefore ask for leave of the House to withdraw the bill, since the proposed amendment will be discussed during consideration of Bill C-2.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING MINIMUM RESIDENCE REQUIREMENT

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-165 to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act (minimum residence requirement).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that I tabled in the House on June 25, 1970 and that I should like to introduce again.

This bill is designed to reduce from five to three years the minimum requirement for residence in Canada as regards applicants for citizenship certificates.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House allow the hon. member to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ATTEMPTED SUICIDE

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Criminal Code (attempted suicide).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that I tabled on December 15, 1969 in order to remove attempted suicide from the Criminal Code.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) who has kindly included this amendment in Bill C-2 which contains amendments to the Criminal Code and is presently on the order paper. I therefore beg leave of the House to withdraw the said bill.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INFORMATION CANADA

ALLEGED INEFFICIENT OPERATION—SUGGESTED DISBANDING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the information from Information Canada that it is in total disarray and is without direction from the minister responsible, can the Prime Minister tell the House what specific action the government proposes to take?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition is referring to an item in this morning's paper—

An hon. Member: Leaked?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, leaked. If the Leader of the Opposition is referring to an item in this morning's paper, I understand it is an internal memorandum prepared by officials for officials. It was not known by the minister or by the government. I can only say that if officials are engaged in this kind of self-criticism it is perhaps a good thing, better than having them circulate laudatory memoranda on the good work they are doing.

Mr. Baldwin: There is not much room for that, no opportunity.

Mr. Fairweather: The government does that.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the information in the memorandum to which the Prime Minister has referred and the escalating costs of Information Canada as shown in the estimates tabled the other day, would the Prime Minister not stop this waste of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money and disband Information Canada as it is now constituted?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I believe that at the outset the opposition parties received Information Canada as a great menace to liberty of information. They saw in it a potential propaganda machine for the government. I do not think they should be distressed now if the machine is not grinding out much propaganda.

Mr. Orlikow: But it is costing $10 million.

Mr. Trudeau: The process is not working as efficiently as we would like, and the memorandum bears this out. I do not think this government should refuse the challenge to set up efficient and well-operating information services. Practically every modern government in the world has them. I think that perhaps the people in this outfit were somewhat frightened by the fears raised by the opposition that Information Canada would grind out too much propaganda, and they perhaps have not been audacious enough in their approach to these matters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: First of all, I should like to apologize if I have in any way terrorized the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the wide publicity that this leak has received, he can assure us that Information Canada will be in charge of all future governmental leaks?

ALLEGED INEFFICIENT OPERATION—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE INQUIRY OR STATEMENT

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour who reports to the House for Information Canada. Having in mind the sorry state of affairs in Information Canada as revealed in the reported memorandum by its deputy director from which it would seem that futility and extravagance are about equal, will the minister either welcome an inquiry into the matter through an appropriate committee of the House or make an early statement on motions so that the country will know whether it is the government's intention either to straighten up or wind up Information Canada?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): There will be an opportunity in the appropriate standing committee to examine the programs and expenditures of Information Canada. I should also like to comment upon and answer the first part of the question which suggested extravagance. The report in the Globe and Mail is an inaccurate report. It skips one year in its comparison. It skips from actual spending in the first year of the new agency to budgeted spending for the coming year. Actually, the increase is $1.2 million next year over this year, and that is more than accounted for by the increase in postage which Information Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. O'Connell: For the first time and because of a change in accounting rules the agency will be paying postage amounting to $1¼ million. We are making savings in the total picture. Another $1¼ million is for four new information centres at Halifax, Toronto, Vancouver and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock on a further supplementary question and then go to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Mather: I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the fact that government information expenditures, including Information Canada, are now running at the rate of $1 million a week in this election year, will the minister undertake to review this situation with a view to saving public money, if not government credibility?

• (1440)

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, we are starting at home. We are making savings in Information Canada, and we will be encouraging all departments to do that. But I want to point out that each department is autonomous in its own right in its information programming. I would invite the hon. member to look at what proportion government information expenditures represent of government expenditures and I think he will find that it is perhaps a quarter of one per cent of the total. We have a responsibility, which I am sure he would support, to inform Canadians about government programs and of their own rights to access to such programs.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, does the minister consider that the Canadian people will get their money's worth from the $10½ million budgeted for next year when this agency requires three weeks longer to make information available than was the case formerly when information was supplied by the individual departments.

Mr. O'Connell: Canadians still receive information from individual departments.

Mr. Hees: Three weeks late.

Mr. O'Connell: We have been taking a very close look at this and re-evaluating the time lag in supplying books and so forth. It is now down to about seven days. We are going to improve that. There is a cataloguing going on in the book storage centre over in Hull, and I think the information given out will certainly match the information given by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Hees: As a further supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. We will have to move to another subject. I am wondering, first, whether the hon. member for Bellechasse has a supplementary.

[Translation]

Is the hon. member for Bellechasse rising on a supplementary?

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall give the floor to the hon. member in a moment.

[English]

For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Fundy-Royal on a supplementary.

ALLEGED INEFFICIENT OPERATION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DEPUTY DIRECTOR'S MEMORANDUM

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, if the memorandum is out of date and inaccurate, will the minister table it so that we can share his propaganda about the propaganda of Information Canada?

[Mr. Mather.]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the memorandum was an internal working document designed to stimulate discussion in the management group of Information Canada. I think the hon. gentleman would agree that it would be improper to table such an internal working document.

ALLEGED INEFFICIENT OPERATION—KNOWLEGE BY GOVERNMENT OF DEPUTY DIRECTOR'S MEMORANDUM PRIOR TO BUDGET APPROVAL

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour responsible for Information Canada. Was the minister aware of the memo by the Deputy Director General of Information Canada, dated January 24, prior to the government's final approval of the almost 50 per cent increase in the budget of Information Canada?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): The answer to the first question is that I was aware of the memo this morning. With respect to the second part of the question, the increase is 11 per cent and not 60 per cent as reported in the Globe and Mail. It may vary depending on what lapsing funds we have this year; and we are doing a very thorough re-evaluation seeking economies within Information Canada.

Mr. Hees: As a further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of hon. members seeking to ask supplementaries but we have not completed the first round of the questioning. The Chair will return to them later. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister arising out of a speech made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce before the Mid-America World Trade Conference in Chicago. According to the release from the minister's office the minister is quoted as saying:

> Canada will remain one of the most open and secure locations for investment by non-residents.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the statement that Canada will remain one of the most open locations for investment by non-residents is government policy, and whether this is the policy which has been adopted by the government with respect to foreign ownership?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, we never gave any indication that our policy would result in a prohibition of foreign investment in Canada in general or in any of the provinces in particular.

So there is no contradiction with what the minister says is the kind of policy we are looking at.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the screening mechanism recommended by the Minister of National Revenue, and the fact that U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Connally, yesterday was again upbraiding Canada for its position on trade matters, may I ask the Prime Minister if this modification of the government's program with respect to foreign ownership is related to the dispute which is now going on with the United States respecting trade matters?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to see how the hon. member can talk about the modification of a program of which he knows nothing.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Has he any intention to amend his statement carried on national television news last night in view of the remarks of Secretary Connally immediately before him?

Mr. Trudeau: The one about the opposition shaking in their boots every time America talks, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize him on a point of order, but again I bring to the attention of hon. members that we have not yet completed the first round of questioning and the hon. member for Bellechasse is still waiting to ask the first question on behalf of his group. The hon. member is seeking the floor on a point or order?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: I was under the impression that I had the floor, Mr. Speaker. My point of order arises from a ruling you have made on several earlier occasions which does not allow the Prime Minister to ask questions of opposition backbenchers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ACCEPTANCE OF PROJECTS SUBMITTED BEFORE JANUARY 31, 1972

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Further to his reply of February 28 to the question put by my colleague the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) to the effect that there were still $4 million for distribution, but that this does not mean that applications exceed funds available, I should like to ask him whether projects submitted before January 31, 1972 will be accepted promptly and whether promoters will be informed in the near future.

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I understand the Minister of Labour is prepared to answer this question, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, all of the projects that are going to be approved have now been identified. The department is in the final stages of notifying the applicants and writing contracts with them. This will take a little while, but the identification process has been completed.

[Translation]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—CRITERIA RESPECTING DATE OF PRESENTATION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

In view of the confusion prevailing as to certain points concerning the date for submission of projects, may I ask whether the regulations stipulate that the project must reach the regional office of a province by January 31 or whether the approval date, in the case of Quebec for instance, can be January 31 even though the project reaches the regional office on February 1 or 2?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the rule is quite clear that the project should have arrived on the desks of the Department of Manpower by January 31 in order to be fair to all applicants across Canada. If the hon. gentleman has any specific case that merits any special consideration I would listen to him, but I would not want to give him too much encouragement at this time.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR COMPLETION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there have been a number of undue delays in the processing and final approval of projects, and I might say desirable projects, under the LIP program, which in turn has caused delays in the commencement and the final completion of projects, making it difficult to meet the May 31 deadline, is the government giving any consideration to extending the deadline in such extenuating circumstances in order that communities may take advantage of the program?

• (1450)

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, no particular consideration is being given to that question. However, I want to assure the hon. member that the program is under constant review and if any special circumstances are discovered with respect to special situations they will be looked at, but we have no intention of changing the basic regulations as they have been established for everyone.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are four or five members seeking supplementaries but we will have to move on to the next subject in a moment. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Peace River on a supplementary and then go to the next subject.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR SPECIFIC INQUIRY INTO CERTAIN PROJECTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): In view of the fact that the supplementary estimates for this program were pushed through last session and as there is some question about the validity of some of these programs, including the one in Toronto which apparently is for an answering service for an alleged homosexual society, will the minister co-operate in having a specific inquiry made into some of these projects rather than their just being considered in the normal way on estimates?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman has any specific reference to any project, we want to hear about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I will give you the telephone number—or ask Information Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What are you worried about, Jed?

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I wish to encourage the hon. member to describe the projects more accurately than he has. In answer to the other question, every project will be monitored at least once. There will be a financial audit and progress reports are required from the sponsors of every project. The whole approvals administration is now being converted in phase two into a monitoring operation, so we do intend to be in close contact with these projects to see that they stay on track in accordance with the contracts.

THE MINISTRY

LETTER SENT UNDER SIGNATURE OF MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION SEEKING FUNDS FOR PARTY—REQUEST FOR LIST OF RECIPIENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and concerns a billet-doux that he, as bagman for the Liberal party, sent out in which it is stated: "funds must be available so that work of the party, in the next few months, may be adequately financed". I ask this question in view of the admonition of the Prime Minister last night that we should "cultivate with a sure hand and a delicately tuned sense of understanding".

Mr. Trudeau: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In that spirit may I ask the minister whether he, being a minister of the Crown with hundreds of millions of dollars to dispose of, sending out such letters and being unable to bifurcate himself into a minister and bagman at the same time, would table the list of recipients of this letter so that we may decide what the purpose of it was and whether it is contrary to the principles of government that have always been recognized?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I state solemnly in this House, that I have never collected a cent for the Liberal party; as leader for Quebec, and responsible for Quebec, I merely sent a letter of invitation to a fund-raising cocktail. I believe the right hon. member or some members of his party may even have received an invitation because they are sent systematically by the Federation. All I did was send a letter and no one—this I state solemnly—knows the names of the companies that ask for subsidies from the department; never are those companies approached for funds, unless it is later on, and then I know not by whom.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the question is, did the minister send such a letter because I saw the letter signed by his own hand.

Some hon. Members: He said so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What business has this minister, heading a responsible department, to bring about at this time a system of benevolence that passed out during the days of the Stuarts? I ask the minister if he will table the list of those to whom the letter was sent so we can determine what he had in mind?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the question should be directed to the Quebec wing of the Liberal Federation of Canada; it is that body which sent the letter and I am the one who signed it. It is merely a letter of invitation—

An hon. Member: Attention, be careful.

Some hon. Members: Be cautious with your answer.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): —that is to say—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Resign, resign.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): —that is to say that there is in the Liberal party a democratic spirit which does not exist in the Progressive Conservative party.

[English]

Mr. Hees: You signed it. It is your letter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I usually sign the letters. Ask the federation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whom did you send them to?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You received an invitation and you declined.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Brant.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DEATH OF SANDY LAKE WOMAN FROM MALNUTRITION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON HEALTH SERVICES IN NORTHERN ONTARIO OR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware of the tragic circumstances surrounding the death from malnutrition last December of a Cree woman at the Sandy Lake Reserve and, specifically, has he received the report on the recommendations made last Friday by the coroner's jury?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blackburn: In view of the fact that some 1,500 treaty Indians at the Sandy Lake Reserve are provided with utterly inadequate health services, for instance, the nearest medical doctor is 300 miles away, would the minister contemplate making a statement at his earliest opportunity on the state of health services provided for Indians in northern Ontario, or would he agree to initiate a public inquiry into this deplorable situation?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member for Brant that in this general area in the course of the next month we are opening three new nursing stations at a cost of approximately $200,000 each. In the intervening period we are taking steps to improve Indian health services even further. I would indicate also that over the course of the last three years the resources, financial and personnel, that have gone into Indian health services—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East.

ALLEGED GRANT TO A. BÉLANGER LTÉE.—REQUEST THAT MINISTER CORRECT ANSWER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, especially since he seems to be in the mood for making solemn declarations. In his departmental capacity will the minister now correct the record or the totally false and misleading answer he gave to the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton on Monday last regarding a grant paid to the firm of A. Bélanger Ltée., which will result in the closing of a branch plant operation in Carleton Place, Ontario?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I was asked on Monday whether the company Bélanger-Tappan Ltée had received a grant from my department, or whether we had an application for a grant from that company pending. I gave a firm negative reply in both cases and, in truth, there has been no such thing. That company has not been given a grant, and there is no application pending in my department. What happened was that about a year ago that company made an application for a grant, which we accepted. The company accepted our offer but we then withdrew it by a letter dated February 11, 1972. We wrote to the company to tell them that their file had been closed and that they would not receive a grant.

The document referred to by the hon. member for St. John's East is not the one that was tabled in the House, but a kind of summary of government activities, and the hon. member will see in the document which will be tabled next month that such grant was never made. Therefore, no explanation is called for. I hope that the hon. member for St. John's East will have the honesty to correct the erroneous and foolish things which he has been repeating outside the House.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary may I ask the minister whether he is prepared—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. McGrath: I have nothing to withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: I have nothing to withdraw. I have the record of the department which indicates that a grant was made—

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No.

Mr. McGrath: —and no further declaration was made by the department to correct that statement—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: —and which he knows does exist—

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please resume his seat. I suggest that at this point we are entering into debate between the minister and the hon. member, and we should not have a debate. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, I will recognize him. I am rather anxious to get on and live up to the commitment I made yesterday to recognize hon. members who have been anxious to ask questions for a few days, including the hon. member for Churchill. If the hon. member for St. John's East has a supplementary question to ask, he will be recognized provided it is short and the minister can reply briefly. The Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer was quite lengthy, and I feel that I ought to be able to ask a supplementary question based on the minister's answer. I was trying to do that. I want to ask the minister whether he is now prepared to lay on the table of the House all correspondence between himself and the firm of A. Bélanger Ltée regarding the grant that was announced on June 30, 1971. I also ask the minister why he was so anxious to take the credit for this grant in the eyes of the public when he never made a correction?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate. The hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It is useless to bring documents to the hon. member's attention. He does not know how to read them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognized the hon. member on a supplementary and drew to his attention that other hon. members are interested in asking questions. The first part of the supplementary was legitimate. The hon. member invited the minister to indicate whether he was willing to table certain documents. If the hon. member will allow the minister to reply to that question, I will then go to the next questioner.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The record will show that the minister gave a misleading answer to the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton. I raised this as a question of privilege yesterday.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The hon. member does not know how to read.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I merely asked the minister a question, and I have nothing to withdraw. He stands condemned by his own answer which he gave on February 28, as recorded at page 305 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate, and I really do not see why the hon. member should want to raise the matter as a point of order. It seems to me that the position is quite clear. A question was asked by the hon. member and a reply given by the minister. Certain facts may be in dispute, but we should not, I suggest, either by way of question of privilege or point of order, dispute or continue to debate the facts as alleged either by the minister or by the hon. member. I really think we should go to the next subject. I recognize the hon. member for Churchill and thank him for his patience.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

REQUEST THAT CONTRIBUTORS BE SUPPLIED WITH ANNUAL STATEMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of what appears to be an unfair obligation placed upon every contributor to the Canada Pension Plan to verify that his contributions are properly recorded and credited, has the minister given consideration to requesting Canada Pension Plan officials to supply each contributor with an annual statement of contributions, as is required by the government of private business and employers?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to look into this matter.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO WHEN FUNDS WERE EXHAUSTED

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Could he tell us exactly on what day in January there were no longer any funds available for local initiative projects submitted by municipalities?

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): You were caught short. You do not even read your own departmental research. You do not even read your own statistics.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is what you say. You do not know what we do.

Mr. McGrath: You were caught with your pants down.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You don't know what we do.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Champlain is trying to ask a question and these exchanges back and forth make it impossible for the Chair to hear the hon. member for Champlain. I think, even though he is at the other end of the chamber, he should be given a chance to ask his question.

[Translation]

Would the hon. member for Champlain please repeat his question? The interventions that have just taken place have prevented me from hearing him.

Mr. Matte: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

I would like to know the exact date in January when there were no longer any funds available for local initiative projects submitted by municipalities.

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the question correctly, the date is not in January at all. The cut-off date for applications was January 31. I have tried to indicate that the assessment process is continuing. All projects that will be approved have now been identified, but we are already in March, and we are still notifying and writing final contracts. If I understood correctly, the date cannot be identified as a date in January.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Could the minister explain how come high officials of his department say that there are no funds available since January 5?

Mr. Speaker: That question has already been asked many times—

[English]

If the minister can reply briefly, he will be allowed to do so.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I will inquire into the question again in a more precise way and let the hon. member know the answer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS ON BEHALF OF OPPRESSED UKRAINIANS—EFFECTIVENESS OF CANADIAN ACTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and is in reference to a petition recently presented to the minister by the Ukrainian-Canadian Committee alleging widespread arrests of intellectuals in the Ukraine. Can the minister advise whether the government has made or intends making representations to the government of the Soviet Union, or is it considering seeking an investigation by any international body concerned about human rights and fundamental freedoms?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, not only have I received this petition but I received the representatives of the association myself. We had a very long conversation as to what would be the most effective way of attaining the objectives that are in the minds of the association. They have left this matter in my hands for me to consider how we can be most effective on behalf of those who are being oppressed.

Mr. Macquarrie: Am I to take it, then, that the government has not yet found an effective way of dealing with this difficulty?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, that is not so. The Canadian government has been more effective in reuniting families on behalf of Jewish people who have been oppressed throughout the world than any other government in the world, and I think the methods we follow are the most effective.

POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED NATIONS ON BEHALF OF OPPRESSED UKRAINIANS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Inasmuch as the representatives of the Ukrainian-Canadian Committee urged the government to make representations to the United Nations, has the government undertaken such action? If not, does it intend to make representations to that international body?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that matter is under consideration. As I say, I think what is important is helping people, not giving ourselves the satisfaction of having made protests in particular ways but selecting the means that are likely to be the most effective. As I say, we are now beginning to see some of the results of the very persistent and quiet diplomatic means we have used, and I think we should continue them.

HEALTH

FAMILY PLANNING—POSSIBLE CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the estimate yesterday of the president of the Family Planning Federation of Canada that one child in every five or six results from an unwanted pregnancy and because of the strong opinion expressed at the Family Planning Conference that the major roadblocks in family planning are now at provincial and local levels, will the minister seek an early meeting with provincial ministers to launch a co-ordinated program of family planning at all levels?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may be aware, there is a cost-sharing arrangement under the Canada Assistance Plan for family planning services and counselling. We have ongoing discussions with the provinces almost daily with respect to programs under CAP. Certainly, these include family planning.

TRADE

UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—EFFECT ON CHEMICAL INDUSTRY— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Inasmuch as the representations of the Canadian chemical industry further emphasize the danger to our domestic industries resulting from the enactment of the United States DISC program, can the minister now announce whether the government has a policy based on studies of the results of the DISC program or is it willing to implement some of the recommendations made by the Canadian chemical industry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that study, which was very thorough and took some time, has come to a number of conclusions, one of them being that it would be essential, if plants established in Canada are to be viable, for them to have greater access to international markets and to the United States market in particular. This is not a reality at the moment. We are making efforts to try to bring this about. The results of the inquiry have been communicated to the industry.

POSSIBLE SALE OR RENTAL OF MINI-TYPE SUBMARINE TO SOVIET UNION— SECURITY CLEARANCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister advise the House whether the interdepartmental committee that, to the best of my information, went to the United States this week to renegotiate the terms under which Canada might be able to sell or lease the Pisces to the Soviet Union met with any success or whether the further application by his department was turned down by the Americans?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received a report of the meeting which I understand took place yesterday. The purpose of the meeting was to determine whether some of the instruments in the said submersible that are produced in the United States would obtain an export permit. It is quite normal to consult with the Americans in order to determine if a permit will be allowed in order to decide how the Pisces IV will be used for research purposes.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. He had a supplementary which he might be allowed to ask now.

Mr. Forrestall: I have a short supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I ask the minister whether I can draw the inference from what he has said that there is no longer a question of security or of keeping secure certain information or other aspects of this deep-water submersible? Is that now no longer a consideration?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the answer might be along the following lines. We are very interested in co-operating in research in oceanography with other countries of the world. In order to do so, and use that particular ship, we have to develop a procedure by which this ship can be used jointly by Canadian and foreign authorities. In order to do that, we have to make sure there is no impediment to the use of the instruments on the said submersible and, in order to do that, we must have approval from the United States to import them into Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH NABET—REQUEST THAT CBC ENGAGE IN MEANINGFUL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My question is directed to the Secretary of State. It concerns the strike or lockout of NABET and the problems between NABET and the CBC. Yesterday in Montreal there was a lockout that involved 700 people in television and radio. Does the minister intend to use his good offices to persuade the CBC to participate in more meaningful negotiations with the union?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I follow the events very closely and I ask for reports from the CBC. But my way of thinking differs from that of the hon. member. I think the CBC management are not solely responsible if no significant negotiations have as yet been undertaken.

DISPUTE WITH NABET—INQUIRY AS TO COST TO CANADIANS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): A supplementary question. As a result of his investigations, is the minister yet in a position to say how much this labour difficulty between the CBC and NABET has cost the people of Canada to date?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am not aware of the exact figures, Mr. Speaker, but I might be able to get them.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO OWNERSHIP OF ANIMALS HELD AT QUARANTINE STATIONS

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): My question is to the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns cattle coming into Canada under authorization of the health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture. I ask the minister whether at the time of entry into the quarantine stations in the gulf islands all animals have been held under permit by some Canadian individual or corporation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I did not hear the first part of the question.

Mr. Downey: I apologize for disturbing the minister. With reference to animals coming into the quarantine stations in the gulf islands under the authorization of the health of animals branch, at the time of entry into the quarantine stations have all animals been held under permit by some Canadian individual or corporation?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, except for the very few brought in by the Canadian Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Downey: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Battle River on a supplementary question and then the hon. member for Marquette. We will then have reached or gone beyond the time reserved for the question period.

Mr. Downey: I am sure the minister has answered my question accurately within the scope of the knowledge of his department. However, will the minister look into reports that there are individuals within the health of animals branch who have made telephone calls to individuals in western Canada asking them to take permits or pay for animals presently in quarantine on the gulf islands? I ask the minister to report on this.

Mr. Olson: I can look into this, Mr. Speaker, but I do not know of any such telephone calls. If these animals have already arrived at the quarantine stations, particularly on the gulf islands, I would be very surprised if there is anything in what the hon. member says because the animals have already been assigned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I indicated a moment ago, the Chair recognized the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Marquette for the last question.

GRAIN

TAKEOVER OF FEDERAL GRAIN COMPANY ELEVATORS BY POOLS—EFFECT ON FARMERS' FREEDOM OF CHOICE IN DELIVERY

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): My question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It arises out of the proposed takeover by the pools elevators of the Federal Grain Company. As this means one organization will control 65 per cent of all elevators in western Canada, it could infringe on the farmers' freedom of choice in delivering their grain. Is the government investigating this takeover and have any complaints been lodged with his department?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member bringing this to my attention. I will certainly take the question as notice and give him an answer as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the usual Thursday point of order. I wish to ask the government House leader about the business for the rest of this week and next.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the listing I believe I gave last Wednesday. In addition to that information, I would like to mention to the House that I hope to call two opposition days next week, namely Tuesday and Friday. I believe there are seven opposition days before the twenty-sixth of March. Therefore we will have to get two in next week. This is what I have in mind, Mr. Speaker. If there is a desire to have further consultation on that, I will be glad to have it.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question with regard to the business of the House. The government House leader will recall that I asked him if he knew anything about the date of the budget. Now that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has returned from Toronto, is the government House leader in a position to advise whether affairs have now been set in motion so that we will have a budget before Easter?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I asked the same question myself. I was given the same answer, that it would be taken as notice.

Mr. McGrath: I rise on the same point of order. I am prompted to do so because of Your Honour's ruling yesterday on my question of privilege, and also because of our inability to obtain accurate information in the House from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the government House leader when he will arrange for an organizational meeting of the Standing Committee on Regional Development so that we can get the minister's estimates before the committee and subject him to the kind of cross-examination that will bring out accurate information?

Mr. MacEachen: We can have the organizational meeting for that committee at once, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises from the position in which I and other members of the House find themselves as a result of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) coming into the House and making a two-phase statement of some five to seven minutes in length, and then immediately vacating the premises.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: In view of the type of statement made this afternoon and the magnitude of the project, surely it should be the practice for this and other ministers, after making such a statement, to remain in the House in order that pointed and important questions can be directed to them. Only in this way can we be satisfied as to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I want to bring this point home because what the minister did this afternoon was obviously an affront to the dignity of opposition members, and perhaps members opposite who have been repeatedly asking questions. I hope the government will appreciate the seriousness of what has occurred here this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

AUTHORIZATION OF FISCAL PAYMENTS TO AND TAX COLLECTION AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton), that Bill C-8, to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I was waiting for some order to be restored in the House. Indeed, many members were speaking louder than me.

I am pleased to comment on this bill before its reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

I listened very attentively to the introduction of Bill C-8 by the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) whom I congratulate for his courage in accepting to be the new scapegoat for that much criticized department. I always greatly admired the minister and I do not blame him at all for he is not responsible for the drafting of this bill since he did not hold that office when this bill was hatched by the technocrats.

I was nevertheless a bit surprised at his self-confidence when he spoke of co-operating with the provinces when we know that most of them are complaining about lack of consultation with the central government. Indeed, in all its relations with the provinces, especially with Quebec, this government reminds me of a steam-roller madly crushing everything that stand in its way without giving it a single thought.

Freedom of choice, acquired rights, autonomy, all that is futile to the government when they plan their federalist action. Their slogan consists in providing for ever greater centralization, even at the cost of making the provinces second rate governments.

I am sure that the minister who knows me as a sincere autonomist wishing to live in a confederation did not expect me to applaud his "supercentralization" of powers no more than I would agree to the views of the NDP about state control.

Therefore, I will speak today as a Quebec federal member. I still believe in the reviving of the true federation we had before 1942. I would like the hon. minister to believe that 90 per cent of Quebecers are still hoping that the federal government will come to its senses and will some day be honest enough to return what it borrowed during the last war, namely the tax fields belonging to Quebec and recognized in the British North America Act because, in my region, we have a principle which we respect above all—give back undamaged to its owner whatever we have borrowed.

Yesterday, I heard a good one when the minister stated that the federal government and the provinces had equal rights of taxation and I think it is by virtue of such rights that the federal government so easily takes the provinces' place and tells them later: Now we have what we want; if you do not like it, there is always double taxation.

I understood then that the word equality for this government means: Move aside I will take your place. This is what I remember from the statement of the Minister of Finance.

As far as the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) goes, he came and told us that he crept into the field of education via post-secondary education and that he is there to stay. To gild the pill, he told us that it is only for two years but we know quite well that it will be for two years and then another two years and finally permanently as was done in all other fields.

I think it is high time this government examined its conscience—if it still has one—before things get worse in the province of Quebec because the population is not the only one crying for help. As a matter of fact, Quebec ministers one after the other have protested against federal interference in the affairs of their departments. Because they were Quebec liberals they thought they could stop this massive intrusion but there is no way.

Under the cover of a good samaritan, Bill C-8 calls for the concession of exclusive rights to the federal government for a period of five years.

It is always the same stratagem of soft talk we have had from this government to hide its true intentions of centralization. Let us suppose that under Bill C-8 the government is asking this House for permission to make certain donations to the provinces. This reminds me of a sated ogre throwing crumbs to the beggars. How this all seems to reflect generosity, kindness, co-operation. How the minister must have congratulated his officials for coming up with such a sentimental style.

As to that permission, the present totalitarian government need not even ask. It has it forever. But read the terms of this little donation so humbly presented and you will see that the title of the bill which is as follows speaks for itself:

An Act to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act.

This bill, then, features three main aspects. First, a permission is humbly requested; then the levying of a tax is proposed and lastly, we are informed that this tax will be increased. Mr. Speaker, the cat is out of the bag and we know what the government is after: taxes, taxes, always more taxes.

All this on the other hand is a consequence of a far more subtle and older fraud which was designed to take from the provinces the three main fields of taxation, which were the only guarantee of their autonomy, their basic taxes, as we say in Quebec.

To this end, what pretext did the central government use to have the provinces swallow the pill once more? War. Not war in Canada, not even in North America, but war in Germany, in Italy and Japan. To be honest, I thought perhaps I should quote passages from this agreement that was passed on May 13, 1942. I would like to quote this, above all to inform the people because I know that most hon. members will not even read that speech. I quote:

• (1530)

An Act respecting an agreement between the Dominion and the Province for the suspension of certain taxes in war time

[Asserted to, the 13th of May, 1942]

WHEREAS the British North America Act authorizes the Parliament of Canada to impose any kind of taxation and the Provincial Legislatures to impose direct taxation;

Whereas in order to enable Canada to put forth, in the prosecution of this war, a maximum effort, it is necessary that the Parliament of Canada should alone exercise the power of direct taxation upon incomes and upon corporations;

Whereas the Government of Canada is willing to allow the Province an adequate compensation if, for the duration of the war, the latter undertakes not to levy such taxes;

Whereas the Dominion Government acknowledges that the Province, in making this undertaking, neither abandons nor cedes any portion of its authority, nor any of its constitutional rights, powers and privileges;

This text is very important, since Ottawa recognizes that the provinces have the right to levy direct taxes. For the duration of the war, Ottawa requested the sole right to levy direct taxes which had been exercised exclusively by the provinces. I did say, for the duration of the war, and if the provinces do not levy direct taxes during the war, Ottawa undertakes to pay them an adequate compensation.

At last, it recognizes, as in the preamble of the last paragraph but one, that the province which signs this agreement, "neither abandons nor cedes ... any of its constitutional rights, powers and privileges".

In theory, the province of Quebec has only temporarily loaned its privileges, but in practice, the federal government still has the upper hand on taxation.

The war ended 30 years ago; however, the provinces are still fighting the federal government to regain their rights. Why is the federal government so jealously and so stubbornly keeping what the province loaned in good faith? This is what 90 percent of the Quebec people are asking themselves without ever finding a sound answer.

Does the federal government hold that it is the sole authority able to equitably distribute the proceeds of taxation? To efficiently overcome regional inequalities? What is it doing in the fields of health, social welfare, education, roads, agriculture, post-secondary education, and in all the other sectors under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces where it sneaked in through shared-cost programs?

I might be told that it had to look after other problems such as old age pensions and family allowances because the provinces were not tackling them. But were there reasons preventing the provinces from being active in social fields? In fact, Ottawa was still collecting all the taxes without ever reimbursing the provinces, except with crumbs.

This is why the province of Quebec had to levy a second tax, considering Ottawa's constant refusal. And we of the province of Quebec know what such obstinacy on the part of the federal government entails, that is two collecting agencies and duplication of all departments to boot. As a result we now have twice as many bureaucrats and technocrats. We are paying three times as much, yet we get only mediocre service.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself said so: When Ottawa returns $2 to the provinces, that means it has pulled $5 out of the taxpayers' pockets.

We now have in Ottawa the most chaotic administration ever to exist since confederation, to the extent that nobody knows the limits of its rights or duties. The situation is worse than the Tower of Babel confusion.

The administrators, whether provincial or federal, do not speak the same language, for they are only technocrats transmitting orders received from financiers. And all that while the elected representatives, allegedly responsible to the people, are no longer responsible for anything. We have evidence of that every day during the oral question period when a minister confesses his inability, with respect to such or such section of his department, to alter the course steered by the civil servants.

We are today living on the wrong side of confederation. And as long as we do not revert to sources, we shall continue to flounder pitifully in the worst disorder.

We are living under a federative dictatorship, if I may use that word to describe a central power which imposes its own will to the provinces without ever consulting them. Proliferation of such laws is our most vicious attack on the provinces' sovereignty. And a province will be autonomous to the extent that it can look after itself and assume its responsibilities.

Now, all these bills result in making the provinces increasingly dependent on the central power. And that is what the province of Quebec—and British Columbia, for that matter—rejects ever more strongly while each day Ottawa tightens its grasp.

Perhaps the minister will retort that under Bill C-8 he is offering the provinces some means to free themselves. But the provinces no longer will agree to being offered only that allegedly magic means: they simply want to take it into their own hands, with all the responsibilities and rights that it implies.

That is why I say to the government that it is time to reverse steam before it is too late. Let us show no hesitation to resume our dialogue with the provinces, for Canada will become united only when it comes back to the true meaning of confederation.

Mr. Speaker, it will perhaps be said that I impute all the wrongs to the federal government, but that is not the case, for I think that the provinces, and particularly the province of Quebec, bear a heavy load. Indeed, when I read again the 1942 agreement, I realize once more that all the Quebec governments which have been in office from 1942 to 1972 have been despicable, hypocritical or traitors to their province.

I will quote certain documents and let Quebecers draw their own conclusions, for let us not forget that the agreement is followed by an annex applicable to Quebec. Again, I am eager to read that annex, which is not too lenghty, so that all can be aware of it. Chapter 27 of Bill C-16, assented to on May 13, 1942, reads in part as follows:

ANNEX

Draft of the proposed agreement between the Governments of the Dominion and of the Province of Quebec

Memorandum of agreement made this day of 1942.

Between:

The Government of the Dominion of Canada (hereinafter called "The Dominion"), represented herein by the Honourable James Lorimer Ilsley, Minister of Finance, of the First Part and:

The Government of the Province of Quebec (hereinafter called "The Province"), represented herein by the Honourable James Arthur Mathewson, Provincial Treasurer, of the Second Part.

WHEREAS the Dominion and the Province and certain municipalities in Quebec have been levying taxes upon incomes and upon corporations, and

WHEREAS it is expedient during the continuation of the present war and for a certain re-adjustment period thereafter that the Dominion only should levy such taxes, and

WHEREAS the Province has agreed to suspend temporarily the levying and collection of such taxes, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, and

WHEREAS the Province shall not, by agreeing, as hereinafter provided, to desist from imposing certain taxes during the term of this agreement, be deemed to have surrendered, abandoned or given over to the Dominion any of the powers, rights, privileges or authority vested in the Province under the provisions of The British North America Act, 1867, or any subsequent Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, or to have otherwise impaired any of such powers, rights, privileges or authority, and

WHEREAS the Parliament of Canada has provided funds for the payments which will be due to the Province—

10. The Dominion will pay to the Province in respect of each fiscal year of the Province during the term of the agreement, the sum of $20,586,074.56 computed as set out in Appendix D—

Mr. Speaker, on reading section 23 which deals with the termination of this agreement, one has the surprise of one's life. I quote:

23. (1) This agreement shall continue in force until and terminate on the last day of the fiscal year of the Province ending nearest to the thirty-first day of December in the first calendar year which begins after the date of the cessation of hostilities, complete or substantial, between the Dominion of Canada and Germany, Italy and Japan, unless sooner terminated pursuant to the provisions hereof.

(2) The Dominion shall, exercising its best judgment on all the available facts, fairly determine the date of such cessation of hostilities, complete or substantial, and shall thereupon give notice to the Province, specifying such date so determined, which shall thereafter, for the purposes of this agreement, be deemed to be the date of the cessation of hostilities, complete or substantial, between the Dominion of Canada and Germany, Italy and Japan.

(3) If at any time, no such notice having been given, the Province is of the opinion that the aforesaid hostilities have ceased, completely or substantially, the Province may request the Dominion to call a conference of the Provinces and the Dominion for the purpose of consulting together as to whether the aforesaid hostilities have in fact ceased, completely or substantially and, if so, on what date. Upon receipt of such request, the Dominion will forthwith call such conference and will thereafter give the notice hereinbefore provided for at such time and specifying such date as the Dominion deems proper having regard to the views expressed at the said conference and to the obligation of the Dominion to exercise its best judgment on all the available facts and fairly to determine the date of the cessation of hostilities, complete or substantial.

(5) The Province may terminate this agreement on the thirty-first day of March of any year, if notice of intention to do so is given in writing to the Minister thirty days before such date.

I am also wondering, Mr. Speaker, what kind of jokers we are dealing with. For 30 years, Quebec ministers and premiers have been clamouring right and left: Ottawa should restore our taxation rights and we would be in a position to administer.

Has anyone ever read that section (5)?

According to what I have just quoted, there were three procedures to bring the 1942 agreement to an end. First, the federal government could have declared that the hostilities were over and annulled the agreement, returning to the provinces the three basic taxation fields which it had borrowed. Second, the province of Quebec, through its government, could have asked the federal government to call a conference, in order to cancel the agreement. Third, Quebec alone could have directly annulled the agreement on March 31 of any year by notifying the minister in writing that it intended to take back its taxation rights.

Those are the facts. They can keep on blaming Ottawa for not having stated that the hostilities were over and for having continued to use it in Quebec as a bone of contention, but sincerely, has the provincial government ever asked the federal government to call a conference to bring the agreement to an end? Never. And what is worse still, has Quebec, through its premier or any other of its ministers, ever given Ottawa an official notice that it was putting an end to the agreement, as was its right? What sort of game have all our premiers of all parties, who have succeeded each other for 30 years, played in front of the people of Quebec?

What was done by the technocrats who were then advising governments? I could name some who today are preaching revolution, when they knew very well that there was no need for it, that it was a simple question of sending a letter to Ottawa in order to terminate the 1942 agreement.

What did some former Quebec ministers do when they were in power? Did they lack the courage to tell the people how easy it was to opt out of agreements without resorting to separatism? It was all so easy. Yet no one wanted to stick his neck out. They preferred to clamour against Ottawa, whilst pocketing the millions which went and still go to the provincial treasury. It was so much simpler so. Always the rule of the least effort.

But do Quebecers and their government realize what a quandary they have created for representatives of Quebec in the federal Parliament? Are we to refuse outright the equalization payments and all the money coming to our province under the terms of past agreements? A majority in Parliament would be required, and we do not have it.

The federal government has reneged on its promise, that is a fact. But Quebec has done nothing concrete to protect its autonomy and Quebecers must be made aware of that. Not only has Quebec done nothing, but every five years the premier of the province comes to Ottawa for in camera meetings with all other provincial premiers of Canada in order to renounce Quebec taxation rights for another five years.

• (1550)

After this treacherous deed, a Quebec premier threw up his arms on television and begged Ottawa to give him back his taxation rights or to stop interfering in Quebec's affairs. Could there ever be a more cynical farce?

Did you know that at these secret meetings that are held every five years, all decisions require unanimous agreement by all premiers?

I should have many other things to tell you, but my time is getting short.

We of the Social Credit party are always in favour of decentralizing taxation powers. But as we must live under this curious system, as the majority in Parliament always decides, we support the statement made in Victoria by Mr. Bennett and published in Le Devoir on February 16, 1972. He suggested that it would be more efficient to help citizens individually instead of giving all the money to provincial governments.

We hope that the conclusions of the report by the Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada, which was tabled in late 1971, will be accepted by the government and that they will materialize in 1972, so that we can ensure a guaranteed minimum income to the people of Canada from coast to coast.

[English]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can remember, as I am sure many hon. members of this House do, reading the story of Confederation and the remarks that were made by those who were so far-sighted as to play a leading role in bringing it about. I can remember that one of the Fathers of Confederation from the province of Nova Scotia had this to say to his son, "My son, you have no country, because Mr. Macdonald has sold us to the Canadians for 20 cents a head." Few of us would look on that kind of remark today with any commendation, but the remark in many ways symbolizes the difficulties over the years in working out an equitable and acceptable relationship between the federal authority and the provinces.

The problem lies first in the parochial attitudes in some parts of the country. But it is not fair just to describe these as parochial. They have developed into a theory of the role and the function of provincial authorities within Confederation, and have been compounded by the duality of languages and the plurality of cultures in our society. But in addition, Mr. Speaker, the problem has been compounded by the inability, over the years, to work out a generally acceptable formula which would be recognized by federal and provincial spokesmen in all parts of the country as representing a philosophy on which there would be agreement.

As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), speaking in his place in this House yesterday said, perhaps the greatest and most impressive effort at building a theoretically perfect structure of federal-provincial financial relations was the Rowell-Sirois Commission. In its report, just before the Second World War in 1940, it put forward three basic propositions, as the minister said. The first was that the federal government had an overriding financial role in the pursuit of national growth and stability. The second was that fair standards of public services and taxation in all regions of the country were vital to national unity. And the third was that co-ordination in tax policy between the central government and the provinces was essential in a modern industrial state.

Try as we may, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to reconcile all of these. In the short period of time in which I have been a member of this House, a period which has been interrupted by decisions of the voters, Mr. Speaker, I have seen a remarkable change in the philosophies of Ministers of Finance. And without any question there will be changes in the future.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said that the bill before us was something of a stand-pat arrangement, and in many ways I would have to admit that this is true. But what is abundantly clear is that there are no concrete alternatives being put before the House in terms either of direction or policy, and that in effect spokesmen for the opposition parties have endorsed the measure simply by their lack of offering alternatives.

The basic fact of our modern society is the desire for a wide range of services, educational, health, welfare and social security, which are costly and which have to be provided as an essential instrument of national unity. The chief spokesman for the NDP, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), had at least a bit of consistency in the way he was able to approach the argument. I might say that this consistency was probably due to a matter of detachment because it is not likely that he and his party will ever have the responsibility of implementing the policy he advocated.

In his detached and more logical approach to the matter, he indicated that the thrust of the central government was highly desirable. He supported the federal-provincial shared-cost programs in medicare and hospital insurance. He indicated that these programs represented a means of achieving national standards which we all recognize are desirable. He pointed out that the development of alternative measures of fiscal policy under previous governments, by which percentage points were given to provinces in return for their accepting the contributions which had been worked out in the original legislation, was something which he regretted. He went on to say that the problem of the development of uniform standards had to be faced. If necessary, he said, he would support measures by the federal government to operate directly such programs in the provinces where there was a threat, because of lack of fiscal resources in such areas, that the programs operated by them would fall below desirable standards.

This is a counsel of perfection, that the federal government should do all these things. But the fact of the matter is that there are strongly held constitutional views in many of the provinces of Canada, and not just restricted to the province of Quebec. The fact is that in many of these areas there is a firm conviction in the minds of those responsible for provincial administration that they can do the job better than the federal authority, that they understand the local conditions better than the central authority in Ottawa, and they are prepared to make the most vigorous fight for their own autonomy in these matters.

The hon. member for Waterloo, for whom I have the greatest respect and affection, says that if necessary we can find a way around the constitution. There are many people who have tried to find a way even to amend the constitution itself which may have seemed a relatively simple thing, but so far the difficulties have not been overcome.

There is no simple way in which we can grapple with this problem of uniform standards across Canada by the federal authority moving into certain areas and operating its own programs. This difficulty was faced in a much more oblique way by the Leader of the Opposition when he spoke in this chamber yesterday. He has been a premier of a have-not province. He recognizes that the need for equalization payments in the fiscal arrangements is absolutely essential to Nova Scotia, among others. Indeed over a third of the provincial revenues of that province come from equalization payments, which are the heart of the bill before us.

If we cannot provide the means for the broad range of services, the infrastructures, the social facilities that are provided through shared cost arrangements, if we cannot provide them through federally operated programs, then the only means by which this can be done is through the device of equalization. Equalization, at a cost of something like $1 billion is, as I said, an essential and key part of the measure before us. Indeed, it is expected that the equalization amount in future years will rise to $1½ billion, so if we are to deal with this through the means of equalization then we cannot make further concessions in the tax points without destroying the tax system itself.

The Conservative party has considerable strength in the province of Ontario and its Premier is a vigorous opponent of this. Oh yes, he pays certain lip service to equalization but his provincial treasurer makes the most vigorous case for increased tax room, for increased assignment of federal taxing authority, for turning over the results of tax levied at the federal level. The leader of the Opposition said it was too bad we did not take account of that great study which was undertaken about 1967 and which indicated that provincial and municipal expenditures would rise and the federal government would have a surplus in the years ahead. He did not say what should be done about it because the simple fact is that there is no further elbow room that can be given by the federal authority, in its income tax, to the provinces.

In a previous House I had the opportunity of listening to the predecessor of the present Minister of Finance announce that 75 per cent of succession duties would be given to the provinces. At that time I made a mental note that before succession duties were changed there would have to be a federal-provincial conference. Three out of four dollars collected were not going to federal coffers but to provincial coffers. I wondered how long a federal government would stay in the succession duty field under that system. I was very pleased to see that under the tax reform legislation adopted by this House, arrangements were made which bring a different approach to this problem. We have taxed capital gains on the basis set out by the act and the federal government is withdrawing from the succession duty field.

[Mr. Francis.]

Meanwhile, as part of the transitional arrangements, there is a certain stability of revenues which will go to the provinces due to the fact that the federal government will continue, at the request of the provinces, to collect succession duties until such time as the yield under the capital gains reaches a level of revenue yield which will be satisfactory to them. At least we have come back to a more rational system. The yield on capital gains is part and parcel of the role of income tax. We no longer have the recession on the tax front which threatened to destroy not only the power of the federal government to act in its own fiscal capacity in handling the responsibilities it has, but threatened to erode the heart of equalization itself and the tax structure.

I am pleased and proud to support the measure before us today. It does not break great new ground, but it gives certain assurances to the provinces that their revenues will be maintained. The Leader of the Opposition said that all of these should have been co-ordinated, the tax reform measure and fiscal agreements with the provinces, and that we have given the provinces an excuse to delay for another ten years. Goodness knows, however, we had enough difficulty trying to put through the measures which have been enacted. The Leader of the Official Opposition does not offer any alternative. He is caught by the dilemma of his own party with the chief and most vigorous spokesman on the provincial level demanding more and more concessions in tax yield. As a man who knows the problem of the have-not provinces, he knows equalization is the heart of their stability, their borrowing capacity and their ability to maintain social services. He knows there is no alternative but to do what the measure before the House suggests. He, therefore, condemns the government for not having undertaken new studies and not having made certain predictions, knowing full well that there are no alternatives before this House but to adopt the measures proposed in the name of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this bill, C-8, I should like to point out that it really does not change anything, that it has merely patched up what has been in effect for the past five years. It will not make much, if any, improvement in fiscal relations between the provincial and federal governments, something which I think will have to be looked at before too long. Even five years ago there was general agreement that these relations should be over-hauled.

It is too bad that at the constitutional conference in Victoria greater results were not achieved in the field of fiscal matters. I think it was at this conference that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) hoped to bring a new constitution to Canada but he seems not to understand that the main stumbling block to constitution change lies in the fiscal field. The growth of health, welfare and education expenditures by the provinces has tipped the British North America Act out of balance and a fresh approach to the fiscal problems is required.

It is interesting to note what the Prime Minister had to say in answer to a question I put to him on June 4, 1971, as recorded in Hansard, at page 6366. I asked what the Prime Minister intended to do:

—In consideration of the statement made yesterday by Prime Minister Davis of Ontario that he intends to bring forcefully to the attention of the federal government at the Victoria constitutional conference his province's concern over federal policies which create economic hardship,—

RIGHT HON. P. E. TRUDEAU (PRIME MINISTER): No, Mr. Speaker, I must confess I am not aware of what Mr. Davis had in mind. The House will recall that he requested some time ago that an additional day be added to the constitutional conference to discuss economic matters. However, since the federal budget and tax reform will be brought down after the conference, it is my understanding that he has now suggested that this additional day be not added to the conference and that economic matters, particularly those relating to the budget, be discussed some time later,—

As was noted by the hon. member who just resumed his seat, I think this was an Ontario point of view. In a supplementary question I said:

Mr. Castonguay has suggested that Ottawa's policies are the cause of Quebec's poverty, has that province indicated to the Prime Minister the areas of economic policy which it wishes to be discussed at Victoria?

MR. TRUDEAU: No, Mr. Speaker. That seems like a very general statement, such as the opposition often makes.

I think the right hon. Prime Minister missed the point at the conference, that fiscal arrangements between the provinces are one of the most important features of Canadian economic life.

The Speech from the Throne in the Ontario legislature contained the suggestion that Ontario would be pressing for greater federal-provincial accord and there was an offer to host a meeting of leaders of the federal, provincial and municipal jurisdictions. There was a suggestion in the Speech that Ontario was eager to achieve progress in such mixed jurisdictional fields as tax-sharing, constitutional reform and shared-cost reform. The province of Ontario has indicated its interest in these matters and finds them of great importance, as has the province of Quebec, a have-not province which pays less into the federal treasury than it receives and it feels that certain arrangements should be changed.

The province of British Columbia has objected strenuously to some features of federal-provincial relations referred to yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). Their argument against equalization payments is that the eastern provinces, particularly rich Ontario, has never taxed the resource industries as heavily as would be dictated by their stake in them, although the western provinces have done so. It was suggested that it was unfair to expect them to provide all these services to provinces which have neglected to take steps in that direction themselves. I think the views of the British Columbia and Alberta governments, as aired, should be explored and discussed.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we come to the statement of the Attorney General of British Columbia, Mr. Leslie Peterson, who presented another view on equalization payments. He suggested that the payment of $5500 million since 1957 by the provinces may, in large part, have been channelled into the expenses of government rather than being directed to those who would be directly affected. In any case, I think it can be shown that there is, on the part of all provinces, a valid reason for doubting the effectiveness of the present arrangement. They want to come to grips with the problem and see if something further could not be done.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the fiscal needs of provincial and municipal levels of government are rising rapidly due to the concentration of their responsibilities in the health, education and welfare fields. There is not in the new bill and there was not in the old, any attempt to measure the levels of expenditure required to attain acceptable levels of public services across Canada. I hope a little later to discuss in more detail problems associated with determining acceptable levels of expenditure in the fields of hospital and medicare services. Mr. Speaker, differences in the costs of providing adequate services and the level of service attained cannot satisfactorily be measured by differences in revenue alone, as Bill C-8 attempts. That is what the minister's predecessor also attempted.

There has been a dramatic rise in expenditures on education, welfare, transport and health. When the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was minister of finance, he made a statement at one time to the federal-provincial tax structure committee. Later, he made the same statement in the House of Commons. In it he suggested six main principles that arrangements of the sort I have talked about should heed. First, the fiscal arrangements should give both the federal and provincial governments access to fiscal resources sufficient to discharge their responsibilities under the constitution. Second, they should provide that each government should be accountable to its own electors for its taxing and spending decisions and should make these decisions with due regard for their effect on other governments. Third, the fiscal arrangements should, through a system of equalization grants, enable each province to provide an adequate level of public services without resort to rates of taxation substantially higher than the national average. Fourth, they should give to the federal government sufficient fiscal power to discharge its economic and monetary responsibilities, as well as to pay its bills. The idea there is that the federal government should use its fiscal powers for the benefit of the entire economy. The fifth point was that they should lead to uniform intergovernment arrangements and the uniform application of federal laws in all provinces.

The squeeze on municipal and provincial expenditures is apparent, Mr. Speaker, and it is evident that substantial amounts of net transfers will have to be made to provincial and municipal governments if they are to meet public requirements.

The position of the provinces was summed up by the Premier of Alberta, Hon. Peter Lougheed, who said at the Finance Ministers' Conference in November:

We came to this conference and the preceding Finance Ministers' Conference. ... We were confronted, without adequate advance discussion, with new fiscal arrangements of a five year duration initiated unilaterally by the Federal Government—supported by some provinces and clearly not by others. Yet we are forced to the wall without any adequate forum for discussion, dialogue and exchange of opinion other than the limited time available at this Conference and, previously, during the Finance Ministers' Meeting.

He went on to say that he thought the timetable for the introduction of these measures was totally inadequate. Actually, the Premier of Alberta asked for consideration to be given to only a one-year extension of the existing fiscal arrangement while the federal government involves itself with the implementation of its tax measures so as to provide reasonable time to debate these issues and evaluate the impact of federal tax measures. This did not occur, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Darcy McKeough of Ontario suggested, in a brief to that same meeting, that the current state of financial and economic relations between the federal and provincial governments makes it clear that it is time to reconstruct these relations. A very complex system has evolved which is patchy in design, capricious in detail, uncertain in ultimate benefits and unrealistic for the seventies. This system is characterized by a sharing of tax fields which bears no relation to spending responsibilities; supplementary equalization payments with uneven benefits; cost-sharing in major provincial functions involving a great variety of formulae and regulations; a heterogeneous tax structure; large federal programs with strongly regionalized impact and dubious long-run economic benefits; and cumbersome federal loan and grant programs to reduce unemployment.

He went on to say that the federal government had failed to enter into discussions on the tax structure when that tax structure was being developed. Once the tax reform decisions were made, and Bill C-259 of the previous sessions which embodied those decisions had been passed, the federal government ought to have opened up discussion on this problem in an attempt to reach a better agreement so that all parties could have co-operated in reaching a solution.

It has been well recorded, Mr. Speaker, that the heaviest burden regarding major public problems and expenditure priorities lies at the provincial and municipal level, while the federal government has the largest share of available revenues. With increasing urbanization and pollution, the problem of the municipal and provincial governments will be strongly accentuated. One must remember that taxing powers are more heavily weighted in favour of the federal government. We ask, what will this fundamental imbalance do to our federal system? I suggest that it is likely that it will be extremely difficult to contain total tax levels within desirable limits. It is obvious, if one studies tax-sharing principles in this country and the new income tax system, that our system will encourage independent tax action and interprovincial tax differences. Also, it will reduce the provincial share of income and wealth taxation, leave the onus on the provinces to fill an equity gap in wealth taxation and assume primary responsibility to determine the ultimate tax level of resource industries, leave the onus on the fiscally weaker level of government to contain tax levels, and force provinces to increase the income tax after three years to compensate for discontinued revenue guarantees.

I should like to mention something the Minister of Finance referred to, namely, the problem involving health and welfare and the problem of exerting some control in this field with a view to bringing equal levels of benefits to all citizens across Canada. In the health insurance field, the contribution to the provinces under the Hospital Services and Diagnostic Services Act has risen from $734 million, the contribution of 1970-71, to an estimated $950 million for 1972-73. Medicare contributions have risen from $400 million in 1970-71 to $660 million, the current level. The increase has been substantial over two years.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

May I now talk about the serious problem involving cost-sharing arrangements between the federal and provincial governments. The system of cost-sharing is most elaborate. Obviously, the provincial governments have the most pressing and costly responsibilities, while the federal government has a greater revenue generating capacity. It is true that many of the cost-sharing programs were initiated with a view to obtaining national standards of service and portability of benefits. In many cases the provinces were forced into these costly programs at the insistence of the federal government because the federal government chose to use its surplus revenue capacity to invent large programs in areas under provincial jurisdiction.

An analysis of shared-cost programs certainly indicates they are very difficult to control and administer. They are outside the normal process of control at both the federal and provincial levels. There are a great variety of formulae and regulations. The formula for hospitalization insurance, the largest, is the population eligible for hospitalization times 25 per cent of the average national cost per capita, plus 25 per cent of the average provincial cost per capita. That formula alone has a very different impact on the various provinces.

In many cases the federal government is now attempting to get out of these shared-cost programs which are forced on the provinces or at least limit its commitments by reducing the established shared-cost formula. According to this communiqué from the federal-provincial conference in Ottawa on November 15 to 17, the federal government advanced proposals which provided for increases in future federal contributions to provincial health programs, tied to the growth of the gross national product supplemented by a special fund of $640 million to be paid to the provinces over a five year period to assist them in improving their system of health care. It was the aim of the federal government that the new proposal would be designed to give more flexibility to the provincial governments in restraining costs and improving the overall effectiveness of the program.

It is noted that the percentage of the gross national product devoted to health care in Canada is the highest in the world. Unless steps are taken to improve the delivery system, the relative share of national care will have to grow even further to the detriment of the capacity of individuals to meet their needs. While I agree we must have some means of controlling health costs within our country, this is not the time for the federal government to throw in the sponge and opt out of the cost-sharing field until suitable alternatives have been found.

What is the problem? The essential problem in hospitalization and medicare is a lack of standards. Probably it is very difficult to arrive at these standards because health care is very desirable. No matter how much money is spent or how many programs are expanded, there are always programs left over that are considered desirable and will improve health care for the people.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is now involved in programs, along with the provinces, for community health clinics which it is felt will control doctor inspired excessive health expenditures. To a limited extent, these may solve the problem, as long as it is realized that a specific amount allocated to a particular clinic will be the governing factor as to how much care the particular facility will give to the population. Whether it will be enough or not may not be obvious to the individual receiving the care. In any event, it will be a limiting factor. In effect, it is limitation through the allocation of money.

There is a problem being experienced in the United Kingdom. The bed population varies in different parts of the country from one per 1,000 to five. However, there is no discernible difference between the death or morbidity rate or those needs by which we are to measure health services. We now have to decide how much the governments in Canada wish to spend on health, hospital and medicare programs and proceed from there. I think the Department of National Health and Welfare is now exploring areas which are likely relatively non-productive. There is a need to reorganize some of their thrust. Although we all agree that all citizens in Canada should receive the same level of care, no real standards are laid down as to what is required to attain a reasonable standard of care.

Yesterday the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) stated that he felt the government should explore certain areas in health care, I presume, as well as taking over completely the shared-cost programs. I do not think this would be good. Health care is personal. It varies in different parts of the country. Health care and welfare should remain under the control of the provincial government. This is a matter to be worked out between the federal and provincial governments. If the wealthy provinces wish to opt out for tax points, surely this can be arranged. However, we must remember that the poorer provinces need to have standards in order to procure for their people some reasonable level of services. There is some disparity in the shared-cost efforts in this field, but it must be realized that there will always be some disparities no matter how much effort is made to preserve equality all across this country.

In the Rowell-Sirois report, it was recommended that there should be an independent commission to look at the problem of the fiscal means of the provinces versus the federal government and periodic reviews and suggestions. It is unfortunate that this committee has never been established.

With Bill C-8, we are destined to have a very serious problem for another five years in relation to the control of health, welfare and education costs. These seem destined to increase because of the formula under which they have been set up. They will grow at an alarming rate and will have to be adequately looked after in the future. After having spent so much time on the tax bill, it is unfortunate that the government did not include some review of the very important problem of fiscal relations between the provinces and the federal government.

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate, not to contribute anything in the line of technicalities, to discuss balancing of budgets or payment of money from one province to another or from the federal government to provincial governments, but to comment on the underlying principles of this legislation, at least principles which I hope underlie it. My intervention probably would not have been necessary if there had not been a certain amount of publicity during the past few weeks which seemed to indicate that at least some people in this country feel they are practising the virtue of charity by participating in the equalization payments. Some who claim to be plugged into God feel they are following the teachings of St. Paul when he said:

> And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

To be a virtue, charity must be practised properly, otherwise the virtue becomes a vice, the vice of pride. The same good book that gives us the words of St. Paul about these three virtues also has reference to the story or parable of the Pharisee and the Publican who went up to the temple to pray. The Pharisee patted himself on the back saying, thank God I am not like those others; I don't do this and I don't do that and I tithe three times my salary and so on. And the final story was that the Lord said: He that exalteth himself shall be abased and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. This is the pride that is a vice.

But there is another kind of pride, a justifiable pride, the pride of a man in his work, the pride he has in his ability to work, the pride a man has in the mere fact that he is a human being. Pride in this sense is justifiable and it engenders in man a capacity to retain his own dignity and to respect that of his fellow men. We must respect this justifiable pride, respect this dignity, respect all these qualities in those we hope to assist, otherwise the virtue we hope we are practising may well turn into a vice. Otherwise, we may well turn in Pharisees, patting ourselves on the back with great self-justification, feeling we are great guys. It is my belief that charity, in the sense I have used the word, does not mean giving; rather, it means loving, or giving because of love. It means a state of mind where one recognizes the need of a fellow man and feels a genuine desire to help that fellow man without self gratification and without desire for reward. It is true this is an idealistic point of view, but in the context in which we are considering this question, the context of equalization payments, there is also a degree of realism.

Under the scheme which is proposed, the "have" provinces are called upon to give, but they will also receive. I can recall a speech made by the former premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Smallwood, at a federal-provincial conference held in the west block in the latter part of 1968 or early in 1969. In the course of his speech he described the situation of a Newfoundlander who, when he rose in the morning, got out of a bed which had been made in Ontario, stepped on to a floor which had been manufactured in British Columbia, walked into the kitchen and sat down at a table manufactured in Quebec, reached for a bowl which had been made in southern Ontario, filled it with cereal from Saskatchewan, covered it with milk from the Maritimes and began his breakfast in a house heated by oil from Alberta and insured, in case of fire, under a policy originating in Manitoba. So the Newfoundlander, though receiving grants from other provinces under this scheme, is nevertheless the buyer of products from the "have" provinces. This is the whole idea of the scheme.

But, while recognizing the realistic benefits of legislation of this type, I prefer to believe that the whole meaning of the legislation is based on the true meaning of charity, and that is love—love for our fellow man, love for our country. I can think of no sounder ground upon which to build a united Canada.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in opening the debate when he introduced this bill, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) indicated yesterday that the purpose of the measure was to continue the arrangements which had been in existence for many years between the federal government and the provinces, arrangements under which the federal government pays to the provinces, dependent on various formulas of need, substantial sums of money to help poorer provinces particularly to meet the basic requirements of their people.

No one in this House would question, nor to my knowledge has any political party questioned, the primary objective of this proposal and of similar proposals made in years gone by, particularly since the Rowell-Sirois study completed almost 30 years ago. While we support the basic principle as enunciated in this bill and as explained by the minister, we wish to make it clear that we do not accept the suggestion that we have achieved the kind of equity which is required; neither do we agree that the proposals which have been made in the past year or which are contained in this arrangement are adequate to meet the needs of the Canadian people.

Without putting on record today the actual figures, let me say that I do not believe any hon. member would disagree with the statement that the differences in per capita income between people in provinces such as Newfoundland and provinces such as Ontario or British Columbia are still very large. We therefore support this proposal and other programs which have been evolved by federal governments to aid citizens in the poorer provinces and to bring standards in the fields of health, education and welfare in those provinces to substantially higher levels, to try to bring them somewhere near the standards which have been achieved in provinces such as British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

This having been said, we must still face the fact that today the disparities in income between people in provinces such as Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, as compared with those of people in Ontario and British Columbia, are just as great in relative terms as they were 30 years ago. Of course, the incomes of people living in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick have gone up in the last 30 years. Relatively, though, they are still in the same position as they were 30 years ago, and this despite the tax-sharing agreement, despite the valiant if somewhat misguided efforts of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), despite the shared-cost programs initiated up to date. For these reasons, I believe we ought to express a good deal less satisfaction with what we have achieved than I detected in speeches made yesterday by the Minister of Finance and by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who dealt with the proposals of the federal government in connection with post-secondary education.

I want to deal specifically with what I consider to be two or three basic, fundamental faults in the proposals that have been made by the federal government to the provinces. For one thing, the federal government made it clear to the provinces that as soon as it can in the very near future, it intends to restrict the amount of annual increase it is prepared to pay toward any shared-cost program with the provinces, particularly in the fields of health and post-secondary education. No citizen of Canada, certainly no member of parliament and, I suggest, member of any provincial legislature in Canada can fail to be disturbed by the very sharp increases, in costs that have been taking place annually in the fields of health, welfare and education. Therefore, it is not surprising that the federal government and provinces are beginning to reassess and re-evaluate programs in the fields of health, welfare and education, particularly post-secondary education.

Most of these programs that are now a fact of life in Canada are in fields in which we have made very spectacular improvements during the last 20 years, programs where the initiative came, quite properly, from the federal government. After all, Mr. Speaker, if any province in Canada has a government-operated universal hospital insurance plan, it was the federal government that first proposed to the province that the plan be initiated and that Ottawa would finance 50 per cent of the cost. Every province of Canada has a medical insurance plan under which virtually every citizen of the country can be assured that the cost of medical care will be met by the government through the raising of taxes of various kinds, such as sales tax or income tax, or some combination of tax and premium, while Ottawa is paying 50 per cent of the total cost. Hardly any province would have gone into such a plan had Ottawa not made it clear that it wanted such a plan and was prepared to meet 50 per cent of the cost. I am sure there is no provincial government in Canada that is not exhibiting marked concern at the sharply escalating cost of medical and hospital care. And so they should, Mr. Speaker. After all, the money to pay for these health care plans comes from the people of Canada in one form or another, be it through taxes or premiums.

Now that Ottawa has persuaded the province to enter into such arrangements with the federal government, the federal government is seriously considering terminating the agreement. It is considering withdrawing from shared-cost programs so that it will no longer have to pay 50 per cent of the cost. For Ottawa to say, as it is making very clear to the provinces, that it is giving serious consideration to limiting the annual increases in costs that it will pay in any one year is, I suggest, a unilateral decision that flies in the face of the principle that was jointly agreed upon by the federal and provincial governments. I agree with the studies that are being conducted by the federal government and the provinces into methods of slowing down the very sharply increasing cost of health and hospital care. The people of this country cannot afford to continue to pay each year the increase of more than 10 per cent a year in hospital and medical costs. I support the studies that are being made, but, further, I believe that the federal and provincial governments need to look at some possible alternatives.

In my own province a number of alternatives are being explored. The government is looking at methods by which the number of acute care hospital beds can be, if not reduced, at least gradually diminished by offering alternative facilities by way of convalescent hospital beds, and so on. Certainly, I think such facilities are necessary. The provincial government is looking at the possibility of having doctors work in teams at community health clinics and being paid a salary rather than a fee for service. Tests now done either in private clinics or hospitals would be done much more cheaply at community health clinics. In the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia, the premiers have made it very clear that the virtually unilateral increases in medical fees that doctors have been able to charge must be arrested. In the province of Quebec, the provincial government has put forward proposals in an attempt to try to control the increasing cost of health care. All such attempts should be pursued vigorously.

As I have said, I cannot accept the unilateral decision of the federal government to limit, as far as the federal government is concerned, the cost of health programs to a certain percentage each year. I am not saying that methods to limit these increases should not be found; of course they must be found. But I do reject the idea that, having helped persuade the provinces to enter into these kinds of plans for the benefit of their citizens, Ottawa should now decide either to withdraw completely or to reduce unilaterally the percentage of the cost it has paid up to now.

I do not say this in criticism, but I would remind the members on the government side that provinces like New Brunswick, for example, were somewhat loth to embark upon a universal health insurance plan, not because the province did not want it or because their citizens did not need it, but simply because they were worried about how to finance such a plan. New Brunswick has now—I am speaking from memory but I think I am not far wrong—a 7 per cent sales tax. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that if the federal government is to unilaterally restrict the percentage of the medical insurance contributions which it makes to the province of New Brunswick, that province may in the very near future have to increase its sales tax even more. There is no more regressive type of tax than a sales tax. There is no tax which hits poor people, people with low incomes, harder than a sales tax. Yet, if the federal government goes ahead with its proposal to limit its contribution to health programs, that is probably what a province such as New Brunswick will have to do. As I say, the government of Canada has been trying to get the provinces to agree to its proposal which would severely limit future federal participation in hospital insurance and medicare programs which, as I have already said, were originally established by Ottawa. Not only would the federal government's proposals undercut and erode existing national health standards, but they would also effectively thwart attempts by provincial governments to revise their health service delivery systems so as to introduce more efficient, less costly alternative care methods.

I have indicated some of the attempts which have been made in Manitoba and other provinces to improve health services and at the same time control the cost. The provincial governments have consistently opposed the attempts by the federal government to apply the kind of arbitrary arithmetical ceilings on expenditures in the field of health care, and in other shared-cost programs, on the grounds that the controls which the federal government is proposing fail to provide allowances for provinces with relatively weak fiscal capacities to upgrade their service standards, to narrow the gap between their services and the services provided by wealthier provinces, and to maintain their services at these levels once they have been attained.

The province of Manitoba has objected to the federal government's proposal that it use the growth rate of per capita gross national product with some variations to calculate the amount of increase which Ottawa is prepared to agree to in the field of shared-cost programs. The province of Manitoba has emphasized that the gross national product figures bear no relationship to the health program costs or quality and, more important, no relation to health care needs, and that therefore this kind of calculation simply cannot serve as the basis for determining programming decisions in the years ahead.

The province of Manitoba has outlined the elements which it believes should form the basis of any new financing arrangements. They suggested that the plan should be flexible enough to allow the provinces to move toward more effective alternative delivery systems while maintaining and, where possible, improving the service standards. Second, it is suggested that federal support must be adequate, not only to meet the demands placed on existing services—demands which will continue to be high, especially in any transition period while new programs are being initiated—but also to cover the necessary large costs of effecting a program redirection of the magnitude required to ensure longrun cost de-escalation. Arbitrary limits put on the cost of financing health care programs by the federal government will not put a cap on the increasing cost. What they will do is shift the burden increasingly from the federal government which has the money to the provinces which simply do not have the money required to meet the increasing costs. The province of Manitoba has made it clear, and in this it has been joined by the province of Saskatchewan and other provinces, that it rejects the proposal of the federal government that it set an arbitrary limit on the percentage increase which Ottawa is prepared to pay to meet the cost of health care services.

Lastly, the Manitoba government has insisted that federal support must be allocated in such a way as to recognize the special needs of various regions in Canada as well as the fiscal capacities of the different provincial governments to meet these needs.

Let me just give one illustration of what I mean. The province of Newfoundland is certainly one of the poorest provinces in this country, if not the poorest. Some years ago it established a medical school. For the first time, some of the doctors whom they need in order to try to treat the people who are ill in Newfoundland are being trained in that province. The province is paying a substantial percentage of the cost of building that medical college and of maintaining it. But we live in an open society. A very large percentage of the graduates of that medical college in the province of Newfoundland will leave that province in a short period of time. I am not suggesting that Newfoundland ought to do very much to force those doctors to stay in the province, but I am suggesting that there is something very unfair in the people of Canada expecting the people of Newfoundland, who are amongst the poorest people in the country, to pay for the building of a medical college and for the maintenance of that college, the bulk of the graduates of which will leave that province to practise in the wealthier parts of this country. I say that the federal government should be prepared to take that kind of situation into consideration and to evolve a system flexible enough so that the people and the government of Newfoundland do not suffer because they established a medical college in that province.

PRIVATE BILLS

UNITED BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale) moved that Bill C-164, to incorporate United Bank of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a proposal to create a new bank in Canada. It comes before the House in the standard form of a bill attached as an appendix to the Bank Act. It is sponsored by prominent Canadian citizens who have conceived and taken the initiative in forming a new bank with new ideas to meet the needs of the Canadian people.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Among the provisional directors of the bank is Mr. Benjamin V. Levinter, Q.C., a Toronto lawyer who is well known in the city of Toronto and who, after listening to a speech delivered by the Hon. Walter Gordon about a year ago, decided that Canada does need another bank. He has gathered together a group of prominent Canadians who include such people as Dr. Gerald Lasalle, of Sherbrooke, Quebec, who is a well known and respected figure in that province. He has been Registrar and a Governor of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Quebec, and is Dean of the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Sherbrooke.

Another provisional director is Mr. A. J. Pianosi of Sudbury, Ontario, a successful businessman. Then there is Mr. Zenon Gutkowski, a chartered accountant, of Toronto, who has lectured in the accounting courses at Queen's University and at the University of Toronto, and for the past 12 years has been director and treasurer of one of the largest credit unions in Canada, the St. Stanislaus Parish Credit Union. Another provisional director is Mr. Isadore Levinter, a lawyer from Toronto, and a Life Bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada.

The objectives of the provisional directors are to establish a bank in which Canadians of all ethnic origins will be involved in every facet of its affairs, and a bank which will be particularly aware of and concerned with the needs of people in different groups and different regions of Canada, and also with certain other concepts to which I shall refer later. Apart from these special considerations they also believe that another bank, and particularly one with some different concepts and emphasis, will be of real benefit to the Canadian economy in that it will make available additional money to finance business, provide employment, and increase competition in the banking system of Canada.

I believe that hon. members are already aware of some aspects of the ideas of the provisional directors of the proposed bank. This bill was debated in the Senate in June, 1971, studied by the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in September and October, 1971, and passed and given third reading in the Senate last fall.

Information which hon. members may be seeking can be found in the record of the proceedings of the Senate. I believe those proceedings give a good idea of what this bank is all about. They contain an outline, and in fact a good deal of detail concerning the proposed bank, and I do not wish to take up the time of the House at present by going into all the detail. However, there are a number of things about the proposal to establish this new bank which should commend it to all Canadians and to the members of this House.

This new bank will seek the involvement of Canadians of many ethnic origins, including French Canadians and Anglo Saxons, in every facet of its affairs; its board of directors, its management and employees at all levels, and with the special concerns which many of our people have by reason of language or other distinctions. It will also allow a degree of regional control to those responsible for the operation of its branches in the five regions of Canada, which will result in many, if not all of the advantages of a regional bank in a particular region.

There is no financial group promoting this bank with the intention of having financial control of it through their stock holdings. The provisional directors are in fact the actual promoters, and the plan to be followed in raising the bank's capital will ensure that there will be no in group with such financial control. Further, the provisional directors have engaged the services of a firm of financial consultants in Montreal, Chartec Limited, for the purposes of making a survey of the market and giving an opinion and report as to the feasibility of obtaining the required money through a public issue in Canada, with the stock being sold by many brokers all over Canada and being distributed as widely as possible. As appears from Chartec's report and the evidence which they gave before the Senate Committee last autumn, an assurance has been given that a sum which is adequate, namely, $20 million, can be raised in this way.

The chartering of a new bank at this time will make available additional money and financial assistance to assist business and increase employment. The chartering of a new bank at this time will also provide fresh, vigorous competition in a most vital area of our economic life in which, because of mergers and other reasons, the general trend in recent years has been very much in the other direction.

Each of the provisional directors comes from outside the normal banking establishment. The new bank will unite Canadians of all backgrounds in a concept which will be Canadian all the way. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I believe there are many things about its concepts and plans which should commend this proposed bank to all Canadians and to the members of this House.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) concerning the necessity and desirability of having an additional bank, particularly one based on regional criteria. For many years I have been of the opinion that we should nationalize the banking institutions. When you have a good proposition and go to a bank manager he is apt to allow you to borrow money. If you have a proposition that is not so good, it is not likely that you will be able to borrow money from any bank. If you have a really poor proposition even a bank manager will tell you that you had better go to a finance company. If you do that, and the finance company agrees to make a loan, it in turn will borrow the money from a bank because finance companies in general are able to get their pound of flesh even if things go wrong.

It seems to me, and I may be wrong, Mr. Speaker, that there is absolutely no competition in the banking field. Recently three banks applied to Parliament for charters and in each case the reason given was that a regional area was not properly served. Two banks were given charters but one was not able to raise the money, for reasons that I shall not go into now. The other is operating, I presume successfully, in British Columbia. I suppose whether Mr. Bennett keeps his money in that bank is a political question, and whether a province should have some say in the operation of the banking institution is also open to argument.

Every time I pick up a newspaper and learn that the bank rate of, say, the Bank of Montreal has increased by a quarter of one per cent, I can be sure that by the next day the other banks will have raised their rates. This happens all the way up to 10 per cent. Banking institutions in Canada would find it difficult to say that they are meeting the needs of the public. They are no more justified in charging 10 or 11 per cent than they would be justified in lending at 2 per cent or 3 per cent if there were no takers, as is sometimes the case today. Some banks are making telephone calls to customers asking them to borrow money because they have more than they are lending.

As was indicated by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), the Senate probably operates in a more businesslike manner than we do in this field and there is a good reason for that. Very few Senators have not been given a directorship in some company and many are on the boards of two or three banks. I believe the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is a director of a very influential company in the Canadian banking field. The committee hired Chartec Limited of Montreal to find out whether ownership of this bank was to be in the hands of as many Canadians as possible. The bank was to have an initial capitalization of $20 million and the provisional directors were in no way to control the bank financially. The firm of Chartec Limited and its members were to have no financial interest in the actual sale of the shares.

This company interviewed 71 people in Toronto representing 28 investment firms and 18 institutions. Their comments were summarized in the proceedings of that committee, No. 37, at pages 7 and 8 as follows:

One, investor interest in Canadian chartered bank shares in general is high, in view of the high return on capital investment. Investor interest in the United Bank, solely on the grounds of the provisional board's responsible and deliberate actions to date, has given the impression that the investor believes that the basic policies of the bank will ensure a profitable operation.

Two, one crucial factor in investor interest has been the desire expressed by the provisional board that no one group, or small combinations, will control this particular bank—

Three, institutional investors, brokers and dealers are particularly conscious of the role that they can play in realizing what so many Canadians want at this point in our history, that is, a broader genesis and control of emerging Canadian industry. With their leadership, a public issue will be successful.

Four, the deliberate attempt by the founders to involve a group of Canadians from all walks of life, to ensure the bank's particular responsiveness to the changing Canada of the seventies was fully endorsed.

Finally, the regional concept of the bank found great acceptance.

Mr. Speaker, I have an inkling, and it is just that and not backed by any solid information, that this bank will probably end up as a depository for moneys being made in Canada by the Mafia, not only from legitimate business but in investments from other areas as well. It is well known that the building trades are very interested in becoming involved in this bank. We are aware that building contractors make arrangements not only with their employees and allied trades but with banking institutions. Because there is so much construction going on in the city of Toronto, this appears to me to be a lucrative way of not only obtaining capital for the contracts, but also of being a very good place to put legitimate money and money which might not be so legitimate. I have no way of knowing that this is so, except from comments that I have heard. I have no means of investigating this institution to find out whether it is so, but I am of the opinion that the CIA would be interested. I am sure that the members of this House would also be interested and that this bank would get a short shrift indeed if this were the case.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a bank is a place where a person who wants to do something constructive can go and borrow large sums of money. About a week ago I commented to an entrepreneur in my area that if all this money being provided to the Lift program, the winter works program and the Opportunities for Youth program were given to the area as a cash donation, we could start a fairly good sized industry which would employ people for long periods of time. The winter works program in Timiskaming is worth approximately half a million dollars, and he told me that if this amount were invested in an industry it would produce at least $20 million worth of business. Mr. Speaker, with $20 million worth of business in Timiskaming we could employ a large number of the 25 per cent of our people who are unemployed at the present time.

I just wonder what this bank would do in that regard. It is all very well to say that the money coming from western Canada is being invested somewhere else. As long as a bank has the sole purpose of making a profit, it will take the money where the highest rate of interest and the lowest risk is available and this bank would be no different. It is very easy for the investors to say to the investigating company hired by the Senate Committee that most of the money will be spent in Ontario. This may be true, but I suggest that anybody who has difficulty obtaining money from one of the chartered banks in Canada will have difficulty with them all. If a borrower is turned down by one bank he will be turned down by two. When these people are turned down by two banks, they try to raise money from the Industrial Development Bank, which really is a government agency. Therefore, the banking institutions of Canada take no undue risks.

I suggest that United Bank of Canada, if incorporated, will not do anything in this regard that is different from what the six other chartered banks would do. We must remember that when we are asked to pass this bill. I think it is unrealistic to suggest that because this bank is to be situated in Toronto, it will lend money on a regional basis to meet regional needs. Certainly, its money will be obtained on a regional basis, simply because in Toronto a great deal of money is being spent. It will continue to be spent there until we decide to change the structure of this country and develop some of the resources of the mid-Canada corridor. The chartered banks are not lending much money for development in that corridor. I suggest that the proposed bank will be no better and probably no worse than the chartered banks in this regard. Therefore, what is the point of establishing it?

All that banks do, when they go into business in any community, is take over or build a building and employ another set of employees. The operations of banks are practically identical. If you are a poor risk, they will not lend you money, and if you are a good risk they will. It is true that in different towns slightly different policies may be followed, largely because certain bank managers adopt different philosophies. For instance, one manager may be a lender; that is, he may like to lend. His bank will lend money. The bank may move him to another town and instal in his place a collector, or a manager who insists on collecting all debts. Of course, after banks have lent money they like to collect what is owing. The point is that, in the end, all the banks work the same way.

In December of last year I spoke on this bill, then Bill S-22. It had originated in the other place. In passing may I say that I am glad this bill has been initiated in this House. Whether hon. members who may not be here this afternoon, or who are present, for that matter, care to admit it or not, it is the elected representatives of the people sitting in this House and not the members of the Senate who may consider personal, regional or corporate interests, who should take a look at bills such as this. Although hon. members have available limited resources for research, nevertheless it is they who ought to make the decision on the setting up of such a bank. Surely one of our major purposes must be to consider such matters.

When I spoke, Mr. Speaker, I said that banks borrow money at a certain rate and lend it at another and, in the process, make a reasonable mark-up. It has been drawn to my attention by a gentleman in western Canada that commercial banks do not borrow the money they lend from the Bank of Canada. He says that this is a purely unrealistic concept when we realize that it takes 75 per cent of the bank's income from interest to pay operating costs. He adds that if they charged 8 per cent on loans they would have to get their money from the Bank of Canada at 2 per cent just to break even. Privately owned banks operate for profit for themselves, and their profits are substantial being at 25 per cent of gross revenue. I will not argue with that contention because, very likely, the gentleman in western Canada is correct. However, if that is correct, it means that we are examining an operation in which banks are obtaining money from depositors, lending it at interest, and, after deducting operating costs, making mark-ups in the region of 25 per cent.

I said in my speech made previously that I wanted to see more competition in the banking field, although I did not expect to see more competition. The gentleman from western Canada disagreed with my statement regarding competition and said:

> Banking is a service. It makes no direct contribution to the volume of the G.N.P. nor does it make any contribution to the economies effected in its production. Too often in the provision of services the sharing of a particular service adds to the cost of that service by the necessity of providing duplicate facilities. The virtues of competition are mostly mythical.

The correspondent at Shell Lake, Saskatchewan, is probably right. He made other comments in his letter which I appreciate. I am happy to acknowledge that his knowledge of the banking system far exceeds mine. Nevertheless, whether banks are only providing a service, the field of banking is one that the government itself has become involved in to a great extent. As I said a moment ago, the Industrial Development Bank provides funds for certain industrial purposes.

Also, the government of Ontario has become involved in the tourist industry and has given large loans in this area.

These loans have enabled certain borrowers to start an enterprise, and have also been of benefit to an industry that has been badly underserviced in Canada and which could not expand if moneys had not been forthcoming. These moneys were needed to provide facilities in certain areas where facilities had hitherto not been available.

One must also remember that when the government grants moneys under the DREE program, it grants moneys to industries that may be marginal. There, again, the government has entered the banking field, in a manner of speaking. Actually, I am not surprised to see some of these projects going into bankruptcy; neither am I particularly worried. It is desirable to establish industries in certain areas. Some industries need help desperately and, after the banks have refused to help, they have come to the government. Therefore, I say that the government has become involved in the field of banking. For that reason, Members of Parliament should look carefully at the bill before them.

We must look at the entire banking system itself and see how it affects industrial development in Canada. I am not particularly interested in setting up a bank which will merely operate in the old pattern already set by the chartered banks, for their operation has been totally deficient in many fields in this country. I suggest that it is hogwash to talk about an ethnic bank, hogwash to say that it is necessary in any region and hogwash to suggest that it is necessary in Toronto. If a so-called ethnic borrower could meet the legitimate conditions that would be laid down by this bank, I am sure that he would be acceptable to any other bank.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity of saying a few words about the establishment of a new bank, to be called United Bank of Canada, to which Bill C-164 refers.

Mr. Speaker, we are not precisely opposed to the creation of a new bank, but we want to give our opinion because we claim that banks do not properly fulfill their function in the economy.

They are necessary to our structure. They should ensure smooth running of our economy and not hinder it. When the economy is in trouble, the banks are involved to some extent. When the economy progresses, under our present banking system progress and development are achieved through the contracting of debts.

Canadians need healthy and efficient finances and that is why we are discussing banks. We do not seek to destroy our financial system, nor do we claim that it is wholly bad, but it must be improved.

Why do we criticize the present financial system? Because it is at the root of the evil, not fulfilling its proper functions which are to finance the production of goods corresponding to requirements and the distribution of these goods.

That is one of the proper functions of banks and we shall demonstrate that the financial system does not meet all requirements according to facts, needs and realities of our economy.

If the financial system did all this, it would be fulfilling its functions, but we can definitely state that it does not. And it is easy to say that it does not because we can see that the people ask for public and private goods that are definitely possible on a physical basis but that do not materialize because the financial system does not finance their production.

Also, some goods are offered to the people who need them but families cannot get them because the financial system does not finance consumption as a whole. These are undeniable facts.

Financial credit derives its value, Mr. Speaker, from real credit, that is, from the production capacity of the country. The dollar under any form has any value only because the country's production can supply products to support it. This production capacity is rightly called "real credit", because it is a real factor of confidence. It is the real credit of a country, its production capacity which gives people confidence that they can live in that country.

There are two kinds of credit: real credit and financial credit. To whom does financial credit belong, Mr. Speaker? At its source, financial credit belongs to the community, on the same basis as real credit, which gives it its value. This is a collective commodity which must benefit in one way or another to all members of the community.

Like real credit, financial credit by its very nature is social credit. The use of these collective goods must not be subjected to conditions that hamper production capacity or that divert production from its own specific end, namely the meeting of human needs. These needs are of a private or public nature, in the order of their urgency. The essential needs of all must be met before the luxury demands of a few can be bealt with.

Therefore, chartered banks, on account of their nature and privileges, of their sovereign right to issue credit in large quantity, meet the requirements of public order, because to lend by creating debts is to curb all development, as the terms of these loans are such as to disposess the citizen of all their goods, public and private.

We obviously need a financial system which yields to reality rather than forces it, a financial system which reflects the facts rather than contradicts them. We need a financial system which distributes rather than rations.

Mr. Speaker, the present financial system—and this happens in many fields—is rationing both the economy and the development process. We need a financial system which helps rather than degrades. Our present banking system runs us into debts, rations and prevents possible developments and paralyzes the economy. It is inconceivable that such a financial system can be perpetuated.

Another bank, Mr. Speaker, will not alter the situation very much either way. Another bank more, or less, will not provide more credit in the interest of the people. Such credit would be provided in the form of debts, of credit issues, to the extent that they will be public or private debts.

Banks, companies, even governments, in short, all institutions or corporations are mere productive or administrative tools serving the people. That is what our banks should be. The people are sacrificed in the interest of banks, of companies, of governments and of large institutions. Is this not clear enough?

I will go even farther. These are facts, observations. This is where the matter stands. This is the present position of our government, the first institution in Canada which is mainly responsible for our economic, monetary and political system.

We form a government of 264 members elected by 22 million Canadians who all have the right to live according to our production capacity. We are thus responsible in Parliament for taking the corrective measures needed in our economy.

Stating facts does not mean accusing, reproaching, blaming or even judging the government. But facts speak for themselves and help us to understand the causes of a parliamentary crisis that might be nothing more than a superficial abcess yet, but nevertheless shows the seriousness of the evil of our administration in Canada.

Here is our balance-sheet for 1967. At a time when in many cases people lack the necessities of life or normal well-being, our banks increased their assets by $3.2 billion. Our companies pocketed or constituted new capital totalling more than $15 billion, and we want to keep on reducing the purchasing power of individuals in order to increase the profits, the capital of banks and big corporations.

Mr. Speaker, in 1967, bank assets increased by $3.2 billion. In 1971, such assets increased by $7,121,396,000, to reach $54,428,406,000, namely a 14 per cent increase in 12 months.

As a matter of fact, here is a table showing bank assets:

October 31, 1970: $46,256,652,000.

October 31, 1971: $52,317,395,000. (For an average of $500 million per month for 1970-71.)

November 30, 1971: $53,147,362,000.

December 31, 1971: $54,428,406,000. (For an average of $1 billion per month for the last two months of 1971.)

Bank assets are therefore increasing from year to year as never before, but the income of most Canadians is smaller. When bank assets show a monthly increase of $1 million as they did during the last two months, the assets of small businesses are reduced, and Canadians are lacking the bare necessities. But the government, despite its prerogatives, does not in the least think of controlling money and credit for the benefit ot the nation.

Mr. Speaker, is such a weak monetary system likely to survive by raising new loans to pay up old ones? In the end, this leads to periodic massive cancellations of debts both private and public, cancellations which in turn pave the way to bankruptcy, repudiation or devaluation.

Over the last few years, we have witnessed devaluations in a number of countries. These were merely the repudiation of debts gordering on bankruptcy. Our economy went through all that. Bankruptcy is a daily occurrence in Canada. In fact, we have had 2,287 bankruptcies since 1969. It is terrible to see that a country such as ours will soon be forced to devaluate its currency to survive along with its system.

As for individual and collective indebtedness, it is undisputable proof that we must improve our banking system and modify the obsolete concept of credit based on shortage of goods. And it is precisely on that point that social crediters maintain that the inadequacy of the purchasing power may be explained by the inability of the current financial system to supply enough currency to buy the goods produced.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to improve our economy we must straighten out our current financial system by converting our national debt into a national asset. And the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is far from advocating or achieving at.

Let me state briefly how to convert the national debt into a national asset. All our consumption should be financed not by chartered banks but by a central bank or credit commission, a strictly non-profit institution and not profit-oriented as our chartered banks are. All the country's consumption should be financed with interest-free money and all private or public production should be financed by debt-free money. Thus, there would no longer be any national debt since it would be converted into national capital or assets which would then yield national interests distributed as national or social dividends.

That is how we could proceed.

Mr. Speaker, we should immediately convert the national debt into national assets and the interests on the national debt in national dividends to be distributed to all Canadian citizens.

That part of taxes now earmarked for paying bank interests is outright robbery and such a procedure should be abolished along with the use of taxes to reimburse loans. We all know that the amounts involved are considerable if we consider the municipal, school, provincial and federal administrations involved.

The national debt, Mr. Speaker, is the worst swindle and the interests on the debt are extorted from taxpayers as the result of a fraud.

We have a lot of things to say about the banking system, but since we have reached a climax tonight with the request made to the government about the creation of an institution which would be allowed to handle Canada's capital, we will not oppose it too much because we know that one bank more or less will do very little to improve our economic situation.

We know that this will not solve the problem but we have decided to let the bill go through. We believe that it should be referred to the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to be more thoroughly studied and so that during the committee meetings we might raise objections to it and add to our comments.

We are prepared to let the bill through tonight.

[English]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to sound a note of caution in connection with this bill to establish a new bank in Canada. Over the years, Canadian banks have gained a very high reputation in international circles. It is many years since there have been any failures involving Canadian banks or since any difficulties have arisen in relation to their financial situation. It is important and necessary that before hon. members approve the establishment of a new bank they should make certain that it will meet the very high standards which have been set.

What causes me concern is that in recent years a number of new banks have been established by Parliament and, generally speaking, they have met with only limited success. On one occasion several banks were chartered within a very short period of time and their affairs did not work out well. I need not go into the details of each case, but they are moving ahead very slowly in most instances and in one case they are not moving at all.

We must assume our responsibility in this House to see that the great international reputation of Canadian banks is not jeopardized by anything we may do. If the institution which we are considering called itself something other than a bank, I would have no hesitation. I assume that the people who are applying for a charter, the people behind the application, are reputable Canadians, people who believe they can establish and operate a bank in the finest traditions of Canadian institutions. I have no hesitation about making this assumption, otherwise I do not believe the bill would have got this far; I do not believe it would be sponsored by a member of the House if he had not formed the opinion that it was well backed and well financed. But this institution is, if approved, to be a bank. It will be a Canadian bank, and when it is operating the reputation of all Canadian banks will depend upon the latest, the newest and the weakest in the banking system. The matter should, therefore, not be dealt with lightly.

I hope the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs will closely scrutinize the details of the bank, the ability of the people behind the application, the opinions of the government officials who have been dealing with it and the views of the parliamentary sponsors who have brought the bill this far. The conditions set out in the Bank Act must be strictly enforced and supervision should continue beyond the initial stage.

That, in effect, is the concern I wanted to express. These bills are brought before the House on an occasion such as this, and those who have not been involved closely with the establishment of the bank and do not know the background are very poorly equipped to come to the real decision that we have to make this afternoon as to whether we have a properly sponsored and well financed bank. I do not think we have this background or adequate information. Neither do I think we can expect to be given it in the few minutes that the sponsor had to present his case. Rather, I believe the situation demands very close attention in the standing committee.

I do not intend to oppose the bill. Obviously, certain conditions at the start must have been met; we can only make that assumption with nothing further to go on. But I would sound a note of caution. I am sure that the members of the standing committee, as well as the officials who have to set up the bank and secure financing, who have to verify that all conditions have been met, will be very careful on behalf of the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people to see that the bank operates as a good Canadian banking institution. If they do that, then I think their purpose as well as ours will have been met.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

AUTHORIZATION OF FISCAL PAYMENTS TO AND TAX COLLECTION AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-8, to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks earlier this afternoon I tried to point out the problems that would be created for the provinces by the unilateral decision of the federal government to limit the increases in the contributions that the federal government would make to shared-cost programs such as health services, post-secondary education and other programs. I dealt in some detail with the problems that will confront the provinces as a result of the decision of the federal government in respect of health services.

I want to deal very briefly with the decision made by the federal government and referred to yesterday in the speech of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) with regard to the financing of post-secondary education. Since 1966 we have had an agreement under which the federal government has paid approximately 50 per cent of the cost of education at the post-secondary level and particularly in respect of universities. Now the federal government has decided unilaterally, I think, although the minister tries to give the impression that this proposal had the agreement of the provincial ministers, that the federal government's increased contribution to post-secondary education amount to no more than an increase of 15 per cent in one year.

All Canadian citizens should be concerned about the tremendous increase in the cost of post-secondary education. Dr. Miles Wisenthal, director of Statistics Canada, education division, in a speech at a conference in Banff in 1970, demonstrated how rapidly the cost of post-secondary education has risen in the last ten years and what is likely to happen in the next ten years. He pointed out that education is Canada's biggest industry and that 20 cents of every tax dollar raised from all sources goes to education. He said that per capita education costs have tripled since 1961. He pointed out that 8.5 per cent of the gross national product in Canada goes to education, more than the United States pays, and that in 1969 Canadian taxpayers spent $6.9 billion on education.

He pointed out that one person in three is either a student, a teacher or a service worker in an educational institution and that this does not include part-time teachers or part-time students. Elementary and secondary school enrolments have risen 30 per cent since 1961, and post-secondary enrolments have risen 251 per cent since 1961. What does he foresee for the future?

Dr. Wisenthal made some projections based on the experience of the past ten years. True, there has been a sudden and pretty significant drop in the past year, but nothing which indicates that his estimates are very far wrong. He points out that education costs could rise to 15 per cent of the gross national product, that while in 1969 the yearly costs per university student were merely $3,600, by 1980 these costs could rise to $9,000 per student. By that year, also, the cost to taxpayers for post-secondary education could be $8.3 billion, more than the total cost of education in 1969.

The government of Canada and the provincial governments not only have a right but a duty and responsibility to consider what is happening in education, both in terms of the number of students attending educational institutions at all levels and in terms of the present and projected costs. We have a right to ask ourselves whether we need so many of our young people and young adults attending schools, universities and community colleges. We have a duty to ask whether an educational system in which a youngster starts school at age five and continues until age 25 provides the best way of educating people, or whether we ought to have a system whereby people go to school, later to work and then return to school for a period of years.

We have a right to ask whether the tremendous amounts of money that we are spending on the upgrading of adults through manpower training courses in our educational institutions is the right method by which to proceed, rather than adopting the system used in other countries where manpower training is carried out almost exclusively on the job.

I do not question the right of the federal government to say that there is a limit to what we can do, but having encouraged the provinces to undertake vast expansion of their post-secondary educational facilities, the federal government should not now say in the middle of the ball game that it is going to stop financing post-secondary education or sharing its educational costs and that from now on the limit will be a 15 per cent increase in any one year. I agree that we have to think about restricting increases, but this ought to be done through close co-operation and discussion between the federal government and the provincial governments. That has not been done. The decision, as confirmed yesterday by the Secretary of State, upholds my contention that the federal government has made a unilateral decision which is completely unfair and unwarranted.

I wish to deal with one more subject before I complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker. The federal government has adopted a very rigid attitude toward the provinces with respect to the collection of income taxes. Up until now it is apparent that the federal government is not prepared to discuss with the provinces a system of tax credits within the income tax structure. Manitoba was the first province to make a formal submission to the federal government on this matter. It outlined several possible alternative tax credit system and dealt with some of the administrative processes which would be required. Yet to date it has received no detailed response or reaction from the federal Department of Finance.

The government of Manitoba feels that the basic questions at issue in connection with the tax credit problem, from the point of view of the federal government, should be primarily administrative while consideration in respect of specific credit amounts or related questions should fall within the area of responsibility of the provincial governments. There has been no response from the federal government on this matter.

The Manitoba authorities asked for joint discussions so that they could begin to develop a workable tax credit plan. They hope that next year they can begin such a plan and apply it retroactively to 1972. It is difficult to understand why they have had no response from the federal government, because the federal government agreed with the Ontario government's proposal whereby the Ontario government went ahead with a flat rate, retroactive income tax reduction for Ontario residents. Speaking from memory, and I think I am correct, that was a simple reduction across-the-board of 3 per cent.

The government of Manitoba, ever since it was first elected, has said it wants to establish its taxation system on a much more equitable basis so that people will pay taxes in a way in which they can best afford to pay them. Instead of a simple across-the-board tax cut, Manitoba wants to institute a system of selective tax reductions for people in the lower income brackets.

We have heard many government spokesmen talk about equity. Again and again the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said that we are moving toward a more equitable society, one in which the people in the lower income brackets will be brought closer to an adequate standard of living. When we have the 1971 census figures analysed, I do not believe the evidence will show that in fact we are moving toward a more equitable society. I believe that, when analysed, they will show the complete reverse, that the differences between people in the lower fifth of the income levels and those in the upper fifth are widening rather than narrowing.

The government of Manitoba wants to do what it can to reduce the burden of taxes on people in the lower income brackets. I find it incomprehensible that the federal government having accommodated the government of Ontario with respect to its proposal of a 3 per cent tax cut across the board and having accommodated that province in the collection of its taxes, has so far refused to co-operate with Manitoba in the institution of a tax credit system which would permit Manitobans in the lower income brackets to pay lower taxes than they are now paying.

Therefore, I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and to the government that while we support this bill, and I submit that no Member of Parliament from any province can object to a bill which spells out a form of transferring tax revenues from the richer provinces to the poorer provinces in order that their services be brought closer to the national level, in many ways this bill falls far short of what is required to establish a fair and equitable tax system.

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make some observations on this bill concerning federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, which includes authority to make certain fiscal payments to provinces and to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with the provinces, I do not wish to offer any great criticism because I feel the bill has a great deal to commend it.

As one who has had some experience in dealing with these questions from all points of view, because I had the honour of speaking on behalf of a province at federal-provincial conferences and later I had some federal responsibility, I believe people from both sides of the House can take a degree of satisfaction from the legislation. I feel, however, that some things have been overlooked, particularly in reference to the maritime provinces, although these may be remedied subsequently.

Before proceeding with my remarks on this bill, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). This is the first chance I have had to do so publicly since he has been entrusted with his new duties. Of my own knowledge I can say he has undertaken no small task in view of conditions as they are nationally and internationally. In this vein may I also congratulate the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) who has been elevated to the ministry. I feel this is a recognition well deserved. When he was piloting the tax bill through the House he was always prepared to give any information he could, of which he had a considerable amount. I am glad that his ability and hard work have been recognized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: I agree with the minister about the importance of this bill, because there are certain things in connection with public affairs and business which are important. One is to have the assurance that within a certain period of time things will either be maintained at their present level or improved. With this assurance, provincial governments know where they are going and have something upon which to base their views. The stability to which the minister referred is most important.

It seems to me that a bill which suggests that within five years payments to the provinces will increase from $1¼ billion to $1½ billion is most important and anticipates a great improvement in the economic welfare of the country. It is a great thing to be an optimist. Generally speaking, people who accomplish things are optimists and go ahead on the assumption that conditions are going to improve. Some members of my party have been accused of being prophets of doom, but in this connection I find it reassuring that the government—I do not necessarily mean the government, but rather those entrusted with the administrative functions of government—consider that it is perfectly in order for them to suggest that payments may increase from $1 billion to $1¼ billion in five years.

The question of stability is most important for the provinces. To a degree my remarks are made from that point of view; it is difficult to get out of the habit. Without question, the matter of revenue raising in the provinces is of great importance, and it is a tremendous thing for the provinces to be assured that should their revenues fall below the national average because of lack of revenue capacity, the federal government will make up the difference. As far as the province in which I reside and which I represent is concerned, $165 per capita will be made up by the federal treasury, according to the minister. Multiplied by the population, that is no small sum. If I were running a provincial government I would feel reassured to see this bill presented with the expectation that it would pass this House in its entirety.

The minister quoted from the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission which said that the federal government has an overriding financial role in the pursuit of national growth and stability. Another point the report made was that fair standards of public services and taxation in all regions of the country are vital to our national unity. Of course they are and we all know that, but to have it quoted by the minister is a very fine thing.

The report also made the point that co-ordination in tax policy between the central government and the provinces is essential in a modern industrial state. Of course it is. I am sure that each province realizes that only by co-ordination of the efforts of all will the well-being of the country be enhanced and we will make progress as a nation. I realize that every province cannot have the same amount of growth and taxing capacity, but I am sure that the 100 per cent stability guarantee gives them confidence in regard to their general operations and financing.

Equalization is also tremendously important. Then we must consider the question of fair standards of public service and fair taxation in all regions. This is important. I think many of the matters mentioned in the minister's speech and contained in the bill will be good for the country because uncertainties will be disposed of.

The bill also envisages the federal government undertaking to agree, on behalf of the provinces, to collect personal income taxes and corporation taxes as well as succession duties and gift taxes levied by the provinces. There has been lack of communication between the federal government and the provinces on the matter of succession duties and gift taxes. We were told, when the capital gains tax was introduced, that the government was vacating certain tax fields; it would not levy succession duties and gift taxes. In the case of New Brunswick, for instance, the provincial government has moved into that tax field, or it wishes to do that. It seems to me that the federal government can be criticized for not having made arrangements under which provinces could enter the tax field vacated by the federal government.

Since capital gains tax is to be levied, it seems to me that arrangements should have been made with the provinces to avoid double taxation. Therefore, I suggest that the federal government may be open to criticism on that score. I say that it is most unfortunate to contemplate the incidence of double taxation in New Brunswick. If small or even large family businesses are saddled with succession duties, those businesses may have to be sold at sacrifice prices. That situation will do no one any good, and those wheels which have been contributing to our economy in that area may be stopped, perhaps for a long time to come. I feel the government has overlooked that. Whether the situation can be corrected at this late date I do not know. I know the matter is serious in my province.

I am pleased to see that under the bill there is a five-year guarantee which provides that each province shall receive as much revenue from the reformed personal income tax system as it would have received under the old system. That certainly will reassure the provinces.

The next item, as I read it, extends for two years the existing system of federal payments for post-secondary education and certain technical changes in the established program are to be made with regard to Quebec. We are all concerned about such matters. After all, although we sit here as federal representatives we all come from a province and are interested in back home.

I remember a few years ago coming into the New Brunswick legislature with some details about a federal-provincial tax agreement. My recollection is not perfect in regard to every detail; however, I remember that after the Second World War the premier of New Brunswick used to report to the legislature when he returned from provincial conferences. He would report that an arrangement had been made with the federal authorities for the rental of the income tax field. That is how we referred to it in those days. We rented the tax field, thereby giving the federal government authority to collect taxes. He would give the details of the arrangement and then say that it was the best arrangement that could be secured in view of conditions prevailing.

The amount of money that this involved for New Brunswick under the tax rental agreement of those days has little relation to the amount that New Brunswick now receives under the equalization formula. Actually, at present there seems to be no connection between the amount rented out, so to speak, and the amount received under this act. I put that difference down to inflation, Mr. Speaker. If I may digress for a moment, let me ask where this extra money is coming from. The extra cash the province receives in return for vacating this field can be put down to the workings of inflation. It seems to me that we are suffering a good deal of inflation and if present rates of inflation continue for 10 or 15 years the consequences will be serious. This is a problem to which we should attend. Should we not address ourselves a little more diligently to the question of inflation?

From time to time, especially during the last two or three years, there have been strikes involving Air Canada. We have been bothered by the strikes, not knowing whether we could travel to our destinations by air. They caused great inconvenience. The strikes have now been settled. But the other day I talked to a man who had been involved in a strike and he said yes, they had accepted a settlement but he felt the cost of living had risen so much in the interval that the amount he would get after the strike would not buy much more than it could have bought before the strike. The point is that we must recognize the fact of inflation. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) the other day brought down a record spending budget. The question is, where will all the money which the government will spend come from? I am afraid that much of it is the result of inflation. If I am right, the implications for us are serious. That is something that we in this chamber should address ourselves to in an attempt to find a solution as quickly as possible.

If I may refer to 1955, let me say that in the Dominion-Provincial Conference of that year we made certain proposals to the government which, although not entirely implemented at that time, have pretty well been implemented since. We said it was important to discuss the principle of federal-provincial assistance to the provinces for the broad purpose of resource development, this proposal being designed to meet a situation with which most provinces had grown familiar. I would say, generally, that the suggestions we made in 1955 have now been recognized by the federal authorities as valid.

During the ten-year period following, and even subsequently, there was broad development of our national economy. At the same time, social welfare measures, either entirely as introduced by the provinces or in part supported by federal revenue, accomplished much to bring about a certain levelling of incomes. These accomplishments, both economic and social, have been substantial and those whose foresight and administrative ability had contributed to the success of those programs were people active on both the national and provincial scene. They certainly had a hand in the improvements that came about. I think all those people deserve full credit for what has happened.

At the same meeting, the second matter we wanted to discuss was the difference in taxable capacities of the provinces. That is what I have been talking about; it is what is embodied in this bill. This principle, which has now been accepted, has been expounded by the minister. It makes me feel pretty good that we were on such solid and safe ground when we made that request back in 1955.

I have always felt that general economic conditions in every part of Canada are the basis upon which the future unity and progress of our country depends. I would like to repeat those words because I think they bear repeating: I have always felt that general economic conditions in every part of Canada are the basis on which the future unity and progress of our country depends. I still believe that. I believe in a national policy specifically designed to recognize income disparity and to do something about it, to improve regional incomes by appropriate fiscal measures, to increase productive capacity so that every able-bodied and healthy adult is able to make a full contribution to production.

It is a shame that we have so much unemployment today. It is not only a question of the person who is unemployed but it is the lack of productivity caused by the fact that the individual is not producing. That is most serious. These are some of the most necessary elements in the process of growth and progress which will cement our country into one strong and viable unit which is the objective of us all. That is what it will do, but surely we are capable of a great deal more. I hope we may succeed in that endeavour.

I return for a moment to the question of the 1955 conference because there are some further points I wish to make. The third subject that we wished placed on the agenda at that time was the special awards that were made to the maritime provinces as a result of the Duncan and White commission reports in 1927 and 1935 respectively. I realize a good many members sitting in this chamber may not have heard of these awards; however, I will not define them in detail. The reports to which I have referred recognized that the maritime provinces had a valid claim on the federal government for special consideration by virtue of the fact that they as provinces had not received any additional public lands as was the case with practically all the provinces from Quebec west. I mention this point so that the minister will be familiar with the basis of our claims of that day which, incidentally, I submit are still valid.

Two maritime provinces had come into confederation when it was set up in 1867 and became the Dominion of Canada consisting of the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, with Prince Edward Island coming in a few years later. The rest of Canada remained a very large and important productive area for future development. However, when the western sections of the country came in and were set up as provinces, which was just a few years later, their boundaries were enlarged, mostly northward, by adding to their areas a great many square miles of northern land. This was the case with Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. But the maritime provinces had no northern lands that could be added to their areas, due to their geography; and no special, tangible recognition has ever been made of this special situation.

Many unforeseen changes have taken place since the provinces to which I have referred had their areas greatly increased. Today, the hinterlands referred to have become tremendously valuable to the provinces claiming them. As we all know, the exploitation of natural resources is continuing from month to month. On the other hand, as I have mentioned, the maritime provinces are prevented from adding to their wealth in this way, owing to their geographic location.

At the time these areas were added to the provinces they may have been considered of questionable value. This may have continued for a good many years. However, they have now become fields of large capital investment and are seen as areas speculative resource development with the resulting large increase in tax revenues accruing to the fortunate provinces concerned. Almost every week we read of discoveries of oil and gas in what has generally been regarded as the north, and from this we all take the greatest satisfaction. This enhances the strength of the claim of the maritime provinces for special recognition. The royal commission to which I have referred recognized this principle in their reports in 1927 and 1935, and it is surely very evident that with the passing of time and ensuing development the claim of the maritime provinces becomes more and more valid.

I said that no attention has been paid to our special situation, but that is not exactly the case. With the coming into office of the Diefenbaker government in 1957, an act setting up the special adjustment grants was passed, under which $125 million was made available to the Atlantic provinces over the subsequent five-year period. At the end of that period this sum was increased to $175 million over the next five years.

I have always been at a loss to understand the reason for doing away with the special adjustment grants in 1967, because I believe it was over and above the ordinary equalization concept and should never have been considered part of it. I submit it was largely due to our vested interests in the northern lands in respect of which disposition was made subsequent to the coming into confederation of the western provinces. As I said, a large area of land was made available to the provinces from Quebec west. I ask the minister to keep this claim in mind when application is made by any of the Atlantic provinces for special consideration, and to recognize that we should have a very large credit balance on the books of the central government due to our interest in northern lands which has never been properly dealt with.

I return to the history of 1955 because I believe it is of interest and is certainly applicable to the present situation. At that time we asked that consideration be given to speeding up completion of the Trans-Canada highway project and that assistance be given to the Atlantic provinces to this end. This has been done under governments of different political complexion. It has had the effect of linking Canada from coast to coast so that traffic is not only possible but is becoming greater and greater with the passing of the years. The Fathers of Confederation had the correct view when they said traffic and trade should move east and west to the greatest possible extent. This is now coming into being.

When I see large trailer-trucks coming through New Brunswick with Vancouver, British Columbia, Calgary, Alberta, Regina, Saskatchewan, Winnipeg, Manitoba and Toronto, Ontario, licence plates, I am impressed by the link that we know as the Trans-Canada Highway which joins Canada together from east to west, or west to east as the case may be, and brings with it the ability to move traffic and expand trade to an even greater extent.

The next item with which I shall deal is one with which this Parliament is very familiar. It perhaps exists to a greater extent today than when we made the report in 1965. I do not blame anyone in particular for it, but it is in existence. I shall quote the exact words which we used when asking that this matter be considered by the conference in 1955. I shall quote it exactly because I do not think I can improve on the language:

The fifth item which the government of New Brunswick feels should be placed on the agenda is the laying down of a comprehensive national policy to deal with the problem of unemployment. A policy of this kind can only be carried out under the vigorous leadership of the federal government. Unemployment must be dealt with in two ways:

(1) The implementation of proper fiscal and monetary policies by the national authorities. This should include a program of capital grants to the provinces and to the municipalities so that public investment may be expanded as unemployment reaches critical proportions.

• (2050)

(2) Responsibility for the relief of the unemployed be taken over by the federal government. Neither the provinces nor the municipalities have the resources to deal with this problem during a business recession. It will, of course, be remembered that this was one of the principal recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois Commission.

That last recommendation has now been implemented. So the items discussed at the conference in 1955 can be summarized as follows: some of the proposals have been implemented and some have not:

1. Federal assistance to the provinces for the purpose of resource development.

This has been done by successive governments. I am not taking any partisan position on it at the present time.

2. Future tax revenue agreements should include a factor which will take into consideration the difference in taxable capacity among the various provinces.

This has been recognized and done.

3. Reconsideration and review of the Duncan and White Commission's awards.

This is one request which has not been recognized. If the minister will take the trouble—as I know he would if he had the time—to see what I have said about the Duncan and White Commission's awards, I should be greatly obliged because perhaps he does not have up to date information on this subject. I have referred to it only in general terms though, I believe, in appropriate terms.

4. Extension and revision of the Trans-Canada Highway program.

This has been done. The country has been joined from east to west.

5. A national policy to deal with unemployment.

I question whether this has been done by any government. If the minister were to ask me what I would do about unemployment, I do not think I should be able to tell him without a great deal of thought, and perhaps not even then. Everyone acknowledges that this is a very difficult problem. We were talking about it in 1955 at the Dominion-Provincial Conference and we are still talking about it today; it is still with us, unfortunately.

We in the maritime provinces are very conscious that some of these requests made during the 1955 conference have been complied with by this government and by previous governments of all political complexions. There still remains, however, recommendation No. 3. I do not ask the minister to do anything about it at the moment because I cannot speak on behalf of any provincial government, though of course I have their interests in mind. We must differentiate between our federal responsibility and responsibility to our province and its claims. But I think the minister should acknowledge that we have a credit balance on his books; and I am referring again to recommendation No 3. So when representatives come from the provinces looking for special consideration, I trust he will receive them with his usual courtesy.

[Mr. Flemming.]

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks this evening I should like to congratulate my hon. friend from Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) on his appointment as Minister of Finance after doing an excellent job as minister of justice. I know he will do the same kind of job in his new portfolio. I should also like to congratulate my hon. friend from Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney). We all know the tremendous job he did in piloting the tax reform bill through the House. He deserves elevation to a cabinet post. I welcome his appointment, as a westerner, but I welcome him first and foremost as a Canadian. I know he will do a tremendous job for Canada.

I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-8. I listened to the Minister of Finance yesterday with a great deal of interest, and I stand solidly behind him and the remarks he made regarding the philosophy of equalization. This has been a very hot subject in the province of British Columbia during the last few months. I am distressed about the connotation this debate has taken on in British Columbia. The Premier of British Columbia has, in my view, taken a wrong stand and the remarks he has made can do a great deal of harm in sowing seeds of distrust and misunderstanding which would lead people to think in terms that would be totally against the best interests of confederation. I do not know what Premier Bennett is trying to do. He says he is not trying to divide the country. I believe him. Yet his remarks certainly cannot be considered constructive or in the best interests of Canadian unity. Perhaps, if he is not trying to be divisive, he should think through the possible consequences before making public statements.

If the government of British Columbia is challenging the concept of equalization on a constitutional and fundamental basis, then maybe they should tell the whole story of where the payments are going, rather than just relating the grievances to statement that too much money is going to Quebec alone. These are not the facts, Mr. Speaker, and the good Premier knows it.

When I hear remarks of this kind, about there being perhaps too many Frenchmen in Ottawa, and remarks such as some hon. members made during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, I have to chuckle. I almost feel like saying, "If you don't like this country you should give it back to the Indians." On the other hand, I suppose the Indians might be blamed for part of this problem. If the Indians had established a different immigration policy these difficulties would not have occurred.

Some of the facts concerning the disposition of grants under the equalization program have already been placed on record by the Minister of Finance. However, I do not believe it would be amiss to re-emphasize them and perhaps to draw attention to a few which were not mentioned by the minister. I should like to put on record figures as to the moneys received by the so-called have-not provinces from equalization payments expressed as a percentage of gross revenue from provincial sources: Newfoundland, 65 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 55 per cent; Nova Scotia, 34 per cent; New Brunswick, 38 per cent; Quebec, 16 per cent; Manitoba, 12 per cent; Saskatchewan, 13 per cent.

I think it would be interesting, too, to put on record the reaction of some of the premiers and ministers of the have-not provinces in response to the declaration by the government of British Columbia that it intended to take the federal government to court over the question of equalization payments. In St. John's, Newfoundland, finance minister John Crosbie said his province would have to close up shop if the payments were ended. In New Brunswick, Premier Richard Hatfield said he was surprised and disappointed to hear of the challenge. He added that Premier Bennett, who was born in New Brunswick, knew of the need for equalization payments and the benefits they provided directly to the people of his native province.

In Toronto, Premier Davis said Ontario was not contemplating a similar suit. In his words: "We agree with the principle of equalization; we have never disputed it." Premier Ed Schreyer of Manitoba said the position taken by British Columbia ran counter to the federal system. Senator Forsey, an acknowledged expert on constitutional law, was also quoted as saying that the threat from British Columbia on equalization is pure moonshine. He also said: "I cannot imagine any lawyer who values his reputation taking the case. He would need the skin of a rhinoceros and the head of an ostrich."

The whole question of federal-provincial relations has been a favourite whipping-boy in Canadian politics for many years and I imagine it will be that way for some time to come. The game of politics dictates this, yet somehow we always manage to arrive at agreements which are acceptable to the diverse views that the regions of this nation reflect. I am confident we will be able to continue in that noble pattern. It seems to me that part of this thing known as being Canadian implies a commitment to national standards and the basics of life. The means with which to achieve this may be faulty in some ways. The differences that may be expressed from time to time among provinces and between the federal government and the provinces must be solved on the basis of negotiation and sound understanding, not always on the basis that "you're the bad guys and we're the good guys".

The essence of Canadian federalism means that some form of tax equalization policies have to be followed to give the less fortunate citizens in distressed regions of this nation the same standards of medical care, hospital and education facilities, income security programs and the like, as other Canadians. Canadians as a whole have long recognized the need for and the importance of reasonably comparable levels of basic public services across the whole country without resorting to unduly burdensome levels of taxation. This is the principle on which fiscal arrangements are based. Our system is probably unequalled in any other federal country.

I am proud and happy to have been born and raised in one of the wealthier provinces of this country and to be able to contribute to confederation through the system of equalization grants. I am also happy that I live in a country where I know that if something should go wrong in my own province and we are no longer wealthy, we can look to our more fortunate neighbours in other areas for a helping hand.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I think the previous speaker not only demonstrated to the House that one can say everything one has to say in ten minutes, but he said it in a most impressive way. Perhaps that should be a discipline for myself, but I always envy those who can put a case with brevity.

I am going to confine my comments to clause 6 of the bill, the clause that extends the post-secondary education payment program for the next two fiscal years, or till March 31, 1974. I am simply going to raise one or two questions and then discuss some of the comments that have been made about the whole problem of post-secondary education and the undoubted national interest and concern in this field by Dr. J. A. Corry, former president at Queen's University.

In his speech the minister spoke, to use his own words, of "a detailed and motivated statement on the attitude contemplated at the time"—that is, at the end of March, 1974. If the minister's statement is to be useful—I certainly hope it will be—it means that between the time this bill receives royal assent and the end of 1974 the universities and the Council of Ministers of Education of the various provinces must be heard by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier).

I should like to stress the need to hear not only the university presidents but the entire university community, including the faculties and student representatives. There is some urgency to this matter because as my leader has said, and I think validly, what we are debating here is a stand pat proposal, particularly as far as post-secondary education is concerned. What we have here is really a postponement of a decision, one that has to be taken, concerning the federal thrust in this field within the next 24 months. Although 24 months may seem like a long time when one contemplates the period in the House of Commons this evening when a very agonizing series of questions have to be considered, I am sure the time is all too short.

I hope this comment is fair, but prior to 1967 the then prime minister, Right Hon. Lester Pearson, had attached to his office certain people on staff one of whom was Dr. Kenneth Taylor who, if I remember correctly, had specific responsibility for post-secondary education. Then, under the succeeding administration this responsibility was shifted to the Department of the Secretary of State. I have no quarrel with that except to say that although this very important matter is being considered at this moment, the special advisers to the Secretary of State, so I am told, have left that department. If I am incorrect, I should like to know who within the office of the Secretary of State is in charge of enunciating a national policy, a policy of the government of Canada, regarding post-secondary education. Certainly we want to hear these officials when this bill goes, as it must, to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Some very fundamental questions will have to be taken up in that committee before the end of this month.

I am very conscious of escalating costs in the field of education, and coming from a have-not, or so-called poor province I am grateful for the fact that a good deal of extra money has come to my province in the form of equalization grants and under the formula for federal assistance to post-secondary education. But this is a matter that is really far more fundamental than being simply transfer payments of cash. What I am suggesting is that there is a serious vacuum in this field that cannot be overcome merely by adding a two-year extension to a federal statute. This bill postpones decisions that have to be made. That is why we shall be anxious to hear from officials in the Secretary of State's department, if there are any left responsible for this field, when the bill comes to the committee.

I am alarmed at the growing evidence of an inward-looking policy, if I may put it that way, in the field of post-secondary education. I would not presume, in a debate like this, to comment on the Wright study that is now going on in the province of Ontario, but I have an uneasy feeling—I say this with great respect for my colleagues who represent areas in the province of Ontario—that the Wright commission has had the attitude that here we are in the Garden of Eden—Ontario. We are born here, educated here and we die here, and may the rest of Canada take the hindmost.

I do not say that this is the case in the equalization formula. How could I, since Ontario has been accepted as one of the key provinces in the Canadian federal system? But I am alarmed at some of the things that seem to be said now, at least in the interim stage of the Wright commission investigation of post-secondary education in Ontario. After all, not all Canada can be born, educated and die in Ontario. There is a national aspect, both a constitutional one and also one lying within the whole focus of the government of Canada in university education.

As I say, we have been given two years of grace for a system which is obviously unloved because of the 15 per cent placed on the escalation of funds, unloved by the government of Canada because it is open-ended and unloved by the provinces because of the uncertainties that arise due to the very short duration of the scope of this act.

Dr. Corry has been underlining the national aspect of university education for many years. It is very interesting to go back to the days of 1966 when this whole matter was being discussed and when finally the ad hoc solution was arrived at within days or even hours of the 1967 agreement, if I understand it rightly. Dr. Corry says:

> There obviously must be some national goals of education in Canada; even though at one time or another, nearly all of them may be met by initiatives taken within the provinces . . . There are national goals, and the laying of one-half of the operating costs of post-secondary education as a charge on the federal revenues certifies that proposition.

We discussed in many other debates, when we considered the whole matter of constitutional reform, the aspect of section 93 of the BNA Act, but may I remind the House of a key phrase in section 93 which provides:

> In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education.

I am not for one minute coming to this Parliament 104 or 105 years after confederation and suggesting that the government of Canada should be butting into the provincial aspects of education, curricula and everything else at the school level. But when the BNA Act became law there were very few universities of international or even national scope in this country.

I am perfectly sure that the skilled drafters of the constitution did not for one moment contemplate that in the university area there would not be massive federal responsibility and concern. As Dr. Corry said, if we need any other evidence of it, we are considering in this bill a massive amount of transfers of money from the government of Canada. If we need any more evidence of the national concern, we have it in the educational provisions that are made for our Indian and Eskimo peoples and for the dependants of people serving in the armed forces, and so on. So it is not at all true to say that the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction in the educational field. That is not contemplated by section 93. Of course, the provinces do have exclusive jurisdiction in and for the provinces themselves.

I do not think it would help this debate or national unity if we began picking at various universities and some of the pressures that are on them, but surely of all aspects of our country's life the university is not one that can be constrained by any narrowness or any provincial boundaries. Many of the famous universities of this country are famous because their authority transcends not only provincial boundaries but the boundaries of the country itself.

It is interesting to recall also that in the whole field of funding, post-seconary education raises the matter of the government role in the field of education. Dr. Corry made a couple of speeches about this in Saskatchewan in 1969. The speeches are entitled, "Universities and Governments". They were given as part of the Quance lectures at the University of Saskatchewan a couple of years ago. In these lectures Dr. Corry raised for us the very fundamental issue. He said that when governments begin to have a major responsibility for the funding of institutions then, as night follows day, governments get themselves into the position of making decisions regarding curricula, and so on, which should properly be left to the universities themselves.

As I began my comments I complimented the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) on the brevity of his speech, so I can hardly carry on much longer. But I do want to say in a general way that the two-year breathing space that has been given to us for the consideration of what is in part VI of Bill C-8 will, I hope, be taken up by the universities themselves, because there is a tremendous amount of information that they should be giving the government of Canada. Also there should be close and intimate contact with the Council of Education Ministers.

Lastly, I hope that when the bill goes to the committee next week or so the officials of the Department of the Secretary of State will be there so that we can raise with them some of the very interesting and what I might call core considerations which arise when governments are heavily involved in the funding of national institutions which are our universities.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a few brief and perhaps disjointed remarks in this important debate. It is important and appropriate that this debate take place at this particular time because in the last few days the very basis of confederation has been challenged. I refer to three particular elements: the idea of equalization payments, the concept of an accommodation between the two major language groups in the country, and some question has been raised about the value of the government's new multicultural policy. It strikes me that if we challenge these factors in our national existence we are really challenging the idea of confederation itself. Therefore, I say it is appropriate for this House to be debating questions relating to equalization payments and federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

In 1924 Vincent Massey, who later become Governor General of Canada, said:

> This country is much more than a chain of wheat fields, and gold mines, and pulp-wood forests; it is more even than the union of nine separate provinces: it is the expression of certain ideas.

I have never seen a better definition of Canada. Many people have tried to describe Canada and to define Canadian identity. No one has really succeeded as well as Vincent Massey did in these few words almost 50 years ago. The idea that is embodied in Canada could, I suppose, be described as a great experiment in the evolution of a truly co-operative and tolerant society, a society in which we can co-exist with other people who share many things with us but who may have a different language, a different religion, and in which we throw open our doors to the world and allow newcomers to retain that from their past which they value, and even allow them to retain their former language, to a greater extent than is possible anywhere else in the world.

I think that if you look at Canada in any other way you would have to conclude that it is certainly not a feasible state. For example, there is no nation other than the USSR which is spread over such a large area, east and west, north and south, or encompasses as many diverse geographic areas with as inhospitable a climate as we have and with the population strung out in a narrow belt. If we were to look at this sensibly we would conclude that the best thing we could do is join the great nation to our south. That would make the greatest economic sense to many people. If we had done that some time ago we would probably all be better off today in an economic sense. However, that is not what happened.

The people who embarked on this venture called confederation did so because they wished to resist absorption by the United States. They wished to attempt a different kind of society on the northern half of this continent, a society in which two peoples attempt to live together in unity and harmony and who invite the rest of the world to come in and join them in this great experiment. In order for this experiment to survive, Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that we must have an inordinate amount of co-operation among the various regions in the nation, and indeed among the inhabitants of the nation. That is what equalization payments are all about. It is really people helping people, the people who are more fortunate helping those who are less fortunate.

I happen to come from an area which has been blessed with great natural resources and which at the moment has perhaps a stronger economy than most other areas of the country. I speak of the province of Alberta. I am sure I speak for most Albertans when I say that we are happy to be able to help Canadians who are less fortunate in other parts of Canada and we will be happy to do so for many years to come.

I believe that the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) was speaking for the majority of British Columbians when he expressed his sentiments earlier this evening. He expressed confidence that if at some time in the future the province of British Columbia became less fortunate, other parts of Canada would take up the slack and help the people in that part of the country to maintain a reasonable standard of public service and a reasonable standard of existence.

At the moment, most of the federal payments made to provinces are going to the five most easterly provinces. I am confident that that will not continue for very long because one cannot help being impressed by the tremendous potential which exists in those provinces. The mere fact that they are all bordered by the ocean in itself makes them an important part of the country, because in the future the oceans will play as great or a greater role than do the land masses of the world. The fact that Canada has the longest coastline in the world and that five of our eastern provinces are on salt water augurs well for this country. I believe that Albertans, citizens of British Columbia and citizens of Ontario when they, in effect, invest in those areas are making a good investment.

But as I indicated earlier, there are those who suggest that there is something insidious about equalization payments and say that we should not make them.

• (2130)

Mr. Alexander: Where did you ever hear that?

Mr. Sulatycky: I have also heard from many people that we should devote a greater amount of our gross national product to foreign aid. It strikes me as being totally inconsistent to talk of providing 1 per cent or 2 per cent of our gross national product to underdeveloped countries and then quibble about using 1 per cent of the gross national product for distribution to the have-not provinces within our borders.

It seems that equalization is accepted in football circles but it is not accepted universally when it comes to supporting our country. For many years the Canadian Football League has had a system where the teams that draw the largest crowds help support others like Regina, Winnipeg, Edmonton or Calgary, and no one quibbles about that. As a matter of fact, without a system of gate equalization it is highly unlikely that the Canadian Football League would exist.

Mr. Skoberg: That is Saskatchewan—in Regina?

Mr. Sulatycky: As an expatriate of Saskatchewan, I stand corrected. I simply use this to illustrate that because of the nature of our country we have to help those areas which are not, at the time in question, able to help themselves. I hope the people of western Canada do not get hung up on this question of equalization. The people there are characterized by initiative and drive and by their foresight. They continually look forward, not back. If this becomes an issue of any magnitude in western Canada, it will simply divert their attention from the tremendous progress made in the last 20 or 30 years.

There is only one comment that I wish to make regarding the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, and this is in respect of the shared-cost programs under the Canada Assistance Plan. Upon examining the social welfare systems in the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, one can only conclude they are using the plan as a back door by which to regain some of the funds they feel they are losing under the equalization payments.

In Alberta, many people are concerned about the rising cost of welfare and the numbers of people on welfare. They do not deny that there are unfortunate people who have suffered personal catastrophe and who require assistance from the state, but they also know that there are many others apparently well able to contribute to the state and the economy but who are not doing so and who rely on the social welfare system. This situation exists as well in British Columbia and Ontario and I hear from my friends in Ontario that welfare is easy to get there.

In the last three years I have become convinced that these three "have" provinces are using the system of the Canada Assistance Plan to get back from the federal government what they feel they are paying out under equalization. The result is that in those parts of the country where there is less need for welfare, it is easy to obtain. In Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta the provincial government can afford to pay 50 cents in order to bring in another 50 cents in federal government funds, but the poorer provinces must scrape to get that first 50 cents in order to pay their own 50 per cent contribution to welfare services.

The result is a distortion in our scheme of providing assistance to the less fortunate individuals in the country. I hope that at some future federal-provincial conference this matter will be discussed seriously so that public funds used to assist our less fortunate fellows are used properly. It should be possible to ensure that provincial governments do not regard them just as a means of obtaining federal funds and it should also be possible to ensure that they are not used in a way which creates dissatisfaction with an otherwise sound social security system.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that I have taken I hope I have indicated my support for the bill sponsored by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and for the system of equalization grants. I am sure that I speak for the majority of the citizens of Alberta, and I am confident that I do when I read editorials such as the one which appeared in a weekly published in my riding called Western Review, of Drayton Valley. On May 6, 1970, when speaking of Quebec the editor said:

—we should certainly be attempting to solve the economic ills plaguing the province. At the same time, the maritime provinces have more than their share of problems that should also get federal attention.

I am also pleased to be supporting this government which in the last four years has done more than any other federal government to support those particular regions of Canada.

[Mr. Sulatycky.]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is the product of a long process of negotiation which no doubt involved a great many problems and anxious moments for the ministers and the federal and provincial officials concerned. We must keep in mind that the agreement reached between the federal government and the provinces which is now embodied in this legislation is an integral feature of the fabric of confederation as we have it today. In fact, it has become a very important and essential part of the entire functioning of our nation as a whole. In many respects we can say it strengthens the nation because it takes into account some of the difficulties encountered from time to time and some of the changes which have occurred in the Canadian economy.

On the other hand, I think that we have to recognize that the important role these arrangements play in the functioning of government at the federal and provincial level across the country adds to the frailty of the entire structure of our nation. We go from five-year period to five-year period, and at the end of that time there is again this process of negotiation. This places the bonds of our nation under a great deal of strain, and I think this is inevitable with the type of negotiations involved in reaching the arrangements we are considering.

I think we must also keep in mind that to some extent the arrangements that are reached periodically are substitutes for the inadequacies and deficiencies of our constitutional structure. These at times can be assets which may strengthen our case; at other times they may produce problems and point more clearly to some of the difficulties with which we will have to grapple over a period of time.

I think one point that must be kept in mind in dealing with this legislation is that it underlines the inequalities and disparities present in our nation, inequalities which are demonstrated by differences in the financial position and fiscal capacity of various provincial governments across Canada. One province, Newfoundland, as was pointed out earlier, depends upon federal sources for 55 per cent of its total revenue. This fact, I think, carries consequences affecting the functioning of provinces as we know them within our federal system of government. The province of Prince Edward Island, as was pointed out, depends on federal sources for some 55 per cent of its revenue. This fact has produced problems as well. Certainly, these two provinces would not wish to see those revenues removed in present circumstances; nevertheless, to refer to them as provincial entities and as sovereign governments in the way that the minister referred to the government of Newfoundland in his speech is to put the present situation in terms that are less than accurate.

It has been made clear already in this debate that we in this party accept the principle of equalization and recognize that a great many features of the application of that principle are contained in this bill. I also want to make it clear that so far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned, we feel the principle of equalization is important. It is important for the nation and is important to many provinces. In future, provinces which do not now receive equalization payments may consider the principle of such payments important.

My own province, of course, has received a good deal of revenue from equalization payments over a period of time. Our dependence on this source of revenue decreased over the years and by about the mid-sixties it looked as though we might be one of the "have" provinces as defined under the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. Certainly, a great deal of political hay was made of this fact by certain politicians of Saskatchewan who attempted to take the credit for a great deal of work which had been done for many years by the government led by my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas).

Of course, the situation has changed drastically in recent years as a result of the drop in farm income and the decline in revenue from many mineral resources. Once again an increasing percentage of the provincial revenues of Saskatchewan is derived from equalization payments.

If I may carry this beyond the Saskatchewan scene, Mr. Speaker, I think it is necessary to underline the concern expressed in some provinces which might be regarded as "have" provinces. As I said before, the picture could be different in future years. At some time in the future some of the provinces now regarded as "have" provinces may well, for a variety of reasons, find themselves in a different position and become beneficiaries under equalization payment programs.

It is quite possible that some provinces which are presently enjoying the benefits of equalization payments may in future, by reason of changing circumstances, suggest that they are no longer benefiting from this type of arrangement. It is therefore important to keep in mind that the process of equalization is important for Canada's future if we are to ensure the existence of one united Canada. In this connection I think it is important to point out that we should all be concerned about the imbalances in Canada as between various regions and provinces.

At present, three provinces under these arrangements might be regarded as "have" provinces—Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. Two of those provinces, Ontario and British Columbia, have been at the top of the scale for a number of years, if one is to judge from a variety of economic indicators. Certainly, to judge from these indicators they are the best off in many respects. How their economic wealth is distributed among the people of the province is another matter about which a good deal could be said.

Alberta, of course, has been in a favourable position for a number of years although there is no guarantee that that will be the case for a long time or on any sort of permanent basis. It may not occupy that position permanently. We must bear in mind that in terms of economic growth and population trends Ontario and British Columbia are the two provinces which are experiencing a high level of growth. None of the other provinces, including Alberta, is enjoying anything like the same level of growth, if one is to judge the situation according to the indicators I have mentioned or other indicators. Ontario, in particular, is growing. Of course, we are happy to see development in Ontario. Since Ontario is increasingly becoming the all-important province, I suggest that in the long run this will create difficulties for Canadian confederation.

That is why many of us welcome programs that will lessen the disparities between the other regions of Canada, not because that will be to the detriment of any province, be it Ontario or British Columbia, but because we want to ensure that the other regions of Canada are able to enjoy a degree of growth and well-being similar to that experienced in those two provinces. I am sure the minister is very concerned about some of these factors. The facts I have outlined carry implications which are of concern for Canadian confederation in the long run.

There are a number of features of this bill, Mr. Speaker, with which I think we can all concur; for instance, the change in the revenue guarantee provisions. The bill has changed the 95 per cent figure relating to the federal guarantee to 100 per cent. This is a useful change with which, as I say, we can all agree. It is an important change because it has been shown that the 95 per cent figure which was included in the 1967 agreement had little meaning for the provinces. When one considers the way in which price levels have been increasing in recent years, and the implications that these increasing price levels might have for fiscal policy and governments, I think it will be conceded that it was necessary to raise the figure to the 100 per cent level.

I note, as well, that progress has been made in recent years in developing a more equitable revenue base in calculating equalization payments. Mr. Speaker, I could go into details which are of concern to many, but I will not do so tonight. There are a couple of points to which reference should be made. The first and most important is that in any calculations of revenue base or source for provinces it is absolutely necessary in today's situation to include municipal revenues in the calculations. This is particularly important at the present time because in a number of provinces shifts are taking place with regard to responsibilities for various functions of government vis-à-vis the provinces and municipalities. Indeed, proposals have been made by various provincial governments to shift the burden of financing certain functions from one level of government to the other.

In my own province of Saskatchewan, the provincial government presently in power, a New Democratic Party government, put forward as one of its major election planks that it would take steps to ensure that some of the burden of financing education would be lifted from property taxation and transferred to provincial sources of revenue. I think the point is very well made, as it has been made on a number of occasions in debating this issue, that unless you include municipal revenues the provinces will be penalized under the present formula if they take steps which result in the type of shift they wish to carry out.

There are a number of other problems with regard to revenue sources that should be noted. One of the items in the definition of revenue sources refers to succession duties. This is a rather difficult and ticklish problem. The federal government has stepped out of the estate tax field and has left this area open to the provinces. Three provinces already have a succession duty plan in effect—British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec. Six other provinces now intend to enter the field—Saskatchewan, Manitoba and the four Atlantic provinces. This leaves only the province of Alberta without any sort of succession duty plan.

The question I want to put to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is this: In the situation that Alberta is not going to be imposing any sort of succession duty, will that province benefit in any way from the calculations made under this act? I hope the minister will deal with this matter when he closes the debate.

A number of other concerns have also been expressed in past years in defining provincial revenues with respect to resources. I would appreciate hearing from the minister what progress has been made in this field and whether the provinces are satisfied with the new formulas for calculating revenue resources. This is particularly important because some provinces, as a matter of policy, have decided to collect more of their revenue from resource royalties and other forms of levies. This is equalized in the calculations that are worked out. Of course, there is no problem. For a long time there was a problem which was particularly serious for the province of Saskatchewan, for example. I am not sure from the wording of the bill that this is the present situation.

There is one other area I wish to deal with tonight. It is related to our concern about this act, although in some respects it may go beyond the immediate terms of the bill. It has to do with the future of federal-provincial health programs. I understand that at the present time negotiations are under way between the federal government and the provincial governments to change the formula for making payments to the provinces under hospitalization and medicare programs. I note in the bill before us that provision is made for continuing the federal hospitalization act for another five years. Under the terms of the bill, I am not clear whether it will be possible to change the formula for making payments. Nevertheless, I think there is an area of concern here.

It is not quite clear from the proposals that I understand the federal government has placed before the provinces whether in the long run it wants to opt out of these programs; whether it wants to get out of the federal medicare and hospitalization programs. No doubt the government is concerned about the very high rate of growth and cost of these programs.

Mr. Douglas: Who isn't?

Mr. Burton: As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands says, "Who isn't?" I have before me a speech delivered recently by the minister of public health of the province of Saskatchewan in which he expressed a great deal of concern about the increase in health costs. With regard to the hospital service plan in Saskatchewan, the medical care insurance plan, he points out that in 1968-69 the total cost for these two programs was $96 million. For 1971-72 the figure is $132 million, a growth of 37.5 per cent in something like three years. Certainly this is a cause of concern to all governments involved.

In dealing with this problem we have to make sure that the federal government is not taking an approach of just opting out or trying to decrease the contribution it makes to these programs without ensuring that the provinces have adequate fiscal capacity to carry whatever burdens they will have to carry. We need a combined effort on the part of federal and provincial jurisdictions to ensure that some controls are placed on the cost of these programs. At the same time we must ensure there is no decrease in the quality of health care provided and, in fact, that there is an improvement in their quality. This can be done because it has been shown in a number of our health programs that new approaches are possible. There is less emphasis on curative procedures and more on preventive programs. There is not as much need for straight hospital care. It is possible to introduce a variety of approaches that can very well bring about improvements and the quality of care.

I suggest this could be best carried out if the federal government made it quite clear that it was willing to go along with the provinces all the way in introducing improvements in their health programs, helping them adequately to combat a problem we all face in trying to deal with the situation of the growing cost of programs in this area.

There are other remarks I would like to make on this bill; I therefore ask if we can call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—OMISSION OF LACHINE CANAL IN TAKEOVER BY DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, during the question period on Wednesday, February 23, I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) the following question:

> Why was the Lachine canal not included in the takeover of historic canals and given national park status?

The minister was unable to answer because of Mr. Speaker's ruling. Therefore, I raise the subject matter of the Lachine canal at ten o'clock this evening. On February 22, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced that eight canals with important historic links had been transferred to the conservation program. In other words, eight canals were given national park status and a higher recreational and tourist potential. These were the Rideau canal built in 1832, the Trent canal built in 1833, the Murray canal built in 1889, the Ste. Anne canal built in 1843, the Carillon canal built in 1833, the Richelieu canal built in 1849, the Chambly canal built in 1843 and the St. Peter's canal built in 1869.

I welcomed this announcement. It is wonderful. It makes me very happy that the government made the decision to preserve these historic canals and create a national park system because I asked for this many years ago when Mr. Pickersgill was minister of transport. However, what concerns me is that the government neglected to include the first canal built, the Lachine canal.

• (2200)

The entrance to the Lachine canal fronts the city of Lachine and the area in which the massacre of Lachine took place. It is from here that LaSalle left to carry out three of his explorations. All voyageurs going west passed through Lachine. The first attempts to build the Lachine canal took place as far back as 1670 and continued until 1733 when the first canal was completed. Almost a century later, between 1821 and 1824, a new Lachine canal was built—ten years before the Rideau, Trent and Carillon canals and 20 years before the Richelieu, Chambly and Ste. Anne canals.

Is the government aware that the city of Lachine has itself been maintaining a 3,000-foot section of the second Lachine canal, the oldest in Canada, and that on its shore the former Hudson's Bay trading post still stands? The building has not been designated as an historic site; it should be converted into a museum by the federal government.

The government hired the firm of Claude LaHaye and Associates to study the future role of the Lachine canal. After a complete and thorough study this firm recommended that the canal should be used for pleasure craft and that the east end be reopened. The government made an error when it sold the Soulanges canal for one dollar to the province of Quebec. Let us not make a similar, tragic mistake.

I believe that the Lachine canal, the Soulanges canal and the Cornwall canal should be included in the national parks system and operated by students during the vacation season. This would provide more jobs for students during the summer months while at the same time allowing pleasure craft under 20 feet in length to enter the heart of the city of Montreal. Such craft are at present restricted by the Seaway regulations. It would give an opportunity to the people of Montreal, particularly to those living in St. Henri, Point St. Charles, Ville Émard, LaSalle, Ville St. Pierre and Montreal West to own pleasure craft and to build marinas. They would even be able to enjoy skating in the winter time as we do here on the Rideau canal.

I ask that the LaHaye report be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for immediate study and that the following recommendations made by LaHaye be immediately adopted:

It is strongly recommended that the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority make representations to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to conduct an over-all study of recreation in the Montreal region. The development of the canal and its immediate surroundings should form an integral part of this study.

Mr. Speaker, the government recently announced a program for the relocation of the E. B. Eddy Company's operation in Ottawa at a cost of $29 million. Yet the historic Lachine canal, which could become a viable pleasure craft route into the centre of Montreal, with an important tourist potential, is not included in the national parks scheme. It is an insult to the population of Montreal to see so much done along the Rideau Canal parkway while the Lachine canal remains a dump due to the policy of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. For further information I would refer hon. members to the speeches I delivered on January 9, 1967, on October 19, 1970, and February 21, 1972, as recorded in Hansard.

The Lachine canal is historic. I have prepared a short history on the Lachine canal to prove this point and copies are available to any person requesting one. The Lachine canal should be given national park status and be transferred immediately.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the representations of the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Rock) regarding preservation of the Lachine canal are well known. He spoke in this House in 1967 and in 1970, and he mentioned the canal most recently last week on the first day of the debate on the Throne Speech. I know that in the last few days he has been pressing his case in every quarter he can find. He has distributed copies of his very well-prepared brief to all members of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and I wish to compliment him on a fine piece of work.

The historic past of this canal has been linked with the history of the Lachine area for nearly 250 years. It was indeed this great history which first led to the study of this canal for possible transfer to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, for preservation. However, detailed study of the canal revealed that it had been extensively altered on at least four occasions including a complete reconstruction at the turn of this century. These changes have been so great as to preclude any possibility of restoration to the earlier historical configuration. The cost of such work, if it were attempted, would be prohibitive.

As well, it was noted that the canal is still used for some commercial activity, although it is not completely operational as were the other canals which were transferred. As a result, it does not offer the same scope for public use as a recreational area. For these reasons, it was decided that the Lachine canal could not be included in the transfer which has just been completed.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—REQUEST FOR ORGANIZATIONAL MEETING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the statement made in the House today by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) that the offer to Bélanger Limited, made, accepted and announced in March, 1971, has now been cancelled confirms my repeated claims that the figures of expected job creation quoted by the minister are grossly misleading. In this regard I am certainly grateful to the minister for this admission.

In this particular case a year would have passed between the initial publication of jobs to be created and the announced cancellation. This case is not at all unusual, however. The figure of an estimated 51,281 jobs to be created from DREE grant offers which the minister is quoting currently includes thousands of jobs which will never be created. The offers which were to have created them will be cancelled in future months or the firms will go bankrupt.

I might say there is considerable concrete evidence to support this charge. First of all, if the offers announced by the end of 1970 had resulted in the number of jobs predicted for them, 18,537 jobs would have been created; 4,454 of these jobs have vanished because of withdrawn or declined offers or bankruptcies. Applying this proportion to the total number of expected jobs announced since the beginning of this incentives program, it can be predicted that at least 13,500 of the jobs announced to date will have been lost by the end of this year.

The so-called net expected job total used by the department represents the subtraction from the total announcements of only the 5,095 jobs lost through withdrawn or declined offers revealed thus far. This procedure results in an overestimation of approximately 8,400 "expected jobs".

In this particular case we were able to expose the minister, but how many more offers have been announced which later have been withdrawn or cancelled secretly? How many hundreds of workers have been laid off by firms subsidized by DREE or by other firms unable to compete with those subsidized by DREE?

Second, in DREE's 1970-71 annual report released two weeks ago the number of jobs estimated from grants under the former Area Development Incentives Act is 22 per cent lower than the number claimed in the report issued last year: 12,264 expected jobs have been lost. This, again, demonstrates the misleading use made of these "expected job" figures by the department.

I call on the minister to stop misleading the public and this House with his talk of estimated jobs. I call on him to reveal the number of jobs actually in existence as a result of the $244 million which this government has paid out in incentives grants to firms since 1968. The minister refuses to talk of the actual total of jobs created; he talks only of imaginary expected jobs.

But there is a further issue: I contend that the minister, in his answer to the member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride), misled the House since the minister himself admitted outside the House that he had received notice of the question. In other words, it was a planted question designed to get the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton off the hook politically.

What happened between that day early in 1971 when the acceptance of the offer was announced with great fanfare and February 11, 1972—a year later—when the offer was secretly withdrawn? Why did this firm decline what amounted to an outright gift from the federal government? Was it because of the political consequences to the Liberal party in Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton which would flow from the closing down of the Findlay plant, with a loss of 200 jobs in Carleton Place? This would appear to be the case.

Only the minister can get the record straight, and I call on him now to do so. I realize he cannot be expected to do so in the three minutes that he has at his disposal during this adjournment debate, but he can do so, as we have repeatedly asked him to do so, by making a statement on motions which would have to stand up to the scrutiny of the opposition parties in the House.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I feel that the debates in this House can only bear fruit if all the members of the opposition as well as government members at least accept the facts, especially those that are known, that are public knowledge.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) asked that a debate be held this evening on the matter of the Bélanger-Tappan Ltd. Plant, and more specifically on the closing down of the Findlays Ltd. Plant. He has spoken of anything but that; in other words, he attempted to give statistical interpretations. I have absolutely no intention of discussing the matter in the few minutes I am allowed.

I say simply and maintain, Mr. Speaker, that if the type of question that was brought up tonight could be regularly accepted in this House, then the institution would no longer have any meaning.

Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth time since Monday that I have stated in the House that never has a grant been made to Bélanger-Tappan Limited. Never, at any time! The hon. member has reiterated the same assertion, that I could sum up this way:

[English]

The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) on Monday last referred to a grant paid to the firm of A. Belanger Ltée. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) knows very well that no grant was ever paid. He said that because he knows very well that some newspaperman would put it in print. That was his only reason. I do not see why he insists. He might interpret these statistics as much as he wants; I do not mind.

[Translation]

That is his business. Let him make his interpretations and I shall make mine. That is the normal play of democracy. But that he should systematically make a statement contrary to facts and continue to assert it, I consider then he is destroying in the process something more serious than the little cause he wants to defend, and that is what I cannot admit.

If the hon. member for St. John's East says there will not be as many jobs created as the minister claims, well, I can't swear to it on the Bible. I can only interpret, as he himself does. On that point, Mr. Speaker, I accept the debate, but on the other point I reject it. It is not proper either for those involved, for the government or for the opposition. Why waste the time of the House this evening saying such things? The hon. member is upset because the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) gave me notice of the question. But, Mr. Speaker, it is common knowledge that even opposition members give us notice of some questions they intend to put. In fact, it even happened to the hon. member for St. John's East. What is dishonest about that?

What matters is whether the reply is right. There is only one simple reply: no grant has been given; the hon.

member just refuses to face the clear fact that no grant has been awarded and that consequently he cannot make political hay of that issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been adopted.

[English]

This House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.19 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ACTION OF PROTECTIVE STAFF RESPECTING DELIVERY OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTS TO PRESS GALLERY BY MR. ROGER JAY

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members may be aware of the report that appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail—I believe the matter was also referred to during the CBC national newscast this morning—having to do with an incident which apparently occurred yesterday involving Mr. Roger Jay, communications officer for the Union of Ontario Indians, when he was delivering certain documents to the House of Commons. It was suggested in the press report and newscast that the gentleman had been treated unfairly in that certain comments had been made by the chief of the protective staff of the House of Commons. I might say I had a conversation this morning with the Sergeant-at-Arms who is responsible for the administration of the protective service. Later in the day he will give me a complete statement in regard to the matter and I will immediately report to the House.

I might say in a preliminary way that Chief Syms has given the assurance that he did not at any time pass any comment or judgment in relation to the contents of the statement proposed to be delivered. I want to assure hon. members, in any event, that I will certainly, on behalf of the House and on behalf of the staff of the House of Commons, extend apologies to this gentleman if in any way we have been at fault. Whether we are or not, we still express regret if any inconvenience was caused to this distinguished person who was here on official business and had every right to call on the press gallery as he proposed to do.

I think it would be unfair to our staff and to the chief if I said more until a formal report has been received which I will pass on to the House later today.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

B.C. INDIAN LAND QUESTION BILL

PROVISION FOR RECOGNITION THAT ABORIGINAL AND HEREDITARY OWNERSHIP NOT EXTINGUISHED

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni), for Mr. Howard (Skeena), moved for leave to introduce Bill C-166, respecting Indian lands in the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give parliamentary recognition to the historical fact that the aboriginal and hereditary ownership of the land in what is now British Columbia has not been extinguished. The native Indian people in British Columbia have been concerned about this for many decades and have pressed their case before government without result.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

POWER

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—REQUEST BY QUEBEC FOR PERMIT UNDER NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT—INDICATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It relates to the proposed James Bay project and the recognition by the minister, as expressed in the House on February 23, that permits are required under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Has the minister received any request for such permits? I ask this question in view of the fact that on February 23 the minister indicated he was not sure whether a request had been received.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to my personal knowledge we have not received any such request. I will inquire of my officials in the department and advise the House in this regard at the earliest opportunity. I suspect that had any such requests come in, I would have been notified of them.

Mr. Stanfield: Has the minister indicated the position of his department to the province of Quebec, that the department insists upon prior approval of this project with regard to navigable waters? Has the minister conveyed the position of his department with regard to the Navigable Waters Protection Act to the government of the province of Quebec?

Mr. Jamieson: Once again, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if this has been conveyed in precisely the manner in which the Leader of the Opposition has put it. Essentially, the Navigable Waters Protection Act works on the basis of an application being filed in the first instance and publicized in the newspapers. It is at that point the application comes forward to us and is dealt with. An interdepartmental committee has been studying this matter and I would imagine the province of Quebec has been advised of the requirements of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Again, rather than attempt to speculate I will, with the hon. member's permission, wait until Monday and get a specific answer for him.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact there is a ministerial committee or another committee concerned with this project, can the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whether the position of the government of Canada with regard to a permit has been conveyed to the province of Quebec? I ask this in view of the obvious importance that the government of Quebec attaches to this project and the obvious opportunities there are for misunderstanding. Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the government of Canada has conveyed its position on this matter to the government of the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the government of Quebec knows the law of Canada with respect to projects of this kind and intends to comply with the law. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not suggest otherwise.

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON HUNTING RIGHTS OF INDIANS FOLLOWING TRANSFER OF LANDS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether his department has been looking into the terms and conditions under which these lands were transferred to the province from territorial status in relation to the rights of the Indian population? If so, can the hon. gentleman report to the House as to the position the government is taking with regard to the proposal to develop these areas which are within the traditional hunting and trapping grounds of the Indian people?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have been looking into a number of aspects of the legal issues related to this question. As to the specific one referred to by the hon. member, we have been doing some work in the general area. However, I should like to take notice of the precise terms of the question directed to me and see whether there is anything I can usefully report to the House at this stage.

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT WILL BE OBSERVED

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that some years ago, at the time of the government headed by the predecessor of the present Prime Minister, the province of British Columbia, presumably in full knowledge of the law, went ahead and constructed a dam across the Peace River in breach of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, thereby causing great environmental damage, will the Acting Prime Minister give an undertaking to the House that the law will in fact be observed?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to give any such undertaking. This government is committed to the support of the law of Canada and will support it in this instance. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to make some accusations that would clarify the matter.

Mr. Baldwin: What about the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED USE OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE RESERVES TO REGAIN CONTROL OF CERTAIN SECTORS, INCLUDING FOREIGN-CONTROLLED INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In light of a government report released yesterday which revealed that Canada's foreign exchange reserves reached a record level of $5.67 billion in February, and in view of the fact that Canada has a floating dollar and hence does not need these reserves, does the government intend to use part of these funds in order to regain Canadian control of certain key sectors of the economy which are currently dominated by foreign firms?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is suggesting we should keep our reserves in other than a liquid form. I would be glad to hear more details of his proposal.

Mr. Broadbent: That is precisely what is being suggested. To be more specific, in view of the report made available from Swiss sources earlier in the week that Canada has the highest percentage of foreign-controlled insurance companies, would the government consider seriously using part of its foreign exchange reserves in order to gain control of these foreign-owned insurance companies in Canada, bearing in mind that these companies are an important source of investment capital which could be used to make more jobs available in this country?

Mr. Sharp: What the hon. gentleman is suggesting is that if we needed these reserves to support our currency we would sell these assets. I do not think that is a very good policy.

POINTE-GATINEAU—LA FERME DU BARON PROJECT—REQUEST THAT OWNERS BE COMPENSATED

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

I would ask him whether the Canadian government intends to take steps to indemnify house owners of La Ferme le Baron development at Pointe-Gatineau against the many defects and poor quality of the construction.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, such a question could readily be placed on the order paper or debated on the adjournment motion. However, if the hon. minister can give the question a brief reply, I shall allow him to do so.

The hon. member might take for granted that due note has been taken of his question.

Mr. Laprise: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—USE OF NEW FACILITY AS MAJOR TERMINAL FOR OVERSEAS FLIGHTS—POSSIBLE SEPARATION OF PASSENGER AND FREIGHT SERVICES

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport concerning his announcement yesterday of a new airport in the Toronto region. Is it intended that the new airport will be the major terminal for overseas flights or will Malton continue in this role?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the new airport which I announced yesterday will be an international airport and will in fact be about comparable in size and operation as the one that is now under construction at Ste. Scholastique. As to whether it will be a totally international airport or one with a mix of services, this can, of course, only be determined with the passage of time. But it will have all the necessary amenities and facilities to be an international airport, and we visualize that that would be its main purpose.

Mr. Aiken: Does the development of new airports in the Toronto and Montreal regions indicate a new policy concerning air traffic handling and, specifically, the development of a distinction between passengers and air freight?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker. I do not expect, at least in the state of the art as it is at the moment, that there would be any such clearcut division. Generally speaking, air freight is carried quite frequently on planes that also carry passengers, and this looks as though it will be the largest part of such movements for the immediate future. So there could be no such distinction. Each of the airports at Toronto and Montreal is designed to accommodate the traffic growth that has taken place and will take place in both these regions.

AIR TRANSPORT

IDENTITY OF CARRIER FOR POSSIBLE SERVICE TO MAINLAND CHINA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport on the subject of air policy. I should like to refer to another airport in Canada, the one at Vancouver, and the prospects for its future growth. Has any decision yet been made as to which carrier will attempt to service mainland China?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this is hardly supplementary to the question asked about the Toronto airport, but again we can perhaps save time by allowing the question and allowing the minister to reply to it.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the procedure, as I expect the hon. member knows, is for the two countries to initiate talks with a view to reaching agreement on a bilateral. I can advise the House that we have in fact advised the government of the People's Republic of China that we are prepared to enter into such bilateral negotiations at any time they are prepared to start such negotiations. In so far as the designation of a carrier is concerned, I think it is common practice to refrain from indicating publicly just which carrier it will be until such time as the bilateral has been negotiated.

PENITENTIARIES

SASKATCHEWAN—POSSIBLE CLOSING OF INSTITUTION—OPPORTUNITY FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO BE MADE BY THOSE AFFECTED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I ask this question of the Acting Prime Minister. It has to do with the special report No. 1 on the design of federal maximum security institutions, which was tabled yesterday in the House. In the report there are recommendations concerning the prairie provinces and the Drumheller, Saskatchewan and Manitoba penitentiaries. One of the recommendations is that the Saskatchewan penitentiary should be phased out and its use as a correctional institution discontinued.

In view of the serious economic consequences that would follow the carrying out of this report in so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, would the government give the assurance that before the theoretical conclusions in the report are carried into effect opportunities will be made available, for example, through a travelling commission, to hear at first hand the views not only of the people affected in the case of the Saskatchewan penitentiary but also in regard to the other two institutions.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member for Prince Albert speaks with his customary eloquence, and I am quite sure his views will be conveyed to the Solicitor General who will treat them very seriously indeed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate that very much, Mr. Speaker, but eloquence without action on the part of the government would be ineffectual. I am asking for action.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROTECTIVE STAFF—INCREASE IN HOURS OF WORK PER WEEK—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to put my question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as a member of the Board of Commissioners of Internal Economy, but he seems to have departed since I started rising so perhaps I can put it to the President of the Treasury Board who is also a member of that body.

In view of reports that have reached us to the effect that the members of the protective staff have been advised that their hours of work per week are to be increased without any increase in pay, could this matter be looked into and could arrangements be made for His Honour, the Speaker, to include a comment on it when he reports to the House later this day on another matter affecting the protective staff?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of the particular circumstances, as I am sure the other commissioners are, but I will be glad to look into this. So far as the second part of the question is concerned, I do not think the hon. member seriously expects the commissioners to examine this question and conclude it by today.

TOURISM

U.S. INSISTENCE ON INCREASE IN DUTY FREE ALLOWANCE ON GOODS PURCHASED BY CANADIANS—PROMOTION OF TRAVEL WITHIN CANADA

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. With the renewal of the United States-Canada trade discussions expected soon, can the minister say whether the United States government is still insisting on Canada increasing the duty free allowance on goods that Canadian tourists bring back from the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations have not resumed yet so it is too early to know what the position of the United States will be on this particular item at that time. Of course, my hon. friend knows that the Americans had identified as an irritant the fact that our allowances for tourists were lower than theirs in the first place, and had not been restored to the level they were in 1962 when we had to change them because of balance of payments difficulties. This was one of the irritants on which we had sympathy for the U.S. case.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, recent figures indicate a many million dollar deficit in tourist account for Canada last year. In light of this, will the government now take measures so that air travel within Canada can become competitive with air travel overseas—in other words, a program to encourage Canadians to see Canada first?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I want to observe first that the balance in tourism between Canada and the United States is favourable to Canada, so that that is not a good argument to present to the Americans. On the subject of package programs for travelling in Canada as opposed to package programs for travelling abroad, I want to underline the fact that my office of tourism which has now an added domestic orientation has been working diligently in order to bring the first to the level of the second. I will be glad to send a note to the hon. member showing that some progress is being made in that direction. I will give him a copy of it.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—DATE FOR RESUMPTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. With regard to the discussions taking place, or about to be resumed soon, between Canada and the United States, can the minister say whether a date has been set for the next meeting or, if a date has not been set, can the minister say whether discussions are actively under way with a view to fixing a date for the next meeting at which these discussions will be continued?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It all depends on how one defines "active". I can just confirm that there is no date fixed for the resumption of negotiations at this moment. As I keep repeating—

Mr. Stanfield: No date has been set for a meeting?

Mr. Pepin: No date has been set for a meeting.

Mr. Stanfield: No discussions?

Mr. Pepin: But contact has been maintained. Our position is along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Peace River who said the other day that we should be tough but soft at the same time. To summarize, we are being reasonable.

• (1130)

Mr. Speaker: Is the Leader of the Opposition rising on a supplementary question?

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the minister can explain how negotiations are continuing when in fact there are no arrangements for meetings or no preparations for meetings.

Mr. Pepin: There are many ways of keeping contact with people if you have some imagination.

An hon. Member: Such as mental telepathy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—GRANT TO PROCESS OF THE FINAL JUDGMENT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ENDORSEMENTS AND COMMITTEE INQUIRY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will resist the natural inclination to deal with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and put that off until later. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. In light of the fact that last Wednesday, as found on page 425 of Hansard of March 1, the Acting Prime Minister enthusiastically endorsed a grant of $26,000 under the local initiatives program to The Process of the Final Judgment church and cited several endorsements by the Bank of Montreal, the YMCA, the mental retardation centre, and the Premier of Ontario and in view of the fact a newspaper report is circulating in Toronto today that these organizations, or most of them, have denied endorsing or approving this particular local initiatives program, will the Acting Prime Minister be good enough to secure and table the endorsements in question so that we in the House may have a chance to examine them?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour will be very happy to deal with this question when he is here on Monday.

Mr. Baldwin: As the Acting Prime Minister was very conversant with the subject on Wednesday I should like to ask him this supplementary question. As this program is costing many hundreds of millions of dollars and as the supplementary estimates were rushed through the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee without adequate opportunity being given to study the matter, will the Acting Prime Minister do his very best to see that this particular issue of the local initiatives program is referred to a specific committee for close examination and study on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada?

Mr. Sharp: There will be the same opportunity to discuss this program as all other programs of the government, and if the opposition is sufficiently diligent in these committees I am sure they will be able to obtain all the information they want.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Would the Acting Prime Minister, having regard to the details given in the Toronto Sun, look into these grants that are being made under the LIP program such as the one to the Rochdale free clinic which provides counselling to deserters and draft dodgers and grants to various other organizations connected with Rochdale which has been described as a refuge for draft dodgers, deserters and drug pushers? Will he have this looked into, because other worthy projects are being turned down and it is difficult to understand why such projects as the Rochdale grants should have been permitted?

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REMOVAL OF STATION AGENTS, SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA—REVIEW OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION ORDER BY MINISTER OR CABINET

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport following questions asked previously in the House concerning the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission to allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to close a large number of station agencies in Saskatchewan and Alberta and to allow the establishment of a customer service centre in Saskatoon. Has the minister considered this matter or has it been considered by the cabinet in terms of the government taking some initiative in reviewing or altering the decision rendered by the Canadian Transport Commission?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the specific answer to my hon. friend is no, it has not been considered in the manner he outlined. I have explained to the House on previous occasions that there is a provision, first of all, for an appeal against this decision which anyone can take if they so desire and, second, that the CTC has indicated that if in any way the railway company breaches the instructions or regulations that were laid down, a complaint can be filed.

Mr. Burton: May I ask the minister whether he has received any indication of appeal procedures or any other actions that will be taken as a result of this decision, and will the minister or the federal government be taking any action in conjunction with any such procedures?

Mr. Jamieson: To my knowledge a formal appeal has not been received. There have been communications or objections of an informal nature but nothing that conforms to the National Transportation Act. Since that is the case, or at least to my knowledge that is the case, the second part of the question is hypothetical until an appeal is received.

GRAIN

TAKEOVER OF FEDERAL GRAIN COMPANY ELEVATORS BY POOLS—ACTION RESPECTING BOXCAR ALLOTMENT TO ASSURE SUFFICIENT SPACE IN OTHER ELEVATORS FOR DELIVERY

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and arises out of the purchase of Federal Grain by the Prairie wheat pools and the fact that this consolidation gives one company approximately two-thirds of the country elevator system. Can the minister say what steps are being taken to change the 12-month floating average method, or what is referred to as the Bracken formula, for the allotment of boxcars so that other elevator companies will have sufficient space available to ensure that their customers have delivery privileges and that true competition in the grain buying trade will exist and not just seem to exist?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, serious consideration is being given to the congestion problems that may arise and at times interfere with the right of the farmer to deliver to the elevator of his choice. There does seem to be general support for the Bracken formula and the 12-month period. However, some other aspects having to do with the congestion problem might well be added to it.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): In light of the fact that there is general support for the Bracken formula in normal circumstances and the fact that these are unusual circumstances and also because of the great concern of many farmers to the point where they are cancelling curling games to attend meetings regarding this matter, may I ask the minister whether he would not at this juncture consider the possibility of allowing the free movement of boxcars which would normally have gone to the Federal Grain elevator system so that the farmers would in fact have the right to choose the elevator to which they wish to deliver?

Mr. Lang: As I indicated, I believe there is general support for the Bracken formula, and by that I mean support from all parties concerned. However, there is a view which some hold, as I have just mentioned, of the need for a new method of dealing with the congestion problem. If this can be dealt with it will mean that the farmers themselves will in effect be making the decision on where they deliver their grain and therefore where boxcar allocations go. I hope this can be done at an early date. If the curling games can be taken up again, I would be very glad to attend.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER CANADIAN SOLDIERS ARE SERVING WITH BRITISH FORCES IN NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It deals with a report I received about a Canadian soldier who is on duty in Belfast, Ireland, and whose mailing address is Camp Gagetown, New Brunswick. Can the minister say whether or not there are Canadian soldiers serving with the British forces in Belfast?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is my understanding that no members of the Canadian Armed Forces are serving with the British forces in Northern Ireland. There may be Canadians who have joined the British armed forces and are now serving in Northern Ireland, but in these circumstances the Canadian government is not involved. The standing instructions are that if any Canadian soldiers are attached to British units they are not to serve in such places. If there has been some transgression of this rule we will look into it, but so far as we know this is not so.

Mr. Grills: I should like to ask the minister whether or not there are any Canadian soldiers serving in any capacity in Belfast, apart from the British military efforts there?

[Mr. Downey.]

Mr. Sharp: So far as I know there are no members of the Canadian Armed Forces who are serving in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Baldwin: They may be refugees from the tax reform bill.

FISHERIES

RESPONSE TO PETITION SEEKING REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES TO PERMIT IMPORTATION OF CANADIAN SWORDFISH

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment but in his absence I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister who has a stake in this as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment have just been sent a petition asking the government of Canada to urge the United States government to permit importation of Canadian swordfish, can we be advised of the response to this plea?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has been received and it is under consideration.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON RAILWAY SAFETY—SPECIFIC INVESTIGATIONS OF RECENT DERAILMENTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. When may we expect the report on rail safety as a result of the investigation undertaken by the Railway Transport Committee some months ago?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Canadian Transport Commission, in response to an inquiry I made which was prompted by the hon. member's question, I believe, a few days ago, that the report is in the process of being completed or written and should be available within two or three weeks.

Mr. Gleave: May I ask the minister whether specific studies or investigations are being undertaken into the most recent causes of derailments in the east and also on many branch lines in western Canada since these affect the safety of the men who operate the trains?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say with certainty that investigations into the various accidents to which the hon. member refers have actually started. It is mandatory, however, that an investigation of each rail accident be undertaken as quickly as possible after its occurrence, so undoubtedly all of them will be covered in this way.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—REDUCTION OF SUBSIDIES—PROTESTS FROM QUEBEC AND ONTARIO PRODUCERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture a question?

As the estimates for the next fiscal year indicate a decrease of $21 million as compared with last year, could the minister tell the House whether he has received representations from industrial milk production boards in Quebec or Ontario in this respect?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is not clear from the question whether the hon. member is talking about a projected increase in dairy support. If that is the impression he got, it is erroneous.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Bellechasse rising on a supplementary?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I hope the minister will not take my question as criticism. I simply wish to know whether he has received representations from industrial milk production boards with respect to the reduction that is announced in the estimates.

[English]

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received a number of representations dealing not only with the level of subsidy support but also respecting the price levels and, indeed, a new situation that has to be dealt with, when the market price for some dairy products is substantially above the support levels.

AIR TRANSPORT

AIR ONTARIO SERVICE—POSSIBLE CHALLENGE TO FEDERAL AUTHORITY TO REGULATE AND LICENSE CARRIERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): My question is for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. In view of the announced increase in Air Canada service within the province of Ontario and recent press reports that the Ontario government is sponsoring or assisting a new air service, Air Ontario, does the government of Canada plan to meet head on any challenge to its authority to regulate and license air carriers within the province?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would not regard this as what the hon. member has described as a challenge to our authority. As things stand at the present time and as I indicated yesterday, Air Canada will be holding discussions with the government of Ontario with a view to providing more in the way of what might be described as regional or hub and spoke services. Given the existing regional air policy, of course the company to which the hon. member refers would not be entitled to apply for services within Ontario or anywhere else unless that policy were changed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Peters: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Timiskaming on a supplementary question. I draw to the attention of hon. members that we will be running short of time within five or six minutes. There may be time for that number of questions if hon. members are quick in asking them and we obtain prompt answers from the ministers. The hon. member for Timiskaming has a supplementary.

ONTARIO—ACQUIRING BY AIR CANADA OF TYPE OF AIRCRAFT REQUIRED TO PROVIDE REGIONAL SERVICES

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has a report as a result of the investigation he agreed to undertake that Air Canada has available the type of aircraft that could service the area mentioned by the hon. member for Algoma?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I can say I have a report in terms of further discussions with the chairman of the board of Air Canada. There are two or three types of aircraft, some already in use in Canada and some not, which are being examined. However, a final decision on this matter is not possible until the route structure has been put together.

POST OFFICE

RESPONSE BY TREASURY BOARD TO UNIONS' PROPOSALS ON WAGES AND JOB SECURITY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and concerns the negotiations with the postal unions. Has Treasury Board replied to the proposals of the unions regarding wages and security of jobs by either accepting them or making counter-proposals?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the situation is this morning but as of yesterday Treasury Board had not replied nor countered in view of the fact that the unions have not presented any proposals.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

METHOD OF AWARDING CONTRACT TO INTERNATIONAL TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH TO MECHANIZE MAIL SORTING IN POST OFFICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Minister of Supply and Services, Mr. Speaker. Is the hon. gentleman aware of the $70 million contract awarded recently to the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation for the purpose of mechanizing the mail-sorting process in the Post Office Department, and can he assure the House that this contract was awarded on the usual tendering basis?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that the contract was on the usual tendering basis.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the fact that there has been a recent exchange of personnel between the Post Office Department and the corporation at a high level, would the minister look into the matter further and report to the House?

• (1150)

CONTRACT AWARDED TO INTERNATIONAL TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH TO MECHANIZE MAIL SORTING IN POST OFFICE—POSSIBLE CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact the deputy minister of the Post Office Department is a former president of the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation and that an important employee of the Post Office is now with International Telephone and Telegraph, would the Acting Prime Minister confer with the Postmaster General, who I understand is holding a news conference right at this moment, so that a statement can be made in the House on Monday correcting any erroneous impression that may be left with the public about a possible conflict of interest in the awarding of this contract?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that what the minister has said, that this contract was awarded on the usual basis of tendering, should be sufficient assurance. Perhaps the hon. member wishes to create an erroneous impression, and of course that is his responsibility.

Mr. Nowlan: Without trying to create any impression but hoping that incorrect impressions can be clarified and knowing full well that some employees have changed positions between International Telephone and Telegraph and the Post Office, will the Acting Prime Minister at least confer with the Postmaster General to ensure that there is no potential conflict of interest in the award of this $70 million contract?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON RENEWAL OF LEASE COVERING AMERICAN AIR FORCE BASE, GOOSE BAY—POSSIBLE CANADIAN FORCES BASE

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact the present lease covering the United States Air Force base at Goose Bay expires in December of this year, can the minister advise whether negotiations for the renewal of this lease have commenced, and when does he expect to make a statement to the House in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, negotiations have begun and when they are completed a statement will be made.

Mr. Peddle: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell us briefly whether the establishment of a Canadian Armed Forces base is contemplated in the Goose Bay area?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, negotiations are taking place.

SHIPPING

INVESTIGATION INTO SINKING OF TUGBOAT, "HARO STRAITS"

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the unfortunate sinking of the tugboat, Haro Straits, off the coast of British Columbia with the loss of the entire five-man crew. Has the minister ordered an investigation into this accident? If not, will he order such investigation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already initiated such an investigation, the normal kind of investigation that follows a tragic incident of this sort. In this particular case it has been possible to go a little further with the initial stage of the investigation because the towline is still attached to the vessel and we have engaged the services of a submersible so that an on the bottom or underwater investigation can take place. My information is that weather conditions have hampered the investigation in the last two or three days but that it is going ahead as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Douglas: Since the whole question of the towboat regulations and the effectiveness of their application may be a factor in determining the cause of this unfortunate accident, would the minister undertake to have an independent investigation made by knowledgeable people outside the Department of Transport which administers the towboat regulations.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I believe the House knows from earlier explanations I have made that the procedure followed in all such cases is for an initial investigation to be conducted and, on the basis of that report, I can then decide whether to continue with a more formal inquiry of the nature the hon. member has outlined. Certainly, if the preliminary or initial report suggests that this would be advisable, I would be sympathetic to the proposal of the hon. member.

POLLUTION

RECONSIDERATION OF LEVIES ON OIL TANKER SHIPMENTS TO PROVIDE CONTINGENCY FUND IN CASE OF SPILLS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister, along with the Minister of the Environment, giving new consideration to the levies regarding oil pollution in the Maritimes, particularly in view of the approach of the provincial governments and others to this question? If so, when will we be hearing about this new consideration?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no consideration being given to the possibility of abandoning the levies. What I have indicated in conversations with various maritime interests, both governmental and otherwise, is that I am prepared to be somewhat more precise than the act requires in indicating the top level of the fund and, once that level has been achieved, how we would propose to de-escalate the payments. I would hope to have a statement on this to convey to interested parties in a few days. I have also indicated my willingness to meet with them.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

AUTHORIZATION OF FISCAL PAYMENTS TO AND TAX COLLECTION AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-8, to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, during my remarks last night I indicated my support, and that of other hon. members of the New Democratic Party, for the principle of equalization. I said that this bill goes a long way towards implementation of the principle of equalization and that we were happy to see the progress, as indicated in this bill, made in effecting an effective equalization plan across Canada. At the same time it must also be said that I am very much alarmed, as are many people, by the prospect of certain proposals which, by one means or another, may undermine the principle of equalization. Any set of proposals which may attempt to declare the principle of equalization as unconstitutional or which may try to destroy the principle will bring about, if accepted, the greatest possible mischief to the well-being of Canada in the long run. Certainly I, for one, want to make sure that all steps are taken to ensure that the principle of equalization is not destroyed or undermined and that this mischief never comes about. Even though some of the proposals brought forward as alternatives to the present system may be well meaning, I think they are ill-conceived and will not achieve the objectives set for them by their proponents.

Last night in my remarks I also urged the government to take steps to broaden the revenue base in determining equalization payments and to include within the scope of the calculations and the formula used for determining the revenue base the matter of municipal revenues. This is particularly important at this time because shifts in responsibilities with regard to various government functions are taking place as between the provincial and municipal levels of government. A number of developments are taking place in various provinces which contain implications for an adequate equalization plan across Canada.

I am also concerned about the future of our health programs, and especially about federal participation in those programs. It seems to me, on the basis of certain indications which are evident at present, that the federal government is making moves in an effort to opt out of these programs in the long run. The first step in the process, of course, is limiting the federal government's contribution to these programs. As I understand the situation, the federal government has proposed that further increases in federal contributions to health programs, and federal-provincial health programs in particular, involving hospitalization and medical care, should be based upon growth in the gross national product or some other similar indicator.

Actually, health costs at present are growing more quickly than these indicators. Therefore, the government's proposal will leave the provinces holding the bag, so to speak. At the same time I think we should all be concerned about increases in health costs and also remember that we must reorganize some of our health delivery systems in Canada, while making sure at the same time that we do not decrease the quality of health care. Actually, we must take steps to improve the quality of health care across Canada. I suggest that this can only be achieved if the federal government makes it clear that it will go along with the provinces and stand behind the provinces in supporting these programs, both at present and in future.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to some further points that are of concern in our consideration of this bill. I wish to make particular reference to some remarks the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) made in introducing the bill. At one point in his speech the minister referred to the benefits of stabilization and the changes made in stabilization payments. He said, as recorded at page 435 of Hansard:

> Another benefit of stabilization is the help it provides to provinces when they attempt to borrow on international money markets.

The minister's statement, Mr. Speaker, may be perfectly correct. Yet it seems to me that that statement conflicts with the request that the federal government some time ago made of the provinces when it asked them to refrain as much as possible from entering the international money markets in raising money for their financial requirements. The minister also made the following statement as recorded on the same page of Hansard:

> Within this framework of tax harmonization and uniformity, provinces are perfectly free to establish their own rates of taxation. They have been doing so to an increasing extent. This is the real test of fiscal independence and decentralization—the willingness to exercise the responsibility to tax as well as the responsibility to spend.

I must take issue with that statement, Mr. Speaker. Although we may recognize that, technically, within the present restricted framework the statement is accurate, there are also loopholes in it. At present the provinces can be involved in the system of taxation as proposed only if they accept the basic structure proposed by the federal government with respect to tax systems. They can then determine at what percentage level they want to have their taxes. However, they must accept the federal government's basic structure as it has been established. If one province wants to give greater benefits and exemptions to lower income groups, for example, they are not able to do so under the present plan. This is a real deficiency. I recognize that there are complexities in overcoming this problem, but I do not think it is fair to say that provinces are perfectly free to establish their own rates of taxation when they have to conduct themselves within the type of framework that has been imposed by the federal government.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) made another statement which is recorded on the same page of Hansard. The minister stated:

> The present bill would also empower the federal government to collect, on behalf of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and the four Atlantic provinces the succession duties which they have proposed. I want to emphasize that these provinces have made the decision to rejoin Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia in the succession duty field entirely on their own. We have had no part in their decision and have agreed to assist in collections only in response to their urgent requests to us.

That is a nice way for the minister to wash his hands of the entire area of succession duties, as the provinces are now taking them up. The federal government must take primary responsibility for this development. In fact, it was the federal government that opted out of the estate tax field in the income tax bill which was passed in the last session. The federal government must assume primary responsibility for the many problems that are going to arise with regard to the entire matter of handling estate and succession duties. In many cases, the provinces have no choice but to enter this field for purposes of obtaining revenue and so on. In fact, the federal government has recognized this in the definition of revenue sources, since they have included a reference to succession duties in the formula. The federal government has done a great disservice to Canada by opting out of the field of taxation of estates or any form of imposition of succession duties. One way to keep this country together, about which the government claims it is so concerned, is to ensure that there is one levy across Canada with regard to taxation of estates. That levy can most properly be imposed by the federal government.

Many inequities will very shortly develop. The new situation is such that nine out of 10 provinces will be in the succession duty field. The province of Alberta thinks it will get away with something by staying out of this field. In the long run, it may find that it will be faced with some serious problems. What is the situation with regard to some cases? In recent months some very well known and distinguished Canadians have passed away, leaving large estates. They happened to live in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Under the new plan, those provinces will be the sole beneficiaries of most of the succession duties of the estates of these people. In some cases these individuals gained their wealth and financial resources by carrying on business activity all across Canada, not just in the particular province in which they lived.

If the federal government is really concerned with the principle of equalization as a means of keeping Canada together, it has a duty to take the initiative and once again re-enter the field of taxation of estates by imposing an equitable succession duty, the revenue from which could be distributed among the provinces on an equitable formula. The only type of equitable plan in the long run will result from the federal government accepting its responsibility in this field.

I want to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). He stressed the importance of the equalization of transportation costs in Canada in the future. This is one of the thrusts that should be developed in federal policy in the coming years. Moves toward equalization of transportation costs would do a great deal to keep Canada together. This one step would do more to eliminate regional disparities in Canada than the millions of dollars which the federal government is handing to private industry and private business. Transportation costs is one of the major factors contributing to regional disparity in Canada at the present time.

I suggest this factor is important in relation to some of the comments made recently by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) when he indicated he and his department are working on an industrial strategy for Canada. If the benefits of this new industrial strategy, whatever it is going to be, are to be equitably distributed across Canada, it will be necessary to ensure there is an equalization of transportation costs. With the technology and economics of the operations of many industries in Canada today, if we allow the present inequitable transportation cost structure to remain, many parts of Canada will be left out in the cold when this new industrial strategy unfolds.

While a good many aspects of the bill before us are concerned with economic measures and financial aspects of the operation of government, there are some features which deserve attention. Under this bill there is another five year extension of the Hospital Insurance Act, the Blind Persons Act, the Disabled Persons Act, the Unemployment Assistance Act and the Canada Assistance Plan. They are simply being extended for another five years. It is not clear whether there will be any changes or improvements in these programs. I certainly feel we should give them some consideration.

Today I would like to mention two particular areas which I feel should be kept in mind. First, I want to make particular reference to the Blind Persons Act. This is a selective program to assist people with a particular problem in life. It is not the type of selective program that tells the people concerned that they will receive more favourable treatment than other groups in society. Under the terms and benefits of this act, blind people today are in a selective unfavourable position. It is a disgrace that we in Canada have been so niggardly in our assistance to the blind people in this country. I hope the federal government will take some initiative to improve the level of assistance provided to this group of people.

I also note that the Canada Assistance Plan is to be extended another five years. There are many worthwhile features in the Canada Assistance Plan in terms of the federal government's contribution to this program. There are deficiencies as well. I wish to make just one comment in this regard. That is to take note of the recent growth of unfavourable comment in Canada about welfare programs in general. There seems to be a mood and feeling developing in Canada that there are many thousands of bums, people who are too lazy to go out and work and so on. They feel they are simply getting along on the Canada Assistance Plan benefits and that the whole program is a shambles. I suggest we all have to recognize that some problems do exist. We all recognize that there are new life styles and new life patterns developing in Canada. These are producing problems which have not been totally taken into account in the programs as they have been developed in this area to date.

But if we concentrate our attention in this area without reference to those who have a justifiable claim to assistance we are doing a disservice to many thousands who are in dire need. A good case could be made out for a better deal for many who are presently existing on welfare benefits under the Canada Assistance Plan and various provincial plans. We need to keep in mind our responsibility as a nation to help those who are not able to help themselves adequately. It may be we are devoting insufficient attention to the requirements of many thousands who are living in unfortunate circumstances and who have a justifiable claim for assistance under these programs.

The government and its officials will feel a justifiable sense of accomplishment with respect to the bill now before us. There are useful items in it. Some progress has been made in implementing the principle of equalization though much work remains to be done. I certainly hope we shall see more progress in the coming months in dealing with some of the shortcomings which have been pointed out in the course of this debate.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is not the type of speech I prefer to make in this House or anywhere else for that matter. I intend to deal with some of the less lovely aspects of political life. I am dealing with the subject of irresponsible statements made by some British Columbia politicians who are in a position to know better and who are, to put it plainly, making pronouncements aimed at showing that French-speaking Canadians are being favoured by the present federal government.

Before going further, I should like to say that the remarks I intend to make are not directed against members of the British Columbia Legislative Assembly whose ridings are in my federal constituency of Coast-Chilcotin, namely, Alex Fraser of the Social Credit party, the member for Cariboo; the Hon. Isabel Dawson, Minister without Portfolio, the member for Mackenzie; Bill Hartley of the NDP, the member for Yale-Lillooet, or Alan Williamson of the Liberal party, the member for West Vancouver. I am personally acquainted with these four people and I know that the type of campaign of which I am speaking would be beneath their dignity. As for some of the other members of the British Columbia Social Credit party, if the cap fits, let them wear it. But they should not think that because some of their wild statements are not always promptly rebutted here they have gone unnoticed. They are not unnoticed. There are letters. There are meetings arranged but never held. There are public statements. And they are on the record.

In this bill we are dealing with an idea which is fundamental to a federal state. Nothing could be more so. No nation can exist without brotherhood, without sharing and without recognition of the basic principle that the poorer sections of the nation shall be helped by those which are wealthier. There is nothing unfamiliar about that idea, whether we look to Yugoslavia or Switzerland or to a score of other states. And the complaints which arise in connection with redistribution are familiar enough, also.

I had the privilege during the recess of sitting in the famous mother of parliaments in Westminster. On the day I happened to be there, the British minister of trade and commerce was being questioned by the opposition and by members of his own party on his policies. The subject turned to special incentive grants to slow growth areas of Britain, and the familiar complaints were heard. Why is one particular area of Scotland receiving aid while certain areas of Wales or the Midlands are not? The old questions and the old problems. We in this federal parliament are engaged in trying to make some redistribution of the tax dollars of all Canadians in the name of a greater Canada. Skillfully or otherwise, this is what we are attempting to do. I am one who has some doubts about the ways in which federal governments, both this one and its many predecessors, have sought to redistribute the wealth. Also, as a westerner, I have some quarrels with the east. There are many of us at home who have no deep and abiding affection for the Canadian banking system, controlled, as it is, by eastern Canada—surely one of the most conservative and unimaginative banking systems of any vigorous young nation. We do not particularly appreciate the control of many of our companies by boards of directors selected from the east all of whom appear to have snow-white hair and ideas which are very old.

British Columbia is producing some of the wealth which is available for redistribution to the poorer provinces. This is being created back home by people with imagination, drive and energy and we sometimes feel we are doing it in spite of the eastern Canadian majority vote in this federation. But that is not the main burden of my remarks today. The fact remains that some redistribution of wealth is fundamental to the very existence of Canada. Indeed, the principle applies even within provinces. In the Province of British Columbia wealth tends to concentrate in the City of Vancouver. Provincial governments over the decades have ensured that some of this money is spread abroad to less developed areas of the province.

In any case, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) set out very clearly, using figures which I truly hope the newspapers of British Columbia will relay to their readers, the facts about the present redistribution system and its true proportions. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I must deal openly here with a campaign which is being carried on by some people designed to convince the public that these transfers of money are not really from the richer to the poorer provinces but from the English-speaking provinces to the French-speaking province of Quebec. Nothing could be more divisive or unfair or damaging. Here today I should like to pass on a few balsawood cannonballs to any at home who wish to pursue this little game.

To illustrate my point, I have here some figures concerning the DREE program. They concern the grants made available under this legislation up to November 30, 1971, the latest date for which figures are available. They show that Quebec got by far the largest share of these grants—$86,299,232. Ontario received only $19,147,632, and British Columbia a mere $2,719,263. Now, any who wish to pursue the anti-French campaign in British Columbia are welcome to use those figures. However, those same people should not read any further in the Hansard report of this speech. They should confine themselves to the figures I mentioned a moment ago.

A misleading campaign of this sort is dependent on the suspension of curiosity on the part of the listener. I say this because the figures I quoted compare grants province by province, not person by person. To accept the proposition that Quebec gets the lion's share of these grants, it is essential that the audience never be reminded that Quebec has a larger population than almost all other provinces, not to mention a larger share of unemployment than many.

If we see what these grants amount to on a citizen to citizen rather than province to province basis, an entirely different picture emerges. Let us see what it is. The highest per capita grants go to Nova Scotia at $32.60 per person. The population of the province at the last census was 756,039, and the total grants amounted to $24,547,833. The second largest per capita grants went to New Brunswick, at $29.78 per capita. This is derived from a population figure of 616,788, with total grants of $18,368,467. Third in rank, for some reason, is the comparatively wealthy province of Alberta, one of the have provinces, at $16.40 per capita, grants totalling $23,999,555 and a population of 1,463,203. So far the charge of favouritism to French-speaking Canadians is not holding up very well, is it, Mr. Speaker? However, Quebec, which has a four-to-one ratio of French-speaking citizens, does rank fourth on the list. Industries there have had money made available to them at the rate $14.93 per capita, a little less than half the per capita rate for Nova Scotia. The total grants to Quebec were $86,299,232, with a population of 5,780,845.

I will run through the other provinces very briefly for hon. members. They can do their own arithmetic, but I can assure them that I have checked the figures very carefully. In diminishing order of amount we have Newfoundland with $12.54 per capita, total grants of $6,185,743 and a population of 493,396. Manitoba has $12 per capita, total grants of $11,572,647 with a population of 963,066. Prince Edward Island has $10.25 per capita, total grants of $1,112,727 and a population of 108,535. Saskatchewan has $5.87 per capita, total grants of $5,605,658 and a population of 955,344. Ontario has $2.75 per capita, total grants of $19,147,632 and a population of 6,960,870. Then lastly, British Columbia has $1.45 per capita, total grants of $2,719,263 and a population of 1,873,874.

[Mr. St. Pierre.]

I suggest there is much scope for debate about the picture that emerges here. One might wonder why Alberta, one of the three have provinces, ranks third while the other two have provinces of Ontario and British Columbia are ninth and tenth on the list. Or why the disparity between two neighbouring and very similar provinces, Saskatchewan and Manitoba? But that is not the purpose of these remarks. The purpose is to match the figures against claims that the federal government favours those Canadians who speak French. Let us keep that insinuation out of this debate and, hopefully, out of other political arenas.

To the extent that I can claim to know something about my home province, I want to tell the House that we British Columbians have our disagreements with the east and I suppose will continue to do so until, as is inevitable, the dumbbell shaped economy develops in Canada, as happened in the United States with the relationship of California and New York. But British Columbians in an overwhelming majority do not want to see federalism damaged by the insinuation that there is favouritism that is based upon whether a Canadian speaks French or English. I thank hon. members for their courteous attention.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have dealt ably with many aspects of this important legislation, and I intend to confine myself to one point and one point only. So that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) does not remain in a state of expectancy, it arises from clauses 9 and 10 whereby the federal government, on behalf of certain provincial governments, will collect succession duties under legislation that is still not passed in those provinces.

The federal authority, as I shall prove, has already frozen, in effect, the estates in those six Canadian provinces, and the argument I will be making is the very age-old one of taxation without legislation. It is true that ministers of finance are able to announce tax changes at certain times during the year, such as in their budget speeches, and the hours at which those taxes are to take effect are later given legislative authority.

However, once in a while a storm breaks in this institution as a result of different courses being followed. For example, a present judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, who previously was a Minister of Finance, Judge Abbott, provoked such a storm in the late forties by announcing an important tax change through the medium of radio, an announcement that later became known as the "radio budget". There was some considerable discussion in the parliament of that time as to whether this was the proper course to follow.

But if it is bad to have that sort of thing happening, it is much worse when we are wielding the headman's axe on behalf of other authorities. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray), whose department is mixed up in this unholy business, find themselves doing this chore on behalf of the provinces, none of whose legislatures, as far as I am aware, have yet passed the necessary legislation envisaged by this bill.

Clause 9 of the bill provides:

Where a province imposes duties or taxes on any legacy, succession, inheritance or gift, the Minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may on behalf of the Government of Canada enter into a tax collection agreement with the government of the province pursuant to which the Government of Canada will collect the provincial duties or taxes on behalf of the province and will make payments to the province in respect of the duties or taxes so collected in accordance with such terms and conditions as the agreement prescribes.

Subclause (2) provides that:

The Minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may on behalf of the Government of Canada enter into an agreement amending the terms and conditions of an agreement entered into pursuant to subsection (1).

The third subclause then provides that the federal authorities will not be bound by this type of agreement in the case of any death occurring after the year 1974. Already an apparatus has been set up for the collection of succession duties, or for what I call the freezing of estates. At least that is what I called it in a question that I put to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) the other day. A procedure has been devised and is being enforced by the banks, or really in effect being enforced by the local offices of the Department of National Revenue. This has the effect of subjecting the estates of people who have died since January 1 of this year to a new tax that has not yet been sanctioned or passed by any provincial legislature.

Up to the present the federal authority has been the one that has taken any discredit or any blame from people concerned, lawyers acting on behalf of estates, or widows and other beneficiaries of estates who find they are operating in the dark. And darkness is what it is, Mr. Speaker, because none of the legislatures have passed succession duty legislation. There have been press releases issued by the different ministers of finance of the provinces indicating what they will attempt to do in their legislature. But thanks to the public discussion that these releases have caused, for example in my own province of Nova Scotia, there are indications that the original proposals by the provincial ministers will be watered down, and that substantial changes will take place in what they announced just before the end of the past year. As a result, the federal authority comes under fire, and I think just fire, for taking part in such an exercise.

The federal authority opened the way to a lot of goodwill by reason of the very sensible provision it included in the income tax legislation upon which we spent so much time last fall and last December. A lot of good will was created by the removal of the estate tax, because very properly it was recognized that when certain estates were sold a form of capital gains tax would attach anyway. I believe that decision was endorsed by all parties in this House, except perhaps the NDP. I want to be fair, and I believe most hon. members thought the removal of the estate tax was a proper thing.

But no sooner had it cleansed its hands in that direction than the government then bloodied them in another direction, I suppose out of good nature because who wants to collect taxes? It has bloodied them by offering to do this job of collecting this tax on behalf of certain of the provinces. I have said that the machinery has been set up, and I will proceed to outline it for the record. The first part of it is a directive, or really a letter from J. C. Ruddy, Director of the Estate and Gift Tax Division of the Department of National Revenue, directed to the Secretary-Treasurer of the Canadian Bankers' Association.

I presume the purpose of sending this letter to Mr. J. F. Riegert was simply that the Canadian Bankers' Association in turn could pass it along as an aide-mémoire or direction to banks that have to decide what to do with safety deposit box contents when some of their customers die. I will read pretty fully from Mr. Ruddy's letter in order to give the substantial parts of it. I quote:

This will confirm our recent conversation concerning the proposed succession duty Acts of the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which the Department of National Revenue—Taxation will be administering on behalf of these provinces. The Acts when enacted will apply in respect of the estate of any person who dies on or after January 1st, 1972.

Mr. Ruddy is not a member of any provincial legislature that I know of, and it is pretty obvious that he is taking that as a direction from whatever agreement has been made between his minister and the federal government on the one hand, and the provincial ministers of finance and their governments on the other hand.

Prior to the coming into force of the proposed succession duty Acts there will, of course, be requests from executors, beneficiaries, or their representatives of the estates of persons who die after 1971 for the transfer or payment over of the property of the deceased including the proceeds of life insurance and also for the release of the contents of safety deposit boxes and property held in custody by banks, trust companies and others.

In order to facilitate matters for estate representatives and beneficiaries in these circumstances, until the respective Acts are passed by the Provincial Legislatures and the official provincial consent forms become available, the Department will release assets on request, by way of a letter under the signature of the Estate Tax Auditor of the District Office which will be processing the provincial succession duty return in respect to the estate of the deceased. The amount and number of assets released for any estate however will be restricted.

I ask that hon. members note this sentence very carefully.

—will be restricted to ensure that sufficient assets remain unreleased in order to protect the revenue.

To protect whose revenue? It is to protect provincial revenues, Mr. Speaker.

A specimen copy of the letter (marked 1) which will be used is enclosed for your information.

I now turn immediately to that form letter. It bears the Coat of Arms of Canada. It is typewritten in English on one side and in French on the other, and the English side reads:

Re: Estate of—

And space is left to fill in the name of the deceased. Then, this appears:

Date of death—

And another space. The text reads:

We acknowledge receipt of your recent communication in which you requested consent to transfer assets of the above noted deceased.

On behalf of the Province of . . . , in relation to the proposed Succession Duty Act, as announced on December 29, 1971, we agree to the transfer, delivery or payment over of the following property:

Then, room is left to list the property. If the provinces are not ready with their forms and paraphernalia for the collection of these succession duties, it appears that the federal government has been very quick to get into the field with its own forms drawn up for the occasion. I now quote further from the letter:

The same procedure may be continued as under the Estate Tax Act by an individual or corporation, in transferring, delivering or paying over property of the deceased person situated in Canada or where the deceased was domiciled in Canada any superannuation or death benefits and any amount payable under a policy of insurance, without the Minister's consent providing notice is given to the Department of such payment. The Estate Tax form ET75 (Notice of Payment) may continue to be used for this purpose until the official comparative provincial form is available.

So, while Estate Tax Form ET75 is as dead as the dodo so far as estates are concerned from the first of this year, its soul goes marching on in its use for the collection of provincial succession duties. The letter continues:

The Department would like to have particulars of payments, if any, already made to date in respect of persons who died after 1971.

That provokes the thought that some crusty lawyer acting for an estate may very well ask, "On what authority do you base this sort of request?" At least until the provincial act is in the field, I would imagine that the Department of National Revenue would have to tread pretty tenderly because there is no ground at all on which they can make such a request.

• (1240)

The letter continues:

The release of a safety deposit box or other depository will also be dealt with by the issuance of a letter from the district office concerned. A specimen copy of the letter (marked No. 2) which will be used, is attached.

That one again bears the coat of arms of Canada and the reference to the Department of National Revenue. The reference to the name of the estate reads:

On behalf of the province of . . . , in relation to the proposed Succession Duty Act as announced on December 29, 1971 we agree to the above named Custodian or Lessor permitting the following property to be withdrawn or delivered to the Executor, Administrator, the Legal Representative or his authorized attorney or agent:

Then, there is a blank space which can be filled in with the material to be released.

The letter continues:

The depository, usually of course a bank or a trust company, is asked to continue as now for Estate Tax purposes to send a certified list of the contents of the depository to the relevant district taxation office, that is the office where the return in respect of the estate of the deceased will be filed. Upon receipt of this list the matter of the release by the issuance of the above mentioned letter will be promptly dealt with by the District Office receiving it.

The Estate Tax procedure in these circumstances of requiring consent (form ET 76) to the preliminary opening of a safety deposit box or other depository to withdraw documents or of consent (form ET 77) to the opening of a safety deposit box or other depository for the listing of contents will be dispensed with until the date when the provincial acts are enacted. There may be withdrawn at any time without consent the following:

1. Will or other testamentary writing of the deceased.
2. Birth certificate.
3. Marriage licence.
4. Marriage contract.
5. Title deed, lease, agreement for sale or deed of mortgage or hypothec relating to real property.
6. Any deed, record or other document required in connection with the burial of the deceased.

Then, on the final page of his letter, Mr. Ruddy continues:

The district taxation offices of the Department where the respective provincial succession duty returns of information will be filed and processed are set out below. Requests for release of assets should, of course, be directed to the District Office where the return will be filed or has been filed.

Where the deceased died domiciled in the province of	District Office where return will be filed
Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia	Halifax, N.S.
New Brunswick	Saint John, N.B.
Manitoba	Winnipeg, Man.
Saskatchewan	Regina, Sask.

The provisions, of course, of the Estate Tax Act do not apply in respect to the estate of any person who dies after 1971 and accordingly the consent requirements of this Act to the transfer of assets do not apply in respect to the assets of any such estate.

The letter is signed J. C. Ruddy, director, Estate and Gift Tax Division.

I put the letter on the record because it may be useful for members of parliament whose constituents are asking about what happens between the first of the year and the time that the six provincial legislatures act, and they may wonder what is involved. I will not claim that it creates all the hardship in the world, because it does provide for the release of assets and in the past there has always been a method of releasing assets so that widows and young people can obtain material from estates. But there might be a hardship should any of the provinces decide to tax estates that are left by one spouse to another. This was the cause of considerable difficulty in the past, but it was removed.

One of the great accomplishments, the only one of which I can think, of the just society was the Estate Tax Act which was passed in 1968. It removed tax from estates passing between husbands and wives. There were many horrendous examples in the past of widows who went practically barefoot because of the enormous amounts of succession duties that had to be paid on their husbands' large estates and the fact that the estates were not in liquid form. That problem was removed by the Estate Tax Act in 1968, but it could return depending on what type of legislation is passed by the provincial legislatures. However, I will not get into that particular issue. It is the responsibility of these legislatures and I am sure they will fight those issues very capably. What I object to, however, is the fact that the federal authority is moving so willingly into the field. It is strange that they are going into a business that is bound to bring ridicule, hatred and contempt on their shoulders. It is strange to see that sort of thing happen, something which did not have to happen.

In my research into why we should be doing for others what, if we did it for ourselves, would get us into hot water—the word "we" refers to government—I went to the days of Charles I whose famous battle with Parliament over his right to taxation occurred in the seventeenth century. In 1628 the Petition of Right was:

exhibited to His Majesty by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, concerning divers rights and liberties of the subjects—

To the King's most excellent Majesty: . . . by which the statutes before mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this Realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge not set by common consent in Parliament:

Here we have the whole sophisticated apparatus of government moving into the operation of the collection of taxes on behalf of other authorities. We know what happened. Charles I levied a ship tax and eventually, in the argument, the Lords Temporal and Spiritual in the Commons won the battle and Charles I lost his head.

I think there might be a remedy for a situation such as this, namely, to have some provisional type of legislation. This was a point made by Mr. Coldwell, then the member for Rosetown-Biggar in the debate of 1948 on the famous amendment to the Excise Tax Act which caused some stir in that year. What I am trying to say in my participation in the debate is simply that I think it was a wrongful act for a department of government to set itself up to collect taxes for another level of governmental operation without any legislative sanction whatsoever. I do not think there is anything in the law now which would give the Department of National Revenue the right to take the course it has followed. I have made the point as best I can, and I would like to put the minister on notice that when the matter does go to the committee I expect that he, his parliamentary secretary or his senior officials, will have an answer to why this particular course is being followed.

As for the other points of the legislation, I have listened with great interest to the debate here. I would be concerned about the formula, particularly for university educational costs and about whether there is any possibility of getting some adjustment in the Blind Persons Act. I think that is important. They have been sending us petitions for years and it is time we gave these disabled persons a better break. However, Mr. Speaker, that can wait until the bill has received second reading and is studied in committee.

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, as it is very close to one o'clock, might I, with consent of the House, call it one o'clock?

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair to resume same at two p.m.

At 12.54 the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you for affording me the opportunity of expressing my humble opinion on the bill now before us.

I have noted that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) who has preceded me, has referred to "the so-called just society". I think he should not have used these words because, once uttered, they produce an adverse effect on the people in terms of the ideal which we are all pursuing, including the opposition parties. I believe that when the leader of the Liberal party spoke of the just society a few years ago, he was not promising to create a just society there and then.

I think that this slogan, or better still this motto, was proferred to the Canadian people as an aim which we should all strive to attain not only in the Liberal party and in the government, but all Canadians together. This is why I believe that the hon. member who spoke before me should not follow in the footsteps of others, and ridicule this slogan, at a time when we all need optimism, enthusiasm and motivation to direct our actions.

Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be limited to the two parts of the bill that interest me most and that I consider, in view of our needs, to be two most important, if not the most important part, that is Part I on equalization and Part VI on post-secondary education.

We can all discuss this problem and try to simplify it, but I think we all recognize the fact that it is a complex one and even the experts are not always successful in having us understand what actually is the meaning of equalization payments, of the transfers to the provinces in certain tax fields, and of all other aspects of the taxation problem.

Nevertheless, we all know this is a basic principle of Canada's Confederation. It is one of the corner-stores of Canadian unity and prosperity. It is not enough to say that Canada is a confederation of sovereign states. We must do more than that and I think the introduction of this bill we now have before is one step further in that direction.

It is not enough to say that Canada is a mosaic of ethnic groups; we must act accordingly and this is what we are doing.

There are people, even among foreigners, who will say that Canada is an artificial nation. Legislation such as the one before us help build this nation.

It may be true that Canada is an artificial nation but one must remember that this feature derives from men, that the artificial feature is a superior and transcendent natural feature.

I think equalization is a means of saving our Confederation, of ensuring a decent standard of living for all Canadians and of allowing all of us to live together and avail ourselves of equal opportunities.

The equalization program is being critized by many. People in the Western provinces do criticize it, but I think that in my own province there are people who also object to it, perhaps not with words but with actior

Small groups in my province are trying to prove what little use it is for Quebec to be part of this group of peoples called Canada, and they overlook the equalization system which is designed to assist all the poor provinces which find it hard to keep up with the average level of public services in Canada, including Quebec.

I would like my fellow-citizens to remember the figures that have been quoted occasionally since the beginning of this debate. For instance, when we consider that in 1957-58 federal equalization payments granted to the provinces reached a total of $136 million and that they are expected to reach $1 billion in 1972-73 and $1.5 billion in 1976-77, we cannot help noticing the increase.

As for equalization payments, taking into consideration the percentages and the overall amounts given to certain provinces—Quebec being one of them—they may appear to be very high. If, however, we consider the per capita amount, we can then evaluate those figures more correctly. If we stop to think that Quebec's gross revenues for the year 1971-72 were roughly $2,764 million, as compared to Ontario's $4,291 million and Newfoundland's $168 million, we then realize that federal equalization payments do make sense.

This is why Quebec received, for the year 1971-72, federal equalization payments totalling $446 million, whereas Newfoundland received $110 million.

If we refer to the percentages of their own revenues, they are 65 per cent in the case of Newfoundland, and 16 per cent in the case of Quebec. Consequently, if a province such as Newfoundland had to levy taxes, for lack of those equalization payments, the income tax burden on the citizens of that province would be far too heavy.

All the same, if one remembers the silent majority in Canada, and particularly in my province, one can assume that our fellow citizens are generally satisfied with those measures and are happy to benefit by them.

We are told that those amounts are paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, which would mean perhaps that this bill is not that much unfair to the three provinces living above the average Canadian standard, since those amounts come from the general revenues and the rates, in so far as income tax and other taxes are concerned, seem to me to be the same throughout Canada.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski).]

As for postsecondary education, it is of particular interest to us in the province of Quebec, at least for the same reasons as the citizens of the other provinces. Whatever may be said about the achievements in the field of university education, until now we have all benefitted from it; it has most certainly given young people, who would not otherwise have gone beyond high school, the opportunity of getting an education that enabled them to live honourably and to work with the rest of their fellow-citizens towards achieving the Canadian ideal.

With regard to the cost-sharing programs that are criticized from time to time—I mean the Canada Assistance Plan from which my province takes advantage, as do all the others—I feel that the advantage, for the provinces, in allowing the federal government to take care of those measures, lies in striving towards greater unity and more efficiency while reducing the work, the administration it entails. I agree with those who speak of encouraging work, especially when they discuss social measures.

Mr. Speaker, I bring my remarks to a close by saying that I support this bill; it fosters Canadian unity and the well-being of all Canadians. All I ask is that the bill should be studied very seriously and passed as soon as possible for the greater good of all Canadians.

• (1420)

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-8, the bill dealing with the equalization payments plan, I, as a member coming from one of the provinces which is a net contributor to the program, cannot argue against the concept of equalization payments. I think there has to be some redistribution of wealth among the provinces if we are to maintain confederation. But the prime area of concern felt by the provinces which are referred to as "have" provinces is directed to such questions as these: where the money is going, whether or not an end can be seen to these equalization programs and whether the money which is being poured into these regions is being used in the best possible manner—whether it is effectively correcting the problems which must be corrected if ever there is to be an end to them.

Over the years there has been a continuing escalation of these payments. In 1970-71, the amount was four times as great as it was ten years earlier. I saw projections the other day which showed they would likely rise to something like $1.5 billion by 1975, a further sharp increase as compared to present payments. When we are considering a subject like this we really need to consider the whole area of taxation, since all this money comes out of common taxes. I realize that politicians will be tramping all over the country in the next few months in connection with the election—many are preparing for it now—and I suppose there are a great many voters who will vote for the man of their choice largely on the basis of the promises he makes and the extent to which he commits himself to various give-away programs. In my view, both the voters and the politicians have got themselves into trouble because of this.

It is not irrelevant to mention in this connection the internal document which was circulated in connection with the affairs of Information Canada. I think it was discussed in the House only yesterday. I read a little footnote in connection with it in the paper the other day; it very well sets out the story of what is happening in the field of government expenditure generally. It refers to the $10.3 million allotted to Information Canada in this year's spending estimates and describes the memorandum as saying that the agency cannot justify its existence on the basis of its record of operations over the past six months. I think it is very good that the department should be looking at its own shortcomings—this is an internal memorandum. The report went on:

The paper, highly critical of the service, was drawn up by the branch's deputy director and was addressed to the director-general. It urged that the branch find new projects to justify its spending in the public view.

So, having been allocated the sum of $10.3 million in the estimates, the people in the branch are now being urged to justify this expenditure in the eyes of the public. In other words, we can expect the staff of this department to be scurrying around seeking other projects. Whether they will be worth while or not I shall not even try to imagine.

Mr. Gundlock: Looking for a place to spend it.

Mr. Downey: Yes. The taxpayers of Canada are sick and tired of this. More and more of them are losing their initiative as each year passes. Fewer and fewer people are willing to work and contribute to the economy. Increasing numbers of people accept the philosophy of working for the government, living off the government, or, in some manner, working government to their advantage so that they may have an easier life. This is the direction in which the philosophy of the country is going and the government is certainly doing nothing to change that situation. If I might say so, it is contributing considerably to encouraging this attitude.

Mr. McBride: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Downey: I shall be glad to do so at the end of my remarks.

What happens in countries which tend to drift into socialistic attitudes? We all recall the time a few years ago when certain Scandinavian countries, particularly Sweden, were held up to us as glowing examples of nations which had solved all their problems as far as business and people were concerned. We were told about the wonderful situation they had created for their citizens. In this connection, I was interested to read an item which appeared in the Globe and Mail of March 1 under the heading "Psychiatric report on Sweden's welfare State describes a merciless, unfriendly society." This was a report on mental health and human environment written by Dr. Hans Lohman in Sweden. It describes what happens when people accept the premise that the state will look after people rather than people looking after people. I shall read some excerpts from this report as summarized in the newspaper.

The study points to a vicious circle in which a high rate of economic growth is necessary to pay the cost of looking after those who cannot keep up, but as their number steadily increases a higher growth rate is needed, which only results in more people being unable to keep up—and so on.

The conclusion to be drawn from the report is that a country's welfare can no longer be measured simply by its standard of life, and that Swedes are increasingly sacrificing their mental health for improvements in their material environment.

• (1430)

This article then goes on to relate what is happening to countries that have tried to maintain this vast and all-encompassing social security program, and then says this about the rate of admissions for mental disorders in Sweden:

The latest available figures show that the number of inpatients admitted to mental institutions rose from 73,000 in 1969 to 83,000 in 1970—

This is costing the state $20 a day per patient, which means that over $1.5 million is being funnelled into keeping these patients under psychiatric care in mental institutions. The article continues:

A still greater number of out-patients were given light psychiatric care at public hospitals, while the enormous number who took to alcohol or drugs as a way out are not included in these statistics.

I read that only to show what is happening in countries in which the people depend on the state to too great an extent. Certainly, state welfare is not the paradise that some would lead us to believe.

To get back to the objections that I hear voiced by the people in the "have" provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta where the equalization payments originate, I may say that when industry is phased out the displaced workers have to be looked after. In many instances they do not want to move to a new community but rather wish to continue their lives in the same area. In this regard, I can think of no better example than workers in the Maritimes. I do not think workers made redundant should have to move to one of the "have" provinces. Indeed, I do not think the "have" provinces expect them to and, as a result, do not begrudge any payments they make under the equalization grants. But what does concern the "have" provinces is that with some families welfare is perpetuated from one generation to another. Families, for four or five generations, live off the largesse of government. This is a big problem and I do not have any easy answers to it. However, I do think that if a man remains unemployed during most of his life, some sort of manpower mobility program should be set up to see that the younger members of his family do move, perhaps to the "have" provinces where they will possibly be able to better themselves.

The subject of transportation has also been referred to in this debate. I agree with those who said that much of the money poured into equalization grants could very well be spent on equalizing transportation rates across Canada. Again with particular reference to the Maritimes, if the freight rates in the Maritimes were equalized with rates elsewhere, farmers in particular would have access to feed grains at the same price as those in the central provinces. They would be able to commence livestock feeding ventures or something of that kind which would enable them to help themselves. The same thing is true of industry. A transportation equalization program would enable these people to help themselves to a far greater extent than is presently the case. Similarly, it would make industries more competitive and enable many other enterprises to break fresh ground, which at the moment they cannot afford to do.

The hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) who spoke prior to the lunch hour drew our attention to some figures relating to grants under the DREE program. He showed definitively the per capita ratios and pointed out that Alberta was third in the list of recipients of government funds under that program. Although I do not think anyone can argue with the figures that he presented, I do not believe he filled in the whole picture relating to grants. One of the major projects in Alberta that probably accounted for much of Alberta's share was the pulp mill at Grande Prairie. About $6 million was given to the Proctor and Gamble company, and I can only doubt the wisdom of those who made this grant. We all know that pulp is presently at the stage of over-production in this country. Therefore, I see little point in giving $6 million to Proctor and Gamble and closing down another pulp mill in a different part of Canada. As I say, I question the judgment of those who made this decision.

Another complex in Alberta, which may be in the riding of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), made an application to set up a hog factory that would produce over half a million hogs a year in the southern part of the province. I must say I can think of no more unlikely place in which to start a hog factory than southern Alberta. A better place would have been in the feed grain area of the province. One can only assume that there are certain political motives behind setting up a hog factory in that area. I also question whether, in view of over-production of hogs, we should have government competing with farmers.

Looking at Alberta in the total picture, I think if all factors were brought into account one would find that Alberta was in a far poorer position than many other provinces. Here again, I refer to the subject of freight rates. We in Alberta pay the freight on our products sent to Ontario and out to the west coast ports. In addition, we pay the producers in those areas for the freight to send their products back to us. In other words, we pay freight both ways. This was not revealed in the figures presented to the House by the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin.

I can think of many other similar examples. There was a rapeseed processing plant contemplated not too many miles from where I lived which was regarded as a doubtful economic enterprise simply because of the cost of freight. Seed shipped out to the coast or to Ontario carries a freight subsidy. However, if the rapeseed is processed on the spot in Alberta, a different freight rate applies for the end product. On the other hand, anyone who builds a processing plant in Ontario can have the rapeseed shipped to him at the subsidized freight rate. Such a person is in a much better position and more likely to have a profitable operation. These are the things which work against the provinces that are not in central Canada.

I shall not continue much further, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to stress that there is ample evidence to indicate that the whole matter of regional incentives needs review. I cannot see that we are getting the desired results in many of the areas that are the prime recipients of these transfers of money. The people in those provinces which contribute to these funds have a right to an accounting from the federal government on how the funds are being spent. It is true that the federal government can generalize when asked how the funds are being spent, but it should indicate more specifically what the success ratio has been. Funds are being pumped into these areas in ever increasing amounts. The federal government will find itself in a position of great difficulty if any attitude of rebellion appears in some of the contributing provinces, from whose coffers money is taken. This may happen if the federal government does not show more responsibility for the performance achieved from the expenditure of this money.

[Mr. Downey.]

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the debate we have been having indicates that there is substantial unanimity about the importance of this measure. There is support for it from all quarters in the House. We have had a certain amount of sniping at the legislation, and some bootlegging into the debate of other questions which we debate here from time to time.

I was born and brought up in the province of Saskatchewan, and I lived the active years of my youth there during the great depression. Like a lot of other people who were young at that time and going to university, the most important event of the day to me was the great imquest conducted into our national affairs by the Rowell Sirois Commission and the publication of its report on Dominion-Provincial relations in 1940. Certainly, at that time in western Canada it appeared as if the terms of confederation had been switched inside out. We were suffering from a great depression, from drought and other factors which made life in Saskatchewan very difficult and reduced the income of the province to minimal proportions. In Saskatchewan, we were also able to see that the benefits of confederation had not spread themselves equally over the country. Manufacturing was centred in eastern Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: Central Canada.

Mr. Blair: The hon. member for Cape Breton says central Canada. But more than that, the head offices of most of the business and financial institutions were in central Canada. In those days we used to speak a lot about the evils of Bay Street and St. James Street, two well known thoroughfares in the cities of Toronto and Montreal. But all through the discussion there was a realization that it was impossible in a country like ours to equalize every economic opportunity, to equalize access to every source of personal or business income. It was quite apparent then, and I think it is still apparent that different parts of this country at different times will achieve differential benefits from confederation. For example, in those days the province of Alberta was almost as badly off as the province of Saskatchewan. It was most definitely a "have-not" province. It is now, as we have just been told by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey), a have province. I hope this does not change, but these are casual circumstances which can and do change, as our history shows.

What is important is how we respond to the challenge of this basic situation, to the changes that occur, so that at all times in this country there will be some basic equity and equality in the provision of governmental services for our citizens. As hon. members know, from the very beginning of our history there has been continual fighting about the financial terms. The ink was hardly dry on the British North America Act before the cry came up from the distinguished province of Nova Scotia for better terms. In one way or another ever since there has been a claim by one province or another, by one section of Canada or another, for better terms.

As the great report of the Rowell-Sirois Commission pointed out, for many years it was possible for these pressures to be adjusted on a more or less casual political basis. In the early years of this century, the role of government in our affairs was nowhere nearly as great as it is now, and it was possible to make adjustments which were essentially ad hoc, which from time to time quelled the clamour of different parts of Canada. However, this whole operation came apart during the depression. The gimmickry, the jerrybuilt structure of federal-provincial financial relations could not stand the test of the depression which put ever increasing pressures on governments for increased expenditures.

This fact was recognized by the Rowell-Sirois report, and I think it might be appropriate at this time to quote a portion from its main recommendations, Book II, page 269 giving the analysis of this great commission of the essential problem of our confederation. I quote

> At the heart of the problem lie the needs of Canadian citizens. These needs, whether material or cultural, can be satisfied only if all the provincial governments in Canada are in a position to supply those services which the citizen of today demands of them. The ability of provincial governments to meet the demands of their citizens depends in part on the constitutional powers which they enjoy, in part on their financial capacity to perform their recognized functions. The striking fact in the Commission's study of Canadian conditions is that many provinces, whose financial position is not the result of emergency conditions, are unable to find the money to enable them to meet the needs of their citizens. The basic problem before the Commission lies, therefore, in finding a way in which the financial position of the provinces could be improved and assured, without disastrous financial consequences to the Federal Government on whose efficient functioning all provinces are dependent. National unity and provincial autonomy must not be thought of as competitors for the citizen's allegiance for, in Canada at least, they are but two facets of the same thing—a sane federal system. National unity must be based on provincial autonomy, and provincial autonomy cannot be assured unless a strong feeling of national unity exists throughout Canada.

As hon. members are well aware, arguing from that strong premise the royal commission recommended the elimination of all the ancient deals which had been made between the federal government and the provinces, and between the provinces, to hold the financial structure together. It recommended what we have seen develop since the war, a system of payments from the federal treasury which will ensure to people in all parts of Canada a basic common level of governmental services.

At another stage in this report, in commenting upon this recommendation in more detail the Royal Commission had the following to say at page 274, also in Book II:

> ... the Dominion was to pay subsidies in 1867 to enable the provinces to perform the functions entrusted to them without having to resort to oppressive taxation. Under the Commission's proposals the Dominion would pay National Adjustment Grants for precisely the same purpose. It is true that a different measure of the amount to be paid to each province would be adopted now than that which was then considered appropriate. But this difference is more apparent than real, for it arises from the inequalities of wealth which have developed as between the provinces. Equal per capita subsidies did conform in some rough approximation to the fiscal needs of 1867. They would not do so today. The Commission hopes that the method which it has employed for calculating the appropriate adjustment grants will be able to accomplish what the per capita formula was intended to achieve in 1867, for, though the means have changed, the end remains the same, namely the maintenance of provincial governments which can provide the necessary services for their people.

What I have quoted illustrates the truth that everyone here in this House would recognize, namely that nothing has changed in our confederation since its commencement. There was then a recognized need for the federal government to contribute to the revenue of different provinces so as to enable them to provide services for their people. That need has continued down through all the 100 or more years. It continues today, and it is the responsibility of this parliament to respond to that need and to provide legislation and measures which are appropriate for satisfying them.

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) who preceded me made a comment which I think must be noted. He said, in effect, that there are taxpayers in some provinces who are paying the shot for other provinces, that the good citizens of Alberta are picking up the fiscal tab for the people of Nova Scotia. Whatever the situation may be in his mind, it is different in reality; it is different so far as confederation and the life of this nation are concerned. There are taxpayers all over this country paying taxes to the federal government, and perhaps most of them feel they are too high.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blair: I knew that I would wake them up.

Mr. Bell: Wake up the minister.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Which minister?

Mr. Bell: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Blair: The talk in this Chamber about the level of taxes is always very interesting, but the real question is how will the taxes be disposed of by the governments which receive them. It is to this question that I will direct my attention. The suggestion is made that somehow or other we who are taxpayers in Ontario, those people who are taxpayers in Alberta and those who are taxpayers in British Columbia, are paying their money directly to other provinces such as Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, or any of the other provinces, and that there is something illegitimate and improper in that. There is the suggestion that because we live in the three provinces I have mentioned we have some kind of super role of surveillance which providence has cast upon us in respect of the expenditures made by other provinces which receive some of these grants.

I think that it is well at this stage to look in totality at what takes place in this country in terms of all the grants and all the payments which are made by the federal government to all the provinces of Canada. I refer to a document which was published by the Treasury Board entitled "How your Tax Dollar is Spent, 1972-73" and more particularly to page 31 where a table is set forth showing the estimated federal payments to provinces and municipalities for the coming fiscal year. The totals disclosed in these tables are themselves impressive. In all, when allowance is made for tax abatements, the total amount of federal funds which is payable to the provinces is $5,205 million, which is approximately one third of the total estimates of the federal government for the coming year which are stated to be $15,700 million.

But let us look at how some of these funds are distributed. For example, the total of all federal payments to the province of Quebec is $1.665 million, the total for Ontario is $1,423 million. The next highest province is British Columbia where the total is $360 million. The next highest province is Alberta where the total is $316.5 million, and so on. It is true that some provinces do not receive equalization payments, but the equalization payments for the current year are estimated to be $944 million out of a total of all federal grants to all provinces for all purposes of $5.2 billion.

So, I suggest that we should look at federal expenditures in their total perspective and realize that the responsibilities which this government and parliament have assumed spread across a broad spectrum of our country. They cover all kinds of services to people in all provinces, and it is quite improper, unjust and unfair for some politicians in some provinces to suggest that they are carrying a load when large amounts of money, for example, are paid to the Atlantic provinces, to some of the western provinces, and to the province of Quebec. It is also unfair for anyone to suggest that there is some kind of impropriety, as Premier Bennett has suggested, in the calculation of these payments, that somehow or other the provinces in eastern Canada do not have to account properly for all their revenues in the determination of revenue potentials when in fact they do.

I have spoken here simply to suggest that there are good reasons for carrying on with this system of tax equalization. It is something which we have had throughout the whole history of our country. It is something which has been applied in an increasingly rational and sensible fashion since the report of the Rowell-Sirois Royal Commission in 1940. If we are going to maintain not only the unity of this country but decent standards of life in all parts of Canada, then it will be necessary for us to overcome the infirmities of economics in different provinces and jurisdictional problems by continuing to pay equalization payments. Therefore, I support the legislation which has been put before us.

• (1500)

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to the bill under consideration.

I wish to say what I think about the equalization payments and the situation in which the government finds itself with regard to the provinces in that respect.

[Mr. Blair.]

Mr. Speaker, the federal budget is close to $16 billion. Transfer payments to provinces, including tax exemptions, will total $5.2 billion during the next fiscal year, that is one third of the budgetary commitments of the central government. However, the funds needed for the administration of the Old Age Security Fund and for advances and loans eventually repayable are not included.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the budgets of the provinces add up to about the same as that of Ottawa. In general, the provinces therefore get one third of their money from the federal treasury.

Such a policy is inadequate. Is it realistic? It is therefore not surprising, Mr. Speaker, in those circumstances, that the provinces feel that they are not receiving enough from the federal government.

Seven provinces receive tax rebates from the central government. And all of them are not satisfied, and feel that they are not getting enough, and, even Quebec and the three other provinces that receive nothing are not satisfied. They state that the central government is asking too much of them, and that it is not logical to be so highly taxed, because those provinces, that are said to be rich, are those in need of revenue, as they do not have enough. The citizens of the latter provinces, like those of the others, have to pay close to 50 per cent of their income.

According to some economists, we are now paying 50 per cent of our income to provincial, federal and municipal governments and to school boards. Taxpayers say that they are not satisfied and that they are unable to make ends meet. They claim that they will be unable to put up with this very long, that it is impossible that taxes should be further increased when they are already paying 50 per cent of their income in taxes.

In the case of Quebec, equalization payments amount to $446 million, that is 10 per cent of the provincial budget. Conditional payments, hospital insurance, the Canada Assistance Plan, health insurance will bring in a contribution of $440 million, that is 20 per cent of the budget.

Mr. Bourassa's last estimates totalled $4.5 billion. Now, for the coming fiscal year Quebec will receive from the federal government grants of $1.5 billion, that is one third of its budget. If to this are added the tax rebates arbitrarily set by the federal government, the direct or indirect amounts handed to Quebec by Ottawa represent $1.6 billion.

Now, under the circumstances, can the provinces, even in their own fields, talk on an equal footing with Ottawa, when the two levels of government have to share sources of revenue.

Federal-provincial conferences have been held for several years, but they have failed to satisfy the provincial as well as the federal government. Canada has therefore reached a very high degree of federal-provincial tax coordination. We have developped an elaborate and efficient procedure to increase provincial revenues.

For the next financial year, Mr. Speaker, Newfoundland will receive $213 per capita; Prince Edward Island, $214; New Brunswick, $164; Nova Scotia, $135; Saskatchewan, $102; Manitoba, $59 and Quebec, $74.

I would not hesitate to say that the present taxation system is vitiated just as the financial system is. It is contrary to the hard economic realities. It is used for centralization in the hands of the financial empire of the state.

Modern taxation is illegal, even though it is effected through a political democracy which, for its participation, gets an insignificant share of its advantages. I think that it is rather the pursuit of an objective which can be nothing but socialism. Economists trained at the London School of Economics claimed that it is possible to reach happiness by condoning the theft of property through taxes.

Present financing and taxation are but means of concentration of financial power. It is obvious that taxation, under its present form, is an inefficient and irritating way of achieving the desired objective. Be that as it may, some form of taxation is inevitable as long as public services and production to meet private needs co-exist.

Public services demand a minimum of goods and labour; the mechanism through which those goods and labour are transferred from the private to the public sector is essentially a form of taxation.

Some claim that through equalization payments, the people can provide both private and public goods. But under the present system, goods are taken away from people who do not have enough, for private production, under the pretext of allowing public production. But in other cases, taxes are in essences legalized robbery. For instance, when taxes take away the purchasing power of the individuals, while production waits for buyers.

The government is levying taxes for functions that should be left to individuals, families and intermediary bodies. The robbery increases as government interference is stepped up. It is true that the government always alleges the financial inability of persons, families and public bodies, when it should apply itself to removing this inability, as a financial system working for the public good would do.

I say that taxes are a nonsense, because the collection is too costly and it is the taxpayer who has to pay for it all without getting anything in return. Under a system consistent with reality we would not have to levy taxes to meet the ever growing financial needs of the social insurance services. As co-heirs and co-proprietors of the capital the citizens should find a unconditional economic security in the guaranteed social income accompanied by an adjustment of the prices, because all physical possibilities would simply become financial possibilities. The public would be able to pay for all the production originating in the private sector of the economy. Thus the public service expenses would not be, as they are today, a burden or a hindrance to the obtainment of goods from the private sector.

On the other hand, a guaranteed income for everyone, at least for the basic necessaries of life, would ensure a fair amount of well-being, according to our productive capacity.

To have a correct perspective of the civilized world, one must be realist. The standard of living would no longer depend on the financial system, but on actual or potential production. Finance would intervene only to lubricate the machinery of production and to protect the freedom of the consumer.

Government measures should be geared to the financing and development of our physical potential.

Mr. Speaker, if we must always, in order to meet requirements of provinces and claims of the poorer ones, do what we accomplished with Bill C-259, the government will tax citizens to the point of empoverishing them, of wiping them out. Bill C-259 and the capital gains tax will ruin many businessmen and farmers. Many citizens will be reduced to kiss the dust and to be dependent on welfare benefits.

Where are we to find money to increase equalization plans in order to keep the have-not provinces going?

Mr. Speaker, since so many provinces are poor, since they have so many problems, we must improve their system in order to keep them afloat, to enable them to develop their public schools and institutions, in short to enable them to keep pace reasonably with science and progress. And, with science and progress available, why could we not adjust our financial economy to the material and spiritual needs of the population. We could certainly help the provinces, so long as men are willing to work and the plough is tilling the earth.

Mr. Speaker, so long as the earth will be supplying more than the total population requirements, we should feel no insecurity. Yet, all the provinces are now insecure, wondering how to balance their budgets, meet interest payments on our debts to financial institutions.

The government should establish effective regulations at once, since we boast of having reached the pinnacle of development. And we can still go further if we make available to the people all possible financial controls to achieve that growth. But as long as we give only crumbs to the provinces, as long as we tax people to the extreme to prevent them from living decently, we will have difficulties at the provincial level, we will experience the threat of separatism and revolution because of the inefficiency of the government in giving people what they are entitled to. As a matter of fact, it would be possible to finance all institutions, even with a reasonable rate of interest, the only cost being on the administrative side.

We would save millions of dollars and some provinces could have those millions, further our development and provide more services to the Canadian people.

As long as we stay as we are, there will be credit restrictions, dissatisfied provinces, revolutions, because the people are unable to provide for their needs and because the financial economic system does not meet with people's requirements.

We know that all provinces would like to do more for the people and give more to them. Schools are now being built in all provinces with borrowed money at 8 or 9 per cent rates of interest. All those provinces will have to repay those loans in 10 years and the interest will be doubled by that time. We shall have paid for such schools or institutions in 20 years twice their value, in 30 years thrice, and in 40 years four times.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have said enough on this subject. although hon. members in this House might not all agree on that point, I wish they were all at least in agreement to find another solution. If the solutions we are advocating are not appropriate for balancing our economic system, well, let them find out the true solutions.

Our former system led us to our present predicament, that is, complete failure, complete unbalance. The more we apply the suggested solutions, the more our system gets off balance and the more discontentment prevails.

No doubt means do exist to settle such problems. Therefore, if hon. members are not pleased with the solutions suggested, they could at least be consistent enough to propose other solutions, and we shall be among the first to approve them.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Latulippe: Certainly.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, my question is complicated but I am interested in this subject as a student and analyst of the Social Credit concept.

I am well aware that the hon. member is convinced that Social Credit is able to build paradise earth, a new Eldorado for future generations, but sometimes in his speech he seems to refer to provinces and countries which, in the past, have been fully happy. He seems to refer to governments which, in the past, would have been fully efficient. For my own guidance I would like to know which are those happy provinces and those fully efficient governments of the past?

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister says that I have alluded to past governments whose management was quite satisfactory to the provinces.

It is not new to say that the provinces have never been satisfied and never obtained what they should have and it is also logical to say that the provinces debts have kept on increasing. Currently, both the provinces and the federal government are indebted up to their neck. The provinces are no longer able to pay even the interest on their debts and part of their contributions to the federal government is used to pay the interest on these debts.

[English]

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is here. On Wednesday afternoon we were delighted and entertained by his opening solo in his new role as Minister of Finance. As we have come to expect from this minister, his speech was informative and sincere. Above all, it was rational. I know the minister will not mind my joshing him a bit about some of his personal platforming idiosyncrasies.

On Wesnesday afternoon I could not help but notice that the minister shares some traits with present and former leaders of parties. This may be a good omen. Like the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Caouette), the minister has developed a certain pivotal skill which allows him to swing approximately 180 degrees without moving his feet. He can speak directly, almost confidentially, to his own backbenchers. This is of considerable importance because the minister always exudes a glow, and his caloric radiations cannot help but envelop with cozy warmth these otherwise obscure and often forgotten individuals. They often have no one to speak to them at all.

In my introduction I would also like to take note of another interesting but, I think, distracting habit which the minister has acquired. When switching from French to the vulgate, he becomes somewhat migratory. Watching him is sometimes like watching a ping-pong match. The minister may be nimble, but trying to follow a nomadic speaker can become a pain in the neck. I will now get to the point I was trying to make before the asides.

I said the minister's arguments were extremely rational; by this I mean reasonable and logical. Perhaps that is why his case is not as convincing as it should be. It has been my observation that people are infrequently moved primarily by logic.

Mr. Osler: You would not want a minister of finance to be logical.

Mr. Rose: If the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) would care to seek the floor and make a speech—

An hon. Member: He never does that.

Mr. Rose: For instance, was there any real economic logic behind the desire of the African states to be free of their colonial masters following World War II? Certainly there was no economic benefit accruing to these new states. Similar emotional content is said to motivate people to select certain kind of cars, houses and maybe even wives. It is not just what is rational that always moves people; perhaps more important is the appeal to the non-rational.

Mr. Pepin: We count on you for that.

Mr. Rose: The minister, who is celebrated for the saying "it takes two to tango", indulges himself most of the time in the hesitation waltz. If he cares to ask me a question, I will be pleased to answer it when I have concluded my remarks.

What is crucial is not what is necessarily true, but what people think is true. This is precisely where the Liberal government has failed in areas other than central Canada, as the party membership in this House obviously testifies. Perhaps people in Canada's extremities believe the Liberals are primarily interested in central Canada. Who can deny the logic in that? The electoral logic in the Liberal caucus probably goes something like this: if there are 23 seats in all of British Columbia and in each of the two cities of Montreal and Toronto, whose voices are most likely to be heard most consistently?

Mr. Pepin: Manitoba's.

Mr. Rose: I know it is becoming tiresome to prattle on about alienation. It is repeated over and over that the poor are alienated. We also hear that the young are alienated and the west is alienated. Mr. Speaker, the west is alienated. I do not think we can deny that certain provincial politicians use western genuine alienation to build an elaborate set of additional fears and suspicion that our taxes, for example, are being siphoned off to parts of Canada favoured by the Liberals. If alienation did not exist there would be no environment for this kind of activity and people would laugh them out of court.

Western Canadians are not tightwads, but they are convinced that the federal government does not really give a damn about their problems. For years westerners have seen themselves "hosed" by freight rates, gouged by tariff-protected central Canadian manufacturers and forced to concentrate instead on capital-intensive rather than labour-intensive resource industries such as mining, agriculture, fishing and forestry which for the most part the west must flog in an open world market. Add all these things together and you have a perfect environment for what I consider to be political irresponsibility.

Contributing to western alienation has been the utter failure of the news media, other than CBC radio, to present the national picture in my province. Take the lower mainland dailies, for instance: very little space is devoted to Ottawa news. What is printed usually gets about the same prominence as the truss ads. It is bad enough in the Vancouver Sun, for Liberals—because the Sun has traditionally smiled on Liberalism—but for NDP members it is a black-out.

Similarly, CBC television programming has gradually been centralized in Toronto and Montreal, so that the west is never adequately presented to the remainder of Canada. The eleven o'clock news which is seen here is even edited, and much less about Ottawa comes through to the west. The newspapers in my province would counter by saying that more space would be devoted to national affairs if more people were interested. I say the people are not interested precisely because they are denied information about the federal program. Not enough attention has been devoted to this matter.

What this vicious circle really adds up to is genuine western sentiment that prompts many, even when talking to their own member, to use such impersonal phrases as "those guys in Ottawa" rather than "our guys in Ottawa".

Mr. Pepin: No; it is "these gentlemen".

Mr. Rose: I see this questioning of equalization in some quarters as nothing more than an unscrupulous move designed to distract our citizens from real issues and to play upon genuine frustrations and irritations which the federal government could help overcome if it set its mind to it. No one can be against the principle of equal opportunity and security for all Canadians, no matter in which part of Canada the citizen may reside or in which tongue he wishes to express himself. That is the price and responsibility of confederation. I am not against genuine equalization, neither are the people I represent who are not, and never have been, bigots.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: Therefore, I believe that I would serve well neither my constituents nor Canada in general by playing the red-neck, so I do not intend to do it. that does not mean that the formula upon which the equalization is based ought not to be examined for its genuine equity.

• (1530)

It is the contention of at least one writer, Mary Rawson, that per capita income is not the most equitable basis upon which to distribute the payments. Mary Rawson points out in the Vancouver Sun of February 10 that there is at least a partial injustice to a donating province if recipient provinces fail to tax their resource industries at an equal rate. Unfortunately, Rawson chooses to compare British Columbia with Quebec, thus adding linguistic overtones to the argument, and I would just as soon avoid that.

I do not have the figures for the other provinces but I am sure similar figures might well apply to them, both donating and receiving provinces. But Rawson claims that in 1970, with an accessible mineral resources base twice as large as that of British Columbia, the Quebec treasury received only $2 million while the B.C. treasury benefited to the extent of $49 million. It seems an extreme difference. Naturally, if one province or several choose not to tax their extraction industries as heavily as do other provinces, the per capita income upon which equalization grants are based would, accordingly, be lower and have-not provinces might appear for grant purposes to be eligible for fatter equalization payments. Rawson observes that "perhaps per capita income is a poor yardstick for judging the wealth of a region."

I have no idea how accurate or how up to date these figures are, Mr. Speaker, but certainly I believe this line of argument should be examined in much greater detail when the bill reaches committee stage. I believe we should look for a system which will set out revenue sources available to provinces on a truly standardized basis.

What we are dealing with here is, of course, a stand-pat bill. Equalization payments are necessary because we have failed in other areas. I should like to mention some of these areas in the time remaining to me. No matter how fair and equitable a grant formula may be, the government cannot be excused for its failure to establish national policies which would make the imperative of equalization less valid. Equalization payments are necessary because we have failed to do other things. Despite equalization, regional disparity still presents a tremendous problem. The government has allowed manufacturing to be centralized in the golden triangle: this is one reason some provinces have so much and others so little. This government, and no other, has tinkered with area incentive grants until they are now applicable to virtually the whole nation except for Toronto and a strip of British Columbia. This government, and no other, has failed to develop a national transportation system which would give the extremities of our country a fair shake. This government, and no other, after sucking the provinces into shared cost programs is now preparing to welsh on them as costs rise.

Bearing in mind the astronomical cost projections for health care, where are the initiatives to develop new approaches to meet the needs of people? Has there been any suggestion that the fee for service method of payment of health service fees should be continued in perpetuity? Where are the initiatives in developing new kinds of post-secondary educational institutions?

We cannot simply continue to pay out to this extent. There are people with new ideas in this area. The government should be considering new methods of training doctors in the way we trained navigators in the Second World War, that is, recruit, clothe, pay and educate bright young men and women so that the contrived doctor shortage could be eliminated and we might cease stealing our doctors from other countries who can ill afford their loss.

It is important we examine many of these areas. Equalization payments are not enough, in themselves, to eliminate inequity and regional disparity. Canada is a rich country, a land with talented people and backed by plentiful resources. There is much to be done, so let us get on with it.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few remarks to this debate. I promise the House they will be few. I do not want to let the opportunity go by without expressing a point of view directed particularly to post-secondary education and the way in which the present formula affects, adversely in my view, institutions of higher learning in the Atlantic provinces.

I agree with the opening statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) that there is probably no other piece of legislation, no matter how dry it sounds and no matter how dull the debate, which affects the federal state more than the bill dealing with equalization payments to various provinces.

Having been born and raised in one of the so-called have-not provinces, Nova Scotia, and having contributed, I suppose in a small way, to the gross national product in one of the "have" provinces, British Columbia, I feel that though I am by no means an expert, my experience as a professional man in the community as well as my experience as a politician permits me to say that we are all part of the family of Canada. As in any family, there are various contributors to the home. Their age differs, as does their state of health. When a family is seated around a supper table, the mother and the father are normally present. In the case of Canada, I suppose one could say that the mother and the father are the two central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. These are certainly the two founding provinces.

Then there are the other provinces, some, in the west, expanding because of their basic economic wealth and others, in the east, going through a transitional period, not sharing in the growth rate of other parts of the country. To reduce this question to a common denominator one ought to consider equalization in the light of a family sitting around a table. The provinces of Canada make up, in their various jurisdictions, the family of Canada. The smallest and weakest member of the family has a part to play, just as do the big brothers and the older sisters. So I am in complete agreement with the Minister of Finance when he said that this equalization concept is the cornerstone of the federal system. In fact, I would go further and say it is the foundation of the federal system—because if there is no equalization within the economy, that is, within the family, what is left?

I should like to compliment the Minister of Finance on his new and challenging post. It so happens, I suppose because of the legislative platter before the House last session, that he had to introduce an equalization bill as his first item of business. There is no item that he could have introduced more important to the federal system in Canada, not just important to us in the east but to the west and the central provinces as well. After all, the whole is only as strong as the parts, and the parts make up the whole.

I come back to my analogy of the family. The squalling, squealing baby in the crib, with which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is confronted when he goes home from a busy day in this House, has something to contribute to the household, the same as the older brother or sister and the two parents. We all have our part to play: the equalization concept recognizes this fact.

Since, hopefully, we shall conclude this debate this afternoon, I will make my remarks brief. I should like to philosophize further on the concept of the "have" provinces contributing to the have-not provinces. That in itself is a myth, because for the "have" provinces to develop the wherewithal or money to contribute to the have-not provinces they have to be part of the whole. People in Ontario and Quebec are able to produce certain tax revenues because they have been able to benefit from various policies that helped other regions.

We now have British Columbia, developing and economically booming, able to contribute to other provinces. Many years ago, years which many people want to forget about or have forgotten about, B.C. was given a form of equalization grant when Canadian taxpayers subsidized and in effect helped to build the Canadian Pacific railway to bring together the country from coast to coast. The railway certainly was not built to carry passengers or freight to the sparsely populated and remote parts of the country at that time. Nevertheless, out of a concept that did not start with the present government or the previous one but goes back more than 60 years, British Columbia has grown buoyant and rich. I myself participated in their economy in a small way for seven years. British Columbia is now a "have" province and can help the rest of Canada in the sense of developing its raw materials and other resources in the province.

I should like to comment on one thing that the Minister of Finance said in regard to the three concepts that the Rowell-Sirois commission defined for Canada in his maiden address as Minister of Finance in opening this debate on March 1. This commission, which was fundamental really to the future of Canada, wrote that the federal authorities were to develop a financial role so that there would be national growth and stability; secondly, fair standards in public services and, thirdly, co-ordination in tax policy.

I could have much to say about the present government, the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Benson), and the tax reform bill. They have fallen flat on their faces in regard to co-ordinating federal tax policy with tax policy at the provincial and municipal levels, so much so that unless measures are taken by this new Minister of Finance we will recreate the tax jungle that we had in Canada prior to the Rowell-Sirois commission. I hope the minister will show some new life, energy and initiative so that we once again do not get into this morass of financial swampland.

Coming particularly to the post-secondary education part of the equalization bill, namely part VI, which in effect extends post-secondary payments for another two years, with a ceiling of up to 15 per cent of the national average, I want to mention several areas of concern. Firstly, of course, in Atlantic Canada there is fundamental concern that the formula for post-secondary education was changed in 1966 in order to get away from a per capita student cost basis to a 50 per cent shared cost basis vis-à-vis operating expenses.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who is responsible for this part of the program, quite correctly says that mushrooming post-secondary education costs have risen more than the educator pot, increasing from $422 million in 1967-68 to $870 million for 1971-72. In Atlantic Canada we have, historically, educated Canadians from many parts of the country. I come basically from what is a poor province. However, in many ways we were better off with a per capita payment for our students, especially students from Ontario, Quebec and other provinces in Canada, than we are under the present program where we receive from the federal treasury 50 per cent of our operating costs.

Very simply and fundamentally, in the province I come from, Nova Scotia—the picture is the same in the other Atlantic provinces—we cannot develop the level of help for post-secondary education that other provinces can. Sharing on a 50-50 basis the operating expenditure, since the 50 per cent from the provincial treasury is a relatively low figure in view of the realities of provincial financing in Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada in general, obviously the 50 per cent we receive from the federal treasury is also low. Yet we still have a large influx of students from other parts of the country. One of the things we can do in Atlantic Canada is build educational institutions. Historically, we have been the provider of education for many who have gone elsewhere in Canada in fields of business, science, politics and the church.

Mr. Bell: Premier Bennett, for one.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Premier Bennett himself, as my hon. friend from Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) reminds me. He was a product of the equalization system. He was born and grew up in New Brunswick before going to the west. I, too, went west many years later, but I came back while he stayed. I am not going to say who fared better, although he has done very well for himself. Be that as it may, it is interesting to note that the Premier of British Columbia is a living example of the Canadian experiment. Having shared, at the lower level, our education system and inherited that bounty he has now gone to another province and today leads the province.

There are many in eastern Canada who look measily at the massive, amalgamated schools that we have. Some sociologists suggest that these will be the pyramids of Atlantic Canada in the not too distant future if we continue to have the outflow of human resources we now have to other parts of Canada. This is a reality of life today. We should try to build into any formula for post-secondary education a per capita allowance for students in Atlantic Canada. Educational institutions in the Maritimes have finally achieved a special place at the post-secondary education level. The present 50-50 cost sharing arrangement which was arrived at in 1966-67 gives cause for concern in view of the outflow of human resources to which I have referred.

One way that the "have" provinces get more fingers into the federal pie is by involving themselves in a cost-sharing program. As I said earlier, 50 per cent of $100 provides a little bit more than 50 per cent of $75.

I have some knowledge of a particular institution in Nova Scotia. I have the honour to be a governor of the board of Acadia University, the university which last year won the national basket-ball championship. I am not sure of its status in that championship this year, but I do know that the playoffs are being held this week. At Acadia University I know that government involvement, provincial and federal, is only 60 per cent per student, whereas in Ontario and the western provinces government involvement is in the order of 85 per cent per student. This is an area in which striking a balance is difficult, because in some cases the "have" provinces have established a higher level of expenditure at the provincial level and thus receive more from the federal treasury.

I hope that in the consultations which the Secretary of State will have with the provincial ministers of education in the next two years, this historic fact of Atlantic Canada will be taken into consideration and that there will be built into the new formula which is to come into effect after 1974 some type of per capita allowance to help redress the imbalance that exists now, whereby several select institutions are educating a great many students from other parts of Canada.

Another problem is how the 15 per cent will be divided. I hope it will be divided equitably. I know, Mr. Speaker, that another hon. member wishes to speak before the debate closes, but I wish to refer to a speech made by the Secretary of State to a Liberal nomination meeting in Laurier about a week ago. In it he said that we have to look at the total package, that if we do not discharge our responsibilities at one level then we will not get the benefits at another level. While that thinking may sound fine in theory and may be great philosophically, I hope that when it comes to the question of post-secondary education transfer payments it will only be the educational needs that will be looked at and assessed in finally drawing up the arrangements.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the few remaining moments of this debate I want to say something on behalf of Canada. I want to speak for a strong, undivided federalism in Canada. We have those in Canada who have sought to divide our nation for their own political purposes. We have seen much of this in the province of Quebec where the disease of separatism has been used by some as a vehicle for racism and for personal political gain. I join with all those who oppose these divisive forces.

We have seen the same kind of prejudice in my own province of British Columbia. It has been said in that province that the principle of equalization is wrong and, by illustration, that Quebec gets too much. Mr. Speaker, if there are those who oppose equalization, let them say that. If there are those who oppose the French language in Canada, let them say that. But let them not confuse and divide by mixing the two together.

If politicians in British Columbia oppose equalization grants only, then why do they always use Quebec as an illustration of why they are wrong? After all, Quebec, with grants of $74 per capita, is the second lowest of all the receiving provinces. If there is any conflict or any complaint why not talk about Newfoundland, with $213 per capita, or New Brunswick, the home province of the Premier of British Columbia, with $164 per capita?

I can only assume that what is meant by British Columbia politicians is that it is only wrong to have equalization grants for French-speaking provinces and it is all right to have them for English-speaking provinces. If there is any complaint from British Columbia, surely it should be with regard to Prince Edward Island, which gets two-thirds of its revenues from equalization grants. It is not my purpose to complain about Prince Edward Island.

The reasons for this apparent anomaly are part of our constitutional heritage, as are certain of our French-language rights which also are part of our heritage. My objection is not with Prince Edward Island; it is not with Quebec. It is not with any province. Rather, it is a complaint against those who create such issues for the purpose of building their own power.

There was never a better example of the old adage of divide and rule than the present course of action being followed by a few provincial politicians in British Columbia. There have been suggestions that British Columbia would challenge equalization rights in the courts. Where is that challenge? It has disappeared. It has disappeared in the laughter of constitutional experts in Canada.

There have been other foolish things recently said by some British Columbia politicians. There have been claims that wages are especially low in Quebec and that this is why equalization grants are unfair. Again, why single out Quebec? Wages are low in Quebec, but they are lower in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. I could go on, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) dealt with a number of these items the other day when he spoke on the same subject and demolished many similar arguments. In the time remaining I wish to make only a few remarks. Canada is a big nation, a family of provinces, a federalism. Any family has to learn to live together. A family with no strains, no tensions, is a family without deep or developing relations. As a British Columbian I support the principle of equalization grants and I assure the House that most British Columbians feel the same way and are equally strong in support of any necessary measures for maintaining a strong federalism and a strong ten provinces in Canada.

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary).]

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand that if I speak now I will close the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. John Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for just one minute. I have followed the debate very attentively. I am gratified to note that there is general agreement in the House about the principles underlying this bill, principles based on equal opportunities for all provinces to provide a minimum national standard of public services to Canadians wherever they live. Members of the House have indicated general support for the principle that it should be possible to provide improved services without the poorer provinces having to raise their rates of taxation to unsupportable levels compared with their more fortunate neighbours. The unity of this country will remain strong through use of the basic arrangements spelled out in this bill.

I had hoped to have time to deal with arguments put forward by various hon. members, particularly those having to do with the tax sharing problems raised by some of the provinces, the misconception that the federal government has really frozen provincial revenues by means of this type of arrangement, the arguments that dealt with the scope of the equalization program and with the formula itself, with the question of whether municipal taxes should be included in the revenue capacity base, whether school taxes should be included, whether a tax base brought in for revenue capacity purposes should be used or not, the effect of certain provinces exploiting a wider tax base than other provinces and what this does to the equalization formula, the failure of some provinces to include some type of taxes in their tax base and how this affects the equalization formula, but I hope to deal with all these questions in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ACTION OF PROTECTIVE STAFF RESPECTING DELIVERY OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTS TO PRESS GALLERY BY MR. ROGER JAY—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Earlier today I referred to a press report relating to an incident which occurred yesterday when Mr. Roger Jay, secretary of the Union of Ontario Indians, sought to deliver a press release to the House of Commons press gallery. Inquiries into this incident confirm that Mr. Jay presented himself at the main entrance of the centre block of the Parliament buildings for the purpose of delivering a press release. The normal practice would have been for the desk sergeant to communicate with the press gallery to arrange either for the delivery of the papers to the Canadian Press representative in the gallery or for the press officer to have the parcel picked up at the desk. Instead, Mr. Jay was directed to the office of the chief of the protective service where, after conversations, contact was established with Mr. Mollins of the Canadian Press.

The chief of the protective staff of the House of Commons gives the assurance that the action taken was not inspired by the contents of the release but only to ensure that the papers were indeed intended for distribution to the press gallery. At the same time, it would appear that the procedure adopted by the security personnel was irregular and that it did cause Mr. Jay inconvenience and embarrassment.

In the circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying on behalf of all hon. members that the incident is a regrettable one, and express the hope that such incidents can be avoided in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the government House leader I should like to confirm an understanding reached with the other House leaders that the business for Monday, after the procedural aspects of orders of the day, will be second reading of Bill C-4 respecting financing of the CNR.

Mr. Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was agreed among us that the first seven items under private members' notices of motions would stand but that they would retain their position on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN EXEMPTION LEVELS TO COUNTERACT INCREASED COST OF LIVING

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislative measures so that the income of Canadians will be adjusted to the increasing cost of living by eliminating all taxes for single persons earning less than $3,000 and for married couples earning less than $5,000 with the addition of a further $500 exemption for each dependent child.

Mr. Speaker, the reason I am presenting a motion today is that I am convinced that the adjustments made at the time the tax reform bill was passed last fall, or rather at the end of last year, are clearly inadequate.

In spite of all the talk which has been going on these past few years about the establishment of the just society, I fail to see any real justice in a small exemption of $1,500 for single people and $2,850 for married couples. I think it is somewhat ridiculous to levy taxes at this level. If we compare, for instance, these amounts with the governor general's salary of $46,500 a year and take into account the fact that this same person who lives among us enjoys a $72,000 a year expense account for entertainment, gifts, medal awards, and government house administration, that is to pay the salaries of kitchen and household staff and all the retinue around him, this situation cannot be justified.

Canadians are well aware that they are being double-crossed by this government. It is true that this administration has published a white paper on taxation so that Canadians could argue their case, but this procedure is to me only a bluff, since the amendments to Bill C-259 have exclusively favoured large associations and corporations. The voice of small earners has not been heard and when some labour associations or citizens made representations, it was obvious that they were ignored because they could not contribute to the electoral fund of the old parties. I think that this is why no amendment was tabled in favour of the working class.

I must recognize, for example, that following the reaction of those who could contribute to electoral funds, the government has been prepared to introduce some amendments.

Mr. Speaker, if we consider that 70 per cent of the country's revenues are paid up by those earning less than $5,000 a year, then there is cause for concern. What is to me a flagrant injustice is evidenced by the comparison between the taxes levied on workers and those paid by oil companies. When one considers that from 1965 to 1968, oil companies have paid only $45 million in taxes, that is 5.7 per cent on profits amounting to $795 million, then there is other cause for concern.

Mr. Speaker, the motion I am introducing today for tax exemption for all single people earning under $3,000 per annum and married couples earning under $5,000 per annum, is based on the fact that they are always and everywhere considered as taxpayers. At all government levels, they pay the same price as anybody else. Nothing, be it municipal taxes, school taxes or insurance services, can be paid by them at reduced prices. If they are lucky enough to get a $3,000 car, for instance, they have to pay the 12 per cent federal tax and, if in Quebec, the 8 per cent provincial tax, as anybody else. If they wish to get a 40-ounce bottle of whisky, they have to pay the same price as anybody else—$8.75.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, it is quite enlightening to consider who are the end recipients of the amount of $8.75 paid by the consumer for the 40-ounce bottle of Canadian whisky since we know that the distiller sells it for $1.22 only.

First of all, the federal government takes 44 cents for sales tax, and $2.49 for excise tax. The provincial government's share in Quebec amounts to $3.94. This already makes $8.10 per bottle. If one adds the 8 per cent provincial tax, one reaches the figure of $8.75.

It is worth noting that 10 years ago the consumer paid $6.90; since then, the distiller's share has increased by only 22 cents; the balance, that is $1.63, is being divided between the federal government and the provincial government.

Now, why should people be surprised to find out that some of them have one glass too many and develop stomach ulcers. No wonder since they end up drinking a much larger quantity of taxes than of liquids. Sooner or later, they wake up with a hangover and related injuries.

Mr. Speaker, whether the worker is earning $4,000 or $10,000 a year, the price for gas is the same, about 50 cents a gallon. Of this amount, the federal government collects about 4 cents while the province of Quebec, for instance, gets 19 cents.

We know that this also applies to a 30-cent loaf of bread. The western wheat producer, the miller who prepared the flour, the baker, the wholesale dealer, the retailer and all those who worked hard and who have been living on fractions of cents in profit could sell us their bread for 15 cents if it were not for all the taxes they have had to pay at all levels of government.

Studies have proven that there were 100 indirect taxes on bread. It is astonishing to see how little taxpayers realize the total amount of taxes they are paying each year.

For instance, at the retail level, the humiliating feature of the sales tax is obvious. If you add up the aggregate amount of taxes paid by a family over one year you reach an astonishing amount. Moreover, most consumers completely forget that the prices imposed by the manufacturers must necessarily include their own taxes.

With the present system, it is unavoidable and unfortunate that the lower income people have to pay a major portion of the revenue required by the governments for their services and programs.

The corporate tax is another kind of indirect tax imposed without the taxpayer's knowledge. This burden compels corporations to reduce their dividends; in fact their benefits are now so low that the shareholders seem to be under maximum pressure. The only way out for a corporation is to increase its sales price. Mr. Speaker, taxes do amount to a theft when imposed on taxpayers who do not have enough money to get the things they need to live at a time when there is an abundance of goods in Canada.

Taxes also amount to a theft so long as there are unsold products, unemployment and an undeveloped capacity of production because of a lack of purchasing power which in turn stymies the sale of goods.

Taxes amount to a theft at a time like this because they limit the purchasing power, lead to an accumulation of products and deprive the people in the same way as inflation does. In fact, taxes should exist only to absorb the money surplus in circulation at the very time when there is a shortage of products. When there is no money, we do not need taxes but an increased purchasing power.

[Mr. Godin.]

From the start, we have to recognize that every direct or indirect tax leads to an increase in the prices of goods and services. It is always the consumer who pays the bill. The real taxpayer is always the consumer.

An eminent professor gave a lecture which appeared in Le Devoir on May 31, 1971 and in which he suggested that Ottawa should reduce income tax for individuals and sales tax. He said in part:

> The government should reduce the income tax of individuals and the federal sales tax in order to stimulate productivity and slow down salary inflation, said economist Grant L. Reuber, director of the Department of Economics at Western University, in London.
> Professor Reuber, a former president of the Canadian Economics Association, submitted to the Senate Committee on Finance some suggestions that are contrary to federal theories on the management of the economy.
>
> In an oral and written submission that he presented in collaboration with economist Ronald G. Bodkin, Mr. Reuber questioned the arguments put forward by Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Finance Minister E. J. Benson and Prices and Incomes Commission Chairman John Young against tax cuts.
> According to Mr. Reuber, the Bank of Canada has intensified the economic problems of Canada by going from one extreme to the other and by alternating the limitations on credit and the influx of capital in the banking system.
> Mr. Reuber has agreed that the economy is moving ahead after the recession of 1970, but unemployment will not go down much below 5 per cent of the labour force. It now stands at about 6 per cent.
> That is why the government should pursue a "moderately expansionary tax policy", promote expenses likely to stimulate the demand for goods and services, in order to multiply employment.

Mr. Speaker, we are witnessing an opposite phenomenon, for never have the burdens of the worker been so heavy. And still more surprising, is that each year, the taxpayers are called to pay increasingly higher taxes under the item of the public debt and incurred interests.

In 1969-70, actual expenditures under the public debt amounted to $1,709,938,172. In 1970-71, those expenditures amounted to $1,862,400,000 and finally for 1971-72, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) then anticipated a public debt expenditure for the tidy sum of $1,988 million.

Mr. Speaker, if we take into account the fact that Canada has some 21 million inhabitants and that the interests to be paid amount to $1,988 million, this represents something like $100 per year for each Canadian citizen.

Now, one should recall that, after the Second World War, the per capita interest on the national debt was $26.42 and that, in 1960, it was $42.17. Twelve years later, that is in 1972, every Canadian will have to pay $100 for this. Such are the fruits of the financial system that current and previous governments have favoured and continue to favour.

Some will no doubt say that that is a good thing and, unfortunately, they are the ones who represent high finance.

If we investigated, we would find that those to whom the interest on the public debt is paid and who will receive the $2 billion or so that Canadians will pay in 1972 are not people who earn only a pittance.

On the contrary, they are in the higher tax brackets and a major part of this interest just goes to swell bankers' dividends.

Mr. Speaker, since in view of all kinds of tax increases the national debt is still rising, we arrive at the conclusion that taxes paid by small wage-earners are just money wasted which, ultimately, serves only to swell the wealth of high finance.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has already asked the working population of the country to tighten their belts. The constant increase of the cost of the debt in interest charges makes it clear that this appeal was meant for high finance.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I am now offering this government an opportunity to demonstrate fairness in establishing its budget by curtailing the amounts allocated to the national debt and, as a result, to evolve a tax system to relieve single people earning less than $3,000 a year and married people earning less than $5,000 a year.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the motion of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), I would congratulate him for bringing the motion before the House. It is a very important one. When we talk about basic exemptions for income tax, if we look far enough ahead we can see that no matter what is proposed, the chances are that it will come to pass some time in the future. So it is well that we should seriously consider this matter this afternoon.

I am pleased, too, that the hon. member has been able to enlighten us on some of the Social Credit theories and the benefits thereof. I am very sorry that these things have never come to pass in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia which have had the wisdom to support Social Credit. However, Mr. Speaker, that does not in any way detract from the importance of this motion.

The hon. member for Portneuf has suggested that the amendments passed during the last 12 months did not go far enough in providing basic exemptions. I think this amendment is always true, but it is a case of trying to balance equity against growth in the economy.

It seems to me that in the two or three years when we debated the white paper on tax reform, and especially in 1969, we were enjoying rapid growth. Young people had not entered the work force in such large numbers and unemployment was at a lower level than it has been recently. Of course, as time went on—and this has been most evident in the past 12 months—it seems to me people felt that we should adopt a tax system and introduce budgets that would provide for growth in the economy. Certainly the warnings of the Economic Council of Canada bore out what would happen if that were not done. The council in its projection contended that we needed something like 6 per cent of real growth in the economy for the next four or five years.

I think we have been pretty successful in reaching this growth level. In 1971 real growth in our economy was at the 6 per cent rate. Our rate of growth between 1968 and 1971 averaged pretty nearly that figure. The Economic Council of Canada has told us that 1.4 million new jobs must be created between now and 1975. If this rate of growth is maintained we will be able to absorb into the work force many of the 1.4 additional people who will be entering the work force.

As the debate on tax policy developed, it became clear that people wanted a more equitable tax system and that we should strive to introduce a progressive tax system in which the person earning more pays more. We must also recognize that we want the economy to grow if we are to provide jobs for people entering the work force. If you are not working and are not earning any income, it really does not matter to you how high the basic exemption levels are. However, being against this motion would be like being against motherhood. We all know how difficult it is for a single person to get along on less than $3,000 a year, or for a married couple to get along on less than $5,000, the amounts set out in the notice of motion.

The hon. member also talked about the inequity of the sales tax. During the debate on the tax reform bill last fall the former minister of finance indicated that in the years ahead we would be reviewing taxes and reconsidering the sales tax. I agree with this. The hon. member for Portneuf used the example of sales tax on a bottle of whisky. I did not think that example was appropriate. If he had chosen bread, meat or something like that, his example might have been more appropriate. The sales tax is a flat tax; it taxes the poor and the rich alike at the same rate. The genius and beauty of the income tax is that it taxes progressively: a person who makes more pays more.

The notice of motion before the House reads:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislative measures so that the income of Canadians will be adjusted to the increasing cost of living by eliminating all taxes for single persons earning less than $3,000 and for married couples earning less than $5,000 with the addition of a further $500 exemption for each dependent child.

The notice of motion uses the words, "by eliminating all taxes for single persons earning less than $3,000 and for married couples earning less than $5,000". It also refers to a further $500 exemption for each dependent child. The proposal to eliminate tax for those earning under $3,000 or $5,000 could be accomplished by starting points or exemptions. The starting point device is used by the province of Quebec which provides that an individual does not pay income tax unless his income exceeds $2,000 if single and $4,000 if married. When an individual's income exceeds these amounts, the basic exemptions of $1,500 and $2,850 come into play. Thus, if a single individual has an income of, say, $2,001, he would become taxable on $501, the amount permitted by the federal exemption. However, this is prevented by a notch provision which has been introduced to prevent the tax reducing income below the starting points.

On the other hand, an exemption of a stated amount applies to everyone. For example, an exemption of $3,000 for single persons would eliminate from the tax rolls everyone with income of less than this amount and would also permit all single taxpayers to deduct $3,000 from income in computing taxable income. The advantage of the starting point device is that it is much less costly in terms of revenue. However, it requires a notch provision for income that is just above the starting points. Even with such a provision the marginal rate on such income is likely to be very high.

No matter whether the hon. member has in mind starting points or exemptions at the $3,000 and $5,000 levels, the government's position might be that this matter was extensively reviewed following the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, the preparation of the white paper on tax reform and the preparation of the tax reform income tax amendments passed by Parliament in December, 1971. There was considerable debate in the House on this subject when the white paper was discussed and during consideration of Bill C-259 last session. The exemptions recommended by the government and accepted by Parliament in the legislation passed in December, 1971, apply for 1972 and subsequent years and are as follows: for a person of single status, $1,500; for a person of married status, $2,850; for a dependent under 16, $300, and for a dependent over 16, $550—or $50 more than the amount mentioned in the notice of motion.

In addition, every taxpayer may deduct an optional standard deduction of $100 in lieu of claiming deductions for medical expenses or charitable donations. Every taxpayer may also deduct 3 per cent of his income from salary or wages, up to a maximum of $150. Taxpayers over 65 are granted an additional deduction of $650. The result of the combination of these deductions is that an employee with single status who is under 65 will not be subject to income tax until his salary or wage exceeds approximately $1,650. An employee with the full married exemption will not be subject to income tax until his salary or wage exceeds approximately $3,041.

The question is, what would be the effect on revenues if the high exemptions mentioned in the notice of motion were put into effect? Whom would we tax, or where would we obtain the needed taxes to overcome any losses. Of course, the tax reform bill passed last year provided for the imposition of capital gains taxes. These will supply additional revenues and allow tax levels to be reduced for practically all people in the labour force. Everyone pretty well, with the exception of single status taxpayers earning more than $8,500 a year, will benefit. Married couples with dependants will pay reduced taxes. As I say, the reductions will affect almost everyone.

The revenue implications of the hon. member's resolution cannot be easily estimated in detail. However, with starting points of $3,000 and $5,000 it would probably reduce revenues by less than $100 million, although this would depend substantially upon the notch provision used to tax income just in excess of the starting points. The increase in the basic exemption of the order proposed would cause substantial reduction in revenue. The order of magnitude can be guessed by noting that the increase in the basic exemptions from $1,000 to $1,400 and from $3,000 to $2,800, as proposed in the white paper on tax reform, was estimated at $1 billion.

When we look at this matter from the human point of view we cannot help but believe that what the hon. member is proposing will in the long haul be adopted in some form because of the inflation which occurs every year and the fact that people in the lower income brackets will have less and less resources with which to pay taxes. This is the important point of a graduated scale: it not only helps the progressive tax system and the poorer parts of the country but it helps the poor people.

[Mr. Foster.]

Last week a group from the national anti-poverty organization met in Ottawa. It presented briefs to all the caucuses of the House. I must say they were a very forward-looking group. Like practically everyone coming to meet the government, they were looking for funds, but they were doing this in a positive way. They were looking for assistance in order to help themselves. This is an encouraging development.

This group proposed that there be a poor people's development corporation. Their proposal had two objectives: first, to assist income groups in developing self-sustaining organizations and, second, to allow low-income people to participate in some organizations. This corporation would be made up by appointments from the government and appointments from within their organization. The corporation would fund self-help projects.

One of the projects they proposed was co-operative grocery stores in isolated areas. They gave the example of a small community of 200 people in one of the western provinces which does not have any store to serve them. They suggested that this kind of national organization would be able to provide the resources for a self-help project. They also proposed that in urban areas funds be used for housing developments and that 5 per cent of the needed capital would be provided by this corporation: the balance would come from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This group also talked about free stores in Winnipeg, a self-help community organization. This would provide an opportunity to assist each other, as well as those who are transferred, in the provision of supplies.

I believe the motion before us would be of benefit to many Canadians in the lower income brackets. The idea of hearings on the tax reform measures which were before us last fall worked toward more growth in our economy. The budget that was presented last fall also worked in this direction. Personal income tax was lowered by 3 per cent and corporation tax by some 7 per cent in order to provide more funds to get the economy of the country moving faster.

I know there are speakers on both sides of the House who want to speak this afternoon. I think it is interesting that this debate should occur just at the time we are debating the federal tax sharing agreements which this afternoon received second reading, approval in principle. One of the beauties of this country is that we have such co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. We know that when the levels of minimum basic exemptions are raised to the levels suggested by the hon. member for Portneuf, they will apply across the country and the benefits will be nationwide. We do not have the tax jungle in Canada that we had at one time and which exists in many other countries.

Mr. Mac T. MacCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) for bringing forward this intriguing notice of motion. I would like to go on record as being sympathetic to the proposal of the hon. member if it really means relief to Canada's hard-pressed taxpayers. However, as a responsible member of this chamber I must point out that having regard to practical considerations and a shrinking tax base that has not been recognized by the government, this probably would not bring the result that the hon. member envisages. I do not think for one minute there would be enough money left to go around. We are aware that next year income tax exemptions will be increased from $1,000 to $1,500 for single persons and from $2,000 to $2,850 for married couples, plus the $100 mandatory exemption. For married couples over 65 in standard circumstances where the wife is not earning any money, the exemption next year will be $3,600.

The notice of motion before us calls for the elimination of taxes for single people earning up to $3,000. This is an increased exemption of $1,500. In the case of married couples it calls for an increased exemption from $2,950 to $5,000, an increase of $2,050. These figures seem rather large at first glance but I suspect they are probably closer to the actual purchasing power of the dollar than the government is prepared to acknowledge. If one considers that until 1948 the exemption for a single person in this country was $750 and in 1949 it was advanced to $1,000, where it has stayed until today, and having regard to the decrease in purchasing power of the dollar during that time, I suggest that a fair figure might be 3 per cent annually. we know that it has been at least 4 per cent a year since 1966 and, therefore, having regard to the compounding effect of the decrease in the purchasing power of the dollar the suggestion of the hon. member is not so far out of line. Indeed, the Ontario Association of Superannuated Teachers passed a resolution along these lines regarding 1972 income tax exemptions. I have received dozens of letters from this organization and I should like to quote a resolution which was passed by them:

• (1640)

Be it resolved that:

(1) The income tax exemption be increased for all citizens of Canada or 65 years and over to $3,000 for all single persons and $4,500 for all married couples, and

(2) That an escalation clause be included in the exemption to establish an escalation geared to the cost of living for retired persons of 65 years and over.

These people are concerned, as well they might be. In light of the situation which exists I must say that while I am sympathetic to their case and to this resolution, in my opinion this approach is only a band-aid treatment for the disease: the cure for the disease is something else. I submit that the sky is the limit as far as exemptions go, but this will not treat the disease of profligate spending by governments in Canada today. This has placed our people in the unenviable position in which they find themselves.

I am not a senior member of the House by any means, but it came as a shock to me to find that in the short period in which I have been in this chamber the national budget has more than doubled. That is in less than a decade. No, Mr. Speaker, the answer is not necessarily to increase exemptions. I submit that the answer lies only in establishing real priorities for expenditures. The cure to this impasse is to spend money only on things which are worth while. We must cut out the frivolities. I ask this question: Has the group referred to as Satan's Choice or devil worshippers, or whatever they are called, which applied in Toronto for a LIP grant, actually received $25,000? If the money has been received by them, what is the situation? I make no statement as to whether they should or should not have received the money, but supposing after investigation it is determined that they should not have been given it: what happens? Do Canadian taxpayers have any chance of getting their money back? Has any taxpayer received a refund following the exorbitant waste in the course of refitting the Bonaventure? What about the grant to CHAT, the Community Homophile Association in Toronto which received $14,602 to succour Toronto's homosexuals?

Mr. Blair: You have strayed a little from the resolution.

Mr. McCutcheon: In conclusion, may I say that I am sympathetic to the motion but in all honesty it appears to me that a thorough review of the priorities of government would result in a more meaningful and more direct solution of the problem.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to address a few remarks to the House on the motion moved by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin). I suggest there is a great deal of merit in the hon. member's proposal by way of tax reform. It would result in purchasing power being placed in the hands of those who need it most.

I was interested in the comments of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) who told us, with great piety, that he is sympathetic to the motion. Nevertheless, I note that the government which he supports, last fall when it had the opportunity to introduce meaningful measures of tax reform evaded its responsibility and put forward legislation designed merely to continue the special privileges of corporate interests. The government should take the opportunity afforded by this motion to alleviate the tax burden upon those whose incomes are low. The hon. member for Algoma told us that the government would lose revenue of $100 million. I believe this $100 million could be made up from sources of revenue other than taxing people of severely limited means.

The tax legislation introduced last fall left wide disparities in terms of what income is taxed and what is not. An individual who earns $10,000 a year as a farmer, a working man or a professional, will pay tax amounting to about $2,285. A person who derives an income of $10,000 from capital gains will pay in the neighbourhood of $788, and a person deriving a similar income from dividends will pay only in the neighbourhood of $173. Disparities of this kind are completely out of line with any concept of a just society.

It would be well for the government to allow this motion to go to a vote, assist in its passage and give a break to people in the low income brackets in terms of the tax they must pay.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to this debate with considerable interest, particularly to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) who has just spoken.

• (1650)

I note that all members who have spoken have pronounced themselves in favour of increased tax exemptions, which is the basic principle embraced by this motion. They have also said that tax reform such as that already undertaken has not gone as far as it should have gone. I should like to raise one basic question for the consideration of the hon. member for Assiniboia. I believe in tax reform, in giving tax reductions to those in the lower income brackets; but when the hon. member increases the basic exemption by, say, even $1,000, then the man in the 80 per cent marginal tax brackets gets tax relief amounting to $800 whereas the man in the 20 per cent tax bracket gets tax relief amounting to $200. Therefore, I would ask him this question: Is this always the fairest and most equitable means of achieving the social purposes that I know he has in mind?

When one increases basic tax exemptions across the board there is no question in my mind that the greatest benefit from such an increase is derived by the man in the higher tax brackets.

Mr. Knight: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Assiniboia is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Knight: May I suggest that the hon. member reread the resolution, which speaks in terms of people in the lower income brackets, not as he suggests.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I have read the resolution very carefully and for the sake of the hon. member I will read it again into Hansard. The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislative measures so that the income of Canadians will be adjusted to the increasing cost of living—

How that is done, I do not know.

> —by eliminating all taxes for single persons earning less than $3,000 and for married couples earning less than $5,000 with the addition of a further $500 exemption for each dependent child.

I agree there is some ambiguity of meaning, but there is reference to a further $500 exemption. Presumably an exemption is an exemption. Presumably this resolution is couched in terms of exemptions. Indeed, I find it difficult to read it in any other way. Is the resolution intended to give us an elaborate system of tax reduction that does not change the tax brackets of anyone except by a notch provision with certain starting points, such as was introduced by the province of Quebec in its administration of tax law?

I understand that in the province of Quebec the basic exemption for a single person is $2,000. The basic exemption under the new law would be something like $1,500 or $1,400, plus the $100 charitable deduction with the tax rate cutting in above that. Then there is a notch provision so that anyone paying taxes on, say, $501 would pay no more as a result of cutting in above the basic exemption.

It is not clear at all whether the Quebec system is intended here, or some blanket exemption. I personally read the resolution to mean there should be an exemption of $3,000 and one of $5,000. I was not aware that the mover of the motion made this point at all clear. I think my reading of it is consistent with the hon. member's remarks, but there will be other opportunities, I am sure, for members on all sides of the House to set the record clear.

Mr. Knight: We will.

Mr. Francis: I am delighted to hear that. One thing that is clear is that we have already gone through a measure of tax reform. We have increased basic exemptions. At the present time the law provides an exemption, for those claiming single status, of $1,500; and for those claiming married status, of $2,850. For each dependent child under the age of 16 eligible for an allowance there is a deduction of $300. For the dependent age 16 and over the allowance is $550. In addition, every taxpayer may deduct an optional standard deduction of $100 in lieu of claiming medical expenses and charitable donations.

Every taxpayer may also deduct 3 per cent of his income from salaries or wages up to a maximum of $150. Taxpayers over the age of 65 are granted an additional deduction of $650. The result of the combination of these deductions is that an employee with single status under age 65 will not be subject to income tax until his salary or wages exceed approximately $1,650. An employee with the full married exemption will not be subject to income tax until his salary or wages exceed approximately $3,041.

I want to make it abundantly clear that in the course of the inflation which unfortunately is part of our times, the case for a review of basic exemptions under our tax laws is so strong that it is unanswerable. The mover of the motion has given us no formula to relate this to the cost of living, despite the pious phrasing of his motion. It will be necessary to review the law from time to time and to raise exemptions in such manner as may be provided. But none of us is so naïve as to think that this can be done without regard to the effect of increasing exemptions on tax yields.

I note, for example, that something like $1 billion was the estimated cost to the treasury of increasing exemptions from $1,000 to $1,400. Increasing them to $3,000 would result in a very substantial tax loss to the treasury. The cost of the $500 exemption for dependent children—and the word "exemption" is clearly used—would cost in the order of $500 million considered separately in its own right.

I am sure nothing will give hon. members on all sides of the House greater satisfaction than to be able to give tax reductions to large numbers of voters. I am sure that in this, an election year, the thought would be particularly appealing. But we have to be something more than just cynical in promising great things and large hand-outs; we have to ask ourselves the basic question: Is this the best way to administer expenditure for public purposes?

I start with the question I asked the hon. member for Assiniboia: Does he intend to give a man in the 80 per cent tax bracket the greatest amount of tax relief? I am sure he does not. The effect of increasing exemptions in a blanket way would do just that.

Mr. Douglas: A system of tax credits would not.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Island (Mr. Douglas) interjects, perfectly logically, that tax credits would not, but the motion before the House does not talk about tax credits. The motion before the House, as I understand it, is put in more simplistic terms and would have the effect, I submit, of giving large reductions in areas that I am sure members on both sides of the House would be the last to stand and defend.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until Monday next, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—CORRECTION OF REFERENCE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN" AS LEADER OF SOCIAL CREDIT PARTY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I rise briefly on a question of personal privilege. In the Saturday edition of the Ottawa Citizen, in an otherwise generous statement, I am referred to as the leader of the Social Credit Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure that if my hon. friend, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), were here he would support me in asking that this error be corrected. As surely everyone else in Canada knows, I am a New Democrat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

POST OFFICE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST IN AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO ITT

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, allegations of conflict of interest have been made in this House and in the media after the Canada Post Office awarded a maximum 70 million dollar contract to ITT Canada for the manufacturing of mechanized letter sorting equipment.

Innuendos have been made concerning the integrity of two of my senior officers, Mr. John Mackay and Mr. Jack Moody.

Mr. John Mackay joined the Canada Post Office on October 6, 1969, as General Manager for our Ontario postal region. This appointment came after an extensive recruiting campaign in private industry by the Canada Post Office to attract highly competent people for its reorganization and decentralization program.

Though it is correct that Mr. Mackay was then president of ITT Canada Limited, this did not mean that we should have turned down his appointment just in case at one time or another his former employer might do business with the federal Government, let alone the Canada Post Office.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to state emphatically that Mr. Mackay has no more ties, financial interests or otherwise with ITT since he joined the Canada Post Office in 1969.

On October 21, 1960, Mr. Jack Moody came to the Canada Post Office from the Armed Forces as a metalurgical engineer. He was assigned to our Engineering Branch and in 1971 became its chief engineer.

On April 17, 1968, Mr. Moody registered with the Career Assignment Program (CAP) administered by the Public Service Commission. His application was approved by the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General—Personnel on June 8, 1970. It was then accepted by the Public Service Commission. From January to March 1971, Mr. Moody left the department to follow the theoretical part of the Career Assignment Program as required.

Unfortunately, the Public Service Commission was unable to find a suitable assignment for Mr. Moody after his three month course. This was mostly because of Mr. Moody's high classification and salary range. This is why the Canada Post Office decided in July 1971, with the agreement of Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission, responsible for CAP, to put Mr. Moody on a Developmental Program. On this basis, Mr. Moody was assigned to ITT Canada for a period not exceeding two years starting September 1st 1971 with the view of broadening his knowledge. Upon his return to Ottawa, the department will benefit from the services of a qualified civil servant who will be competent in the installation, operation and utilization of automatic letter sorting machines.

In keeping with the terms and conditions of this program, Mr. Moody is still a public service employee and is paid by the Government of Canada. ITT Canada reimburses all expenditures—wages and incidentals—to the Receiver General of Canada. In similar programs, we have another Post Office employee on assignment with Imperial Oil. Furthermore, we have had employees from Gulf Oil and Bell Canada working with the Canada Post Office on assignment. We do not have any other Post Office employee working on coding and mechanization with companies other than ITT Canada for the simple reason that it is the only one which entered this field with a manufacturing plant in Canada.

The Canada Post Office has not had any active research and development program in recent years in the mechanization field. It has simply studied, supplemented by published documentation, different pieces of mechanized equipment now in use and queried other postal authorities on their performance and expectations regarding their particular coding and mechanization programs. This is the responsibility of our Coding and Mechanization Branch. To be specific it is the main responsibility of Mr. Jerry Fultz. Mr. Moody never worked for our Coding and Mechanization Branch nor did he in any way collaborate in its work. As for Mr. Gerry Fultz, he joined the Canada Post Office on February 12, 1940. Since then he has had vast experience in the Department particularly in the operations and administration field. Mr. Fultz was named Director of the new Coding and Mechanization Branch on June 16, 1970.

• (1410)

[English]

On November 24, 1970, Mr. Fultz recommended that the Post Office call for tenders for automatic letter sorting equipment needed for the mechanization of the Ottawa Post Office. Twenty-seven companies which we knew manufactured such equipment were invited to submit tenders. Tenders closed January 12, 1971.

A specifications book was given to the interested parties. It was understood that the equipment was to be delivered in two stages. We knew very well that the first stage could not be built in Canada. But we specified definitely that the second stage of the contract had to be Canadian-built.

We received five bids: ITT Canada on behalf of ITT Belgium; Canadian Marconi on behalf of GEC Elliott of Great Britain; Telefunken; Plessey Canada on behalf of Plessey of Great Britain; and Plessey Canada on behalf of Plessey of Great Britain-Plessey of Australia and Toshiba.

Technical appraisals determined that the equipment proposed by Telefunken and that of ITT Canada were the best on the grounds of proven standard quality. Hence, because of costs, shipment dates and the ability to produce in Canada, the ITT Canada tender was judged to be superior. Therefore I sent a submission to Treasury Board recommending approval of the ITT Canada bid. It was approved by Treasury Board after being studied by the Department of Supply and Services and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Thus, on March 30, 1971, a $4.4 million contract was awarded to ITT Canada.

The equipment corresponding to the first stage of the contract has recently arrived at the Ottawa Post Office from Belgium. ITT Canada has already started the manufacturing process, in Canada, of the second stage.

In September 1971, ITT Canada informed the Canada Post Office verbally that it was ready to provide automatic letter sorting machines which the department needed for the other 14 Canadian centres at the same unit base price. Though I could have legally and technically recommended to Treasury Board the awarding of the contract to ITT Canada on the basis of its first bid, I asked my officials to call for another tender. My purpose was to give other companies another chance and also to see if we could get a better deal.

Tenders were called October 6, 1971 and again a specifications book was sent to the interested parties. Fourteen companies in five countries were invited to submit bids. Tenders closed November 18, 1971. Only two bids were received: Plessey Canada for Plessey-GEC Elliott of Great Britain, and ITT Canada.

Technically and legally, the department could have ignored the Plessey Canada bid. In fact that bid did not meet the specifications of the tender call in many instances. Nevertheless, I asked Mr. Fultz to study thoroughly the Plessey Canada bid and to contact them to ask for extensive amplification, clarification and new data regarding the bid.

An evaluation of the two bids was finished by the end of January, 1972. On February 1, 1972, at the request of the British High Commissioner in Ottawa who was making a representation to us on behalf of Plessey of Great Britain, I agreed not to make a decision on the matter and to delay my recommendation to Treasury Board until Mr. Fultz met again with top executives of Plessey of Great Britain to hear their new arguments on the proposed equipment. On the same day, Mr. Fultz left for England for the fifth time in two years. He went to examine again the present status of the equipment of Plessey of Great Britain.

Following his return from England Mr. Fultz reported that, while he had seen equipment being developed which had capabilities for fulfilling the specifications should it be placed in production, as yet none of it was in the production stage. And a fair amount of development work remained to be done before it could be fully assessed. After his report, I sent my submission forward to Treasury Board recommending the contract be awarded to ITT Canada. My proposal was accepted by Treasury Board.

The reasons for my recommendations and Treasury Board's decision are as follows:

1. The ITT Canada equipment is of the sixth generation of equipment which has successfully been in operation in many countries such as Belgium, the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany and Denmark. The proposed Plessey equipment is still in the research and development stages without even a prototype being assembled.

2. While the ITT Canada equipment can handle 21,000 letters per hour regardless of size, the performance of the Plessey equipment, according to its own appraisal, ranges from 20,800 letters, 5½ inches long, per hour to 14,100 letters, 10 inches long, per hour. These are the figures "throughput" by the machine. Throughput is maximum speed adjusted to allow for mail feed, stoppages, operator error, etc. and is the number of letters we can expect to get out of a machine in one hour of operation.

The majority of letter sizes for the government is more than eight inches in length. Thus the Plessey equipment would have allowed handling of 6,000 letters less per hour than the ITT Canada equipment.

3. If we take into account that the average size of letters mailed in Canada is at least eight inches, it would have meant a purchase of 85 automatic letter sorting machines from Plessey while only 67 ITT Canada automatic letter sorting machines would have done the same work. Thus, if we had opted for the Plessey system, though the cost per machine would have been less it would have cost the Canada Post Office, over a 15-year period, 28 million extra budget dollars because of an increased demand for supplies and labour. Evidently with an increasing volume of mail over the years, the Plessey system would continue to cost the Post Office more money because of the ever-increasing number of machines needed.

Those three reasons should have been enough to justify awarding the contract to ITT Canada, but other reasons of equal importance moulded our decision. Let me just mention:

1. Space needed: If we would have opted for the Plessey system, we would have been forced, because of the number of machines, to build bigger offices. Just to cite Montreal as an example, construction costs of our new proposed facilities would have been nearly $2 million more than forecasted.

2. Canadian content: While ITT Canada guaranteed that the equipment in this contract would be built in Canada, the first seven automatic letter sorting machines and 72 coding desks of the Plessey system would have been built in England. To summarize, the ITT Canada proposal will create directly about 150 jobs in Canada this year while Plessey could not really do it before 1973.

I could also mention, Mr. Speaker, the advantages of the ITT Canada bid on future costs, on research, and the development in Canada of such an industry and its potential for export in harmony with existing government policy.

Nevertheless, I think I have proven beyond any doubt that the award of the contract to ITT Canada was in the best interest of the Canada Post Office and the Canadian people. I would have preferred, out of courtesy for Plessey, not to go into details, but circumstances forced me to do so. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that, as you are now aware of the fact that I was extremely cautious in connection with these bids, you will admit in all fairness that I went further than the usual tendering procedures.

But mostly, and more importantly, I hope that any doubts cast on the integrity of Mr. John Mackay and Mr. Jack Moody have been proven baseless and uncalled for.

These two senior public service employees have had no say whatsoever in the decision taken on this matter. I, alone, have made the decision after carefully studying the well-documented information and the recommendations which Mr. Fultz made to me. On this basis I then recommended to Treasury Board the award of the contract to ITT Canada knowing very well that my Deputy Postmaster General, John Mackay, had been president of that company and that Mr. Jack Moody was on assignment from the department to that same company.

I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker, in the name of these two senior officials of my department, for your patience.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, initially I want to thank the minister for his courtesy in giving the opposition a copy of his statement beforehand. I temper that, however, with the advice that if the statement and all statements of this kind are so long it is no wonder that the postal service is so slow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: In fact, as I listened to the minister I almost thought he protested too much. This problem does raise some very basic questions. I quite agree with the minister it is unfortunate that men on the periphery are sometimes caught in the crossfire. However, until the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government define a code of ethics to remove any potential stain of conflict of interest in the discharge of legislature and administrative duties, these problems are going to return to haunt all members and to take the time of this chamber.

It was only in the bright days of 1968, which are now somewhat dulled and certainly distant, that the new Prime Minister and the new government were going to proclaim, at long last, a code of ethics. I have not got all the quotations here and I will not take up the time of the House, but I know that at that time the Prime Minister said on one occasion that conflicts of interest must be avoided and they were going to search for some kind of guidelines. Mr. Speaker, they have searched for guidelines almost like the biblical characters of old, wandering and stumbling through the wilderness. I am told that two reports even got to the Privy Council office recommending certain terms of reference to take care of this problem, and still there is no action.

Let no criticism from this side of the House unfortunately fall on those who are caught in this crossfire. We do need a code of ethics to define rules of conduct and to remove any possibility of conflict of interest for parliamentarians, be they in the House of Commons or the Senate, and certainly for some of the top administrators in government.

In this case we have a deputy minister who was a former head to ITT, the chief engineer of the Post Office now seconded or leased or lent to ITT, and we have a contract for $70 million nine-tenths of the feet, which is not just a foot in the door but both feet in the door, for future contracts for the mechanization of the Post Office and postal services. This is a large item of government business.

Last Friday the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) cast innuendoes about tendering. It does not take much of a layman to know that with a detailed definition of specifications you can chart and determine the type of tender you want. It does not excite me that 27 companies applied initially although it is interesting that only five were interested in the specifications book. On we went from there.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the continual growth of the public and private sectors and the interrelationship of the government with the private sector demand a code of ethics. I believe there should be cross-fertilization and an infusion of new blood from the private into the public sector so that the public will have an appreciation of what motivates the private sector. I think we have to do more of that. I commend the minister for trying to experiment on that basis. But this interrelationship cannot be allowed to develop so that it in effect becomes incest between government and the private sector. I suggest, on the face of the matter and on the initial facts, that until the minister stood in his place today and gave a very detailed statement there were naturally questions that arose.

I shall not say much more. I think the whole problem of ITT could and very well may develop further questions in the not too distant future. This is not the first advent of ITT in government business. A company called Raynier

Pulp and Paper, which is interested in pulp and paper rights in Canada, I am informed has received federal funds. Some of the timing of the federal commitment for federal funds might be involved in postal problems, but when we have a conglomerate like ITT and see the problems they have south of the border I think we have to ask questions.

To avoid these matters coming up on a recurring basis it is not the minister's but the government's responsibility to define a code of ethics so that parliamentarians in the Senate and in the House and also top administrators will be able to discharge their duties without getting caught in this type of crossfire. I believe we should have a committee to look into this matter. There should be terms of disclosure of personal interest in any legislative or administrative acts. We should come at least as far as Britain has come, let alone the United States, and define very carefully a code of ethics so this will not happen again.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has perhaps misconceived the problem. The problem is not the integrity of public servants. I and my colleagues certainly do not question the integrity of Mr. Mackay and Mr. Moody who I am sure are very decent Canadians trying to do a job as they see it. I think the long explanation the minister gave in order to try to clear these two men of any suggestion of improper action may have been necessary in his own mind, but that is not the point at all. The point is that the entire situation is such as to create doubt about what is happening in the department and in other departments. The point is that if you are going to do business with ITT it is wrong to have as deputy minister an ex-president of ITT. The point is that if the government is going to do a large business with ITT it is wrong to have a senior official of the department seconded to ITT. These are the issues.

If the minister or the government tells me this is the only source for the equipment or the only company to which to send someone I tell them that they are downgrading Canada a great deal too much. There are other areas where these people could go and there are other firms where they could be trained. This cosy connection between the government and ITT of having a senior official there at the time the specification books arrive, when the specification books have to be studied, when the tender has to be made, this coincidence of a senior official of the department being there at that time seconded to the company—that is the kind of thing that creates problems and creates conflict of interest. No detailed statement about duties and all that will wash away the fact that there is a conflict of interest.

Anyone who has studied our society has long ago abandoned the notion that the company and the deputy minister or somebody from the department sit down in a smoke-filled room and cook up something. That is not the way it is done. It is done at luncheons. It is done at cocktail parties. It is done at dinners. It is done on the golf course and it is done in the boathouse. It is that kind of association that throws doubt on what is being done. Precisely because a government department is involved and tens of millions of dollars of the money of Canadian taxpayers, action must never be undertaken in a way which may even remotely suggest the kind of thing that this action now suggests.

The hon. member who preceded me referred to ITT Rayonier in Quebec which has been offered $13.7 million by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I think of the fact that there are two members of the minister's advisory board who are officers of companies which have been offered grants of over $7 million. I think of the remission by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the previous Minister of Finance of $6 million to Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited, a subsidiary of Sun Oil in Alberta—a $6 million Christmas gift, I think of the statement of one of the spokesman for the Liberal party in Ontario to the effect that 95 corporations finance the activities of the government party between elections and at election time, and I say I am thoroughly justified in suggesting that the cosiness between the government and corporations such as ITT is a disservice to Canada and a disgrace to the democratic system. This is what disturbs me.

Despite the detailed and elaborate statement the minister has made I want to express the hope that the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications which will be studying the department's estimates will not be satisfied with the details that the minister gave. He has referred to a number of documents and you, Sir, ruled the other day that documents which are quoted or to which reference is made should be laid on the table. I hope that when the committee discusses the department's estimates it will demand that the minister lay on the table the submission to Treasury Board, the studies carried out by the two departments to which he referred, the Department of Supply and Services and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the actual contract with ITT, the specification books for the two orders, Mr. Fultz's report on the Plessey equipment, and the tenders submitted by all bidders. We have to see all these documents in order to make certain that the specifications were not tailored to ITT possibilities.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN TREASURY BOARD AND UNIONS— REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I would like to move a motion on a matter of pressing necessity. I ask for the consent of the House to propose a motion without notice in this regard. The urgency and the pressing nature of this matter concern the reasonable possibility of a cessation of postal services in Canada in the very near future. We are told that talks are now going on between Treasury Board and the postal unions, but the President of the Treasury Board has admitted that the board has not made a proposal on the essential issues of wages and job security guarantees. In the public interest there is urgency and a necessity that Treasury Board negotiate in good faith. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That this House instructs the President of the Treasury Board to report to the House on the status of the bargaining and the proposals made by the Treasury Board to the postal unions on Tuesday and on each succeeding Tuesday until a collective agreement is signed.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

That the rejection by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion of the Port Simpson Cannery proposal, as a project under the terms of the ARDA agreement with the province of British Columbia, be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for investigation and report.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): This question was answered by a statement from the Hon. Ron Basford to the House on February 21, 1972 to the effect that: (a) The E.B. NUMBER OF RETIRED CANADIAN ARMY OFFICERS

Question No. 121—Mr. Latulippe:

How many Canadian Army Officers are retired and what was their average pension during the year 1971?

[Translation]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Since the amalgamation of the three elements of the Canadian Forces, separate statistics are not maintained and it is not possible to say how many Army officers have retired. However, at present there are 9,299 retired regular force officers. The number of officers who retired but who are not drawing pensions is not known. In addition, a number of retired officers are employed in the Public Service and have their pensions abated in accordance with the provisions of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act. In order to ascertain the average pension paid in 1971 it would necessitate going through the records of approximately 40,000 pensioners as ranks are not shown. The necessary expert staff is not available to undertake the large amount of work which would be required to gather the necessary information.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH—SUGGESTED TABLING OF EVALUATION REPORT ON 1971 PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister concerning the unpublished report, Summer 1971, an evaluation task force report, at least parts of which are reported to have been leaked to the Citizen today. The report was supposed to have been completed in December at a cost of some $400,000. Has the Prime Minister any reason he can give to the House why this task force report has not been tabled in the House or made public, although I understand that the deadline for applications for new projects for 1972 is about to expire?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Unfortunately, I have not read the Citizen yet and I am not aware of the task force to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Stanfield: May I express the hope that in future—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Stanfield: —these reports will be leaked to the Prime Minister as well as the public.

Mr. Hees: It is a special department of Information Canada.

Mr. Forrestall: That is a squeak, not a leak.

An hon. Member: You know what happened to Morison.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would give the House the assurance that this task force report will be made public, as has frequently been promised by the Secretary of State, particularly in view of the highly critical nature of the task force report with regard to last summer's programs.

Mr. Trudeau: In his supplementary question the Leader of the Opposition still has not indicated what task force report he is referring to. I asked the ministers around me and nothing is apparent from the hon. member's question.

Mr. Stanfield: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister and the ministers around him would listen they would know that I described the task force report at the outset of my question as being the Summer 1971, evaluation task force report. It is the task force report on the 1971 summer program. The Prime Minister can smile about it but I do not think he will smile quite as much when he sees the paper.

Mr. Trudeau: We did a lot of things in the summer of 1971, and I would be interested to know what this evaluation is all about.

Mr. Stanfield: If it will help the Prime Minister it concerns the youth program for the summer. I am asking the Prime Minister for an assurance that this task force report will be published now. Apparently it has been buried for some three months.

Mr. Trudeau: I will gladly look into the matter now that the question is clear.

TAXATION

SALES TAX REMISSION TO GREAT CANADIAN OIL SANDS LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO OTHER APPLICATIONS AND REMISSIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Finance one or two questions arising from the question I asked about a week ago with respect to the $6 million remission of sales tax to Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited. Have other companies made application for such remissions and have such remissions been made by Order in Council under section 17 of the Financial Administration Act, I believe it is, or under any other act that I may not know about?

• (1440)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked me that question last week and I undertook to ascertain whether there were any other similar applications for remissions. I am advised there are none.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, would the minister undertake to lay on the table a list of any applications made for remissions under section 17 of the Financial Administration Act, and any decisions to remit such money? I appreciate that I can find the Orders in Council by going through all the copies of the Canada Gazette, but perhaps the minister would table such a list for the information of hon. members and the country, say for the years since April, 1968.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will not give any undertaking to submit the applications. After all, it only becomes a valid situation when an Order in Council is passed. The hon. member has suggested that Orders in Council are public documents, but I will arrange that the public documents be collected for his convenience.

SALES TAX REMISSION TO GREAT CANADIAN OIL SANDS LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO OTHER GRANTS TO GREAT CANADIAN OR SUN OIL

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance would not have authority over other departments may I direct this supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister have someone check into the question whether Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited or Sun Oil Company, its parent American corporation, or any subsidiary of Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited or of Sun Oil Company Limited has received grants from any other department of government, whether the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce under the various programs they administer, or from any other department?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Prime Minister may wish to reply to the question, but the hon. member will appreciate that a question as far-ranging as this one is normally placed on the order paper. The hon. member is asking for very detailed information covering many departments. I respectfully suggest to him that normally such a question would be placed on the order paper, but that having been said, perhaps the Prime Minister may wish to reply to the hon. member.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I agree with you, Mr. Speaker, and my answer to the question is yes.

SUGGESTED REMISSION TO COMPANIES AND MUNICIPALITIES OF SALES TAX PAID ON PRODUCTION MACHINERY BETWEEN 1963 AND 1967

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, as the government believes it is justified in making a remission of $6 million to Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited because of financial hardship incurred through paying sales tax on production machinery between 1963 and 1967, is it undertaking or will it undertake a review of all cases where companies or municipalities paid sales tax on production machinery during those four years to satisfy itself whether or not any other instances of financial hardship occurred, and in those cases will othe government remit the sales tax involved?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I can only say in answer to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that this case was treated on its merits.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have to move on. We have spent quite a bit of time on this question. The hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as it appears satisfactory to make a remission to a very large company, is it not sensible to look into the cases of all municipalities and companies that might have had similar difficulties, and see if it is not worth while to pay them a remission also—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

I apologize to the hon. member for Portneuf. It was him who was recognized. The hon. member for Portneuf.

[Mr. Lewis.]

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REFUSAL TO ACCEPT CERTAIN MUNICIPAL PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Labour a question.

Since, in order to have access to the Local Initiatives Program, municipalities had to have architects or even engineers draft their projects, could the minister tell us whether the government intends to give special grants to some municipalities which have spent thousands of dollars to draft projects that were rejected?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO INDEPENDENT AUDIT AND EVALUATION—EARLY PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is somewhat supplementary to the first questions asked with regard to the partly leaked report of the Cohen group on last summer's youth program. It is directed to the Minister of Labour. The minister indicated this morning at the meeting with the Canadian Labour Congress that in light of the request by the CLC he would be prepared to have an independent audit of both the LIP program and the opportunities for youth program, and that a similar audit might exist for LIP as existed last summer for the youth program. Can the minister indicate if this audit study has been established, what its terms of reference are, and whether its terms of reference will allow such audit to be in fact independent and public?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the establishment of an independent audit to do a thorough review and evaluation of the LIP program is now in an advanced stage.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Now that the Prime Minister's memory has been refreshed, I wonder what steps he may be taking, along with his colleagues, to ensure speedier performance in the publication of such evaluation and to ensure that there will be an objective report which will not suffer the early editing that the Cohen report suffered in September?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wants to ask a question that is acceptable procedurally he should not submit one that contains argument. Perhaps the hon. member may want to rephrase his question. Otherwise I will have to go to the next questioner.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry you viewed that question as argumentative. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether or not steps are being taken to provide a public forum in which there can be an objective report on the effectiveness and the sufficiency in meeting goals of the local initiatives program as well as the opportunities for youth program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall gladly look into that matter, just as I undertook to look into the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition once he had clarified his question.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF GRANT TO SCENE AFTER SCENE FREE THEATRE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour regarding the LIP program. In light of the fact that a $40,000 grant under the LIP program has been given to the Scene After Scene Free Theatre in Dundas, Ontario, to produce plays that allegedly oppose the political, economic and social systems upheld by the government and intending to propagandize communism, would the minister at the earliest opportunity, preferably forthwith, look into this matter in order to ascertain whether or not this project meets the criteria of the program, what in fact were the criteria set for this group, and report back to the House immediately?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this matter was brought to my attention this morning by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: For a very good reason.

Mr. O'Connell: I have been looking into it and I have asked for a full review and report. The project was monitored on February 21 and will remain under continuous review. At that time it was said to be proceeding within the contract requirements. I agree with the hon. member, as we all do, that anyone who is reported in the press as being interested in agitational propaganda is of very little interest to us. We are going to review that project.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask just one supplementary question. In view of the seriousness of this allegation, since we understand that the purpose of the LIP program is to produce work, and since I believe that the grant is to be made in five payments, will the minister assure the House that further payments will be withheld until such time as he can report fully to the House on the conclusions that have been reached?

Mr. O'Connell: Yes, Mr. Speaker. However, I do wish to report that the first payment, which is normally just an advance payment, has been made. No further payments have yet been made, and we will be looking at the project in the meantime.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ALLEGED INCOMPATIBILITY OF STATISTICS ON EMPLOYMENT PROVIDED

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Would the minister indicate why the level of actual employment in 1971 due to "all new facilities assisted under ADIA" is 19,269 jobs in his department's publication, "Statistical Review of Regional Development Incentive Activity," dated February, 1972, compared with a total of estimated employment standing at 58,782 in the annual report of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for 1970-71?

• (1450)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that this kind of question is not in order. This is debate. The hon. member is inviting the minister to debate a point rather than seeking information. Perhaps the hon. member might try to rephrase the question and ask it more directly.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rephrase the question by asking the minister to explain the difference which exists in the departmental publication estimating the number of jobs created under ADIA or RDIA to April at 50 per cent less than the figure he takes credit for in his annual report, which is a public document?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, since I noticed last week that the hon. member is not able to read statistics, I will read his question carefully, check the figures and then give him an answer.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that my reading is perhaps a little better than his because I am quoting from a departmental document which he apparently has not read. I would ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary I would ask him to put it. We cannot embark on a debate between the member and the minister.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask by way of a supplementary question if the technique of his department in trying to evaluate the number of jobs created under RDIA or ADIA is to contact successful applicants across the country by telephone? Does he think that this actually constitutes an accurate evaluation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Regina East.

INDUSTRIAL INCENTIVES ADVISORY BOARD—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MINUTES BEARING ON MEMBERS' POSSIBLE CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of some questions I asked him last week concerning the operations and activities of the Industrial Incentives Advisory Board, can the minister now tell us if this board keeps minutes of its meetings? Also, in view of some of the questions that have arisen, would the minister care to table the minutes of the meetings of the board or such portions of the minutes of the meetings of the board that concern matters where the possibility of a conflict of interest might arise?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware whether the council, which acts only as an advisory body to ministers, keeps any minutes. I shall inquire into the matter and inform the House, in reply to this "substantive" question, whether I can table the documents.

[English]

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, while the minister is making his inquiries and looking into the matter, would he also inquire into the methods of operation of the board when situations arise in which there is a possibility of conflict of interest? Does the person involved leave that meeting, refrain from discussion or abstain from voting on a recommendation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR WHEAT—REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING METHOD OF PAYMENT

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Welcome though the $60 million anticipated payment to Canadian farmers may be under the guise of a domestic two-price system for wheat, may I ask whether the minister has received representations from the prairie pools to the effect that the proposed method of payment does not reflect a fair proposition to wheat farmers? If so, will the problem be discussed further with farm organizations before the payment policy is finally determined?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, representations were received from certain officials in at least several of the pools which might have led to a different conclusion for distribution than the one that was adopted. However, representations from individual pool committees as well as many farmers and farm organizations favoured the formula that we actually used.

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR WHEAT—DATE OF PAYMENT TO FARMERS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the government has now announced the method by which it will make the payments, when can the farmers expect these payments so they can reduce their indebtedness and thereby save some interest on long-term debts?

[Mr. Burton.]

An hon. Member: That's how they hope to win the election.

Mr. Korchinski: You can forget that.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as indicated in the announcement on the method of distribution, we expect the first distribution to be made in the spring.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. Will there be a supplementary estimate between now and the end of March to take care of this particular matter?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that is the intention.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY AND FURTHER STATEMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Now that the honeymoon couple has been located with ease in Barcelona, and in view of reports that certain moves were made prior to the release of Geoffroy, will the minister now reconsider his position and direct the holding of a judicial inquiry?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the opposition has drawn my attention for the last two months to discrepancies and irregularities which they claim have been happening in my department and they have been unable to date, to substantiate to my satisfaction any discrepancy or irregularity. They have brought to my attention a lot of rumors and fabrications.

Until such time as a discrepancy or an irregularity has been substantiated, I do not think an inquiry is necessary and our only concern is to bring Mr. and Mrs. Geoffroy back to Canada to face trial.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the statement just made by the minister—he judges his own facts—I wonder if he would, at a convenient time, since the question of extradition may be involved here, make a full statement to the House once again about this matter? I do not want my question to be argumentative, but the minister said that if there were irregularities or illegalities the matter would be looked into and I submit he is judging these matters himself.

An hon. Member: And so are you.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have never hesitated to answer any question directed by the opposition on the subject of the authorization given to Mr. Geoffroy to leave the penitentiary to get married. I have always declined to answer the question of the opposition regarding the police inquiry and I believe I was right.

[English]

METHOD OF EXTRADITION OF YVES GEOFFROY AND WIFE FROM SPAIN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Solicitor General can tell the House under what treaty or other arrangement the extradition of this couple back to Canada will be sought?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think that the question should be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I redirect my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have a treaty with Spain for the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals which was signed in London on June 4, 1878.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Signed by whom?

Mr. Woolliams: It must have been signed by Sir John A. Macdonald himself.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, if I may jump from the past to the future, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he is now sufficiently comfortable in his new and exciting role and challenging job to be able to tell the House whether he is going to bring in a budget before Easter?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Not that comfortable, Mr. Speaker.

AUDITOR GENERAL

REASON FOR DELAY IN TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since the Financial Administration Act provides that the report of the Auditor General shall be laid before the House of Commons by the minister on or before December 31 or, if parliament is not then in session, within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session, and since this is the eighteenth day of the present session, why has this report not been laid before parliament. What excuse, if any, is there for this breach of the law?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to discuss this matter with the office and look into it.

Mr. Stanfield: You understood the question, did you?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Did you? Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to hear questions which, when asked for the first time, are clear as the hon. member's invariably are.

Mr. Hees: Let us have a clear answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, there was a lot of noise and I do not think the Prime Minister answered the question.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I did, Mr. Speaker. I said that I would undertake to look into it.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—GRANT TO PROCESS OF THE FINAL JUDGMENT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ENDORSEMENTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the acting minister confirm the statement of the Acting Prime Minister last week that the $26,000 local initiatives program grant to a project of a group called the Process of the Final Judgment was endorsed by the YMCA, the Bank of Montreal, the Ontario Department of Health, the Toronto Doctors Hospital and the centre for the mentally retarded? Also, can the minister table whatever endorsations these respective institutions gave this project?

• (1500)

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have read the letters which, in some cases, are an endorsation of the project and in other cases from the people operating the project. I would have no objection to tabling them, but out of courtesy perhaps I ought to clear this with the persons who have submitted the half dozen or so letters. If the hon. member will see me in person, I will be delighted to show them to him.

Mr. Nesbitt: I thank the minister for offering to show me the correspondence personally. Perhaps later this week the minister can confirm whether or not he will be able to table them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I will not make any motion at this time, but having in mind the very brilliant judgment which the Chair made on the application of the hon. member for Calgary North it might well be that the minister might consider he has a duty to table these documents.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says he is not making a motion now. If he reads the precedents and the ruling to which he referred, he will note that it has reference to documents quoted, and not documents to which reference is made. In any event, the question is theoretical at the present time. The hon. member knows that is the distinction.

Mr. Baldwin: The Secretary of State for External Affairs quoted from them.

POST OFFICE

CONTRACT TO ITT—INQUIRY AS TO LOWEST TENDER

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question is to the Postmaster General. It arises out of the statement he made this afternoon with regard to the two contracts given to ITT Canada Limited. With reference to both the first contract on which there were five bids and the second contract on which there were two bids, was ITT Canada Limited the lowest tenderer for both of these contracts?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I believe I said in my statement a while ago that, over a 15-year period, the total cost of the second contract would be lower, that is with ITT, because their equipment requires less space, fewer machines and operators, etc.

With regard to the first contract, two companies put in bids; these were almost identical but the cost of the ITT equipment was lower than that of Telefunken.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact the tenders were accepted and therefore, I presume, met the specifications, may I ask the minister if the lowest tender was accepted in each case?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): In the case of the first call for tenders, Mr. Speaker, bids were received from five companies, two of which offerred to put at our disposal equipment corresponding to our specifications. The lower of these two was that of ITT Canada.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I again bring to the attention of hon. members that we will soon be running short of time. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, but there should not be too many supplementaries if we want to proceed in an efficient manner.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

CONTRACT TO ITT—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION OF JACK MOODY IN DEVELOPMENT OF SPECIFICATIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): One brief supplementary. May I ask the minister if Mr. Jack Moody, who worked for the minister's department and later was assigned to ITT Canada Limited, had any part in preparing the specifications sent to the various companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will have to repeat what I said a while ago: Mr. Moody has never helped to prepare those specifications. The first ones were drawn up in November 1970 and Mr. Moody joined ITT in September 1971. He was therefore not an employee of that company when the specifications were drawn up and he was in no way involved.

CONTRACT TO ITT—ALLEGED LOWER BID BY PLESSEY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Regardless of 15 years in the future, but solely on the basis of the specifications that were sent in effect to two eventual bidders, is it a fact there was a $30 million difference between the bid that was accepted from ITT Canada Limited and the Plessey bid?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I did not refer to $30 million. I said that if the contract had not been passed with ITT, from a budgetary point of view it would have cost the Post Office Department an additional amount of $18 million over a 15-year period.

As far as the price of equipment is concerned, I think that the Plessey equipment was cheaper, but since it was much slower that ITT's, it would have been costlier to operate.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: With reference to the specifications that were sent out, is it correct to say that, regardless of the speed of putting letters through the mechanical equipment, on the basis of dollar difference there was approximately $30 million or more between the ITT bid and the Plessey bid?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look at the figures. I do not have them in front of me, but I can supply the information to the hon. member.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ACCEPTANCE OF PROJECTS SUBMITTED AFTER JANUARY 6, 1972

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Finance.

It seems that, since last week, Mr. Speaker, we have been putting several questions about local initiative projects. It should be realized that this is very urgent, especially concerning projects which some municipalities have already submitted and which should normally be in force during the month of March.

This is why I should like to have answers to all the questions raised last week and, among others, this one: Do local initiative projects submitted after January 6 by municipalities stand a chance to be accepted even though there are no more funds for this purpose?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have been unable to identify this precise date or precise projects. I invite the hon. member to meet with me following the question period so that we can come to an understanding about what we are speaking.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

POSSIBLE INVITATION TO HER MAJESTY TO ATTEND CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that Her Majesty the Queen is the honorary commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the fact that this year the RCMP is to celebrate the centenary of its founding, what consideration is being given by the government or what action is being taken to invite Her Majesty to attend these ceremonies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not involved in the planning of the ceremonies. However, I know that the force itself is making plans. The Solicitor General has discussed these with me in a general way. I do not know of any indication that they have asked to have Her Majesty invited at this time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In light of the experience by the Prime Minister and other ministers with regard to the time required to negotiate arrangements for a Royal visit of this kind, does the Prime Minister not think it is time to do something about such an event?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the House may have in mind that there is a question of inviting Her Majesty for the centennial of a province next year. These plans have already been under discussion between myself and the premier of that province. It is conceivable that some idea will be brought forward to see if Her Majesty can perform any other duties at that time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF BRYDEN REPORT ON STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister yet in a position to advise when the report of the Bryden committee, which is studying the Public Service Staff Relations Act, will be made public or made known to the public?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): No, I am not, Mr. Speaker. I will make inquiries into that, first as to whether it is to be made public and, second, when.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West on a supplementary question.

Mr. Alexander: It is a related question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: If it is only related the hon. member may wish to give other hon. members, who have been trying rather diligently and anxiously to ask questions, an opportunity to do so.

AGRICULTURE

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL—DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS—INQUIRY AS TO REQUESTS FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCIES

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): I wish to direct my question to whoever is answering today for the Minister of Agriculture. Have the members of the Farm Products Marketing Council yet been appointed, as provided some time ago in the marketing bill, and, if this has not yet been done, when will they be appointed?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. member that they have not yet been appointed but these appointments will likely be made very soon.

• (1510)

Mr. McKinley: Can the parliamentary secretary advise us whether producers of any particular commodity have asked for an agency to be set up to regulate that commodity?

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): I should like to check before answering that specific question. I know there has been a good deal of discussion of this subject, but I am not sure whether there has been a specific application.

URBAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE CREATION OF LAND BANKS—STUDY OF UNITED STATES PROGRAM

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is the government presently discussing with the provinces and the municipalities the creation of land banks in the cores or downtown areas of our cities and metropolitan areas?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): There is already a program for land acquisition by provinces and municipalities with federal support under the terms of sections 40 and 42 of the National Housing Act.

Mr. Ryan: Is the minister looking carefully into the new federal program in the United States under which $5 billion is being set aside for the purpose of setting up land banks of the kind to which I have referred?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

TAKEOVER OF PHARMACEUTICAL FIRMS BY UNITED STATES COMPANIES—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. Has his attention been drawn to the fact that nine or ten Canadian pharmaceutical organizations or companies were recently taken over by United States corporations with the result that some 90 per cent of pharmaceutical shipments are now shipments by United States controlled pharmaceutical companies in Canada? If so, is the right hon. gentleman giving this matter any attention in relation to the policy which is to be announced eventually?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, my attention has not been drawn to that situation. Therefore the answer to the second part of the question is no.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might ask a supplementary question, since there are only three or four minutes left before the end of the question period and I must again point out that a number of hon. members have not had a chance to ask a question, let alone a supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: I merely wanted to ask the Prime Minister whether the last two weeks have provided him with an opportunity to decide when government policy on foreign ownership might be announced, or whether he is still not in a position to give us any indication of a likely on-or-about date when we may expect such an announcement?

Mr. Trudeau: The latter, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOUNDARY BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES IN AREA OF GEORGES BANK— REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The eleventh annual Canadian hydrographic conference was held in Ottawa last week and the event attracted a good attendance of United States hydrographers. Since there is some uncertainty concerning the exact position of the border between Canada and the United States in the area of Georges Bank off the coast of Nova Scotia, will the minister tell us whether this matter has been discussed with the Americans recently and, in view of possible oil reserves in this area, when we may anticipate a report on this important boundary?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to take notice of the question. Discussions have been going on from time to time. I am not certain, though, when the most recent of them took place, so I would ask for the indulgence of the hon. member to take the question as notice.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE PURCHASE OF MUSKOX BY RUSSIA— PROVISION OF STOCK TO CANADIANS FIRST

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I would direct this question to the parliamentary secretary. It arises out of a function which was held in Edmonton recently at which schoolchildren presented Premier Kosygin with a muskox, at which time the Russian premier expressed the intention of purchasing muskox from Canada. May I ask whether requests by Canadians who have already expressed interest in starting enterprises, or have applied for the necessary permission, connected with the raising of muskox will be looked after before we sell any of these animals to the Russians?

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I will take notice of the question, Mr. Speaker.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister inform the House when new legislation in connection with family allowances will be presented? Since he has already admitted that the new plan cannot be implemented by the original target date, can he advise us what the new target date will be?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): We hope to bring the legislation before the House fairly soon. The date on which the new cheques can come into pay will depend on how rapidly the legislation is dealt with.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING COMPANY

QUEBEC—DISCONTENT RESULTING FROM TECHNICIANS' STRIKE— REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

As CBC technicians are playing the fools and the Canadian public, particularly in the province of Quebec, is quite upset by their behaviour, does the government intend to take any action in order either to give service to the people or, as the Prime Minister said, to close the shop, on the double?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Perhaps I should answer that question as Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. I do not think there is any intention to intervene in the way the hon. gentleman has mentioned, but I would point out that mediators from the Department of Labour have now succeeded in bringing the two parties together for discussion of all the outstanding issues. The parties met regularly all last week and talks are continuing today.

REQUEST FROM WIRE SERVICE GUILD FOR PERMISSION TO PROSECUTE CORPORATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received a request from the Canadian Wire Service Guild seeking permission to prosecute or sue the CBC for an action amounting to an illegal walk-out?

An hon. Member: Walk-out?

Mr. Nowlan: If so, what was the nature of the hon. gentleman's reply?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): I have such a wire. I would have to look it up in order to see what reply I made to them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-4, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from January 1, 1971 to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, financing and guarantee bills, including the present one, have been introduced annually with the exception of the 1963 bill which covered 1962 and 1963, and the 1966 bill which covered 1965 and 1966. The present bill is basically the same as in previous years. It sets out, in summary form, the amounts of CNR's capital expenditures for 1971 as presented in its capital budget for that year totalling $219,800,000. This level of expenditures compares with $229,000,000 authorized in 1970. The bill also states that Canadian National Railways is authorized to make expenditures not exceeding $83,000,000 between January 1 and July 1, 1972 for obligations incurred prior to January 1, 1972 and to enter into contracts before July 1, 1972 for capital expenditures not exceeding $162,000,000 for which payment will not come due until after 1971.

The bill is intended to achieve six main objectives most of which have had similar expression in previous financing and guarantee bills.

First, the bill contains provisions authorizing Canadian National Railways to borrow up to $27,000,000 for financing branch line construction. This amount includes the financing of branch lines in excess of 20 miles authorized by special statute as well as the financing of those lines under 20 miles which do not require special legislation. By covering all branch lines, the provision in the bill is consistent with the intent of reflecting in the financing and guarantee bill all the financing authorities which Canadian National Railways require.

• (1520)

Second, the bill provides for the continued purchase by the Minister of Finance of Canadian National Railways' 4 per cent preferred stock through to the end of the calendar year 1972. This continues the practice of previous financing and guarantee acts. The 1970 Financing and Guarantee Act extended to December 31, 1971 the expiry date of the authority granted by the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act of 1952 for the purchase of such stock equivalent to 3 per cent of the company's gross revenue.

Third, as in previous years the bill provides authority for the government to make temporary advances to Canadian National Railways and Air Canada to meet deficiencies in operating revenues up to June 30, 1972. Such advances are repaid later in the year from the companies' revenues. If these prove inadequate, the insufficiency is covered by a parliamentary appropriation.

Fourth, the bill contains an option similar to that contained in the 1970 Financing and Guarantee Act which would enable Air Canada to borrow $114 million prior to July 1, 1972 either directly from Her Majesty or by means of a guaranteed public issue. It also would renew the authority for the Minister of Finance to guarantee debentures amounting to 13 million pounds to be issued in the period May 1, 1972 to December 31, 1976 by Air Canada in accordance with contractual obligations assumed by the airline prior to July 1, 1972.

Fifth, the bill contains a clause to increase to one billion dollars the limit on the amount of substituted securities that may be issued by the CNR in respect of any refunding pursuant to provisions of the CNR Refunding Act, 1955. The Financing and Guarantee Act of 1964 raised that ceiling to $680 million. The further increase of $320 million proposed in this bill would make adequate provision should a decision be taken to replace with longer term financing the temporary government loans authorized under section 7 of the 1955 refunding act.

Finally, the bill would provide for the appointment of the firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co. of the cities of Toronto and Montreal, chartered accountants, as auditors of Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1972.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, once again this House is being asked to rubber stamp its approval of the expenditures of certain crown corporations during the past year. Once again we are being asked indirectly to approve the actions of these corporations during the past year, even though all members of the House know that we have little or no control over the policies of these corporations. In fact, about the only time that we hear from them is when they come to this House looking for money to pay their bills.

The fact that this annual exercise in futility has been going on for years does not make it any more valid. The fact that year after year members of the House deplore the custom of voting moneys which have already been spent does not make the custom any more palatable. Nor does it soothe the feelings of members on this side when they realize that, despite their annual objections and criticism, their suggestions for a review of the whole procedure—in fact, a review of the whole transportation policy—nothing changes from year to year. We are still being denied any effective voice in the conduct of Canadian National Railways and Air Canada. We are still told by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) that the National Transportation Act is the be-all and end-all, that the government is apparently quite satisfied with it. Not only parliament but the people of this country, who after all supply the money to pay the deficits of these two corporations, are effectively blocked by the provisions of an act which sets up quasi-judicial bodies which have put themselves beyond the law. Has anyone ever been known to launch a successful appeal with the Canadian Transport Commission?

But, Mr. Speaker, hope springs eternal and the members on this side continue year after year to debate the CN financing bill and to criticize it. In fact, sometimes it seems as if everyone wants to get into the act, to take a swipe at the CNR and to offer suggestions for improvements in service. Surely, this must be the reason that we go through this exercise year after year, for we cannot change anything. The money has been spent. Even if the opposition did refuse to allow the bill easy passage, I suppose the government would ram it through anyway, since this government is quite expert at ramming through unpalatable legislation.

I suppose this exercise will continue to be one of futility until this government is prepared to examine the rationale of its national transportation policy, to set priorities and to determine what role our national carriers must play. This government must show leadership, must designate those services that are essential and must be provided, subsidized if necessary—this applies to all modes of transportation whether it be air, ground or water transporation—and then insist that these carriers provide efficient services.

Until this government does that, about the only good that can come of this debate is the opportunity it gives us to examine the operations of the CNR and Air Canada, both here and in Committee, to criticize those operations and make suggestions. This is only right, for if these Crown corporations want this House to vote them money they should be prepared to submit their operations to a thorough and searching examination. This is the only time that this House has an opportunity to examine the activities of the CNR and Air Canada, and it is the only time that hon. members can make suggestions and recommendations on behalf of the people of Canada, who are not too happy about the manner in which these two corporations carry out their day to day operations.

Surely, the government owes the people of this country the duty not only to listen to their complaints but to take some action on them. This is where the government has failed the people of Canada shamefully. This is where a good share of the responsibility lies for failing to develop a national and rational transportation policy that is based not on profit alone but rather on the concept that transportation is essential to Canada, that where necessary services must be subsidized, whether they be in the form of highway, rail, air or water transport. The profit motive is important, but it should be secondary to the concept of providing essential public services.

This bill, as the parliamentary secretary has outlined, provides financing for Air Canada. In view of this I think it only proper that I say a few words about Air Canada, and in this regard I find myself in an awkward position. Since I have been subjected to the whims of Air Canada for the past four days, in my present mood I find it very difficult to be objective, but I should like to make some general remarks, leaving my colleagues to zero in on specifics, of which I know there are plenty.

I think the nature of one of the difficulties being faced was very well illustrated by Mr. Yves Pratte, chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Air Canada, when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on June 22, 1971. Mr. Pratte was asked many questions about the airline's philosophy, about its rationale. Was the airline there to make money or to provide services? His reply was very interesting and I think gets right to the nub of the government's indecision on a transportation policy. Mr. Pratte said this:

• (1530)

> The basic problem in so far as we at the management level are concerned is that we do not know what the mission of Air Canada is. We wish we knew. It is awfully difficult to manage any organization when one does not know what the purpose of the organization is: when you are told on the one hand that the purpose of the organization is to be as profitable as any private corporation and, on the other hand, that you are to provide service at all cost.

Is it any wonder that Mr. Pratte was confused as to what his duties are as chief executive officer of Air

Canada. He went on to say that he had offered ideas and made suggestions to the government, but came back to the point that the government had not laid down a clear-cut policy for him to follow. In other words, was it to be principally a profit making organization or was it to provide services where they were deemed essential? Mr. Pratte went on to say:

But this requires a definition of the role of the corporation which, I submit very respectfully, we do not have at the present time.

That was on June 22 last year. When reference was made to that statement in this House, I remember that the Minister of Transport expressed surprise that Mr. Pratte would say such a thing. However, he must have read the transcript of the evidence and realized that Mr. Pratte did indeed make that statement because in the Toronto Star of June 28, 1971 the minister is quoted as saying:

We would like to give Air Canada a clearcut mandate but it is hard to be precise. I have been working on this for two years.

The problem has existed longer than that, Mr. Speaker, but surely in two years this government could come up with some rational air policy. How much longer must we wait? When the minister and the management of Air Canada do now know what the mission of the corporation is, when there is not a transport policy worthy of the name for other means of transport either separately or in combination, it is unreasonable for this House to be asked to vote moneys to Canadian National Railways and Air Canada. The House and the public have a right to know how the taxpayers' money is being spent and the government has an obligation to define its policy objectives. The shareholders of a private corporation would laugh at directors who brought in such a request for money. The government has admitted publicly that it does not know where it is going or what its priorities are, yet it asks for another $600 million or more. I think this is completely ridiculous, but I shall let my colleagues zero in on some of the specific problems of Air Canada later.

Last week in this House, we heard speaker after speaker endorse the principle of equalization payments, a scheme designed to compensate the less affluent provinces for their unfavourable economic or geographical situation. At least one speaker pointed out the difficulties imposed upon the western and eastern extremities of this country by the high cost of transportation involved in competing in the markets of central Canada. They pointed out quite correctly that equalization of transportation costs was just as valid a proposition as transfer payments from the central government for social welfare, education and all the various purposes for which these transfer payments are used under the equalization principle.

It is an historic fact of confederation that the outlying parts of the country, both west and east, must have competitive transportation costs to and from the markets of central Canada. Not only were parts of the country cut off from their traditional markets in the United States by tariff barriers set up to protect central Canadian industry, and from those parts of the country which offer natural markets, but new problems were created, particularly in the Maritimes, by the fact that direct rail routes to the United States were replaced by a circuitous all-Canada rail line. In other words, essentially for purposes of defence, the rail line was taken by an all-Canada route when the shortest route would have been through the United States. This has aggravated the problem of distance already suffered in these areas.

Is it any wonder that people in the Atlantic provinces are upset by the erosion of the Maritime protection established in the old Maritime Freight Rates Act? Under the old Railway Act, which was amended by the National Transportation Act, under the terms of subsection 326(5) no charges could be made unless authorized as follows:

"No tolls shall be charged by the company or by any person in respect of a railway or any traffic thereon until a by-law authorizing the preparation and issue of such tolls has been authorized by the Board"—

The reference is to the old Board of Transport Commissioners. This was one of the sections which was repealed, with the result that the railways or carriers do not have to get prior approval of rate increases. They simply announce a rate, allow the stated waiting period to pass and the tolls become effective on that date. It is all very well to say that there is provision for appeal to the CTC. In theory there is, but in practice no such thing exists because it is impossible for a private company to make an effective appeal. Each time a rate increase was announced, other members of the opposition and myself pleaded with the Minister of Transport to order the CNR to delay it until a new policy was devised, but he would not listen. He always said that he could not do it or, because of rising costs, the CNR must raise rates. I realize that costs are rising, but I am saying that we in the east and west have a constitutional right to have rising freight rate costs offset by direct transfer payments to the shipper or by some other means. All we ask is that the minister live up to his commitment that he would not allow reductions in subsidies or increases in freight rates unless and until some equivalent assistance was provided for the people affected.

But what has happened? We have been waiting for this government to act on some sort of national transportation policy. A recent issue of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission's monthly bulletin, Tips and Topics reports that:

For the eighth time in the past twenty-nine months, rail rates will increase on February 14, 1972.

That increase has come into effect.

The increase announced by the Railway Association of Canada on behalf of the Canadian railways, will range from 4 to 8 per cent.

The latest increase is another in what has become a pattern of an increase every six months since the lifting of the rail freight rate freeze on September 23, 1969. This succession of rail rate increases now stands at a cumulative total of 35 to 68 per cent (depending upon the rate level) for non-competitive rail rates and 19 to 40 per cent on competitive rail rates.

The minister said that, of course, there had been no increases for 10 years prior to that. That is true, but I want to point out to the House that the cumulative increase enacted following the lifting of the freeze has been more than would normally be expected in those 10 years. Those increases have exceeded the increases in any similar period since World War II, so that these freight rate increases cannot be justified by any trend in the rising cost of living or rising costs.

Why were these rates increased so rapidly? I think the answer is to be found in the fact that the railways no longer have to seek prior approval of the federal regulatory body, nor do they have to justify these increases as was the case prior to 1967. Secondly, when the National Transportation Act was enacted in 1967, the railways were paid a transitional subsidy beginning in 1967 at $110 million and declining each year until its disappearance in 1974. This transitional subsidy was designed to compensate the railways in a broad way for uneconomic services which the railways were maintaining by the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission. I have no quarrel with elimination of the subsidy. I think any reasonable member of this House would realize that subsidies are not the best way to handle these problems.

• (1540)

But we in the Atlantic provinces are asking that the government follow the recommendation of the Atlantic premiers or of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission in 1969 when they agreed that it would be wise to phase out the subsidy but only—and here is the crux of the whole question which the government has conveniently overlooked—if the subsidies were replaced by an equivalent amount of money which should be allocated to shippers on some basis determined by an independent commission. We said, all right, phase out the subsidy but do not take it away unless it is replaced with something else. This, in itself, would be bad enough, but what we are now finding is that the phasing out of the subsidies has already started. They have been reduced by 2½ per cent. Not only did the government not grant an equivalent amount of assistance to the shippers involved, but about a month later the railways raised their rates by an amount which would roughly offset the 2½ per cent subsidy they lost. Here, we get it both ways.

Instead of having a new policy to replace the old one in order to give some assistance to our shippers, we now find the minister has embarked on a policy of taking away the assistance we had and at the same time allowing the railways to increase their rates. We do not know where it will end. It has reached the point where many of our major shippers are very concerned about the situation. I think I should read into the record at this time excerpts from a letter from the Secretary of the Maritime Co-operative Services Limited, which is one of the largest shippers in the maritime area. Mr. McEwen, the secretary, states:

> We are further concerned that millions of dollars are being spent under DREE in the area to develop industry which has little hope of survival without a long-term transportation policy to move the products of these industries into the markets of central Canada or New England, U.S.A. The transportation factor seems to be largely ignored by the planners in the development of this industrialization.

I have heard my colleagues repeatedly take up this aspect with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). Certainly, the transportation factor is very much involved in manufacturing in the maritime area. Mr. McEwen continues by saying:

> In our opinion, it would be better to use the money to add to the fund suggested by the premiers and equalize transportation on some point, such as Levis, Quebec and then industry could develop and operate competitively.

Here again, I have taken up this matter with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and have heard my colleagues repeatedly refer to it. Millions of dollars are being pumped into the Atlantic area to create industries which have no reasonable chance of success, because once they start producing goods and wish to ship them out of the maritime area they find the transportation costs are so high they cannot compete in the markets of central Canada which are their natural markets.

The writer goes on to say:

> We have watched, over the years, various secondary industries die.

He speaks about a small manufacturing company which produced wooden step ladders which gradually over the years, because of the rising freight rates, became less and less competitive until about five years ago it went out of business. He says:

> We see the same thing happening to industries that have been developed recently with area incentive grants but no consideration being given to transportation.

So, this is what is happening in the Atlantic provinces. I believe the same situation exists in the other provinces which are faced with extremely high freight rates. This is why we continually call upon the government to get off its fanny and suggest some sort of a regional transportation policy. There are many other areas I could touch on because this whole field is very broad. It would be impossible for me to cover all of them, however, even if I had all day every day or if I had a week.

I should like to mention a matter about which many people probably do not think when they consider the exorbitant cost of transportation. Many people in this House who are shippers or businessmen probably know what the term "demurrage" means. Demurrage on railway cars is a charge levied which is supposed to be an incentive to unload cars quickly. The charge is, therefore, a penalty if cars are held beyond the free period, which is normally two days. This demurrage tariff is administered by the Canadian Car Demurrage Bureau, which is supposed to be an independent body, but is owned and controlled by the various railways in Canada. The substantial revenue derived from its operation is paid back to the railways. In spite of protestations otherwise by the railways, this organization has become a source of substantial revenues, and with the free hand it now has to levy whatever charges it wishes it is carrying its mandate to the fullest extent.

We always seem to come back to the Canadian Transport Commission. The CTC seems to be always at the root of all our troubles. Until the Canadian Transport Commission was set up, the Canadian Car Demurrage Bureau had to adopt the same procedure as the railways. It had to go to the Board of Transport Commissioners to have its tariff approved, but this is no longer necessary. The result is that since the change in the act, demurrage charges have been increased drastically to the point that they are now a major item of expense to any company using railway facilities. It is easy to get a car in, turn it around and get it out in many areas of central Canada but at the end of the line, as it were, these cars may be in an area on Friday where they are required to stay over the weekend because they cannot be hauled out. Up until recently, three free days were provided. If the last free day was a Friday, there would be no charge for the weekend. Now, by an arbitrary ruling of the board, the shipper, if the car is not unloaded by Friday night, must pay the demurrage charges for Saturday, Sunday and Monday. One might say that this does not amount to much, but over a period of years it could involve thousands of dollars for shippers in the Maritimes and might mean the difference between a profit operation and a loss. Because of our distance from the central markets, the Atlantic provinces feel the effect of these charges to a much greater extent than other parts of the country.

Indeed, the transportation problems of the Atlantic provinces have always been serious. This fact was recognized at the time of confederation, but we received no protection in the terms of confederation similar to the Crow's Nest Pass rates which are applicable in western Canada. We receive no demurrage concessions such as those which are applicable at Thunder Bay. These demurrage charges are serious, but the most serious feature of this whole situation is that once again the CNR and Air Canada, and now the Canadian Demurrage Bureau are allowed to arbitrarily assess tariffs from which there is no effective appeal from them. The rapidly escalating costs of transportation are slowly strangling the development of the Atlantic region, and not only are we receiving no response to requests for change in government policy but the policies of the transportation agencies are making it impossible for the maritime manufacturer or feed producer to ship to or receive from the markets of central Canada.

Even though this is a routine financing bill such as we get every year, I still feel it is important because Parliament should tie down CNR and Air Canada until such time as the government comes up with a policy which will provide a service to Canadians in all parts of the country. Until the government is prepared to do that, we will not be prepared to grant them any further money. It is difficult to take such a stand in the House, but sometimes I think we should. At least we should refer this bill to the committee where, hopefully, we will receive some answers from the minister as to what he proposes to do and what the transportation policy for all parts of Canada is to be.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am entering the debate on this bill at this stage because my colleagues and I believe that this government, this parliament and the people of Canada, have permitted the railway and air services of this country to be contracted to the harm not only of individual Canadians but of communities of Canadians and that the time has come to call a halt to that process. We feel very strongly that the time has come to say to both the railway systems that the abandonment of rail lines, the closing down of local stations, and the dismissal of local agents must end, and that the real purpose of the transportation system must govern their actions instead of the totally false social approach which is now animating their policies.

The people of Canada granted tens of millions of dollars and tens of millions of acres of land to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and then when a number of railways failed, the people of this country paid and continue to pay hundreds of millions of dollars in debt to set up the Canadian National Railways system. We built the first at the end of the nineteenth century with money and grants of land on which the CPR has built an immense financial, mineral and industrial empire, and we built the second, the Canadian National Railways, out of small railways that had failed. We did that almost immediately after the first world war.

I suggest to you, Sir, that the people of Canada spent these immense amounts of money and made these immense grants of land not for the purpose of these organizations developing some profit. They built these railways, spent this money and gave grants of land because a country the size of Canada cannot live unless there is an adequate railways system from one end of the country to the other. The people of Canada spent these moneys and gave these grants because they recognized that it is otherwise impossible to support an agricultural industry dependent on exports in large measure and on movement across the country as far as feed grains and related products are concerned. They gave these moneys and these grants of land because they recognized that all the sections of Canada's economy required a transportation system. They did that in the days when the air transportation system was not yet available. These moneys were not spent for the CPR to make profits; they make enough profits even though they may not make them on passenger railway service. The money was not given to the CNR to make profits when we took over the bankrupt railways. They were built for the purpose of serving the people of Canada. Both railways have failed in their duty and should stand condemned as failing many communities, particularly in the west. Both railways stand condemned as having failed the economic needs of regions of Canada distant from the centre by their inconsiderate and continual increase in freight rates without a sufficient change in rates to fit the situation of the Atlantic provinces or of western Canada.

This is one of the two or three points I want to make, and I make it as emphatically as I can. This is the opportunity for me to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway is an organization without conscience. Having built its strength and its power on moneys and on land given it by the people of Canada, it is now a railway, an air, a bus and a steamship organization. It has transportation systems in the air, on the water and on rail as well as on highways. It is an organization that has immense oil, gas and mineral reserves and subsidiaries right across the country. It owns large tracts of real estate and makes very large profits on the whole. The entire CPR empire makes very large annual profits, and yet they do not have the sense of obligation to Canada which established that organization, which paid for its building, and which made it possible for it to grow. They do not have that sense of obligation to Canada which would require them to continue the passenger service because it may not be or probably is not profitable.

• (1600)

I say the same thing to the CNR leadership, Mr. Speaker. The difference between the publicly owned corporation and the privately owned corporation is that, contrary to what the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) thought, the CNR officers can be brought before a committee of parliament, and undoubtedly will be there to be questioned, but not the CPR officers. I say to the CN: your company is no longer accepting its responsibility to carry out its duty as a transportation service.

For a number of years, working with some of the railway unions from about 1952 to about 1962, I had occasion to take a deeper interest in railway services across this country. I tried to learn a little about the railway services, and particularly about passenger service. What I learned was that there is no railway in the world that makes money out of its passenger service, not even those that run on the eastern seaboard of the United States where the population is great, where communities are close to each other, and where trains do not have to run across an entire continent, say from Vancouver to Halifax, Winnipeg to Toronto, or whatever it may be.

In the eastern U.S. seaboard, the railways lost money on passenger service on the whole. True, there were seasons when they made money, seasons when passenger service was profitable, but many other seasons when it was unprofitable. There just is not any railway that can make profits out of passenger service. I have not yet read an expert on railway economy who recognizes that passenger service can be profitable at all times. But any government or any country that has any sense of priorities and of purpose obliges its railways to give passenger service. That is one of the reasons for the existence of railways. This is true regardless of the fact that the provision of passenger service may be undertaken at a loss, as undoubtedly it is in Canada. I do not think the railways in Canada are making money out of passenger service, or ever did make money out of it. But they were established for the purpose of giving service to communities.

On this point I merely want to add that the reason my colleagues and I feel so strongly that the two railway systems have betrayed their obligations is not solely that there are individuals in some northern parts of Ontario, or in some small communities in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta who cannot now have this necessary transportation service. This is extremely important, but it is not the only reason. In addition to the fact that people are being inconvenienced, communities are being destroyed. It is not only that individuals are being inconvenienced in not having the railway service to which they are entitled, it is the fact that when you close a railway station or an agency, and this is followed up by the closing of the elevator at a remote locality in the prairie provinces, then a whole host of other activities follow, and communities are on the verge of dying. This is where the thoughtless acts of the railway companies become most apparent.

So far as the New Democratic Party is concerned right across this country, we say that enough is enough. From now on, passenger service ought to be provided for Canadians, and local stations and agencies ought to be continued. That is the purpose of a railway.

I was a member of this House, Mr. Speaker, when the Transport Act was passed setting up the Canadian Transport Commission. I remember the then minister of transport, Mr. Pickersgill, piloting the bill through the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Piloted all right!

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Lewis: He piloted the bill through the House of Commons, and then piloted the minister of transport into the position of president of the Canadian Transport Commission. I have had the pleasure of knowing Mr. Pickersgill for many years but I say, Sir, that in carrying out the policies and the duties of that commission, the various parts of it are showing a reactionary unconcern for the needs of the people of Canada, are showing a reactionary concentration on the dollars and cents involved.

In my opinion, the Canadian Transport Commission is much more an agency of the railways than it is of this parliament or of the people of Canada, and that this cannot any longer be tolerated. If the railways need an agency they can pay for it themselves. We should not have to pay for it. If Mr. Pickersgill and his associates want to act for the Canadian Railway Association they are free to do so, but not at public expense. The public is paying the members of the Canadian Transport Commission in order to make certain that the public interest is served by the organizations answerable to the commission. However, that is not what the commission has been doing, whether with respect to the railway companies, the air companies, or indeed Bell Telephone, an organization that has been rooking the Canadian consumer for God knows how many years. Almost every time Bell comes before the CTC with an application for an increase, after a long falderol and inquiry, by some inconceivable coincidence it is able to get the increase. I should not say this happens always. There have been delays and changes, but eventually Bell is able to prove its case, no matter how indefensible its case may be.

I take the occasion of this bill to voice on behalf of our party our strongest protest against the philosophy and thrust of the CTC as related to the abandonment of railway services, as related to rates set by the railways, and as related to all the other agencies and bodies that come under its jurisdiction. It is my firm conviction, after watching it functioning since it came into existence, that it is not carrying out its function as a safeguarder of the public interest, but in effect is an agent of the transportation companies rather than of this parliament and of the people of Canada. That is true no matter in what direction you look.

The hon. member for Moncton was entirely right when he said that one of the main causes of inequality of opportunity, of economic circumstances, and of the level and standard of services in those parts of Canada distant from the centre, like the Atlantic provinces, like the west, and like Northern Ontario, has been the cost of transportation.

One of the legitimate, sensible, rational and just ways of assisting the disadvantaged areas of Canada—I do not say it is the only way because more needs to be done—is to set up the necessary differentials, the necessary subsidies if the case requires them, to rid these areas, particularly the Atlantic provinces, of the immense disadvantage they have in the fact of transportation distances, and in the fact of the costs of transportation. This is something that has been recognized in Canada over many years but has never become part of an integrated transportation system.

The third point I want to touch on briefly, and I do not intend to speak very long today, is to protest against the continuing and determined effort of the CTC, and obviously the policies of the government, to increase the number of private air carriers and to give them more and more of the feeder lines, more and more of the air transportation routes in Canada. At the moment when our publicly owned air transport company gets out of the red and begins to generate its own surpluses which it will need to assist in the expansion and renewal of equipment made necessary by modern developments and provide that service which, if left alone, it would continue to provide, big and little private corporations, led by CP Air, enter the field and the Canadian Transport Commission gives to these small or large transport organizations rights and privileges which, before then, had belonged to Air Canada. This means that in many parts of Canada, and most of northern Ontario is one of them, the people will not be served by Air Canada at all. They will be served either by CP Air or, more likely, by one of these other, small transport companies.

I do not object to the thrust, courage or enterprise of an individual or group of individuals wishing to set up some air company. I am not saying that such people should not be allowed to develop their business. What I am saying is that, in the long run, it is shortsighted and stupid to allow them to do so at the expense of the potential income and development of Air Canada. I am saying that CP Air particularly ought not to be given that kind of advantage. Air Canada, it seems to me from my study of it, and I might easily be wrong, may welcome this opportunity for lessened service. The company may even have desired it, because in the process it would lose some of its headaches as well.

I am never in favour of bureaucrats, whether in the public service, in Crown corporations or with private companies, who want to take the line of least resistance and fewest headaches. As I say, Air Canada may have wanted this. Yet I venture to suggest that in 10, 15 or 20 years a great many people will be sorry for what has happened as the opportunities for Air Canada grow fewer and as the demands for capital increase greatly. Then Air Canada, instead of having generated some of its own investment and replacement capital, will have to come to an increasing extent to parliament and ask for loans, grants, underwritings or what have you.

I do not think that makes sense. We had sense enough to set up a publicly owned air corporation. We ought not to interfere with the possibility of its future growth by handing out licenses without first considering what the consequences of these actions will be in future and how they will affect the people of Canada. And, instead of standing up and making these demands from the CTC, Air Canada has been acquiescing in developments which are bound to be fundamentally hurtful to it in the long run, if not in the short run. The company has cut down service constantly across this country and that, too, I regret very much.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a brief word about the capitalization of the CPR. I heard, during my recent few days of visiting to the western part of this country, that the CNR is losing money. Like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), Mr. Speaker, I made some non-partisan, non-election visits to western cities not long ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: I did just as the Prime Minister suggested he has been doing. I felt I ought to flatter him by imitating him, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: All the time in the lobbies here, and particularly in the lobby with my friends from the Tory party who, I notice, were robbed this morning of their major election issue with the recapture of Geoffroy in Spain, one hears the refrain, as one does elsewhere across Canada, that the CNR is losing money, that here we have an example of a publicly owned corporation and it loses money. Actually, Mr. Speaker, when the CNR capital setup was changed some years ago, and I was glad then that it was changed, the change did not go far enough. The CNR continues to carry a debt which it ought not to continue carrying. It is stupid to continue loading it with that debt. The CNR capital structure ought to be changed again, to the point where the CNR does not carry the debt which was originally undertaken when we nationalized the little bankrupt railways that make up the CNR.

Some years ago I asked someone to calculate how much a person or estate, or what have you, would make if $100 were invested in one of the companies that went bankrupt in 1918, 1919 and 1920. We assumed that the original share would be changed into a share of the CNR. I forget exactly what the term for such securities is, and I forget how the matter was handled. I wanted to know what the return would be for a person or estate on an investment of $100. You will be surprised to learn that the present return would be about three or four times the amount that was invested only 40 or 50 years ago, Mr. Speaker. I ask, how much longer are you to go on making the public treasury pay for a publicly owned utility on that kind of base. Therefore, I say that the capitalization of the CNR ought to be changed so that the railway ceases to carry the immensely heavy burden of debt and interest payments that that involves.

I want to conclude by saying something that some of my colleagues have said better than I can claim to say it. The point I want to emphasize in our discussion of this bill is that the people of Canada urgently require an integrated transportation policy. I, personally, believe that a utility like transportation ought to be all publicly owned. Canada is only one of two countries in the western world in which a privately owned railway system operates. The other country is the United States. No matter whether you look at Britain, France, West Germany, Denmark, Norway, Spain, Australia, New Zealand or Japan, you will find that the railway system is publicly owned. Railway service and transportation services in general are a public service. They are a public utility and not areas out of which private profit ought to be made. They are necessary services. A transportation system is necessary not only for the pleasure of people who use it; it is primarily necessary for the movement of goods, services and people. It is necessary for the good of the country as a whole and for the building of the economy of the country. This is true particularly for a country like Canada which depends so greatly on the export market in so many economic areas. Therefore I make no apology for having said to the president of the CPR when I was a very young man that, if I had the opportunity, I would nationalize his railway. That was said—and I know I should not admit this—in January, 40 years ago. I do not doubt that the CPR will be nationalized eventually, either by my party in power or, to judge from what has happened in past years in many areas, by some other party in power. They will finally recognize the need for it.

In any event, we require an integrated transportation policy that takes into account all four major means of transport; air, road, rail and water. It must integrate these four major means of transport in some meaningful way for all parts of this country, and place all modes of transport under one really effective control, in the hands of government and Parliament through an agency. In this way it will serve the public interest and not be the lobby for the transportation companies that the CTC now is in many respects. In order to have an integrated transportation policy, we must have the courage to take over a large part of the CPR, if not all, in order to take over the profitable as well as the unprofitable, so that we will have public control.

The CPR now has a rail company, airline, more than one bus company, steamships, hotels, trucking services, minerals, oil and gas. Every time officers of the CPR appeared before boards on which I represented labour unions and shed some tears about its awful financial condition, I thought to myself I had not heard a more amusing comedy before and never expected to hear it again. The crocodile tears which the management of the CPR is constantly dropping are just outrageous. It has been a very successful empire. We ought to take over this company and place it under public ownership and control, not for any doctrinaire reason, but in order to integrate our transportation system in all four areas. That is and has been my own personal view for many years. Only in this way can we have a transportation system that will serve the people of Canada well, both now and in the future.

If I remember the order, this bill is scheduled to be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I am sure the members of that committee will be wise and determined enough to call the officers of the CNR and Air Canada to appear before that committee this year, as has been the case in the past. I can assure the House that our members of the committee will demand much better explanations than we have had in the past with regard to the unacceptable reduction in passenger service and the closing of offices and agencies which have taken place throughout Canada, particularly in the prairie provinces. Although I have not looked into the situation, I hope it will also be possible to call spokesmen for the CTC before that committee. I hope the members of the committee from all parties will unitedly tell Mr. Pickersgill and his associates that Canada will no longer accept the reduction in passenger and other services which the railways have undertaken to the detriment of the building of communities, particularly in western Canada.

[Mr. Lewis.]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, following the debate in the House, Bill C-4 will be referred to the Transport and Communications Committee for detailed study. Earlier today, I listened to the comments of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) on the Canadian Pacific, which is a private corporation and Canadian National and Air Canada, which are government corporations.

He admitted that private enterprise makes huge profits on providing the same services as Canadian National while the latter company is calling on us for $210,800,000 to cover its deficit and Air Canada is asking for $114 million. This makes a total of $333 million, a third of a billion dollars, to support public enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, I should readily recognize that railways, Air Canada and other carriers are public services, to be encouraged, supported and improved in order that they may provide services to the whole population of Canada. However, when it comes to saying that we should nationalize private enterprise to improve services, I am not at all in agreement with the hon. member for York South.

According to his theories, to improve the administration of justice and law we should nationalize lawyers, turn them into civil servants, ciphers such as the employees of Canadian National or those of our transportation systems.

Private enterprise proves that it can operate and provide better services at a profit over a given period whereas a public enterprise must provide better service, even without profit. That is public enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, I should advise the Canadian Transport Commission to hire the hon. member for York South and appoint him president of Canadian National at the earliest. It pays better, since he would be getting $100,000 to $125,000 a year. He would be in the right place. Moreover, being so persuasive and so determined and so well informed about nationalization, state control and socialization, he could no doubt, as president of the Canadian National, improve on our present services.

I made a trip to western Canada last year. I went by the Canadian Pacific and came back by the Canadian National. The difference between the two is as great as that between night and day.

On the CP, the service is faultless: good food, good service all the way as far as Victoria or Vancouver.

I came back by the CN, through Edmonton and Saskatoon, through the north. It was completely different. The coaches were dirty; it was easy to see that those responsible were not there; the employees were like people working from 9 to 5; their work was only a job to them. The CN does not have to make profits; we need only vote them some $219 million at the end of the year to make up its deficits.

With all this, we find, as the hon. member was saying a moment ago, that some rail services are abandoned. In my area, the CN has abandoned its Rouyn-Noranda-Taschereau service; the run between Montreal and Quebec, to come back toward Cochrane through the Abitibi region, and Témiscamingue, brings in a profit because of the forestry operations of Domtar at Lebel-sur-Quévillon and the forestry operations in the Lasarre area. The service was improved at the rate of approximately ten miles per year.

In any event, I have known the railway service in that area for at least 35 or 40 years and, instead of 22 hours to go from Montreal to Amos, as was the case in the past, one now needs 18 or 19 hours. That is quite an improvement! The railway track is just about impossible and we do get thrown about; a person lying in bed is sure to remain wide awake, such is the lack of comfort—

An hon. Member: That is right, I have taken that train before!

Mr. Caouette: My colleague from Champlain (Mr. Matte) has taken this train to Abitibi and found that this was the case as far as Parent.

So, tracks are poorly maintained!

At the end of the year, the Directors of the Canadian National—the Administration office—hastened to submit their estimates to us, saying: "We need $125,265,000 for new railway property. This is for new branch lines." Some are being built to connect Rouyn to Taschereau, but others are required for an amount of $19,000,000.

For equipment $44 million are needed; for telecommunications $22,437,000; for hotels $3,026,000.

CNR hotels lose money whereas CP hotels prosper.

Since the private sector prospers, we must nationalize it at once so that it may lose money. That is socialism! That is what elimination of free initiative brings about. If you deprive someone of initiative, you kill him; he is no longer interested in business. On the contrary, if you give him the opportunity to make the most of his talents, to be creative rather than crush him, you allow him to improve the living conditions in a country such as ours. We can see it throughout the world.

The hon. member for York South told us: There is no country in the world where the communication system is not state-owned. I took a train from Moscow to Leningrad in 1965, a state-owned train; it was worse that the old train in Abitibi. Why? Because personal initiative has disappeared; it has been suppressed. No one can set up a railway company today in the USSR, in Czechoslovakia or in any other socialist country in the world. Everything is state-owned. Even the taxi transportation system is state-owned. The cab drivers are civil servants. Everyone is a government employee. The government decides in the place of the individual. This is contrary to common sense!

We should not nationalize the Canadian Pacific; instead, we should sell the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific because the latter operates at a profit. To make up the difference, the government should, while doing its duty, ensure that the means of transport serve the public adequately, not through state gimmicks but by setting up agencies made up of responsible human beings and not "numbers".

Mr. Speaker, I was speaking of the lines the Canadian National had abandoned. A while ago, someone told me that the same company has a reserve fund for its employees; $650 million were taken out of that fund and loaned at 4 per cent to other agencies, there being, it seems, too much money in the fund. However, they forget to raise the pensions of retired employees.

• (1630)

The Canadian National has problems, like every body else. Workers are dismissed after 30 or 40 years of service. They are no longer useful, right. However, the pension system should provide those people with an income equivalent to their former wages, since they have already paid contributions for their years of service. Instead of tampering with their pension fund it should be used for the benefit of those who spent their lives in the service of the Canadian National or other railroad companies.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I feel that Bill C-4 is only a repetition of former bills. Indeed, the Canadian National or Air Canada never show a profit but deficits always while the Canadian Pacific always shows a profit, even with its airlines.

When CP Air was servicing my region why has it been replaced by Air Canada? Air Canada says that this service is not economical and someday it will give it up to Nordair. But why was this run taken away from CP Air if Air CAnada finds it uneconomical? There are three flights a day and the planes seem to be full each time. It is therefore an economical operation and this is why we asked them to improve the service. We are prepared to supply them the funds required provided we have the services in return.

The same thing applies to the CN. We are now voting $219 million in grants to our national railways and this company decides at a given moment to wage unfair competition against the private trucking industry by adopting exceedingly low rates precisely because it is subsidized by the government. We should grant similar amounts to the private sector if we want to have fair competition. But we should not tax the truckers to meet the deficit of a competing CN.

This is unfair and we should be able to establish criteria under which the private sector will not have to pay taxes to offset CN deficits.

To tax the Brazeau Transport Company or the Compagnie de camionnage du Québec to pay CN deficits while it is engaged in the same kind of transportation—even though the member for York South finds nationalization quite fair and even commendable—I maintain this is pure and simple confiscation of private enterprise and an obstacle to normal operations of Canadian transport companies.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues will be following carefully in committee the clause by clause study of this bill so as to determine what is wrong with the operations and with the administration of our national railways and Air Canada. We are not asking for the eliminations of those services. On the contrary, we are prepared to grant the required credits provided however they are supplied. If the credits passed by Parliament are used only to pay senior civil servants or strikers we are not at all interested. These expenses will not be paid by union leaders but by Canadian tax payers.

Then, when we are asked to make up a $219 million deficit, we should understand that it is the result of all the strikes which cost a lot to Canada. Canadian taxpayers pay for that. The hon. member for York South may like it but I do not. That is why we say to union officials: Instead of distributing boxing gloves to Canadian workers, why not try to be peacemakers, so as to enable employees to get along with the employers? Instead of stirring up hatred among classes, why not foster comprehension between workers and employers, who also have problems. Maybe they are not "9 to 5" people, as we call them, but they are up at 7 in the morning, still working at midnight and not paid for overtime. We do not think of that.

People like the hon. member for York South protest against exploiters, against private enterprise. Most private enterprise owners in Canada get a smaller net income than the hon. member for York South. It is easy to be a socialist at $100,000 or $50,000 a year. But when the owner of a small grocery store who works very hard to earn $15,000 or $20,000 a year is being told: My boy, the minimum hourly wage of your employees is $2, or else you will be fined, he is in danger of going bankrupt because we look upon him as an exploiter. It is easy for people with annual salaries of $50,000 or $100,000 to tell people getting $20,000: You are an exploiter, you destroy small wage earners.

Mr. Speaker, there should be a limit to riduculing people and belittling their personal initiative, then trying to control everything through government action. Canadians do not want the government to poke its nose into all their personal affairs. The less nosing on the part of the government, the better it will be unless one is a socialist as in that case people probably lose courage. They say to the government: Make the decisions for me. Take my salary! Spend it the way you like and let me know what is left for me at the end.

As I have already said: let us continue to live in the present system. We will be heading towards socialism. Twenty years ago, I said: "Within 10 or 20 years, when you receive your pay cheques, the cheque stub will be at least twice as long as the cheque itself". This is what is happening today. The cheque stub is at least twice as long as the cheque itself which means that so much money is deducted for unemployment insurance, so much for provincial and federal taxes, medical insurance, old age pension, union dues and super annuation, to the extent that the cheque stub is very long.

Within the next ten years, we will only receive the stub to acquaint us with the way the government has spent our pay cheque. We will then have complete socialism and the government will decide for us.

This is exactly what is happening, Mr. Speaker, because we are witnessing the establishment of programs such as this one, a nationalization program, a government system under which we are asked to pay for deficits year after year.

I agree that we pay for deficits in order to obtain services, but I notice that services are being reduced while deficits keep increasing. This is what I find unnatural. Let us increase services, let us improve them and pay for them. I quite agree, for this is absolutely natural—but let us not pretend as we are doing at present.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Speaker, in this bill we are asked to vote $333 million for the operation of our transportation system which is related to the government and is a nationalized enterprise.

As far as private enterprise is concerned, we do not hear of the Canadian Pacific Railways asking for any money to make up its deficits. No, that company makes profits. As I was saying at the beginning, rather than abolishing the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is a profitable operation, let us sell the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific Railways; this way, it could be that next year we will have saved $219 million on what we are spending this year, and that this company will help the Canadian National to make profits.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and myself advocate solutions designed to remedy this situation. We are quite aware that we have to pay for services. We do not object to this, but let us improve services to the same extent that we have to pay for deficits. Covering the deficits will then allow for the development of real services for the greater well-being of the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in this debate, which is more a discussion of our transportation problems and ills, a subject that will be explored very thoroughly by the committee. This debate is particularly well timed, since just a few days ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) and the appropriate provincial authorities announced the final decision on the location of a new airport facility for the central Ontario region, particularly the Toronto-centred region, as well as an improvement in the air terminal facilities in southern Ontario.

My riding is specifically affected because part of the new airport proper is to be in my constituency; indeed, a lot of the flight patterns will be over a great part of my constituency. In view of this I am now beginning to come to grips in a very real way with the problems that a major airport causes the residents of a delightful part of Ontario that is close to metropolitan Toronto. Some rather serious problems will have to be faced by some. Although I am sure these will be resolved to the extent that that is possible, it does not detract from the fact that wherever an airport is sited there is some disruption caused local residents.

In this particular case I think all agree, in fairness, that a wiser selection could not have been made, and I think the co-operation between the federal government and the provincial government was the key to making certain that a wise decision was made. I say that with a little bit of sadness because I, myself, am not happy, quite frankly, that the new airport is to be located in part of my riding. But the people of York North are sensible people, particularly at election time, and they realize that such a decision would affect some people no matter where the airport had been located. They are not happy that they are the people affected, but they are counting on me and many others to make certain that its major effects are mitigated.

This is a time for us to think of what we must face in terms of transportation. We cannot think of transportation in terms of airports alone but rather as a total concept, in terms of the social and economic impact that a major transportation facility has on the country.

Shortly after I entered this House in November 1968, I made a speech on somewhat the same subject as this, and I note that the other day the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) also had something to say on the matter. I have been doing some work on a more comprehensive transportation plan because I feel we should be thinking in terms of where we go from here. We have an air plan that should satisfy our needs for the next 20 years or so, but we must look far beyond that. To think that the present concept is the answer to our transportation problem is not good enough.

I should like to suggest a logical projection of our transportation requirements over the next two or three decades beyond the time when this new facility will be well in use and perhaps overloaded. I take into consideration the natural industrial development areas and the need to remove the growth pressures from our major cities. Included in this proposal, and the key to it, is the accelerating growth of air transport for both goods and people. The result of my studies would be a major air terminal approximately midway between Toronto and Montreal, serviced by high speed surface transport joining these two cities and the air terminal. Such a transportation corridor would spawn planned residential and industrial communities along its route. The consequence should be a growing interdependence between French and English speaking Canada. Its immediate effect should be to capture the imagination of Canadians and focus their thinking toward the next 20 to 30 years which would be required to complete the first stages of this plan which I propose to outline. Even this time frame would require the earliest possible commitment to the concept, not to the program but to the concept.

Ste Scholastique and the new Toronto region airport should satisfy our air transport terminal requirements for close to a generation. Projections for the future indicate a sharp increase in air travel surpassing any growth we have seen since World War II. A substantially greater growth curve is indicated for air cargo. While these projections are difficult to make, and I am trying to get some more enlightened projections, I think they are important indeed. In spite of larger aircraft, the volume of traffic itself will present problems of air and noise pollution, safety and physical handling of both people and goods which will dwarf present considerations. One answer is to provide a major facility roughly equidistant between Toronto and Montreal which will alleviate the congestion and environmental problems which plague areas within a wide radius of any major airport.

The Kingston area appears to have many advantages. It is roughly equidistant and it already possesses the basic infrastructure of a major community. To the south is Lake Ontario and to the north vast areas with relatively sparse population. The environmental consequences of increased air traffic will be minimal relative to other areas. It is possible that the existing air base at Trenton has many of the same advantages and a great advantage is that it exists, if not equidistant. It could conceivably be an alternative site.

While it is difficult to project technological development in the aero-space field, it may be assumed that air vehicles will increase in size, and long range flights of transcontinental and transocean traffic will increase at the greatest rate. Indeed, it is an integral part of this concept to reduce a major segment of the short haul air traffic. The balance of short haul traffic could continue to be handled at existing airports already adjacent to the major urban areas. The key to an airport facility remote from the major cities is high speed ground transportation enabling passengers to reach the airport or their ultimate destination in the minimum possible time. For practical purposes, this should be under one hour: distance itself is not the factor, but time is.

The suggested location is in the 150 to 175 mile range for both Toronto and Montreal. It therefore follows that average ground speeds in excess of 200 miles per hour will be necessary for the ground transport. Existing technology to achieve these speeds in comfort already exists. Prototype development is under way in France, Germany and Japan, while promising research is being undertaken in the U.S. and even Canada, if one wishes to include the CN-United Aircraft Turbotrain. The Germans, particularly, have some new technology which is interesting according to my studies.

It can reasonably be assumed that satisfactory resolution of the technical difficulties involved in this development will be accomplished before this proposal is at the implementation stage. The technology is there now and prototypes are under way. It is certainly within our capacity. It is likely that the commitment to this project will accelerate development, and it is possible that Canada could concentrate a significant portion of its research and development activity in this very field.

In a country as large and as sparsely settled as is Canada, transportation is as vital to its growth as it was when our present railways were conceived. Indeed, it is the same type of vision and commitment which is called for at this time. I am just reading Pierre Berton's book on the building of the CPR, and it is interesting to see an example of this type of vision. I hope we do not experience the politics or the business practices engaged in at that time, but there certainly was a great deal of vision. However, it was not a Liberal government in office at that time, so I am sure things would be better today.

Our existing rail beds would provide the essential right-of-way. It would be necessary to improve these substantially, but as new high speed ground transport is unlikely to utilize conventional trackage, this would be an integral part of the development. The important consideration is that the right-of-way exists, though some deviation might prove necessary, and the use of elevated or underground systems in whole, or in part, cannot be rejected. It is possible that the system could involve all three levels, that is, ground, underground and elevated. Propulsion could range from diesel to nuclear, jet to vacuum, and possibly gravitational, but this I leave to the scientists.

With the ability to reach a midway point between Montreal and Toronto in less than one hour, it will be possible to continue via surface transport between these cities in approximately two hours, or slightly more when intermediate stops are taken into consideration. When transport to and from airports is considered, it presently takes in excess of this time to complete an inter-city trip by air.

With high speed surface transport terminating in central areas of the cities and tying into existing and projected subway facilities, it is reasonable to assume that travellers would use the ground facility for the entire journey and at considerable benefit in time, comfort and convenience. I cannot give the precise percentages at this time, but a significant percentage of the take-offs and landings in both Toronto and Montreal are for flights between these points. By putting these travellers back on the ground, a considerable amount of air traffic would be eliminated. With the relief of this pressure on our airports, the growth of other short-haul traffic, that is, New York, Chicago, Winnipeg, Quebec, Halifax, Ottawa, Boston, Windsor, London, etc. could well be accommodated with existing facilities such as Dorval, Ste Scholastique, Malton and the new Toronto region airport.

Curfew regulations applicable at airports adjacent to cities are a major social and economic consideration. These may be substantially relaxed or eliminated at a more remote location. It is likely that noise levels will be significantly reduced or noise eliminated by the time a concept such as this reaches fruition. With or without the noise consideration, air congestion and ground facilities would be under-utilized during the hours from midnight to seven or eight a.m. The elimination of curfews would enable 24 hour operation with cargo aircraft being accommodated during the low passenger traffic hours.

It must be assumed that the airport would not be located immediately adjacent to the city of Kingston itself, but could be as close as ten to 25 miles, the latter figure being preferable. Major residential development within a radius of perhaps up to 25 miles of the airport would be curtailed.

A further development would be the use of cargo containers which could be accommodated by regular aircraft and the high speed surface vehicles. This has been done successfully for water/rail transport and could be readily adapted to air/rail. It is another area for Canadian research and development.

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Trade; the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—Health; the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn)—Indian Affairs.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely Notices of Motions and Public Bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR RESEARCH ON WASTE DISPOSAL METHODS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should initiate a national research and development program in respect of methods of proper and economic solid-waste disposal, including studies directed to the conservation of natural resources by reducing the amount of waste and unsalvageable materials and by recovery and utilization of potential resources in solid wastes; and provide technical and financial assistance to provincial and municipal governments and multi-governmental agencies in the planning, development, and conduct of solid-waste disposal programs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity of once again bringing to the attention of hon. members a problem which I have pointed out on two prior occasions on a private member's notice of motion. I am pleased to see the interest that is usually exhibited when I bring it back, and I know that government members will of course have some constructive criticism to offer of this motion. They may also raise some points which have made it necessary to move in this area to a greater extent than has been the case in the past.

My motion perhaps could be broken down into three parts. I say there should be initiated a national research and development program in respect of methods of proper and economic solid waste disposal. I see nothing wrong with the suggestion made, because obviously we are all in favour of pollution control. It is pollution control I am talking about, while at the same time having the opportunity to reclaim waste and turn it into a profit. I believe this is the sort of thing we are interested in because obviously, as has been stated, the United States spends billions of dollars to bury waste materials while at the same time millions of dollars could be reclaimed if only we had a co-ordinated effort to ascertain what type of material could be reclaimed, whether it is economically feasible to do so, and whether in fact there is a market for it. Notwithstanding how small the market may be, I would still impress upon the government the fact that this is an area in which we should not be concerned about an overall profit but rather whether, in fact, it is feasible to become involved in the reclamation of waste whereby we, in turn, attempt to reduce the ever-growing pollution.

Secondly, I should like someone to indicate whether, in fact, studies are to be undertaken. I know now that, as a result of governments having had the opportunity to do much of the research in certain areas, it is time that the type of research of which I am speaking now should be undertaken by the private sector. In this way we would be able to make some use, and good use, of the special talents required for a problem which faces us now and, perhaps at the same time, relieve the unemployment situation as it relates to those of higher learning at this particular time. When I receive letters from persons who possess Ph.D's who tell me they cannot acquire work, then I believe there is something wrong with our system. They should at least be given an opportunity to further their education by attempting to bring about solutions to problems which at this particular time have been practically untouched by the federal level of government. I say this with a great deal of respect because I feel that, in order to pacify those who believe we are not involved with this matter, the federal government must step in, even though someone will tell me it is a provincial matter, in order to give us some idea whether or not this is a matter of high priority.

The last time this subject was brought to our attention, I asked some questions which were placed on the order paper. I asked which department, if any, bears primary responsibility for the development of research or demonstration projects to deal with solid waste disposal. Then, as a second question, I asked on what dates and by whom were recommendations made to the Department of National Health and Welfare advocating research studies into the problem of solid-waste disposal as indicated by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance on December 14, 1970 in Hansard at page 2026-2027. As I understand the answer, it is anticipated that the new Department of the Environment will bear primary responsibility for the development of research or demonstration projects to deal with solid-waste disposal. This reply was tabled through the courtesy of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) on January 25, 1971. I should like to know, in fact, what the department is doing in terms of the suggestions I have placed before it. In Hamilton we have tried to make strides in this area by having a form of pulverizer which, as I understand it, has been a welcome addition to the waste disposal facilities.

Let me point out that in 1960, as reported in the Hamilton Spectator sometime in 1971, Hamilton threw away about 185,000 tons of garbage. In 1971 there were some 285,000 tons. This is an increase from 625 pounds per person in the 1960's to 700 pounds per person at the present stage. I think what I am concerned about is the lack of appreciation of the problems being faced by municipalities, because obviously they do not have the money to make the capital expenditure required for the type of project necessary to ascertain just which type of solid-waste disposal method is acceptable, feasible or economical. It is in this area that my motion indicates we should be providing technical and financial assistance to provincial governments, municipal governments and multi-governmental agencies in the planning and development of solid-waste disposal programs.

Lately, the province of Ontario has commissioned people of some expertise on this subject. They brought out a report in February of 1971. The authors of this report were Professors Clark and Brown, the former a chemical engineer and the latter a mineral engineer, both of whom are pursuing their professions at Queen's University in Canada. I was very impressed by the conclusion reached in the report regarding the recommendations. One of their recommendations should perhaps solidify our thinking in terms of the importance of the need for action. The report is entitled Municipal Waste Disposal, Problem or Opportunity. It reads in part:

> The current problem of solid waste disposal should be regarded as an opportunity for Canadian originality and foresight to develop the means for conserving natural resources, preserving the environment and demonstrating that organizations, communities and individuals can effectively co-operate in a common cause.

I find that the conclusions reached in this very candid and very important exposé are very disturbing because it was just published in February 1971. With your patience, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote at some length from the report. It reads:

> It is found that Canada has lagged the United States both in terms of legislation and the investigation of the disposal and treatment of municipal wastes. Data on the nature and quantity of municipal wastes is not available and no methods other than the traditional means of burial or incineration have been employed in Canada. Furthermore there is no organization in Canada which currently serves as an authoritative source of knowledge; neither is there a centre of research and development in this field. The newly created Waste Management Branch in Ontario has the authority to develop and provide these services but it is so understaffed and inadequately funded that its work is almost solely concerned with the immediate and urgent problems associated with the implementation of the Waste Management Act. Such is the state of the art in Canada.
> The "art" is developing very rapidly in the United States and in other countries. Many new processes are being developed and the phenomena of solid waste generation and its implications are receiving considerable attention.

• (1710)

That is my point, and I will repeat the last sentence I quoted:

> Many new processes are being developed and the phenomena of solid waste generation and its implications are receiving considerable attention.

Is this the position in Canada? My motion seems to be well accepted by members on both sides of the House. This is not a political matter, but one about which we should show deep concern to the point where members on the other side of the House are ready to make recommendations to the government, particularly with respect to the assistance that is required by municipalities and provincial governments to enable them to conduct more research into this problem. Then, at least we would not be waiting for conclusions to be reached by other jurisdictions in order that we could move into the area ourselves.

It has been stated that we are burying ourselves in our own garbage. I note, too, that an article has been written by Mr. Gordon Sutin entitled "The Case for Pulverization of Solid Wastes" printed in October, 1970 in "Public Works, City, County and State". I was impressed with what he had to say and, with the indulgence of my colleagues, I should like to quote as follows:

> While incineration appears to offer the ultimate solution to the problem of disposing of solid wastes, it is a fact of life that many smaller communities cannot generate the capital to build the necessary facilities. This suggests, of course, that smaller communities should band together for the construction of one large regional incinerator, one plant to serve a number of municipalities. However, this again poses the problem of capital investment to establish and operate transfer stations.

What I am attempting to do this afternoon is to bring home the importance of the need for our continual involvement and appreciation of the problems of pollution, which are increasing because of our increasing population, and because of the fact that many people, rather than saving things and using them over and over again, are now discarding all materials of consumption in an accelerated fashion. I should like to point to three recommendations which Messrs. Clark and Brown brought to the attention of the Ontario government. I do not think that we can differentiate between the jurisdictions because the problems that they have brought to our attention and on which they have made recommendations apply equally to the federal government. The first one reads as follows:

Immediate attention should be given to the co-ordination of the activities of all branches of the government concerned in the solid waste field, recognizing that integration of the processes to treat and dispose of these wastes might be achieved and that investigatory studies may have implications and benefits of common concern.

Another one reads:

Every attempt should be made to concentrate the research and development activities so as to provide for the eventual establishment of a centre for study and research.

One may think that this would be under the jurisdiction of the provincial government, but it is not in fact. I think we have a role to play in terms of leadership, money, research and assistance to municipalities and provinces.

Another important recommendation that was made is one which I hope the government has pursued in the past, and I hope we will hear about it from some members on the government side. It reads:

Data on the requirements, limitations and potentials of the various waste disposal systems should be made available to the public and to municipal officers on a continuing basis.

Another recommendation reads as follows:

Appropriate prototype facilities for a reclamation process should be established in such a location that the development of the process can be fostered and studied and under such conditions that the knowledge generated can be made readily available to all communities.

It seems to me that those recommendations can certainly be understood, accepted and implemented by the federal government, if in fact we are concerned about what is becoming a problem of ever increasing importance.

This is the third time that I have risen and spoken on this matter, and I will continue to do so. I know that the government has attempted to pay lip service to the motion that I have put forward on three occasions, but I do not think we have been doing enough. I think that pollution in all its aspects is an extremely serious problem. I am ready to accept that our young people are looking for answers to the various aspects of pollution which they find so unacceptable.

Mr. Cullen: The old people, too.

Mr. Alexander: Let us say, everybody. Perhaps I should not have singled out any one group in the country, because I think all of us are extremely concerned about the adverse effects of the different kinds of pollution of air, water, noise.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member wants to be included.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Alexander: Yes, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), who is the parliamentary secretary to some minister who is not quite doing his job, wants to be included. It is always nice to have his interjections.

In conclusion I would like to state that the over-all nature of the problem is such that attention should be drawn to it. I should like to point out two or three other recommendations on which I am sure the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton will wish to comment eventually so he might as well start writing now. Attention should be given to:

The improvement of organization and systemization of the waste material outflow portion of our consuming society,

The improvement of technology dealing with this outflow and with the separate steps of collecting, processing and disposing, and

The adoption of practices and policies that will close the loop between the materials consumption and the waste production parts of our society so that decisions relative to consumption will consider the waste product problem.

I do not think I can add any more at this time except to express the hope that when members rise to speak, particularly members on the other side, they will not turn this into a partisan issue since I did not until the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton interjected, but rather will offer some constructive criticisms and an appreciation of the intention behind this third attempt to bring this subject before the House for the consideration of hon. members.

• (1720)

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): History may well record that the beginning of the decade of the seventies marked the turning point in man's use and abuse of the precious planet earth. In Canada, governments at all levels are becoming more and more aware that the biosphere is a closed system in which all things are recycled and re-used in support of the life process. Man, as a part of this closed life system, is dependent on it for his survival. Of all the living things, man alone is capable of consciously co-operating with nature to ensure his survival and progress.

Environmental modifications, which have accompanied our good yet shortsighted intentions of minimizing the spread of disease and maximizing the consumption of our raw resources, have had a global impact on human health and welfare. This has led our society to the discovery that we are dependent on, and part of, an ecosystem that we did not invent and must not destroy.

In this respect the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has given a very interesting, provocative and intelligent presentation to the House today. I commend him on his choice of subject matter. But as is usual, although the problems were raised, no suggestions for their solution were really presented. I intend to present what I believe are constructive suggestions that will help to solve the problems.

The hon. member suggested that we establish a research council of some kind, and that we spend many millions of dollars, at least that is what I believe it will cost, to gather civil servants and representatives of universities and industry together in such a research institute. I do not believe this would be an answer to the problem, for the simple reason that we live beside the most powerful nation in the world, the most industrially advanced, and the most technologically advanced nation in the world.

I submit that there is a germ of a good idea in the speech made by the hon. member for Hamilton West, but I repeat that I do not think the real solution lies in establishing the kind of research institute he advocated. I believe we should be gathering information from the United States, a country which has many large, burgeoning cities that are coping with pollution problems. In this respect I think of the cities of Pittsburgh, Detroit and Buffalo. I believe we should ask them to share with us the know-how that they are developing in solving these problems because they have more cash to work with, and more expertise available to them than we have. In addition, they have ten times as many people working on these problems as we could afford. I believe that at this stage we would be well advised to pick the best advice we can get from our great neighbour to the south, and I believe our great neighbour is ready to help us, particularly in light of our good relations with the United States.

I believe that we could send a small task force to the United States to gather information there. Pollution is a continental problem. The Americans are friendly to us when dealing with such matters. When presented with a joint problem such as we had during the Second World War, the Americans co-operated with us. They co-operated with us in the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway, and I am confident that thanks to the good neighbour policy that still exists between Canada and the United States, they will help us in coping with the enormous problem of pollution.

Canada has taken constructive action in attempting to clean up the Great Lakes, in co-operation with the United States. However, I believe we must extend our efforts to reach across the border and create dynamic dialogue, not only with congressmen, senators and mayors in the border states, but also with the people who reside along the Great Lakes in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, 1972 is the year that the great environmental conference is to be held in Stockholm. In my opinion, it is vital that Canadian views be expressed at all levels of contact with the United States of America, and dialogue should proceed immediately to achieve an exchange of views with people in Buffalo, Detroit and other large U.S. cities, dialogue that will encompass people in Canadian cities like Toronto, Sarnia, Sudbury and Hamilton.

The Great Lakes can be saved for present use and for future generations. The time has come for instant and immediate discussions. I welcome the action taken by the federal government to date in substantially reducing pollution on the Canadian side of Lake Erie. The challenge now is not to attack the U.S. people but to persuade our giant neighbour to the south to take action at all levels of government, management, labour and the public. I believe that a conference attended by the heads of our two nations would be beneficial to this cause. I urge that serious consideration be given to the idea of establishing a system to curb pollution of the Great Lakes. I suggest that the International Joint Commission be given power, by international treaty, to recommend anti-pollution directives, to be delivered and publicized to polluters on both sides of the border.

I believe in the principle that the polluter must pay. I also believe that on both sides of the border we have been lax in finding a means of sending the polluter a bill for payment, with the alternative of an injunction order backed up by international agreement to enforce such measures. This could all be worked out under the aegis of the International Joint Commission.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I was rather in despair during my first year as a member of the House of Commons. We questioned officials of the International Joint Commission who appeared before the Standing Committee on External Affairs when it was considering the estimates of the Commission. I gathered the impression from them that they did not want to rock the boat. I gathered the impression that they did not want to accept any real responsibility. They simply wanted to express opinions on how things could be changed, but they did not want the responsibility for cleaning up the Great Lakes. They did not want the responsibility of sending a bill to anyone for payment. I believe they should be engaged in drawing up a constructive program to stop this pollution. I want in some small way to accelerate the process because we simply cannot allow the pollution of the Great Lakes to continue.

I believe that when the United States finally gets around to doing something about the matter, it will proceed to do so very rapidly. I believe that our role should be that of a catalyst, pumping enthusiasm into the great nation to our south, discussing this question at all levels and all ages.

The greatest factor causing pollution in Hamilton harbour is waste from the city. The secondary stage of its sewage treatment system has been reached in Hamilton, thanks to co-operation at all levels of government. Part of this system has been paid for by federal funds. Once the system is fully developed, a great percentage of the pollution in Hamilton Bay will be removed for all time. Industry is partly responsible for the pollution, but industry is playing a large part in anti-pollution measures. Both the huge steel companies there, the Steel Company of Canada and the Dominion Foundries and Steel Company are spending vast sums of money on pollution control. I believe they should be encouraged.

Further, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary that all parties realize that the residents of Hamilton Beach must be protected from continuing pollution hazards. I am confident that they will soon see happier days with the possible development of park lands for the use of people in that immediate area.

In closing I reiterate that the hon. member for Hamilton West has raised an extremely interesting matter. I think he was deficient in presenting solutions. I think the Canadian role today should be that of a catalyst, to inspire and work with the Americans in bringing about reforms in the field of pollution.

• (1730)

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I think the notice of motion before the House is a good one. It deals with a request to set up more research facilities in Canada in an effort to overcome some of the severe pollution problems facing the nation. Although we are able to discuss only briefly some of the many things which ought to be done to remedy this situation, I nevertheless am pleased because the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has brought this matter before the House and thereby has given us an opportunity to say publicly a few words on it.

To begin with, I presume that the motion is drafted in its present language because not sufficient research has been done in Canada or any other nation along the lines suggested by the motion. I could not agree more with that presumption, Mr. Speaker. Here we are, asking for a research development program to be set up with definite guidelines. In that connection may I say that my party has for a long time proposed the setting up of an environmental council of Canada. Such an environmental council should, in my view, be established along the lines of the Economic Council of Canada. They would be non-political. We would pick some of the most able people in Canada to sit on the council. They would report to Canada—every year, I presume—and outline the environmental problems which Canadians should meet. They would criticize, if necessary, any lack of program or policy on the part of the federal or provincial government—those governments which are supposed to be taking care of this problem.

I suggest that the need for research in Canada is urgent, just as it is in many nations of the world. A large number of articles and books have been written by people trained in this field. Some of them are biologists who have spent their lives studying the food chain, and so on, and they have indicated that we cannot continue along the lines we are following today and that we must take drastic action. Mr. Speaker, the proper action must be devised by those who have the expertise and training necessary to give us guidance in this field.

The notice of motion mentions solid-waste disposal. Although there is a host of pollutants in the world, I should like to deal briefly with solid-waste disposal and demonstrate the need for a plan to recycle all these solid wastes so that we can obtain from what is now waste material minerals and other materials which will assist in the industrial processes of the future. May I point something out before I go any further. I believe that three factors are invariably involved in research into pollution. One of those is population, the other resource development, and the third, of course, pollution itself. You cannot separate those factors, Mr. Speaker.

Canada, in common with other nations, will in the near future need to formulate a population control program. We must sit down and discover what will happen if the world in which we live becomes overpopulated. Information currently available tells me that by the year 2000, which is just 28 years from 1972, the population of this world will double. What will this mean? It means this: If the population doubles, the volume of material goods which the people of the world will need will also double. We shall need many more motor cars, colleges, schools, doctors, and so on. Vastly increased amounts of raw material will be dug out from our store-house of treasure in the earth, a store-house which the world holds, if the burgeoning population is to maintain standards of living that we currently enjoy. Many say that we cannot indefinitely go on as at present: there is a limit to how much food we can raise in the world and to the resources which can be made available for the use of individuals. Before we reach this limit, what must we do? First, I think all countries of the world, perhaps through the United Nations, will have to set out some kind of population policy and try to stabilize world population through a host of processes which I will not go into now.

If I may return to the subject of minerals, Mr. Speaker, a number of minerals throughout the globe are already in short supply. So far no plan has been made by Canada or by any country of the world, that I know of, to ration the mineral resources of this world so that those who come after us will have something to use. So far, nothing has been done to establish a program for reclaiming certain waste materials. This notice of motion suggests that more research be applied to the subject we are considering so that we may return to the economy—return to society, if you like—many minerals which today are wasted. I could think of all kinds of garbage dumps where minerals are being wasted. Commodities made of minerals are just thrown to one side, covered over with dirt, and left. Sometimes they are dumped in the ocean or the lakes and are destroyed.

Not only Canada and the United States, but other nations of the world are conducting research into this question in an effort to determine which materials can be recycled. We can all learn from these efforts and we should pool all this knowledge and the results of research. Perhaps an agency for receiving and disseminating knowledge in this field should be set up through the United Nations.

This spring, Mr. Speaker, there is to be a meeting in Sweden sponsored by the United Nations. All nations belonging to the UN organization will be invited to look into the problem we are now discussing—pollution and its effect on the ocean, air and life in general. I therefore hope that we will devise a plan of action for undertaking the necessary research in this field in order that we may solve the problem of solid-waste disposal and attempt to put most wasted materials back into use.

To show the seriousness of the problem, may I quote a few figures. It is useless ducking our heads in the sand and saying that eventually, if we dump wastes and solids somewhere, nature will look after them and break them down into their original elements. This will not happen, for pollution has become too serious a problem in Canada and every other nation of the world. The survey I am about to refer to was made in 1969. One might say that a survey taken two years ago was taken long ago, and so it was. Nevertheless, the situation is even worse now, simply because the so-called standard of living of people is rising rapidly. We have reached the stage where people can buy goods in containers that can be thrown away or discarded. This just adds to our pollution problem.

• (1740)

In this article they stated that the experts felt the problem of pollution and recycling required a radical change in patterns of consumption and disposal. I do not think anyone in this House would disagree with that statement.

They stated they checked with a number of large cities in the United States. Time does not permit me to give all the data. However, this is very interesting and is something which I think closely parallels the Canadian way of life. In talking about the United States, they said:

> Every man, woman and child in the country, on average is now generating more than five pounds of refuse a day—household, commercial, and industrial ... but excluding ... agricultural waste.

We find that in 1969—two years ago—every individual in the United States had every day of his life five pounds of refuse credited to him. When you multiply that by the over 200 million people in the United States, it represents a vast tonnage of refuse per year that has to be thrown away. The problem has become almost insurmountable in so far as municipalities and local agencies are concerned. Again talking about the United States, the waste includes, and I quote:

> That adds up to more than a ton per person per year ... It includes 30 million tons of paper, more than 4 million tons of plastic, 48 billion cans and 26 billions bottles and jars.

That is what they are trying to get rid of each and every year in the United States. The problem of pollution has become so immense that it is no wonder there is talk about recycling. The article continues:

> Collection and disposal facilities already are staggering under the load, which is increasing rapidly.
> "The major metropolitan areas are standing in front of an avalanche" ... and it's threatening to bury them."

The article points out that some of the larger cities are now planning to carry their refuse by train hundreds of miles away from the city centres. In fact, one city is planning to haul the garbage over 250 miles by train and dumping it in a desert area away from the burgeoning populations of the future. All they are doing is transferring the problem from one area to another. The answer to this question is not to take the refuge and dump it on somebody else's doorstep or in another area, although this might stall the problem for a short period of time. The answer is to find some method of recycling all the materials we have. This would be achieved by the type of research which the hon. member for Hamilton West indicates in his motion.

There is much more I would like to talk about, but the time allotted to me is running out. I am certain other hon. members want to speak on this subject. In conclusion, I would like to say that one of the weaknesses of this administration—and I might say that this is political—is that we have never had an environmental policy put to this House or the people of Canada. We need this type of policy. We must know what we intend to do about pollution. What shall we do about resource development, population, and management in the future? What are the plans for development of urban areas? Shall we concentrate more and more on the bigger cities and bypass other areas of Canada? If the plan is to set up a mid-Canada corridor or create cities and industries outside the current, large urban centres, now is the time to do it.

We have not had such a prediction from this government. At no time has there been an environmental policy concerning what we shall do and how we will conserve our resources. I add to the motion that I think research can solve this problem and at least give us a goal or goals toward which the municipalities, provinces and the federal government can aim in the years ahead.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, unhappily, this motion puts the truth to the criticism with which lawyers are always charged, namely, the motion is too verbose, it does not hit the point and grammatically it leaves a lot to be desired. Fortunately, the hon. member who moved the motion had an opportunity to spend 20 minutes explaining what he was trying to say in about ten lines of the motion. Also, it seems he feels we are entering into a political atmosphere, because when one endeavours to make a polite interjection to indicate that not only the young people of Canada but all people of Canada are concerned about pollution, this is a political interjection. If the hon. member is so thin-skinned, he had better thicken his skin because the interjections will get rougher from this point.

Mr. Alexander: You can say that again.

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member may have a lot more time after the next election to be worried about the situation in Hamilton and to be a little more parochial. I do not think anyone can argue with the position put forward by the hon. member. The point he is trying to make is good. However, I would have liked him to have zeroed in on one area. In the limited time we have, it is impossible for him or any member of this House to do justice to this motion.

The disposal of solid waste is one of the great problems that faces each municipality, province and Canada as a whole. On a more parochial level, there were two gentlemen who did not wait for government grants or initiative. They saw the problem locally and decided to do something about it. The problem was the disposal of solid chemical waste. Mr. Stanley and Mr. Harry Goodfellow tried to find some method of disposing of chemical waste. They were successful.

When the hon. member for Hamilton West talks about coming up with something that is not only good for the standpoint of pollution control but economically feasible, he makes a good point.

The gentlemen to whom I have referred formed a corporation called Goodfellow Enterprises. Subsequently, Canadian Industries Limited looked into this project, saw that it was good and would be a money-maker. They recently purchased this company and will be getting into this field. It is that kind of initiative that has made Canada great—not the handing out of government loans and government grants all the time, but seeing the problem and doing something about it.

I have done a fair amount of research on this subject. One always hesitates to put forward his views because I am sure the hon. member will agree that when you rise in the House of Commons to talk about pollution control the tendency is to say, "No wonder he talks about this: he is from Sarnia," or, "from Hamilton." In this way we give our communities a bad name which they do not deserve, whereas in point of fact we can see the problem developing and are trying to nip it in the bud. In Sarnia we welcomed the Lambton Industrial Society which is looking into all areas of pollution. They endeavoured to put their collective brains together to see if there was some way in this area to cut down air pollution caused by coal burning which has a higher sulphur content.

• (1750)

There are four general categories of solid waste—municipal, industrial, agricultural and mineral. It is my impression that major studies have been concerned primarily with municipal waste, the refuse produced by households and commerce which eventually finds its way to the public dump. Because this waste is so visible, attention is focused on it and other wastes do not receive the same measure of attention. However, it should be noted that in terms of tonnage, mining and industrial waste is astronomical by comparison with municipal waste. For example, in Canada in 1970, mining operations produced 440 million tons of solid waste, and agricultural waste totalled 150 million tons. Municipal waste accounted for only 17 million tons during the same period. I use the word "only" because of the huge amounts produced by other sources.

Municipal solid waste—garbage, in plain language—is anything that is deposited in a garbage can and a good many items that are not. It includes, in addition to everyday refuse such as potato-peelings, paper, rags, packages and old clothing, items such as junk furniture, worn out appliances, the refuse of industry and the debris from construction projects. Attempts recently have been made in Ottawa to recycle the discarded paper which accumulates in household waste. I hope they continue and that they will prove successful, because while the composition of refuse by weight varies from city to city, a typical Canadian or American municipal refuse accumulation contains 59 per cent paper. The remainder would be in roughly the following proportions: 10 per cent wood, lawn and garden waste; 9 per cent food waste; 8.5 per cent glass, other ceramics and ash; 7.5 per cent metal and 6 per cent clothes, rags, plastic, rubber and leather.

The hon. member who spoke before me suggested we should explore more vigorously the possibilities of deriving some benefit from waste. We might, for instance, find some use for tailings which are piled up around mining communities. Perhaps we could find a way of getting iron out of the slag dumps. This can be done at the present time but it is not feasible from an economic point of view. It is not right to suggest that no research work is carried out in this field. Before the war, research was being carried out in this connection, to my personal knowledge.

Who generates municipal waste? Everyone is responsible for generating refuse. It is produced constantly, day in and day out. It is produced by office workers, homemakers, factory workers, shopkeepers, farmers—virtually by everybody. The affluent produce more trash than the poor. The amount of garbage generated by Canadians in 1970 averaged 4.3 lbs. per person per day, a total of 1,580 lbs. per person per year. It is estimated that the average United States citizen generates 1,800 lbs. of solid waste per year, while in backward India the figure is about 200 lbs. Generally, everyday household trash goes into the garbage can for collection by the city through the agency of private sanitation companies. Business and industry usually arrange for a special refuse removal at their own expense. Regardless of how or where it is produced, virtually all refuse ends up as land-fill or in the incinerator.

It has been suggested, and the motion before us suggests, that the problem of dealing effectively with solid waste has now reached crisis proportions. Even if this is not the case at the moment, the stark statistic introduced by the hon. member who preceded me, namely, that the world's population will double by the year 2,000, is enough to convince anyone that the time to begin working very hard to eliminate the pollution threat through recycling and other means, is now.

Mr. Alexander: So it is not a bad motion after all.

Mr. Cullen: It is not a bad motion. It is poorly worded and it is hard to know where the hon. member is placing his emphasis. Maybe the next time he brings it forward he will concentrate on one or two particular areas.

Mr. Alexander: Read my other speeches which contained more statistics.

Mr. Cullen: I did. The hon. member said we should not lay blame in any one direction; that we should not be attacking the government but that we should examine all the areas involved. Yet when his remarks were interrupted by a polite interjection he sank to political partisanship which is unbecoming.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: We are not faced with a sudden crisis. Garbage has been around as long as mankind, ever since the Stone Age. The difficulty is that in the more congested, more sophisticated societies, it is not so easy to avoid the problems it creates. We cannot avoid it or walk away from it. Some time ago members of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development had an opportunity to visit an Indian community which was established in the Northwest Territories at about the turn of the century. As a result of the build-up of hunting and household wastes during all those years, a pollution situation had developed. The department concluded that the population of the village ought to be moved from that particular site and consultation began with the Indians to see how their removal from this unhealthy site could best be arranged.

So it is not only modern cities which build up pollution through an accumulation of household waste. In times gone by it was possible for communities simply to walk away and find new sites for their homes. But this is no solution for people living in cities like Sarnia, Hamilton or Madawaska?

Recognizing we are faced with a problem we must act as all Liberal governments have acted, that is, we must devise satisfactory solutions. And the present government has come up with some splendid solutions—the clean air act and the clean water act, to name two examples. Some people say they are not enough—but they are important steps forward. I, personally, would like to see the International Joint Commission be given more money and greater power so that it could do what needs to be done to clean up the Great Lakes.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-4, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from January 1, 1971, to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying prior to private members' hour, the whole question of containerization in air transportation has, in my opinion, an increasing role to play. We were talking about cargo containers and I should also like to speak of the possibility of passenger luggage containerization which might be developed within similar parameters. In either case, the object would be to load cargo and/or passengers in a container and an aircraft according to their ultimate destination. Thus, a container for Montreal, Toronto or other points serviced by the central airport facility could be loaded on the same aircraft but quickly unloaded on to the ground transit vehicle with the minimum of handling for the balance of the journey. Packaging passengers in that way may sound somewhat inhuman, but we are thinking of larger units, which might be a whole vehicle or aircraft, or a significant portion of it.

It can be seen that such a system could eliminate a number of costly and time-consuming steps in any long air journey. It would seem logically to follow that the ground vehicle, or a section of it, would be stationed immediately adjacent to the unloading aircraft and simply joined to the main line track, or other right of way hopefully going in the right direction. As the major part of the initial system would parallel the St. Lawrence Seaway, further possibilities for integration with water transport exist. This is in addition to the availability of fresh water for the industry and population to be served by this industrial transportation corridor.

Such a centrally located facility would immediately serve smaller cities whose travellers must presently find their way to cities served by major airports. For longer journeys they would have the Kingston airport, and for shorter journeys they would have the surface transport to the airports handling short and medium haul flights. It should take more than a footnote to indicate that the ground transit would have to be tied into the existing airports for connecting short-haul passengers and cargo.

The addition of tie lines to the ground transit system would be logical even in the early states. The most obvious tie-in would be the nation's capital, not only providing it with better air service but, again, eliminating a significant amount of short-haul air traffic between Ottawa-Hull and the country's two largest cities, Toronto and Montreal. This should reduce air traffic movement, according to my figures, by a further 5 per cent in Toronto and 6 per cent in Montreal, at today's rates. Communities such as Belleville, Brockville and Valleyfield would be served by the main line. Cities such as Peterborough could be conveniently tied in by a number of alternative methods. Northern New York state cities, such as Rochester and Syracuse, could be serviced by hovercraft or hydrofoil vehicles.

A natural extension of the ground service would be to cities such as Quebec and Windsor,serving intermediate points such as Trois-Rivières, Sorel, Hamilton, Kitchener and London. This would service existing population and industry and encourage the economic growth of regions now not economically or conveniently accessible. It would create an industrial corridor extending some 750 miles with convenient interchanges of people, industrial components and goods.

Ultimately further tie-lines could be extended to regions such as Lac Ste. Jean and the eastern townships, and northward from Toronto as far as Sudbury, allowing commercial access as well as providing a transportation system which would take people from the crowded urban centres to some of the most beautiful recreation areas in the country.

I previously mentioned that time rather than distance is the key factor in transportation of people. With high-speed surface transport, people could enjoy the benefits of country or smaller town living while being able to work in the major cities. This provides a better life style for some while at the same time taking the pressure for growth off the already strangling large urban communities. One could conveniently live in Cobourg, Ontario, and work in Toronto. With a northern line one could live in his year-round home on Lake Simcoe, or even in Muskoka, while one's means of livelihood was in Toronto. I am sure similar examples could be drawn for Montrealers.

It has been estimated that a major airport requires a community of 100,000 to 150,000 people to service it. I notice that these are just about the figures being used in conjunction with the new Toronto region airport. This includes not just those employed at the airport but their families and the multiplicity of services they require, such as shopkeepers, barbers, travellers, doctors and lawyers, plus the recreational and administrative needs of all.

Existing centres would develop, but it may also be necessary or desirable to inaugurate new planned communities, perhaps 25 or more miles east and west of the airport site enabling airport personnel to commute in minutes—a great opportunity for the planning genius of a Buckminster Fuller or a Moshe Safde or any number of excellent Canadian planners!

One of the key considerations would be air and noise pollution. This factor is one that makes the Kingston region a logical one, assuming that the facility is not immediately adjacent to Kingston. It is likely that any major housing development within a 10 to 25-mile radius of the airport would be forbidden. An extension of this would be expropriation of land and the establishment of a national park or wilderness area. This provides an apparent contradiction because one would hardly think of a wilderness area beset by air and noise pollution.

Normal traffic patterns would have considerable bearing on the land use. Industrial development could be quite satisfactory, even complementary in some areas. Other areas might prove quite suitable for wildlife, while others for camping. Considerations for permanent living are quite different from those for industrial or occasional use. The need for nature preserves and lands for recreational use will grow, as does population and leisure time. Not all will choose to live in less dense areas and commute. Even if such an area were to serve just the Kingston region, the growth of that city as the hub of the transportation network would be sufficient justification.

I mentioned previously that the ground transit would have to connect with existing airports serving Toronto and Montreal. In so far as passengers are concerned, there may be a case made for interconnecting air shuttle service. Similar services may be provided for other communities, particularly those not served by the ground transit system. Canada's STOL development might well provide the proper type of aircraft for such service.

It is further possible that traffic volumes might justify interconnecting flight schedules with other major cities in the medium haul range, such as Winnipeg and Halifax. These services would apply to incoming and departing long-range, international and transcontinental flights of the Los Angeles-Kingston type.

Frequency of schedules for the surface transit is an essential factor. All of the time advantage could be lost if infrequency of schedules required passengers to take the "ten o'clock", arriving at 11 to catch a noon or 1 p.m. flight. Conversely the arriving passenger might have to wait an hour or more for a departing train or unit. The growth of the corridor would ultimately justify frequent arrivals and departures, but any frequency which could require waiting periods of an hour or more would seriously impair the total concept.

Technology, again, can provide the answer to this problem. Smaller groupings of surface vehicles can provide part of the answer. Economic, self-propelled modules are another possibility. Perhaps the best solution is a continuing or perpetual power source into which the module or unit is connected with schedules and the number of modules in a transit unit is contingent upon demand. But this is another problem for the scientists, Mr. Speaker.

As one thinks in terms of the emphasis Canada should give in the areas of science policy, research and development, it would seem natural that transportation should rate high on any list of priorities. There is no reason, however, why we should have any natural advantages, in spite of the fact that we have natural potential and problems. Without a project to give focus and thrust, as well as market, we could wander in the never-never land of unapplied research. This project would be the catalyst for a national scientific effort which could have significant international market potential.

An international centre for transportation studies could be established, perhaps at Queen's University in Kingston. Other Canadian universities could be participants covering specific areas of concentration. At the same time, international dimension could be provided by encouraging visiting specialists from other countries to participate. Not only would we achieve the results of research, but we could also train specialists to administer our transportation systems.

The broader aspects of transportation should be intertwined—the sociological ramifications, the industrial development, urban styles and the unifying effects on a nation so diverse in all its aspects. The economic consequences could be substantial, resulting in the sale of technology and much of our hardware abroad.

The regional economic benefits are obvious—efficient transport of goods within a major market; components from a tool shop in Windsor delivered rapidly to the major assembly plant in Sorel or Quebec city; greater mobility of labour; a direct tie-in to the automotive heartland of the Detroit area and adjacent to the Boston, Washington, Chicago triangle, the largest market concentration in the U.S. and perhaps the world.

The project itself develops its own market. The rolling stock, containers, the switchgear and complex electronic systems all feed high technology, labour-intensive Canadian industry. With developed know-how we would have immense export potential in a field in which we could be pre-eminent. Examples of subsidiary economic benefits are virtually endless.

Mr. Speaker, you might ask about the cost of such an operation. That is difficult to project but I think there are certain trade-offs. This is of greater value to eastern Canada than the economic well-being of western Canada. Western Canada might ask, what is in it for us? I would suggest any improvement in our transportation system and the economy in any part of the country is good for all parts of the country. I would suggest that we also think of pipelines for gas and oil to serve our eastern markets. There are those who ask why we should spend more money for western oil or gas when we can bring in offshore or foreign product? Well, Mr. Speaker, I think this is part of the price of belonging to the club, part of the price of being Canadian. For many years westerners have paid a higher price for consumer goods produced in the eastern industrial centres in order to protect the economy of eastern Canada and this, in turn, helped them. It works both ways, and I think this is the trade-off. I do not know what the cost would be—say about $100 billion. No one can argue with those figures.

An hon. Member: Billions.

Mr. Danson: Whatever the cost, it would certainly be outweighted by the benefits and would be substantially less than the ultimate cost of laissez-faire development or lack of purpose. This is the greatest danger we face.

The Kingston airport itself is not the key to the whole concept. I think it is a major component in a vital plan. The whole transit system is important and I think the Kingston airport could be the cornerstone.

All this came up, Mr. Speaker, because of the subject of our debate and the recent announcement of the major airport which will take up a large segment of my constituency. I mentioned the effects on my constituency earlier, which are not all pleasant, but this is the price of what I guess we call progress, or a type of progress. The economic benefits for my region are considerable, but many of my constituents are concerned about the possible selling price of their homes. However, past experience indicates that this price rises in such circumstances. There is a tremendous amount of economic fall-out from an airport facility—new industry, new job opportunities, new business opportunities and excellent transportation, so the cost of existing properties should increase.

But that is not my sole criteria, Mr. Speaker. The economic benefits are great but I think we should consider the human benefits, particularly as we talk of the long-term. I like to think what might have been decided 20 or 30 years ago if politicians then had been talking about the type of future, the type of cities, the transportation networks which we would require today. In its initial stages, I think this is the type of thing that could be a priority task for the recently established Institute of Public Policy Research. This may be the sort of thing it is designed for—to look well into the future and do the type of forward thinking for which we in this chamber do not have time. Regrettably, our system is reactionary—we react to events, political pressures and economic pressures. But the Institute of Public Policy Research is a non-partisan vehicle supported by all levels of government and the private sector. It should be able to look at long-range goals and perhaps give guidance to politicians like ourselves so that we may more realistically base our policy.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I hope that what I have suggested will be raised in committee with the officials of the railways, the airlines and the various departments involved. Now that we have made the decision for current needs for the next 20 or 30 years, for the next generation, it is time to start thinking beyond those years because the potential for our country is considerable. If we are wise now and look ahead, our children and grandchildren will thank us—but if we do not, they will damn us as some damn our forefathers today.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the interest in this bill, which is perennial, is about proportionate to the influence of what we say during the course of this debate to the CN and its operations in the next year. As a matter of fact, I know of no other Crown corporation or agency responsible to this Parliament which is less responsive to the wishes or the influence of Parliament than is Canadian National Railways.

However, we nevertheless welcome the opportunity provided us every year through the vehicle of this financing bill to place on record our views and grievances. I come from a province which perhaps—yes, without a doubt—is more dependent upon Canadian National Railways and the services of CN than any other province in Canada. We are totally dependent upon CN both from the point of view of Air Canada and the service provided to our province by Air Canada and the ground service provided to us through the railways and the ferry services operated by CN.

Just about three years ago Canadian National was permitted to suspend rail passenger service in Newfoundland as a consequence of an application placed before the Canadian Transport Commission. I refer to the order of the CTC of July 3, 1968, No. R.2673, which gave authority to Canadian National Railways to discontinue its rail passenger service in the province of Newfoundland. Since that time our province has been without rail passenger service, the only province in the country so deprived. Consequently, we have to suffer the shortcomings of what is at best a most inadequate public transportation system.

Perhaps this is the most opportune time—indeed it will probably be the only opportunity we will have in the course of this Parliament—to review what has transpired since that decision of the Canadian Transport Commission of July 3, 1968. I would point out that I was very happy to join my colleagues in the submission to the CTC dated February 15, 1972, in which we asked the commission to reconsider its order of July 3, 1968, permitting CN to withdraw rail passenger service in Newfoundland. Our reason for doing so was prompted by a decision of the commission on February 8, 1972, in which it issued a decision requiring the railways, CN and CP, to continue operating rail passenger services between Montreal and the maritime provinces. The railways had applied to the commission for permission to withdraw this particular rail passenger service, which included the main line operations between St. John's, Moncton, Halifax, Sydney and Montreal as well as the various connecting services to the maritime points and the Gaspé regions of Quebec. The commission, in its release announcing that decision, said:

> Cost studies carried out by the commission in connection with the February 8 decision identified a total actual loss on these services of $14,834,298 in 1970. Under the law, the services now are eligible for federal subsidies of up to 80 per cent of annual losses. At the 1970 level, this could cost the taxpayers almost $12 million a year or $1 million a month.

I can think of no better way than to continue quoting from the release of the commission:

> The decision, by the Railway Transport Committee, saw no evidence that the services could be rendered profitable with current schedules, operating practices and equipment. It added: "Hence, given the actual losses incurred and the demands and traffic patterns, the committee is of the opinion that it is possible through imaginative improvements to develop a maritimes passenger-train system which will satisfy the needs of the travelling public and, at the same time, justify whatever cost there may be to the federal treasury.
> In this decision the committee identifies the basic rail passenger network as it presently exists in the Atlantic region east of Montreal. Pending the achievement of its objective as just stated, the committee determines that all the passenger-train services under consideration should not be discontinued. As time goes on, and suggestions or proposals for improvement are analyzed and accepted by the committee, it may be necessary to require alterations in the services as presently operated, having regard to the needs of the travelling public and the cost to the Canadian taxpayers".

That is the end of the quotation which in effect is the judgment of the commission in response to the application by the two railways to discontinue the service between Montreal and the Maritime provinces. As I indicated, this rather momentous decision by the commission prompted the submission my colleagues and I made to the commission on February 15, 1972, to which I shall refer in a moment. I should like to quote from this release because I think it is very relevant to my remarks. The committee stated in its release:

In order to ensure that all possible methods of improvement are considered, the commission invites suggestions from the public. Such suggestions, dealing with mainline or local aspects of the services, should be submitted in writing—

Then the address is given to which one should write.

Persons making submission are asked to give consideration to the following points:

1. Routing, including possible combinations of service on CNR and CP Rail lines.
2. Frequency of service on the resulting route or routes, with possible variations in summer and winter schedules.
3. Train departure-arrival times.
4. Connecting services by rail, road, air and water.
5. Methods and costs of providing meals.
6. Methods and costs of providing sleeping car service.
7. Fare levels for coach services.
8. Improved reservation procedures to reduce the "no show" problem.

The commission hopes to obtain responses from the appropriate departments of provincial and municipal governments, the railways, trade unions, travel agencies, public bodies and individual citizens. It is particularly interested in the views of those members of the public who have actually travelled on the trains in the last two years.

• (2030)

We feel that the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission is very relevant to the arguments we have placed before the House since the commission in its judgment of July 3, 1968, allowed by its order No. R. 2673 Canadian National to discontinue railway passenger service in Newfoundland, hence depriving our province of a total, comprehensive public transportation system.

Now I should like to quote from the submission of the Newfoundland members of parliament to the commission, of February 15, 1972, which reads in part as follows:

We submit that the bus service provided by Canadian National as an alternative to the train service does not now, and probably will never, fulfil the needs of the travelling public. Service has been anything but adequate; even more alarming, service is less than safe—as statistics recording the number of accidents will attest.

My colleagues and I will present arguments to support that contention during the course of this debate. Our submission continues:

One of CN's own vice-presidents, J. A. McDonald, has said publicly that "anyone who has experienced the miseries of peak congestion on even the most modern 12-lane super highway will recognize that road transport is incapable of providing adequately for all the needs of the travelling public". In Newfoundland, we have no 12-lane super highway: it is a two-lane, and the miseries and agonies of travelling by bus along the nearly 600 miles can be documented at length.

My colleagues and I will attempt to do just that—document our case in this respect. We feel that the poor service in Newfoundland during the past three years—the "road cruiser service" as CN styles it—is totally inadequate to meet the needs of the travelling public. Buses are uncomfortable and less than safe. In fact, they do not meet the demands of the public travelling over such long distances in order to make necessary connections with the mainland transportation system.

Why have we arrived at the state where we have an inadequate bus service which is supposed to be superior to the rail passenger service which it was to improve? It is a fact, as we have indicated during past debates on bills similar to this, that the CN deliberately set out in Newfoundland to downgrade the passenger service so that patronage would fall off to the point where they could successfully file an application with the commission pointing out that the service was no longer being patronized to an extent to justify continuing the service and that the operating deficit was increasing to the point where CN felt that it was no longer able to carry on.

They took a five-year trial period for purposes of their application. During that five-year period they took one year by their own accounting procedures which are incomprehensible to most people. They were able to show that the rail passenger service in Newfoundland for that particular year operated at a deficit of $900,000. Yet, the service in the maritime provinces is going to cost $1 million a month, whereas our service for the entire province during its most difficult year was only able to arrive at a maximum deficit of $900,000. Service was downgraded and deliberately slow. There can be no doubt about that. It was downgraded to the point where patronage fell off and where, as I have said, they were able to successfully appeal to the commission through the collusion of the then provincial government—and, I might say, the collusion of the Canadian Transport Commission and the government of Canada—and argue a case for the discontinuance of rail passenger service. Presumably they were able to satisfy the commission that a bus system in Newfoundland would not only meet the needs of the travelling public but would also be more economical to operate.

What is the case? For the year 1970-71 the bus service in Newfoundland, the CN road cruiser service, operated at a deficit of $400,000, plus considerable inconvenience and discomfort to the travelling public the like of which was never known during the days of the rail passenger service. What about the safety feature of this new bus system? I will not say too much about that because my colleagues, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) and the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) who represent constituents who are much more familiar with the bus service than I am, will I am sure outline the unsatisfactory safety record. Suffice to say, however, that there is growing concern in the province of Newfoundland among the travelling public about the growing number of accidents involving the CN road cruisers.

The inadequacy of the system was dramatically underlined and sharply driven home during the recent strike of the air traffic controllers. The province of Newfoundland which, as I said, is totally dependent upon CN services, found itself totally dependent upon the CN road cruiser service for connections with the mainland. The people had to try the bus service because no other alternative was left open to them, and they found out for themselves the discomfort, indeed the hazards, of travelling across the 600 miles of Trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland to get to the mainland via this means.

We believe that the time has now come when the government agents, the Canadian Transport Commission, should reconsider the decision that it took in July of 1968 in light of the operating experience of the past three years. If they do that in an objective way by having public hearings, calling witnesses and having the kind of examination of the service which will bring out the facts, we believe that in fairness they can only come to the conclusion that they erred in their decision of July, 1968, in allowing Canadian National to discontinue rail passenger service in the province of Newfoundland.

I am not arguing for a return of the system, as we knew it, for a return of the Newfie "Bullet" of fame, but I do suggest that since we do have an inadequate system and we are totally dependent on this road cruiser service operated by the CN monopoly in Newfoundland—since this service is operating at a substantial deficit which is increasing and, I submit, at a considerable inconvenience to the public—the time has now come when it is incumbent upon the government to consider the advisability of providing the province of Newfoundland with standard gauge rails.

I realize that this is something that should have been done 22 years ago when Newfoundland became a province of Canada. But it was not done then. I think a case can be made for it now. What better way could there be for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which is so involved in substantial expenditures in Newfoundland, to provide a so-called infrastructure? What better could it do than provide funds whereby Canadian National and the government of Canada would standardize the rail lines in Newfoundland to link us with the rail network of North America? This would make eminently more sense than some of the infrastructure expenditures that have been undertaken by that department during the past two years. It would have the effect of making transportation to Newfoundland considerably more economical than at present.

In the first instance, it would provide the people of Newfoundland with a direct connection with the rail lines of the continent for passenger service. And, probably even more important, it would provide the province of Newfoundland with a direct link with the continental rail network for the purpose of freight transportation, which is so important to my province which is totally dependent upon imports of consumer goods from the mainland of Canada. We feel there is a case to be made for such an expenditure by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

I regret that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) is not present for this debate. I am sure he has a very good reason for being elsewhere, but the fact remains that he is not here, able to hear or respond to the arguments presented by hon. members during the course of this debate. Hopefully, we will have another opportunity to present these arguments and to question the minister during committee stage of the bill.

I feel we should now take a long, hard look at the situation in Newfoundland with regard to Canadian National. I believe it is difficult, if not impossible, to justify CN bus service in the province of Newfoundland which is unable to meet the demands of the travelling public and must operate at a growing annual deficit.

As I indicated at the outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, we are short-changed in that we do not have adequate public transportation service in the province of Newfoundland but have inadequate transportation service which hampers resource development. It also hampers tourist development and causes considerably inconvenience to the travelling public. For these reasons alone a case can be made for reopening the whole application and the whole area of the decision which was made by the commission in 1968. In this respect it might be advantageous to quote from the MacPherson commission report. This commission made its report in 1961 but it is the only report we have. We feel it is still relevant. As recorded at page 72, volume I, the commission stated:

> Locational and resource disadvantages are well known in Canada. Remedies for overcoming them have been built into national policy. Transportation has been used as one instrument for mitigating locational disadvantage ... Locational disadvantages can still be ameliorated by national transportation policies.

I do not think that we have a national transportation policy. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Danson) referred to this question during the course of his remarks. I think the way he put it was that there is need for a more integrated transportation policy. The leader of the NDP made the same point during the course of his remarks, which I substantially support. We can refer to the recommendations of the MacPherson commission as supporting argument for our contention. But there are also other data which will support our argument. If transportation in Canada is to make sense, then transportation decisions, as the leader of the NDP said, will have to be made on the basis of public need and not on the basis of political expediency.

It was political expediency that brought about the decision of the commission, in the first instance, which allowed CN to withdraw railway passenger service from the province of Newfoundland. Decisions should not be made on the basis of some sort of simplistic approach, the kind of simplistic approach advocated by the Minister of Transport. It is interesting to examine what he said before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications at its hearings on February 25, 1971, dealing with this matter. He said:

> Where it is feasible it is still the objective of the ministry to provide services on a cost-recovery basis to the maximum extent possible.

If we are to have a transportation policy based on that philosophy, then it is my contention that the people of Canada will be shortchanged. It is my contention that if we are to have a public transportation policy based on a pay-as-you-go philosophy, then we will not have an adequate transportation system in this country. Certainly the facts, as I have tried to lay them on the record, indicate that this is so in Newfoundland today, because the arguments used to support the decision to disallow rail service in Newfoundland were purely on the basis of cost-recovery or on the basis of operating deficits.

No public transportation service can operate on a break-even basis, let alone a profitable basis. The public will have to underwrite the cost of public transportation. It seems to me that the difficulties we are experiencing are a direct consequence of the attitude of the government of Canada and of the Minister of Transport, whose philosophy I have tried to outline in the quotation I have given. The minister would be well advised to heed the words of his cabinet colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Development (Mr. Marchand) who, when he was president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions in 1961, said:

—transportation policy is closely tied to economic planning and as such must be linked to the common good and not the profitability of private enterprise.

Public transportation must flow from a direct, integrated government policy on transportation. We do not seem to get that from the government. I submit that until we have a definition of the government's policy on transportation, we will have this ad hoc, hit or miss attitude of the Canadian Transport Commission carrying out what they interpret to be the philosophy of the government of the day. We need only add that until we have such an integrated and adequate transportation policy from the government we will continue to have conflicting decisions by the commission which, under the scrutiny of examination, make no sense at all.

Therefore I appeal to the government, and in particular to the Minister of Transport, to enter into discussions with the president of the CTC with a view to at least having public hearings into the service provided by Canadian National in Newfoundland since the momentous decision of the commission in July, 1968, by which it allowed Canadian National to withdraw from railway passenger service in the province. Such an examination in my view, Mr. Speaker, can lead only to the conclusion that Newfoundland is inadequately served by the public transportation system of this country. That inadequacy must be met by this government. We feel it can only be met by serious consideration being given to providing the necessary funds whereby the province of Newfoundland, in keeping with the latest technology, can adopt the standard, gaugerail line. That would at least link us with the continental rail network and thus give us half a chance to get goods in and out of the province and provide our people with decent rail service.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us is one in which Parliament is being asked to vote money for the Canadian National Railways and Air Canada. Naturally, the debate on this bill becomes one in which Members of Parliament state their views as to improvements in various areas that ought to be made by both these transport agencies.

The leader of this party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) spoke this afternoon in a general way, indicating our view with respect to transport policy in a broad sense. He also said that a number of us in this party would be dealing, one by one, with specific issues. I intend to confine my remarks, therefore, to the matter of further improvements that must be made with respect to the pensions of the Canadian National Railways. I am very conscious that a little over one year ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) stood in his place in this House and announced a significant and deeply appreciated improvement in the pensions of Canadian National employees already retired. I am happy to underline today the appreciation I expressed on that occasion. I refer to the minister's announcement of Friday, February 5, 1971, to be found at page 3102 of Hansard for that date. However, Mr. Speaker, a year has gone by and, as it is popularly put, those concerned are asking, "What have you done for us lately?"

Despite all the good things we were able to say about the announcement of a year ago, we also pointed out then that there were two or three notable shortcomings with respect to what was done at that time. Now we must add to that that one year has gone by, the cost of living has gone up and many CNR pensioners whose position was improved a year ago now find that they are back where they were.

Sir, I said a moment ago that I would confine my remarks tonight to the matter of Canadian National pensions. May I add that I want to divide what I have to say into two main areas. First I want to talk about what can be done to improve further the lot of Canadian National pensioners already retired. Having done that, I shall turn to a second area, namely, the one major improvement, amongst others, that I think ought to be made in the Canadian National pension plan, an improvement affecting those who are still in the service of the CNR.

Going back to my first concern, that of pensioners already retired, may I indicate that the announcement made one year ago was that there was to be provided an increase in the pensions of those who had retired on or before December 31, 1969, and that that increase would amount to 2 per cent for each full year of service. That increase was made effective on January 1, 1971. The pensioners concerned got their first payment of the increase in April of last year, and they have been getting ever since the increase so provided. However, the principal shortcoming of that increase was that it was a one-shot proposal: the increase was granted then, but there was no provision for an additional increase in 1972; there is no provision for another increase in 1973, and so on. Thus, although the cost of living is going up at between 4 and 5 per cent a year—and I think that is a conservative estimate for me to make—these people do not even get the 2 per cent increase in their pensions that quite a number of pensioners under other jurisdictions now receive.

I said on February 5, 1971, that that was one of the main shortcomings in the announcement made at that time. I pointed out that it was a one-shot proposition and that there was no provision for these increases to be granted on an annual basis. May I point out, Sir, that that is what is done with respect to the pensions of retired public servants. The increases that were provided for them a year or so before that were reasonably comparable to the increases provided for retired Canadian National employees. Actually, they were better, because there was a compounding element in those increases that Canadian National pensioners did not get. Not only did public servants get the first increase; they have continued to get the increase of 2 per cent on the gross amount they are receiving every January as the cost of living has continued to go up. That applies also to those on old age security who are also receiving the guaranteed income supplement.

I regret that it does not apply at present to those receiving only the basic old age security pension. However, it also applies to all sorts of other people who are retired under federal auspices. It applies to retired Members of Parliament, and so on. If any one of us leaves this place and goes on pension he will find that, provided he is over 60, his pension will increase by 2 per cent per year if the cost of living has gone up by that much. History seems to suggest that it will continue to go up by at least that amount.

My point is that although there are these other groups which not only get pension increases but which also get these increases every year, the increase for Canadian National pensioners was a one-shot proposition and there was nothing after that. I think that is grossly unfair and something ought to be done about it. Not only have there been no subsequent increases for these people; in addition, any employee of Canadian National Railways who retired on or after January 1, 1970, is not covered by the scheme that was announced one year ago. Those Canadian National employees now retiring are retiring on what I regard as the worst kind of pension, namely, a pension of fixed amount with no provision for that amount to be increased.

Sir, this whole matter was discussed at length in the session previous to this one. Indeed, it has been discussed for a great many years. During the third session of the present Parliament we had the matter referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for a very thorough study. That committee made a report, to be found in Journals of the House of Commons for 1969-70 at pages 1290 to 1296. The report was tabled on October 5, 1970, and is found in the pages I have indicated.

I also point out that this report, which was a unanimous report as far as the committee was concerned, became the opinion of this House of Commons because later, as noted at page 1425 of Journals for that same session, that report was concurred in on a motion made on behalf of the committee by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner). The recommendations of the committee to which I have referred became, as I say, the recommendations of this House of Commons.

As I have indicated, the report covers a number of pages. I am not going to take the time to read them all. I am not even going to read all of the seven recommendations with which the report concludes. Instead, I draw particular attention to three of those recommendations. I mention the first one because it is a case where I can extend my compliments to the Canadian National Railways. I am referring to the third recommendation, which was that the Canadian National pension board should be restructured. Its powers should be increased substantially. In particular, we asked for equal representation, as we put it, between the unions and the company. The old set-up was that the board consisted of seven persons, three appointed by the employees through their unions, three appointed by the company and a chairman appointed by the company. That is a strange brand of equality. In effect, it became a seven-man committee with the company having four men on it.

This was responded to rather generously by the Canadian National in that the pension board now consists of ten members; five from the management side and five from the employees side, with the chairmanship alternating. I forget the period of time for which each chairman presides over the committee. At any rate, the chairmanship alternates between a representative of management and a representative of the employees. That is good. In addition, although I do not believe this is written into the rules of the pension board, there is an understanding that each of the two sides will ensure that one of its five representatives is a pensioner so that the viewpoint of those now on pension will have some representation on the board.

The whole question of how much power that board has is another matter. I will not take the time to go into it now. However, I wanted to refer to recommendation No. 3 of our committee which, as I say, called for the restructuring of the pension board as well as for its democratization, and to say that I welcome the action that has been taken. I can also say that many pensioners and employees of Canadian National take heart from this change. They hope that beneficial results will follow from it. The other two recommendations to which I draw special attention are Nos. 4 and 5. I quote No. 4 as follows:

> At the outset, this committee wishes to point out that the Canada pension plan and the Quebec pension plan adopted the principle of adjusting pensions for cost of living increases. Furthermore, a second important principle has been adopted whereby Parliament in the name of all Canadians applied the cost of living adjustment on a current basis, but more important, retroactively to all public service pensioners.
> The committee strongly recommends that these principles be adopted on a broader basis and that other major employers, including Crown corporations, recognize their obligation to follow the lead of Parliament in this regard. The committee specifically recommends that the Canadian National Railways implement these principles forthwith.

Let it be very clear that what we were recommending in that fourth recommendation in our report was that the Canadian National Railways should do what was done by Parliament for public servants and what has been done in the Canada pension plan and the Quebec pension plan, namely, that the escalation of pensions should be put on an annual basis. In other words, every year in which the cost of living goes up, pensions should go up accordingly. There is a 2 per cent ceiling there which I do not like or accept, but that is another issue.

Welcome though the announcement of the Minister of Transport on February 5, 1971, may have been, it was only one portion of what the committee recommended. It was only a one-shot increase with no future increases provided. I contend that one of the things that certainly needs to be done is to make it clear to Canadian National that, good as this was a year ago, it is not now good enough. Even if we have to live with this 2 per cent ceiling for a while, until we get rid of it in the Old Age Security Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act and so on, surely we could at least provide the same benefit for Canadian National pensioners who are retired, namely, an escalation of their pensions every year in which the cost of living increases. I believe very strongly that this should be done.

When we get this bill to the committee, I believe the Canadian National officials should be asked to come before the committee and answer the obvious question: When you accepted our recommendation, why did you accept it on only a one-shot basis? Why did you not accept it on the basis which we proposed, namely, that it be an annual increase as is the case with public servants, the Canada pension plan, the Quebec pension plan and so on?

We will have to remind the Canadian National officials when they come before us that because of the motion made later by the hon. member for London East, which had the unanimous support of this House, that recommendation was the recommendation of the House of Commons.

The other recommendation in this report to which I would like to draw attention is No. 5. It is rather lengthy. Perhaps I might be permitted to summarize it, hoping that I will not do violence to it. It is one of those recommendations that gets all-involved in amounts of money owing to the fund, amounts that are paid, amounts that are not paid, interest on those amounts, and all the rest of it. Those on the committee will remember we had long and involved arguments about all this. The company was accused by some witnesses of running away with money and so on.

Even when you boil all this down to a minimum, and even when you deal only with what the committee could support unanimously, we came up with the recommendation that there is an amount of $7 million annually that Canadian National should be putting into the pension fund and that that annual debt of $7 million arises because of what we call in our report the oldest contributions in the fund. We say that this $7 million that is owed annually should be used for the benefit of the oldest employees. I quote:

> For these reasons, the pensioners appear to this committee to have a prior claim on any surplus designated by the company.
> The committee accordingly recommends that the benefits arising from the allocation of this surplus should be separate from and prior to the cost of living adjustments referred to in paragraph 4.

Now may I try to put that, if I can, into plain language, or at least into language which is plain to me? What we have said is that we think Canadian National pensions should be escalated on an annual basis as is the case with public service pensions. But, we added, before this is done, before the annual escalation arrangement is started, there is an annual amount of $7 million which should be used to bring up the low pensions of those who have been retired for many years.

The company may say that it raised the $25 pensioners to $50 a month. But how can one expect anyone to regard $50 a month as a pension on which one can get along at all nowadays? I suggest it bears no relation to what we feel should be done with that $7 million. Therefore, I believe I am expressing the view of the committee when I say that though we are grateful for what was done, not enough was done and we think the Canadian National should review the whole matter.

I have done most of my talking in this whole area about the need to place this escalation on an annual basis. But I also believe that this question of the proper use of that $7 million a year for the benefit of those whose pensions are in the lowest categories needs to be reviewed, and I should have thought that what we asked for needs to be implemented to the full.

These are the views I have in respect to the CNR pensioners already retired. When we talk about pensioners already retired, as far as the announcement of last year is concerned the only people who got any benefit from it were those who retired not later than December 31, 1969. With regard to any who have retired since and are on fixed pensions, they have received no increases. I do not think this is good enough. Of course, if the business before us had to do with the Canadian Pacific I would probably be holding up what the Canadian National had done as an example and saying that the Canadian Pacific had really given its pensioners a lousy deal. That is terribly true. But though it can be argued that the CN arrangement is better than that handed out by the CP, I suggest that the Canadian National arrangement is not good enough for all time. It may have been good enough for the year in which it was announced, but it does not measure up to what was asked for in the report we tabled in October, 1970.

I want to emphasize the importance of this matter and I hope the committee will go at it seriously and with a sense of responsibility. Canadian National pensioners were heartened by the increase a year ago. They have been heartened by the fact that two of their number, one an employee and the other a management type, are now on the pension board. I urge that this sense of progress not be frustrated by nothing further being done. The Minister of Transport said last year that these other matters could be left to collective bargaining. That is not the way to treat persons who have already retired on pensions. It is important that we provide for our Canadian National retired employees at least the same kind of treatment as is provided for retired public servants, retired Members of Parliament and others.

The other area to which I should like to address myself is the question of improving the Canadian National pension plan for those still in the service of the company. Here again, I speak as strongly as I can. When one gets into these pension matters the complications and involvements are many and one can soon get lost in them. But I will stick to one point. I think the time has come when the factor for computing all pensions by the Canadian National should be set at 2 per cent. Not many years ago the plan was so complicated that some service was computed on the basis of 1 per cent, some at 1¼ per cent and some at 1½ per cent.

Over the past decade things have improved until the over-all factor is now 1½ per cent. In other words, a CN worker trying to work out what his pension will be has to multiply the number of years of service by 1½ per cent, and that total percentage is applied to what might roughly be called his average earnings in his five best years. By the way, in order to get this 1½ per cent factor the employees had to accept an increase in the amount they pay toward the plan. First it was 5½ per cent, then it was 6 per cent and finally it was raised to 6½ per cent. Of course, this is modified to the extent the plan is related to the Canada pension plan. I will not go into that, now; I mention it only so that no hon. member will think I am not aware of this aspect. I point out that again this is grossly unfair. Public servants get a pension based on 2 per cent per year of service. A public servant who works 35 years gets a pension of 70 per cent of his salary in the five or six best years of his service. But a CNR employee will get only 52½ per cent of his salary during his best five years.

In the case of Members of Parliament, we did a little better for ourselves. Our plan provides 3½ per cent for the first ten years, 3 per cent for the next ten years and 2 per cent for the last five years. So we can reach a full pension of 75 per cent in 25 years. A Canadian National employee cannot do that: he cannot work enough to reach that level.

Mr. Cullen: You have been here that long?

Mr. Baldwin: He asks if you have been here that long.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am just getting started.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Take a good look at this place. Jed: I want you to remember it.

Mr. Baldwin: I will have a better view from over there next time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I enjoy listening to this chit-chat. I don't know how much of it is getting on the record, but that doesn't matter.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We are listening.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): To me, or to each other?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): To both.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well, I thought that if I mentioned the MP's plan I would get attention. I did so in order to make a comparison. By what standard of fairness can we say that in our own case we should have the benefit of these higher factors, 3½ per cent and so on, that in the public service the factor should be 2 per cent, and deny these levels to others? How can we say to CNR employees, "The most you can get is 1½ per cent for each year of service"?

I shall place another argument before the House in this connection. It is one which has come into the picture only recently. I have here a copy of the pension rules for Air Canada dated September 30, 1967, but also, thanks to Air Canada officials, a copy of a statement issued by the management of that company's pension and retirement program from which I learn that on November 1, 1971, a number of changes were made in the Air Canada pension plan, the most significant of these being an increase in this basic factor about which I have been speaking. The result is that as far as Air Canada pensioners are concerned, service is now computed on a 2 per cent basis.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that from a technical point of view the CNR owns Air Canada—in the name, it is true, of the people of Canada, but nevertheless that is the technical set-up. So here we have the CNR owning Air Canada, and Air Canada providing its employees with pensions at the rate of 2 per cent for each year of service, while the CNR itself provides pensions for its own employees on the basis of only 1½ per cent. I do not see how this can be allowed to continue. I know someone will want to tell me that Air Canada's change was made only recently, and that is correct; it was made effective November 1, 1971. Around this place one does not get overly excited at a delay of a few months. Only when things go on for 10, 20 years does one get excited about delay.

However, I do plead that if just about every other group coming under the aegis of the federal government has a pension arrangement that is based on a 2 per cent factor, then it is a case of gross discrimination and is, indeed, a gross insult to Canadian National employees to say that their pensions must continue to be based on a factor of 1½ per cent.

I could go into some of the other details and the combinations that exist between age and years of service. Indeed, I could go into many of the improvements that need to be made in the Canadian National pension plan. I could speak favourably about some of the arrangements for early retirement, though I think they could be greatly improved. But I believe it is the part of wisdom to stick to this one issue which I think is terribly important, namely, that the basis for computing all pensions for those now in the service of Canadian National should be raised from the present 1½ per cent to 2 per cent.

So as I said at the outset, I have spoken about two main areas of Canadian National pensions. I am concerned for the well-being of those who are now retired; I am also concerned for the future well-being of those now in service. We can do something really worth while for those who are now retired if we put the escalation of their pensions on an annual basis and if we carry out the recommendation I referred to earlier, namely, seeing to it that those in the lowest pension categories have their pensions brought up to current levels even before we talk about their escalation. For those in service who have their pensions to look forward to, we can do something worth while if we introduce into their pension plan the 2 per cent factor, which is the factor used by Air Canada and by the public service and is pretty generally used by a great many pension plans.

I say again that I was one of those who was happy on February 5, 1971, to welcome the changes that were then made. As all of us said on that occasion—and I think we had the right to say it—one of the reasons that those changes came about was that the committee had pushed very hard for them. The committee had made a unanimous report and that report received unanimous endorsation on the floor of this House.

Therefore, I ask that the members of this House again speak clearly on this issue. The way to do that, of course, is for the committee to consider these matters, have the Canadian National officials before it and bring back a report to this House. When that report comes back, I hope it will call clearly and categorically for an annual escalation of the pensions of those who are retired, and for increasing the basic factor in calculating pensions for those who are still in service to 2 per cent, as I have suggested. If we do these things, the committee will have done a good job, and it is a job we must do.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in this debate, but something has come to a head which I think should be mentioned in this forum. This is why I have risen to say a few words.

Mr. Baldwin: A great many speeches are made under that heading.

Mr. Cullen: I hope this will be another great one. However, when one follows the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), particularly on the subject of pensions, about the only thing one has left to say is "Me, too". Because he does a tremendous amount of research work and the points he makes are so well made and presented, I know he will have the support of the House. At least, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre keeps them honest as far as pensions are concerned, then the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) keeps them honest as far as their work operation is concerned.

I should like to start on a happy note by dealing with Air Canada, followed by what I hope is a hopeful note in regard to the CNR, and then make a very quick conclusion. For four years I have been travelling almost exclusively with Air Canada, and being an incurable voyageur I would have to say that the stewardesses of Air Canada are perhaps the most gorgeous, pleasant and efficient group of stewardesses that I am happy to have had serve me. I hope that, with that comment, all stewardesses will read my remarks and will give me an extra lump of sugar in my coffee next time I travel with that airline.

More seriously, I should like to deal with the circuitous route that we make Canadian National and Canadian Pacific travel when they apply to abandon a service which actually they have no intention of abandoning in order to qualify for a government subsidy. I refer to an application to abandon a passenger service which has as its only aim to secure a subsidy from the government because the particular line is not paying. In most instances, when the CNR makes application to abandon a passenger route the people in the immediate community are up in arms and wonder why the action is being taken. This means that the public relations image of Canadian National—or it may be Canadian Pacific—takes a complete nose-dive.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I believe there are between 35 to 50 applications for abandonment now before the Canadian Transport Commission. In many of these instances, as I say, the railway company in question has no intention of abandoning a stretch of line but has to follow this circuitous route in order to secure a government subsidy. I am sure a minor change to a regulation or section of the act would eliminate this procedure. Not only would the railway company benefit as a result, but they might find that instead of antagonism from the municipalities they hope to serve, those municipalities would assist them.

Let me give an example. In my area we have excellent bus and air services. It is a short distance by road from Sarnia to Toronto and this means the CNR faces a tremendous amount of competition. If CNR simply applied for a subsidy, the citizens of Sarnia might be prepared to assist the company. However, when they apply to abandon a stretch of line, it does raise the hackles not only of the chamber of commerce but of everybody else in the community. As I say, a minor change to a regulation or to the act might eliminate this, to the benefit of the railway company and the communities affected.

Railways are obliged to maintain their services even if they are run at a loss. The managerial decision that must be made is how much loss the railway can afford and still carry on the service on which it is losing money. Where a railway can make a good case for abandonment, I think a second look should be taken at the property rights and privileges granted the company when the line was built in the first place. If the railway company had to surrender a valuable piece of property fronting a river or a lake, then it might take a long, second look at any application to abandon a passenger service before proceeding further.

I also think there is a role to be played by both CN and CP working together, as is the case with CN-CP Telecommunications. I think there is a role to be played in the passenger transportation field where they are not competing with each other but complementing the services provided. I am not going to usurp the role of management, Mr. Speaker, but this is an area they have to look at. Another area is the trans-Canada trains that come to Montreal and Halifax. The same train seems to come all the way across the country and if it has difficulty in the western provinces with weather, a person in central Canada could be left waiting five or ten hours or even a day. I believe that some thought should be given to what might be called a shotgun approach so that if this kind of problem occurred it could be overcome by running several trains and the people would not have to wait for service.

• (2130)

An hon. Member: Those storms start in the east.

Mr. Cullen: Well, they can't start out west, Mr. Speaker, with all the hot air we have on the other side of the House.

These comments are made in a constructive way and in the interests of improving passenger service. I hope the government and the powers that be will have a long look at the section which requires railways to go through this circuitous route if they are simply looking for a subsidy.

I should like to make one more pitch, Mr. Speaker. Some thought should be given to providing free passes on passenger trains for senior citizens. The trains have enough room. I recognize that there are almost two million senior citizens in Canada, but I think they could be phased in. Try it with people 75 years of age and over first and find out what the passenger load is, and then work it down. This is the sort of service that a national railway, particularly a Crown corporation railway, should be prepared to offer to our senior citizens.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues from the Atlantic region, I am unable to allow this bill to pass without saying a few words about the transportation policy in our region, especially in the province of Newfoundland which I represent.

As my colleague from St. John's East has pointed out, Canadian National has most certainly failed in its obligations to the Newfoundland people. I am referring, of course, to the decision made in 1968 and supported and approved by an order of the Canadian Transport Commission which allowed Canadian National Railways to discontinue its rail passenger service in our province. This has been an unpopular decision. I think I might say that as long as Canadian National and the federal government insist on forcing upon the people of Newfoundland a grossly inadequate bus service, members from our province will object to the passing of the Canadian National Railways and Air Canada financing bill. And rightly so, Mr. Speaker, because we are reflecting the feelings of the vast majority of people in our province.

Newfoundlanders will not accept the second-class transportation system that has been imposed upon them by Canadian National with, as I say, approval of the CTC. Over the past three years the bus service has proven to be inadequate, unsafe and a very inferior type of ground transportation. This decision is all the more difficult to accept when one remembers that just a few months ago the Canadian Transport Commission refused permission to Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway to discontinue rail passenger service in the Maritimes area. As my colleague from St. John's East pointed out, that service will cost the Canadian taxpayer approximately $12 million a year by way of subsidy, or $1 million a month.

The basis upon which permission to discontinue rail passenger service in Newfoundland was granted was mainly that it was costing too much money to operate and losses were too great. Mr. Speaker, the loss incurred by the rail passenger service in Newfoundland came to less than $1 million a year—less than one-twelfth what it will cost the government to maintain the service in the Maritimes region. I do not want to give the impression that I oppose the CTC decision with respect to the maritime provinces, but I believe that part of Canada is as entitled to a modern, up to date rail passenger service as any other part of Canada. However, it makes it seem worse because we in Newfoundland have to tolerate a grossly inferior, unsafe and unsatisfactory transportation system.

The arguments advanced by the CTC with regard to the application of CPR and CNR to discontinue the Maritimes rail passenger service could be advanced for the reinstatement of the rail passenger service in Newfoundland. My colleagues and I have petitioned the Canadian Transport Commission to reopen the case and to allow us to appear before it to advance an argument for reinstatement. Scarcely a day goes by that an editorial or article does not appear in one of the Newfoundland papers dealing with the inadequacy of the so-called road cruiser service. We find that in the past three years there have been more than 40 accidents, some of them very serious. Buses have actually been blown off the highway.

Mr. Lundrigan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) has either deliberately or otherwise misled the House, because there have been over 50 accidents with the Canadian National bus system. I think the record should reflect the fact that there have been 52. I want to challenge that statistic and I hope the hon. member will correct his remark in this regard.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I apologize but I have not been in contact with Newfoundland for the past four or five hours! I appreciate the hon. member correcting me on the number of accidents because this is very important. If it were not so serious it would be laughable to read of buses being lost in a snowstorm with 30 or 40 passengers on board and of buses being blown off the highway.

Early in the winter I had occasion to drive over the trans-Canada highway through part of my riding. I noticed a CNR bus off the side of the road which had just been blown off by a very severe storm. Then I had quite an interesting experience during the recent air controllers' strike. My wife and I had to get back to Ottawa, and the only way to travel was by road cruiser as far as Port aux Basques, then across on the ferry service and then by train to Ottawa. I must say that the bus trip was quite an experience.

The Canadian National have the nicest, the most shiny, most beautiful water-cooler of any bus in Canada. There was only one problem—no water. They have a shiny, chrome-plated dispenser for cups—a credit to them—but no cups. In the toilet there was a lovely, porcelain sink but no water and no plug. This Mr. Speaker is the type of service we are expected to tolerate in our province, a service which would not be tolerated, I submit, in any other province of Canada.

• (2140)

As I say, so long as this land is represented in this House, and so long as Canadian National insists on imposing on the Newfoundland people this secondary and inferior service, Newfoundland members will have to rise in their place to oppose and object to the services and the passing of the Canadian National and Air Canada financing bill. There are a number of problems I could raise in respect of the Canadian National and its operations in our province, but first let me say an argument will be advanced by Canadian National and by others, such as engineers and editorial writers, that in Newfoundland the only satisfactory answer would be to have a wide-gauge railway service provided in the province.

Engineers say that with a narrow-gauge railway it is almost impossible to run a smooth and efficient rail passenger service. I cannot think of any better way for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to put its money where its mouth is, as it were, than to provide perhaps a wide-gauge railway service for the province. This is essential for the future development of our province: it is essential in so far as the movement of people is concerned. As a matter of fact, when I think back to 1948 or 1949 when the Terms of Union were being negotiated between Canada and Newfoundland, I sometimes wonder why the Fathers of Confederation, the people charged with responsibility for drafting the terms, did not insist that this be one of the terms of union—that is, that a wide-gauge railway be provided in our province. Certainly, if it is needed now it was needed at that time. This is one thing I believe the people who negotiated the terms will have to answer for in years to come.

Canadian National, as I say, has failed in its obligation to the Newfoundland people. I feel the recent increase in freight rates has already been reflected in an increased cost of living. St. John's, the city I represent with my colleague from St. John's East, has probably the highest cost of living in Canada. It is continuing to rise. I think 4.6 per cent was the figure for last year. Of course, the increase in freight rates will most certainly be reflected in the cost of living index for St. John's.

Then we have the matter of ferry rates. The only line between Newfoundland and the Canadian mainland, unless one travels by air, is by the Port aux Basques-North Sydney ferry service. I contend that this 100 miles of water separating our province from the mainland of Canada should be treated like any other 100-mile stretch of the Trans-Canada highway. I see no reason why people travelling to and from our province should be penalized because Newfoundland is an island. I feel the rates on that ferry should be reduced to a point where they would compare with any 100-mile stretch of the trans-Canada highway. A man, his wife and perhaps three children travelling across the gulf would pay almost $40 for that 100-mile stretch, whereas to travel the same distance on the trans-Canada highway would cost $15.50, or less than $20.

I believe that in Newfoundland, Canadian National is failing in its obligation to the people in that it has not given serious consideration to the potential of the Canadian National dockyard operation in St. John's. St. John's has been referred to by people as the service station of the Atlantic. I feel Canadian National has ignored the potential of the harbour and its facilities, to the detriment of people working at the CN dockyard and to the economy of the city generally. As a matter of fact, its policy in respect of its dockyard operation in St. John's is a very miserly one. If there is a slack period of a month or two or three weeks because ships are not coming in, rather than trying to place the employees in other jobs within its operation the company lays off these men. I feel this is very unfair. I think if the CN were to give more thought to its planning, these lay-offs could be avoided.

[Mr. Carter.]

Therefore, I would strongly suggest that Canadian National undertake immediately a study of the potential of its dockyard operation in the harbour. I am quite confident that once such a study was completed a need would be shown for upgrading of the docking facilities in St. John's harbour, to the advantage of the people who work for Canadian National and to the economy of the city generally.

I could speak further on the failings of Canadian National in the Atlantic region and especially in Newfoundland, but I think I have made my point, especially in respect of rail passenger service, the inadequacy of the road cruiser or bus service and the fact that our people are subjected to a grossly inferior, inadequate and unsafe service.

I would strongly recommend and urge the government, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission to pay heed to the submission made in February, at which time we requested an opportunity to meet with the commission and, hopefully, have reopened the case for rail passenger service in our province. I believe that if they are prepared to listen to what we have to say, bearing in mind that we reflect the views and thoughts of the vast majority of Newfoundlanders, something will be done. Certainly, something must be done because I do not think our people, any more than the people in any other Canadian province, deserve to tolerate this type of ground transportation service.

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, once again Parliament has been called to its yearly exercise of rubbert-stamping expenditures of the Canadian National Railways and Air Canada for the coming year. Most of this money has already been spent, and it is of deep concern to me that regardless of the amount of money we pour into the hands of these companies we as Members of Parliament are constantly being told of the poor passenger and freight service that CNR and, quite often, Air Canada are providing.

The National Transportation Act of 1967 comes from the Royal Commission on Transportation known as the MacPherson commission. The preamble of the act reads:

—an economic efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation.

The principle of subsidization for any service that is uneconomical but is required in the public interest is embodied in the legislation. Politicians past and present have, so far as I can find out, assumed that the CTC and the railways were talking of passenger service only. Mr. T. W. G. Macdougal, executive vice-president of the CNR, in a speech to the Canadian Railway Club said:

—at last we are making sense out of the railway passenger business and may, in the near future, begin to make similar progress toward rationalization of the grain gathering and distribution system which is so important to the Canadian economy.

• (2150)

If the same pattern is used in the grain industry that has been used in the passenger service we can well imagine that, in the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), "somebody is going to get hurt". In trying to understand and to make sense out of the practices of the CNR, we consulted the American Everyday Dictionary, the Consolidated Webster Encyclopedia Dictionary and, finally, Colliers Standard Dictionary, international edition, where it says:

The act of bringing an industry into accord with up to date methods of organization and operation—

Even then one must stretch one's imagination to come to grips with the term "rationalization." The CNR has apparently applied this interpretation only in the business sense. The reasoning here was verified by an official appearing on television and saying that they are not really interested in cattle transportation as it is a marginal business, and by an official of the CTC saying that the Canadian railways are much better off because of permissive legislation allowing the railways to diversify, and that in Canada they would never have eliminated 50 per cent of passenger business in one sweep as has happened in the U.S.A.

It would appear that the CNR is diversifying its assets if more profit can be made in some other area. This policy can have no other effect but to force more and more trucks on our highways that are already overloaded. The truth of this can be seen in the poor service provided to cattle shippers this past fall and winter. What has happened here is already a well established and recognizable practice of the downgrading of service until those involved seek other modes of transportation.

If the government is happy with the present operation of the CNR and the CTC, and if we are satisfied with their interpretation of the legislation, then many Canadians are sure that the management should be congratulated because we are sure that according to their ideas they are doing a first-rate job. If you are not, I would suggest that as a first step toward rectifying the situation we put more common sense railway men on the CTC and indicate to that body the kind of railway service which the people of this country want and deserve.

In my opinion, transportation in Canada, especially passenger service, is badly planned. It is provided by many companies on an ad hoc basis, and the general idea is that the public, who in all cases are called upon to pay the bills, are not considered in any way. For example, train 154 arrives at London from Sarnia at 12.45 p.m., and 146 from Windsor at 13.35, so if you are coming from Windsor and wish to go to Stratford or Kitchener you have lost your train connection when you arrive in London. You have two choices, either to remain in London until 20.05 at night or go to Toronto and come back by the other route. For many years these trains met in London, but today the CNR has made changes so that the connections are no longer possible.

I have attempted to show the members of this House some of the results of the short-sighted policies followed by the CNR. Successive federal governments have paid lip service to the need for a rational transportation system in Canada. By "rational" they meant a system in which the basic transportation needs of the population in each region would be supplied by whatever mode of transport was most efficient and economical.

The MacPherson royal commission was supposed to recommend the rationalization of Canada's competing and overlapping transportation service. The new transportation act of 1967 was supposed to have enacted policies to reach that objective, and the new Canadian Transport Commission was given a mandate to implement these policies. What do we find today? Our transportation system is in a worse mess than it ever was. How the CTC can pay lip service to rationalization and ignore the need for transportation between Montreal and Ottawa is more than we can understand. One can drive or travel by bus over the worst, most dangerous stretch of the trans-Canada highway, go by rail, by CN, CP or by air: there is no doubt that the fastest, most efficient, most economical and safe method of transportation is fast, up to date rail service.

The more one examines the federal government, the CNR and CPR transportation policies, the more confusing they appear. All the various agencies are pulling at cross-purposes, each launching contradictory projects that have nothing in common except that they all cost the taxpayers millions of dollars. On the one hand we have the CNR, a Crown corporation, systematically trying to scuttle its passenger service with the encouragement of the CTC, and while the CTC is permitting the railways to kill their passenger trains another government branch is paying half the cost of producing a high-speed rail passenger coach.

Meanwhile, the Department of Transport is not satisfied that travel service between Ottawa and Montreal is sufficiently diversified, so the department has extended more subsidies to the Air Industries Association of Canada to provide another mode of transportation between the two cities, that is, the short-landing and take-off aircraft scheduled for operation in 1973. This money would be better spent in upgrading the rail service in Canada.

Canadian citizens who in all cases are called upon to pay the shot find very confusing the continuing insistence that the CNR is in business to provide a service. Not one politician is happy with the CNR and only the CTC and the top officers of the CNR seem satisfied.

The basic idea of the founders of this great country was to unite the east and west and all parts of the expanding country with a rail line for the purpose of transporting people and goods across this nation. Therefore, we can assume that their idea was to create a service industry, and this is the only type of product the CNR has to sell. The CNR was created by the federal government of the day by taking over a group of bankrupt railways. Was the basic idea of the merger to run a railway for a profit or break-even point, or was it to provide a service to the people of Canada? I believe that the provision of service is the answer. Today the CNR has a group of academics and even specialists, and their new ideas are causing undue problems with the employees and shippers across this nation.

Although there are undoubtedly many good recommendations in the MacPherson report, many Canadians consider that the basic philosophy of the report is wrong, that to embrace the free enterprise system and the pursuit of profit to cure the ills is wrong. The CNR came into being for a different reason and should be required to provide service at a reasonable cost. The interpretation of this could be either that all service must perform at a profit or that service should be provided at a reasonable cost to the taxpayer if necessary. To require the railway to operate on profit alone is to set them apart from all other industry engaged in transportation, such as the trucking industry, air lines, bus transportation and ships. Perhaps the permissive legislation allowing the railway to diversify is wrong if the policy of the CNR is designed to have the company use some other forms of transportation owned by the CNR.

All tax money comes from the same pocket and many people either recognize or ignore this fact. Therefore, we the people of this nation are entitled to and require a modern, up to date railway service for both passengers and freight in addition to other forms of transportation. There is plenty of room for all modes of service and there is no reason why all services cannot be tied into a modern system using the railways as the key link.

I find it refreshing that one of our cabinet ministers has finally come to view the CTC as a rubber-stamp for the railways. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) recently said—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Finish that quotation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I would not want to take it that the House wishes to go beyond ten o'clock on the recommendation of one hon. member or a few hon. members. However, if the House wants the Chair not to see the clock for a few seconds, I am ready to do so.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (2200)

Mr. Turner (London East):

For that reason he said he would like to see the "public interest" lawyers represent the people—the traveller, the radio listener, the TV viewer, the consumer, at agency hearings of all kinds. The "public interest" lawyer's job would be to appear before an agency and make sure that the views of ordinary citizens who would be affected by its decisions were fully presented.

"Let's take a situation where one of the railways goes before the Canadian Transport Commission to ask for an increase in fares," Mr. Turner said. "At present the railway makes its pitch. Its competitors appear along with the air lines, maybe truckers, certainly boards of trade, sometimes different cities and so on. But surely there ought to be evidence submitted by some one representing the travelling public, the people who pay the shot."

I agree 100 per cent with the minister, Mr. Speaker, and I sincerely believe that he is on the right track. New servo-centres have been established in many key cities in Canada serving large areas of shippers, and after talking to many employees I find that in their opinion this service is not as good as the old system. Stationmasters, station agents and assistants are no longer employed, and thus passengers and freight shippers are robbed of the personal touch.

Service agents and their staff lived in the communities and therefore had a constant dialogue with the shippers. Today this service has been replaced by salesman and their assistants working out of the servo-centre offices. Many employees tell me that the CNR has lost contact with the customers because this new service is not providing the personal touch which for many years was the key to obtaining business.

Recently a cattle shipper was informed that his cattle shipment would be in the London yard at such a time. Naturally he drove to London to pick up his stock, but due to the fact that the freight service does not run daily to his area, the stock was routed via Stratford and therefore it was waiting for him in Stratford instead of London. This caused the shipper undue delay and extra driving costs. It is my understanding that the company is reassessing its position on servo-centres at St. Catharines, Kitchener and Windsor. If this is true, Mr. Speaker, one would think that perhaps the new system is not doing the job it was set up to do.

I now turn to the question of the morale of the employees of the CNR. In some areas during the past few months the management has begun to do something about the situation and is having a little meaningful dialogue with various groups of workers. Recently meetings were held on the subject of company discipline. Some of the discipline recently handed out by officials has been rather severe. They take the rule book and state that the person involved violated such and such a rule. They do not take into consideration today's length of trains, new triple valves, new brake-shoes and the general idea that no two trains handle alike. Today, Mr. Speaker, a crew can have a short, heavy tonnage train and next trip have a long train with less tonnage.

Many of these officials who are handing out discipline have never had the experience of running a train and therefore do not know what the men are up against. Mr. Speaker, it is one thing to read it out of a book and tell a man how to do his job, but it is a different thing if that same man cannot sit down and show you how to do the job. The employees of the CNR once were a proud group of employees. They were a quite happy group who enjoyed going to work and were sorry to see retirement date appear. Today most employees can hardly wait for retirement date; they are not the same group of happy employees.

I now refer to the pensions of CNR employees and of former employees. About a year ago one change was made and pensioners who were then retired received an increase in their pensions covering the years they had been retired. To me this was very good, but why we did not tie in a 2 per cent increase every year as long as they live is beyond my comprehension. Retired public servants get their 2 per cent increase yearly, and I contend that the pensions of retired CNR and CPR employees, and of the employees of all railways, should be escalated and increased on an annual basis in the same way as the pensions of retired public service employees. The CNR is a Crown corporation and CNR employees are not inferior to civil servants and should be treated in the same way as civil servants.

I believe that employees of the CNR and CPR are entitled to a new deal as far as pensions are concerned. Today, when an employee does not receive sufficient pension on retirement he must seek other employment to provide the additional money required or he must provide a bank account to assist him until the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan and Old Age Security program are available to him. It would, therefore, be appropriate if the federal government and, industry, in conjunction with Canadian National pensions and the Canada Pension Plan, were to provide the means and funds for increased pensions so that older employees could take advantage of early retirement. We should do that instead of paying unemployment insurance benefits to the less fortunate; thereby we should be increasing job opportunities for younger graduates coming into the labour force who have found it increasingly difficult to find suitable employment.

It would appear that the CNR management is of the opinion that if the full increase in pension benefits as requested were granted to employees, or if a compulsory retirement age of 60 were provided, the result would be that a large segment of senior supervisory staff would be removed. These supervisors are not irreplaceable. Mr. Speaker, this is a hot issue with the CNR, no doubt it is with the CPR as well as with all railway companies. Employees are requesting that pension benefits be based on 2 per cent of salary per year of service and that the age be reduced to 60. If this cannot be accomplished at once, they should be given a complete financial statement as to the types of investment the pension fund has made. As of December, 1970, the reserve in CNR pension trust funds amounted to $1,160,488,477. There are no moneys out on loan, but investments are made in bonds, mortgages, stocks and short-term investments.

Of the total reserve, only $818,203,051 is represented by investments, cash and accounts receivable. The remainder, $342,283,426 is an unfunded liability, or a bill which the company has to pay. About $299,732,674 is being amortized over a 60-year period and $42,550,752 over a 25-year period, in accordance with the Pension Benefits Standards Act which was passed by the federal Parliament, effective as of October 1, 1967. Mr. Speaker, all Canadians would like a deal like this giving them 60 years and 25 years to pay their debts. Net earnings on investments during 1970 were $23,984,003.

The CNR pension fund supplies each employee with a T-5 slip which states the amount of money he has contributed for the year. For many years during the war they were supplied with nothing. For a time we also received a slip stating the total amount accumulated on our pension account. This has not been done lately. Thousands of employees are pouring money each year into a pension fund and they receive very little information as to the type of investment the money is invested in. Surely the employees are entitled to an annual statement giving them more information than they now receive. If the fund will not generate enough money to lower the pension age to 60, they should be advised of the percentage increase in contributions that would be needed to make the necessary change.

The employees of the CNR, CPR and of all railway companies are patient people who are willing to listen to facts and figures produced by the pensions board. However, if they are not supplied with the necessary information soon on the lowering of the pension age I predict that we will see serious trouble in the railways of this nation. No single issue has grown in importance more rapidly during the past year than that of pensions, largely because of lay-offs and the faster introduction of technological change. All trade unions and their members are making pensions the single, most important issue in collective bargaining.

When a machine is worn out, Mr. Speaker, we replace it with a new one. The workers of all companies in Canada are entitled to a decent pension at an earlier age. They should not be thrown out of work without adequate pensions that are tied to the cost of living. I urge the railways and all industries to update their pension plans and meet the personal needs of employees and retired employees in a fast changing society.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE—DISCUSSION WITH COMMONWEALTH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES ON SUGAR TARIFF REBATE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on February 25 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) a question concerning the tariff rebate on Commonwealth Caribbean sugar, and I was somewhat surprised at his answer. It was to the effect that the rebate extended to December 31, 1971, had not been cut off at that date. It was my impression that such was not the case and that the rebate had lapsed.

As I have often said before, Mr. Speaker, the abrupt, unilateral termination of this rebate was one of the most regrettable blunders in our dealings with the governments of the Commonwealth Caribbean. The most excellent report of the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate of Canada also referred to this matter. Page XVI of the foreword to their report states:

> Serious misunderstandings have recently arisen, due in part to the manner in which decisions were unilaterally arrived at.

We recall, too, that the government leader of the Senate made a long, good will tour of the Caribbean area. This was followed by the government's change of heart with the announcement that the rebate which was to terminate on December 31, 1970, would continue until December 31, 1971. This announcement made front-page headlines in the press of the Caribbean countries of the Commonwealth. But prior to that there were comments in the Caribbean press which were far from complimentary to Canada. As the Trinidad Guardian editorialized on December 24, 1970:

> It is no use pretending that relations between Canada and the West Indies have not been soured this year by the harsh realities which came to the fore.

Here in Canada, the Globe and Mail said:

> Sometimes those closest to us are the ones we understand least. The rule applies to nations as well as individuals.
>
> The cancellation was made at a stroke, without any consultation with the governments involved. It showed a clear lack of understanding of the feelings of those nations with whom we are supposed to have a special relationship.

It also noted:

We also buy twice as much sugar from South Africa as we do from all the Caribbean countries.

I can say that this question of heavier purchases from South Africa than from other areas might some day be discussed in the House. But my concern is not to belabor the blunders of the past. Rather must we try to avoid such errors in the future. I am somewhat concerned about the degree of consultation. I wonder if we are not a bit short on consultation but long on confusion. Of course, in some areas of the Caribbean the facts of domestic production make the rebate question somewhat academic, but in other areas it is far from academic. It matters and matters greatly. I hope the parliamentary secretary can bring the House up to date on what is happening. What is contemplated and what is the nature and extent of consultation and discussion?

The Commonwealth Caribbean is an area of great importance to us. Our ties have been close and can and should be closer. We must not through carelessness or casualness fracture a longstanding friendship which has of late been somewhat shaken. These neighbours with parliamentary institutions similar to ours deserve a high priority in our foreign policy consideration. We must not take their friendship for granted. We must be ever alert to opportunities to broaden the base of amity and good will. I express the hope that the blunder of 1970 will not be repeated in 1972 and that we will not through halfhearted lack of negotiation have to send my very good friend, dear old Senator Martin, down to the Caribbean to exculpate the blunders of a most insensitive government, as we did two years ago.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope that I can assure the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) that the value of our friendships in the Caribbean with our fellow Commonwealth members and with others is fully appreciated. I will just briefly review the history of this matter.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) told the House on Friday, February 25, which the hon. member mentioned, that the government has not entered into any discussions concerning a possible extension of tariff rebates on Commonwealth Caribbean sugar. The hon. member will recall that the government decided to terminate the sugar rebates paid to sugar producing countries of the Commonwealth Caribbean at the end of 1969, following the successful negotiation of an international sugar agreement. As a result of representations from the region, an extension of the rebates was agreed for 1970 in order to provide the industry with a longer period to adjust to the new circumstances. An additional extension of one year was made following lengthy consultations which Senator the Hon. Paul Martin had with Commonwealth Caribbean governments during his special mission to the region in late 1970.

Announcing the latest extension in December, 1970, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that it was for the year 1971 and that the situation would be reviewed when the government had considered the report of the tariff board on sugar which it was anticipated would be available early in 1971. This report was received by the government last autumn and was tabled in the House on November 10. The recommendations in that report are under consideration by the government and I can assure hon. members that the views of all those who might be affected by its recommendations, including the governments of the Commonwealth Caribbean, will be carefully considered before decisions are taken on the report.

As far as payments of these rebates are concerned, the amount is based on sugar imports from the Commonwealth Caribbean during the calendar year. At present, final figures for 1971 are not yet available; when they are, the payment for 1971 will be made. The payments for 1970 were made in March, 1971.

HEALTH—PROPOSED PAYMENT BY GOVERNMENT OF HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL CARE PREMIUMS FOR ALL INDIANS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on February 28 I addressed the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) who was unavoidably away from the House:

Is the government considering the problems created as a result of differences in the way hospital and medical care premiums are paid on behalf of the Indian people in various provinces, and is the government considering taking steps to pay the health taxes on behalf of all Indians as is the case in Alberta?

The Prime Minister was so interested in my question that I had to repeat it for his benefit and when he finally came to attention and took note of it he said he would take notice of the question on behalf of the minister. Later, I sent a note to the Minister of National Health and Welfare drawing his attention to the fact that I had asked this question and that I intended to place it on the list of subjects to be discussed at the time of the adjournment, and he thanked me for that note. I would like to discuss this question tonight.

I believe it is recognized by all that the federal government has responsibility for providing health care for the Indian people. What is the situation with respect to the payment of premiums, and of medicare premiums in particular? In 1969, Alberta introduced a medical care insurance plan. As I understand it, the federal government registered all Indians residing in Alberta and paid personal health tax on their behalf. Included were all Indians whose names appeared on band lists regardless of whether they resided on an Indian reserve or not. The federal government has continued to pay the health tax in Alberta on behalf of all Indians as defined in the Indian Act whether they reside on or off a reserve. I understand there is some provision for reimbursement from Indian people who are considered to be self-supporting. How this arrangement is working, I do not know.

What is the situation in other provinces such as the neighbouring province of Saskatchewan? The federal government does not pay the hospitalization or medical care tax on behalf of Indians residing outside an Indian reserve though it makes such payments in respect of Indians residing on a reserve or who have been outside a reserve for less than 12 months.

Two questions arise. The first is this: How can the federal government justify handling this program in such a way in one province and in another way in another province? This is especially so with respect to health programs where standards and quality of service or care are given such high importance.

• (2220)

How the government got into such a mess only the minister can explain, and he will have to do so. Can the minister expect any respect for his programs when the government does this sort of thing? There will be justifiable friction and irritation with the provinces, for one thing. Can the minister expect the Indian people to have any respect for his programs, or for the government, when this is what is being done? In such a delicate area that also involves federal-provincial relations, how does the minister justify treating one province differently from another as a matter of policy?

The second question is: What is the justification for treating off-reserve Indians differently from on-reserve Indians or, for that matter, some self-supporting Indians compared with non self-supporting Indians? Does not the federal government have a responsibility here which it accepted under treaties and through various programs over the years? I think the question must be asked: Is this the first step in a process whereby the government is trying to back out of its commitments and programs?

I think present policy discriminates against those Indians who want to join the urban trek to the cities. It discriminates against Indians who try to help themselves by adjusting to changing conditions. Often enough, people complain of Indians not showing sufficient ambition or initiative. What incentive is there for a person of Indian descent to help himself, if this is the approach that is taken by government in the handling of programs that affect him?

I urge the government to treat Indians in all provinces in the same way. I urge the government to accept its responsibility in this area and to pay premiums for all Indians under the Indian Act regardless whether they are on or off the reserve.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while there is no statutory or binding authority obligating the federal government to provide free health care to Indians at public expense, the federal government has accepted the moral obligation for more than 100 years of ensuring that no registered Indian suffers from lack of medical attention, either due to inability to pay or inaccessibility to adequate care, particularly if there is no other agency to which he can turn for assistance.

Indians should have the opportunity to achieve standards of health which are comparable to those of the rest of the country, and the federal government has maintained a policy of being willing to assist them through the arrangement for, or the provision of, basic public health services and essential treatment, not necessarily always at public expense.

Prior to the implementation of the two major national health insurance programs—hospital insurance in 1958 and medicare in 1968—there were many Canadians who could not purchase hospital insurance or medical insurance or, at best, could only obtain limited coverage or had to pay an unfairly high premium. It will be recalled that the private insurance industry in that era frequently denied health insurance coverage to Canadians on account of age or previous health, and in some cases, regrettably, even because of racial origin, such as Indians.

Consequently, in both of these Canadian health programs, one of the requirements which each corresponding provincial plan has had to meet in order to receive federal financial support is that the provincial plan had to make available uniform coverage to all eligible residents of the province, including registered Indians. This means in effect that a provincial plan cannot charge a particular group of residents a higher premium or give them less coverage than other residents in similar circumstances.

It is not considered to be a violation of the "uniform terms and conditions" concept when a province waives all or part of a health insurance premium on account of age or limited financial resources of the beneficiary, provided that all residents of the province who meet these requirements are treated equally. Where a province wishes to waive health insurance premiums for its residents who have reached the age of 65, for example, this is permitted as long as all residents of the province are entitled to the same privilege on reaching that age. In point of fact, this is the case in Alberta and Ontario—

Mr. Burton: And in Saskatchewan. Come on, get up to date.

Mr. Weatherhead: —and in both of these provinces the premium for Indians on reaching 65 has been waived as for the other residents.

In a similar way, when a province establishes an intermediate scale of health insurance premiums based on income class, this is permitted under the "uniform terms and conditions" requirement of federal legislation as long as all insurable residents of the province receive the same consideration. Thus, in Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, which are three provinces with scaled premium subsidies for those residents with limited incomes, the registered Indian who is a resident of one of these provinces receives exactly the same consideration as any other resident of his province on applying for premium assistance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but the time allotted for his reply has expired.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—DEATH OF SANDY LAKE WOMAN FROM MALNUTRITION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON HEALTH SERVICES IN NORTHERN ONTARIO OR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last I asked the Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) if he was aware of the tragic plight of Indians on the Sandy Hill reserve, 400 miles north of Kenora. The minister mentioned a few improvements in the situation but did not answer my question on whether he would agree to initiate a public inquiry into the deplorable condition of health services in the area.

A 50-year old Cree woman died on February 24 en route to hospital by plane. Cause of death was officially given as malnutrition and double pneumonia. I maintain that the true cause of her death was bureaucratic neglect and ineptitude.

This woman was 5 feet 8½ inches tall, but at the time of her death she weighed only 85 pounds. The circumstances of her death are a source of great bitterness to others in her community. She had spent ten years in a sanitorium where she was treated for tuberculosis and had part of one lung removed. Her medical history clearly indicated the need for close medical supervision during illness, but she was prevented from getting that attention either in her own community at North Spirit Lake or in a hospital until it was too late. This woman lay ill—severely ill—for several days without medical attention. Proper medication was not available, and so she was given two aspirins by a local, lay dispenser. Twenty-four hours later she was dead.

Fifteen hundred treaty Indians live in three communities on the Sandy Hill Reserve. Two of these communities had only lay dispensers; the third had a nursing staff, all employed by the Department of Health and Welfare. The closest doctor is 300 miles away. Details of the woman's illness had to filter through the lay dispenser to the nurses, and through the nurses to the doctor who was the only person with authority to have the woman sent to a hospital. The procedure took a week, and the woman died.

The coroner's jury made five recommendations: home visits by medical personnel should replace radio contact; all personnel performing medical duties in remote settlements should have nurses aid training; medical personnel in remote communities should be permitted to authorize flights of patients for treatment; additional nurses should be stationed in each isolated community; and, finally, a medical practitioner should be stationed in the Sandy Lake area to treat the 1,500 inhabitants.

To further illustrate the need for better medical services in such areas, let me mention that an influenza epidemic afflicted 350 people in the area from mid-December to mid-January. Nine people died. During the whole period of the epidemic, I am told, the Indians at North Spirit Lake received only one visit from a doctor, and he stayed for only two hours. Field workers from the Ontario Union of Indians had 27 people flown to Red Lake hospital. All were admitted, at a cost to the Union of $2,000. I am told that the bill will be sent to the Minister of Health.

The Indians of the Sandy Hill Reserve have several questions to ask of the Minister of Health. They want to know if the minister intends to implement the recommendations in the coroner's report. They want to know why lay dispensers in their area are white instead of Indian. And they want to know why lay dispensers are permitted to administer antibiotic and narcotic drugs to Indians who have not been seen by doctors.

The minister has told the House that steps are being taken to improve Indian health services. Would the minister agree to tell the House what these steps are, so that the House and the Canadian people can judge the extent of the government's commitment to improving the life of our native people?

[Mr. Blackburn.]

On behalf of these people I must urge that the minister not wait until starvation and disease put an end to the problems of the Sandy Hill Indians and Indians in other remote communities, but that he launch a full public inquiry into health services in the north.

• (2230)

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Medical and public health services in the bush country north of Sioux Lookout have been greatly expanded in the past few years through an extensive program made possible by co-operation between the Department of National Health and Welfare and the University of Toronto which deploys medical consultants, physicians and residents making available the highest possible standards of care. Improved communications have been developed between nursing stations which have been built by the department in the larger communities and the base hospital at Sioux Lookout, and between nursing stations and health stations in the small satellite communities which are staffed by community health aides who work on a part-time basis. The department has an active program for training community health aides, and some of the individuals doing this work are qualified as registered nurses or licensed practical nurses. The community health aide on duty at North Spirit Lake was qualified as a licensed practical nurse.

No medical service, however sophisticated, can prevent deaths during epidemics of influenza. Influenza is an acute infectious disease due to a virus for which there is no known specific treatment. Of importance is the rapidity with which epidemics evolve, placing heavy demands on health personnel who must adapt their activities to render assistance to the greatest number and to those who in their opinion need care the most.

It is the minister's view that the recommendation of the coroner's jury at Sandy Lake to the effect that medical authorities should give consideration to requests for home visits is difficult to reconcile with the facts of the case because the patient's death was being investigated and is being investigated. The patient was visited frequently at home along with many others in the community. The home visits at North Spirit Lake were made by a community health aide who is a licensed practical nurse, and also by a registered nurse who responded to the community health aide's request for assistance. Unfortunately, it is not always possible to predict which persons suffering from influenza will develop complications. The large number of persons who become ill not only increases the problems of surveillance but makes routine evacuation to hospital or to a nursing station impossible.

Complications, however, can be serious, develop suddenly and as a rule require care in hospital. The subject of the coroner's inquest was to be flown to hospital December 23, 1971, the same day her condition suddenly deteriorated as a result of a new complication, but the weather prevented this. Evacuation, unfortunately, was not possible until the next day. The existing procedures for chartering aircraft are regarded as satisfactory. They are, of course, subject to the availability of aircraft and to the weather.

I understand that the minister has received a full report on the inquest and the matter of the provision of medical services from the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) in whose riding Sandy Lake is located. I understand he attended the inquest and prepared a long memorandum on the matter for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro).

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

YOUTH

REPORT ON OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of a report published yesterday which seriously challenged the ability of last year's or this year's government youth programs to deal effectively with the basic problems of youth unemployment, in view of the discrimination with which the evaluation charged those programs, and in view of the high figure of unemployment among those under the age of 24, reaching 11 per cent last year, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan), the following motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

1. This House request the Secretary of State to table the Cohen Report on Summer '71 forthwith.

2. Refer the evaluation of Summer '71 to a Standing Committee.

3. The Secretary of State maintain his undertaking to call a broadly-based federal-provincial community conference on youth programming.

4. Direct the Secretary of State to call a meeting of provincial ministers and members of the business community so that a meaningful program of long range youth employment initiatives might be put into force at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agree.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1971-72

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (B) for the financial year ending March 31, 1972, was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing):

That the Supplementary Estimates (B), 1971-72, tabled this day, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move, pursuant to Standing Order 43, a motion on a matter of urgency. One of the difficulties last year with the Opportunities for Youth program was the lack of consideration given to young citizens in rural and remote areas of Canada who are denied equality of opportunity because of their isolation from normal communication.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, there is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member. I apologize to him for doing so, but he knows that the rule is well established that remarks made in connection with motions under Standing Order 43 ought to be limited to a brief indication of the urgency of the matter rather than argument. It seems to me that in the explanation the hon. member is now giving he is presenting argument rather than an indication of the urgency of the matter. We all know how sensitive an area Standing Order 43 can be, and I hope there will be co-operation on the part of all hon. members to try to keep in mind the suggestions I have made to hon. members from time to time, based on my interpretation of Standing Order 43.

Opportunities for Youth

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, since there is evidence of a repetition of this weakness this year and a resulting effect on the initiative and morale of young Canadians, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the deadline date for submitting projects be extended and that co-ordinators be directed to extend every effort to ensure the opportunity to participate of all Canadians regardless of where they live.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the motion proposed by the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

GRAIN

MOVEMENT AND HANDLING PROBLEMS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I want to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a question of urgent and pressing necessity. Substantial export grain commitments have to be met and terminals in Vancouver are now 17 million bushels short of grades of grain required. The railways have not met their commitments in grain movement. Actually, the railways are placing grain movement at the bottom of their priority list. Canadian National has refused to divert grain over the PGE railway when their own lines have been blocked. Also, car unloadings are low and men at the terminals have been paid off in recent days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this is a clear abuse of Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: No doubt the hon. member will say that the facts to which he has referred are important if he is to make his case for a motion under Standing Order 43. On that basis I am sure any member could get up and make a five-minute speech in justification of a motion under Standing Order 43. I remind hon. members that this is a very special Standing Order and that some day hon. members might be faced with a situation in which the government will want to use Standing Order 43. I am anxious to see what will be the reaction of hon. members at that time. I would think hon. members would want to keep in mind the very, very special nature of Standing Order 43 and try to limit their presentation to the urgency aspect of the motion without arguing in support of the motion.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I apologize if I went beyond the limits prescribed by the rule. It was because of the urgency and the difficulties involved that I did so. I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move:

[Mr. Speaker.]

That the matter of slowdowns and bottlenecks in grain movement and handling be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for study and report thereon.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Regina East under Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Claude-G. Lajoie (Trois-Rivières) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-167, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Trois-Rivières can briefly explain the object of the bill which he wishes to introduce.

Mr. Lajoie: Mr. Speaker, this bill is brought in firstly, at the request of my constituents in three cities; secondly, in order to avoid confusion between the names of the provincial and federal constituencies; and thirdly, at the provincial level, the constituency does not include the city of Cap-de-la-Madeleine which has 32,500 inhabitants.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House allow the hon. member to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

RESPONSE TO RECOMMENDATIONS BY CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS—ACCEPTANCE OF SUGGESTED FULL EMPLOYMENT BUDGETING

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Canadian Labour Congress has presented its annual memorandum to the right hon. gentleman and in view of the fact he has had it for several days and has studied it, I wonder whether he could indicate briefly his response to their recommendations as they pertain to employment and the economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could not do that briefly. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour yesterday spoke together for about 15 minutes on this point, and I am sure that if the hon. member would ask somebody for notes he might get these answers.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I had assumed that the Prime Minister received the brief. I should like to ask him specifically whether he accepts the principle of full employment budgeting, which was one of the recommendations of the Canadian Labour Congress, and, more specifically, whether the government is prepared now to introduce any new programs which would have the effect of stimulating the economy in a direction to achieve that particular principle?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the first question is rather a technical one that I really could not deal with very shortly in an answer to a question. The Minister of Finance certainly could at some time explain why we do not apply this concept. It might be of interest to the member to know that our budget has the equivalent effect of a full employment budget in a sense—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —but I realize from the guffaws that the matter is very little understood by the opposition parties.

An hon. Member: By the unemployed too.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the right hon. gentleman has indicated that his government has moved on the assumption of full employment budgeting, can he indicate briefly what prediction he has for the achievement of that goal in view of the indication that the unemployment picture will remain very serious during 1972? Can he indicate whether that will be achieved over a five-year period or a two-year period? What general parameters can he indicate to the Canadian people?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member should understand that the so-called device known as full employment budgeting does not guarantee that there will be full employment. It offers to governments and administrations a series of choices of levels at which expenditures and taxes can be equated. There are very many options possible, and it is impossible to answer that question at this time.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Was it under instruction of the government that the Minister of Finance about two weeks ago at Jasper advised the provincial finance ministers that the government's view was that the fight against inflation must be balanced with control of unemployment, that this point has now been reached and that the provinces were therefore to curtail any expansionary budget expenditures?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Prime Minister may wish to reply to the question but this should be done briefly. It seems to me we are now getting into the field of debate, but I will allow the Prime Minister to reply to the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot really reply in the terms in which the question was asked which simplify the position of the Minister of Finance to a considerable degree. But I do wish to say that of course the government is concerned, at the same time as it is concerned about full employment, with the possible inflationary effects in the future of the wrong kind of budgeting. I believe this danger is present in the minds of even some members of the opposition who asked us recently about the dangers of inflation.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize a last supplementary question from the hon. member for St. John's East and then recognize the hon. member for York South.

POLICIES TO ACHIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT TARGET RECOMMENDED BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Does the Prime Minister accept the target and the definition of the Economic Council of Canada which describes full employment as being 3.8 per cent, and does the government intend to pursue policies which will achieve this level of employment by 1975 as recommended by the Economic Council of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any level of unemployment is unfortunate for the percentage of people who are unemployed and therefore there is no reason why I would accept a target of 3.8 per cent. If we could go lower we would prefer it. In fact, just a couple of years ago there was less than 3.8 per cent unemployment in some parts of Canada and more in other parts. Therefore I cannot accept this target. What we want to do is to achieve the lowest possible rate of unemployment consistent with stable growth.

MANPOWER

ALLEGED APPOINTMENT OF LIBERAL PARTY OFFICIAL TO CARRY OUT STUDY IN WEST GERMANY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the unfortunate absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I should like to direct a question, or perhaps more than one, to the Prime Minister, of which I gave him notice. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has appointed J. P. Lefebvre, executive director of the Liberal party of Canada in Quebec and former member of the Quebec legislature to carry out a manpower policy study or some similar study in West Germany.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration today. I want to thank the hon. member for giving notice of his question which has now been passed on to me. I have asked that an inquiry be made into the matter and I will get a report on it for the hon. member.

Mr. Lewis: Without in any sense trying to belittle the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration, may I ask the Prime Minister as well as the minister in question to look into the matter of the appointment of Mr. Lefebvre and whether he still holds the position of Liberal party executive director in Quebec?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order. The hon. member for York South has the floor. Perhaps he might be given a chance to ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Lewis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not intend to compete with the noise across the way and I can stand and wait until hon. members are quiet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Come on, now.

Mr. Lewis: I should like to ask the Prime Minister and the minister this question. If Mr. Lefebvre is no longer executive director, when did that position end? Also, does the contract with him provide that he is to receive a salary of $600 a week as well as travelling and per diem allowances and the cost of secretarial services in addition to the salary, and exactly when was the appointment made?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that the first part of his question as to whether someone is a member of a political organization is hardly a question that can be asked of a minister. In any event, I am sure the second part of the question is in order, and the minister might be allowed to reply to that part of the inquiry if he has the information.

• (1430)

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman, like all of us, is interested in the facts of the situation. I am going to ascertain those facts and make a report.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I appreciated that a question about holding a certain party position could not be directed to the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. That is precisely why I directed my question to the Prime Minister as well as to the acting minister. It seems to me the Prime Minister has the authority to make the appointment and should inform the House whether this is another example of his new politics.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rose on a point of order. I disagree entirely with his interpretation of the Standing Orders so far as his point of order is concerned.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—CORRECTIVE MEASURES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the situation is becoming increasingly worse because a great number of unemployed must wait five, six or even ten weeks, especially in Quebec, before drawing their first cheque of unemployment insurance benefits, can the Prime Minister tell us whether his government intends to improve those conditions in the very near future?

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am answering for the Unemployment Insurance Commission today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Perrault: If there are cases of what is alleged to be an inordinate delay these will be investigated immediately, as the hon. member is aware. Mr. Speaker, I would point out that there has been a dramatic decline in the number of complaints about delayed payments in the last two weeks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—POSSIBLE DECENTRALIZATION OF SERVICES FROM MONTREAL

Mr. Beaudoin: I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Since these difficulties have been experienced only after payment services were centralized mainly in Montreal, could the Parliamentary Secretary say whether the government is planning to decentralize the offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission?

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are now 200 centres in Canada, either main offices or service offices, to attend to the unemployment needs of the Canadian people. In addition, the resources of 400 manpower offices are being investigated to make sure that every possible service is extended to the unemployed of this country.

Mr. Baldwin: That is because there are so many unemployed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have glanced round the House and noticed that there are exactly 13 members who are rising to ask supplementaries. I am not sure whether that number is lucky, but we certainly cannot spend too much time on supplementaries. I will try to be fair by having a sampling of hon. members on supplementaries and then go to the next questioner.

MONTREAL—DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Parliamentary Secretary who has just answered my colleague.

Since all cases of delay in the payment of benefits which have been submitted to hon. members have been forwarded, at the minister's request, to the regional office, as well as to the central office in Montreal, and since after several weeks, these cases have not yet been settled, in spite of what the minister has said, is the latter prepared to order immediately that an investigation be held regarding the operation of the Commission's electronic computers in Montreal so that cheques can be issued and people can stop living on fresh air only, thanks to appropriate resources?

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can assure hon. members that there is a continuing study taking place into methods whereby the most modern electronic techniques may be introduced to improve unemployment insurance services further. There are a number of specific studies under way, and if improvements can be made they will be made.

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—ACTION TO PREVENT LOAN-SHARK OPERATIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. I should like to refer to a question to the parliamentary secretary by another hon. member, as recorded on page 262 of Hansard for February 25:

> Is the department aware of loan-sharking operations, the lending of money against unemployment insurance cheques, resulting from the delays in payment and, if so, what action is the commission taking to prevent this occurrence?

Has the parliamentary secretary any further answer today?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that this is a source of great concern to the minister and to the department. Our UIC general legal counsel has contacted the small loans division of the Department of Insurance and they are prepared to carry out an inspection of the books of some of the people who advertised in the Calgary and Winnipeg press. I assure members that an investigation is being carried out to determine whether the practices being followed by the so-called loan sharks infringe the law. If such is the case, I can assure hon. members that if possible appropriate measures will be taken. This is not a practice that is welcomed by the government or the department.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member for Joliette wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. La Salle: This is not a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize on a last supplementary the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—POSSIBLE DECENTRALIZATION OF SERVICES FROM MONTREAL

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary to the minister who says that there are 200 centralized offices across Canada.

We would like to know whether the department intends to decentralize?

In my own area, for instance, that is 400 miles from Montreal, they always answer that the Montreal computer is out of order and the people have not received any benefits since October.

Does the department intend to decentralize in order that an area like ours, for instance, may have an office.

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there has been a 50 per cent increase in the number of unemployment insurance offices since 1970. If the hon. member can develop a persuasive case for the extension of unemployment insurance services in his area, it will be looked at.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This debate is now ended and the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Kent-Essex.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—REASON FOR DELAY IN RESUMING TALKS ON AUTO PACT

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can he indicate whether the delay in the trade talks between the United States and Canada on the auto pact will last until a definite agreement is reached on the value of the Canadian dollar compared with the U.S. dollar and, if not, what is the other basic reason for the present delay?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give reasons why the Americans are not yet ready to open formal discussions with us on this matter. I can only say it does not appear to be related to the factors mentioned by the hon. member, nor to the presentation of a foreign investment policy by the Canadian government. It seems to be in an area of its own not related to other factors.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Can he inform the House why the government has decided to wait until after the next election before it signs a new agreement on auto trade with the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is argument and not a procedurally legitimate question.

FISHERIES

SWORDFISH—SUGGESTED LICENSING OF SELECTIVE FISHING OPERATIONS TO DETERMINE MERCURY LEVEL

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the collapse early in 1971 of the North American market for swordfish, which has caused financial hardship for our swordfish fishermen, has the minister given any consideration to licensing selective swordfishing operations in any areas of Atlantic Canada in order to determine whether there has been any decline in mercury levels and, if so, when can we expect an up to date report on this important aspect of our fisheries?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the basic problem arises with the United States food and drug administration requirement that no fish be imported into that country with more than half of one part per million of mercury in it. We can export swordfish to Europe with impunity, but the price is not attractive there.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask just one supplementary question. In view of the fact swordfish are still being landed in some of the New England markets, has the minister taken any steps to secure the lifting of the ban on swordfish sales to the United States?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, swordfish being landed in the United States do not enter into interstate trade. Since we face national standards rather than state standards we have difficulty selling our swordfish in the U.S.A.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING STAFF RELATIONS ACT AND TABLING OF BRYDEN REPORT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. In view of the apparent leaks of the contents of the Bryden report submitted to the then Minister of Manpower and Immigration last June, leaks which I contend do not correspond to the substance of the report, would the minister inform the House about the recommendations made by the task force in order to dispel the suspicion that the Treasury Board and, more specifically, its President are using the ignorance of the public with respect to the contents of the recommendations in order to put the public service unions under pressure in the current disputes?

[Mr. Pepin.]

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This appears to be an argument, but the minister might be allowed to reply briefly to the question asked by the hon. member.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall answer the question if only to introduce myself as the minister responsible for this particular phase of government operations. All I want to tell the hon. member is that the report to which she refers is in my hands at the moment and is under study.

Mrs. MacInnis: Would the President of the Privy Council agree to table the Bryden report in its entirety so that the public, the unions involved and their membership will be finally informed about the government's intentions in respect of amending the Public Service Staff Relations Act?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to tell the House that it is not my intention to table this document because it is an internal document for the advice of the government and that is why it will not be tabled. I should also like to mention that the reports I have read in the newspapers about this report are highly speculative and, finally, that there is no intention to have legislative action on this report at this session.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I ask a final supplementary of the President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be allowed a last supplementary on this subject.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNIONS—ASSURANCE THAT RIGHT TO STRIKE NOT BEING THREATENED

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he can assure the House, solemnly or otherwise, that he is not using the threat to rescind the right to strike as a bludgeon in current negotiations with the Public Service unions?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member, both solemnly and otherwise, that I have never threatened withdrawal of the right to strike.

CRIMINAL CODE

ABORTION—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION—ESTABLISHMENT OF FAMILY PLANNING POLICY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Some ten days ago, in Ontario, the Prime Minister stated that he was not contemplating any change in the legislation on abortion as long as he himself is not convinced of the need for such a move. I would like to ask him if he can assure the House and the Canadian population that no change in that connection will be brought about before the government has put into effect an effective family planning policy.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had some difficulty understanding the whole question. If I do not answer correctly, the hon. member may wish to ask a supplementary.

Government policy on this subject has already been announced. We intend to have a debate in the House and to hear the views of hon. members. I hope the hon. member will take that opportunity to indicate what his own opinion is.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—INTERIM GUIDELINES PENDING STATEMENT OF POLICY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. During the period while the background study is being rewritten and until the government introduces its legislation outlining its policy on foreign investment in Canada, is it the intention of the government to issue guidelines or set out any procedures for regulating the takeover of Canadian companies by foreign interests?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member should feel perfectly free to proceed as he wishes.

Mr. Hees: Is the country to assume that the government intends to continue to deal with each of these cases on an ad hoc basis founded on nothing more substantial than political expediency rather than according to an established policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is obviously argument. The hon. member for Calgary North.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REPRESENTATIONS FOR NEW TRIAL FOR YVES GEOFFROY—METHOD AND NAME OF PERSON

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General. On February 28 I asked the Solicitor General a question which appears on page 302 of Hansard and on March 1 I put the question again to his parliamentary secretary, of which he took notice. I wonder if the minister is prepared to give an answer today. I will read part of the answer in order to familiarize the Solicitor General with the situation. His reply was:

Mr. Speaker, someone who claimed to know where Mr. Geoffroy is suggested it to me. My reply was very simple: the laws of the country apply to every citizen. If Mr. Geoffroy wants to ask for a new trial—

The Solicitor General has said that someone approached him. Was that done by telephone, was it done by letter, was it done by personal contact, who was that person and what day was that contact made?

Mr. Basford: You are not in a court room.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I find that the hon. member's informer, against whom a warrant for arrest for fraud was issued in 1971 by the Quebec Police Force, has not yet been apprehended.

A reporter, acting as such, called me on the phone. There was no blackmail nor dishonest proposal, and I told the reporter, as I stated in my answer, that the laws of the country applied to all citizens, including Mr. Geoffroy, and that if the latter felt that he was entitled to a new trial, he had to put forth his reasons for so believing, just like any other citizen, directly to the Canadian Minister of Justice.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Maybe the Solicitor General misunderstood one part of my question. What was the name of that reporter and who did the reporter say he was with at the time he made the telephone call to the Solicitor General?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's informer against whom a warrant for arrest was issued in 1971, has himself revealed the name of the reporter, and the reporter has confirmed. So, I do not hesitate to say it: it is Mr. Lavergne, who is the editor in chief and a very responsible reporter for Montreal's Dimanche-Matin.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Solicitor General.

Since the hon. minister has just referred twice specifically to an informer of my hon. colleague from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), I should like to ask him who are his informers concerning the Geoffroy case, and whether he has others, outside of his department, who could give him information on the Geoffroy case.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps the same informer to whom the hon. member resorts when launching false rumours to the effect that—

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a question of privilege.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Solicitor General has just stated that the informer who allegedly gave information to my colleague was also my informer. I flatly assert that the hon. minister lied to this House when he said that. He must withdraw his words because the person to whom the Solicitor General referred is not at all my informer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is clearly a difficulty between the minister and the hon. member. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie is well aware that he cannot accuse an hon. member or a minister of lying. I am sure the hon. member for Sainte-Marie might like to express himself differently to indicate that he is not in agreement with the minister.

In my opinion, there is clearly conflict as to facts between the hon. minister and the hon. member, a daily occurrence in the House, and I believe there is no necessity, when a minister and an hon. member do not agree as to interpretation of facts, to resort to unparliamentary language.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

I used the very expression the Solicitor General himself used on television yesterday when he accused opposition members of lying. If the Solicitor General is willing to withdraw the imputation in his statement to the effect that Richer was my informer, I shall withdraw the word, "lied" as you have invited me to.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I agree with the hon. member for Sainte-Marie that the minister—

[English]

Order, please. I wonder if hon. members might like to take an interest in what is going on in the House at the present time, if there is an interest in what is going on at the present time.

[Translation]

I would suggest to hon. members that certainly no minister or member can credit another member with any intentions and that such was not the wish of the hon. minister. The latter was certainly not entitled to do that any more than the hon. member is entitled to use unparliamentary language. I am prepared to take it that the minister confirms to the House that he would not impute any motives to the hon. member who in turn will confirm that he did not want to use unparliamentary language. Thus both will be considered as having withdrawn their remarks in so far as they are not of a parliamentary nature.

Does the hon. member agree with my interpretation of the Standing Orders?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I agree.

Mr. Valade: I agree for the first time with the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: So everybody is satisfied.

[Mr. Valade.]

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—DISCUSSION WITH NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER—POSSIBLE AMENDMENT OF GOVERNMENT PROPOSAL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister indicate whether in his conversations in Halifax last week he got into serious discussion with the premier of the province of Nova Scotia of sharing arrangements with regard to both royalties and responsibility for administration and regulatory control in respect of offshore minerals?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We discussed offshore mineral rights.

Mr. Forrestall: Is the minister prepared to indicate whether during the course of these discussions with the premier and other officials of Nova Scotia a slightly better or a more relaxed position than the 50/50 sharing arrangement that has been publicly suggested to date was discussed?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my visit to that particular city was to hear the premier's viewpoint and I did so. I did not make any offer to him.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE AND JAMES BAY POWER DEVELOPMENT—CANCELLATION IF DAMAGE TO ECOLOGY TOO GREAT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of recent statements by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the effect that a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley is virtually assured, will the Prime Minister assure the House that such a pipeline will not be allowed to proceed if the potential damage to the ecology is too great?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government's policy on this has been stated many times. I believe the Minister of the Environment can give the details of the $15 million program in which we are engaged to make sure that this does not happen.

Mr. Harding: Can the Prime Minister give the same assurance with respect to the James Bay project?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the assurance cannot be the same because the problem is not the same. However, I believe the House was notified a month or so ago that a joint study on the problems of the environment was made by the Quebec government and the federal government. This study was made public, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF PETITION OF OLD CROW INDIANS TO COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Eric Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a related question to the government House leader. The petition of the Old Crow Indian people was laid on the table last week. Will the government House leader consider favourably allowing the House to refer this petition by unanimous consent to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the government House leader give this matter his earliest consideration and perhaps make an announcement with regard to the government's intentions with respect to hearing the people of Old Crow on their petition?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to give this matter further consideration. However, at the present time it appears to me there are some procedural difficulties with which the House has really not yet dealt in terms of referring petitions to standing committees for study. I will give the matter further consideration.

AIRPORTS

OPPOSITION TO LOCATION OF NEW FACILITY NEAR PICKERING—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the very strong and angry opposition to the new airport location at Pickering and the destruction of the very finest of farmland and an historic village? Does the minister propose to make a statement to the House on this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not propose to make any additional statement to the House other than the one I made when announcing the project. However, I might point out to the hon. member and the House that the expropriation proceedings allow for and, in fact, require the appointment of a hearing officer and the lodging of complaints in a formal manner. These are dealt with in the appropriate way. If there are objections, they can be heard at that time.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have been reading an article in today's March 7 edition of the Globe and Mail. It is hard to tell the page number because I only have a photostat. This article draws attention to a LIP program in my constituency. I would like to make an explanation to the House concerning it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister knows the rules. He cannot rise at any time on a question of privilege which has reference to an article in a newspaper. The minister has to give notice to the Chair in the usual way according to the Standing Orders and explain the question of privilege at the opening of the House. That is the standard practice and it should be followed by all hon. members. I should not say "standard practice". It is the practice provided for by the Standing Orders and should be adhered to by all hon. members.

HOUSING

VILLE DE LAVAL—GRANTING OF LOAN FOR PROJECT " "RESIDENCE RICHELIEU"

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Can he tell us why his department granted a $950,000 loan for the housing project known as "Residence Richelieu" at Ville de Laval, which may be demolished any moment now because of zoning regulations? Can the minister give us some explanations in this regard?

[English]

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON FUTURE OF NORAD—POSSIBLE MODIFICATIONS IN DEFENCE-SHARING AGREEMENT

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs perhaps the Prime Minister might answer my question. Are discussions planned with the United States for later this year with respect to the future of NORAD, and is the government of Canada giving consideration to attempting to bring about major modifications in our defence-sharing agreement with the United States during those discussions if they are to be held?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe this question was covered in our white paper on defence. If my memory is correct, the NORAD agreements only expire in 1974.

An hon. Member: 1973.

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore I assume there will be no meetings in the immediate future. I will consult with the Secretary of State for External Affairs to see about the further future.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST THAT INITIALS BE AS PROMINENTLY DISPLAYED AS WORD "POLICE" IN LIGHT OF PROTESTS AGAINST CHANGE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Having regard to the very numerous representations that have been directed to the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General and, indeed, to many members of parliament objecting most vigorously to the action taken in removing the initials "RCMP" from police buildings and vehicles and replacing them with the word "police", can the Prime Minister assure the House and the country that the initials "RCMP" will be displayed as prominently as the word "police" in the designation of our national police force?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of this question is that it had been decided as an administrative matter by the police themselves. I believe their decision was to use the word "police" more prominently in some cases than the letters "RCMP".

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the widespread protests with regard to the action that has been taken, will the Prime Minister consider using his good offices and influence with a view to having this directive either withdrawn or reversed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly ascertain whether the Solicitor General discussed this matter with the Commissioner of the RCMP. I am rather certain he has discussed it. The RCMP must be aware of the kind of noise that has been made on this subject in the past couple of weeks. If the Commissioner feels the decision is wrong, he will discuss it with the minister. I, personally, do not propose to tell the RCMP that they should make a change on my direction.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH—SUGGESTED TABLING OF EVALUATION REPORT ON 1971 PROGRAM

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It follows the commitment he made yesterday to investigate the leaking of the Cohen report relative to the summer youth program last year. The Prime Minister said he would look into this. Bearing in mind the fact that early last September the Secretary of State indicated that Mr. Cohen's report would be tabled by the end of the year, by the end of last year, has the Prime Minister been able to ascertain when we may expect to have this important document, particularly since a little more than 24 hours remain in which applications under the Opportunities for Youth program can be made?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Acting Secretary of State): Perhaps the Prime Minister wishes to answer, but as Acting Secretary of State I believe there is some confusion in the mind of the hon. gentleman. The Secretary of State undertook to table an evaluation of the program, noting that the evaluation involved a number of reports including that which is called the Cohen report. I doubt very much, subject to correction, that he undertook to table the Cohen report.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, I am grateful for the information from the Pooh-Bah—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —from the acting minister of whatever he is acting for. I do not have the record before me, but I checked it before I came into the chamber. On December 9, in response to a question in the House, the Secretary of State indicated that the Cohen report would be published in full by the end of the month, acknowledging that the initial report was but a preliminary document—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This discussion between the minister and the hon. member for Egmont could go on for a long time. Perhaps the two hon. members might get together and pursue the matter later. We have reached the end of the question period.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a supplementary point of order or to ask a supplementary? The last point of order has taken the last few minutes of the question period and we have to call orders of the day.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order—

Mr. Gibson: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Egmont resume his seat? Perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth would allow me to complete the point of order raised by the hon. member for Egmont. I think that in principle there would be priority for a question of privilege, but with his indulgence I will hear the point of order first and then listen to the hon. member's argument in support of his question of privilege.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister indicated yesterday, first to the Leader of the Opposition and later to myself, that he would give some idea when this important document might be published. Could we hear from the Prime Minister or the Acting Secretary of State as to whether in fact this document will be made public?

Mr. O'Connell: I think we shall have to clarify just what the Secretary of State did say in the mind of the hon. gentleman.

An hon. Member: It is on the record.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order? Obviously we are getting into a resumption of the argument between the hon. member and the minister. I suggested a moment ago that an attempt be made to clear up the situation at some other time. It certainly cannot be done on a point of order or by a statement today.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a question of privilege, if these important proceedings in the House during the question period are to have any value whatever, then surely an undertaking by the Prime Minister in answer to a question raised yesterday must be followed up by some kind of response, either from him or from another minister of the government. So far we have had no answer to this question and I am wondering whether the rights of the House generally are not being infringed by the cavalier approach which the Prime Minister and other members of the administration are taking.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. We are merely continuing the same debate. I shall now listen to the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth on his question of privilege.

Mr. Gibson: In view of the irrelevant questions asked by the opposition, I want to ask an emergency question from my riding about damage—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that he cannot, under the guise of a question of privilege, ask a question. I have advised hon. members from day to day that when we have reached the end of the question period they should not seek to direct further questions by raising points of order and questions of privilege. If a very urgent question could not be asked today, I am sorry. I am sure the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth was the only one who did not have an opportunity to ask a question. I tried to note those who were not able to ask questions today and I will do my best to give them priority tomorrow. I undertake to recognize the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth during the question period tomorrow.

Control of Government Expenditures

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I wish to raise a new point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have waited until we have reached the end of the question period. It is well known that, even though it is not officially recognized by the rules of the House, the government has unilaterally imposed a roster system involving the attendance of ministers to deal with questions of the day. This system has never functioned effectively and we find ourselves this afternoon at a point where six ministers listed on this infamous roster are not present to answer questions, leading to the public spectacle of one of the neophyte ministers having to answer for half the government ministers. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, as the senior officer of this House, to take into consideration the government's deliberate commitment to keep more than half the members of the administration away from this chamber during the important business of the question period each and every day.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O.58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED MISMANAGEMENT AND WASTE OF TAXPAYERS' MONEY—NEED FOR MORE PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL OF ESTIMATES AND EXPENDITURES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement and waste of taxpayers' money and urges that parliament take steps to exercise greater scrutiny and control over estimates and expenditures.

He said: May I rise for a few moments on a point of order Mr. Speaker? First, as to the wording of the motion as it appears on the order paper, I should point out that in the third line, the word "urge" appears. It should be "urges". I exonerate the officers of the House, as I did encounter a little difficulty yesterday in putting the motion together. Second, it has been suggested that after the first four speakers have taken part in the debate the time allotted to hon. members should be limited to 15 minutes. I am making this suggestion because it might well be, as a result of the interest in the subject matter, that a large number of members will wish to make contributions.

Mr. MacEachen: I have no objection to there being a time limit of 15 minutes, but I wish to make it clear that the spokesman for the government, whether he is the fourth speaker in the debate or whether he speaks later, will not be limited.

Mr. Baldwin: I understand that. The official spokesman for the government would, of course, be allowed 30 minutes pursuant to the rule.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Our understanding of the situation is that the mover will have 30 minutes, the official spokesman for the government will have 30 minutes and the first spokesman for each of the other two parties will have 20 minutes as provided in the rule, while the remainder of the speakers will have 15 minutes each. We agree to that.

• (1510)

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we agree but with reservations similar to those voiced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I am really very sorry to break up this interesting question period but the rules allow me no alternative. May I point out to the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, that it may well be that this subject matter is not as colourful and controversial as some members might like. Nevertheless, it is the view of the members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition that every once in a while during the course of a parliament some effort should be made to come to the aid of the beleaguered taxpayer.

It seems to us that there are an awful lot of taxpayers. To paraphrase what Abraham Lincoln said, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) must love the taxpayers because he has made so many of them. In any event, this matter is surely of the essence in view of the fact there is no doubt at all that there are a great many responsible people who are concerned about the performance of the economy and that the real problems of unemployment, inflation and economic growth, not only in Canada but in the United States and Europe, are not responding to orthodox remedies.

There is a lack of confidence. There is lack of confidence on the part of the business community in this government. While the government may be temporarily altering its stance, we note that this is only temporary. There is lack of confidence on the part of consumers in this government. They lack the confidence that the government can take the essential steps to place under some control the accelerating cost of living. Finally, there is lack of confidence on the part of the taxpayer that this government has the capacity or the will to check the deadly twin viruses of increasing taxation and inefficient handling of the taxpayers' money. Attempts by the Parliament of Canada at restraint and scrutiny have become a mockery and a farce. There needs to be a new flowering of the strength of parliament to deal with this very serious problem.

Governments more and more seem to be bland, anonymous bureaucrats with the power to command the lives and take the property of people, to tell them what do do and how to do it, and there seems very little hope of getting any change. The end result is inevitable: there is cynicism, frustration, militancy and often confrontation and violence in the streets. People will therefore turn their faces away from government as we know it, from the legislative system and the whole democratic process, and many of them are.

But despite all the warts and defects of the parliamentary system, I suggest all the other methods by which people contrive to order their affairs are infinitely worse. The neat trick is to take what we have and make it better, make it work, and, like the ideal of justice, make it be seen to be working. The infinite wisdom of the ages lies in all of the people in society, and the problem is to find and use these truths as the basis for the rules under which society operates. People need to know this. They need to know and to believe that the system can be delicately tuned and made responsive to their views; that not only the majority but the minority, even the individual, who has a cause to plead, a wrong to right and a proposal to urge, will be provided with some means by which to do so. This can be the parliamentary structure when it has the freedom and the mechanism to operate. But that is what is lacking today.

The parliamentary system of government should be like the two pans of a scale, evenly balanced between the executive branch on the one side, and the legislative branch on the other side. That is a principle that, I think, is acceptable to all people. But what has happened? There has been a grotesque distortion. There has been poured into the pan on the executive side of the scales more and more weight; on the other side, there has been a taking away from the legislative branch of many of the powers and authorities it requires. In the result, this distortion is very apparent in the limited way that this parliament can check expenditures and scrutinize the estimates of government. I know government needs to have power, strength and the ability to act quickly. But there needs to be, as the Prime Minister himself said, a countervailing force. This is what we lack and it is what this party proposes to do something about.

Recently the Prime Minister, in a speech made to the National Conference on the Law, said something which I regard with great concern. These are his words:

> Perhaps in some instances the adversary system, so revered by lawyers, is a counter-productive element in the political process; for example, in relations between various levels of government.

Further on in his speech the Prime Minister confirmed that view. I question the validity of that assertion. The doctrine of infallibility comes, of course, easily to those who occupy the chairs of state. Such being the case, the only safety lies, in part, in the adversary system, with the ability to press for change, to refine, to restrict or in any way to cope with the bureaucratic despotism, stupidity, inaction, stealth and secrecy which from time to time characterize this administration. The white paper on taxation was changed largely because of the adversary system. When in turn that white paper was translated into a bill, there were important changes made in the bill as a result of pressure exerted by people both outside the House and inside this House. That is the virtue of the adversary system.

That is not all, Mr. Speaker. I could list a number of issues that have benefitted from this system, such as the government reorganization bill, Bill C-176, the grain stabilization bill, and, of course, the infamous bill that this government brought in over a year ago in an attempt to curtail the power and independence of the Auditor General. Because of the adversary system, and because of pressure outside the House and representations made in the House, the government was compelled to withdraw that bill. Hearing statements of this kind made from the Prime Minister and supported by his colleagues, and noting many of the trends of the government in Ottawa today, it is time for all good men who believe in the parliamentary system to draw together and challenge the government.

Without in any way restricting the list, let me outline some of the more dangerous changes that we see taking place from day to day. There are the fundamental changes in the character of legislation, where today all too often bills are merely enabling acts, vague declarations of principle, with the dry bones being fleshed out by orders in council, decrees and regulations made by the bureaucracy in the secret places of their private offices without the knowledge, consent or advice of parliament. In that regard I urge the government to take steps at once to establish the scrutiny committee that is set up by the statutory instruments act. That committee will form one of the bulwarks against this kind of despotism which we so often encounter in this country.

• (1520)

We must also consider the growth, at an abnormal rate, of this bureaucracy. Their elite have now become the high priests of our society and we build great, shining temples to them throughout the land and worship before the altars in those temples. Then, we must consider, as well, the enlargement of the office and the growth in power of the leader of the government so that, through the bureaucratic machine at his command and by the skilful use of the media, he will always appear larger than life; also, the refusal of government to furnish people with proper and adequate information of the public affairs of the land. Further, we must consider the lack of adequate checks and restraints on public spending.

That old grey mare the Treasury Board has recently unbent enough to put out, during the last two sessions, a shiny new pamphlet called, "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent".

Mr. Dinsdale: She ain't what she used to be.

Mr. Baldwin: On page 9 of this year's copy appears the following statement:

> Rooted in Canadian tradition and through centuries of British history is a basic parliamentary responsibility of granting 'supply', the term applied to the process by which Parliament considers proposed government expenditures—
>
> One of the continuing and basic powers of Parliament is its ultimate control over the public purse.

That, Mr. Speaker is the way it should be.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is the way it used to be.

Mr. Baldwin: But that is not the way it is. That statement is pure and utter bilge.

Mr. Drury: That is the way it is.

Mr. Baldwin: I am not alone in my view. My colleagues share it. If hon. members opposite were free to speak their minds, they would agree with me when I say that the statement I have read does not represent the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: But they dare not say that.

Mr. Hees: Be careful; big brother is watching.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I now quote from a column recently written by that great Canadian columnist, Charles Lynch. He wrote this soon after the latest blue book of estimates was inflicted upon Parliament:

> The unfortunate thing is, however, that while the costs of government continue to go up, there is no sign of an increase in government efficiency.
> —the size of the public payroll today, relative to the amount of work being produced, is a bigger disgrace than ever. Glassco was too late, and nothing can save the taxpayer now, or ever.

Time is of the essence in debates of this kind, so that I will simply limit myself to outlining some of the areas where there is ground for legitimate complaint on behalf of the taxpayers of this country about the way their money is being spent by the government, and the way in which estimates for those expenditures are placed before Parliament and approved.

In this connection, as well, we shall need to consider the unholy mess disclosed by the secret memorandum from the Deputy Director of Information Canada; certain expenditures on behalf of the Department of National Defence relating particularly to the Bonaventure, the hydrofoil vessel and the DDH destroyer program, which is still pending; some of the projects contained in the local initiatives program; the manpower training and unemployment insurance benefits fiasco, and the housing program; and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and its method of making grants and providing subsidies. If I have an opportunity, and if time permits, I will go into details with respect to these matters later, Mr. Speaker. Some of my colleagues who will follow me will deal particularly with some of the areas I have mentioned, and will outline clearly sufficient evidence to convince even hon. members opposite that the government is stupid. They will establish beyond any reasonable doubt incompetence, mismanagement, waste, stupidity and gross carelessness in the payment of taxpayers' money.

It is the duty of an opposition to be critical, Mr. Speaker, to point out errors and defects in the operations of government. I submit that Her Majesty's loyal opposition has, during the course of this Parliament, gone beyond this and from time to time made a series of alternative proposals and suggestions which will be found incorporated in the various amendments which we have offered, either with respect to legislation or in the form of various opposition day motions we have moved. I am not suggesting that they contain the sum total of our alternative policies. I want to make the point, in answer to those who have indicated that we have not suggested any alternative remedies, that a full examination of the parliamentary records and of Hansard will make it abundantly clear that we have discharged our proper responsibilities and offered rational alternatives. Why, then, have some of these programs slipped through? Why are they being maladministered? Why is money being paid out as it is now being paid out? And, what can be done about it?

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the committee system has not worked as was expected and many of its original proponents now doubt its value. I have talked to hon.

members opposite, who agree with me. Many of them, as I say, doubt its total value, particularly in so far as estimates are concerned. Mr. Speaker, there must be changes. All we have today is a minuet of committees. In many instances there is no opportunity and no means for hon. members to come to grips with the question of estimates, payments and expenditures. The basic principle governing supply, a principle that has come down to us through the ages, has been eliminated. This principle is that supply ought to be held up until basic grievances raised in this place by members of the House on behalf of the people of Canada have been answered. At present, Sir, there is no real opportunity for this to be done.

At present, estimates must be passed by a calendar date. Even if there has not been adequate study with regard to some of the items, and in many instances there certainly has not, all the votes are automatically deemed to have been passed by a certain date. In committees, the intention was to provide government members with an opportunity to be objective and independent, and avoid the party whip. This has not been the case. Government members fall neatly into file and toe the party line when estimates are challenged. A recent column written by George Bain in the Toronto Globe and Mail demonstrated this. He said in part:

—the principle of responsibility always looming, the committees in the end will report on any vital matter precisely on party lines.—

—But it would be worthwhile to examine, openly, to see whether it would be beyond Canadian ingenuity to devise a system which, by reducing to a very small handful the occasions on which a government might be defeated in the House and have to give up power, would permit some relaxation of the dead hand of party discipline as now applied.

I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will heed the message and relax the stern discipline under which all members are restrained when estimates are discussed, so that backbenchers on the government side in particular may be free to vote according to the dictates of their consciences rather than according to the way they are told to vote.

Mr. Pepin: You people had better watch your own discipline.

Mr. Baldwin: Let me talk for a moment about supplementary estimates. Today we were given supplementary estimates B, involving some $433 million. Supplementary Estimates A were tabled in the House on November 19, 1971 and totalled some $872 million. In other words, by virtue of these supplementary estimates, more that $1 billion has been added to the spending program of this government. What opportunity do hon. members have to deal with these supplementary estimates? What has happened, Mr. Speaker?

The estimates of 25 departments were contained in Supplementary Estimates A which totalled altogether $872 million odd. There were 87 votes in all in those supplementary estimates. Because of the limitation of time pursuant to our Standing Orders, only 32 of those votes were considered. We never discussed 55 of them. They were never debated, never questioned. Not a single question was put in the committee, largely because of the fixed date for passing the estimates which governed the work of the committee. The estimates were out of the committee on December 7 and were the subject of an appropriation bill in this House on December 9. Mr. Speaker, that was shabby treatment. That was not good enough. The people of Canada are being ill served by Parliament when the rules established by this government permit sharp practices by the government and even encourage this to happen.

There is a great lack of detailed information in the estimates. I shall not go into the details of that, but I defy even members of this House, after looking at the estimates to comprehend what is involved. They are full of gobbledygook. Those people in the Treasury Board who know about them may understand them, but to the average member of the public and even to members of this House they simply do not make sense. I am not alone in saying this. The Auditor General said it in many of his reports to this House. The Public Accounts Committee has said it also on a great many occasions. I suggest that a very serious look should be taken at this particular problem, so that when we examine these estimates they will be comprehensible and we will have the capacity to deal with them.

In addition to that, I suggest that the estimates of at least four or five departments must be brought to the House each session by way of Committee of Supply. These should be at the choice of the opposition. This would mean that, during the course of the average Parliament of four years, more than half the departments of government would have had their estimates discussed in the wider forum of the House of Commons. I am not suggesting at this time that we revert entirely to the old system. We may consider this, at least as a half-way house, but I think it is absolutely essential that commencing this session at least four or five departments should have their estimates considered in the House in Committee of Supply. Then, there should be a vote on every motion brought in by the opposition parties on the 25 opposition days, although only six of these would be construed as being non-confidence motions. There is no reason the government should not be compelled to take a stand and that all members be counted. This could be done if it were clearly understood that these were not non-confidence motions. At the present time, unless there is a motion on which there is to be a vote, the procedure becomes more and more futile so far as the opposition is concerned.

I have already indicated that in my view the form of the estimates should be changed to conform with the proposals made by the Public Accounts Committee and by the Auditor General. In that regard there is one important suggestion I make to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). Members of this House, members of committees and the public should be aware of the present estimated cost of programs. We have often seen the situation where some large program is introduced with a blaring of trumpets and loud hallelujahs. It is rumoured that the cost will be X million dollars. Each year we find in the estimates a limited amount of money included to cover that particular year's work on that project. What we do not know, however, from year to year is by how much the cost of that project escalates and, by the time the project is completed, we learn to our dismay and certainly to the dismay and anxiety of the taxpayer that it cost not X million of dollars but rather four times X million of dollars.

I suggest to the President of the Treasury Board that in each vote of the estimates of this kind there should be included the original project cost, the present estimated cost and any proposals or thoughts which may be in the mind of the Treasury Board about the final cost. Such information should be available in clear and specific language to members of the House and the public so that they would have knowledge of the ultimate cost of the project. In this way, the taxpayers would know what they are facing, and then if they wished to object through us as their representatives we would be in a position to do so, basing the objection on facts.

There should be a moratorium on dollar items. In the supply items given to us today by the Treasury Board we find 12 dollar items.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are 20.

Mr. Baldwin: I stand corrected. I have not had an opportunity to examine them. I noticed 12 at first blush. We all know what dollar items are. The government brings in an item for $1 and within the limited wording of a vote in the estimates there is a provision for spending which should be contained in legislation. I suggest there is no reason, save in cases of emergency, that the government should not with proper timing and proper understanding place legislation before the House. We have an example in Information Canada. We have an example in the local initiatives program. There are dozens of examples costing hundreds of millions of dollars for which this House has had no opportunity, during the course of considering a bill, to make proposals, to make amendments, to make changes or to call witnesses before a committee. The items are there, and they are subject to a time limit. As I said before this is an exceedingly shabby way to treat the taxpayers of this land.

Finally, the relations between the Auditor General and the government should be altered so that we get better service from this official. A question was asked in the House of Commons yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness). Today, I am told, there is an article by the Canadian Press containing a statement made by the Auditor General, in which he says the reason he was not able to produce his report at this time is that his staff has been reduced. He says also there is a lack of morale among the staff because of the failure of the government to meet with his request concerning salaries and classifications, as a result of which Public Service Board has not been able to recruit the staff he requires.

I believe this requires a very substantial and serious answer by the government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said he would look into it yesterday. It is a very dangerous situation when the Auditor General, the last defence of the taxpayers of our land, is treated in this shabby way. According to the press release the Auditor General's report will not be out until at least May. The Public Accounts Committee is now dealing with the report up to March 31, 1970. Should an election be held this spring or summer, this House will have no opportunity, through the Public Accounts Committee, to deal with the report of the Auditor General. It will be left in abeyance until next fall and it will be almost two years after the event before we get around, through our committee, to a study of this report. Since the Auditor General has stated one reason for the delay is the very large number of mistakes in the public accounts, this calls for a very serious examination by this House and some explanation by the government.

Let me close on this note. Today all over the country people have sent, or have prepared, their income tax returns for 1971. They will shortly be coming under the new tax laws which were enacted last session. This is probably neither the time nor the place—and in any event I do not have sufficient time at my disposal—to deal with all the various programs and policies covered by the vast expenditures for the coming fiscal year. However, there is one duty which is obligatory upon every member of this House on both sides. It is to ensure that the taxpayer who is compelled to fork over his money to the government receives a dollar's worth of value for every dollar he pays. This certainly is not the case today. Most people realize there is a responsibility, within the opportunity afforded by their particular earnings, to make a reasonable contribution to limit poverty, distress, unemployment and the problems of the older people. I think the great majority of Canadians are also prepared to attempt to help, at least to some extent, narrow the gap which exists between the various regions of Canada.

Having said that, I think in addition the people of Canada are entitled to, and I demand on their behalf, a fair break. I know there is no government which spends other people's money which is 100 per cent efficient. That is the way it happens. But I think it is a shocking and a shameful thing to see exposed in this House year after year and month after month details of profligacy, of improvidence, of stupidity, of waste, of extravagance and mismanagement and absolutely no corrective measures taken. We demand on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada that this sort of nonsense be brought under control. I have attempted to offer some suggestions. We have criticized the government, and I think we are entitled to do so, but we have not limited ourselves to that. We have offered suggestions as to ways that this situation might be remedied. I suggest that the government should pay some attention to these proposals and give a reasonable answer to the people of Canada before this debate is completed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I look upon the motion made today as a very important one, and I regard it as a motion which we should discuss in terms of looking at our House of Commons operation with respect to the estimates or, to put it in other terms, with respect to the expenditures that parliament is called upon to vote. I realize that in the first part of the motion there is a phrase that seems to get into most opposition motions, namely that we condemn the government, and so we should. No doubt before the day is out some speakers will elaborate on that part of the motion. But I confess that I am more interested in the latter part of the motion, which urges that steps be taken so that we can exercise greater scrutiny and control over estimates and expenditures. I, therefore, propose to discuss this matter, as I have already said, in terms of looking at the ways in which the House of Commons deals with the estimates.

As hon. members are aware, we made some pretty drastic changes in our procedures a few years ago, and I want to say quite openly that I think in some respects the changes that we made were good. I believe that we did improve the process by which we handle legislation. I think it was a good idea for us to arrange for practically all bills to go to standing committees and for us to eliminate the duplication that we used to have when a bill could be discussed at length in a standing committee and again at length in the committee of the whole House. We got around the complaint that might arise because bills go to standing committees that members not on those committees do not have a chance to speak on the bill by providing for the report stage at which it is possible for any member, by putting down a motion, to achieve a discussion on a phase of the bill in which he is interested. That is not before us today, but I felt that I would like to say that I think we did a good job in the changes we made with respect to the legislative process.

However, I think we have not succeeded to the same extent—in fact I think we have not succeeded at all—in our efforts to find a better way to deal with the estimates or the expenditures which parliament is called upon to vote. I welcome the attendance in the House this afternoon of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), and I hope he will take the remarks I wish to offer in the vein in which I present them. I present them not as an attack upon the government but rather as a plea that the House of Commons as a whole take a new look at the whole question of how we handle our expenditures. I am frequently twitted about the fact that I have been around here for a few years. As I said last night, I am only beginning my stay in parliament, for I hope to be around for several decades yet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But I have been here long enough to see estimates handled in four different ways, not one of them perfect. When I first came here estimates were still being handled in just about the same way they were dealt with back in 1867. They were dealt with in the committee of supply, and every individual item had to be called. There was no time limit of any kind, either on an individual item or on the total amount of time to be spent on the estimates. There were some other aspects of the supply process that were quite interesting in those days that I need not go into. The point I am making is that that is the original way in which estimates were handled, namely, by every item coming before the committee of supply, which was a committee of the whole House, and I emphasize the fact that there was no time limit so that a minister had to give some kind of satisfaction or answer to the questions that were being put before he could get his estimates through the House of Commons.

In retrospect I think that was the best of the four systems that I have seen tried in the House of Commons, but I have to say that with the much larger volume of business of all kinds, including the increased amount that comes under the heading of expenditures, the year is not long enough for us to go back to that system under which all of the estimates were dealt with in the committee of supply on the floor of the House of Commons. We just could not handle it if we did it in that way and, as a matter of fact, that is the reason that quite a few years ago we made a significant change. That change—and I come now to the second regime which I have experienced with regard to estimates—was to provide for all the estimates still to be considered in the committee of supply but for there to be a total time limit. It escapes my memory whether we had a longer period of time at one stage, but at any rate, 30 days was, for quite a period of time, the total length of time that was allotted to the estimates. We fixed that limit of 30 days because the year was not long enough for us to continue the practice that had been in effect since 1867.

When we started the practice of dealing with estimates on the floor of the House under a time limit of 30 days, we found that it saved a lot of time but we also soon found that it was terribly unsatisfactory. There were many departments to be dealt with, so we had to take a department for only a day or two, then let it stand, and move on to another department for a day or two in order that we might have some time, even if it was only half a day in some cases, for all of the departments. It sounded a plausible way to deal with things. It sounded as though it was a responsible and a proper use of time, but it soon developed that a minister whose estimates were called knew that he had one day or two days to sit there and listen to the speeches. He knew we would not get off the first item. He knew he would not have to answer any questions. He knew that when the day or two allotted to him expired, that would be the end of his appearance until we got to the end of the thirtieth day and then, on that occasion, the total of the estimates would be voted.

It meant that during those 30 days we had lots of speeches. When agriculture was called the farming members spoke for a couple of days. When labour estimates were called, members interested in labour matters spoke. When external affairs estimates were called we had the sophisticated speeches of these esoteric people who know all about international relations. But we soon came to realize that although this second arrangement was a time saver, it really was not satisfactory at all.

So the day came when we proceeded to make another change. It was in the transition from the second regime I have just talked about to the present one. For one session, or perhaps two, we had a half and half arrangement. Let me describe that half and half arrangement. In that session or two we sent most of the estimates to various committees, but we arranged to keep three or four departments on the floor of the House of Commons. The choice as to which departments would be dealt with on the floor of the House of Commons was left to the opposition.

I want to say that I think that system worked fairly well. The difficulty was that it was agreed to only as a transitional move, and there never was any plan for that system to be continued. The effect of that system was that the estimates that went to committees got a certain amount of discussion, and one right that the opposition had up its sleeve was that it could say to the government, "These are the departments we want to deal with on the floor of the House of Commons in this particular session". I think that system worked fairly well. Perhaps modification of it would have been a good idea, but the main difficulty with that system, as I say, was that it was transitional only, and we did not renew it.

Then, we moved from that to the present system under which we send all of the estimates to committees, every last one, including the supplementaries, such as were tabled today. We have abolished the committee of supply. By the way, Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the procedural committee that recommended this, and we thought we were producing a method that was better than the former one. We decided that since all members were doing on supply days was making speeches anyway, we would put in their place 25 opposition days; that we would be honest about it and say 25 days are for opposition members to discuss whatever they wish. In return for that, we would let the estimates go to committees and renounce any right to deal with estimates on the floor of the House.

I think that was a mistake. I do not think we should be faulted for having proposed the idea and for having given it a trial. But it has not worked. The estimates go to committees. Perhaps in the first session of a new parliament the estimates of this department or of that one will get a fairly good going over. But so far as parliament as a whole is concerned, the members not on a particular committee get no chance at those estimates. A day comes, therefore, at the end of the session when a vote has to be taken, and unless those members put down motions, as some of us have done on occasion, all these millions or billions of dollars are voted in a very few minutes, without debate at all.

I think it might almost be better not to do it at all, and merely pass one act which provides that whatever estimates the Treasury Board has brought in are deemed to have been passed when the session ends. But I am sure the President of the Treasury Board does not want that authority. All I am saying is that what we do is so ridiculous that we might as well go the whole way. It is time we had a look at the experience we have had, a look at the four methods, assess them, and ask whether there is not some better way than the one we now follow.

I think the present system is no good. I think the second of the regimes I mentioned just a while ago was likewise no good, that is, when we sent all the estimates to committee of supply but with a time limit of 30 days. I think the system that was in effect when I first came here was the best, but it is not possible to go back to it because there are still only 365 days in the year and there is so much more business to be done. But I think something of the order of the third of the systems I described would be a lot better.

I would like to see us arrange for the estimates to go to committees, and I want to make some suggestions about that, but I would like us to make it part of our rules that the opposition has the right every session to name three or four departments—and it does not have to name them until on in the session—that would also be dealt with on the floor of the House of Commons. Whether that would be done by a committee of the whole or a committee of supply does not matter. I would even go so far as to say that this should be without time limit. Lengthen the days if necessary. Have morning sittings then, instead of morning sittings in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. If there is anything to the supposition or myth that parliament controls the public purse, we ought to set it on a basis where we really will be doing this kind of thing.

With regard to the committees that handle estimates, they should be looked at as well. Some of my colleagues may develop some of the points in an amendment that I am going to move, namely, that there should be more services for those committees, more space for them. Don't kick us out of this building and put us over in the Confederation building somewhere. Leave us in this building, but provide a building in which committees can operate as they should. There should also be proper time for the committees to do their job. Now, I am back to an old theme that I often proclaim, namely, that there should be times when parliament does not meet but committees do so that they can do their job.

Then, we have to look in particular at the kind of job committees do on estimates. I go on committees that deal with veterans affairs and with health, welfare and pension matters. These are subjects in which I am interested. But when I do go on these committees, what is my interest? My interest is getting all the money I can for veterans, for pensions, for health services, or what have you.

When my farm colleagues go on the Agriculture Committee they are not interested in saving money. They are interested in getting money and services for the agriculture industry. That is part of our job. None of us is going to renounce it. But in my opinion there is a place for a committee on estimates made up of auditor types, public accounts types, members who will devote themselves to this and will scrutinize the estimates the way the Treasury Board is supposed to scrutinize them before they ever get into the book. I believe that whole programs should be looked at with what we sometimes call a fine-toothed comb, if that isn't a mixed metaphor of some sort. The job our committees do now on estimates is not an auditing job. It is not an inspection or scrutinizing job. It is a job that members do because they are interested in the subject of the committee to which the estimates have been referred.

Another fact of life around here is that in any parliament each department gets a pretty thorough going over about once, and then examination tends to peter out. It is repetition. Maybe it would be good enough in a four-year parliament that every department would have one thorough examination with, shall we say, a special committee on estimates, that could have the authority to call for three or four or five different departments that it would examine, not with an eye to getting more dollars for this or that program, but with an eye to close scrutiny of the estimates. This is the type of thing I am advocating. I think we should go back to a combination of reference of estimates to committees and of dealing with three or four departments on the floor of the House of Commons.

I also think, so far as the committees are concerned, that the standing committees generally should have more time, and space, and services, and that there should be a special estimates committee which again would have the authority to call each session for three or four of the departments to come before it for the kind of close scrutiny that could be given to them by that type of committee.

• (1600)

Now, Sir, it seems to me that this is the kind of thing we ought to consider. I do not put my ideas out as the final answer, and I would certainly be glad to see them modified or amended. However, I do plead that we not go through another Parliament handling or mishandling or failing to handle estimates as we have these past few years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The process of handling supply the way we do on both interim and final estimates is really a joke. The President of the Treasury Board filed supplementary estimates today, getting them in before the end of March, which means that we do not get the three extra days provided in the rules under certain conditions. The day will come when he will ask for a vote for interim supply for the months of April, May and June. He will get it without any debate on the floor of Parliament because that is the rule. By the end of March, he will have his interim supply for the months of April, May and June and by the end of June, because it is in the book, he will get his vote on the main estimates for the balance of the fiscal year, or until the end of next March. We did this with our eyes wide open because we did not like the old system by which money was being voted on at all. I think we are to be commended for getting rid of that farce, but now we have another one.

As I say, I am trying to present this not as a case of confrontation between government and opposition, but I am asking that we discuss our own operation as a House of Commons. The rules that we have were produced by us. In terms of the legislative process, we made tremendous improvements and we do not need to worry about them within the life of a few more Parliaments. Naturally, members will come along who will want to change them, and that is the way it should be, but in terms of the supply process what we have now is not any good at all.

The President of the Treasury Board may not go as far as the judgment I have made, but I think he will agree that he would like something much better. What he has is very convenient; he knows that once Treasury Board produces the estimates his troubles are over. He gets interim supply before the end of March and the main estimates before the end of June. The worst that could happen is that there might have to be one or two votes on the last night in June on some opposed items, but even that process is hard to pursue. We have put them down for the Prices and Incomes Commission and for the Senate, but there are very few items in the estimates that we can oppose entirely. There are a lot of government programs of which we are critical but we cannot put down a motion of opposition for the entire item. The whole system is for the birds. It does not fit the requirements of a Parliament that is supposed to be giving close examination, is supposed to be scrutinizing the estimates and is supposed to fulfil the role of guardian of the public purse.

I shall welcome further comments made during the course of the day about this matter, but since I see my time is about up I had better present the amendment to which I referred. I should like to offer an amendment to the motion presented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) which suggests in general terms the kind of thing for which I have been arguing. I, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the motion be amended by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"by amending the Standing Orders of the House of Commons so that the handling of estimates, instead of being perfunctory and ineffective, will be put on a proper basis, including provision for adequate committee time, space and services, and for consideration of certain of the estimates on the floor of the House of Commons."

Now, Sir, hon. members may have other suggestions and those I have set forth could be modified, but in the main I think what we are proposing is clear. We accept the fact that the legislative process, using committees as it does, is good but we are not satisfied with the process by which estimates are handled. We think it could be improved by strengthening committees, by giving them adequate time, space and services. We think the whole process could also be improved by having an arrangement of the kind I have described, namely, that some of the estimates could be dealt with on the floor of the House of Commons at the instigation of the opposition and also that some of the estimates each year could be dealt with by a special committee set up for that purpose.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we welcome the motion that has been moved so that the House can discuss these matters today. We hope the House will look favourably on our amendment and, whatever happens on the vote tonight, we hope that this House will make up its mind that if it is not done before the forthcoming election, in the next Parliament we will have to find a better system for carrying out our function as the guardians of the public purse of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the motion we are debating today, moved by the official opposition, means that Parliament should be empowered to scrutinize thoroughly federal expenditures.

Indeed the motion is worded as follows, and I quote:

This House condemns the Government for its mismanagement and waste of taxpayers money and urges that Parliament take steps to exercise greater scrutiny and control over estimates and expenditures.

The motion refers to a "waste of taxpayers money" and this is just about what is happening throughout the country. Today, I would like to deal briefly with the local initiative projects approved by the federal government.

Some projects had to be submitted first to the provincial authorities, the Municipal Affairs Department in Quebec and similar departments in other provinces, and the minister or his department accepted the projects presented to the federal government.

Later on we had answers such as this one: This project has been refused. A phone call to the department brought this reply: Certain funds earmarked for these projects have been spent and the total of these amounts exceeds the budget—a budget of $50 million for the whole country. It so happened that many important local initiative projects were refused while others less important were accepted.

For example, the creation of snowmobile trails had been requested and certain municipalities or parishes asked for the improvement of community centers. All they wanted was money to pay the salaries since the materials would be supplied by the parish or municipality. This was rejected.

Substantial amounts of money were spent to create jobs and while these were being created the number of unemployed was going up. The reason given is that the number of people entering the labour market is increasing rapidly; so unemployment goes up and at the same time the government tells us it is creating new jobs.

It may be true that new jobs became available because in February, for example, I saw men cutting branches in three or four feet of snow. Our unemployed were in the snow right up to the belt cutting branches. They had to dig to cut branches. It is obvious that the branches will be growing again this spring and that next winter this will provide other jobs.

However, when I saw those unemployed working in temperatures of 25, 30 or 35 degrees below zero I thought it might be wise for the government to undertake, next winter, another local initiatives program to allow these people to work in a heated place, for example, by buying balls of wool and knitting needles and having them knit mittens. There are not anough mittens in politics. We need more.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we probably need a new minister, a minister of balls of wool to ensure fair distribution to those who want to knit. They could knit in a heated place. This would be as intelligent as having them cut branches in the middle of winter.

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has not yet thought of it. In the coming election campaign we will see if he does not promise us a department of balls of wool and knitting needles to take care of the jobless next winter.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Would the hon. member allow me a question? Would he make a suggestion to the government?

Mr. Caouette: No, but I am ready to suggest the replacement of our present crazy system. My suggestion would be as crazy, but not more.

Mr. Speaker, important projects have been rejected while, I repeat, others which were unimportant were accepted. Who made the decisions?

Some municipalities, for instance, are told: Your project has a fair chance of being accepted. A building project of sorts is then submitted to the Minister of Municipal Affairs providing that the government would pay the salaries involved. The municipality concerned is given to understand that the federal government will accept the project. The provincial government gives the go ahead and subsequently an architect is hired. The plans are drawn at a cost of $10,000 to $12,000 which the municipality is called upon to disburse. The plan is then submitted to the provincial government and the minister declares that it is accepted and that it should be immediately forwarded to Ottawa. Two or three weeks elapse—these things take time—after which Ottawa decides to reject the project. The municipality is then compelled to pay $12,000 to an architect for a project that has been rejected. The government does not contribute a cent. That is, once again, a brilliant system: Parishes and municipalities are compelled to run into debts and pay the salaries of architects whom they are obliged, by provincial laws, to hire. This is done with a promise that the project will be accepted, but then it is rejected.

• (1610)

Only recently, I was talking to officials of the department responsible for the Local Initiatives Program, and they admitted to having gone over the budget. They have spent $15 million already, and the minister says he is not going to add a penny.

Mr. Speaker, since we have established a Local Initiatives Program, let us at least respect the projects which make sense. Let us not make petty excuses and say that all the money has been spent. Let us create a budget!

Yesterday we were presented with a $219 million budget designed to make up for the deficits of the Canadian National Railways and Air Canada. Strangely enough, we will manage to find the money! Why cannot we do the same thing for serious local initiatives projects—not, of course, for revolutionaries and rebels!

There is a local initiatives project in Mont-Laurier, for instance, where the FLQ leader Pierre Vallières, who has now been released from jail, has been hired, even though he said: I will never stop working towards the separation of Quebec.

That same night, the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) stated humbly in a television broadcast in Montreal that Pierre Vallières had a right to work. I do not question this right, but let him go and work for René Lévesque—not for the federal government.

Vallières is paid with the Canadian people's money for working towards the destruction of Canada, towards getting Quebec out of the Canadian Confederation. Where do they send him? To the poor people in Mont-Laurier, so that he can see whether it is true that there are poor people there, and why and how they are poor, and so he can give them advice: You know, fellows, the reason you are poor is because of Ottawa. If you were on René Lévesque's side in order to make the separation of Quebec come about sooner, you would be a little poorer but it would not show so much. This way he tries to stir up people against the country. Ottawa does not raise any objections. They say: It is a Mr. De Serres who is responsible for the project—another notorious separatist, another man who is openly anti-Canadian. And this project gets $46,000 or $48,000 from the federal government.

The same goes on in my area of Rouyn-Noranda. Small groups of separatists receive federal subsidies for local initiatives projects. They use that money to try to destroy Canada. You meet them in groups of ten, twelve, and they tell you: Ottawa is stupid enough to pay us, but we are not so stupid as to turn it down. And so they accept subsidies from Ottawa to work towards the destruction of Canada. The government has money to finance those projects but when it comes to the parochial complex of Nédelec, in Témiscamingue, it does not. They refuse a subsidy of $52,000, while in a neighbouring parish, they subsidize a skidoo trail, part of which is built on a river! When the ice melts, the trail will disappear. Still, $46,500 were granted for that project.

I have nothing against skidoo trails; I like the sport myself and do some skidooing. But, Mr. Speaker, projects of greater importance than skidoo trails have been truned down. If they were not, all would be well. Skidoo trails are fine indeed for week-end fun, but they are of secondary importance. In a logical system, that is the way things would be. But under our present system, skidoo trails have the priority over parish halls, and municipal or provincial improvements.

Money could be spent towards achieving better understanding between the various elements of Canada, so that all might work towards buttressing Canadian unity. But no, money is spent on projects that are worth very little.

So, Mr. Speaker, I distinctly blame the government for this situation. The opposition is quite right in saying it has been a stupid waste of taxpayers' money. That is what we are protesting against.

Now, let us turn to the area of unemployment insurance. To a question I put this afternoon, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) replied that there were 200 major offices throughout Canada. They have been centralized in the province of Quebec. For our region and the Hull region, the regional office is in Montreal. Anyone applying to the local Rouyn-Noranda office is referred to Montreal. Some people have received no benefits since October 25, a period of four months. We are entering the fifth month, with still no cheques forthcoming.

Yesterday, for instance, an applicant from Larder Lake, a village in the riding of my friend, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), told me that he has been in touch with the Timmins office since October 25. The day before yesterday, he was notified that his case was still pending. They have been processing the case of this applicant for four months. He was advised to apply to a welfare office for assistance pending settlement of his case. Anyone applying to the provincial welfare office is told: "Your unemployment insurance benefits will be coming through." Yes, but when? In the meantime the applicant is required to undertake in writing to make his cheques over to the office when he receives them and he will thus obtain a small cash advance in the meantime. That is the game they are playing with the unemployed.

There is a still more serious case in my region, Quemont Mines which closed down, laying off 350 miners. These people, according to their working contract, had accumulated a fund of $750 each, which they received when they were laid off. They applied to the Manpower Centre, but they were told: Gentlemen, when you have spent your $750, we will pay you unemployment insurance benefits. Now, the miner who has not found a job the day after his dismissal does not receive any unemployment insurance benefit. On the other hand, the one who has found one continues to receive an income. He is not told that he will not have to pay unemployment insurance as long as his $750 are not spent. Unemployment insurance contributions are required from his first working day. After having paid unemployment insurance contributions during 20 years, those people are denied benefits, not because they are unemployed, but because they have accumulated $750 during that period. That amount is considered as an extension of their wages.

I suggest that the Department of Labour is stealing from the workers of the Quemont and Noranda mines whose wages amounted to $3,000 or $3,500 at the time of their dismissal. This means that the Department of Labour is a department of thieves whose victims are the miners who have spent their lives toiling at 5,000 or 10,000 feet underground, have lost their job and are now receiving $750 for 20 years of work. And then they are told: Gentlemen, you must spend your $750 before you can get unemployment insurance benefits.

I brought this problem to the attention of the minister who told me: Officials have made a decision. What is the use of a minister who cannot make decisions? It is the officials who are going to decide in the case of the Quémont miners! These men have paid their unemployment insurance contributions, which means that it would come to the same if the government or the public servants said: Gentlemen, over your 25 years of work, you have saved $4,000 or $5,000; so we will have to check. Spend your $5,000 and then, we will pay you unemployment insurance benefits.

• (1620)

As for the $750, the government has collected them from those miners during 20 years. He has collected unemployment insurance contributions. And, when the time comes for benefits to be paid to them, they are told: Spend your $750 allowance, and then we will start paying you unemployment insurance benefits. The Quémont miners began receiving benefits at the beginning of March when they had lost their jobs in August, in September or in October last year. And this is supposed to be normal!

Mr. Speaker, that is a waste of the taxpayers' money. It is more costly to hire someone like Lefebvre, a former Liberal organizer, at $600 per week. Six hundred dollars per week! Money is available for that, but to help the unemployed, there isn't any.

For political patronage, money is available. To serve man, there is not. Appeals are made to the department, to the minister, to the deputy minister to solve some cases, because one cannot do so by oneself. And, suddenly, one finds that shameful waste is the rule in many fields, in several sectors of the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, no wonder provinces and municipalities are opposing Ottawa. Millions, billions of dollars are thrown away. When we ask the government to spend money for the people instead of taxing them and spending money for the benefit of a few privileged persons, we are laughed at.

Ten years ago when I was advocating on television that the Canadian economy be given a push, I suggested distributing $100 to each Canadian only once so as to see the results five or six months later. A family of 10 would have received $1,000 of Canadian credit. One of five would have been given $500. We could then have found out if it was a failure or a profitable undertaking. The Liberals laughed at us. Fools!

According to the estimates for the current year, interest on the national debt is $2,335 million. Do we know what that means? $106.43 per person in Canada. It means that a family of 10 must pay $1,064 in interest on the national debt. Do you see any government members rise up to protest against the interest on the national debt? Of course not. If the amount of $106 is paid to financiers, that is fine, but, if it is paid to Canadians, they cannot see it. They are such fat-heads.

Mr. Speaker, government expenditures are tremendous. Out of a budget of $18 billion this year, nearly $2.3 billion will go to pay the interest on the national debt alone. Nobody protests against that. It is the worst waste in the whole budget, in the whole federal administration.

Mr. Speaker, the Créditistes object to this waste and urge, as it is said in the motion, a fair and honest scrutiny of the Canadian government expenditures, in order to serve the whole population.

[English]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the motion we are considering appears to have two aspects. In one of them, the government is roundly condemned for what is described as mismanagement and waste of taxpayers' money. In the other, parliament is urged to take steps to exercise greater scrutiny and control.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) cited instances of expenditures which have been fairly well examined, I think. In every instance they have been explained, and in many instances the course of action taken has been justified. To describe these now, at this late date, as examples of waste, extravagance, inefficiency and the other attributes he was able to find in his dictionary, is not likely to take us very far in this discussion; I do not think it would be helpful if I were to attempt to rehash all this old history again.

Let me put on record some information with regard to government expenditures as a whole. It is true that government expenditures have been rising from year to year, though I suggest they are not rising at so great a rate as the increase in the responsibilities of the government would indicate. This increase in responsibilities results from the growth in population and from economic growth as reflected in the increase in our gross national product. Public expenditures in Canada have been rising quite rapidly in the past few years. However, they have been rising much more slowly in the federal field than has been the case either in the provincial area or in the combined municipal and provincial area.

The average rate of growth of federal expenditures during the period from 1967 to 1971 inclusive was 11.8 per cent per year. Of the total federal expenditure, very substantial sums are transferred annually to the provinces and it is the provinces which in the final analysis make these expenditures and control not only their size but their scope and administration. If one subtracts from the total of the federal expenditures I have mentioned transfers to the provinces, one finds that net growth in federal expenditure exclusive of these transfers to the provinces in the year 1967-68 was 7.8 per cent; in the year 1968-69, 11.6 per cent; in the year 1969-70, 9.8 per cent; and in the year 1970-71, 7.8 per cent, for an average net federal expenditure growth rate of 9.3 per cent per annum. That is pretty much the same as the growth rate in our gross national product.

In a similar way, growth of public expenditures by the provinces is rather more spectacular. From an average annual growth rate of 18 per cent per annum, one subtracts the substantial transfers made by provinces to hospitals and local governments for administrative control and expenditure purposes. This leaves a net figure for provincial administration growth rate in the year 1967-68 of 16.9 per cent; in the year 1968-69, 12.9 per cent; in the year 1969-70, 23.5 per cent; and in the year 1970-71, 24.7 per cent, for an average annual growth rate in provincial government public expenditure, not including sums transferred for local control and administrative purposes to hospitals and municipalities, of 19.5 per cent. So, one can see that the expenditures of the federal government, exclusive of transfers to the provinces, have been something in the order of the gross national product growth, but have grown at a conservatively lesser rate than provincial government expenditures.

Another feature I should like to emphasize is that about one-half of our total annual expenditures are derived not from programs put forward in the estimates and under the appropriation acts, but from separate parliamentary statutes that provide for expenditures on a scale, at a rate, and under conditions determined by the particular statute itself. About one-half of our annual expenditures have been devoted to this particular purpose; the other half go toward appropriations under programs contained in the estimates.

Growth in statutory expenditures as against what we might call discretionary expenditures or appropriations in 1967-68 was about 43 per cent of total federal expenditures, rising in 1972-73 to about 482 per cent. So that the amount of discretionary expenditures under the appropriation acts both in relation to public expenditures as between the provinces, municipalities and the federal government, and in relation to the federal government itself as between statutory expenditures under the control of acts of parliament and discretionary expenditures, has been decreasing. Indeed, it has shown the slowest growth of all the expenditures I have described. This is the particular aspect to which the hon. member for Peace River directed his attention.

Mr. Basford: Except that he is not paying any attention now.

Mr. Drury: Then perhaps I should not say directed his attention, but directed his remarks. So the fact is that the suggestion that these expenditures have been growing out of control is not borne out by the facts relating to total expenditures. I will not dwell any more on that particular item.

In making his litany of complaints, the hon. member for Peace River referred to worshipping at the temple of bureaucracy. That is a temple at which I do not worship, though perhaps he does.

Mr. Baldwin: You are in it.

Mr. Nowlan: You built it and you own it.

Mr. Drury: If the hon. member for Peace River is prepared to worship at my feet, I do not like it but I will accept it. Like the disposable public expenditures that I have mentioned, the bureaucracy itself has also not been growing out of control. During the past ten years the average rate of increase in the size of the public service has been 1.5 per cent. I think this represents a much slower rate of growth than the increase in responsibility for the very large, new expenditures, public benefit schemes, such as the Canada Pension Plan, the guaranteed income supplement, the reform of the income tax system and the issue of capital gains. The additional people required to administer these programs—

Mr. Douglas: How much do you pay into the Canada Pension Plan?

Mr. Drury: The government of Canada is required to provide the administration for the Canada Pension Plan. We are talking here about numbers of people, about growth in the federal bureaucracy. I am saying that in spite of these new large programs, growth in the population of Canada, and substantial growth—something of the order of 9.5 per cent per annum—in the gross national product, the size of the public service, including departments and departmental corporations but not including, of course, the CNR or armed forces, has been of the order of 1.5 per cent per annum during the last 10 years.

Mr. Baldwin: But your casuals employed under contract arrangements take the figure up.

Mr. Drury: I am sure the hon. member would hardly represent that contractors' form part of the bureaucracy, certainly not that part of the bureaucracy of which he calls me an element.

The next item the hon. member mentioned and with which I propose to deal concerns the form of the estimates which, in his view, calls for some criticism. I can only assume that this criticism is based on lack of opportunity to look them over; I think it could hardly be lack of intelligence. The fact of the matter is that the present form of the estimates was the unanimous recommendation of the public accounts committee which gave the question long consideration, I suggest much greater consideration than the hon. member for Peace River has given the new form of the estimates. The committee was impressed with the fact that the revised form of the estimates now disclose more in the way of intelligible information than has ever been given to parliament before.

[Mr. Basford.]

Again I make the point I have made in the past, that power is based on knowledge, and that knowledge is power in the kind of institution we have. The government's endeavours to provide information to the public and, indeed, to members of the opposition apparently so overwhelmed those hon. members that they have not been able to assimilate it all and, consequently, they have had to take exception to the size of this great big, thick volume known as the blue book. There is too much information in it, and it confuses them. The hon. member cannot understand it.

• (1640)

Mr. Baldwin: It is not properly put together.

Mr. Drury: If the hon. member feels that it is not properly put together, let him make specific suggestions.

Mr. Baldwin: I already have.

Mr. Drury: Let him make those suggestions to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, the body which gave consideration to the new form. That committee, including the chairman, unanimously adopted the new form and—

Mr. Baldwin: One chairman of that committee made recommendations which have never been followed.

Mr. Drury: I can only say that it is perhaps fortunate that they were not followed, because the subsequent Tory chairman in my view was correct in not paying attention to the recommendations of an earlier and less competent chairman.

Mr. Baldwin: He was not allowed to carry out those recommendations, because the majority of committee members would not let him.

Mr. Drury: The hon. member suggests that there should be votes on all opposition days. Apparently the ability of the opposition to articulate grievances or, indeed, to find grievances is so limited that by about half past eight in the evening on an opposition day there is no way of compelling opposition attendance except by requiring a vote and ringing the bell.

Mr. Baldwin: No, no. The minister has that all wrong.

Mr. Drury: We thought that we would establish a system in this House involving proceedings that are sufficiently interesting to command the attention and presence of hon. members without the sort of school boy announcement that would call them in for a vote on every one of those extra 25 days. Surely, it is a most unsatisfactory commentary on Parliament, and on the conduct of the opposition, when the only way of getting the attention of those hon. members is by ringing the bells and calling for a vote.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I know the minister would not want to mislead the House on what I said. I think I must, under the Standing Orders, correct him and say what I had in mind was that I hoped some of the boneless wonders who sit behind him would be prepared to vote on motions that are not confidence motions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what kind of remark that is, other than being an endeavour to get on the record a description of intelligent people as "boneless wonders".

The suggestion made by both the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was that there should be consideration of the estimates of a number of departments, chosen in some way, in the committee of the whole. There should be a certain number each year so considered. The hon. member for Peace River did not explain why he would like this. His, I suppose, is the conventional wisdom that suggests that certain things can only be considered adequately in the committee of the whole or on the floor of the House and that it is impossible to have any kind of meaningful scrutiny, any kind of meaningful acquisition of information, except through an exchange of views across the floor of the House.

I myself feel that, under our committee system, there is an orderly opportunity for detailed examination and detailed scrutiny of estimates.

Mr. Alexander: It is all too fast.

Mr. Drury: In the consideration of estimates in committee, there are available for this purpose about two and a half times the number of hours that were available in the past. By referring all the estimates to committee, by abolishing the committee of supply, we have succeeded in providing more House time for the formal legislative process. At the same time, we have obtained two and a half times the amount of parliamentary time for the scrutiny of estimates than was the case in the past. I would feel reluctant to back any scheme that would diminish this level.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that one reason for bringing this matter back to the House was that the members—he must have meant the members of the opposition—were concerned only about seeing that there was more money for their friends, for their constituents, and, consequently, that such scrutiny can hardly be described as a scrutiny of the estimates. For instance, the Standing Committee on Agriculture presumably is not competent to examine certain estimates in a critical way. The suggestion was that opposition members were there merely to see that there was more money for their constituents; or, they would represent that they were trying to get more money for particular constituents.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Be fair; this involves all the members on both sides.

Mr. Drury: Well now, Mr. Speaker, I can understand the hon. member making that statement. I do not accept that all the members on both sides are engaged in that activity. I happen to be a member of the House of Commons; and, let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that this has not been my object in attending parliamentary committees.

Mr. Nowlan: Of what committee is the minister a member?

Mr. Drury: I am not a member, but I have attended—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the minister been a member of any committee?

Mr. Drury: Yes, I have been. Not only have I been a member of a committee, I have been a member of a committee as an opposition member.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister is one of the Commissioners of Internal Economy. That is the committee on which he sits.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the real difficulty facing members of parliament is the vast volume of business that must be accomplished in what are described as only 365 days of one year. It is a fact that all of us try to undertake perhaps more than we can accomplish. We are constantly being frustrated, not because of the lack of information, not because of any lack of energy, but because of the lack of time to do everything we want to do. The essential problem that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was raising, and that the hon. member for Peace River referred, to, was the problem of how more intelligently to allocate our limited resources of time.

The one arena in which time pressures are very great indeed is the arena of the House of Commons. I think, perhaps, better use could be made of opposition days. If anyone wished to scrutinize a particular department on a particular opposition day, this could be done. Today, for instance, if the opposition had agreed to look into a particular department and had expressed that desire, that could easily have been done. That it has not been done makes me assume that perhaps the opposition does not want to do this. The information on which intelligible and intelligent debate can be constructed is readily available, either in committee or through the committee system, where all pertinent information can be obtained quickly from knowledgeable people. I include in that term both ministers and officials. Such information is available and can be obtained in a way that it could never be obtained across the floor of the House, either in committee of supply or in committee of the whole.

Although, undoubtedly, our system is not perfect—

Mr. Baldwin: The minister must not say that, please!

Mr. Drury: —I am not persuaded that the improvements suggested either by the hon. member for Peace River or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre constitute an improvement over what we have today.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has described our present system of scrutiny as basically the obtaining of information in relation to programs. If information is not obtained and if the scrutiny, as he put it, is perfunctory and ineffective, that can only be because those members who claim to want information cannot be bothered to go and ask for it and cannot be bothered to get it. We have made a sincere endeavour, with the help of the Public Accounts Committee, to display more information than has ever been displayed before in the printed estimates. So great is the volume of information that the hon. member for Peace River has complained he cannot lift the blue book, because there is so much information in it.

• (1650)

The committee system is designed to make even more detailed information available. The informed opposition should then be able to carry on a constructive critical debate on opposition days and perhaps then call for rather more closely argued and more closely reasoned responses from the government than perhaps now is the case.

Mr. Baldwin: You will have an opportunity to try it after the next election.

Mr. Drury: The hon. member suggests I will have an opportunity after the next election.

Mr. Baldwin: If you are lucky, that is.

Mr. Drury: After the next election we undoubtedly will have another look at this problem of the allocation of our most valuable commodity, time, and will have noted the experiences of the present Parliament. I hope this experience will be taken into account, but I also hope that in consideration of the question there will be a real understanding of the essence of the problem and not an endeavour to construct a facade which perhaps will make it easier for the members to do their business without putting effort into what they conceive to be their business but rather into what I think the system calls for.

I would reiterate that I do not believe the case for the motion and the amendment which call for a change in our procedures has been really put forward strongly. I appreciate that the hon. member for Peace River rather was using this as a nominal or adjectival exercise, whereas I had the impression that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) really hoped to improve our system. But if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will accept that the most useful thing that can be made available to him as an instrument by which to fulfil his particular responsibility is information and knowledge, then the suggestions he made do not seem to me to make knowledge more available to him, and this is really what he should be after. The conduct of a so-called scrutiny of a department in committee of the whole is not really a sincere effort to acquire information but merely an opportunity to make points. This can adequately be done in the 25 odd days per session which are now called opposition days.

Another point was raised by the hon. member for Peace River. This was in relation to the Auditor General. I regret very much that the Auditor General appears to have made some comments, not to the Public Accounts Committee through which he reports, but in some other fashion and as a consequence I do not know exactly what he had in mind or to what questions he was responding in relation to the remarks attributed to him by the hon. member for Peace River. I shall try to inform myself concerning what this particular problem is, but at the moment until I ask the Public Accounts Committee what the problem is it would perhaps be unwise of me to make any comment.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to be involved in the debate of what we believe is a very significant motion.

[Mr. Drury.]

I feel that, without question, one would be ill advised to come to the conclusion that there has been no waste or mismanagement on a gross scale since there are so many facts and figures which suggest this is a proper conclusion. I was impressed somewhat by the speech given by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I think one thing stands out. He indicated to us, I believe in all sincerity, that in effect we in this House of Commons are attempting to deal with more than we can accomplish. I think this is a problem which is becoming more severe as we go along, particularly exemplified by the passage of the tax bill which, as I understand it, is an imperfect bill. This is readily admitted. There were amendments upon amendments and there are amendments to come. Yet because of expediency and because of some deadline, we attempted to deal with more than we could accomplish. The end result is imperfect legislation being foisted upon the Canadian public.

I was also very pleased to have the opportunity to listen to my House leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and I was equally impressed with the arguments developed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have come to the conclusion that if changes are not made in our Parliamentary system we can probably call the exercises which are perpetuated in this House of Commons, facades—facades in the committee, facades in the House of Commons and facades continued by ministers—I say with all due respect—before the television cameras out in the hall. In other words, it would seem that this place is becoming meaningless for the member of parliament. We are here to represent our constituencies, to look at estimates, to project and give constructive criticism, and yet the ideas of a member of parliament are not usually accepted. The direction which he wishes to place before the House and the people of Canada is not accepted, and the implementations he would like to see pursued are not accepted. They come from the Treasury Board.

Without intending to be nasty in any way, I suggest that many members on the government side are frustrated. I do not think I am letting anything out of the bag when I say they want a more meaningful role, and they want an opportunity to debate and question the integrity of the government. They want an opportunity to vote in order to register their concern. However, because of the system which this government perpetuates they are denied this opportunity. It would be easy for me to condemn the government's handling of the Bras d'Or, the Bonaventure and Information Canadian, which are glaring examples of waste and mismanagement. However, I will leave that to other colleagues of mine on this side of the House.

Another very significant statement by the President of the Treasury Board was his acceptance of the fact there has been an increase in the government's responsibilities. He went on and on in respect of several programs, outlining the why's and wherefors. However, he missed mentioning the responsibility that this government has toward our most important asset, that is the human resource. It is in this area that a stinging indictment is due this government because of its shameful and disgraceful attitude towards people. The government should receive the highest condemnation. They should be condemned for their lack of understanding, lack of proper policies in terms of priorities for people who want to work or who have been in the work force but have lost jobs as a result of this government's fiscal and monetary policies. The Government has stood by and watched this happen as a regrettable side effect, and therefore there is deliberation in the creation of the unemployment for 600,000 people.

• (1700)

What disturbs me is that this government, through lack of understanding of its priorities in the spending of money, has deliberately decided not to reward initiative and not to give incentive. As I understand it, the rate of unemployment is unprecedented and, as I pointed out, it will continue to get worse as a result of the lack of understanding of the government of what the priorities should be in terms of the spending of government money. We need an industrial strategy which will take into consideration the tax cuts and incentives, through the co-operation, understanding and assistance of other levels of government, of labour and management, in order to set the first priority of full employment. The words "full employment" are bandied around day by day, and yet there was a stinging indictment in the presentation of the Canadian Labour Congress which, I believe, speaks for hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I want to put on the record some of the things they have said in this regard.

Mr. Basford: I disagree with most of what they had to say on the subject.

Mr. Alexander: One must be careful not to be side tracked by interjections. This is what the Canadian Labour Congress had to say:

> Many Canadian families will continue to suffer because of past policies, probably the most inept, ill-advised and inhuman policies ever thrust upon any nation in modern times. Knowing fully well that this country for years has had a much more rapidly expanding labour force than any other advanced industrial nation, your government nevertheless persisted over a long period of time in pursuing the kind of policies which seemingly ignored this important labour force fact.

An exception was taken to the phrase "your government". The government said it should be "our government". I do not know why anybody should want to call it "our government". This is a stinging indictment which I believe embodies the thinking of all Canadians.

It would be very easy for me to relate my remarks to the inadequacies of the LIP program and the Opportunities for Youth program. One cannot question the principle behind these programs, but it is this that we are talking about when we refer to an industrial strategy, this ad hoc, off-the-top-of-your-head, make-work program which apparently is not making work, which apparently has been criticized from all sides, and which apparently has been condemned by the task force which has indicated that the Opportunities for Youth program has been a total failure. Let us remember how much money has been spent on the LIP program. As I said yesterday in the House, I do not know how these programs get through or what kind of scrutiny they are given before moneys are spent on them.

I refer to such programs as the one in the city of Hamilton which opposes the principles by which all of us abide in terms of our social, political and economic development and instead propagandizes Communism. I do not know whether this is acceptable to the government and whether this is the criteria that was set. Sometimes I wonder whether it is a devious plot on the part of the government in order to reward someone back on someone's riding. That is as general as I can make it without becoming too offensive.

Mr. Deachman: Don't overdo it; you are going to blow it.

Mr. Alexander: Other members who follow me will put the facts on the record I hope, indicating that the suggestion which I just made is well founded and truthful. Unfortunately, I do not have enough time to put some facts on the record with regard to housing. However, let me say that the government has wasted time in dealing with the problems of those who live in our urban centres. I look right now at the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), and I wonder what he hopes to accomplish.

Mr. Basford: I am waiting for facts.

Mr. Alexander: He is waiting for effects. How can there be effects when he and his predecessor have done nothing. We on this side of the House have brought to the attention of government members the problems that are associated with urban living. We have said that the constitution should not become a straitjacket precluding this government from action, but they said that under section 92 of our constitution the cities are the creatures of the provinces. Lo and behold, we now have a Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The establishment of this ministry was made at the suggestion of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. They are now involved in tri-level conferences, which was also the suggestion of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. Instead of taking our advice in the first instance, the government spent some $14 million in an attempt to find out just what to do.

I wish to put a few facts on the record so that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will be able to reply to me in his usual charitable and friendly way. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) submitted his resignation citing differences between himself and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the range of the federal government's responsibility in the housing field. The government initiated partial plans did not work. They tied down the construction industry with petty regulations and bureaucratic red tape, and they reduced housing availability to crisis proportions. Dr. Harvey Lithwick had a major opportunity within the government to design a coherent and active housing policy for this decade, but he resigned because he felt that the federal government was not prepared to admit the dimensions of the problem and was not willing to sufficiently change its thinking and discipline. The ministry proved itself to be primarily a co-ordinating agency with no power to develop programs or to implement them. What then is the sense of spending $14 million of the taxpayers' money if the government does not recognize the problems which the study set out to uncover?

• (1710)

Let me carry on for just a minute more, Mr. Speaker. Some time ago Mr. Dennis of Toronto's Osgoode Hall headed a task force on low income housing. What became of Mr. Dennis and his task force report? Is there trouble in the printing department getting it ready for publication, or is it that such sweeping demands are being made for change that it could never be published for fear of putting CMHC totally out of business as a lending agency?

When it comes to waste and mismanagement the government's record is classic. The Prime Minister says to his supporters, "Let us not go to the public on our record." I don't blame him. Members opposite with any sense of responsibility dare not go to the people on their record. They want to talk about their future plans, but I want to talk about their record. It is a horrible record, a disastrous record, and lacks any indication of a sense of responsibility.

Hon. members opposite sit in fear because they know we have the right to stand up and criticize, and with our mandate have the right to be the protectors of the people's interests. I can tell the smiling Minister of State for Urban Affairs that this is our function, and we will continue to carry it out with all the strength in our bodies. When we show the people that we know what is going on, we increase our credibility, and as a result of our constructive criticism the people will learn that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition will be a reasonable alternative to the government after the next election.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to chastise the government as the preceding speaker did. I wish to talk about what I consider to be a problem which affects the role that members of parliament play as representatives of the people with respect to the operations of government.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) talked a lot about the idea of providing members of the opposition with more information. Mr. Speaker, I have more information here than I can ever handle. The President of the Treasury Board says that we are provided with additional information in these estimates. Mr. Speaker, if the directors of Bell Telephone or General Motors in the United States put out a financial statement similar to this, they would not last until the next board of directors meeting.

This financial statement respecting the country is not read by the general public. It is no longer even an interdepartmental document. One can no longer pick it up and find out what Joe Blow in another department is being paid. All one can find out is the general expenditures of a department, with the specifics referred to in very general terms. There is even a page for each department in the estimates with nothing but pure propaganda. These statements sound like those the CBC makes when it runs those promotionals on "I Love Me." That is what each department has.

All countries are having difficulty supervising, in a democratic way, the expenditures of various government departments. If there is one thing for which the present government can be criticized, it is that it has given up the idea of democracy. It intends to rule, and be damned to everybody else. On more than one occasion the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has told the Liberal caucus, "I am the only one who can win the next election. Therefore, if you don't like what I do, leave." The Prime Minister is telling opposition members of parliament, "If you don't like it here, leave." And he is telling us, through his supporters in the various committees, "If you don't like the way a committee is being run, get out." The only thing the government seeks from its backbenchers is their vote. By having a majority on all committees it does not need to give out information. All it needs is sufficient members to vote and pass something, and then get on to something else.

England has this problem. But in England they believe in paying attention to the expressions of the loyal opposition. Democracy will not function if questions are not asked about the expenditures of government. That is their system in England. We may have become confused in Canada by having more than two political parties in our system. This may be part of the reason a government with a majority says, "We will use our majority and, if the country doesn't like it, the country can change that majority." Frankly, I found the same attitude displayed by the previous Conservative government. But it is magnified in the present government.

I can remember only one occasion when the Prime Minister showed enough interest in the debates that take place in this House to remain in it. That was one late evening, after midnight, when he did not have any place else to go, so he dropped in here for a few hours. Government members in one of the committees this morning talked about what wonderful thing this was, particularly when opposition members, who had other plans for the Christmas holidays, may have been away in other parts of the world.

We have changed many of the procedures in this House, but those changes have not made it easier for the opposition to scrutinize estimates. I believe we will have to set up an independent agency to scrutinize estimates, and examine them in the same way as the Auditor General examines expenditures. If we are going to examine en masse all governmental estimates, we will have to make an effort to discover what policies are wrong, simply because we do not have the time or ability to do much about the actual expenditures themselves.

It is an exercise in futility for some of us to spend two or three hours, two or three times a week, for two or three months in a committee listening to some of the experts explaining items in the estimates, when we know that the government members have a majority on the committee. Unless the Fourth Estimate picks up a particular incident, the public will learn nothing about it. If the government were really serious in saying parliament should scrutinize estimates it would give us the opportunity to do so, and allow us to correct anything wrong that civil servants may have done with respect to estimates.

Members on an estimates committee should be interested in determining that there are no abuses in the expenditures covered by the various estimates. But that is not the way we do things now. We have the adversary system, with one side made up of a majority of government members. In my opinion, there have been damned few occasions when members of the opposition were able to change in any meaningful way any estimate of any department. The question of whether we should handle estimates in this House is one that is worthy of consideration. The minister responsible for the estimates of a department had his officials before him and replied to the questions being raised. This seemed to be a satisfactory system. I would be quite prepared to listen to the argument made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) that we should have some estimates in the House in those 25 days allotted to the opposition, but I would agree to that only if it were in committee rather than with the Speaker in the chair.

• (1720)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: It seems to me that if we could correct one or two problems a year in a particular department, we would be doing an excellent job on behalf of the public. Let us not fool ourselves. The general public knows nothing about the estimates and expenditures within a department. The general public is given the information that the total expenditures for the nation are so much and each person is concerned with what it costs him.

The same is true in every municipality. I am sure that hon. members will be faced with this problem everywhere they go, particularly in respect of rising education costs. Nobody seems to be able to do anything about it. I am sure in the provincial field the same holds true; the general public continually objects to large expenditures in certain fields but has no way of doing anything about them.

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that members of parliament have absolutely nothing to do with the estimates prepared for Parliament by various departments. I cannot remember, over the last three or four years, when there was ever one dollar changed in those estimates. I cannot remember when there was an amendment to the spending of $7 billion or $8 billion in the period allotted to discussing estimates. I cannot remember when there was one opposition amendment to those expenditures that was either received or accepted in this House. If there were changes, Mr. Speaker, they were made by a cabinet minister increasing the estimates in his department, not correcting something that might have been overlooked in their preparation.

In the estimates before us today, Mr. Speaker, we see a number of transfer payments. Parliament, in a previous session, has already passed estimates but the money was not used, so there is now a dollar vote transferring it from one year to the next. This is being done for many departments. The amount that is being transferred by the estimate of one dollar may be $50 million. Here, for an extra dollar, you can get $50 million!

In the United States, where they use the committee system, it is the practice that every member on a particular committee has an equal right. They are not committed to the defeat of the government, nor are they committed to the maintenance of the executive who prepared the budget for their consideration. They face a problem as they see it; they make the comments they wish to make; they make changes and, on a number of occasions, to my knowledge they have substantially reduced the request of the executive for money in many fields. They can do that in the United States because in their committee system members are not committed to either upholding or defeating the government. We do not operate on that system, but many members of this House are confused because of their great adherence to our committee system.

Today 15 committees were meeting for organizational purposes, starting at 9.30 a.m. this morning and running until later this evening. It is not unusual, Mr. Speaker, for 20 committees to meet in one day and there just are not enough people to go around. So committees cancel meetings; they borrow people from one committee to go to another. They go to a committee and say "You leave this committee and come to the other one so that you can vote." As soon as the vote is taken, those members leave and return to the original committee. Everybody moves around for the vote and then they leave.

If the general public saw how most of these committees operate, they would not be very satisfied with the system. I am sure that if you questioned your wife's budget for the next month because you were having difficulties on your salary and the alternative was to go to your boss and ask for more money, you would trim the budget here and there. That might prove easier than asking for the raise.

We have made changes and all kinds of concessions. Every time we make a concession it reminds me of a little story in one of my early school books. An Arab had a tent and a camel. The camel was standing outside the tent and he asked the Arab if he could put his head in because it was cold outside. He got his head in, and then he wanted his feet in; then the hump, and then the rest of him. Pretty soon the Arab was outside the tent and the camel was inside. It seems to me that is the way it is with the committees, Mr. Speaker. Every time the opposition gives an inch, the government is in a position to take advantage of it but we do not get any concessions from the government, except the one with which the President of the Treasury Board is very enamoured, and that is information. He will give us research people and all kinds of experts, the same as the government has. That does not seem to me to solve many problems. Our experts talk to their experts, and soon our computer talks to their computer but what about Joe back in the riding? How is he being protected by my computer's conversation with their computer, if it gets to that stage?

The thing that worries people in this country today more than anything else is that they are being reduced from human beings, from people who counts, from people in a democracy who have a right to elect people to represent them, to a social security number.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: If they are not being represented by us in regard to these budgetary expenditures, I think the day will come when confrontation in the streets will be their answer to the problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I would have found it difficult to refrain from speaking on the motion moved by Her Majesty's loyal opposition, a motion which is so general that it does not contain anything. In fact, it blames us but without stating precisely in which area we have failed to do our duty and caused waste.

I thought that the basic role of Parliament was to approve budget expenditures. However, it seems that the opposition does not agree with Parliament sovereignty, with the adoption of its estimates and when I notice that the motion refers to waste I believe that today is a total loss since I doubt we can reach our objective by debating such a motion.

The opposition might have moved a more flexible and more accurate motion aimed at a specific department, blaming it for its management and proving it. It would have been much easier for the party in power to defend its position.

I do not think we can defend ourselves in any area when the government is condemned for mismanagement in such general terms. In my opinion, Parliament should be blamed since it is its responsibility to approve the country's expenditures. If waste does exist, Parliament should be blamed for it and, of course, that includes opposition members.

Parliament is also urged to take steps but I do not know which steps we could take to improve the study of the estimates. I do not believe that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin)—whom I hold in high esteem—is suggesting that every member of the House should be an auditor on the same basis as the Auditor General. Someone is policing the government's expenditures and I do not think it would be in order for hon. members to interfere in the Auditor General's work or to take his place by themselves becoming auditors.

In that case, it would be very difficult, if we spend more time than we do now dealing with the estimates, to pass legislation to improve the standard of living of the people.

The Auditor General, in his report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1970, page 1, describes his terms of reference as follows:

> The Auditor General shall report annually to the House of Commons the results of his examinations and shall call attention to every case in which he has observed that
> (a) any officer or employee has wilfully or negligently omitted to collect or receive any money belonging to Canada,
>
> (b) any public money was not duly accounted for and paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund,
>
> (c) any appropriation was exceeded or was applied to a purpose or in a manner not authorized by Parliament,
>
> (d) an expenditure was not authorized or was not properly vouched or certified,
>
> (e) there has been a deficiency or loss through the fraud, default or mistake of any person, or
>
> (f) a special warrant authorized the payment of any money, > and to any other case that the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons.

I think then that the terms of reference of the Auditor General are clear enough and I believe that neither the motion now before us nor the amendment can significantly contribute to the control of government expenses since there is already an agency entrusted with this particular job which operates conscientiously considering the results of its work and its annual reports. I am referring to the Committee on Public Accounts which is under the chairmanship of a member of the opposition.

Since 1968, two important changes have occurred in the procedure for reviewing estimates: First, all estimates are referred to committees and second, as was mentioned earlier by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), there has been a revamping of the estimates form of presentation. This form of presentation has been studied in depth by the Committee on Public Accounts and the present one has been unanimously approved.

Prior to 1968, a committee, known to this House as the committee on supply, used to meet in the House itself. Almost 200 hours could be allotted to reviewing the estimates.

Today, the opposition complains that it has less time to carry out this review. I have made some calculations myself which I would like to convey to the House, proving that today the opposition, besides the 25 days allotted to them to debate supply, can still manage to spend 1,248 hours on this review. This, is how this result has been obtained: Sixteen committees sitting at least twice a week will be studying the estimates according to the orders of the day, which makes 32 meetings of roughly three hours each, that is to say 96 hours; if those committees sit during the months of February, March, April and May, 13 weeks all told, this comes up to a total of 1,248 hours of work alloted to the estimates.

Furthermore, of the 16 committees, two include 30 members and 14 include 20 members, which adds up to 340 members. In other words, some members will evidently have to sit on more than one committee, as indeed I and several of my colleagues and hon. members of the opposition do.

All hon. members who sit on committees are able to ask questions from officials and ministers who appear before them to explain the basis and the objectives of the estimates. I do not see how a member of the House can complain of being unable to study the estimates, for he has every opportunity of doing so. If a minister is called upon to give evidence before a committee and there is not enough time for hon. members to ask questions about the estimates under consideration, the minister and the public servants accompanying him are recalled by the committee—the committee comprising representatives of the opposition parties and of the government party—in order to comment on those estimates.

Therefore, I do not see why there are complaints, Mr. Speaker. One should make a distinction between consideration of the general estimates, which are tabled in February, and the supplementary estimates, which are tabled twice a year, that is in March and in December. This difference being taken into account, we might have to increase the number of sessions if we want to be able to consider everything that is referred to this committee.

As chairman of the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, I think I have reasons to believe that hon. members, even those on the government side, sometimes show indifference when time comes to study estimates. In the past, the committee sat when only four hon. members of a total of 20 were present including only one opposition member. Some will complain that there is not enough time to consider the estimates. That is beyond my understanding. I do not see how one can complain of such a situation when one can readily settle the problem by other means.

Such a motion, I feel, should have been introduced in the procedure and organization committee. The very object of this committee is the study of House and committee procedures and I think that instead of taking the time of the House on a motion as vague and, I believe, as useless as this one, it would have been better had it been introduced before the standing committee of the House whose responsibility is precisely to study problems of this kind.

Today, we could have discussed more interesting questions. All together, we could have thoroughly studied the estimates of a single department, for instance. It has been suggested that when the opposition's 25 days are used up it might be advisable to meet in committee of the whole for detailed scrutiny of the estimates of any particular department. However, it can still be considered that the estimates for the same department can be thoroughly examined in an already existing standing committee.

At the time when the Standing Orders of the House were altered, Parliament voted in favour of the changes, and I for one feel the new rules have been quite adequate, since we have been able to release the House from the work of examining estimates, thus allowing us more detailed study of bills.

I am surprised that the Creditistes seem to approve the motion and the amendment because in the three committees to which I belong, the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee which I have the honour of chairing, the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee and the Public Accounts Committee, I have yet to witness regular attendance of Creditistes to study estimates referred to those three committees.

I understand that they are not many, and they will be fewer still after the next election. However, when they are appointed to a committee, they should at least try to attend the meetings, because on the committees I have mentioned, at least one Creditiste is appointed. They should consider it their duty to be present, particularly in committees dealing with economic affairs, which are of the highest importance. It seems that the social credit theory clashes with the procedure of the House of Commons, and they are not happy to sit in on committees; they prefer practicing demagogy—inside the House—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time is expired.

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this motion I do not intend to indulge in a shell game with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). Suffice it to say that in the six years I have been here, total government expenditure has more than doubled—from $7.2 billion to $15.7 billion. This is borne out by the handy little booklet the hon. gentleman caused to be distributed at the same time as we received the estimates.

I agree that to talk in global figures at this time might not accomplish what we have set out to do here. I submit there has been mismanagement and waste by the government. In support of this contention I intend to deal specifically with one agency of the government, namely, Information Canada, which ironically tabled its first annual report today. Without going into detail concerning this report, which could itself be the subject of further debate, I would say that its form is specious and basically flim-flam. Though colourful in style, it is empty in substance, trying to flesh-out a skeleton and instil life where there is no purpose.

When the political archeologists sift through the sands of the just society, if they find any trace of Information Canada at all they will have found in capsule form the dreams and despairs of that society. Embalmed with the dried-out petals of flower power, the remains will be mute testimony to the frustrated hopes and disappointed expectations of thousands of Canadians who happened to live during the Trudeau era. They yearned for a new era in politics: they got parliamentary profanity. They wanted compassion, but they were fed into a computer. They hoped for substance and sensitivity: they received the style of a shrug and a smile. Vacillation, indifference, task forces, surveys, waste and policy vacuums were the telltale mark of the day.

Where better to see this story than in the birth and the life of Information Canada? But, really, what should we have expected from an agency which was a pet project of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), conceived in haste with a troubled pregnancy and subjected to an induced and troubled labour. And to compound all these problems we had as midwife Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon. There was naturally going to be a retarded growth with these ingredients, not a retarded growth in terms of cost or size but certainly a retarded growth expressing a feeble function and one deficient in purpose.

Doubts about the purpose of Information Canada and fears regarding its function as a propaganda tool of government were crystallized by the appointment of Mr. Gagnon, a former propaganda chief of the Liberal party in Quebec, as director-general. This is where the Prime Minister made his first basic mistake in his tenure of office. He failed fully to appreciate the human factor in the appointment and the seeds of suspicion which the appointment sowed—for without reference to past associations or former political friends, the appointment of the chief of the new agency should have been an appointment beyond reach of suspicion, like Caesar's wife. He should not only have been pure, but he should have been above suspicion. Here, there was certainly suspicion, the same type of suspicion as if one appointed Yves Geoffroy as head of the penitentiary service. We would know he was doing a job but we would wonder who he was doing the job on.

If my remarks appear unduly harsh, I invite hon. members opposite to look at the record. The report of the task force was tabled on November 4, 1969. The announcement of the creation of Information Canada was made on February 10, 1970. Much to the surprise of some, this was the only parliamentary framework within which we had to work in so far as Information Canada was concerned since there was no legislative proposal which Parliament could scrutinize on an annual basis. By April 1, 1970, Information Canada was in operation.

• (1750)

The annual report of Information Canada was filed today. We know it went into operation, without any parliamentary approval, in 1969-70. In the estimates for that year there appeared a supplementary estimate of $1 million. The first item that appeared before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee relating to Information Canada was an estimate of $2.1 million. I have tried to trace the estimates year by year following that, but the picture is confusing because there were two revolving accounts affecting the exhibition commission.

However, as shown in the estimates, Information Canada, having started with a $1 million supplementary estimate followed by a $2 million budget at the end of the first fiscal year 1969-70, grew in 1970-71 to an approved estimate of $7,910,000, and in 1971-72 to a proposed expenditure of $8,700,000 with a supplementary estimate of $456,000, for a total approved budget of $9,156,000. Then in the current year the estimate shows a growth to $10,354,000.

Meanwhile, the number of employees grew—from 377 in 1970-71 to 403 in 1971-72; and for 1972-73 the number is close to 500. While this growth was taking place, the duplication that was supposed to have been avoided and the savings that were supposed to have been made proved baseless. In other departments informational agencies also increased in size. So from the answer in the return given the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather), it appears that on November 16, 1970, the number of employees engaged on informational services work prior to Information Canada was 950, and since Information Canada was formed has grown to 978.

Following all this growth, the House of Commons and people of Canada have been exposed to the confidential memo of the deputy director-general outlining the present lack of policy, purpose and direction of Information Canada. I could refer to many quotations in support of this, but it is clear there is no policy. As reported in the Globe and Mail of March 2, Mr. Phillips stated in his confidential memo:

> The record of the past six months . . . leads one to conclude that it is urgent to consider some projects to justify our budget and existence.

He then refers to a policy vacuum and says that planning has come "to a virtual standstill." Not even preliminary work has begun, he said, nor can it begin without guidelines relating to organization and other policies. Then he talked about many other gaps existing in planning and direction. I think the most interesting statement is this, and it relates to the estimates. He said:

> With only about six working days left for the submission of our financial forecast—

As I have indicated, this already shows a substantial increase in amount.

> —not even preliminary work has begun, nor can it begin without guidelines relating to organization and other policies. This should ordinarily be a job lasting at least one month.

I do not have time to refer to other quotations, but it is clear there has been a growth in expenditure and in personnel, while other informational agencies of the government have also been growing. Let me quote the two laws of Parkinson which I hope the minister responsible will heed. The first is that work expands so as to fill the time available for its completion. I think the memo of Mr. Phillips to Mr. Gagnon supports that first law of Mr. Parkinson. The second law of Mr. Parkinson is that expenditure rises to meet income. Certainly, when the deputy director-general of Information Canada says that they have to get plans in order to spend money to justify their existence, you wonder what is happening to the expenditure of public funds in Canada. If this is happening with Information Canada, the pet hobby of the Prime Minister, what is happening in other Crown agencies where millions of dollars are being expended?

Let me read more about the second law of Parkinson, and I trust the director general and the minister responsible will take note of it:

> It is the paradox of administration that fewer people have less to do and more time, therefore, in which to think about what they are doing. When funds are limitless, the only economy made is in thinking. The worst inefficiencies do not stem from a lack of funds but from an initial failure to decide exactly what the object is. It is this muddled thinking that leads to waste, and often to waste on a colossal scale. Towards eliminating public waste an essential step is to reduce the total revenue. Officials are less inclined to squander what is not there.

I commend the two laws of Parkinson to those in Information Canada who, on their own admission in the internal memo of Mr. Phillips to the director-general, do not really know how properly to spend the taxpayers' dollars. If there was any question that Information Canada has a purpose, why has it not been delegated to deal with the advertising campaigns of various departments of government? The government campaigned to tell Canadians how to fill out a census return, and this cost $798,000. The government campaigned for the Manpower Department, at a cost of $392,000; and to tell Canadians that they would have a new Unemployment Insurance Act it spent $585,000.

These advertising campaigns, which are not political but are more of a functional and administrative nature, should come within the ambit of Information Canada if this body is to have any basic design for its existence. Instead of this, the money was doled out to friends of the government in a complete violation of recommendation No. 13 of the task force report which stated there should be established, amongst other things, an independent board composed of advertisers and representatives of the media to deal with government advertising campaigns.

My time is limited, but there are many recommendations I could make of a positive nature. However, I leave this thought with the House: Let us do something different. Instead of squandering millions of dollars on Information Canada—$10.3 million to date—let us look at some real participatory democracy, in which the Prime Minister says he believes, to say nothing of parliamentary democracy. The Prime Minister proved this when he established research funds for the opposition parties. In the speech from the Throne in September, 1968, and in the statement he made on November 15 of that year he said, somewhat fleetingly, that he believed in parliamentary and participatory democracy.

But what has happened since? The annual funds allotted to members of the official opposition amount to $125,000, to the NDP $35,000, and to the Ralliement Créditiste $35,000, for a total of $195,000. Subsequently the Liberal caucus, which is basically a body of about 40 Liberals who do not have a position as parliamentary secretary or minister, received $130,000. This amounts in all to $325,000.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair to resume the same at eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, just before the supper recess I suggested that instead of wasting money on Information Canada—and I documented how money had been wasted since Information Canada was conceived—we should shift attention and financial resources to the sort of research facilities that a former prime minister in one enlightened period made available to opposition parties. I suggest that this would give us not only a better informed opposition but a stronger government, because with an informed opposition there will be a strong government and thereby the public will be better served.

I also said that the funds allocated back in 1968-69 for opposition parties totalled $325,000. I showed how that amount was divided among the parties. These amounts to be expended solely on salaries of staff members of professional status—economist, sociologist and jurist; the sort of people the Prime Minister hopefully stipulated would be employed—have remained without increase throughout the 1969-70, 1970-71 and 1971-72 budgets. I suggest that Mr. Speaker has not been able to recommend that these employees should receive the annual 6 per cent or 7 per cent increase granted to other House of Commons employees. Although all four research branches have requested translation facilities, these facilities have been constantly refused. This, surely, is contrary to the principles of the bilingual policy enunciated by the Prime Minister and carried out by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier).

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to contrast this treatment with respect to research facilities available to us in this House with the figures of the annual budget of the Prime Minister's office over the last three years. The amount of $110,000 has been deducted from figures in the estimates to cover expenditures for the maintenance of the Prime Minister's residence, for his salary and car allowance, and for allowances to former prime ministers. We arrive at the following expenditures for the Prime Minister's office, exclusive of any supplementary expenditures: for 1970-71 there is $989,000, for 1971-72 we have $1,078,000, and for 1972-73 we have $1,095,000. These sums, of course, are exclusive of salaries of members of special inquiries, of task forces or of amounts paid to contract workers who report to the Privy Council in aid of the Prime Minister's office.

I ask hon. members to contrast the amount of money available for opposition research facilities in the federal Parliament with the amount that was made available for opposition parties in the Ontario legislature in 1972-73. In that legislature, Mr. Speaker, the official opposition happens to be the Liberal party, thank goodness. That party received $200,000. The NDP received $191,000, making a total of $391,000 for both opposition parties, which is more than the total of $325,000 made available in this House for opposition parties.

If one adds to that sum the $486,000 which is available to members of the government caucus in the Ontario legislature, one will see that in the Ontario legislature $877,000 is spent on research facilities, compared with $325,000 spent here. It may be added that these amounts represent increases from the original sums granted because the value of the service to the parliamentary process has been proven. In the result, Mr. Speaker, the two opposition parties in the Ontario legislature receive for research facilities double the amount received by the three opposition parties in this House, plus $1,000.

The research branches of the opposition parties have more than proven their worth and their contribution to the parliamentary process as that contribution and objective has been defined by the Prime Minister. Information Canada, on the admission of its second-ranking deputy and of the Prime Minister, has not proven its worth. That body, I suggest, has not fulfilled the function expected of it. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that our decision-making process can admit of only one course to be taken. I would hope that future expenditures in this area would be frozen and that funds would be switched to help establish research facilities. We hope that further money will not be wasted on Information Canada.

In conclusion, I mentioned Parkinson's law before supper; I said Information Canada obeys the law laid down by Mr. Parkinson. I wish to mention another law or principle. I am referring to the Peter principle which indicates that every man rises to his own level of incompetence. Information Canada has definitely risen to its own level of incompetence. In the process, that body has obeyed another law of science, Newton's law, which says that everything which goes up must come down. I say that everything that goes in must come out. I think we should vote in support of the motion before the House and say that there has been waste and mismanagement by this government. In that way we could get rid of some people who have robbed the taxpayer of tax dollars that rightfully belong to him.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we are now considering a non-confidence motion presented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) as well as an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The motion presented by the hon. member for Peace River reads as follows:

This House condemns the government for its mismanagement and waste of taxpayers' money and urges that Parliament take steps to exercise greater scrutiny and control over estimates and expenditures.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre states that the committees do only a perfunctory study of government expenditures and it recommends that we go back to the practice of past years, that is to say that certain items be considered by the House of Commons and others by the Standing Committees.

The criticisms and remarks of the hon. member for Peace River dealt mainly with generalities, Mr. Speaker. But as was suggested by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) this afternoon, part of the increases in government expenditures are transfers or amounts being spent on cost-sharing programs.

I would like to give a few examples of increases in those cost-sharing programs as well as in transfers of funds to the provinces. Among others the amounts allotted to National Health and Welfare for the 1972-73 fiscal year total $3,831 million as compared to $1,824 million for 1964-65, which represents 24 cents out of every dollar of taxes paid by the taxpayers of this country.

As far as economic expansion or development is concerned, the estimates are $2,241 million, compared with $805 million for the year 1964-65.

As for transfer payments made to the provinces, in 1964-65 they were $358 million, compared with $1,307 million for 1972-73.

We note that in 1964-65, the government spent $28 million for education support programs compared with $667 million earmarked for this purpose in 1972-73.

Under the heading of cultural activities and leisure, expenditures now total $368 million against $169 million in 1964-65.

The estimates for 1964-65 totalled $7,218 million and $15,749 million for 1972-73. The figure I have just mentioned for 1972-73 represents 52 per cent of the estimates for this year.

I would like also to draw a few comparisons relating to the Department of National Health and Welfare. In 1968-69, expenditures for medical services amounted to $35 million and for 1971-72 to $581,200,000; in 1968-69, the federal government contributed $560 million for hospital services compared with $841,556,000 for 1971-72.

I could go on listing figures, Mr. Speaker, I will point out, moreover, that part of the estimates increase since 1964-65 results from transfers to provinces or from federal contributions to cost-sharing programs.

I would like now to touch briefly on the question of control over government expenses. Some would like to revert to old methods. I too experienced this in 1961-62. That was when the House, sitting as a committee of the whole, then known as the committee on supply, was reviewing government expenses.

In 1964-65, the votes of only two departments were referred to standing committees: the committee on veterans affairs and the committee on external affairs. And I remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1961-62, while the government proposed to the House to review the expenditures of a department, strangely enough, one or two days later, it submitted the expenditures of another department or a new bill.

I for one prefer the method adopted since 1968 whereby all government outlays are referred to one or other of the 16 standing committees of the House. I do not understand the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he says that those committees study government expenses superficially.

If I refer to a study made by the Committees Branch, Mr. Speaker, I see that during the second session of the 28th Parliament, 152 meetings were spent on the study of the various departmental estimates. Having had the honour of being chairman of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, as well as a member of other committees—not, like the President of the Treasury Board, on the opposition side only, but both as an opposition and a government member—I would say that on the whole members who sit on committees are responsible people and study government expenses in depth.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) say this afternoon that in some cases debates are cut short. I have sat with the hon. member for Timiskaming and I do not think it is easy for a chairman to try and stop him from making remarks.

Now, if I refer to the third session of the 28th Parliament, I think that the 16 committees spent 179 meetings on an in-depth study of government expenses.

Over and above the committees which study estimates, we also have to consider the mechanism for checking expenses, which is the public accounts committee. This committee again considered the matter of checking public accounts last fall, on November 9 and 16, 1971, as is evidence in Issues Nos. 51 and 52 of the committee proceedings. On that occasion, the committee had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Balls, assistant deputy minister of the Department of Supply and Services, who informed us that as far as tabling public accounts for the year 1970-71 was concerned, the government had made a commitment, back in 1968, through the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson), to table the Public Accounts of Canada on October 31 at the latest. This year, the three volumes were tabled, the last of which on November 4. Public accounts were tabled two months earlier than for 1969-70 for volumes II and III, and three months for volume I.

The Public Accounts Committee set up a sub-committee made up of a member from each party and representatives for the Auditor General, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Supply and Services, to make a study in depth of the possibility of accelerating the tabling in the House of the public accounts of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the formula whereby the study of government expenditures is referred to standing committees, and once those expenditures are made, their study is entrusted to the committee of public accounts, is an excellent one.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, as other members said it before me, that we have to find more efficient means to improve that situation and those procedures. I see that the Auditor General is being blamed, because his report for the year ending on March 31, 1971 will be tabled late, but he gave the reasons for that delay. As a member of this House, I would have liked the Auditor General to make his comments not to a representative of the Canadian Press but to the Public Accounts Committee, because when a minister makes a statement outside the House, the members opposite do not hesitate to blame him for doing so. He said in that statement that for 1970-71, he found more mistakes than in past years. I think that we must be realistic, especially when we note that the estimates for the financial year 1972-73 will amount to some $15 billion. There can undoubtedly be some administrative mistakes, but I think that we have the necessary tools to correct them. And if, in its wisdom, the House or the committee responsible for improving Standing Orders can find a better formula, either to consider government expenditures or to check them, I will be the first to support such an amendment to Standing Orders.

[English]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take a few minutes to speak on the motion before the House regarding government spending and the lack of control by Parliament and the Canadian people over government spending. Because I have only 15 minutes in which to speak I should like to touch upon a topic of current interest and controversy. I refer of course to the Local Initiatives Program. I recall in the early part of October, 1971, when many questions were put by members of the opposition regarding the critical unemployment problem facing the nation, unemployment which at that time was in excess of 6 per cent despite the prognostications of the then minister of finance that we would have a decreasing unemployment rate in 1971.

I remember that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and other members of the House were constantly on the back of the government and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), asking for early consideration of special measures to deal with what appeared to be a critical problem in the winter of 1971-72. It was not until the unemployment statistics were released in October, 1971, that the government decided the problem did exist.

I remember, when I was a youngster, reading a story in my kindergarten book about the young chicken that sat on its perch and closed its eyes thinking that nobody would notice its presence. The Prime Minister acted like somebody who did not realize that this government could adopt policies which would result in serious unemployment. He refused to face the fact. He sat there stubbornly and told the Canadian people they could either like it or lump it; they could either put up with his policies or throw him out of office in the next election. The result of that reactionary stubbornness was that at one time last year 750,000 people were out of work. Finally we got word that various ministers of the Crown had ordered their deputies and departmental officials to dust off all the drawers in their offices and come up with old projects and programs that had been laid aside during the two years of the depression which existed in 1970 and 1971.

Lo and behold, we witnessed the birth of the Local Initiatives Program which was announced on October 14. The program was born out of panic. The concept and philosophy behind it not only has the support of the Conservative party but is the type of philosophy for which the Conservative party has been known since its inception, namely, to encourage people to involve themselves in their own economic environment, to do things for themselves, to become productive and to have a share in the economy of the nation as well as to have the satisfaction of being involved.

Certainly the concept and philosophy are healthy, but the fact is that the program was born out of panic and many of the attitudes and frustrations which are experienced across the nation right now are the result of poor planning, a panic situation where the government was caught with their proverbial pants down in October of 1971. They came through with the program without proper co-ordination with the provinces and without ability to initiate a serious and sensible program to combat unemployment this winter.

The word "isolation" was mentioned several times in the Speech from the Throne and it seems to be the keynote of the speech. There is no other word that can so aptly describe some of the aspects of the Local Initiatives Program which was prepared in total isolation from the provinces of Canada. Many of the provinces had already begun their own winter works programs and they found that LIP overlapped and conflicted with them.

Also, there was little co-operation with the municipalities which are creatures of the provincial governments. They found themselves forced into the situation of having to hastily prepare programs and projects. The program was initiated in isolation from the House of Commons. There was no reference to members of the House, the representatives of the Canadian people, and in October of 1971 the announcement was made of the $100 million program which had to be increased to $150 million with no explanation to the people's representatives as to how it would be administered and implemented throughout the country.

I should like to mention generally and briefly two concerns of the Canadian people. The first is, who is benefiting from the Local Initiatives Program? On the one hand hundreds of responsible groups had the foresight and the insight to come through with constructive projects, among them municipalities, Lions Clubs, churches, schools, community councils, athletic associations and many similar organizations. On the other hand we have to admit one thing, that the communities which were best structured, the more formalized communities which had better organization and were more in contact with government programs, had a big advantage compared with small, rural communities throughout Canada. The communities that were closest to the scene, had better contacts with their Members of Parliament and were better provided with information services, had a very big advantage.

This past weekend, Mr. Speaker, I had a unique experience, speaking against the background of my brief experience as a Canadian. I went to Toronto. I must admit that the visit was not in my capacity as a Member of Parliament. I do not say that the people involved knew who I was. I did not advertise myself as a Member of Parliament, as John Lundrigan does, but I did visit Rochdale college. I had this unique experience, and I feel almost guilty about admitting publicly that I used a pseudonym, or whatever you call it, when I visited the Process Church of the Final Judgment. There I observed the results of the decisions of the Canadian government whereby moneys were advanced to some of these groups. I have to say that despite my broadmindedness toward young Canadians and my eagerness to get involved in making money available to groups that can make worthwhile changes in our society, it is inconceivable to me that the Canadian people through their representatives here could be satisfied with the allocation of funds to some of these groups that are totally under mismanagement, if in fact one can use the word "management" in conjunction with their programs.

It is absolutely unbelievable that the government would allow money to flow into some of these activities and programs with no more control than it has shown to date. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is absolutely no control over the way these moneys are being expended in the various communities across Canada, let alone over the way they are being expended by some of these groups that do not know where they are going and are never likely to know.

After seeing the program of the Final Judgment church and talking to some people at Rochdale college, that institution which certainly has to be questioned—a large, beautiful building that could be used to great advantage by young Canadians or by some other formal institution—I was reminded of the thousands of projects put forward by action groups, community councils, churches, schools and athletic associations across this nation but which were turned down.

In October, 1971, when the government introduced the Local Initiatives Program the authorities actually went on a rampage of phoning the churches, the colleges, the town councils, the mayors, the chairmen of local groups and committees and telling them, "Get your projects in. We will be looking at your projects."

Let me point out the way this program has been handled and the absolute frustration that has resulted from it. These groups were all activated. I know that many communities just sat there and were very lukewarm about getting involved in any type of program such as this, but they were encouraged to do so. In Halifax, for example, in the Atlantic region, the director-general phoned groups and told them to get their projects moving. In some cases these groups had formal leaders and in some cases informal leaders. They got together at public meetings, preached the Local Initiatives Program from church pulpits and from mayors' seats at council meetings. Then the communities began to advance their projects.

As the projects started to come in, the government, being very interested in showing an early impression on the unemployment statistics, began to accept almost everything that came along. Tens of thousands of little communities began to get programs under way for the provision of fire halls, parks and the cleaning-up of cemeteries. One commentator writing in a local newspaper in St. John's, Newfoundland, said they were interested in both the quick and the dead, the athletic programs and the cemeteries, which seemed to attract the greatest attention of the administrators of LIP. At any rate, these thousands of projects started to come in and finally in the month of January, with almost all their money running out, the administrators discovered they still had thousands of projects coming in. As a result, the vast majority of the projects that came in during January were turned down.

Can you imagine the frustration of a local community group or action group having its project turned down after first being stimulated and publicly encouraged to take part in the program? At the same time, groups that were turned down could point to nearby, little communities that were proceeding with a fire hall or had projects approved for other purposes. At the same time, too, they could point to some of the groups which have been exposed in Ontario during the last few weeks where projects of a very questionable nature were approved. Those who were turned down were devastated by the rejection of their programs.

All this points out to the opposition and to the Canadian people that the government's program was very ill-defined in the first place. It had no clear concept of what it was getting involved in. The program originated out of panic in October, 1971, when members of the government realized they had an unemployment problem, that they had to take some remedial action or perhaps we would have a worse situation in the winter of 1971 in terms of frustration and public demonstrations. The over-all program was ill-planned. It is very poorly administered and is causing a tremendous amount of hardship and frustration. It will have the effect of literally annihilating thousands of project leaders across Canada who caused their communities to become interested in their projects and who are now flattened by the rejection of the federal government.

I say two things are needed, Mr. Speaker. In these types of government programs, regardless of their merit, more planning has to be done. They have to be properly evaluated in order that mistakes which occurred in the past can be corrected. The second thing needed is that the representatives of the Canadian people must be given more control over this type of government spending. There is no way, as representatives of the Canadian people, that we can stand up in this House today and approve of the manner in which many of these projects were approved, no way in which we can justify money being refused to other projects without any excuse or hope for the future. To those who were turned down the government did not say, "We will reconsider your project at a later date "or," We will set up a kind of priority system whereby your project will be re-evaluated next fall." No hope at all was given.

As a final step the government will have to come up with a co-ordinated effort so that these programs will not be launched in isolation from other programs of a worth while nature. There was no co-operation with the provinces. The Premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Blakeney, complained vigorously in December that the LIP program was not getting off the ground. From Saskatchewan they had sent in over 100 applications, only 22 were accepted and they had no word with respect to the others. There seems to have been little co-operation with the provinces. The program was not introduced as part of a major package that would stimulate the economy, put the confidence of the business community back into shape and get the whole economy moving ahead again. It was a program launched very much in isolation of the needs of the Canadian people. Such a program cannot continue and hope to achieve major results.

A number of references have been made by hon. members in this debate, including my colleague from Egmont, to the lack of government control. We have asked that these programs be re-evaluated. Last year we had the Opportunities for Youth program. It was announced early in the spring of 1971 and was concluded at the end of the summer. An evaluation of it was undertaken. I do not know exactly how much this cost but I believe it was $32 million. We have not yet received the results of that evaluation. This year another Opportunities for Youth program was announced, with the closing date set at March 8. I repeat that we have received no evaluation from last year, and now we have another program under way. We have asked for special reference to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration in order to have the program evaluated and to call before it people whose projects were rejected and, of course, people who had projects of a questionable nature.

• (2040)

I say, Mr. Speaker, that at least we should have right now a thorough exposure of these programs before the appropriate committee so that the Canadian taxpayer will see the results, learn where his hard-earned dollars go and the reason for the increase in taxes.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, it may sometime seem too easy to criticize. Since this is our part in the opposition, government members are misled and ignore our criticism, thinking that after all we are just playing our part. This, Mr. Speaker, is a serious mistake by the government. If constructive suggestions from the opposition were accepted more often, there would be more harmony, and especially more efficiency. But there is this devilish practice of thinking that the party which has won more seats enjoys an exclusive monopoly over legislation.

So, we are quite right in rejecting all blame on the only people responsible for present difficulties—the members of the government. The nefarious results or consequences of ineffective laws, coupled with the refusal to accept either our projects or our amendments, make this non-confidence motion right and true.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about the mismanagement of the government. Going from childish hesitations to dubious decisions, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet have managed to dissatisfy almost everybody: the unemployed, welfare recipients, workers, white collars, professionals, tradesmen, businessmen, I repeat, everybody.

We are accused, among others by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) who, furthermore, did so in a pitiful manner, of making general and vague charges. No doubt the hon. member was not present when the leader of the Social Credit (Mr. Caouette) did in fact list very specific facts and circumstances. Furthermore, I intend to point them out again.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, what should one think of the famous announcement with regard to unemployment insurance, which threw dust in people's eyes with the $100 weekly benefits and which also became one more bone of contention between Quebec and Ottawa. It is a four-, five-, six-, what I am saying, seven-month delay that is imposed on the unemployed.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the government, like the other opposition parties and the Social Credit, should know that the humble worker is always waiting for his pay cheque. As soon as he becomes unemployed, it is a catastrophe. Why strike at his dignity in this way, by making him wait for weeks for something that he is entitled to, because he has paid contributions in order to be able to face unemployment periods easily foreseeable in such a badly-governed country as ours? Why those weeks of waiting? Those are so many ways taken by the government and the technocrats, as the minister admitted candidly this afternoon, to raise many hopes but to give nothing.

What should one think of this shower of money falling from the clouds where the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is amusing himself. He squanders money, Mr. Speaker, as if it were going out of style. He does not worry about the consequences, sometimes disastrous, of the subsidies he grants, no planning, no true concern for progress. But what he deems important is the political capital which this may bring. As the party's organizer, did he, perchance, ask those receiving such subsidies to make a contribution to the electoral funds of the party? I would also like to say a word, Mr. Speaker, about the local initiatives projects. Theoretically they were the outcome of a good idea. Once again, how was it applied? We had to keep on fighting for the approval of serious projects while thousands of dollars crumbled under ski-doos.

Mr. Speaker, as the Social Credit leader was saying, we are not opposed to the approval of recreational projects but we are disappointed with the implementation of this program designed to create jobs during the winter and the beginning of the spring. For weeks and months there was publicity and propaganda: "Canada works". It was not working fast enough in December. Advertising was increased. All kinds of groups were formed, some of them concocting all sorts of uncanny inventions. In the meantime our municipalities were considering, developing and approving useful, necessary and even essential projects. Then the Department of Municipal Affairs in Quebec revised, ratified and sent everything to Montreal.

• (2050)

Of course, it was impossible to do all that in a few days; thus, most municipal projects were received during January, before the January 31 time limit. All goes well up to that point, Mr. Speaker, but then, things are beginning to get serious.

All this work had been done for nothing because the funds were all used up by December 30, 1971. This is dishonest, deceitful, demagogic or, as the Prime Minister once said, and I sum up his three famous words: It's God-damned fuddle duddle merde.

Our little Robert, who is short-winded, in Quebec City, is always short of money. What a splendid opportunity his Ottawa master offered him. That is how most of the funds earmarked for municipalities under the local initiatives program ended up in the large empty pockets of our little Robert in Quebec City.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it is shameful to defraud in such a way the municipalities and all the taxpayers. Therefore I fully endorse the motion which enable us to set things right.

Thus it is high time:

—that Parliament take steps to exercise greater scrutiny and control over estimates and expenditures—as it is said in that motion.

We do all we can here to help the government with our advice, our suggestions and even with the solutions we are proposing. They already have laughed at them and they tried to attack them. They make a pretence of ignoring them, but, Mr. Speaker, nevertheless our solutions are still there.

A healthy administration can be based only on a philosophy that guarantees individual freedom while ensuring security.

There should be security on every level. It is therefore urgent to start at the beginning and reform our monetary system in order to establish an economy which is fair, human and progressive. It is our duty to correct the inadequacies, injustices and stupidities of the present financial system.

As for the population, it is willing to accept mandatary reforms. Then, I shall be asked, how is it that everyone does not vote for the Créditistes? Mr. Speaker, during the next election campaign, the steamroller of election funds will again attempt to overwhelm all opposition.

It is not the Créditiste doctrine they will be attacking. It is known that people are ready to accept its implementation, but they will resort to demagogy.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) gave me a little fore-taste of that this afternoon. He was taxing the Social Credit members with insufficient attendance at committee sittings. Besides, I notice that all government members, in their contributions, bring up that subject: the work achieved within the committees. However, the hon. member for Laurier is well aware that we cannot fraction ourselves in order to attend two, three or four committees simultaneously, committees which, moreover, operate more or less efficiently. Since we are unable to divide or multiply ourselves, at least before the elections we must voice our criticisms on the stages of the bills debated right here in the House, and that is what we are doing.

We did not convince our constituents through the use of money, propaganda, misleading advertising or—I almost said—through the support of the underworld. Only honesty, simplicity and the appeal of our doctrine convince the people. This is the greatest tribute that the people can pay to our sincerity because, Mr. Speaker, we convince the people in our constituencies through the force of conviction brought about by what we believe.

We are increasingly convinced that a great number of Canadians understand—because the present government has proved it himself clearly—that it is high time to change the system, to end this wasting of the taxpayer's money and to bring to everyone this security that we all wish we had.

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, the dollars and cents that have been wasted in the realm of government spending in recent years will probably never be known. Certainly it can be counted in the hundreds of millions of dollars. Perhaps in the minds of some it will ever be thus, but I am not prepared to accept the proposition or argument that this wasteful spending is something over which we have no control.

In the first place, it can be clearly demonstrated, I suggest, that inept political leadership at the ministerial level can be blamed for virtually all waste within the capital equipment spending program of the Canadian armed forces in recent years. From horses on the payroll all the way through to the DDH-280 program we have glaring examples of failure by political leaders to accept advice from professionals in the forces. We have the resultant and obvious end to which this has led us—wastage of money, purchase of ill-devised equipment and a national arts centre. Even worse, in virtually every case it can be very clearly demonstrated that inept political leadership has led to these bad decisions being made.

The mid-life overhaul of the Bonaventure is a classical example in which we saw responsible ministries of government fail to tell what I consider to be the full truth. They preferred to let professional serving officers and non-officers take the blame. It is to this waste and avoidance of public responsibility that I wish to direct a few thoughts in today's debate. Going back to the Bobcat, there was a wastage of $9 million. We purchased 115 CF-5 aircraft at a cost of $1,114,000 each. Incidentally only about 11 per cent of that program was put up for tender. What did we do with these aircraft? We have some in storage, we sold a few to Venezuela and some are being used for training. Their operational use is in question. Indeed, they were bought against good military advice. What have we done to compound this mistake? We have ordered an additional 20 aircraft. If they were no good in the first place, why are we buying more?

I think we must deal with the Bonaventure. This is probably as good a place as any to set out one case that may stand: I hope in fact it does stand as an example and substantiation of the claim that it is not always the professional public servant or professional soldier who is to blame. Prior to the calling of tenders in the mid-1960s for the mid-life overhaul of the Bonaventure, professional, naval and civilian engineers and other support staff in the dockyard at Halifax carried out a work requirement or job order. They advised DND headquarters in Ottawa that the mid-life overhaul would cost approximately $14 million. That was not good enough. Instructions went back to these professionals instructing them not to change the job requirement but to substantially reduce the dollar content. Back came a revised estimate and another directive went to Halifax to substantially reduce it. Back to Ottawa came an estimate of $8 million, which the Canadian public will recall was the amount at which the overhaul contract was let.

What was the final cost? Two figures are being quoted around the country. I am not certain which is correct. One is $14 million plus, and the other is $17 million. In any event, the point is that DND HQ was advised of the approximate dollars and cents cost and the government, for political purposes, instructed the professionals to reduce it. How can we continue to live in a country that tolerates this practice? Many Canadians, including myself, are fed up with the incompetent political leadership that permits this to happen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: The manipulation of professionals in the public service and the Canadian armed forces by incompetent political leaders is morally wrong. Because of actions like this the government will find itself out of office. The story of the Bonaventure has been a black eye, if you will, on the Canadian armed forces ever since the incident. But it is not the professionals, it is not the serving officers, it is not the five men who were directly involved and who got the axe one way or the other; much more directly it is the result of inept political leadership.

• (2100)

Perhaps even more glaring is the question of the final cost of the DDH-280 program. In 1968, estimates for this program were set at $170 million or thereabouts. Here again, there were half a dozen different figures given. No one knows what the figure was. I could mention one as low as $140 million. In any event, in 1966 there was a figure of $170 million estimated to cover the total cost of those four ships. To date those ships have cost Canadian taxpayers $282 million, and the ships are still in the river yards; they have not gone down to the Atlantic Ocean where they will serve. Worse, there is no way of getting an indication from the government of the final cost of this program. It is a simple question of how much will these four ships cost when turned over to the commander of maritime command for operational purposes, with the keys in the ignition and the supplies and crews on board?

We cannot get an answer to that question. These ships will go to Halifax. They will be finished there. Work will be necessary following sea trials. Work not finished in the river yards will have to be done at the dockyards in Halifax. While I have no doubt about the ability of the tradesmen and the professional people on the east coast to complete this work, I begin to wonder to what extent the Department of Supply and Services let the river yards off the hook with respect to the moral obligation they had to complete this program. How much have they got away with? Who knows? I doubt that anyone will ever know.

No information as to the final cost has been forthcoming from either the Department of National Defence or the Department of Supply and Services. Are they afraid to admit that not even they know what the final cost will be? Do they believe that Canadians are blind and stupid and cannot understand or accept the truth even though it may hurt a little? I say to the political leaders across the way that it is not themselves they are protecting; rather, it is the professional officers whose reputations they are damaging.

In the case of the DDH-280 we have probably the finest ship of its kind in the world. Why do we not say so? Why do we not admit that mistakes were made, that the prime contract was ill-conceived and entered into without proper consideration? Why do we not admit we have made mistakes and tell the public that we are not sure what this program will cost but that everything is being done to keep costs in line? But the government does not do this. The government prefers to procrastinate, to be evasive, to mislead, to protect its political hide at any cost. The government will never tell the Canadian public the whole story.

In this case the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) should give us some answers. As was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), perhaps after all our experimentation with the committee system it is right here in the House, in committee of the whole, that Parliament will become effective. This is where we may learn the full answers to our questions. We shall not get them in committees which are understaffed and poorly administered with respect to timing. I think it is time we paid a little more attention to this chamber because perhaps in committee of the whole extravagant, wasteful decisions, decisions made for political purposes against the advice of professionals in the various departments, can be avoided.

I can suggest no better place to start than right here. Otherwise, there will continue to be waste to a degree which is not acceptable to the public until there is more frankness, more honesty and more concern about the work we are trying to do on behalf of Canadians.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Skoberg: Go to it, Alf. They are spending all your taxes.

Mr. Gleave: I hope the House has carefully noted my cheering section.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: I think the official opposition has done well by bringing in a motion saying that the actions of the government should be more carefully scrutinized. Our approach is also one of examining expenditures to bring them properly before committees so that they can be thoroughly considered.

I wonder whether Canadians realize how many programs are carried out without examination either by the House in committee of the whole or by standing committees. For example, the government spent something in the neighbourhood of $80 million on the Lift program simply on the basis of an estimate. This spending was not examined thoroughly. They made payments to farmers and then said to the same farmers, "All that money was not really due to you. We want some of it back." Then on occasion they changed their position and said to the same farmers, "Sorry, but we are wrong again. Do not bother to send anything back." Obviously there was poor bookkeeping here or inadequate guidelines. The method of payment was never really understood by some farmers. In many instances they did not know what the basis of payment was.

We were presented with a similar kind of program under the stabilization bill. As responsible members of the House sitting in committee of the whole we said we were not prepared to accept the bureaucratic approach taken by the government, and in turn we were told we were obstructing parliament. Time after time during the short while that I have been in this House, when opposition members have demanded to know how money is being spent and what effect programs are going to have on the people, we have been charged with being obstructionist, with preventing the government from getting on with its business, even to the extent that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that those who sit on this side of the House are, as far as he is concerned, nobodies. I can well understand, in view of the actions of the government, that the Prime Minister really believes that.

I have watched the operations of two government programs, Opportunities for Youth and more recently the Local Initiatives Program or LIP. In these two cases the programs have been financed simply by an estimate and without legislative approval or proper guidelines have having been laid down. As a result, people who participate in the programs, have had to wade through yards of red tape. Decisions have been delayed. Decisions are being made in the month of March in relation to programs that were prepared early in the winter and are going to expire in May. A senior citizens' group in the city of Saskatoon asked for some money under the Local Initiatives Program to rebuild an old hall that they had been using for recreational purposes year after year. The hall badly needs remodelling, as well as needing new chairs and furniture. Their application was turned down.

In my constituency I have taken the trouble to write to all organizations that made application for funds to determine whether their applications were accepted or rejected. That was the only way I was able to find out. Certainly you cannot get an up to date reading from the government of what is happening in one's constituency. Last summer I talked to people in my constituency who were taking part in the Opportunities for Youth program. I wrote to all organizations and finally wrote to the minister's office asking for an accounting of what was happening in my constituency and for an evaluation of the program. In effect, the minister said yes, there would be an evaluation of the better projects but not of the whole program. I think that is shameful.

I have before me a letter from Mr. Gray, one of the officials of the senior citizens' group to which I referred. He wrote that he was sorry that their application had been turned down. Then, speaking of the hall, he wrote:

—the present hall that the senior citizens have is 80 years of age. I think the same chairs are in the hall. I do not think there is a cushion on any chair in any way whatever ... It must give the older people a wonderful feeling to know the chairs they are sitting in are the same hard seats that their grandmothers sat on—

This organization has been denied the few thousand dollars it takes to give the senior citizens of Saskatoon a comfortable place in which to enjoy themselves in their old age. The people of that generation built this country. Although the government has money to throw around here and there, causing the Ottawa Citizen to call the program a disgrace, none of it is spent on these people.

This morning the Standing Committee on Agriculture held its first meeting. Since I have been in the House, this committee has worked hard examining the estimates and legislation that has come before it. Yet what did the ruling party try to do in that committee this morning? They wanted to pass a bylaw to the effect that there does not even have to be a quorum for the committee to examine witnesses coming before it.

The government does not even want to honour the organizations appearing before committees of this House with a full attendance of members to ask questions and to hear what they have to say. We spent one hour during our first organizational meeting arguing whether or not there should be a quorum at all times when the committee was sitting. Surely, if a committee is set up it should have a quorum. If it is prepared to sit without a quorum, then I would question whether the committee should be set up at all.

I have been in committees where we have had to fight for information, for the opportunity to hear witnesses and representatives of the farmers from the agricultural communities of Canada give their assessment of what should and should not be done in terms of legislation. As the admendment to the motion says, we must put our committees on a proper basis by providing adequate committee time, space and services and we should consider certain estimates, those of greatest importance, on the floor of the House in committee of the whole. We must remember that we are responsible for spending the taxpayers' money. When we take from those who earn $10,000 or $12,000 a year about 30 per cent or 35 per cent of their income in the form of taxation, it is only fair and reasonable to give them the right to know where and how their money is spent.

Although we are spending large amounts on temporary programs, the city of Saskatoon has to plead for money to build a proper and permanent air terminal. This should have been rebuilt last year. The Department of Transport is going to spend the magnificent sum of $350,000 this year, but what can you do with $350,000 when what you need is an enlarged air terminal? An enlarged air terminal would be a permanent improvement and very useful to Saskatoon. We do not even have adequate transportation for grain from the Prairies to the west coast. All that is needed to provide this transportation is the money to build more track and boxcars, but this money is not forthcoming.

We need to examine fully and completely, in committee of the whole or in a standing committee, how the taxpayers' money is being spent. We must see that this money does long-term as well as short-term good in providing benefits for Canadians.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jerome: —I am a little nervous to be on my feet and facing the august cheering body to which the previous speaker referred without having the usual number of supporters in front of me. I might go astray; however, I will try to stay on the topic we are discussing.

Before embarking on the main body of remarks that I wish to make in this debate, may I say that I cannot help but sympathize with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), who just spoke, in his appraisal of this morning's proceedings before the Standing Committee on Agriculture. Those of us who were attending and hoping to get on with the business of other committees expected to see a brief organizational meeting of that committee. For myself—and I speak as an urban member—it was the first exposure to the proceedings of the agriculture committee, proceedings which became renowned during the period in which the committee held a birthday party with respect to one of the bills before it.

I know that if the hon. member had been given more time to expand on that theme he would join me in saying that his criticisms are not the result of any fault of the government. It is a pity that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) is not in the House, because the destruction of the work of that committee is a result—an achievement, if you want to call it that—which can be laid at his feet. The blame must be laid squarely at his feet. I am sure that the hon. member, if he has the interests of the farmers of this country at heart, will be dismayed at the manner in which that man destroyed the work of the committee and made a shamble of it. And that is not the fault of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Downey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member who now has the floor has referred to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). He has made some disparaging remarks about him and spoken totally from ignorance. I do not think he was present at any time when the committee met, and his knowledge of the situation in agriculture is practically zilch. Yet he stands in this House and pretends to speak from knowledge.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Downey: I do not think he ought to do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Would the hon. member please resume his seat? The Chair appreciates the intervention of the hon. member. However, in accordance with the rules of the House the hon. member has merely raised an argument and not a point of order.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I did not think I would touch a nerve so easily. I thought that the gathering opposite looked hostile, but not sensitive. If I may speak to the motion before us, it seems that it was hastily drawn up. One gets the impression, from the lack of vigour that was exhibited in the earlier stages of this debate, that the official opposition must originally have chosen some other motion for presentation today. Perhaps certain events of the weekend made it impossible for them to proceed with the originally intended motion and this one had to be substituted rather hastily.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: Would the hon. member care to go into more detail?

Mr. Jerome: I want to direct my remarks primarily to that portion of the motion which urges that Parliament take steps to exercise greater scrutiny and control over estimates and expenditures. I do not think there is any argument that general agreement existed in this House for the changes that were introduced which resulted in the elimination of the long period of time in which estimates were examined solely in committee of the whole.

It was obvious that the former procedure, by bunching up the examination of estimates so that only the estimates of a small number of departments were examined in the time available, had deleterious effects on the general examination of estimates. The first of those effects was that the estimates of a great number of departments were not examined at all, and the second was that the bulk of work involved in the examination of estimates took place at a time when it was really too late for us to be examining estimates.

The increase in workload that this was putting on Parliament was obvious for all to see. The increased spending and increased operations of government made it impossible for Members of Parliament to keep up with the work which had to be done in that field. In any event, we came to the point in committee of the whole where it was clearly not possible for us to give close scrutiny to individual items in the estimates.

When first coming to this House in 1968 I was impressed with the members of the committee on procedure who worked on the rule changes. A tremendous amount of the talent of members of opposition parties was seen on that committee. The mover of this motion was a member of that committee, as was his colleague the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the House leader for the NDP, was a member of that committee. He has put forward an amendment to this motion. One is tempted to conclude, Mr. Speaker, that those hon. members are quick to forget. The conclusions that the committee on procedure came to in 1968 were based largely on their contributions to the committee and on their accord.

That committee reached conclusions about changes in the rules and dealing with estimates. The result is that we have dealt with estimates ever since in the way we now deal with them. The rule changes that were made permanent in 1968 as a result of the work of the committee which began in 1968 were introduced in part in this House on a trial basis in 1965. What were those changes, Mr. Speaker? First we saw the establishment of a trimester allocation of time with respect to the examination of estimates, and the adoption of Standing Order 58(14) which had the effect of referring estimates to committees by March 1, to be reported by May 31 right in the middle of the third term, so to speak.

This now means that the unfortunate timing of the examination of estimates has been as nearly as possible eliminated. Estimates are now examined during the most meaningful time of the calendar year. This change also means, Mr. Speaker, that estimates have been referred to standing committees instead of to committee of the whole House. Also, a great deal of flexibility has been introduced into the process, so that instead of examining at one time the estimates of any one department, which was the method adopted when estimates were considered in the House, it is now possible for the estimates of several departments to be examined carefully at the same time in several standing committees.

Further flexibility has been introduced into the system in that witnesses who attend committee hearings are able to testify. That flexibility certainly has been of value. This means that not only can more than one minister testify at one time but that departmental officials can also attend. Frequently they can testify directly before the committee, sometimes in the presence of the minister or his parliamentary secretary and sometimes on their own. That flexibility I am sure did not exist in committee of the whole. Certainly we do not see it in remaining procedures involving committee of the whole House. Officials can appear in the House—that is, they can sit in the House—but they may only talk through elected representatives. In the House an hon. member cannot question an official directly, whereas in a standing committee he can. That is certainly of benefit to hon. members who are serious about examining estimates.

Another important effect, Mr. Speaker, of the flexibility that has been introduced into our committee proceedings may best be exemplified if I tell hon. members what I saw when I once attended the proceedings of the Public Accounts Committee. I was not a member of the committee and did not participate in the proceedings: I simply dropped in and watched a very important meeting taking place. At that time the government was being questioned on a certain tax agreement that it has entered into with the Ford Motor Company. Members of the opposition undoubtedly were able to ask questions about a most important subject. Present at the meeting were just about all the responsible officials who could conduct a meaningful examination into that section of the estimates.

• (2130)

The Auditor General—or on this occasion I believe it was his deputy—was in attendance. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of National Revenue, because this matter involved a tax concession, and their officials were present. The officials of the Department of Finance, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Trade and Commerce were all there. There was no opportunity, as had existed under the previous system, to pass the buck. I know this feature was welcomed by opposition members. The questioning was very good and very vigorous. The proceedings of the committee on that occasion were a chronicle of the maximum potential achieved in a system wherein the estimates of various departments are examined in a meaningful way before a standing committee.

The rule changes, upon recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee and the Auditor General, led to better preparation and presentation of the estimates, the result being that members were in a position to compare the figures with those of the previous year, those estimated and what was actually spent in the previous year. Any member who wishes to conduct a thorough examination of the estimates can do it with a minimum of difficulty. In other words, because of the rule changes that were introduced in this Parliament we have taken other important steps which should be reviewed, not the least of which is the allocation of research funds to the opposition parties. I think this fact has been largely overlooked in this debate.

What has happened in this combination is that a tremendous potential exists for expertise and specialization to be developed in the opposition parties. Imagine the effective manner in which estimates could be examined if the opposition parties would take the trouble to allocate one or two members thoroughly to study a particular subject. They could pool all the talent—I am using that word in a generous sense—of six, seven or eight members of the combined opposition parties and with their combined resources of research staff they could develop in respect of each department's estimates a team which could go into every item. There could be developed a team on each subject and each department which could undertake a thorough and meaningful examination of the estimates.

The truth is that this is not done, but that is not the fault of the system. The fact is that the research assistants are busy writing funny speeches for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) or are campaigning for the New Democrats in by-elections. These are all areas to which these talents are being directed, and that is the choice of the opposition. If they want to be spendthrift and wasteful with these resources, fine—but why come here and say that the estimates are not being carefully examined? The truth is plain and clear—the facilities and opportunities exist but they are not being used to advantage. There are 25 opposition days in the three semesters in which the year is calendarised. Any opposition member who is truthful will admit that sometimes during the course of the parliamentary year it is difficult for the opposition to fill up those opposition days with a subject of criticism of the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Jerome: It is the truth. There are too many opposition days—25 is too many. But if the system were to be changed by the government so that the number of days was reduced, we know the cries that would be heard from the opposition benches to the effect that we were trampling on the rights of a democratic society.

Mr. Downey: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) obviously has not much on his mind. I am wondering if we could relieve him by letting him know that he does not have to talk out this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker,—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie rises on a point of order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member has used up all the time allotted to him, and Your Honour should now recognize a member on this side of the House.

[English]

Mr. Jerome: Well, Mr. Speaker, opposition members have an opportunity to participate in the debate. Why do they not get up and make a speech?

• (2140)

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member raises a question of privilege concerning the time allocated to the parliamentary secretary, and I will point out to him that the Chair has to time speeches and, at the same time, take into account interjections and points of order which have the effect of extending the time allocated to the parliamentary secretary.

If hon. members want to rise, as they are entitled to do, to make numerous points of order and interrupt the member who has the floor, by so doing they extend the time which the Chair has to allocate to the latter. This is precisely what is happening right now. The parliamentary secretary has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Jerome: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I feel I should point out in passing that in the period between eight o'clock and ten o'clock tonight eight speakers have had the floor, only two of whom have been from the government side. In that sense it is difficult to accuse government speakers, the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) and myself, of occupying too much time.

An hon. Member: You do it more than anyone else.

Mr. Jerome: I did not interrupt the hon. member and I wish he would accord me the same privilege. In any event, hon. members opposite will be happy to know that I am very near the end of my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hurrah!

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, the last step that has been taken in respect of assisting hon. members of the opposition to carry out a careful examination of the estimates has been that which was implemented two days ago on an experimental basis for this month. I refer to the new system we are trying out of scheduling committees so as to reduce as much as possible the problem of members who sit on more than one committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I say it is the duty of the Chair to respect the time allowed members of the opposition, who have the same privileges as government members when it comes to expressing their views in this House.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been speaking for 20 minutes, while no member of the opposition parties was allowed more than 15 minutes, including the time used up by interruptions; I ask the Chair to act impartially in this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The hon. member should resume his seat!

Mr. Valade: You should pipe down!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I am sure the hon. member did not want to criticize the Chair or the way in which it presides over the deliberations; destroying or criticizing the Chair cannot help this institution, I am sure. If hon. members will co-operate and allow the parliamentary secretary to finish his remarks, the Chair can give at least five minutes to the hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

Order. In view of the exchange that has just taken place, I doubt that the hon. member should ask the Chair to extend his time. Even then, he would probably not get unanimous consent, and this can only be done if unanimous consent is given by the House.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for recognizing, at last, that the opposition can have a few minutes at its disposal.

We are supposed to be in a just society; yet, we notice, once again, that through its vociferations, the government tries to silence the opposition, to keep it from expressing the views it has the right to express by virtue of the mandate given by its electors.

Some government members have chided me for being absent from the House; yet, I am present more often than the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Mr. Speaker, as I have only a few minutes left, because since it has been in office the present government has been restricting our interventions through closure, I will only deal with one aspect of the motion now under consideration, that is the mismanagement and waste of the present government.

Since I did not make any preliminary comment, I would like to say that I would entirely approve some aspects of the local initiatives program if they were carried out so as to really lessen the burden of unemployment which is a scourge now raging in Canada. However, as I must be brief, I would like to expose in this House the uses made in some quarters of the local initiatives program.

I would like, for example, to mention an amount of $11,665 which, in the constituency of Saint-Marie, under the pretext of reducing under-employment, was paid to the president of the federal Liberal association of that constituency, for a project under which description of the task to fulfill is as follows: 5 jobs created. Information of the public through films is also anticipated. So, we are right in wondering whether the government is going to keep on wasting millions of dollars of the taxpayers money and this, not only in order to alleviate the burden of unemployment in Canada, but also to prepare an election campaign whose results it does not seem to expect for its policy over the past four years has been one of laissez faire, a policy of indifference toward the workers who have been plagued by unemployment since the Liberals have been in office.

Mr. Speaker, not only did the liberal government ignore the reasons why millions of dollars were entrusted to it by the Canadian taxpayers but, furthermore, if one is to believe the article I am holding, it seems—even though my friends opposite do not agree with the opinions expressed in the newspaper Défi of March 10, 1972—that in the constituency of the Secretary of State, who is responsible for the administration of these programs, an amount of $450,000 was awarded for local initiative projects solely for political purposes and only in order to restore some prestige to the Secretary of State who is becoming increasingly a liability for the Liberal Party and for the general public.

Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to go into more detail. I believe my friend, the former Quebec Créditiste member turned Liberal who commends this waste, when he was a

Division

Créditiste member, denounced the extravagance and waste of the government he was then fighting. And I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that a responsible member is in this House to accept one day what he condemned the day before. At any rate I myself cannot accept such a reversal when in Canada, and particularly in Montreal, in my constituency, despite these programs aimed at purchasing consciences, unemployment constantly increases.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 9 of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the motion before the House. Accordingly, the question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

PRIVILEGE

MR. O'CONNELL—CORRECTION OF "GLOBE AND MAIL" REPORT ON LOCAL INITIATIVES PROJECT IN SCARBOROUGH EAST

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I rose on a question of privilege and I should like to renew it at the first opportunity today. I rise to correct two inaccuracies in a report appearing on page 4 of yesterday's Globe and Mail with respect to a local initiatives project in the constituency of Scarborough East. The report indicates that I gave assurances that a group known as Scarborough Pollution Probe would receive an opportunities for youth grant. I did not give such assurances, Mr. Speaker. I did assure this group, which is an excellent one doing a lot of good work, of my interest, and I am sure I would endorse any project that comes forward.

The other inaccuracy concerns the suggestion that as part of the local initiatives project for which this group did receive some funds—I endorsed that project, as all members of parliament had an opportunity of doing in their own constituencies—there would be two taped interviews which might be broadcast on cablevision or television, using the facilities of Scarborough College to produce the tapes. I simply want to make it clear that I will not be part of any local initiatives project that I endorse.

I have no complaint about the reporters responsible for the report, but I thought it was important to clarify these inaccuracies. I may well be taped by Scarborough Pollution Probe and I would be happy to be so taped, but I do not want to be part of any local initiatives project.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has not followed up his argument or presentation with a motion, so I assume that the Chair is not required to rule whether there is a legitimate question of privilege here. In any event, I would suggest to the minister that in my view this is not a prima facie case of privilege and that the matter should not be further pursued.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, since the question of privilege raised by the minister was, as far as we are concerned tantamount or similar to a statement on motions, and in view of the fact that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may think it is tantamount to a statement on motions, but from day to day I hear alleged questions of privilege which in my view are tantamount to statements on motions, and I would not think they should be considered as such. I did express the view that in my opinion this is not a question of privilege. The minister sought to correct what he thought was an erroneous interpretation of the situation. I would think that that kind of matter should not be raised in the House by way of a question of privilege, and it certainly should not give rise to a debate at this time by way of privilege.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADA CANCER FOUNDATION BILL

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF RESEARCH FOUNDATION

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-168, respecting cancer research.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to focus attention on the necessity of research to arrest the dreadful disease of cancer. The bill establishes the Canada Cancer Foundation to which any individual person or organization and governments may contribute money in a drive to find the cause and a cure for cancer.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*INVITATION EXTENDED BY DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS TO UNITED STATES PRESS AND BROADCASTING REPRESENTATIVES

Question No. 132—Mr. McIntosh:

1. Has an invitation been extended by the Department of External Affairs to United States press and broadcasting representatives to come to Ottawa, at the expense of the Canadian public, on February 28 and 29 and, if so, for what purpose?

2. What are their names and media affiliations?

3. How many of the firms are presently represented in the Press Gallery and what is the name of the present representative of each in the Gallery?

4. Is it the intention of the Canadian Government to pay their transportation and hotel expenses?

Questions

5. Is it the intention of the Canadian Government to pay each invited guest a daily sum of money in lieu of incidental expenses and, if so (a) how much (b) for how many days?

6. Which of the invited guests accepted the invitation under the above conditions?

7. How many refused the invitation and the conditions?

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In response to starred Question No. 132, Mr. Speaker, there are seven sections to this question. I will answer as briefly as possible.

1. A group of 10 editors and senior executives of major United States newspapers, magazines and broadcasting companies were invited to visit Ottawa on February 28 and 29 for informal meetings with ministers and senior government officials in order to give these people of the United States a better understanding of Canadian problems.

2. The members of the group were Charles Bartlett, syndicated columnist for the Chicago Sun Times, and other papers, Washington; Robert Christopher, Executive Editor, Newsweek, New York; James Greenfield, Foreign Editor, New York Times, New York; Graham Hovey, Member, Editorial Board, New York Times, New York; John Hughes, Editor, Christian Science Monitor, Boston; Robert Manning, Editor, Atlantic Monthly, Boston; Les Midgley, Executive Producer, Columbia Broadcasting System, New York; Stewart Pinkerton, Chief, Dow Jones Service in Canada, Montreal; A. M. Rosenthal, Managing Editor, New York Times, New York; Stanley Swinton, Assistant General Manager and Director of World Services, Associated Press, New York.

3. The New York Times is represented in the Press Gallery by Mr. Jay Walz and Dow Jones News Service in Canada by Mr. Mitchell Lynch.

4. The group was invited under the Visits Program of the Department of External Affairs. Following the practice of other countries, visiting foreign journalists are offered transportation and a per diem allowance for accommodation and meals while they are in Canada.

5. In the case of this particular group the great majority, representing as they do large organizations, preferred to pay their own expenses.

6 and 7. Organizations or newspapers invited to take part in the visit to Ottawa accepted the invitation, although in several cases, because of difficulty in timing, the organizations asked if their visit might be deferred to a later date.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to report that the visit took place on schedule and all concerned found it a very interesting exchange of views which will, undoubtedly, help to provide a better understanding of Canada in the United States.

*YVES GEOFFROY CASE—APPLICATION FOR VISA

Question No. 193—Mr. McCleave:

Do any nations, faced with applications for visas from Canadian citizens, ask for information about such citizens from the Department of External Affairs, and particularly, did such take place with regard to the name used on the passport in the Yves Geoffroy case?

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs receives such requests from time to time. Generally this happens when the visa-granting nation has some reason to suspect that it is dealing with a criminal.

However, no such request was made concerning the name used on the passport obtained by Yves Geoffroy.

BEAUCE CONSTITUENCY—DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE PERSONNEL

Question No. 264—Mr. Rodrigue:

How many people are employed by the Department of Agriculture in the constituency of Beauce and (a) what are their names (b) what position does each occupy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture):

(a)	(b)
J. F. L. St-Onge	Sub-District Veterinarian
C. Lavigne	Veterinarian
J. D. E. Marcotte	Primary Products Inspector
L. Fillian	Clerk

Mr. Crouse: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Late last year I placed a question on the order paper dealing with an expenditure of the Department of Public Works. It is a very simple question seeking information from the government. The question was not answered. I again placed it on the order paper at the beginning of this session. It stands as No. 68 under date of February 18. I wonder when I may expect an answer in view of the time that has elapsed since the question was originally asked.

Mr. Jerome: I will certainly look into question No. 68.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I raise again a point of order I raised a week ago with regard to question No. 156 on the order paper. This is the second time of asking. This question was also raised during the last session and not answered. Inasmuch as the Department of the Secretary of State issued a press release on this matter last month I wonder why there should be such an inordinate delay in answering such a straightforward question.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notices of Motions Nos. 2, 3, 6 and 17.

COPY OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN DR. A. VENNEMA AND DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Motion No. 2—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Interim Report made in March, 1968, by Dr. A. Vennema, Director of Canadian Medical Aid in Vietnam in 1967-68 and for copies of any subsequent correspondence between him and the Department of External Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all experts, such as Dr. Vennema, who perform a particular service under contract to the Canadian International Development Agency, submit reports on their respective projects as a matter of routine. These reports and other correspondence are submitted on the understanding that they will be treated as confidential and privileged documents. If these experts felt that such documents could be made public they would be reticent about making meaningful comments that would help in the effective implementation of Canada's aid program. For these reasons, I ask, with regret, that the hon. member withdraw her motion.

Mrs. MacInnis: I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot accept the parliamentary secretary's reply.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall I put the motion?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF REPORT ON UNITED STATES INTERNAL FOOD-AID PROGRAM

Motion No. 3—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report undertaken in the Department of Agriculture on the United States Internal Food-Aid Program and its application to Canada.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was informed by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) on November 18, 1970, that no formal report has ever been made by the Department of Agriculture on the United States internal food-aid program and its application to Canada. An analysis of the program referred to was for departmental use and is considered to be confidential. I would therefore respectfully ask the hon. member to withdraw her motion.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to transfer this matter for debate. I do not think it should be secret.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE PERTAINING TO THE RELEASE OF YVES GEOFFROY FROM ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY

Motion No. 6—Mr. Woolliams:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all documents, reports, letters, papers, and statements in reference to and material to the release of Yves Geoffroy from the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary and material to his wrongful escape, while serving a life sentence for the conviction pertaining to the murder of his wife.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if the government were to accept and accede to this motion it would be called upon to concede certain basic premises which in the government's view in law do not exist and accordingly the hon. member is asked to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I just speak to that?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows very well that he cannot speak to it but can merely indicate whether he wishes to withdraw the motion, have it transferred for debate or put to a vote.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I say there has been communication between the parliamentary secretary and myself. He is unhappy about the terminology. It is important that we get these documents. The motion asks that an order of the House do issue for copies of all documents, reports, letters, papers and statements in reference to and material to the release, and he objects to the word "release" and to the words "wrongful escape". I do not know what the terminology should be. I will not agree with his terminology and he does not want to agree with my terminology, but what I am after is to have the documents produced.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has risen on a point of order. I am sure he appreciates that there is not much the Chair can do. The Chair can either put the question or the motion can be transferred for debate.

Mr. Woolliams: Question.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

• (1420)

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have had three occasions already when parliamentary secretaries in purporting to answer particular requests have stated reasons. My submission is that under the clear provisions of the Standing Order the government may accept a motion for papers, reject it or transfer it for debate, but they are not allowed to smuggle in their reasons at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows how the practice has developed. I think that perhaps with some reason it has been felt by hon. members on both sides of the House that it might facilitate the work of the House and make it more rational if parliamentary secretaries or ministers indicated the grounds on which the motion was objected to, giving an opportunity to the member who had put the motion to indicate whether he wanted to withdraw it, have it transferred for debate or have a vote called on it. Often it is very difficult for an hon. member who puts this kind of motion to decide whether he wants to withdraw it unless he knows why the government does not want to produce the documents required. This practice has always made sense to me. At the same time it is easy to abuse the situation and to go a little too far and argue a case. I have hoped all along that there would not be argument on the part of parliamentary secretaries or ministers explaining why a motion was not acceded to by the government, but I believe that, with the general consent of hon. members, it is a helpful practice, provided there is no argument presented by the government, in indicating why a motion is refused or acceded to.

Mr. Woolliams: May I just speak to that point of order without being argumentative. If parliamentary secretaries can give reasons, surely we who are asking for the production of papers should be allowed to give our side of the story. If it is fair for one, surely it should be fair for the other. If there was not an escape in this case I have not heard of one since A Tale of Two Cities.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member appears to have given at least as many reasons for his case as the parliamentary secretary gave for his. I suggest to hon. members that the practice appears to be a good one, and I would hope there would be co-operation on the part of members speaking for the government and members moving such motions to continue the practice and not abuse what appears to me to be a very logical and helpful practice which we have developed over the years.

DESCRIPTION OF AREA TO BE INCORPORATED IN SECOND NATIONAL PARK IN VAL MARIE-KILLDEER AREA

Motion No. 17—Mr. Burton:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a description of the area which the federal government would like to see incorporated in the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked that an order of the House do issue for a copy of a description of the area the federal government would like to see incorporated in the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area. The maps and papers describing this area are under active consideration and papers relating to negotiations cannot be released until these negotiations have been concluded. As no final decision has been made, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Burton: Lots of other people see these documents. Question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PENSIONS

OLD AGE SECURITY—SUGGESTED ADJUSTMENT TO MEET INCREASES IN COST OF LIVING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ricard: Stop quacking over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. These 30 seconds are not being charged to the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I hope that will not be charged either, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the information we have had today that the index for food prices has gone up by one full percentage point in one month. In view of this increase is he now prepared to sponsor the adjustment of pensions to take into account fully the real changes in the cost of living? I ask this question particularly in view of the fact that a freeze has been in force for about a year so that even the most needy pensioners, those who receive the guaranteed income supplement, can receive a maximum adjustment of only about 1 per cent in the course of the year regardless of what changes take place in the cost of living.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): At $100 a dinner it is not surprising that the food index went up, Mr. Speaker. I must say I disagree with the interpretation given by the hon. member. When the guaranteed income supplement was raised by this government to $135 a month it was a greater increase than the cost of living increase over the years which had been covered by that increase.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, without arguing with the Prime Minister about his statement I would like to ask him whether, in view of the increase that has taken place since the change was made, and the restriction on the increase to about 1 per cent of the pensions received by those who are entitled to the guaranteed income supplement, he would make a small move at least toward justice for these people by arranging that at least the guaranteed annual supplement will be changed in line with the real increase in the cost of living?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that this matter was debated in the House. He knows that when the government brought in this modified legislation it was in order to make sure that the funds were spent more on the needy people. That is why the freeze on the $80 was accompanied by a very substantial increase, much higher, I repeat, than the comparative increase in the cost of living, to the needy people. This increase to the needy people was also accompanied by a possible 2 per cent increase tied to the increase in the cost of living.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask one further supplementary question to make sure that the Prime Minister understands me. Is it the position of the Prime Minister that a 2 per cent area of upward movement is justice for these people when in fact the cost of living goes up substantially more? In view of the fact that the money the government is spending on Information Canada would go some distance—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: —to do some justice to these people—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure—

Mr. Stanfield: —would the Prime Minister not reassess his priorities?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would agree that at least part of this further supplementary was argumentative. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a supplementary question.

OLD AGE SECURITY—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF ESCALATION BASED ON COST OF LIVING INCREASES FOR THOSE RECEIVING BASIC AMOUNT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the cost of living has risen very greatly and is now almost 5 per cent higher than it was a year ago, would the government be prepared at least to introduce an escalator provision for those on the $80 a month which would be geared to the rise in the cost of living which has occurred since last year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, these questions were amply debated when the legislation was brought in, and the principle that the government put forward was that, rather than pay—

Mr. Stanfield: You had inflation licked then.

Mr. Trudeau: —to the aged people in this country an amount regardless of what their income was, we would use public funds mainly for people who are in need. That is the reason why we froze the OAS pension and increased, I repeat, very substantially the supplement to the very needy in this country. Once again, I say the principles involved were debated in this parliament and I cannot, without repeating the whole debate, answer the question any more fully.

Mrs. MacInnis: As there has been a big change since that time and the cost of living has continued to mount, would the Prime Minister still say that the people who are only receiving $80 are not in need?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary.

• (1430)

OLD AGE SECURITY—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON ADJUSTMENT OF ESCALATION PROVISION TO MEET COST OF LIVING INCREASES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very heavy burden being forced upon our senior citizens because of the rapid rise in costs, can the Prime Minister say whether there has been consultation with the provinces or requests from the provinces respecting adjustment of escalation clause in the federal pensions so that they will be adequate to enable pensioners to meet the continuing rise in costs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if there have been consultations with all the provinces. I do know that the provinces sometimes put forward an argument that the federal payments should be increased substantially but, of course, the federal payments are discussed and submitted to the federal Parliament, not to the provincial legislatures. I cannot say how many provinces have carried the argument put forth by the hon. member or under what circumstances.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since the Prime Minister does not seem to be clear either as to the need on the part of our senior citizens—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —or as to specific requests from the provinces, would he undertake to the House to initiate inquiries in order that he may have up to date information and be able to give a more informed answer to the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, regarding need, the guaranteed income supplement is precisely designed to be addressed to those people who are in need and not universally to all people over the age of 65 whether they are in need or not. If they are in need they can apply for the guaranteed income supplement which is indexed, as I said earlier.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): What is happening to the people now?

Mr. Trudeau: What is happening? Well, they have to listen to some of the guff of hon. members—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of members are seeking supplementaries.

OLD AGE SECURITY—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCING AGE OF ELIGIBILITY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Is he in a position to tell us whether his government is considering lowering to 60 the age of eligibility for old age pension and to grant this pension to the spouse as soon as the other begins to collect old age pension, in view of the economical problems facing those people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did not quite catch the second part of the question but as regards the first part the government obviously wishes to give as much money as possible immediately to everybody but we must manage the government taxes and revenue as fairly as possible.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Would it not be easier for the Prime Minister and his government to use the services of the Bank of Canada which has been created especially to serve Canadians?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Mackenzie rising on a supplementary question?

Mr. Korchinski: I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member in due course. We are still on the first question and have not completed the first round of questioning yet. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings on a supplementary.

OLD AGE SECURITY—STEPS TO CHECK INFLATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. As the rise in the cost of living during the last month maintained the same rate as during the whole of last year, namely, 5 per cent, does the government intend to take positive steps to check this rapid inflation or does it not intend to?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I disagree once again with the figures put forth by the hon. member; they are not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that we have to go to another subject, important though this one may be. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings may ask a last supplementary and I will then go to the hon. member for York South on the next question.

Mr. Hees: As the figures I have quoted to the Prime Minister were produced by Statistics Canada, would he explain why he disagrees with his own government's agency?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

[Mr. Fortin.]

MANPOWER

APPOINTMENT OF ALLEGED LIBERAL PARTY OFFICIAL TO CARRY OUT STUDY IN WEST GERMANY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration can now give us the details of the saga of Mr. Jean-Paul Lefebvre?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Jean-Paul Lefebvre, after consultation with the Department of Manpower and Immigration, was engaged on December 20, 1971, on a contractual basis by the government of Canada to carry out a study of the manpower policies and institutions of the Federal Republic of Germany and to draw to the attention of the government conclusions that might be useful in the Canadian federal system. The contract period ends on March 31, 1972. During the period Mr. Lefebvre will receive a fee of $600 a week. He is also entitled to the usual travelling and living expenses provided under the public service travel directive and to a total amount not to exceed $400 payable on the basis of actual expenses for secretarial services outside Ottawa. This remuneration is well within the standard range of short-term contracts. Mr. Lefebvre has been a total of 18 days in the Federal Republic of Germany and in Europe. He expects to meet the deadline provided in the contract.

Mr. Lewis: Can the acting minister inform the House of the basis on which the Federal Republic of Germany was selected as the place to study the manpower situation, particularly in view of the fact that West Germany has had full employment and employed two million to three million people from outside the country to fill vacancies in the labour market? In view of that situation, exactly what is Mr. Lefebvre studying in West Germany that would be useful to Canada?

Mr. O'Connell: The fact that there is no growth rate in the German economy and they have to import people is perhaps one of the reasons he is there, but the point the hon. gentleman misses is that it is a federal system and he is looking at manpower policies in a federal system of interest to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The federal system of West Germany is about as equal to the Canadian as this House of Commons is equal to the assembly in Tokyo.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly ask his supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: What a comparison! May I ask the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration if he has found out whether Mr. Lefebvre had been on similar investigations when he was a Liberal member of the provincial legislature of Quebec? Did he go to Sweden and other places during the years he held an office in the Liberal party?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I have the biography of Mr. Lefebvre and I shall be pleased to show it to the hon. member. He has a very broad experience in labour, manpower—

Mr. Hees: Just answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. O'Connell: —and his qualifications—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SHERBROOKE—DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—EMPLOYEES' WORKING CONDITIONS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary.

Yesterday I asked a question about the delayed payment of benefits to a great many unemployed and I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary if it would be possible to decentralize the offices which issue cheques to the unemployed.

Since the regional office in Sherbrooke is much too small for the number of civil servants working there, could the parliamentary secretary advise us whether steps will be taken to improve the services in that area so that civil servants would be able to work in more human conditions?

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, consideration will be given to this request. I should point out, however, that in effect there has been decentralization since 1970 with an expansion of 50 per cent in unemployment insurance offices—both main centres and service centres—servicing unemployment insurance clients.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Is the parliamentary secretary aware of the fact that the Sherbrooke office staff has been increased by 25 per cent, with the facilities remaining the same?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is an argument put forward by the hon. member in support of his contention.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Since the minister is prepared to see to the well being of the Unemployment Insurance Commission civil servants, would he be now prepared to look after the unemployed who are not receiving their cheques?

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN EMBASSY IN SPAIN TO ASSIST CBC CREW REPORTING ON ARREST OF MR. AND MRS. GEOFFROY

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did the Department of External Affairs issue instructions to the Canadian embassy in Spain to offer assistance to Peter Daniels and a CBC crew in reporting on the arrest in that country of Mr. and Mrs. Geoffroy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not particularly, Mr. Speaker. We did not issue any instructions to help the CBC nor did we issue any instructions to hinder their activities.

Mr. Nielsen: Just asked them to do it.

[Later:]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did the minister or any of his officials have any conversation with anyone in the CBC with respect to the coverage of the Geoffroy matter in Spain?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the CBC has complained about the treatment it has received from the Spanish authorities who have placed difficulties in the way of taking pictures. This has been conveyed to us. This is a matter for the Spanish government to decide. The Spanish government laid down one stipulation, that there would be no interviews with Geoffroy and his wife. With that decision we agree.

Mr. Baldwin: Probably you people asked them to do that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATURE OF PROCEEDINGS TO SECURE RETURN OF MR. AND MRS. GEOFFROY FROM SPAIN

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary or somewhat related question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister is dealing with this point, can he tell the House whether extradition proceedings have been taken and, if so, what is the result and will Geoffroy and his wife be returned to Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite certain whether proceedings will be by way of deportation or extradition. I cannot answer that question yet.

[Later:]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a minor point of order so as not to mislead the House on an answer I gave a little earlier today. I am now informed that both Mr. and Mr. Geoffroy have expressed a wish to return to Canada forthwith.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—APPLICATION DATE CONSIDERED IN MAKING GRANTS—ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the number of applications that have gone to his office in connection with the local initiatives program, is the original date of application considered for the granting of loans or is it the final date which is considered as the date of application in the granting of loans? I ask this question since there apparently is a shortage of funds available for the program.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will try to clarify the two dates that the hon. member has in mind and have a conversation with him on this.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if the government intends to devote additional funds to this program in order to make it workable inasmuch as people have become excited about the program and made applications and the program now cannot fulfil the requirements?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, it is true that a very large response was made to this offer of opportunities for work. There is no present intention to increase the funds in the program.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED ONGOING PROGRAM TO ASSIST PEOPLE IN ISOLATED COMMUNITIES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Since many hundreds of applications under the local initiatives program from people living in remote and isolated communities will be turned down and as this will have a detrimental effect on their initiative and morale, will the government give consideration to introducing a similar type of program that will be ongoing so these people will be given the advantage of this type of project?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to note, in looking at the range of projects, that a great number of them, particularly in Newfoundland, involved what the hon. member likes to describe as isolated communities.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I apologize to the hon. member. Perhaps I might first recognize the hon. member for Oxford on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUIREMENT THAT APPLICANTS BE CANADIANS OR LANDED IMMIGRANTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister tell us if one of the criteria followed in making grants under the LIP program is that the applicant or those receiving assistance must be Canadians or landed immigrants?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe that both those conditions are in the criteria. I will check on that, but I think I am correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, my point of order concerns the question raised by the hon. member for Oxford, the response of the minister, and several projects which have been awarded grants in Toronto. I have reason to believe that certain individuals who were given grants did not meet the specific requirements. I wonder whether an investigation could be launched along those lines?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously not a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member in a moment on a supplementary question. He will be recognized for that purpose in a moment.

[Later:]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN TORONTO PROJECTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask whether the Minister of Labour will investigate those projects in Toronto which are of a questionable nature and report to the House on whether the criteria regarding Canadian citizenship or landed immigrant status have been met in connection with the two or three projects referred to by the hon. member for Oxford?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. gentleman to be more specific in his suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is the kind of situation in which it might be best if the hon. member were in touch directly with the minister, or the minister with the hon. member, in order to find out exactly what the situation is that they want to investigate.

OIL

INQUIRY AS TO REVOKING OF DRILLING PERMITS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA COASTAL WATERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has his department issued oil drilling permits to Petrotar Development Company Limited of Calgary, and have these oil drilling permits been revoked and withdrawn?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is referring to the west coast permits. They were permits for seismic investigation rather than for drilling, as I understand it.

Mr. Douglas: Have those permits covering some 2.7 million acres of the coastal waters of British Columbia been revoked and withdrawn, and are any other permits outstanding for either seismographic work or drilling? If there are any outstanding, will they be withdrawn?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking for a really detailed enunciation of the outstanding permits on the west coast. Perhaps the best thing to do would be to get those in tabular form and supply them to the hon. member. I cannot do this from memory.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary question, but we should try to limit the number of supplementaries asked. If each hon. member asks two or three supplementaries, we will run short of time. I will try to recognize as many of our colleagues as possible during the question period.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the minister for detailed information. I am asking about permits which were issued by his department and which the Minister of the Environment said were going to be revoked. I am asking the minister a simple question. Have the permits issued to Petrotar Development Company Limited been revoked and does the department intend to revoke any other outstanding permits?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think that my previous answer still makes sense. A great many permits have been issued on the west coast, as I indicated to the hon. member. I will be glad to get a full description of their current status for him. I think that is the information he wants, according to my understanding.

AUDITOR GENERAL

REASON FOR DELAY IN TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who undertook on Monday, I believe, to investigate why the report of the Auditor General had not been tabled in the House within the time required by law. Has the Prime Minister been able to conduct this investigation, and what brief report can he make now?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did make that inquiry and I understand that the Auditor General himself has failed to deliver the report to the minister for tabling in parliament—

Mr. Forrestall: Why?

Mr. Trudeau: —under the provision that the law provides.

Mr. Forrestall: Why?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks why. I am sure, if an officer of parliament is breaking the law, that an hon. member should not ask me why he is breaking the law. He should address his question to that officer of parliament.

Mr. Forrestall: He has been given some help in breaking the law.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister give the House the undertaking he will make certain that the Auditor General has sufficient resources to complete this report and that it will be tabled before the next general election?

Mr. Hees: Don't be afraid, Pierre. Speak!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—I am suddenly afraid.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the investigation of this matter which the Prime Minister assured me on Monday would be undertaken, did he discover that the reasons given by the Auditor General for the lateness in tabling the report are a shortage of staff and poor morale because of low classifications of his officials?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat, the Auditor General is an official of parliament and not of the government. I do not want to question the reasons he gave. If parliament wants to condone his breaking the law and not do anything about it, that is fine—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —but the government is not stepping into this matter.

Mr. Forrestall: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of hon. members that some 20 or 25 hon. members want to ask questions. We must make headway. Again I bring to the attention of hon. members that the question period will be over soon. It will end at about five minutes past three.

• (1450)

Mr. Harkness: I wonder whether the Prime Minister would look further into this matter and ensure that the Auditor General has sufficient staff of the necessary high calibre in order that he can get his report in very shortly and so that in future he will be able to get his reports in on time as required by the Financial Administration Act?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, every minister in this government would like to have more staff. It is my job to receive these demands on behalf of—

Mr. Hees: Give them some of yours.

Mr. Trudeau: I have even heard that the opposition requires more staff. I do not think more staff would help them. Perhaps a different kind of staff might.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether hon. members wish to pursue supplementaries on this very important and interesting subject, but I again bring to their attention that we shall be running out of time soon.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

THREATS AGAINST CANADIAN CONSUL IN SAN JUAN—POSSIBLE DEPORTATION OF HUMBERTO PAGAN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Is the hon. gentleman willing to make a statement regarding the threats against the Canadian Consul in San Juan, Porto Rico, to protest the possible deportation of the militant nationalist Pagan who is being detained in Ottawa for having illegally entered Canada?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter. I do not want to undertake to make a statement at the present time because deportation proceedings are now under way against this person and I do not believe it would be in order for me to make a statement. I am aware that threats have been made against the consulate and this, I think, is most unfortunate, because we want to see justice done.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I appreciate the reasons of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but since Cuba or Chili are willing to accept the Porto Rican nationalist, would the department be prepared to consider the possibility of handing him over to either Cuban or Chilian authorities?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: This is a question which ought really to be directed at this stage to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. But perhaps I could add that there are two kinds of procedures under way. One of them is for deportation, in which case the appeal board and ultimately the minister would have to deal with the matter. There is another procedure involving extradition. It is necessary to take both into account. This is why I am reluctant to make a statement at this time which might in some way affect the course of justice.

POST OFFICE

CONTRACT TO ITT—PARTICIPATION BY J. W. MOODIE IN WORK OF CODING TASK FORCE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker. In his absence perhaps the Acting Postmaster General or the parliamentary secretary might reply. It arises from the statement made in the House last Monday by the Postmaster General and reported at page 529 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Moodie never worked for our coding and mechanization branch nor did he in any way collaborate in its work.

I draw attention now to another statement in a report on this subject, prepared by Samson, Belair, Riddell and Stead, expressing appreciation for help from various people and adding:

> —but none could be more stimulating than the coding task force under the team leadership of Mr. J. W. Moodie, the department's chief engineer.

In view of these contradicting statements can a statement be made on the subject at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. Gerald Cobbe (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): I will bring this matter to the attention of the minister and make sure that the hon. member receives an answer.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I seek the co-operation of hon. members in limiting the number of supplementaries.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the suspicion around ITT government dealings on both sides of the border perhaps the Prime Minister, as captain of the leaky ship of state, could make a statement on this matter.

Mr. Trudeau: I was not following the exchange, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH

NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON INCLUSION OF OPTOMETRIC SERVICES IN MEDICARE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. May I ask whether the hon. gentleman is in a position to report any progress in connection with the negotiations he has been carrying on with the provinces concerning the inclusion of optometric care in the national health plan?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have held discussions with the provinces, mainly on the subject of the new cost-sharing formula to replace the present hospitalization and medicare arrangements. This formula would, we believe, place greater resources in the hands of the provinces to enable them to develop a health care system more in line with their own priorities. One of the ingredients of this proposal was that in the calculation we would build in the cost of optometric services.

Mr. MacLean: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire whether we can be advised who are the ministers acting in place of the eight or nine ministers who are absent today but who are supposed to be here according to the unofficial roster? I am not taking into account the seven or eight ministers who are not scheduled to be here today. Perhaps the Prime Minister could inform us who they are and assure us that there is an acting minister in every case.

Mr. Trudeau: I will be glad to help the House with that information. The Minister of National Defence, who is visiting military establishments in Victoria, is represented today by his parliamentary secretary, Mr. Comtois.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien is presently in Victoria where he is holding meetings with Indians. His parliamentary secretary, Mr. Sulatycky, is here today to answer questions.

As for Mr. Pelletier, he has travelled to Vancouver where he is meeting with representatives of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and I think that his two parliamentary secretaries are in the House to reply on his behalf.

[English]

In the case of Mr. Laing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the Prime Minister. I think I should remind him that he ought to refer to ministers by their official functions rather than by their names, and the same applies, of course, to parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, at the end of the question period yesterday I called attention to the fact that there were at different times between five and seven ministers absent who, according to this infamous roster system, should have been in the House. You have already acknowledged the fact, Mr. Speaker, that this roster is not a legitimate or formal document of the House. We find ourselves in an increasingly difficult situation in connection with the proper functioning of the House when ministers deliberately refrain from being present. I refer again to Standing Order 5 which states:

Every member is bound to attend the service of the House unless leave of absence has been given him by the House.

There has been a continuous disregard by the administration for the importance of this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What about your leader when he was in Guadeloupe?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please? The hon. member for Egmont is raising a point of order. He should be given an opportunity to make his point. I am quite prepared to listen to him.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yesterday we witnessed the unusual sight of one minister responding for three separate departments, I believe, and one of the newest ministers at that. Today we are unable to tell for which particular department a minister or a parliamentary secretary may be answering. This has reduced the capabilities of the House.

• (1500)

I say, Mr. Speaker, that in your position as senior officer of the House you should take it upon yourself to consult with the House leaders with a view to clearing up this very great difficulty, and seeing if ministers cannot be in their places to answer questions that are important to this country.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order raised by the hon. member has been raised before, and I have stated my position. It is obvious that any system that is not provided for in the Standing Orders is not, so far as the Chair is concerned, in operation. Whether certain ministers, all ministers or no ministers at all are in the House from day to day is certainly not the responsibility of the Chair.

So far as the Chair is concerned, the situation is that Standing Order 5 is operative. I am not sure to what extent it is respected from day to day, but it does not apply particularly to one side of the House or the other. Standing Order 5 does not apply to ministers as such but to individual members; it requires that all members should be in the service of the House.

In any event, I think much of what I am saying is somewhat theoretical and goes beyond the point raised by the hon. member for Egmont. As I say, the point has been raised before. I have reflected on it and have expressed my opinion, and I doubt very much that I can go beyond that. There are only a few minutes left before the end of the question period, but if hon. members wish to raise points of order I have to recognize them.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order which arises from a statement made by the Prime Minister. I ask for the guidance of the Chair on this question: Under what rules or procedures is a parliamentary secretary allowed to function as an acting minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask questions of the Chair. Other members of the House have enough trouble answering questions, and I do not think the Chair should be required to share in that difficulty.

Mr. MacInnis: A further point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was putting my question in the form of a request for a ruling from the Chair. The question could be directed to the Prime Minister. May I ask him under what rules or procedures he permits a parliamentary secretary to function as an acting minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps I should let my parliamentary secretary answer that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that this is debate. We have reached the end of the question period, but I think hon. members would allow the Chair to recognize a few members from the different parties before calling orders of the day. I have seen hon. members standing for 40 minutes and I apologize to them for their lack of opportunity to ask their questions. This gives me an opportunity to remind members that if we are to spend 10 or 15 minutes on the first two or three questions, which admittedly may be important there is going to be some difficulty at the end of the question period. I will try to be fair to members and see a few of them before calling orders of the day. I might start with the hon. member for Edmonton Centre. I have seen him.

TWINNING OF TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST YELLOWHEAD PASS ROUTE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister please advise the House why his department made the decision to twin the southern part of the trans-Canada highway in Alberta leading to Banff and to discriminate against the Yellowhead trans-Canada highway, which is the northern counterpart?

Mr. Speaker: I would think that that question, though important, might well be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency to it I will be pleased to return at the time of the adjournment to enable the hon. member to have it considered during the adjournment proceedings.

Mr. Paproski: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF COMPLAINT OF NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD—ACCESS TO MINISTER

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister consider holding an inquiry into the complaint of the president of the National Indian Brotherhood that everything the Indians try to do is stopped at the civil service level?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will refer the question to the minister, and if he wants to inquire into the matter he will tell me.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the minister is absent today, would the Prime Minister consider establishing a procedure or structure which would provide the Indian Brotherhood with easier access to a minister when they have problems to resolve?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Indians have wide access to the minister. He is out in the west meeting Indians today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

Mr. Alexander: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West on a point or order.

Mr. Alexander: May I bring a matter to Your Honour's attention. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth has been rising for the past two days with great anxiety. I was told yesterday that he said something about a disaster in Hamilton, and since I come from Hamilton I am hoping that Your Honour will give him an opportunity to tell us what this disaster is all about.

Mr. Speaker: I have every intention of recognizing the hon. member. I undertook yesterday to give him an opportunity, but for the moment I have recognized the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

ENERGY

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON RESPONSIBILITY FOR POSSIBLE NUCLEAR ACCIDENT

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I feel we can do with more matter and less argument during the question period. My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the Nuclear Liability Act is as yet non-operative, does this mean that the federal government is assuming any and all risks associated at the present time with any nuclear accident in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubt about the procedural aspects of this question but the minister might be allowed to reply quickly.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would have to make an investigation into the question but I hope to be able to respond to my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ICE DAMAGE IN COUNTY OF WENTWORTH—REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. As the result of severe property damages caused by a very severe ice storm in Saltfleet and Ancaster municipalities in the county of Wentworth, would the Minister of the Environment consider recommending payment of emergency damages to alleviate the problem created?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if this disaster is beyond the competence of the government of Ontario, we in Ottawa will be hearing from Queens Park about it.

ENERGY

COAL—EFFECT OF POSSIBLE MINING IN ONTARIO ON AID TO NOVA SCOTIA MINES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister say whether any recent plans have come to his attention regarding possible mining of anthracite coal in the province of Ontario? If so, would this have any bearing on his current policy of possibly extending aid to the Nova Scotia coal mines?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the mining of anthracite in Ontario has not come to my attention but I would be glad to make inquiries on the point.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Lundrigan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: This matter has been raised several times during the last year and concerns the fact that since this parliament commenced we have had a 40-minute question period. In view of the question raised by the hon. member for Egmont, it is clear that there is absolutely no way for a member of parliament to hold a minister accountable for his department. We have raised this question in the House and asked the various House leaders to get together with a view to extending the question period.

Today, for example, or rather late yesterday, there was an incident off the east coast of Canada in which a Canadian vessel was intimidated by a foreign vessel. We are unable to ask questions of the Minister of the Environment about this incident, even though it could be tantamount to the declaration of a particular type of naval war against the people of Canada. There are matters of an urgent nature respecting various regions of Canada about which my colleagues to my left along the backbenches have been unable to ask questions. If we are to continue to have a reasonable opportunity of getting through to ministers with urgent questions, I suggest serious consideration must be given to extending the question period and I think that consideration should be given immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised this question before. I do not want to be unfair to him or to any other member, but speaking very objectively and sincerely I have the impression that sometimes a question period that lasted even one or two hours would not be sufficient for all questions to be asked. This is particularly the case if half the question period is taken up with points of order and questions of privilege.

• (1510)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I certainly do not want to disagree with the hon. member. Obviously, he has a point. It is obvious that from day to day members who are seeking to ask questions do not have the opportunity. There is a responsibility on the part of the Chair to try to recognize as many members as possible.

Mr. Lewis: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I might be allowed to finish. The hon. member has suggested that the whole problem be considered by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I agree with this. I hope that when the committee meets it will give very serious consideration to this kind of difficulty.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I believe it affects all members of parliament. I am anxious to draw this point to Your Honour's attention while the Prime Minister is still in the chamber. In reply to questions asked of the Prime Minister with regard to the late filing by the Auditor General of his report, he said—I do not claim to be quoting him verbatim but this is certainly not an inaccurate representation of what he said—that if parliament is willing to let him break the law or something to the effect that if Members of parliament are willing to condone a breach of the law or the Auditor General breaking the law, it is okay with him.

I make several points, Mr. Speaker. I think the behaviour of the Prime Minister in such cases is really remarkable, if not worse than that, if not reprehensible. First, as one member of this parliament I do not intend to allow the Prime Minister to accuse me, my colleagues or, indeed, any member of this parliament of condoning lawbreaking by any servant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Second, if the Prime Minister is right, then as leader of the government, and therefore as leader of this parliament, he should have the courage to produce a resolution to deal with the Auditor General in the way in which the act provides.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Third, it is a well-known habit of those who want to kill someone to produce discomfort for him.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Lewis: They amputate his arms and legs and then ask him to run. This government has amputated the Auditor General's office. It amputated the arms and legs by inadequate personnel. Now, we have this kind of statement.

I did not rise on this point during the question period because I did not want to take up any time in the question period. But I say it is less than courageous to attack an officer of this parliament in this House without giving details or considering the situation, and it is less than proper for the Prime Minister to say that members of parliament condone lawbreaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I merely want to point out, without shouting if possible, that this matter was brought to the attention of the House by way of a question from a member of the opposition. The government had no intention of drawing this to the attention of the House. It did not bring this matter before the House.

When the question was asked of the government why this illegality was being perpetrated—those were the terms that were used; I cannot quote them exactly but in the question the matter of illegality was raised—I undertook to look into the matter. I reported that it was not any fault of the reporting minister but of the Auditor General himself that the report was not with us. I answered that it was not the intention of the government to look into the motives of the Auditor General or the reasons that he might want to give.

I did not want to make an issue of it, Mr. Speaker, but the question was pressed upon the government. I just said that the Auditor General is an officer of parliament, not of the government, and that he is answerable to this House. This government does not intend to introduce the resolution of censure which is recommended by the leader of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If he has the courage of his convictions, perhaps he will want to move such a motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to both the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. member for York South that there is not much point in pursuing this matter by way of a debate on a question of privilege. The hon. member raised a question. As is the tradition and the long-established practice of the House, the person involved was allowed to reply. There is no motion before the House. There is nothing before the House. I called orders of the day before and I have to call orders of the day again.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a personal question of privilege. I respect Your Honour's desire, but the Prime Minister was in the House when I spoke and I do not intend to let him get away with twisting my words.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now entering into a debate with the Prime Minister. The hon. member made a statement and the Prime Minister made a statement. The hon. member for York South now says that he does not want the Prime Minister to misinterpret his statement. This can go on for a long time because the Prime Minister will again reply. I wonder where it will end and whether we are achieving any purpose in pursuing this debate.

Mr. Lewis: I am in Your Honour's hands. If I believed, as the Prime Minister suggested he did, that the Auditor General, having the capacity to produce the report on time, was deliberately breaking the law, I would bring such a resolution. It is the Prime Minister who suggested he is breaking the law.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: It was the Prime Minister who suggested—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: It is up to him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: I, for one, will not accept this kind of dishonest twisting of words.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems we are continuing the debate between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for York South. I have no objection to allowing the Prime Minister to reply to what the hon. member calls his personal question of privilege, but it does not seem that this is a very profitable exercise as far as this House is concerned.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think there may be a solution to this. The matter of the Auditor General has been before a standing committee of the House for many months now. It can be brought back to this committee. The committee is chaired by a member of the Conservative party. I have no objection. On the contrary, I would be happy if this whole matter were once again tackled by that committee. As to twisting the words of the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I do not have to do that. His twisted mind does it for him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed, from Monday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-4, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from January 1, 1971, to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, continuing from where members left off on Monday on the CNR financing bill, I should like first of all to say that the remarks of my colleagues which were placed on the record on Monday perhaps cover the major reasons members from the east coast of Canada are taking part in this debate. For the last several years, going back to about 1965, I have had occasion to travel from St. John's, Newfoundland, across to Edmonton, Alberta on Canadian National Railways and, of course, since then on dozens of occasions have indulged in trips from the Maritimes to western Canada as well as from the Toronto-Montreal area back and forth to Ottawa. I am always fascinated by the pronouncement which seems to highlight the advertisements of Canadian National. In their advertising program, they state that they are involved in building the Canadian dream.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has the floor, but there are so many conversations being carried on that it is very difficult for the Chair to follow the hon. member's interesting pronouncements.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a contradictory situation we have this afternoon. Some hon. members cannot keep quiet, and some other hon. members have decided to rest in peace. It is an unusual House. I have never known the House to be quite so lively in some respects, and quite so dead in some others. I remember an occasion on which I was travelling by train from Toronto to Ottawa. I got on the train and was escorted to one of the most luxurious cars the Canadian National has. It is a space-age car in which you have several levers to adjust your seat. It is a beautiful car with most luxurious upholstery. I was in the wrong place by the way, because my pass only permits me to travel in a second-class compartment. Without having paid the difference in the price of the ticket I was placed there.

Before getting shoved into the second-class I observed a beautiful thing. Along came a porter with hors-d'œuvres, shrimp, mushrooms and other doodads. Then, there were drinks and a person came along with white towels asking what time the passengers would like to dine. He spoke about the menu and asked whether we would like roast duckling with some kind of a sauce, an orange sauce perhaps, although I am not familiar with such things because I come from a fishing community. The service included all kinds of things which someone from the east coast would never have believed existed.

A few days earlier, I was getting off a bus in Newfoundland, also operated by the Canadian National Railways. A person needs to have a figure no larger than 34 inches in order to squat in the seats. There is one small bathroom in the rear which my colleague from St. John's West described. There is one lavatory for 39 persons. The comparison between this type of bus service and the luxurious train service is unbelievable. The fact is that the CNR provides a particular type of service for the urban parts of Canada and downgrades the service in the rural parts of Canada. The evidence of this is overwhelming.

The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and other members from western Canada, complain daily about the elimination of substandard rail services into small towns and the difficulty this causes throughout rural Canada. I have always contended that the government, through various programs including programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, is involved in the downgrading of rural Canada and the encouragement of a drifting toward urban centres. I think it is quite natural for people to look to areas of opportunity but I do not believe any government or any corporation has the right to bring in programs whereby the people in rural parts of Canada are placed at a disadvantage. Basically, this is what is happening because of the attitude of the government.

The government has an unstated policy which is realized only if one is sensitive to the formal policies which destroy rural life. In my area, several hundred communities are suffering and many of them could have been viable communities if there had been specific emphasis placed on rural development. In western Canada we see tumbleweed blowing down deserted streets. We see houses closed and dilapidated buildings. This downgrading of rural Canada is contributed to by the type of assistance policies we have in this country. I recall that my colleague pointed out many examples where Canadian National especially, and CPR, have specifically eliminated rail services which has led to the early discouragement of any interest in housing for those communities.

In our province we have a very serious situation. In 1968, I believe on June 3, Order R 2673 was issued which allowed Canadian National Railways to discontinue its rail passenger service. That order was upheld by the Canadian Transport Commission. Because of a loss of $900,000 which was experienced in the last year of operation the government of this country through its official agency the Canadian Transport Commission eliminated the rail passenger service. This was one of the most tragic things which has happened to our province since it became part of Canada in 1949. This is not a matter involving only the Canadian Transport Commission. Perhaps I am exaggerating slightly, but I contend that there has been a plot between the Canadian Transport Commission, the CNR and this government to eliminate this railway service, as well as many others.

We have raised this matter from time to time with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) who has not poked his nose in the House since this debate started. He is supposed to be piloting this bill through the House. When we raise the question with the minister he says it is a matter for the Canadian National Railways and because it is a Crown corporation he cannot interfere. Then, when we raise the question with the minister again, he says the matter has been reported to the Canadian Transport Commission and he cannot interfere because the Canadian Transport Commission is a regulatory body which has a particular type of omnipotence. Then, if you go to the Canadian Transport Commission they say they have no authority because the act states that they must behave in a certain manner. Because the CNR is afraid to offend the minister, because the Canadian Transport Commission is a creature of the minister and because the minister refuses to become involved in these problems since other agencies have jurisdiction, the end result is that jointly the minister, the Canadian Transport Commission and the CNR are carrying out a process of downgrading rail services. They have already eliminated completely rail service in one province. We will fight this decision as long as we have breath.

• (1530)

We have already indicated earlier in the week what we have done. In 1968, when the decision to abandon the service was brought before the Canadian Transport Commission, we protested against it. Our people did so unanimously. We considered that Canadian National should have moved in, upgraded the railbed and cleaned up the cars. Nobody would have believed how calculating the CNR people were. They are not even in their usual place in the gallery today listening to the complaints, because they do not pay any attention to them anyway. The fact is that for about two years prior to the abandonment of the railway passenger service in 1968, the CNR deliberately started the downgrading process. They did not clean the cars on the outside, and the inside was repulsive to anybody who wished to get on board one of these trains. The end result was that people stopped using the service.

After a couple of years of this, the CNR decided that they had sufficient statistics to show that the number of passengers using the service was reduced, so they applied to the Canadian Transport Commission for permission to abandon that rail line and the CTC agreed. We have never been able to uncover the reasons for this decision, but I hope that one day, with a new government in Canada which will face the facts honestly and openly, we can bring the czar of transportation before a committee of the House. I am referring to the man who is now in the $40,000 a year job as president of the CTC. This person should give sworn testimony before an appropriate committee where he might admit that there was some kind of plot between the then provincial premier, the CTC and the then minister of transport to eliminate the rail passenger service. There had to be some agreement among them. Perhaps the provincial government at that time said, if you help us with the trans-Canada highway or give us a grant of so many millions of dollars, we will not oppose the abandonment of the system.

Unless there is some skulduggery behind the scenes, there is no way in which the CTC can justify its decision in 1968 to abandon one railway system in one province which had a deficit of less than $1 million, and refuse to abandon railway systems in two other provinces which had deficits of $15 million a year. We agree that the rail passenger service which serves Nova Scotia and New Brunswick should be maintained and upgraded, because it serves as a vital passenger link with the heartland of the nation. However, you cannot say, on the one hand, that one system is to be abandoned which had deficits of less than $1 million and which served one province, while another system having a deficit of $15 million and serving two other provinces with a population a little more than twice as big as the province of Newfoundland should be maintained. Something must have gone wrong somewhere. The transportation system in Newfoundland is not a minor thing; it is of major importance. We in the Atlantic region have need of an efficient, well serviced and cheap transportation system that will link us with the central industrialized parts of Canada because we are far from central Canada and we must have good transportation.

Back in the nineteenth century Canada said that tariff systems and trade policies would be designed which would encourage the growth of the less industrialized parts of Canada. We agreed with that. At the same time, the Atlantic region was left in the position of depending basically on raw resources, so we are in great need of a system whereby our products can be brought to the large population centres of the world and certainly to the large population centres of our nation. Therefore, much more emphasis must be placed on rail transportation.

My colleagues from Nova Scotia have commented on the increased freight rates in the Atlantic region. There have been several increases in the last few years and another one is to take place in a few weeks time. There is no way in which you can carry on an effective policy of regional development in the Atlantic region in the face of this kind of discrimination. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that members from western Canada must have the same attitude because this is one of their great disadvantages. I have listened to my friends in the cattle industry, such as the distinguished and honoured member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), as well as other hon. members speak about their need for a reassessment of the freight rates and about the cost of transporting their produce to the heartland of Canada.

These are the kinds of things which we would like the CN to consider. The attitude of the people in managerial positions in the CN is rooted in the eighteenth century. They do not understand the word "service". They dislike any innovation, change or progress. If you speak to these people now you will find that they have not heard of the word "service" except in areas where they have brand new, sophisticated systems serving perhaps a few of the heavily populated central Canadian areas. These people are still treating the rail system as the traditional mode of transportation, and in many cases the only mode of transportation, but they have not kept up with the times.

My colleague, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) was telling me a couple of days ago about some of the advances in the railway system in Japan. He mentioned the unirail system with which I am not very familiar. Countries like Japan are 100 years ahead of Canada in this respect. They have integrated their road and railway systems in the phenomenal engineering feat of the unirail. I wonder if anybody has thought about adapting this concept to Canadian conditions. I wonder whether the CNR has seriously considered this phenomenal engineering feat, whether they have conducted a sophisticated cost analysis to justify putting it into operation in certain parts of Canada, such as the provinces on the east coast, an area which is fast becoming a haven for people who want to live a more relaxed kind of life in a different environment. What vision do they have?

Back in the 1870's we had John A. Macdonald who spoke about building a railway across Canada. People must have thought him a nut to be talking at that time about building a railway across uninhabitated areas, across the Rocky Mountains. In 1885 they drove the last spike and the whole country was joined together by the silver rails. But in 1968, those great promoters of the CNR decided they would abandon the whole passenger service in one province. They do not seem to be able to find ways to upgrade the roadbed and to build new coaches to attract tourists. Yet, the Ontario government did so in 1902. Perhaps hon. members will recall that the Ontario Northland railway was built then. There was prospect for development there. They opened up the great mines in the southwestern part of the Canadian shield as a result of the building of this railway which is one of the few railways in the world which makes money. The area is a great tourist attraction. Between the middle of June and the middle of September you cannot get a place on the Ontario Northland railway. I believe it is called the Polar Bear Express.

At that time, back in 1902, people with vision realized that with the beauty in that part of Canada, and with its potential, this could be a paying proposition. Today it is actually making money. If anybody would like to take the time to write to the Ontario minister of transportation he could obtain new, beautiful annual reports showing that this railway works. Why can the federal government, through its national agency of the Canadian National, not adopt such an attitude and explore such a possibility? The tourist potential is unlimited. The railway in Newfoundland would have been the only narrow gauge railway in the western world. My colleagues, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) spoke about building a wide gauge railway. Perhaps that is farfetched, but has anybody ever explored it? We have a serious unemployment problem. According to DBS statistics 18.5 per cent of our people were unemployed in January. Why cannot this be looked at as a possible way of putting thousands of people to work? Can it pay dividends? Can it open up access to resources, to our forests, to our minerals, and provide transport for those products as well as for our fisheries products to central Canada and the eastern seaboard? I do not know, Mr. Speaker. But I ask, has anybody ever thought about it?

All we get from the government is the reply, "we have abandoned this service in accordance with the act." We will have to wait until hell freezes over before the Prime Minister and the government display a flexible attitude to our province. They always look at it in terms that we have only half a million people and 200,000 square miles of territory. We have a vast hinterland with very few people inhabiting it. This is the main reason we cannot make a greater financial contribution to the people of Canada.

In this respect government members have a narrow-minded, introverted, reactionary attitude. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the people of Canada, that during the next decade the true worth of the resources of that part of Canada will come to be realized. It is only a matter of time until using our marine resources on the continental shelf, the unbelievable mineral resources of Labrador and Newfoundland, the forestry potential of that vast hinterland, the equally unbelievable hydro development potential, now coming into effect with the billion dollar power plant at Churchill Falls, Labrador, we will contribute our full share to the rest of the country. This is all the more reason for the federal government to look at our problems in the broadest possible perspective.

I say that men like the member who for years represented the constituency I represent are betraying the people back on the east coast. They are doing that by permitting this kind of attitude to develop. Such a person becomes very popular when he can go into the Prime Minister's office and say, "In Newfoundland we have just saved you $900,000," or go into the office of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), who in effect is his boss, and tell him, "We have saved you $900,000." Wouldn't that put him in a position of prestige and authority? That type of attitude has to go, Mr. Speaker. The type of attitude displayed by the Canadian Transport Commission, the Department of Transport and the government, has to go. We need more perspective, more vision, more foresight.

Only today I was informed once more that there has been another train derailment, this time at Jasper in the northwest part of the province of Alberta. We had three derailments last week in the province of Quebec. Twice during the Christmas recess I attempted to travel by rail in Ontario, and I was impeded by derailments. Once returning from Newfoundland during the air traffic controllers strike, I was impeded by a train derailment somewhere in Nova Scotia. Every week we hear about train derailments. My colleagues who know about railroads tell me that this is the result of the Canadian National cutting back on its section men, and on the extra gangs it once hired. The end result is that the modern day, heavy trains cannot carry their loads in safety. If this trend continues, it will only be a matter of time until the Canadian National can justify the elimination of all rail lines.

If the Canadian National management are only interested in qualifying for the 80 per cent subsidy from the Canadian government, all I can say is that this is a hazardous way of going about it. They are downgrading their own roadbeds, their service on the railways, and the small railway stations. Has anybody here ever gone into a small railway station in the year 1972 and thought he was back in the year 1880? You have to bulldoze your way into the small toilet. In the waiting room there is the same old hard bench that was always there. There is no telephone and in most cases no heating. Then, CN management comes to the government and says, "Here is what we have got. It's an awful mess. We have to eliminate it and close it down." But the government replies, "You don't have to do that because we will pay you 80 per cent of your losses." That is the kind of progressive management that there is in the CNR today.

I was 17 years old when I had my first opportunity to work away from the beautiful east coast haven of rest and relaxation in which I was brought up. I went to Knob Lake, or Schefferville, Newfoundland, on the border with Quebec, which is about 360 miles north of Seven Islands. I went to work on the railroad. I was driving spikes and shovelling ballast, and helped to build up the railyard that serves the iron ore mines at Schefferville. We wore our caps and our badges. We were proud of ourselves. We were railwaymen. I felt the old spirit myself, even though I was only a young fellow. But today when you talk to railwaymen across the country you find that the railways have adopted a policy of not replacing anyone who passes on. What do you call that?

Mr. Hees: Attrition.

Mr. Lundrigan: The railwaymen are all in danger of losing their jobs. Those same men who were proud builders of the Canadian nation are today the most demoralized labour group in Canada. This kind of thing must be taken seriously. Every year when we get this CNR joke, and it is only a joke, Mr. Speaker, we stand up and debate it. I note that there is nobody up there in the gallery today, although there are usually half a dozen $30,000 a year CN men there. Perhaps I should not be too harsh because I have some friends in the Canadian National. Anyway there are usually half a dozen of them up there taking notes. Then, they come before our standing committee. They have a well calculated plan to present. Members question them, then they go away, and the following year we go through the same exercise. We are getting a lot of complaints as a result of the tremendous frustration experienced by Canadian National employees. The government has to take a close look at the situation.

This is a purely personal view, Mr. Speaker, and I am not putting it forward as representing the view of my party or of my party's spokesman on transportation. I would like to see some kind of very special inquiry set up to have a look at the Canadian National, a look at their attitude, their management, their progressiveness, their vision, their plans and the programs they have in mind for this country. In this context the building of the Canadian dream was the biggest fraud ever seen perpetrated on the Canadian people, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I first want to tell you how much I am in agreement with the hon. member who just spoke. It is most unusual in the House of Commons when members on both sides are really in agreement on a particular topic. Any member of any party who has his eyes open must agree that passenger service and rail service generally, not just in Newfoundland but throughout the whole of Canada, are in a most deplorable mess.

The previous speaker mentioned the abandonment of railway service in the great province of Newfoundland. I, who come from what many call the heartland of Canada, Ontario, can tell you that rail service there is as deplorable as it is anywhere else in the country. It is equally deplorable right in the capital city of Ottawa. About two weeks ago I had to meet a passenger coming in from Winnipeg, but because of a derailment the train was 12 hours late. Instead of arriving at a quarter to five in the afternoon, it arrived at twenty to five in the morning. In this capital city of Ottawa, the railway station closes at midnight, so if a train is delayed after that hour you can try phoning the station about it but you will not get an answer.

People are completely dissatisfied with the way the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific are operating. Only a few months ago I was in Union Station in Toronto, which the CPR and CNR are thinking of remodelling or rebuilding. But why, when they do not look after the building they have now? My friend was talking about the trains that Sir John A. Macdonald started a hundred years ago but when I was in Union Station only three CP trains per day were coming in. It is a disgrace that we let the railways of Canada get away with this.

My hon. friend spoke about the Japanese trains. I was in Frankfurt, Germany, two or three years ago and at that time 800 trains per day moved in and out of that station. But the Canadian Pacific, which has the gall to call itself the greatest transportation company in the world, had three trains per day going to Union Station in Toronto. My hon. friend made a case to show the people of Canada that our railway system is in a terrible state, but he did not say what should be done about it. We can blame the government or the Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission, but the brutal fact is that as a result of legislation passed in this House over the years, the railway companies have parliament exactly where they want it. They eliminate services, and not just passenger services. You should see the condition of some of the cattle that arrive in my area from western Canada. Sometimes a few are dead and the farmers have a hard time getting satisfaction from the Canadian Pacific or Canadian National.

We have to do something about this, Mr. Speaker, because as my hon. friend said, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways are laughing at us. It is high time that we in this House of Commons let the railway systems of Canada, and the people of Canada, know who is boss. Up to the present the railways have shown that they are.

Mr. Horner: Tell us about Pickersgill and his job.

Mr. Whicher: The railways have an obligation, not just to the House of Commons but to the people of Canada. When I watch a football game on television and see the Canadian Pacific advertisement about trains going across Canada—"Another Way in Which the Canadian Pacific is Serving You"—I say it is nonsense. The only people they serve are those at the head of the CPR and the stockholders. There is nothing wrong with being a stockholder. The CPR is a great organization and in many instances has done a good job.

However, both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific have failed the people of Canada by not providing proper railway systems. They have obligations. They made a deal, not with the government of the day but through the government with the people of Canada, the people in my riding of Bruce and in the provinces all across Canada. The Canadian Pacific said "We will give you perpetual service for X number of dollars and X millions of acres of land". In its wisdom, the federal government gave the Canadian Pacific Railway $25 million and 25 million acres of land. That is a lot of land and today the Canadian Pacific has oil wells, gas wells, big hotels and everything imaginable, the returns from which go to swell the coffers of the company. The railway company signed agreements with little municipalities across the country. These little municipalities, such as the one I represent, gave $10,000 or $12,000 in return for a guarantee perpetual service. But that service is not being given, Mr. Speaker.

If the mortgage on my house were held by a private individual and that individual were to die during the term of the mortgage, would that mean that I would not have to pay his heirs? Of course not; I would have to pay. The Canadian Pacific guaranteed perpetual service for so much money. But if I did not keep up the mortgage payments on my house, the house would be taken back. That is the way in the free enterprise system. The Canadian Pacific Railway is one of the largest free enterprises in the whole world. They guaranteed a service which we did not get, so let them give back the money and give back the land. Let the municipalities go to the Canadian National Railways and get their money back, plus the interest. You may think this is a foolish idea which could not be implemented, but the only thing these money barons understand is a dollar bill. If we demand the return of the money because their signature is on the deal, then I think they might attempt to give the service that is required.

We do not need rail lines in every part of Canada, of course, but there is no reason for not having service into the city of Toronto with two million people or Montreal with around three million people. I am sure that my hon. friends from Newfoundland are not asking that the railway serve every village and town. What we all request is a reasonable service. When the railway service was eliminated in the area I represent, the railway companies and the bus companies were in cahoots. The bus companies guaranteed to the public and the Canadian Transport Commission that they would look after transportation for the area. As far as the bus companies are concerned nothing has been done and the railway companies have stopped giving service.

I will go as far as to say that the deal the railways have given to the people of Canada is just legalized robbery any way you look at it. If I were head of either the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canadian National Railways, I would not be able to face the people of Canada after what they have done in this great country of ours.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): When speaking on Monday on this bill the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) said that this is the annual exercise in futility. I do not know if I would go that far, but certainly it is the annual bite placed on the people of Canada for funds for Air Canada and the Canadian National Railways. Every year we go through this process and deal with this kind of measure, the only difference in the script is the amount of money involved. Every year we see the spectacle of the Parliament of Canada bailing out the CNR with respect to debt charges that the railway should not be expected to carry. Ever since its formation in 1923, the deck has been stacked against the CNR. The government of Canada bailed out entities that operated as financial and economic pirates between 1900 and 1920. When the small railways that now make up the CNR went broke, we bailed them out by buying them up; and we are still paying.

• (1600)

Some of the money provided by this bill is for the payment of a deficit resulting from the interest incurred on the original debt, a debt that has been charged to the CNR, quite improperly in my view. I submit that the original mortgage indebtedness of 1923 ought to have been refinanced, for I submit that the original mortgage debt has been paid off. The Canadian National Railways system has been in debt long enough. It has been kept in debt all this time under the present set-up. I submit that the system ought to be permitted to show a profit, so that it need not come to parliament for help. Parliament should not have to bail out that system as a result of deficits incurred by reason of interest paid on debt.

May I mention the speech made the other day by my friend, the hon. member for Moncton. He was the lead-off speaker of the official opposition. If he has always believed what he said, I am proud of him. If he is newly converted to the ideas of the NDP, I am even prouder of him, for in the course of his remarks he enunciated a philosophy with which we have concurred for many years. What he said we have advocated in this chamber ever since my party first sent members to this place way back in 1935. I should like to quote one paragraph from the speech of the hon. member for Moncton. He said, in part, as recorded at page 546 of Hansard:

> Surely, the government owes the people of this country the duty not only to listen to their complaints but to take some action on them.
> This is where the government has failed the people of Canada shamefully. This is where a good share of the responsibility lies for failing to develop a national and rational transportation policy that is based not on profit alone but rather on the concept that transportation is essential to Canada, that where necessary services must be subsidized, whether they be in the form of highway, rail, air or water transport. The profit motive is important, but it should be secondary to the concept of providing essential public services.

The last sentence in the paragraph reads, "The profit motive is important, but it should be secondary to the concept of providing essential public services." I agree. I submit that so long as we maintain a rail transport system that is partly publicly and partly privately owned, a system whose primary concern is the making of profits and whose secondary concern is the provision of service, we will continue experiencing the kind of grief with regard to rail operations that hon. members of this House have been complaining about for 30 or 40 years.

I was also interested in the remarks of the Leader of the Social Credit Party, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). Last Monday in his remarks he brought out some of the old shibboleths and myths which have been bandied about by those who for many years have opposed public ownership of transport facilities. At page 553 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> Since the private sector prospers, we must nationalize it at once so that it may lose money.

He went on to say:

> We should not nationalize the Canadian Pacific; instead we should sell the Canadian National to the Canadian Pacific because the latter operates at a profit.

May I remind that hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that he has conveniently forgotten a few things. Of course, the CPR operates at a profit, and for a good reason. It started out with a grant of 25 million acres of land and $25 million in cash from the people of Canada. It started out with that kind of advantage. The dice were loaded in favour of the CPR. When it was established, it did not bear an unfavourable financial burden. It started out in a way that is exactly opposite from the way the CNR started out. When the Canadian National Railways system was established, that system took over the debt, amounting to some $1 billion, of several bankrupt railway companies. Yet, the hon. member for Témiscamingue has the nerve to say that the CPR always makes a profit and that, therefore, it should take over the CNR because the CNR loses money.

What kind of logic is that? If the hon. member were to look at the financial statement of the CNR, he would find that the facts are opposite to those he has suggested. Canadian National Railways has been showing profits. As I say, all the hon. gentleman has to do is look at page 46 of the 1970 Annual Report of Canadian National Railways. That report shows the performance of Canadian National Railways during the past 25 years, between 1946 and 1970. And, Mr. Speaker, for the edification of that hon. gentleman and anybody else who thinks that the CNR is always operating at a loss because it is a publicly owned system or who thinks that in the last 25 years the CNR has shown only deficits and not profits, let me say that in 22 of those 25 years the system has shown net operating profits. The record year was 1956, when the system made $57,860,000 in profits. However, Mr. Speaker, when the interest on the debt was charged against that $57 million operating profit, the net result was a deficit and the parliament of Canada had to vote another $26 million to cover additional interest on that debt. This has been the situation for the past 25 years. I suspect that if one were to go back and examine the record between 1923 and 1946, one would find that the system enjoyed operating profits comparable to those of any other rail system in North America and, in most cases, better than those of any other rail system in Canada.

I submit there is ample evidence to show that the one publicly owned railway of any consequence in North America, Canadian National Railways, has set the best example in terms of operating efficiency and operating profits. Those who continue to oppose blindly public ownership of any kind like to bring forward half-truths in support of their argument. They leave out some of the facts relating to the Canadian National Railways system.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

I, myself, have many criticisms of that system. The one brought forward by the hon. member for Témiscamingue was not justified and was not truthful.

The whole issue of public and private ownership of transportation has been debated for the last 50 or 60 years in this country. The CNR became a publicly owned railway system, not because any government showed any desire to acquire a publicly operated railway system, but simply because at least three privately owned railways went bankrupt and the government, having provided guarantees to those entrepreneurs, to those fancy free-enterprisers, was stuck. The people of Canada have been stuck ever since. That is how the CNR was established as a publicly owned corporation. It was established, not because of any essentially good principle involving the public ownership of essential public services, but only because the government of the day had no choice.

One of the railways of that day was the Intercolonial Railway, which was publicly owned. Its operation was carried on from the office of the minister of railways and canals with an extravagance of partisanship in the granting of rate preferences and in the giving of employment to party friends that was considered scandalous even by the relaxed standards of the time. By 1910 people were beginning to wonder whether some kind of insulation against the grosser froms of political pressure could be devised. One of the arguments for the creation of Canadian National Railways was that it would do just that. People wanted to do away with pork barrelling and the granting of special rates to friends.

The National transcontinental line was built by the dominion government to very high physical standards and with a great deal of plain and fancy graft for friends of the party in power. Nominally, it was to be leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific, after completion. In fact, the parent Grand Trunk had an interest in getting a connection between its lines in Ontario and Quebec and those of the Grand Trunk Pacific running west from Winnipeg. Therefore, the whole of the line east from Cochrane through Levis to Moncton was a purely political job. Whatever else can be said of it, no part of this line can be laid at the door of private enterprise. Even in those days, public construction and ownership of railway lines was not undertaken because it was held to be a good principle that the public should own an essential public service. It was done for political purposes and for political purposes only. The Grand Trunk Pacific was financed finally on the basis of government guarantees. The manner of construction and the price of the Prince Rupert terminus were both decided by the government. It is perfectly true that the management of the parent Grand Trunk was not good; but even a good management might not have been able to create a viable enterprise under two such handicaps.

We listen to speeches made by the hon. member for Témiscamingue and others suggesting there is something fundamentally good about private enterprise and something fundamentally bad about public enterprise. He and his friends support the free enterprise theory, the theory that you make it on your own, put up your own money, show initiative, and so on. If you succeed, well and good; if you go broke, well, you have taken your chance, it is too bad, try again. That is the theory. What happens in practice is illustrated by the case of the Canadian National system. It has happened many times in the practice of the mythology of private enterprise. The entrepreneurs start on their own. They "con" people into buying shares in their ventures. Their friends buy bonds and shares. Large corporate financial institutions invest in those bonds and shares. The company gets government guarantees and then goes broke, as in the case of at least three of the railways in the early part of this century. They don't lose, they get their money. The groups who bought stocks and shares get their money, and the public pays.

This is what happens too often in practice. The people I am talking about are the first to yell about the value of initiative and private enterprise. But when they are in trouble, who runs to the government to be bailed out? They are the largest welfare recipients in the history of this country. When I hear some dinosaur complaining there is too much welfare available, too much public assistance, I cannot help being amazed, because the amount spent on public welfare is infinitesimal compared with the sums handed out to corporations who run to this government and who ran to the previous Conservative government to be bailed out. Any damned fool could be a private enterpriser under that kind of a deal, and a lot of people in Canada have been made damned fools of by bailing out these bankrupt corporations. And we are doing it now. The government to this day makes grants in the order of hundreds of millions of dollars to private corporations, the officers and boards of directors of which decry socialism and state intervention. What a bunch of nonsense! They are the first to go pleading for help. This applies to all the social aid cases who reside in boardrooms and have done so ever since this country started.

Canada's rail operations are handicapped because of the kind of national transportation policy under which they are working today and under which they have been operating since confederation. I wish to illustrate this point by drawing attention to some of the areas in which rail service has deteriorated or ceased altogether. All these things have gone on—the closing of railway agencies, the cancellation or curtailment of branch line services, or ceasing of schedule train services, which means the railways can run a train whenever they feel like doing so. With respect to certain types of freight and express traffic, railway services have virtually disappeared. As I say, all these things have gone on, particularly since the end of the second world war. The private enterprise railway was not interested. It wanted the gravy. It did not want to give a service. In the case of the publicly-owned railway, it had no choice because of the financial arrangements under which it had to work and the unfair competition which it faced. It had no choice but to decrease services; it was necessary in order to show members of parliament and the public generally that an operating profit had been made.

May I give a few examples? I suppose the most horrendous and the most recent was the application to close a total of 76 railway stations in Saskatchewan and Alberta in one fell swoop. Four members of parliament, an hon. member from the other place, mayors and town councillors from dozens of communities and representatives of the province of Saskatchewan all appeared at three successive hearings in Saskatchewan opposing that application. The Canadian Transport Commission Railway Transport Committee handed down its decision a week or two ago. It chose to ignore or discount the representations which had been made to it, and granted permission to the railway to close these 76 agencies by the middle of this month. When I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) whether he would get his cabinet colleagues to intervene and disallow this order, it was evident that he did not even know whether he could do so or not. I hope the parliamentary secretary will remind him that according to the act itself, the cabinet has authority to overrule the Canadian Transport Commission. This is the most recent example of the decisions we are getting from CTC, decisions which fly in the face of the needs of the Canadian public.

I want to be so brave as to read a little of the brief I presented to the Commission, outlining what I thought should be done to continue to provide service at those agencies while, nevertheless, reducing costs and improving efficiency. I am not suggesting for one minute that all 76 of those agencies should or could be kept open, but when one sees the railway wanting to close agencies in towns of 500, 1,000 or 3,000 people, it is obvious something is wrong. And when we see a docile transport commission agreeing to this proposal as rapidly and as easily as it did, here is more evidence that something is fundamentally wrong.

The claim by the Canadian Pacific, and latterly by the CNR, that the so-called customer service centres are giving better service and are resulting in more business is not borne out by any evidence which I, or any member of this House or the Canadian Transport Commission have been able to get. I submitted in my brief at the hearing at Wynyard, Saskatchewan, that if the Canadian Pacific Railway, for example, was correct in its assertion that in other areas of western Canada where customer service centres had been inaugurated dozens of agencies were closed, the customer service centres were in fact providing better services and resulting in more traffic, it was incumbent upon the railway to provide to the commission, to the public and members of this House the revenue earnings at each of the stations for forward and received, carload, less than carload, freight and express, number of telegrams sent and received, number of tickets sold and passenger revenue, before those stations were closed.

Then, what we would like for the Canadian Pacific customer service centre in Regina, for example, is the revenue earnings, number of shipments for each of the stations now closed, what the revenue has been since they were closed and served by the so-called customer service centre. These figures can be obtained. It would mean that Canadian Pacific would have to put a lot of people to work going through every single waybill and ticket stub issued since the customer service centre opened. But I suspect very strongly that the Canadian Pacific railway have not kept those figures separate, that they cannot at this point in time tell us what the revenue is at each of the stations. This is very convenient from the company's point of view. It conveniently disposes of the kind of evidence that we need. It is the kind of evidence that I submit CPR does not want to present. All the revenue from stations like Milestone, Yellow Grass, points north, south, east and west of Regina, is lumped into one bag at the customer service centre at Regina.

I and many others will continue to oppose these applications. Canadian National has one now pending to close a large number of stations in Saskatchewan. We will oppose that application as hard as we opposed the one made by Canadian Pacific during the winter unless they can present evidence to show that those customer service centres are in fact providing better service and earning more revenue than they provided prior to making the application to close these agencies.

As one who was a station agent for 15 years and worked in the CPR's dirty old stations under their archaic rules, watching the day to day operations of the railway I can only say it was a "helluva" a way to run a railway. In my opinion, since the second world war the CPR, followed by the CNR, has pursued a deliberate policy that has had the end result of relieving the company of any responsibility for providing carload or less than carload, passenger, telegraph and other ancillary transportation and communications services for hundreds of communities along dozens of branch lines in western Canada. One can only come to that conclusion having watched first hand the CPR's attitude over the last 25 years, its failure to modernize its buildings and re-equip its stations in scores of communities.

I remember that for years after electricity came to the town I was living in when I was a station agent, the CPR was still burning coal oil lamps as well coal in old heaters. And they expected the public to rush to give them business when they had those kind of facilities. Why should they? That sort of thing helped to drive people away. The infrequency of trains, or for that matter truck service, coupled at the same time with rates that were always higher than their trucking competitors, resulted in a fall in business and this in revenue. The company then comes to us and pleads poverty, says it is losing money, and can they close agencies and branch lines? I submit there is, call it a compromise if you will, but I submit a better way. I hope Canadian National will follow it instead of adopting the same buccaneer attitude shown by the CPR toward the Canadian people over the years.

While I agree that there is no point in trying to maintain open agencies at little villages and hamlets of 50 or 100 people, there are viable communities of significant size of 300, 500, 1,000 people that will support an open transportation agency. I should like to suggest that for these middle and larger sized rural communities, not only on the Prairies but right across Canada, there be established a transportation and communications service centre that would provide a completely integrated service for local communities and neighbouring smaller communities.

I suggest that a community transportation and communications service centre should offer the following: loading and unloading facilities for carload and less than carload freight and express, both rail and truck. It could also be the bus terminal. If the particular community is on a bus route of one or more bus companies, it could also be the bus terminal. It would have rail and bus express facilities, telex and telephone service. Have you ever driven into a small rural community in the middle of the night, Mr. Speaker, and been unable to find a telephone or even a pay booth? Do you realize that with the exception of the nine cities and the handful of larger towns there is no place else in the whole province of Saskatchewan where you can send or receive a written message? This community transportation and communications service centre could also offer a fairly large selection of freight, express and passenger tariffs for all modes of transportation, be it air, rail, bus or truck. If any tariffs were not to hand, the agent at that transportation and communications service centre could quickly obtain access via telex or telephone to the tariffs he did not have.

The public would be able to ship anything they wanted. The public would be able to buy any ticket they wanted, whether bus, rail, steamship or air line. This transportation and communications service centre would be staffed by 2 or 3 people, of even one man, who would serve not only the public in that community but would be required to visit neighbouring small communities to solicit business, look after claims and call on customers, as opposed to the attitude that is presently being shown by the railways. At the moment if you ask them to ship an article weighing 1,000 pounds, the railway treats you as though they are doing you a favour, mostly because they do not have either sufficient facilities or service. In addition, they have rates that scare you away. I recall one time when the CPR was going to put a minimum rate of $4.85 on a five gallon can of cream. I was a station agent at the time, so I looked up the tariff and found I could ship that can of cream on a lower berth much cheaper.

Such transportation and communications service centres in these communities would be part of the local scene. They would have the advantage of being closer to and more readily available to the public. The businessmen of the area would know where to go to forward and to pick up shipments. At the present time packages are dumped on the street or in front of a general store, which is closed, or beside the railroad track. If you are lucky you will receive a postcard telling you there is a parcel waiting for you at the side of the ditch in Gopher Gulch 15 miles away.

At a transportation and communications service centre the public would be able to make reservations. They could purchase passage tickets for any mode of transportation. They could send or receive a written message, which in most parts of rural Canada they can no longer do. They could enquire and obtain information primarily about rates and conditions of carriage. These are a few of the many facets of services that could be provided with a real public service rail transportation system in Canada.

• (1630)

Mr. Gleave: Which we had at one time.

Mr. Benjamin: I agree we did have such services at one time. This situation has only developed since World War II when the private enterprise theory in particular was put into operation by our railway system.

Another thing this transportation communication system would do would be to serve all inter-line traffic. If both railways went through the same town, one facility would serve both railways, and the local trucking companies and trucking companies from neighbouring cities. All modes of transportation would use that transportation and communication service centre, including telephone, telex and teletype. I believe this would make sense, particularly in a country like Canada which is 4,500 miles wide and only has a population of 22 million. It is more necessary for a country like ours than a country which is densely populated.

No doubt much of what I propose is not new. I am sure it is not. It was presented in a formal way to the Canadian Transport Commission which did not even have the courtesy to inquire into or look at it. When questioning me, the fancy-pants Canadian Pacific lawyer asked me if I hated the CPR. Even if I did, I do not know what that would have to do with it. I replied that I did not hate the CPR, but I was thoroughly disgusted and fed up, not only with the CPR, but with the government and parliament of Canada for continuing to try to operate a railway system on the basis of profit first and service second, if at all.

There is something else that is necessary in a country like Canada which has millions of square miles and only 22 million people. A freight rate equalization system would do more for our economy than almost anything else we could do. A manufacturer of stoves in the Maritimes, with its head office in Quebec, closed down. This was a good make of stove. I bought one when I got married. In fact, I burned CPR coal in it. It is not only logical and in the national interest, but it should be a deliberate policy of the government and parliament, to provide that if it costs $25 to ship a stove from Halifax to Vancouver and only costs $5 to ship it from Halifax to Moncton or whatever part of Canada that stove is shipped, the rate should be $12.50. By operating the freight rates in that manner, we won't decrease revenue, but we will certainly decrease the disparity in the far regions in Canada, the east and west coasts as compared to central Canada. I submit that equalizing freight and passage rates is essential to the success of a good transportation system in all parts of Canada. It is cheaper to fly to Europe from Toronto or Montreal than from Toronto to Vancouver which is in our own country. The airlines operate for profit but not for Canadians.

In the whole area of research and development, the government and the taxpayers of Canada have expended hundreds of millions of dollars for the aid and comfort of private enterprise, whether it is in the defence industries or in terms of building terminals worth hundreds of millions of dollars for the benefit of private airlines. However, in areas of research and development for the railways, we have done nothing. A few private companies, as well as the Canadian National Railways, have been desperately trying to sink funds which they can ill-afford into research and development in order to modernize and update our train systems. For example, we have the Turbo. I hope the CNR succeeds with this. They will not be able to thank the government of Canada for very much help. We kill and injure tens of thousands of people on the highways every year, and pollute the air in our cities and on our highways, while rail lines sit idle.

CNR and Air Canada

Our grain is not being moved fast enough. I was fortunate to have a discussion last week with a senior officer of one of the largest grain handling companies in Canada. He told me that he hopes somewhere in the CNR financing bill the item for equipment, which I believe amounts to $42 million, will include some provision for hopper cars. He suggested, and I agree, that we now need 5,000 more hopper cars which are capable of carrying 3,000 to 4,000 bushels each. They are needed now. We are still loading old 40 and 50-ton boxcars out west. They are 30 to 40 years old. This is another real complaint.

I have talked to elevator agents in my constituency and in other parts of the prairie provinces. Do you know who is repairing their boxcars? It is not the railway companies. The amount of unfit cars being spotted for loading is a disgrace, yet men in CPR shops are being laid off. There are cars patched with boards and cardboard. Grain is leaking out of them. The farmers are stuck with this. There are thousands of bushels of lost grain due to leakage. This is not only incompetence, but ridiculous.

In building a case against a publicly owned rail transportation system, the hon. member for Témiscamingue found it convenient to refer to the Russian railway system. He talked about the poor service and the dirty cars. I do not doubt his word. I have never been on it. He conveniently forgot that that railway system was totally demolished by 1945 as a result of the war and has been completely rebuilt since that time. That is not such a bad record. He also conveniently forgot to talk about the railways in western Europe, such as those in England and France, which are all state-owned. The hon. member who spoke earlier this afternoon also referred to West Germany in connection with state-owned railways. The government-owned railways of France are providing fantastic service in the movement of goods and people. The turbotrain which travels from Paris to Caen averages 82 miles per hour. They are now working on developing an even faster system. If and when the tunnel under the English Channel is built, the train will travel from Paris to London in two and one-half hours.

The state-owned railways receive funds for research and development. It does not matter whether they make a profit as long as they provide good service. Travellers using the sleeping car service in France and other European countries know that, with the purchase of a special card, their berths cost less each time they travel up to 50 trips in one year. On the 50th trip they travel free. That is an example of the use of imagination with regard to selling rail passage tickets. There are special offers. The French railways offer a particular trip for two people at a cost of $112. The train leaves the Paris station at 5.55 p.m. The passengers are provided with sleeping compartments. The train arrives in Madrid the next morning at 8.48. This train travels at a high rate of speed and is always filled to capacity. This is not the type of short haul one expects in a small densely populated mid-European country. This trip is a long haul.

I notice that Your Honour is about to inform me that my time has expired. In conclusion, it is the opinion of the New Democratic Party and the CCF before it, that Canadian railways should be publicly owned. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company and all of its operations should be taken over by the people of Canada. I refer to the entire rail transportation system and the auxiliary systems, such as telecommunications, hotels, steamships and truck services. We could provide an integrated transportation system that would have the admiration of many countries of the world. We could set an example. If they should lose money, so what? I submit we can set up this kind of a transportation system which would be a credit to the people of Canada and would provide the type of service to which they are entitled.

• (1640)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, while we remember that railways in Canada were built to connect the various parts of this vast land and thus help to melt in steel this unity that had been conceived by the architects of confederation, and also to open new frontiers and extraordinary opportunities to the Canadian economy, it is normal and natural in my opinion for all members of the Canadian family to contribute to their expansion, improvement and maintenance.

It is true that transportation has made huge progress since the first spike was driven to fasten tracks in the late 19th century to bear the first transcontinental train in Canada. Indeed, it took about 10 days at that time to go from Halifax to Vancouver, whereas this distance can now be covered in less than six and a half hours on an Air Canada DC-8 or 747.

Even though air transport companies offer ever lower rates, it remains that this means of transportation may be too expensive for some people. Moreover, operation costs and the remoteness of airports adequate for the various needs of industry and the population throughout the country make it unrealistic in the present context to consider replacing a good and efficient railway system, both for passengers and for merchandise, and equipment, by an air transport system.

The consideration of this bill since Monday by this House gives me an opportunity to make a few remarks which I consider very important on railway transportation.

I decided to take part in this debate and to make the following remarks because the people of Canada and particularly those I represent are tired of the constant threats, whether by way of rumours or otherwise, of abandoning passenger services, reducing services, in my region and throughout the country, which are forever being dangled over our heads.

Long before my election to this House, Mr. Speaker, I had occasion, whether in such agencies as the Chamber of Commerce or as secretary of my municipality during ten years, to gight continually with the management of Canadian National to retain and improve services in my region although the railway was the only public transportation system available.

Progressively, by dint of perseverance, of representations and sometimes even of vociferation, some improvements I shall call major were brought about. Among others, since I came to the House, the best achievement and the most highly appreciated in the field of railways or common transportation was the implementation of direct passenger train service between Gaspé and Montreal in 1967.

Incidentally, I feel it is proper to ask the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) or his parliamentary secretary (Mr. Duquet) who is present, to inform the management of Canadian National that the schedule of the train operating between Montreal and Gaspé should remain the same in winter and summer instead of being adjusted to the needs of the Maritime provinces, which I certainly do not blame for this.

However, Mr. Speaker, any concession made by the CN authorities was inevitably followed by worrying decisions on their part, such as threatening to close down stations, reducing the number of key employees responsible for railway maintenance, transferring employees and services from the Gaspé Peninsula—and particularly from my riding—to New Brunswick, to the city of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé), and so on and so forth.

I would not like, Mr. Speaker, to create the impression that I am opposed to development and progress as materialized by certain steps proposed in the last few years, and which are about to be realized by the Canadian National for greater efficiency of the services it provides for the public. We have to make sure, however, that the objective pursued is not lost and upset because of overcentralization. Anything that can help improve passenger and freight service for Canadian taxpayers and for the people I represent will always get approval from the hon. member concerned—and I am sure that my colleagues would support this statement.

The authorities have to understand, however, that the break from traditions established for half a century or more cannot be effected without some pain and without a certain regret. Human beings cannot be knocked about—or at least they can no longer be knocked about the way they used to be in the past. In this connection, I want to give credit to the officials of the "Chaleurs" area for the co-operation which they have always given to me as well as to the representatives of the people in my area whenever major decisions concerning railway transportation in the Gaspé Peninsula were involved. We must admit that there have been isolated and sometimes unfortunate omissions, but on the whole our relations are excellent.

• (1650)

Briefing sessions and meetings were held periodically to explain to us the guidelines, the programs and the intentions of the company as well as the difficulties encountered.

Although it is not easy for my constituents to do so, I must recognize that the railway companies do face today greater financial difficulties than ever before because of a diminishing number of customers due to fierce competition by other means of transport which are more modern and faster.

Furthermore they are obliged to take those unpopular steps because of an act of Parliament forcing them to become efficient. Thus, in recent years both the CN and the CP have been concentrating their efforts on profit-earning freight traffic.

I know full well that the CN freight service is profitable along the Gaspé shore, and elsewhere. In the face of such facts, one would be inclined to ask: Why then should this service be cut down since it is profitable? To that the authorities reply that it would be unfair, for freight customers and, generally, for the population, to make up the deficits of the passenger service with the profits of the freight service. Freight costs would then have to be increased; this would finally be detrimental to the consumers whose already high cost of living would go up further.

To give an idea of what that deficit represents, I shall refer to a document put out by the Transport Commission, dated February 25, 1972 and entitled "Passenger service in the Maritimes". It seems that when the CN speak of the Maritimes, they include the Gaspé Peninsula. The study of the commission on cost prices mentions the possibility for the railroad of maintaining its operation. Deo gratias! That study establishes that the railroads lost $14,834,298 in 1970, through providing passenger service in the Maritimes and the Gaspé Peninsula. Those figures are rather impressive and no less eloquent.

The act of Parliament alluded to a while ago provides for operations at a loss—and this is one—by allowing federal Treasury subsidies of up to 80 per cent of the true losses. Some hon. members will recall the stormy sittings of the railway committee a few years ago, when the annual reports of the CN were studies and considerable losses were reported which Parliament was asked to make up. They will also recall the bitter remarks addressed to the officials. There are some who object to the granting of subsidies to make up 80 per cent of the losses incurred by the passenger service in the Maritimes and the Gaspé Peninsula.

I know less about the transportation problems in the Maritimes, but being aware of those in Gaspé, I say it is the duty of the state, toward our people who have no other adequate means of public transport, not only to make up the deficit, but indeed to maintain a service that is essential to our people, and even to improve it, by allowing the CN to modernize its cars, most of which are obsolete, and to maintain the services that those trains offer to travellers. Let us improve the reservation system by making enough cars available in order to be able to face any situation and to carry all passengers who wish to travel, especially during peak periods.

And I believe, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian National authorities know that at Christmas, New Year, Easter and other holidays, a large number of people from Gaspé visit their families in Montreal and other areas of Quebec. Furthermore, students spend their vacations in Gaspé and must return home afterwards. Each year, despite the many representations that have been made, there are never enough cars to carry those travellers. I believe there is at least a certain miscalculation and a lack of foresight which it is worthwhile to point out.

I know this is a difficult situation for the company which has to compete with an increasing number of vehicules, but thanks to sustained publicity on the part of the company's management, those who have never boarded a train, though they criticize at every opportunity, will end up using it because, in my opinion, it is the safest means of public transport and could become one of the speediest considering the advances of modern technology. It would be a mistake on the part of railway companies to drop passengers services. As for me, and I was pleased that the hon. member who spoke before me pointed it out, it is the means of transport of the future and the least expensive.

When one considers the enormous amounts the governments have and will have to invest in the future to maintain a road network which is obsolete before it is completed, besides the agricultural land spaces which are gradually phased out from our heritage and the many lives that are lost every year and even every day on public roads, compared with the cost of construction of a railway which requires relatively less replacement and maintenance, then governments and railway companies should urgently and seriously consider, not to drop railway passengers services, but rather to modernize them and make them speedier and more attractive. Tremendous amounts of money will thus be saved at all levels of government to the advantage of taxpayers who will be also able to travel safely on an almost pollution-free road.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the government and to my colleagues that it is about time that we take off the CN's back the notorious debt which this company has been compelled to assume when it acquired various railway companies. Thus, we will have helped dispel a nightmare that needlessly haunts the Canadian National, that eats up a great deal of its budget and too often, compels us, taxpayers and members of Parliament to be called upon to vote certain sums of money to make up the deficit. Were it not for this heavy load, we might some day see more encouraging results and, perhaps, some profits that would enable the railway companies to develop at home a better public transportation system.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, sitting here this afternoon and listening to the sometimes emotional rhetoric used in the discussion of transportation, I am inclined to think that the field is wide open. This bill legalizes the granting of money which is perhaps already spent by the CNR on property, branch lines, equipment, telecommunications, hotels and other investments. The debate has ranged across various problems in our country, and certainly transportation is of vital importance in a country as diverse as Canada.

I was inclined to look up the National Transportation Act which was passed by the House back in 1967. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) this afternoon condemn the CNR and its operations, and say that it has now become completely divorced from any responsibility to the elected representatives. I wonder what position he would have taken on that government legislation which was implemented back in 1967. I suppose that like all good trained seals he, too, would have found plenty of reasons to support it, as did many of them at that time.

I was also interested to hear the hon. member for Regina-Lake centre (Mr. Benjamin) speak about socialism. I always like to hear the socialists talk about socialism. I become a little worried when they tend to stray away from the subject, because then they become more dangerous political foes. However, I was pleased to hear him answer my question. When he spoke about taking over the CPR I asked him, what about the smelters? He said we should nationalize them also. I was pleased to have that answer put on the record because it shows how strong the waffle movement within that party is. Although quite often they profess to have no wafflers in the House of Commons—they are all straight NDP-ers, none of them really follow the Laxer doctrine—here we find one who is pretty close to being a full-blooded waffler. I always like to hear socialists speak about socialism because one knows what they are thinking, but when they get away from the subject, perhaps they become more dangerous.

Section 1 of the National Transportation Act reads:

> It is hereby declared that an economic, efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost is essential to protect the interests of the users of transportation and to maintain the economic wellbeing and growth of Canada, and that these objectives are most likely to be achieved when all modes of transport are able to compete under conditions ensuring that having due regard to national policy and to legal and constitutional requirements—

• (1700)

Many people have attempted from time to time to find out what the Liberal party's national policy is with respect to transportation. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) did not say anything about it in his speech in the Throne Speech debate. But looking over that paragraph, I well remember the fight that we had to add the word "adequate". There was a heated debate in the Transport Committee, but we finally got agreement on the words, "an economic, efficient, and adequate transportation system" is needed in Canada.

That is really what the debate is all about today. Is the present system adequate? We can all question whether it is efficient, and whether it is to be efficient in the interests of revenue or in the interests of the people? But is it adequate to serve Canada? Without a doubt the hon. member from Newfoundland who spoke this afternoon said it was not adequate in his province. He said they needed a wide gauge railway there. From my experience of travelling in Newfoundland, I certainly believe they need the track straightened out. There are 500 miles of track across the province. It winds around every little hill and every little swamp. If the shortest distance between two points is a straight line, then it is the furthest thing from a straight line. Therefore, it is difficult to serve the people of that province adequately. I agree with the hon. member that The "Bullet" could have been made an attractive tourist promotion. Certainly, tourism is one of Canada's biggest industries. It is disappointing that the Minister of Transport, who comes from Newfoundland, neglects that province so badly in transportation matters.

What is the situation in western Canada? A lot of members have visited Vancouver. In the latter part of February I, too, made a trip to Vancouver to find out why our grain was not moving as efficiently as it should have been. I can honestly say that I found the system inadequate. We were about a month behind in grain deliveries to Vancouver. There were about 25 ships waiting in the harbour, with only about 8 million to 10 million bushels of grain in the terminals. Another 20 million bushels were needed. I was told it was on the tracks on its way to Vancouver. One can pick up any newspaper and see these facts reported. Here is one. The Manitoba Co-operator of March 2 has an article headed, "Grain Loading Catastrophic at Vancouver."

There has been much talk to the effect that because of the Crowsnest Pass rates, railways don't want to move grain since they do not make any money moving it. Recently, Mr. Speaker, the CPR wanted to move coal to Roberts Bank from three points in British Columbia, for the Kaiser Coal Company. In order to stop the contract from going to an American line south of the border, the CPR had to set a rate which in effect is lower than the Crowsnest Pass rates. The rate set is $3.69 per ton. For moving grain, even from Alberta, the CPR and the CNR receive a higher return under the Crowsnest Pass rates.

The Crowsnest Pass rates cannot solely be blamed for the delay in moving grain. Some hon. members say that if the railways got more money they would look after the business better. Mr. Speaker, railways charge an awful lot of money for moving cattle from western Canada to eastern Canada. But last fall we heard all kinds of complaints about the manner in which the railways treated that trade. In some cases in my constituency boxcars, loaded with cattle, sat on the tracks for almost 24 hours before a train came along to pick them up. It was no wonder that when they reached eastern Canada it was found that as many as 20 to 30 calves had died in the cars. No other form of transport can move bulk traffic over great land distances. The railways know this. Grain has to sit on the prairies waiting for them to move it. In effect, they move everything else first, and finally move the grain.

The whole railroad complex has to be changed. The National Transportation Act did not inject any new spirit of service into the railroad business. Section 3 of that Act reads:

> —each mode of transport, so far as practicable, carries traffic to or grom any point in Canada under tolls and conditions that do not constitute
> (i) an unfair disadvantage in respect of any such traffic—
> (ii) an undue obstacle to the interchange of commodities between points in Canada or unreasonable discouragement to the development of primary or secondary industries or to export trade in or from any region of Canada or to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports:

The railroads have not lived up to that. I doubt very much whether the Canadian Transport Commission is trying to encourage the railroads to live up to it. When you appoint a board to look after the railroads it may immediately become the servant of the railroads. That is the danger in appointing boards and not making them responsible to the elected representatives of the people. The railroads have certainly not tried to provide an adequate transportation system. Through their freight rates, they have created undue obstacles to the interchange of commodities between points in Canada. They have discouraged the development of primary and secondary industry.

I wish the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries) were present, Mr. Speaker. He made a big speech in Calgary on this very subject. He is never in this House, but he seems to attract some press from time to time. I do not know whether he practices what was commonly referred to as the Horner theory in getting good press coverage, but I think his voice in this debate could assist tremendously in encouraging the development of an adequate transportation system.

We see all kinds of money spent on pretty frivolous subject matters and inquiries. Yesterday's whole debate dealt with that. Why can't the government invest a little money in a Canadian boxcar construction industry? As the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) said, we are still using boxcars that are 50 years old.

But, Mr. Speaker, as soon as the potash industry became viable in Saskatchewan, the railways acquired new potash cars. As soon as the Kaiser Company came up from the United States and said it would develop coal in British Columbia and ship it to Japan, the CPR had a whole fleet of new cars built to haul that coal to the coast. For some reason or other we cannot build, buy or even steal a boxcar to haul grain. Surely, the government could arrange for the construction of more hopper cars for this purpose.

The port of Vancouver handles less than 600 boxcars of grain per day. It should handle 700 and it is six months behind now. The target is 800 but this has not been attained. The reason is obvious—the snowslides in the mountains. But the mountains have been there since the beginning of the North American continent and pretty nearly every winter there is snow in the mountains. Why can you not build more tunnels through them so that trains can be diverted?

There is provision in this bill for $125 million for the construction of roadbed and $19 million for branch lines. I would suggest that there should be a branch line west of Kamloops, from Ashcroft to Lillooet. In the event of a snow slide, this would allow for a diversion between Kamloops and Boston Bar. Cars could be sent across to the PG&E railroad and on to the port of Vancouver. On the map this is a distance of 30 or 40 miles, but even if they had to bend around a mountain or two it would only mean the construction of about 50 miles of railroad. Perhaps it would only be used in times of crisis, but it would be another way of overcoming the hazards of winter and the summer rock slides. During this past fall and summer there were some very bad rock slides in the Boston Bar area. My investigations convinced me that no attempt was made to maintain the telegraph signal line in that area. If a rock slide occurs the line is broken and a red light flashes on. The engineer of the approaching train then has enough time to stop the train. This telegraph line and signal system has not been maintained and one wonders why. Many accidents are reported and I do not think this is the fault of the workmen.

The trackage of the CNR used to be divided into sections and a sectionman was responsible for a certain area. In the last five or six years, each section has been doubled or tripled in length and the same man may now have three or four times as much trackage to look after. This could be because of greater efficiency or perhaps the dollar bill, but it does not contribute to an adequate transportation system.

The Vancouver harbour handles about 37 per cent of the tonnage moving in and out of Canada and over 50 per cent of the grain. Most of the tonnage of grain and other commodities used to be moved through the south side of Burrard Inlet. The trackage is all there, but the city of Vancouver built right up to it and so caused congestion. A good port has to be adequately protected from the winds and the ocean, and it must have depth, but it must also have an approach from the land side. The south side of the port of Vancouver is certainly congested. The north side is a little better but there is only one track there. Vancouver harbour and Burrard Inlet have been there since the beginning of Canada, but there is still only one track. There has been talk of building a causeway across Indian Arm and a second railroad to run into the north shore of Burrard Inlet. This is where the Saskatchewan pool elevator is situated. It can handle over 65 cars and has trackage for that number as it is the most modern elevator.

The unit train concept has recently been developed. Such a trainload of grain was picked up at Moose Jaw, moved to the north shore of Burrard Inlet and unloaded on the continual loading system at the Neptune terminal. The Vancouver wharf people want to get into the business of handling grain, but they need more trackage to serve the north shore of the Burrard Inlet. This could be achieved by the use of imagination and the expenditure of a little money; it would help the economy of this country. We are a trading nation and we must facilitate the movement of goods in and out of our harbours. The port of Vancouver is one of the 15 largest in the world. We are not proud of it and treat it like some old discarded woman, but we should be proud of it. We should spend the money to put enough trackage there to keep our commodities moving in and out. We certainly have not made any real move toward building an adequate transportation system.

I should like to refer now to section 23 of the National Transportation Act which deals with the question of captive shippers, as well as the definition of a carrier in the movement of goods in the public interest. It states that railroads must set rates for the movement of goods and the servicing of the country in the public interest. There have been three court cases because of this section but no decisions have been handed down yet. The act provides that if one is a captive shipper he can appeal to the transportation commission to have his rates set. However, no one has yet been able to declare himself a captive shipper under the act. Since the act is so poorly worded it is no wonder it is difficult to understand section 3(d)(ii) which reads:

—tolls and conditions that do not constitute—

(ii) an undue obstacle to the interchange of commodities—

The section goes on to provide that tolls must not be unreasonable and not discourage the development of primary or secondary industry. Certainly, freight rates on manufactured goods have discouraged the development of primary and secondary industries. To use carrots as an example, the rate on a boxcar of carrots moving from Toronto to Alberta is less than half the rate on a boxcar of carrots moving from Alberta to Toronto. That is the same product moving over the same trackage in the opposite direction. Why should the rate be double on products moving from western Canada to eastern Canada? A rate such as that automatically hinders the development of primary and secondary industry in western Canada.

There is the old argument that the rates were set in 1921 when the demarkation line was the boundary between Saskatchewan and Manitoba. That was used as a guide in the setting of freight rates back in 1921, the theory being that it was cheaper to move goods to Vancouver by water so the rates were set accordingly. Certainly, under the present system, it is cheaper to move goods from eastern Canada to Vancouver than to Calgary. This hardly makes sense. It is cheaper to move goods to Calgary than to Medicine Hat from eastern Canada, and that hardly makes sense, because Medicine Hat is that much closer to eastern Canada and Calgary is closer to eastern Canada than Vancouver is; it is something like 800 miles closer.

• (1720)

Mr. Benjamin: That is free enterprise for you.

Mr. Horner: My learned socialist colleague suggests that is free enterprise. I suggest, no, that this situation has arisen from the decisions of an inadequate regulatory body and from the provisions of a poor piece of legislation, because one cannot prove that one is a captive shipper.

I can remember when the present incumbent of the Chair was a member of the transport committee, and I can remember the heated debates that took place at one time. Those debates made the debate in the previous session on Bill C-176 look like a pale shadow of the real thing. Many hon. members complained about the time we took to discuss Bill C-176 involving agriculture. I say that that debate did not take overly long, not when you remember that the debate on Bill C-237 of the previous parliament went on from January 9 to January 31, following the earlier debate on that bill which lasted from about November until Christmas of the previous year. Mr. Pickersgill said that the bill had to be passed because he had made some sort of commitment to the CPR.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we kept on talking and advocating changes. We made changes. We told the government of the day that the captive shipper clause was unsatisfactory and that paying the railways a subsidy equal to 80 per cent of their losses on certain routes would lead to the elimination of passenger service. All the railways need to do is prove they are losing money on passenger service and a subsidy will be provided. The more money they lose the greater will be the subsidy provided by the government. That is a poor formula, that is not private enterprise. The government set up a poor regulatory body and passed poor legislation. The railways deliberately downgraded their passenger services and increased their losses so that they could go before the board and ask for huge subsidies.

As I say, the greater was the loss, the greater was the subsidy that the railways could claim. This provision encouraged the railways not to provide the people with efficient or adequate transport facilities. There must be changes. I have talked to friends in the Canadian Transport Commission—

Mr. Benjamin: Friends!

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Horner: Yes, I have one or two. They tell me the government would like to bring back that transport act and make some changes. I urge the government to bring the act back as quickly as possible. Let it introduce a bill in the present session, before the next election, because our transport system needs help. We, on this side of the House, will do our best to change that law, so that the railways will be encouraged to provide adequate service and fair freight rates across Canada, not freight rates that discourage the development of primary and secondary industries in certain areas.

I will close on that note. I urge the government to bring that piece of legislation back and, on my side, we will do our best to remedy the errors made in 1967 when we originally passed that legislation. I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Bruce. He condemned the operation of the Transport Act, because the railways now need not answer to the government or, in essence, to parliament. We should alter the law and, in principle, make them answer to this place. The Minister of Transport who is responsible for our transport system cannot forever attempt to hide behind the Canadian Transport Commission and say, "I cannot do anything about freight rates; you will have to talk to the Transport Commission." There are three test cases now before the Transport Commission, and no decision has been handed down. I again urge the government to bring back that legislation. We, on this side, will put our heads together and suggest changes which will benefit all Canada.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate. It is always nice to follow my hon. friend, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). It is very difficult to do so, also. This routine bill which is to authorize for the government owned Canadian National Railways capital expenditures totalling $219,800,000 for 1971 and another $83 million on July 1, 1972, and which is also to authorize government loans to Air Canada in the period from January 1, 1971 to June 30, 1972 for the purpose of helping that organization pay its debts, really gives us the opportunity to say to the people of Canada, and particularly to the people of my constituency, that the CNR has one thing only in mind: the public be damned. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the railway employees have absolutely no control over their own pension plan; that the three union officers on the CNR pension board are not employees of the CNR, are not covered by the employees' pension plan and therefore cannot be accepted as representing the interest of all the employees of the CNR; that the four officers of the company on the CNR pension board are appointed by the board of directors of the CNR and do not represent the interest of the employees? Let me also say that Alberta has no representation on the Canadian National Railways board of directors. How shameful that is.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the CNR pension board is appointed by the CNR board of directors from among the four officers of the company on the CNR pension board and does not represent the interest of the employees; that even this non-employee pension plan representative has no power over the decisions of the employee pension plan; that this pension board, completely controlled, as it is by the CNR can only make recommendations and cannot, on its own, make any decisions of any consequence; that all recommendations or decisions of the pension board must be submitted to the CNR board of directors for ratification before such recommendations or decisions become effective; that the CNR, under the 1959 employees' pension plan, does not match the employees' contributions month by month; that, because of their system of not immediately matching the employees' contribution, they have accumulated an unfunded liability to the employees' pension fund of $671 million. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that through a quirk—a clever or cunning evasion, a twisting of meaning—in the Pension Benefits Standards Act, the CNR was able to reduce its unfunded liability to $300 million, which represents a loss of $371 million to the employees' pension fund?

I wanted to put some of these matters on record, Mr. Speaker, because some of these things have been raised in many meetings in my area. People are concerned about pension plans. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has mentioned difficulties connected with pension plans. These people, under the direction of Mr. Wilf Macdonald and Mr. Jack Pickett, have sought diligently to bring to the attention of the CNR the many problems which have arisen in our area. I believe there has been a neglect on the part of the CNR to pay any attention to those meetings.

I should like to read into the record this afternoon a statement by the Canadian Railway Labour Association with regard to the elimination of some of the services which is presently taking place in Alberta and across Canada. The statement reads:

Many of the basic assumptions upon which the National Transportation Act is founded date back to the MacPherson Royal Commission in the 1950s. We are very strongly of the view that many of the conclusions of the studies done for that Royal commission are not consistent with contemporary views. The act contains a built-in bias toward using economic viability as the over-riding criterion for determining railway passenger transportation needs. We suggest that the assumptions upon which the act was based are not a sufficient basis for contemporary policy and that these assumptions are in contradiction with many of the government's other policies.

The assumptions of the act are insufficient today because the Canadian people and their government have increasingly realized that while economic criteria are important, perhaps the most important criteria, they should not be the over-riding consideration in all cases. This is especially true when one considers the long-term results of any given action. We have realized that while the gross national product may be a reasonably satisfactory aggregate measure of the Canadian people's wellbeing, it is a poor measure of the quality of life.

Increasingly also, economics and the other social sciences have placed renewed emphasis upon a vastly broadened concept of cost, realizing that public costs and benefits can, and frequently do, outweigh private costs and benefits. To consider only costs and benefits in a narrow sense is to accept a short-term and unrealistic framework for policy. It is not sufficient for the Canadian Transport Commission to look at the costs and revenues as submitted by the railways for such a service and merely weigh those arguments against the views of the public at a hearing.

This government has increasingly demonstrated its willingness to view problems on a long-term basis and to do so within the framework of a broadened concept of costs and benefits, especially with respect to environmental questions. But its willingness to be farsighted on some environmental issues contrasts sharply with the underlying assumptions of the National Transportation Act, which is the basic element in Canada's transportation policy.

There are numerous ways in which the National Transportation Act conflicts with current policy. We wish to mention only two. With the elimination of rail passenger service the public's ability to choose among different modes of transportation is being restricted. This would not be such a serious situation if the various methods of transportation were perfect substitutes. They are not. They are in many ways complementary but not substitutive. Therefore the mobility of the public is being lessened and the cost of maintaining the same amount of mobility is being increased.

Secondly, the elimination of rail passenger service is promoting the increased use of automobiles at the same time as the public and various levels of government are becoming concerned about the increasing costs of pollution, congestion, etc. The current policy is encouraging the elimination of rail passenger service despite the knowledge that such service is the most acceptable means of moving large numbers of people on an urban, interurban and national basis. We submit that the aims of the present policy of the National Transportation Act are outdated, inadequate, and inappropriate and should therefore be immediately revised.

We continue to be greatly distressed by the prevailing inequity as regards the assistance provided to one mode of transportation as opposed to another. This situation can only serve to exacerbate the problems discussed above and at great length in our previous submissions. We note that our view that the inequity of the assistance works to the disadvantage of the railway passenger systems has been supported by others, including the Canadian Transport Commission in its order of January 29, 1971, concerning the discontinuance of the 'Canadian'.

Such an inequitable policy is tragic. It leads to policies based on the short-run rather than the long-run and is, in our view, in conflict with Part I of the National Transportation Act.

Anyway, there it is. These are my feelings, too. There is another letter here which I should like to read into the record. These are from my colleagues and many of my friends who are railway men in my constituency. I have a lot of respect for them because I used to be on an extra gang banging away with a 12-pound hammer. They were tough days. This letter comes from John L. Pickett, President of the Edmonton Council of Railroad Unions:

Dear Sir:

During the last few months, much has been said and written about moving grain to the west coast for export by rail. But how about the rank and file railroad men, the people who actually do the work and keep our railroads running? Railroading in western Canada during a winter such as we are experiencing is not easy. Temperatures dropping to as low as 40 below. Traincrews switching, spotting and picking up cars, mostly at night; trainmen and conductors often tramping through four feet of snow, putting in 12 or 14 hour shifts to get over the road, often on a thermos of coffee and a few cold sandwiches; the men in the yards, the switchcrews, making up trains, blocking grain, the carmen, checking and fixing bad order cars, walking freight trains, fixing air leaks so that we get the proper brake tests. The signal maintainers who get called out in the middle of the night, to go and fix some break in the signal system. The sectionmen, who are out there in all weathers, doing the 101 things they have to do, to keep the railroad running and, of course, the countless other railroad workers who contribute their share. No, railroading in the winter months in western Canada is no picnic.

We know we need more locomotives, cabooses, cars, radios, better storage facilities at the west coast, bigger storage yards so that when the weather is good we can move cars faster and cheaper. Why can we not have 4,000 or 5,000 cars of grain stored at the west coast in early December so that if we have snow slides or derailments in the winter, the grain is there where we need it?

Give us the tools and the facilities and the Canadian railroad men will move all the bulk commodities we need for export to make this great country of ours thrive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: One does not have to say much after reading a letter like that. I say to the Canadian National Railways: Have some consideration; look after your pensioners. You might also take some of the money you have stored away and use it to build homes at a cheap interest rate for the people who work for you, or else lend it out to them at 5½ per cent or 6 per cent. This would be a wonderful idea on your part. Other than that, I have nothing further to say at this time.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when this subject had been debated last year, two questions were referred to the Standing Committee on Transportation and Communications. Each was of great importance. Only one of them was solved, or partly solved, by the committee. The conclusion reached was not, of course, a satisfactory one, but it was a step in the right direction. It showed that members of parliament can, if they wish, bring about improvements in the areas we are considering. The benefits of the change which occurred as the result of that last hearing were considerable in terms of pensions to retired employees of the CN—something like a 42 per cent increase for the old timers. This was a step in the right direction. It was parliament at its best. We held a gun to the head of the government of the day, and they reacted, as is usual, with half a loaf. I say that in this case half a loaf was much better than no loaf at all. If it had not been for members of parliament, nothing of any use would have been done.

Having had the government make the concession of paying a retroactive cost of living payment over 21 years, this kind of escalator, in the retroactive sense, was applied to lesser degree by the CNR and paid by a number of other government and private agencies who also saw both the advantage and certainly the justice of such a payment to pensioners who had provided them in the early days with the wherewithal to make their enterprise a success.

Another factor, which in a sense is more important to the general public and to the orderly operation of any railroad—I presume that Air Canada will find itself in a similar position unless some changes are made—is the long-term debt of the Canadian National Railway. It has been said jocularly, and sometimes even seriously, that the Canadian National Railway was nationalized. That is only partly true. We nationalized it when we bought the assets of a number of railroads of that day. However, we also took on the liabilities of those railroads in the form of long term perpetual bonds and other debts, and these have been carried on the books for many years.

You will probably gather, Mr. Speaker, from my remarks that I am not a financier, but my contention is that if you buy something you should hope eventually to be able to pay for it. Even farmers, who often borrow more money than they should to carry on their farming operations, are of the opinion that eventually not only will they be able to pay off the interest but will pay something off principal as well. Since they have been able to add to their operations they will probably make some profit from their labours. If not, there is no point in embarking upon such an exercise.

[Mr. Paproski.]

Faced with this situation, perhaps we should not have bought Grand Trunk or Northern whatever it was. Though some of my colleagues may have been here at the time, I cannot remember the names of some of the railways which were amalgamated into Canadian National. Perhaps we should have decided to let those railroads go bankrupt and then take them over. But we did not do that. Perhaps we were generous to the shareholders of some of the railroads of the day. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in the early days of railroading in Canada you did not play the stockmarket in Toronto or Montreal but played the bond game, in which you bought up railroads. We had on paper more railroads and lineage laid out than probably any other country in the world.

Ottawa was one of the main centres of activity in this regard. There were eight or ten railways going from Ottawa to James Bay at that time. Why, I do not know, but people like O'Brien were able to sell stocks in railways and he made a considerable profit doing so without ever considering just what was at James Bay, even if he had been able to build the railway there. Buying railroad stocks was quite a game in those days. When these companies were taken over by Canadian National, we also assumed that the liabilities were too, and as a result Canadian National has been saddled for many years with a huge and elaborate debt.

The last time this matter was before the House it was generally agreed by hon. members that this question should be referred to the committee. The committee looked at the matter but was unable to come to a conclusion, I hope because of lack of time. The committee settled the other important question of pensions but left the question of debt.

The financial statement of the railroad appears in the Auditor General's report to parliament for the year ending December 31, 1970. It appears from the report that interest on the debt in 1961 had raised the total debt to $62.5 million, but by 1970 it had grown to $75.5 million. So it appears we are not paying anything off principal; we are only paying off the interest. In 1970 the total deficit of Canadian National was $29.7 million, though in fact the company made a profit of $40 million odd—if I use the wrong arithmetic my colleagues will correct me. If we had to buy a new aircraft for the armed services or a supply of rifles, the cost would be put into the national debt if we did not have the money to pay for the equipment. Then when we did have some money available, as has happened once or twice in my experience, the government would be able to pay part of this debt and reduce it. But debts increase rather than decrease most of the time.

In this case the debt becomes not that of the railway but of individual Canadians who own the railway. This is why we should retire the debt. Let us pay off those people who held the original bonds or their successors, and put the deficit into the consolidated debt.

Mr. O'Connell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Surely.

Mr. O'Connell: Would he be able to say whether the debt of the CNR has actually increased in principal amount or decreased, and trace the relationship between the preferred shares, which are increasing, and the debt? I have not looked at the report, but the debt ought to be decreasing. The technique of getting out of debt is to issue preferred shares on which you do not need to pay dividends. It is not like interest.

Mr. Peters: I am quite happy to admit to the minister that he has lost me. I am certainly not that competent in the subject of finance. All I know is that the committee should take a look at all these factors and should, in my opinion, conclude that the debt is not the debt of the CNR. There is also the fact that we have accumulated some debt by issuing stock for purchases the railway has made in its own right. We probably added that on as well, and then went into the bond field from which we raised money as well. I suggest that on the debt, which has been accumulating for a number of years, we have been paying a great deal of interest. We have long lost whatever advantage we had from borrowing the money.

• (1750)

The money we originally spent to buy all the railways that went into making up Canadian National was put into the national debt. The railway can be operated in a much more orderly way. If Canadians think they need this railway, they should be willing to pay for it, whether by adding to our national debt or in some other way such as stock promotion. We should eliminate the huge interest payment from the financial structure of Canadian National Railways because it distorts our whole railway tariff structure. Everytime we consider an application by Canadian National, we look at the amount of their expenditures, the payments they have to make and the money which parliament has to raise to pay these operating expenses. By using that kind of structure, Canadian National is able to go before the Canadian Transport Commission and justify almost anything. Canadian National does the justifying and Canadian Pacific, which does not have that kind of structure, gets the gravy because of the necessity of maintaining uniformity of the tariff structure between Canadian Pacific and Canadian National.

I agree with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing) who has shown a great deal of interest in the last few years in the high Arctic. He has shown great interest in buying into the high Arctic and getting the Canadian taxpayer involved. In a previous portfolio, he was able to establish Panarctic of which the Canadian public owns 45 per cent of the stock. Oil is not the only resource in the Arctic. There are many kinds of minerals. When he appeared before the transport committee the other day, the minister stated that in his opinion there was more wealth in minerals north of the 69th parallel than in all the rest of Canada. He may well be right.

If this is so, we will have to consider in the very near future what type of transportation facility we are going to put into the high Arctic. I suggest we will be considering a number of methods. Probably the most economical will be the type of facility that will bring in all the necessary materials and take out all the ore and finished products developed in that area of the Arctic. In order to do this, we will have to raise a lot of money. It will probably make the amount given to Canadian Pacific, probably the largest give-away of the Canadian parliament, look small. I hope this money is given to Canadian National to put a line into the high Arctic to develop that area for Canadians in an orderly way, with proper regard for the ecology of the area, and the ability to service the needs of the population in that area.

Pipelines will bring out materials, but they will not take in the goods necessary for production. It is my guess that we will have to consider rail transportation. Large sums of money will be required to build a line. I hope some cabinet ministers will avail themselves of the opportunity to appear before the committee and indicate how we can get out of this financial problem, a problem that has been with us for 50 years.

Canadian National says that this problem cannot be solved. I talked to some of the senior officials. They said that we do not have the guts or the know-how to solve this problem. I think that is wrong. We can if we so decide. A lot of this is just a bookkeeping proposition, transferring from one column to another. We will have to pay interest on the debt, but it will be the Canadian public rather than the railways that will be paying it. We will have losses in rail transportation.

We should be looking at the new systems of transportation. Canadian National should be given the credit it deserves. It is the only railway company in North America that has worked on developing new trains for passenger and freight service. I am sure it is safe to say that Canadian National is many years ahead of any other railway on the North American continent.

I agree that the Canadian National Rapido did not work. However, there are good reasons for this. One is our inability to develop a full-fledged railway component to handle our present trains and at the same time withstand the conditions with which we are faced. Trains cannot be brought from England because our conditions are different. Although the Rapido froze up and had other problems, it was a step in the right direction. In fact, it has been the only step.

Are we being sensible in spending millions of dollars building airports 15 or 20 miles away from cities such as Toronto and Montreal? In my opinion, that is throwing money away as if it were going out of fashion. As an hon. member stated the other day, we should be building a major jumbo trans-Atlantic international airport north of Kingston with a ground transportation system that will get people to Toronto faster than the time it now takes to travel by bus from Malton Airport. I am sure the same situation will apply to Montreal. A major hotel in Montreal still maintains a facility that connects directly to the trains. People staying at that hotel will be able to get on a Rapido train and travel to an airport that will eventually be built in the Kingston area in 30 or 40 minutes. They will travel in ideal surroundings and in complete comfort with all the facilities that can be provided in a modern transportation system.

At the present time people spend 15 or 20 minutes on an airplane, 15 to 20 minutes getting out of the airport, 15 minutes waiting for bus transportation downtown and an hour to one and a half hours to get to the centre of the city. Because of the large land mass in this country, there is a need for a rapid transportation system. We have the technical know-how and the interest to develop it. In order to accomplish this, we may have to get rid of Canadian Pacific. If that is necessary, I am all for it.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 9, 1972

The House met at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE SUGGESTED BY MR. SPEAKER FOR DEALING WITH NOTICES OF MOTIONS OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think hon. members might be interested to know that during the last few hours I have received five separate notices under Standing Order 17 on the part of hon. members who propose to move a motion of privilege under the terms of this Standing Order. Essentially, these five motions relate to the same matter. Because this is so unusual I am not sure how the matter should be handled. My thought is that hon. members who have given notice of these motions might be allowed one after the other to indicate what their arguments and what their motions would be, someone would then reply on behalf of the government, and the matter might be taken under advisement. These hon. members, as is required by the Standing Order, have had the courtesy to file notices, but to this point there is no information on the part of the House concerning what the motions would be and what arguments would be advanced in support of such motions.

With the consent of the House, I will take these motions in chronological order as they were received, and the one who has been most diligent in this respect is the hon. member for Peace River.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—DELAY IN TABLING AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I hope that all your other decisions from now on are as good as that one. I did serve notice pursuant to Standing Order 17 with regard to this matter because I feel that what is involved is in fact a question of privilege. I would go on to say that in addition to a question of privilege being involved with regard to the question contained within the four corners of the notice I sent to Your Honour, namely, the extent to which the Auditor General of Canada, an officer of parliament and servant of this House, is being inhibited in the opportunities which he should have to carry out his duties, there is the question of the inherent right of this House, as indeed of the other place, to call before it as a witness any person it sees fit to subject to examination and discussion. I shall deal with both these questions as I proceed. I have, of course, had to give notice to Your Honour pursuant to Standing Order 17 in order to obtain the opportunity to make this motion, and I will be making a motion on the question of privilege, but I want to make it abundantly clear that there is in addition to the question of privilege, and related to it, the very important issue of the right of this House and of parliament as the highest court in this land to call before it any witness, not necessarily a person who may have offended against the privileges of the House but any witness, and conduct an examination according to the traditions and practices of the House, and to the extent to which these may be changed by order or by the modern practice we have now developed.

• (1410)

Certainly, on the question of privilege, it seems to me that any interference with any of the officers of this House in such a way—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Peace River has now been speaking for some minutes, yet as far as I am aware he has not stated the matter of privilege he is raising. I am asking him to state the matter of privilege because he has risen on a question of privilege. He has now had the floor for a sufficiently long period to have stated on what the question of privilege is that he is raising. I am asking him to state the question because I should like to argue the point whether the matter he wishes to raise, which is still unknown to the House, has been raised at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Baldwin: I understand the position of the President of the Privy Council. I was coming to that. But I always feel that in dealing with hon. gentlemen on the other side we should take longer in explaining matters than if we were dealing with ordinary people.

On the question of privilege, I now come to the first branch of my argument. Any officer of this House—I would include the Clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Auditor General whom I place squarely in that category—must be allowed to carry out his duties in such a way as not to limit in any manner the opportunity for hon. members of this chamber to fulfil their responsibilities. I simply indicate, by way of illustration, that if in the course of taking a vote the Clerk was interfered with so that the count could not be made, I would consider this to be a breach of privilege such as interfered with the opportunity of hon. members to carry out their duties. I submit, therefore, that if I can show Your Honour that there has been this kind of interference, that an officer of this House has been denied the opportunity so to fulfil his duties as to prevent hon. members on both sides of the House fulfilling the responsibilities they must exercise on behalf of their constituents and the people of Canada generally, then that is a breach of privilege.

I am dealing with the question of the Auditor General and the comments which were made yesterday, the statement by the Prime Minister that the Auditor General was breaking the law and the position in which this leaves members of the House.

Mr. MacEachen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman is raising as a matter of privilege comments made yesterday in the House by any hon. member, then I suggest he is not permitted to raise a question of privilege at this point because Standing Order 17 provides that whenever any matter of privilege arises it shall be taken into consideration immediately. It is a fact that the hon. member for York South did raise a question of privilege on the comments made by the right hon. Prime Minister yesterday and was heard by the Chair.

If the hon. member is raising a new matter of privilege, then I will cease my argument, but if he is raising a matter of privilege based on the comments made yesterday, then under the terms of the Standing Order he was obligated to take the matter into consideration, because it is clear from Standing Order 17(2) that notice is to be given by an hon. member proposing to raise a matter of privilege other than one arising out of proceedings in the chamber. I am merely saying, as he has referred to statements made by the Prime Minister yesterday, that in my humble submission he is not entitled under the terms of the Standing Order to found a question of privilege on those comments.

Mr. Speaker: I have some difficulty now in ruling on the point raised by the hon. member because actually I have not heard to the end of the question of privilege which the hon. member for Peace River wishes to raise. I think it might be simpler if we allowed the hon. member for Peace River to complete his presentation. It seems to me that the point now made by the President of the Privy Council might be made afterwards, along with other objections which he might have to the points made by the hon. member for Peace River. I would hope that we might proceed in an orderly fashion and as expeditiously as possible with the presentation of the five questions of privilege of which I have received notice. All hon. members who have such points might want to take into consideration the fact that there are all these presentations to be made which will have to be taken into account by the Chair and about which the President of the Privy Council may have some comments to make. I invite the hon. member for Peace River to pursue his presentation at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, let me go ahead from where I was interrupted. Under the Financial Administration Act—I think this will answer the President of the Privy Council—the office of the Auditor General is created. It is a statutory office with a statutory function. I will not take the time of the House to read in detail the duties and responsibilities of the Auditor General, but under section 61 he is required to report annually to the House of Commons the results of his examination of the public accounts. Then the section continues:

2. The report of the Auditor General shall be laid before the House of Commons by the Minister on or before 31st day of December, or, if Parliament is then not in session, within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session—

I would also call Your Honour's attention and that of the House to the fact that under section 56 of this act, subsection 4, there is a provision with respect to the Auditor General which reads:

Such officers and employees as are necessary to enable the Auditor General to perform his duties shall be appointed in accordance with the Public Service Employment Act.

• (1420)

The point of my reference to the discussion yesterday was that the Auditor General had not performed his statutory duty, and in relation to that statement the Prime Minister said yesterday that the Auditor General was an officer of the House, was in breach of the law, and that it was incumbent upon some person in the House to do something about it.

There is no question in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that if the Auditor General is prohibited, if he is prevented from carrying out his duty as an officer of this House to place before parliament the results of his examination of the public accounts of Canada and as a result the opportunities for hon. members to discharge their responsibilities as members representing the people of their constituencies in particular and the people of Canada in general are limited, this constitutes, per se, a breach of the privileges of the House. If it should appear, during the course of a debate which may or may not take place following the motion that I intend to place before Your Honour, that this has come about because of the fault of the government then, Mr. Speaker, it will be my view, and the people of this country are entitled to take the view, that the government has been guilty of such contributory negligence as to prevent the Auditor General from carrying out his duties and to limit the opportunities for members of this House to do their job. I think that is the simple issue and is a question of privilege standing by itself. There is no question about it.

There may be some question as to the procedure that needs to be followed. There may be those who would say that this question should be considered by a committee. Let me make it abundantly clear, Sir, that this is an unique and unusual situation. We have here an officer of parliament who by act of parliament, by statute, is compelled to carry out certain responsibilities and to do certain very essential things, particularly today when we come to examine the expenditures of this government, or of any government for that matter, and its involvement so far as the taxpayers of Canada are concerned. He is a very important functionary.

I make it abundantly clear that I am not asking Your Honour to come to a decision on whether or not the Auditor General should be called before the bar of the House. I am not asking Your Honour to decide that. That, I suggest, is a matter for the House alone, but of course Your Honour has the responsibility of deciding whether the motion should be put before the House. As a matter of fact, it might well be that the argument could stop right now if the government has the intestinal fortitude to accept the fact that there is this issue and accept this motion and let the House decide. However, I doubt that it will do that, even though I make the suggestion that this might stop further argument on the issue.

Mr. MacEachen: Let us hear the motion.

Mr. Baldwin: The President of the Privy Council will hear the motion in due time. Mr. Speaker, what I am in fact putting before the House, putting before Your Honour, is what is known as an interlocutory application as to whether or not Your Honour should put the question to the House on the motion which I shall read very shortly.

However, before I leave this branch of my case I suggest that when we find a situation where an officer of the House, of the importance of the Auditor General, is involved in an issue where it appears that he is deprived of carrying out his exceedingly important statutory duties, then surely, Sir, there should be an examination on that issue, and the only place that examination should properly take place is at the bar of this House. There are committees—yes. The very fact that the House has the right to call witnesses before it is indicative of the fact that it also has the power to give that right to a committee.

But the inherent power—and this is the second branch of my case—is that there is, there always has been, and I pray God there always will be, an inherent right in this House, and in the other place for that matter, when there is a feeling that there has been an injustice, some challenge to the authority of the House, and particularly, Sir, when it involves an important officer of the House, for that officer to be called not before a committee but before the bar of the House. The Public Accounts Committee has been suggested. It is or will be charged with the responsibility of dealing with the report of the Auditor General covering the year ended March 31, 1970. There will be no opportunity, there will be no scope, no means by which this matter could be decided by that committee.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter which should come to the House itself for decision but I suggest, if some proposition is made that the proceedings and the means are difficult or complex, that this is for the House to decide. If it is difficult, because of the practice and traditions of the past, for us to deal with the situation where an officer of the House appears at the bar of the House, we are not without resources to apply a procedure which will be acceptable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me briefly deal with the second part of my case—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I certainly do not wish to interrupt the hon. member uselessly or needlessly but I would hope that the presentation could be as brief as possible, although I appreciate the importance of the matter. I trust that the hon. member will indicate as soon as possible the motion that he proposes to submit to the House.

Mr. Baldwin: I shall do that very shortly, Mr. Speaker. I want to make it plain, as I indicated earlier in my argument, that not only is there a question of privilege—all the yowling and screaming from the other side will not prevent me from making my presentation—

Mr. Ricard: The big mouth from St. Boniface (Mr. Guay).

Mr. Baldwin: —but there is also an inherent right of this House to call witnesses before it, not necessarily witnesses who are malefactors or have committed infractions against the privileges of this House but any witnesses. This is an inherent right of the House. This may be unusual but the facts are unusual and call for unusual treatment, especially when the Prime Minister saw fit yesterday—I think this is an issue which Your Honour cannot ignore—to refer to the Auditor General as a lawbreaker and to call upon this House to do something about it.

Our system provides or ought to provide for every person charged with some offence to appear and make his defence in the proper forum. I suggest to you, Sir, that every member of this House has the right in this day, with the continual encroachment of the executive, to have the opportunity to have the Auditor General appear at the bar of the House and make his explanation and indicate his position with regard to this very serious charge which has been laid and the effect it has on the rights of members of this House.

Before I read the motion I would once more call to Your Honour's attention the fact that in the final analysis this is a matter for the House to decide. I am not asking Your Honour to take upon yourself the responsibility of deciding whether the Auditor General should appear before the bar of this House. This is for the House. I would suggest, with the greatest respect, that Your Honour is limited to the question of whether a case has been made which would justify this procedure being adopted. Even if Your Honour does so with the full knowledge that it entails difficulties with regard to procedure, this is a matter for the House to consider and if the House, with full knowledge of what is involved, comes to this decision it is a right which the House should exercise.

I would therefore seek leave to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

> That the report of the Auditor General of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971 not having been laid before this House as set out in the Financial Administration Act, and the Prime Minister of Canada having stated in this House that the Auditor General has broken the law, this House orders that the Auditor General of Canada appear before the bar of this House at a time within seven days of this order to be fixed by Mr. Speaker, there to explain to this House why the said report has not been tabled and there to have the opportunity to make his statement in respect of the said allegation.

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier at the opening of the House, there are a number of motions dealing with the same set of circumstances. I think it might be somewhat difficult to make a ruling in each particular instance and my thought is that all hon. members who have given notice of motions should be given an opportunity to make a brief presentation. Perhaps they might take into account, in making those presentations, that some of the facts have now been laid before the House by the hon. member for Peace River. I am not suggesting that all the motions are the same; I am sure they are all different and that they all take a different approach to the situation mentioned and the circumstances of the case. However, they do, basically, refer to the same set of circumstances and I think it would be in order for the Chair to hear hon. members who have given notice, subject to a ruling being made in due course. I recognize the hon. member for York South.

MR. LEWIS—DELAY IN TABLING AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief. I hope Your Honour will be able to permit me to present the context for the motion which I would move if Your Honour thought there was a prima facie case of privilege. My question of privilege arises out of a complaint by the Auditor General who says that he is prevented from performing his duty, a duty which he is required to carry out on behalf of the members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of this chamber to supervise and, indeed, to control public expenditures. The Auditor General is appointed by statute to examine the public accounts and to prepare a report which would enable the members of this chamber to carry out their duties with respect to supervising and controlling public expenditures. The allegation by the Auditor General that he is being prevented from carrying out his duty therefore clearly means that there is interference with the rights of all members of the House and, indeed, an interference with the duty of this parliament. Therefore it is a matter, in my respectful submission, of privilege concerning all members of the House and the very working of this House of Commons collectively.

The matter effectively came to our attention yesterday and also through reports in the press dealing with statements made by the Auditor General.

Permit me, Sir, to start with the obvious. Aside from our legislative duties as a House of Commons, there is no duty that is more important for members of this House to perform than the duty of watching over public expenditures.

I remind you, Sir, that the early history of the parliamentary system which we follow was essentially a history of struggle between the House of Commons and the Crown as to the authority to impose taxes, to collect taxes and to have control over public expenditures. Some heads rolled as a result of that struggle, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps it is time for political heads to roll now. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the result of that struggle, which is historically of immense importance, was that the duty to supervise public expenditures and to control the levying and collection of taxes was placed not in the Crown, not in the executive, not even in the House of Lords or in the Senate, but in the hands of the elected representatives of the people of Canada who sit in the House of Commons. I am reminding the House of these elementary facts because I believe that what is now happening with respect to the Auditor General ought to be placed and understood in that context.

May I also point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House that the duties and functions of the Auditor General are not merely to carry out a simple bookkeeping audit. Section 58, subsection (b) of the Financial Administration Act, for instance, requires the Auditor General to examine public expenditures and to report on whether in his opinion all public money has been fully accounted for, "and the rules and procedures applied are sufficient to secure an effective check on the assessment, collection"—note these words—"and proper allocation of the revenue". Subsection (c) of that section requires the Auditor General to ascertain whether in his opinion "money has been expended for the purposes for which it was appropriated by Parliament, and the expenditures have been made as authorized."

Section 61 requires the Auditor General to report not merely on the accuracy of the bookkeeping, which is what the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the government would like him to do, but to report whether any appropriation was exceeded or was applied to a purpose or in a manner not authorized by parliament. Subsection (d) of that section says he must report whether an expenditure was not authorized or was not properly vouched or certified. He must say, under subsection (e), whether there has been a deficiency and so on. The final words of section 61 provide that the attention of parliament is to be drawn to any other case that the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons.

I think it is important that Your Honour—this is the reason I referred to these sections—should consider the duties laid on the Auditor General in the terms I have indicated briefly in order to underline the submission I am making, namely, that the Auditor General is required by statute to prepare, as it were, in detail a report on all aspects of public expenditure for the purpose of enabling members of parliament to do their duty as elected representatives of the people. That is the purpose of the Auditor General. The government has interfered with his performance of that duty. I say that on the basis of evidence we have had for a long time the government has in fact interfered with the performance of his duty. It has mischievously interfered and, the government having done that, it is important for members of the House to look into the matter.

I understand that the Auditor General may have sent a letter to the appropriate minister explaining the reasons for the late filing of the report. If that is so, the letter ought to have been tabled so we could all see it.

I am about to conclude, Mr. Speaker. I will not take more than another minute. I merely point out that the Auditor General, in speaking to the press, has indicated that his staff has been denigrated, that his office has not been given sufficient staff, that 40 of his staff members have resigned and 22 of them have accepted jobs in other government departments for more money than he is permitted to pay them. As I said yesterday, his arms and legs have been amputated and therefore he could not file his report in accordance with the deadline established by statute. I believe there has been mischievous interference, which leaves this whole question in doubt.

If Your Honour accepts the motion moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and agrees that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I and my colleagues will be happy to support the hon. member's motion. But if the Auditor General appears before the bar of parliament, all that can happen—and I am not taking anything away from the motion of the hon. member for Peace River—is that the Auditor General will have an opportunity to make a statement, and there it has to end. I feel that this matter requires more inquiry and more examination than that action alone can supply. Therefore, in addition to the suggestion of my hon. friend that the Auditor General be ordered to appear at the bar of the House I suggest that there ought to be a deeper investigation and inquiry into this situation. If, therefore, Your Honour thinks I have established a prima facie case of privilege I would move:

• (1440)

That the complaint of the Auditor General that the government has failed to provide him with such officers and employees as are necessary to enable him to perform his duties, as required by Section 56(4) of the Financial Administration Act, and his consequent failure to submit his report in time, be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and that the said committee hear the Auditor General and other witnesses and report its recommendations thereon not later than March 29.

If the government is carrying out its duties as it ought to, if it has nothing to hide, if it has the courage of the convictions which it constantly expresses, but in a hypocritical tones of which I am getting sick—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: —then the government will place such a motion before the House and I will be glad to support it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that there is something a bit unusual about the procedure we are following this afternoon, but of course it is somewhat unusual to have all these notices about the same circumstances. However, having heard the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for York South, probably the best course of action to follow in the circumstances is to hear brief presentations from hon. members in support of their proposed motions. This will give an opportunity for the Chair to consider the matter in its broader aspects, in toto. Chronologically, the next motion of which the Chair received notice came from the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

MR. NOWLAN—DELAY IN TABLING AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to be brief, but the point is serious. It raises matters of substance which cannot be sloughed off by catcalls across the way. I did give notice for that reason and to anticipate the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) saying that this did not come to the attention of the House at the earliest possible moment.

I was in the House yesterday, Mr. Speaker. Frankly, I could not believe what I thought my ears had heard. It was only when I saw the printed record of this institution that I obtained confirmation of the allegation by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), an allegation without foundation in the parliamentary annals of the House of Commons, be it on this or the other side of the Atlantic, the Commons across the way that is commonly called the Mother of Parliaments.

Neither the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) nor the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) referred directly to the words used by the Prime Minister. They were an insult to my eyes when I read the printed page. I have tried to give the Prime Minister the benefit of the doubt in the first reference to illegality alleged against the Auditor General when, in answer to a question, the Prime Minister said, as recorded at page 635 of Hansard:

—if an officer of Parliament is breaking the law—

In effect he said, don't ask me why he is breaking the law. By innuendo there is a suggestion that the Auditor General is breaking the law, but you cannot raise a question of privilege in this institution where innuendo and imputation are sometimes the order of the day. But in answer to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) the Prime Minister, still conditional and still philosophizing, said:

If parliament wants to condone his breaking the law and not do anything about it—

Thereby the innuendo is removed and by direct reference the Prime Minister is suggesting that the Auditor General is breaking the law of the land. If he is breaking the law of the land, then we can come before Your Honour with a question of privilege.

I suggest this is serious because there are only three servants of this House of Commons—the Chief Electoral Officer, the Official Languages Commissioner and the Auditor General. They are beyond appointment by any department and in their respective capacities and areas of competence are the conscience of this parliament. We are not going to talk about elections and the Chief Electoral Officer, but that is pretty fundamental to the law of the land. This does not involve an area of culture that is part of the history of this land, a responsibility of the Official Languages Commissioner. We are dealing in terms of auditing facts and figures, the power of the purse. The Auditor General is in fact the ombudsman of the purse of Canadian taxpayers from coast to coast.

To suggest even casually that the Auditor General is in breach of the law deserves and demands rebuke, Mr. Speaker. Parliament is the conscience of the land. If this Commons is painted with illegality, how can it discharge the responsibility of being the conscience of the land? The voice in the wilderness across the way is why there is such a thing as privilege. You have to start tying matters down to rules. Whether the Prime Minister likes it or not, there are rules and regulations which governed this institution long before he came here and will govern it long after he is gone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: My question of privilege arises from the fact that there is a reflection on the dignity of this House. There are three parts to my question of privilege. I am not going through some of the travesties which have been attached to the dignity of the House by words that have been said both in and out of the House and allegations about the status of members. They have had a deleterious effect on the dignity of this House and on the House discharging its duties. When you have accusations of partiality and discourtesy against members of this House, when you have libels against members of this House that in effect concern the character and conduct of members of the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should relate his remarks to the situation now before the House. I do not think it is competent upon him to review the general situation which may have inspired his comments. I think as much as possible he should try to limit his remarks to what is now before us.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am very directly relating my remarks to the situation that arose yesterday. I have tried to lay some foundation in a general historical way for the edification of members abroad. I am not going into the history of why this institution arose to fight the King and obtained the right to impose levies despite what the Crown wanted to do. Coming to today, I am dealing with the dignity of the House in three ways.

According to Beauchesne, when there were accusations of partiality and discourtesy in the past or libels against members that in effect reflected on the conduct or character of members, or scandalous charges or imputations directed against members, these were always found to be a breach of privilege. I am transposing "members" to one of the main servants of the House of Commons. I am asking Your Honour to find that, when there are allegations of partiality, discourtesy or illegality, surely this raises a question of privilege. When there has been a reflection not against the character or conduct of a member but against the character or conduct of one of the three main servants of parliament, surely there is a potential point of privilege. Even more important, without referring to all the references to occasions when scandalous charges or imputations have been directed against members of the House of Commons—Your Honour is more familiar with Beauchesne than I—one need only look to page 98, paragraph 102, of Beauchesne which states that when there are imputations and scandalous charges against members of a select committee you in effect have a point of privilege.

In conclusion, when the Prime Minister of this land, the leader of this government, alleges illegality against one of the three servants of this institution, you have ipso facto a point of privilege. I support the motion of the hon. member for Peace River—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was given the floor for the purpose of proposing a motion. It is well known that on a question of privilege hon. members are given an opportunity to propose their motions and indicate their question of privilege. There is no debate, the responsibility being cast by members on the Chair to decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I do not think it is in order for a member to give notice to the Chair and then to sit down having said he supports a motion proposed by some other hon. member. The hon. member has given notice and I heard him for that purpose. I do not want to make things difficult for the hon. member. On the other hand, I would not want to establish a precedent that members can simply give notice for the purpose of supporting some other motion proposed by another member. I shall not press the matter further.

• (1450)

Mr. Nowlan: With all respect and due deference to the Chair, I was coming to the point where I was going to make a separate motion. I not only support the motion moved by the hon. member for Peace River, but I move that the Prime Minister admit the impropriety of his remark and that he withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—DELAY IN TABLING AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate my support for the contention of the leader of this party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), that if there has been any breaking of the law it is to be found in the failure of the government to carry out the provisions of section 56(4) of the Financial Administration Act.

However, I too have sent Your Honour notice of my intention to raise a question of privilege because I feel that there is a distinct aspect of this matter that should be considered. As Your Honour has pointed out to us many times, the whole question of privilege is a very difficult one, and the Chair is not supposed to find that there is a prima facie case of privilege unless it can be shown that the privileges of a member or of members of the House of Commons have been offended. It is my contention that this is what has been done. I contend that our privileges have been attacked and therefore, something should be done about it.

In what way do I contend that our privileges have been attacked? Let me put it this way. The Auditor General is an officer of the parliament of Canada. He is responsible to this House. He is also responsible to the other place, but that is by the by; he is responsible to us. I contend that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of this House, makes statements on the floor of the House, statements which in turn are carried in the press, to the effect that an officer of this House is a lawbreaker, that he failed to keep the law, and that this action on his part is being condoned by parliament, then we are involved in the making of charges against an officer of this House, charges in which we have had no say.

It is not just a case of a backbencher standing up and saying something that is unfair, cruel or untrue of an officer of this House; it is a case of the leader of this House standing in his place and saying that an officer of this House has broken the law. I contend, therefore, that we should have the opportunity to express ourselves on the contention of the Prime Minister.

I believe that the way for us to resolve this matter now is to hear from the Auditor General, to hear from this person who is an officer of this House. I think, therefore, that he should be given an opportunity of telling us why he has not been able to file his annual report on time.

I am in general sympathy with the motion presented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and if Your Honour allows that motion my colleagues and I shall certainly support it. But I do feel a little bit unhappy about the way in which the motion seems to order the Auditor General here, as though he had done something wrong. I think that the way in which it should be put is that the Auditor General, having been attacked in this House by the Prime Minister, should be given the right, the opportunity, to appear before this House to tell us why he has not been able to file his report on time. Then and only then would it be possible for this House to make a decision whether or not the Auditor General has broken the law.

I repeat, Sir, that I feel we do have the quality of privilege in what I am presenting to the Chair at the present time. The members of this House have had their reputations damaged because they sit here having been spoken for by the Prime Minister, who has made statements that they do not support and in which they have had no part whatsoever.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if you find that I have a question of privilege I would be happy to move:

That the Auditor General of Canada, having been accused by the Prime Minister of non-compliance with the law respecting the filing of his annual report, be permitted to appear before the bar of the House of Commons for the purpose of stating the reasons for his not having been able to file his report within the time specified in the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has also received notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Egmont.

MR. MACDONALD (EGMONT)—DELAY IN TABLING AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House is waiting breathlessly. I think that much of this present discussion would be unnecessary for the members of the House had the government, throughout its brief history in office, acted properly with respect to this important officer of the House. As in all things within the ambit of a question of privilege, there is a fair bit of discretion put in the hands of the Speaker. It has been a well known fact that through the centuries of traditions and the functioning of parliament questions of privilege must relate, when they are raised, to the context of the day. I think the very real context of the discussion being pursued at the present moment relates to the well known attitude of this government toward the functions of the Auditor General.

Perhaps the verbal indiscretion yesterday afternoon of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would have been accepted simply as that had we not had the previous experience of dealing with legislation in this House that obviously was out to muzzle and to limit the powers of the Auditor General. The position is made clear in Bourinot's Rules of Order, page 40, and I should like to quote from that page briefly:

Questions of privilege cover a wide range, but it may be stated in general terms that they refer to all matters affecting the rights and immunities of the House collectively, or to the position and conduct of members in their representative character. In other words, a breach of privilege is a wilful disregard by a member or any other person of the dignity and lawful authority of parliament.

With regard to matters affecting the rights and immunities of the House collectively, it is indeed difficult to think of questions of privilege that would more directly affect the collective rights and responsibilities of this House than the disposition of public funds. Surely this is of even greater importance today in view of the recent changes that have been made in the rules which effectively restrict the competence of the House to deal with the estimates that are regularly before us. The House has already been limited, through the alteration of these rules, in regard to its control of the estimates.

Now we have seen, through the information conveyed to us by the Prime Minister yesterday, that the Auditor General, in his function as watchdog of the public purse, is being even more severely restricted. Surely a debate on this matter should not be necessary at all. It has already been suggested by the leader of this House that the Auditor General is breaking the law. When that kind of statement is made within this chamber, there is no recourse to a higher court. Members are placed in the difficult situation of being informed by the leader of this House that one of its own statutes is being wilfully broken by an officer of this House.

Surely it is of the utmost importance that hon. members of this Chamber be allowed to reach a decision on this important question. What is being asked for in this instance is not so much a decision from Your Honour as to the desirability or otherwise of having such a motion brought before the House; what is obviously necessary is that we should be allowed to reach a decision on such an important question. How can this chamber continue to function day after day and week after week if there is no opportunity for us either to confirm or discount the validity of the statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister? Surely it makes a mockery of the stewardship we are supposed to exercise in this place. Nothing is more basic—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member indicated in his opening remarks that he intended to be brief. He should indicate as soon as possible the nature of his question of privilege. The hon. member is now making the kind of speech which would normally be made if there were a debate on the question of privilege. I hope he will take into consideration the fact that other hon. members have been brief in their presentations and have not wandered too far from the motions they propose to make. I trust the hon. member for Egmont will indicate as soon as possible what his motion is.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Before I do that, before I indicate the nature of my motion, may I say this? The Prime Minister made it very clear that if an officer of parliament was breaking the law an hon. member should not ask the Prime Minister why he is breaking the law; he should address that question to the officer of parliament concerned. Surely there is only one context in which this can take place, namely, in the House of Commons. What is being sought is an opportunity for the House to make that decision. I believe there is here a question of privilege based both on deliberate interference with the Auditor General's ability to carry out his responsibilities plus the fact the Prime Minister has indicated he is presently breaking the law. I believe we should put the motion in order to clarify this situation.

If Your Honour rules there is a prima facie case of privilege, I would be prepared to move:

Business of the House

That this House make available to the Auditor General such resources as are necessary for the fulfilment of his legislative mandate.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has now heard from the hon. members who have given notice under the terms of Standing Order 17. I am not sure whether the President of the Privy Council indicated earlier that he wanted to make some comments from a strictly procedural standpoint. If he is prepared to do so, this is as far as the Chair would be prepared to go. I will hear the minister and then take the matter under advisement.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if I had been shaking in my boots at the possible damage to the government which might be inflicted by this issue, I have been totally relieved by the contradictory and discordant effort which has been made on the part of the opposition to find ways of attacking the government and of attempting to solve the problem.

The Conservative party alone has three different proposals as to the manner in which the House ought to deal with what is claimed to be a question of privilege. The hon. member for Peace River says: take the Auditor General to the bar of the House. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley says: apologize, Prime Minister. The hon. member for Egmont has unleashed an unfocused chorus of vocal frustration, ending by letting the cat out of the bag and placing an ordinary substantive motion before the House. If there was any doubt whether this matter involves privilege it has been clearly dispelled by the motions which have been proposed. At least three of them are substantive motions which can only be heard upon normal notice being given and which do not raise any question of privilege at all.

The hon. member for York South proposed that this matter go to a committee. He made a reasonable defence of that proposal. He wanted a deep examination of the facts. He wanted, really, to know whether there was justification for the complaints which have been made by the Auditor General. He must, at least, have an open mind because he wanted to have a complete examination carried out by a standing committee.

His deskmate, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), really did not accept the lead of his leader. He favoured a modified version of the Peace River proposal. He said: Come to the bar, Auditor General, but please come; we do not order you to come but come at our gentle invitation.

The question of legality has been raised. A number of the comments made suggested that the question of privilege rested on words uttered by the Prime Minister yesterday. My foundation for that statement is the particular comments made by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley and the words used in the motion of the hon. member for Peace River. The matter has been alluded to less directly by other hon. members. I would resubmit my argument that if the words uttered by the Prime Minister involved a matter of privilege then the matter ought to have been raised instantly. In fact, it was—almost—raised instantly by the hon. member for York South. And it was disposed of by the House.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Mr. Speaker: I have to interrupt the minister for a moment. I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond wishes to rise on a point of order. I hope we can resolve this matter without too many points of order and further questions of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I raise the same point of order as the leader of the House tried to raise earlier in the debate. My point of order can be substantiated by your own remarks as recorded in Hansard when the Prime Minister and the hon. member for York South were engaged in an exchange in the House. The Prime Minister definitely said that the hon. member for York South was twisting his words and you, Sir, made at that time no ruling on a question of privilege but asked the hon. members, as you will see from the record of the House, to avoid any further exchanges on the basis that they were not contributing anything to the debate. There was therefore no ruling on any question of privilege yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might try to make further progress. We have been engaged on this matter for over an hour now. I would hope we might go on soon with the business of the House on the understanding that I will take into consideration all the points which have been expressed, including the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

• (1510)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I was stating that if the comments made by the Prime Minister were complained of, then under the rules it was the obligation of hon. members to raise the matter at that time. In fact the hon. member for York South did raise the matter under a question of privilege. So it is my submission it would not be possible to raise that matter again at this time under the guise of privilege. As a matter of fact, my position is supported by what happened earlier in the week and particularly by the question the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) addressed to the Prime Minister on March 6, 1972, as recorded at page 541 of Hansard. The hon. member for Calgary Centre put this question:

Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since the Financial Administration Act provides that the report of the Auditor General shall be laid before the House of Commons by the minister on or before December 31 or, if parliament is not then in session, within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session, and since this is the eighteenth day of the present session, why has this report not been laid before parliament. What excuse, if any, is there for this breach of the law?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: So, the first reference—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether it is the intention of hon. members that we should have a debate for the rest of the day on this subject. If we are to pursue points of order and questions of privilege, that might be the easiest decision to make. I think we should try to bring the matter to an early conclusion. We have heard from hon. members. The President of the Privy Council should have the right to rise and state his views and I certainly will listen to him with the same patience, forbearance and understanding with which I have listened to other hon. members. I gather the hon. member for Calgary Centre wishes to rise on a question of privilege. Perhaps I might be allowed to suggest that it is difficult to have a further question of privilege when we have one already before the House, but with the consent of hon. members we might allow the hon. member for Calgary Centre to indicate what he has in mind.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think the statement which has been made by the President of the Privy Council does give rise to a question of privilege but so far as I am concerned I would be quite happy, if it would be your desire, to wait until the President of the Privy Council has finished and then raise my question of privilege on what he said. The reason I rise at this moment is that I believe the rules provide that one is supposed to do so immediately. Mr. Speaker, I wait for your direction.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the hon. member for Calgary Centre to indicate his grievance, point of order or question of privilege and then we will try to end the discussion with the last concluding words from the President of the Privy Council. I think we should get on with the other business of the House. I would not try to minimize the importance of this subject but perhaps we have heard most of the points of view and aspects of the situation. The hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, when I asked what I thought was a perfectly innocent question I did not expect I would open the sort of debate on various points which has ensued. However, my point of privilege is that I did not as a matter of fact accuse the Auditor General, as now implied by the President of the Privy Council and I think by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday, of being in breach of the law.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Harkness: As recorded at page 541 of Hansard I read the relevant section that the President of the Privy Council has just read from the Financial Administration Act which states that the report of the Auditor General shall be laid before the House of Commons by the minister on or before December 31 or, if parliament is not then in session, within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session. Then I asked, since this is the 18th day of the present session, why has this report not been laid before parliament and what excuse if any, is there for this breach of the law?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident—

An hon. Member: It sure is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Harkness: —that there has been a breach of the law.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should be given an opportunity to complete his remarks.

Mr. Harkness: It is quite evident there has been a breach of the law—

Mr. Trudeau: Say that again.

Mr. Harkness: —but the breach of the law so far as this section is concerned is on the part of the minister. I might say that had I been sure which minister it was I would have asked him the question directly. At one time it was the Minister of Finance. I think now it is the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), but I do not know. The President of the Treasury Board shakes his head. For that reason and because the Prime Minister is the responsible head of the government I directed the question to him. In any event, so far as this section of the act is concerned I think it is quite clear that the person who is in breach of the law is the minister who I take it now is the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member has made his point. I wonder again whether there is any point in pursuing the matter further. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege. He has indicated what his grievance is. It seems to me we should co-operate with one another in an effort to bring this interesting debate to a close.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I have just one more point to make, if I may. I think the minister was in breach of the law not only because he did not place the report before parliament but also, not having been in a position to do so, he should have put before parliament the reasons the report was not presented and then all of this would not have been raised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harkness: It is because the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are obviously debating the issue. We could continue this argument for a long time this afternoon, but I invite hon. members to permit the Chair to try to bring the matter to an end. I will listen to the President of the Privy Council briefly and then indicate what the ruling might be.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think we have made considerable progress because the hon. member has indicated what he intended—

An hon. Member: What he said. Read it.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I must say that the question of privilege was raised by the hon. member after I had finished reading his question without any further comment or conclusion on my part on it. My point is now—

• (1520)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I suggest to hon. members that if this is the kind of House they want we could go on eternally. I think there is a responsibility on both sides of the House to try to bring this matter under control. I invite the President of the Privy Council to indicate as soon as possible what the point is that he wants to make. He has had the floor now for some time.

Mr. MacInnis: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why don't you go home?

Mr. MacInnis: Keep on braying. Since I have been recognized by the Chair I do not intend to compete with the braying on the other side.

The House leader is now trying to mislead every member of the House by saying that he read the question of the hon. member for Calgary Centre and made no comment. The record will show that the House leader clearly made comments on the very statement he read into the record.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will advise hon. members that I will allow the President of the Privy Council to conclude his remarks briefly. I will hear no further about this matter. It is just as simple as that.

Mr. MacEachen: May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, in all seriousness, that the opposition parties put up five members on this subject who continued until well after three o'clock. From the moment I rose to my feet I have occupied only a small part of the time. It has been mainly occupied by members of the opposition. I ask Your Honour to reconsider whether it is fair to this side of the House to ask me, in light of the time elapsed, to conclude my remarks briefly.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is fair and I invite the President of the Privy Council to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think it should be clear that I did not ask the President of the Privy Council to resume his seat. I asked him to be as brief as possible in concluding his remarks. I did not intend to suggest that the remarks of the President of the Privy Council were finished. I would not have wanted to do this because I do want to take into account that there have been five contributors from the left of the Chair on the question of privilege and it would be unfair to the President of the Privy Council if I were not to allow him to say what he has in mind. However, I would suggest to him that he should speak as briefly as possible, and I am asking him to do what I asked other members to do when they made their contributions to the question of privilege.

Mr. MacEachen: I appreciate your admonition and I will attempt to conclude my remarks as briefly as possible in a much shorter time than has been used by the opposition. I believe that the hon. member for Calgary Centre was the first person in the House this week to allude to a breach of the law. There is no question about that. The second person, in my study of Hansard, who has not used those words but who raised the subject in the context was the Right Hon. Robert L. Stanfield, Leader of the Opposition.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I am following the mistake that was made the other day on his radio program.

Mr. Aiken: It is a forecast, not a mistake.

Mr. MacEachen: He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who undertook on Monday, I believe, to investigate why the report of the Auditor General had not been tabled in the House within the time required by law.

I think that is a totally neutral statement. It is a fact that the report of the Auditor General has not been tabled in the House in the time required by the law. The hon. member for Calgary Centre said that the minister has breached the law. He is a fair hon. member and he should ask himself whether that is a fair charge against the minister that he breached the law by failing to table the report which had not been provided to him under the terms of the same law by the Auditor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harkness: I said a few minutes ago that he might well have had a good excuse.

Mr. MacEachen: The Prime Minister then referred to the same matter and referred obviously to the breaking of the law. There is no doubt in anybody's mind that the law has not been complied with. It is not the first time that the law has not been complied with in respect of the tabling of the Auditor General's report. This is the sixth year in succession that the Auditor General's report has not been tabled under the terms required by the law.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. MacEachen: I ask you, Mr. Speaker—and I am coming to a conclusion—why has the matter become a question of privilege in its sixth year and not in its first, second, third, fourth or fifth years? Those are the facts, and at no other time has this House raised a question of privilege.

I make a final concluding point, Mr. Speaker, and it is this: it is suggested—and I will not go beyond that—that the Auditor General—let me put it in the most neutral way because I do not want to denigrate in any way the post of the Auditor General.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: It is not my intention and it is not the intention of the government to do that. We want to co-operate with his work in the greatest possible way. So let me say it has been suggested that the report has not been tabled, that the law has not been complied with because facilities have not been made available to the Auditor General. That is the contention. We on this side do not accept the validity of that contention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: We regard it as a matter of debate, of dispute, and not a matter of privilege. But in order to ensure that the facts are studied properly and in the proper form we are ready to accept the motion put by the hon. member for York South. If he will agree and the House will agree to accept this motion and to send the matter to the committee without debate, the inquiry can start tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We may be going beyond the point of the question of privilege or the procedural aspects of the question of privilege. I would not want hon. members to become involved in a debate when it has not yet been determined that there should be such a debate. I would certainly hope that the President of the Privy Council will again limit his contribution to the strictly procedural aspect of the matter. Having said that, I am not sure how far we should go in responding to the comments just made by the President of the Privy Council, whether there should be further points of order, further questions of privilege. Perhaps it might be wise to allow the matter to rest at this point.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That's a commitment, Bob.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for York South rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lewis: I am rising on a point of order, but very briefly, Mr. Speaker. We are happy to accept the government's belated arrangement, which it should have taken the initiative in proposing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the hon. member just one moment because we certainly cannot get involved in a debate now on which motions are acceptable and which motions are not acceptable. That would be unfair to other hon. members who have placed motions before the Chair and on which no ruling has been made. I believe the hon. member says that his point of order is coming to a conclusion. I will hear him to that conclusion.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was merely going to conclude, having said we would be glad to accept that, as I am sure other members would, by asking the minister whether now, or on motions, he will carry out his acceptance of my motion and move it today?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I said that this should be without debate because we have other government business before the House. If we can pass it without debate, as I stated, then I will put the motion on motions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF AUDITOR GENERAL'S COMPLAINT OF LACK OF STAFF TO PERFORM DUTIES AND SUBMIT REPORT ON TIME

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis):

That the complaint of the Auditor General that the government has failed to provide him with such officers and employees as are necessary to enable him to perform his duties, as required by section 56(4) of the Financial Administration Act, and his consequent failure to submit his report in time, be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and that the said committee hear the Auditor General and other witnesses and report its recommendations thereon not later than March 29.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. For a long time now I have been threatening hon. members with the possibility of a motion from the government under Standing Order 43, and apparently this is what we are getting at this time. Hon. members have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are very happy to accept the motion on the understanding, of course, that you are still going to consider the questions of privilege that have been raised.

Mr. Speaker: Of course the hon. member will realize that I will consider the questions of privilege, but at the same time, to be very honest, I would think that if this motion were accepted by the House it might have an influence, not an undue influence but some kind of influence, on the consideration of the matter by the Chair. I think it would certainly not be honest on my part to say that this would not be one of the factors considered by the Chair in deciding whether there is a matter of privilege before the House. I do not say it is the only matter that would be given consideration. I would certainly give every consideration to all aspects of the matters referred to by hon. members. I think that assurance can be given by the Chair, but I really think the Chair should not be involved in this at all. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is carried.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH NABET—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, after that successful effort I would like to try a motion under Standing Order 43. The matter is the impasse in contract negotiations between the CBC management and the National Association of Broadcasting Employees and Technicians, which is seriously and presently affecting the public interest by preventing the broadcast of National Hockey League games on our national television service. With the consent of the House I will move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson):

This House urges the government to act forthwith to put into immediate effect the conciliation board recommendations and such further concessions as the CBC management may have since offered, and to instruct the CBC management to negotiate in good faith thereafter with the National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians with a view to the settlement of any matters then in dispute. And this House further urges that if the CBC management and the National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians fail to conclude a settlement within three days after such instruction is given, the government take measures to establish procedures for effecting a settlement and for broadcasting National Hockey League games on our national television service.

I hope that the poor people in Toronto get their Saturday night broadcast, even though I am a Montreal fan.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster. The motion requires consent in the same way as the previous motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the hon. member that unfortunately there is not unanimity. This interesting motion cannot be put.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—TABLING OF ENDORSEMENTS OF PROCESS OF THE FINAL JUDGMENT PROJECT

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table copies of the letters of recommendation, appreciation and endorsement relating to the Process Church of the Final Judgment, pursuant to the request made by the hon. member for Oxford on March 6.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that there was some disturbance in the House. I am sorry that I was unable to hear the minister.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that the minister referred to a motion. Would the minister repeat the motion? I believe it alluded to an exchange with the hon. member for Oxford, and he ought to be given an opportunity to understand what the motion was.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I was just tabling under Standing Order 41(2) copies of letters of recommendation and endorsement concerning the Process Church of the Final Judgment as requested by the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Nesbitt: I thank the minister.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AUDITOR GENERAL

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING DELAY IN PREPARATION OF REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I would like to ask the minister whether he has received any communication from the Auditor General relating to the preparation and presentation of the Auditor General's report to parliament for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, and, if so, what form of communication?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have. As hon. members know, the Auditor General is an officer of parliament and has a duty under the Financial Administration Act to table annually his report. That report is tabled through the Minister of Finance who has the duty to table the report if, as, and when he receives it. I talked to Mr. Henderson this morning and advised him of the possibility that his letter to me of March 7 might well be called for by hon. members of the House. In that letter he advised me of being unable to hand me his annual report before the month of May. I replied to his letter this morning, March 9, and I would be perfectly willing, with the consent of the House, to table that correspondence in view of what has transpired.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the letter in question is not too long whether it might not be placed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Peace River has a supplementary question.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, unless the letter is of inordinate length it might well be placed in the record of Hansard, or attached to Hansard.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since the matter has been referred to a committee the proper incorporation might be in the minutes of that committee.

RESEARCH

RELATIONSHIP OF GRANTS TO FOREIGN COMPANIES TO GOVERNMENT POLICY ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the report of CALURA, the report under the act requiring corporations and labour unions to make certain returns, and arising out of the fact that the report shows that Canadian controlled companies obtained 7 per cent of their research and development funds from federal government sources and that foreign owned companies received 23 per cent of the funds spent on research and development. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether this discrepancy between Canadian and foreign owned companies with respect to government grants in the field of research and development is consistent with the existing government policy in the field of foreign ownership and in development and research.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can answer this question but in order to do so properly I would have to make certain qualifications. First of all, the statistics quoted by the Globe and Mail are not exact; it is 19 per cent, not 23 per cent. Secondly, the figure given by Statistics Canada does not cover the whole of the research and development. For example, IRDIA grants are not included, and under that program Canadian-owned companies do much better than American-owned companies in Canada. Thirdly, the figures do not take into account research and development done by American-Canadian owned companies outside Canada, and this would be an important factor. All of these factors would have to be taken into account in order to make a proper assessment of what the situation is. Basically, the answer is that one day the opposition complains that American-owned companies are not doing enough research in Canada and the next day, as today, they complain that they are getting more government funds as they are doing more research—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. minister would agree that he is now debating the issue. The hon. member for York South on a supplementary.

RELATIONSHIP OF DEFENCE CONTRACTS TO ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, I cannot debate that question with the minister, but may I ask him whether one of the reasons for the way in which funds are decided is related to defence contracts? Is that the area in which the foreign owned corporations do more?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, defence is one of the areas where American owned companies in Canada do more research and development than Canadian owned companies. Generally speaking, a lot of the American companies research in Canada is in the more technologically sophisticated area of Canadian industry and my department gives grants without reference or discrimination concerning the ownership of the company. As they do more, they get more research funds.

ELECTIONS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON AMENDMENT TO CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT REQUIRING REPORTING OF POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I have a further supplementary which I should like to address to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the government, for one reason or another, has not introduced and is not proposing to introduce in this session any legislation dealing with election expenses, is the government considering or would the government consider introducing an amendment to the act requiring both labour unions and corporations to report their contributions to political parties and candidates?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I shall look at the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Speaker.

AUDITOR GENERAL

POSSIBILITY OF REPORT TO SPEAKER TO GIVE FREEDOM IN DECIDING STAFF MATTERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I have a question for the Minister of Finance supplementary to the one asked by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Since the Auditor General is a servant of this House, has the minister given any thought to having the Auditor General report to the House of Commons through the Speaker who would then determine the total budgetary requirements of the Auditor General? In this way the Auditor General would be free to establish rates of pay and other conditions of employment for his staff, as well as the size of his establishment, provided he stayed within his budget. This could well eliminate the present impasse.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, how the Auditor General should report is a matter for Parliament to decide, because he is an officer of this House. Perhaps any representations should be made to the committee which will hear this matter.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the census report will be divided into several stages and I do not remember them all. MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUIREMENT THAT APPLICANTS BE CANADIAN OR LANDED IMMIGRANTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I put a question to the Minister of Labour regarding eligibility for LIP grants. The minister replied that he was not sure of the answer but would look into the matter. The question was whether non-Canadian citizens who did not become landed immigrants would be eligible for grants. Is the minister in a position to give an answer today?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, two circumstances prevail. In the case of sponsors, the requirement is that if they are receiving remuneration they must conform with the laws of Canada. That is spelled out. They must be either citizens, landed immigrants or if neither of those, they must have work permits. The same would apply for persons employed on a project. They must be citizens or landed immigrants or have work permits. The question of citizenship is not directly asked. The requirement is that all employees be paid and sponsors conform to all the laws of the competent authority, and that includes the labour laws.

Mr. Speaker: I shall allow the hon. member's supplementary but I think I should draw to the attention of hon. members that I shall attempt to recognize some of those who were not recognized yesterday. I think they can identify themselves or perhaps go back to Hansard and see whether or not they were reported yesterday. I shall make the effort today to recognize some of those who were not given the opportunity to ask questions yesterday. For the moment, the hon. member for Oxford may ask a supplementary.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PARTICIPANTS IN CERTAIN TORONTO PROJECTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Will the minister undertake to investigate the LIP projects in Toronto which have been under discussion lately, both in this House and outside, in order to ascertain whether all the recipients come within the three categories that he has just mentioned, and will he report to the House?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): I do not think I shall give that undertaking, Mr. Speaker. I do not understand these opposition attacks on Toronto. I would invite the opposition member to be specific with respect to any project that he thinks does not conform. I do not propose to terrorize the city of Toronto.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I cannot have the minister twisting my words like that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order. I will recognize him. Certainly, I agree with the hon. member that that is debate.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. minister, who is new at his job and until now has been very agreeable, would take this opportunity of clearly twisting my words—although perhaps he does not hear very well—by stating that I am making attacks on the city of Toronto. The minister knows perfectly well the projects that I have in mind. They have been mentioned time and again in this House, in the press and everywhere. I hope the minister will reconsider his remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope we do not have the same situation as we had yesterday when most of the 40 minutes were taken up with points of order. That is why I have an obligation today to many hon. members who were not recognized yesterday, including the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rises on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: I hope Your Honour will give me at least a minute in view of the fact that we have taken two hours today on questions of privilege. The fact is we have asked about a $150 million program brought into effect on October 1. I have had calls today from people who received $20,000 cheques in the mail with no strings attached. They could use the money to go to Spain as far as the government is concerned. We have a responsibility, Mr. Speaker, to ensure that there is at least some control and some evaluation of the procedures to make sure this money is well spent.

• (1550)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. What that has to do with a point of order is beyond the comprehension of the Speaker. This is debate. There are many opportunities for debating these points. This is what I have tried to point out to hon. members. Certainly, we are not using the question period the way it ought to be used if we spend five or ten minutes on every question. I am not condemning any individual member because I appreciate that the hon. minister himself gave a response which gave rise to debate. However, we are certainly not helping hon. members who are trying to ask questions if we raise these questions of privilege or points of order. The hon. member may have a valid point and I will recognize him in a moment for a question, if he wants to ask one.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I had almost finished my remarks. I certainly want to say, in view of the attack by the minister on the legitimate efforts of members of the opposition to ensure that there is some control of government spending of this money, that I request the minister, on behalf of the opposition to withdraw those remarks which are unfair.

Mr. Speaker: This is obviously debate. There is no precedent to indicate that this kind of remark ought to be withdrawn, either by the minister or an individual member. I will again recognize the hon. member for Greenwood.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID TO BANGLA DESH—CONSIDERATION OF REQUEST FOR COMMUNICATIONS AND TRANSPORTATION EQUIPMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the recent announcement by CIDA that the total Canadian contribution for emergency relief for refugees in India and Bangla Desh amounts to $11.5 million out of a total allocation of $20 million, and in light of reliable reports to the effect that there is immediate urgency for transportation and communication, has consideration been given by the government for emergency action to provide STOL aircraft, locomotives, bridges and technical equipment, in order to prevent an even greater disaster in Bangla Desh?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, so long as I am not misunderstood, the answer to the question is, yes. Consideration has been given to this possibility, although our resources in this field are not as good as in other fields and we are not as well situated as some other countries to provide this kind of help. However, the President of CIDA is going to Dacca during his trip to the subcontinent and will investigate the question directly.

GRAIN

SALE TO RUSSIA—POSSIBLE SHIPMENT THROUGH PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice in relation to his responsibilities in answering for the Canadian Wheat Board. I should like to ask, in relation to the recent announcement by the minister of a sale of grain to Russia, whether or not substantial quantities of this grain will be shipped through the port of Churchill this coming shipping season?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows from the announcement of the sale, the option was given to the buyer of taking a certain quantity of this grain through the port of Churchill. The Wheat Board, of course, tries to accommodate buyers in every possible way, and the decision as to how much in the end will be taken through that port is largely up to the buyer.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Wheat Board has indicated from time to time that it is interested in moving substantial quantities of grain out of the port of Churchill, would the minister co-operate by trying to influence his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to carry out the very necessary dredging program at Churchill this summer. The lack of these facilities is probably one reason the Russians have not taken greater advantage of the port of Churchill.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a supplementary question but, rather, a representation to the minister.

ALLEGED WITHDRAWAL OF OFFERS FOR SALE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice, in his capacity as answering for the Wheat Board, whether the Wheat Board has temporarily withdrawn offers for the sale of grain to other nations. Could the minister give the House the reason for this situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board is, of course, continuing to make sales of grain for future delivery over certain periods. I understand that because sales already made have taxed the port of Vancouver to its limit, the Wheat Board may have ceased offering deliveries for a particular period of time to particular countries.

POSSIBLE USE OF INLAND CLEANING FACILITIES TO ALLEVIATE CONGESTION AT VANCOUVER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer given by the minister that this year new sales have not been accepted, or will not be accepted for particular periods of time through Vancouver, is the government giving consideration to cleaning new grain at the inland terminals or expanding the facilities at Vancouver, so that these additional sales are not lost to grain farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As a result of the very thorough work of examining the handling and transportation system which we have done this last year and a half, and in the expectation that we will reach record sales levels, we have studied every facet of the transportation situation and will be in a position, at an early date, to begin some additional inland cleaning in a regular way. The Wheat Board is now fairly satisfied that these facilities can, in a particular way, add to the total capacity of the system for delivering grain. We are also in discussion with a number of parties about additional facilities at Vancouver.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ALLOCATION OF BOXCARS TO INCREASE STOCKS AT VANCOUVER

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question along the lines of the previous question. In view of the continuing low level of wheat stocks in store at west coast terminals, can the minister assure us that the volume of grain moved and the allocation of boxcars by the two railroads will be such as to correct this intolerable situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the railroads have assured us that they will make every effort to correct the grain situation in Vancouver as soon as it is physically possible to do so. I am satisfied that it is not the shortage of cars or shortage of motive power which is the limiting factor at the momcnt but, rather, the very unusual and severe snow slide conditions in the Rocky Mountains which have prevented these rail facilities from carrying adequate amounts of grain to Vancouver.

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members wish to ask supplementaries. I hope that they will be brief supplementaries. I will try to recognize as many hon. members as possible. I now recognize the hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

DOMESTIC DELIVERIES FOR FEED—EFFECT OF USE OF UNIT TRAINS FOR EXPORT MOVEMENT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, although I know nothing about snow slides in British Columbia, I have a domestic concern and that is domestic deliveries of feed grain. Can we be assured that the government has explored ways of improving rail deliveries of feed grain within the country; also, will the loading of unit trains for export be carried out in such a manner as not to interfere with the regular and orderly deliveries of feed grain for Canadian users?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when we had discussions about the exceptional movement of grain by unit train to points east for export, and we were given assurances by the railroads that the regular movement of grain could be taken care of.

TAKEOVER OF FEDERAL ELEVATORS BY POOLS—ALLOCATION OF BOXCARS ASSIGNED TO FEDERAL—REPLY TO UNITED GRAIN GROWERS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the proposed takeover of Federal grain facilities tomorrow by certain pools, and since the boxcar allocation which might have been assigned to Federal is also to be turned over to the pools, which allocation has not been earned by the pool but has been bought, would the minister consider allocating the normal Federal allocation to all other existing train elevators on a proportionate basis of the shipments made over the past year?

[Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the allocation of boxcars is made according to the Bracken formula. This is a self-adjusting formula, and works over a period of time. There are special problems which arise when congestion results, despite the application of that formula. Some steps are under way to see if special measures can or should be taken to deal with that congestion problem.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Mackenzie for a second supplementary, but we must move on. The hon. member was not on my list of those who did not ask questions yesterday. However, I know the matter is important and he may ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, does the minister intend to reply to the United Grain Growers in regard to this matter?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have replied to the United Grain Growers on this subject.

LOSSES RESULTING FROM DEMURRAGE CHARGES ON BOATS AT VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR REIMBURSEMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I would like to direct a supplementary question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the demurrage charges on boats that are waiting in the harbour of Vancouver are running between $3,400 and $6,000 per day per boat, as well as the fact and the consequence that this money will have to be paid by the Canadian Wheat Board and, therefore, taken off the farmer's grain payment, does the minister or his government have any plans to reimburse the Canadian Wheat Board for moneys that will be lost through the recent transportation difficulties we have experienced?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will return to the subject in a moment. The hon. member for Regina East and other hon. members are anxious to ask further supplementaries, but in fairness to other members the Chair will first recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—PROPOSED MEASURES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

I would like to know whether he has received any criticism, representations or requests relating to the problem raised by delayed unemployment insurance checks and whether he has ordered an investigation or the adoption of steps to expedite those checks.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into this problem with the minister concerned, his deputy minister and also with his parliamentary secretary.

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—RESULTS OF STUDY BY MINISTER

Mr.André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer of the Prime Minister about reviewing the matter, I would like to ask him what is the result of his inquiry.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I came to rather numerous conclusions all of which I cannot list here but, essentially, the unemployment insurance program under the new act provides benefits which on the average are 40 per cent higher than the previous ones. That program has been implemented after certain changes stemming from the new taxation system, from the fact that unemployment benefits became taxable and that part of the program was affected as of last July, another as of January 1, 1972, another as of January 2—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the right hon. gentleman but it seems to me that the statement he wishes to make in reply to the question of the hon. member is becoming somewhat drawn out. I do not blame him, but I think the question is of a very general nature.

Does the hon. member for Lotbinière wish to ask a supplementary?

Mr. Fortin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I hope it will be brief because we have to proceed with our business as soon as possible.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister has explained the provisions of the new legislation as compared with the old one. I would like therefore to ask him what results he and his advisors have obtained regarding the problems that have arisen in respect of the new legislation?

Mr. Trudeau: That is what I was explaining, Mr. Speaker. This new legislation, which differs from the old one, had to take into account three different dates together with all the factors I mentioned earlier. Its administration has created some difficulties. The UIC had foreseen these difficulties, hired auxiliary staff and opened new centres, but there have actually been delays in the mailing of unemployment cheques, largely because the contributors themselves according to the ceiling—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the right hon. gentleman once again and I appreciate fully that it is difficult for him to reply briefly, but I suggest to the hon. member that his question is of such a general nature that it should be answered by a statement on motions.

There are only a few minutes left before the end of the question period and I hope to obtain the co-operation of the hon. member and the ministers replying to questions.

Mr. Fortin: I have a very specific supplementary question, Mr. Speaker

In view of the fact that in my riding of Lotbinière 450 very specific cases have been set before the Unemployment Insurance Commission offices in Sherbrooke and Montreal, and we have not had any results, I would like to again ask the Prime Minister what very specific concrete steps—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the same question for the second time. The Prime Minister has already attempted to answer it; in fact, we have spent almost five minutes on it. I think we should now move on to another subject.

[English]

I notice that a number of my colleagues are getting impatient. I really think they should be given an opportunity. I will first recognize the hon. member for Hillsborough.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A moment ago Your Honour referred to the fact that there was one minute remaining. However, I believe we started at 20 minutes to four—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member did not hear me correctly.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Yukon on a supplementary in a moment. I have recognized the hon. member for Hillsborough.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED REPRESSION OF SOVIET JEWS WISHING TO MOVE TO ISRAEL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns recurring reports of repression and restrictions upon Soviet Jews seeking to move to Israel and notably an article by Rabbi Stewart Rosenberg of Toronto. Can the minister advise if these reports have been investigated and have any representations or inquiries been made to the government of the Soviet Union?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been following the situation in the Soviet Union as closely as we can. Our ambassador keeps us informed on developments which he is able to ascertain from his contacts in Moscow. I believe the hon. member will agree there has been a very notable increase in the movement of Jews from the Soviet Union to Israel. I cannot, of course, guarantee that there will not continue to be repression.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe a moment ago I said I would recognize the hon. member for Yukon on a supplementary.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR OFFICE IN WHITEHORSE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): My question is for the Minister of Labour. It is supplementary to the questions asked by the hon. member for Lotbinière. In view of the hardships that are being suffered as a result of large numbers of claims for Unemployment Insurance benefits in the Yukon, and in view of the crushing burdens being placed on welfare agencies because of delays, will the minister consider the re-establishment of an operative and functioning Unemployment Insurance Commission office in Whitehorse in this separate jurisdiction?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): I will be glad to look into that question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who tried yesterday and on previous days to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence today, I intended to direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence today, I will direct it to the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Secretary of State. In view of considerable evidence that the first two documents of the Le Dain Commission on Drugs, namely the "Interim Report" and "Treatment" contain misleading and inaccurate statements which, in the view of important medical people could be dangerous to health, is the government willing to withhold the publication and distribution of the next report on cannibis until it has been carefully scrutinized and a proper cautionary foreword prepared by a qualified team of medical experts, nominated by an independent body such as the Canadian Medical Association, for inclusion in the report?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am taking note of this question and will pass it on to the minister.

GRAIN

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION ON RE-NEGOTIATION

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): My question is for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as being responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In light of numerous and strong representations being made by spokesmen for Canadian and American farm organizations recently, calling on both governments to move toward re-negotiating the International Wheat Agreement with meaningful price levels, what action, if any, is our government taking in this regard?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are following up this matter in discussions with the interested governments. We will certainly welcome any early opportunity to move toward such orderly pricing levels.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

OMISSION OF THE WORD "ROYAL" FROM ADVERTISING OF MILITARY COLLEGES

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): My question is for the Prime Minister. It arises from an advertisement of national scope in connection with advertising Royal Military Colleges as Military Colleges. In view of the keen interest of the general public in our traditions, and in view of the fact several members of this House are graduates of Royal Military Colleges, I ask the government why the government has dropped the word "Royal" in their advertising of the Royal Military College at Kingston, Royal Roads at Victoria and the Collège Militaire at St. Jean, Quebec. This is obvious from the current nation-wide advertising I have seen.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question. Perhaps he might allow the Prime Minister to reply.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the advertisement. I am not sure if it is one that has been placed by the colleges or by the government. If this was done by the government, it was presumably done by the Minister of National Defence or his department. I will refer the question to him.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING OFF-TRACK BETTING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the indication in the speech from the throne delivered in the Ontario legislature last week that the government of Ontario will legalize off-track betting shops when the necessary amendments are made to the Criminal Code, is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to introduce those necessary amendments?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are giving serious consideration to the timing of some amendments in this regard, but I intend to have some further discussions with the provincial authorities before bringing a proposal before the House.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH NABET—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I wonder whether the minister would bring us up-to-date on the present state of negotiations between the CBC management and NABET in their continuing, smouldering public service dispute.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I have just returned from a tour of western Canada, I have not yet met with the CBC management and cannot give the hon. member an up-to-date report.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that the minister was away yesterday, but hopefully may I ask if he would be in attendance tomorrow, even though he does not appear on the roster, to make a statement on the state of the negotiations in view of problems relating to showing National Hockey League games and other programs at the weekend?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I cannot make any promises in this connection, but I will try.

Mr. Stanfield: Don't be too rough, now.

An hon. Member: Stand up straight, don't crouch.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): If for no other reason, Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to say I appreciate the fact that you have recognized me today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I also appreciate the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Bell: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): May I thank you once again for recognizing me, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT IMBALANCE WITH TAIWAN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce; since he has been ignored I think I should put a question to him. In view of the fact that Taiwan exported $81 million worth of goods to Canada last year while our exports to Taiwan dropped from $18 million to $14 million, what steps is the minister taking at the present time to correct this growing imbalance in trade between Taiwan and Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the least I can say on the subject is that it is difficult for me to make a big case of this. In a number of occasions in our trade with foreign countries we are on the advantageous side of this equation.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH—REQUEST FOR OTHER PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the leak earlier this week concerning the Cohen report to the effect that there was a major failure to solve student unemployment problems on the part of the government's summer programs last year, is the Secretary of State now exploring with the provinces or with business and other authorities, further measures that might be taken to alleviate very serious student unemployment this coming summer?

GRAIN

DIVERSION OF SHIPMENTS TO PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN—POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF LINK WITH CNR AND CPR TO AVOID SNOW SLIDES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the very low level of unloadings of grain in Vancouver at various times recently due to blockages of the two major railways' main lines, has the minister or the Canadian Wheat Board pressed the railways, particularly the CNR, to divert grain shipments to the Pacific Great Eastern line, which I understand is capable of handling up to 400 cars a day?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I understand from discussions about this matter that there are some difficulties regarding rates and other arrangements that might be made by the CNR and this particular railroad, which is a provincial railroad. It is largely the CNR which can take advantage of this situation, rather than the CPR, without building more expensive trackage. It is the CPR that has had the bulk of the snow slide problems.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister or the Canadian Wheat Board pressing for some further investigations and studies into both the feasibility and the desirability of building a link between the two major railways' main lines west of Kamloops or Lillooet, or some other suitable location, and the Great Eastern railway line?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can only say, speaking broadly, that we are concerned about ensuring that there are adequate rail facilities between prairie points and the coast for all our products, and that this is a matter that is going to concern us very much in the time ahead.

FISHERIES

ALLEGED INCIDENT WITH FOREIGN VESSEL—REQUEST FOR INCREASED NAVAL AND AIR SURVEILLANCE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government been able to determine which foreign national was responsible for the incident of intimidation that occurred off the east coast of Canada earlier this week, and have any charges been laid or statements been made by the minister's department? More importantly, has the government decided to step up naval and air surveillance along our coast line in order to give our ships more protection?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, our fisheries service officers are investigating the incident and will be making a report shortly.

Mr. Lundrigan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I hope that the minister will answer my second question, which is the more important, regarding giving our own Canadian ships more protection from this kind of happening or event by stepping up naval presence off our coast, and especially air surveillance.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, Canada has not been noted for using gunboat diplomacy far out at sea.

ACTION AGAINST DEFAULTERS ON REPAYMENT OF CASH ADVANCES—REQUEST THAT PENALTIES BE DROPPED

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the action of certain grain producers who took cash advances in the 1969-70 and 1970-71 crop years and who are now considered in default, though they have scrupulously filled their quotas as space became available, does the minister intend to have charges and any penalties dropped in cases where the producer has fulfilled his contract?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding from discussions with the commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board that they do not propose to exact any penalties from anyone who in fact has been delivering grain on quotas as they opened. They will do so only in cases where there has been a clear default in the delivery of grain.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT CHARTERED BANKS LOWER INTEREST RATES IN VIEW OF INCREASED PROFITS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the increase in net profit earned by the chartered banks of Canada during the previous two years, and in view of the most recent increase of 41 per cent in operating profits for the first quarter of the chartered banks' fiscal year, can the Minister of Finance say whether he and the Governor of the Bank of Canada are making any investigation into these profits, and are they considering asking the chartered banks to lower interest rates on consumer loans as well as to lower their bank charges?

• (1620)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Interest rates have been lower for some time, but I will take the submission of the hon. member into consideration.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the Postmaster General is rising on a point of order, but we have gone a little beyond the question period. I have attempted to recognize several of the hon. members who have been patiently seeking the floor. Again, I recognize that some of my colleagues did not have that opportunity today and I will try to give them preference tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Postmaster General rising on a point of order?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris implied there was a contradiction between a statement I had made in the House on Monday and statements contained in a report prepared by the consultant firm of Samson, Belair, Riddell, Stead, Inc. which was commissioned by the Post Office in July, 1969, and tabled in the House on February 18, 1970.

The main concern of that consultant firm's study, to the work on which Mr. Moodie was attached as representative of the Post Office, was to study the feasibility, or the necessity, of some form of postal coding—

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order. The hon. minister is contesting what he believes to be the interpretation of what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. If we do this, we shall spend most of our time arguing as to what has been said by members on one side of the House or the other. I hope the minister will not pursue the matter further.

An hon. Member: Make a statement on motions.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister is answering a question, that is a different matter. And if he wishes to make a statement on motions, again, he has a right to do this. But the statement he is making now to correct what he considers to be a wrong interpretation of what he said should not be made by way of a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Today being Thursday, I wonder whether the President of the Privy Council is in a position to tell us what the business will be next week.

CNR and Air Canada

Mr. MacEachen: Today we are continuing with the CNR bill. Tomorrow will be an Opposition Day. Next week, we shall call three Opposition Days, the first on Monday. I had in mind Wednesday and Friday for the two succeeding days next week, but this can be discussed or considered later.

The following bills will be on the agenda: The CNR bill, the amendments to the BNA Act, the amendments to the Explosives Act, and the Criminal Code, hijacking and piracy. There is also the budget bill, which I hope will be given first reading in time to be dealt with in the two days given to us next week.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-4, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from January 1, 1971 to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company, and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was last before the House I was talking about the need to clear up the long-term debt which has plagued the CNR for years. It is a debt which has made the ordinary financing of the Canadian National impossible, and it has plagued this House, too, inasmuch as it has been necessary every year to bring in a bill providing additional moneys to the railway company. If we had disposed of this matter when the CN was first taken over as a national railway, the company would have been able to operate at a profit which would have allowed for normal expansion.

For many years to come, there will be a real need in this country for rail passenger transportation. In my opinion, parliament was providing for this when it passed the Transportation Act. It ought not to be necessary for the railway to undertake a ludicrous program designed to put passenger service in the worst possible light so that it could show a paper deficit on that service for the purpose of getting additional grants from Parliament. Under the present system, the more passengers the railway carry, the more money they lose. On the basis of the system of accounting presently used, there is no possibility of profitably increasing the number of people who use the railways. The only result is the creation of confusion. The more passengers the railway carries, the worse the situation becomes. Obviously the railways have not been buying passenger cars, dining cars or cars with sleeping accommodation. They sure as hell have not been providing facilities for passengers in any segment of the service, including waiting rooms and facilities normally considered necessary to meet the needs of the travelling public.

There is obviously something wrong with the present accounting system, and this should be looked at closely because there are areas in Canada where railways are still the best system of moving people around. In many parts of Canada it is almost impossible to fly at certain periods because of bad weather conditions. This is true of the maritimes. It is true of northern Ontario. It has been true, this year, of British Columbia. Yet, the alternative travel facilities provided are not sufficient to meet the demand. This is the case in northern Ontario. One of the basic requirements of regional development is a suitable transportation system to meet all the needs of the community. We do not enjoy the benefits of such a system. I suggest that when the CNR appears before the Transport Commission with an application to abandon the line between Toronto and North Bay on the grounds that it is not profitable to carry passengers, the company should be obliged to offer the route, especially the portions of the line which have been twinned, to the Ontario Northland Railway so as to give the people of northern Ontario an opportunity to provide their own facilities.

Northern Ontario does not occupy the same weather zone as does Toronto. It very often happens that when weather is fine in Northern Ontario, poor visibility or other adverse conditions make it impossible for planes to operate from Toronto. On the other hand, the weather in Toronto may be clear at times when the Ontario northland is encountering severe storms. Air travel in the spring and fall months, particularly, is subject to many delays and interruptions. Often it is not possible to fly for as many as 11 or 12 days a month. If we had better transport facilities we would be able to get on a train at night, enjoy a good night's sleep and arrive early the next morning in Toronto, since trains are usually scheduled to arrive in Toronto early. If you leave in the evening, you will be back in your place of business in northern Ontario the next morning after having enjoyed two nights on a train with proper facilities. Those facilities do not exist now because of the attitude of the Canadian National toward the people of northern Ontario. Since that portion of the CNR line between Toronto and North Bay has been twinned, they could use one line interfering with the other. They could sell the one which runs around Lake Simcoe.

We are told that the government of Ontario would be glad to buy it if they had the opportunity. Instead of having a facility into Parry Sound, we would have a connection into Toronto and the rest of the area. If the Canadian National does not want to operate the line, they should put a price on it and we will operate it for the people of Ontario. I am sure this line would pay because the Ontario Northland Railway has always paid. I am sure that if such projects were undertaken in other areas of Canada where rail transportation is difficult and where accommodation is lousy the people of the area would respond.

Great mistakes have been made in respect of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific Railways. They have cost the Canadian people more money than any other mistakes we have made, including two world wars. These mistakes have been made because of incompetence, because of the disregard of the people using the facility and because of a desire to add vice-president after vice-president. If anyone wants to know why they do this, all he would have to do is read the book "The Peter Principle". A man is moved to a level of incompetence and when it is found that he is not any good he is promoted to vice-president in charge of something or nothing in a bureaucracy of incompetence. This has been done in the railways.

It is almost impossible for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to consider an ideal location for airports. We find a new airport is to be built just north of Toronto. It will be so close to Toronto that if the past growth of the city of Toronto is repeated in the next 25 years, it will be as close to the downtown area as Malton is. This airport is to be placed in an area where farming is possible. It is true that land values in the area are so unrelated to production value that it is difficult to farm there. However, the land is capable of supporting agricultural production. There is other land nearby that is not capable of supporting agricultural production I am told that three miles north of the chosen site there is a sandy area in which the airport could be built with a bulldozer. There are no people living there because it is barren waste land which continues for some miles northward.

Everybody knows that if you are thinking of jumbo jets 25 years in the future, you are thinking about intercontinental transportation. This type of traffic should be kept as far as possible from any centre of population. I suggest that in Canada such an airport should be located north of the city of Kingston, in an area where agricultural production is almost impossible now and will remain so in the foreseeable future. I wonder why we do not consider these aspects. We have the ability in Canada to develop rapid ground transportation. There is a speed limit of 60 miles an hour on our highways, and yet we build automobiles capable of travelling at speeds of 100 miles an hour or more. We have not been able to design a highway which can match the capability of these cars and therefore have kept the speed limit down to 60 miles an hour. If one had a 1930 automobile which was in good shape, one could probably reach the speed limit on our highways.

We have not developed efficient land transportation in Canada mainly because there has been no inclination on the part of governments to have better service. We have not really faced the problems of environmental pollution created by airports in downtown areas. Twenty-five years ago a United States train travelling through Canada could travel at an average speed of 90 miles an hour. We have never duplicated that and we are not likely to do so because we play around with transportation as we did before. The New York Central had a train, the Silver Bullet, which travelled through Canada at an average speed of 90 miles an hour. We cannot duplicate this with the tracks we have because one man is supposed to look after a mile of track rather than a reasonable amount.

Exactly the same situation exists in respect of Air Canada. Air Canada has been spending large sums of money each year in the form of deposits on super-jumbo jets. Air Canada will not be able to compete in the international traffic field so long as it is faced with competition from groups who charter a full aircraft. Under these conditions the company is always sure the aircraft will be fully loaded. I am not suggesting that Air Canada should not fly on these international routes. I believe it is a matter of prestige for all Canadians. I think we must be in that field. I would be surprised if I went to the Airport in London and found that the airline of Bechuanaland was flying to Canada, and that Canada was unable to provide such a facility for the Canadian public. We do not know what we are planning to do with the jumbo-jets and yet we are tying up money for the purchase of such planes. We are not even sure that they will fly, or if so how they are to be used.

In many parts of Canada this year we face the possibility of having no aircraft which will meet the needs of the feeder lines which really are the basis of our trans-Canada airline service. If we are to operate a trans-Canada airline service, either by Air Canada or by giving the service to the Ontario government which seems to want to get into that particular field, we will still have to provide feeder lines to connect with the trans-Canada service in order to ensure that passengers travelling from the north and south of the major airlines will be able to make the right connection.

I looked up an aeronautical magazine, Aviation Week & Space Technology, put out by McGraw-Hill. It is the publication for March 1970. It indicates that there are number of Viscount planes still around. This is the type of aircraft which flies into the airports in my area of northern Ontario and which flies into northern Quebec, northern Saskatchewan, northern Alberta and northern British Columbia. The Viscount was made by the British Aircraft Corporation. It is listed as an 800 or an 801. It was made as a transport plane to carry 73 passengers. Then, there is the Vanguard which carries 139 passengers. These same people also make other planes. They make a BAC 111 which is used in flights to a number of destinations in Canada and carries 78, 84 or 109 passengers. The Branif airline uses model 203, and Mohawk uses model 204 of this aircraft. American airlines use model 401. There are others, of course. The Americans are making some, and the Japanese are making a plane which will carry 60 passengers. Their JS-11 and the JS 11a200 both carry 60 passengers. The Americans are building a number of them. Douglas is building the SST prototype which carries 48 to 58 passengers, and another version carries 64 to 92 passengers, while another one will carry 60 to 95 passengers. The Friendship series of Fairchild will carry 40 to 48 passengers in two or three versions.

I grant you that there are not many but these are planes which travel in the range of 280 to 350 miles an hour. Those are fairly modern, up to date planes. Certainly, everybody will agree that the Viscount has been a satisfactory type of plane and the Vanguard has not been bad either. Air Canada has made some very good choices. But I suggest that unless this government makes up its mind soon—and it certainly has not made up its mind on its feeder line policy—we will have such a jumble of aircraft flying over this country in all directions, without providing the necessary services and without making the proper connections for the travelling public, that we will find ourselves in exactly the same position as we have with our passenger service on the railways. It is necessary for us to unify.

Let us give Air Canada all the credit it deserves, in spite of the fact that it serves lousy meals, and without a doubt has the most discourteous passenger desk personnel I have met as well as the poorest informed and poorest trained personnel that I have met, particularly the Ottawa division. However, it certainly has an enviable record in the air, an enviable service record on the ground in terms of maintenance and ground support staff; it has an enviable record in the hours it has flown without accident, and without a doubt it is the best of the North American services that I have used in terms of passenger reservations. If Air Canada were to lend their passenger reservation facilities to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the latter would probably save two or three weeks on every inquiry because the appropriate number would be filed on the applications. It is an ideal system and Air Canada has every right to be proud of it.

I suggest that in Canada we want a unified service for all areas. In northern Ontario, we have been very satisfied with the service that we receive. I am sure everyone will agree, however, that it could be expanded. I am also sure that unless this government faces up to the need for the unification of our service by ordering, not asking, Air Canada to buy the type of plane that will meet the needs on its feeder lines, we will find ourselves in a chaotic situation in all the outlying parts of Canada. It will be impossible to relate those outlying feeder areas to the mainstream of transportation both across Canada and internationally.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, this week, more specifically on March 6, as it does every year the government presented guidelines to the Canadian National, a Crown company.

As the member for a riding that company and Air Canada both serve, I feel that it is my duty to convey my impressions to the minister who is piloting Bill C-4 cited under the short title of Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act, 1971.

Mr. Speaker, last year the government also asked us to vote certain sums of money. The first request was made on November 30, and then the bill was shelved. It was only on February 8 that the government brought up the subject again through Bill C-186, because it seems that the CN is in the red every year at about the same time.

Whether a liberal government or a progressive conservative government is in power, whether or not stations are closed down, lines abandoned, workers laid off, experts mobilized to analyze the situation, and other experts hired to implement the recommendations of other experts, whether or not we live through years of depression or years of abundance, whether the CN witnesses a decrease or an increase in the volume of transport, it always ends up in the red, and there is seldom any change in the amount of money requested.

In fact, this year, Bill C-4 asks the authorization to provide $219 million. This we read on page 2 of the bill and I quote:

Estimated requirements in the calendar year 1971:

Last year, Bill C-186 asked for $229 million, reflecting a small $10 million difference.

We recall that, surprisingly, in 1968 the CN was granted government authorization to cross out a debt of $371 million—the amount it owed to its employees' pension fund.

Mr. Speaker, when debts of $371 million disappear thus, the amount becomes net profits. So I would like to know from the CN, through the minister who is piloting this bill today, how this amount of $371 million will be included in the budget.

I would like to know whether the Canadian National intends to add those $371 million to its assets at the rate of $70 million during a five-year period or to show $371 million as profit on a single balance sheet.

Speaking of CN balance sheets, an important item in my opinion is that of the debt charges appearing in the annual report of the company under "Total interests on debt".

I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that the officials of the company do their utmost to maintain the operations at an economic level. If such is the case, these officials could prove us that they are responsible by looking for less costly procedures than those they are using at the present time.

If we compare the balance sheets of the last years, we find that in 1952, the debt charges amounted to $25,415,000 in comparison with $75 million in 1970.

Mr. Speaker, the CN debt tripled in less than twenty years. I think this is absolutely abnormal. In addition to that, while we are on the subject of credits, there is one point I would like to make and it has to do with the maintenance of the tracks.

Keeping in mind the number of derailments that took place on CN tracks, we must ask ourselves a question to which the answer is readily found. Since it is a Crown company, we can assume that some incompetent people hold important positions. I think unexperienced employees are the cause of several accidents that happened recently. They are employees who obtained their positions without knowing exactly what a railroad is all about, employees who have no practical knowledge and think that railroad lines need no maintenance.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that construction methods have changed. A railroad line can be rapidly built because of heavy equipment that can do a lot of work in little time. Even if it is easy to build railroad lines, I think we must keep in mind the fact that they still need to be maintained.

Twenty years ago, a team of five men maintained ten miles of rail. Today, the same team of five must maintain 50 miles of rail, which is physically impossible. The number of accidents since the beginning of the year, in a radius of 125 miles around Quebec City alone, is proof that the security limit has been exceeded.

[Mr. Godin.]

For the information of the minister in charge, I will make a summary of those accidents. I think all hon. members read it in the newspapers. The first derailment since the beginning of the year happened in Val Jalbert, causing inconvenience to passengers and leaving two locomotives overturned. Recently, Rapido No. 20 left the tracks with 125 passengers on board, which left one dead and one seriously injured who died a few hours later from a heart attack. On the same day, at Edward Lake, 22 cars left the track. At about the same time, in Donnacona, while the trains were running in front of the snowplow, the train became stuck and the Quebec-Abitibi passenger train was cancelled.

Near Quebec City, around Ste-Foy, there was another derailment. In Grand'Mère, 17 cars left the tracks. In Eatonville, in the county of Kamouraska, 51 cars left the tracks and damages were estimated at $6 million. More recently, in Fitzpatrick, there was another derailment in a tunnel and traffic was delayed for twelve hours.

Mr. Speaker, if I said the public is beginning to have second thoughts about the security of CN tracks, I think the people would say I am right. If we discussed with CN officials all the serious accidents that have happened since the beginning of the year, I am convinced that there would certainly be some of them who would say it is due to the rough climate. Mr. Speaker, if CN trains were the only ones running in the country, I think we could really believe that the climate would be the cause of those accidents.

• (1650)

By the way, another company is in the same field and that is the Canadian Pacific whose trains operate also in the same area under the same climate, except that the Canadian Pacific is privately-owned and that its authorities are concerned with their responsibilities.

To bluff the public, they make believe, through some minor layoffs, that management is sound, since they thus achieve savings of a few thousands of dollars. But at the same time, security has been ignored, which has caused damages of several million dollars. This is not, in my mind, what we can call sound management.

Yesterday again, the CNR management have met at their Quebec City office with representatives of the municipalities of the county of Portneuf. The purpose of this meeting was to try to bring the mayors of the county to accept the closing down of some stations in the district concerned. If some stations are closed, station masters and wireless operators will automatically lose their jobs.

It is rather strange, Mr. Speaker, that, for the past ten days, because of bad weather conditions, those station masters, who are to be dismissed shortly, have worked as much as 18 hours a day, and those are the people that the CN is on the point of dismissing.

If anyone here understands this, I would like to meet him. I for one cannot understand how people who have to work 18 hours a day can be dismissed. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this company has become the business of a few people only.

Railway workers, I repeat, have been dismissed; station masters are being dismissed; the number of clients continues to decrease; revenues remain low and competent employees, tired of being directed stupidly, resign almost every week. Meanwhile, employees of some categories are on the increase. In some administrative service, there are more senior officials than supervisors and more supervisors than workers.

In my view, railways have forgotten their mission and the recommendations of the MacPherson Commission, as applied until now, have been a failure.

In order to ensure, first of all, more security, sections should be brought back to a maximum of 20 miles. That would be a starting point. Considering that there are more supervisors than workers, any private company in similar circumstances would be unable to operate within its budget.

Since the CN is reducing its income because it has too many official or semi-official technocrats, I wonder if we should not copy Swedes and Norwegians who a few years ago cleaned up the administration of their railways.

The government should also take into consideration the case of CN retired employees. As the industrial and technological development is not solving the unemployment problem, new means should be devised. Premature retirement by those wishing and requesting it would improve the living conditions of the young people and would wage war against unemployment.

Where there exist well established retirement plans, like in the CN, serious thought should be given to early retirement so as to provide as much employment as possible for young people entering the labour market. In turn, this would encourage young people to organize their lives in a decent way in a rich country like ours.

Mr. Speaker, we know that there have been many consultations with insurance companies as to the methods for developing pension plans for employees.

Since we know insurance companies, while keeping within the law, can achieve incomes of several million dollars a year, it is clear that the consultants on loan from these companies are not the ones to tell us what they should do to pay out more.

So, as the Canadian National pension fund was never set up to be a lucrative organization, it is evident that an increase in pension benefits of that company has long been imperative. Since 1952, Canadian National employees have partially accepted payments of 2½ or 3 per cent interest on their contributions in order to consolidate their reserve capital, and in return they received increased pension benefits.

At the end of 1968, the reserve capital of the Canadian National pension fund was almost $1.5 billion.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NATIONAL PARKS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR DESCRIPTION OF AREA NEAR VAL MARIE-KILLDEER TO BE INCLUDED IN PROPOSED PARK

Mr. John Burton (Regina East) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of a description of the area which the federal government would like to see incorporated in the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area.

He said: Mr. Speaker, for some years there has been discussion about the possibility of developing a grassland park in the southern portion of Saskatchewan which would take advantage of a few of the remaining areas of native grasses. This would make available to the people of Canada in perpetuity an area of grassland and open range country which still exists in its native form and natural state. This matter has aroused considerable interest in the province of Saskatchewan, in the southern area of the province and many of the communities located nearby. A number of organizations and societies have expressed interest in it. Some problems have been encountered in the negotiations between the government of Saskatchewan and the government of Canada, and a few remain to be resolved.

It is not my purpose today to go into the problems, the advantages or possible disadvantages of this park. What I am asking today, as a member of parliament is to have access to information to which I submit I have a right. That is the issue this afternoon. As I understand the situation, a good part of the proposed area is located in the constituency of Assiniboia. At the time I originally made inquiries that constituency was not represented but, of course, today it is very ably represented in this House.

Mr. Speaker, on May 3, 1971, I requested some papers in the following terms:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the following documents with respect to the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area (a) all correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan on this park since January 1, 1964 (b) all correspondence between the government of Canada and other interested persons and organizations since January 1, 1964, concerning the proposed park (c) an outline of plans for development of this park.

I obtained that information in October or November, 1971, when it was tabled in this House. The correspondence and documents make a volume two inches thick. Later, I pointed out to the then parliamentary secretary that some of the information requested and ordered by the House was not there, namely, an outline of plans for the development of this park. That information is still outstanding.

Looking through the documents, I was interested in one in particular so, on October 27, 1971, I moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of a report prepared for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by Kaplan Consulting Associates Limited, entitled "Economic Impact Study of Alternative National Park Proposals at Val Marie, Saskatchewan.

That was tabled on December 16, 1971 approximately and is a fairly substantial document as well. A note added to the text of this document reads:

This report was prepared by Kaplan Consulting Associates Limited of Montreal in 1968 to provide further background data regarding the economic impact of establishing a national park near Val Marie, Saskatchewan. The report does not represent the current situation with respect to boundary alternatives or discussions with the present government of Saskatchewan. Further, the economic circumstances in the area may have changed since the report was commissioned.

Now, the fact that boundary alternatives are mentioned confirms that one or more set of boundaries for the park are being considered. What I have attempted to obtain during the last session and by this motion is:

—a copy of a description of the area which the federal government would like to see incorporated in the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area.

I deliberately worded the motion in this way, recognizing that the matter is still under negotiation and that any proposals the federal government may have at the present time are not necessarily final. Of course, the Saskatchewan government may have views on this matter as well. However, the note appended to the motion for papers tabled last November indicates that there is at least one boundary alternative and probably another indicated at the present time. I submit that the government should make available all the information it has on this subject at the present time because of the widespread interest in the matter. There is no reason for the information not being available. There is considerable interest and discussion amongst the local residents in the area between Val Marie and Killdeer, Saskatchewan. They have a pretty good idea of what the government has in mind, though some of the rumours are not too well founded I am sure but others are probably based on good information.

What the government is trying to do has a good deal of merit if certain problems can be worked out but we, as Members of Parliament, do not have access to this information. We do not know what the federal government is discussing with the government of Saskatchewan and with some of the local residents. This illustrates this government's penchant for secrecy. If pressed on the point, I believe that the minister and the parliamentary secretary would say that there is no reason for this information not being made available in a general way. Probably they were told by some of the bureaucrats in their department that it should not be made available. Some of the bureaucrats probably feel that they would have a little less control or power if the information were released. I submit that this has to come to an end, Mr. Speaker. It is about time that the people of Canada and their representatives had access to this type of information.

As I indicated earlier, I deliberately worded my motion in a way that would take into account the fact that there has been no final decision on this matter. It provides scope for the government to qualify any information tabled in the House on the basis that it is a tentative proposal, that there are several proposals under consideration or that this proposal could be amended in the future. I would have no objection to such qualifications. That is the case with the motion for papers that I mentioned earlier, where a qualifying paragraph was necessary at the beginning of the document which was tabled. If there is any particular problem about the wording of the motion, I would be happy to amend it to give consideration to any areas of sensitivity. Basically, I say again that I think this type of information should be made available to members of the House of Commons. I urge the government to make sure that members of the House are not denied rightful access to information respecting public affairs and the expenditure of the public's money. That is money over which we are supposed to be exercising control.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate on the motion of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), which reads in part as follows:

for a copy of a description of the area which the federal government would like to see incorporated in the proposed second national park in Saskatchewan to be situated in the Val Marie-Killdeer area.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy for me to speak on this motion, since development of the first national park in Quebec was started in my riding in 1970. We have had all sorts of problems in connection with designation of the area and expropriation of land.

I want to start by giving you the background of the Forillon National Park, and remind hon. members that on May 29, 1963, in the first speech I made in this House, I pointed out the importance of establishing a national park in the Gaspé Peninsula. I had hoped that such a park could be developed as a centennial project.

Having explained my project to the minister and submitted it to the Quebec provincial secretary, I was told that it could not be realized as the province was not at that time prepared to give up land to the Canadian government for the development of such a park.

Still trying to take steps in order to obtain a national park in the Gaspé Peninsula, the Eastern Quebec Planning Bureau recommended in a study on the economic and social development of the Gaspé Peninsula that, in view of the touristic appeal of the area, a national park be mentioned in the Ottawa-Quebec agreement.

As well as being nature conservation areas, large provincial and federal parks have now become important tourist attractions. The Gaspé Peninsula offers interesting natural sites which have remained untouched and which are being developed in order to give visitors open air recreational facilities.

I congratulate the mover of this motion for having pointed out earlier the importance of national parks, but I think he forgot to mention the wonderful work which the present government is doing towards conservation of our land.

The province of Quebec and the federal Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have agreed in principle on having a national park in the Gaspé Peninsula.

According to the law, the government of the province was then to purchase and lease to the federal government, free of charge, for such time and on such conditions as would be mutually acceptable, the territory designated as the park.

The mover insisted a while ago on the necessity for the province to agree on having the park; it seems Saskatchewan is willing to do so.

But, Mr. Speaker, when it was decided that there would be a park in the Forillon Peninsula, needless to say many tried to speculate on the sale of the land.

A few weeks before the signature of an agreement for the development of the park, even a provincial department took the liberty of granting some prospectors an oil exploratory permit in the Forillon Peninsula where the park was to be located. Far from me, Mr. Speaker, the idea of implicating provincial officials about the grant of an exploratory permit a few weeks before the signature of the agreement, but the newspapers at the time not only suggested that the transaction was questionable, but that it showed lack of communication between two departments within the same government.

In order to prevent speculation in the transaction of land to develop the Forillon National Park, the Quebec government—that is, the National Assembly—introduced in July 1970, Bill 29, an Act concerning the Forillon Park and adjoining areas. The purpose of the bill was to enable the Quebec government to purchase quickly and transfer to the Canadian government the necessary land for the development of the Forillon Park.

The bill was also aimed at preventing, until June 30, 1971, except for agricultural purposes and in certain exceptional cases, any building, rebuilding, transformation, addition or new implantation of buildings as well as drawing up any plans for divisions or subdivisions in this area.

Section 4 of the act is very explicit and provides for deposit of the plan pertaining to the park. It reads as follows:

4. Deposit of the plan mentioned in article 792 of the Code of Civil Procedure carries with it, as of right, rescinding of any grants or licences of occupation or leases granted under the Lands and Forests Act or the Colonization Land Sales Act covering public lands included in the Forillon Park area as described in Schedule A. For the sole purpose of compensation payments, the owner of such a right is deemed to have been expropriated.

By way of this legislation, the Quebec National Assembly forestalled all potential speculation in the area. When the government decided to develop an airport at Sainte-Scholastique, the Department of Transport proceeded likewise, depositing all the plans and tenders and stipulating all the lands to be expropriated, in order to avoid speculation.

Last fall, I went to Washington wish a group of members of this House to study the operation of national parks. I was therefore able to see that in the United States they also have problems when determining the location of a historical site or a national park.

Mr. Speaker, there are always some citizens who are interested in speculation and this is only human. And when public funds are involved, many are not overly scrupulous.

This government, and in particular the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), wishes to stimulate the tourist industry in this country as well as the development of the national parks system so as to ensure the preservation of immense Canadian stretches of land in their natural state, and this in order that present and future generations may enjoy them. This House must pay tribute to the minister responsible for national parks for his magnificent work and initiatives.

I cannot figure out why a member would want the minister to make public the description of an area that he wishes to include into a park project, even before the end of negotiations with the province.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I must say that the master plan for the development of the Forillon National Park is finished and, after looking at the plans and specifications, it is possible to conclude that this park will become one of the most interesting in Canada as, for the first time, the Park Branch intends to include cultural and human interpretation.

The geological and biological attractions of Forillon are truly extraordinary and, by themselves, they provide very eminent examples of nature's marvels. Recognition will be given to the historical value of the site through conservation and interpretation. Visitors to Gaspé will be able to appreciate Forillon for its natural marvels where man will be seen as part of nature and integrated into a dynamic environment. The whole project will provide a unique example of harmony between man, earth and sea. Forillon Park will be an inspiration to our people in its consideration of man's relation to nature.

[English]

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of interest and anticipation that I involve myself in this debate on the matter of disclosing a description of the boundaries of a park in part of my constituency. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) suggested there should be some secrecy within the area of negotiations. I suggest to him this is not the case.

The particular land involved in the area of Killdeer-Val Marie is Crown owned land. I suspect there is no room for any type of speculation in that area. I point out to the hon. member for Gaspé that there is quite a difference between drawing up a park for the area of Killdeer-Val Marie and drawing up one for any particular area of the Gaspé. It was a nice treat to hear a description of his park. Some day I would like to visit it. However, I question the value of such a description in relation to the matter at hand. The question is a simple matter of asking the government to disclose the suggested boundaries for the area of a park in southern Saskatchewan.

During the recent by-election, I travelled in that part of the country. There was a considerable amount of concern as to the nature of this park and how it would affect the livelihood of such areas as Mankota, which is dependent upon the cattle raised on the grazing land around the proposed park. The government has been good enough, and I say this with some hesitation, to give copies of reports to the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) concerning this park. It does not seem inclined to give a description of the park in terms of the boundaries involved.

Although this may seem minor in many ways, a question does arise. I think it is an important matter when members of the House of Commons, who are directly involved in the problem of the creation of a national park in their area, are not informed as to the suggested boundaries of that park and are not informed of the other proposals in relation to that park or how it will affect the people involved. I can go along with the statement that this is a unique area of grazing land and a unique area of Canada in terms of its beauty. There is no question about that. However, there are questions as to how to keep the grazing land in that area trimmed. If it gets too long, it can be easily swallowed up by prairie fires. Some academic in a department drawing up plans for a park does not realize that most of this grazing land must be utilized to avoid prairie fires, since this is one of the most dried out parts of Saskatchewan.

The suggested boundaries for the park do not take into consideration the uniqueness of the particular area. It is a cattle producing area, and the lifestyle of the people is inclined toward being adventuresome; it is unique in comparison to the lifestyle of other Canadians. It is important to keep in mind that this is a part of their heritage. It was they who originally pioneered and developed the area in terms of its use in the cattle industry. If these people are removed from that area, what will be the economic effect on the town of Mankota which receives the benefit from something in the neighbourhood of $1 million in cattle sales each year?

One does not want to get excited about the government's proposal, or become involved in a long and lengthy discussion of it, without knowing some particulars of this suggested park, such as the boundaries. These boundaries should be made known to the public and, in particular, members of parliament. This information would allow the member for Assiniboia, myself at the moment, to meet with these people and discuss these matters. If such information were available, a considerable amount of the hearsay and misunderstanding in connection with setting up a second national park in this area, or the question of setting one up at all would be eliminated. There are many questions involved.

I hope the government will listen to the legitimate requests of the hon. member for Regina East and myself for a description of the boundaries of this proposed national park.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this subject. Perhaps it might be a worthwhile exercise to go into some of the history of our parklands. If one wants to make a good assessment, he would probably have to go back many years. In fact, it was three centuries ago when our forefathers inherited the forest, lakes and rivers which are today within the boundaries of our national parks. For many years these elements were often regarded as enemies to be overcome before the country could be developed.

We are strongly marked by the fact that for many years our history was influenced by the fight against the domination of nature. At some stage in the development of our nation, a problem of considerable import forced itself on our conscience. We became aware that misuse, together with a lack of foresight and planning, caused considerable and perhaps irreparable damage to beautiful regions of our country. This becomes a serious matter when a striking and unique example of our natural national heritage is destroyed. Decisions are needed. Definite measures are necessary to correct this situation. Every community must decide upon the format for its economic, social and cultural development and the use of its land. Conservation is an essential element in a comprehensive policy of land development. At every level of political and governmental structure, conservation must be given due consideration each time the fate of any park or other land is decided upon. This is true of the municipal, the provincial and federal levels.

• (1730)

More precisely, all governments must assume a policy of conservation for the purpose of providing green areas and reserving natural beauty spots where the balance of nature, wildlife and other elements may be maintained and may evolve freely. At the national level our conservation policy has taken concrete form in the creation of 19 national parks, covering an area of 30,000 square miles or more.

The first of these parks, Banff National Park in the Rocky mountains, dates from the last century when those holding political office had the necessary foresight to reserve under state protection a tract of land, including sulphurous waters and springs, in a magnificent mountain setting bearing traces of the passage of glaciers that centuries ago chiselled out the features of our country. All types of flora and fauna abounded in this area. Alpine meadows covered with delicate growth, animals such as the dangerous cougar and the great grizzly bear, and less terrifying species such as herd elk, deer and moose, wild sheep and goats, made the mountain slopes their home.

Mr. Skoberg: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am glad someone is listening.

Mr. Burton: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) on a point of order.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, my point of order has to do with the relevance of the very interesting remarks being made by the hon. member to the motion under consideration, which concerns whether or not certain documents should be made available to this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) on the point of order, if he wishes to assist the Chair.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am just coming to that point, Mr. Speaker. I am learning fast from opposition members and giving them some of their own back. You cannot sit here for as long as I have without at times acting as they do. May I continue?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I thought the hon. member for St. Boniface might want to speak to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton). I have considerable sympathy for the point made by the hon. member for Regina East, but I understand the hon. member for St. Boniface is making preliminary or introductory remarks. I invite him to lead very quickly into the matter now before the chamber.
